House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, March 17, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 153, respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 154, to incorporate "North American Relations Foundation".—Mr. Jacobs.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing) moved:

That the first report of the select committee on standing orders presented on Thursday, 10th March, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEES—PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Sir Henry Drayton be substituted for that of Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast) on the select committee on standing orders, and that the name of Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast) be substituted for that of Sir Henry Drayton on the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171, to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Explain.

Mr. HEENAN: The purpose of this bill is to give permission to the labour unions of Canada to register their labels and to prevent the use of forgeries or counterfeits. While giving the right to unions to register labels, the bill provides that no label can be placed on any goods without the consent of the proprietor of such goods. A similar protection is given to the labour unions in many states of the union and in Great Britain.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the first reading of Bill No. 152 (from the Senate) to amend the Canada Evidence Act as respects bank books and records.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MARITIME PROVINCES ARCHIVIST

Mr. BELL (St. John-Albert):

1. Is there an archivist for the maritimes?
2. If so, what is his name, the date of appointment, and salary?
3. Do his duties require him to be in the maritime provinces?
4. How many months is it since he visited the offices in Saint John and Halifax?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.
2. Dr. J. D. Logan—16th February, 1925—$2,520.
3. Yes, unless it is desirable in the interests of his office and the department for him to visit other places.
4. About five months.

PEACE RIVER TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Is it the intention of the government to build a telephone line in the Peace river country?
2. If so, for what distance?
3. Between what points?
4. Have tenders been invited?
5. Will consideration be given to seniority of service of applicants who tender for the work?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

Nos. 1 to 5. Matter under consideration,

PATRONAGE IN SOUTH ESSEX

Mr. GOTT:

1. Who holds the patronage for the constituency of Essex South?
2. Must all governmental undertakings be passed by him before they become operative?
3. Is it the intention of the government to adhere stricly to the line of party patronage in Essex South?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask Your Honour's ruling on this question. It seems to me to belong to a class of questions that should not be permitted to appear on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will examine the point.

MISSION CITY—PUBLIC BUILDING SITE

Mr. BARBER:

1. Was a site purchased at Mission City, British Columbia, for public building?
2. If so, when was it purchased?
3. What price was paid?
4. What was the total revenue from the Mission City post office for the year 1926?
5. How many rural routes are served through the Mission City post office?
6. How many boxes on each route?
7. What is the post office accommodation at present at Mission City?
8. If premises leased, what is the rental?
9. To whom is rental paid?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.
2. January, 1913.
3. $6,000.
4. $6,669.21.
5. None.
6. Answered by No. 5.

7, 8 and 9. Eight hundred and fifteen square feet is provided for postal purposes in a building owned by the postmaster. The postmaster is granted a rent allowance of five hundred dollars a year based on the revenue.

DAWSON POST OFFICE

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Was a vacancy in the post office at Dawson, Yukon, filled during November or December last, by temporary appointment made without reference to the Civil Service Commission and without the preference to be given to applicants who are returned soldiers?
2. If so, will an opportunity be afforded returned soldiers to apply for and compete by examination for appointment to said position, and when?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes, temporary appointment.
2. Yes, if permanent appointment becomes necessary.

STEAMER PELEE

Mr. GOTT:

1. What is the cash subsidy paid to the steamer Pelee for the year 1927?
2. When was the contract drawn for the 1927 season?
3. On whose recommendation was it passed?
4. Is the following item which appeared in The Amherst Echo on March 25th correct.

"The steamer Pelee subsidy has been cut to $11,000—a reduction of $2,750—according to the budget brought down in the Dominion House this week."

[Mr. Gott.]

5. Will the government please explain?
6. Is the government aware that the company to whom the subsidy is granted has paid high dividends for some years past—having paid as high as 25 per cent?
7. Was there any attempt made this season to reduce the subsidy as promised by the department in July last?

Hon. Mr. MALCOLM:

1. The contract subsidy is $11,000.
2. The contract is dated February 25, 1927.
3. The recommendation of the minister.
4. No. While the subsidy is $11,000 it has stood at this figure for several years. There is only an apparent decrease in 1927-28, due to the fact that there was an increase of $2,750 included in the esimates for 1926-27, to cover a similar amount remaining unpaid from the year 1925-26, due to the fact that the steamship company sent in their subsidy claim for the last quarter of their contract after the books of the Auditor General had closed for 1925-26. This amount, therefore, had to be paid out of 1926-27 funds and provision made therefor in the estimates.
5. Answered by No. 4.
6. No. From information in the department it would appear that the average profit is very moderate.
7. No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

FARM INDEBTEDNESS OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. CARMICHAEL:

1. How many farms in the province of Saskatchewan are mortgaged?
2. How many have first mortgages?
3. How many have second, third, and fourth mortgages?
4. What is the total mortgage debt of Saskatchewan farms?
5. How many farmers in Saskatchewan were assessable under the Dominion Income Tax Act for the last preceding year?
6. What is the total federal provincial, urban, and rural debt of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba, respectively?
7. How many farms in each of the three prairie provinces have Dominion seed and relief loans against them, and what is the total of such in each province?
8. How much money is invested in farm machinery in Saskatchewan?
9. How much money is owing by farmers on such farm machinery in the said province?

IRON AND STEEL—EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

1. What quantity of iron and steel and their products, of all grades and classes—specifying the grades and quantities, naming the country of origin and the value in grades and classes—was imported into Canada for the year ending in January, 1927?
2. What quantity of iron and steel and their products, of all grades and classes—specifying the grades and quantities, showing the provinces of origin in Canada, the country of destination and the value in grades and classes—was exported from Canada for the year ending in January, 1927?

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the government arrived at a decision as to whether or not it will introduce at this session a measure for the revision of civil service salaries?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A decision has not been arrived at as yet. The matter is still under consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ROSEDALE BRANCH

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to extend the time for two years for the completion of the joint section of the Canadian National railway branch line from Rosedale southwesterly, in the province of Alberta, authorized by chapter 30 of the statutes of 1924.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR SEED POTATOES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): On Tuesday the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) asked for certain information respecting the refrigerator car service in Prince Edward Island. I have made inquiries and I find that between the 1st and the 15th of March, 181 refrigerator cars were delivered to the island. There are 30 cars on hand at Cape Tormentine this morning, which will be ferried across to-day. There are 27 cars in transit from Halifax and Moncton for the cape to-day, due to-morrow morning at the island; also 78 cars in transit from Montreal to Riviere du Loup. That makes a total of 135 cars at the cape or in transit, for loading. The railway management is informed that the requirements call for 200 cars, but the 135 cars which are now at the cape or in transit will provide sufficient for at least three days loading, and a further supply will be moved out of Montreal to-morrow.

LIMITATION OF NAVAL ARMAMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a despatch from Washington to the effect that Canada is not going to be asked to the conference on naval armament limitation. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if, in view of our improved national status, he is going to take any action to uphold our dignity in this matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If my hon. friend refers to the same despatch which I have seen, I hardly think it would be proper to express an opinion on a despatch that comes to us from Washington, but which relates to matters of which the government itself has no knowledge. I think we may well wait to see what action may be taken by the United States government before commenting on the despatch.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES—SEAPLANE PROTECTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): May I call the attention of the government to the necessity for a prompt decision as to what they are going to do about a seaplane service for the protection of the fisheries of the Pacific coast. I understand that there is an alternative system offered by private service, but unless a decision is made soon it will be too late, because the season is coming on and the protection will soon be required.

RURAL MAIL BOX

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I inquire from the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) if he has been able to come to a decision in regard to rural mail boxes? As I understand it, there has been some difficulty in deciding on the style of box to be used, and in the meantime routes are being held up because of the want of these boxes. It seems to me a rather awkward situation that should not be allowed to continue.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): The establishment of any rural route is not being held up in consequence of the Postmaster General not yet having arrived at a decision as to the style of boxes to be adopted. I have not reached a decision, however, as to the style of boxes, but I expect to within a few days.

MARITIME CLAIMS COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my hon. friend opposite and to the House that I had expected to make a statement to-day with respect to the royal commission on maritime claims. Unfortunately, I have been delayed in the matter. I will promise it by Monday at the latest, but I hope to be able to give the statement to the House on the orders of the day to-morrow.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

RE-INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): I have received more than a dozen letters in the last week from farmers of the west asking me what the government is going to do in regard to the measures that were before the House last year, but which failed to become law owing to the dissolution of parliament. The farmers of the west are very anxious to know what is going to be done; they do not wish to see these measures go by the board, and they are afraid that some of these measures might not be re-introduced in this parliament at all. I have a letter here from P. B. Anderson, of Tofield, Alberta, dated March 8, 1927, and reading as follows:

Dear Sir:

At the untimely dissolution of the last Dominion parliament there were several important measures that went "in the wash". I am referring especially to the Agricultural Credits bill and to the amendments to the Grain Act. Those two measures, it seems to me, are of the greatest importance to us farmers of western Canada. We are therefore keenly and anxiously watching and waiting to know what will be done with them at this session of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot by way of quoting from a letter state what he could not state verbally himself. He has put his question to the government, and he cannot go on to comment on the grievance.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what is going to be done with the amendments to the Grain Act.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can assure my hon. friend that the amendments to the Grain Act will be brought down in due course. I fully expected that they would have been brought down before this, but other legislation had to take precedence. They will be brought down following the report on the maritimes.

[Mr. Veniot.]

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I should like to read a resolution passed by the corporation of the town of Whitby, opposing the Georgian bay canal—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will kindly table the resolution or place a question on the order paper. That is the regular proceeding.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

The House resumed from March 15 consideration in committee of Bill No. 149, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915—Hon. Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—Printers, etc., to be deemed producers or manufacturers.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked the minister the other day a question regarding the amount of business that had to be transacted before the section could apply. The matter is one of regulation?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I daresay that other members have received, as I have done, a circular letter from the Retail Trade Bureau of Canada dealing with this phase of the bill, and if the matter is one of regulation it is unnecessary to discuss it further than to ask the government to give it that attention which the memorandum warrants.

Mr. ROBB: The minister who administers the act has the matter under consideration, but it is not sufficiently advanced to justify a report upon it.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—When paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6 of section 5 and section 6 come into force.

Mr. BENNETT: Why July 6?

Mr. ROBB: That is the date the returns come in for the previous quarter.

Mr. BENNETT: If you make it July 6 there will be several days in that month to which the old rates will apply and the returns will have to be made accordingly. The date should be changed. As it stands it rather complicates than simplifies matters.

Mr. ROBB: This is the date proposed by the department.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister will have to reconsider it. It is true that the returns for the previous quarter come in on the sixth of July, but the banks will make up the statement for the previous month on the first day of August.

Mr. ROBB: They will have until the sixth to collect.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, but on the first day of August the banks will have to send in their accounts for the stamp tax up to July sixth. That is what they will have to do according to the bill as it stands, and that is not the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will see that according to the printed explanation of this section it is not intended that the tax shall continue for the quarter beginning the first day of July, 1927, but the statute distinctly says that it shall.

Mr. ROBB: The department, having considered the matter, has proposed the date here fixed. They will have until July 6 to make the returns.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter does not require any argument. If the statute is not repealed until July 6, then obviously the old law will apply to the first six days of that month. No argument is necessary.

Mr. ROBB: The Department of Justice has ruled that if the old law is repealed as from the first day of the month we shall not be able to collect for the previous quarter.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that you might overcome that difficulty by substituting the third for the sixth, inasmuch as the first, second and third days of July are holidays. If you make it the sixth, the tax will still have to be paid for two days.

Mr. ROBB: I would direct my hon. friend's attention to the following provision in the Special War Revenue Act:

> Whenever an advance is made by a bank to any person by way of overdraft the bank shall, on the last day of each month, or within five days thereafter prepare a statement showing the maximum amount of the overdraft...

Mr. BENNETT: The language of the bill rather disguises thought.

Mr. ROBB: I am going by the Justice department.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the Department of Justice ever said that.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ROBB moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the motion for the third reading of this bill I beg to move an amendment in the following terms:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> In the opinion of this House the application of sales tax in respect of personal clothing and boots and shoes places a heavy and unnecessary burden upon the people of Canada, and should be discontinued.

I have endeavoured to frame this amendment in accordance with the rules of the House, Mr. Speaker, but it may be that in the result I would have been able only to express what Your Honour has time and again described as a pious aspiration on the part of the House. This amendment really involves the opinion of this House in regard to the propriety of maintaining the present sales tax upon personal wearing apparel and boots and shoes.

In discussing the budget some days ago I went rather thoroughly into the question of the sales tax and on this occasion I do not intend to more than mention the matter. We are all aware that the sales tax which has existed in Canada for the past two years has been a direct tax of five per cent upon many household necessities. Food has largely been exempted since the institution of that tax. The sales tax was originally placed upon commodities because the needs of the treasury were very great at the time because of war expenditures which were piling up, but even at that trying time it was considered proper to exclude food from that tax. As originally imposed, that tax was at the rate of three per cent; the present government, or its predecessors in office, raised the tax to six per cent and then reduced it to five per cent, at which figure it has remained until the present time. Among those necessities of life which are subject to this tax are personal clothing and boots and shoes.

In the budget this year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) proposed to reduce that tax from five per cent to four per cent, an announcement which will be very welcome, of course, throughout Canada. But that four per cent will still be levied upon the clothing and the boots and shoes of the people of this country. I think I am within the opinion of the House when I say it is the general desire of hon. members here that this tax as against these specified articles should be discontinued. From the manner in which this government proposes to go on spending money during the next six months, as evidenced by the estimates which have been going through day after day, it is apparent to all that the treasury can easily forego the small amount of tax which will be derived from clothing and boots and shoes, in comparison with the vast bulk of the revenue of Canada. We have already voted large sums of money—in many instances unnecessarily—for expenditure this year, which sums might well be saved to the treasury, and as we proceed further with the estimates we will come upon almost page after page of similar and larger votes. By the practise of a little economy large amounts could be saved; by the practise of that economy it would be absolutely unnecessary to impose a tax on clothing and boots and shoes. We all use clothing and we must all wear boots and shoes; this tax is a burden upon every class of our citizens but, like all taxes, it is felt most by those in the poorer walks of life, and it will be a great relief to the ordinary people of Canada if this tax is discontinued. I would like to have the opinion of this House upon this subject, and for that purpose I have moved this amendment.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the observation of my hon. friend that the sales tax is an expense to the country, and particularly the sales tax on boots and shoes and clothing, no person will find fault. Everyone admits that the sales tax adds to the cost of each commodity, and with the sentiment that as quickly as possible we should get rid of this tax we on this side of the House are in accord. That has been the policy of this government; we have been gradually reducing the sales tax.

I had occasion earlier this session to quote figures showing that at one time the sales tax on boots and shoes could have been pyramided until it was about eight per cent, but generally speaking at no time then was this tax on boots and shoes less than seven per cent. Under the act brought in by Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, I do not recall the year, we reduced the sales tax to a flat six per cent as the maximum; in 1924 we reduced the sales tax on all materials, and indeed on many commodities required on the farm that tax was eliminated altogether. On articles required for production, such as agricultural implements, dairy utensils and articles used by fishermen and lumbermen the tax was eliminated altogether, and the general tax was reduced to a maximum of five per cent. But the sales tax on boots and shoes, which was previously as high as eight per cent and in most cases seven per cent, was reduced by this government in 1924 to a maximum of two and one-half per cent. Under the legislation of this year we have again reduced the sales tax on boots and shoes to two per cent—the maximum on boots and shoes now is two per cent—and we have also reduced the sales tax on clothing to four per cent.

Let me point this out to my hon. friend before I come to what I regard as the most serious objection to his amendment: As regards clothing you cannot take the sales tax off an ordinary suit of clothes such as members of parliament require, without taking the sales tax also off high priced gowns, sealskin jackets, and all the other costly articles of feminine apparel. So the question is one of fairness in that regard. Is it not better that we should have lowered the sales tax as we did by a gradual reduction of twenty per cent all along the line, rather than have picked out a few articles of commerce and reduced the tax on those. But there was another and more serious reason. I think I can prove to my hon. friend that it is not in the general interests of the people he represents in parliament that we should take the whole of this sales tax off at once. There are throughout this country many merchants—in fact hundreds even thousands of merchants—with their stock bought. They have bought that stock on the basis of the sales tax as it exists. If you wipe that sales tax off at one stroke you do a great injury to many small merchants, particularly small country merchants, throughout Canada. I am convinced—I am free to admit it now—that in 1924 when we reduced the sales tax from six per cent to two and one-half per cent we made a mistake. We made a mistake because we placed many small merchants throughout the country in an embarrassing position. Letters came to the department from all over Canada asking for a rebate, and telling us: We have bought our stock; we bought those stocks of boots and shoes on the basis of a six per cent sales tax, and you have at one stroke reduced that sales tax to 2½ per cent. To that extent you have taken away our profits. You have placed a competitor who may come and open a store right opposite to us in such a position that we are not able to compete with him. I suggest to my hon. friend that if his amendment is adopted he will be doing great injury to many merchants throughout this country. In proof of that I have the statement, prepared after very careful consideration, of the Retail Merchants Association. I will admit at once that the large departmental stores that get rid of their stock quickly might look with favour upon this amendment, but the country merchants will not regard it with very great favour, because, as the Retail Merchants Association represent to us, there are hundreds and thousands of merchants throughout the Dominion who say they cannot afford to absorb this reduction of the sales tax all at once. Now since the budget has been brought down, to be accurate no later than the day before yesterday, a delegation of the Retail Trade Bureau came to my office and said: Mr. Robb, you were right in making this gradual reduction. We can stand that, we can absorb it. I say right now that the policy of the government is, in so far as possible, to get rid of this sales tax gradually.

There is just one other point. It seems to me that if this amendment goes through it will have the effect of killing the whole reduction that I have introduced, the gradual twenty per cent reduction on all other lines. For that reason I am opposed to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. ROBB: Do you regard the resolution as in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of opinion that the amendment is in order and I am fortified in this view by the opinions of May and Bourinot. According to Bourinot, page 431:

All the authorities go to show that, when the government have formally submitted to the House the question for the revision of customs and excise duties, it is competent for a member "to propose in committee to substitute another tax of equivalent amount for that proposed by ministers, the necessity of new taxation to a given extent being declared on behalf of the crown".

And Bourinot adds:

It is also competent for any member to propose another scheme of taxation for the same purpose, as a substitute for the government plan. But it is not regular to propose a new and distinct tax, which is not a mere increase or diminution of a duty upon an article already recommended by government for taxation, though it is the function of this committee to impose rather than to repeal taxes.

And here again:

But nevertheless numerous instances will be found in Canadian, as well as English, practice, of committees having been appointed to consider questions of taxation, notwithstanding the opposition of the government. The whole question came up in 1877 in the Canadian House, and Mr. Speaker Anglin decided, in accordance with English precedents, that it is open to a committee to whom a question of taxation is referred, "to express an abstract opinion as to the expediency or inexpediency of imposing a duty."

Then May, page 390, lays down this rule:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill.

It might be argued that this is not a second reading, but on this point page 421, May also says that on the third reading of a bill, such amendments as have been described in reference to a second reading may be proposed to the question for now reading the bill.

In my opinion when only an abstract opinion on a matter of taxation is presented by way of amendment it is permissible. The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye". Those opposed to the amendment will please say "nay".

Mr. CANNON: Before the question is put—

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is out of order, the question has been put.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order. The question has been put and I submit that no discussion can now take place.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please. The hon. leader of the opposition is right. The question was put. Does the hon. member wish to speak to a point of order?

Mr. CANNON: I rose and asked Your Honour not to put the question, but notwithstanding my request the question was put. Technically Your Honour is right and if the leader of the opposition wishes to take advantage of that technicality—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There are, of course, amenities which should be observed in debate. I did not see the hon. gentleman rise at the time stated by him, and I leave it to the House to say whether or not the hon. member should be given an opportunity to state his point now. It is true that I put the question, and that the hon. gentleman is not in order in seeking to state his point now, but we must observe amenities here and I take it the House will allow the hon. gentleman to proceed.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to support my hon. leader's point of order. I quite agree with what you now suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. Solicitor General had risen before you put the question he would be entitled to proceed. But the question was put before my hon. friend rose in his place.

Mr. CANNON: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no desire to prevent my hon. friend from speaking, but at the same time we must have some reasonable observance of the rules.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that seated where I am, I am in a position to judge whether the Solicitor General was on his feet and had addressed his question to Your Honour before Your Honour put the question to the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

An hon. MEMBER: You had your back to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Even with my back to the Solicitor General I heard him say to Mr. Speaker that he wished to raise a point of order before His Honour put the question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to say on the point of order that there should be the same rule for to-day as for yesterday. Hansard corroborates the position which I took yesterday. No amenity was shown yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will state again that I had not seen the Solicitor General. He states that he rose—and I must take his word—before I had put the question. If there is not unanimous consent I must proceed by putting the question.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Guthrie) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. ROWE: I was paired with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I voted for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition because it meant a reduction in taxation, which I think is in keeping generally with the policy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friends will find I am in order before I get through, perhaps to their regret rather than their satisfaction. I am opposed to the continuation of both the sales tax and the customs tariff, in so far as they impose a tax especially on the necessaries of life. Without any long discussion, as my hon. friends seem worried about it, let me say that I think every argument advanced by the hon. leader of the opposition is a valid argument also in respect of the customs tariff, and in that case I feel satisfied he will support me when I move the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this House the application of the customs tariff in respect of personal clothing and boots and shoes places a heavy and unnecessary burden upon the people of Canada and should be discontinued.

I am delighted to note the premature approval of my amendment by some of my hon. friends to my right, but I feel satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that if they stop interrupting long enough to get the line of argument they will support the amendment as we intend to do.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Garland, Bow River), which was negatived on the following division:

INCOME WAR TAX ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 150, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917—Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move:

That Bill No. 150 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend it by inserting after the word "tax" in the second line the words "on incomes under ($5,000) five thousand dollars".

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not consider the amendment in order. The House has already expressed its judgment on a similar question and by that judgment I am bound. Unless, therefore, any hon. member desires to speak to the point I must declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: When did the House decide on the question?

Mr. SPEAKER: On Tuesday last, on an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the House gave its judgment.

Mr. IRVINE: That amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, in my recollection.

Mr. KELLNER: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the decision of the House the other day had reference to a resolution, whereas the present motion relates to a bill—a different matter entirely. If it is not permissible for a member to move an amendment either to a resolution or to a bill of this character, then I submit there is no use in our considering these matters at all. This House, in that case, certainly would have no power to make any changes whatever. This, I submit, is entirely a different matter from that upon which the decision of the House was given the other day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The figure involved in the question before the House on the previous occasion was $10,000; in this instance it is $5,000. The Chairman of the committee ruled that amendment out of order, whereupon an appeal was taken, not to the Speaker, but to the House, and the House in its judgment confirmed the Chairman's ruling. That stands, therefore, as the judgment of the House, and by it I am bound. Consequently I declare the present amendment out of order.

Mr. BOURASSA: Before you finally dispose of the question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the House is to understand that you are now rendering a decision the effect of which will be to deprive every member of the right to move any amendment to budget resolutions or to bills based upon such resolutions? If so, I suggest that the matter is very grave. If the present ruling is confined merely to its bearing upon a decision given by the House the other day upon one particular point, then I am prepared to let the matter pass. But I think the House will have to consider one of these days the very grave issue that might be raised if a new parliamentary jurisprudence were here established whereby private members were deprived of the right to move amendments to budget resolutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not suggest that I differ from the hon. member; I am ruling on a specific case which has already been decided by the House, and as I have already said I am bound by that decision. Any decision given by the House is binding upon the Speaker, and in ruling the present amendment out of order I am merely giving expression to the judgment of the House as rendered on a similar question. It is the same with resolutions; they must be considered, if carried, as judgments of the House, and for that reason the House should carefully weigh any resolution or motion presented. I am not now passing judgment on the question as to how far a private member may go in moving amendments to tariff or budget resolutions. It is not necessary that I should read again the motion made the other day and the ruling of the Chair upon it. As I have already indicated, I am now merely ruling in conformity with the judgment of the House on that particular question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just for information, Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this ruling of yours to-day, following the decision of the House the other day, creates a precedent with regard to what may be done?

Mr. SPEAKER: That, of course, will depend upon the next Speaker. If any subsequent Speaker takes my ruling as a precedent, so much the better for me and for my reputation. But the House is all-powerful in these matters and can always reverse a ruling of the Speaker. As regards the present question, I have explained that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Kellner) is framed in precisely the same terms as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the other day. It has the same purport, except for the fact that the figure is altered; and as the House confirmed the ruling of the Chairman of the committee, rejecting the previous motion, I am bound to be guided by that decision and rule this amendment out of order.

Mr. GARDINER: First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to give the authority for your decision at the present moment? In the next place, I should like to call your attention to this fact: the deputy speaker the other day gave a certain ruling which was appealed from.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will pardon me if I interrupt him. If the House is not satisfied with my ruling it may be appealed from.

Mr. GARDINER: The Deputy Speaker the other day, in committee, gave a certain ruling—

Mr. McGIBBON: There is no debate on this.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member speaking to a point of order?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: The ruling has already been given.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not understand that you had given your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declared the amendment out of order and gave my reasons.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not hear you give the ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member did not hear me he may speak.

Mr. GARDINER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I say, the Deputy Speaker gave a ruling in committee, and that ruling was appealed from. Your Honour then took the chair and the House voted on the Chairman's ruling. To-day you uphold the former ruling, not on the strength of any authorities you might quote, but because of the fact that the House had confirmed the decision of the Chairman. Now, the point I want to make is this: the Deputy Speaker in the first place is nominated by the government in power, who usually have a majority, and that being so it can be understood that when the Deputy Speaker—or the Speaker, as the case may be—gives a ruling, that ruling will be sustained by the government and its supporters. That, however, does not imply a soundness in the ruling itself, and in this instance I would appeal to you to base your decision upon the authorities rather than upon what may have happened two or three days ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: The best authority for the Speaker is the judgment of the House. The Speaker merely voices the opinion of the House. The House, having declared out of order an amendment framed precisely as the one now under discussion, I am bound, in accordance with that decision and irrespective of the authorities, to rule the present motion also out of order. A distinction must be drawn between the principle invoked by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the principle now appealed to. In my judgment there is a slight difference. In the present case I am bound by the judgment of the House, even if I were able to find authorities to the contrary.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask a question of Your Honour?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a very important point, and I should like hon. members to express their views.

Mr. COOTE: I have no view to express; I would like to ask Your Honour a question. The amendment moved the other day was an amendment to a resolution; this is an amendment to a bill. I would like Your Honour to inform the House whether the effect is the same in both cases?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is exactly the same, and I will explain why. When the resolution is passed by the committee it is reported to the Speaker and it is thereupon moved that the introduction of a bill based on such a resolution be permitted. What is contained in the resolution is contained in concrete form in the bill, so the effect is exactly the same.

Mr. WARD: Just by way of information may I ask a question of Your Honour? What is the difference between the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and the amendment just moved by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner)?

Mr. SPEAKER: Would the hon. member kindly repeat his question; I did not understand it.

Mr. WARD: I would like Your Honour to explain to the House the difference between the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and that moved by the member for Athabaska.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order. There are a number of members in this House who desire to get on with the business of the session, and while this may be very entertaining and instructive I would suggest that Your Honour start a school for the benefit of some hon. members. To keep this House waiting on a point already decided by precedent and the judgment of the House is too much of a waste of time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Exactly, but there are certain amenities of the House which must be observed. In order to satisfy the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) I would explain that the amendment moved a moment ago by the leader of the opposition was perfectly in order because it was an abstract declaration of principle. In May, thirteenth edition, I find the following:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill,—

Or a third reading:

> —to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill; or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution;

The amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition was only an abstract declaration, while the present amendment is specific, mentioning a certain figure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 62, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credit for farmers.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would like to ask whether this bill is in exactly the same form as the act that went through last session and if not, what changes have been made?

Mr. ROBB: I have not checked it carefully, but I am assured by the officers of the department that the bill is identical with the bill which left this chamber last session. I think I made that statement once before this session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Senate amendment is not included?

Mr. ROBB: No; the bill is exactly as it left this chamber last session.

Mr. ARTHURS: I presume the consent of the provinces interested is necessary to the operation of this bill, and therefore it is in the same category as various other bills dealt with this session. Has the minister any idea of how many provinces will come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ROBB: We have no information on that; we will pass the bill first and then find out.

Mr. ARTHURS: Has any effort been made to ascertain that information?

Mr. ROBB: The proper method is to pass the bill and adopt the principle and then determine whether the provinces will come in.

Mr. KENNEDY: We have had some difficulty in the last few days because we could not hear what was being said, and I wish the ministers especially would speak a little louder. I have been doing my best to catch everything the Minister of Finance said but now I do not know what it was.

Mr. ROBB: Sometimes it is better not to know.

Mr. ARTHURS: I would like to have a little further information from the minister. What provinces, if any, have applied for legislation of this kind?

Mr. ROBB: This is a government measure, introduced by the federal government. When this bill is passed it will be time to inquire whether the provinces wish to take advantage of it.

Mr. ARTHURS: The measure cannot succeed without the acquiescence of the provinces; there is no question about that. I would suggest to the minister that it would be better to ask the provinces whether or not they will come under the provisions of the bill. This measure in itself is of no use unless the provinces do take advantage of it.

Mr. ROBB: How will the provinces know whether or not they desire to coöperate in such a measure until they find out what legislation we are going to submit to them?

Mr. ARTHURS: By consultation with the provinces.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a provision here for the provinces coming in. It is in clause 8 of the bill as we all know, and the minister will find he will get his bill through much quicker by giving the necessary information rather than by refusing it—because what he said to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) was tantamount to a refusal. Now when these boards are established—I understand notice has to be given in the Canada Gazette, and until that notice is given the provinces have no part in the matter at all. But after the notice is published in the Canada Gazette, according to section 8 subsection 1—

The subscription by the government of the province to the capital stock of the board to the extent of five per cent of the total loans outstanding at any time in that province as such loans are issued.

Approval must be given to the whole scheme practically before operations are started in the province. Now the question is: Have any provinces up to the present expressed their approval of the scheme?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And have they requested the passage of this legislation?

Mr. ROBB: Well, members of this parliament who come from different provinces have asked for this legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not under my hand the resolutions passed from time to time in various provincial legislatures in favour of a scheme of farm loans, but I know that a number of such resolutions have been passed from time to time as the expression of opinion of the legislatures of some of the provinces at all events.

Mr. ARTHURS: All by the same province?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not at all.

Mr. ARTHURS: I am not opposed to the bill at all, in fact I am in favour of it, but will the minister in charge of the bill tell the committee what amendment was made to the measure by the Senate last session? They amended some provisions of the bill but I have forgotten the nature of those amendments.

Mr. LETELLIER: I should like to inform the committee that a large number of my electors in the constituency of Compton are asking for loans of this kind, and I am very anxious to see the bill adopted as soon as possible. The matter is one of great importance to the farmers there, who are in urgent need of these loans.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the minister give us the information asked for?

Mr. ROBB: I am looking up the record to see if I can find it.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. STEVENS: While the minister is looking the information up I should like to say that this is a question that has been before parliament for many years. It was very thoroughly considered at the time of the revision of the Bank Act in 1923. On that occasion, as well as in 1924, the banking committee came to the conclusion, and with the approval of the leading representative bankers, that there was need for some medium of credit such as is provided in this bill. I am not prepared to say that every detail of the bill is perfect, but personally I welcome very much the idea of rural credits. If the minister could inform us as to the amendments made by the Senate last year it would perhaps facilitate the discussion. There were one or two amendments the exact nature of which I have forgotten, but which were worthy, I think, of some consideration.

Mr. ARTHURS: While the minister is looking up the information asked for I should like to dissociate myself from any idea of opposing this measure. I look at it in the same light that we regard several other bills that have come before this House, where provincial consent is absolutely necessary before any organization can be arrived at. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Letellier) said that his constituency was in favour of this bill. Would he say that the province of Quebec has asked for legislation of this kind? I am sure he will not, and I am quite sure that the minister in charge of the bill, who is also from the province of Quebec, will not say that that province is in favour of the bill as at present before the House. We are not opposed, at least I am not opposed, to the principle of rural credit, nor am I opposed to a similar bill regarding old age pensions which has passed this House. But we do ask, and I think we have the right to ask, that this government look to the provinces and see which province, if any, is in favour of this legislation before it is passed here.

Mr. LETELLIER: If I cannot assure my hon. friend definitely that the province of Quebec, or the provincial government, is in favour of this bill, I can assure him that it was asked for last session by the provincial agricultural association, which claims that it is needed in the interest of the farmers of the province. I think I can assure my hon. friend also that if the bill is passed it will function in the province of Quebec as successfully as it does in other provinces where it is actually in operation. I would state furthermore that my hon. colleague, Mr. Goulet, has told me that in his province there is a similar law in effect which is functioning extremely well.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is in the province of Ontario.

Mr. LETELLIER: Yes, in Ontario.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend asked what changes were made in the bill in the Senate. There were some changes made of a minor character which perhaps rather improved it. But the main change made was this: If hon. gentlemen will refer to clause 7, near the top of page 5 of the bill, they will see it is provided that the interest "shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the board, to provide for the expenses of operation not exceeding one per cent of the amount of the loan." The Senate cut out the words "not exceeding one per cent of the amount of the loan."

Mr. CLARK: I regret that the minister has not paid some attention to that particular amendment of the Senate. He would be well advised to do so at this stage, because I think if he investigates he will find that it is impossible to administer the act and provide for reserves on a one per cent margin. In the first place he could not provide for reserves if the whole of the one per cent were devoted to that purpose, but the attempt to provide for administration and reserves to meet losses with one per cent is really an impossibility; it cannot be done. Why then pass a law to provide for a thing which is impossible?

Mr. WARD: Is the hon. member aware that there is at least one large farm loan organization in Canada that has been doing it, and has been paying overhead charges, and so forth, and the rate has never exceeded one per cent?

Mr. CLARK: How long has it been running?

Mr. WARD: Seven years.

Mr. CLARK: I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that if an investigation were made it would be found that in no place in the world has such a thing been achieved, and that no company could provide for losses alone on a one per cent margin. One per cent certainly does not meet the administration charges of any company that I have ever heard of, and I think an investigation in the Finance department—I believe particulars will be found in the Insurance department publications—will show that one per cent will not begin to meet administration charges and overhead. In my opinion it is impossible to provide for reserves with such a margin.

Mr. WARD: What would the hon. member consider is required to provide for the losses to which he refers?

Mr. CLARK: I am not putting myself forward as an expert to state what percentage should be provided. The department ought to be in the best position to investigate the problem of overhead and the amount required to provide for reserves. I would not arbitrarily fix any figure. I know that one per cent will not cover it. I suggest that the minister is simply inviting further interference with this bill after it has been passed out of this House. Seeing that the question was raised by an amendment of last year, why not study the suggestion of the Senate and try to meet the situation so that we shall not have these bills emasculated when they leave this House?

Mr. COOTE: The effectiveness of this bill in meeting the needs of Canadian farmers is going to depend largely on whether this one per cent is to be maintained or not. We must keep down the interest rate to the farmers who want to borrow money under the scheme, and if the rate is not held very close to one per cent over the rate paid on the bonds of the Board. I do not think the scheme will be effective in providing the farmers with money at a rate which they can afford to pay. Perhaps it will allay the fears of my hon. friend if he learns that the long term farm loan system in the United States has been operating on this basis of one per cent. They have made ample provision for any losses, taken care of all their administration expenses and in a period of years have repaid to the federal government I think nearly 90 per cent of the money which was advanced by the government to start this scheme.

Mr. CLARK: How long has it been operating?

Mr. COOTE: Since about the year 1916.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): It was considered in the grain business that one cent per bushel was required by all commission firms for operating expenses. When the wheat pool came into existence in western Canada they found that they could operate on less than one-half of one cent per bushel because by mass operation, just the same as by mass production, they were able to cut down the overhead. I would suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that that can easily be taken care of by the volume of business which we hope to set up by this scheme.

Mr. CLARK: The greater the volume of business, the more reserves you will have to provide.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Very true, and the less overhead.

Mr. CLARK: I was not speaking of the overhead. I suggest that one per cent is not sufficient for reserves for losses and depreciation.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I would like to ask the minister if, according to the language of this clause, the one per cent is supposed to take care of operating expenses plus reserves for losses, or whether it is not a fact that reserves for losses are to be provided for outside of the one per cent and that the one per cent covers just the cost of operation.

Mr. ROBB: Reserves for losses are in addition to the one per cent.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The hon. gentleman was arguing otherwise.

Mr. CLARK: Where is that provided?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The fundamental principle of a scheme of this kind is the elimination of competition, following, as the hon. member for Last Mountain has said, the principle of our wheat pool. In the district in which I live there are, I think, no fewer than ten different loan companies operating. At various periods of the year no fewer than seven men will come in there collecting money or soliciting loans or doing some particular business in connection with their different companies. It can easily be seen that if all the business in that particular district were turned into one company and competition eliminated, overhead expenses could be immediately reduced. That is the basic principle of the rural credit system. Unless we can achieve that, the system has failed of its purpose. It is based, as most hon. gentlemen know, on the German Landschaften system which was established by the German government some time after the Seven Years' war. It met the situation and to-day the farmers in Germany are receiving money cheaper than the manufacturers. Just compare that situation with ours in Canada. I presume that no Canadian manufacturer will pay more than 6 per cent interest. Most of them will secure money at less than that. But farmers, at any rate in Saskatchewan, are not securing money on loans at less than 8 per cent and the ordinary banks charge perhaps 9 or 10 per cent. The idea behind this system is that by having such a large amount of business done in one community and by the elimination of competition and the duplication of travellers on the road and overhead charges, the cost of operation will be reduced. Unless that can be done, of course this scheme fails, and it is only in so far as that can be accomplished that the scheme will be a success.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Capital requirements.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The closing words of subclause (2) of this section read:

The said shares shall be non-transferable and shall be subscribed for in the following manner.

And so on. Would it not be much wiser if after the word "non-transferable" we inserted the words "except at the option of the board"? It would be as well to give the board discretion in regard to that.

Mr. ROBB: I will accept that. I think it is an improvement. I move that subclause (2) of clause 5 in the twelfth line at the top of page 3, be amended by inserting after the word "non-transferable" the words "except at the option of the board."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Limit of outstanding farm loan bonds.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to subsection 4 of this section, and then ask him to turn back to section 4, subsection (d) which subsection gives them authority to invest the funds of the board in the debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities of, or guaranteed by, the government of Canada, or of, or guaranteed by the government of any province of Canada —in other words, fully protected bonds. But the power having been given to invest in that class of security we find that their use as security is to a large extent modified by subsection 4 of section 6, which restricts the board to securities for its bond issue other than the bonds which it has already invested in. It is a restriction on the board which is unnecessary, and it might be just as well to take into consideration a possible adjustment.

Mr. STEVENS: You have your initial payment to start with.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Subsection 4 of section 6 reads:

(4) Each farm loan bond shall be signed by the commissioner, or by a member specially authorized thereunto by the board, and by the secretary or treasurer of the board. It shall have printed thereon a certificate by the commissioner that it is issued under the authority of this act and that at the time of issue the board holds first mortgages on farm lands at least equal to the total amount of bonds issued under this Act.

Why not have that clause amended so as to read:

—the board holds first mortgages on farm lands and securities, in keeping with subsection (d) of section 4, to the full amount of the bonds issued under the act.

Why in addition to the first mortgages should we not allow this other first class security? Has the minister considered the point?

Mr. ROBB: I am sure my hon. friend does not want to turn this board into a bond investment company.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all. The minister has already gone further in that respect than I would have done myself.

Mr. ROBB: The previous section referred to investments in federal and provincial guaranteed bonds. They may invest in those, but they must have mortgages. Otherwise what are they for?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, they must have the mortgages also, but when you have an ample supply of guaranteed bonds purchased as investment by the board, why should that not be taken into account? With respect to subsection 4 of section 6 which says:

And that at the time of issue the board holds first mortgages on farm lands at least equal to the total amount of bonds issued under this act.

The board might have first mortgages on land and a considerable amount of these other securities besides.

Mr. STEVENS: Subsection (d) in section 4 is a permissive clause and covers extra funds which the board may have, that it has not yet loaned out in accordance with the main intent of the bill, namely, on farm lands; but in order that they may earn for them in the interim as much as possible, they may purchase bonds and so forth, of a certain class, suppose the board has two or three million dollars invested; before borrowing any more money it would dispose of those debentures and loan that money on farm loan credits. If the board did not follow such a course it would not be doing its duty under the act. Therefore I do not see any need for the amendment my hon. friend suggests. If that amendment were carried it would be an indication to the board that parliament expected them to keep those securities in reserve, which is not the intention. The intention is to have the board loan this money on farm loan credits. But suppose they market an issue of ten million dollars, they cannot invest it immediately in farm loans, but they can place it out at interest while they are arranging these small loans. I suggest that it would be preferable to leave the section as it stands.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Conditions for loans.

Mr. STEVENS: Now we come to the subject of that amendment. I approach this matter with an open mind. I certainly hope the board can restrict its expenses and so forth within the one per cent fixed in this act. I agree with my hon. friend who spoke a moment ago, that it is desirable that if possible we force the board to keep within that limit. I am inclined however to the view that in the early stages it may be difficult for them to do so. It may be one and a half per cent or one and a quarter per cent, and I would be willing to give the board discretion and would favour the adoption of the amendment made by the Senate eliminating the restriction to one per cent. I am not worked up about it at all, but I feel that as a matter of sound common sense they should be given a free hand to that extent.

Mr. ROBB: In common with my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, I am not worked up about it, and I am not going to worry much over it. In the original bill as presented last year there was no limitation of any kind. The words "not exceeding one per cent of the amount of the loan" were inserted when the bill was in committee. I observe there seems to be a misapprehension as to what this one per cent means. Perhaps there should be a comma or a semicolon in that sentence. However, it clearly provides that the one per cent is for the expenses of operation and reserves for losses. I think that is clear, but if the committee wants to strike out the words I do not object. I want to put the bill through just as it left the House before.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to press the matter, but sometimes, in order to get a larger measure, it is well to give way in small matters. I consider this of such minor importance that if we can facilitate its passage through the Senate by acceding to their view, I certainly would rather do it than risk the bill.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I fail to agree with the remarks which the hon. member has just made. I am rather of the opinion that the cost of operation is one of the large matters in this bill. It was the opinion of the committee last year that unless the cost of operation was cut down to a minimum the bill would be useless after it came into effect. I think the reason why the one per cent maximum was imposed for the cost of operation was because of the tendency of government management to let the cost run unduly high, and it was felt by the committee that if that cost were limited to a one per cent margin, some effort would be made to keep within that margin. We have had comments made here and evidence adduced that in Manitoba the rural credit scheme has been running on a margin of one-half of one per cent, and that the American rural credit scheme has been running on something less than a one per cent margin. It does not seem unreasonable, then, to suppose that in the whole of Canada we should be able to run this scheme on a one per cent margin for administration. If not, it would appear to me that the cost of the money to the farmer would run up so high that the loan companies would not need to reduce their interest rate very much to meet the rate charged under our federal scheme, and by so doing our scheme would be killed at the start.

Mr. CLARK: Supposing the board charge one per cent for expenses, and that one per cent does not meet the expenses. Then there are losses, are there not? This act leaves it in the discretion of the board to increase the rate as much as they like in order to provide the necessary reserves for losses. It seems to me that it is leaving a pretty wide discretion to the board to fix a maximum of one per cent for administration, and then let them charge any rate they like to provide for the necessary reserve. I was under a misapprehension when I first saw the section; I had just glanced at it for a moment, and I thought the intention was to make the one per cent provide for the administration and for the necessary reserves for losses. Frankly, I was of the opinion that that was an impossibility, and I am still of that opinion. As it stands now, the one per cent is limited to administration; I think that is unwise, too; I thought it was unwise then, and I think it is unwise now, because if that amount is exceeded, the excess amount becomes loss, and the board has the discretion to increase the rate to any amount it sees fit to meet these losses or to provide the necessary reserve for losses. Furthermore, I think it is advisable that it should not be left in such an indefinite state. I am not clear whether the board has discretion to fix a rate in each individual case to provide the necessary reserve for losses, or whether a uniform rate will be fixed applicable to all loans. I am left in a state of doubt on that point.

Mr. ROBB: I think good administration would provide for a uniform rate throughout.

Mr. CLARK: But how many boards are there?

Mr. ROBB: While I am on my feet I may say that the losses, as I understand it, will be losses in the investment, not losses on administration.

Mr. CLARK: I think it would cover all losses. I know the intention ordinarily would be to fix a rate for losses on the loans, but supposing you have a loss on the administration; how are you going to provide against that?

Mr. BOYS: Has the minister any idea of what the rate of interest is likely to be under this act?

Mr. ROBB: The act provides:

> The interest rate on loans under this act shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds issued by the board as shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the board, to provide for the expenses of operation not exceeding one per cent of the amount of the loan and for the necessary reserves for losses, or if no such bonds have been issued, such a rate as in the judgment of the board will be yielded by the farm loan bonds when issued, increased by provision for expenses and reserves as aforesaid.

Mr. BOYS: I read that.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows that the price of money is like the price of wheat; it fluctuates. I cannot tell what the price of money will be next year.

Mr. BOYS: But I take it for granted that this has been considered, and there must be some idea of what the rate is going to be. I ask the question because of some knowledge I have of the system obtaining in Ontario in connection with our Agricultural Development Board. The benefit, if any, which may result from this act, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, will depend entirely on the ultimate rate of interest which must be paid by the borrower under this act. I should think the minister would have a fairly accurate estimate of what the interest rate will be. The section says:

> The interest rate. . . . shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds—

I should think the minister would have a very good idea of what rate of interest he thinks those bonds would bring. To that we add one per cent, and add to that, again, whatever might be thought proper for losses. I certainly agree with the minister that the word "losses" as used here means losses in loans, and not any other losses, and it might be wise to make that clear, because as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has pointed out, if there is a loss sustained in operation amounting to over one per cent, where is the money going to come from? It has to be made up out of some fund, and I do not know where it can come from except out of the moneys that will be at the disposal of the board under this act.

In Ontario, under the existing law, farmers are entitled to obtain mortgage loans very much on the same basis as under this act. It is fifty per cent of the value of the farm. There is not the distinction we have in this act, of fifty per cent of the value of the land and twenty per cent of the value of the improvements. It is fifty or fifty-five per cent of the actual value of the farm, and they are paying five and a half per cent. During the last election the Premier of Ontario made the announcement, which I have every reason to believe he will fulfil, that the rate of interest on the loans to farmers under the Agricultural Development Board Act would be five per cent. It is perfectly manifest that if the rate of interest to be charged under this act is to be over five and one-half per cent, the act will be absolutely useless so far as Ontario is concerned, because the farmers there are able to get their money now at five and a half per cent, and if they are able to get it at five per cent in the future they would not resort to the benefits of this act if the interest rate is going to be higher than they are now paying.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend is right in saying that they get the money at five per cent, and it costs one per cent for administration, that means they are getting their money at four per cent.

Mr. BOYS: I do not want to be misquoted. I say they are getting their money to-day at five and a half per cent, and that the Premier of Ontario during the last election campaign stated that he expected to be able to make that rate five per cent. I do not altogether agree with some of the remarks that have been made. I am of the opinion that you should be able to administer this act at a cost of one per cent, and certainly you ought to be able to raise the money on bonds guaranteed by the government at four per cent. If that is the case, there should be some estimate made for losses, and I would think the farmers would be able to get their money under this act at five and one-half per cent, which is the prevailing rate to-day in Ontario.

Mr. ROBB: That is very encouraging. We will get the money as cheap as we can.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A great deal is to be said for the argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe. I notice that in Alberta this last winter there were no less than thirteen or fourteen mortgage companies competing for business, while four years ago there were only two, and neither of them was competing for business at that time they were just keeping a staff on and doing very little lending. There seems to be a considerable expansion of credit taking place in this country at the present time, and if the scheme is wisely administered, that is all to the good; but if it is unwisely administered it may lead to another crash such as that from which we have just recovered.

I wish to correct an impression that may have been left on the House by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I have in my hand the ninth annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Board for the year 1925, from which I quote the following:

> Rates of interest—the rate of interest charged borrowers by all of the banks in this system is governed by the rate at which they can sell their bonds.

Just as is proposed in this bill.

> Every bank is limited in its interest charge to one per cent above the rate at which its last preceding issue of bonds was sold.

Mr. BOYS: Is there any provision for losses?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just a moment.

> The rate borne by the bonds marketed during 1925 by federal land banks was four and a half per cent, which made five and a half per cent the maximum interest charge.

That indicated that all losses and contingencies had been taken care of in that one per cent. The report goes on:

> Experience has fully demonstrated that when a bank obtains a volume of one hundred millions in mortgages, and is in good shape as to its delinquencies and probable foreclosures, it can, owing to large volume, operate on a spread less than one per cent. Three of the federal land banks, being in this situation, have reduced their loaning rate—two of them to five per cent and one to five and a quarter per cent.

I need not quote further. This is simply in contradiction to the hon. member's remarks. There was no deliberate misrepresentation; he was merely misinformed. There are other illustrations that might be cited, but I am satisfied that if the act is administered sympathetically and with the hearty support of the government there is nothing to prevent its taking the place, in all provinces, of the existing loan system. If that is done there is no question about the volume, and, with the volume, no question about the ability to carry on with the one per cent margin. I strongly recommend that the one per cent limitation be retained.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): I would refer to a point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre with regard to the initial expense of setting up the offices and hiring the staff, which he said would exceed one per cent. I might draw his attention to clause 5 of the bill, which provides that the first five millions of bonds issued by the government shall be free of interest for a term of three years. So that while the board will be charging interest on this amount, according as it is loaned, and not having to pay interest on it to the government, the interest it gets from the mortgagors can be used for any initial expense that may be incurred.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering section 7 of this bill.

Mr. SPENCER: I would like to refer for a moment to subsection 7, which calls for a charge of 8 per cent on default payments. It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that that rate is too high; I think anyone will admit that farming cannot be made to pay under a burden of that kind year after year, and I would be glad if the Minister of Finance could see his way clear to lower that rate to 7 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to add my hearty approval of that suggestion. We have had sufficient experience in the last five years to show that the policy of still further burdening the farmer with heavy arrears of interest makes it almost impossible for him to get out of his difficulties. As a result of that condition, as hon. members know, in our province we have had to establish a special board for the purpose of adjusting debts as between farmers and their creditors, which has caused a great deal of contentious discussion among the financial interests. I think the minister would be saving himself and the board a good deal of trouble later on if he could moderate that penalty against the unfortunate man who, because of conditions not under his control, is not in a position to make his payments in any particular year. Has the minister ever considered the possibility of giving the board discretionary powers in respect of this penalty clause? For example, should not the board be given power to say to the borrower "We understand your conditions this year; you have had a total crop failure either through drought, hail, grasshoppers or something of that kind, and you cannot pay. We know it is no fault of yours and that you are not trying to defraud us, therefore the interest this year will be at the ordinary rate, with no penalty." Should anyone attempt to defraud the board, of course, I would agree wth the authorities that a penalty should be imposed, but if through conditions beyond the control of the farmer, such as what are known as acts of God and the like, he is unable to make his payments, I think the board should have some discretion in the matter.

Mr. ROBB: I quite agree with my hon. friend that it should be made as easy as possible for the borrower to wipe out his debts. This rate of 8 per cent was fixed as an incentive to induce borrowers to pay up, but as I understand it the board may, if the circumstances justify, make the rate less. My hon. friend will notice that the clause reads "not exceeding 8 per cent." I think this a pretty safe clause to insert.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the minister will realize that 8 per cent is altogether out of the question; that is the very thing we are trying to get away from in this legislation. We want a lower rate of interest if possible and if, because of unforeseen circumstances, it is impossible for a farmer to make his payments, why put him back in the situation he is trying to escape by this legislation?

Mr. ROBB: Of course it must be remembered that the board will be sympathetic. My hon. friend knows that there are people who dally along and avoid payment if they can do so. This clause is inserted to provide an incentive for them to pay, and in their judgment the board may reduce the rate to the usual one of 5 per cent or 5½ per cent; there is nothing to prevent the board from allowing that rate to continue. But if the man is careless and pays no attention to his obligations the board has the right to charge up to 8 per cent, and this will be helpful to all the other borrowers as well.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does that rate of 8 per cent include the amortization?

Mr. ROBB: No, it is straight interest.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then in my opinion that is an absolutely wrong principle and is not fair.

Mr. ROBB: It applies only to defaulted payments and the board have the right to make it less if they so desire.

Mr. WARD: I presume the board referred to is the board here in Ottawa, and in that connection I would like to ask a question of the minister. Provision is made in the bill for the establishment of provincial boards; if that is done, what authority would that board have in these matters? Would it be in the capacity of an advisory board to the central board in Ottawa?

Mr. ROBB: I understand that the central board has the final authority, but it must be kept in mind that the central board is governed by the advice of the provincial boards. The man here in Ottawa does not know very much about these matters and he must of necessity rely on the judgment of the board nearest to the spot, whose members understand the local situation.

Mr. SPENCER: There is one other point I would like to bring up, with regard to subsection 8. Would the borrower be asked to pay any bonus if he repaid his loans before they were due?

Mr. ROBB: What does my hon. friend mean by a bonus? That is a matter to be determined by regulation, I think.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid it is. Does the minister consider it wise to leave it that way? Would it not be much better to decide now that after the period provided for, that is five years, the borrower could repay in whole or in part without necessity of paying a bonus. I think it would be a very advisable clause to insert in the bill. There is no question in my mind but that it will increase the volume of business done.

Mr. ROBB: Of course there is no penalty after five years. We hope the board will be sympathetic towards the borrowers and will administer the act in a fair way.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—When loans available.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would ask the minister if he could not widen somewhat the scope of subsection 3. I had a letter a few days ago from La Société de Colonisation which the minister knows is a sub-agent, so to speak, of St. Jean Baptiste Society. It has a provincial charter, interests itself in colonization matters and is frequently an agent of communication between the Land department at Quebec and the settlers. This society asks to be empowered under this subsection of the bill to act as a local coöperative society. I think the addition of two or three words along this line with respect to colonization societies would enlarge the scope of the operations of the bill very usefully.

Mr. ROBB: I can see no objection to amending the subsection in such a way as to read:

> Subject to the approval of the board whether loans shall be made directly to farmers or through local coöperative societies, or recognized colonization societies—

And so on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What body would be responsible for determining the nature of the colonization society?

Mr. BOURASSA: The board.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This board? All right. May I submit that this section is probably one of the most important sections in the bill, if not the most important. This is the section which brings the province and the federal board together. It goes further than that, it brings the borrower directly to the board. In the original draft of this bill the precaution was taken by those who were interested in the question from this side of the House to see that this section should provide that the loaning should be made either direct to the borrower, or through co-operative societies, or in the way the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has suggested, but subject to the discretion of the provincial advisory board, not to the approval or regulation of the federal board. As the section is now drafted it makes the method to be adopted in a province subject entirely to the federal board. So the board, as soon as the bill is passed, could come to our province, where we are prepared to adopt this measure to the fullest degree, and say: "Here, you must administer your loans direct," whereas in that province we administer the loans through our local coöperative societies. I would ask the minister to reconsider this section and have a provision made that the provincial advisory board, or the provincial authorities acting in connection with this bill, have discretion as to whether under the operation of the act in the province the loan would be made through the local credit society, or the local coöperative society, or direct to the borrower.

Mr. ROBB: I think we must have uniformity. There must be some central authority to determine lines of policy for all the provinces. I repeat that the board will be quite likely to listen to the advice of the local boards, but there must be in the last analysis uniformity in the act. I think it is well to leave the central power there. My hon. friend is acting on the assumption that the central board is going to be antagonistic to this whole scheme. I do not look at the matter in that way.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all.

Mr. ROBB: I think the central board will be fairly sympathetic to the scheme.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister misunderstands my point. No one entertains a greater degree of hope than I do that the federal board will be completely sympathetic, but the minister's last statement makes the provision worse. He says that uniformity is essential. Now at that I frankly throw up my hands in despair and say it cannot be achieved. There are provinces that are not prepared to undertake the organization of local coöperative societies for the administration of loans through this bill. On the other hand there are provinces that are prepared to do it in every way. How are we going to secure uniformity?

Mr. ROBB: I admit the point, but they will be the men to put their O.K. on it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then under subsection 3 of this section the federal board will be advised to consult the administration board in every province with respect to the manner in which these loans should be made.

Mr. ROBB: I am speaking now as the minister in charge of the department, and that is the advice I shall give to the central board. I do not hesitate to have that go on record as the view of the government.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the minister is somewhat mistaken in regard to the attitude he has taken with respect to this particular clause. If he reads subsection 3 very carefully he will see that it states:

Whether loans shall be made directly to farmers or through local coöperative societies, or both directly to farmers and through local coöperative societies, as the province may desire.

The local board in the province, I submit, would be able to recommend to the central board what method should be adopted in a particular province, and it would be natural that the central board should give its consent to what was thought advisable in a particular province. I think the point is already covered.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend's interpretation is right. The central board would listen to the recommendations of the provincial board.

Mr. STINSON: Should not a provision be added making the provinces liable for any loss that might be incurred within a province?

Mr. ROBB: I recall that last year that position was taken by some members of the Senate, but I prefer to have the bill as it left the House last year. I would rather not add such a provision to the measure.

Mr. WARD: Subsection 6 in the fourth line reads:

That in case of an adverse report on the operations of any provincial board by the auditors of the board, or should any provincial board refuse to enforce in a satisfactory manner the regulations and directions of the board, the board may after conference with the said provincial board relieve such provincial board of its duties—

And so on. If the provincial organization lives up to the act, why should any discretionary power be required on the part of the central board?

Mr. ROBB: Is this what my hon. friend has in mind?

—refuse to enforce in a satisfactory manner the regulations of the act—

Instead of, "the directions of the board."

Mr. WARD: "And" directions of the board.

Mr. ROBB: I am afraid that would tie up the board. We might find that a disadvantage later on to both the borrower and the lender. Let us leave something to the judgment of the men who are administering the act.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has moved to amend subclause 3 of clause 8 by adding after the words "coöperative societies" in the 8th line the words "or recognized colonization societies." The suggestion has been made to the minister that the word "both" would have to be stricken out so that the clause might read properly.

Mr. BOURASSA: Should there not be a slight change made in the last line of the same subclause, making it read:

To farmers and through such societies—

Or something to that effect?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I would suggest:

Such local coöperative or recognized colonization societies.

The CHAIRMAN: The clause as amended would read:

Subject to the approval of the board whether loans shall be made directly to farmers or through local coöperative societies or recognized colonization societies, or directly to farmers and through local coöperative societies or recognized colonization societies, as the province may desire.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister might explain just what these colonization societies will include, and if they will have to secure their funds through the provincial board subject to its jurisdiction to the same extent as coöperative societies or individual farmers would be subject.

Mr. ROBB: We are placing these recognized colonization societies on exactly the same basis as the coöperative societies. There are, in some of the provinces—I know there are in Quebec—recognized colonization societies which have charters from the provincial government.

Mr. SPENCER: These colonization societies have nothing to do with bringing immigrants into western Canada? This is simply a way of carrying on certatin community work in Quebec?

Mr. ROBB: They are called colonization societies, but they are doing the same work as these local coöperative societies.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it that they will be subject to all the rules and regulations of the local board, and that the property will have to be properly appraised the same as any other property whether it is that of an individual farmer or a local coöperative organization working under this legislation.

Mr. ROBB: It is all dependent upon provincial legislation.

Mr. EVANS: I do not think we need open the door there to colonization societies as I understand them. After this scheme is properly organized the local farmers will form themselves into coöperative societies for the purposes of this legislation. I do not see why we should want to open the whole thing up to colonization societies, as the valuations will be made on improvements and the balance of the farm as the farmers organize themselves.

Mr. ROBB: That may be true in the province from which my hon. friend comes, but in some other provinces we have colonization societies that are doing exactly the same work as coöperative societies. They are all subject to provincial legislation.

Mr. EVANS: In those provinces can they not have farmers' organizations under this legislation through the provincial government?

Mr. ROBB: I do not doubt that they can, but if they prefer to do the work in this way, why should we close the door on them?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—reserve fund.

Mr. WARD: As I understand this legislation, it is purely coöperative or national in its purpose and application. Why should we provide for payment of dividends?

Mr. ROBB: The dividend is paid back to the borrower. This is on exactly the same basis, I suppose, as the Grain Growers' Grain Company and other coöperative grain companies of the west. If there is a profit, I imagine it will go into a reduction of the debt.

Mr. WARD: Will that be returned in the form of lessened charges, or in what form will it be returned to the borrower?

Mr. ROBB: I might direct the attention of my hon. friend to sub-clause 4 of this clause:

All dividends paid upon stock held by any borrower shall remain in possession of the board and shall be allowed to accumulate at the rate of 5 per cent per annum compounded annually until such time as the said stock with accumulated dividends is sufficient to provide for the payment of all indebtedness under the loan when the amount of the said stock and the accumulated dividends shall be credited to the borrower as a final payment.

It goes back to the borrower.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Regulations.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I draw the minister's attention to subsection (e) of this section, which reads:

The board may, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, make regulations . . . . to provide for:

The manner of nomination and appointment of representatives of the borrowers on the provincial board in any province.

That means these gentlemen will be appointed by order in council. Then subsection (f) provides that—

The manner of crediting advance payments by the borrowers under the mortgages—

Shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. ROBB: What is the objection to that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It leads to interminable delay. Would it not be done better by the provincial board, or by the provincial board in consultation with the federal board?

Mr. STEVENS: The central board will make its regulations, which may be approved by order in council.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that is clear, all right.

Mr. ROBB: I think it is clear.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then it is just the regulations.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This section does not say so. Section 16 reads:

The board may, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, make regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act for the conduct of the business of the board, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing provision the board shall have power to provide by regulation for:

And then it gives a list of the officers, appraisers, inspectors, and so on. In my opinion that is a direct violation of the merit principle in the operation of the Civil Service Act itself, and I suggest to the minister that he insert the words:

The board shall have power to provide by regulation, subject to the terms of the Civil Service Act, for the employment of officers, appraisers—

And so on. I am quite willing that the federal board, the provincial board and the advisory council shall be appointed in whatever manner may be best calculated to secure the proper men, but that all under them, all clerk and other employees, should be subject to the Civil Service Act. I do not think there will be any division of opinion in the House on this point. I am satisfied my hon. friends opposite are as anxious to maintain the integrity of that act as hon. members to my right. I am satisfied the minister will accept my suggestion and I do not think any further argument is necessary.

Mr. ROBB: I think the hon. member had better let this section go through as it stands. I want to assure him that there is no question of seeking additional patronage or anything of that sort. If my hon. friend knew what I know and had the experience I have had within the last thirty days in connection with some of the officials in the Department of Finance I think he would agree with me. I am finding no fault with the Civil Service Commission. They appointed these gentlemen under the act, but we discovered that some of those who were appointed had been let out of positions—well, I would not like to use a harsh word, but one man assigned to us by the commission has had to go to the penitentiary. I do not hesitate to say that. I have taken that matter up with the Civil Service Commission, pointing out that we feel sometimes that we are sitting on a powder barrel in the case of a department where millions of the people's money are at stake in connection with appointments made under the act. It would look as if the commission had never gone back to look into the question of a man's character—they look for everything else but character. After all character is the main thing in administering a department of a financial nature. I think my hon. friend had better allow this to go through as it is. We have arranged to have a sitting with the Civil Service Commission and point out some of the difficulties that have crept in from time to time in a department where large sums of money are handled. I shall be glad to discuss the matter with my hon. friend confidentially and tell him what I know, and I think he will agree with me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to accede to any reasonable request of the Minister of Finance, but any argument he has used is more applicable to appointments by patronage than appointments by commission. Furthermore he knows that, in spite of the, shall I say, exceedingly acute manner in which he endeavours to make the suggestion, without actually stating it, that he found himself in great difficulty with respect to the appointment of an employee who had been in the penitentiary at some time or other. He can get rid of that employee under the Civil Service Act by order in council.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, we might, after he had run away with a million dollars of my hon. friend's money and mine.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly the same characters, or even worse characters, have crept in under patronage than under the Civil Service Act. There is no question about that, and if the minister wants me to waste time I shall give all sorts of cases. The minister must not forget some of the appointments which have been made under patronage. There is nothing more essential to the country's future welfare and proper development than the administration of the civil service, under, I shall say, principles that have elevated the civil service of Great Britain and placed it above all others, so far as I know, in the matter of personnel and ability. The only way we can hope to improve the civil service is by adding all our strength and force to the prestige of the present commission, and not by appointing such men as have been placed in their positions by patronage. Let us work in this direction, not from the bottom up but from the top down. We are taking a very serious step if we open the door to patronage in the matter of appointments in connection with this board. It is going to be one of the most vicious forms of patronage. The Liberal whip grunts and groans at this suggestion.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. whip would be better employed in studying the terms of the Civil Service Act and making it a little better, instead of sneering at it. The attitude assumed by the other side of the House in this matter is regrettable. I do not wish to antagonize hon. members in this matter, but frankly I cannot agree with the minister, and I cannot allow this matter to pass without a protest. I cannot support the proposition to place the appointments of the stenographers, the appraisers and everyone else, the huge personnel of this federal loan board, at the door of patronage. I am opposed to it and I record my protest against it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think the minister has made some serious statements in the last few minutes, and I do not think that they can be correct, if I understand what has been the procedure of the Civil Service Commission in the past. He says that the Civil Service Commission do not look for character, that that is the last quality which they consider. I know of no position filled by the Civil Service Commission where the applicant has not been asked to furnish references, and these references are always communicated. They are in nearly every case I know of. How can the minister say that character is one of the matters that is not touched upon by the commission, when, as far as I know, the practice that is followed by the commission is to look into the matter of character? I should like to know it, if they proceed in one way in one district and in another way in another. The minister should think seriously before that statement is broadcast.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think it is quite evident from the minister's remark of a few moments ago that the government must do one of two things; either they must have the courage of their convictions and bring in a bill to get rid of the Civil Service Commission—

Mr. ROBB: We do not want to get rid of them.

Mr. McGIBBON: You do not want to get rid of them openly, but you are taking this means of getting rid of them so far as these appointments are concerned. We have a Civil Service Commission two members of which were appointed by this government, and what does the minister say? He cannot trust this commission, with two of the government's own appointees on it, to appoint the officials who are to work under this act. The thing is absurd. If the minister believes what he says, he should have the courage to bring in a bill to get rid of the Civil Service Commission, for that is what he is doing here in an underhand way so that the people of this country will not get wise to it. For the minister to say that he cannot trust his own commission to make the many appointments necessary under this act, to say that the commission may appoint gaol birds and cannot be trusted to choose men even for minor positions, is a serious charge to make against the Civil Service Commission. The minister has said either too much or too little.

Mr. ROBB: I have nothing whatever to withdraw. Unfortunately, we have had the evidence within quite recent weeks of exactly the kind of thing I frankly stated to the House to-night. My hon. friend must not try to convey the impression, just because I pointed out a certain condition, that we are opposed to the commission. Nothing of the kind. We are in favour of it. I am in favour of exactly the same system of civil service administration as they have in Great Britain; but we have not that system in Canada. My hon. friends would try to represent that we are departing from the system of appointments by the Civil Service Commission in creating this very small organization to administer this act, for it will be very small. From letters coming in I notice that there is an idea that we are going to build up a large organization and load it down with expense. Nothing of the kind. Let me point out that my hon. friend sat behind one of the ablest Finance ministers that Canada ever had, and he exempted the Income Tax branch from the operation of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is no excuse for the minister's action, surely.

Mr. ROBB: I am not offering it as an excuse. I am simply using it as an argument to my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does the minister know any other method than the one I have mentioned by which an insurance or liability company operates? They take references from reliable people in the community, who vouch for the character of the applicants. If such people are not to be trusted, where can you get reliable evidence?

Mr. MALCOLM: I would like to offer a word, not in criticism of what hon. gentlemen opposite have said, but simply as chairman of the committee which investigated the whole civil service a few years ago. There is a condition in the Finance department as was pointed out privately to that committee, and in regard to which we seriously considered making certain representations, calling for a high degree of honesty and secrecy in the men who administer that department, and the same applies to the Income Tax branch. I do not think it is possible for the Civil Service Commission, with their machinery constituted as it is to-day, to make inquiries into a man's private life and his records as to trustworthiness without probably casting reflections on some of the men who have not been chosen for appointment. The staff that will be required in the administration of this act is going to be small, and I feel that in this respect the minister in the present bill is not asking even as much as a former Minister of Finance asked in connection with the Income Tax branch employees. He asks the right to select men who, in his opinion, would be worthy of the confidence he put in them. At the time the committee of which I was chairman sat, we were invited by the Finance department to go through the sub-treasury vaults, and I believe that most of the members of that committee who took the trip, and some of them are still in the House, came to the conclusion that what former ministers of finance have said—and it is what the Minister of Finance is saying to-day—was perfectly justified, namely, that there is a class of positions in the Finance department in regard to which nobody should have the right of selection except the senior officers of the department who are responsible for its administration. I make that observation with regard to the Finance department based on my own experience as chairman of that committee which brought in the Civil Service Act amendments under which we are now working. We did not recommend that the Income Tax branch be put under the Civil Service Commission for the reasons given to us privately, and for the very same reasons I would not ask that those engaged in the administration of this act be placed under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McGIBBON: I cannot let either of the two ministers get away with such nonsense as that. There is absolutely no comparison between the experts in the Finance department and the officials who will be appointed under this bill.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has my hon. friend ever had the pleasure of visiting the sub-treasury vaults of the Finance department? Let him do so, and then make his comments on nonsense.

Mr. McGIBBON: I have had that pleasure. This bill is providing for the employment of "officers, appraisers, inspectors, attorneys, clerks and other employees."

Mr. MALCOLM: How many are there?

Mr. McGIBBON: The whole staff. Does the minister say that there is any comparison between these employees and the higher officials of the Finance department? The thing is absurd.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is the minister serious in his statement that the Income Tax branch has not been placed under the Civil Service Commission because that might cast a reflection on somebody?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, I was referring to the higher officials.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Certainly not. Everybody in this House knows there is a reason why the Income Tax branch was not put under the Civil Service Commission. The minister's remarks might apply to a few of the higher officials of the Finance department, but not to the under-officials who will be engaged under this act. The minister cannot be serious in suggesting that it would cast a reflection on certain people who have been appointed in the past.

Mr. MALCOLM: I was referring to the higher officials.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think this clause should pass until we have had the opportunity of definitely establishing where the groups in this House stand in regard to the retention of the Civil Service Act and the maintenance of the prestige of the Civil Service Commission. I do not see how the government can very well get away from it. As I stated in my introductory remarks, I have no objection to the government providing in this bill for the appointment of the federal board, the provincial boards and an advisory council, in whatever way they consider will get the best results, but so far as the subordinate positions are concerned, I ask that they be placed under the Civil Service Act. I hesitate to move an amendment. I do not wish to embarrass the minister, but I think this is only a reasonable request which should be acceded to by the government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think we could all agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and leave these appointments to the senior officer of the department concerned if only we could be sure that that officer would control these apointments. To my mind, that is the question for us to decide in discussing this matter. I do not know that the minister himself would have an absolutely free hand in making the appointments. We all know the pressure that is brought to bear in the making of political appointments. There would be pressure from every point of the compass and the minister himself, if he were frank, would state that he did not have an absolutely free hand in making the appointments. I heard the former leader of the official opposition, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, say on one occasion that a minister who tried to enforce the merit system in his own department would be defeated by his own party on the floor of the House, and I do not think I could put it in any stronger language my condemnation of the patronage system. I would not go so far as the hon. member for Bow River and suggest that we should amend the act, thereby tying up the matter at this time. I realize that we spent a lot of time on this bill last year, as we have done this session, and I would hesitate to do anything that would interfere with the progress of the bill at this stage. But when the question of the Civil Service Commission versus patronage is under discussion we ought to state exactly where we stand. The observations of the minister with regard to certain men in his own department appear to me to be hardly applicable in a general way to the Civil Service Commission. If a man of questionable character is found in the service under the present system, I venture to say that for every one of that type under the commission I can point to two or three men appointed under the patronage system who are a good deal worse; not perhaps in the employ of this government, but men who have been in the service of various governments of Canada, provincial or federal. I know that very often ministers of the crown, whether provincial or federal, have not a free hand in the matter of appointments. Men come along who have given their services in an election and who are looking for their reward, and the minister is unable to resist the pressure brought to bear upon him. The object this parliament had in view when the Civil Service Commission was created was to relieve ministers of the crown of this very pressure. Why, the present Speaker is on record in Hansard as saying, after the Civil Service Act had become law, that he walked home from this House that night feeling for the first time in his political life a free man. Surely that statement ought to be considered.

Mr. DUNNING: I have just a word to say in reference to the manner in which this legislation will work out in practice. I do not think that due regard has been paid by some hon. gentlemen to the provincial board feature of the bill now before the committee. Provincial boards are provided for, three of the members to be nominated by the government of the province and two other members by borrowers within the province. Then provision is made in the section under discussion for the national board to make regulations with respect to the employment of the officers of the board. I expect to see it work out in this way: the provincial board having to do with the work on the ground will necessarily have a very large say as to the officers who are to operate within that particular province. If that is not the case we certainly shall not get, in the various provinces coming under the act, men who will be willing to assume the responsibilities for administering the act in those provinces. The provisions of the bill are sufficiently elastic to facilitate coöperation between the Dominion and the provincial governments, not only as regards the financial aspects of the measure, but as well with respect to its administration directly within the limits of the respective provinces. Personally I think the method now suggested in the bill should be given a trial rather than it should be insisted upon that the Civil Service Commission of Canada at Ottawa should make appointments within the provinces in relation to a matter with which the provincial governments are concerned. I do not think it wise, because of the joint liability created under the terms of the bill, that the commission should be asked to make these appointments. The administration of this law will in the nature of things be largely experimental. The bill is different from other measures which have been enacted from time to time to make possible coöperation between the Dominion and the provinces. This is different in that there is to be coöperation in administration. Reading together section 8 and section 16, with which we are now dealing, I think there is considerable merit in the contention of the minister, apart altogether from the arguments he advanced on other points. As he has pointed out, the employees at headquarters in Ottawa will necessarily be the smallest proportion of the staff. Indeed, the minister tells me that he intends to use in Ottawa, so far as the admnistration of the act here is concerned, a branch of his department which is now under the Civil Service Commission. But with regard to provincial administration my own opinion is that regulations will have necessarily to be evolved, setting out a form of coöperation between the province and the Dominion with respect to the conduct, within the province itself, of what is really a joint undertaking.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 17 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT

EXPORT TAX ON FURS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 123, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Export tax on furs.

Mr. SPENCER: Could we have some explanation from the minister as to whether this bill is to raise revenue, or to control the fur trade or export trade, or what it is for?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I gave an explanation on the introduction of the bill. We are aiming to bring the Northwest Territories in conformity with the rest of Canada. There are fur taxes in every other province, including the Yukon, and some complaint has been made that in Alberta particularly fur packs were coming in and the tax was collectable, but the statement was made that the furs came out of the Northwest Territories and there was the difficulty of proof. Of course our expenses are always going up in the territories; we think this act will remove the difficulty of collecting in Saskatchewan and Alberta and will give us some revenue for the administration of the territories.

Mr. FRASER: What amount of tax is it proposed to impose? Is it in conformity with the tax in Alberta?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It will be based on each pelt, but at the prices of furs to-day it will approximate about 5 per cent.

Mr. KELLNER: It is a pretty well established principle of taxation that no tax shall be levied on a people who are not represented, and I wonder if the minister does not think he is getting away from that principle in this bill. The Northwest Territories certainly have no representation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is true, but we have the Northwest Territories Council in operation; we are spending a very considerable amount of money annually from the revenues of Canada in those territories, and we are quite within our rights in imposing this tax. The reason it is called an export tax is because there is no local tax; if the citizens desire to use their furs within the territories no tax is collected.

Mr. KELLNER: I would take objection to the remark of the minister about the Northwest Territories Council. In the first place I think the personnel of that council is wholly composed of people residing in the city of Ottawa. It is true that they may have some knowledge of the Northwest Territories from having taken a trip there or something of that kind, but I very much doubt if any of them are personally acquainted with the conditions existing there to-day. The council is not elective and the people of the Northwest Territories have not the privilege of the franchise; they are in an even worse situation than are the people in the constituency of Athabaska. I doubt very much if the minister is within his rights in imposing a tax of this kind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I can say is that the bill has been drawn up by the Department of Justice; they tell me we are quite within our rights, and of course they are the people who give legal advice to the government of Canada. I think if my hon. friend will make inquiries he will find that we are quite within our rights. When my friend says that none of the officers of the Northwest Territories branch go into the territories he is entirely mistaken. Officers of the department are in that territory every year, going down the Mackenzie and to Herschel island as well as down the east coast. That trip is made annually; all the police posts are visited, and we have very intimate knowledge of what is taking place in both portions of the Northwest Territories. I am willing to admit that there are hundreds of thousands of miles of unexplored land there, but they contain no white settlers.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask a question? Is not the trapper already taxed on his traps, his other utensils, his clothing and everything he uses, without placing a tax on his furs?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My friend may be pleased to be facetious, but I may ask him the same question about the trapper in any other province of Canada. Does not the same thing apply? This has been the one happy hunting ground in which there was no tax on furs, and there is still no tax on the furs used by the residents of the district, which is not the case in any other province.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): With regard to the point brought up by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) that the Northwest Territories have no representation, I would suggest that they be added to the Yukon territory. I believe there are only about 3,000 people in the Northwest Territories and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) could very well represent them in this House.

Mr. EVANS: I think this is a very hard measure to impose upon the few residents of the territories. If, as the note of explanation in this bill says, foreigners are going in there trapping and sending out their furs without paying a tax, I think that could be very easily looked after by issuing licenses, as is done to hunters. It does seem rather hard to tax these few residents of that great north country, where conditions of life must be very hard. This tax is imposed on their only means of securing a livelihood, and seems to be rather severe.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may say to my hon. friend that the tax will not be at all onerous upon the residents of the territories; it will be similar to the tax in force in the Yukon territory, which was enacted some years ago. It must be remembered that the residents of that country are having a very considerable amount of money spent in improvements and facilities for carrying on their work and earning their livelihood. Surely, if every other commodity bears a tax, there is no good reason why a small tax should not be placed upon these furs.

Mr. KELLNER: Will the minister explain how he expects to collect the tax, and where?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We expect to collect it when the furs are leaving the territories, at Herschel island and on the east coast; it will be collected by our police force at the various posts, and especially at Fort Smith. The present staff will do all the work; there will be no necessity for increasing the staff.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, when I was in the west last week I was spoken to by two or three gentlemen who indicated to me that one of the difficulties in this legislation is that all the business in that country is conducted on credit, and long term credit at that. If this measure is to become operative at once it will undoubtedly work a very great hardship not only upon the settlers who have the furs to sell, but upon others as well. I was going to ask the question which the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) has just put to the minister; how does he propose to collect the tax? It seems to me reasonably clear that one of the great difficulties will come about, under the circumstances which he has mentioned, in the collection of this tax. Having regard to the fact that this matter was threshed out in this House some two or three years ago and was not then proceeded with, I now suggest to the minister that he give these people a year's notice. Let him put the measure upon our statute book, and let him indicate that at least a year will be given in which to make possible an adjustment of these conditions before the imposition of such a tax is made. Otherwise I am satsified that it will work a very grievous hardship and a very grave injustice to many people. The minister knows far better than I, because he has lived farther north in Alberta than I have, that there is a limited population in that area. They have no representative in this House, as has been already pointed out this evening. They are governed more or less by a benevolent autocracy, which is the best form of government that you could get if you reconcile your mind to it, and that is always one of the difficulties—

Mr. DUNNING: Tempered by assassination.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it depends entirely upon who is the "assassinator" and who is the "assassinee". I can readily understand after the hon gentleman's observations the other evening that if he had the "power" he would commit hari-kari. At any rate I do suggest to the minister, in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding as to the reasons behind this legislation, that if this power is taken and the exercise of it deferred deliberately a year he will accomplish the purpose he has in mind, and everybody then will have an opportunity of adjusting himself to the new conditions. I fear very greatly the unfairness and injustice that will be done to many people, if I am correctly informed, if this legislation becomes immediately operative, and I fear much more greatly the difficulties that will attend the collecting of the revenue. I fear the minister will find that in nine cases out of ten either one of two things will happen: An adjustment will have to be made with the original gatherer on basis of the furs taken, and he will get that much less money, or else the furs will be sold under such conditions that no tax will be collected and the government will then have to seize the furs for non-payment of the tax, causing much irritation, much difficulty and many complications. After thinking the matter over in the light of what was said to me the other day in Calgary and Edmonton—and I think representations have been made to the minister—it occurs to me that it would serve an excellent purpose if he could see his way clear not to make this legislation operative until another season. That is my only suggestion at the moment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have had representations made to me to delay the imposition of the tax, but those representations have come very largely from transients.

Mr. BENNETT: From whom?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): From the transient traders. The transient trader is the biggest difficulty we have to encounter. He is the man who has been going in there and securing fur from the legitimate traders and is responsible for the losses to them. In order to cope with that difficulty we put into effect a regulation insisting on licenses being issued, and we do not any longer issue a license to the transient trader. Some hon. member may say that is all in favour of the big fur companies but it is not. All we ask a man to do is to take out a license and establish himself in some definite locality. We are being bombarded by the very men who wish to travel by dog team here and there and gather all the furs they can get hold of. In the meantime some legitimate trader who has given credit to the trapper and his family is cheated out of his legitimate return. The greatest difficulty lies in connection with the matter of credit, and I want to say frankly I do not see anything in the argument at all with respect to the destruction of credit by the imposition of this tax. The difficulty has been created by the fact that some people have seen fit to get outfits, go into the territories, make rapid trips through the country visiting Indian camps and trappers, buying furs and getting them as cheaply as they can by reason of paying cash. That was the greatest evil we had to contend with in the Northwest Territories. We have stopped all that. We allow no one to enter the territories as a fur trader unless they have a license. We issue a license to a trader no matter whether his operations be small or large; if he says that he intends to trade at a definite location and establish himself there he gets a license and he can begin business. So that we are not, and I want to make this point very clear, turning these operations over to the big companies, such as the Revillon Brothers and the Hudson's Bay Company. I think they complained just as bitterly when the suggestion was made that we put a stop to the operations of the transient traders in order that we might give that protection to which the trade was entitled. I have no notion, however, of bringing these acts into effect with respect to this year's catch. I think due notice should be given in order that the companies interested and others in the business should adjust themselves to the new conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I had in mind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On the other hand I wish to make it very clear that the difficulty did not arise in regard to the stopping of credit. The difficulty was that those who gave legitimate credit were cheated out of their returns.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister did not follow me correctly. What I had in mind was that if the tax is to be exacted it is probable the price paid for furs will be less than the price theretofore paid, and inasmuch as the price has been fixed and the credit given it follows that with respect to this year's catch, if I may use that word—I think the minister says that is the correct term—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: If that be so it might unjustly affect the whole arrangement that had been made. Hence my suggestion that it should not be proceeded with at least until another season. Then business will be transacted on the basis of the tax and prices will be regulated accordingly. If the difficulty that presented itself to his mind has been cured, as the minister says, then clearly there should not be much trouble on that score. If the danger exists no longer there should be no more difficulty in regard to it.

Mr. KELLNER: There may be considerable dissatisfaction with the transient trader. I should like to suggest to the minister that he go into the library and consult the record of what the Hudson's Bay Company did at the time it had control of the whole of that territory. I want to point out to the minister that in collecting the tax in the way suggested there will be quite a lot of points where it will be absolutely impossible for the residents to sell their furs at all because there is no office at which a tax can be paid. I do not for the life of me see how the trappers are going to dispose of their furs unless they come out to the main centres, which will mean a trip of several hundreds of miles. I think it will involve unnecessary hardship to many trappers in the district. I have been asked to oppose this measure, but I shall say nothing further at the present stage beyond urging that this legislation be seriously considered before it is passed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is unduly alarmed. I have a pretty good idea from whom the opposition to the bill is coming. To some of these men we have refused to issue a license altogether because of the manner in which they have treated the natives in the territories. We do not want to make fur operations expensive, but we do want to know who are in the business. After all very few trappers bring their packs down to the city of Edmonton to dispose of them, although some of them do. The legitimate trappers are well known, their reputation is good, and they will not be subjected to any undue hardship in connection with the payment of the tax. I wish to move, in order to meet the objections of my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that the act shall not go into force until January, 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: That would cover the season of 1928.

Mr. McGIBBON: What will the license fees be? Will the amount be the same in all cases?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are not the same. They are less for a Canadian.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about the fees for non-residents?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are pretty high.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand the minister proposes a tax of 5 per cent?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is approximately that. It is on a basis of so much per pelt.

Mr. BENNETT: How is the minister going to fix the basis of the price of the pelt?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On the present price it is approximately 5 per cent. If fur goes up in price, it would be less. If fur goes down, it would be more. We have authority to change it from time to time.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister propose to fix it as a set charge per pelt?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. We must do it in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand it is impossible to do it otherwise, because if you do it on a valuation basis, you would have all kinds of complications.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is so much per pelt. It is approximately 5 per cent on present prices. If prices go down, we have authority to reduce the tax and if prices go up, we have authority to increase it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the form of a specific tax per pelt?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I move that there be added as clause 2:

2. This act shall come into effect on the 1st day of January. 1928.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

ORGANIZATION OF COMPANY TO PROVIDE STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 142, respecting the Canadian National steamships, and to provide for the establishment of West Indies service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. STEVENS: The proposal is that a new company is to be incorporated under the Companies Act to carry out the purposes and intentions of this legislation. I have under my hand in the Canada Gazette of January 11, 1919, a copy of the charter of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I gather from a study of this legislation that it is intended to organize a company under the Companies Act in precisely the same manner as and of similar character to that of the charter of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. My first question to the minister is: Why not use the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for this purpose? Why incorporate a new company at all?

My next point is this: This legislation provides in one of its subsequent clauses that each of the ships owned by this company may be incorporated as a separate company. That is, of course, the accepted practice. It also provides that the stock of this subsidiary company shall be owned by the company to be incorporated under the Companies' Act. Precisely the same power exists already in the charter given to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, so that adds to the force of my argument that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine should be used.

The third point is this: This legislation provides that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine may turn over to this new company some of the ships it now owns. That seems to be a third reason why we should use the charter of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine instead of encumbering the records and so forth with a new charter. The other day when this matter was before the House, the minister rather disposed of the argument advanced regarding the organization of a new company by saying that it was desired to keep the accounts of this new proposal entirely separate and distinct, so that we might know precisely how the business stood. There is no difficulty whatever in doing that under the present organization. It would be the most simple and elementary matter in accountancy to set up a separate accounting. Indeed you could set up a separate set of books for this and operate quite as effectively under the charter of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. In my opinion this could be done very much better under the present charter than by the incorporation of a new company. For instance, in this charter I find that they have power:

To construct, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, charter, own, maintain, operate and manage steamships, vessels, tugs, car ferries, dredges, lighters, barges, boats, and water craft of every description.

It goes on. They have the right to acquire.

Structures, erections, buildings, hotels, shops, stores, works—

And so forth.

Lands, water lots, docks, wharves, basins, slips, harbour and port works and terminals and other facilities, easements and privileges of every description.

To build, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, manage or control. . . . such buildings as it deems advisable for hotels and restaurants;

To use any of the funds of the company to purchase or otherwise acquire, and take and hold shares, bonds, or other securities of or in any other company or corporation, notwithstanding the provisions of section 44 of the said act.

And so on. Therefore, instead of a new charter being secured under the Companies' Act, the powers taken in this bill should be given effect to through the Canadian Government Merchant Marine under its existing charter. That is the first point I wish to make. I might ask another question at the same time so that the minister can deal with it while he is speaking. Who will be incorporated as this new company?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has asked several questions, and if I should miss one of them, he will remind me. The question as to how the steamship services under this West Indies trade agreement should be provided has been the subject of study by the permanent officers of the Department of Railways and Canals, and more especially by the management of the Canadian National Railways. The method suggested by my hon. friend was, of course, the first method considered. It must be remembered, however—and this is one of the reasons which led to the conclusion to incorporate what is not only a separate company, but a separate holding company in a certain sense, because as my hon. friend mentioned, later on in the act provision is made for the incorporation if necessary of each ship in a separate company for reasons which were discussed when the financial resolution was before the House, and which were more clearly explained by the hon. member for Pictou than I think by anyone else—the Canadian Government Merchant Marine now in existence is indebted to the government of Canada directly. The finance minister holds notes given in payment by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the sums advanced originally for the building of the vessels now composing the merchant marine. As the House knows it has been the subject of discussion and the exercise of much judgment as to how the very great depreciation in value as compared with the original cost of the merchant marine vessels should be taken care of, and we have not yet got out of the woods completely in that regard. In view of the fact that this particular West India service is in a sense a partnership arrangement with the West India colony, in view of the fact that they themselves each contribute, under the terms of the West India trade agreement, a subsidy towards the maintenance of the service, it is considered wiser to have the holding company completely standing on its own feet, separate entirely, so that we can in an accounting sense and in a corporate sense show to the West India colony from time to time what it is costing Canada, and what effect their contributions with respect to the cost of the service would have. The method provided in this act, as will be indicated when we come to section 3, is to finance the building of the ships by way of government guaranteed bonds, and it is expected, as I indicated in discussing the financial resolution, to amortize the ships during the course of twenty years out of the revenues received from freight and passengers, and also from subsidies from the various islands. It is also desirable, for comparative purposes that this House should know from time to time what the actual deficit on this separate service is, because it is comparative with what we have been paying for many years by way of subsidy to private corporations for operating a service to the West Indies. Taking it by and large, it is just a matter of business judgment as to which was the better way to handle it, and the judgment of all those connected with the Canadian National railway in an executive way and the judgment of those who have had to do with its business, is that it would be much better to organize a separate company for this purpose, retaining of course entirely the merchant marine organization and staff for the operation of the boats. I do not want to speak positively as to the future, but I would not be surprised if in future years it was found desirable to gradually absorb the Canadian Government Merchant Marine into this company, rather than to absorb this company into the merchant marine. I do not speak positively with regard to it. It is a possibility. As we go through the bill it will be found that provision is made for calling the two companies the Canadian National Steamship Company, and providing for the use of a common name regardless of whether they be Canadian government marine vessels or Canadian national steamship, if they are incorporated under this act.

Mr. CANTLEY: What thought lies behind the suggestion that they would transfer the Canadian Government Merchant Marine into this company?

Mr. DUNNING: The thought that lies behind it is this; when the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was organized it was organized as a governmental institution. Its name indicates that. Subsequently, after the organization of the Canadian National railway, the management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was entrusted to the railway management. In the case of other institutions of a similar character—that is the steamship lines connected with the railway line—it has been found desirable for reasons that apparently were good to those who were interested, to incorporate the steamship company with the name of the railway company, and now that the term "Canadian National" stands for something in the way of efficiency and service, there is some value in it as attached to a steamship concern under exactly the same management as the railways themselves. That is one thought. However, I am not to-night, in connection with these proposals, proposing that that should be done, but I indicate that in the future it is possible such a development may take place. My hon. friend from Centre Vancouver says that the terms of the charter do not differ widely from the terms of the original charter of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, but the method of financing it is entirely different to the method followed on that occasion, and we are starting this company free entirely from the old awkward obligations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in the matter of capital expenditure, in the matter of values of ships. The cost of the ships was far, far out of proportion to the present value.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has not answered the other question as to who would be the incorporators of this company.

Mr. DUNNING: I think there is a section of the bill with regard to that point.

Mr. STEVENS: The company has been organized under the Companies Act, and certain individuals would be incorporated under that act as a company. Who are these individuals?

Mr. DUNNING: They will be the directors of the Canadian National.

Mr. STEVENS: That is decided?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, quite. We are not introducing any outside interests whatever. I assure my hon. friend there is no intention to introduce any outside interests.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the boats of this company run between the West India islands and Canadian ports alone, or is it proposed that they will touch American ports?

Mr. DUNNING: The treaty covers that.

Mr. MacLAREN: A few years ago it was permissible that they call at American ports. Under the present arrangements it is proposed that they will be restricted to West Indian and Canadian ports.

Mr. MALCOLM: The terms of the treaty are to give direct service. There is no treaty affecting American ports.

Mr. BENNETT: What the minister has said might be well said with respect to any company which changes its name. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company changed the name of the Dominion Express Company to the Canadian Pacific Express Company for reasons they gave which were good and sufficient. The minister says the service may be known as the Canadian National Steamships Company for the same reason, because the Canadian National with respect to railways has become so well known. But there is in this bill a serious matter raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George last year, and that is this: What is the obligation imposed upon this country by reason of this legislation? Whatever obligation is imposed upon this country by reason of this legislation—it does not make any difference whether it is guaranteed securities or not—the people of this country must pay if the corporation does not. That is as clear as anything in the world. Whether the obligation is imposed with respect to deadweight debt or guaranteed securities does not make much difference. The Canadian National got $10,000,000 out of the people of this country last year in cash, and the taxpayers paid it. It did not make much difference where it went; whether it went direct to them or in some other way, we had to pay it.

I have looked through this bill, as I did the resolution, with some degree of care. Who is going to build these ships? How are the contracts to be let? What are the circumstances under which the ships are to be built? Speaking for myself, I think there should be added to this bill a provision that not one single contract should be let without public tender with respect to these ships. I have not any doubt that that should be done.

[Mr. Stevens.]

I have not observed what has taken place in this country during the years I have been able to remember without having learned something, and legislation of this character is an invitation to the collector—not the collector of customs either, as we understand the term. I think the time has come to insist that there be added to the legislation itself a provision that no contract shall be let until there has been first public notice and public tenders called for.

Then you will have three sets of figures to consider. You will have an offer to build these ships from continental Europe; you will have an offer to build these ships from Great Britain; you will have an offer to build them in Canada. Then there will be pressure to build them in Canada, because that offers greater facilities for those who desire that to be done. There will be a certain amount of pressure to build the ships in Great Britain; that will be less, and the pressure to build them in continental Europe will be less still. Everybody knows that in the history of building ships, the Royal Mail Company and other lines have found it necessary during the last few years, in order to be able to compete at all upon the high seas, to have their ships built where they could be built most cheaply, and they have had them built in Amsterdam, Hamburg and at the Vulcan Works in Stettin, because the price at which they could be built there was very much lower than what they could be built for in England. The British shipowner could not compete with German and Netherlands built ships if he had to pay British ship-building costs.

We in Canada are faced with this situation. This government made a treaty with the West Indies. That treaty involved this country in large financial obligations. For several days the member for St. Lawrence-St. George endeavoured to ascertain from the government of the day what that involved in dollars and cents. No figures were forthcoming. There came a change of administration for a few months which left those who assumed the responsibility in very great difficulty, because the question of implementing our promises under that treaty had not been commenced; the ships had not been contracted for or built. There was a small sum of money available that enabled us to maintain our word of honour with respect to the West Indies to a limited extent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows the demands made from the West Indies with respect to this service being provided. They say: You have contracted to give us this service, and now we demand that you give it to us. We say: It takes time to provide the service, and in the meantime we will do the best we can. We have now decided, instead of leaving this service to somebody else, that we ourselves will probably construct the ships for the purpose of providing the service and in order to maintain it, as the minister has very properly said, upon a business basis, we have further decided that we will have an entity created under the Companies' Act, with powers in addition to those that might be obtained under that act given by the measure that we now have before us. That involves, of course, the creation under the Companies' Act and this statute of a new corporation which will have an appropriate name. To that company will be payable the subsidies granted by this government as well as by the West Indies government.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: In lieu of paying out money exactly as a subsidy as we have been doing heretofore, we are going to guarantee securities, which admittedly means a deficit, the amount of which we have been very anxious to obtain.

Mr. DUNNING: It was given to the House the other evening, so far as an estimate is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: So I observed, but we have no figures in detail as asked for last year except the estimate of the minister, which I take it is based on the best information he can secure. In other words, what we are going to do is to back the note of this company for the amount of money that may be necessary to build these ships, and we propose, instead of paying a subsidy from year to year as we have done heretofore for this service, to assume the responsibility for the deficits which are inevitable. Now the true test of the value of this is going to be the extent to which the deficit exceeds the subsidy, having regard to the fact that the ultimate ownership in the venture will rest with the Canadian people who advance the money by endorsing the note of this corporation. That being so—and I observe from the acquiescence of the two ministers that they realize this is really a venture of the Canadian people, pure and simple—

Mr. DUNNING: Of course.

Mr. BENNETT: That being so, is it not right and just that we should add to this legislation a provision that no contract for the construction of these ships shall be made unless called for by public tender, so that we cannot in any sense divert responsibility from the government to the corporation created by this statute? I am not saying that in an offensive way; I mean it in the sense that the obligation must be a governmental obligation. My observation as well as my experience has taught me that, in the langugae of Professor Ripley, who has been writing such excellent articles in the Atlantic Monthly and other magazines recently with reference to corporate administration, one of the safeguards of the public in this regard is publicity, and that publicity comes through tenders called for publicly from the shipbuilders. I do not say that you are going to put an advertisement in the Podunk Review—

Mr. DUNNING: Or the Calgary Herald.

Mr. BENNETT: Or the Regina Leader. If it were given to the Regina Leader, having regard to its proprietorship you would no doubt get a response from the Vulcan yards at Stettin. One of the safeguards of the public which should be provided in this bill is that no contract shall be made by this company for the construction of these ships unless public tenders have been called for. That is the real point I desire to make in regard to this legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry my hon. friend was not here the other night because we discussed this at very great length, and I think the discussion centered more around the building of these ships than around any other part of these proposals. I would point out to my hon. friend with reference to his last suggestion, which was also his first, regarding tenders and so forth, that both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself, who are primarily concerned in the matter, he with the trade and treaty end and I, of course, with the initiation and operation of the service—

Mr. BENNETT: Although it is neither a canal nor a railway.

Mr. DUNNING: Although it is neither a canal nor a railway. I would point out to my hon. friend that in order to cover the very point he mentions—we are again discussing the bill generally now, Mr. Chairman, instead of by sections—an addition was made to section 8 in order to nail the responsibility definitely to the government with respect to the contracts for the building of these ships, as follows:

All contracts or agreements involving an expenditure in excess of $500,000 shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point. I have read that.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that that involves the scrutiny of parliament of every detail in connection with these contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: After the event.

Mr. DUNNING: After the event, of course. With regard to calling for tenders, it was plainly stated the other evening that that would be the course pursued, only I am not at all sure that we should do otherwise than the Canadian Pacific steamships, for instance, or the Royal Mail Steam Packet would do—

Mr. BENNETT: They always call for tenders.

Mr. DUNNING: But they would not advertise, not in the Vancouver papers. They would address their call for tenders to shipyards which they knew could produce the goods.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. DUNNING: They would not advertise in the newpapers as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. BENNETT: In the trade journals.

Mr. DUNNING: There would be notice there, and I can assure my hon. friend in the most positive terms that such a course will be followed whether this act is amended to provide for it or not. To use in the act language having the effect of calling for tenders might imply more than is intended. There is no intention to advertise generally, nor to ask for tenders from any concern which is known not to possess the facilities to enable it to build ships. I have no doubt at all that if any Canadian shipyard, which hon. gentlemen opposite believe might be able to build ships, is not given an opportunity to tender we shall hear about it. It is our intention to give to all Canadian yards that could possibly do the work a chance to tender.

My hon. friend spoke of German yards, and I may tell him—although he is not listening to me just now—that it is not our intention to call for tenders from continental ship builders. I made that clear the other evening. We do however intend to assess properly the differences between British prices and Canadian prices as submitted to us by shipyards in Canada who consider themselves capable of doing the work. But I must say that if a shipyard in Canada, which the officers of the merchant marine and those engaged in this business for us consider is not capable of producing ships, tenders at a lower price than others whom we know to be capable of doing the work, then we shall have to exercise our best judgment, just as any business concern does under similar circumstances. Of course, in such a case we shall have to take the responsibility for our position. I appreciate that fully.

I do want to impress upon my hon. friend that we intend to be fair in the matter. The language I used the other night was that it was our desire that as much of this work as possible should be done in Canada, having regard to all national considerations which ought properly to be taken into account in matters of this sort. Among those considerations I include the factor which has been mentioned as applying to steamship companies that find it necessary, in order to compete on the high seas, to buy their ships in the cheapest market. We must have regard to that factor and we cannot properly decide, on the one hand, between the work to be given to Canadian yards and Canadian workmen and, on the other, the necessity of which my hon. friend spoke, of being in a position to compete on the high seas, until we have before us comparative figures which can be secured only by tender from the British and the Canadian shipbuilders respectively, for each one of the ships in question and, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce points out to me, not only each ship but also, one, two, three, four and five from each yard. This is our intention with regard to the matter and I trust that my assurance will relieve my hon. friend's mind and obviate the necessity of moving an amendment, which it might be rather difficult to draft having regard to what it is necessary to do under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Power): Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. STEVENS: We have not passed section 1 yet, Mr. Chairman. We must not allow these little matters to go through so easily.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister the other evening referred to a proposal to equip as oil burners two of the vessels now engaged in the West Indies trade.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the department is making a grave mistake. The cost of fuel oil has advanced greatly within the last two years, so much so that many ship owners who installed oil burning equipment in their boats are reverting now to coal. If the minister inquires he will find that the cost has gone up largely, and this reversion to coal has taken place and is still occurring. If the boats were operating at points where it was difficult to obtain bunker coal there might be reason for incurring the additional expense. In the first place the expense of fitting up these boats as oil burners will be considerable. The costs of operation will be very much higher than they are to-day with coal. There is no difficulty in obtaining bunkers for they are readily available at any of the ports from which the initial voyage is made, either from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or on the St. Lawrence to the West Indies and vice versa. I should like the minister to take that point into consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's observations in that regard will be given due weight. The proposals I submitted the other evening regarding conversion were proposals made by officers of the merchant marine. That however is a detail which I have not yet examined sufficiently to be able to say finally shall be carried out.

Mr. CANTLEY: I thank the minister for the explanation. The next point I want to refer to briefly is this. It has been the custom for these boats in the summer months when coming from the West Indies, instead of calling at Halifax or St. John, as they do in winter, to complete the voyage at Montreal. I rather consider that a mistake. At any rate, I would point out that these boats in the past have been in the habit of coming up the St. Lawrence too early in the season. That is to say, the first voyage up the St. Lawrence has been at a time when the weather and ice conditions are not favourable to passengers coming directly from the warm climate of the West Indies, and the result has been that in a number of cases personally known to me people who have come up the St. Lawrence through the drift ice have caught cold and been seriously ill, in some cases having to be taken to hospital immediately after arrival. If the boats are to come up the St. Lawrence in the summer months I want to urge on the minister the importance of deferring the first voyage, until at least all ice is out of the gulf. They should not come up as early as they have done in the past. If they continue to make the trip so early in the season our people will take an unfortunate view of that voyage from the West Indies. April is the period of the great migration from the West Indies of people who have been spending their winter there. In April and May the boats are crowded coming north; the same being true in the autumn months going south.

There is another and broader matter in connection with this whole question, and that is interference by government with private enterprise. I presume the minister has taken this point into consideration. Trade between the West Indies and Halifax and other maritime ports has been going on now for between a hundred and a hundred and fifty years, and many old established houses are thoroughly familiar with it. They have gone through all the vicissitudes of sail and steam, and know all that has transpired in the last seventy-five or hundred years or more in that trade. It seems rather a pity that these people should be called upon now practically to give up their business by competing with a company organized by this Dominion, with all the power, influence, resources and money of the government behind it. I was going to make a suggestion in this regard. One of the ministers a few nights ago, when the subject was under discussion, submitted certain figures as his estimate of the losses that would ensue from the operation of a line, running into about three-quarters of a million and diminishing to half a million later on. Supposing the government, instead of asking for tenders for the construction of the boats, should make an offer of a subsidy which they are prepared to pay, the subsidy being about the amount which they estimate their loss to be; we could see in that way whether or not offers would be received from steamship companies, either those already in the business or others disposed to take it up. Then we would be relieved from all anxiety in regard to the cost over and above any estimate of the officers of the department, because they are only estimates after all. Again I would refer to the unfairness of interfering in this way as we now propose to do, with private enterprise in view of the fact that these boats or the profits arising from them are not taxed when private enterprise is taxed; if the private company is fortunate enough to make some profit we take a portion of that away in taxes. The competition seems rather unfair, and I would suggest that an effort be made along the lines I have indicated or in some other way to try to discover if it is not possible to get a private company to take over this service rather than have the government embark on what is after all an entirely new and distinct business.

Mr. DUNNING: I would respectfully point out to my hon. friend that the suggestion he makes with regard to a further effort to get private enterprise to undertake this work is of course entirely contrary to the principle advanced by his colleague from West Calgary

(Mr. Bennett) in connection with another matter fully as important. May I say that at least two efforts have recently been made to get a tender covering the service contemplated by our treaty obligations, and as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) indicated the other evening, they met with no success. Now I understand my friend to say that having failed to get tenders from private companies we should ourselves figure out an offer which we can make the private steamship corporations as an inducement to undertake these services. I imagine that if I came into this House with any such proposal I should be subjected to attack, and I think properly so, by the hon. member for West Calgary, the ex-Minister of Finance, on the basis of the same principle which he enunciated so well a few minutes ago. Having failed to get even an offer for the western service with all our advertising in the trade journals in London and elsewhere, where it might be thought that those interested would at least be sure to know about the tenders, I do not think we could very well adopt this proposed scheme. We are following the present plan because we are convinced that it is the only way in which we can establish the service called for by the treaty. I think I dealt with my friend's other question, and I do not know that there is anything else I have not covered.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would like to make one observation. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) refers to the fact that this will initiate public competition against private capital, and he thinks it is not fair. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has already pointed out that private companies can buy their ships in the cheapest market while as a public enterprise we are denying ourselves that right. The cheapest market is continental Europe, and if we deny ourselves the privilege of buying there on the understanding that it is in the public interest to build these boats in Canada even at a greater price, surely private companies have at least the advantage of having the markets of the world open to them with lower initial costs.

I would like to make just one further reference to what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has said. At the request of people who were interested in this service and who were most anxious that something further should be done, the matter was delayed and a further call for tenders was made, but without any offer of a private company to undertake the service to the western group of islands. We did have a tentative proposition of about $750,000 subsidy for both services from one proposed company, but they were not able to finance their plans and withdrew their offer on the second tender. We had reason to believe the suggested tender would stand, but it was withdrawn owing to the inability of this group to make the financial arrangements necessary. I can assure the hon. member for Pictou that with the government it was not a selection as between a private company and a government service but rather a matter of necessity to meet the terms of the treaty. Considerable dissatisfaction has been expressed in the West Indies as to lack of service, not since the last conference but because of the failure of the government to implement its agreements made at the conference of 1920, which I believe is known to every member of the House.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister mentioned building ships in Canada. Do I understand that that is the settled policy of the government?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is the intention to send invitations to tender on all five of these ships to all Canadian shipyards and to all British shipyards, because as was pointed out the other night in debate by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), it is quite possible to lay down two boats of the same kind in one yard more economically than to build the two boats in separate yards, and the government will have to take cognizance of all the conditions surrounding the tenders before a decision is finally reached.

Mr. HEAPS: I would ask the minister if it is the intention of the government to ask for tenders in Great Britain for all the ships that are to be built?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Supposing there is a great difference between the price in Great Britain and that in Canada; is it the intention of the government to award all the ships to the one place?

Mr. MALCOLM: Was my hon. friend here the other evening?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. I understood then that it was the intention to have three of the ships built in Canada. That is why I hardly think it fair to ask for tenders on all the ships in Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: I indicated that ratio of three and two the other evening as the basis of the financial calculations which I had to give the House. It was necessary to take some basis and naturally we weighed whether it should be all-British construction or all-

Canadian construction or whether it should be a part of each, and having regard to all the factors we could then see it was thought that the best basis of presenting the calculations to the House would be in the ratio of three and two. That does not mean that we will not call for tenders for all the ships in both Canada and Great Britain. As I indicated previously to-night, it will then become the duty of the management of the organization and finally of the government to decide what proportion shall be built in each country, having regard to all the considerations mentioned in the House during the discussion on the matter. I cannot speak more positively than that. Might I point out to my hon. friend that if we say here and now that these ships will all be built in Canada, in my opinion it would have a prejudicial effect upon the tenders; I think there is no doubt about that. We do intend to call for tenders in Great Britain on all the ships in order that we may have before us all the facts before we enter into any contract.

Mr. HEAPS: My little experience along this line has been that it is unfair to ask companies to tender when they know they will not get the business. I think it will militate against us at some future time.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not indicate that.

Mr. HEAPS: Then is there an understanding that a certain number of ships will be built in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: There is not.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it possible that the five ships may be built abroad?

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly is.

Mr. MALCOLM: But not likely.

Mr. EVANS: According to the minister's remarks, we are entering upon a project which is most unbusinesslike and of very doubtful benefit to this country; in fact I think from the remarks of the Minister of Railways it cannot be expected to be a paying concern, since no private company would tender for the service. I really wonder why we have entered upon this project at all, seeing that it is an uneconomical thing from the very beginning. We are going to have a line of boats bringing in the products of the West Indies, entailing a very much longer haul than under the present service. I can remember that some years ago when the Minister of Railways was general manager of the coöperative elevators in Saskatchewan he was very emphatic that every part of the business should pay its way. Well, here we are entering upon a national scheme and the minister admits that it cannot pay its way. It is a foregone conclusion that the minister will have to come to this House and meet a deficit each year, or the New Brunswick potato grower and the Canadian consumer will have to be charged a freight rate or price that will pay for the service.

Mr. DUNNING: We cannot do it.

Mr. EVANS: Then we will have to meet a deficit every year.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. EVANS: Why in the world have we entered upon such a contract as this? What benefit will be derived from it?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should just like to say that I realize that we have a trade to keep up with the West Indies and we can hardly ignore that even if we encounter a loss. But those of us in this section of the House have been protesting for many years against the large subsidy paid to a private company operating ships between the ports of Nova Scotia and the West Indies. We have complained of it because we saw no direct result from it, and because the company that had entered into the contract with the government, the company that was receiving large subsidies—amounting I believe to about $450,000 a year—was not living up to the contract. I believe that the proper type of ships was never supplied, and the ships were not equipped with proper facilities for handling the trade. I appreciate the fact that there will be a loss of business for some time, but that loss will probably be made up to us in many other ways. Why even the government itself is carried on at a loss if you look at it from a merely business standpoint; it makes no return from a monetary point of view for the expenditure made. There are many matters with respect to which we have to adopt that point of view. Most of us are married men with families to maintain. We can hardly say that marriage is a profitable investment, and I think that some of these matters must be regarded in the same light. What I am more concerned about is that the system or the principle of government ownership should get a fair trial. Because it seems to me that in the future, in the next quarter of a century in this country, the great political battle will not be between free traders and protectionists but will be between the advocates of public and private ownership. Perhaps my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) will not agree with me on that but that is how I regard the future.

Mr. MANION: The fight between free traders and protectionists ceased this afternoon. There are no more free traders except a few down in that corner.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not recognize any difference on the issue of free trade between the two old political parties. What I suggested to the minister a few evenings ago in connection with the construction of these ships was that if it were necessary to build them in Canada—and I expressed the hope that they would be built in Canada even at a higher cost—the difference in cost should be absorbed out of the treasury so that the extra capitalization would not be charged to these ships and tend to hinder the development of trade between maritime ports and the West Indies. I have no doubt that if these ships were to be built in Canada the Canadian companies would want to raise the price; but I think that could be gotten around because there should be some means of ascertaining the relative costs—the cost of construction in foreign countries, in Great Britain, and in Canada. I think when those figures were arrived at the government could very well allow that difference in cost to the Canadian manufacturers. If the tenders of the Canadian shipyards are excessive, give them to understand that unless their figures are reduced the contract for the construction of the ships would go to another country. But I think in any case the difference in cost should be absorbed out of the treasury.

Mr. CANTLEY: One of the gentlemen who has just spoken referred to the fact that public ownership does not get a fair show as against private enterprise. In a matter of this kind they get more than a fair show. As to that there can be no possible doubt. As far as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is concerned I do not think anybody can say that it is operating under any disadvantage as compared with private ownership. I do not know of any, and I do not think any can be shown.

It is rather strange to hear members from the west getting up here and protesting more or less against this service. The fact of the matter is that ninety per cent of the flour consumed in the western islands and ninety-eight per cent of the flour consumed in the eastern islands is Canadian flour. Not only that, but large quantities of other products, agricultural products for example, are being shipped from Canada to the West Indies which would not go there if it were not for this service. These boats come up the St. Lawrence in summer, and they have a direct route from Montreal clear down to the West Indies. That is something they could not have under any other arrangement. There is a good deal of advantage in shipping by this route as against shipping by the American ports. I do not want to go into that feature of the matter again, but every man conversant with the trade knows what those advantages are.

In regard to the construction of the boats, the minister has convinced me that he has not any intention, or the government either, of going to the continent to have them built. I deny that ships built on the continent today are cheaper in the long run, working experience and necessary replacements considered, than boats which are built in this country. British owners have had some experience in that connection and those experiences are not likely to be repeated. If the Minister of Railways has any doubt as to the advisability of building these vessels in Canada, I think I can relieve him of those doubts. There will be competition, there is no doubt about that. There are four or five yards—there are two or three at least—who would be active competitors to-morrow for the building of the two capital ships. I take it that these ships are to be say 400 feet long and say 42 to 45 feet beam, or thereabouts. There are three yards, probably four in Canada, in which those two boats can be built. Let me point out again, as briefly as possible, the advantage which one yard would have in building the two boats. There are detailed drawings to get out, there are the moulds, templates and half a hundred other things, the cost of which is just split in two, determined by the fact of whether you are building two boats or one. If there were four boats to be built the cost would be cut in four instead of in two. As far as the three smaller boats are concerned they can be built in half a dozen places in Canada. I have no doubt there will be very active competition for them. I cannot tell how much greater the cost will be in Canada than in the old country; the minister can, but I presume some advantage would and should be given to Canada yards in competition with Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: Unquestionably.

Mr. CANTLEY: I thank the minister for that. That is all I want to say, except to emphasize the reference I have already made to those boats coming up the St. Lawrence too early in the season. The minister was kind enough to deal with the other matters I brought up, but he did not refer to that, and I would be glad if he would do so.

Mr. DUNNING: The matter of the boats entering the St. Lawrence, in the opinion of my hon. friend too early in the season, is one of management. The government does not interfere with that, but I will of course see to it that the views expresed by my hon. friend in that regard are communicated to the management, and I have no doubt they will be carefully considered. I should, however, like to ask my hon. friend a question with regard to his other suggestions as to the building of the boats. He speaks of the economy which could be secured by giving two boats or four boats to one yard. If he were in my place and tenders came in indicating that one Canadian yard had tendered the lowest in Canada for all five ships; that a substantial saving or a saving could be secured by giving all five ships or four or three of the five to one yard, would he regard that as good sound policy, or would he come here next year and criticize the government for proceeding along that line?

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister has misunderstood what I said. I had reference to two identical ships. What I said will apply only when they are identical, that is as regards detailed drawings, plans, estimating figures, moulds, templates, jigs and all that sort of thing. There are probably fifty items that apply to the two boats—not necessarily the whole five, because when you change from one size or type of ship to another you have to make new templates, et cetera.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend does not clearly get my question. Regardless of the factors which he mentioned, if for any reason one Canadian yard is low for the whole five ships, or if, let us say, two Canadian yards are low, one for three ships and one for two, what is his judgment? Should we confine the building of these ships to those two yards?

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not see why not, but I am quite sure I would not give the five ships to any one yard.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course there is this to say in regard to that. My hon. friend is rather cute.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: These tenders, as we have been insisting, must be open tenders, so that all will have exactly the same deal, and we would like to have that safeguard inserted in the bill. It would not be fair for the minister to come here next year, having given all these ships or three of them to one yard, and having given that yard perhaps an opportunity of making a special tender on three ships, and say: I propounded this scheme to the House last year, and the House agreed. This all depends upon the conditions surrounding the granting of the contract to the one yard.

Mr. DUNNING: I can tell my hon. friend that exactly the same conditions will apply to all tenderers. That is the business practice of this government.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not so sure of that. I am not desirous of starting a row to-night; I would like to go through the rest of this day quietly and harmoniously, but I want the minister to understand that we are not children and we are not going to be fooled by very quiet and kind observations such as he has made. We might as well say this now: We warn him now that next year when this House meets, if a kind Providence spares us and the government does not dissolve in the meantime, if he lets all these contracts to one yard we shall scrutinize the job pretty closely no matter where it goes and we shall want to know the why and the wherefore.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought I might be successful in arousing the normal suspicions of my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has never allayed them. They have been there all the time.

Mr. DUNNING: I never hope to convince my hon. friend that any of us on this side of the House is even ordinarily honest.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend seems to be looking for trouble to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: Methinks the lady doth protest too much.

Mr. DUNNING. I am merely appealing to the good business judgment of the remainder of the members of the committee who, I am sure, desire to be fair. They have heard the repeated statements of myself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) with respect to the manner in which we intend to conduct this business. I am content to leave the matter to the judgment of the committee and to the record of Hansard, knowing fully that we shall be responsible for what we do. I do not hope ever to satisfy my hon. friend that any business we conduct is conducted honestly; but I am not concerned about that; I am concerned rather about the verdict of the whole House and particularly the verdict of the Canadian people.

Mr. STEVENS: Now the minister has succeeded in reading me out of all reasonable company and branding me as being utterly unreasonable and not capable of being persuaded of the honesty of anybody, particularly of himself, a judgment which he lays upon himself, but which I did not. What I was pointing out, what the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) pointed out a little while ago, was this. This bill is giving the government wide powers, and we would be derelict in our duty if we did not examine it very carefully in order to protect the rights of the people of this country. I do not care a snap of my fingers what the minister's opinion is. I purpose doing that. I am not going to be frightened or estopped by the minister insinuating that it is impossible to satisfy me. Let me tell him that there are in this chamber other members besides himself who have known me during the sixteen years that I have been in parliament, who probably will not wholly agree with him if he will go out into the lobby and talk to them. Indulgence in that sort of thing is not going to advance his interests or the government's interests or the harmony of the House. As a matter of fact we have been treating the minister with a considerable degree of courtesy this session while he, on the other hand, has been rather provocative at times.

Mr. BENNETT: That is his normal condition.

Mr. STEVENS: A few things were said tonight which I resented very much, but I kept silent. As we go through this bill we will give it just a little close scrutiny.

Mr. DUNNING: The record in Hansard of his observations will speak for itself with regard to insinuation; the record of mine will speak for itself with regard to provocation. I say with all respect to my hon. friend that his attitude towards the government and towards me in connection with this matter from the commencement has been, in my judgment—I may be wrong, and if I am doing him an injustice, I regret it—one of insinuation as to the sincerity of the motives which actuated the government in dealing with the matter of building these ships. My hon. friend need only read his observations of the other night. I have no desire, as he would intimate, to brow-beat him in any way or to treat him discourteously. But if we are to be subject all the time to the threat from himself and from some few others that if a minister sees fit to resent aspersions upon his common honesty his measures are going to be blocked, I can only say in all fairness to my hon. friend that, like himself, I am inclined to scrap when that sort of thing happens. I say this to him in all good humour. My time will be spent here just as his will, but there is a limit to what either of us will stand from the other in that regard. From him I feel it is insinuation all the time. He thinks from me it is provocation all the time. I am quite content, if he is, to let the matter rest there. I have no intention of insulting him at any time. I have not consciously done so, and I will not do so in the future. But I do not intend, and I do not think either the rules or the amenities of this House compel a minister to sit silently all the time while impressions are being created to be scattered by the press across this country that he is not going to handle properly the business which he has sworn to handle with common, decent honesty. I resent that whether it comes from my hon. friend or any one else. I have no complaint in that regard with respect to anybody on that side of the House except my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: Keep rubbing it in.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend asked me for it and I gave it to him, not in a spirit of pique but in good humour. I say that is the way we feel about it. Now we are square.

Mr. STEVENS: No. The minister says I insinuated and intimated certain things. I did nothing of the kind. The other night I drew the attention of the House to the fact that a shipyard in Montreal had been transferred to two gentlemen whom I named, according to the public report, Senators Raymond and McDougald. I made the statement on the floor of the House and made no insinuation. I simply said it was a remarkable synchronization with the contracts authorised in this bill. I asked the minister, before we had the bill and before we had an opportunity to study it, if there was any significance in that fact. I did not go behind the company and did not go outside to make any declaration. The minister recognised that in his cross-examination of the hon. member for Pictou. He was asking a hypothetical question; suppose we let all the ships to one yard, and suppose the figures were below those of the other tenderers, would my hon. friend criticize the government for letting them to one yard? I intimated to him and reiterate now that that looked like providing in advance for a possible happening. He may call it insinuation or suspicion or whatever he likes, but I am giving him the information that these contracts will be scrutinized.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. STEVENS: And I claim the right to scrutinize them.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. STEVENS: And it paid this country to scrutinize the Petersen contract and other matters. The minister knows perfectly well that the government is frequently subjected to pressure that is very difficult to resist. No one is impugning his personal honesty, but while he may desire to go along a certain path it may be difficult to resist the pressure. One of the uses of an opposition is to keep the government on the straight and narrow path. Very often the government will say to importunate followers, "We will have difficulty in getting through with this in the House." I am fortifying the minister with some propositions which might help him to resist the importunities of his friends.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the observation of the minister that criticism of a public measure made by the opposition in the House involves a criticism of the minister in charge, is not well founded.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not intend that.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think he intended to state it in those terms, but it was open to no other construction. He spoke about his common honesty and decency. Surely no gentleman charged with the responsibility of a minister in the House of Commons of Canada would for a moment assert that criticism of a measure by His Majesty's opposition in any sense involves a reflection on the personal honesty of the minister in charge, whether it be common honesty or decency or otherwise. I am sure the minister will agree with that. There is reason why the opposition should criticize legislation introduced by the government in the form of proposed statutes. Does the minister recall that in the income tax measure brought into the House within the last fifteen months there was a retroactive provision that quietly disappeared? Does he realize that we are not all fools, and that if we are to make it our business to investigate and criticize business introduced by the minister we are doing it in the public interest? Is the assertion that those who sit to the left of the Speaker, and spend their time night and day in studying legislation from an intelligent standpoint, should be held to be casting reflections on the minister when they criticize such legislation when it is being considered by the House? The reason that the gentlemen sitting to the left of the Speaker discuss proposed legislation is that it is their duty to do so in the public interest, just as the Liberal party similarly situated would do. As my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has properly pointed out, in this country and in every country where democratic conditions prevail that is the course to be pursued. In Pennsylvania last fall, in Ohio and in Illinois, conditions prevailed with respect to elections, and those conditions prevail not only in United States but in other countries. They have prevailed in this country, and reflections such as those made by my hon. friend with respect to those who in the public interest criticize legislation of this character are not well made. I feel sure that in the heat of the moment the minister made his statement a little stronger than he meant to make it. His observations meant only one thing; that criticism of the minister's proposals means distrust and allegations of dishonesty against such minister.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the minister intended it, but as he stated it, it is open only to that construction.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it was not intended in that way. Following assurances made by me and repeated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that tenders would be called, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre intimates that I am creating in advance an alibi for what he says is an endeavour to put through a contract as a special favour. I consider that if I did that it would be dishonest on my part as a minister. If in calling for public tenders I permitted some of my officers to give information as to what others were bidding it would be dishonest on my part, and I resent the suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear the statement by my hon. friend, and I think he means it. Those of us who are familiar with the history of Canada will know that that is just what was done in connection with the alienation of a considerable part of our western Canadian resources.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think there is a man on this side or on the opposite side of the House who would be guilty of doing what the hon. gentleman suggested I was doing.

Mr. BENNETT: The Solicitor General apparently wants to say something.

Mr. CANNON: We are discussing a shipbuilding proposition, and perhaps that is why we are allowed to go adrift.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend misapprehended the point about the criticism. He does not call for tenders under this bill, it is the company that does it, and unfortunately the saying of "yes" or "no" to the tenders rests with that company and not with the government, except to voice approval or disapproval if the sum is over $500,000. Therefore they can make their contract and send it to the government, with a report which may or may not be founded on fact, and the government acts upon that report.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, the Canadian National would call for tenders. The allocation of the tender and the matter of where the ships shall be built will rest with the government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the bill says.

Mr. MALCOLM: I admit that.

Mr. STEVENS: That is our quarrel with the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: The question of tender has been overcome by having sealed tenders put in, and having the tenders opened in public. The tenders are not opened until the public can be present. If there is any difficulty in regard to the form of these tenders, my suggestion is that they be called for and that they be opened in public.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Nature and form of securities to be approved by Governor in Council.

Mr. BENNETT: The point that I desire to make is that these securities should not be sold except by competitive bids. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is a business man in eastern Canada, knows how easy it is for bond houses and others to get what in the vernacular is called "a lead pipe cinch" on the sale of these securities, and I think the time has come when we should provide that these securities shall be subject to competitive bids. That, I think, the minister will agree is not an unsound suggestion.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a standard clause that I am endeavouring to work into all bills relating to Canadian National finance, with the objective of giving to the Minister of Finance a measure of control over the disposition of the securities. The Minister of Finance is not here at the moment, but I know his views are in the direction outlined by my hon. friend. I should not like, however, to tie him down positively in a statute without consulting him.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. BENNETT: You will not take the bill out of committee?

Mr. DUNNING: No, but I am doubtful as to whether in a statute relating to the sale of securities you should under all circumstances be compelled to call for tenders.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say tenders, but competitive bids. There is a distinction.

Mr. DUNNING: That might help out, I might say that during ten years experience as provincial treasurer I never sold an issue of provincial bonds otherwise than by public tender; by that I mean invitations issued to all the bond houses who might be expected to bid. I must confess that I had a number of experiences which led me to the conclusion that such a course was not always in the best interests of the body borrowing the money. My hon. friend I know is familiar with such conditions. While agreeing with the general principle, I would hesitate to put in the bill something which would make it impossible to deal with the securities otherwise than in the manner therein set out.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite appreciate the minister's point, but if you say "Such securities shall be sold only by competitive bids," you have met the difficulty. I do not think you should take the bill out of committee entirely, for when we come to section 8, I am going to say that I think $500,000 is entirely too large a sum, if you mean it in that sense.

Mr. DUNNING: We will come to that. We will carry this section and leave the bill in committee so that I can discuss the matter with the Minister of Finance.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Powers of company to construct, purchase or refit boats.

Mr. STEVENS: I notice the company is being empowered either to contract for the construction of ships, or to purchase, charter or otherwise acquire the boats. Is it in contemplation at all to purchase boats for this service?

Mr. DUNNING: We may have to purchase a 1,000 ton boat for the Trinidad-Jamaica service.

Mr. STEVENS: Is there one in sight?

Mr. DUNNING: No. I know of no arrangement having been made as yet.

Mr. STEVENS: That would be one of the five?

Mr. DUNNING: No, that is a small extra boat.

Mr. STEVENS: In regard to this $500,000, my hon. friend from West Calgary has intimated that he thinks that too large a sum. I have the same opinion. It says:

All contracts or agreements involving an expenditure in excess of $500,000 shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council.

I do not know by what reasoning $500,000 was fixed upon. It strikes me as altogether too large a sum. I do not know what the dimensions of these smaller ships will be, and I do not know what they will cost, but it is quite within the realm of possibility that they may come within this $500,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That figure was set with the idea of having all shipbuilding contracts approved by the government. The one possible exception might be the small 1,000 ton boat.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not place it at $100,000?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no objection to cutting down the amount, except that if it is cut down to too small a figure it will necessarily increase what I might call the political control over the management of the company; that is, the Canadian National board of directors and management are, of course, handling contracts and agreements of all sorts—

Mr. BENNETT: The Board of Directors does not do much.

Mr. DUNNING: The management, in any event, and it is just a question of arriving at a figure which will maintain the principle of the government passing upon and being responsible for all the shipbuilding contracts. I am inclined to think that $500,000 will not be too large a sum for any of the ships, with the possible exception of the 1,000-ton ship.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest that this clause stand and be the clause that will keep the bill in committee.

Mr. DUNNING: Very well, and I shall be glad to hear any suggestions from my hon. friend in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: In the interim I would ask the minister to consider cutting this amount down to $100,000. His idea is that the company shall have a free hand in ordinary business?

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. STEVENS: I would say that $100,000 would amply cover ordinary business contracts.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in the shipping business. However, I will make inquiries.

Mr. STEVENS: About all you would have that would come above that figure might be a large contract for fuel, which would be a contract once a year or something of that kind. Perhaps major repairs might run above that figure, but they would have to be very extensive repairs.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think my hon. friend is sufficiently acquainted with the operation of boats to realize that there is not going to be any boat purchased for this service for less than $500,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I would expect that to be the minimum.

Mr. MALCOLM: There might be fuel contracts and many outfitting contracts that would exceed $100,000. Personally I would not mind the amount being reduced, but if it were reduced below a quarter of a million dollars it would be getting into the realm of small business.

Mr. STEVENS: We will let the section stand and think it over.

Section stands.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee to consider the followig proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, chapter 48 of the revised statutes, 1906, and to make further provisions for a more adequate enforcement of the act and the prevention of smuggling operations.

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. EULER: This resolution precedes a bill to amend the Customs Act and is similar to the bill which was passed a few days ago amending the Excise Act. Briefly, the important provisions of this measure are these. One of them aims at clearing up in connection with the administration of the act, certain departmental difficulties which have been experienced in the last year or so. There is an extension of penalties for offences under the act, and power is given to customs officials to arrest without a warrant. This is in accordance with a recommendation of the parliamentary committee of last year. The bill also provides that importation shall be considered complete when a vessel arrives within the three-mile limit. Finally, there is a change in regard to in transitu shipments of liquor. In future, shipments of liquor brought in in transitu shall be required to give a bond in double duty which will be released only upon production of landing certificates. These are the chief provisions of the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Euler thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 172, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

The House resumed from March 15 consideration in committee of Bill No. 151, for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1927—Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—$575,204.22 granted for 1926-27.

Mr. BENNETT: There were two items in this bill for which explanations were asked, one in relation to a vote for $15,000 in connection with the Northwest Territories, and the other respecting certain gold claims of one McIver. The word purchase was used instead of sale, and that caused the difficulty. The explanation has been given by the minister.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend satisfied with the information given?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Friday, March 18, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Third report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines —Mr. Young (Saskatoon).

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a resolution passed by the Galt city council, also another resolution passed by the village council of Ayr, Ontario, protesting against renewal of the charter to the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, known as Bill No. 78.

Mr. F. W. HAY (North Perth): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition from the city council of Stratford, Ontario, with reference to Bill No. 78.

Mr. CLARK: What is the purport of the petition?

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to place on the table a resolution from the town council of Sandwich protesting against granting a renewal of the charter to the Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it well to point out to the hon. members that the regular procedure to bring these protests before the House is by way of petition, and not by way of resolutions passed by municipal councils.

Bill No. 165 (from the Senate), for the relief of James Edward Barnaby.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 166 (from the Senate), for the relief of Evelyn May Bateman.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 167 (from the Senate), for the relief of Fannie Louise Dance.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 168 (from the Senate), for the relief of Sarah Simpson.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 169 (from the Senate), for the relief of Percy Compton.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

Bill No. 170 (from the Senate), for the relief of Hazel Green Anderson.—Mr. McMillan.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would there be any objection to giving these bills second reading now? It would advance them to the committee stage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then I will take a motion covering all the bills. Is that satisfactory?

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—POSSESSION OF WEAPONS

On the order for the first reading of Bill No. 173 (from the Senate) to amend certain provisions of the Criminal Code respecting the possession of weapons:

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no mover.

Mr. ARTHURS: The mover should be nominated on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is prepared to move the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MARCIL: This is a Senate bill, I move that it be read a first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall these bills be read the second time?

Mr. ARTHURS: We object seriously to the inclusion of the last bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well; the others.

An hon. MEMBER: And the first.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the exception of the first and the last of these bills, it is moved by Mr. Edwards (Frontenac) seconded by Mr. Arthurs that bills 156, 157, 158, 159 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169 and 170 be now read the second time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not rising to object to this motion at all, but I want to call attention to the fact that there are a good many bills of a similar naure on the order paper, where they have stood for days for second reading, and it seems to me that if we are to dispose of these bills in the way proposed it will place them a stage ahead of the others. I submit that all these divorce bills should be treated in the same way, sent to the committee, and taken off the order paper, just as it is proposed to do in this case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that probably a more expeditious way would be to conclude the debate on the Georgian bay canal and get that bill across to the committee as speedily as possible. We could then dispose of all these others in rapid succession. However, the government will be prepared to consider my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. MARCIL: I object to the suggestion of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). I have a bill on the order paper coming immediately after the Georgian bay bill, and if these divorce cases are to be advanced a stage I do not want my bill left behind. It is well for the House to remember that these divorces are a plague and that over 600 divorces were granted in Canada in 1926, according to the statistics.

Mr. SPEAKER: Are there any objections? The motion can be entertained only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for second reading of these bills stands until the next sitting of the House.

MARITIME CLAIMS

STATEMENT OF POLICY BY PRIME MINISTER

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister): I said yesterday that I hoped to be able on the orders of the day to-day to make a statement on behalf of the government arising out of the report of the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims. I am happy to be able to make that statement this afternoon. As I shall have occasion in the statement to refer to the exact text of the commission I hope hon. members will pardon me if I take the liberty of making free use of the statement I have in my hand.

The Royal Commission on Maritime Claims was appointed on April 7, 1926. The commission submitted its report to the Honourable the Secretary of State on September 23, 1926. As respects its subject matter and recommendations, the report is subdivided as follows:

I. Money Grants to Provinces.
II. Transportation and Freight Rates.
III. Port Development and Export Trade.
IV. Trade Policy—Forest Produce, Fisheries, Coal and Steel.
V. Agriculture and Migration.
VI. New Brunswick Railways.
VII. General.

There are, in addition, a few paragraphs by way of introduction and conclusion.

The recommendations of the report may be briefly summarized as follows:

Under the heading—I. Money Grants to Provinces.

It is recommended "that the Dominion government should give immediate consideration to the whole of this subject, with a view to a complete revision of the financial arrangements between them and the maritime provinces."

and

"that immediate interim lump-sum increases should be made in the payments to the three maritime provinces as follows:

Nova Scotia..	$ 875,000
New Brunswick..	600,000
Prince Edward Island..	125,000"

and that

"These interim payments should be continued until the Dominion government has had time to complete its investigation and re-assessment."

Under the heading—II. Transportation and Freight Rates.

It is recommended "that an immediate reduction of 20 per cent be made on all rates charged on traffic which both originates and terminates at stations in the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways—including export and import traffic, by sea, from and to that division,—and that the same reduction be also applied to the Atlantic division proportion of the through rates on all traffic which originates at stations in the Atlantic division —excluding import traffic by sea—and is destined to points outside the Atlantic division." For this purpose the divisional points on the Atlantic division are to be Diamond Junction and Levis.

It is further recommended, with respect to the policy of the railway companies—as interpreted in the rate structure—"that the railway board should be vested with somewhat fuller supervisory responsibility," . . . . . "in its relation to the natural basic products of the country, and the development of these products and associated enterprises," and vested also "with power to order an accounting investigation at their own hand, into the incidence of the railway charge on the costs of production of the commodity, and its relationship to other costs, and to the general trading results of the interest involved";

Also, that the matter of the system under which flat percentage increases—known as horizontal increases"—were added to railway rates,—in other words, the "incidence of 'horizontal' war increases"—should be taken into fresh consideration by the railway commission, and that they "should be free to consider the whole question on its merits."

Referring to transportation for Prince Edward Island and the needed railway service improvements, it is recommended "that the railway administration should be asked to make a survey of what is required" and "that the department should make capital provision for the improvements to be undertaken within the shortest possible time;" and, referring to the need for improved ferry boat service, "that the matter be gone into from the point of view of placing at the disposal of the island such satisfactory means of communication as will ensure as regular and complete a service as can reasonably be made," and further "that, so far as the ferry boat service is concerned, it should not be run as part of the railway operations, but should be run by the railway administration under separate account for the department."

Under the heading—III—Port development and export trade—referring to Halifax and St. John; it is recommended "that, in respect of each of these two harbours, the federal government should establish a statutory harbour commission, whose business it would be to see that the port facilities are developed on such a scale as will gradually—but by no means slowly—create channels through which trade can expand both winter and summer."

Referring to harbour facilities in Prince Edward Island, it is recommended, "that the Public Works department make an immediate survey of these harbours, particularly as to wharfage and storage accommodation, with a view to adequate provision being made to meet the needs of the island's produce."

Under the heading—IV—Trade policy—forest produce, fisheries, coal and steel—with particular reference to "a mutual trade treaty" for forest products and fish, it is recommended: "that the Dominion government should apply its mind to the proposition in the light of maritime province interests, and having regard also to the position of other provinces concerned with these same products, and to Dominion interests generally."

Referring to coking plants, it is recommended: "that immediate practical steps be taken by the federal authorities in regard to the question of coking plants."

Referring to customs tariff on coal, it is recommended: "that the Tariff Advisory Board should be asked to give immediate consideration to the subject."

Referring to bounties, it is recommended: "that a bonus should be given in respect of steel when Canadian coal is used in its manufacture, and that the bonus should be calculated on the basis of the present drawback for every ton of coal used in such manufacture."

Under the heading—V—Agriculture and migration—with reference to the need of closer coöperation between the federal and provincial governments on the question of maritime province colonization, it is recommended, "that the federal authorities should take the matter up with the governments of the three provinces, with a view to a plan being devised for much more active advertisement abroad of the attractions and advantages of the maritime provinces."

Under the heading—VI—New Brunswick railways—referring to the St. John and Quebec railway, it is recommended: "that the government should, with the concurrence of the province, set up an ad hoc tribunal to enquire into the circumstances surrounding this matter, with power, if they are satisfied that the circumstances justify it, to arrange terms and conditions on which the railway should be taken over by the government."

Referring to the Kent Northern railway, it is stated that representations were made to the commission that "the present was an appropriate time to reopen negotiations" looking to its "acquisition at a price of $60,000" and it is recommended: "that this be done."

Under the heading—VII General—with respect to fisheries organization, after mentioning that a suggestion had been made that there should be a separate branch in the Department of Marine and Fisheries with a Deputy Minister of Fisheries at its head, "whose duties would be confined to that section of the department, and who would therefore be freer to keep in close personal touch with its problems by periodical visits to the fishery areas", the commission states that it recommends "accordingly".

After referring to a conflict of view on the question of closed seasons and conservation, particularly in regard to lobster fishing and on the question also of replanting oyster beds, the commission recommends that: "the deputy minister should take the whole subject into immediate consideration and that after consulting with scientists, fishermen and fish merchants, appropriate and definite regulations should be framed".

The commission recommends, "that the geological department undertake, as soon as possible, a more detailed survey of New Brunswick, and an exhaustive survey of Prince Edward Island for the purposes of re-mapping this province, of investigating its mineral deposits and materials for roadmaking and of examining the possibilities of its clay resources."

With respect to Prince Edward Island, where there are no large industries which would justify the establishment of an institution for technical education, the commission cites the suggestion that the technical education legislation should be given a broad application in their case, and that agricultural education should be deemed to be covered by the term "technical education". The commission recommends "this suggestion to the favourable notice of the department."

Finally the commission mentions that at their request, the Bureau of Statistics had prepared a special memorandum giving the more important statistics of social and economic progress in the maritime provinces since confederation and recommends "the immediate publication of this memorandum".

This concludes the enumeration of the recommendations made by the commission. There are scattered throughout the pages of the report many observations upon conditions in the maritime provinces as well as suggestions, expressions of view and of feeling on the part of the commissioners, as for example: "We feel that a more active and vigorous commercial policy should be developed and that much wider scope should be given to the functions and activities of trade commissioners." The government is prepared carefully to consider whatever the commission has set forth in this manner. With respect to the recommendations themselves, it may serve to bring the proposed action of the government into clearer relief if, in presenting to parliament the statement of the government's attitude with reference thereto, I reverse the order of presentation adopted by the commission and first take up the miscellaneous recommendations which find their place at the end of the report, and proceed therefrom to the far-reaching recommendations which are to be found in earlier subdivisions.

Commencing, then, with the last mentioned recommendation, namely, the immediate publication of a special memorandum giving statistics of social and economc progress in the maritime provinces since confederation, I would say that the memorandum is already in type, and that such number of copies will be published as the House may direct.

The government accepts the recommendation made with reference to Prince Edward Island, that, inasmuch as there are no large industries in Price Edward Island which would justify the establishment of an institution for technical education and as agriculture is their principal interest, technical education legislation should be given a broad application, and that agricultural education should be deemed to be covered by the term "technical education," and action is being taken accordingly.

The more detailed survey of New Brunswick and an exhaustive survey of Prince Edward Island which it is recommended the Geological department should undertake is being carried out.

The commission's recommendation with respect to the appointment of a deputy minister whose duties will be confined to what at present constitutes the fisheries section of the Department of Marine and Fisheries will be carried out.

With respect to the commission's recommendations concerning the possible acquisition of the St. John and Quebec railway, and the Kent Northern railway, the government is of the opinion that the matters referred to are, in some particulars, incidental to the larger transportation problems of which mention is made in the report and to which the attention of parliament will be invited at the present session, and that the situation with respect to these railways will in no wise be prejudiced if the course recommended by the commission is permitted to await a knowledge of the probable effect of the adoption of such legislation as may be enacted with respect to maritime railways generally.

The recommendation of the commission, with respect to closer coöperation between the federal and provincial governments on the question of maritime province colonization, accords with the policy of the government as repeatedly set forth. The federal authorities will cordially welcome that larger measure of coöperation on the part of the provinces which the commission's report recognizes as both desirable and necessary.

With reference to the natural basic products of the maritime provinces, namely, agriculture, fish, timber and coal, the government shares the view expressed by the commission that aspects that arise from the character of these natural basic products of the maritime provinces "lie at the very foundation of the economic prosperity of these provinces," and that, as respects these subject matters, "no greater dis-service could be done than to evade deliberate decision."

As respects the specific recommendation that the Dominion government should apply its mind to the proposition of a mutual trade treaty for forest products and fish, it may be pointed out that reciprocal trade treaties in natural products are, and have been for many years, a part of Liberal trade policy. The attempt of a great Nova Scotian in 1911 to remedy the situation by a reciprocity treaty did not, in our opinion, meet with the support it should have from the maritimes. We believe that to the defeat of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement, more than to all other factors combined, may be traced the causes of existing economic depression in the maritime provinces. Our policy remains one of seeking to advance, as opportunity affords, mutual trade agreement in natural products.

A declaration of our readiness and our willingness to make an arrangement with the United States whenever they are ready to meet us on fair terms, will be found in the following clause which, at the instance of Mr. Fielding, the then Minister of Finance, was inserted in 1923 in our tariff laws:

> The Governor in Council may authorize any minister of the crown to enter into negotiations with any authorized representative of the government of the United States with a view to the making of a commercial agreement between the two countries on terms that may be deemed mutually beneficial. Any agreement so made shall be subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada.

This is a general indication of our willingness to make a commercial treaty with our neighbours. If favourably entertained, some time would have to elapse before an agreement could be made and brought into effect. It would require action by the United States congress as well as by the Canadian parliament. Under the present law of the United States there is a privilege granted to the President of the United States to make certain reductions of duties if he likes to do so.

He may do that without waiting for congress. As an intimation to the president that if he is prepared to exercise the power which congress has given to him by way of reduction, we are prepared to meet him on similar terms. Mr. Fielding proposed in 1923, the insertion of the following clause in our tariff law, which clause is in effect to-day:

If the President of the United States, under authority of the United States' Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce by fifty per cent the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say:

Cattle, wheat, wheat flour, oats, barley, potatoes, onions, turnips, hay, fish, as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719, and 720 of the said Tariff Act of 1920.

the Governor in Council may, by order in council, make such reductions of duties on similar articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions of duties on Canadian products imported into the United States.

The appointment of a minister to Washington is a step which it is believed will be helpful, as opportunity offers, in the negotiation with our neighbours of trade treaties of mutual interest and advantage.

With regard to the question of coking plants, the commission's recommendation that immediate practical steps be taken, has been accepted and a bill will be introduced at the present session of parliament respecting the establishment of coking plants at convenient centres in Canada under government assistance, along lines approved by the special committee of the House of Commons, which dealt with the fuel question last year.

The recommendation of the commission that the Tariff Advisory Board should be asked to give immediate consideration to the customs tariff in its relation to coal, anthracite and coke has been met. The matter is now before the Tariff Advisory Board. It would appear desirable at this point to recall that at the session of 1925, as a means of assisting coal production in the maritimes, the customs duty on slack coal was raised from 13 cents to 50 cents. The question of protection on the primary products of iron and steel was, as stated in the report, under the consideration of the Tariff Advisory Board at the time of the commission's investigation. Owing to the existing uncertainty of conditions surrounding the iron and steel industry in the maritimes, the government does not feel in a position to make at present any pronouncement with respect to the commission's recommendation of a renewal of the system of granting bounties with respect to steel when Canadian coal is used in its manufacture.

The government is prepared to accept the recommendations of the commission concerning the establishment of harbour commissions for the harbours of Halifax and St. John and bills with reference thereto will be introduced at the present session.

In connection with port development and the development of trade through Canadian ports, it might here be mentioned that within the past year increased loading accommodation has been provided for the elevator at Halifax; also that the bill "respecting the Canadian National Steamships and to provide for the establishment of a West Indies service," at present before parliament, will have an important bearing upon port development and trade of the maritime provinces. Mention should also be made of the enactment of 1923 whereby a discount of 10 per cent of the existing customs duty in addition to the preference rate is allowed on goods entitled to the benefit of the British preference when shipped via Canadian ports, and of the enactment of last year which restricts the advantages to be derived from the British preference to commodities entering Canada via Canadian ports.

In regard to harbour facilities in Prince Edward Island, it should be stated that the Department of Public Works had begun a survey of the harbours of Charlottetown, Georgetown and Summerside, particularly as to wharfage and storage accommodation, prior to the date on which the commission presented its report. In this particular the commission's recommendation has, therefore, already been acted upon in part. The survey will be continued, in as far as may be necessary fully to comply with the commission's recommendation.

I come now to the important subject of transportation and freight rates and to the far-reaching recommendations of the commission "that an immediate reduction of 20 per cent be made on all rates charged on traffic which both originates and terminates at stations in the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways—including export and import traffic by sea from and to that division—and that the same reduction be also applied to the Atlantic division proportion of the through rates on all traffic which originates at stations on the Atlantic division—excluding import traffic by sea—and is destined to points outside the Atlantic division."

Subject to certain modifications, which may appear to be necessary respecting international rates and through import rates by sea, a bill will be introduced at the present session giving effect to this recommendation.

With respect to the recommendation "that the railway board should be vested with somewhat fuller supervisory powers," it is felt that, if accepted, this recommendation would bring about a radical change in the fundamental powers of the railway commission affecting the whole of Canada. It has no immediate bearing on the rights of the maritime provinces any more than of other parts of Canada and is of such a far reaching character as to demand more mature consideration than has been possible up to this time.

There is now before the railway commission the whole matter of flat percentage increases, known as horizontal increases, which the commission recommends should be taken into fresh consideration by the railway commission.

A survey of what is required with respect to the needed railway service improvements on Prince Edward Island will, as recommended, be made immediately, in order that future action may be intelligently determined.

The whole matter of ferry boat service between the island and the mainland is now under investigation, as recommended by the commission.

This brings me to the last of the recommendations, which in the order of the report are the first there mentioned, namely, those respecting money grants to the provinces. The government is prepared to accept the recommendation of the commission to give immediate consideration to a revision or readjustment of the financial arrangements as between the Dominion and the maritime provinces. In this connection attention is invited to what is said by the commissioners with respect to the increase and form of Dominion aid. The statement in reference thereto immediately precedes their recommendation, and is as follows:

> The terms of readjustment are obviously a matter for detailed determination and assessment, so that the actual amount—as well as the reasons and purposes attaching to it, can be recognized by the rest of Canada as fair and equitable. It is not possible, therefore to make a final recommendation as to the increase and form of Dominion aid which is required to satisfy the just claims of the maritime situation.

To gain recognition by the rest of Canada as to the fairness and equity of any revision or readjustment of the financial arrangements as between the Dominion and the maritime provinces, it would appear that the proposed revision or readjustment should be made a subject of consideration in the first instance by a conference at which all of the provinces of Canada as well as the Dominion would be represented. This indeed is directly implied by the language of the commissioners and by the reference which this portion of the report makes to "the revision of 1907" to "general grounds applicable to all other provinces as well as to the maritimes," to "the contention of the maritime provinces that they have been, and are being, dealt with differently from the western provinces," and to the "territorial limitations" of the maritime provinces and their claim that the "extra-provincial lands which came into the possession of the Dominion government at the date of confederation were acquired by purchase and have been developed and given value at the expense of the Dominion."

In order that there may be no delay in effecting consideration by a Dominion-provincial conference of a revision or readjustment of the fianancial arrangements as between the Dominion and the maritime provinces, the government has decided to place this matter on the agenda of the Dominion-provincial conference to be held, as already announced, during the course of the present year. In that conference the Dominion will be in a position which it has not thus far enjoyed, to present its views on the general question of the financial relations between the Dominion and the provinces, as well as on the question of a detailed determination and assessment of the special claims of the maritime provinces, and every province will have an equal opportunity of stating its position.

As already indicated, we believe with the commissioners, that the time is opportune for a readjustment of the financial arrangements between the Dominion and the maritime provinces, but it would not make for an harmonious and lasting settlement of the financial issue, a settlement based on due regard for the needs and interests of all the provinces and of the Dominion itself, to attempt to set a final figure now, before the views of the other provinces and the position of the Dominion have been set forth, and a settlement reached which public opinion will be prepared to accept. For the same reason it is not possible, in advance of the deliberations of the conference and of the detailed determination and assessment which the report recognizes is necessary, to accept the view for which no detailed grounds are advanced, that certain sums set forth in the report should be regarded as "the minimum addition that the three maritime provinces should have in any such revision." The final revision can only be made in accordance with the merits of the case.

As evidence of the desire of the government to go just as far as may be possible, in relieving any feeling of suspense pending a final revision and in order to enable the maritime provinces, in what the commission describes as "their present state of grave necessity" to deal with any special industrial or financial situation which, in the view of their governments may require public assistance, we are prepared, without prejudice as to the amount to be arrived at as a final solution, to recommend to parliament at the present session the making of special grants to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island of $875,000, $600,000 and $125,000 respectively, these amounts being the sums recommended by the royal commission as immediate lump sum payments.

In concluding this statement, may I say that the government hopes that, by accepting as we have, the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims, virtually in their entirety, parliament and the country will recognize in the attitude of the government a wish to remove this great question as largely as possible from the arena of sectional discord and party strife, and a desire to give to our Dominion in the sixtieth anniversary of its founding, a renewed expression of the spirit which animated the fathers of confederation in their efforts to construct out of British North America a federal union under a system of government devised "to protect the diversified interests of the several provinces and secure efficiency, harmony and permanency in the working of the union."

BRITISH COLUMBIA HALIBUT FISHERY

OBJECTION TO LICENSES FOR JAPANESE FISHERMEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria): I wish to call the attention of the House to an item appearing in the Vancouver Province of last Sunday, which reads:

White Halibut Men Oppose Granting of Licenses to Japanese

White halibut fishing men are alarmed over the report that large numbers of Japanese, formerly engaged in salmon fishing and now barred by the reducing quota under federal regulations, are turning to the halibut banks.

Has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries heard anything of this matter? If so, I should like to ask if the government has jurisdiction in these ex-territorial waters where halibut are caught, and if any licenses are issued to halibut fishers?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I am not in a position to give a definite answer to the question. I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend refers. I would be inclined to state just now that I do not think we have any authority beyond the limits. At all events, I will make inquiry in regard to it and will inform my hon. friend at the next sitting of the House.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move that the House revert to motions in order to consider the report of the committee on rules.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I move that the House resolve itself into committee of the whole immediately, to consider the report of the committee appointed to revise the rules of the House of Commons, which report was presented to the House on Tuesday, 15th March last.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the report, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Amended rule No 1.—Procedure in unprovided cases.

Rule agreed to.

Amended rule No. 2—House to meet at 3 p.m.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) wished to speak on this rule; he has left the chamber. Perhaps the committee could proceed with the other rules and take this up later.

The CHAIRMAN: All right.

Stands.

New rule to be added after rule 3—Adjournment at 11 o'clock p.m.

Mr. SPEAKER: Following the appointment of this special committee we held sittings on every day set apart for meetings. The meetings were well attended by every member of the committee, which represented fully the three groups in the House. There was harmony and unanimity in the making and adoption of the report.

Mr. IRVINE: I think it is a rule in practice in this House that on Wednesday at six o'clock the Speaker leaves the chair, and any matter then under discussion virtually drops out, or goes to the bottom of the list on the order paper. I wonder whether this rule that is now under consideration would apply to the Wednesday afternoon discussion as it does to discussion on other days closing at eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: This question was considered by the committee, and it was decided that the same rule should apply in the future as in the past. The matter under discussion at six o'clock on Wednesday goes to the bottom of the list of public bills on the order paper, but these items under public bills have, under our amended rules, a chance to be debated again in the House on Tuesday and Friday evenings during the hour devoted to private bills, because when private bills are disposed of the remainder of the hour is taken up with the public bills. Sometimes, however, they lie in abeyance during the whole session. I hope my explanation is clear.

The CHAIRMAN: We will revert to amended rule 2.

Amended rule No. 2—House to meet at 3 p.m.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to make a remark or two in regard to this rule. I think the House should seriously consider starting its business at an earlier hour than three o'clock in the afternoon. Ottawa has been well named, I think, the land of afternoon. We should start our work in the morning, in my opinion, but if we cannot do that, surely we might start at two o'clock. As it is, we turn night into day, and those who can sleep in the morning turn day into night. I am not one of those happy individuals who can sleep in the daytime. If I am kept in this House until eleven or twelve at night and get to bed around midnight or one o'clock in the morning, I wake up at my usual time in the morning, and I do not get enough sleep, and then I am accused by some members of getting very cranky before the session is over. I think many other members are in the same position. I am sure it would be better for the House, better for the individual members and better for the business of the country, if we started our work at a reasonable hour in the day and quit at a reasonable hour at night. I do not want to delay the committee or get out of order, Mr. Chairman, but if we agree that the House is not to start until three in the afternoon, it may be impossible to get the House to consent to closing earlier than we do now.

I want to draw the committee's attention to the hours that we must keep here if we do not start our work until three in the afternoon. First of all, there is the effect on the members themselves, and the ministers of the crown and the leader of the opposition are in the worst position. They should be here on most occasions, in fact, nearly all the time the House is in session, and in addition, ministers must attend council meetings and look after the work of their departments. I do not see how they can be mentally in a fit condition to attend to all these duties if they are compelled to sit here until midnight.

Mr. POWER: They were not even before they became ministers.

Mr. COOTE: The ordinary member—I am going now by my own experience—is here as a rule from about nine in the morning until nearly midnight for at least four days in the week. It is true that we have Wednesday night off, but I think that all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. There is no other class of people that I know of that works four nights a week as well as in the daytime, and I am firmly convinced that if we would adopt reasonable rules to expedite the business of the House and of the committees, we could get along without sitting until eleven at night, but to bring it about we should have to start a little earlier in the day.

If I may go back again to the members of the House, we are here from about nine in the morning until midnight four days in the week, and the other day we are here from nine until six or seven. That leaves us only two nights a week. I think even members of the House of Commons should have a little time for play, and the only time they can get is in the evening, and if they take those two evenings for recreation there is no other evening left in which they can go to bed early. Besides there are lots of people around this House in addition to the members. We have Hansard reporters and reporters in the press gallery, whose work is not done when the House adjourns. They are here for about two hours after the House closes, and if a member happens to speak at eleven or eleven-thirty—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend know that we are going to adjourn at eleven in the future under another rule?

Mr. COOTE: Even supposing we adjourn at eleven, if the member remains to correct his remarks in Hansard, he is going to be here till twelve or twelve-thirty.

Mr. MARCIL: Under the new rules a member will not be allowed to speak for so long, so they will have less work to do in correcting proofs.

Mr. COOTE: A few nights ago I was speaking here for about five minutes, and I did not want to correct my remarks because it was after eleven. In my remarks I used the word "turbines," and it appeared in Hansard as "carbons." Anyone reading my remarks in Hansard will naturally wonder what I am talking about. I do not blame the Hansard reporters because very often this House is so noisy that they cannot hear what is being said.

I would like the committee seriously to consider the question of starting our business earlier in the day and quitting earlier in the evening. As far as I have been able to find out, Great Britain and Canada are the only two countries in the world where night sittings are indulged in by parliament to any extent. At Washington, congress does its business, a business probably three or four times as great as ours, without any night sittings. Nearly all the parliaments in the world do without night sittings except Canada and Great Britain.

May I draw the attention of the House to this fact? Away back in 1907 a resolution was introduced into this House by the then member for South Renfrew asking that the House adjourn at ten-thirty in the evening. We shall have made very little progress in twenty years if we are now simply proposing to adopt a rule to adjourn at eleven o'clock. What I would suggest to the House is this: We might at least sit at two o'clock in the afternoon, take recess at six o'clock, and adjourn at ten. If there is objection to that, could we not at least have two other nights a week off? On Monday and Friday nights we cannot do any very important business in the House because so many members from Ontario and Quebec wish to go home for the week-end, but the members from the west and from the east have to stay here and all they can do is to transact routine business. I say that if the members from Ontario and Quebec are privileged to take off Monday and Friday nights and go home over the week-end, why should not the members from other parts of Canada have the same privilege? Let us do without Monday night and Friday night.

Now a word on behalf of members who come from a distance and bring their families with them. A man's family life should not be destroyed because he accepts the position of member of parliament. If a member does bring his family to Ottawa—and I speak now from experience—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: I do not understand the applause. I must admit that I am Scotch. Sometimes I bring my family to Ottawa, but my family complain that I spend almost all my time in the House of Commons and they do not see me in the evening.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I do not care how much amusement the committee get out of this if I can only persuade them to do their business within reasonable hours. All joking aside—

An hon. MEMBER: What is the joke?

Mr. COOTE: I do not know. If a member takes his duties seriously, and if he has as much correspondence and as many departmental calls to attend to as have some of the members from western Canada—their constituents including many homesteaders, people who want leases, and others who desire their member to do something or other for them—he has to be here from nine o'clock in the morning until midnight. I repeat, I do not see where the joke is when I say that even if a man brings his family to Ottawa they will not see very much of him unless they come and sit in the galleries. We have committees almost every morning of the week, we have our correspondence to attend to, and we have our duties in this chamber. It means, as I say, that a man is tied down here from nine o'clock in the morning until midnight. Is it any wonder that in the last parliament we lost so many of our members? I think it is too severe a strain physically on members to carry on even during the hours that are proposed under the new rules, which I must admit are an improvement on the present rules. In my judgment if this House of Commons cannot devise rules for the transaction of the country's business without sitting here until eleven o'clock at night four nights a week it is certainly a reflection upon our intelligence.

Mr. HAY: Mr. Chairman, I differ just a little with my hon. friend from Macleod. I get ample sleep at home during the summer and I thought that coming down to Ottawa I could perhaps do without as much sleep as I had been accustomed to. I find I can. I have reached the conclusion that there are too many days and too few nights in our time-table. If we can readjust ourselves in some way I am quite willing that we should have at our disposal more nights and fewer days. But what affects some of my colleagues from the western provinces most seriously seems to be the disturbance of their family arrangements. Thus far my experience is that I really see more of my family here than I do at home. But perhaps so far as the major membership of the House is concerned it would be agreeable to them if some of us at this end were not so frequent in our attendance and so keenly interested in public affairs! In all seriousness, would it not be possible for us to agree to attend punctually at the hour of opening and devote our time to our parliamentary duties during the full duration of each day's sittings. I do not refer so much to attendance in this chamber, and being a new member I am not offering any advice, but I have noticed that in our committees we are punctual for the opening meetings, although afterwards we are often fifteen to twenty minutes late. Not only in this chamber but in the various committees it is most difficult to carry on our work because apparently we give too much attention to something that ought not to concern us and too little attention to the subject matter in hand. I do not know that the acoustics of this chamber can be improved to any very great extent, but certainly from either end it is most difficult to hear discussion that may be proceeding beyond the centre and nearer the chair. I believe that if we would give a little more serious thought to the business of the House we might accomplish much more within the present hours. Then we would have ample time for play and when the weather is fine we would be able to enjoy the beauties of Ottawa, for in the summertime I am told it is a very pretty place. I am not so busy at home during the summer season and with the kindly coöperation and hospitable generosity of local members and the ministers who desire to entertain those of us who are living here on the European plan and not on a flat rate, perhaps we could spend some part of the summer very profitably.

Mr. POWER: May I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that during the last nine years that I have been a member of this House no budget debate has been terminated before eleven o'clock at night. A great deal more progress is always made after that hour than at any other period of the day.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. POWER: I am calling the attention of members to that fact. It may be that some of us are not fully awake and in our best state of mind until after eleven o'clock. It seems to me that we will be prolonging the length of the session if we lay down any such hard and fast rule as that now under discussion. I am very much opposed to it and do not think that it should be adopted. If it does pass, and it is desired to have a fixed hour of adjournment, let us sit straight through from three o'clock in the afternoon until eleven o'clock at night, as is, I understand, the custom in Great Britain. We could very easily arrange that between six and eight o'clock only noncontentious measures would be brought up and that no votes would be taken either in committee or in the House during that period. It would be a comparatively easy matter to keep a quorum and we could get through a great deal of work. However, I put that forward only as an alternative suggestion in case the House decide to give up the good old practice of sitting as late as we can as long as we get our business done.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What rule are we on?

The CHAIRMAN: Rule 2. The third rule is carried.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is putting the cart before the horse.

The CHAIRMAN: Rule 2 was allowed to stand.

Rule 2 agreed to.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If the third rule is carried I cannot do anything more than enter my protest. I heartily agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I am in entire agreement, as I am sure other members are, with the proposal that it would be advisable for this House to rise every evening not later than eleven o'clock. I do not think there is any difference of opinion as to that, but I do question very strongly the advisability of laying down a hard and fast rule to effect it. I believe it would take away, to a certain extent at least the liberties of the members and I believe it would not conduce to expediting business, for in many cases members would continue to talk on the principle, "Oh, well at eleven o'clock the sitting will be through anyway."

Mr. MARCIL: We are to have a rule governing the length of speeches.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There are a sufficient number of members who would be prepared to talk forty minutes each and thus keep a debate going interminably. I do not think that a hard and fast rule for the adjournment of the House at eleven o'clock would make for despatch. Hon. members would simply keep an eye on the clock, knowing that at eleven o'clock the House would automatically adjourn, and they would just talk to kill time. That would not be in the interests of the country. The rule is absolutely unwise, and it would be an infringement of the liberties of members. In my judgment it is not in the best interest of Canada to adopt such a rule. Surely we can leave the adjournment of the House to two factors; first, the general disposition of members to close at a reasonable hour. We might put some dependence on that disposition. As has been suggested, in the budget debate, which usually comes on early in the session, or in the debate on the address, no harm would be done if the sitting now and then exceeded eleven o'clock. A member might be able to conclude his remarks if he were allowed to speak for half an hour or so after eleven o'clock, but with a rule in force for adjournment at eleven he would have to wait until the next day. I do not agree with the statement of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), which is very often repeated in the press, as to time being wasted in this House. I admit that a certain amount of time is unavoidably lost in parliament, but it has often struck me that newspaper editors in criticising the members of the House of Commons for waste of time might very well look over their own papers and see how much space is wasted by Jiggs pictures and things of that sort. Having regard to the extent of this country, some members representing constituencies which are larger than some independent countries in Europe, does this parliament waste any more time—indeed, in view of the business to be done, does it waste as much time—as the township council, the city council, the county council and the provincial legislatures? My own honest opinion is that we do not waste any more time in proportion to the extent of our business than they do; and we pay closer and better attention to the affairs of the country than is generally the case in other legislative bodies. Undoubtedly a certain amount of time is wasted; that has always been true and it will continue to be so. But time is wasted at meetings of boards of trade and other bodies as well. I have no hesitation in saying that, if we are tied down to a hard and fast rule to adjourn at eleven o'clock every night, we shall waste far more time than we should if we were allowed some latitude and some room for the exercise of judgment and common sense on both sides; for I am sure it is the general desire of members throughout the House to stop at a reasonable time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no doubt that in any change of this kind there are arguments pro and con. There is much in what my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington and my hon. friend from Quebec South have said, to the effect that a rule for adjournment at eleven o'clock might not help to expedite the business of the House. I trust, however, that other rules which we shall adopt will compensate for whatever disadvantages might result from this one. This rule is rather in the interests of common sense and of the health of members. I agree to a large extent with what my hon. friend from Macleod has said, and I am glad he has given a description of the work of a member of parliament. So many people in the country think that we all come here for a holiday, but a member's task is tedious. It might very well be called a drudgery; it is work that impairs the health and, as the hon. gentleman has said, makes family life impossible. I do not however quite agree with the hon. gentleman in his suggestion that we should begin at two o'clock in the afternoon. This has been tried on Wednesdays for some time but it has not worked very well. And as a matter of fact, although it stood as a rule it has never been observed.

Mr. STEVENS: It has always been observed except in the last two years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, I think for a longer time than that. Let me take my own case by way of illustration, unpleasant as it is for one to be personal. We work from nine to ten in the morning and we have to look after the affairs of the departments, receiving delegations, carrying on the business of council, and so forth. As has been said, ministers are expected to be in their seats and in fact we try to do so. I do not see therefore how we could very well be expected to come to the House at two o'clock every day. I may say that the meetings of this very committee, in which I was interested, I found it simply impossible to attend. I certainly think that three o'clock in the afternoon is early enough for the opening of the House. An hon. member has made a remark about Friday and Monday evenings, saying that we practically lose these sittings because of the absence of many Ontario and Quebec members. That is not my experience. My experience is that we have done much more work on Friday and Monday evenings than we do on other days. The absence of the members referred to does not reflect itself in any curtailment of business.

Mr. HEAPS: That is a compliment to the other provinces.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will say it is a compliment to my hon. friend, who is very diligent in his attendance, as well as to all who remain here. As I said, these rules have been carefully considered, and while there may be objections to some of them, they are on the whole, I think, such as will lead to a better parliamentary life.

Mr. BENNETT: I have listened with much interest to the observations of my hon. friend from Macleod, of the Minister of Justice, and of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington with respect to the opening of the House at three o'clock. In England it used to be the custom to open at four o'clock, but looking up the rule recently I found that the House there meets at two forty-five. Might we not compromise in this House and meet at that hour?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why?

Mr. BENNETT: For the reason that the fifteen minutes between two forty-five and three o'clock would give us time to dispose of a good deal of routine business of the House, so that at three o'clock we might be able to direct our attention to the regular program. There is only one objection to this suggestion and that is the possibility of its interfering with ministers in council in the discharge of their duties. That is the only difficulty I can see. In this country the cabinet meets practically every day during the session usually at two o'clock, and whether forty-five minutes would be sufficient time for the disposal of the business on hand it is difficult for one who occupied the position for so short a time, and who was not in office during the session, to determine. It does occur to me however that we might effect a compromise by meeting at two-forty five.

With respect to the hour of closing, may I point out to my hon. friends from Quebec South and Frontenac-Addington that the House always has control of its own proceedings, and it would be only necessary at any time for the Prime Minister to give notice that on such a date the rule for eleven o'clock closing would be suspended. The Prime Minister to-day, for instance, gives notice that on and after a given date we shall sit in the mornings. If this rule now proposed were adopted, its operation could be eliminated at any time upon notice being given. In the main I am prepared to accept the findings of the committee, but in view of the remarks that have been made I may point out that in England they adjourn at eleven-thirty. It is fixed by rule in England, notwithstanding what my hon. friend says, that at eleven-thirty, in some circumstances, and at five o'clock and eleven o'clock in other cases the House adjourns. They also have a special rule in their procedure whereby it is provided that a minister may give notice, and when the House signifies its acceptance of his motion the eleven o'clock or eleven-thirty or five o'clock closing rule does not prevail. It seems to me that that would meet our difficulty; if we wanted to sit until midnight it would only be necessary for the Prime Minister or the minister in charge of the measure under consideration to give notice the day before that the next day the rule in respect of the eleven o'clock closing would not apply, until the question under consideration was finished. For instance, the whole budget debate might be treated in that way, which would overcome the difficulty mentioned. In the main I am glad to support these recommendations.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I consider that we had very satisfactory meetings of this committee; our object all the way through was to devise changes in the rules upon which we could all agree, and in our report we were unanimous. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) took different views; one wanted to sit later and the other to adjourn earlier, but this report is a compromise. I came into this House a great many years ago and from my very first session I felt that we should amend the rules in order to close earlier in the evening and to have shorter speeches; in that way we would be kept here a shorter time and the business of the House would be done more quickly. I am very glad to have been a member of this committee and to have had a part in drawing up these recommendations, which I think will help very much in expediting business and in allowing us to get home at an earlier hour than has been the case in the past. It seems to me that wise men would hardly agree that they should sit here until four or five o'clock in the morning, as has been done many times in my experience, and I hope that that practice will be stopped. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has explained about the hour of closing; that matter is entirely in the hands of the House and by giving notice the rule can be suspended. Of course, when closure is brought in we have not suggested stopping at an earlier hour than that provided in the old rules, which is two o'clock in the morning. It may be as some hon. members have said, that this will lead to greater time being taken in discussing these matters, and in such case I suppose we will have closure often; so far as I am concerned I see no reason why that should not be. I hope the House will adopt these rules as they have been unanimously drawn up by the committee.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I agree with many hon. members who have spoken that shortening the hours we spend in this House would be a proper procedure. There is no reason why this House should sit after eleven o'clock; if there is some matter of great public importance under discussion, by unanimous consent we could arrange to sit later. Years ago we used to consider that unless we kept our stores, warehouses and other places of business open from early in the morning until eight or nine o'clock at night we could not get along, but during the war, when help was scarce, our ideas changed. To-day we are opening at eight o'clock and closing at five o'clock, and our business is just as great as it was before. It may be, as one hon. member has said, that we push through a lot of business after eleven o'clock at night; that may be all right for the party in power if they can catch the opposition asleep but it is not the best thing for the country and we should consider the people. It is not often that I disagree with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) and agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), but in this case I agree with him absolutely. In this House business administration should apply as in any other big business. We drift along in a lackadaisical way, doing nothing and discussing radical resolutions which should never be introduced here. In revising the rules of the House I would suggest that something be done to eliminate matters of that kind altogether. I am not referring to any hon. member in particular, but I think we all waste time, with the exception of myself, and it is a crime to lose the time and waste the money of the country sitting here week after week when we should not be here at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would just assure the hon. member that I will give him every support if he initiates a strike in this House for an eight hour day.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to support what has already been said by the other members of the committee. These rules are in many cases compromises; we would have shortened the work of parliament still more had we been able to agree, but in that way we did bring in an unanimous report. We must not only consider to-day's sitting; a late sitting to-day means that the committee to-morrow morning will not meet. The committee on privileges and elections met three times last week and each time lacked a quorum. I have had the honour of sitting in this House for twenty-nine consecutive sessions, and I have been a member of three committees appointed to revise the rules; I filled the position of Deputy Speaker for four years and of Speaker for three years, and I say without fear of contradiction that with three parties now in the House we should accept these recommendations. We have considered the rules in the British House, where the so-called midnight rule applies, and I am sure that in our common sense and anxiety to give the country the best we have and with our desire to get through our work as expeditiously as possible and in as businesslike a way as possible, the majority of this House will be in favour of the adoption of these changes. My experience in the old days was that we never settled any important question before five or six o'clock in the morning, twenty-five or even fifteen years ago all the important divisions were taken at about that hour. Then closure was brought in; that was a blessing in disguise and helped the government of the day, but it was also a great help to the opposition. We have had debates in this House which lasted for a fortnight, beginning at three o'clock Monday afternoon and ending at midnight Saturday night. Men were so exhausted that they lay down here on cots; some of them brought pillows and we were a laughing stock; we were nick-named "sleeping beauties", and people came to gaze upon the results of our foolishness. I sincerely hope this report will be adopted; the eleven o'clock closing rule can always be suspended, but when it is adhered to we will feel fit to do something the next day, and it must be remembered that all the important work of a member of parliament is not done in this chamber. We all belong to committees, to which important measures are referred, and I am sorry to say that as it is many members do not attend the meetings of those committees as regularly as they might. When we have late sessions the committees meeting the next morning are not attended, and as a consequence important matters are neglected and the work is not satisfactory. As I have said, the committee has brought in a compromise report in the best interests of all parties, and I hope it will be supported by the House. These rules will come into effect next session, and if we find that we have made a mistake we can then correct any rule we so desire. For the present I think the House should do this committee the compliment of adopting the report.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, the surest evidence that late sittings have not been injurious to the health of the members is the eloquence and mental ability of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat and who has been a member of this House for twenty-nine years. If he has been able to remain through these long sittings for twenty-nine years and then deliver the speech he made this afternoon, I have no doubt that if our electors permit us to do so we are capable of doing the same thing. Every reason urged by the Minister of Justice in refusing the request of the hon. member for Macleod that we do not sit Friday night applies with equal force to sitting after eleven o'clock on any night. He stated that more work was done on Friday night than at any other time. Possibly the implication was because some members were away. The same thing applies to not sitting beyond eleven o'clock at night. I do not wish to insist on this but I think experience will show that the government, no matter which party may be in power, will suffer. It will be comparatively easy to obstruct, comparatively easy to keep the House sitting until eleven o'clock at night. I know it would be my best wish under such a rule to be sitting on the opposition benches.

Mr. McGIBBON: I just want to say a word on this matter. I agree with all those who have spoken that it is our duty to facilitate the work of parliament. I also agree with the hon. member who has just sat down that this rule will not accomplish that result; there is no question of that at all in my mind. I think the government are making a serious mistake. After all it is the duty of a government to govern, and if they are going to govern they must have the power to do so. This rule will put the government in the hands of the House. Talk can be maintained every night until eleven o'clock, and the government will find that they are seriously handicapped in carrying on the affairs of the country. The members of the government may be hard worked, but I can assure them that there are lots of other people who would be glad to take their places. The same thing is true of members of parliament. Every time they go home they can find a dozen people who would gladly relieve them of their duties. But I do not think anybody can say he is seriously overworked in the House of Commons when he only puts in three hours in the afternoon and three hours at night. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Power) that anybody who has watched the business of this parlimaent will find that the most effective work is done after eleven o'clock. Many of us have had to sit here and listen to speeches that sometimes occupy two, three and four hours, many of them repeated session after session, and two or three times a session. I am not one of those who take up many hours of the time of this House, it is very seldom that I make a speech of even twenty or thirty minutes duration. I want to say to the government that they are not going to get the business of the session done more quickly by adopting an arbitrary rule to quit at eleven o'clock at night. We are not children. Most of us are supposed to have reached the age of maturity and common sense. The necessity for adjourning at eleven o'clock at night, or earlier, is in everybody's mind, but when you make an arbitrary rule to adjourn at that hour the government will find night after night that when they take up their measures, especially estimates, they will not get the work done as quickly as they otherwise would.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have just one other remark to make and I may as well make it now before the forty-minute rule comes into operation. It has been mentioned that if the eleven o'clock rule proves irksome it may be suspended. That is very true, but the responsibility for carrying on the work of the House does not rest upon this side, the responsibility is upon the government. I suppose that if in the judgment of the government it was deemed advisable to suspend the rule the motion for suspension would come from them, and they might continue sitting until twelve o'clock midnight, or one or two o'clock in the morning. I do not imagine a motion from this side of the House that the rule be suspended in order that we might continue after eleven o'clock would meet with approval; I would not expect it to. At any rate I say the responsibility rests upon the government for any such motion as that. But I think I am right in making the assertion that there is a general impression throughout the country that most of our estimates go through in the last few days of the session—that millions and tens of millions of dollars of estimates go through at that time. Now it might be particularly in the interests of the government to try to put those estimates through by continuing after eleven o'clock at night in the hope that members would get tired and say "Oh, well, let them go through, I am going home." What I want to say in that regard is that if there is any instance where that rule should be vigorously followed it is when the estimates are going through and the money of the country is being voted. It would be open to the government to suspend the rule if they thought it advisable in order to facilitate the passage of estimates in that way. It would certainly be in their interest to suspend that rule, and continue sitting until one or two o'clock, or perhaps three o'clock in the morning in order to rush things through. Suppose the government desire to prorogue on a certain date and they say: Both sides of the House desire to close on that date. Different matters are introduced. The government make an estimate of how much time it will take to get the business through but fresh matters crop up that reduce the margin of time allowed and in order to close by the date fixed the government give notice of motion to suspend the rules and so rush through estimates of hundreds of millions in the last few hours of the session. I want to enter my protest now before that happens, if it does happen. Because it would be better not to have any arbitrary rule at all than to have it suspended by the government when it is to their interests to do so in order to rush through estimates and other business at a time when people are tired and want to get away. I hope the government will not abuse the rule in this regard at all events.

Mr. SPEAKER: As was stated by one hon. member the committee in agreeing upon eleven o'clock thought to strike a happy medium. Personally I was in favour of adjourning at ten-thirty; other members of the committee favoured eleven o'clock, and still others thought eleven-thirty o'clock should be the proper hour. Finally the committee agreed upon eleven o'clock as best harmonizing the diversity of view.

Let me say to hon. gentlemen on both sides that in Britain where they have to scrutinize perhaps the biggest budget in the world, where they have to administer the affairs not of one country but of an immense empire, the House begins to sit in the afternoon at four-thirty and adjourns, except on special occasions, at eleven-thirty in the evening. Now, I admit we have a new country and we have vast problems to settle, but I think that by reducing the length of the speeches delivered here we can efficiently administer Canada's affairs in a reasonable length of time.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) a moment ago mentioned the Wednesday sittings beginning at two o'clock in the afternoon. I remember when that rule was introduced. It is the progeny of my dear old friend, Right Hon. Mr. Fielding. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) said a moment ago that he had sat in parliament for twenty-nine consecutive sessions. May I be permitted to say that I have sat in the House of Commons for thirty-one consecutive sessions. I was a boy when I came here first and, thank Providence, I feel like a boy yet. Mr. Fielding introduced the two o'clock rule for Wednesday sittings but the first session after its introduction members began to realize that it was impossible to deal with the business of the House even for only one day each week at two o'clock in the afternoon, and the rule has been a dead letter practically ever since. The motion to suspend this rule, which forced members to rush to the House of Commons from the club or from the hotel, in order to be in their seats on time was practically the first motion made every session. Now this rule was adopted in a moment of fervor to expedite the work of the House but it did not succeed. As to the duration of the session, I believe we shall have made immense progress by agreeing to reduce the length of speeches to forty minutes. Let me recall some of my own experiences. In the old days, before 1900, it was the fashion to deliver long orations and the best among our parliamentarians were in the habit of speaking for two or three hours. Tupper and even Laurier, but in a lesser degree, would deliver long speeches. Blake delivered very long speeches. His speech in the early eighties against the Canadian Pacific Railway contract I think lasted for five or six hours. That was accepted in those days. But in this respect there has been a change in England as well as in Canada. It would not surprise members of the House if I were to say that the great Gladstone would be out of place in the House of Commons now. Public affairs are now managed by the British parliament as if it were a board composed of business men, with the directors sitting at the table and the shareholders around them. On one occasion after the war, in 1920, I happened to be in the House of Commons, and the proceedings were most interesting to me. Asquith had been elected for one of the Scottish seats, Paisley I think it was. He was introduced on that day, and he gave notice of a motion to consider the state of Europe after the war. That was surely a big issue. The motion came up the following day by mutual agreement between Lloyd George and Asquith. Asquith spoke for thirty minutes on the state of Europe after the war, and Lloyd George followed and closed the debate in twenty-five minutes. Surely a member can say all he has to say in less than forty minutes. I was in favour of making the limit thirty minutes. The best English ever heard in this House was spoken under closure in twenty minute speeches. The speeches were to the point, couched in excellent language, went to the root of the question, and delivered, I may say, with warmth and eloquence for fear of the guillotine. I say to the House, let us be practical. We say that we model our rules upon the English pattern. In England they have reduced materially the length of speeches. They do their business,— yes, and they administer the affairs of a great empire in rather short sessions of the House. Why should we be provincial in this matter? Let us imitate the great mother of parliaments; let us be broad-minded and business-like. The country would thank us for it.

New rule to be added after rule 3—adjournment at 11 o'clock—agreed to.

Rule 5—to be transferred to rule 23 as section 1, agreed to.

Amended rule 10—Select standing committees.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I observe that there is a committee on industrial relations. Our present committee is called committee on industrial and international relations. I think we should retain the two words.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a mistake; the full name will be restored as it was formerly.

Mr. NEILL: I must take exception to this rule. I do not think it will achieve the purpose intended. I think the general idea is that there is difficulty in getting a quorum together on the day on which these committees meet, and it is proposed to remedy that by reducing the size of the committees, but in many cases increasing the percentage of the quorum, which will make it even more difficult to get a quorum. To begin with, may I say that much of the difficulty in getting a quorum of committees together is due to the fact that it is the custom of hon. members living in the neighbourhood in Quebec and in nearby places in Ontario to go home for the week-ends; consequently we have no committee meetings on Friday or Saturday, and we might well have meetings on those days, and we have no committee meetings on Monday because the members have not got back, and the result is that on Tuesday morning we have seven or eight committees all asking for a quorum at eleven o'clock. That is the real trouble in getting a quorum together. Some hon. members are ashamed to advertise that fact. Look at the proposed changes in the number of members on the committees. In the case of the committee on miscellaneous private bills it is proposed to have fifty members, fifteen of whom shall constitute a quorum. The committee formerly was composed of sixty-five members, and ten would constitute a quorum. If my figuring is correct ten out of sixty-five would mean 15 per cent, and fifteen out of fifty would be 30 per cent. Do hon. members think it will be easier to get 30 per cent of the committee than it would be to get 15 per cent? The same idea is carried out all through the list of committees. The quorum for the committee on agriculture has been raised from 11 to 33 per cent. It would be comparatively easy to obtain a quorum of 11 per cent out of a membership of 105, but when you have to get 33 per cent of that committee together in order to have a quorum, it will be difficult. I say that these changes will not achieve the object aimed at. I suggest that the remedy is to leave the committee as it was before and make the quorum smaller.

I should like to refer to another phase of the matter. On page 7 we have the statement that it has been so arranged that each member may belong to two committees, according to the number of committee men arranged under this section. That will not be satisfactory in working out the matter. It may be all very well for members who represent an exclusively industrial district, or perhaps those exclusively engaged in some kind of farming, such as the growing of wheat in Alberta, but there are other districts where they are engaged in a variety of employments and where some representation should be granted to them. For instance, in the district I represent we have a large agricultural population and I want to be on the agriculture committee. Marine and fisheries is an important thing in my district, and I want to be on that committee. Then again, on account of the large labour vote in my district, I want to be on the industrial relations committee. I am told I can be placed on two committees only. Which of the two will it be? Take fisheries as an illustration; that resolves itself around two features, the salmon fishery in British Columbia and the lobster fishery on the Atlantic coast. Am I to leave the interests of the salmon fisheries in my district to be decided by the gentleman from Nova Scotia, whose interest does not go beyond the lobster industry or vice versa? It is not fair or just.

Another point is that people say "Oh well, members do not come to committee meetings." We will find that they will come to the sittings of both committees on occasions when they are required. A man interested in the dairy industry will not attend a meeting of the agriculture committee when the committee is dealing with the transportation of beef cattle across the Atlantic, but he will be on hand when the matter in which he is interested is to be discussed. When the transportation of cattle across the Atlantic is under consideration he can go to other committees. It is an advantage to have a large committee, because the men who are interested in the matter will turn up, and you will have less trouble in getting a quorum. But you have the greatest difficulty in getting them to turn up to discuss something in which they are not in the least interested, but in which other members are very vitally interested. I would suggest that the remedy is, as I said before, to leave the committee as large as before, but to reduce the quorum, and if we could possibly get into the way of holding committee meetings on Friday and Monday, it would do away with a great deal of the trouble we have in getting a quorum.

Mr. MARCIL: This amendment was based on a recommendation made to us by Mr. Todd, who has been the Clerk of the Committees of this House for forty years. The intention is to reduce the membership. These large committees, such as the railway committee, with 135 members, are unworkable. The more members you have on a committee, the less work they do, and our object here is to distribute the work among all members of parliament so that each member will not have more than two committees at the outside to attend, and perhaps only one. What happens in practice is that two or three committees of which you are a member will be sitting at the same hour in the morning, and it is impossible in such a case for members to give their undivided attention to the work before them. We therefore invited Mr. Todd, with his forty years experience as Clerk of Committees, to prepare for us what he thought would be a workable system, and this is the result. I think it should be tried before being changed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would say to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that all the members of the House have the same kind of difficulty that he suggests. We are all of us interested in all the committees at times, but we cannot all be members of all the committees, and I would remind him that as a matter of custom and etiquette a member can always go to a committee of which he is not actually a member and listen to the proceedings. As a matter of fact, even though he be not a member of the committee he is attending, I have never known a member to be refused a chance to speak on a subject if he wished to do so. He has not the actual right to speak in a committee of which he is not a member, but I have never known permission to be refused.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend is speaking from his experience, and I am speaking from mine. I have seen permission refused several times in the few years' experience I have had in this House. I can give him a case in point. It occurred in the railway committee. I was not a member of that committee, and I proposed to make some remarks in it, and I was called to order. The point of order was raised whether I was entitled to make any remarks, and I know of another occasion when the same rule was applied, and properly applied, to another member. So far as having the right to go in and look on is concerned, we can all do that in a police court, or in the Supreme court, but that does not give us much say in what is being done there. The man who butts in on some particular phase of an inquiry that is being held by a committee of which he is not a member gets very small attention. He is not allowed to cross-examine the witnesses, or to vote, and he is accepted as being simply an onlooker. That is all the good it does him. My hon. friend points to what has always been the custom; but we are living in an age of progress. There are five parties in the House, now, and some consideration should be given to that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: My hon. friend's experience has been different from my own. It seems to me the exception proves that the practice is all right. Each committee must have full control over its own deliberations, and if I go into a committee of which I am not a member, and for any reason that committee feels I should not be allowed to speak, that is their right, because they have full control of their own proceedings.

Mr. NEILL: I do not want to go into a committee of which I am not a member. Why do you suggest I should go?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I did not suggest that. I simply said that I have never known a case where a member of the House was refused permission to speak in a committee of which he was not a member. My hon. friend's experience has been a little different, but I am sure that does not often happen.

Mr. KELLNER: I think the members of the House will recollect that the former member for Brant, Mr. Good, introduced a resolution in this House for reducing the membership of committees, and he appeared before the committee revising the rules of the House two years ago, and made a considerable impression on the committee. I think every member of that committee was convinced that his argument was sound, and that the membership should be reduced. He had gone to a lot of trouble in getting statistics as to what would make a good working committee and quorum, and we adopted his recommendations which were supported by the Clerk of Committees, Mr. Todd. I think that the committee arrangement which we have to-day is probably just about as unworkable as you could get. For instance, two weeks ago Tuesday morning I was summoned to attend four different committees meeting at the same hour, and I am satisfied that many other hon. members of the House received similar notices. The impossibility of attending several different committees meeting simultaneously is apparent, and I cannot see what good it is going to do any member to be on a lot of committees which he cannot possibly attend. Under this new rule members will be able to attend their committees.

In regard to the quorum, there was a good deal of objection three or four sessions ago to the quorum being made only a small number, because that would allow a few members to get together and put things through which did not have the approval of the majority of the committee. For ten or twelve members to form the quorum of a committee of well over one hundred is a pretty small proportion, and it is a little dangerous. I think the quorum should be kept up to between one-quarter and one-third the membership of the committee. I believe that this recommendation coming from the committee will give every member of the House the opportunity to get on the one committee he most desires to be on, and the privilege, possibly the duty, of being on a second committee. I feel that that is as good an arrangement as we have had suggested up to the present time, and I recommend its adoption.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to endorse the suggestions of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I would be almost inclined to go further than he does and allow every member of the House to take part in the discussions of any committee. Perhaps that would not be practicable, but I do not see any reason why any member of the House should not be allowed to speak in any committee. In the short time I have been in this House I have noticed that the more work that is done in committee, the less discussion there is when the measure comes back to the House. The work done in committee is not so spectacular, but it is much more useful. I do not see any good reason for cutting down the size of committees, because it would only result in throwing upon the members more work that would have to be done in this chamber. I remember last year a very respected member of this House, the father of the House, advancing an argument in committee, and someone objected to him speaking in the committee, and wanted to force a vote. His reply was, "I will speak here or somewhere else where you will have to listen to me." I notice that members who thresh out a question in committee spend much less time discussing it in the House.

I think the objection raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to committee work as it is done at present is valid, and that more work might be done on Fridays and Mondays. I was present at a committee meeting this morning, and we are meeting again on Monday morning. I believe that a great deal more committee work could be done on Friday; on Monday many members are away.

As to limiting a member of the House to serving on two committees, I again endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. That proposal is not fair to members of the House. Many constituencies are interested in more than one subject. I represent a constituency myself that is vitally interested in agriculture, in forestry, in fishing, in minerals, and in finance. Why should not their representative in this House have the right to represent them on the various committees dealing with these matters?

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has raised the objection in regard to reducing the size of the committees and of the quorum required, that it might be harder to get the required percentage of the committee than under the present conditions. It seems to me the very fact that the number of members of the several committees is reduced means that there will be more members available to attend those particular committees, and of itself justifies raising the quorum.

Mr. NEILL: It will be easier to secure the attendance of twenty than of ten members?

Mr. BROWN: I think my argument will appeal to a mathematical mind.

Mr. NEILL: Then it must be a very astute one. I cite the case of the agriculture committee, where the old quorum was ten, now it is to be twenty. It will be easier to secure the attendance of twenty than of ten?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: That is a species of higher mathematics beyond me.

Mr. BROWN: I repeat my argument. It will be possible because there will be more members available to make up the quorum than when they are expected to attend a larger number of committees.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall rule 10 carry?

Mr. NEILL: No, take a vote.

Amended rule 10 agreed to.

On amended rule 11—Special committees.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, I think it should be provided that the members be named in the original notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is an unwritten rule of the House that no committee can be appointed without its personnel being stated. The rule is transgressed sometimes, and it is only by unanimous agreement that such a defective motion is allowed to pass.

Amended rule 11 agreed to.

On rule 12.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee recommends that rule 12 be transferred to rule 11 as section 3.

Mr. KELLNER: It will be recalled that the other day when an amendment by a private member was offered to a resolution before the committee of ways and means it was ruled out of order. I am prepared to admit that there is a difference of opinion on that point, but I think all parties are agreed that a private member has the privilege of introducing an amendment to a bill. As, however, there is no rule covering the point, we have to look to the various parliamentary authorities for guidance. Therefore I would suggest that the clerk be instructed to draft a definite rule stating the privileges of private members with respect to offering amendments either to a resolution or a bill before the committee of ways and means.

Rule 12 agreed to.

Amended rule 15 agreed to.

Amended rule 17A—Debatable motions.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I may be reading this rule incorrectly, but it does not seem to me to carry out what is intended. It is in this form:

The following motions are debatable:—
Every motion standing on the order of proceedings for the day, except—

Then the list of exceptions is given.

—except for the second reading of a bill, or for the third reading of a bill, or for the consideration of Senate amendments—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, no. Those are debatable.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): As the amended rule is framed it makes these exceptions:

The following motions are debatable:—
Every motion standing on the order of proceedings for the day, except government notices of motion for the House to go into committee at a later date, or for the—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, "or, (b)."

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I will read the paragraph in full.

Mr. MARCIL: The exception is really parenthetical.

Mr. SPEAKER: Would it not be better to insert "and" instead of "or"?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it is just as well this way.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member for Melfort appears to be mistaken. The rule really provides that the following motions are debatable, (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), and so on. But as the question has been raised, in order to make the meaning plain the words:

—except government notices of motion for the House to go into committee at a later date,

Might be enclosed in brackets.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Strike out the word "or".

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Leaving in the word "or" means that all these other motions are not debatable.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the only exception is government notices of motion.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: You will have to strike out the word "or" in every paragraph.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the objection to putting in before (b) and (c) the words "every motion"?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If "or" is struck out it would remove my objection.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it agreed that the word "or" in each section be struck out?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Amended rule 17A as amended agreed to.

On amended rule 13—Deputy speaker.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In the first paragraph the concluding words "House of Commons of England" should be changed to read "the British House of Commons," for the simple reason that there has been no House of Commons of England for over two hundred years.

The CHAIRMAN: The language is taken from some of the old rules.

Mr. POWER: Why not substitute the words "House of Commons of Great Britain and Northern Ireland"? Or we could follow the language in amended rule 1:

In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain—

And so on. Is there any distinction between the House of Commons of Great Britain and the House of Commons of England?

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. POWER: I understand that the title of the House of Commons was changed at the last Imperial conference because the King's title was changed.

The CHAIRMAN: It is suggested that the concluding line of the first paragraph of amended rule 13 be changed to read: "House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain."

Mr. SPENCER: Why not make it simpler than that and substitute the words "British House of Commons"?

Mr. DUNNING: This is a British House of Commons.

Mr. MARCIL: As in the first rule we use the phrase "House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain," the same words should be applied later.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It might be well to go the full length and adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Quebec South, using the term "House of Commons of Great Britain and Northern Ireland".

The CHAIRMAN: So that the matter may be clear we had better have a motion.

Mr. POWER: I would move that this rule be referred back to the committee to ascertain what is the proper designation of the House of Commons to which we wish to refer.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The point raised by the hon. member for Melfort is well taken. His suggestion covers the whole matter. Simply change the designation to "British House of Commons".

Mr. DUNNING: This is a British House of Commons.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): This is the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is fine; we are progressing, both of us.

[Mr. McLean.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Why not accept the suggestion that the Clerk ascertain the proper designation, and use that, whatever it may be?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That suggestion is good.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the rule carry on that understanding?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The first rule would have to be amended in accordance with this so that the title might be correct in both.

Rule agreed to.

On amended rule 14—Order in committee of the whole.

Mr. BOYS: I offer a suggestion—I do not know that I have any deep rooted conviction in the matter—with regard to subsection 3, which provides that the chairman shall maintain order in committees of the whole House, deciding all questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House. We had yesterday an illustration of the waste of time involved in appealing decisions of the Chairman to the House. I do not want to interfere with the provision that disorder in committee may be censured only by the House on the receiving of a report thereof. But why should not an appeal from the ruling of the Chairman in committee of the whole House be taken to the committee rather than to the House? If this were done it would result in a saving of from half an hour to three-quarters of an hour, and at the moment I cannot see any reason this should not be done. In any of the ordinary select committees, any appeal which it is desired to take from the ruling of the Chairman is taken to the committee itself, which has charge of its own proceedings. Why should not the committee of the whole House also have charge of its proceedings and decide questions taken on appeal from the Chairman? There is always a fairly good attendance of members in committee and the same result would be obtained from an appeal to the committee as from an appeal to the House. The suggestion I make is that after the word "the", in the third line of subsection 3, there be inserted the word "committee" instead of "House", so that the subsection will read:

The Chairman shall maintain order in the committee of the whole House, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that the appeal be taken to the Speaker. The Chairman is appointed from year to year and sometimes he is not as familiar with the rules as is the Speaker. When his decision is appealed from to the House the House frequently, from considerations of loyalty, sustains his decision, and in that way precedents are established. If his ruling were appealed to the Speaker the Speaker might very well overrule the Chairman without any great loss of dignity to the latter.

Mr. BOYS: There is a difficulty in that suggestion. We should have to go a step further, because I am sure my hon. friend would not want the committee to be bereft of all protection. I do not think he would want the Speaker to be absolutely in control of the committee, and for that reason we should have to provide for an appeal from the Speaker to the House in the event of his decision not being satisfactory. My only reason for offering the suggestion is a desire to save some of the time which at present is wasted. However, I have not any deep rooted conviction in the matter, although I do think there is no reason why an appeal from the ruling of the Chairman should not be taken to the committee of the whole House rather than to the House itself. Why should not the committee of the whole House have charge of its own proceedings as has any of the select committees?

Mr. SPEAKER: I take exception to the point of view of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys) and the reason is very obvious. Suppose there should happen to be disorder in committee of the whole House and that a member should persist in creating disturbance. I am of course merely supposing a case which fortunately does not occur often. Does my hon. friend think that the ruling of the Chairman and the vote of the committee upon that ruling would be sufficient to put an end to that disorder? I think not. If an appeal is taken from the ruling of the Chairman it must come before the House; and this because of the consequences that might be involved. If the Speaker is obliged to name the member who has been disorderly, the hon. gentleman can see the grave consequences that might ensue. The leader of the House would have to make a motion, the disorderly member would be admonished, and thereupon he would be committed to the care of the Seargent-at-Arms and brought to the bar of the House. Thereafter, as Mr. Speaker Anglin, one of my predecessors, once observed, "God knows what would happen". This is an old rule which has proved its usefulness in the past, and I think we should leave it to the House to see to the carrying out of such drastic measures as I now suggest, which now and then may be unavoidable. Otherwise the committee would not have the authority to deal with such a case as I am supposing.

Mr. BOYS: With great respect to His Honour the Speaker, I do not think the situation he refers to could very well arise. Let us take matters as they stand now. Suppose there is a limited attendance in committee and a question is to be appealed: the members are suddenly called in, and although they have not heard a word of what has taken place in committee they are called upon to pass judgment on the question. Those sitting in the committee, on the other hand, are in possession of all the facts; they know what has taken place, and they are in a better position to judge. I am not disturbing the closing sentence of the rule, relating to disorder. I am aware of the rule that provides that any member who is to be named can be named only by the Speaker, and I do not seek to alter that feature. However, as I say, I have no settled conviction on the matter; I was merely making a suggestion with a view to saving time.

Amended rule agreed to.

On amended rule 17C—Speaker to leave chair on Thursdays and Fridays.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It was decided the other day that rules 76, 77 and 78 even if not altered would come in after No. 15. It will be merely a matter of renumbering, but I thought it better to have it on record that these rules would come in in that order.

Amended rule 17C agreed to.

Amended rules 18, 19 and 20 agreed to.

On amended rule 21—No speaker to speak twice.

Mr. IRVINE: I want to offer a suggestion. There has been a slight oversight in the preparation of this amendment.

Sir EUGENE FISET: This is where the hon. gentleman should not speak at all.

Mr. IRVINE: That applies to my hon. friend as well. I sympathize with the desire to curtail the length of speeches to forty minutes, but that is not what I want to call the attention of the committee to. The new rule provides:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order—

The CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend is speaking of the new rule; amended rule 21 is now before the committee. Shall amended rule 21 carry?

Amended rule 21 agreed to.

New rule to be added after rule 21—Speeches limited to 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend is in order now.

Mr. IRVINE: The new rule reads as follows:

No member, except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

The suggestion I would make is that instead of merely saying that the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition should be permitted this extra time, the leader of any recognized party or group should also be included, and I would ask His Honour the Speaker to give this matter his consideration. We have in this House a number of groups; it may be that in the near future they will melt away into the two old parties; I do not know, but I hope that will not be so. Even if that happens, a change of this kind would not affect the rule, while on the other hand if these groups become well-established there is no reason why the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition should have the preference in this regard over the leader of any other group in this House. I would suggest the addition of the words, "or the leader of any recognized party or group in the House."

Mr. MARCIL: The objection I see is that there is no standard by which parties can be defined in this House. Last session I heard the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) declare that he was a party by himself. If that should be so, we will have sub-divisions of the Progressive party, we will have the Labour party and so on. I do not see how these parties could be recognized.

Mr. IRVINE: The word "recognized" would mean any part recognized by the Speaker as such. I do not suppose the Speaker would recognize an individual as a party, and I think there is a reasonable understanding in this regard. There is no doubt in our minds of what the word "party" means, and if the Speaker has given recognition to a group in this House, the leader of that group so recognized should be on a par with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition in this respect.

[Tte Chairman.]

Mr. HEAPS: I am opposed to this rule in its entirety; I think we should follow the British practice where, as I understand it, there is no rule limiting the length of speeches. In Great Britain the budget debate is finished in two or three days; in this parliament, where our budget has not the importance of a budget in Great Britain, the discussion lasts anywhere from two to five weeks. In Great Britain this is done by an arrangement between the whips, who decide upon a certain length of time for the debate to continue. This year we had the sordid spectacle of the different whips going around insisting that the budget discussion be prolonged, and they found difficulty in finding enough speakers to continue the discussion while that debate was proceeding.

I think the regulations of the House should be as elastic as it is possible to make them, and the moment we lay down hard and fast rules we will find great difficulty in maintaining them. I think we would find some difficulty in regard to the eleven o'clock rule, and I think this forty minute rule will work a great injustice to many members of this House. In the first place we find under this rule something which I believe is novel in British procedure; it recognizes different parties in this House. I have never heard of written regulations under which different parties were recognized in the British House of Commons; there may be some such unwritten understanding as we have here, but there is nothing in the regulations to cover the point, and we are departing now from a procedure which has been long established when we recognize two groups or parties only. I would much prefer that no such recognition be given, and that we try to carry out the spirit of the rules of the House and get through our business as expeditiously as possible with no rules at all. This year we have done fairly well; there has been a desire shown in all parts of the House to not unnecessarily prolong the proceedings, and what has happened? The debate on the speech from the throne called forth practically no discussion and in spite of the fact that at times the whips found difficulty in getting enough speakers, the budget debate lasted for only about ten days. If that debate could be finished this year in ten days, is there any reason why the same thing should not apply in other years? Is there any reason why the whips of the parties could not get together and say, "The budget debate will not take more than two weeks." Is there any reason why the whips of the two parties cannot get together on the speech from the throne and get it through in a few days? The different groups of the House could choose the speakers whom they desire to have heard, representing their particular party. I think that would be more desirable than to have a written rule in our procedure which would allow the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition to speak for an unlimited time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the hon. gentleman be willing to comply with the decision of the whips if they decided he should not speak?

Mr. HEAPS: I would be no more willing to comply with such a decision than would the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I can quite frankly say I would not be willing to do so, and I am asking if my hon. friend would.

Mr. HEAPS: I would object to it, and that is why I am objecting to the limitation of speeches to forty minutes; in my remarks in this House I think I have only once exceeded that period. If time is being wasted in this House and if speeches are being prolonged, the government have a remedy in their hands, and I would suggest to the government and to the committee which framed these regulations that the British precedent be followed, and closure be moved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HEAPS: We would be following British precedent, and after closure is moved the speeches would be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. COOTE: Does the hon. member think it would be fair to allow those who spoke in the first few days to continue for three or four hours, and to limit those who speak at the last to twenty minutes? Would it not be more fair to limit everyone to forty minutes, and make everyone equal?

Mr. HEAPS: That may sound very nice in theory but it works out differently in practice. Every member of this House does not speak on every question, but any member who does desire to speak should have the right to take more than forty minutes. I think we should follow the practice of the British House of Commons and let the whips agree on a certain definite time for which the discussion will last. As one of the members of this House, Mr. Chairman, I would be willing to get rid of the budget debate in one week, and I would be satisfied to see the speech from the throne finished in the same length of time.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much of that time would the hon. member want?

Mr. HEAPS: I did not catch the remark of the hon. member, and perhaps it is as well I did not; I do not suppose I missed very much. I think it would be well if we limited the time of discussion by arrangement; this might apply to what I believe are the two main questions which take up the time of the House, that is, the budget and the speech from the throne. On other questions I do not think lengthy speeches have been made; they have been rather brief and to the point. Personally I think that by fixing forty minutes as the time limit for speeches we are assuming a certain amount of control over the private members of this House and giving certain privileges to favoured members. I feel inclined to oppose the resolution in its entirety.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the hon. member be good enough to define what he means by a waste of time in speeches necessitating in his opinion the application of closure?

Mr. HEAPS: I certainly can do that. I hear such speeches in this House on Wednesday afternoons.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I am very strongly opposed to long speeches and I am also very strongly opposed to this rule. I believe it is taking away from private members a privilege which should be preserved to them. Very often a member cannot say in forty minutes what he desires to say. But the difficulty is that there is so much repetition on various questions. That is where the time of the House is lost. I have noticed when estimates are going through that the most trival questions are asked and time is taken up by the hour—all of course, for the purpose of creating political propaganda. If we had a process of education along common sense lines in this House such a rule would not be necessary. If the sense of the House on this question was so strong that it would be recognized by every member such a rule would not be necessary. I for one offer my protest as a private member to the limiting of debate in this House.

Mr. NEILL: I realize from the way in which the House received the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that I am essaying an unpopular task. Nevertheless I join with him in opposing this rule. I consider it of such great importance that I propose to oppose it by every possible means I can so that it shall not be said hereafter that I at any rate was a party to the adoption of this rule. My hon. friend who has just sat down objected to it on the ground that it was taking away their privileges and rights from private members. The rule goes further than that: It is taking away from the people of this country the right to have their wrongs or their grievances expressed in parliament.

To deal with the thing in itself, as it were, I support the views of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) who asked why the right of reply to an unlimited extent be confined to only one member, the leader of a party in this House. Moreover even that arrangement might be abused by a little collusion between the government and some insignificant member.

Mr. FORKE: What does the hon. member mean by "insignificant member"?

Mr. NEILL: I should say "the member of any numerically insignificant group." Because there is no member in this House who is insignificant if he represents the wishes of his constituents. So far as a motion of no confidence in the government is concerned, the proposed new rule provides that unlimited speech shall be confined to the member making the motion and the minister replying thereto. Now, let us visualize for a moment. Say that one of the hon. members opposite, the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) gets up and makes a motion of want of confidence. It is imperative that somebody on the government side reply to him forthwith. But there are two hundred and forty-five members in the House, the life of the government is at stake—it may be going to go down—many members will want to speak; and surely it will not be suggested that the majority of the cabinet whose government is going down shall not have the right of reply for longer than forty minutes. Under this rule they would be precluded from making speeches beyond forty minutes. However, that does not worry me very much. If the opposition or the cabinet do not see the point of that there is no reason why I should worry. Now let me imagine there was a supposititious case in which a particular province was represented by only one man of a certain party in this House. Suppose the government of the day were putting through some deal extremely against the interests of that province. Suppose it was a gross gerrymander and we have heard of such cases, and it became the duty of that one miserable member to represent the interests of his province and to expose the situation. Why the hour glass would be turned upon him at the expiration of the forty minute period and he would be told to sit down.

Mr. SPENCER: What does my hon. friend mean by "miserable member?"

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: If I must make myself so plain I would say "miserable" in that condition. I do not suggest that my hon. friend is miserable or ever likely to be, but a member would be miserable who occupied such a position. Now I have heard it said that the government, the Speaker, the House would extend a member's privileges under such conditions. Not a bit of it. Somebody would get up and draw the Speaker's attention to the infraction of the rule and he would have to enforce it. So that the member who was the sole representative of his party in his province would have to bring his remarks to a close and he could only cover a few of the necessary points in the short space of forty minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Where is such a case possible?

Mr. NEILL: I would ask my hon. friend if he has such confidence in this government that he believes it would not be possible for them to carry out a gerrymander?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am asking where it is possible for only one man to be speaking for a province.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, I do not think that needs explanation. I have known of occasions where a whole province was represented by members of only one political stripe.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no Tory from Saskatchewan now. That is the situation you mean.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: He is referring to the Yukon.

Mr. NEILL: At any rate I point out where you can go very far under such a rule. We have had an example of another sort quite recently. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre made a speech on the budget. Did any one of his opponents suggest on that occasion that he was obstructing, or unduly lengthening his remarks, or doing anything beyond making a fair statement on the important subject of the budget? The hon. member spoke for more than forty minutes, and yet under this rule when his time was up he would have been debarred from proceeding further and the House and the country would have lost the benefit of that speech.

Mr. LAPOINTE: His speech would have been just as effective.

Mr. NEILL: That is a matter of opinion. This speech had to do with the budget and I suggest that it cannot be dealt with in a forty minute speech. Allusion was made this afternoon to the fact that Mr. Asquith, I think it was, in the British House of Commons dealt with an important subject in a thirty minute speech. But the conditions over there are not similar to the conditions here. In this country we go into far more necessary detail about local and provincial matters than they do in the British House of Commons, and while I desire to be loyal to the country of my birth I desire to point out that this is Canada and that we are Canadians, and that we should not always go to the mother country, where the conditions are very different from what they are here for examples in such matters.

Now, as the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) suggests, there is a remedy, and a very simple one, if there is abuse and the time of the House is taken up by long speeches, and that is to apply the closure. That is what it is for. We have a closure in existence now, rather a lengthy procedure, but it can be readily imposed. I know of a system of closure that is in force in the British Columbia legislature, which can be invoked in five minutes, and it is of the most drastic character. It is called moving the previous question. All a man has to do is to say "I move that the question be now put". It is not subject to debate, and the question is put. This system operates very effectively. We have a provision in our rules for putting the previous question, but it only results in preventing members from moving further amendments. The previous question in British Columbia immediately stops all debate and the question has to be put at once without further discussion.

At any rate these are the methods I would suggest, rather than doing away with the right of free speech. I defy any hon. gentleman—I may be wrong in this, but I will take a chance on it—who supports this rule, and a great many are going to do it, to give me an instance of any civilized government, except the very inferior ones, who have a system of limiting its speakers to forty minutes or any other period, and I would like to know the name of the civilized government which does not have some form of closure. Experience proves that it is desirable to have a form of closure, and not desirable to prohibit the free speech of hon. members. I think I heard the Minister of Agriculture saying, in an aside, "We are all progressing"—he did not say we are all Progressives, but that we are all progressing—but are we? If so, we are progressing backwards. This is a reactionary thing which I have never heard of before in this parliament. We are going back instead of forward. We are going to take away from the common people the right of expressing themselves in parliament. In the past people have gone to great length and have shed blood to get the right of free speech. I am sorry at times to have to listen to members with whose views I do not agree, which I do not relish, but these hon. members are in the same position with regard to my speeches. However, that is a small price to pay for the privilege of free speech and the opportunity afforded us to express our views and to ventilate once or twice a session, the grievances of the people we represent.

If it is necessary to have this restriction, I will test the feeling of the House by moving to add at the end of this rule the words:

Except on budget debate.

That would give an opportunity, once at least during the session, for a member to talk on any subject he likes, as long as he likes. I do not think that is an unreasonable thing, and the privilege would not be abused. The idea of this rule is to shorten debate. Will it do so? What will happen? If the opposition decide to obstruct a bill, instead of putting up ten members to speak for three hours each, they will put up a hundred men to speak for forty minutes each, and what would be the result? You cannot prevent obstruction in this way. I think it is worth while to put up with some boredom in this House, in order to preserve the right of free speech.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member favours the closure rather than a limited time for each speaker. Suppose half a dozen members of the House were prone to make long speeches, and each got up and spoke for five or six hours, then closure was put on, would that be better than giving a greater number of members an opportunity to speak twenty minutes or forty minutes.

Mr. NEILL: If, as I suppose, the hon. member would suggest that these men were going to make six hour speeches for the sake of obstruction, it would not make any difference how it was done.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. member referred to the budget debate. That is one stage. Under our rules a member can speak forty minutes on the budget debate. The budget debate is followed by a resolution which is followed by a bill, and there are sixteen different opportunities, before the bill passes the House, for a member to speak forty minutes.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to see the speech of the leader of the opposition cut up into sixteen sections!

Mr. MARCIL: An hon. member could make sixteen different speeches.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Some hon. members are quoting precedents from other countries as to what we should do. We are in Canada, and in the House of Commons, and have a right to consider ourselves and need not go to other places for guidance. I am in hearty sympathy with the limit of forty minutes for speakers. There are few members in this House who cannot tell all they know in forty minutes. Many of them, including myself, can tell all they know in half an hour or possibly fifteen minutes. Every hon. member should be alive to the fact that time is money and should say as much as he can in as few words as possible. Hon. members take too long in prefacing their remarks. They think there is something in it. With few exceptions, I would say definitely that anyone who takes more than forty minutes repeats his statements, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) did a few minutes ago when I came into the chamber. He talked for a considerable time and said nothing, as I would be doing if I attempted to talk as he did. I think the curtailment of the length of the speeches will be beneficial and should be carried unanimously.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think any speech is better if it is brief. We suffer more in this House from long speeches than from any other cause. If a member could only speak for forty minutes, he would make his statement in a way people would understand what he was saying, and the speeches would be much better. When the speeches go beyond forty minutes, certainly when they extend to an hour or an hour and a half, no matter how fine they are, very few people care to listen to them.

In regard to the rules, they were framed and designed for two parties, the government and the opposition. That would be all right when there are only two parties. That is no longer the case, and it will probably not be the case in the future. The present indication is that there will be more than two parties in this House, and therefore I think we should cut out all exceptions. Why should the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition have a right to harangue the House at length and others be precluded from doing so? I do not think we have any worse offenders than the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. Even their speeches —and I say it with all respect—would be very much stronger and better if made shorter. I think we should either cut out all exceptions, or add to the exceptions the leaders of the recognized groups in this House.

Mr. BROWN: I am also averse to cutting off debate or refusing the British-born privilege of expressing our views in this House. It is a pity that we should have to consider such a resolution in this House. But the fact is borne in upon us that a great deal of the time of the House is taken up with unnecessarily long speeches. It is not only the long speeches, but the frequent speeches. Consider the time members of the House are accustomed to occupy in discussing different matters. Some members seem to feel under an obligation to speak upon every possible subject that comes up in the House. We perhaps lose more time in that way than we do with the unnecessarily long speeches. I have noticed ever since I came into the House that much of the time of the House is wasted in committee of supply through a minister having to repeat his explanation of a particular item over and over again to different members dropping in. I think I have been as faithful in my attendance at the sittings of the House as any other member, and after listening to an explanation given by a minister I must confess I have felt a sense of annoyance when some other hon. member has come into the chamber half an hour later, and insisted on the minister repeating his explanation. Then perhaps another member will come in, and the same explanation has to be given all over again. I think a great deal of the time of the House might be saved if members who come in while estimates are being discussed would first find out whether the particular subject in which they are interested has not already been covered by the minister.

I am not going to say I am not in favour of this rule of limiting speeches to forty minutes, because generally speaking the ordinary member can give the meat of any matter within that time, but there is one consideration that we ought to take into account. If a member has prepared himself to speak on a given subject and has the matter well in hand, he naturally is prepared to cover it in a given length of time, but very frequently, as we all know, he is compelled to speak a great deal longer than he intended because of interruptions.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Interruptions can be allowed for.

Mr. BROWN: If a member is interrupted he has to use part of the time that he intended to devote to his prepared speech to go off into side-lines into which he is drawn by the interruptions, so if we decide to limit the speeches to forty minutes, I think we should go further and absolutely forbid interruptions when a member is making his speech. We cannot consider this matter simply from the standpoint of the speech the member is prepared to make. It would put a member in a humiliating position, after having prepared a well-rounded speech from start to peroration, to be compelled to stop before he had covered his subject in the way he was prepared to do.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last Tuesday I was referring to the resolution to ratify the Petersen contract, because to my mind there are aspects of similarity between it and this proposed bill. The Petersen contract was entered into by the government in 1925. It contained a laboured preamble that the government intended thereby to secure control of ocean freight rates, but it was plain to anyone who read the agreement that in the final analysis such control would be passed over to Sir William Petersen. Of course, it sounded fine to say to the members of this House: Oh, you are voting to give the government control of ocean freight rates, to put an end to a shipping monopoly on the Atlantic. We struggled hard to impress upon the government that its claims were false and misleading, but they insisted that the contract must be regarded as almost inviolate. The then Minister of Trade and Commerce said: The contract is cast iron. The Prime Minister said: We never would have made the contract unless it entirely carried our judgment. What happened? Against our protest the contract was referred to a special committee. That committee laboured long over the matter and considering what was spent by the government and by those who were in attendance to give their views either for or against, probably, at least $250,000 was expended in connection with the reference. When Sir William Petersen could not get what he thought was secured to him by the contract, by reason of the fact that the government could not secure its ratification by parliament, not only was the contract killed but its rejection involved his death.

Now, I do not imagine for a moment that the promoters of this bill may die in the committee room. But what has happened in the course of their efforts to secure its passage through this House? Every member has had the bill put before him as a measure which might mean—I will put it that way—which might mean the construction of a canal in the Georgian bay district. Nothing of the kind is intended. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) so acknowledges. He told us on Monday night that the issue involved was power, not a canal. He used the word "canal" only once in the whole course of his address, and then not to suggest that it was even a possibility. If I can do nothing else, Mr. Speaker, I want to register a strong protest against hon. members being hoodwinked and made fools of by promoters who lead us to believe that they want one thing when in reality they want something entirely different. The Right Hon. Winston Churchill has described that practice as the policy of "hugger mugger," and this certainly is an application of it. And hugger mugger he defines thus. When you want something very badly you have a great chance of success if you can fix in the public mind something else which the public desires very much and which you use as a cloak to cover the object you are after yourself. When you have well camouflaged your object then you try as vigilantly as you can to obtain it, and you may find in the end that you get what you want. I say it is beneath the dignity of this House and of every individual member of the House that a canal should even be mentioned or the possibility of its existence mooted in connection with this bill. Yet we have heard member after member from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba dealing with the Georgian bay canal and telling us how much the freight rates were going to be reduced.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to leave on the House an impression which possibly is not accurate. I do not think that any member from Alberta has supported the idea of building this canal.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The mistake, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely mine. Possibly the members from Alberta belong to one of the cleverest sections of the House, and they are not prone to errors of that kind. Certainly, however, members from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario who have been discussing this canal have suggested that as a result of its construction wheat would be moved at a cheaper rate, and they have also seen the vessels navigating this imaginary canal in less time and at less cost than other transportation lines operate. There are canals in Mars, so they tell us, and there are more chances of these members from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario sailing on those Martian water-ways than on the Sifton canal which they have been talking about. I therefore object to this legislation being promoted in this House on the basis of the canal to be constructed. There is of course, in the bill not one word that has obviously to do with electrical energy, but that is the whole object of the bill. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) said, "Oh, well, this bill has been renewed from year to year fourteen times. Is it not very strange that those opposing it so very vigorously now should not have opposed its last renewal?" Here again I for one have to make a confession, which is something I do not like to do. This bill absolutely fooled me. I thought, when it came before the House in 1924, that it was really intended to build a canal, or that at any rate somebody was lingeringly thinking of a canal. I do not believe there was any such object in view at that time, and I am the more confirmed in this opinion by the fact that the bill of 1924 contained a saving clause which protected the rights of the country. That clause is omitted from the bill now before us, and that omission leaves the bill absolutely one of power and not one that aims at the construction of a canal. That saving clause, which was enough to disarm anyone, provided that the government of Canada could, on one week's notice, take over the whole enterprise, assume possession of it, enjoy its property, and this by paying merely the value thereof. That clause, I find, is left out of this bill and the omission, I maintain, has made the power feature the only object of this legislation. If the promoters of the bill spend $50,000 they have nine years in which to lay hold of and control every horsepower of electrical energy that can be developed upon the Ottawa and French rivers, provided always that the provinces have not exclusive jurisdiction. The gist of the bill—and no one can deny it—is that the expenditure of $50,000 gives to these private interests, so far as the government of Canada is concerned, the right to develop all the power they possibly can in the nine years, to the whole extent of the 1,000,000 horse-power. Then what happens? The husk of the charter in the shape of the canal proposal falls away, and these interests are absolutely confirmed by our legislation in the sole control and ownership of that immense value in electrical energy. When we find a bill involving such consequences inimical to the interests of the country, it is our duty to administer a reproof to those who promote such a bill. It is our duty to defeat it rather than aid its progress through this House.

While I do not like even to mention the word canal as a possibility in connection with this legislation, I would point out that in 1914 there was appointed by the government a commission consisting of Mr. W. Sanford Evans and two other gentlemen to investigate the practicability of the whole Georgian bay canal project. That commission reported. I know very well the gentleman who acted as its chairman, a man who lives and has lived for a number of years in the west, who understands the wheat trade probably as well as any man in Canada and who is familiar with the transportation problems that face that trade. The report was made by the commission to the effect that this canal was not feasible and would never be an advantage to the farmers in the way anticipated by Sir Robert Perks and those who advocated the canal. It was further reported that nothing could be gained by a canal of this description even if it could be built, and the whole thing passed out of the picture. No reference has been made to that report by anyone now pretending to be interested in the canal. The minister did not refer to it when he spoke the other evening, and no member of the government, not one of the promoting party, has seen fit to controvert or even to mention the report of that commission. I say, therefore, that so long as that report stands unanswered, the possibilty of this canal becomes even more remote than it was before. And that is so far off that its distance would have to be measured, as great distances are measured, by so many light years—again reaching the regions beyond Mars.

Some of us were quite interested in what was said by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) the other evening. He has been criticized by the Toronto Globe, which as every one knows is not a paper which as a rule supports the Conservative party, for having played small politics in his address to the House, and I think he left a false impression upon the House which I hope to be able to correct. The lease entered into in 1921 was referred to and condemned, and I want to draw attention to the fact that after condemning the 1921 lease and after condemning in perhaps stronger terms the 1926 lease he told us that the government of which he is a member renewed that 1921 lease for five months, and it is in existence to-day. If that lease was improper, which was the impression given, then it was the duty of this government and of the minister who claims it was improper to cancel it at the first opportunity; that was not done and it is in existence at this very moment. This fact, it seems to me, robs the attack of the Minister of Railways of much of its sting. He went on further to say that the lease entered into in 1926 was ill-timed; why? Because it was negotiated about three months in advance of the time when the existing lease fell in. The minister left the impression that this was done because of the near election. The lease expired on December 1, the men concerned in that lease are at least business men, and three months was all too short a time in which to make arrangements to prevent cutting off the consumers of power in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. But the minister said also that the lease of 1926 contained a clause which meant that $600,000 of the money of the people of Canada was given up for the benefit of the lessees. What does that mean? The lease runs for eighty years, which means about $7,500 a year and if the minister examines the matter he will find the reduction in the price of power was made in consideration of the term of the lease. The first lease was for five years and the second for eighty years, and a reduction was demanded and given to the consumers to the amount of $7,500 a year. The consumers got the benefit of it, but the impression left with the House was that the lessees really benefited.

In the next place the minister made a great play out of the alleged fact that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec were each to receive one-third of the rental, in case the rental was reduced. To put it more clearly, it will be remembered that there are two disputed claims to the power; the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have their rights and this Dominion is asserting its right. It is claimed that all the power belongs to the provinces but the Dominion has made an agreement whereby the rental is paid to it, and this clause which the minister attacked merely provided that in case Ontario and Quebec established their rights and exacted payment of the rental to them, by so much as the rental had to be paid to the provinces—the Dominion would abate. That is only fair; if it turned out that the provinces were by law entitled to collect the rent, the Dominion would have to be satisfied with that condition. There is no complaint that the provinces are not parties to this lease; it would not be artistic draftsmanship or conveyancing if they were parties to it. They make their separate arrangements and the Dominion makes its arrangement, but at the time these leases were entered into the provinces were consulted, and my information is that on the last occasion, in August of 1926, both the provinces of Ontario and Quebec were satisfied with and desired the lease which was entered into. The minister said, "Oh, a lease of this valuable property was given for eighty years, until the year 2006." That is only about twice as long as this charter has kicked around this House and further, if the principle of this bill is adopted on second reading it is not only giving away 300,000 horse-power until 2006, but it is giving away 1,000,000 horse-power to the Sifton interests forever. That, it seems, is what the minister advocates. The principle of this bill now before us gives the power to be developed under it, so far as the Dominion has the right to do so, to these interests forever; whatever is in their hands at the end of nine years belongs absolutely and forever to the promoters of this bill. When the matter is looked at in that way I think it will be seen that instead of an improvident lease having been made, those who acted with the consent and approval of the provinces were acting in the interests of the Dominion of Canada as well. If there is a disputed title; if the provinces claim all and that claim is sustained, in any case the Dominion of Canada will have a one-third interest. It may very well be that the courts and the Privy Council, if it goes that far, will decide the proportions should be different, but I fail to see how it can be proved that the provinces are not entitled to at least two-thirds of the water-power developed by what has been already held to be their water. Therefore it seems to me that the care taken by those acting at the time in the right of the Dominion of Canada has been absolutely justified by the results.

What happens now? We have the contract which was made by the Conservative government approved by the Liberal government; we have this question of power, with its uncertainty as to title and right; we have the government of the day saying, through the Minister of Railways, that this matter must be brought to the attention of parliament. It is now before parliament; it is certainly within the power of the government to investigate anything that may be in any shape or form supposed to be not in accordance with the very right and justice of the case nor in the interests of the country. But what has not been done, and I submit should not be done, is to investigate, as the Minister of Railways has proposed, a question of this kind upon a reference to a standing committee in the case of a private bill. The promoter of a private bill is supposed to look after the passage of that bill, is he not? Why does the Minister of Railways wish to investigate public matters upon a private bill that has no reference on its face to the subject of the investigation? I submit that the reference would not be wide enough to include any such subject as the minister hinted he was anxious to investigate. The minister said that the matter only became of great national and provincial importance when it was found that this lease, the latter one, had been cancelled by the government. I submit that plainly that is not the reason why such newspapers, flaming evangels of the Liberal cause, as the Ottawa Citizen, the Toronto Globe, and the Brantford Expositor are telling this government that at the first opportunity this bill should be thrown out of the House. And newspapers in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, as well as in all parts of Canada, have said that this bill should be given no consideration whatever. I cannot understand how anyone living in the province of Ontario who has been accustomed to hear what is said by men who have benefited from the development of hydro-electric power in the province could imagine for a moment that the people of that province would brook any interference at the present time with what they consider their rights to power and the further development of power. There is no county in the province of Ontario except possibly, and only possibly, the two very far eastern counties, and I would not even except them, where anyone can stand up and say that he is opposed to what has been accomplished by the province of Ontario in the development of hydro-electric power. They want to see that good work go on, they are determined that it shall go on; and no question of party politics, no public issue that I know of, no other issue of any kind, ranks in importance with the determination of the people that hands shall be kept off the development of power in the public interest. That is the reason for my opposition to this bill.

I object to the bill in the first place, because it is false and misleading in character as I have explained. I object to it in the second place because it is against the interests of the Dominion of Canada so far as the federal authority has the right to deal with this power. I object to it in the third place because if the Dominion does insist that it has a claim to this power, it will mean that litigation will take place, time will be consumed, and money will be expended and I believe not to the benefit of the people. I object to giving this bill a second reading also because the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as I have said, are united in opposing it. I am told that Premier Taschereau of Quebec has intimated to-day that he stands wholeheartedly with the premier of the province of Ontario against this legislation. If that is the case, and the government can easily ascertain the fact, why should it not respect the will of the people? How often have we heard declarations from hon. gentlemen opposite that the will of the people ought to be allowed to take effect. I say that the overwhelming will of the people is against this bill, is against giving it a second reading.

In conclusion I want merely to read a short extract from the Toronto Globe of to-day, to the following effect:

> But does the Georgian Bay Company think for one moment that members of the Canadian parliament are so stupid as to be misled by the stress placed on the canal feature of the charter? Does it not realize that everyone knows that no corporation will sink millions of dollars in an enterprise which, on the face of it, cannot be a financial success? So why does it not come out in the open and say that it wants the people's power rights, which would make the charter worth hundreds of millions of dollars, and without which the charter would be useless?
> The people know this, the members of parliament know it, the ministry knows it. The question is not whether the Sifton interests shall get authority to build a canal, but whether they shall get the power; and on this there can be no compromise. They cannot get this power unless the government throws the weight of its votes and influence with them. Does the government dare do it? Will Mr. King risk the honour of the Liberal party and the political life of his Ontario ministers and members by thwarting the expressed wish of the people of this province? Would his chief cabinet minister, the Minister of Finance, who has rightly earned the confidence of the country for honesty and rectitude, permit the heritage of the provinces to be diverted to private interests? Would any cabinet minister at Ottawa tolerate such an abuse of public rights?
> The day has passed when the people's interests can be disregarded with impunity. The sooner the federal government lets the electors know that it realizes this, the sooner will it clear itself of the suspicion which now hangs over it in the matter of a great public utility franchise.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I presume there is very little I can add to the discussion which has already taken place on this bill, but I fear, Sir, I would be negligent in my duty as a member of this House and I would not be true to the responsibility I owe to my constituents did I not place myself on record as being opposed to the measure that we are now considering. I have frequently during this debate heard arguments from across the way that, whether we are in favour of the bill or not, no harm could come by sending it to a committee, that we should at least be fair and permit the bill to go to a committee and there hear all the arguments for and against it. It seems to me a rather ridiculous thing that if we are opposed to the very principle of the bill, if we are opposed to the very principles of granting water-powers to private interests, we should provide a means of taking up the time of members by sending the bill to a committee. I can hardly conceive of any member who really objects to that principle being in favour of taking that course. To my mind if one objects to that principle now is the proper time to raise the objection. Therefore I cannot understand the argument or the line of talk we have heard so much in this debate to the effect that whether we are in favour of the bill or not we should at least permit it to go to committee.

Now, Sir, my reasons for opposing this bill are, in the first place, because the water-power will be required by the people of Ontario. Of course it can be said, and it has been said in this debate, that whether these water-powers be developed by the Ontario Hydro Electric, or whether they be developed by private interests, the people will have the use of the power just the same. But, Sir, there is a vast difference between a public utility owned and controlled by the people of the province of Ontario, and one in the hands of a group of capitalists who will make all the money out of it they possibly can, and assess industry, and assess the householders who are obliged to use the power, all the traffic will bear. The Ontario Hydro Electric Commission now control, I understand, about 900,000 horse-power, and they have an investment of $240,000,000. On this basis it is authoritatively estimated that the 1,250,000 horse-power that this bill would give to these private interests would be worth a capitalization of not less than half a billion dollars, an enormous sum. It is proposed to put into the hands of these private capitalists the power to assess the people of Ontario and Quebec for all time to come, and to hinder in various ways the development of industry in those provinces. Of course the argument is used that the Quebec share of this would, under the policy adopted by the provincial government, be handed over in any event to private interests. But that is not our concern; our business is to deal with this matter on our responsibility as the House of Commons of Canada. Once those water-powers are turned over to the provinces we have nothing more to say. If the Quebec government desires to turn those water-powers over to private rather than public interests, that is the business of the people of that province. On the other hand, if the Ontario government, representing the people of that province, desire that the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission should control this power, that is their business, and it is not for us to put anything in their way.

The Ontario legislative assembly has put itself on record unanimously as being opposed to this bill. Liberals, Conservatives and Progressives have joined to the last man in the Ontario legislature in opposing it. Ottawa is a city right on this wonderful waterway by which the enormous quantity of wheat we heard about was going to be transported to the Atlantic, a city, one would think, that would benefit greatly by the development of this canal. Yet we find the council of the city of Ottawa unanimously condemning this proposition and passing a resolution to that effect.

We have heard frequently during this debate that the western farmers are in favour of the construction of this canal. How often have we heard that old cry! Whenever some privileged interest wants something from this House, it is always for the benefit of the western farmer, and he is frequently invoked to support it. I would call on any of these hon. gentlemen who use that argument to show me a single instance, to quote a single statement by any one representing any body of farmers, or by any body of farmers in western Canada, showing that they have placed themselves on record as being in favour of the construction of this canal. The farmers of western Canada realize that we have already spent enormous sums of money on transportation. In addition to the already expensive canal system that we have from the head of the lakes to Montreal, we are now opening up the Hudson bay route. Some years ago we spent $170,000,000 on a transcontinental railway designed for the express purposes of giving the western farmers the shortest and best possible route by rail to the sea. But we are effectively prevented from using that route. So far as actual effect is concerned, the government of this country, or the Board of Railway Commissioners, or whoever is responsible, might just as well have built a brick wall across the transcontinental in order to prevent us from using it.

Nevertheless in spite of that we propose to spend an enormous sum of money in developing another route to the sea.

Of course we have heard frequently from protagonists of this bill that no public money is involved; that a group of private capitalists are going to construct this canal; that they are going to put up all the money. But it is really immaterial whether we provide the money out of the public treasury for the construction of this canal or give them water-powers worth half a billion dollars. I would much rather see a company come to parliament and ask for a subsidy to construct a waterway of that nature, because then we would know just what we were dealing with.

Of course, that is all on the assumption that there is going to be a canal. I think, however, it is generally understood that this is not the purpose of the promoters at all; that they will never construct a canal; the only object to be served is to obtain control of these valuable water-powers. I wonder if all hon. members realize the relationship that exists to-day between water-power and industry. I wonder if they realize the dominant position that in the future may be held by Canada in the markets of the world in regard to manufactured goods. In another twenty-five years, if we retain these water-powers and use them wisely and judiciously so that industry will be able to obtain the cheapest possible power, we are going to put our manufacturers in a position almost to control the markets of the world, because every day it is becoming more and more obvious that the country which a quarter of a century from now controls its own water-powers will hold a dominant position in the markets of the world in regard to manufactured products. Therefore, Canada's attainment of that proud position in another twenty-five years will be determined by whether or not we decide to conserve and hold these water-powers for the benefit of future generations. We are legislating to-day not for those who are here at present, but for countless millions of Canadians yet unborn, Canadians who will look back and either condemn or bless us according to the way in which we handle this great heritage that should be preserved for our children and our children's children.

Several hon. members from Manitoba have placed themselves very strongly on record as being in favour of this bill. Of course that is not a difficult matter to explain when one goes back to western Canada. It can be said that after all we were dealing with something that was an issue in Ontario. It would not be an important matter to tell my constituents that we gave away water-powers in that way in Ontario. The issue would not be a direct one there; but to be fair and to look at this question from a natural standpoint, I would ask some of these hon. gentlemen from Manitoba to change the geographical description in this bill and to make it apply to the northern part of their province. Let us imagine to-night that we are considering a bill which proposes to canalize the Nelson river to its mouth. That ambitious project was at one time actually discussed and very seriously considered in the city of Winnipeg. The idea was to make Winnipeg an ocean port, and it was believed that the water-power that was on that great river would more than pay for the expense of canalization; that Winnipeg would then be an ocean port, and that we could deliver our grain from the city of Winnipeg by water right to the open sea. That was the ambitious project that was considered about forty or forty-five years ago in the city of Winnipeg. After all it is not such a dream and indeed some time in the future it may come true. Engineers sent out there by the Dominion government have estimated that there is no less than 6,000,000 horse-power capable of being developed on the Nelson river. That river, as we know, is one of the greatest in the world, and its vast potentialities to the province of Manitoba can hardly yet be estimated, but some day in the future that water-power will be harnessed, and it will be developing countless industries in the province of Manitoba. It will be delivering power to the farmers of the province and to the householders in the small towns, and it will put the province of Manitoba in an entirely different position from what it occupies to-day in regard both to industry and agriculture. Indeed, I think the time will come, and perhaps before very long, when the city of Winnipeg will be one of the greatest manufacturing centres on the North American continent. That seems a dream to-day, but with these immense water-powers right at her door, and with the newer transmission developments that enable the movement of power over long distances without serious loss, it seems to me that the day will come, and before very long, when the city of Winnipeg will be one of the greatest manufacturing centres on this continent. When we come to the day when we shall need all these water-powers developed, if they have been already coralled by private capitalists, who will simply charge all the traffic will bear, what is that going to mean to the province of Manitoba? We are either going to develop enormous industries there, or with these water-powers in the hands of private capital industry will be stifled from the very beginning. I would appeal to my hon. friends from Manitoba just to visualize the effect of this bill as applied to their own province, as applied to those enormous water-powers on the Nelson and Winnipeg rivers, and let them imagine for one moment the wave of popular indignation that would sweep not only over the province of Manitoba but over the whole of the west if there was any attempt on the part of this parliament to alienate those resources for all time to come. I ask my hon. friends to take that into consideration before they vote to send this bill to the committee.

I say again that I am opposed to the very principle of this bill, and that being so, I can see nothing to be gained from sending it to the committee. Therefore I intend to vote against it.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): As it is just approaching nine o'clock—

Mr. STEVENS: I rise just to ask Your Honour one question. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) is the mover of the main motion, and would naturally have the right to close the debate. I want to ask Your Honour, is he exercising that right now?

Mr. CASGRAIN: He has the right to speak. There is an amendment before the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is entitled to speak on the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: And again in closing the debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not objecting at all. I merely rose to ask Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is now before the House the main motion and the amendment thereto, and as I understand the rules, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to speak upon the amendment, and again upon the main motion. As it is now approaching nine o'clock, and as my remarks will be rather extended, I should be glad, Mr. Speaker, if you would call it nine o'clock and adjourn the debate until Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Chevrier moves that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried, by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 66, to incorporate Gatineau Transmission Company.—Mr. Fontaine.

Bill No. 69, respecting Dominion Electric Protection Company.—Mr. Marcil.

Bill No. 106, to incorporate The Premier Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Smith (Stormont).

Bill No. 107, respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Cahan.

Mr. SPEAKER: In order to meet the wishes of many hon. members and to save time I will, if there is no objection, just read the numbers of these two pages of divorce bills, which can be given a second reading en bloc, on division, of course. They are Nos. 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104. It is moved by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman), seconded by the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Simpson), that these bills be now read a second time. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On division.

Bill No. 81, for the relief of Amy Humphrey Lowe.—Mr. Rennie.

Bill No. 82, for the relief of Erik Herman Delling.—Mr. Young (Toronto).

Bill No. 83, for the relief of Samuel Stanley McNeely.—Mr. Lang.

Bill No. 84, for the relief of Edna May Stevens.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 85, for the relief of Beatrice Maude Cammell.—Mr. Ryerson.

Bill No. 86, for the relief of Stanley Moorhouse.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 87, for the relief of Blanche Evelyn Parkinson.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 88, for the relief of Lillian Franklin Boddy.—Mr. Stinson.

Bill No. 89, for the relief of Ninna Louise Bryant.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 90, for the relief of John Thomas Fray.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 91, for the relief of Cornelia Mosca Cristoforetti.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto).

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Florence Emaline Hind.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 93, for the relief of Dorothy Helen Elliott.—Mr. Church.

Bill No. 94, for the relief of Myrtle Blanche Weeks.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 95, for the relief of Dorothy Olinda Tew Phillips Lawson.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 96, for the relief of Nelson Douglas Longfield.—Mr. Preston.

Bill No. 97, for the relief of Susanah Ivy Y. Cave.—Mr. Harris.

Bill No. 98, for the relief of James Arthur McNish.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 99, for the relief of Elizabeth Maud Maitland.—Mr. Hepburn.

Bill No. 100, for the relief of Agnes Seeds. —Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 101, for the relief of James Sharkey. —Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 102, for the relief of Lawrence Raymond Sinclair, otherwise known as Lawrence Reginald Sinclair.—Mr. McPhee.

Bill No. 103, for the relief of Ruby Pearl Northam.—Mr. Young (Toronto).

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Leila Beecher Smith Kerman.—Mr. Young (Toronto).

Bill No. 110, to incorporate the president of the Lethbridge stake.—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 112, respecting the Bronson Company.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 116, to incorporate "La Congrégation de Saint Dominique du Tiers-Orde enseignant."—Mr. Raymond.

Bill No. 120, respecting Joliette and Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Denis (Joliette).

Bill No. 143, to amend an act respecting the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson's Bay Railway.—Mr. Thorson.

Bill No. 144, respecting the Midland Railway Company of Manitoba.—Mr. Thorson.

Bill No. 145, to incorporate Thousand Islands International Bridge Corporation.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 153, respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

JOHN E. RUSSELL COMPANY, LIMITED PATENT

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 117, respecting a patent owned by the John E. Russell Company, Limited.—Mr. Chevrier.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I shall have something to say on this patent bill, Mr. Speaker.

Bill stands.

JAMES MCCUTCHEON COLEMAN PATENTS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 118, respecting certain patents of James McCutcheon Coleman. —Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. STEVENS: This is another patent bill, Mr. Speaker, on which I shall have something to say.

Bill stands.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CHESTER EARL GREY AND AAGE JENSEN PATENT

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 148, an act respecting a certain patent owned by Chester Earl Grey and Aage Jensen.—Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is this bill opposed?

Mr. STEVENS: On this patent bill also, Mr. Speaker, I shall have some remarks to make.

Bill stands.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration in committee of the report of the committee on rules—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering the new rule to be added after rule 21, limiting speeches to forty minutes. Mr. Neill had moved to add to this rule the words, "except on a budget debate". Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. NEILL: Might I take this opportunity to correct a slight misunderstanding that occurred this afternoon between myself and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards)? He asked me if I could think of a situation where there would be a province with only one representative, and I did not catch his question. I was referring to a case where there might be sixteen members from a province, fifteen of one particular stripe of politics and the other of the opposite stripe, that the party to which the fifteen adhered might bring in something prejudicially affecting the interests of the province, and that the duty of combating the proposal would devolve on that one representative. I was not referring to a case like the Yukon.

In defence of the proposed new rule an hon. member explained this afternoon that there were no less than sixteen opportunities to speak on the budget. If you multiply sixteen by forty you get a total of ten hours and forty minutes, if a member took advantage of his opportunity. Where is the saving of time? In the one case he makes sixteen speeches consuming ten hours and forty minutes, but in the other case his physical limitations would stop him long before he had spoken for that length of time. If it will not make any difference, why pass the rule?

Mr. MARCIL: A money bill cannot be passed two stages at the same sitting without unanimous consent. So at one sitting a member could speak forty minutes and repeat his performance the day after until the bill was disposed of. Consequently I do not think we are curtailing a member's right in any way. This simply means that he cannot speak for more than forty minutes at a time.

Mr. NEILL: I appreciate the point made by the hon. gentleman, but dividing a speech into sixteen sections seems to me something like dividing your prayers into sixteen portions. It has been suggested that this new rule will shorten debate and stop obstruction. Will it? We have an instance at the present time in the opposition to the Georgian bay canal bill. I do not think I can be accused of imputing improper motives by terming the opposition "obstruction", because the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) said more than once in the course of his speech against the bill: "I am here to talk it out."

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did you ever do that?

Mr. NEILL: Sure—when I thought the occasion justified it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is what we are doing in this case.

Mr. NEILL: I am not objecting to hon. members opposite taking advantage of the rules; that is their privilege. But supposing the speeches had been confined to forty minutes—and most of them were made within this time—it would not have prevented obstruction. It would only mean putting up more men each to talk forty minutes instead of a few occupying the attention of the House for a hundred minutes each. It would be something like the Irishman who pondered whether he would save a million dollars in one year or accomplish the same purpose by saving one dollar a year for a million years.

I heartily agree with the remarks made by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) when he put his finger on the cause of a good deal of waste of time in connection with the estimates. I have noticed exactly what the hon. gentleman has described. A minister will patiently explain an item half a dozen times, and then someone who has not taken the trouble to be in his seat saunters in and starts the thing all over again. If the minister, somewhat harrassed, answers sharply, that member immediately begins to whine and complain how difficult it is to get a civil answer to a civil question. There are other difficulties. A member speaks for a minute or two and sits down and someone else jumps up and discusses a totally different phase of the subject. More time is wasted in that way in committee than in reasonably lengthy speeches.

As regards the forty minute proposition, as the hon. member for Lisgar pointed out, no allowance is made for interruptions. Give a man a couple of untenable points of order and a couple of irrelevant questions that throw him off the track and you waste so much of his time that his speech will not amount to very much. It may be said that allowance will be made for this, but it is not expressed in the rules. If it were, matters would be different. A man might raise a point of order on very slim grounds and so take up a good deal of the time of the member speaking. Someone might see a fancied insinuation in the speaker's remarks and raise a point which might consume fifteen minutes. Someone else asks a fool question that takes up ten minutes or more. It may be contended, of course, that no one is bound to answer; but there are circumstances under which a man is bound to do so if he does not want to rest under an undeserved odium. Suppose a member were advocating a certain railway line and someone asked, "Is it not a fact that you are being paid by the railway company to promote this bill?" Can that member allow such a question to pass unheeded? Of course not; if he did the newspapers next day would come out with a headline, "Member accused of being paid servant of company and sits dumb under accusation". There are occasions, I say, on which a man, either through courtesy or of necessity, must reply to interruptions. Allow four such interruptions as I have suggested—and there is nothing abnormal about the suggestion, for these interruptions do occur—and how much of the forty minutes has he left?

The closure has been advocated, and it is said that is even a more extreme form of preventing debate. But there is this difference between the closure and the method proposed in this rule: the restriction of free speech by means of curtailing the time allotted to any member is imposed automatically by this rule, whereas in the case of closure notice must be given by the government, who must assume the responsibility before the country. If the government abuse the closure method, they must answer to the people. There is therefore no danger in that direction. As a matter of fact there is no record in any of the countries in which the closure is practised of this method having been seriously abused, and that for the very reason I mention, of the responsibility which the government assumes in imposing it. This little private rule of ours, however, would be invoked automatically without any responsibility on the part of the government or of any member of the government.

I come now to another point of interest apropos of the situation. Let me ask hon. members from the maritime provinces what they consider the most important piece of legislation before parliament this session. Is it not the matters involved in the Duncan report? Would those hon. gentlemen like this resolution to come into force at once, every one of them being limited to a forty minute speech on that important report? That, I think, is a good illustration of the danger I am pointing out in connection with a rule of this kind.

Mr. MacLAREN: We will accept these regulations in toto to-night.

Mr. NEILL: Is the hon. gentleman willing to accept them?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Does my hon. friend speak for the whole party?

Mr. MacLAREN: I was not asked to speak for the party. The hon. member wondered whether anyone from the maritime provinces would be content to deal with the Duncan report under the forty minute limitation. My reply is, I am prepared to accept all these regulations in toto to-night.

Mr. NEILL: Then I apologize to the hon. gentleman. I gave him credit for more devotion to his province than he appears to have.

Mr. MacLAREN: The case of my province is so clear that I can state it in fifteen minutes.

Mr. NEILL: I foresee another result which will follow from this rule. The rule will lead to speeches being written out and rattled off as speedily as possible, and in this I anticipate a great advantage to the hon. member for Fort William. Why should that hon. member be given an advantage over all the rest of us? It is to handicap those less ably endowed than he, and it is not fair. There should be some sort of handicap imposed upon him. Again, Mr. Chairman, it is a notorious fact that the best speeches are not those that have been written out and that are read off. Most of the best speeches are delivered from notes, or without any such help at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And they are not the longest, either.

Mr. NEILL: They are often not as long as the others. Now, how are we to ascertain how long any given speech must be in order to come within the compass of the time allowed? The only way that can possibly be determined is for the member to have his speech typewritten and then read off to someone who holds a stop-watch to time him. Will the stenographic staff be equipped with stop-watches, and shall we be obliged to read our speeches to the stenographers in order to ascertain whether they can be crammed into thirty-nine or forty minutes? And will there be any extra compensation to the staff for the added work in this direction? Why, Mr. Chairman, the result will be simply this: either this rule will be abused or it will be ignored altogether. I do not know what will happen, but either of these things will be the result. The chances are that as time goes on the rule will be practically ignored, and if that is the case, what is the use of adopting it. At any rate, I predict one or other of these consequences. An hon. member reminds me that my time is nearly up. Well, for once in my life let me exceed the time limit.

I am perfectly serious about this subject, notwithstanding that it has its humorous aspect. There will be a reaction in the country to the imposition of such a rule as this. The people will have a feeling something of this character: "We sent these men to Ottawa to represent us and express our views. We paid them to go there and speak for us"—because after all, to put it bluntly, we are paid to come here—"and now they are shirking their responsibility." That is not true, I know, but that is what the people will fancy. I say, there will be a reaction to this rule and we shall be suspected of shirking our responsibility.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the hon. member assume that members who do not speak forty minutes necessarily shirk their responsibility?

Mr. NEILL: No, perhaps they serve their purpose by listening. As Milton says, "They also serve who only stand and wait." I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we could better deal with the problem by an appeal to our dignity, to our esprit de corps. I have not the resolution before me, but it is in my recollection that years ago a motion was passed in this House with reference to lengthy speeches containing voluminous quotations and involving a waste of time. This practice was deplored and the resolution went on to recommend to members that they abstain from the propensity to being so long-winded. It did have the desired effect on those members to whom it was addressed and who have since ceased to belong to the House. I suggest an appeal to the common sense and the sense of dignity of the House. Let hon. gentlemen try to cut down the length of their speeches. An appeal of that sort, I am sure, would be more effective than any hard and fast rule such as is now proposed. What we should be guided by in this connection is what has characterized the British constitution, which is founded almost entirely upon precedent rather than upon the letter of any rule—precedent broadening down to precedent. The statement was made not long ago that if we endeavoured to put into legal language the bonds that bind the dominions of the empire together, it would be exceedingly difficult to secure unity. That is true, and we should try to keep it in mind. We are trying to make hard and fast rules when it would be better to leave it to the good sense and judgment of the members of the House. Are we going to accuse ourselves of being lacking in good sense, good taste and good judgment? The amendment I have proposed is very simple; if I might explain it, it is intended to allow members to speak as long as they think necessary on only one occasion during the course of each session; that is, on the budget. The budget covers a large number of subjects, and I do not think the dignity of parliament will be at all endangered if once in the course of each session a member is allowed to speak as long as he wishes. If we find that this still materially handicaps parliament we can change it another year, but I would suggest that we are passing a lot of very drastic rules to-day some of which we do not understand and will not appreciate until later on, and I think we are going too far altogether when we limit the right of free speech.

Mr. MANION: I am going to take the liberty for a few moments of giving the reasons why I range myself in this matter beside the Minister of Justice and others who served on the committee in favour of forty minute speeches. It is not, as my hon. friend has said, because I ordinarily speak so rapidly, but because I believe it would enhance the value of our debates if they were boiled down. Someone has well said, and it has often been repeated, that brevity is the soul of wit, and I do think that most of our speeches would be improved by being shortened and by doing away with a lot of these excrescences of which we are all guilty at times, particularly if we have not given proper time to the preparation of our remarks.

This afternoon as I listened to the debate without participating in it, I remembered having read some years ago a book by Lord Curzon on parliamentary eloquence, which I have since looked up to check my memory. In that book the author discussed eloquence from the speeches of the different speakers he had heard and some which he had just read, and he gave as one of the three greatest masterpieces of English eloquence the Gettysburg speech by Lincoln, which has been quoted again and again as perhaps the greatest masterpiece of eloquence in the English language. Some years ago I timed myself in reading that speech, and I find that it takes about a minute and a half to read it all.

Mr. NEILL: But we are not all Lincolns.

Mr. MANION: No, we are not, but I do not know that my hon. friend had to say that. I remember that the author quoted at the same time what he considered the three great masterpieces of literature, two of them speeches by Lincoln and one a speech by William Pitt. The second speech by Lincoln was his second inaugural address, which was very brief, while the masterpiece by William Pitt consisted of only three lines. When great master pieces of eloquence can be made in such a brief time, it seems to me that forty minutes should be long enough for those of us who, like my good friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) are not Lincolns. We should be happy to take less than forty minutes even, and so boil down our addresses. It seems to me that we might even go further in this resolution, and put some time limit on the debates. When we take a month or six weeks, as has been the case in a number of the eleven sessions I have been in the House, in debating either the speech from the throne or the budget, I think we are taking altogether too much time; I think we might well make the limit a week or ten days in a dress debate of any kind. However, that is not before us at present, and I do not intend to press it, but I think everyone who has been in this House for several sessions will agree that on those occasions when the closure has been put in force and speeches have been limited to twenty minutes, we have heard addresses of the very best type, cut down to that length of time.

Since my good friend from Comox-Alberni took me into account, Mr. Chairman, I just wished to place myself on record as against his amendment and as favourable to the report of the committee, because I think if we can lessen the length of our speeches, cut down the duration of the sessions and make the sacrifices of public men a little less than they are at present, we will build up the whole character of our parliamentary institutions.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I was very much disposed to oppose the adoption of this rule, but felt that it would be useless to do so after the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) spoke in opposition to it, because in opposing it he has given a very good demonstration of why it should be adopted. It took the hon. gentleman twenty-five minutes to express his views in respect to this question, and I can understand why he particularly does not want any limit placed on the budget debate. If it takes him twenty-five minutes on a little rule like this it would take him about twenty-five weeks to express his views on a subject like the budget. The hon. gentleman suggested that this limit should not apply to the budget debate and as I understood him his reason was that he is in a class by himself from the province of British Columbia, so far as the budget is concerned. He therefore thinks that he in particular should have a little more latitude than other people.

Mr. MANION: It is twelve to one.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes. Well, if you apply that principle, and accept the argument that these various groups should be recognized, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be able to speak on the budget as long as he pleased, because he is the only one from British Columbia holding the peculiar views to which he subscribes. The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) should then have unlimited time also, because she represents all the women in the Dominion of Canada.

I was rather struck with the argument of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who argued strongly against this forty minute rule. The way he would handle the matter is this: He would refer it to the whips and let them limit the time and make a selection of the men who should speak. That is nothing but the application of closure through the medium of the whips, and I object most strongly to it. I presume the reason why exception is made in the case of the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition, a minister moving a government order, a member speaking immediately in reply to such minister, a member making a motion of no confidence in the government and a minister replying thereto is because, in the case of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition and other ministers, of their lack of experience in public speaking; they possibly need a little more time than others in which to express their views. If that is not the reason I do not know what it can be unless it is that the matter is of so much importance that they should have special regulations.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni argued that this rule should not apply to the budget debate, but might I point out in opposition to that suggestion that if an exception is made in that case certainly other matters will come up of even greater importance than the budget. I venture to say that many hon. members of this House regard the Duncan report, for instance, as of greater importance so far as this session is concerned than the budget debate, and why we should make an exception in the case of the budget and not in other matters I cannot possibly understand. What I particularly wish to say is this: If an exception is made to this rule in regard to the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition and certain other members mentioned, although I am not prepared to agree that an exception should be made, then it does seem to me that the exception should be carried a little further in order to apply to any member who introduces a resolution; such a member should have a little more than forty minutes in which to lay his case before parliament. On the order paper this session, for instance, there are a number of motions standing in the names of different hon. gentlemen, many of which are of great importance. I can readily understand why it might be somewhat difficult for a member introducing one of these subjects to cover the ground as it should be covered in the space of forty minutes. I am not arguing against the rule of forty minutes if it is applied all round, but I do say that there are subjects on the order paper before us which would indicate to me that private members under certain circumstances, should be exempted from the application of this rule just as much as these who are especially named for exemption. I believe the idea of cutting down or limiting the length of speeches is a very good one, and I take no particular exception to it, but I think it should be applied all round and made applicable to every member, ministers as well as others.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I disagree most heartily with the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and to oppose the amendment which he has submitted to the House. We have heard the honest expression by His Honour the Speaker this afternoon that the very best speeches delivered in this chamber were only of twenty minutes duration and given under the closure. I think we should attach a good deal of importance to a statement such as that coming from the gentleman who presides over the deliberations of this chamber, and who was the chairman of the committee that revised these rules. In the past the practice has been to talk for an indefinite period. Those of us who have been in the House for the past few years have listened sometimes to speeches which occupied two hours, even three hours, and I recall an instance of a private member speaking for three hours and forty minutes. It is quite true that member did not stay within the borders of his own province nor within the confines of the Dominion itself; in fact I think he girdled the earth from east to west. In several instances I doubt very much if it was possible to follow him in all the remarks that he made.

Now the amendment as proposed by the committee is to limit speeches to forty minutes. I think the amendment does not go quite far enough. If the best speeches that have been delivered in this House only occupied twenty minutes why should we extend the time to forty minutes? Personally I would favour cutting it down to thirty minutes. I think any person who has little or much to say, and who has his subject well in hand, should be able to present his ideas in thirty minutes. Perhaps the most of us attend church service occasionally, and if the preacher were to occupy more than thirty minutes in the delivery of his sermon we would be very much dissatisfied. As a matter of fact if a preacher extends his sermon beyond half an hour he finds his congregation getting up and walking out, indicating that he takes too long. Now I rather think that the thoughts to which a preacher gives expression are just as good and just as necessary as the ideas advanced by a lot of members of this House—in fact they are more necessary.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does the hon. member advocate applying the rule of closure to ministers?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The closure is applied when members of the congregation get up and walk out.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is the very point of the discussion to-night.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Perhaps the most important speech delivered this session was the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, yet it took him only thirty-five minutes to deliver it. If the budget speech, covering taxation proposals for the whole Dominion, can be presented in that length of time, why should any mere member of parliament need more than even half an hour to present the needs of his constituency? It is true that any of us could take more than half an hour. A member could speak for an hour and a half and say no more than he could say in half an hour, but that is not a legitimate reason for insisting upon the longer period of time It would be a good deal better to have an expression of opinion by several members in the same space of time that such a speech occupies. In the case of the member who spoke for three hours and forty minutes a couple of years ago, if there had been a limit of half an hour we could have had seven speeches in that period of time. Surely in a budget debate it would be much more preferable to have the opinions of seven members from different portions of the country than simply to have the opinion of one individual delivered at such length. Therefore I would be very much opposed to the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I would prefer there should be a thirty minute maximum, but I presume the committee have considered the matter from all angles, and perhaps the limit fixed in the proposed rule is a compromise, although I do not know as to that. A forty minute limit is better than none at all, and certainly if you had such a limit it should apply to the budget debate in which there are speeches of such great length.

There is another matter in connection with the proposed rule as to which there should be an amendment. I do not know that it would be in order at the present moment, but possibly when the amendment we are considering is voted down, as I expect it will be, the amendment I have in mind would be in order. It is with reference to the position of those who are privileged to represent groups in the House. The proposed rule recognizes only the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, thus giving recognition to two groups merely. I would not go to the extent of saying that we should recognize every group here no matter what their numerical strength might be, but we should take some notice of existing conditions. It does seem to me that when opinions are expressed by the government side of the House, which is supposed to be low tariff, and then opinions are expressed by the opposition side, which is supposed to be high tariff, although we know there is not so very much difference between the two, then there should be an expression of opinion by the groups in this chamber which are independent of party politics. There should be an expression by one spokesman at least representing the independent groups. I think we will be well advised to make provision in the proposed new rule for an expression of opinion on behalf of the independent groups, that in that respect they should be placed on a parity with the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Personally I have no objection to limiting the time of speeches, but there may possibly be occasions when a man would need a longer period than forty minutes. I am inclined to think that a rule of this kind is rather an advantage, but I would agree very largely with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in objecting to the exceptions that we have here. The proposed rule states that the leader of the opposition may have longer than forty minutes, and furthermore that the man who immediately follows the minister may have longer than forty minutes. Now as matters are arranged in this House the man that follows the minister is usually a member of the official opposition. That is not a fixed, written rule, but it is more or less a practice of the House, so that it means that almost invariably the official opposition, as it is known, has an opportunity of prolonging the speaking as long as may be necessary. That is a real discrimination against other sections of this House. We who belong to the smaller groups might very well make a plea for a little longer time proportionately than would in the ordinary way come to us. We recognize that there are certain territories, like the Yukon, or districts rather remote which, because of their peculiar character, because their population is scattered, find it necessary to have more than their proper proportion of representation. It would be quite possible for the opposition with its eighty or ninety members to say over and over again eighty or ninety times what its leader has said, whereas in the case of us who represent smaller groups, sometimes with only three or four in a group, we have only three or four men to express a viewpoint that may represent a considerable section of the public outside.

According to this rule there is an official recognition of the opposition, of parties in this House, and I do not think that is travelling along very good lines. If we are to have an exemption made in the case of the leader of the opposition, there ought also to be exemptions made in the case of representatives of other groups, and in saying that I do not forget that there are individuals like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who have an equal right, with even a small group, to represent in this House the particular point of view which they hold. Under these circumstances the only fair way would be to remove the exceptions. It may be said that because the Prime Minister or a minister introducing a government order is in an official position in the administration, an exception ought clearly to be made in his case. But that again is recognizing a wrong principle. It is very well for the government to have charge of the administration, but in matters of legislation the government already occupies too influential a position in this House. It is well known to hon. members that under existing practices it is almost impossible for a private member to introduce a bill with any hope that it will have an opportunity of coming before and being discussed by the House. On account of the regulations the bill goes down into an inferior position from which it rarely reappears. That is a wrong practice. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) to-night used the phrase "a mere member."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Private member

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not like the term "a mere private member." I take it that the mere private member who is elected to this House has just as much right to introduce legislation as the Prime Minister himself. I say that without reflecting in the slightest on the Prime Minister or the government. As we come up from our various constituencies we have all equal rights in this House, and no rule ought to be introduced which would discriminate against any one member simply because he does not choose to associate himself with one of the larger groups.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): How long would the hon. member expect the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, representing, as he does, only himself in this House, to speak?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not speaking for the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. COOTE: I think the House of Commons in this case is being compelled much against the wishes of many hon. members, to take some action to limit debate. No doubt the majority of the members would much prefer that each member should control himself and not make too long speeches in this House. If that were done we would not require any rule to curtail debate. It might be a good idea if we had a rule that when any hon. member had spoken for more than forty minutes, the Speaker would get up and read to him the resolution which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni quoted, and which was passed by the House some years ago protesting against long speeches. A few years ago I put on the order paper a proposal that we should have a time-keeper who would mark down the time occupied by every member speaking in this House or in committee of the whole, and that when a member had taken up say three hours in speeches during a session, his name should be handed to the Speaker and he should not be recognized by the Speaker if any other member wished to speak. This forty-minute rule is very drastic, but at the same time the House of Commons must adopt some measure of restriction of freedom of speech, because prior to this year we have had members who would speak for more than three hours. We have had leaders of the great parties in this House occupying as much as three hours. I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to the rule which is in force in the United States congress. It reads:

No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They hand in their speeches to be printed.

Mr. COOTE: Possibly if the committee had suggested one hour instead of forty minutes the recommendation would have been adopted almost unanimously by the House. I do not think there is any great virtue in the amendment proposed. Many members who might wish to speak more than forty minutes might not wish to speak on the budget at all; they might wish to use those forty or sixty minutes on some other matter. I think the exceptions should be stricken out of the proposed amended rule. I am sure if the Prime Minister, making a speech introducing some bill, had not finished in forty minutes, the House would not insist that he should sit down. But it looks bad on paper to set down such exceptions as are suggested in the amended rule. There are many members who object to this forty-minute rule who would seldom speak more than forty minutes, and if one hour were suggested instead of forty minutes I am sure that would meet with general approval.

Mr. KELLNER: A good deal of opposition seems to be developing over the privilege given to the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. KELLNER: My recollection of the opinion of the committee was that they did not necessarily mean the leader of the official opposition; that the matter might be one of arrangement between the various groups in this House, and that it might very easily be the leader of this group who was occupying that position.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): If you will grow in numbers it will be all right.

Mr. KELLNER: There have been times before when the privilege has been given to this group. We might trust to the verdict of the House; if the leader of this group required more than forty minutes, the House, I am sure, would readily grant permission. If my colleagues do not feel safe in allowing this forty-minute limit to pass, I shall be glad to support an amendment if they will introduce one, but I think we are amply protected under the rule as it stands at present.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Chairman, not being one of the hon. members of this House who have transgressed its rules perhaps as much as others have, because I believe the records of parliament will show that most of the members from the west irrespective of groups in this House have not abused their privileges with respect to consuming time in the debates of the last two sessions, I want to stand up in this House to-night and say that I am not very much in favour of this amended rule. If the amendment is accepted, it means that the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition, a minister moving a government order, and the member speaking in reply immediately after are made exceptions to the general rule limiting speeches to forty minutes. There is another exception made of a member who makes a motion of "no confidence" in the government. The only free lance in the whole House, therefore, if this amendment goes through, will be the member who gets up and moves a want of confidence motion in the government, and it is a good job that that freedom is not being taken away from the average member. I do not think I would be in favour of this amendment if you removed these exceptions. I do not think I would be in favour of it if you increased the time limit from forty to fifty minutes. I believe the extra ten minutes would make a great difference, however. I do not see how you can mathematically figure out a speech that will take just forty minutes to deliver. If you devote ten minutes to your introduction and ten minutes to your conclusion you have only twenty minutes left for your development—not really long enough—and then instead of having actual growth of thought upwards you would have just the opposite—an arbitrary development rendered incomplete and ineffective on account of the time restriction.

So far as the time limit is concerned, I do not think we ought to put any time limit on the average member. I think it is the number of speakers we have in this House rather than the length of speeches that runs away with the time of the House. I believe that we could develop enough coöperation between the different groups of this House so that, with a word from the Speaker we could confine our speeches to a definite length of time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is my opinion; hon. gentlemen can have theirs. Then there is the question of interruptions. I believe that an interruption is all right, but it should be made with the idea of getting information, and not simply to waste time or block the business of the House, which is the purpose of many interruptions. I do not believe we could have an up to date House of Commons unless we allowed interruptions and a certain amount of cross-firing. I believe that the present method of discussion and debate is the correct method, and if you simply have a member getting up and making a prepared speech, and no interruptions or questions are allowed, you will then have a dead House of Commons.

There is another idea, which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, though not in quite the same way in which I prefer looking at what I regard as this curtailment of free speech. We talk about representative government and democracy, but what are the facts? We have sent to this House 245 members, and from among those 245 members a cabinet, a committee of the House, is chosen. That committee of the House has the power to initiate legislation, and there is where its great power lies. It has the power to direct, to guide, but the development of the last century has brought about a situation where the cabinet—regardless of the party in power—our main committee of the House, instead of leading and guiding rationally, dominates, and I do not believe that any committee of the House should dominate. The big thing for us to do to-day is to preserve for the people of Canada responsible and representative government on the part of private members, and as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, I believe there will be a reaction in the country if we put this amendment through here to-night, and before a year goes by there will be a demand to have this new rule changed. Why proceed with something of such a temporary nature? Why accept an amendment which is not going to be permanent? If we are going to go on in that way, instead of having a white dial on the clock we shall need all the colours of the rainbow—green, blue, red and yellow—to tell us when to stop. The rights of a private member are to-day very largely limited. We are to a certain extent looked upon as ciphers in this parliament. We do not want that to go any further, and I am enough of a Liberal and a democrat to stand up here and say that I will not stand for it, and I am going to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would point out—

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment was declared lost.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You were reading the amendment, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for North Battleford was on his feet. Time after time I have heard the chairman declare an item of supply carried, and we have proceeded with perhaps two other items when some hon. member would revert to the item that had been declared carried, and the discussion would be re-opened. In this case the hon. member for North Battleford was on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN: In this case it is somewhat different. I called for the yeas and nays, and then declared the amendment lost.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was on my feet before you called for the yeas and nays, Mr. Chairman. I will leave it to the House.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot say whether my hon. friend was up or not. That does not affect my statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I saw the hon. gentleman rise before you put the question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am not blaming you, Mr. Chairman, for not seeing the hon. member, but I am glad that Mr. Speaker saw him on his feet. I am not going to take long at this time.

I would point out that this committee has already gone a long way, if these amendments go through, in restricting the time during which private members may speak. First, it is impossible to speak after eleven o'clock at night; second, it is impossible to speak on more than two committees; and third, there is a time limit on speeches of forty minutes. I have no complaint to make about that, because there is no principle involved. I am in favour of limiting speeches ordinarily to forty minutes, but I think after we have already made these three concessions, the House should be reasonable enough to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and give the members of the House the right to speak a little longer during one debate in the session.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot agree that what was done this afternoon was done at the expense of the rights of private members, as my hon. friend from North Battleford said. Quite the contrary. We have been told by members of the House that the government was putting itself at the mercy of private members by accepting the eleven o'clock adjournment. I am free to say, as I did this afternoon, that these rules have been adopted in a spirit of compromise, and personally I would be opposed to the eleven o'clock adjournment if this rule is not adopted also. The two must go together, or the two must fall together. I think it would be senseless to ask for any other solution of this difficulty. After all, the House has appointed a committee representing all parties and all groups in this House—

Mr. STEVENS: Twice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, twice, and we all regret that the work which had been so painstakingly and carefully done last year had to be left aside. This session it was the desire of everybody apparently that these rules should be adopted. We appointed another committee representative, as I said, of all sides. They considered the rules very carefully and this report is the result of their work. Compromises have been made. As I stated, there are some things in these rules that I do not like, but on the whole I think they are good rules and a great improvement on the old. I have been sitting in this House for twenty-three years and almost every session I have heard complaints that the rules ought to be amended, especially in regard to those two features—the duration of each day's sittings and the length of speeches, both having had the effect of prolonging sessions into the summer, to which everybody objected. I think we trust the judgment of the members of that committee. I heard even my good friend from Comox-Alberni, when he was complaining this afternoon with regard to another rule, state that the real business of the session is done in committees, and that very seldom is their work challenged or changed in the House. Surely he ought to be consistent and accept the work of this committee.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say that; someone else did.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment moved by Mr. Neill.

Amendment (Mr. Neill) negatived.

Mr. GARDINER: When I first read this proposed new rule, Mr. Chairman, I thought it might be a move in the right direction, and provided that it is amended in some particulars I believe it might be of great benefit to this House and the country at large. However, taking into consideration the exceptions therein, certain members are placed in a privileged position, and that I object to. We must always bear in mind that we meet here on equal terms. True, we have to appoint a committee of parliament to run the business of the country, and so far as that committee is concerned, which is known as the government, I am quite willing to make an exception under certain circumstances; but if we pass this rule in its present form I fear we shall create a dangerous precedent, for it will place the great majority of the members in an inferior position to represent their constituents.

Another point in this proposed new rule should be given grave consideration. On many occasions I have heard His Honour the Speaker state that our rules do not recognize parties in this House. But under this new rule we are going to recognize parties. We are going a step further, we are going to recognize the opposition.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will permit me, I do not think His Honour the Speaker has ever been heard to say that the leader of the opposition is not recognized. Always the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition has been recognized in the British House and in this House.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not the rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the practice.

Mr. MARCIL: The leader of the opposition is paid a salary and recognized by the House.

Mr. GARDINER: All right, I will deal with it from another angle. We may oppose government measures or private legislation, but I do not believe in an official opposition, and I think the time is near at hand when opposition of that character will be eliminated, if not by the members of this House, then by the people themselves. I believe in coöperation, provided we can coöperate. Consequently I do not approve of the proposed new rule, having regard to the fact that it recognizes an official opposition, and I move the following amendment, Mr. Chairman:

That all the words after the word "except" in the first line to the word "shall" in the fifth line be struck out and the following inserted: "a minister moving a government order".

Also that "forty minutes" in the last line be struck out and "one hour" inserted.

The new rule would then read:

No member, except a minister moving a government order, shall speak for more than one hour at a time in any debate.

I move this amendment for the reason that I am not satisfied that anyone other than a minister of the crown in bringing before the House a government order should be privileged above other members—not even the prime minister or the leader of the official opposition. If we admit that these gentlemen are privileged above private members, there must be something in their election to give them that privilege. Therefore as private members we would not be able to represent our constituents to the fullest extent if we allow certain privileged members extra time at our expense. As I said before, I am quite prepared to accept the view that a minister of the crown introducing legislation should have all the time necessary to explain it, but otherwise we ought all to be on a parity, and I have sought to achieve this in my amendment.

Mr. POWER: I think my hon. friend's amendment really broadens the proposed rule, for it would allow every minister of the crown to speak for at least an hour.

Mr. GARDINER: No, only when introducing legislation.

Mr. POWER: In any case I cannot see why there should be discrimination in favour of a minister as against the leader of the opposition, or a private member moving a resolution. Therefore, in order to meet what I believe to be the wishes of all members, I move as an amendment to the amendment:

That all the words beginning with the word "except" and terminating with the word "thereto" be stricken from the clause.

It would then read:

No member shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

That will settle the question.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. McMILLAN: While I am strongly of the opinion that as a general rule forty minutes should be sufficient for any member, I do believe it is unwise to limit debate, and further I believe if we do this we shall realize in the near future that we have made a mistake.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Amendment negatived.

An hon. MEMBER: Was not that an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. POWER: I withdraw my motion as a subamendment and shall propose it later on as a substantive amendment.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I am still of the opinion that the independent groups in this House should receive recognition. I would support the suggestion that all speeches should be limited to forty minutes, but since the committee is not prepared to go that length I maintain that the independent groups should be recognized. There are members here who have been sent by the public to present a non-partisan view and in important debates they should have sufficient time to state their point of view. I therefore propose the following amendment:

That after the word "opposition" in the second line the words "and one spokesman for the independent groups" be added.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It would be impossible to carry out that provision. How in the world can a number of independent groups select a single spokesman?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It would be easy for the independent groups to elect a spokesman. We have in this House a group from Alberta, we have the Progressive group, we have the Labour group, and we have a couple of independent members. It would be impossible for each small group to be represented independently by its own individual spokesman. But taking it for granted that the different independent groups are non-partisan, surely it would be an easy matter for them to arrange to have their views submitted by one speaker. It would not necessarily require the same speaker on every occasion, but there is no reason why one man should not be selected to represent their different points of view.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Amendment (Mr. Carmichael) negatived.

Mr. POWER: I move that all the words after the word "except" in the first line to the word "shall" in the fifth line be struck out so that the clause shall read:

No member shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

Mr. STEVENS: You are leaving in the word "except".

Mr. POWER: I must amend my own amendment; I thank the hon. member for his correction. The amendment should be to strike out all the words after the word "member", in the first line, to the word "shall" in the fifth line.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Power) negatived on division: Yeas, 34; Nays, 68.

Mr. NEILL: As a compromise—

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): No compromise.

Mr. NEILL: That is a nice, kindly feeling to display. It is very evident that a great many members here know in their hearts, however they may vote, that forty minutes is too short a time. I move that the "forty" be struck out and "sixty" be substituted therefor.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): That motion was voted upon a minute ago.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If there is to be any time limit I consider it a good deal better to have forty than sixty minutes. I am unalterably opposed to having any time limit, although I am very strongly in favour of short speeches. I cannot help feeling that what is needed around here is a little education rather than fixed rules. It was interesting to hear the hon. member for Fort William this afternoon. I wished at the time that I could turn the clock backwards one year and have the hon. gentleman apply his own argument to his own position then.

Mr. MANION: You may any time you like.

Mr. POWER: I rise to a point of order The hon. member is speaking to an amendment which has already been defeated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member for Acadia moved an amendment in which there was a provision that speeches should be of sixty minutes' duration, and that amendment was defeated.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the hon. member is well taken. The proposed amendment was covered in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Acadia and rejected by the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I will amend my motion, then, and make it sixty-one minutes.

Mr. BIRD: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: If my hon. friend desires to move an amendment we had better dispose of the one already before the committee. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) moves that the word "forty" be struck out and that the word "sixty-one" be inserted in lieu thereof. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Neill) negatived.

Mr. BIRD: Mr. Chairman, I would move that the words "the leader of the opposition" in the first and second lines be deleted and the following words substituted therefor: "leaders of opposition groups." I move this amendment because as a member of the committee which drew up this report I feel it to be in line with the spirit in which that committee conducted its work. On that committee were representatives of all groups in the House and on no occasion was there any disposition to overrule any just demand of any member of that committee; it was very much otherwise and a different spirit prevailed. Two things were very manifest in that committee; the first was the consensus of opinion, after we had discussed the rules for some time, that although our rules of procedure are based upon long parliamentary experience, sometimes we thought we had discovered a weak spot.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The principle in the amendment now moved by the hon. member was involved in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), which was voted down.

Mr. BIRD: I think my best answer to the point of order is to continue with the line of argument I had started. I was pointing out the spirit in which all the members of that committee conducted this work, and it seemed to me that that spirit should be continued in this House. I think we all desire to reach an unanimous conclusion and to do something to further the business of the House. I was pointing out, Mr. Chairman, that in the committee we recognized after studying the rules for some time that we were dealing with traditions—

Mr. CLARK: I would like a ruling on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. Just before your ruling is given I would suggest that the member is out of order either because he has moved an amendment which is not in your hands and which therefore is not before the committee, or because he is moving an amendment the principle of which has already been dealt with by this committee.

Mr. BIRD: If necessary I will withdraw my amendment until I have finished my argument. With all the debate on this subject in the last few hours I think I should be allowed to continue with what I have to say. In many cases in committee we have had matters of a similar kind before us, matters in which I as a member of an independent group have been very much interested, and any representation I made in committee at any time was met with the greatest courtesy, as I think all recommendations should be met.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is the hon. member speaking inadvertently now?

Mr. BIRD: When I speak inadvertently I sometimes express much greater sense than the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), when he speaks with consideration. After all, Mr. Chairman, this is only in keeping with the spirit which should be maintained in a House of this kind, and it is the spirit in which our rules should be revised. What is the use of appointing a committee to revise the rules of the House if we are entirely to overlook and ignore the outstanding features of this parliament as it exists today? One of the most fruitful sources of disharmony in this House for the last five or six years has been the existence of a third group. I do not object to the manner in which the rules have been applied in the past, because rules exist to be applied, but the necessary result of their application did not lead to the despatch of parliamentary work but rather to the contrary, and now that we are revising the rules why cannot we frankly face the fact that instead of two parties in this House we now have three or four? Surely if our object is to facilitate the business of the House we must so adapt our rules as to take into account all the factors which enter into that business, and I want to say that I do not know how this provision got into the rule. I must have been absent from the committee at the time, because I certainly would have been remiss in my duty had I let this go in without registering some objection. It is surely a very bold disregard of the presence of a third or fourth group in this House, that these words should be placed in such a rule, and I should think the House could have no objection whatever to their removal. Concessions are made along these lines frequently and I think in the revision of these rules the existence of a third point of view in the House should be recognized. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect I would move the amendment, but perhaps before doing so I might say something else which has occurred to me. I listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), and I think he was entirely sincere in the attitude he took. We have had sufficient incidents of a serious character in our parliamentary development to justify fully any member being on his guard against any restriction of the right of private members. Therefore I concede to the hon. member and others who feel the same way a real sincerity of motive, and I think only that the occasion was somewhat mistaken by them. Personally I think that unrestricted freedom of speech is not the defence of free speech, as we have often seen in the course of the last five or six years; It is rather an abuse of free speech. I know it is a regrettable thing that rules have to be invoked in order even apparently to restrict free speech. It surely was a regrettable thing when the action of Parnell and his associates compelled the invoking of the closure, it was a regrettable event in the otherwise free development of British parliamentary experience. I think this also is a somewhat regrettable step to take, but the step has been made necessary by the wholesale abuse of the right of speech in this House in the last few years. After all I think that a step of this kind, which apparently has the fairly unanimous backing of the House is just a matter of self defence on the part of the greater majority of parliamentarians. As a matter of fact the ones who transgress are the few. The ones who impose themselves upon us in the name of free speech are only a very insignificant proportion of the total membership of the House, and why should we be willing quiescently to submit from time to time to the false imposition of these gentlemen? Why cannot we agree on some rule that will bring these men to time? We have no other way of doing it. If we do not do that we are defenceless. It reminds me of a story in parliamentary history. On one occasion a well know parliamentarian was listening to a very long and tiresome speech. He happened to see another member with an ear trumpet to his ear, and he said to his neighbour: "There is a man throwing away his natural advantages." Well, Mr. Chairman, we have not very many natural advantages in this House when it comes to the overpowering eloquence of some of the members who think from time to time that they can safeguard the interests of the country and their constituencies only by talking hour after hour. I think I am as wholeheartedly in favour of free speech as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and I am only sorry that at this time we should seem to differ as to the best method of preserving what after all is the most precious inheritance of our parliamentary possessions. I wholeheartedly support the principle of this section, but in order to make it more in keeping with the actual facts in the House and to make it so that the proceedings here will henceforth be more harmonious and create a better spirit among the various parties, I move:

That the words "the leader of the opposition" in the first and second lines be deleted and the following words substituted: "leaders of opposition groups."

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is pretty nearly time we came to an understanding in regard to this matter of the opposition. We have given official recognition to the opposition by voting a salary to the opposition leader, and I would settle this question by providing that after the word "the" the sentence will read: "leader of the official opposition." There is an official opposition and that fact is recognized by voting him a salary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The wording is "the recognized leader."

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, the recognized leader of the official opposition.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The word "official" there is useless; it is not necessary.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Very well, say "the recognized leader of the opposition."

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it should be the "leader of the opposition."

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not see why we should recognize one or two persons who call themselves a group or a political group. I am not very much moved by the appeal of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat in regard to groups, bearing in mind that he "inadvertently" voted against the very group that he belongs to.

Mr. MARCIL: I think it is only fair to give an explanation of how the committee was guided in this matter. A strong appeal was made to us that an opportunity should be afforded the three parties in this House to express their views. Generally when the government brings down the budget the official opposition moves an amendment, and from time immemorial only one amendment has been allowed on going into committee of supply. Now hon. members will find at the top of page 26 a new rule which provides for a subamendment. There is to be one amendment, and one subamendment, which is designed to afford the members independent of the two large parties the opportunity of making known their views. The present situation in that regard had been a bone of contention for the last four or five years in parliament, and we had some trouble on one or two occasions as to which of the two groups was to be the opposition. I think this concession to the independent members will furnish them with the opportunity of moving, before going into committee of supply, a subamendment in which their own views can be stated fully. This concession was accepted as a compromise by the members of the committee. It is a departure from the practice of the House, but the committee agreed to recognize to that extent the three existing parties.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was very much interested to-night in hearing the hon. leader of the United Farmers of Alberta group—I think that is what he is styled—claim that he was opposed to any opposition or recognized opposition. Then we hear the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) suggesting that the members in that corner are the opposition, and bringing in an amendment. What I want to know is just where these hon. members stand? Are they in opposition or what are they? This amendment would lead us to believe that the various groups in that corner are in opposition, and the hon. gentleman virtually says so in his amendment.

Mr. BIRD: It is well known that the term is applied to those members who do not sit on the government benches. There was no implication in the use of the word that we were anything like an official opposition.

Mr. VALLANCE: You always refer to the members sitting in front of me—Mr. Neill and Mr. Bourassa—as "independents." You have not included them. We want to know where this outfit stands.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. gentleman surely is attributing to us motives that it is not proper to attribute to us at all. Because we sit on this side and sometimes express independent criticism does not imply that we are the only opposition. The hon. gentleman seems to want to put us—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend permit me? Can he tell us himself how many would be entitled to the longer speech if his amendment carries?

Mr. BIRD: For all practical purposes I admit frankly that it might extend on occasions to three or four, but even at that I think the House could very well make a concession for the sake of good will. While I am on my feet I want to say something in regard to a remark passed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I do not wish to bring up anything that is past or dead, or that should be so regarded, but I do not intend to sit here calmly and listen to the insinuations that the hon. member for Frontenac has made on one or two occasions respecting an action of mine. I think it would be becoming of him and his colleagues on that side of the House if they would let that incident drop. During the election he and others sitting on the front benches went out of their way to spread from one constituency to another statements that not one of them would dare to make on the floor of this House, that not one of them would be man enough to make to my face.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BIRD: I think it is descending to a very low level of parliamentary practice for the hon. gentleman with his experience to stand up and make those base insinuations about the action of another member.

The CHAIRMAN: The remarks of the hon. gentleman are not relevant to the matter which is before the committee.

Mr. BIRD: They may not be relevant, but I think as a member of this House—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I rise to a point of order. Is it within the rules for an hon. member to accuse another of making base insinuations? I do not think it is. I am sorry indeed if he or anyone else is accusing me of making insinuations. What I stated were facts. I do not bother wasting my time with making insinuations.

Mr. BIRD: It does not make the matter any different for the hon. member to use his subtlety of mind to get himself out of a situation which no self-respecting member would place himself in.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No self-respecting member would be guilty of the inadvertence which he committed.

Mr. POULIOT: May I move a certain amendment to the amendment which I think will make the matter clear? I move:

[Mr. Bird.]

That the new rule to be added after rule 21 as amended be replaced by the paragraph:

"No speech delivered in the House of Commons shall be recorded in Hansard."

Mr. LAPOINTE: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, March 21, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 175, to incorporate The Independent Order "Fior d'Italia".—Mr. Odette.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (For the Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 176, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, 1919.

Mr. MANION: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: In the absence of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) I am unable to explain the bill, but I should like to have it introduced and recorded.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): In connection with the working out of the Superannuation Act of 1924 my attention has been called to the position in which two deserving classes now find themselves, as I believe they are not legally entitled to receive anything under the wording of that act. I refer to the widows and minor children of former civil servants who died before the act of 1924 came into force, and also the wives and minor children of former civil servants still living who were superannuated before that date. Is the government taking steps to give these cases consideration?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): This matter has been under consideration for some time. The Superintendent of Insurance was instructed to make, and I believe he is making, a census of employees to come under the act, but I do not think he has quite completed it yet. He has not all the information from the various departments and recently matters have been somewhat complicated by the receipt of requests from civil servants who were employed in the maintenance of public buildings and others who had been retired under the Calder Act. The whole subject will be given careful study before a conclusion is reached.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Referring to the same matter, may I ask whether it is the intention of the government to extend the time for civil servants to elect to come under the act? I understand that on the eve of the last election the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in a speech delivered in Ottawa, made a promise to this effect.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not recall the promise, but if it was made it will be carried out.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will it be carried out? That is the question I asked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If such a promise was made it will be carried out. My hon. friend prefaced his question with the statement that the Prime Minister had made the promise. I say, if the promise was made it will be carried out.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Prime Minister knows whether he made it or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not so sure.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is to be presumed that the Prime Minister does not care to answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have answered it.

Mr. CLARK: With reference to the answer given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), I should like to know whether the Superintendent of Insurance has instructions to consider cases of employees in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The employees of the Soldier Settlement Board are at present classed as temporary, and have been for the last nine years, and they are not entitled to consideration under the Superannuation Act.

Mr. ROBB: I will direct the matter to the attention of the superintendent, although I think it has already been submitted to him directly by the board.

Mr. ARTHURS: I suggest that this should be confined entirely to returned soldiers.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): In view of the passage of a bill in June, 1925, for the equalization of freight rates and the fact that the Crowsnest pass agreement then in force in relation to commodities going west was abolished at that time, and in view, further, of the facts that the Crowsnest pass agreement does not apply to all lines of the railway in western Canada, and that since that bill was carried two crops have been hauled out, I want to ask the government whether they will see that justice is done the west in this matter.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): The railway companies, I understand, take the ground that they have complied with the statute in question. Those who believe otherwise have made an appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to the matter, and evidence and argument have, I believe, been heard. An appeal was brought to the Privy Council from the decision of the railway commission as to procedure. The judgment of the Privy Council on that appeal was given some weeks ago and, I believe, has been published. The railway commission has been requested by the government to give its decision in connection with the matter at the earliest possible date.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I have a question to ask the government in connection with the proposed bill to amend the Canada Grain Act. The question arises out of an Ottawa despatch appearing in the Montreal Gazette of March 18. This despatch intimates that a compromise agreement has been entered into between the government and the grain interests in connection with this bill, and in the closing paragraph it states:

> It was learned to-day that Mr. Malcolm, who will bring down legislation along this line this session, submitted the bill to the grain commission. The commission, after considering the question, has recommended that legislation be introduced compelling country elevators to guarantee grade but not weight.

As anything less than the provisions of Bill No. 8 last year will be of no practical use to the farmers of western Canada I would like to have the assurance of the government that there is no truth in this report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government can assume no responsibility for any report in any paper, but the government will assume full responsibility for its promise to introduce amendments to the Grain Act which I hope will be brought down this week.

RECOGNITION OF PEKIN GOVERNMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the situation prevailing in China, does this government continue to recognize the Pekin government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps I had better say to my hon. friend that the matter is under consideration.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Friday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, judging by the nature of the amendment which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has been pleased to move, I am quite convinced that the old time board of strategy is still functioning, and is running true to form. This amendment is the most unskilful smoke screen ever put forth by that venerable body. Those who promoted it did not figure how long it would have to last, and they become sorely mixed up in the directions of the wind. The longer this discussion lasts the thinner becomes the smoke screen and the easier it becomes for us to see that this amendment was not conceived in any purity of thought but that it was rather the product of a guilty mind, to befog the issue and distort public opinion. What is the purport of this amendment? The board of strategy, moved by bellicose sentiments and with sanguinary intentions, has no desire other than to turn this honourable House into a place where this bill may be slaughtered, something which has not been heard of in twenty-five years in connection with a bill of this magnitude. If this bill is extinguished in that way it will be simply for the purpose of endeavouring to prevent the light of day going beyond it, so that public opinion may not turn a searching eye on the management of certain public utilities in Ontario and elsewhere.

I have the greatest respect and admiration for public ownership when it is carried out according to the principles which were laid down at its inception; I am an Ontario man and am proud of it, and I am also proud of the fact that the province of Ontario stands for public ownership. At the same time, Sir, I am not prepared to endorse the management of those matters under public ownership as they are carried on to-day, which is one reason why I ask hon. gentlemen sitting directly opposite, particularly, they who are affiliated with no political party, whose sincerity I know and whose loyalty to their tenets I respect, to fully consider the nature of this amendment, and to consider it with great suspicion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Since he has sought what I may call our juryship, would he be so good as to illustrate more clearly than he has so far done the lack of efficiency in the management of the Ontario hydro-electric system?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate that my speech will be one which might be delivered from a bed of roses; this is an evidence of that fact. If the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) is anxious to find that out do not let him ask it from me now, but when he delivers his speech let him move that this bill be referred to committee, where the light of day will shine on that spot. It pleased the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to ask a certain embarrassing question, not of us, at page 1208 of Hansard, when he said, in reading from a clipping:

> The election in Ontario means in one sense the dawn of a new era as far as the electrical generation of power is concerned, for in future the electrical projects of "peepul" in Ontario will be carried out hand in hand with the so-called "St. James street" gang; in others words, the large power interests of the province of Quebec; a situation which perhaps may cause

Sir Adam Beck to turn in his grave, but which will nevertheless be welcomed by all thoughtful people.

Then the hon. member continued, and asked this very timely question:

I do not know how long the debate will continue; but I hope, before it is over, my Conservative friends, with whom I have a good deal of sympathy at this time—

Probably the time will come when that sympathy will not be quite so great.

—in regard to their resolution, will be able to throw some light on an editorial of this character, and very definitely to assure us that there is no danger that the hydro electric of Ontario will be in any way imperilled. We ought to be very sure of that.

Many speeches have been delivered since then by members of the Conservative party, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not yet received his answer, but in that guilty silence I find the answer. If they have not been able to give him an answer I say it is high time for my hon. friend to make up his mind that there is something fundamentally wrong, and that this bill should be sent to the committee on railways and canals for a proper investigation.

Yes; I have said that public ownership is a great thing, provided it be carried out according to the principles laid down at its inception. I am a great believer in consistency; even if one is wrong, if one is consistently wrong I feel that it is not so bad. But to be consistently inconsistent is a very bad thing. I shall have something to say about the consistency of the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment, but before I start dealing with that amendment let us see what has brought that amendment about. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox) said that there were no papers in Ontario that would support this scheme. Of course there are no Tory papers in Ontario that would support this scheme, not since the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) cancelled the lease of the 26th August. The Ottawa Citizen every second day or so fires a broadside into this project. The Ottawa Citizen did not do it in 1924.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Globe?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, the Globe! I repeat, the Ottawa Citizen did not do it in 1924 and why? Because in 1924 certain things did not exist that exist to-day. At that time the president of the chain of newspapers which owns the Citizen to-day was not a director of the International Paper Company. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Moncton Times of January 27, 1927, in which I find a very interesting bit of history. That clipping says:

Montreal, Jan. 26:—The Canadian International Paper Company announces the following as being elected to the directorate:

Now here is where we get some light upon the question as to why we are encountering all this opposition from the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Conservative benches. Here are some of the directors:—

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the hon. gentleman trying to make this a political question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not catch the hon. gentleman's question.

An hon. MEMBER: Never mind, it's not worth it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I always like to answer a question when it is put in the genial fashion characteristic of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), who gave his views upon this matter the other night in a very courteous way. But let my hon. friend ask for a reply to his question from the member for one of the Toronto constituencies, who said that this question should remain in politics and remain there forever.

Mr. ARTHURS: Who said that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Young). My hon. friend knows who I mean.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast): I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did not make any such statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The clipping from the Moncton Times contains this statement:

The Canadian International Paper Company announces the following as being elected to the directorate: Hon. R. B. Bennett, K.C., F. N. Southam, Hon. Smeaton White—

Now, I am only concerned with these for the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has only quoted part of the statement. He should read the whole of it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not hear the question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Read the whole statement.

Mr. BENNETT: When the hon. gentleman reads what purports to be a list of directors he should not confine himself to reading only three names and omitting the balance. Suppose he names his colleague from Ottawa.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will do that with the very best of grace.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Under the circumstances.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The names are as follows:

Hon. R. B. Bennett, K.C., Calgary; Hon. Raoul Dandurand, V. M. Drury, Sir Lomer Gouin, G. H. Montgomery, K.C., J. W. McConnell, Hon. Donat Raymond, F. N. Southam, Hon. Smeaton White, Brigadier General J. B. White, all of Montreal;

Now laugh:

Gordon C. Edwards, M.P., Ottawa;

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHEVRIER:

J. H. Fortier, Quebec;

Now laugh, gentlemen of the opposition:

A. P. Graustein.

There is a wonderful gentleman. Why do not my hon. friends applaud the reading of that name? But let me continue reading:

Neil C. Head, H. C. Phipps and A. H. Wiggin, New York; J. Comber, Boston; J. M. McCarthy, Quebec; J. A. Russell and E. R. Wood.

I hope the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is satisfied. He is in very pleasant and agreeable company as far as public ownership and private ownership are concerned.

Now, as I said, the Citizen in 1924 did not take the stand that it takes to-day, because at that time the gentleman who presides over the destinies of the Ottawa Citizen was not a director of the Canadian International Paper Company. Now we know why the Citizen to-day sheds these crocodile tears over this situation—because Mr. Southam is directly interested. That is one answer why the Ontario papers are not so much in favour of this project. He is interested in the Hamilton Spectator, the Winnipeg Tribune, the Calgary Herald, the Edmonton Journal, and the Vancouver Province, and is also very heavily interested as mortagee in the Vancouver Sun, and owns, of course the Ottawa Citizen.

Now we might go on a little further. I am still quoting from the Moncton Times:

Ottawa, Ont., Jan. 26:—The Ottawa Citizen carries the following in its news lines—

And, Mr. Speaker, this time if I mention only one name it is because there are no other names referred to:

It is believed in local business and financial circles that the inclusion of Hon. R. B. Bennett, K.C., as a director of the Canadian International Paper Company portends either an amalgamation of the E. B. Eddy Company with the New York enterprise or it is to be purchased outright in the near future. Hon. Mr. Bennett is one of the principal shareholders and vice president of the E. B. Eddy Company, and a rumour has been current for many months that some vital change is forthcoming in connection with that company.

Mr. BENNETT: Rising to a question of privilege I desire to say that the statement is wholly unfounded in fact and is known to the hon. gentleman to be such because of the statement I made here the other evening. There is no basis, remote or near, direct or indirect, for that statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, there are many statements contained in this clipping, and in order to be fair to the hon. gentleman I should like to afford him an opportunity of saying which one of the statements is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: Every statement that links up the E. B. Eddy Company with the International Paper Company or myself, other than as a director, about which I will presently enlighten the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And for which enlightenment I shall be delighted indeed.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like the statement to be withdrawn now. It is wholly unfounded in fact, and I think I am within my rights in asking that it be withdrawn. The statement made by the Ottawa Citizen that the E. B. Eddy Company has been or is about to be sold to the International Paper Company is untrue. There is no foundation for it directly or indirectly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have no desire to argue with the hon. gentleman, but I ask why he does not defer his remarks—

Mr. ARTHURS: I rise to a point of order. Where a statement made has been given the lie direct it should be withdrawn.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not had the benefit of hearing any of the hon. gentleman's enlightening remarks so I cannot answer them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think under the rules of the House the hon. member is bound to accept the word of the hon. member for Calgary West. The hon. member for Ottawa has quoted from a newspaper clipping a statement with respect to the connection of the hon. member for West Calgary with some company, which the hon. member for West Calgary denies. I think the hon. member for Ottawa should withdraw that statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Nobody in this House is more amenable to the rules particularly when they are interpreted with such grace as you have interpreted them, Mr. Speaker, but the statements quoted were not my statements. I am just reading what is contained herein.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot use the language of anybody else.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let us be fair about the matter. I am willing to retract anything that should be retracted, but does the hon. gentleman say now that he is not a director of the International Paper Company?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We ought to have this question of privilege settled. A statement was made and it was denied by another hon. member. The ruling was given that under the rules of the House the statement should be withdrawn, but my hon. friend now seeks to persist in the statement. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask your definite ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With respect to the last utterance of the hon. member (Mr. Chevrier), I think every one heard the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) distinctly say that he was a director of the Canadian International Paper Company. There is no question as to that. The question is as to the statement given to the House in connection with the E. B. Eddy Company, and the hon. gentleman should withdraw it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the best of grace. I withdraw the statement contained in the Citizen.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I can readily understand that the case which is mine to-day may be that of hon. gentlemen opposite to-morrow. May I venture to say that applause of that kind in a deliberative assembly is not calculated to accomplish any good purpose? The hon. gentleman read a mis-statement of fact. I corrected it. He read from the Moncton Times stating that it came from the Citizen. He now says that it came from the Citizen. He fathered the statement, and in conformity with the rules he must withdraw it in its entirety. In addition to that the statement was contradicted in the Citizen and my hon. friend was aware of that when he used it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In view of the fact that the matter is bad enough, I will retract the whole statement. We have, however, the statement that the hon. gentleman is a director of the International Paper Company. It will be most interesting then to see what stand he takes on this amendment and what stand he takes when we come to vote whether this bill is to go to the committee or not. We also find that Mr. Smeaton White and Mr. Southam are directors of this company. Therefore the attitude which the Citizen and the Gazette take in this matter is not surprising. These newspaper owners whose names I have just cited are either the partners or the hirelings of Mr. Graustein of New York. From whatever angle you look at this matter, from whatever side you study it, the picture reveals that these newspapers are under the direction of Mr. Graustein of New York to foster his interests in Canada. I say that never in all the history of Canada has such a gross attempt been made to muzzle the press of this country. An order in council was passed on the 26th of August last renewing certain leases and prior to that moment nothing has been heard of this discussion. That order in council was in these terms:

> For the furnishing by the company, at no cost to the government, of greatly improved canalization facilities past the Carillon rapids in the Ottawa river, and the utilization by the company of the water powers adjacent thereto.

That was an order in council. In ordinary language that means bartering away privately and by subterranean means our natural resources. If any other construction can be placed on those words, I would like to have it. Surely that method of disposing of the public resources and utilities of Canada does not appeal to hon. gentlemen directly opposite.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): While I quite agree with the statement which the hon. gentleman has just made, I would like to ask him now if the government he is supporting is willing to withdraw the lease in its entirety. It has the power to do so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Usually one asks payment of money from the one who owes it. With the greatest possible courtesy to my hon. friend I would like to answer that question, but I am, unfortunately, not in the secrets of the government. Let me however tell him that that lease will expire on May 1 of this year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We would like to hear what the hon. gentleman's position is in regard to the matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course, I am not in favour of the renewal of the lease. This renewal of the lease was granted on the 26th August, 1926, when the shadow government was supposed to be in power. Now we find the ghosts and survivors rising and fluttering in this House to oppose what in those days they themselves fixed or sanctioned. Out of their concrete form now, they remind me of the effigy on the old Roman coins looking both ways. How history repeats itself and how hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on this matter and particularly those who were members of that former government which granted this renewal, remind me of the ancient king of Judea who, in order to get at the newborn Saviour, ordered the destruction of all males two years old and under.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was this same lease that was renewed for a short time last summer by the Meighen administration not the lease that was extended three times by the King government prior to that, in August, 1923, November, 1924, and October, 1925?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, but there are two answers to that. One is the: Tu quoque, Brute! If you did wrong, should we have done the same thing? The other answer is this: that the original leases never contained the tremendously increased power which the shadow government granted to their supporters just before the election when they did not know which way they would have to jump. There is a tremendous difference in renewing a lease in the ordinary way of business and renewing a lease with tremendously increased powers just on the verge of an election and continuing it until kingdom come in the year 2005.

These hon. gentlemen also remind me of another prince of biblical times, and particularly the hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment reminds me of that ancient king who forced Moses into the bulrushes. Probably the day will come when the hon. gentleman would like to conduct his party into the promised land, but politically he will meet the same fate. There is still another picture which this brings to my mind and that is of the old god that used to devour his children because of the fear he had that they would one day dethrone him. This amendment was conceived for that purpose and under the same fear. It was for the purpose of hiding an accusing past. The best evidence of that is to be found in these two clippings, this one from the Ottawa Journal:

> No government of this country ought to take to itself the right to barter away privately in subterranean conferences the power resources of this country to powerful political friends and backers. Such proposed concessions ought to be advertised openly, with all the facts available to everybody, just precisely upon the principle that government contracts are let by public tender.

Those Journal editorials written in May, 1926, compared with the editorials that they write to-day, remind me unmistakably of the quilts that my grandmother used to make of so many multi-coloured pieces of linen and of so many different patterns that the dear old lady called them crazy work. That is what the Journal wrote on that date, that is not what it writes to-day.

It will be interesting to proceed a little further just to see how consistent is the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition when compared with his attitude in the past. This charter was first granted in 1894 under Tory rule. It was renewed under Liberal regime until 1911. We ought to remember that date for the misfortunes that then befell the country. In 1912 the charter was amended, and Mr. White, the Tory member for North Renfrew, sponsored the amending bill. In 1913 the charter was renewed at the instance of the same Mr. White, and also in 1915; in 1918 Mr. Fripp, one of the two Tory members for this city, obtained a further renewal and not a word of protest was uttered by any of our friends opposite; in 1924 Mr. McGiverin, the senior Liberal member for Ottawa, obtained another renewal and not the slightest protest was made by hon. gentlemen opposite—because the renewal of the lease of August 26, 1926, had not yet been made. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) were in the House in those days, but they kept consistently quiet.

Let me refer to some ancient history, but not so far back that it will be too uncomfortable. I hold in my hand a memorial which was submitted to His Excellency the Governor in Council in 1909. It is in the words following:

> We, the undersigned members of parliament,—

And may the House mark these words:

> —after carefully considering the transportation needs which seem to us must urgent for the present and future commercial, industrial and agricultural interests of Canada, desire to humbly but earnestly submit that the construction of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal should be commenced at an early date and completed as soon as possible.

It goes on, and I ask the House to mark the understandings:

> We understand that the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company has made all necessary preparations and is ready and willing to commence and prosecute this work with all possible speed.

I find the signatures of various hon. members of that day and among them is the signature of "H. Guthrie, S. Wellington." The hon. member at that time "after carefully considering the transportation needs for the present and future commercial, industrial and agricultural interests of Canada" affixed his name to the memorial asking His Excellency to authorize the carrying out of the scheme. To be wrong once is bad enough, but to be consistently inconsistent is worse. Here is another memorial presented to His Excellency the Governor in Council in 1903. The parchment is rather faded, and probably it would have been very much to the liking of somebody if the signatures also had faded out, but fortunately I find it reprinted in a memorial which was submitted to the government some years ago. Let me quote the following at page 22:

> Confronted with the prospect of another delay and rebuff the friends and promoters of the canal in all parts of Canada called a meeting in the autumn of 1903 of members of parliament representing constituencies in favour of the Georgian bay canal.

The meeting was attended by a large number of members of parliament and the petition was submitted to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Then it recites:

> We, the undersigned members of parliament, have given careful consideration to the subject of transportation in connection with the proposed ship canal from Georgian bay by Ottawa to Montreal.

And those gentlemen asked that the matter be at once dealt with and the scheme put through.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Who signed that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I find that the members for Ottawa at that time, Thomas Birkett and Mr. Belcourt signed the memorial and at page 3 it is very interesting to notice the signature of "Hugh Guthrie, South Wellington."

An hon. MEMBER: He was a Liberal then.

Mr. CHEVRIER: "Oh! consistency what crimes are committed in thy name." Now we find that the hon. gentleman on two distinct occasions under his own signature has asked for the renewal of this charter and the completion of the canal after having given careful and considered attention to the question of transportation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps he has reformed since he became a Conservative.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, the hon. gentleman himself has said nothing, but following out the thought of my hon. friend from Bow River I think the hon. gentleman looked better in his old clothes.

Now, after having twice sanctioned the principle, after having twice said that the problem of transportation had been carefully looked into, the hon. gentleman gets up in this House and moves his amendment, stating as his reason for so doing:

> I cannot conjure up before my mind any graver matter of public policy at this moment in Canada than the great question of transportation. We have in this bill a proposal that a private corporation shall construct a great transportation work.

Exactly the same charter that is sought to be renewed to-day, a charter that was in existence when the hon. gentleman on two different occasions put his name to a memorial asking for its renewal. Oh, consistency, where art thou!

I have no apologies to offer for sponsoring this bill, and I trust that I shall be able to see it to a proper conclusion. I am particularly happy to oppose this amendment as one of the two members for this city.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the hon. member imply that the amendment submitted by the hon. leader of the opposition has some ulterior motive behind it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I have said nothing else but that all along. I submit that the amendment is a smoke screen for the purpose of endeavouring to kill this bill without investigating its merits before a committee. As I say, I am delighted to sponsor this bill as one of the members for Ottawa. Others have done so before, and up to this moment not a single protest, except from the phonograph of Mr. Graustein and the victrolas of the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Journal, has come to my ears by way of objection to the stand I am taking. Ottawa in the past has always stood for the construction of the Georgian bay canal in exactly the same terms as the charter is now submitted for renewal.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to know, simply for my own information, what interest Mr. Graustein or the International Paper Company has in the Georgian bay canal either for or against it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They have no interest in the Georgian bay canal, but their interest is this: that just as the Hydro is purchasing power from the International Paper Company their intention is to stop anybody else from getting power in the manner in which

I will show this company can get it; so that the power will remain in their own hands, and they will turn it into a gigantic monopoly. I realize that a member of parliament has the dual obligation of representing his own constituency, and at the same time forgetting when in parliament that he represents that constituency only, and that under our parliamentary system he must have regard to the good of Canada as a whole. In so far as Ottawa is concerned we favour the construction of the Georgian bay canal because it will reduce transportation rates, notwithstanding what the leader of the opposition says; secondly, it will turn Ottawa into an ocean port, with all the advantages that go therewith, and incidentally it will reduce the cost of fuel in this city by some $700,000 a year, as shown by the report of the Fuel board.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to mislead the House, but in view of the contradictory statements in the editorial columns of the two daily papers I ask him to support his statement that Ottawa desires the construction of this canal, by reading a resolution from any representative body in support of the proposition.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It would require as much paper as my hon. friend consumes in writing his speeches if we introduced these resolutions and presented them in this House. Up to the moment, there has not been one serious resolution against it, except the small resolution of the Allied Trades and Labour Council. The city council has not said anything about it at all, and if they did I know where the opposition would come from—from somebody connected with the Ontario Hydro.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Have you got the city council muzzled that they do not say anything?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am in the very fortunate position of having nothing to do with the city council. This scheme would cheapen the cost of fuel in Ottawa by over $700,000 a year. In Arnprior it would reduce it by $1.33 per ton, in Pembroke by $1.90 per ton, Mattawa by $2.10, Haileybury $2.13, and so on.

Mr. PETTIT: How does my hon. friend arrive at that statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not arrive at the statement myself. I am reading a statement that was prepared by Mr. Neate, superintendent of the Fuel board in Ottawa. If he is wrong I am sorry, but I do not think he is wrong.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why refer to this question of navigation after the statement of the Minister of Railways?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is very easy to answer, and I will come to that. I do not mind interruptions, I welcome them. I might just as well say now that this charter, as I see it, is a canal charter and nothing else. It is primarily a canal charter with certain rights and obligations incidental thereto. The primary intent of this charter is the construction of a canal before anything else can be done. I stand by that and by that alone, and my own legal training and understanding and my common sense tell me, after having read the charter, as I will do again later, that it is a charter for the construction of a canal, and the development of the surplus power resulting therefrom. I will read the section dealing with that matter later.

I am asked if anybody in the city is against the canal. I have before me an absolutely independent newspaper, neither Grit nor Tory, owing allegiance to no party, a paper which fought me in some elections and I propose to read to the House what this French-Canadian paper in the city of Ottawa, Le Droit, said in connection with the Georgian bay canal at Ottawa. I give that paper credit for expressing its opinion courageously and fearlessly. On March 8, 1927, Le Droit published the following:

> The Georgian Bay Canal Company requests, for the fourteenth time since its inception, the renewal of its charter.
> It was an excellent opportunity to re-open the discussion on the advantages which the country might derive from the construction of this essentially Canadian waterway, and the opportunity has not been allowed to slip by, seeing that since a week and a half it is the fourth time that the subject has been debated. A remarkable feature: the Tories, those haling from Ontario especially, condemn the project as being far less advantageous than that of dredging the St. Lawrence in order to reach the great lakes by way of the Welland canal, and upon which the government has unwisely invested as much as $75,000,000.
> By this attitude, these Tories shatter the traditions of their party. In fact, if we refer back to Sir John Macdonald—

They tell me that in the time of Sir John Macdonald the question of power was not discussed. In 1898 a Senate committee, charged with investigating these conditions, reported as follows:

> Furthermore your committee are unanimously of the opinion that the development and use of the enormous water-power along the route for electrical purposes in the mining and smelting of iron and other ores, which are so abundant in the Ottawa valley, and which cannot now be developed by reason of the want of cheap communication and transportation, would of itself alone warrant the construction of the canal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, could anybody in the House say that these statesmen lacked forethought and vision when they made this report? Now we proceed with the citation from Le Droit:

—if we refer back to Sir John Macdonald, we find that he made a statement of this kind: "The Ottawa canal and the Pacific railway must be constructed and no voice should be raised against the great national work which would open the western states and colonies to the seaboard".

It is just exactly the opposite of what was advocated yesterday afternoon by General Ross of Kingston, who wished to see the Georgian bay canal doomed because it would compete with the railways. Much later—we come to the views held by Sir Alexander Mackenzie who, in 1876, declared himself irrevocably in favour of this canal—Sir Robert Borden, in 1914, at the time he was Prime Minister, stated: "Our aim is to retain Canadian trade over Canadian routes and to follow, as much as possible, the policy which consists in having this trade move from east to west".

These three Conservative opinions suffice to prove that the Tory party, up to recent times at least, were in favour of the dredging of the Ottawa, the Mattawa and the French rivers, in preference to that of the St. Lawrence.

The late Paul-Emile Lamarche, who died at the age of thirty-seven after a political career the usefulness of which was in inverse ratio to its duration, in February 1914, on the floor of the House expressed the view which all true Canadians should to-day study in its bearings in order to remain permanently Canadian. We advise this same study to those who are not enough Canadians and who would like to become more so. Mr. Lamarche, after having disproved clearly all the objections which were then brought to bear against the construction of the Georgian bay canal, faces the question squarely and shows the advantages which would result from this enterprise and which the interests of Canada necessarily require. "The Georgian bay canal scheme", he stated then, "should include among its most enthusiastic supporters all those who not only endorse but also sincerely believe in the motto: Canada for the Canadians!" The whole of his magnificent speech is permeated with this patriotic motto and those pages are not only a homage to the youthful orator who conceived them, but to the Canadian race which gave Canada such a statesman.

It is more and more evident that these opponents of this essentially Canadian water route are the victims of a narrow patriotism, a sectional patriotism, perhaps also the victims of large foreign interests. For, after all, if the Americans did not find the dredging of the St. Lawrence to their advantage, they would not support it so willingly. It is not among our neighbours to the south that practical philanthropy exists the most.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does it exist among the Sifton interests?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Probably if the hon. gentlemen knew these people he might be able to say so himself.

Therefore, the scheme of the opponents to the Canadian canal would be to discredit the project which has a chance of success in order to better establish the necessity of another enterprise which suits them better. It seems that the best advice which could be given to the latter would be to take a broader view so as to enable them to embrace more generously the interests of Canada and Canada only.

I come now to the question asked me a moment ago: Is this a canal charter or is its object the development of power? Well, no matter how the question may be argued; no matter what is said, I affirm that under the terms of the charter which the promoters of this bill are endeavouring to have renewed, nothing is contemplated but the construction of the canal. Although there are other sections of this legislation relating to the disposal of surplus power in connection with the construction of these works, the fact remains that the backbone of the whole scheme is the canal. And the whole purpose of the opposition to the bill now before us is concerned, not with the fear that the canal will not be built, but with the development of power at Carillon.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did not the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) make the statement that it was a struggle between two parties to obtain the power?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister may have made that statement but I now say what the position is. I say that the subject under discussion is an application by the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company for a renewal of the charter granted in the first place in 1894 and subsequently renewed until the first of May, 1927. Bill 78, presently under consideration, has been introduced for the purpose of extending the charter, not as it stood when introduced in 1894 but as it was at the date of its last renewal. Let us see what the charter was like when last renewed. Hon. members on the Conservative side of the House have spoken at length about this charter, but they have not quoted one section which has not been repealed. Every section they have mentioned has been repealed and reënacted, yet not one of these hon. gentlemen was aware of that fact. If therefore we are to listen to arguments based upon sections of an act which have been repealed and reënacted, it is high time that we sent this bill to the committee to have the whole subject properly aired.

The charter was first granted on July 23, 1894, and the power provisions were then embodied in section 8 (a). But that section has been repealed, having been reënacted in section 4 of the act of 1896; and section 8 (g) upon which the hon. member for Fort William

(Mr. Manion) based his whole argument was also repealed and reënacted in totally different form in 1912. The power clause of the original charter, section 8 (a), allowed the company to lay out, construct and build the canal, reciting the details, and it was repealed by section 4 of the act of 1896. The section which now empowers the company to construct the canal is to be found, let me say for the edification of my hon. friends opposite, in 60 Victoria, chapter 11, and is, as I have said, section 4. The act reads:

Section 8 of the said act is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor—

My hon. friend did not know that.

Mr. MANION: Were any powers taken away from the company by the repealing of that section and its reënactment in another form?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Tremendously, in 1912 particularly, in the section with reference to power.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead and deal with it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In section 8 (a), which was afterwards repealed, the powers of the company are defined, the company being allowed to lay out, construct, maintain and operate the canal or canals, at and from certain points described, the canals to be of such dimensions as will make a navigable channel nine feet in depth. That is the provision of the original charter. Now let us look at section 8 (g) as quoted by my hon. friend from Fort William at page 942 of Hansard. The company is to have the right to——lay out and lease or otherwise dispose of water lots, and use, sell, lease or otherwise dispose of water brought by or for the said canals or works but not requisite for the same, and produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power in connection with the works hereby authorized.

That provision was repealed in 1912 and is now contained in section 5 of the amending act of that year. I will not now deal with it at length, because it enters into another portion of my speech which I do not wish to take out of its order.

Mr. MANION: Has the right to develop electrical power been taken away from the corporation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. MANION: That is the point I made. It is absolutely the only point I quoted the section to show.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend and I must agree to disagree. He knows the English language much better than I do, and if I make mistakes he will correct me. Section 8 (g) of the original charter was repealed in 1912—I will show under what conditions—and the following was substituted therefor:

—produce, lease, supply or otherwise dispose of surplus—

Mark the word "surplus" because I shall comment upon it when I sum up the argument.

—hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power developed in connection with and for the purposes of the works hereby authorized, the rates or prices at or for which such hydraulic electric power may be disposed of by the company to be fixed or determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada in accordance with the provisions of section 360A of the Railway Act.

If my hon. friend will now revert to this section and read it he will see the vast difference between section 8 (g) of 1894 and section 5 (g) of 1912. My hon. friend and everyone else on the other side based their arguments on the power sections which have been repealed.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): I rise to a question of privilege. I quoted the section from the act of 1912 precisely as my hon. friend is now quoting it, and it is not fair to say that all hon. members on this side were wrong in the citation they made. I was right and I was not the only one.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman may have quoted the section I have given, and I have no quarrel with him if he did read section 5 (g) of the act of 1912. But if he followed that section to its logical conclusion he must inevitably have reached the decision that the power incidence of this charter is purely and simply subsidiary, and that the charter is one for the construction of a canal—the provision for the disposal of surplus power resulting therefrom having been added subsequently. By no distortion of the English language, by no process of alchemy and by no vision of mind can anyone turn this section into anything else, or give it any construction but that which I have placed upon it.

Mr. MANION: May I ask a question? Did I not take as well the stand that I opposed the construction of a canal by a private corporation; that I opposed not only the power schedule but the canal schedule as well? I opposed both, and do so yet.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That may be of some value in the eyes of my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: But my hon. friend is entirely trying to mislead the House in regard to the attitude I took.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I have said anything of that kind I am sorry; I do not mean that. I mean that all through this discussion every hon. gentleman opposite—I grant you in absolute good faith and with the very best of intentions; they have discussed this matter with no idea of deceiving anyone—have discussed this matter on sections which have been repealed and are not now in the law. If these sections were in the law to-day they would produce exactly the effect hon. gentlemen have said they would, but fortunately these sections are no longer in the act.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did not my hon. friend tell me a few moments ago that the hon. gentlemen to my right were insincere and had ulterior motives in this matter?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and I repeat it. I said, Sir, that when these gentlemen quoted sections of the law which have since been amended, in that part of their argument they honestly believed they were discussing what was the law. As to that there can be no difficulty; but I say as well that their argument, specious as it is, is purely and simply a smoke screen to prevent the construction of this canal. While we are at it, let us consider this section, because the whole of the argument turns upon its interpretation. When this charter was originally granted it was obtained for the purpose of constructing a canal; if Hansard is looked through the fact will be revealed that there was no discussion as to the desire of those promoting this bill simply to produce power and forego the construction of a canal. But power in those days was not an unknown quantity; power was not something out of the vision of those who granted this charter. I have just read an extract from the report of the Senate committee of 1898, the charter having been granted in 1894, and that committee considered the question of power to be of tremendous importance. But no matter how great or how important that power may be the charter must be read in the light of day and according to its exact wording; one must place an interpretation on the words contained therein, and by no construction can anyone say that the primary motive of this charter was the securing of power. So much has public opinion been distorted in this House, willingly in certain quarters and innocently in others, that the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) on February 16 asked for a return of the House in these terms:

> For a copy of all applications, letters, reports, orders in council, correspondence and all other communications between the government and any other person or persons as to the renewal of charters or agreements, or extension of the same, regarding the Ottawa, Montreal and Georgian Bay Canal Company, for power and navigation rights on the Ottawa river.

There must have been some idea in the mind of the hon. member that some negotiations were proceeding for the purpose of securing the power alone, but what did he find? The return came down and there was not a tittle of evidence or a scrap of paper of any kind to show that at any time this corporation had expressed a desire to forego the canal rights and substitute therefor the power rights. The primary idea of this company was to build a canal, and that is the idea to-day.

I am an Ontario man and believe in public ownership; I have the greatest respect for the memory of Sir Adam Beck, and it is due to his genius and his perspicacity and sense of business that this system of public ownership was developed in Ontario. But I cannot say as much for those who have succeeded him. This charter was granted in 1894; section 8 (g) which I have just quoted was included in the bill until 1912, when Sir Adam Beck, seeing into the future, knowing the possibilities of hydraulic power in Ontario and looking to the future needs of the people of Ontario, saw that this charter of 1894 granted too many powers and rights in connection with the development of hydraulic power. He came to Ottawa and appeared before the committee which, Sir, shows the necessity of having a matter of this kind referred to a committee. When Sir Adam Beck appeared before that committee the matter was thoroughly threshed out and discussed, and what happened? The company agreed that its primary intention was the construction of a canal and nothing else, and they also agreed to the adoption of this amending section which took away the vast powers granted in 1894 under section 8 (g). The new section reads as follows:

> Produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of surplus hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power—

What does that mean? I may not be quite familiar with the English language, and I may not be able to understand every word of this section, but when I see the word "surplus" I ask myself what it means. A surplus is something left after you have done something; what you have left after paying your debts is a surplus, something I do not have, but that is what the word means. Now, where is this surplus power; where can anyone get surplus power unless a canal is first constructed and unless some power is used for the development and maintenance of the works? Then what is left is the surplus, and that is what the company would have the right to dispose of under the control of the railway commission. I defy any hon. gentleman in this House, no matter how learned he may be in law or otherwise to place any other construction upon this section, which limits the disposal of power to that surplus. A canal must be constructed, after which that surplus may be dealt with.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Which section was the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) referring to when he made the statement that this was a strife between two parties over this power?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I want to be courteous to my friend, but I think that question should rather be addressed to the minister himself. I do not know what section the hon. gentleman has in mind, nor do I know what section the minister had in mind when he made the statement referred to. But no matter what statement has been made, at any time, anywhere or by whom, can we by any process of distortion argue that that section does not mean what I have just said it means?

Mr. CAMPBELL: There seems to be a direct conflict between the statement of the hon. gentleman and the statement of the Minister of Railways. That is what the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) is trying to get at.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no difference at all between us. It is dangerous to repeat a statement unless you have before you the actual language used, but the bone of contention was the power, and I suppose that is what the hon. gentleman refers to. Now any hon. gentleman in this House can make any statement he cares to if he is honest in doing it; but I refuse to change to the extent of one iota the interpretation which I place, and which everybody else should place, upon that section in reading it in the light of day.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am trying to answer the hon. gentleman. This charter is essentially a canal charter; on that we are agreed I think. True there is a bone of contention. The Tory party is anxious to secure that power at Carillon for those to whom they had already leased it. May I say that the power at Carillon is not worth anything to this company unless it has built the canal there. Until that is done, the power at Carillon does not mean five cents to this company, it is absolutely waste energy so far as this company is concerned. Because this company, under the terms of its charter, cannot sell any power until the canal at Carillon is constructed. Then if there is any surplus of power left it may dispose of it under the terms of the section.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman again does not wish to mislead the House, does he? Therefore, will he answer this question?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I can.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it a provision of the bill that the sale of surplus power shall not take place until the canal is built, or that it shall take place as each section of the canal is built?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is a very pertinent question, indeed, and one which at this stage of the proceedings I cannot bind anybody to, but the reasonable, logical, and honest proceeding would be this: the canal should be first constructed; that the surplus power should not be used until the whole of the canal has been built; that the proceeds derived from the sale of the surplus power should not be used for the private purposes of the company, either in the payment of dividends or otherwise, until the whole canal has been built. That is a sensible view to take.

Mr. STEVENS: Where can my hon. friend show this House any clause, sentence or reference, direct or indirect, that carries out such a suggestion?

Mr. CHEVRIER: What suggestion?

Mr. STEVENS: I say that my hon. friend cannot point to any clause in support of his statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What statement, please?

Mr. STEVENS: The one you have just made, the preposterous statement you have just made. My hon. friend cannot point to any clause, any statement, or any inference in this bill before the House, or any of its predecessors, that carries out what he says. It is certainly the most preposterous thing I ever heard.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a most preposterous thing for the hon. gentleman to make such a statement, in view of what this charter contains. However I will say this: If there is not such a provision in the bill at the present time I will see that one is inserted when the bill is in committee.

Mr. STEVENS: You said it was there already.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not say anything of the kind. I said the objection was well taken, and that from a business point of view there ought to be such a stipulation inserted, but how can we get such a stipulation put in unless we send the bill to a committee and have it investigated there? The course proposed by the opponents of this bill is a most inconsistent way of proceeding, and is a most unjust way to treat an application made to this parliament.

There is another feature about this bill. My hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) said—and I will deal with that point later on—and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox) particularly put stress on it, that this company because of its charter has the right for the next nine years to take any water-power, to develop it, to refrain from expending the $50,000 called for, in fact not to do anything in the way of constructing the canal, and that after the nine years the government may step in and take only that portion of the works which were not completed, but that the power development, the power plant, will remain in the hands of the company.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend said "hear, hear" too soon. Let us look at section 43 which was repealed.

Mr. MANION: Why not read section 1 of the bill before the House?

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are talking about the charter. We will talk about the bill when the time comes.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 43 of what act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 5 of the act of 1906. That section reads as follows:

Section 43 of chapter 103 of the statutes of 1894 is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

43. His Majesty, his heirs and successors, may at any time assume the possession of, and the property in, the said canals and works,—

Canals and works.

—and of and in all the rights, privileges and advantages of the company on giving to the company one week's notice of intention to do so; and thereupon all property in the said canals, works, rights, privileges and advantages shall become, and thenceforward shall be, vested in His Majesty, his heirs and successors; and by way of compensation His Majesty shall pay to the company the value of the work—

Mr. STEVENS: Read the balance.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course, it is only a waste of time:

—actually done by the company up to the time of the giving of such notice in surveying, and in the making of plans, and otherwise upon the ground, together with the value of all tangible property of the company of which possession may be so taken,—such values to be fixed by three valuators, or the majority of them, one valuator to be chosen by His Majesty, another by the company, and the third by the two so chosen.

Now, for instance, suppose that we take up this work at Carillon. We have eight years under the bill to build it, but our powers are defined in the charter, and if we start to turn one sod for the construction of a power plant at Carillon or elsewhere, Thomas Jones, Bob Smith, anyone can take out an injunction to restrain us from going ahead. In other words we have no right to do it, the charter falls by the wayside and we have not got the right to proceed. I defy any man in this House to show how it can be constructed otherwise. We have not got the right to turn one sod for the construction of a power plant unless we have built a section of the canal that develops that power, and we can only sell the surplus of the power which results from the construction of such work. If, after this charter was renewed, we started to build a power plant along this route, because of ignorance—no, it would not be ignorance now because I have divulged the whole thing. Had I not said what I have said perhaps hon. gentlemen would have not known about it, and then we could have gone along and for eight or nine years built up and developed this power. Nevertheless at the expiration of that time or at any time the government, on seven days' notice, could step in and wipe us out and that would be the end of the thing. Where are the jokers in this charter? The charter is absolutely clear and above board. After this charter has been ventilated in this House and before the committee on thirteen different occasions, will hon. gentlemen, like Daniels come to judgment, come into this House at the eleventh hour and find riders or jokers in this lease when none was found heretofore? Such a thing is preposterous and the smoke screen is getting thinner all the time.

Let us come to some of the statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter. I have the greatest respect for the hon. member who represents in such a dignified manner in this House the wonderful county of Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). But I just wonder, and quite charitably also, what stand he will take when we come to vote whether this bill shall go to the committee or not. I quote his remarks as reported in Hansard at page 764:

So far as I am concerned I have no expectation or idea of trying to keep this bill from going to committee; we all know very well that cannot be done and we have no wish to do so. We do wish, however, to have it fully discussed here before going to committee in order that it may be thoroughly understood by every one.

Did the board of strategy consult the hon. member for Argenteuil when they drafted that amendment? If so, they have put him into a box. At page 917 of Hansard he is also reported as saying:

It is not my intention to prevent the bill from being referred to and being considered by the committee on railways.

I am satisfied that at least one hon. gentleman on that side of the House will break that line of inconsistency and vote to send the bill to committee. In another place the hon. gentleman was asked this question by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen):

Mr. Glen: Before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat I would like to ask him, just for information, how it is proposed to separate the development of the water-power and the construction and operation of the canal, having in view the paramount need of navigable waters.

The hon. member for Argenteuil then said that if the bill was sent to a round table the matter might be threshed out. Why does he not send it to the committee now? The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) as reported on page 918 of Hansard made this statement:

I am not trying to block it from going to committee.

I shall be delighted to see the hon. member for Fort William kill this amendment because—

Mr. MANION: I intend, with great pleasure, to vote to kill the amendment—or rather to vote for the amendment in order to kill the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend may expedite patients in the other world in any way he may be able to arrange and distribute spirits in the way in which spirits may be distributed without any harm to the spiritual, but it may not be quite so well for him to take this stand and go back upon such a clear statement.

Mr. MANION: I am not trying to block the bill from going to committee.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr, CHEVRIER: What is the effect of voting for the amendment? It would effectively block the bill from going to the committee.

Mr. MANION: The effect of voting for the amendment is to kill the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The bill will not go to the committee if it is killed in this House, and yet my hon. friend, as reported in Hansard, says that he has no intention whatever of blocking the bill from going to committee. Nevertheless he will put it on the block now and cut its neck off.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry I was not in the House a few moments ago. Was the hon. gentleman referring to me in that remark?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. I am sorry the hon. member for Argenteuil was not here when I mentioned him. I was through with the hon. member.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose the hon. member had finished him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think he is finished by this time unless he votes against the amendment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As the hon. gentleman has referred to me, may I be allowed to explain? What I stated in my remarks on the second reading of the bill, I still stick to, I reiterate. I did not start out with the intention of endeavouring to keep this bill from going to committee, but to my surprise it has created such a feeling throughout the country that it is quite evident that the general public would like to see the bill defeated. I expected to see it go to committee and I hoped to defeat it there. My object was to see that this charter was not renewed. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has moved the amendment in the way he has, in consequence of the general feeling of the public on the subject, I shall certainly, with great pleasure, support his amendment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not at all surprised at the quick turn-about and acrobatic feat of the hon. gentleman. It is well known to be a Tory rule that hon. gentlemen can wiggle out of a tight corner faster than anybody else can, but sometimes that is not quite to their credit. There was no reason for making the statement which the hon. member for Argenteuil made unless he was sincere. This bill has been before the House on thirteen occasions; nobody knows better than the hon. member what is contained in it and what its purport is. I have enough confidence in the hon. gentleman to know that had he known that amendment was to be submitted he would not have said what he did say. He can get out of the fix in any way he wants, but he stands committed in Hansard as saying one thing and now he says that he will do the other.

I find another quotation from the speech of the hon. member for Fort William. When this question goes to committee, he said, and he was honest at the time—

Mr. MANION: And at that time the bill had a chance of going to committee. We are hoping now it has not.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend did not see the light of day. Has he been travelling to Damascus these last days, and will he say that the light which the leader of the opposition hung over his head was the light that showed him what to do in the matter?

Mr. MANION: I saw an easier method of killing this bill; that was all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But my hon. friend is doing neither justice nor adding grace to his statements in Hansard. If he intends to follow out his political career in that manner, that is, to say one thing and do the other, he is quite welcome to do so, but I would be sorry to see him do so. That is Tory consistency! Of course, Mr. Speaker, when we look across the House and see the consistency of these gentlemen, at one time sitting on one side and at another sitting on the other side, we are reminded of that virtue of Toryism. My hon. friend from Fort William asked, why not develop this St. Lawrence scheme and divide the total cost between the two countries in proportion to the benefits received. That is a wonderful scheme—so long as peace lasts. But what would happen in time of war?

An hon. MEMBER: There will be no war.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I hope so, I trust that Divine Providence will so ordain. But some five or six years before 1914 the same hon. gentlemen were saying the same thing. The construction of the Georgian bay canal, remote from the international border, is not a new scheme. It was ventilated in 1898 before a Senate committee, when Major-General Gascoigne gave evidence on this feature, showing that the authorities in those days were farsighted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. gentleman seriously wish the House to believe that in view of the great industrial future of this country, because of the danger —shall I say?—of a militant conflict with the United States, we are never to develop the St. Lawrence waterway? The suggestion is absurd.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not an idealist, perhaps I am imbued with sentiments that are too practical. I do not like to propound wonderful theories and then bury my head in the sand as I have seen ostriches do in South Africa. I prefer to look everything square in the face and get the best solution possible. I do not like to wait until a threatening danger crushes me; I try to get it out of the way.

One of the hon. gentlemen from Winnipeg said that when the charter was granted there was no idea of the value of electrical energy. I have shown that that element was considered in the Senate report of 1898.

Now let me refer to page 968 containing the remarks of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox). If one should give attention to the wonderful campaign speech which the hon. member made it should be only the degree of attention which his remarks deserve after a reference to what he said at page 975. The hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) asked this question:

The hon. member—

Referring to the hon. member for North York:

—said this bill went before the committee thirteen times. Was it not passed in the House without going to the railway committee?

The hon. member for North York answered:

Perhaps I made a mistake. I apologize. If it went before the committee thirteen times, I would not object, but it was before the House thirteen times. The House extended the charter without even sending it to the committee.

Then the hon. member for South Battleford continued:

The hon. member said it went before the committee thirteen times.

To which the hon. member for North York replied:

I apologize. I should have said it went before the House, and the House extended it without sending it to the committee.

By what process of alchemy or procedure can that be done? But that is the sort of information that the hon. gentleman furnishes to enlighten the House and the country with reference to this charter. He continues in the same vein at page 968.

> Upon payment of $50,000, which will be returned if the canal is not constructed, this company is getting a charter to build the canal and to develop the water-powers for a period of nine years.

With that fallacy I have already dealt and have shown that the company cannot turn a sod for the purpose of utilizing the power unless the portion of the canal developing that power has been constructed, and that it is only any surplus power that can be disposed of. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) also spoke against the renewal of the charter. It is surprising that when hon. members discuss this matter in good faith they occasionally make statements which are in error, and unfortunately when this erroneous information appears in Hansard and is read by other members who have not had an opportunity of studying the subject they are likely to gain an entirely wrong impression. The hon. member for Grenville in the course of his speech stated:

> When the charter was first granted it contained no clause authorizing the promoters to develop hydro-electric power . . . . To that scheme we now find added a power scheme.

That is wrong. The hon. gentleman did not read the charter, yet he gets up on the floor of the House and makes that statement. The charter did not contain those powers when originally granted, but it was amended in 1912, and he knew nothing about it. Then he proceeds to enlighten public opinion as I have cited. Apparently the board of strategy consulted the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), because he said that he was opposed to the motion and to the amendment!

Mr. PETTIT: Does the hon. gentleman anticipate that there will be surplus power available?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I hope so.

Mr. PETTIT: And considerable of it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. gentleman asks me if there will be power, and, if so, how much. I am able to say that undoubtedly there will be power. You cannot construct a canal on the Ottawa river where these water-powers are without creating power. But what will be the resultant power from that construction I do not know. I do know that no matter how much power is developed in the course of constructing the canal all that this company will be able to dispose of will be the surplus, and the rates to be charged for that surplus will be controlled by the railway commission.

Now, the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) in the course of his speech last Friday stated at page 1358 of Hansard:

> Here again I for one have to make a confession, which is something I do not like to do.

Well, the hon. gentleman had done nothing to be ashamed of. He continued:

> This bill absolutely fooled me. . . . the bill of 1924 contained a saving clause which protected the rights of the country. That clause is omitted from the bill now before us.

He is mistaken. The section in question is No. 43, and the charter is still alive and will continue in any case until the 1st of May this year. It surprises me that such an able lawyer should make a declaration of that kind.

Now we come down to this statement of the question: The building of this canal by the corporation and the development of power therefrom; or no canal at all and the development of power by interests of some kind. The building of the canal under the terms of this charter will ensure under the Railway Act the supervision of rates by the railway commission and fair treatment to everyone. The construction of power under private interests assures the consumers of nothing at all. Under the present system, as will be found out in this instance, the Hydro-electric has been purchasing power from the Gatineau Power Company, the Ontario Hydro has no plant of its own to develop the power. The Ontario Hydro purchases power and sells that power, and it says it sells it at cost. But what is the cost? I am unable to say what the cost is, but surely there is an increase in these various transactions which would not exist if the sale were direct. The whole matter therefore simmers down to the question of the construction of this canal with power, or no construction at all, and the development of power by private interests.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon. member advocating that the private interests develop the power under this canal scheme and sell the power direct to the consumers in Ontario, in violation of the principles of public ownership?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. I said at the outset that I believe in public ownership, but public ownership properly handled, not the public ownership we are having to-day. But, at the same time, in a matter of this magnitude, with this amount of power to be developed, I am quite satisfied that this company may, by the conditions under which the charter is granted, dispose of power at such price as will be reasonable, and that there will be no increased cost other than that which the Hydro electric is now charging.

The statement has been made that the investigation of the rates could not be properly carried on by the railway commission. An hon. member has said that the railway board would have to take the figures of the corporation as they presented them. The railway board has been investigating transportation rates for months and they have been investigating the telephone rates, and surely we should believe in the sincerity and accuracy of the railway commission in an investigation of that kind. It is a slur on the railway commission to suggest that there will be a lack of confidence in the way in which the railway commission would investigate these rates and endeavour to come to a satisfactory conclusion. It is a slur which I resent. The International Paper Company is operating a plant across the river at Hull. It is operating another one at Des Joachims on the Ottawa river. Where are the apostles of public ownership in northern Ontario? Where are they when they find the International Paper Company is already on the scene preparing for further development? Of course that is the International Paper Company and my Tory friends will not interfere. Many of their friends are directors of the company. On March 11, 1927, the Ottawa Journal published the following:

> The running streams commission of the province of Quebec is anticipating a request for a report from the Quebec legislature on the power resources of the upper Ottawa river, with a view to dealing with a request for development, is the information given from an authoritative source close to the Quebec government. The announcement is in keeping with the trend of events along the river, particularly at Des Joachims, where gangs of men believed to be in the employ of the International Pulp and Paper, or allied interests, were busy all last summer, and where preparations are being made for another season's work. The informer volunteered the information that the running streams commission is hastening its task of securing all possible data as to power development at Des Joachims.

Here is another instance where the tremendous octopus is endeavouring to place its ramifications on all the water-powers of the Ottawa river, and where are the apostles of public ownership now? Why do they not interfere? Why does the hon. leader of the opposition not do something to stop this proceeding?

I am not going to enter into a discussion as to the advisability of this canal or of its conditions. Everybody is prepared, I think, to admit that it is feasible and that it can be carried through to good advantage. I want now to leave out the canal and the power question for the moment, because certain allegations have been made as to why this charter is still before the public. This charter was granted in 1894, and hon. members say that the charter has lain dormant ever since, and that is one of the reasons why it should be refused. That charter has not been dormant during these years. The charter was granted in 1894, and from 1894 to 1907 the company proceeded with a number of surveys. Hon. members know that this canal extends from Montreal to the Georgian bay. That is not an enterprise which can be completed or surveyed in a few days. It takes years to survey it and years to investigate the conditions. From 1894 to 1907 surveys were made by the company. In 1907 the plans which this company prepared were filed with the then government. The government was not satisfied with the plans for some reasons, and some of those reasons were these: it was thought at the time that a nine-foot canal was not deep enough. The government considered there were many things in the way. It was a matter of magnitude and the government considered it for some time. In 1908 the Public Works commission was formed, and from 1908 until 1912 this Public Works commission went over the whole survey made by the company in previous years, because the government said, "We are not satisfied with an ex-parte survey; we want our own engineers to make the survey. We want a check-up of your plans." From 1908 to 1912 the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier spent $825,000 on this additional survey, and the result was the production of those books, five volumes, which all hon. members would do well to consult. Here is the result of those four or five years of survey. It cost the government of Canada $825,000 to do it, and yet hon. gentlemen who were then in parliament come and say that during those years the company did nothing.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member is confounding the company with the government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot answer questions from across the floor when I cannot hear them.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the hon. member say how much the company spent during those years?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend will allow this to go to a committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friends are going to laugh, then that settles the argument. That is my answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Lucas). Let him shuffle. I would not spend any time—

Mr. LUCAS: I am not shuffling. I asked the question in good faith, and I thought it might be interesting to know how much the company has spent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The company has spent since 1894 thousands upon thousands, the amount of which I do not know, but any one of the hon. members sitting on the opposition benches now, including the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) and even the member from Fort William (Mr. Manion) who was then in the House—

Mr. MANION: Not in 1894. Do not make me too old.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, after the hon. member came in. In the city of Ottawa, as every hon. member knows, offices were kept and employees retained at work on the plans. I am not prepared now to say just how much the company spent on lead pencils or on more costly undertakings up to surveys. That is a matter of detail for the committee to look into. But surely my hon. friend knows as a business man that a company of this magnitude could not possibly operate since 1894, obtaining renewals of the charter and keeping offices and a staff, without spending an enormous sum of money. I do not know what the initial survey cost, but inasmuch as the government expended $825,000 on the second, we may assume that the cost to the company to make the initial survey must have been upwards of a million. From 1908 to 1912 the company was engaged making this survey and preparing these reports. In 1914 the government surveyors were actively at work with the employees of the company, engineers and others, taking up these reports, and they continued their activities. If hon. gentlemen will send the bill to the committee they will get the whole history of the company, revealing in detail every step taken, every activity engaged in, every overture made to the government to bring the matter to a conclusion. I should be quite willing to stand here, if it were physically possible, and recite the whole history of the undertaking for the edification of hon. gentlemen. If I did, I am sure they could not fail to be convinced that the company has not, as has been suggested, lain dormant all these years. Between 1914 and the end of 1918 we were in the war period, and one hon. gentleman has magnanimously suggested that over that interval we should draw the curtain.

In 1921 there came the period of deflation, and in 1921 the charter was renewed, and there was not a single objection from any quarter of the House; no one protested. It was renewed again in 1924 without any protest from either side. No hon. gentleman at that time moved any amendment emphasizing the gravity of this matter from the standpoint of national transportation. My hon. friend himself signed his name twice to one of these memorials. In July of that year a renewal was obtained, and in December of the same year the company deposited new plans and specifications in accordance with the demands of the government. As a matter of fact plans had been submitted in 1907, and at the instigation of the government they were successively altered to increase the depth of the channel from nine to twelve feet, from twelve to fourteen, from fourteen to sixteen, from sixteen to eighteen and then to twenty. Now it is twenty-four feet.

Mr. PETTIT: In view of the fact that the government's engineers figured on a twenty-four foot canal, surely they gave an estimate of the quantity of surplus power that would result from that construction. If so, what is that estimate?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give the information now, but if my hon. friend is anxious to have it I will secure it for him.

Mr. PETTIT: I want it now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry I cannot give it now; that is something that would come out in an inquiry before the committee. However, I can easily get the information and let my hon. friend have it if it will satisfy him.

Now we come to the year 1925. The last renewal, as I have pointed out, was in July, 1924, plans having been submitted in December of that year. In 1925 we find the company organized in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Act and ten million dollars subscribed, of which sum one million dollars was then paid up. There is where the company stands now. Will hon. gentlemen persist in the statement that the company has lain dormant all these years?

Let me say a word now about the proposed alliance between Ontario and Quebec. A good deal of capital has been made of the resolution which the Premier of Ontario has forwarded to this House, and the statement is made that the Hon. Mr.

Ferguson is about to enter into an agreement with the Hon. Mr. Taschereau. There is to be a mutual understanding in regard to the development of the Carillon power. The Hon. Mr. Ferguson and the Hon. Mr. Taschereau are to come to an understanding; they are going to fall upon each other's neck. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is to laugh! Will any hon. member in this House voice an honest belief that an alliance of that kind can be perpetrated between Tory Ontario and Grit Quebec? Can an alliance of that nature be formed between the people of Ontario, who believe so deeply, and properly so, in public ownership, and the people of Quebec who, equally properly, for that is their tenet, believe exclusively in private ownership? Is it possible, is it feasible for Ontario and Quebec to blend? Is it likely that such a happy marriage as is predicted will result? As the great Laurier said on a somewhat similar occasion—and I may safely use the simile here—"When I think of the proposed agreement and the proposed marriage in this regard, I say, What a salad!"

It is an open secret that the National Hydro of Montreal is in the hands now of Aldred and Holt. We heard nothing about it previous to 1926; we heard nothing about it so long as Robert and the others held the charter. But the moment it goes over to the Holt interests then our Tory friends oppose the renewal of this charter. Let me say to my hon. friend from Quebec province that they know that the National Hydro is now in the joint hands of the Aldred and Holt interests. It is an open secret that the same interests which are now endeavouring to prevent the renewal of this charter are the same interests that in the last general election brought forth and supported in the province of Quebec the spectre of Patenaude. Again I say, what a salad!

I appeal to the members of the maritimes to show in this matter vision and forethought. Here is a great project realizable at once as a means of bringing them near to the central and western provinces and enabling them to have relations more freely with the other sections of Canada. Here is something that will make for the development of trade between east and west. And trade is one of the elements most conducive to a better understanding between the peoples of different localities. The maritime provinces through this route will be able to ship their coal to the industries of northern Ontario, their ores to the smelters, and grain to the flour mills and elevators. The members of Quebec too, I know, are deeply interested in the maintenance of navigation on the St. Lawrence; they are interested in the construction of a deep waterway to the great lakes. In passing, let me congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme) who at the moment occupies the Speaker's chair.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Laflamme): Thank you.

Mr. CHEVRIER: To continue. The members from the province of Quebec are particularly interested in a deep waterway running through the whole of Canada over Canadian territory, while to the members from Montreal the maintenance of water levels around Montreal is a matter of considerable importance. There was also a resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Montreal calling for the immediate construction and maintenance of this canal, and probably it would be just as well to place that resolution on Hansard.

Whereas the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company is asking the parliament of Canada the prolongation of its charter for the construction of the Georgain bay canal; and

Whereas plans of the said company have been submitted to the government for approval or otherwise, which delays the beginning of the work;

It is resolved that the council of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce endorses the said demand of prolongation of the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

The chamber of commerce having always favoured this construction, prays the government of Canada to give its kind attention towards its realization, such being to greatly help the western provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What was the date of the resolution?

Mr. CHEVRIER: February 23, 1927. I read from a copy, but I have now in my hand the certified copy sent me by the secretary of the chamber of commerce of Montreal. I say to my hon. friends from Montreal that there is something more than that. Some of them are interested in the construction of the St. Lawrence ship canals and I have something in that connection as well. A report of the joint board of engineers on the St. Lawrence waterways project was made on November 16, 1926. Three engineers were named to this board by the United States and the three selected to represent Canada were Mr. Duncan W. McLachlan, of the Department of Railways and Canals, Mr. Olivier O. Lefebvre, Chief Engineer, Quebec Streams Commission and Brigadier General Charles Hamilton Mitchell, of Toronto. Questions were put to this investigating board, and the answers are now embodied in this report. Among others they were asked the following question:

To what extent may water levels in the St. Lawrence river at and below Montreal, as well as the river and lake levels generally, be affected by the execution of the project?

To that question they gave this answer:

The irresponsibe operation of the power works proposed by the board, or indeed of any power works, however designed, that develop fully the power resources of any section of the river, would affect injuriously the water levels in the St. Lawrence river at and below Montreal; but it is feasible to operate these works under government supervision in such a manner that they will neither lower the summer levels in the lower river nor raise the winter and spring levels. With such control the improvements proposed will have no injurious effect whatever on the water levels of the St. Lawrence at and below Montreal.

Then for the benefit of my friends from the province of Quebec I would like to quote a portion of a telegram sent by the secretary of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company to the premier of the province of Quebec:

We draw your attention to the fact that the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company is compelled by its charter to safeguard the interests of navigation and to operate its works on the Ottawa river in the interests of navigation and in the interest of maintaining water levels in the Ottawa river, Montreal harbour and in the St. Lawrence at the best levels for navigation. Clearly, if the riparian owners are permitted to develop power only on the Ottawa river their works will fall within the dictum of the international joint board and will injuriously affect the levels of the Montreal harbour and in the lower St. Lawrence. We appeal to you in the first place to support the interests of navigation, in the second place to prevent the erection of water-power works on the Ottawa river which will injuriously affect the water levels in the Montreal harbour and the lower St. Lawrence; in the third place to use your influence to defend the great vested interests of your province established in the trade of the harbour of Montreal and the lower St. Lawrence generally and in the shipping and general commerce which is entirely dependent upon the maintenance and the protection of water levels in that area.

I would warn my good friends in Ontario of the danger of disturbing the economic equilibrium of this province by furthering so easily the monopolistic development of power in one section only in order to draw to that section commercial enterprises, to the detriment of other portions of Ontario. We all know that because of the situation in Ontario power is being given to the immediate vicinity of Toronto and Hamilton while all the other portions of the province, especially those to the north, are ignored.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Then I would just say a word to hon. gentlemen directly opposite, who are also interested in cheap means of transportation, in the development of our resources and in the national development of Canada. More than that, I appeal to them because I know their independence; I know they are affiliated with no party in this House; I know the sincerity of their tenets and the loyalty with which they are adhered to, and I do not want anyone to accuse me of just saying this because of the expediency of the moment. I have said it before; I say it now and I will say it again no matter when or where. But I say also that not only because of what I have submitted to the House but because of the speeches made by other hon. members in favour of this measure, there should now be in their minds enough doubt and uncertainty to defeat this amendment, to allow the second reading of this bill and to send it to a committee, there to meet whatever its fate may be. I do not believe my friends opposite would think of killing this bill in the House without giving to its promoters a chance to submit their own arguments; I think in their honesty of purpose and in their loyalty to themselves they will send this bill to a committee of this House where all questions will be thoroughly ventilated. If the members of that committee find that what I have said to-day is not true—although I defy anyone to say so—if they find that there are any objectionable features in that charter which should be removed, with the consent of the promoters that might be done. But if it is there found that the charter is fundamentally wrong and that there is something absolutely reprehensible about it, they can do as they please, kill it outright or let it linger. I do say, however, that it is incumbent upon those hon. members as well as upon every other member of this House to make sure that a question of this kind should be referred to a committee.

I have just a few more words to add. After all, Mr. Speaker, I am not so much concerned about the building of this canal and the exploitation of power as I am concerned with a matter of much greater importance. It is true that the construction of this canal and the exploitation of these water-powers are of great importance to the economic welfare of this common country of ours, but that has more to do with the material side of things. When our early Canadian statesmen laid the foundations of our present national development, they did not do so in terms of dollars and cents. They did not do it in the terms of interest to this one or to that one, and the criticisms hurled at them were far in excess of the congratulations which they received. To-day the works of Cartier, Macdonald, Mackenzie and Laurier stand out in our national life as everlasting tributes to the memories of these great men. The preaching of the development of our internal trade, of the getting closer together of the various provinces in an endeavour to cure their common ills, of the blending together in the hearts and souls and minds of the Canadian people of their common desires and ambitions made feasible their materialization into those bonds and ties of steel that to-day bind together the provinces of this country, and have their origin in the construction of such works as that of the Canadian Pacific railway.

But that is not enough, we must not stop here. Much more needs to be done; much more can be done to bring closer together in one common spirit the various forces and elements of this country. Uttering this sentiment is good, preaching it is good also, but the furnishing of the means to achieve the desired end is better, and that can only be done by the construction and the maintenance of such works as the one under review, a work which will bring the component parts of this country into closer commercial relations and thereby to a better understanding and a rapid solution of their respective needs.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I could almost have wished, Sir, that the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Chevrier) had continued for another fifteen or twenty minutes, or finished fifteen or twenty minutes sooner. I am not sure that I shall be able to conclude my remarks within the half hour which remains before the House takes recess for dinner, but I shall try my best to do so.

I shall not, Sir, as has been done quite frequently by hon. members opposite, ride a different horse to-day from the steed I rode ten years ago. I do not think we can accomplish much by doing that.

Mr. MANION: Not if it is a good horse.

Mr. BROWN: It is true that we sometimes like to twit our genial friend over there with having made a change in recent times, but I will do it in an entirely good natured way. If a man makes a change—

Mr. ARTHURS: There are others.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, of course. If a man makes a change honestly he is not to be reproved. Therefore, after all, Mr. Speaker, the difference between the patriot and the traitor, between the convert and the pervert, depends simply upon the point of view. I have never objected to a man changing his horse once in ten years. I do not like to see him change too quickly, or try to ride two horses in opposite directions at the same time, which of course is an entirely different matter.

I wish to say, as some other gentlemen have said, that I have no personal interest in this matter. I have not been canvassed by anybody, and I have not been lobbied by anybody, either for this bill or against it. I have come to my conclusion in regard to the bill, and the manner in which it should be disposed of, entirely from my general knowledge of the subject, as well as from the provisions of the bill itself and the arguments which have been advanced in the House. It ought to be a matter of gratification to those who believe in public ownership to hear the expressions of opinion that have come from across the House, even if we cannot believe there is as complete unanimity as the speeches which have been made on that side would seem to indicate.

An hon. member from Toronto made the remark that the line of cleavage between those in favour of public ownership and those in favour of private ownership ran down the centre of the House. I think in that respect he is entirely wrong. It seems to me that if you tried to draw a line between those in favour of public and those in favour of private ownership, it would cross the House a great number of times in order to include or exclude the hon. members in one or the other of these two classes. I cannot understand how it could possibly include those who would defend the order in council of August 26th last, neither do I think it could include those who were elected in response to the "whisper of death" campaign that was carried on in Montreal some years ago. While we have heard many declarations in favour of public ownership from the other side it seems to me that I could detect at times a somewhat different note, a note that was not just as completely devoted to the idea of public ownership. For instance we could detect the note of the assertion of provincial rights. That, it seems to me, was a thought far more prominent in the minds of some of the speakers than the idea of public ownership.

I wish to call attention to the speech that was made by the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Young). I need not read the passages from his speech where he emphasized his attachment to the idea of public ownership. Having done that—of course, with all the fervour that might characterize the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), or the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—later on in his speech he said, speaking of the matter dealt with by the order in council of August 26th:

I repeat again, that the National hydro contract to which my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Glen) referred, was a contract approved by both the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

That is, he is intensely devoted to the principle of public ownership, but when the government of Ontario sets its seal of approval upon a contract that violates all those principles, then his adhesion to the principle of public ownership goes by the board.

There is another need that seems to have been emphasized by some hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is the question of the St. Lawrence waterway. I have no doubt that the matter of the deepening of the St. Lawrence had some place in the thoughts of my hon. friend from Fort William—

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN: —for we know he is very greatly attached to that project. I am not going to find any fault with him for that, but in speaking of this matter the leader of the opposition used an argument that seemed to me to be absolutely fallacious. He contended it would not be wise for us to construct a waterway that might enter into competition with those other great lines of transportation that we have in mind—the St. Lawrence waterway, and I suppose he referred to our National Railways. I cannot see force in the argument that we should not allow a private right to compete with public enterprises, and the argument loses its force entirely when you remember that if the St. Lawrence waterway is ever constructed, the canals thereon will be thrown open to the public free, and we will not collect any revenue from them. Why then is it unwise for us to grant a charter in respect to a waterway coming into competition with another waterway from which the Dominion of Canada receives no revenue at all? If the argument is good against the Georgian bay canal scheme that it should not be allowed to enter into competition with our railways, the same argument is just as good against the St. Lawrence waterway. As a matter of fact that argument has been used against the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway—that it will enter into competition with our railways. I put these arguments aside altogether, however, because I do not think they have any weight.

I can understand the attitude of hon. members from Ontario in regard to this matter because of the question of provincial rights. Naturally they have their attention fixed upon their constituencies; naturally they know what the people in their constituencies want, and if it became a conflict between the Dominion and provincial interests the weight of their support would go in favour of maintaining provincial interests. That is an understandable position from the standpoint of hon. members from Ontario; but we in this House ought to emphasize the interests of the Dominion. If there is a conflict between the interests of the Dominion of Canada and those of Ontario or Quebec, we should attach some importance to the interests of the Dominion of Canada.

What then is the situation? This is a measure which proposes to deal with a great internal waterway, a waterway that for three centuries has been a highway of commerce and traffic between Montreal and the Rocky mountains. That is a highway which the Dominion of Canada is interested in preserving for the use of the Dominion, and that is something to which we as representatives of constituencies in this Dominion parliament ought to give attention. We cannot for a moment concede that the people of Ontario and Quebec are the only ones who are interested in this matter. We who represent other parts of the Dominion have also an interest in seeing that, whatever may be done in the development of this waterway, the interests of the Dominion as a whole are protected.

We have heard a great deal during the course of the debate about legal decisions that have been rendered in favour of the claims of the provinces. I do not know enough about law or court decisions to know just what those decisions are or how far they go in determining the various matters at issue, but there is in the British North America Act a section that would bear study. Section 92 deals with the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures, and in subsection 10 we find that these matters are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province:

Local works and understakings other than such as are of the following classes:—

a. Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province:

b. Lines of steamships between the province and any British or foreign country:

Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

Therefore this parliament has the power to declare this work to be for the general advantage of Canada. Whether that should be done or not, I am not at the present time arguing; but I just want to point out that as there undoubtedly is a conflict between provincial and Dominion interests in this matter, this parliament has the power to declare that this particular work is not a matter in which the provinces alone are concerned, but that it is or may be a work for the general advantage of the people of Canada. The provinces and the Dominion alike derive their powers from this British North America Act. I am not a lawyer, but I think it is clear that this section is worthy of consideration in this connection. The leader of the opposition, speaking of the powers that lay within the jurisdiction of the province, made certain statements, but I notice that in section 91, which deals with the powers of parliament, subsection 12 includes "sea coast and inland fisheries." Therefore, when he declared that the fish in the stream belong to the provinces, that does not seem to me so absolutely beyond dispute unless some astute legal gentleman can show a distinction between fish and fisheries. Perhaps someone may be able to do that. We never know just how far astute legal arguments may carry. It would not at least seem to be so clear as hon. gentlemen have been endeavouring to assert, that the rights of the provinces are supreme in such matters as these.

Let us deal with the bill itself and I will try to state in terms that will not be misunderstood my attitude towards this question. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) produced the farmers' platform of Manitoba. I might as well confess that I had something to do with the preparation of that platform. I had the honour at the time of being president of the United Farmers of Manitoba and when we drew up that platform I was present. Indeed I am not sure that the particular clause referred to was not my own wording, and I have no intention of departing from the position which I took then. I am opposed to the principle of this bill and I do not think it is possible to amend it in a way that would satisfy me. I think that is plain and definite enough for anybody.

What about the amendment? Technically, I admit that the amendment is correct. Undoubtedly the leader of the opposition when he appealed to May, supported as he was by Bourinot, was correct in saying what he did in support of his amendment. I need not refer to his argument because it is well known. But while he is technically correct, it seems to me that the carrying of that amendment would not altogether meet the needs of the situation, because in my judgment it would leave unsettled a very important matter, a matter with which I think this House ought to deal promptly. The carrying of that amendment, it is true, would, so far as this House is concerned, put the whole question for the time being to one side. If we were to think of that amendment only in its own terms and no further, I for my part would have no objection to voting for it, but I think we are under an obligation to look further. Since I have been in this House I have learned that it is sometimes just as well, if you can get somewhere near where you want to go, to forget technicalities. Therefore, at the risk of being charged with inconsistency, I propose to take the other course. I have no hope that this particular bill can be amended in any way that will suit my views. My hope, in sending this matter to the committee, would be that from that committee might come some constructive proposition that would help us to deal properly with a great national problem. Now, somebody may say that this is not the right way to do it. It may not be the best way, it may not be the only way, but it seems to me that it is at least a good way.

We have heard a great many statements from both sides of the House in regard to the various interests that are concerning themselves with this or a kindred project for the development of power at the Carillon falls. What the exact situation is we have not the privilege of knowing. I think it well that we should know just as soon as possible what the exact situation is, and it seems to me that that could be brought out if this matter were placed before a committee of this House. I have no objection whatever to the terms of the amendment, but its acceptance would prevent our giving immediate consideration to the question. The great problem before Canada to-day is how we are to develop these great natural resources so that the people will receive the maximum good therefrom. It is with the hope that we may be able to do something immediately to solve the problem that I would cast aside technicalities and allow this matter to be referred to the committee, where we can get further information and probably suggestions that would be helpful to us. For example, it might very well be suggested that at once parliament should declare this whole work to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. I am not saying that that would be done, but it is a possibility. It might be that the committee would suggest an immediate conference between the Dominion and the provinces. It might be that half a dozen suggestions would be made to bring us at once to grips with the situation. I have confidence enough in the members of this House, and certainly in the group with which I am immediately associated, to know that they stand absolutely firm on the question of the public control and development and operation of this great natural work for the general good of the people. There need be no question in the mind of any person on that point.

Speaking for myself, I take the position that we should send this bill to the committee, only in the hope that from the committee will come some suggestion to enable us to settle the question in the interests of the Dominion, whose rights in this great waterway are paramount. We cannot allow the interests of navigation to be sacrificed. I do not think for a moment that in the immediate future such a canal will be built either by private parties or by the Dominion; but who can foresee the future, who can tell us what the condition will be fifty years hence? We do not know. Whatever step we do take we must see to it that the rights of the Dominion in this great inland waterway are not permanently sacrificed. The rights of the Dominion must be protected. At the same time we must, of course, give consideration to the rights of the provinces. It is quite possible, as I have said, that this can be best done by a conference between the Dominion authorities and the representatives of the provinces. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that this could be so done as to secure the end that we have in view—that these great natural resources shall be preserved and developed in such a way as to secure the maximum benefit for the great mass of the common people of Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that I was a member of the committee which was formed a year or so ago for the purpose of amending the rules of this House and making speeches as short as possible. Perhaps I should apologize for taking part in the debate now, because I spoke for a few moments on the original motion. I shall not, however, occupy the time of the House longer than the time originally proposed for speeches in the amended rules—half an hour, or at the most, forty minutes, as the recommendation now stands.

My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) spent about half an hour trying to defend an absolutely impossible position. I might take his argument in the reverse order in which he presented it. His last proposition was that nothing should be done in this matter until a conference had been held between the two provinces. So far as that is concerned, there is no difference of opinion between the idea of the province of Ontario and that of the province of Quebec. Secondly, he says we should forget all technicalities, no matter what they were, as long as they got us where we wanted to go. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman forgot all the technicalities that he ever knew, so long as they got him half way to the place to which he wanted to go. In other words, for many years he was strongly in favour of the Georgian bay canal, and now he is making an attempt in this House to hedge in every possible way.

Mr. BROWN: Does the hon. member say that I was for many years in favour of the Georgian bay proposition?

Mr. ARTHURS: Yes, I said that.

Mr. BROWN: I do not know how my hon. friend got that impression.

Mr. ARTHURS: Every member from my hon. friend's constituency, and every member of the delegation which came from the constituency, and made representations to the government on the subject, took the same attitude, and I am sure my hon. friend did not oppose the decision to send the delegation down here.

He said that this proposition should go before the committee in order that parliament should pronounce upon the question whether or not the work was for the general advantage of Canada. The hon. member is exactly thirty-three years behind the times. In every act passed by the railway committee of this parliament the first clause provides that "this act is for the general advantage of Canada," and this clause has appeared in this bill since 1894, so that my hon. friend is wrong there.

I want to take up for a few moments the argument, or the want of argument, of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). He made a very fine peroration. He started off by throwing this matter into a political arena, without any question of doubt, making a dividing line from Mr. Speaker to the other end of the chamber.

Mr. BROWN: That line was drawn by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary).

Mr. ARTHURS: I am not talking about the hon. member for South Toronto, but the hon. member for Ottawa, and to-day he made exactly the statement I am making now. He drew a political line, and my hon. friend (Mr. Brown) tried to get away from that line, to hedge around it, or crawl under it, or something of that kind. In fact he did not know what position he took, but the position of the hon. member for Ottawa was plain and distinct. In the early part of his remarks he made it a political question. Later on he spoke about sanguinary purposes and so on, and tried to connect the name of my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) with certain organizations in favour of one or other of the parties who are lined against us in favour of this scheme. He was not very successful, and after that he appealed to everybody generally. He appealed to the members of parliament, the members from Quebec, the members from Montreal, and after he had made that distinct appeal to those members whom he knew were unfavourable to this canal project, or any other canal project for that matter, he appealed to the members from the west, and the only rise he got was from the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown)—the only member who would support him at this time.

When I spoke on this question previously I said without any equivocation that I believed this matter should go to the committee, the reason being that I believed in the canal. But I do not believe in the company. I have perfect faith in the canal scheme. I have no knowledge for or against the company which is behind the proposition at the present time. I have no reason to know, nor have I any reason to believe, that any set of parties, whether they be Siftons or Holts, are behind the proposition, and I do not care whether they are or not. All we ask is certain safeguards, and we can go along regardless of who may be behind the company. We believe that if any power is developed in the process of constructing the canal along the Ottawa river or the French river, or any portion of either or both of them, that power shall be under the control, as to its distribution and price, of the Hydro Electric Commission, or of such other body as is appointed by the province of Ontario, so far as Ontario rights are concerned. We believe equally that any power generated which belongs to the province of Quebec should be under the control of some body appointed by that province as to exportation or as to price.

The people of northern Ontario are absolutely in favour of this canal. They do not care anything about the power proposition, nor are they concerned with the company. As a matter of fact this canal project has been before the country for many years. The bill now under consideration is to all intents and purposes, according to parliamentary rules, one of a private nature, although I would point out to the ministry and particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it is not a private bill in the ordinary sense of the word. The charter has been opposed by Quebec and Ontario, the only two provinces in the Dominion that are interested in the matter; and the bill is being opposed likewise. This is consequently a government question on which the government should say either yes or no. They should be prepared to state whether they are ready to dispose of any of the rights that they may have in any or all of the streams, international or interprovincial, running through this country, or whether they are going to allow any or all companies to have charter rights along those streams. And the number of international and interprovincial streams in Canada are very few, and this is one of them. I have no doubt that the average man in Ontario and Quebec is awaiting a pronouncement from the government to the effect I suggest, but the only information we have had from the ministerial side comes from the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), who declares in favour of submitting the bill to the committee—for what purpose? To pass it? I think not. I think the government is trying in a quiet and easy way to kill the bill or, in other words, to have an opportunity of disposing of this power without the interference of this particular company.

For many years practically all of the provinces were in favour of this canal. Speaking for Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and the eastern provinces generally, I think it was the consensus that this canal should be built: first, on the ground that it is all Canadian; secondly, that it would be over 300 miles shorter than the projected St. Lawrence route; thirdly, that it was cheaper to build; and in the fourth place—this is a secondary consideration—that it would not be affected by the levels of the great lakes. Originally the canal was projected on the basis of a nine-foot depth, to be built by the Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the next proposition was put forward, not by the canal company but by the Canadian Pacific Railway, who made complete survey of the French river section of the canal. I believe that had it not been for their financial condition at that time they would have built the canal on the basis of a sixteen-foot depth from the mouth of the French river to North Bay. We must bear in mind that when this proposition was put forward there was no such place as Cobalt. When the Canadian Pacific Railway were about to undertake the building of this section of the canal there was in northern Ontario no mining country of any description: Cobalt was entirely unknown and the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway had not even been projected. Indeed, even after the originally proposed depth had been increased to twenty or twenty-two feet our great paper mills of northern Ontario, which to-day are producing the greater proportion of our paper exports, had not been contemplated.

The government of Canada, under the administration of the present Prime Minister's predecessor, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had a survey made of the whole canal proposition from one end to the other, although the report was submitted after that government had gone out of power. During their regime, however, a commission was appointed to look into the matter, and that commission afterwards reported. The commission cost Canada approximately one and a quarter million dollars and their report was that the canal scheme was absolutely feasible in every way. Nay, more, they said that there was not the slightest doubt that there would be plenty of water not only for the present but for the future. The building of the canal was delayed in many ways. In the first place there was the uncertainty as to capital; and, secondly, notwithstanding the favourable report of the commission, nothing could be done on account of the war, which came on soon afterwards. Next, a proviso was embodied in the charter whereby the government reserved the right to control this enterprise at all stages, so that no construction could be started until they agreed to the plans of the company. So far as I am aware these plans have never been agreed to by this or any other government. Another difficulty was this. After the government had taken away the power rights and had declared that all power generated should be at the disposal of the railway commission, and that no tolls should be charged on the canal, the company naturally asked for a guarantee of their bonds at three per cent; and this being refused, no construction has taken place.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Many of us on this side of the House were more or less opposed to the building of the present or the prospective Welland canal. The Welland canal now in course of construction was proposed by a government of which I was a humble follower, and the engineers' estimate was $50,000,000. We have already spent approximately $110,000,000 on that canal and the only result is that we are benefiting or will benefit ports on the American side. We have on the Canadian side no harbours which can receive boats of the capacity of the new Welland canal. The harbour of Toronto accommodates vessels of about sixteen feet, Cobourg, of about eleven feet, and so on along the lakes. The fact is that all deep water channels are along the other side of lake Ontario. Now, I believe the St. Lawrence canal scheme is a good thing, and I have nothing against it. But why should we not build from the ocean up? Why spend $110,000,000 on the Welland canal when it is estimated that $108,000,000 would build canals up to lake Ontario? Our eastern friends can bring up their coal gradually as the canals are built into the province of Ontario, but if you start at the Welland canal and work down the inevitable result will be that their American competitors will follow the canals mile by mile, and instead of getting coal or other products from Nova Scotia we in Ontario will find that American trade is using that canal.

I would also like to call the attention of the government to a very important point in connection with this proposition. It is all very well to sit back and say, we are going to build the Welland canal, or the St. Lawrence system or some other canal, at a cost of $500,000,000 or $800,000,000 or $1,400,000,000; the same proposition will come up in each case. Where are you going to get the water and how are you going to get the harbours? Our friends from Montreal know very well that there is very serious danger to the ship channel between Montreal and the ocean; they know that even there the level is being lowered. I hold in my hand a return of this House under date of February 28, in answer to a question as to what action the government had taken to ascertain the levels of the various lakes, and also to inquire what action had been taken in regard to a protest or claim at Washington. In answer to that we are told that the lowering of the level in lake Huron due to the Chicago drainage canal has been 0.5 feet, and that the lowering of the level due to the removal of gravel from lake St. Clair was 0.6 feet, or in all a lowering of 1.1 feet. I was not satisfied with that answer and asked a question later in this House, the answer to which I now hold in my hand. The question reads:

1. Having regard to sessional paper No. 118, question No. 1, has any department of the government kept any record of the levels of the great lakes or any part thereof, for all or part of the last ten years?
2. If so, what does such report show as above or below zero?
3. What is zero for each of the great lakes?

The important part of the answer is that given to question No. 2. According to this answer the actual lowering of levels as shown by the Department of Marine and Fisheries —not by the International Joint Commission, which showed a loss of 1.1 feet in lake Huron, one-half of which was attributable to the Chicago drainage canal—as measured daily and hourly throughout the year, is given as 3.19 feet, or 2.09 feet more than was given in a return to a question which was passed as an order for return four or five days previously. The thing is absolutely absurd. Those of us who live on the shores of the great lakes know very well that the levels of those lakes are lowering very fast, and that something must be done in this regard.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of a canal but not a power scheme. I am quite willing to allow this bill to go to any committee of this House or to be thrown out by the House provided that the government will guarantee one or two very simple things. I have not the slightest doubt that each member of the government will say that in any power project along the St. Lawrence river the Dominion government will see that proper safeguards are included, and that no dam or other work be placed on that river unless and until such safeguards to the navigation of that stream have been provided. We believe that any dam or other work placed on the Ottawa or French rivers should also provide these safeguards in every case. In many cases according to the plans of the government no additional cost will be entailed but in even the most extreme instance the additional cost cannot exceed more than 2 per cent to 5 per cent at the most, because each one of these lockheads so placed would act as a sluiceway in case of emergency, and that is one of the principal things we desire. If the government will say they are prepared to guarantee that in all these waters under their jurisdiction provision will be made to safeguard navigation according to the plans of their own engineers, I am quite prepared to back up the government in this proposition. That was the most important point I desired to bring out. I have already pointed out that at the time the original charter for this canal was granted the resources of our north country were practically unknown; we had no mines in northern Ontario, no pulp and paper mills, and nothing of that kind was thought of. This was then simply a canal scheme for the purpose of exporting grain from western Canada.

I do not know that I need go any further, Mr. Speaker. Just in conclusion I might say that I am opposed to any private interest in this matter, and would far rather see this canal constructed under public ownership. As I have already said, all we are asking is that the government shall safeguard not only the interests of Ontario and Quebec so far as power is concerned but the interests of the people from Montreal to Mattawa and from the Georgian bay to lake Nipissing so far as navigation is concerned, and this will be found to be a small matter in comparison to the complete project.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have no apology to offer for addressing the House to-night on this subject, because I do not think a question of greater importance has come before parliament during the five sessions I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House. In my opinion the Petersen contract of such odoriferous fame was a mere bagatelle, so far as the evil nature of the contract was concerned, as compared to the charter now before us. At the outset of my remarks I would like to brand this charter as the most glaring example of commercial and political brigandage attempted in this House during my time, and for a parallel we will have to go back to the old days of railway exploitation, on which the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is so well informed.

For a few moments now I wish to deal with the speech of the promoter of the bill, made this afternoon by the hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). At the outset he described the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition as a smoke screen, and declared that the smoke screen was getting thinner and thinner as the debate proceeded. Well, that may be, but if a smoke screen was created, the only wind that is dissipating that smoke screen is the aroused public opinion against the bill; it has not been the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). I had awaited his speech with intense interest in the hope that he would give us some arguments on behalf of the bill. He failed in his entire speech to produce a single argument as to why the bill should be supported. All he told us was: let it go to the committee and there I will give you all the information. Well, we want the information now before we let the bill go to committee. We are trying to get what light we can, and I have, in my humble way, Sir, done all I could to secure the fullest knowledge of the question.

It is not so very many weeks since one of the kindly directors, a director I think he is, of this company asked me to give him an interview. I did so. I am always glad to have any gentleman inside or outside the House come and see me. In the course of the interview this gentleman aroused my interest on this question; and on that point itself, Mr. Speaker, let me ask you to refer for a moment to some of the editorials written on the question of lobbying. Lobbying is declared by the Ottawa Journal to be a very fearful thing today, especially that of the professional lobbyist. Well, the professional lobbyist may have some influence upon some hon. gentlemen, but I wish to assure you that the only influence this lobbyist had upon me was to make me go further for some information of more value.

My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) was kind enough subsequently to allow me to read the brief which he possesses on behalf of this company. I think indeed he called it his own brief, and he allowed me to take it away with me and also to use it now. For that courtesy I thank him. I intend to use the brief, and I hope to use it to better advantage than the hon. gentleman, with all his eloquence, did this afternoon.

The hon. gentleman talked of a smoke screen, and yet the very first attempt on his part to influence the House was to draw another smoke screen into the debate by making a general allegation against the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission in support of which he did not produce a single tittle of evidence. He questioned the management of public ownership, but he did not tell us why. I gave him an opportunity. I asked him in what respects it failed. He waved the question to one side as a matter of absolutely no importance, and declined to clear up the very smoke screen that he himself had spread in this chamber. Well, I do not wish to go into that matter at any length, but in order not to leave the impression that he tried to leave upon the House—I do not think the impression was left, but he tried to leave it—let me again quote from a statement that has already been quoted in this debate; it is worth requoting:

The other day—

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Said the hon. member for one of the Winnipeg constituencies:

—I noticed the Electrical World, one of the most reliable of American magazines in this field, estimated in its issue of January 2, 1926, that the grand total of electrical consumption in the United States during 1925 was 47,997,000,000 kilowatt hours for which was paid $1,389,000,000, or an average of 2.9 cents per kilowatt hour.

Commenting on this an American writer points to Ontario—

Under the Hydro Electric Commission, which the hon. gentleman waves to one side as guilty of violating the principles of public ownership and of questionable management.

—as the bright spot on this continent in respect to cheap light, heat and power, and states: The grand total of Ontario sales was 1,157,000,000 kilowatt hours for which the people paid $19,137,000, or an average of 1.65 cents per kilowatt hour.

As compared with 2.9 cents in the United States. He says:

"If," we Americans had paid Ontario rates, we would have saved ourselves in 1925, $600,000,000.

Surely that speaks well for the management of hydro electric; that speaks well for public ownership in the province of Ontario.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not wish unnecessarily to interrupt my hon. friend, but will he say that under a different management of the Ontario Hydro the cost would not be quite as much as it is now?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It would be very difficult for me to enter the field of prophecy in a matter so extremely technical as this, but let me say that when the principle of public ownership, applied in a practical way in the province of Ontario, has secured such very satisfactory results over private ownership in the United States for which he is an advocate, it speaks very well for public ownership.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend will admit it is not conclusive.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is more conclusive than any of the arguments my hon. friend used this afternoon.

The hon. gentleman then continued his exudation of the smoke screen, like one of those little aeroplanes that sometimes hover over the centre of New York city advertising cigarettes, and he reasoned very plausibly, but hardly logically, that the reason for the Conservative opposition—far be it from me to defend hon. gentlemen to my right, who do not need any defense in this case—the reason for their opposition was, if you please, because Mr. R. B. Bennett was a director of this new company? that is of the International Paper Company—that Mr. Southam was a competitor, or presumed competitor, of the Sifton interests—and that Mr. Smeaton White was another. It was very fortunate indeed that there was an hon. gentleman in the chamber at the time who was wise enough to take up the hon. gentleman's statement and to ask him to read the other names on the board of directors. Without going any further into that I think I may say that the answer the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) gave the hon. gentleman from Ottawa entirely destroyed that argument; indeed, it did not leave a fragment of it existing.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to say—and this, by the way, is an exceedingly interesting point—that the reason why the Ottawa Citizen is opposed to the Georgian bay canal is because Mr. Southam is a director of the Canadian International Paper Company. Well, it was an amazing statement, for which the hon. gentleman did not bring any proof; he simply made the assertion It may be quite true, I am not going to defend Mr. Southam. The hon. gentleman then said that he could not state why the Ottawa Journal was opposed to the canal, and leaves us to assume as the reason the fact that it is a Conservative organ, but let me submit that the hon. gentleman overlooked many important papers. He overlooked for example the Toronto Globe. He will not say what personal interest the Toronto Globe has in opposing this charter or supporting the Holt interests of Montreal. He overlooked the Hamilton Herald, he overlooked the Port Hope Times, he overlooked the Gananoque Reporter, he overlooked the Brantford Expositor the Kingston Whig-Standard, the Hamilton Spectator, the St. Catharines Standard, and a dozen other papers, every one of which is unanimously, bitterly and unalterably opposed to the renewal of this vicious charter.

He then went on to discuss what is known as the lease to the National Hydro in Quebec, and he properly referred to the fact that the Conservative government in 1926, when in office for a few months, did renew an old lease endowing it with enormously increased powers. But he did not give us the history of that transaction; he did not tell us any more about it. Well, I will just summarize briefly what took place in regard to the Carillon power development in connection with the National Hydro. The first lease for the development of Carillon power was granted many years ago, not by my hon. friends to my right but by the gentleman who is now the Hon. Senator George P. Graham. Senator Graham was then and is now a Liberal. The lease itself received several extensions, and just prior to the 1921 election the administration under Mr. Meighen granted a lease for a much greater amount of power development. This lease was also extended from time to time until two years ago, when an attempt was made to secure a lease for the development of all the available horse power at that point. This lease was never agreed to, was never signed. Why? Because there had arisen the question of provincial rights with respect to water. There is no question whatever that under the British North America Act once the Ottawa river had been declared a navigable stream the federal government assumed rights over navigation and to the water needed for navigation. But in addition to that there is the justifiable and asserted claim of the provinces for their share of the power possible of development from their share of the stream. Therefore, before this lease could be signed or agreed to, both the provinces had objected with the result that the lease was never signed and never agreed to. In 1926, however, as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) has stated, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who was at that time I think Acting Minister of Railways, renewed the lease giving enormously extended powers. May I say I think that was a usurpation of power out of keeping altogether with the present attitude of the Conservative party?

Mr. ARTHURS: If, as the hon. member says, the right of the provinces is absolute without a question of doubt, what possible right would the Dominion have to grant any of these powers to any company?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It so happent that there is a little navigation canal built at Carillon I believe by the Department of Public Works which gave the Dominion authority over a certain quantity of power there. There was a canal built and authority was given many years ago to a company of which the National Hydro of Montreal is the successor, to develop a certain small horse power from the flow of water. Subsequently they came for more powers, but the question of provincial rights had risen especially in connection with the development of public ownership in Ontario.

I need not deal much further with the hon. gentleman's speech. He went on to assail hon. members to my right because certain of their number had in past days signed certain memorials advocating the construction of this canal. Frankly speaking, I cannot see what that has to do with the problem before us. They may have done so, it is true, for political expediency or any other reason, but this has nothing to do with the question and instead the hon. gentleman should have been raising arguments on behalf of this project.

The hon. member in a sort of premature—I hardly know what to call it—eulogy described the altruism of the Sifton interests and in glowing terms, continuing of course his smoke-screen tactics, went on to talk of Canada for the Canadians. If the hon. gentleman had said to this House that this bill rather meant Canada for the Siftons, he would have been a great deal closer to the truth. For the life of me I fail to see what interest Canadians will have in the bill after the Sifton interests get hold of it.

Let us examine this question for a few moments. A deep waterway canal is the alleged objective of the bill and the hon. member goes on to say that there has never been any serious obstacle to the proposal as a constructive project. This afternoon in the course of his speech he raised the point saying that there was no question as to the feasibility of the canal. Then, without describing in detail the feasibility of the project, he went on with his speech. As a matter of fact the hon. gentleman's assertion was not correct. There has always been the gravest doubt as to the feasibility of this canal and in a moment I will give the House a few opinions in that regard. Let me, however, suggest to him and to his administration that it would have been much wiser, before sponsoring this bill, if he and his friends had taken the trouble to study certain of the memoranda submitted in days past by the engineers of the Department of Public Works to the administration. Amongst them we find one dated in the year 1925 dealing with the plans to which my hon. friend referred this afternoon and which were then submitted to the administration. This is a memorandum to the deputy minister and signed by K. M. Cameron, chief engineer of the Department of Public Works. The memorandum, which is dated January 2, 1925, reads:

> With respect to the application of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company for approval of plan submitted with their letter of December 18, 1924, to the Governor General in Council, the plan covering that section of the Ottawa river between Hawkesbury, Ontario, and Pointe Fortune, Quebec, it is noted that the plan is an adaptation of the suggested route and layout of works as embodied in the 1908 report by the Public Works department on the proposed Georgian bay ship canal.

It was merely an adaptation of an old plan made by the engineers in 1908.

> That project was based on the then existing depth for navigation in the great lakes and proposed depth of 22 feet on the sills of the locks, the locks to be 650 feet in length and 65 feet in width.

I wish at this point to make the assertion, which is of course supported in these memoranda, that this company of which my hon. friend is the advocate in this House has never yet submitted to the department a single plan of a concrete or concise nature. The government has never dared to give sanction to or approval of a single plan submitted, and to this very moment the government itself knows that the Sifton interests behind this bill have not a single intention, as shown by any plans of building a canal. The report of the engineer would confirm that. It reads:

> The government has before it in report No. 2 of the inter-departmental committee on the St. Lawrence waterway the findings and recommendations of that committee on the most advantageous dimensions for the St. Lawrence waterway. As the canalization of the Ottawa would be a side, and possibly alternative route for the St. Lawrence waterway—

The very argument used by my hon. friend.

> —the dimensions of the locks and channels should be made to conform with those recommended for the St. Lawrence waterways. The plan is very general in the information it gives as to the proposals of the company. Before, however, any work is allowed to be done by the company it is recommended that the company agree, in writing, to furnish additional plans and information in accordance with the following recommendations.

The engineer then goes on to give a number of recommendations, many of which should be placed on the records of the House, but it may save time if I submit this long report for publication in Hansard. It should be in the hands of hon. members but I hesitate to delay the House in reading it. The recommendations are as follows:

> 1. Locks on the canal to be 30 feet deep over the sills, 80 feet wide at the chamber and have a clear length of 800 feet in the chamber; the depth of water in the canal reaches to be 27½ feet below low water for the reach.
> 2. To submit for approval further plans showing the details of the dam or dams proposed, of the nature of the foundations of the dams as disclosed by borings, of the regulating works and of the power installation.
> 3. The dam or dams to be designed, constructed and provided with a highway 20 feet clear width with a 4-foot sidewalk, with suitable approaches from one shore to the other, the highway to be capable of carrying 15-ton motor truck loads. Tolls for the use of the bridge to be as approved by the railway commission of Canada.
> 4. To submit plans in detail for approval showing: (a) Areas of lands to be flooded and areas where flowage rights are to be acquired, with book of reference, and assessed damages;

(b) Areas of lands to be acquired for right of way and works of the canal, with book of reference, including all federal government lands, works, or properties to be taken over, and valuation;

(c) Plan, profile, sections and elevations of proposed canal, locks, channels, and works, showing soundings, borings, nature of materials of construction, details of construction and specifications covering works to be performed;

(d) Location, plan and proposed type, size, loading and clearances of all bridges;

(e) Location, plan and profile, size and capacity of all culverts and sewers with plans of areas to be drained;

(f) Location, plan and profile, size, capacity, method of construction of all water supply systems for domestic and other purposes;

(g) All plans and specifications submitted for approval to bear the signature of an engineer or engineers of recognized standing, to be dated and to have a distinguishing number;

(h) Working plans or plans of work as actually built, and specifications, to be provided as soon as any part or parts of work are completed.

5. To submit for approval before any work is undertaken a schedule or order of performance of the various works embraced in the general scheme.

6. That officials of the Public Works department shall have access to and free control of the operation of the compensating or of the regulating sluices wherever situated, and shall have the right to measure the discharge of the various channels and passages and to adjust the flow in the public interest, any expense becoming a lien against the property of the company.

7. The company to furnish, without cost, to the Public Works department copies of its records of the flow of the Ottawa river in such terms, at such times and based on ratings satisfactory to the chief engineer, Public Works department, as that officer may require.

8. The company shall save the government harmless should the construction of works in the St. Lawrence or Ottawa river above or below the proposed works, affect the level of the river above or below the works, and shall save the government harmless should the construction of the works affect rights heretofore existing above, below or comprised within the area of the proposed works.

9. The works shall not be designed, constructed, or subsequently operated to prevent the passage at any and at all times of the regular flow of the Ottawa river, to the detriment of Montreal harbour and the St. Lawrence river.

10. The company to be responsible for and to compensate for any damage which may be caused by its works to other companies or interest owning or operating water-power on the Ottawa river and its tributaries above Carillon and Pointe Fortune.

11. A satisfactory fishway approved by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to be provided in the dam or dams.

12. Statistics of shipping and of production and disposal of power to be furnished in the manner and when required by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

(Signed) K. M. CAMERON,
Chief Engineer.

Not a single recommendation of the engineers has been carried out, and to-day with the bill before us asking for our sanction, the company has not submitted a single plan which the government can conscientiously recommend to the governor in council for his approval. Report after report, memorandum after memorandum, statement after statement by the engineers of the department responsible for ascertaining the facts about matters of this kind simply confirm this. For example, on the 13th July, 1925, the following statement occurred:

> For reasons such as they may be, the department cannot recommend to the minister the asking of council to approve—this information to the company simply to inform them as to the cause of delay in an early advice.

And so on through report after report. It is true that they submitted some varying plans in the meantime, a little addition here, a little addition there of no material effect. Then in general effect a further memorandum dated January 20, 1925, goes on:

> The charter authorized the building of a nine foot canal from Ottawa to Georgian bay and gave the company the right to produce and dispose of all hydro-electric power in connection therewith.

From 1910 onwards no mention is made of the depth of water in the canal or canals until the 1912 plan of which the hon. gentleman spoke this afternoon. The memorandum goes on:

> This plan is a very general one, practically a duplicate of the Department of Public Works Georgian Bay ship canal scheme of 1908, at a scale of 2,000 feet to the inch, showing the centre line of proposed canal with locks of 650 feet by 65 feet by 24 feet at Pointe Fortune and Hawkesbury, and dams, power houses and regulating sluices at both Carillon and near Grenville.

Mr. ADSHEAD: A government plan?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. It was an old and subsequently discarded plan. These plans are discarded; they are to-day worthless, and until the report of the engineers is carried out in detail, this House should not be asked even to consider something which the government has not dared to recommend to this House or to the governor in council. Subsequent to the 1908 plan, upon which all the existing plans of the company are now based, an investigation was held into this whole question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When were the plans asked to be approved?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The only date I can find is December 12, 1925. This is simply a file, No. 223, tabled by the department on June 1, 1926, containing the correspondence up to and including that date.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the two volumes of Sessional Papers, one for 1916 and the other for 1918, containing an enormous mass of information, indeed they are almost entirely devoted to the reports of the Sanford Evans commission. That commission sat for four years. It was appointed about 1916 for the purpose of investigating this whole project—the canal project, of which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat spoke. With the limited time at my disposal I have carefully studied these papers and have had others read them for me, and they contain not a single line or sentence that could be used by anyone in support of the canal project. On the contrary, as a result of the three reports made to the House since 1918, the canal project has been as dead as a herring. Why is it brought along at this time—why, after the government itself refused to sanction the plans of the company, why after the government itself dropped the whole subject after receiving the report of the Sanford Evans commission? The reason has been given by several speakers; it is this: the power necessities of the provinces have developed so rapidly that they provide an excellent opportuniy for exploitation hitherto unknown. There is no doubt in my mind that that is behind the whole effort of the promoters of this bill.

So far as the feasibility of the construction end of the canal is concerned, I would simply call attention to parts of a report by engineers in which the following passages occur:

> A glance at map "A" of the survey made by the Department of Public Works in 1908 shows that this canal as projected has its western terminal at the mouth of the French river, on Georgian bay, and ascends said river through 3 lift locks up into lake Nipissing, and through it to North bay, 82½ miles.

This is the description given in the report of portions of the proposed Georgian bay and Ottawa canal route:

> The Georgian bay coast is probably the most dangerous of any on the great lakes, and the entrance of the middle outlet of the French river, while not particularly difficult of navigation, is dangerous, being comparatively narrow and confined between submerged ledges of rock and small islands. At the mouth of French river, four miles out from the shore, are the Bustard rocks, and safe water in the lake is not reached until four miles beyond these.

So the entrance to the river alone for large steamers is so extremely dangerous as to render the canal project largely unfeasible. For eight miles you would have to travel in a narrow channel between submerged rocks and islands, and the rates of insurance as a result would be enormously high, especially as that portion of the coast is described by navigators as the most dangerous of the whole Georgian bay coast.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What is the width of the channel?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is not given. But in a high wind the hon. gentleman can readily realize that a vessel steaming up to the mouth of the French river, at reduced speed necessary in entering the canal having lost a good deal of its leeway, would be in great danger of being blown onto these submerged rocks. In fact the situation would be perilous. At any rate those navigators and engineers who have studied the local conditions are satisfied that the entrance to the French river is so dangerous as in itself to condemn the project from the navigation point of view.

Mr. BROWN: Has the hon. member at hand the extent of the lift from lake Huron up to lake Nipissing?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, but it would take a long time to go through it all. There are three lift locks. Let me, however, say that in that portion of the report pointing out further difficulties in the canal situation it is stated:

> Because the height of land separating the waters of the great lakes and those flowing to the Ottawa river must be crossed by the Ottawa-Georgian bay canal, there must be a summit level from which the canal can be fed east and west to its terminal harbours. A canal fed from a summit level requires twice as much water as end-fed canals like the Welland and the St. Lawrence. The height of land, which is a granite ridge is between lake Nipissing and Trout lake. At this height of land a reservoir is to be made incorporating Trout, Turtle and Talon lakes, and must contain water enough at all times for canal purposes. The summit level or reservoir has an elevation of 29 feet above lake Nipissing, 99 feet above Georgian bay, and 677 feet above sea level.

When one gets into the details of the report it is apparent that the engineers themselves in their preliminary plans saw that it would be necessary to consider plans for the installation of several heavy pumping plants, to be used, in addition to the natural flow of water, to pump water from Georgian bay or some other source into the height of land basin in order to provide sufficient flow of water for the canal.

Mr. LAPIERRE: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman interjects a denial; then let me read the report itself, which devotes much space to the problem of maintaining the required volume of water at the summit level. The following extract from the report reveals the concern of the engineers regarding this question:

When the sufficiency of the water supply at the summit level of a canal is in question, its correct determination is a most important problem.

Now I ask my hon. friend to note this. There was no doubt about the engineers being uncertain regarding the quantity of water that they could obtain to supply the summit level or they would not have proposed the following:

A pumping plant has been designed which would take the water from about 1,500 feet below the entrance to the locks to lake Nipissing and discharge it the same distance above the upper entrance against a head of 27 feet. There are to be five units, each consisting of 1,000 horse power motor, directly connected to a turbine pump of 200 cubic feet per second capacity. These pumps can keep the summit reservoir full and could be closed down for two months, while the demands of navigation are supplied from the reservoirs. It is true that in no large canal has such a principle ever been resorted to for supplementing a deficiency in the water supply.

I need not go further. I simply point to those extracts from the reports made by the engineers to indicate that the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa this afternoon that the feasibility of the canal is unquestioned is not accurate. Its feasibility is most seriously in question.

Let me now come to another point raised. The hon. gentleman described with great vividness the altruism of the promoters of the bill. This bill was for the purpose of devloping a canal, he states—always a canal, nothing but a canal. In the hon. gentleman's own brief, in the brief that many hon. gentlemen opposite have seen and some have been influenced by, the following statements occur:

By the 91st section of the British North America Act of 1867 the parliament of Canada possesses the exclusive legislative authority to deal with and control navigable waters for purposes of navigation and shipping.

Then comes the following:

It is clear that the Dominion does not possess any rights—

I want those hon. gentlemen who are anxious to ascertain the nature of the provincial rights in this matter to pay attention to what follows:

It is clear that the Dominion does not possess any rights on such rivers aside from or in excess of those derived by virtue of the above mentioned right of the Dominion to so deal with and control navigable waters for the purposes of navigation.

Therefore, according to the brief of the gentleman himself, all waters not needed for navigation belong to the provinces, by the very right of the provinces for development purposes. You will notice how this document contradicts itself.

The actual property in such navigable waters is vested in the provinces but is subject to an over-riding right of user appertaining to the Dominion for navigation and shipping purposes.

The Ottawa river was declared navigable and all works thereon declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, by an act of parliament passed in 1870, being 33 Vict. chap. XXIV.

Now here is where the company gets in some of its nasty legal arguments:

By the special acts respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal company, the parliament of Canada has authorized that company to develop the navigation of the Ottawa river.

By so doing the parliament of Canada exhausted during the currency of those acts, the rights of the Dominion in regard to the granting of the use of water on the Ottawa river. Any executive authority granted by the Dominion for the use of water on the Ottawa river for any purpose except navigation and shipping is invalid as being ultra vires.

Again they admit provincial rights, but before they get through they throw provincial rights to the winds in the following:

Therefore the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal have the exclusive and overriding right to the use of water on the Ottawa river, a right which, when put into force, destroys all other claims. Any existing users of water in the Ottawa river are, to the extent to which they interfere with the right of development and control of that river for navigation, interlopers with no legal status whatsoever.

But notice the qualification:

To the extent to which they interfere with the rights of development and control of that river for navigation.

Now turn back to paragraph (j) of their own statement, the statement of the brief of the hon. member for Ottawa. It reads:

As a matter of physical fact there is no water in the Ottawa river which is not essential for navigation.

The company behind the scheme claims that under this charter the Dominion of Canada will have relinquished not only all its rights but all other rights provincial or private now existing. Let me ask hon. members this question: after listening to the hon. member for Ottawa this afternoon, and other lawyers who have spoken, can you not imagine what a hideous mass of litigation the passing of this legislation would mean to the Dominion and the provinces? Do you think, after the statement of Premier Howard

Ferguson, speaking for Ontario; after the unanimous resolution passed by the legislative body of that province, and after the position taken by Premier Taschereau, who has asserted, in respect of the Ottawa river, the rights of the province of Quebec—do you think the parliament of Canada could get away with such a violation of provincial rights as to pass this bill and give to a private company the right to declare everybody and every interest now using the river an interloper with no rights whatever? The situation is utterly absurd. One would fancy no development had taken place. There have been some developments on the river. If this measure were passed the first litigation we would be up against would be in reference to the Carillon power and then there would be litigation about the power at many other points. If parliament desires to turn the Dominion into a sort of inciter of litigation for the benefit of lawyers by passing such legislation, then I submit parliament could well devote its time to much better purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know about that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend, being a lawyer, does not know about it. I, being a layman, having to pay taxes, do know about it. Again in their own brief they say:

> This is the first occasion in the history of the Dominion of Canada that it has been possible to secure the construction of a great public work without the expenditure of public money, directly or indirectly.

How altruistic, how delightful! I cannot for the life of me, with all the kindness I have in my heart, conceive that the Sifton interests, so powerful commercially, so notoriously known throughout Canada for their ability to secure much of the public domain for their own use and aggrandizement, are now becoming altruistic and are going to build a canal without exacting anything from the public. It is true it will not come out of the treasury directly, but from the pockets of the power users. Well, we will come to a point in connection with that later on. The brief continues:

> The present opportunity to secure enormous, immediate construction activity, with concomitant large circulation in Canada of foreign and new money and the consequent immediate general stimulation to business in the Dominion should, we submit, not be lightly cast aside.

Once this measure is passed the private interests control it. The Sifton interests with their board control it. I want hon. members to imagine any hard-headed Wall street financier advancing to the Siftons or anyone else sufficient funds to undertake the development of this canal or these power projects as long as the terrific danger of litigation which is now threatened rests over their heads. It is absurd to think of it. I do not believe for that single reason alone that the Sifton interests could secure a dollar of United States money for the development of this canal project, because no man with common sense in his head is going to invest large sums of money in the building of a canal and subsequent power projects while there is a danger that it may be held up indefinitely by provincial as well as private legislation. The brief proceeds:

> Incidental to the construction of the Georgian bay canal an enormous amount of electrical energy will be developed.

Yes, about a million horse-power. Now note:

> Upon this fact hinges the present opportunity. It is this incidental electrical development which makes possible the building of the canal other than at the expense of the taxpayer.

You know that is a pretty ingenious way of getting round the taxpayer, but let me point out for a moment, as has been pointed out before in this debate, the stupidity and the absurdity of the argument. The taxpayer is not going to be assessed directly for the building of the canal, but the poor beggars along the canal route in the zone to be served by the electrical energy developed are to pay for the whole development of what should be a national project. It would be a grievous violation of every known principle in connection with canal construction. Well, there is no use going further than that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Quite no use.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I cannot imagine an hon. gentleman coming here with a brief of that kind—they practically say, "let us soak the local consumers of electrical energy for the purpose of building a canal several hundred miles in length, in order that it may become a national transportation link. A private company should never be permitted to develop any large transportation project of this nature. It is a violation of the old principle that the Dominion government shall build and control canals and that they shall be toll-free to the public. Yet here, not only is it a violation of that principle by allowing private interests to undertake the construction of it, but we are proposing to allow the company to charge tolls. It is true they admit they do not expect to get very much revenue from these tolls. They do not expect to get enough to pay the interest on the investment and operating costs on any fair proportion of the total capital. They expect the total cost to be about $282,000,000, and the consumers of electricity are to be asked to pay the fixed charges and operating costs on $250,000,000 of that total. They expect to pick up something additional in the way of tolls from the users of the canals to cover the charges on the $32,000,000 balance. The brief says:

A large part of the expense of developing the potential hydro-electrical energy along the route of the Georgian bay canal is inherent in the building of the canal.

Yes, surely it is.

The canal cannot be constructed without at the same time constructing the dams and practically everything necessary for the electrical development.

Quite right. Not only that, but I make this assertion that the company can at any time step into any part of this canal project and build any dam for the alleged purpose of canalizing that part of the system, and then pass on to some other district, building another dam and there is not a single obligation upon them to complete the water-way. There is no obligation in the charter to compel them to do so, and I defy the promoter of the bill to contradict this statement. The hon. member is in his seat and if he can dissuade me from this view I shall be pleased to have him do so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I made my argument this afternoon and the hon. member can read it in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I listened to the hon. member's whole argument this afternoon, if it was indeed an argument—and I wish to be kind to him—but I repeat, he cannot disprove the statement I have just made. The company's brief proceeds:

For the comparatively small additional expense of installing the power houses and turbines, the power can be developed as well as the navigation. Private parties are willing to take the no inconsiderable risk that the sale of power plus the tolls on the canal will pay interest, maintenance, etc., and sinking fund—that is, all fixed and operating charges on the cost of the canal plus power, whereas to do the same, tolls on the canal alone would have to be so high as to be prohibitive. Therefore, without the coincident development of power, the canal could not be financed. With it it can.

Furthermore, as a matter of cold engineering fact, the same excavations, foundations, dams, sluices, embankments, raising of levels, etc., etc., are required for navigation as for power.

That is their own statement: the power is to pay for the whole business.

So they can proceed to put up dams, foundations, sluices, embankments, and so forth, develop power at any given point and then pass on to another section, but there is no obligation upon them to complete the canal.

The reverse is not true, the power can be developed without undergoing the expense of canal cuts or locks.

Certainly. I submit this point to show that because of the ease with which as they themselves admit the canal can be built, the federal government should undertake the construction of this waterway if it is at all feasible although as I have already shown I have serious doubts in the matter. The brief goes on:

The real fact that in navigable rivers the Dominion of Canada and those holding title from the Dominion of Canada can control the water-power as against the rival claims of the provinces,

There again they frankly confess that there will be rivalry.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. gentleman explain what he means by a "brief"? I did not know that hon. gentlemen in this House were allowed to read briefs prepared by any company.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I was also under that impression, but I know that on many occasions briefs are prepared and submitted to hon. members. I will not press the point because I am indebted to the courtesy of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) who has been very fair with me in this matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I wish my hon. friend were as fair with me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I try to be so. The statement goes on.

Upon the issuance of the order in council approving the plans of the Montreal and Georgian Bay Canal Company, the special acts referring to that company (which until then are in some respects in suspense) becomes wholly operative to the complete exclusion of any and all other conflicting leases, rights, authorities or claims, and particularly to the complete exclusion of the various so-called impediments to that company, now so strongly supported by various claimants and interim interlopers on the field of navigation. On the issuance of such an order in council, the chartered company's special acts become operative with the full force which it is possible for the sovereign right of the parliament of Canada to give.

The adjustment of all claims would then be a matter of litigation. What a pleasant position for the parliament of Canada to be placed in. And why? Paragraph 17 contains the following explanation:

For the reason that the money made out of power development, which money should construct the canal, would under those conditions have been granted to the shareholders of such power companies as profits and would thus be lost forever.

This could be used to help the construction of the canal. Again we see the object in view.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will my hon. friend be fair with me? He is quoting from a brief with which I have nothing to do. I am not the father of it. This afternoon I submitted to the House my interpretation of the charter, and I stand or fall by that charter and not by the brief which is being quoted. The hon. gentleman is not quoting from any speech of mine nor from any submission I have made.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad to have my hon. friend's refutation of what I presumed to be his brief.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I never said it was.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understood that to be the case, but I accept the hon. gentleman's word.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not mine; and just to prove that it was not prepared by me I may point out that what the hon. member has read is in absolute contradiction to section 43 which I quoted this afternoon.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly. But does the hon. gentleman deny that this is the brief distributed by the Sifton interests?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of that I have no knowledge.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have. It happens to be the same brief they distributed to certain members of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Not throughout the House.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not throughout the House, but to as many members as they could get hold of. The brief goes on:

Power profits can be fairly expected to pay fixed and operating charges on about $250,000,000, leaving about $32,000,000 of additional capital to be found for canal alone.

It is really unnecessary to go further. The whole thing is replete with contradictions and assertions which definitely damn the report in the eyes of any man who believes in public ownership or in the retention of the public domain for the use of the people. The brief condemns itself. I wish all hon. gentlemen had secured copies of it, for I have no doubt that if they had read it there would have been removed from their minds any doubt whatever as to the proper action this parliament should take in respect to the bill now under consideration: they would reject it ruthlessly.

There is another point to be considered. The hon. member who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Arthurs) made a brief reference to it and I may mention it once more because it is one of the strongest arguments against the charter. Surely Canada has had sufficient lessons in the duplication of transportation systems. Surely we have been cured of the mania for grasping at visionary plans of promoters and allowing them to secure public property with a view to realizing some extraordinary ambitious grandiose scheme of transportation. The lessons we have learned with respect to our Canadian transcontinental lines should have convinced us forever of the danger of grasping too easily at such projects. A few years ago we started the Welland canal in which we have sunk nearly $100,000,000 and it will cost the country another twenty to twenty-five million dollars, and possibly more to complete that undertaking. Now if we assume, although I am not willing to do so, except for the sake of argument, that every statement made is correct in relation to the possibility of constructing the canal now under consideration, that the canal can be built to serve a useful purpose, that it will secure the mass of tonnage which the brief of the promoters alleges it will, then I have this to say, that it would take away from the Welland canal project the last possible hope of salvaging one dollar of the taxpayers' money invested in this project for it would then completely replace that canal and render it useless. Are we still mad that we are going to commit ourselves to such a folly? Do we want to lose $110,000,000 already invested in a canal which is almost completed in order to satisfy the promoters of this charter?

Another reason given for the construction of this canal, rather than the completion of the Welland or the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway, is the possibility that in the future we may be faced with the horrors of a conflict with the United States. Let me say to the hon. member who made that suggestion that he did not do himself justice. No matter what fears any individual may have to-day regarding our future relationships with the United States, no argument of that kind could ever justify our stopping the development of the St. Lawrence waterway.

That project will be commenced and completed just as soon as this country is ready for it, just as soon as the people want it and when we are prepared to undertake our share of the expense in connection with it. All the smoke screen which my hon. friend so unfairly brought before the House this afternoon will never dissuade me from the illogical nature of the plan now proposed and the logical nature of the St. Lawrence deep waterways proposal.

All through history and even to this moment, Mr. Speaker, this charter has been surrounded by the most sinister influences. I am now adopting, I will admit, some of the tactics of my hon. friend in referring to it in this way, but I am compelled to do so because many editorials have appeared recently referring to the extensive and highly efficient professional lobbying which has been carried on among members of this House. Personally I have no objection to a lobby if it is reasonable; I am glad to hear all sides of a question, but when a lobbyist comes to my room, as a rule he simply incites my curiosity and causes me to seek information in other places. Nevertheless, it seems to be the fact that people are inclined to regard lobbyism as something suspicious. There is one question, however, which I would like to ask. Why did the ministry through the mouth of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) the other day, virtually declare that if this bill had not been introduced by a private member it would have been introduced by the ministry? Why would the government father a bill which had been dropped by a former government as not being feasible? Why should the ministry introduce this bill when their own engineers and their own Department of Public Works condemn the plans which have been submitted up to the moment? Mr. Speaker, there must be a reason behind it. I am not going to impute motives to the government but I am going to tell them that there are rumours going through this House which the government would do well to refute, rumours that this bill is the result of pre-election pledges. Is that true?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Very well. I have in my hand an editorial appearing in the Catholic Record of London, Ontario, under date of Saturday, March 19. With reference to the sale of royal honours in Great Britain, this editorial says:

> Campaign funds are perhaps a necessary evil. Stable government, with an assured majority, is a good thing. But a government with an assured majority may do things that a government with a precarious majority would not dare to do.
> After all, while the sale of royal honours may muddy up the fountain of honour, it does not cost the common people anything. It is a distasteful way of raising party funds, but it is not stealing from the people.
> There are men in public life who would scorn to enrich themselves by dishonest or dishonourable means, but who would not hesitate to buy campaign funds with the gift of public property.
> Just now in Canada there is the question of reviving the old dead and buried Georgian bay canal.
> There is one and only one reason for this revival.
> It is party funds.
> A stable government, with an assured majority, may look to this source of party funds and dally with it; perhaps put over this gift of electric power to private interests under the pretence of constructing a canal for the benefit of the people. But not if the people show themselves alive to their own interests.
> It would be ten thousand times worse than the sale of royal honours. There is no reason in the world for such a shameless transaction other than the necessity of raising party funds. And to rob the people in order to pay the pirates who will contribute to party funds is infinitely worse than to sell royal honours for cash.

Along with that, we had an incident which occurred during the life of this charter not so many years ago. The House suddenly discovered, after it had passed the bill, that the bill before the Senate was not the bill which had been passed by the House. Something had happened to it in the meantime, some sinister influence had been at work, and the major part of the framework of the bill had been altered. Let me quote from Hansard of February 20, 1913, at page 3741, where Mr. Lancaster, then chairman of the committee on railways and canals moved, seconded by Mr. White of Renfrew, the following:

> That a message be sent to the Senate requesting their honours to return to this House Bill No. 45, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, as it appears that the said bill as sent to the Senate is not printed as passed by the House of Commons.

Some members asked him to explain, and he proceeded as follows:

> It has come to my notice that their honours in the Senate will be called upon to consider a bill presumably passed by this House, but which, if considered in its present form, would put this House in a very ridiculous position. The House of Commons, after due deliberation, passed the bill referred to, and section 4 of the bill as sent to the Senate undertakes to repeal the whole of chapter 123 of the statutes of 1912. This House never did any such thing. It was never suggested by any member that we should. What we did was to repeal section 1. In some strange way—I do not want to impute motives, but I have to have a good deal of charity in my disposition to think this interference was not intentional—after the House dealt with the bill the bill was printed in such a way as to strike out the whole chapter instead of what the House actually did. The effect would be that the company would have no directors and provincial rights with regard to water-powers would not be protected. It is a strange thing; the House will have to deal with it afterwards as they see fit, but it is my duty now as chairman of the railway committee of the House of Commons to call attention to the fact that this House has been placed in the position of having sent a bill to the Senate which we never passed as sent, and I move that the Senate be asked to send that bill back to us in order that a proper bill as passed by this House may go to them for consideration.

This motion was agreed to unanimously. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to delay the House very much longer in this connection. I do submit, however, that this charter should not be renewed for many reasons, first perhaps because of the utter failure of the company to even file plans that could be accepted, the utter failure of the company to do the least thing in keeping with recommendations of the engineers of the Department of Public Works. The company have had thirty-two years in which to do this and nothing has been done as yet. And then again, there is the engineering feature of the scheme. I will be as kind as possible to my friends opposite, but the very best that can be said is that there are grave doubts of the feasibility of this canal scheme, and in any case let me submit what I said before, that if the canal is found to be feasible it should be undertaken as a national enterprise by the Dominion government, and not by a private corporation. Again, the granting of this charter would be a violation of the principle of public ownership, and of the control of the provinces over their own water-powers. The statements of the promoters which I have just read prove conclusively that as soon as the charter is granted they will assume, by virtue of the overriding right vested in the Dominion government, and surrendered to the company to complete and utter control of every interest located along the canal which may interfere with their own project. Again it violates the principle of toll-free canals, and interferes with the development of national ownership of our waterways. It would place at the mercy of an utterly merciless corporation—a private group of some notoriety, which has not public interest as its guiding influence—all those users of electrical power in the immediate vicinity of these works. Any reasonably-minded man knows that the objectives of a commercial corporation such as that seeking this charter are not altruistic and that they are not working for the good of the people. Commercialism to-day has become too bitter for that; it is too vicious a system to ever grant to the people justice and equality. It would place at the disposal of private interests a heritage of the people, and would subject those people in the immediate vicinity of the canal almost to a condition of subjugation in connection with the power for use in the factories and mills and on the farms of the district. It goes to the length of suggesting that those who use power should pay for what should be a national avenue of transportation. That, perhaps, is one of the most vicious features of the whole proposal. It will in the opinion of the hydro-electric commission, according to the statement of Mr. Magrath, and I believe the statement to be perfectly true, prejudice the whole future of hydro development in the province of Ontario. Let us not forget that the hydro-electric commission has reached the limit of its present development, and for its future expansion there are only two great sources of water-power left. One is the St. Lawrence, and the time may not have arrived when we can undertake that development, and the other is the Ottawa river. Do we propose to stop the expansion of public ownership in Ontario by granting to private interests their half—and I say it with all my belief behind it—of the rights to the water-powers of the Ottawa river? Shall we prejudice the whole future of hydro-electric and with that the whole principle of public ownership in the province; to do so would be an indefensible flouting of the expressed, the unanimously expressed, will of the province of Ontario; it would be a flouting of the expressed desire of the province of Quebec through the mouth of its own premier, and it would destroy the last vestige of hope left to the shareholders in the nation, the taxpayers, of securing one dollar back out of the enormous investment of one hundred and twenty millions to which we are committed in the Welland canal.

For all these reasons, and for other reasons which I do not wish to delay the House in reciting, I am opposed to the granting of this charter. I am opposed to this bill even going to committee, because no committee can change the principles under which this charter is being sought. Why waste the valuable time of members of this House by asking them to investigate a bill the underlying principles of which are in violation of the recognized principles I have referred to? That would be stupid and futile. It would be stupid to let a bill, the fundamentals of which you could not change, go to a committee and be killed there. Hon. members opposite have said: let it go to committee and we will kill it there. Why waste time talking over this bill for a couple of months just to kill it in committee? Kill it now. The principle of the bill is unsound, absolutely unsound in every respect. Whether as regards the canal development or as regards the power development, it is unsound in principle. It is a violation of the rights of the people. It is a clear, absolute and complete theft of the people's property. It is a deliberate attempt to surrender the heritage of the Canadian people to private interests. I support the amendment because it proposes to kill the bill, and if the amendment is defeated I will vote against granting the charter.

Mr. E. D. R. BISSETT (Springfield): I intend to take very little time this evening in discussing the amendment to this bill to renew the charter of the Montreal and Georgian Bay Canal Company. To begin with I am opposed to the bringing into effect of the legislation sought by this measure, because I believe that such a move will alienate the rights of the Canadian people as regards water-power and other rights on the Ottawa river, and other rivers concerned. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) stated during his remarks the other night that this was a fight between two rival companies for the control of the power at Carillon. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that before this debate is ended the people of this country will, through their representatives in this House, claim those rights for themselves, that they will claim what the Minister of Railways told us was the bone of contention, namely, the power on the Carillon falls.

In common with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Garland, Bow River) I believe the big question under discussion to-night is not one of allotting power rights to certain interests. The whole question is: are we for or against public ownership? I believe that there is a movement on foot to-day to monopolize to a great extent the available hydro-electric energy in this Dominion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) pointed out in his admirable address quite clearly that two or three groups of financial interests controlled the hydro-electric energy in Canada to such an extent that their income almost equals that of the Canadian National Railways, or the total income of the province of Ontario. The control of electrical energy in this country to-day will, I contend, mean the absolute control of the industrial life of the country before many years have gone by, and with the rapid advance in the development of electrical service that day is steadily drawing nearer. The question, therefore, which faces the people of Canada to-day is: shall they control the power, or shall the power interests control them?

In the constituency which I have the honour to represent is developed all the hydro-electric energy used in the province of Manitoba, and the history of the circumstances surrounding the entry of the city of Winnipeg into the hydro business is one which would convince anybody who happens to live within that vicinity of the advantages of public ownership over private control. Before the city of Winnipeg went into the hydro-electric business they were paying 20 cents per kilowatt hour for the power used in that city. Immediately following the building of their plant at Pointe de Bois the price of power dropped to 10 cents, and to-day it is only three cents, which goes to show the advantages of a publicly owned utility.

As an example of the monopolies existing in certain parts of the United States I should just like to quote one or two facts. On July 25, 1925 it was announced that the Middle West Utilities Company had perfected mergers and consolidations that gave control of public utility services in 1,269 cities, towns and villages in 18 different states. In other words the public service utilities in 18 different states, and in 1,269 towns, were at the absolute mercy of a private corporation. This question of the monopoly of electrical energy is one that is engaging the most serious attention of the nation just south of the international border. It is engaging their attention because of the fact that they have awakened, when it is too late, to find that they are at the mercy of the power interests in that country. In this connection may I quote what Governor Clifford Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, in his message of transmittal of the report of his Giant Power Survey Board, made public in February, 1925, had to say regarding the power trust in the United States. Speaking of the power trust he says:

> Nothing like this gigantic monopoly has ever appeared in the history of the world. Nothing has ever been imagined before that, even remotely approaches it in the thoroughgoing, intimate, unceasing control it may exercise over the daily life of every human being within the web of its wires. It is immeasurably the greatest industrial fact of our time. If uncontrolled, it will be a plague without previous example. If effectively controlled in the public interest, it can be made incomparably the greatest material blessing in human history.

That is the opinion of the governor of one of the largest states in the American union after a thorough investigation had been made by a committee. Senator Norris, who has filled page after page of the congressional record with facts regarding this trust, states that he has been dumbfounded and amazed to learn that over twenty millions out of fifty-five millions horse-power of potential hydro-electric power in the United States have been already awarded to or applied for by private organizations.

I notice in a Washington paper dated March 19 of this year an article on the power situation as it affects the United States. It is headed "Federal Commission discloses how small group dominates electric field", and it reads:

Responding to a resolution introduced by Senator Norris of Nebraska, asking information on the power trust and its interests in Muscle shoals, the Federal Trade Commission has made a report which more than justifies every warning of monopoly uttered by Senator Norris and Senator Walsh of Montana.

It shows that a little group of interests controls almost 90 per cent of the power development of this country, that these interests are interlocked, and that the profits make Croesus look like a piker.

Owing to the holding device, the concentration of power is almost unbelievable.

"In one instance," the commission says, "less than a million dollar investment in the majority of the voting stock of the apex holding company gave full control of the entire organization of the group, having scores of underlying companies and several hundred million dollars of investment."

Another item appearing in a New York paper under date of March 14 of this year states:

Power Issue Splits Smith and "G.O.P."
N.Y. Republican Leaders Favour "Private Enterprise" Against "Government Control"

New York, March 14.—The long expected break between Governor "Al" Smith and the Republican organization which controls both branches of the state legislature has developed.

The governor insists that New York's water-power resources must be developed under state control.

That is what the Governor of New York state says about the matter:

The Republican leaders are determined that the power trust shall have a chance to do the job.

The G.O.P. leaders propose to name a commission to study the hydro-electric problem, with authority to consider both public and private development. Governor Smith maintains that the inquiry should be confined to the feasibility of public development.

The result will probably be a deadlock of indefinite duration.

[Mr. Bissett.]

The power trust is willing to permit things to remain as they are. It hopes that Smith will go out of office in 1928 and that he will be succeeded by someone who is more favourable to the trust.

Those two items dated only this month give quite a clear idea of what the power situation is in two of the largest states in the great union just south of us and show that it is a problem which is engaging the earnest attention of many at the head of public affairs in both of those states.

As I stated a few minutes ago, and I think, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), in his address the other day, suggested it, the control of electrical energy represents in great measure the control of the development of the industrial life of the country. I notice that in the city of Chicago 45 per cent, in Indiana 60 per cent, and in Ontario 85 per cent of the industrial plants use cheap electrical energy for their operation.

Why, may I ask, are so many branch factories of United States manufacturing concerns coming to Canada to-day? Some hon. gentleman would say: because of the tariff. Whatever relation the tariff may have to the question of building up industries in Ontario, I believe the real answer is the hydro electric system of that province. In support of that statement, I might state that in the hearings before the Senate committee of the United States on the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, the chamber of commerce of Niagara Falls, New York, presented a memorial in which it is stated that the manufacturers of Ontario enjoy a power rate of one-half of that which is charged by the privately owned corporations of the state of New York, and therefore it prays for tariff rates to protect them from the competition of Ontario manufacturers. It will be seen from this that cheap hydro electric power is a greater factor in the industrial life of the country than probably any other single factor. I would like just at this point to give a few striking examples showing the rates before and after municipal or public ownership:

Place	Before cents	After cents
Chicago	12	5
Cleveland	12.05	3
Palo Alto, Cal.	20	7
Seattle, Wash.	20	5.50
Jamestown, N.Y.	10	5
Pasadena, Cal.	15	5
Springfield, Ill.	11	6
Winnipeg	20	3
London	9	3
Calgary	14	5
Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario 247 municipalities	9.85	3.45 per K. W. hour

I think these figures will demonstrate the advantages which have accrued to many municipalities and cities by taking over this hydro-electrical development. I contend that the organization, unification and inter-connection of vast and far-reaching electrical power systems are inevitable for the reasons which I have already briefly pointed out. We are coming more and more face to face with that self-same situation. The economic advantages to be gained by such a system are so great that, whether we like it or not, we are rapidly being drawn into it. The question which this country has to face to-day is this: Shall this be a private or a public monopoly? For that reason I contend that the bill under discussion means nothing more nor less than this: Are we going to hand over to private interests the potential electrical energy of the great waterways of Canada, or are we going to see that they remain and are controlled and developed for the general advantage of the people of this country. Because I believe the water rights of this country should be retained, owned and controlled by the Dominion of Canada for the general benefit of the citizens thereof, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward):

That all the words after the word "therefor" in the said amendment be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

That inasmuch as the construction of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal and the development of the water-powers incident thereto are essentially of the nature of public utilities,

That these undertakings, including the development of all works for water-powers or others, on the Ottawa river, Mattawa river and French river, if not within the class of works which have been declared for the general advantage of Canada or the advantage of two or more provinces under the statute of 1870, shall be so declared.

That in the opinion of this House such natural resources should not be alienated,

And also, that no further leases or extensions of leases on the Ottawa river, Mattawa river and French river should be granted without the consent of parliament.

That all existing rights, claims and leases in private hands, as affecting the Ottawa river, Mattawa river and French river, with the exception of those power sites already fully developed, should be recovered for the general benefit of the people of Canada,

And further, that this House is of the opinion that the developments on the Ottawa river, Mattawa river and French river should be taken over by the government of Canada as part of a comprehensive scheme for the supplying of navigation facilities and hydro-electric power to the people of the Dominion of Canada at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. SPEAKER: This amendment is out of order for the reason that the bill is a private bill. It is true that by reason of the discussion the bill has assumed a measure of public importance, so much so that the hon. leader of the opposition moved an amendment in these terms:

The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

But his amendment does not pretend to advocate a policy which naturally should originate with the government. The purpose of the bill apparently is for the construction of a canal. There is no mention of water-powers, although personally I may be of the opinion that there is some water-power development behind the canal project, but as a matter of fact the bill is simply for the extension of time for the construction of a canal. According to Bourinot, page 509:

All amendments "must strictly relate to the bill which the House by its order has resolved upon considering."

I find in the twelfth edition of May at page 358 the following, which on the one hand supports the point of view of the leader of the opposition in moving his amendment, and on the other is against the subamendment:

On the 21st of February, 1854, an amendment was made to the question for reading the Manchester Education Bill a second time, that "education to be supported by public rates is a subject which ought not, at the present time, to be dealt with by any private bill," which gave legitimate expression to the opinion of the House.

What I have just read is in accord with the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. Now, as against the subamendment, May adds:

Amendments, however, to the question for the second reading of a private bill, which seek to substitute for that question a resolution declaring the opinion of the House on a matter of public or general policy, are out of order.

Basing myself on May and on many precedents, I rule that the subamendment is out of order, and I so declare.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate as I thought that this being a private bill it would have been referred to a committee at least two weeks ago. As a representative from northern Ontario, which is directly interested in the construction of the Georgian bay canal, I am bound to express my views. I do not intend to be partisan and I shall confine myself strictly to what I believe to be the truth. In our section of the country without private development we would never be enjoying our present measure of prosperity if it were not for private capital and enterprise. I hold no brief for private or public ownership interests. We know that it is impossible for us in northern Ontario to ever expect to have hydro-electric development under public ownership, for the simple reason that the provincial government for the last fifteen years has seen fit to alienate practically all the water-powers in that settled section of the country.

I have never had an opportunity to meet the Sifton brothers, but judging from what I read in the newspapers it would be wise for me to be on my guard if I ever come in contact with them, for they are described as very bad people. However, in my section of the country we judge men not by newspaper reports but by our actual contact with them and by the way they are developing the province. As for public ownership, I repeat, that in northern Ontario we have no hope of ever getting development under the Hydro Electric Power Commission. Indeed under that commission some illegalities and considerable injustice have been imposed on northern Ontario as a whole.

But it seems to me that the subject of public ownership has been confused with governmental control of industrial enterprises. These two categories are not merely separable, but they are in reality fundamentally distinct. The right of eminent domain or the universal right of the public over property is embodied explicitly or implicitly in the law of every civilized country. The right of eminent domain by the state during the war was exercised by every belligerent nation, and under it lands, plantations, forests, oil wells, railways, telegraphs and cables and telephone lines, telegraph cables and even private residences and industrial establishments were taken over by every belligerent state except Russia, in order that the nation might exert its maximum war effort. This has been the ruination, not only of the individual and of the public, but of the nation as a whole. I am bound to put the facts before the House as they exist. I represent one of the largest portions of the province of Ontario, and the richest one in developed and undeveloped natural resources, and it is a territory worth fighting for.

I quote from the Hamilton Herald the following:

> Worth Fighting For
> From Premier Ferguson it is learned that a resolution will be introduced in the Ontario legislature protesting against the granting to the Georgian Bay Canal Company of any power rights in the Ottawa or French rivers. Such a resolution will have the solid support of public opinion in this province, and it is to be hoped it will be unanimously endorsed by the Legislature.
> Let this company go ahead and build the canal if it can raise the money to do it. But the people of Ontario will not tolerate the alienation of any water-powers belonging of right to the province, to any private corporation, to be exploited for private gain, now that the achievements of our hydro system have revealed the value of these public assets.

I must take that statement with a grain of salt. If you travel over the province of Ontario to North Bay and through that northern section of the province you will find that many of these utilities and water-powers, including some rivers attached to lake Nipissing basin, are owned by private interests. If you go to Iroquois Falls, you will find that the same condition exists. You will find that the power in the Abitibi river belongs to the Abitibi company, and if you go to Frederick House you will find these utilities are operated by private interests. If you go still further to Smooth Rock Falls and Jacksonboro, you will find that the same condition exists. The water-powers on the Mattagami river have been sold to private interests, and the same condition exists all through that district, including the Kapuskasing and Ground Hog rivers, where $25,000,000 is being expended under private capital.

I represent one of the largest ridings in Canada, and I believe that ninety per cent of the utilities in that country is actually in the hands of private interests. And how does the system work out? It works out well up there. The natural resources in many cases are sold to private interests and developed, and such developments are a cause of prosperity. Under the hydro commission we are actually paying taxation which we never expected to pay, and which is not logical. I have heard the hon. member saying that people in northern Ontario are against the hydro-electric. I may say that we are in favour of it, but I think the primary development of the Ottawa river is for canalization purposes. I am going to read an article from an independent paper, the Cochrane Northland Post, of March 4, 1927, which says:

> North Bay's pet child, the Georgian bay canal, is once more in the limelight. Bill No. 78 is now before the House of Commons for the purpose of once more renewing the old charter given to the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company.
> The north has always backed up North Bay in the attempt to get the canal put through, which would materially assist in the development of northern Ontario, and will continue to stand solidly behind it. We have always felt that probably the same interests which right from the beginning tried to choke the Transcontinental railway are behind the efforts to kill the Georgian bay canal. One thing is sure, the government will never be permitted to undertake this project as a national work; and unless private interests are given the charter, nothing will come of it. This of course offends the public ownership minds, and the attempt is made to throw out the child with the cradle.

The Toronto Globe on Wednesday comments as follows:

When the charter was granted this company in 1894 Ontario had not entered upon its program for public ownership of water-powers. The project was received with enthusiasm not only in the Ottawa valley and along the French river but throughout the province because of the transportation facilities promised as much as for the prospective power development. Since hydro has demonstrated itself the conditions have changed, and the people are no longer willing to turn over to private ownership hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of natural resources which can and should remain part of the public domain.

The Globe of course has particularly the Carillon power site in mind, the rest of the long stretch of canal (which also abounds in water-powers) runs through sections of the country too remote for the Hydro Electric Commission to touch, owing to the sparsity of population. In fact conditions are about the same as they are here, and yet we have not heard them bewail the fact that our wonderful water-powers all along the Abitibi have just recently been handed over to private corporations.

As we said before, we do not object to the water-powers being given away to private interests as long as the existing municipalities here are sufficiently protected as regards their power uses.

The Globe need not have any fear of seeing the Georgian bay canal constructed to create a short cut between the east and west and leave the matter to private interests, as long as future generations are properly protected as regards power development. As we said before, if we would have to wait for national building of this canal, we are afraid the country will remain undeveloped for generations to come; and after all it is right in the centre of Ontario where these private interests will bring about the transformation from wilderness to settled communities.

That is what we are seeking in our section of the country. We are the connecting link between the east and the west and our position allows us to judge impartially. We want that development. For the last eighteen years the Ontario government has seen fit to sell to the private interests the powers in northern Ontario. Even if we wanted public ownership in our section of the country, it would be an absolute impossibility for the government to enter into the development of that section. In Kapuskasing the development of the land under public ownership was tried, but after hundreds of thousands of dollars had been spent in the development of the land, the result was complete failure. But to-day under private ownership that section of the country is very prosperous.

Then let us take the wonderful districts of south Porcupine, Cobalt, Matheson and Kirkland Lake. These districts never would have been developed without private capital and enterprise. Under the conditions it was the only logical solution of the problem in the north. What would it mean if we now apply the principle of hydro-electric development after private capital has been invested in enormous sums, under many risks, and the initial stages have been passed in opening up the country, and often these utilities will be out of the experimental stage, would it then be fair for the hydro-electric to take them over? After a good deal of money has been spent in those utilities and they are just beginning to put them on a profitable basis would it be fair to take them away from the private interests? We are in favour of the hydro-electric in our section, but our hopes are very remote of ever getting such development. In northern Ontario we are paying taxes on which we never expect to receive any return. I am going to read a brief article from The Nugget of September 24, 1926, which reads:

Cost Million to Give Hydro Power to Ontario Farms

Toronto, Ont., Sept. 24.—(Canadian Press).—The contribution of the Ontario government to the extension of hydro power to the rural districts of Ontario during the fiscal year will approximate $1,000,000 Premier Howard Ferguson estimates. In a statement yesterday the Prime Minister said that three-quarters of this amount had been expended to date in making hydro service available to farming communities of old Ontario. Compared with last year's aid to rural electrical extension, made by the government, this year's expenditure represents an increase of approximately $650,000.

I am going to quote an article from the Canadian Engineer on an address delivered by Mr. R. G. Cook, a member of the Hydro Electric Commission, delivered at Toronto at the occasion of the twenty-fifth convention of the Ontario Good Roads Association, showing subsidies paid the rural sections of southern Ontario, showing again that we cannot expect any hydro developments in the distant or near future; we are nevertheless helping in the construction and maintenance of hydro, in the southern section of the province. He said in part:

The people of the country are isolated but they are doing a work that is absolutely necessary for the prosperity of the country.

It was with this thought in mind that the government of the day, in October, 1923, made the first payment of $425,000 for the construction of rural electric transmission lines in Ontario.

Since that time, new legislation has been passed in 1924 that has practically doubled the government assistance to rural transmission lines. The result has been that it has so stimulated the rural demand for extensions that during the last fiscal year the commission have constructed an average of 2½ miles of transmission line in the rural districts for every day of the year. This has brought about conditions whereby the commission is now operating over 2,000 miles of rural lines and serving 20,000 rural customers. Under that legislation the government of this province are handing over to rural customers in the construction of their rural distribution systems at the present time a free gift of over $2,000,000 and I think, Mr. President, that no better investment has ever been made by any government on behalf of agriculture, because under our system it is so altogether unlike our legislative grants to rural schools or highways—in this respect that it entails no further annual charges upon the government, because the funds for renewals, contingencies, maintenance and sinking funds all form part of the monthly bill to the rural customer, just the same as it does to the urban customer with the result that at the end of the sinking fund period the farmer finds himself the owner not only of a half of the distribution system that he has paid for, but the owner of the other half which the government has presented to him. He also finds himself with sufficient reserve to maintain these things at 100 per cent efficiency.

Further on he says:

It is only fair to say that this ideal condition in Ontario has only been created by the sympathetic coöperation of every party and every class and every group in the House. I question if there is another country in the civilized world where in its legislature every party and every class and every group give such sympathetic consideration to all the problems of rural life.

The northern section of Ontario, which is part and parcel of that wonderful province, endorsed the bond issues of the Ontario Hydro-Electric, and we are also responsible for some of its taxation. I believe it was under the Drury administration that an inquiry was made and it was proved that the province as a whole actually paid $7,000,000 in interest in connection with this enterprise. To-day we are paying in the province of Ontario millions of dollars in the way of subsidies to the farming population, and while we in the northern section never expect to benefit from electrical development and have proved that we are willing and ready to shoulder the responsbilities of the hydro development in the southern section, why should they not be anxious to solve our transportation problem in the way proposed in this bill? Is it not logical under present conditions to ask the support of the southern section of the province for the Georgian bay canal scheme? Surely it is only reasonable to ask hon. members from the southern section of the province at least to allow this bill to go to the committee so that it may be thoroughly discussed. We in northern Ontario sympathize with the needs of the southern portion of the province, but I am bound to say that there does not seem to be on the part of southern members any appreciation of the wonderful heritage we have in the north. Northern Ontario represents 85 per cent of the total area of the province. The other day the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox) in reply to a question I asked him, whether he was aware that the Hydro-Electric Commission was not functioning in my section of the country, declared that it was too far north for him to know anything about it. I would quote for the information of the hon. gentleman a statement made by the Hon. Mr. Finlayson whom I met in Cochrane, my home town, a week ago to-night at a banquet tendered the Toronto Board of Trade. He said that in very many instances it had been found difficult to get legislation enacted in the House in Toronto for the development of northern Ontario because of the lack of knowledge of that section of the province displayed by representatives from southern Ontario. The same remark applies to representatives in this House from the southern section of the province. May I take this opportunity of extending to those gentlemen who come from southern Ontario, as well as to hon. gentlemen in other sections of the House, a hearty invitation to visit my part of the country and find out for themselves what a wonderful heritage we have there. If they will come up I can assure them that we will give them the hearty reception which would always be extended to them by the people of northern Ontario—but not modelled after the civic reception committee of the city of Toronto, because in our section of the province we judge a man for his citizenship, not for his political affiliations. They will experience the hospitality of the northern country which is called the spirit of the north, and which, coupled with the spirits controlled by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) would make not only a very instructive journey but also a very interesting one. The fact is, we are not known enough. Hon. gentlemen in this House do not sufficiently realize the possibilities of that part of the country. Business men do, but very few politicians in either party, provincial or federal, are aware of conditions there. If hon. gentlemen would come up they would become more familiar with those conditions and they would better understand our problems. An hon. member from Toronto the other day, ridiculing this proposed canal, suggested that more navigable waterways might be found on Mars. Well, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman knows more about Mars than he does about northern Ontario. I for one have never believed in the wisdom of secession, nor do I think that the people in the part of the country I represent want anything of that kind. I must confess, however, that in my judgment we have not been getting a fair deal. In this very bill it is evident that we are not being fairly treated, for hon. gentlemen opposite seem determined to kill the bill. I do not say that this canal project in its entirety is feasible at the moment, but I do urge that the House allow the bill to go to the committee where the possibilities of the scheme can be thoroughly investigated. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has been quoting expert documents in support of his contention that the building of this canal is impracticable, while other members are equally positive that it is feasible. In face of this conflict of opinion a new member finds it difficult to come to a conclusion. Is this not all the more reason why we should refer the whole matter to the committee in order to have it looked into? As a representative of northern Ontario, realizing the responsibility that rests upon me in a matter of this kind, I am bound to look at the question from the standpoint of the nation as a whole —something that will give northern Ontario a chance of developing. I would not support the contention that this scheme should be considered purely from the point of view of hydro development, if I thought that such development were really possible; but it seems to me that the thing of primary importance to us is the construction of the canal. If we were considering the question of a partnership between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, with the federal government constructing the Georgian bay canal and the two provinces in question developing the surplus power, that would be quite satisfactory. But where it is a matter of linking up east and west the question of chief importance is one of transportation. Southern and northern Ontario are both parts of one province and the problems of one section are naturally of concern to the other, they should not be burning in one section of the province, what they worship in the other. I do not say that hon. members from southern Ontario are necessarily opposed to our interest, but I do say that they should not object to this bill being referred to the committee. There are good things to be said for hydro development, but we must consider Canada as a whole before any particular section of Ontario. And although I have no technical knowledge of canals, I have no doubt of the future possibilities of this proposed waterway for the development of the country at large.

I have not much more to say. I again tender an invitation to hon. members from north and south, on both sides of the House, to come to our section of the country and especially to the riding which I represent and which was represented in 1914 by the Hon. Mr. Cochrane. What was then the original riding is now divided into three sections federally and my own riding is now divided into two sections provincially, and in the very near future, new ridings will also be formed federally in that section of northern Ontario. I want the House to realize that the coming part of the country is northern Ontario; it would be time well spent if every member of the House came to our section and studied our problems. I was pained and grieved to see the sectionalism which has been displayed by some members of the House in discussing this matter; they have what amounts to a parochial viewpoint, and do not consider the province of Ontario as a whole in the study of this question.

I might just make a brief allusion to the fact that my home town of Cochrane has been brought into this discussion; I think one of the members for Toronto said that a delegation had been sent to Premier Ferguson and that that was done because of some grievances against some private interests in that town. Let me give a history of the case. In 1909, when the town of Cochrane received its charter, the government promised that our water rights at the Long Sault, thirty-five miles from the town, would be protected and developed. Again in 1911 and in 1914 Hon. Frank Cochrane repeated that statement, but for some reason or other the government sold the power to the Hollinger interests, who developed them, and they were then bought by the Abitibi people, and Cochrane is now getting its power from that company. Following the promise of the government that our water rights would be protected we asked for the services of a hydro engineer, who made a report that we should not pay more than $35 per horse-power for that electricity. That recommendation was submitted to the provincial government, through the premier, and we expected they would act upon it, but it was absolutely ignored. We are not protesting to-day against development by private interests, but we are protesting against the fact that the provincial government has not seen fit to protect the town of Cochrane, following the report of one of the government officials.

It was also mentioned by an hon. member opposite that the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway could not inaugurate electrical service on their line. I have enough confidence in the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Commission to believe that that railway will reach its natural terminal at James bay, that they will see their way to electrify that road with powers developed from the Moose river basin. I say now that if that railway wants to electrify its line, we still have some water-powers left with which that can be done. We in this section of the country represent almost a quarter of a million people. We are a growing section, we are the connecting link between the east and the west. In the past our voice has not been heard, but I believe that in the future our situation and problems will be studied and given careful consideration. In the matter under discussion all we ask is that we be given the opportunity to discuss it in all its details in a standing committee of this House. We are all interested in this question and believe that such a development would work for the advancement and development of Ontario and of Canada as a whole.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1926-1927

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1927, was presented by the Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of supply.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

Tuesday, March 22, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PETITIONS

Mr. E. A. PECK (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I beg to present a resolution—

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not in order; only petitions may be presented in this way.

Mr. PECK: This is in the nature of a petition.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is a resolution it cannot be received.

Mr. PECK: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but several of these resolutions have already been presented to the House, and I would like the opportunity of presenting this resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: When these resolutions were presented the other day I notified hon. members that they should be regularly presented in future. However, I think the House would not object if the hon. gentleman tabled his resolution.

Mr. PECK: May I be permitted to lay it on the table?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

ALLIED INDIAN TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. W. HAY (North Perth) presented the first report of the special committee to inquire into the claims of the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia.

Mr. HAY moved:

That the first report of the select standing committee to inquire into the claims of the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia be now concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: Since notice has not been given, this will serve as a notice of motion.

CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) asked me a question with regard to an alleged promise made by myself with respect to the Superannuation Act as affecting the civil servants. I have looked up the matter and find that a promise was given. I can assure my hon. friend that it will be carried out this session.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed amendment:

Resolved, that it is expedient to extend the time for two years for the completion of the joint section of the Canadian National railway branch line from Rosedale southeasterly, in the province of Alberta, authorized by chapter 30 of the statutes of 1924.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has any work been done on this line as yet?

Mr. DUNNING: No work has been done. The original arrangement was for the construction of a joint section, dependent of course upon an agreement being reached between both railway companies with regard to its construction. That agreement has not yet been signed, but I am informed that negotiations are nearing completion with respect to the terms of the agreement. If the House would pass the resolution and permit the introduction of the bill it could then be sent to the railway committee with the other branch line bills, where further details could be given if required by any members of the House.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 178, to amend an act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway line being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly, in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

CONTROL OF STANDARDS OF MAINTENANCE VESTED IN RAILWAY COMMISSION

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 176, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, 1919.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Application of the Railway Act to Canadian government railways.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister might explain. This particular provision, if I understand it aright, is to place the Canadian government railways on the same plane as the other railways in respect to their employees.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the present Canadian Government Railways Act control of the standards of maintenance is not vested in the Board of Railway Commissioners but is vested in the minister. With respect to the whole of the rest of the Canadian government railway system, the Board of Railway Commissioners have control over the standards of maintenance. After going into the matter very thoroughly it is thought desirable to give the board jurisdiction over the former government railways as over the rest of the system. That is the whole import of the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose there has been no objection on the part of any of the employees to the proposition?

Mr. DUNNING: No. The fact is that the employees' organizations have for a number of years been pressing that this be done.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The House resumed from Friday, March 18, consideration in committee of the report of the special committee appointed to revise the rules of the House of Commons—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose on Friday evening we were considering a new rule to be added after rule 21. This will be found at the bottom of page 12. To the proposed new rule the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) had moved an amendment to the following effect:

That the words "the leader of the opposition" in the first and second lines be deleted and the following words substituted therefor: "leaders of opposition groups".

The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Bird) negatived.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the new rule be added after rule 21?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. POULIOT: There was a subamendment which has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN: On Friday evening Mr. Pouliot moved:

That the new rule to be added after rule 21 as amended be replaced by the paragraph:
"No speech delivered in the House of Commons shall be recorded in Hansard."

I do not think this can be accepted as an amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has no reference to this rule.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would it be proper to suggest as an amendment that the hon. member's speeches be not recorded in Hansard?

New rule 21 agreed to on division: Yeas: 115; Nays: 20.

On amended rule 23—Decorum in the House.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Sub-section 2 reads:

When the Speaker is putting a question, no member shall walk out of or across the House, or make any noise or disturbance.

This does not refer to any member coming into the House, which evidently may be done while the Speaker is putting the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Until the question is fully put by the Speaker, any member may enter the House; until then, he is in time. After the question has been put by the Speaker no one may come in and claim the right to vote.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that is the case why should it not be permissible for a member to walk out of the House before the question is fully put? The alternative should be allowable if we are to be perfectly logical.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are keeping the old rule in that regard.

Amended rule agreed to.

Amended rules 25, 37, 39, 40, 41, 45, and 64, and repeal of rule 50 agreed to.

On amended rule 65—Duties of Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is a duplication in language, as well as a conflict, as between sub-section 1 and sub-section 3. Sub-section 1 reads:

The Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House is responsible for the safe keeping of the mace, furniture and fittings thereof.

This language is ambiguous but I presume that "furniture and fittings thereof" refers to the House. Sub-section 3 then provides that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be responsible for "the movable property belonging to the House." This is a duplication which may easily be avoided. It should not be difficult to amend the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may explain for the information of the hon. member that the Sergeant-at-Arms officially takes care of the mace. As regards the furniture and fittings of the House, they are the property of the Public Works department and are confided to the charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms for safe keeping. Whenever a member requires a desk or any other article of furniture in his room, he makes application to the Sergeant-at-Arms and the requisition is filled by the Public Works department.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have no objection to the rule; I am merely pointing out the ambiguity of the language as it stands. In sub-section 1 the wording is not clear and in sub-section 3 there is a duplication of what is already stated in the previous paragraph.

Mr. SPEAKER: This was copied from the rules of the British House of Commons. It specifies the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is responsible to the Public Works department for the movable property. I do not think that the repetition is necessarily superfluous.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would take it that the words in the first section of this rule. "furniture and fittings thereof" refer to the mace.

Mr. SPEAKER: To the furniture and fittings of the House, I think.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Why not change the word "thereof" to "of the House"?

Mr. POULIOT: Do I understand that the furniture in the members' rooms is entrusted to the care of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and not to the members?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Sergeant-at-Arms is responsible for the safekeeping of the furniture of the chamber and the whole House of Commons. The furniture is ordered upon requisition through the Public Works department, and is supplied by that department.

Mr. MARCIL: I move to strike out the word "thereof" in the last line of section 1, and to substitute therefor the words "of the House."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Why not say, "furniture, fittings and movable property of the House"? I think that would meet the objection that has been raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: In order not to use the word "House" so many times, I would delete the words in the first line "attending this House."

The CHAIRMAN: There have been a number of suggestions made to amend this section. Is it the committee's wish that it should read:

The Sergeant at Arms is responsible for the safe-keeping of the mace, and of the furniture and fittings of the House.

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the subsection as I have read it?

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On subsection 2 of amended rule 65—Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. NEILL: I would like some explanation of this. It says:

No stranger who has been committed, by order of the House, to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, shall be released from such custody until he has paid a fee of four dollars to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

What is the sense of that? What happens if he does not pay the four dollars? Has the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep him permanently?

Mr. JACOBS: Might I suggest that we are building a state tower for the purpose of keeping him there till he pays the four dollars?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is an old tradition in England, as old as the hills, that when a stranger is committed to the tower, or as in our case, to the common gaol, he may not be released until he has paid the traditional fee of four dollars; I suppose in England it would be one pound.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it is cheap.

Mr. SPEAKER: I remember we had a case of a man appearing before the bar of the House, Mr. Miller, and refusing to answer. He was committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and sent to gaol, and he remained there during the remainder of the session.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to have Your Honour's view as to what becomes of that four dollars? Does it go to the consolidated revenue fund or into the pocket of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. SPEAKER: It remains with the Sergeant-at-Arms, and he deserves it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is why we do not increase his salary.

Mr. JACOBS: The Speaker says that this rule is as old as the hills, but now that we are changing the rules why not change this one, to make the punishment fit the crime? This reduces the parliament of Canada to the level of a recorder's court. I think the stranger who is committed should pay a substantial fine, or else apologize to the Sergeant-at-Arms. I am not in favour of any four dollar fines in the House of parliament.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

Subsections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

Amended rule agreed to.

On amended rule 69.—Withdrawal of members in certain cases.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It says in the third line "he shall make a statement." Is a member obliged to make a statement if he does not wish to?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. I think it would be better to say, "he may make a statement and shall then withdraw." I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BANCROFT: I would suggest that you leave out the word "then", seeing that we have already changed "shall" to "may".

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is all right.

Amendment agreed to.

Rule as amended agreed to.

Rule 75 (Sec. 2) agreed to.

On amended rule 76.—Committees of supply and ways and means.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask whether the committee discussed the matter of referring the estimates to a special committee? I remember that two years ago there was a motion introduced into the House asking that the estimates be referred to a select committee, and this resolution was referred to the special committee that was then engaged in revising the rules. I was wondering if this year's committee had discussed that matter at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Personally I am strongly in favour of the reference of the estimates of the various departments to a grand committee, composed of as many members as possible, before which all the experts, engineers, accountants, and other officials whose evidence might be required could be called and examined. When I was sitting on the other side of the House, in 1920 or 1921, I moved a resolution which was discussed for a whole afternoon by this House, and during the debate I referred to the fact that both in Great Britain and in the United States during the war a grand committee had been established for the purpose of sifting to the bottom all the expenditures involved by the participation of those two great countries in the war. It has been proven both in Great Britain and the United States that very large sums of money running up into millions and millions of dollars have been saved by the work of these committees. The committee in Great Britain reports to the House of Commons, which also resolves itself into committee of supply for the consideration of the estimates, but as every detail has previously been threshed out in the grand committee, and perhaps several items condemned, so to speak, the work of the committee of the whole House is very much shortened, in addition to the saving that is made by the careful scrutiny of proposed expenditures in the grand committee. But when I proposed to the committee revising the rules that they might adopt that principle, it was thought that perhaps it was too radical a change and that the House might not be ready to agree to it. I can assure the hon. member from Macleod that the proposal he makes will have my hearty support. Both in the United States and Great Britain during the war they had grand committees to which were referred all heavy expenditures, but it is true that those committees do not exist any more. I remember immediately after the war the United States official, General Dawes now vice-president, enumerated the vast sums of money they had saved to the American republic by that method. But it was thought that here it was too radical a step to take and that perhaps we might wait until another opportunity presented itself before introducing that new system. If ever adopted we would have before that committee experts, accountants, engineers. Every detail would be explained and the report would be presented to the House. This committee would certainly be in earnest and non-partisan, and if the feeling was against a certain item that item would not be presented to the House.

Mr. ARTHURS: One point in connection with the procedure before that committee is that under our present system all debates on ways and means and debates in committee of the whole are reported in Hansard. Under the proposed rules, and under the rules in the United States during the war, or the rule suggested by my hon. friend to my left, there would be no verbatim reports of the proceedings of that committee.

Sir EUGENE FISET: During the war I had some experience with the war appropriations. This question was discussed in the House of Commons, and it was decided that these sums would be voted under the title of war appropriations; detailed explanations of every item of the vote were printed and distributed to members of the House. The matter was discussed in committee of the whole. I think the suggestion of the Speaker impracticable, because if you are going to submit to a special committee of the House every item of the estimates of every department I do not know when you will end the session.

Mr. COOTE: I think while the rules are being revised we should very carefully consider this matter. I think one of the reasons why we are revising the rules is to save time. Surely we could save a great deal of time if the estimates were referred to a committee. I would not suggest that we should have one committee only, but I think the estimates should be sent to four or five select committees of the House. At present we have a special committee to deal with the Canadian National estimates. I think nearly all hon. members will agree that is a great improvement over the old method of dealing with the estimates in committee of the whole House. If we send the estimates of the Canadian National railways to a special committee appointed to consider them, why not send the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to the committee on agriculture, and why not send all the other railway estimates to the special committee dealing with the Canadian National railway estimates? It would be very easy to divide all the other estimates among the different standing committees of the House, allotting the estimates of each department to the committee dealing with that department. The reports of these committees would come before the House and be considered in committee of the whole House, and any hon. member who wanted to say something about them would have a chance. In that way I think we could shorten the session a month. Anybody who will read Hansard for the last four or five years will see that most of the time has been taken up with estimates. Hon. members wish to shorten the session, and I think we could achieve that object by adopting my suggestion more than in any other way. Before this committee which is revising the rules is disbanded, it should be asked to go into that matter and ascertain if we could not adopt that suggestion at the present time, and next session we could have the estimates referred to the select committee.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I entirely support the suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod, and the suggestion of His Honour, the Speaker. I think there is nothing more aggravating or irritating, and nothing causes more delay than the practice of having ministers come into the chamber with a deputy in front of them, endeavouring to make explanations of subjects on which they are not informed and cannot be informed. I am not blaming the ministers. I understand their difficulties. Having to meet every day in council, they have not time to study the estimates or become acquainted with the details in connection with them. They have before them a very brief description of the particular matter that may be under consideration at the moment, and as to the reason it is necessary, but when we come to the engineering end of it, or the justifiability of it, we have not the information and cannot obtain it because of the method of handling the estimates. It is the most stupid and foolish method of spending the public money, and I think my hon. friend's suggestion one that we might wisely adopt.

I submit that the point brought forward by my hon. friend from Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) was not well taken, because I did not understand the suggestion made by the hon. the Speaker, nor the suggestion made by the hon. member for Macleod to be that there should be a printed explanation of the estimates in detail handed to every hon. member. I entirely agree that such a proposition would be impracticable and ridiculous. It would involve volumes of printing, but the other suggestion is a practical one. Let us refer the estimates to the several committees, as we are doing in the case of the Canadian National, or refer them to a special standing committee as suggested by the hon. member for Macleod. It would be a great improvement, and we could go back feeling satisfied with the manner in which we had dealt with this question. I think nobody can go home now feeling that this matter has been dealt with satisfactorily.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think I will have to come to the rescue of the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are not interested any more than other members.

Mr. McGIBBON: My hon. friends are running the government. I do not see how any self-respecting minister can recommend to this House estimates, previously recommended by the cabinet, and then have them torn to pieces by special committees. The thing is absolutely absurd. I would not remain on the government benches five minutes if some committee of the House, having no responsibility at all, could tell me what I could do or what I could not do. We must have some respect for the minister and he must have some responsibility. It is absurd to tell a minister after he has brought down his estimates, and after they have been submitted to the committee, that he cannot spend this money. I do not think you could get any self-respecting government to permit themselves to be placed in that position.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not think we are discussing this case from the viewpoint of the ministers. I have no doubt that they know all about their departments and what the estimates are for; but we do not. I have observed that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) and his associates ask a great many questions in supply—many of them perhaps are not of much consequence. While the estimates are under consideration a good deal of political campaigning takes place, and we ask questions which perhaps should not be answered at all. The time of the House is wasted more in that respect than in connection with any other business. Surely we should now refer this question back to the special committee while we deal with the rest of the rules, so that they may draft a rule that will enable us to handle the estimates more efficiently and save the time of the House. The suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) would certainly have this effect, for if members want information on any items they could secure it before the various committees to which those items had been referred. If we were to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Muskoka there would be no use in bringing the estimates before the House at all. It is suggested that we let the cabinet deal with the estimates; but if there is to be any inquiry as to the particular items, that inquiry should take place in a small committee. I therefore suggest that His Honour the Speaker place this rule before the committee for amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. IRVINE: Don't be in such a hurry to carry things until we know what we are actually carrying.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I say to my hon. friend that this would involve more than a mere change in procedure? It would affect the principle of the discussion of the estimates in the House when every member is present to scrutinize the expenditure of public money. The question was deemed so important by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Kellner) that he has a resolution on the order paper proposing a reference of the estimates to select committees and I think it should be discussed by the House in the usual way.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is a very good one. I would, however, ask him in view of that suggestion if he would assure the hon. member for Athabasca an opportunity for the discussion of his resolution; otherwise the danger is that private member's days may be closed off suddenly and we will find ourselves unable to discuss it. Will the minister give us any assurance so that we may rely upon having such an opportunity?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is assuming that I have much more authority than I really have. The House is master of its own proceedings.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, I do not think so. In this case also very often ministerial advice will be accepted, especially when so wisely counselled. I am quite sure the Minister of Justice is too modest, and I am satisfied that if he consults his colleagues, especially the one to his right (Mr. Elliott) there will be no trouble.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is so kind hearted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure if he will consult his colleagues there will be no difficulty in securing an opportunity for discussion of my hon. friend's resolution. Otherwise the minister may himself be prolonging debate on this question. Frankly, I am perfectly willing to let it drop if he will grant us a day for discussion of the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will submit my hon. friend's request to the Prime Minister, but I may tell him that there are many private members asking for the same favour for their resolutions, which makes it rather difficult to give a pledge of this kind.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It simply arose out of the minister's own suggestion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will plead my hon. friend's case the best I can.

Mr. IRVINE: The Minister of Justice intimated that some principle was involved, but he did not specify it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everyone understood, I think, even my hon. friend.

Mr. IRVINE: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The principle involved is that of having the expenditure of money scrutinized in the House by all the members.

Mr. IRVINE: Surely that principle is safeguarded when all the estimates come back to the House eventually.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I do not think a proposal of this kind would shorten sessions. Imagine, if you can, all the estimates going to the different committees, with your experts in attendance. The result will be that we shall have these committees so busy that they will be asking for permission to sit while the House is in session. We want to be familiar with the estimates of every department, and we would not be under this proposal. For instance, I am a member of the agricultural committee and the private bills committee, and I would know nothing about any other departments. I do not propose to be a member of this House without having some knowledge of what is going on in every department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is right.

Mr. COOTE: I think I had ample justification for raising this question because two years ago I introduced a resolution asking that such a change be made. That resolution received some support, and the House decided to refer it to the special committee then revising the rules. The statement made by the hon. member for Muskoka I consider astounding: that estimates having passed the cabinet —and I am a little surprised that he has so much confidence in that body—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should you be?

Mr. COOTE: —they should not be questioned by a select committee of this House. Estimates for the National railways, which surely must receive very careful consideration by the cabinet, are now subject to review by a select committee of this House. What difference in principle is there if we do the same thing with all the estimates? I think it is time that the commoners devoted more attention to a scrutiny of the estimates. Anyone who has studied English history knows that the House of Commons came into existence simply because the king wanted money. That is all the Commons are required for. I am certain if this government did not need us to vote money they would not call us here at all. I think that is the attitude of governments towards members of parliament. Surely we should give very careful consideration before we vote money. I agree with my friend from Bow River and I challenge any member to say that we give the right kind of consideration to public expenditure under the present procedure. When we try to get information from the deputy minister—who after all, is running the department, we have to get that information through the minister. The deputy sits in front of him but is not allowed to say anything. When a question is asked the minister leans over to the deputy, gets his answer in a whisper, and then repeats it to us. When an embarrassing question is put the minister simply waits until another member asks a question and then answers him, and very often it is almost impossible to get the information wanted. Surely it is the part of common sense to have the estimates considered by a select committee where the deputy minister and, if necessary, some other man in his department could be put on the witness stand and state what the money was needed for.

Amended rule agreed to.

On rule 79—Double elections.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee recommends that rule 79 be struck out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is no longer necessary.

Rule struck out.

New rule—Private members' notices of motions.

Mr. NEILL: I notice this rule as amended is substantially different from the same rule as amended last year. The object of this amended rule is to do away with the practice of members loading up the order paper with resolutions during the recess. Then when we come down here we find perhaps thirty or forty resolutions which have been placed on the order paper during the recess; I think in one case I counted as many as fifteen resolutions in the name of one private member. The object of the former committee was to try and get away from that; that object was attained in some measure, but subsection 4 of the proposed amendment of last year has been left out. That subsection provided that if notice of certain resolutions were given during the recess, these should not be placed on the order paper in the order in which they were received but that they should be retained by the clerk and on the opening day of the session the right of precedence should be determined by ballot. According to this new rule, a member may only have one resolution on the order paper at one time, and it is suggested that this will do away with this abuse. That will not be the case, because a member may put down a resolution in his own name and then put the other fourteen resolutions in the names of his friends in the House, which will load up the order paper just the same. We are always in the habit of running to the English parliament for precedents, and I might say that in that House the ballot system is followed. I do not know why that was left out of the amended rule, because it seems to me it would cover the whole situation.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There is another portion of this new rule to which I would like to refer. Supposing a private member has a motion on the order paper and it is called on a Wednesday close to six o'clock; he would not be given sufficient time for a proper discussion of his motion. It is not proceeded with; it may be called a second time on another Wednesday shortly before six o'clock, and if it is not proceeded with then it goes off the order paper altogether, and to a certain extent advantage might be taken of a procedure of that kind. I think there should be some safeguard for the motions of private members in regard to Wednesdays.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that under subsection 1 the motion can be reinstated; that would permit it to be called three times, and it is hardly likely that each time would be late on a Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is true, but it would go to the bottom of the list.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It goes to the foot of the list, but it may be restored.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would point out to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) that the new rule says "If the notice of motion thus restored . . . ." That is, thus restored to the foot of the list.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is quite true, but as a matter of fact under this rule the list will never be very long.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There could be 244 motions on it.

Mr. COOTE: I think a notice called or under discussion at six o'clock on Wednesday should take precedence on the following Monday; the rule should be amended to provide for that, this would be fair to everyone. It has happened on Wednesdays that the whole order paper has been gone through because no member was willing to go on and have his resolution talked out at six o'clock. I think it would greatly improve the rules if they were changed to allow a resolution under discussion at six o'clock on Wednesday to come up first on Monday.

Mr. JACOBS: What are you going to do with awkward resolutions about which the government do not want to do anything? The government must be protected in some way.

Mr. COOTE: Such resolutions could be disposed of in the usual way; someone could move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. NEILL: I would like an answer to my suggestion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was not in the committee when this rule was adopted, but as I said before everything was fully considered and weighed and I really think we should adopt the rules as approved by the committee. As the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) pointed out, there will be fewer motions on the order paper when each member will be limited to one at any one time. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) suggests that it would be fair to all members if a motion not disposed of on Wednesday evening should take precedence on Monday, but as my hon. friend knows this House has 245 members, and they each have equal rights. I think this suggestion would rather work for the benefit and advantage of all members, in providing that one member should not take up two days with his motion while others are kept waiting until that motion is disposed of.

Mr. COOTE: It is only in an endeavour to get equal rights for every member that I suggest this amendment. If one member has his motion discussed all day Monday and another member can only get from five to six o'clock on Wednesday surely that is not fair, and it is with a desire to avoid that particular situation that I suggest that any resolution not disposed of at six o'clock on Wednesday should be first on the order paper on Monday.

Mr. NEILL: The argument that the matter has been considered by a committee and that we should therefore accept it blind, applies equally to the report received last year, which provided a very different thing. It seems to me we are perpetuating the very evil we seek to dispose of that of members loading up the order paper either personally or vicariously during the recess. Is it reasonable that a member should be allowed to place a motion on the order paper in August which will not be discussed until March to the prejudice of hon. members coming down here with a resolution with which they desire to proceed? The former committee prevented that by establishing the ballot system, which seems to me to be the fair way.

Mr. MANION: Is not that prevented by the fact that a member can only have one resolution on the order paper at any one time?

Mr. NEILL: No, because the member will put on a resolution in his own name and will put on other resolutions in the names of his friends.

Mr. POWER: I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) with regard to the situation which will be created if this rule is carried. Undoubtedly if the government do not wish a certain resolution to be proceeded with they can so manoeuvre matters that it will be called twice on a Wednesday. If the resolution is of some public importance and if the member sincerely wishes to have an expression of opinion from the different quarters of the House and the different members of the House, in that way he will be prevented from doing so. He will naturally ask that his resolution stand over until Monday, when several hours may be devoted to it. I remember a year or so ago a resolution was placed on the order paper by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, in which was embodied the entire policy of the Tory party. That resolution was called three or four times on a Wednesday, and Mr. Meighen very properly refused to proceed with it. In several other instances the same thing has occurred. This year I have on the order paper what I consider to be a very important resolution, asking for the abolition of the Civil Service Commission, which is a question in which many members of this House are interested. Some are bitterly opposed to the Civil Service Commission. Others think that the Civil Service Commission is probably the greatest institution which has visited earth since Moses received the ten commandments. I should like to hear this matter discussed, and the constituents of a number of hon. gentlemen would also like to hear their views on this question. On the last two or three Mondays—the last three, I think—I have been unable to proceed owing to the debate on this very important matter of the Georgian bay canal. To-morrow probably, or perhaps on another Wednesday, this resolution may be called.

Mr. HEAPS: Why do you not take it up on a Wednesday?

Mr. POWER: Because I do not wish to have the resolution discussed on a Wednesday. I should like to have my hon. friend's opinion on this matter. I should like to have the opinions of hon. gentlemen who sit with him, and particularly, I should like to have, if possible, the opinion of some of the members of the government, but if the resolution is brought up on a Wednesday perhaps they will not give me their views on the question.

Mr STEVENS: Is this filibustering?

Mr. POWER: This is only by way of illustrating the injustice which will be committed towards the country and to a member. I think the rule ought to be changed to read, "when a private member's notice of motion shall have been called twice on a Monday." I would therefore move, seconded by Mr. St-Père:

That the words "on a Monday" be added after the word "twice" in the second line of paragraph 1.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Before the amendment is voted on I should like to ask what is the meaning of "on a Monday," whether it means twice on one single Monday or twice on two successive Mondays.

Mr. RINFRET: It cannot be called twice on the same day.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am dealing with the language as it is. It is proposed that a notice of motion shall be called twice on a Monday. I would suggest to the mover of the amendment that he might make that matter clear, and consider also mentioning the hour on a Monday. Calling the motion after five minutes to eleven on Monday evening would not help very much.

Mr. STEVENS: The member will have to take his chances on that.

Amendment (Mr. Power) negatived.

New rule as to private members' notices of motions agreed to.

New rule as to amendments on motion to leave the chair agreed to.

On amended rule 88—Time limited for receiving petitions for private bills.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I may say for the information of hon. members that these new rules regarding private business, upon the consideration of which we are about to enter, were prepared by the officers of the House after a great deal of care and attention. From their experience in years gone by they should understand very well what changes are necessary in order to expedite the business of the House and make matters move more smoothly.

Mr. SPEAKER: All these rules which we are about to consider are of a purely technical character. The task of preparing and amending them was confided to an expert officer of the House, Mr. Todd, who has been in the public service for fifty years. Such little changes as he recommends are changes which he thought should have been brought about long ago. As I have already said, they are purely technical in their nature, and were taken as read when they were brought back to the committee.

Amended rule 88 agreed to.

On amended rule 89 (1)—Time limited for deposit.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is provided here that:

Any person desiring to obtain any private bill shall deposit with the Clerk of the House not later than the first day of each session, a copy of such bill in the English and French languages, with a sum sufficient to pay for translating and printing the same.

For information, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask into what languages these bills are to be translated?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The wording should be "English or French language." I move that the word "and" be replaced by the word "or" in the fourth line.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will there be any charge for translating if the bill is deposited in both languages?

Mr. STEVENS: An official translator attends to that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have to have an official translator.

Amendment agreed to.

Amended rule 89 (1) as further amended, agreed to.

Amended rule 89 (3) (b); amended rule 89 (new subsection 5 (a)); amended rule 89 (proposed subsection 9); new rule 90; amended rule 91 (1); rule 91 (a) 3; rule 91 (b) 1; amended rule 91 (b) 2; amended rule 91 (c) 1; amended rule 91 (c) 2 agreed to.

Amended rule 91 (d)—recommendation that rule be struck out agreed to.

Rule 91 (e)—recommendation that rule be struck out agreed to.

New rule 92; 92 (2); 92 (3); 92 (4); 92 (5) agreed to.

Amended rule 93 agreed to.

Amended rule 94 (1) and (a) agreed to.

Amended rule 94 (b) and rule 95—recommendation that rule be struck out agreed to.

Amended rule 96 (1); amended rule 96 (2); amended rule 98; amended rule 100; amended rule 101 agreed to.

Rule 102—recommendation that rule be struck out agreed to.

Rule 103 agreed to.

Rule 104—recommendation that rule be struck out agreed to.

Amended rules 106, 107, 110, 111, 113, 116 and 117, agreed to.

On amended rule 118—Parliamentary agents.

Mr. HEAPS: This rule provides that no person shall be allowed to be registered as a parliamentary agent unless he has paid a fee of $25 and is actually employed in promoting or opposing some private bill or petition. As it stands, that language would imply that the payment of $25 makes him a permanent agent. I take it that is not intended.

Mr. SPEAKER: During each session.

Mr. HEAPS: It does not say so.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is the fee in England and in the United States.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member has raised a point worth considering. Undoubtedly the rule as it stands makes the agent permanent on payment of $25.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Make it "per session".

Mr. ADSHEAD: Perhaps we might say, "an annual fee, $25."

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that the rule be amended to read:

No person shall be allowed to be registered as a parliamentary agent during any session unless he has paid a fee of $25 and is actually employed in promoting or opposing some private bill or petition pending in parliament during that session.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That language is not quite clear. The words "during the session" should come after $25.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Why not say "for each session"?

Mr. WARD: I would suggest the word "sessional" in the second line—"unless he has paid a sessional fee".

Mr. MALCOLM: The fee is paid only for one session and I think the words "for such session" might be sufficient.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): As a new member, I should like to know what it is all about anyhow. What is a parliamentary agent and why is it necessary for him to pay $25? What does it all mean? Is he a species of lobbyist?

Mr. CAHAN: No; parliamentary agents are necessary for the ordinary progress of bills.

Mr. SPENCER: With what officials do parliamentary agents register?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. WARD: What is the amendment?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker might be good enough to inform the committee whether any recommendation has been made to have a new issue of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules in their present handy form.

Mr. SPEAKER: Naturally the rules will have to be recast and reprinted. As amended they will come into force next session. In the meantime I presume they will be printed and I dare say the Clerk of the House will have a new edition of his book published. That book, of course, is his own property and not ours, but possibly later on parliament may deem it advisable to pay for the distribution amongst the members of the House of copies of the revised edition. The amendments which have been made, though radical in some respects, do not conflict with the general principles of parliamentary government and May and Bourinot will continue to be quoted in this House. At all events the publication of a new edition of Beauchesne is a matter that concerns the clerk personally.

Mr. STEVENS: The committee, I think, will agree that the rules as issued a few years ago and as we have them now are printed in the handiest possible form. A number of decisions have been rendered in recent years and this of course will necessitate such changes as may warrant a new edition. I suppose it would be out of order for me to make such a motion, but perhaps I can induce the Minister of Justice to move at the proper time that a new edition of the book be printed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. member will leave it to the common sense of the Speaker.

Mr. STEVENS: If we leave it there we are safe.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gave instructions to the Clerk the last time to have the rules printed, and now it will be necessary to have a new edition printed containing the amendments adopted by the committee. The Speaker can then not do otherwise than recommend to parliament that a certain number of copies be distributed among the members. In fact, every year we distribute copies to the new members. There need be no fear about that.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I would like to know what is the purpose in making the man pay a fee of twenty-five dollars.

Mr. SPEAKER: Every lawyer has to pay to the bar of his own district an annual fee. I pay to the bar of Montreal every year a fee to have my name kept on the roll as a practising lawyer. When a lawyer appears before a committee of parliament he is paid a very large fee, an enormous fee in some cases, and these lawyers use our officers, our paper and ink and pens and our offices, and the least they can do is to pay a small fee out of consideration for the personnel of the House of Commons. I may say that in England and the United States counsel who appear before committees to argue cases for private interests are obliged to pay a certain fee to the officers of the House, which goes into the treasury, and we are simply following the practice that is followed elsewhere.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The only objection I have to the rule is that it should be one thousand dollars instead of twenty-five.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do not be too hard on the legal profession.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I quite agree with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington. I do not think the practice of a lawyer or a medical doctor paying an annual fee to his society is in the same position as this at all. I do not see why these people are allowed to use our offices and our pens and ink, as stated by Mr. Speaker. I think the fee is a great deal too low. I would like to see it much higher than twenty-five dollars.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would you read the rule, Mr. Chairman, as it has been amended?

The CHAIRMAN: Rule 118 will now read:

No person shall be allowed to be registered as a parliamentary agent during any session unless he has paid a fee of twenty-five dollars for such session and is actually employed in promoting or opposing some private bill or petition pending in parliament during that session.

Amended rule agreed to.

Conclusion—Recommendation that amended rules be put into force next session agreed to.

Report, with amendments, reported.

On the motion of Mr. Lapointe for concurrence in the amendments:

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Before concurrence, as I have not taken part in this debate, I wish to make an observation that might be of some use in the future. If the object of the committee engaged upon the revision of the rules was really to expedite the business of the House, it seems to me that it has failed in one important respect. It has been observed during the debate—I read it in Hansard—that much time is consumed during the former part of the session, not to say the most of it, in discussing various estimates in committee of supply, and then when we come towards the end of the session hundreds of millions of dollars are voted almost en bloc. Comment is made on that at almost every session. It seems to me, with all due respect to the committee, that a much more important reform than many of these that have been adopted would have been to study and, if possible, recommend one feature in which I think the French parliament has improved on the English practice, and that is of constituting a standing committee on supply—"La Commission du Budget." To this committee is referred the whole of the estimates, and before it appear the permanent officials to give any information that is required.

I think it is a ridiculous proceeding we have here when estimates are going through, to see a couple of chairs brought in and placed in front of the minister for a couple of officials who are supposed to know all the matters that are going to be considered. Very frequently they do not know, and very frequently the minister does not know a word about the subject under discussion. A question will be put to him by an hon. member; then the minister interrogates the official, gets some answer, repeats it to the committee, objection is made to it, then a further consultation takes place. Certainly this little talking business does not conduce to a proper elaboration of the estimates. If we had a permanent committee of supply, all that work would take place in that committee, which would function just like the committee on railways and canals, or the committee on miscellaneous private bills. The permanent officials would be interrogated by the members of the committee right there, and would give their evidence at first hand; and then, when the estimates were referred back to the House, they could be adopted by chapters, as it were—the budget of the Railway department, the Militia department, the Public Works department, and so on. Any motion of censure or amendment proposed by any hon. member of the House would be as to the general policy of the department, and Hansard would only record such debates that bore on the general policy of any department or on the general policy of the government. It seems to me that much time could be saved in that way; in fact, if that is not the rule, it is the practice in England. The committee of the whole House discusses only the general features of the budget, and if any member of the opposition has any criticism to make or blame to pass upon any department of the government, he moves that the salary of the minister or Secretary of State be reduced by £100, and then a discussion takes place upon the policy of the department. Then there should be no verbatim reports of all the discussion that takes place here on some little post office, or the building of a wharf, or the best way of packing apples, or the number of pounds of butter that should go in a case. I think the larger the country grows and the more we have various matters of detail introduced into the budget, the more we will have to look into this matter. I am merely making a suggestion this year. I think the idea will have to be considered, and when it is considered perhaps we will make headway.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Another point I want to deal with is the right of private members to propose amendments to supply or to budget resolutions. I do not want to offer criticism. But, as a matter of illustration, when the budget resolutions of the Finance minister were before the committee two motions were made, one to restrict the application of the sales tax, the other to limit the reduction in the income tax as proposed by the Minister of Finance. Both were declared out of order. If the decisions then rendered were to become the practice of the House, it would mean that no private member has the right to suggest amendments that would either diminish or increase taxation. I have taken the matter up since that time. I have studied authors that I had forgotten about for years, and I have come to the conclusion that if those decisions were to form part of the jurisprudence of the House, the liberties of individual members would be much more restricted than had ever been thought of, either in this House or in any other parliament. I cannot believe it is the intention to do so. Of course, it has become a practice, although not for many years, in the British House of Commons—and we have followed the practice—that no money measures can be introduced by a private member. It has also become the practice that no individual private member can propose anything which means an increase of expenditure. This is of rather recent growth in the Britsh House of Commons. I do not dispute that, and what I think is expressed in various forms, in various language, and supported by various precedents, is that no private member can introduce amendments that would change the character of a money measure proposed by the government, as it has been approved by the king, or the representative of the king. But surely any private member should have a right to propose that a measure already accepted by the government and presented by a minister in the House should be enlarged or restricted, provided we remain within the scope of the matter presented. To give an example, I do not think it would be in order, according to the present interpretation placed upon the rules, for a private member to propose that a direct tax should be changed into an indirect tax, or that the Customs Act should be amended either by lowering the duties or raising the scale, and compensate for that by some change in the income tax. But if the government introduces some amendment to the Customs Act bearing upon a certain article, or certain kinds of merchandise taxed by the tariff, or if the government proposes certain amendments to the income tax, surely it should be within the right of any individual member to suggest by way of amendment that this special measure, applying to the same clause in the law, should be enlarged or restricted. I think if the rules of the House are to be reprinted, if precedents are to be quoted, and if the opinions of parliamentary jurists are to be taken, something to that effect should be mentioned. I stand for ministerial responsibility; but I think every member of the House, no matter what party he supports, should also stand for the privileges and liberties of the individual member. A very conservative British author, a high authority, Lecky, pointed out, some thirty or forty years ago, how, with the growth of practice the cabinet, a new institution in parliamentary government, a thing which was not heard of two hundred years ago, has gradually absorbed the powers of the Lords, the powers of the Commons and the powers of the King. Surely the evolution in the parliamentary system of government, either in Great Britain or any country which boasts of parliamentary traditions, should not tend further towards replacing aristocracy or autocracy by oligarchy. Surely we must preserve some principles of representative government. While reserving to the committee of the House which commands its confidence, full liberty to carry out its policy, we should also concede liberty to individual members to make suggestions or propose changes, not merely by words but by amendments that give concrete form to their thought, or the thought of the people they represent. I commend these matters in a most friendly spirit to all and to the House of Commons as a whole. I think a very substantial reform would be accomplished if we had a committee of supply to deal with the budget in a business-like manner while reserving to the House ample liberty to discuss the general features of the budget, and at the same time reserving to private members their full liberty to express the views of the people who sent them here, not to serve one party or the other, but to serve the country to the best of their ability.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The rules have been framed in an endeavour to expedite the business of the House and to shorten the length of the session. When the report of the special committee was brought in the other day the discussion was started before many hon. members knew what was coming down that day, and very few were here to discuss the first few rules.

The second rule, providing for closing of the House at eleven o'clock at night, in my opinion will lengthen the sittings of the House a great deal, and I do not think we should have an ironbound rule with regard to adjourning at eleven o'clock at night, because if that rule were in force the debate could be kept going for an endless time. I think the House expressed an opinion on it, and we should endeavour to close at eleven o'clock at night. But when we pass an ironbound rule to close at eleven o'clock at night in my opinion it will greatly lengthen the session of parliament and I think it should be carefully considered before we finally adopt it.

Mr. NEILL: It was my intention to move an amendment at this stage. But in view of the vote taken about an hour ago, and the decision of the House in favour of this rule, I will not waste time in forcing another vote, but I want to go on record once more as entirely opposed to the changes made by which the speeches of private members will be limited to forty minutes on all occasions. One hon. member opposite said that the British House of Commons was originally instituted to vote supply. Yes, but there was a condition attached to it. Before they voted supplies they made the king listen to the grievances of the common people, and it is the inalienable right of the common people to present their grievances in the House of Commons, but the House has dealt a blow against that principle to-day. While the amendment was carried a little while ago I think that the greater tribunal, the people of Canada will justify us who opposed it in the position we took. I think the most precious political rights the British subject can possess are, first of all, the right to vote, and second, the right of untrammelled free speech, and I believe the House has struck a blow at that right to-day.

Mr. HEAPS: The rule limiting speeches to forty minutes has been agreed to, and I desire to know if, under this rule, a member is to be allowed for the time taken up by interruptions.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may be allowed, not to take part in the debate, but to explain. Whenever closure is invoked the time taken up by any interruptions of a member is credited to his twenty minutes. It is an unwritten rule in congress, for instance, where similar restrictions are in force, to allow a congressman extra time for interruptions.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the report of the committee of the whole on the rules of the House be now adopted.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. NEILL: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on division.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Public Works—chargeable to income—Prince Edward Island, $189,600.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee that this vote should be taken item by item?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Charlottetown—reconstruction of railway wharf, $75,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): What is this $75,000 for?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): This is a revote of $75,000, to provide for the reconstruction of the railway wharf at Charlottetown.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is nothing in the estimates to show that this is a revote. When was the item voted before?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Last session, I understand, but it does not appear in the main estimates. Possibly it will be found in the supplementaries.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I would like to ask the minister if it is the intention of the government to provide anything this year for accommodation at Georgetown or Souris. The question of accommodation at Georgetown has been before the government for a couple of years at least, and it was generally expected that something would certainly be done this year. I brought it up in the House last session, and the then Minister of Public Works stated that the government, having considered the matter, intended to proceed, but that owing to the railway east of Charlottetown being narrow gauge, it was no use constructing a warehouse until the gauge was standardized. This was done last September, and the people of the province have been hoping that this very much needed accommodation would be provided. It is not a local matter affecting merely Georgetown or even Kings county, it is a matter for the province as a whole. For at least a month after the harbours of Charlottetown and Summerside are closed in December Georgetown and Souris are open. The growing of seed potatoes is now a very important industry in Prince Edward Island, and their transportation has become an acute problem. As is well known, the car ferry during the past year was taxed to its utmost capacity, and was unable to transport all the produce grown in the province. Although it worked day and night during November last it was unable to carry all the traffic offered. There will be great disappointment if something is not done this year to provide the necessary accommodation, by reason of the fact that a large portion of the seed potatoes is sold in the southern part of the United States, and it is very important that this traffic should be moved by water. In certain parts of the south they will purchase these seed potatoes only about the middle of January when their planting season commences. Transportation by rail is very expensive; it is also risky on account of frost at that time of year, and they will not ship till late in the season because they have no storage facilities there and do not want to hold potatoes for a month or six weeks. Therefore they want transportation by water at the latest possible date. Last year the latest date on which navigation was open at Charlottetown and Summerside was during the first few days of December, while a steamer loaded a cargo of produce in the harbour of Georgetown on January 11. Navigation could have been continued for many days later had any business been offered or had there been accommodation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might ask my friend a question which he can answer in the course of his remarks. I have received representations with regard to both Souris and Georgetown, and as to the relative amounts of potatoes shipped from both places. There is no doubt that there is quite an extensive traffic in potatoes, which I understand to be largely seed potatoes shipped to the United States from both these places. Would my friend feel disposed, in case the government should not feel able to grant both requests, to state which is the larger? The figures differ somewhat.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I would say to the minister that the local traffic is not considered in the matter as of any consequence, although of course it is important to the people of these different localities. I am not speaking for the county of Kings or for the towns of Georgetown or Souris; I am speaking for the province of Prince Edward Island. Queens county is just as much interested as Kings county, because the main features apply equally to both. The harbour of Souris cannot be used as a shipping point during the month of December because it has no storage facilities, and the people in the vicinity of Georgetown cannot use that point either; if either Georgetown or Souris were equipped with the necessary accommodation the whole province would be able to make use of that accommodation. The farmers would then be able to get their produce to the southern states at the time the consumers want it, and the farmers would realize a great deal more than would otherwise be the case. I was proceeding to give the reasons for that statement. If the potatoes are transported by water they can be delivered in the southern United States at a price which will cover both freight and duty if shipped by rail, and when you realize that the duty is thirty cents per hundred pounds and that you can save at least that amount if not more by water transportation, it will be seen that this is a very important item.

I would not like to say to the minister that he should select one point or the other, because either port will serve the great bulk of the province. I think the government officials and engineers should decide on the point where this warehouse should be placed. A meeting of the potato growers was held at Souris about two weeks ago, at which strong representations were made from the local standpoint that this warehouse should be placed at Souris, while I understand that up to that time all negotiations by the department were made with the view to having this warehouse at Georgetown. I understand the department has prepared plans for that warehouse, and it was generally accepted in the province that these facilities would be constructed at that point. Beyond that I have not anything to say in the matter; it is entirely up to the government and its officials to decide the proper point at which to place this warehouse. As a matter of fact, if we had nerve enough to ask for it, accommodation should be placed at both these points, but we realize that we must be reasonable and must be satisfied if the Department of Public Works will grant us one warehouse at this time.

There are many reasons which could be given for accommodation at these points other than the local needs of these places. There are a number of places in the eastern and northern parts of the province which have no railway accommodation whatever but have water accommodation, such as Murray Harbour North, Lower Montague, Gaspereaux, Newport, Bridgetown, Fortune and some points on the north side as far around as New London in Queen's county. These and other points would be served by accommodation at either Souris or Georgetown, because these people would be able at any season of the year to assemble their produce at Georgetown or Souris by means of small schooners, large motor boats or other means of water transportation, without fear of frost. This is a most important matter; while I do not like to take up too much time of the House I would like to go further into it, but I hardly think it necessary. I think probably the minister has all the information required, and if there is anything further he would like to ask I would be glad to tell him.

Before closing I would like to say that when this matter was brought up last year the minister practically told us the warehouse would be built after the railway was standardized. The Prime Minister was at Georgetown last year; at that time this matter was put up to him very strongly, and the people at the meeting understood his statement to be a practical promise that a warehouse would be built at Georgetown. I think I am justified in saying that—and I am not speaking politically at all but rather in the interests of the industry in Prince Edward Island because The Patriot newspaper, which is the Liberal organ in that province, reported Mr. Mackenzie King as follows:

> Mr. King spoke of his landing at Georgetown and of the discussion in parliament as to the need of improved facilities at that port.
> He was interested in seeing the large warehouse on the railway wharf which had been referred to. He did not wish to be charged with making promises to influence the electors, but as a result of representations made to him, the Liberal government had taken steps to have this shed made frost-proof. The then Minister of Public Works, Hon. Dr. King, had declared that as soon as the standardization of the railway east was completed the work of making the warehouse frost-proof would be undertaken.
> "I believe that this would be a right and proper step, and should be undertaken as soon as possible," declared Hon. Mr. King, amid loud applause.

The people of that section of the country took that statement as a definite promise, in conjunction with the statement made by the then Minister of Public Works, that this work would be proceeded with without delay and that the accommodation which is so much needed would be granted. There is great disappointment in that province to-day because of the fact that no sum has been placed in the estimates this year to provide for this work.

It must also be remembered that even during the open season, the harbour of Charlottetown was taxed last year to its utmost capacity, and as a result about 800,000 bushels of potatoes were shipped from that port. About 200,000 bushels passed through the port of Summerside, and an additional 200,000 bushels were handled by schooners and other sailing craft. The car ferry, during the shipping months, handled 2,271 carloads; as I said before, during the month of November the car ferry worked day and night and was taxed to its utmost capacity, handling about 1,165 car loads. These figures are taken from the records of the railway officials. I am satisfied that about the utmost that could be handled, with the rail and water facilities available, was handled last fall. Unless some further accommodation is given so that larger shipments can be made, there is a prospect that we shall be seriously handicapped in the matter of shipping facilities next fall.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I may say to my hon. friend that representations have been made by at least two delegations on behalf of Georgetown, and one or more on behalf of Souris. They have pointed out that the potato industry in Prince Edward island has doubled in production in the last three or four years, and the exports have more than trebled. There is a great difference of opinion between the representatives of these two places as to which port is best entitled to consideration. I do not think that either of them quite expected that much could be done for both. However, a survey of the Souris district is now being made, and I shall be very glad to go into the matter further as soon as that report is received.

Mr. JENKINS: I should like to say for the information of the House that potato growing in Prince Edward island is going ahead at a very rapid rate. The votes included in the estimates we are considering were inserted there for the purpose of making provision for the expansion of this particular industry. In order to show hon. gentlemen just how important the matter is, I shall quote from the issue, dated February 19, last, of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, gotten out by the Department of Trade and Commerce, wherein appears an article by Trade Commissioner Frederick Hudd on Canada's trade with the United States. In the course of this article the Commissioner says:

Undoubtedly a considerable portion of the total exports of potatoes from Canada to the United States were reëxported to other markets, although detailed statistics on this point are not available. It is evident, however, that the reputation of the Canadian potato, as well as its superior quality and size, are finding for it a constantly expanding market, not only in the United States but in foreign countries through United States agencies. Improved methods of cleaning, grading, and packing Canadian potatoes have greatly assisted their marketing in competition with potatoes from the New England states. Under present conditions the heavy movement of potatoes from maritime province points in the months of November and April results in a congestion necessitating the placing of an embargo on potato shipments at such points as Boston and New York. This congestion at two periods results in a lower price for the producer. After having obtained a first hand knowledge of the potato situation, paricularly in Prince Edward island, the writer is of the opinion that it would be of considerable advantage if there were more frost proof warehouse facilities on railway tracks at Canadian shipping points. Potatoes could then be stored and shipments spread over a period, thereby eliminating the risk of loss due to lack of frost proof storage for potatoes which it is impossible to ship when the movement is at peak.

There was included in the estimates of last year the sum of $75,000 for the desired work at Charlottetown, but it was not available in time. The railway authorities therefore, agreed that they would undertake the work with the understanding that they would be reimbursed later on by the Public Works department. To show you what effect this work has had in connection with the industry I beg to put on Hansard a letter written to me on December 7, 1926 by the secretary of the Prince Edward Island Potato Growers' Association. That letter is as follows:

Dear Mr. JENKINS:

I feel that as an association we should express to you our appreciation of your efforts in securing for us at Charlottetown a better warehouse for the handling of our potatoes.

This season we had in storage during cold weather potatoes in value from seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars. This was due to the late arrival of steamers over which we have no control, and you can readily understand how great would have been our loss in the old shed. While that is the most important advantage, yet loading as we did such large cargoes we could never have been able to accomplish the moving of upwards of seven hundred thousand bushels in practically six weeks with the old facilities.

We wish to assure you the expenditure has been a benefit to the whole province, and we feel you were of great assistance in bringing the government to see the need for the changes made.

Yours very truly,

J. W. BOULTER,
Secretary,
P.E.I. Potato Growers Association.

I may say, Sir, that I happened to be a member of the House last year and we were very ably assisted not only by the members from Prince Edward Island, but also by the Hon. John Sinclair, although not at that time a member of the House, who helped us in every way possible.

I am very much pleased to support the recommendations made by the member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald). It is quite true, as he has stated, that the harbours of Souris and Georgetown remain open quite a while longer than either those of Charlottetown or Summerside, and it is therefore essential that we should have later shipments from ports such as these. I shall be pleased to support anything that will give us better shipping facilities for the island at large. As the member for Kings has stated, it is really a provincial and not a county matter. There seems to be, unfortunately, a little difficulty as to what port should be selected for improvement. I would suggest, however, just as he has suggested, that a representative of the department should be sent down to the island to go over the different ports and recommend to the department the proper steps which ought to be taken. I shall be pleased indeed to support whatever recommendation is made by the officer sent down for that purpose. The wonderful work going on in the province is really marvelous to those who are not acquainted with the situation, and any assistance that will help to place the products of Prince Edward island on the outside markets in good condition is something which merits the utmost consideration of the government.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I will delay the committee only a few moments in a brief expression of opinion with respect to the very important matter now under consideration. I want to say that I agree with the representations that have been made by the member for Kings, and by the member for Queens (Mr. Jenkins) in regard to the necessity of making further provision to aid in the transportation of potatoes from Prince Edward island at a later period in the season. Perhaps, Sir, the two main reasons may be summed up in this way: at present our season for shipping potatoes, after the close of the harvesting period, is forty days. Now, if we can extend that by a month we shall be conferring a great benefit upon the growers of potatoes in the province. Further than that we shall enjoy the advantage of a much larger market in the southern states by shipping potatoes to those people when they require them, which is in the month of January. We can do that if facilities are provided in the eastern or winter ports. With that end in view I say to the minister that it is necessary that one harbour at least in the eastern end of Prince Edward Island be equipped for winter shipments so as to take care of exportations of seed potatoes to the southern states at the season of the year when such shipments are most advantageous.

I may say further that I agree with the minister that if representations have been made to have developments carried out at two ports he could not do otherwise than have a proper survey undertaken and act on the advice of his representative on the ground. I think further, as an agriculturist representing an agricultural constituency, that it would be wise for the Minister of Agriculture to have an expert from his department look into the situation also with a view to having the best possible transportation facilities provided for the exportation of potatoes, particularly from the point of view of making shipments in the winter season possible by water.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I am not quite clear as to the minister's explanation; in fact he has not given any explanation as to why a sum of money was not put in the estimates this year for this purpose. It has been before the government, it has been in the hands of the Department of Public Works for at least two or three years. Last year, according to Hansard, the answer I received from the then Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay), was as follows:

> I am familiar with the situation at Georgetown. The government have reconditioned and renewed a very good wharf at that point, and have improved the shed accommodation. It is true that we have not made that shed frost proof, as I think it should be, for the accommodation of the farmers in the handling of their potatoes, but I would point out that at the present time the railway is on the narrow gauge. We understand that the railway is changing to the broad gauge, and once that is accomplished I think we will be justified in spending some money on a potato warehouse at Georgetown.

I do not want to be critical at all but, in view of the facts as set out, in view of the promise virtually given by the minister in the House last year, and the Prime Minister's virtual promise at Georgetown, I do not quite understand why something was not included in the estimates this year for either one of these ports. The minister will agree with me, I think, that it is only within the last few weeks, since the estimates were prepared and printed, that any representations were made to him with regard to Souris. I understand that the first step taken was a meeting held at Souris about two weeks ago, not over three weeks at any rate, and after that a delegation came to interview the minister, resolutions having been forwarded to him as adopted at that meeting. Surely the department having had the matter under consideration for at least two years, would have been prepared, if they intended doing so, to put an item in the estimates this year to implement the promises made by the Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister. I should like to have the minister's candid explanation as to why this was not done in view of these promises, or at any rate of what we regard in that light.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The representations on behalf of Georgetown, made shortly prior to the preparation of the estimates, asked, as I recollect, for a frost proof potato warehouse much larger than called for in the first estimate, and it was necessary to have a resurvey made before any decision could be arrived at. The warehouse which had been discussed before was stated by the representatives from Georgetown to be totally inadequate to the present needs of that port, and consequently a further survey was made. That survey was not completed nor reported upon when the estimates were in preparation, and in the meantime Souris represented that the production there was four times as large as the production at Georgetown. That matter is now being inquired into.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): It is not at all a question of production at either Souris or Georgetown; that is only a minor detail in connection with the scheme. Does the minister intend to put anything in the supplementary estimates this year for this work at either of these places?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That will depend upon the reports received. I am not in a position to answer that question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Am I to assume that it is not the intention of the government to do anything this year in regard to this matter?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend should not assume that. I want him to understand clearly that I cannot give an undertaking to include any amount in the estimates for either Souris or Georgetown or any other place.

Item agreed to.

Summerside—wharf repairs and improvemets, $63,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): The minister might explain what this vote is intended for. What construction is contemplated?

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: The proposed work will consist of:

(1) Rebuilding outer end and outer west side of wharf to original width of 100 feet on a length of 350 feet.
(2) Construction of two warehouses each 230 feet long, 26 feet wide.
(3) Provision for two lines of railway track between the sheds above referred to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): I was not objecting; I just wanted the information.

Item agreed to.

West Point—wharf repairs, $6,800.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Before this resolution is reported I have just one remark to make. We have in this total vote $189,600 for the province of Prince Edward Island, and it will be found on analysis that almost every dollar of that money, with the exception of a small item for Naufrage, is to be spent in Queens and Prince counties. There is just $1,000 for Kings county. The department is fully aware, from information submitted by its district engineer, how urgent the needs of Kings county are, and it is surprising to find that of this large sum of money practically every cent is to go to Queens and Prince counties and only $1,000 to Kings county. Naturally I feel, as the people of Kings county feel, that we should not be shut out altogether even though by a small majority they voted me here instead of returning a supporter of the government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is overlooking the fact that these items are made up largely of work in Charlottetown amounting to $75,000 and the vote for Summerside of $63,000, which are the recommendations of the Duncan report.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): But apart from that there is $50,000 for the other counties and nothing for Kings.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers—New Brunswick, $154,100.

Mr. MacLAREN: On looking over this list of places provided for in New Brunswick I fail to see the name of Lorneville. It has been brought to the attention of the department on several occasions by my colleague and myself. Lorneville is an important and thriving fishing village. The catch of fish is quite considerable and valuable, including a large catch of salmon. In the harbour of Lorneville there is a pier which is more useful as a breakwater than for the ordinary purposes of a wharf. Last year the department made some repairs to this structure, but it did not and does not meet the great requirement of the pier as a breakwater. The water is shallow in the harbour and the fishermen are not able to use the pier as a breakwater in rough weather. There is therefore need of some dredging; not a great deal is required but a fair amount will have to be done. If the minister would look into the matter he would be satisfied that some dredging at that point would be a very justifiable expenditure. It would enable the fishermen to bring their boats in for safety in rough weather. I do not know whether the minister has considered this matter or had it brought to his attention; perhaps not; I think he only came into office since last year. But I would ask him, and I have no doubt my colleague will do the same thing, that some work be done at this point. It is an important centre, a thriving, active port composed of fishermen making a valuable catch of fish of all kinds, and it is about twenty miles from St. John. These fishermen cannot carry on with safety because there is no shelter in time of storm.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be glad to consider the representations my hon. friend has made. I am advised that certain repairs were made last year at this place, but they were of a temporary character, I believe, and did not extend to the dredging. However, the matter will be looked into, and if it is not very extensive there is a possibility that it might be taken care of under the general vote for harbours and rivers.

Mr. GARDINER: What amount was spent in this province last year in comparison with the amount asked for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will realize that last year was an unusual year, because we were allowed to proceed only with matters that could be gone ahead with under governor general's warrants. The total expenditure last year was around $200,400. The total asked for this year is $154,100.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year's estimate was $292,925.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, and $92,525 of that amount was not expended.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and Rivers—Quebec—Cap de la Madeleine—wharf extension, $75,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister explain this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The proposed work consists of a close face cribwork extension to the downstream end of the headblock, 200 feet long by 90 feet wide; stone filled cribwork to be around the outside, and the centre filled with earth and stone, and the whole covered with a bituminous macadam flooring.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this the total estimate for the completion of the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. The total estimated cost was $132,800. We have received tenders varying from $110,000 to $174,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Are the tenders let?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No contract has been let yet.

Item agreed to.

St-Louis river—dredging, $46,200.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The proposed work estimated at $46,200 is towards dredging a section of the St. Louis river, 3.35 miles long to a depth of 6½ feet and a width of 40 feet, to complete the scheme of improvements commenced in 1905 and running over a period of years up to 1916. This work will be done by an excavator on caterpillar wheels which will have to be purchased or built, as well as a scow 25 feet by 40 feet.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this to complete the work?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will complete the work in that particular section, but this is only part of the general scheme.

Item agreed to.

Sorel—harbour improvements, $46,100.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The details are as follows:

(1) Reconstruction in concrete of remaining 311.4 feet of high level wharf along the Richelieu river..	$18,000
(2) Repairs to breakwater..	2,000
(3) Reconstruction, Pontbriand wharf, the new structure to consist of a closeface crib structure built on piles, 250 feet long and 14 feet wide, with a 27 feet return wing at each end and concrete anchor blocks 4 feet by 4 feet by 5 feet placed at every 25 feet..	23,000
(4) To build a reinforced concrete roadway 511 feet long by 20 feet wide connecting the end of Roy street to the high level wharf; and a concrete sidewalk 4 feet wide by approximately 390 feet long around the end of the high level wharf..	6,100
Total..	$49,100
Less work authorized 1926-1927.. ..	3,000
Balance for 1927-1928..	$46,100

Item agreed to.

Valleyfield—dredging, $50,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year we passed an item of $31,000 for dredging at this point. Was all that money expended, and will the amount asked for here complete this dredging project?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. The $31,000 appears as a revote, and we are asking for an additional $19,000 to complete the work.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Ontario, $1,021,150.

Mr. KAISER: I would like to ask the minister whether there is under contemplation any expenditure in supplementaries for the harbour at the city of Oshawa.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Representations have been made by various representatives from that district, including my hon. friend, if I remember correctly, and the matter is under consideration.

Mr. KAISER: I am very glad to hear the minister is contemplating taking action, but in fairness to the district I represent I would like to make a statement. It surely must appear to everyone that there is something absurd in the harbour situation at Oshawa. Here we have a city which contributes a larger revenue to this government than any other place in the Dominion with the exception of five. Only five ports in Canada send more revenue to Ottawa than the city of Oshawa. It must strike hon. members as a marvelous thing that a city of our size should send to Ottawa $30,000 every day from customs receipts. We have never asked very much from the Dominion of Canada; we have not made many requests, but twenty-six years ago a Liberal government undertook to build a harbour at Oshawa. By virtue of that promise what harbour we had was destroyed, and after twenty-six years the condition remains the same. There is no politics in this matter; both Liberal and Conservative governments decided years ago that we should have our harbour works completed in that town. The last few years the government voted reasonable supplies and carried on some work which up to to-day has cost $132,000. It will take $112,000 to finish the work. I have recently inspected the works and have taken friends to see it during wintertime, and I say that unless the government completes the work, all that has already been done will be destroyed. It is a necessary work. Our city needs it. There are at the present time men who are quite ready to build coal sheds and do other work which will assist us in our progress and in our undertakings. The harbour is more than half completed, but it has taken twenty-six years to get to this stage. Surely we are not doing anything out of the way in presenting our case to parliament. All we ask is that the work that has been undertaken be finished. It is a small demand in comparison to what we contribute to the revenue of the country. I am glad to hear that the government has the matter under consideration and I hope they will complete it. It will be a benefit to the town, and will more than pay the government of Canada if they complete it. Men in Oshawa have built stores and warehouses at Montreal and are prepared to ship their goods, but they have been standing there several years waiting for the harbour to be completed. I plead with the government to consider this matter and put something in the supplementary estimates of a substantial nature to finish the work which has been dragging along for twenty-six years.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not expect the minister to carry everything in his head, but in the supplementary estimates last year there was a vote of, I think, $5,000 for repairs for navigation purposes at what we call the Narrows in Muskoka lakes. It does not appear in the main estimates this year; will it appear in the supplementaries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Nobody knows what will be in the supplementaries until council considers them. Sometimes the minister is disappointed when he asks for certain estimates, but this matter will receive consideration.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister give "favourable consideration," as Sir Oliver Mowat used to say?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will receive grave consideration.

Mr. GARDINER: I have been looking through the estimates for Ontario and I could not realize what was the matter. There seemed to be something missing. What is the matter with Belle river now? Is that completed, or why is it there is no amount in the estimates for Belle river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is very extensive work at Belle river. It has been completed as far as the government intend to go at the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: Does it complete one pier on one side and one pier on the other side?

Mr. ELLIOTT: One pier on one side.

Mr. GARDINER: Does it accomplish anything for the purpose required?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, yes. This government never does anything that does not accomplish something.

Mr. GARDINER: With regard to the grant for a wharf at Ottawa, is it a new project, and where is it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is to take the place of the wharf at the basin on the Rideau canal.

Mr. GARDINER: Where is it—on the Rideau?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it is on the canal. Conferences are taking place with the railway department and negotiations are under way to decide upon the exact location.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there any use for a wharf at that point on the canal?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that on the canal basin they do $7,000,000 worth of business a year, and it is very necessary. We are taking the present structure away, and some substitute must be provided for it.

Mr. GARDINER: There is only one other vote in this item that I want information about, and that is with regard to the dredging at Toronto. I understood the waterfront was under the harbour commission. Is that under the harbour commission or outside of the commission?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is not the waterfront; it is the eastern end, and there has to be additional dredging there every year; there seems to be an annual filling in.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Manitoba—$22,400.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year in the supplementaries an item was included for the purpose of providing against flood conditions in the southern part of Manitoba because of certain works that had been constructed to the south of the line. Is that project to be undertaken?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I believe my hon. friend is referring to the Roseau river, which is an international stream. I think the control of the water has been referred to the International Joint Commission. The matter is receiving consideration and if we decide to proceed the necessary vote will appear in the supplementaries.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan and Alberta—Fort Resolution —wharf, $18,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Whereabouts are the harbours in Alberta?

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are in the northern part of Alberta, being the points along the river where there is water transportation.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The vote has nothing to do with measuring the current of the river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GARDINER: How much was spent under this vote last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Only $3,195.

Mr. GARDINER: Out of the $15,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Out of the $10,000.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is not Fort Resolution in the Northwest Territories? I think it should be separated from this vote.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, it is in the Mackenzie district.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 67, respecting The Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Dubuc.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Monday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, probably I would not have taken up very much time in respect to this matter had it not been for the rather uncalled-for attacks which were made yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and the general terms of insinuation which characterized the major part of his observations. For the benefit of this House I desire to state at once that while I think the personal business of members of parliament should be sacred from the prying eyes of the public, nevertheless when they are dragged into the House of Commons it becomes essential that some observations should be made by those who are directly affected.

For a period of upwards of fifteen years I have been associated with the enterprise known as The E. B. Eddy Company, Limited, which company many years ago purchased a limit on the Gatineau river together with the late Senator Edwards; subsequently, after his interest had been sold, the company acquired the whole limit. The other license holder on the river is the Canadian International Paper Company, and in consequence of the development they are carrying on I found it necessary to speak to the president of that enterprise as to what the effect of their operations might be upon the business of the company with which I was associated. He at once assured me that he had no desire prejudicially to affect those interests, and later suggested that I might join the board of his company. This I did, in common with many others, one at least being the leader of the government in the Senate, and thus I found myself for the first time associated with such a considerable number of distinguished Liberals. You can readily understand what a splendid effect this association has had upon me, and how much it has induced me to believe that the liberality of their views is not confined to their politics.

Might I venture further, and assert that I think no very good purpose was served in this House by the attacks made by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) upon the good faith, the honesty and integrity of either newspapers, newspaper men or men of business carrying on their operations in this Ottawa valley. One hearing that speech or reading it afterwards could not but be struck with the rather violent attacks made against the president, for instance, of the Canadian International Paper Company. There is no young man of my acquaintance in the United States, Mr. Speaker, who has made his way by perseverance, by very great ability and the exercise of his great talents as has Mr. Graustein. He has been honoured in the country in which he lives, and his enterprises have received the stamp of approval of Hon. Mr. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec. Therefore I think it ill becomes any Liberal member of this House of Commons thus to attack him where he has no opportunity to make his defence. So far as his business operations are concerned, they have all been carried out under the law. If one for a moment remembers that after all the observations made by the hon. gentleman have nothing whatever to do with the bill under discussion, one finds it even more difficult to explain them, but when one recalls the genial qualities of heart and mind which characterize the hon. member for Ottawa, one is after all inclined to excuse and forgive him and to remember that the principals whom he represents are capable of nothing better.

After all, there is something rather amusing in it all, when one recalls that at the moment it is openly disclosed that the interests promoting this bill are those interests which a few months ago stood on the platform in Newmarket and decried with all the strength and vigour possible the plutocracy of Montreal; when one recalls the evils of St. James Street as then pictured and the wrongs they have done to this country, one cannot but be amused at the observations made by the hon. gentleman with respect to other people in this country. Then one reflects upon how really embarrassing it must be to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, after the toil and effort of a general election, a long Imperial conference and a session of parliament, journeys to Atlantic City there to seek solace and to recuperate his worn and weary frame. One sympathizes with him in all the toil which attaches to the great office which he holds. I see him there on the board walk; there is his faithful senator, the unofficial minister of collections and elections, clothed in all the pomp and panoply of war, wearing the insignia of his office, in his left hand the cancelled Carillon lease, in his right the bill that imposed retroactive income taxes and the act by which it was quietly suppressed. One sees him with all this insignia of his office dividing his time as an unofficial minister between the high portfolio of collection and the duties of minister of elections; and in the distance one observes the senator from Ottawa looking with interest and some suspicion upon these conferences. The scene changes. The right hon. the Prime Minister is engaged in conference with the gentleman who, as a supporter of my right hon. friend in Newmarket, briefly visited Atlantic City, and I assume once more inveighed against the evils of plutocracy. At Newmarket he said: "There is a group of capitalists, mostly in Montreal, who are taking an active part in this election, and that is the principal reason why I have come here to address you to-night." Oh noble patriot! Oh disinterested representative of the humble poor! For that great reason he journeyed to Newmarket, there to instruct the electors how they should vote. Let us listen to the conversation. He recalls to the listening Prime Minister the evils of St. James Street. He recalls to an admiring Prime Minister what evils have been wrought by predatory wealth. He repeats his speech at Newmarket. He recalls the evils that arose in western Canada with respect to the Crowsnest pass coal lands; speaks of the farmers of Brandon; of the downtrodden and poor of the west—the farmers of the west, the grain growers of the west—he says a Free Press must be ever at their behest. He speaks of the evils of exploiting the Yukon; he speaks of the exploitation of the timber limits and the coal and grazing lands of the west, and the Prime Minister listens with wonder and amazement. He again recalls the evils of St. James Street, and how these evil agents are endeavouring to filch from the people of this country the power on the Georgian bay canal. The Prime Minister, no longer able to contain himself, exclaims: "It must not be, it shall not be. I will hie me to Ottawa, and my Minister of Railways and Canals will save these great resources, not for the plutocrats of St. James but for the squire of Newmarket!"

Now let us see what the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) says. Sir, the Minister of Railways and Canals breaks the silence of this administration, after days of waiting on the part of the people of this country for a statement. Days pass, weeks pass. Nothing is said. Then the Minister of Railways and Canals, reminding us that he is Minister of Canals and speaks as such, makes a statement in which I am bound to observe there is nothing said with respect to the Georgian bay canal bill. He says there is "a bone of contention", and as he finished his speech one could not help but think of the irrelevancy of his observations. It was a speech to which it will be necessary for me to pay some little attention because it contained half truths and many statements which I regret to say were utterly unwarranted by the record. I make that statement deliberately because I have taken the trouble to look at sessional paper No. 154D, which deals with the whole question of the Carillon power, and was filed with the sessional clerk in 1925. It deals with all the matters that took place in connection with that enterprise, and brings them down to that date, and if you add to that the sessional papers of this year you have the story complete.

Now let us analyze this matter, if we may; for I am sure that after listening to the Minister of Railways and Canals you would have thought indeed that this enterprise came into being from a Tory administration. Everything that is evil, in the mind of the Minister of Railways and Canals, originates with the Tory party. Well, let us look at the facts. The grant of Carillon water-power came into being on the 6th day of August, 1908, under P.C. 950, which will be found at page 10 of sessional paper 154D now under my hand. It was granted to Crawford Ross and transferred by him to the National Hydro Electric Company. It contemplated a development of only approximately 250 horsepower, and on the 14th day of March, 1911—still under the aegis of a Liberal administration—by Privy Council order No. 465 a lease was made direct to the National Hydro Electric Company which involved the improvement of the river and the establishment of a hydro-electric power plant limited in extent. Then in 1913, under Privy Council order No. 1792 dated 14th day of July, to be found at page 24 of the sessional papers to which I have referred, a new lease was made supplanting the old, contemplating an additional power development at that point. Now remember that the origin of this was in 1908, but by successive renewals the matter was brought down to 1913. That contemplated, as I say, a new lease, a larger development of power, and the use of more water. On the first day of December, 1921, by Privy Council order No. 4553 the order in council of 1913 was amended; it will be found at page 76 of the sessional papers. That too provided for an enlarged development and for new terms and rentals.

Now, Sir, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals may I remind this House that that order in council was recommended by Mr. Graham Bell, still Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, by Mr. Fairweather, a solicitor, and by Mr. Bowden, departmental engineer. The late Mr. Stewart was then Minister of Railways and Canals. Negotiations commenced in October, 1921. Then we find a long memorandum on page 110 of this sessional paper in which the extended powers of the 25th of November, 1921, are fully set out. They did not complete their work for reasons which they subsequently gave, and on the 14th day of August, 1923, the government of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, by Privy Council order No. 1555, extended until the first day of December, 1924, the time within which the company might begin its operations. That will be found on page 125 of sessional paper No. 154D now under my hand. Then followed a further extension in 1925 and another in 1926. Lastly we have the repeal of the latter order in council by an order in council passed by the present administration. Now the order in council passed in 1926, providing for a new lease, granted extensive powers, but it also contemplated a larger development than had theretofore been provided. It also provided for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec having a contingent interest in the enterprise.

Before I conclude I propose to direct the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to what I conceive to be legal reasons why this bill should not pass, and I shall refer him to certain authorities and judicial decisions. But at this point I desire particularly to point out that in 1926 the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario, speaking through Mr. Magrath, entered into negotiations with the Acting Minister of Railways who was also the Acting Prime Minister at the time, Sir Henry Drayton, and as a result the order in council to which I referred was passed. The Minister of Railways and Canals invests this matter with secrecy. He suggests that Sir Henry Drayton hid the documents in his desk, or adopted some other furtive course; that he did not tell Mr. Graham Bell about it—although he would be forgiven for that—and did not tell somebody else. All I can say in that regard is that I have no information respecting the conduct of affairs by Sir Henry Drayton. But those of us who know Sir Henry well realize that his allegiance to public ownership has never been questioned and that in the province of Ontario, in which he has so long resided, his record regarding that matter is quite unblemished. If any hon. gentlemen in this House are interested enough to make inquiries they will find in Sir Henry Drayton's dealings with reference to the Welland canal and the utilization of a portion of the Welland river, the development and use of that stream for the purpose of carrying water for the Chippawa development, an illuminating indication of his attitude of mind towards the principle of public ownership. For the reasons I have stated I cannot give any further information as to the manner in which Sir Henry Drayton may have dealt with the matter except to observe that I know of my own knowledge, inasmuch as I happened to be here between the months of July and September, that Mr. Magrath, the chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, came here and entered into negotiations with Sir Henry Drayton. I cannot say what was the extent of those negotiations, but I do know that he was negotiating with Sir Henry with relation to the Carillon power. Further, I also know that Sir Henry, Acting Prime Minister at that time, was in negotiation with the province of Quebec.

Let it be observed now beyond all cavil that the first order in council was passed in 1908, was extended by a Liberal government in 1911, then extended by a Conservative government in 1913 and after 1921 by a Liberal administration again. It was further extended thereafter by a Conservative government and latterly, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways, an order was passed repealing the authorization for the lease of 1926. There was no secrecy about the matter. If one might quote the language of a great apostle, the business was not done in a corner, for everyone knew about it. The matter was discussed in the public press extensively and every opportunity was afforded to consider it. Certainly, speaking for myself, knowing my former colleague as I do and as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House know him, I resent the covert insinuation of the Minister of Railways that in Sir Henry's dealing with the matter there was any secrecy.

Mr. DUNNING: I rise to a point of order. I made no covert insinuation of any character whatever.

An hon. MEMBER: What?

Mr. DUNNING: I stated a simple fact which the records of the Privy Council and evidence which can be adduced before the committee will amply prove.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Just why hon. gentlemen should cheer a statement so wide of the fact as the one just made I find it difficult to understand. As regards the minister's denial that he had made any insinuation, I accept his word without question and I am glad that he has made that denial. I regret, however, to say that in the course of his speech he was careful to point out that he was saying something he would not say unless certain statements had been made, and that there was such secrecy about the matter as rather marked it as a thing to be avoided in discussion. This reference to the subject should not, I submit, have been made in the absence of the hon. gentleman who was in charge of these matters at that time and who could speak with a measure of authority on the subject.

Now comes a very interesting matter. I again refer hon. members to sessional paper 154D wherein there is an indication of the time at which the situation first became acute —the differences to which the Minister of Railways refers. I find that on June 13, 1923, Sir Robert Perks wrote a letter to the Right Hon. George P. Graham, then Minister of Railways, in which he pointed out that certain difficulties had been experienced by his company in relation to grants of power on the Carillon river to other interests. That correspondence will be found on pages 118-120 of the papers to which I have referred. Then you have the reply from the Right Hon. George P. Graham dated June 28, 1923:

> This morning I received your interesting letter of June 13th.
> As a matter of fact, the lease to which you refer was granted to a company for the development of power at the Grenville canal some years ago, and the only application that is in now is to allow an increase in the amount of power to be developed.

That is what the Right Hon. George P. Graham wrote at that time in June, 1923, to Sir Robert Perks who represented the Georgian Bay Canal Company. The only application in 1923 was therefore for an increase in the amount of power to be developed. He continues:

> I was always friendly to the Georgian bay when revenue was buoyant and surpluses large and people were coming to Canada by the thousands. However, since the war the position has been reversed, and I do not expect, much to my regret, anything in the way of construction along the Georgian bay canal, at least in my time.

And the Hon. George P. still lives. That is the position so far as that phase of the question is concerned. Now I come to another letter written to Major Graham Bell by Mr. H. A. Lovitt, acting for the National Hydro, in which the following statement is made:

> Mr. Fairweather informs me that he left the draft of the proposed new lease with you. Some alterations were made on the suggestion of Mr. Fairweather and I understood from him that the draft as so altered would meet the legal requirements as to form.

So that in 1923 there comes a protest for the first time from Sir Robert Perks, representing the Georgian bay canal interests, as to the granting of power rights at Carillon upon the Ottawa river, and we have the Right Hon. George Graham assuring him that this is nothing new, that all that is involved is an increase in the amount of power; the only application is for an increase in the amount of power that may be developed. Let me point out this significant fact. Any one of us who was in London in 1923 and 1924 will recall that one of the present promoters of the bill was then boasting in that city that he had control of the Georgian bay canal charter which would wipe out of existence other power interests on the Ottawa river. I shall presently give day and date with respect to that matter. In 1923 therefore Sir Robert Perks first comes into the picture in connection with power rights granted the National Hydro Company. That is of some importance in view of what has transpired since that time and to which I shall direct the attention of the House before I conclude. That is the position so far.

What then happened? The hon. gentleman concluded, for reasons best known to himself, and to which I made some allusion in my opening remarks, that it would be well to cancel this lease and later on extend it to the first day of May, 1927. And listen to the reason he gives for doing this. I regard this as one of the most difficult statements to understand of any that I have ever heard or read in this House. At page 1199 the Minister of Railways says:

> What did we do? We cancelled the contract and cancelled the order in council, but we renewed the 1921 lease which was still in existence until May 1, 1927, the date upon which the Georgian bay charter will expire. Why did we do that? With the deliberate objective of putting this whole matter before parliament, this matter which hon. gentlemen opposite had done secretly, ostensibly in the interests of the provinces, as they say. The people of the Dominion were not to know about it. No, this is not a conflict between private and public interests.

I do submit that when a minister of the crown, speaking for the Department of Railways and for the government of which he is a member, says that the government had a deliberate objective with respect to a given matter, no private bill in relation thereto can by any stretch of the imagination represent the policy of the administration. And when I read that statement I have answered every observation the hon. gentleman made with respect to this question. For he says that he renewed until May 1, 1927, the lease of 1921, and the only difference between the lease of 1921 and the lease of 1926 is that apart from rentals there is recognized the contingent right of the provinces to contest the jurisdiction of the Dominion to grant the company the right to develop and sell power under any circumstances whatever; and I think I can convince my friend the Minister of Justice before I conclude that this bill should not be read a second time because it is beyond the competence of this parliament to grant the essential part that is sought, namely, the power rights, for if you eliminate the power and regard this bill as dealing only with a canal, then obviously there can be only one objection to that, and that is the objection of the public interest with respect to a matter of this kind.

Let us go a step further. It was his deliberate objective, the Minister of Railways says, to precipitate a discussion of public business of the utmost, and as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) said last night, of the greatest public importance, through the medium of a private bill.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: The language of the hon. gentleman was this, Hansard, p 1199:

With the deliberate objective of putting this whole matter before parliament, this matter which hon. gentlemen opposite had done secretly ostensibly in the interest of the provinces, as they say.

He goes further, and then the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) interrupted to ask:

Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): I understood my hon. friend to say that this action was taken with the deliberate intention of bringing this matter before the House.
Mr. Dunning: Yes.
Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): Was it at the instance of the government that the hon. member for Ottawa introduced this bill?
Mr. Dunning: Not at all.
Mr. Bennett: What does it mean?
Mr. Dunning: This matter would have been brought before the House in any case, and my hon. friend well knows that.
Mr. Bennett: Deliberate intention of the government!
Mr. Dunning: Yes, the deliberate intention of the government.
Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): Acting through a private member.
Mr. Bennett: For Sifton.
Mr. Dunning: Well, Mr. Speaker, we certainly were not acting for the National Hydro or any other private interest in what we did in regard to this matter. It is before parliament, and we knew it was inevitable it should be before parliament.

By a private bill; that is the position with respect to that, and the hon. gentleman repeats that by saying that this bill should go to a committee for the purpose of enabling the House to ascertain the whole story. He says:

I speak as a member representing a constituency, free to do as I wish in connection with this matter.

Now to what committee will this bill go if it passes to-night? To the committee on private bills.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Private bills is the only committee it can go to. It is a private bill; it goes to the private bills committee. If it is a canal bill it may, by a direction of this House, go to the committee on railways and canals.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Assume it does—and here is where some of my friends opposite have, I submit with deference, fallen into a very grave error with respect to sending a bill to committee—I am going to venture even although it may be tiresome, to read some of the authorities dealing with a measure of this kind. That brings me at once to what I conceive to be the essential feature to keep in mind with respect to this matter. It is usual with respect to private bills to give them their second reading as a matter of form. That is usual; I desire to make that perfectly clear, and usually there are very few speeches made with respect to the second reading, unless there be some matter of public interest involved which overshadows the private right. Indeed, it is the almost universal custom for the bill to go to committee. The authorities make that abundantly clear. Let us for a moment look at what the authorities say. At pages 709 and 710 of May the position is stated in these words—I shall not read too many authorities, but I desire to make this point perfectly clear:

The second reading of a private bill corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the House affirms the general principle, or expediency, of the measure. There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked. A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons: but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee. Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the House will not consent to the second reading: but otherwise, the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee.

Now I desire to say once more that this House in accepting the principle of a private bill on its second reading may be said usually only to do so conditionally, because the proceedings with respect to a private bill are partly legislative and partly judicial; before the House, they are legislative; before the committee, they are judicial. It becomes necessary and essential for the promoters of the bill to prove their facts before the committee; otherwise, they fail to get their legislation. But it must be observed further that where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the House will not consent to the second reading.

Now my contention to this House, Sir, is that this is a bill where, irrespective of the facts, the principle is objectionable.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. member tell us since when the principle of this bill has been altered so that it has now become objectionable? It has been before the House thirteen times.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very grateful to my hon. friend for interrupting at this moment, because it enables me to say something here which I proposed to say later.

Since this bill was first placed on the statute books the development of our jurisprudence by the decisions of the Privy Council has altered the legal status of the provinces with respect to the water and the river bed of navigable streams in the provinces, and I shall presently refer to the decisions which support that contention—shall I say?—because my friend being a lawyer will realize that there are two sides to every case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; we all know that judgment is rarely given for both plaintiff and defendant. Under these circumstances I am merely going to discharge what I conceive to be my duty to the House by placing before it, as best I may, the considerations that influence me to conclude that this is a matter of grave public importance rather than a matter of private interest.

Let us proceed a step further. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has moved an amendment in that sense. He has kept clearly before him the distinction between a private bill and a public measure, and in that he is supported by the authorities in England. I desire to point out the principle upon which they proceed. I cite only a few authorities. I will point out to you that in England this bill could not possibly receive consideration or attention as a private bill, and I am going to show you the authorities, if I may, Sir, because I conceive it to be somewhat important that we should in this parliament recognize that a bill which at its inception thirty years ago may have been purely a private bill, may by reason of changed conditions, by the alterations of the law, by the development of the country, by industrial demands, by all the conditions that go to make a progressing civilization, become a public measure, and thereby lose its status as a private bill. Let me point out what is said in May. Commenting at page 657 upon private and public bills, he says:

> Bills for the particular interest or benefit of any person or persons, are treated, in parliament, as private bills. Whether they be for the interest of an individual, of a public company or corporation. or of a parish, city, county, or other locality, they are equally distinguished from measures of public policy; and this decision is marked in the very manner of their introduction. Every private bill is solicited by the parties themselves who are interested in promoting it, being founded upon a petition which must be duly deposited in accordance with standing order.

Then, after reviewing a number of cases, the learned author proceeds to indicate the real difficulties that are encountered when you come to a bill of this character. He says:

> In passing private bills, parliament still exercises its legislative functions, but its proceedings partake also of a judicial character. The persons whose private interests are to be promoted appear as suitors for the bill; while those who apprehend injury are admitted as adverse parties in the suit. Many of the formalities of a court of justice are maintained; various conditions are required to be observed, and their observance to be strictly proved; and if the parties do not sustain the bill in its progress, by following every regulation and form prescribed, it is not forwarded by the House in which it is pending. If they abandon it, and no other parties undertake its support the bill is lost. however sensible the House may be of its value.

He proceeds further to point out that in England a number of bills that were introduced as private bills had to be withdrawn. Then at page 667 there is a review of a number of cases. He says, for instance:

> In 1900, on the second reading of a private bill promoted by the Metropolitan Water Companies, the Speaker called the attention of the House to the large and important powers which were propoed to be conferred by it upon a public department (the Local Government Board), and which, according to the practice of the House, ought to be secured by a public rather than by a private bill; and the bill was accordingly withdrawn.
> In 1910, on the second reading of the Society of Apothecaries of London Bill which had been introduced as a private bill, the Speaker drew attention to the fact that the bill sought to empower the society to grant diplomas in sanitary science and public health, and for dentistry and dental surgery, and ruled that it should proceed as a public bill, as it dealt with public interests; and the bill was accordingly withdrawn.

And the same with another bill, and still another. I need not go into details. All the authorities go to show that where it appears from the statement of the powers sought or the principle which the House is asked to support that any measure affects public interests of large and wide character, it ceases to be a private bill and must be dealt with as a public measure. That is the summary of the position. It is for that reason that the leader of the opposition has moved, not that this bill should be given the six months' hoist or read three months hence, but an amendment declaring that a bill which confers upon a private corporation powers so large, over two hundred miles of river and lake waters, is a public bill, not a private bill, and cannot be dealt with by the House as a private measure.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the hon. member tell us wherein lies the change, if any change there be, in the principle of this act since its inception in 1894?

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to ask my hon. friend this question: wherein lies the difference between the tallow dip age and the age of electricity?

Mr. PARENT: If the principle has been wrong since the beginning, the repetition of wrong should produce no good.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is answering the query put by his colleague: If the principle is wrong, the fact that this parliament has acted upon a wrong principle with respect to this bill does not make it right.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then we must assume that in the previous parliaments they were all wrong and that the hon. gentleman is the Daniel come to judgment.

Mr. BENNETT: That is hardly the question, I have not understood that the name of the promoter was Daniel. It was something more euphonious; and I have never yet heard that he was thrust into a den of lions for his convictions.

Let me conclude what I was going to say with regard to the committee. I very much respect the observations of some of my hon. friends opposite who have given the matter careful consideration. Many of them see no reason why the usual practice with respect to private bills should be departed from; they say that we have been accustomed to let such bills go to committee, and why should we not do so in this case? That is the way we deal with other private bills. The only observation I would make about other private bills is that usually we have a non-contentious bill up for second reading. When the bill affects the public interest the case is different and there is not an hon. member present who has not said that it does not affect public interests. The Minister of Railways, who is the spokesman for the administration, says that "the bone of contention" is power in the Ottawa river. Do hon. members realize that if this bill passes you hand two hundred miles of river and lake waters, with all the latent possibilities for electrical development, extending to upwards of a million horse-power, according to reports I have in my hand, to a private enterprise, without one dollar of revenue coming to the state? The leases about which the hon. member complains all provide for the payment of rentals. This measure carries none. This bill does not give Canada one dollar for rental, and it takes two hundred miles of water away from the people and gives it to a private enterprise. Under the original lease of the Carillon power alone there was to be developed only 250 horse-power. This was increased to 250,000 or 300,000 horse-power, which would have given this country $600,000 to be divided between the Dominion and the provinces. Since when was there a public enterprise that took from the revenue of this country the sum of $150,000 a year? Since when did it cease to be a public matter, in the view of the Minister of Finance, to take from the treasury $150,000 a year?

Mark you, in this bill, to the principle of which you are now asked to give your approval, not one dollar comes to the Dominion for revenue, not a sou—that under the leases about which complaint was made $600,000 was to be paid in, and the annual rental was to be fixed ultimately by the Exchequer court. That is the position. Let us not blink the facts. Let me proceed further. We have been asked to send this bill to committee. What may we do in committee? Do you realize that in the committee you cannot change the principle of that bill? Do hon. members realize that they cannot add to it a provision with respect to rental?

Mr. DUNNING: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the rentals provided for under the lease were $600,000 a year?

Mr. BENNETT: That $600,000 might come to this Dominion ultimately at the end of the lease. On the figures as given, estimating it on the same basis as at present, the Exchequer court, applying the principles of the present lease, would award a much larger sum; it would be more than a quarter of a million if fixed by the Exchequer court on the same principles as the present revenue is fixed. It is only an estimate with respect to the production of horse-power, but my argument is that under the present bill we are asked to affirm the principle that not one sou goes into the exchequer for the use of two hundred miles of waterway, which under the lease would bring us a large sum of money, and under the lease the revenue comes to the Dominion and the provinces.

What are the powers of the committee?

The committee cannot report back a bill different in principle from that under consideration.

That is Number 1. Number 2 reads:

Though a committee has full power to amend even to the extent of nullifying the provisions of the bill, they cannot insert a clause reversing the principle affirmed by the second reading

That is parliamentary law at any rate. Why this talk about letting the bill go to committee? Do my hon. friends realize what it really means? The committee may not amend the bill in such a way that it will reverse the principle affirmed by the second reading. What is the authority for that statement? I find a case in the House of Commons in England. In the year 1880 they were dealing with a bill in the same position as this one, and in volume 251 of the third series of the debates in the House of Commons this is the way it was put by the chairman:

It certainly appeared to him that so far as the committee were concerned, they were required by the House to consider any bill sent to them in accordance with the objects with which it had been sent to them by the House. It was open for them to modify the propositions contained in a bill, or to annul them: but it was not open for them to introduce an amendment which would enact something in an entirely opposite sense to the obect of the bill sent to them.

Again the chairman said:

That was not at all the question before the committee. The bill proposed to repeal the 36th section of the Representation of the People Act of 1867. The effect of that section of the act of 1867 was to declare a certain practice to be illegal. The object of the present clause was to make that practice legal. The proposal of the hon. member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) was not only to leave the practice illegal, but, by amending the clause, to attach a penalty to the illegality, and to affirm the opposite of the principle; in point of fact, to reverse the principle which it was sought by the bill to affirm. That being so, it appeared to him that it was not within the functions of the committee to take such a course without the sanction of the House.

Mr. CANNON: Under the principle just laid down by the hon. gentleman is it not a fact that it would be impossible for any committee to change this canal bill into a power bill?

Mr. BENNETT: I am so glad the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) made that observation, for the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) the other evening declared it was a power bill.

Mr. CANNON: That is a very poor answer to my question.

Mr. BENNETT: No, excellent.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has just put words into my mouth which I never uttered. I stated what is well known to this House, that the bone of contention is the Carillon power. That is the truth, and everyone knows it.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us see what the hon. Minister of Railways did say. At page 1194 of Hansard, I find the following:

Because of the connection of any matter of canalization with the department over which I have the honour to preside, and especially because numerous references have been made from both sides of the House to leases, past or present, which have a bearing upon the subject matter of this debate, I deem it necessary to give to the House, if possible some accurate information respecting the history of what I might call "The bone of contention",—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: (reading):

—because beyond any question that bone of contention is the Carillon power.

I thought he did not say anything about power.

There is not a member of the House who is not aware of that fact.

Now, the Solicitor General says, under that principle how could the House of Commons deal with the question of power in what was a canal bill?

Mr. CANNON: The committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The hon. Minister of Railways has in anticipation answered the question. But I will go further: I will show in this bill—as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) did yesterday—that it does deal with power. That is the legal phase of the submission that I am going to make to this House, and I hope my hon. friend the Solicitor General will do me the honour of listening because I think he will not seriously differ with me in the conclusions at which I shall arrive. If that be so, I ask my friends who propose to vote for the second reading of this bill merely as a matter of form in order to let it go to the committee, where they are in respect to the measure. They must go on record as affirming the principle of the bill, and no committee can change its principle, because of the limitations imposed upon them in the manner that I have indicated.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Just at this point, Mr. Speaker, so there may be no misunderstanding, will the hon. member just say what the principle is of the bill? I have stated definitely that it is a charter for the construction of a canal with authority to develop the surplus power resulting from the construction. Those are the words of the charter.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend from Ottawa—and I quite appreciate his position—has asked me, what is the principle of the bill. A distinguished American poet once said:

I don't believe in princerple,
But, O, I du in interest.

He was interested in principal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate very much if the hon. gentleman would speak in such a way that I might be able to understand him in this corner of the chamber.

Mr. BENNETT: I regret, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend is not able to hear me. I shall endeavour to speak a little louder, although it is somewhat difficult for me to do so. I know my friend has equal facility in the English as in the French language. I regret that I have not the facility in French that I have in English. My friend has asked me, what is the principle of the bill. Its principle is determined from reading the bill itself. The bill divides itself into two parts: (a) canal, (b) power. If necessary I shall read the sections later. The first bill sought authority from parliament to create an entity called the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company for the purpose of constructing a canal through a series of lakes and rivers to Georgian bay. There was subsequently a change in the authority thus granted, and the company now has authority, up till the first of May next, subject to filing its plans, to construct a canal from Montreal to Georgian bay through various rivers and river-ways and lakes, a distance of about 200 miles. It also has authority to construct and operate power plants in the first instance as incidental to its business. But as the hon. gentleman last evening pointed out, that provision of the statute was repealed and a new section substituted, and it is that section which answers the question of the hon. Solicitor General, of the Minister of Railways and of my friend. That section provides for the construction and operation of power plants with authority to sell power to consumers. That is the principle of the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask my hon. friend: Does not that section say that they can only produce, lease, supply or dispose of the surplus power?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall read the section. In the year 1912, under a Conservative government, paragraph (a), section 5 was repealed, and the following substituted:

> Produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of surplus hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power developed in conection with and for the purposes of the works hereby authorized, the rates or prices at or for which such hydraulic and electric power may be disposed of by the company to be fixed and determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada in accordance with the provisions of section 360A of the Railway Act.

[Mr. Bennett.]

That confers upon this company the authority to operate as a power company and tc sell electric energy. What is more, the promoters of this bill have seen fit to put in black and white a statement to that effect, and in the prospectus referred to by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) last evening, circulated by the promoters and not by the hon. gentleman, he read a statement that this was not per se a canal bill, but a power bill, and that the revenue derived from the sale of the power would pay interest on $250,000,000 of the cost and the interest on the balance of the capital would be met by the canal tolls, the major part of the cost being borne by the power system, and the main object being the development of power. That is what is stated by the promoters themselves. Let there be no misapprehension on that score.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, may I interject—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, yesterday for two and a half hours I laboured—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHEVRIER: —and I made no objection to the numerous questions that were put to me.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): You had lots of time.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend may ask a question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy, but not his followers.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to refer to the prospectus which was issued by the parties who are promoting this bill. My hon. friend from Bow River described it as a "brief", but he would have been nearer the fact had he termed it a prospectus. It is a statement of what might be expected from this enterprise in the event of the promoters being able to develop power.

Mr. PARENT: Nine o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Public Works—harbours and rivers—British Columbia—$299,500.

Mr. BRADY: Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the government and of the Minister of Public Works to some grave omissions with regard to the constituency of Skeena which I trust will be included in the supplementary estimates of this year. I have already brought some of these things to the notice of the minister and there are others to follow, but I would now ask that the minister give his careful consideration to some very pressing needs of that constituency. Port Simpson, which lies near Prince Rupert, is a federal port, and possesses a wharf which at this moment is in a serious state of disrepair; its state is precarious, and the residents of that town have urged me to present their case to the government for immediate consideration. I can say without exaggeration that there is a moral obligation on the government to safeguard the lives of the people who are using that wharf; the whole structure is decayed; there is danger of its collapse, and as it is used by all the incoming vessels, the Union boats as well as the large fishing boats, there is danger that at any moment loss of life may occur. I understand that the federal district engineer brought this pressing case to the attention of the government and urged that that wharf be reconstructed. I would tell the minister that he would be throwing money away if he spent it on the reconstruction of that wharf; a new wharf should be built.

The next case I would bring to his attention is that of Stewart wharf which, next to Vancouver and Prince Rupert, is the one wharf in British Columbia sadly in need of extension. Probably the minister knows more about its condition that I can hope to tell him, but I do say that I have seen hundreds of tons of ore on that wharf together with all kinds of material for the five or six large producing mines of that district. I have seen the Canadian National boats, the Canadian Pacific boats, the Union boats and the ore carriers from Anyox lying there, and at times it is almost impossible for anyone to even cross that wharf without being in danger. This matter I particularly refer to the minister.

Another place for which I desire to say a word is Bella Coola. On that wharf there is a little warehouse which is supposed to meet the needs of that valley which is an agricultural, mining and fishing centre. In this connection I want to say that I stood on the wharf a few months ago and opened the door of that little zinc or corrugated iron warehouse, which is sixteen feet by twenty-four feet in size, and found it full of a heterogeneous mass of commodities. I saw there gasoline, coal oil, flour, grain, groceries, potatoes, vegetables and fruit, and on the wharf outside were tons of commodities destined for that valley. It is not in reason that I should have to ask something of which the government itself will be the beneficiary; it is likewise in the interest of the government to facilitate the growth and development of trade in these places. The people of Skeena are not beggars; they are as big as the mountains, and they are not pleading for some little petty gift from the government. Whatever the government gives them they will give back ten-fold, yes a hundred fold, in the revenue which will be derived by this government.

I do not wish to take up too much time; we are anxious to get through these estimates, but I do wish to say one word about Atlin, which is in the northern part of my constituency. I wish hon. members of this House were able to look over that country and realize the greatness of the struggle and the vastness of the problems which beset those splendid people. All that I ask the government is to place in the supplementary estimates a paltry sum of not more than $5,000 and not less than $3,000, in order that the boulders in the Atlinto river, which drains the great Atlin lake, may be removed, giving an opportunity to small craft to ply from Atlin along Atlin lake, down the Atlinto river and into lake Taku, where the great Engineer mine is situated along with other wonderful mining properties.

Now, Sir, I do not even ask the government to send an engineer at great expense from Victoria up to Atlin. It is a big journey. Travelling by up-to-date Canadian boats, and passing through Alaska, it would take him from twelve to fourteen days even to reach the district. I have got here, Sir, the data of a resident engineer in Atlin, a man who is very well up in the matter of river improvements, and he authorizes me to assure the government that there is no need to send a federal engineer to Atlin; that if the government grant not less than three thousand and not more than five thousand for this work, facilities will be offered that will ameliorate to a great extent the character of transportation in Atlin. You may say I am too optimistic. I may be optimistic, but I maintain that neither the government nor anyone else can play with the lives of men and women—they are not pawns, they are pledges. I appeal with confidence to the Minister of Public Works and I know that he will see to it that these needs are carefully examined into. Then if my claims are based, as I think they are, on concrete facts, they will meet with the approbation of the Minister of Pubic Works. I therefore urge the minister to give the utmost consideration to the district of the Skeena. It is to a great extent a maritime district. It is vast in extent, and wharves and other accommodation are an absolute necessity. If they are not provided there will be retrogression, there will be disappointment, there will be failure, and the government themselves will be the losers. Without saying any more on the subject, I leave the needs of the district with confidence in the hands of the minister, believing that the welfare of that country and the good of the people are far more important than the expenditure of a small amount of money.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to ask the minister to state the nature of the improvements on the Fraser river.

Mr. ELLIOTT: These are but a continuation of works that have been going on along the Fraser river for some considerable time. The amount of $150,000 is asked to be provided towards the following improvements on the Fraser river:

Extension of Steveston north jetty..	$34,000
Construction of Steveston north dykes Nos. 2 and 3..	16,000
Annieville bar dyke..	62,000
Bank protection, Woodward's channel.	66,000

I may say for my hon. friend's information that during the season of 1926-27 the sum of $6,122 was expended on the completion of the dam at Woodward's slough. This dam was constructed during 1925-26 at a cost of $46,346.73. The reinforcement of the dam at Woodward's slough is being proceeded with during 1926-27 under contract with the Fraser Pile Driving Company, the amount of the contract being $35,998.72. The order in council, authorizing the acceptance of their tender, was passed on 1st December last. The district engineer reports in estimates for the current year that this extension to the north jetty forms part of the scheme of jetty control of the channel through the sandheads at the mouth of the Fraser river, and is wholly of a public nature, benefiting the whole of the Fraser river and Delta district. There has been quite a large expenditure for years along the Fraser river, and this is just a continuation of that work. I am told that we will not get the benefit of the expenditure that has already been made unless the work is completed. I may also say that the total expenditure on that jetty up to the present time since the year 1914 is $787,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it the reason of this work is to control the current.

Mr. ELLIOTT: To direct the current.

[Mr. Brady.]

Mr. GARDINER: After the work is completed will it be necessary to carry on any dredging in order to give the necessary depth to the channel?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is to be hoped the channel will pretty well scour itself after this work is done, but that is something as to which one cannot be positive.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is proposed to complete the jetty right out to deep water?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We intend to go out to such a point as will give the necessary facilities.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does that mean the completion of the Le Baron scheme? The Minister has no doubt heard about the Le Baron scheme for the development of a channel at the mouth of the river. If the minister has not heard about it, I may tell him that some years ago the city of New Westminster retained the services of Mr. Le Baron, one of the greatest river engineers in the world.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I may say to my hon. friend that we are working along the lines of his suggestions, with such variations as are suggested from time to time by the engineers in charge, as the work proceeds.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The trouble is the work is not completed; it has been going on for a number of years. The scheme was placed before Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his time. It was adopted by him and he promised that it should be completed. In short the scheme was that a jetty should be constructed across the sandheads out to deep water. I think the distance was something like five miles. Although the scheme was adopted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier the principal part of the work was done under the Conservative administrations—notably when Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister, and Hon. Robert Rogers Minister of Public Works—but up to date only about two and a half miles, or about one half of the distance, has been covered. I understand that under the present program it is the intention of the government to continue that jetty for another thousand yards or so. If I am not right on that point I should like to be corrected.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not thought that it will be necessary to go the whole distance, but apparently the work will have to be carried quite a piece farther before the results will be satisfactory.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is where the trouble comes in. As I see it, and as all the authorities who have studied the question admit—that is to say, the engineers and the men engaged in river work and who have been operating on the Fraser river for many years—it will be necessary, as Mr. Le Baron said, to complete the north jetty out to deep water. If that is not done your work cannot of course attain the object intended. If you go only two and a half or three miles, instead of five miles across the sandheads, the work will not be completed. Mr. Le Baron pointed out that it was necessary to complete the north jetty right out to deep water, and, he added, if this were done we should then have a channel which would be stationary, so to speak, and which would more or less scour itself. We should also obviate the necessity for further dredging of any consequence. If that did not prove to be the case, he went on to say, a jetty could be built on the other side of the channel and beyond question there would then be a channel which would be satisfactory for all purposes. The minister is no doubt aware that shipping on the Fraser river has increased very materially in the last few years. If he has not the figures I can give them to him.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have them here.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They show that in 1914 the estimated registered net tonnage was 6,000, whereas in 1926 it had increased to 579,167 tons. I need not labour that point because no doubt the minister has been well informed regarding the enormous increase which has taken place in shipping. There are certain advantages which the Fraser river possesses as against salt water harbours. I suppose the minister is aware that the effect on deep sea ships coming into fresh water is very beneficial inasmuch as the fresh water removes the barnacles and other sea growths which attach themselves to the ships. The minister also knows, I am sure, that the Fraser river route offers many advantages in comparison with other harbours on the Pacific coast, particularly in the shipment of grain. In this my good friends from the prairies who a few years ago visited the Fraser river will bear me out.

The Fraser river is the most desirable route for the shipment of grain from Pacific ports. Our difficulty is that we have not a deep enough channel. It is true that the channel has been improved but it is not possible for ships to come in and load to full capacity. What does that mean? It means that those ships coming into the Fraser river must take partial cargoes instead of being fully loaded and they must go elsewhere to complete their cargoes. It is pretty well admitted that we must have a deeper channel than was at first contemplated. Our objective originally was thirty feet from New Westminster to the gulf, but it is now unquestioned that a depth of thirty-five feet is necessary for the reason that the depth of vessels has been increasing; and, if we are to handle the business offering, this increased depth must be made. We simply must have a thirty-five foot channel from New Westminster to the gulf. This has a bearing on the trade of the Canadian merchant marine, because it is not possible at the present time for the ships of the Canadian merchant marine to come into New Westminster and load to full capacity. There is considerable business at this point for the Canadian merchant marine.

There are other advantages to be considered. For instance, in the erection of elevators and so on, the cost of construction on the Fraser river is much less than it is in salt water harbours because it is not necessary to have the same protection against marine growths, so destructive to timber, such as are found in salt water. Then there is the question of the value of sites. Altogether there are a number of advantages with which I presume the minister is familiar, having no doubt studied the subject.

We have had to educate so many different ministers of public works, even during my time, because of the many changes there have been. I must say, however, that all ministers who have gone before the present incumbent of the office have shown a great interest in the Fraser river, and have always been willing to be shown. I am hopeful that the present minister will find it possible this year to visit the river and go over the situation himself. A personal visit from him would serve a better purpose than anything else. The Fraser river is fast becoming a very important avenue of shipping and one upon which I think we are justified in asking that an adequate expenditure be made. I have always objected to our doing the work more or less piecemeal. I have advocated from time to time that a contract or contracts be let for the construction of the work. Let us have at least a contract that will complete the work and give us a start with a proper channel from New Westminster to the gulf. I do not believe in the way in which this matter has been gone about. I have constantly placed before the department my views, which are backed up by practical men resident on the Fraser river. I have no doubt the minister sees the advisability of doing this work by contract. There are a good many works to look after on the river, and particularly is that the case in connection with the north arm, which has been neglected for years. I do not say that this neglect has been at all intentional, because the dredges have been urgently required in the main channel and consequently have not been able to do the work required on the north arm. The works which were put in on the north arm at the cost of large sums have gone out of repair. There is plenty of work for the government dredges to do and I would suggest that the minister consider the advisability of letting this work by contract and cleaning up the job, so as to give the people out there a chance to conduct their business in a satisfactory way. The late Minister of Public Works, now Minister of Health (Mr. King, Kootenay), is quite familiar with the situation, and I am sure he will give his counsel and advice to the present minister. He is no doubt convinced that the work ought to be completed and done properly. The late minister did contend that it should be done gradually and in that regard there was a difference between him and myself. My opinion is that it should be done rapidly and that we should make a good job of it and clean up the whole thing. It is worth while, because the business is there to warrant it. There is no reason at all why the work should be done piecemeal. We used to be told that we must first show that we had the business before the work could be done. We have now shown that the business is there; it is knocking at our door and the time has come when the government should take up the Fraser river channel work energetically and carry it to completion in order to give the people there, who are trying to carry on under adverse circumstances, the opportunity to which they are entitled. We are not trying to compete with Vancouver harbour at all. They are two entirely different and distinct classes of harbour. Vancouver harbour, of course, is one of the most wonderful in the world for the purposes for which it is used, but so far as the industrial end is concerned, there is a reason why the Fraser river channel should be improved, and improved in an expeditious manner. I hope in addition to speaking to-night to have the opportunity of discussing this subject with the minister personally, and I am sure that he will give me an attentive hearing. I think he has already received a deputation from New Westminster during this session, who have urged upon him the claims of the Fraser river. This is not a political matter at all; there is no politics about it. It is a matter of business pure and simple. We should have that jetty completed right out to deep water without delay, and I would urge upon the minister as strongly as I can the necessity for getting away from this piecemeal program and for taking hold of this matter vigorously and finishing it up in accordance with Le Baron's report. He is still watching the works on the Fraser river. I had a letter from him, from Mississippi, a short time ago, in which he regretted very much that this jetty had not been completed, and he stated that he was confident that if the jetty was completed right out to deep water it would be satisfactory. The work, so far as it has gone, has been satisfactory. It has stood up well, and we have no complaints to make on that score. The only thing we do complain about is that the job has not been finished, and I urge upon the minister to get right down to business now and finish up that work, and then we shall have a good channel.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might point out to my hon. friend that that is exactly the thing that the hon. member for Skeena and members from other parts of the country think should be done in their particular localities. I quite agree with my hon. friend that this is an important point. If it were not, the government would not have felt justified in expending, as they have done, nearly $900,000 on this particular project; that is, on the channel and the north arm together. While my hon. friend was speaking I checked up the figures of the expenditure on the Fraser river in the last five years, and it amounts to $899,831, so I think in view of that expenditure my hon. friend will agree with me that this work has proceeded very well during those years.

Of course, we would all like to be able to do all these things in one year, but it cannot be done. The demands upon the department are so great on account of the necessities in various parts of the country that it is quite impossible to proceed any more rapidly than we are doing. However, I appreciate the suggestions that my hon. friend has made, and I shall be glad to give the matter the most careful attention that it is capable of receiving. I may also say that I have had the benefit of the advice of my colleague the former Minister of Public Works, who quite agrees with what the hon. member for New Westminster has said with regard to the necessity of doing work upon the Fraser river, and just as rapidly as the funds can be obtained the work will be proceeded with to completion both here and at other points, taking first those that seem the most necessitous. I think that is all I can say. Opportunity seems to be knocking at the door in all these places to-day, and we are all pleased that it is so. I can assure my hon. friend that the work in these various harbours will be proceeded with just as expeditiously as funds can be obtained.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Might I add one word? It is not a matter of spending money that appeals to us at all. It is a matter of obtaining results.

Mr. ELLIOTT: You have obtained results, judging by your trade.

Mr. McQUARRIE: We have to a certain extent, but just let me mention this to the minister as an illustration. The Grain Growers, the Saskatchewan Coöperative, and I think the pool too, had options on properties on the Fraser river for the purpose of constructing grain elevators, but they had to give them up because they were not satisfied that the work of deepening the channel was going to be done quickly enough for their purposes. Therefore they had to go into Vancouver, and what was the result? As the minister knows, Vancouver was unable to handle all the grain it could have had this last season, and an embargo had to be placed against grain going through western ports. If our channel on the Fraser river had been sufficiently deep, these large and influential concerns would have taken advantage of their options. As the minister knows, the grain that goes over the Canadian National to Vancouver goes first to New Westminster. The government already owns several satisfactory sites on the Fraser river suitable for the construction of grain elevators.

The minister has mentioned Skeena: I suppose he was referring to Prince Rupert. We have always contended that an elevator should have been built at Port Mann on property which the government already owned and still own to-day, but instead it was built at Prince Rupert. We hope it will be successful, but as a matter of fact that elevator was leased to the pool for $100 a year. That is the way the matter stands now. If a grain elevator had been built at Port Mann on the Fraser river it would have been used to its fullest capacity right from the start, and I think that statement will be backed up by hon. members to my left who have been out there and studied the situation. There is a great saving to be made by the Canadian National in shipping grain from the Fraser river. It amounts to something like $13 a car; that is the cost of taking a car from the Fraser river over to Vancouver. That amounts to about one cent a bushel extra freight, and that cent a bushel would be made by the Canadian National railway.

The only difficulty in establishing private elevators on the Fraser river is a question of the depth of the channel. There are no engineering difficulties involved, for the engineers have reported that it is quite feasible to construct a proper channel from New Westminster to the gulf. It is simply a matter of spending the money, and of taking hold and doing the work as expeditiously as possible. If you do that, you will save a lot of money. I am free to admit that many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been wasted on the Fraser river. I think the predecessor of the minister will agree with me in that. We want that waste stopped. We want the money which is expended on the Fraser river to count, and in my opinion it is not going to count if the work is to be continued in the same old way in which it has gone on for some years under various administrations. They have dredges there. One dredge in particular—the deputy minister will perhaps not agree with me in this—is simply throwing money away every day it operates. I refer to the dredge 303, formerly known as the Fruhling, a dredge that outlived its usefulness if it ever was useful. It cannot dredge and never could dredge in a satisfactory way. The King Edward is the right style of dredge, but is getting pretty old. I think the government should at least put on a new modern dredge of the King Edward type to help out with that work and do away with the 303. Junk it, if you like, if you cannot get anything for it, give it away and you will be ahead. I do not know that the department will entertain the suggestion in regard to getting rid of the dredge, because according to the records it does a lot of work. All I see is that it digs a hole and sucks the sand into its hold. It goes out into deep water dumps the sand and comes back and digs another hole, and the first hole does not fit in with the second hole. You have a series of holes but you have no channel. I have tried to impress upon various ministers that they should get rid of the 303 and give us a modern up-to-date dredge of the King Edward type.

Mr. LADNER: Does that item of $150,000 provide for necessary dredging on the north arm? There are certain conditions there, sandbars and fills, that will require attention very soon.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The figures that I have given make up the amount, and they do not provide for dredging on the north arm.

Mr. LADNER: Is there any general estimate that covers necessary dredging on the north arm?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are the general estimates out of which probably the north arm will receive a share, but there is no special estimate for it.

Mr. LADNER: I urge very strongly the minister's attention to this. Many representations have been made to myself and I believe to the department. It is not a new enterprise, but it is taking care of existing needs for a very large industrial centre.

Mr. BARBER: How far up the Fraser river does that snagboat operate?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand it goes to the head of navigation, about Chilliwack, I fancy.

Harbours and rivers generally, $30,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I desire to draw the attention of the minister to a certain matter, but I do not know whether it should come under this item or under item 155. I refer to the condition of La Salle causeway, crossing the junction of the Rideau and Cataraqui rivers and lake Ontario. I think the deputy minister and the engineers will tell you this causeway is in a most disgraceful condition. It is almost impassable, although it forms a link in the highway between Montreal and Toronto. Is it proposed to have work done on this causeway so as to put it in proper condition? Any work done in the last number of years was done through patronage and has been a failure. If the minister would examine the few feet done at the entrance by the city of Kingston he would see that the work can be properly done, and if this causeway is to be repaired it should be taken in hand by the department, a proper amount of money expended and the proper method adopted to put it in a condition for passenger travel. If the minister would take his car up there he would be in great danger of smashing it or losing it. There will be a good deal of complaint this year if it gets in any worse condition than it was last fall.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am advised that the condition as my hon. friend describes it does exist to a certain extent. I believe last year a small section was improved by the plant of the city of Kingston, but there is no question that, in common with many other places, it requires attention.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think the minister or deputy will agree that the work should be done early if he is going to avoid accidents; because it is not a matter that affects one constituency, it is a part of the highway and is very important.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Dredging, $1,605,000.

Mr. ESLING: What portion of this vote for British Columbia will go to the West Kootenay district for dredging? We have dredgers constantly in operation after the high water, two of them in fact, one on the Columbia river and one on Kootenay lake. There is nothing here to indicate where the dredging is going to take place. I would not like to suggest that it might be owing to the indifference of the Minister of Health (Mr. King, Kootenay), but surely something should be done. It is a serious matter. In the vote that we passed the whole contribution to West Kootenay was something like $8,000. In the administration of that sum alone you have $10,000 in salaries, according to last year's estimates. Is any portion of this item for dredging to be expended on the Columbia river or has the Minister of Health failed to recommend it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is quite in error if he thinks there is any part of British Columbia which the Minister of Health would desire to neglect. It is only a question of getting money enough to do the most urgent part of the work. This vote for dredging in British Columbia is fairly substantial, but is not too much in view of the number and importance of the harbours there. It is expended largely in operating the dredges and on such work as during the season appears to be most urgent.

Mr. ESLING: Our resident district engineer is as courteous and efficient as any member of the engineering staff in the Dominion. Repeatedly I have presented to him and to the Department of Public Works the complaints of people along the Columbia river of the constant erosion of the river bank and the loss of their land. They say it is by reason of insufficient dredging. One settler claims that during the last two years he has lost actually an acre of land from this cause. As I say, in the previous votes our total expenditures are only $8,000 and yet the salaries alone to administer that sum amount to $10,000. Are any of the expenses of the district engineer's office to be included in this vote for dredging? That may be one reason for the engineer's staff. Certainly it cannot be attributed to any repairs to wharves, for the simple reason that we have but three in all these estimates that are to receive attention along the Columbia river.

Mr. ELLIOTT: None of this vote goes towards keeping up the district engineer's office. The authorities are not unanimous as to what causes the erosion complained of, but usually the erosion is greater where dredging takes place.

Mr. ESLING: Precisely for the very reason that the authorities do not seem to be unanimous as to the cause of the erosion I would ask the minister to have particular attention paid to that portion of the Columbia river indicated in this vote as being below Burton, where there is a jetty. I know there is a difference of opinion between our district engineer and the department at Ottawa, but while this continues the man's land is being washed away.

Mr. ELLIOTT: A lot of land throughout the country is being eroded in the same way.

Mr. ESLING: I am not making any particular complaint against the department, but it is not very pleasant for a member to be continually in receipt of complaint from settlers. Naturally they look to their member to have these things remedied. I have brought their complaints to the attention of the department on more than one occasion. In view of the difference of opinion as to the cause of the erosion I would ask the minister to see if the real cause cannot be determined and the proper remedy applied so that there will be no further complaints.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to have the matter looked into further with a view to finding the best possible solution for the trouble.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, I notice that there is a vote of $547,000 for dredging in the maritime provinces. I hope the minister will be good enough to make a note of what I brought to his attention this afternoon so that some small portion of this money may be devoted to the harbour of—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Lorneville.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Will the minister specify where the $500,000 is to be spent in the maritime provinces?

Mr ELLIOTT: There have been many suggestions as to how the money should be expended, and a number of places have been mentioned whose claims are imperative, for instance, Miramichi bay, Mabou harbour, Mabou bridge, Antigonish, Bathurst, Newport. Of course, as the season progresses the necessity for repairs will become apparent. It is impossible to say now where all the money will be expended.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I am very pleased to hear from my hon. friend the minister that it is the intention of the government to do some very urgent dredging at Mabou harbour in my county. I refrained from discussing this when the estimates were under consideration because I had taken it up with him personally and also had sent some very strong recommendations to the department. May I ask, however, how much dredging will be done and to what depth? I understand that the present depth is about ten feet. The Mabou Coal and Gypsum Company that is operating there require a depth of about twenty feet to enable them to use boats of 5,000 tons capacity.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The intention is to take out about 114,000 yards scow measure, I understand that that will give a depth of about eighteen feet.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It would be, then substantially the program outlined in the minister's letter to me?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt that that will be followed fairly closely.

Mr. KENNEDY: Where is the dredging to be done in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required to provide for the operation and maintenance of the dredging plants in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and for dredging to be performed by day labour or private agreement. Dredge No. 202 and the dredge Winnipegosis will operate on the Red river along with the tug Mossy River and the Vaughan; most of the dredging will be done on the Red river in Manitoba. There is not much dredging being done in Saskatchewan this year.

Mr. ROBINSON: In the absence of the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Odette) I would ask the minister if any portion of this appropriation for dredging in Quebec and Ontario will be spent on that most important harbour on the south shore of lake St. Clair, namely Belle river, which I may say is filled up with silt at present?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That important harbour was under discussion this afternoon; I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the House. So far as I am aware there is no decision at present to do any work at Belle river this year.

Mr. ROWE: Could the minister tell us approximately what portion of that amount will be given to each of the two provinces?

Mr. SHORT: I would ask the minister if this item for dredging in the maritime provinces is to be expended entirely on work to be done by government dredges, or whether private contracts may be let?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The work will be done mostly by government dredges.

Mr. SHORT: Then I presume it will be allotted as the district engineers send in their reports?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but the decisions will be made here as to which places they shall operate in, having regard to the reports we receive.

Mr. SHORT: I hope the minister will not lose sight of the fact that there are a number of places where dredging is urgently required. They include Anderson's cove, Battery point in Annapolis county, the Racquette at Digby harbour, and Westport in Digby county. I trust that when the reports of the engineers are received, these matters will receive consideration. I find that they are overlooked if we do not call the attention of the department to them quite often.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am obliged to my friend for mentioning these places, although I do not recall that the present reports name these particular points. I shall be glad to give them careful consideration.

Mr. SHORT: Is the list from the district engineers already complete?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are reports in from the engineers, but I do not recall any immediate requests having been received from the places mentioned.

Mr. SHORT: I can quite understand that these things could not all be kept in the minister's mind.

Mr. KELLNER: I would like to ask the minister if it is intended the dredging will be carried on at Lamont, Alberta, where I believe $20,000 has already been spent, and where there is a dredge at the moment. Estimates covering this work have been included in previous years, and I would like to know if it is proposed to finish the dredging?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Nothing definite has been decided about that matter; the dredge there is laid up at present, of course, and whether it will proceed with further dredging this year has not yet been settled.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister say if this vote for Ontario and Quebec, or any portion of it, is to be used in deepening the channel between Quebec and Montreal, and if so what amount will be so used?

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, this amount does not apply to that at all. My friend will notice that this is exactly the same amount as was voted last year for this purpose. The amounts nearly correspond, and this is the annual vote for this purpose.

Mr. GARDINER: The work of deepening that channel would come under the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ROWE: I would like the minister to tell us at what points in Ontario the chief expenditures of this vote are to be made?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The places mentioned particularly are Amherst harbour, Amherst, Grindstone, Pointe Basse, Saguenay River, Port Burwell, St. Ours, Colonie des Greves, St. Sulpice, St. Jeanne, Beauharnois, Caughnawaga, Grosse Ile, Barachois de Malbaie, Anse à Beaufils, Ste. Adelaide de Pabos, Thames River, Harricana River, Trois Pistoles, Pembroke, Point Edward, Port Hope, Stokes Bay, Sydenham River, Wilson Channel, Cabano, Kinojevis River, Rivière du Loup, River Yamaska, Baie La Valliere, Vercheres, Petite Riviere St. Francois.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): How much of this $540,000 is to be expended in the constituency of Richmond-West Cape Breton during the coming year, and at what points?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not set out by constituencies, but perhaps I can give my friend something which will serve. There is North Sydney, C.N.R. Wharf, Birks Head, McLean cove, and Glace Bay.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I notice that one of the items mentioned is in the constituency of Richmond-West Cape Breton. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, as I have done on a former occasion, that contracts have been let for dredging in the constituency within the last year and a half and the work has not been completed. After expending a thousand, or two or three thousand dollars, the contract was dropped, and the vote has been allowed to lapse. I wish to ascertain definitely if it is the intention of the government to complete the work commenced at Petite de Grat one of the most important fishing centres probably in the whole province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand the place to which my hon. friend refers is the place where the contractors lost a dredge. I am informed the work there is difficult work. Nothing has been definitely decided as to the expenditure at that point for the coming season.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I might point out to the minister that the dredging was being done inside the harbour and the dredge could not have been lost at that point. I know the dredge was removed from the vicinity shortly after the election. I should like to know why the dredge was taken away from that particular point. An item of some $30,000 was in the estimates in 1925, but the vote has been allowed to lapse. I would remind the minister that this is a very important fishing section, and it is imperative that the work there should be completed.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Before the resolution carries I should like to get a more definite answer from the minister, because the people of that district were led to believe that the government had voted the sum of $30,000 of public money to assist the local fishermen. It is a fine fishing district, and it was understood that this money was to be expended in opening one of the entrances to the harbour. The people at that point supported this government on the strength of the benefits they were to derive from this expenditure. I wish to get some definite statement from the minister as to what his intentions are in that regard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The information I have indicates that a contract was awarded but the contractor gave up the contract; he was unable to complete it. Attempts have since been made to let contracts for the work there but they have not been successful. There is nothing definite as to what the program is to be for this year. That is all the information I can give my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Is it intended to complete the dredging at L'Archeveque, which was begun about the same time but has since been dropped? A large sum of money was voted for this purpose, but it remains unexpended. A certain amount of work was done there, and the people of the neighbourhood were led to believe that the harbour was to be dredged so that the fishermen might be in a position to carry on fishing operations in the fall. Will the minister be good enough to inform me what the government's intentions are with respect to L'Archeveque harbour?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am told the last named place is in the same category as the place which my hon. friend mentioned previously. The same company had the contract. First of all government dredges were worked there for a season or two, but they did not make progress that was at all satisfactory in the estimation of the residents of the district, or of the government. Then the suggestion was made that a contract should be awarded, and a contract was given to the company in question. The work was completed in neither place, and there is no decision at present as to what will be done during the coming season.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Is it the intention of the government to again call for tenders previous to the next election, say two or three years hence?

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone lines— Nova Scotia—Cape Breton Telegraph and Telephone lines—general repairs and improvements	$9,800
Telegraph line from Little Narrows to Ottawa Brook	515

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I understand that a petition was sent in asking that a certain line be built from the town of Louisburg into Little Lorraine. Is it the intention of the government to carry out that extension?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There has been no decision in that matter. It is still under investigation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): May I say that this district is one of the most important sections along that line? The people down there are three or four miles away from a telephone or any convenience of that nature, and if this extension were made it would be of great benefit to them. I would urge upon the government to have this extension built at the earliest possible moment.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia— Mainland telegraph and telephone lines—general repairs and improvements	$16,800
British Columbia northern district—general repairs and improvements	8,100
Vancouver island district—general repairs and improvements	5,500

Mr. ESLING: On Kootenay lake we have a mining operation which provides a very large payroll and a community of perhaps two hundred people. It has been conducting operations for several years and the property is successful. It is proposed to extend these operations. The community is situated on the banks of the Kootenay lake and there is not a road nor even a trail from it in any direction. The only means of access to the outside world is by rowboat or launch if you happen to have one. For two years I have been asking the department to provide telephone connection with that section. As was indicated in my communication to the department, such connection could be made at a cost of $4,000 or $5,000 covering a distance of not more than five miles. So keen have been the operators of the mine to secure that connection that they were even willing to contribute towards the cost of erecting the poles. Just imagine a case of sickness or accident calling for the services of a physician: before a doctor could be reached somebody would have to row three or four miles across the lake and then telephone to the nearest town or city where a physician could be had. Certainly it is unreasonable. The estimates this year provide for a total expenditure of $354,000,000. Now the government is anxious to have the mineral areas of British Columbia developed and is inviting people to come to the country and settle on the land, yet it does not seem disposed to provide them with the ordinary necessities of life so far as accommodation is concerned. I do not blame the present minister, because these estimates were passed on to him and he has not had time to review the situation. In connection with the Nova Scotia vote, I noticed the other evening that the Minister of Finance gave an hon. member from that province the assurance that if the minister from his province recommended a certain vote of $60,000, omitted from the estimates, he, the Minister of Finance, would see that it was included. Here I have had this application before the department for two years and nothing has been done. It is evident that our minister from British Columbia does not recommend it. He cannot get away from the fact that a request is on file in the office. This might be a life or death matter for somebody working in the mine, and only between $4,000 and $5,000 is involved. A dozen miners might suddenly require the services of a physician, and yet for the sake of a few thousand dollars the government neglects to give us the accommodation asked for. I repeat, it is altogether unreasonable, and I do not blame anyone but the minister from British Columbia who has neglected to make the necessary recommendation. I appeal to the justice of the present Minister of Public Works to see that this $4,000 or $5,000 out of a total of $354,000,000 is devoted to this telephone connection so urgently needed at Riondel. The minister could very well apply to telephone lines the policy of the department in relation to public buildings. He said the other night that it was the policy to erect public buildings where the accommodation was inadequate or where the necessity was urgent. Here there is no accommodation at all and certainly it must be admitted that the necessity is urgent. That being so, I again appeal to the minister to see that the line is constructed this year.

Mr. FRASER: Does this vote for mainland telegraph and telephone lines include the Yukon system?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. FRASER: Where are the principal lines that are maintained by this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the following sections: Kamloops; Barriere; Merritt; Chase-Revelstoke; Vernon; Penticton; Princeton; Arrow Lakes; Creston; Golden-Invermere.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous, $1,002,200.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation of the $100,000 vote for the maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $100,000 is required for the maintenance and operation of dams and sluiceways at points on the Ottawa river and its tributaries. The object is to store the spring floods and augment the low water flow, thus equalizing the run-off of the Ottawa valley throughout the year. This also necessitates the purchase of lands damaged by maintaining reservoir surfaces at high stage during summer and autumn.

1. Maintenance and operation of Temiskaming dam	$ 8,800
2. Maintenance and operation of Quinze dam	9,000
3. Towards construction of stone fill for repairs to apron, etc., on the Ontario side of Temiskaming dam, to offset erosion	267,010
4. To repair concrete piers in Quinze dam	4,000
5. To renew glance boom above Quinze dam	4,900
6. To pay land damages and other claims in connection with storage, Ottawa river	4,000
7. Bank protection at Young's creek	2,250
	$100,000

Mr. GARDINER: There is an item in this vote for the national monument on Connaught Place. What progress is being made with this monument?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The artist is still working on it, and I understand it will be a couple of years yet before it is completed.

Mr. GARDINER: This is a progress estimate?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A year ago I protested against such a monument. There is no need for monuments of this character, seeing that we have a memorial tower that might be considered sufficient. We have already, I think, quite sufficient monuments in commemoration of the war. We are shouldered with a huge national debt which absorbs half our revenues and there are a large number of soldiers who are not being adequately cared for. There are any number of reminders of the war and of its futility and I cannot see any necessity for spending money on still another. If we must have a monument of this character it should be one bringing out very distinctly the horrors and the uselessness of war rather than in any way glorifying war. I take this opportunity of voicing this protest and I know that similar protests are in the minds of people throughout the country, at least in western Canada.

Item agreed to.

Collection of public works revenue, $4,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I have a question to ask regarding these statutory items. Is this an annual contribution made by the Dominion government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These are provided for by the Dry Dock Subsidies Act.

Item agreed to.

Champlain graving dock..	$ 82,000
Lorne graving dock..	46,000
Esquimalt graving dock..	19,000
Esquimalt, Songhees graving dock.. .	58,100

Mr. GARDINER: Are these all Dominion government dry docks?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

St. Andrew's rapids—lock and dam, $20,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister state what work is being carried on there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required for the annual operating costs of the lock and dam at St. Andrew's rapids.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone lines, $803,200.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister explain this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required for the operation of the telegraph and telephone lines operated by the government.

Mr. GARDINER: Have you any record of the income from these properties?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. Has my hon. friend any particular one in mind?

Mr. GARDINER: You have not the figures lumped?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps the minister could give an estimate.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The revenue from the British Columbia mainland line is as follows: 1922-23, $69,000; 1923-24, $73,731; 1924-25, $74,888; 1925-26, $77,934; and the estimated revenue for this year is $77,934.

Mr. FRASER: What is the revenue from the Yukon line?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is as follows: 1920-21, $133,276; 1921-22, $108,254; 1922-23, $99,943; 1923-24, $94,776; 1924-25, $99,642; 1925-26, $89,563.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—new departmental building, $500,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister give an explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The amount of $500,000 is required to make a start on the departmental building to house the various departments of the public service in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. GARDINER: How far will $500,000 go?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is estimated that the building will take four or five years to complete, and this amount will probably provide one-fifth of the total cost of the building.

Mr. GARDINER: Has any contract been let?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GARDINER: It is only an estimate?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—parliament building, $175,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is required to be done here?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is an annual expenditure on that part of the building that is not completed. This is mostly for the tower and the carillon.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—expropriation of properties between Sparks and Wellington streets, east of Elgin street, $600,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Are expropriation proceedings being taken at the present time, or is there any arbitration going on in connection with these properties?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Notice of expropriation was served on April 24th of last year. Since that time there have been negotiations with the owners, but no proceedings have been instituted in the Exchequer court as yet.

Mr. GARDINER: Will it finally go before the Exchequer court?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In all probability, unless satisfactory prices can be obtained from the owners.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the government placed any valuation on these properties?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Sorel—harbour improvements, $200,000.

Mr. GARDINER: In connection with this and the other items in vote No. 131, this afternoon we passed several items for harbour and river improvements. How is it they are not all included in one vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required towards the development of the port of Sorel, in order to provide for ocean going vessels. It is to make Sorel an ocean port for the eastern townships.

Item agreed to.

St. John harbour—improvements, $185,000.

Mr. BELL (St. John): What does this represent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The memorandum with regard to this work reads:

Courtenay bay—to complete the contract with the St. John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company..	$85,000
General maintenance of harbour works, renewing shed roofs, floors and so on, renewing decayed timbers in wharves, grain conveyors, and so on.	52,600
West St. John—maintenance dredging of deep water berth..	25,000
Partridge island—wharf repairs.. ..	4,200
Fort Dufferin—repairs to breastworks	5,000
Staff inspection and so on..	13,200

Making a total of $185,000.

Item agreed to.

Public Works—salaries; $637,385; contingencies, $75,000.

Mr. GARDINER: How much of the contingent account was spent last year?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: It appears from page 100 of the Estimates that it was all spent. The amounts asked are the same as last year, and I am advised it is all spent.

Mr. GARDINER: What is due to contingencies under this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Printing and stationery, travelling expenses, clerical and other services, and temporary services.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Agriculture—dairying, including grant of $5,000 to the National Dairy Council, $242,000.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): This vote is identical with the one passed last year, and we had a very full discussion on it. I thought it possible the committee might look with favour upon it, and let it go through. The season we have just passed through has been in some respects quite favourable, so far as pasture and fodder is concerned, but on account of the lateness of the season and the inclement weather last fall the butter and cheese production was less. Aside from the increased dairy production in the west, the greatest point of interest was the introduction of a new standardized 56 pound butter box. This is an improvement on the old container for export butter, and I think will be accepted by the trade generally. The adoption of this box was preceded by conferences between the box manufacturers, the manufacturers of butter and the producers generally. I think it will go into use without any particular friction or upheaval in the trade. With regard to the item of $5,000 for the National Dairy Council, we went into the personnel of that council a year ago. The work is the same this year but the officers have been changed. Mr. Stonehouse, the former president, died last year and Mr. D'Arcy Scott, the late secretary, also died last fall, and their places have been filled by Mr. Joseph Caulder of Regina and W. T. Stephens of Huntingdon, Quebec. Among other activities, their work more recently consisted in interviewing the authorities at Washington in connection with the Lenroot-Tabor bill, and they succeeded in bringing about some modification of the provisions of the bill that were adverse to the dairying interests of Canada.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

Health—the administration of the acts respecting food and drugs, honey, maple products, opium and narcotic drugs and proprietary or patent medicines, $120,800.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): There is an increase of $25,000 over the vote of last year. This vote is understood to provide for the administration of the acts respecting food and drugs, honey, maple products, opium and narcotic drugs and proprietary or patent medicines. The $15,000 of the increase, or part of it is for investigation in connection with the international traffic in narcotic drugs between Canada and United States under the terms of the international treaty. It was found last year that we required to ask for a governor general's warrant and a supplementary vote of $10,000. The additional increase of $10,000 is to make provision for establishing and equipping a sub-laboratory at Toronto, in addition to our laboratories at Ottawa, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Halifax and Montreal.

Item agreed to.

Pollution of inland waters, $9,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What sort of organization could be put into existence for $9,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have a chief sanitary inspector whom we are making permanent this year at $3,600, a part time assistant at $1,000, the traveling expenses represent $1,800 and our coöperation with the provincial department of health in collecting water samples from the steamships for analysis requires $2,600, making a total of $9,000. This work is carried on in conjunction with the provincial authorities, and also under an international agreement between the United States and Canada, which relates more particularly to work on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river.

Item agreed to.

Marine hospitals, including burial expenses of destitute deceased mariners and grants to institutions assisting sailors, $190,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the expense of this department last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It amounted to $139,998.

Mr. GARDINER: Why the increase?

Mr. SIMPSON: Is the increase due to higher funeral expenses?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is estimated that the amount required this year will be $190,000. There is $25,000 needed to cover payments made last year.

Item agreed to.

Immigration medical inspection, $160,000.

Mr. MANION: I would suggest that the minister let this item stand for the moment.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no objection.

Mr. MANION: It is something that we will wish to discuss.

Item stands.

Venereal diseases, $100,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I think it is very unfortunate indeed that this grant should be cut down. Last year a deputation representing all sections of the House waited upon the Prime Minister and asked for a larger sum. I cannot see why such an important item should receive this scant attention at the hands of the government. I notice that the total to be spent for the health of the people is only $600,000. On the preceding page the vote for health of animals is over $2,000,000. It is absurd to spend $2,000,000 for that purpose and only half a million dollars in caring for the health of the people. I think the minister ought to explain the reason for the reduction.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, this expenditure was undertaken some years ago by way of annual grants to the provinces in order to develop clinics to take care of the conditions indicated by this item. A number of clinics have been established throughout Canada, fifty in all. I am informed that if this grant is stabilized at $100,000 it will probably be sufficient to meet the requirements of the provinces.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest to the minister, in order to save time, that as some members wish to discuss this and the other item that I referred to, he might let this stand also?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item stands.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand that this vote is held over?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It stands.

Health—salaries, $174,425; Contingencies, including members of the Dominion Council of Health, or substitutes for the chief provincial health officers and $179.90 incurred by Dr. H. Orr of Edmonton, Alta., in coming to Ottawa as substitute in July, 1926, $60,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, are the new rules in operation? It is eleven o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not yet.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Railways and Canals—salaries, including E. E. Pelletier, messenger to minister, at $1,600 per annum, who shall be entitled to all the benefits and privileges under The Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924, as if he had been a civil servant who had elected pursuant to the provisions of part IV of the act, to become a contributor under the act, $248,490; contingencies, $38,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will have to have some explanation of this item?

Mr. DUNNING: This is all the permanent civil service, of course. The one exception, Mr. Pelletier, is a very difficult case. He has served for thirty or forty years in the capacity of messenger to every succeeding minister of railways and due to a succession of awkward circumstances he is not under the Superannuation Act. This is designed to give him the opportunity of coming under that act. He is not yet at the supperannuation age and will contribute from this time onward. I feel sure that every minister of railways and anyone else who had anything to do with this particular man will realize the justice of giving him this opportunity. He was in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway for a long time and consequently is not under the provisions of the ordinary act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would the minister explain the thirteen increases in his department?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the documents here, but I may say no actual increases are involved. Salaries which were carried under other votes previously are now put into their proper place under civil government. In other votes my hon. friends will notice decreases which are accounted for by this increase.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister promise to tell us of those decreases when we come to them?

Mr. DUNNING: I will.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the minister will turn to page 101 of the estimates he will find that last year the salaries in his department amounted to $222,155, while this year they amount to $248,490; the number of employees last year was 93 and this year it is 106, so apparently there is an increase of 13 in the number of employees and of $26,000 in the salaries, part of which I suppose is statutory. What are these additional thirteen employees?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I did not make myself clear. Other votes already covered salaries which should be under civil government, and these salaries are now transferred to civil government where they properly belong.

Mr. STEVENS: Then there is no actual increase?

Mr. DUNNING: There may be an increase of one or two; I am sorry I have not my documents with me, but there is nothing like an increase of thirteen. The real reason for the increase is the transfer of salaries from other votes to civil government. But if there is any objection I shall be glad to let the vote stand until I have the information available or I will give the detailed explanation on the other votes as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) suggests. I really was not prepared to go on to-night, as I think everyone will recognize; I have not the documents before me, but I remember checking up when the estimates were submitted to me and this is really a transfer of salaries from other votes to civil government, where it is considered they properly belong.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I remember last year and the year before we had from other ministers the same explanation, but you can take the estimates year by year and take the number of civil servants drawing their salaries from the government and find an increase every year. There is nothing in the estimates to show these decreases of which the minister has spoken. That statement would apply to every one of the last five years; there has been a gradual increase in the civil service, and I doubt if there is any new business to warrant it. The invariable explanation given by the government is that these increases are apparent rather than real and that in some other branch of the service there have been some changing or switching or rearrangement of some kind, which has not involved any more money. Every year, however, the salary list shows an increase and the number of officials increases as well.

Mr. DUNNING: I can only repeat what I said previously, but I have found one vote, item 127 on page 30 of the estimates, "Surveys and inspections—canals, including salaries and expenses of experts employed temporarily." Last year that item amounted to $20,000 while this year only $13,000 is asked, and I know the reason is because of the transfer of some salaries formerly chargeable to that vote to the civil government, where they properly belong. There are other votes in connection with which the same thing applies, but I do not have them at hand at the moment. As I said before, I am willing to allow the vote to stand over if it is so desired, because I appreciate the committee is entitled to all the information it is possible to give.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Wednesday, March 23, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Kay.

Fourth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. —Mr. Young (Saskatoon).

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a letter from the city clerk of the city of Ottawa, containing a resolution of the council in opposition to the Georgian bay canal bill.

PETITION OF ARTHUR J. EVANS

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough) moved:

That the petition of Arthur J. Evans, of the township of Esquesing, province of Ontario, farmer, praying for the passage of an act to declare his marriage with Mabel Evans of the township of Esquesing, province of Ontario, to be dissolved, and that he be divorced from her, and the report of the clerk of petitions hereon be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders, pursuant to the provisions of rule 88.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. HARRIS: I may say that the original petition was in error sent to the Department of the Secretary of State. When it finally found its way to the House of Commons it was too late to proceed with the petition. I should like to have the petition go to the standing orders committee in order that it may be properly dealt with there.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RELIEF TO FAMILIES OF PRISONERS

Mr. ADSHEAD:

Is the government considering, or will they consider, any plan either by the Dominion alone or in coöperation with the provinces, whereby relief may be granted to the wives and families of prisoners, or of having whatever the prisoners may earn, forwarded to the families of prisoners, to keep them from suffering and destitution?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: The matter is under consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings):

1. Is it the intention of the government to continue standardization work on the Prince Edward Island section of the Canadian National railways?

2. Will this work be undertaken on the remaining narrow gauge lines during the present year?

3. At what time is it expected to have the Murray Harbour branch changed to standard gauge?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING: The question of capital expenditure on the Prince Edward Island railway was dealt with by the Duncan report, which recommended that a survey be made of the situation with a view to provision for necessary improvements. The entire situation in that regard is under investigation at the present time by the Canadian National railway management.

SHEDIAC ISLAND POST OFFICE

Mr. PRICE:

1. Has Francois Fougere, postmaster of Shediac island, Westmorland county, New Brunswick, been dismissed?

2. If so, what was the charge and by whom laid?

3. Was an investigation held, witnesses called, and who acted as commissioner for taking the evidence?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. François Fougère was never postmaster at Shediac island. A Mrs. Frank A. Fougère was in temporary charge of Shediac island post office from the 8th October, 1925, to the 30th June, 1926, the date on which a regularly appointed postmaster was placed in charge.

2 and 3. See 1.

AIR SERVICE

Mr. BARBER:

1. How many air force stations have we in Canada?

2. Where are they located?

3. How many seaplane stations have we in Canada?

4. At what seaplane stations is all year flying possible?

5. What was the personnel of the Jericho, British Columbia, station in 1925?

6. What is the personnel of the Jericho station at present?

7. How many machines were in service at Jericho in 1925?

8. How many at present time?

9. Have any machines been replaced since 1925?

10. Are these machines of modern or old type?

11. Is it the intention of the government to improve and extend the service at Jericho?

12. What is the program for training at Jericho this year?

13. Does the government propose to reëstablish a civil air board in order to give desired impetus to civilian flying?

14. If not, what provision is being made to encourage civilian flying?

15. Does the government propose to establish an air mail service?

16. Will this service extend to western as well as eastern Canada? If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Nine.

2. Camp Borden, Ont.; Vancouver, B.C.; High River, Alberta; Winnipeg, Manitoba (with sub-stations at Norway House, Lac du Bonnet, and Cormorant lake); Ottawa, Ont.; Dartmouth, Nova Scotia.

3. Seven.

4. Vancouver, B.C., and Dartmouth, N.S.

5. At March 15, 1925—6 officers and 34 other ranks.

6. At March 15, 1927—15 officers and 13 other ranks.

7. Three.

8. Three.

9. Two.

10. Standard training aircraft.

11. As conditions warrant.

12. In addition to the normal training of the personnel of the station, flying instruction on seaplanes is being given to nine officers and five airmen. Other courses will be organized as needed.

13 and 14. The powers, duties, and functions formerly vested in the air board were by the National Defence Act, 1922, transferred to the Minister of National Defence and are now exercised by him.

15. Yes.

16. Yes, as conditions warrant.

LABOUR STATISTICS

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri):

1. How many persons have been employed in the manufacturing industries during 1925 (approximately)?

2. How many members have the labour unions, according to the last statistics?

3. How many industrial disputes have been investigated under The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, up to its amendment of 1925?

4. How many, under the said act as amended by chapter fourteen of the statutes of 1925?

5. How many provinces have adopted legislation substantially identical to the Dominion statute?

6. What are the names and membership of the nine trade unions now in existence under the act respecting trade unions?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Number of salaried employees and wage earners, 537,345; number of outside pieceworkers, 3,703.

(The above figures are subject to revision).

2. 274,604.

3. 450 disputes were dealt with by boards of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, up to its amendment of 1925.

4. 10 disputes were dealt with by boards of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, as amended by chapter fourteen of the statutes of 1925.

5. Five provinces, namely, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, have adopted legislation by which disputes which are within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces are made subject to the provisions of the Federal Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. One province, that of Alberta, has adopted legislation resembling generally the Dominion statute.

6. Canadian Brotherhood of Railroad Employees; Brotherhood of Canadian Pacific Express Employees; L'Union Nationale des Ouvriers de la Rive Sud; Syndicat National Catholique des Employés des Magasins; Musicians' Protective Association of Montreal; Canadian Association of Railway Enginemen; Vancouver and District Waterfront Workers' Association; Canadian National Plasterers' Union of Montreal, Local No. 3; Mine Workers' Union of Canada.

STOCKYARDS

Mr. MILNE:

1. How many stockyards come under the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act of Canada?

2. Where are they located?

3. Who are the owners?

4. Have any of the live stock exchanges on any occasion refused to adopt by-laws submitted by the Department of Agriculture?

5. If so, what exchanges?

6. What was the content of the suggested by-laws that were refused by the exchanges?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Eight.

2. Edmonton, Alberta; Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan; Prince Albert, Saskatchewan; St. Boniface, Manitoba; Toronto, Ontario; Montreal (2), Quebec; Calgary, Alberta.

3. Edmonton stockyards, owned by Edmonton Stockyards Limited, a private corporation; Calgary stockyards, owned by Alberta Stockyards Company, Limited, (C.P.R.); Moose Jaw stockyards, owned by Southern Saskatchewan Co-operative Stockyards, Limited; Prince Albert stockyards, owned by Northern Saskatchewan Co-operative Stockyards, Limited; St. Boniface stockyards, owned by Public Markets, Limited, (C.N.R. and C.P.R. jointly); Toronto stockyards, owned by Union Stockyards of Toronto, Limited; Montreal stockyards, owned by (a) East End stockyards owned by Eastern Abattoirs, (b) Point St. Charles stockyards owned by Montreal Stockyards Company, (C.N.R.).

4. On one occasion, a draft of regulations was submitted to the exchanges for their consideration and a date was suggested for the adoption of same. No formal demand, however, was issued either at the time or at a later date. The regulations in question referred to the putting into effect of a shipper trust account, and the manner in which the deposit of moneys into this account, and the disbursement of same, should be carried on. In connection with the replies received from the exchanges, it became clear that the regulations, as submitted, could not be made effective in accordance with the provisions of the act and, further, that, if regulations were drafted in accordance with the provisions of the act, these regulations would impose a serious hardship upon shippers and producers generally. Under these circumstances, the department, through its officers at the stockyards, advised the several exchanges, that they would not be required to adopt regulations re this matter until the department was satisfied that regulations could be drafted which would cover the case. The exchanges objecting to the adoption of the regulations as submitted were those located at Toronto, Winnipeg and Edmonton. This is the only occasion upon which the department submitted regulations which were not adopted by the exchanges.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Mr. NEILL:

1. How many Chinese landed in Canada for the first time, according to Canadian government returns, during the calendar year 1926?

2. Of those entering how many came as: (a) members of the diplomatic service and their servants; (b) merchants; (c) students; (d) under section 9, chapter 38 of the Chinese Immigration Act, 1923 (permits)?

3. What was the classification as to occupation of those admitted under said section 9, chapter 38?

4. What was the average period of residence in Canada allowed under such permits?

5. During the year were any existing permits renewed or extended for a further period, and if so, how many and for what further period?

Hon. Mr. FORKE:

1. No Chinese immigrants landed; 58 Chinese entered under permit (section 9, Chinese Immigration Act, 1923); two entered under section 5 (a) of Chinese Immigration Act, 1923, being consular staff; two entered under section 5 (c) (2), being students.

VERMILION WHEAT

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture had the Vermilion wheat of Mr. Frank Larcombe under their observation for three seasons?

2. Was the license certificate of variety issued to Mr. Larcombe on the 30th of December, 1926?

3. Did an official of the department write Mr. Larcombe on the 12th of February, 1927, six weeks after the license certificate had been issued, advising him not to sell any more of his wheat as it had fallen down in the milling test?

4. Was the first test made for milling purposes carried out on the 11th of February, 1927?

5. Does the department anticipate asking for confiscatory legislation to cancel the license for the above wheat?

6. Has the department a record of the heavy yield capacity of the Vermilion wheat in western Canada? If so, what are their records?

7. Will the wheat withstand the hot winds and drought better than other varieties?

8. Can it be grown in semi-arid districts of the west?
9. How did the yield compare with other varieties grown under the same conditions?
10. Was this wheat tested in 1926 at Vermilion, Olds, Youngstown, and Claresholm experimental farms?
11. How did it compare with Garnet wheat at the Claresholm experimental farm?
12. Has Mr. Larcombe ever asked officials of the department for particulars of tests of the wheat made by them?
13. How many tests have been made?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. No, first test was made in 1925.
5. No.
6. We have as yet no definite records.
7. Not definitely proven.
8. Not proven yet.
9. See answer to No. 6.
10. Have records only from Olds. These are provincial stations, consequently we are not in a position to report on their experiments.

CHARLO STATION POSTMASTER

Mr. GRIMMER:

1. Has George Chalmers been dismissed from the position of postmaster at River Charlo, New Brunswick?
2. If so, what were the grounds of his dismissal?
3. Were any charges laid against Mr. Chalmers?
4. If so, what was the nature, who laid them, and was an investigation held into said charges?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. George Chalmers was postmaster at Charlo Station, N.B. and not Charlo River. He was dismissed by order in council of the 23rd February, 1927.
2. Active political partisanship.
3 and 4. The member for the constituency made a statement that he had personal knowledge of the political partisanship of the postmaster and there was accordingly no investigation.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

Mr. BETTEZ:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): There is no such postmaster in charge at River Charlo, and in order to get the answer my hon. friend desires, it will be necessary for him to give the proper post office.

Motion agreed to.

FARMERS BANK FAILURE

MOTION PROPOSING RELIEF FOR THOSE WHO SUFFERED LOSS

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable that the same measure of relief should be granted to those who suffered loss through the failure of the Farmers Bank as has been granted to those who lost through the failure of the Home Bank.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a tabulated statement of some twenty-four bank failures which have occurred in Canada between 1868 and 1910, giving in each case the date of suspension, the amount owing to the public, and the percentage paid to the depositors, also the amount lost in each case, if any. The aggregate liabilities, the amount owing to the public, in these twenty-five banks—I am including the Home Bank—was about $77,000,000. The amount lost was $6,774,665, not including the loss in the Home Bank case. Out of those twenty-five cases of failures, in fourteen cases the depositors received the full amount they had on deposit: in six cases they received respectively 57½ per cent, 59⅜ per cent, 66½ per cent, 75¼ per cent, 96¼ per cent, and 99½ per cent of the amounts they had on deposit. In one case they received 11 per cent, and in another 17½ per cent of the amount they had on deposit. In two cases only of all in this list the depositors received nothing whatever. One of those cases was the Bank of Acadia, which suspended in April, 1873, and where the amount involved was only $106,914. The other case was that of the Farmers Bank, which suspended in December, 1910, and where the amount involved was about $2,000,000.

I wish to point out that during the last fifty years or more there has been no case of a bank failure where the depositors have lost all that they had in the bank, except the case of the Farmers Bank. I want to state also this, that so far as my information goes, and I believe it is correct, the only case in the history of Canada where the certificate was granted to a bank in violation of the provisions of the Bank Act was in connection with the Farmers Bank.

Earlier in the session I placed on the order paper certain questions which in due course were answered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). One of these questions read as follows:

> Did parliament vote money for the relief of Home Bank depositors in recognition of any legal or moral claim of such depositors on the government?

The answer to that question was as follows:

> The act stands on the statutes as a relief measure. It will be recalled that the House adopted a report of the banking and commerce committee to the effect that it considered the investigation established "a moral claim in equity for compensation."

The Home Bank opened its doors for business on the 2nd of January, 1906, and suspended on the 17th of August, 1923. The Farmers Bank opened its doors on the 2nd of January, 1907, and suspended on the 19th of December, 1910. The Home Bank was therefore in operation for 17 years and 7½ months, while the Farmers Bank was in operation for less than four years. When the Home Bank failed there was on deposit in savings and current account a little over $15,000,000. When the Farmers Bank failed there was on deposit about $2,000,000. In the case of the Home Bank the depositors received 25 per cent from the liquidator, and I am informed, whether correctly or otherwise, that there is a likelihood of their receiving eight or ten per cent more, which I hope may be the case; but in addition to what they received, and may receive, from the liquidator, the depositors were granted under the legislation that was put through parliament by the government an additional 35 per cent, so that these depositors have been recouped to the extent of 60 per cent, whereas, as I stated before, the Farmers Bank depositors have received nothing whatever.

When the Home Bank failed representations were made to the government asking for an investigation, and in February, 1924, Mr. Justice McKeown was appointed to investigate the Home Bank failure. He made his report to parliament in June of that year, and in July of the same year, 1924, the banking and commerce committee made its report, which was approved by parliament. In June, 1925, the Finance minister moved the House into committee on a resolution to pay $5,450,000 to the creditors of the Home Bank for moneys on deposit or in current account. He said that this would provide for a partial payment of 35 per cent of deposits, and was in pursuance of the approval by the House of the report of the banking and commerce committee, which was influenced by the report of Mr. Justice McKeown that the depositors had a moral claim, or to use the exact phraseology of the Minister of Finance, "a moral claim in equity" against the government.

What is the basis of that moral claim? It can rest, it seems to me on only one foundation. The basis of the moral claim placing moral responsibility upon the government for loss must necessarily rest upon error of judgment or negligence on the part of the Finance minister or of the Treasury Board. That is the basis, and the sole basis, it seems to me of the moral claim and of the government's responsibility. My resolution asks for the same measure of relief to be granted to those who lost through the failure of the Farmers Bank as has been granted to those who lost through the failure of the Home Bank. It is therefore up to me to establish an equally strong basis of moral claim, and to do so I must establish it on the same foundation, in fact, on the only foundation there is, namely upon an error of judgment or negligence on the part of the Minister of Finance or the Treasury Board.

What constitutes negligence?? An act may not be a negligent act at one time under certain circumstances which would certainly be an act of negligence under different circumstances. A person may be driving along the road at a moderate rate of speed, unaware of certain danger, or unaware of the fact that a certain part of the road is unsafe. He meets with an accident. That person is not guilty of negligence, but if that same individual driving at the same rate of speed has been made aware, not by one warning or two warnings, but by half a dozen warnings, that this particular spot is dangerous, and then meets with an accident, I think if he sued for damages any court would say that he had contributed, by his negligence, to the accident which had occurred. Looking at it in that light, I want to place before the House certain facts which I think should be considered in regard to this matter. There are, it seems to me, certain reasons why the Minister of Finance, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, should have been particularly careful before issuing the certificate to the Farmers Bank. As I said a moment ago, a certain number of failures had taken place. Some of these were of recent occurrence. Some half a dozen had occurred between 1896 and 1906. Mr. H. C. McLeod, general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, said:

> Most if not all of these failures were fraudulent, and it is now plainly evident that a few hours' examination by a skilled banker would have disclosed an insolvent condition in any one of those banks years before they collapsed.

There were a number of failures which had occurred in recent years. For instance, there was the failure of the Banque Ville Marie, which occurred in 1899, but it was only wound up in 1905. Then there was the failure of the Bank of Yarmouth in 1905. This was pretty close to the time when the certificate was given to the Farmers Bank. Then the Ontario Bank closed its doors or suspended in October, 1906, the very month when Travers was making overtures for a certificate. It seems to me that these failures, occurring so recently, should have been a warning to the minister to be especially careful. Another matter of importance is this: the Farmers Bank was incorporated in 1904. The promoters started to work to get the money necessary to obtain the certificate. They failed and came back in 1905 asking for a renewal of their charter. Again they worked for a year and failed, and came back again in 1906, and at that time the Hon. Mr. Fielding expressed his opposition to the granting of the charter, and what reason did he give? He said:

> My view was that the fact that they had not been able to organize promptly indicated that they were having difficulty, and I confess that from the beginning I did not quite like the name "The Farmers Bank".

The impression which he had at that time certainly was not very favourable to the granting of a certificate to this bank, and his own impression, it seems to me, should have warned him to be particularly careful, in view of the fact that Travers and those connected with him had been working for two years and had failed to find the necessary money which would have enabled them to obtain a certificate.

On November 30, 1906, the very day that Travers came for the certificate, Mr. Fielding had a talk with him and brought up the matter of the Bank Act being evaded by taking notes of subscribers and getting them cashed. Mr. Travers assured him that nothing of that kind had been done. On the assurance of Mr. Travers that there was nothing in the rumour so far as the Farmers Bank was concerned, Fielding handed over to Travers the certificate, asking him at the same time to write him, putting in the form of a letter the assurance which he had given him verbally. Travers goes out of the office with the certificate in his pocket, goes to an hotel and writes a letter along the line of the conversation he had just had with the Minister of Finance. When the Farmers Bank failed representations were made from various parts of the country asking for an investigation. On January 7, 1911, a large number of shareholders demanded that a royal commission be appointed to investigate the affairs of the Farmers' Bank. On January 23 of that year Sir George Foster, speaking in the House said:

> The Treasury Board had an application before it. The fundamental conditions were the subscription of $500,000, and the putting up and paying in of $250,000 of actual cash.

Neither the one nor the other was done, and the only way that the $250,000 came to be paid in at last was that some men, the bank not being in existence, not having running power, borrowed the money. On February 18, 1911, Mr. Travers was taken from prison to give evidence before the court, and on that occasion he swore that the chief Liberal whip, Mr. Calvert, had gone with him to the Finance minister to urge the granting of the certificate, and on his intervention had been successful. On the 23rd November, 1911, the government refused the request for a royal commission to investigate. On the 15th March, 1911, Mr. David Henderson, member of parliament for Halton, which county was hit the hardest of any, moved for a royal commission to investigate. This motion was voted down on a straight party vote of 97 to 62. In that debate Mr. Fielding said:

> Undoubtedly that certificate, as has since been ascertained, was obtained fraudulently. The minister was deceived, the Treasury Board was deceived, the whole country was deceived by the whole proceedings of the Farmers Bank.

Then on the 7th May, 1911, Mr. Haughton Lennox, a member of parliament, moved the following resolution:

> This House regrets that in permitting the Farmers Bank to commence and to continue in business the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board failed to exercise such proper care and to take such reasonable precautions as were necessary to prevent evasion of the law and to protect the public interest.

That motion was defeated by a vote of 97 to 63. Then in the election of 1911 the Liberal party issued a pamphlet in regard to this Farmers Bank matter, and in that pamphlet they gave this as one of the reasons why the certificate was granted: that at the time of the application some $40,000 had been spent in promotion and if the certificate had been refused the shareholders would have lost a part of that money. They also said—and I put this on record, because it is exactly in line with the expression of opinion given by Mr. Fielding before the House—that if the government had refused to grant the certificate to the Farmers Bank their political opponents would have charged them with treating farmers more unfairly than other people. So that it appears there was a political reason for the granting of the certificate.

I pass now to what took place after 1911, when the Borden government came into power. Sir Robert Borden introduced a government bill for the relief of the Farmers Bank depositors. That bill passed the House of Commons. At that time the majority in the Senate was Liberal. The Senate saw fit to defeat the bill. May I say in connection with the bill put through very recently in regard to the Home Bank depositors that the Conservatives were in a majority in the Senate, and if they had taken the same course as the Liberal majority did in connection with the Farmers Bank bill that bill would never have become law.

In 1912 the Borden government appointed the late Sir William Meredith, then Chief Justice of Ontario, to investigate the failure of the Farmers Bank. In his report Sir William said:

> That the Treasury Board was induced to give its certificate by false and fraudulent representations on the part of Travers;
> That as to the representations made to the Finance minister by E. B. Osler and others, it was in my opinion, incumbent on the Treasury Board to have investigated the charges that had been made before coming to a conclusion as to whether or not the certificate should be given.

His findings show conclusively that the conditions prescribed by the Bank Act as precedent to the issuance of the certificate by the Treasury Board had not been complied with, that the certificate had been obtained by fraud and dishonesty, and that the Treasury Board was negligent in issuing it. It will be observed that he said in his report:

> It was incumbent upon the Treasury Board.

That means it was the duty of the Treasury Board, which duty was not fulfilled. I submit, Sir, that a duty unfulfilled constitutes negligence, especially if that failure of duty is in the face of repeated warnings.

Let me quote a remark made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to which I would direct the particular attention of all hon. members. It will be found in Hansard of 1911 at page 5400:

> This country is broad enough and rich enough to correct an error of the government, if an error has been committed.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a good principle to follow, for no party and no individual gains anything by refusing to correct a manifest fault. But while Sir Wilfrid Laurier admitted the principle that the country should make good where error was shown, he refused to permit an investigation to find out whether or not an error had been committed. Sir William Meredith followed explicitly, almost literally, what Sir Wilfrid Laurier had said. Sir Wilfrid then said that he would admit moral responsibility if negligence could be shown. Let me quote his own words, that they may impress themselves upon hon. members. They will be found in Hansard of 1911 at page 3659:

> If there was negligence on the part of Mr. Fielding, the question of how far the government would be responsible would be a very different question. The government would be morally responsible, if not otherwise. If a minister of the crown has made an error of judgment, it is simply a question of his having made a mistake, which has no legal or moral consequences. It is always a serious charge that there has been an error of judgment, but we are all liable to mistakes; and after all—

I entirely concur with this, as I am sure the House will.

> —and after all if the only charge that can be made against a minister of the crown who has been fifteen years in office is that upon a certain occasion he committed an error of judgment, the charge is but a minor one.

I would ask hon. members to note particularly the first sentence, because Sir Wilfrid Laurier there admits the responsibility—if negligence on the part of the Finance minister or the Treasury Board can be shown. I direct attention to that sentence because it was the basis of the action taken by the Borden government. And necessarily it is the basis of this resolution that negligence should be shown.

Now let us examine the facts a little more in detail. I have already quoted Mr. Fielding's admission that he was deceived. I will add some words from Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the same effect. He stated from his place in the House:

> That the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board have been deceived was admitted long ago. When Mr. Travers declared that the shareholders had put into the treasury of the bank $250,000, that was deceit to the extent of about $80,000. That is admitted.

These words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier are the basis for the general admission by himself and his followers of what they are pleased to call an "error of judgment" on the part of Mr. Fielding. But the right hon. gentleman argued that that had nothing whatever to do with the subsequent loss. In that regard I wish to quote what was stated by Sir Robert Borden, as recorded in Hansard of 1911 at page 5397:

> The Prime Minister having put a very relevant question as to whether or not this fraud had anything to do with the subsequent loss, I would ask him: Does he consider the Department of Finance or the government was doing its duty when it permitted the man, who according to statements of the president of the Canadian Bankers Association had perpetrated a fraud, by means of perjury, upon the department, to remain at large and to continue his operations among the various communities of this country and no investigation instituted. Had that nothing to do with the loss?

That question, by the way, was not answered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I have said, Sir, that it is incumbent upon me to establish negligence on the part of the Treasury Board or of the Minister of Finance, all the more so because of the statement of Sir Wilfrid Laurier that if negligence could be shown he would admit the government's responsibility. The Farmers Bank was incorporated in 1904. By acts passed in 1905 and 1906 the time for issuing the certificate was fixed at not later than January 18, 1907. Therefore there was no good reason for unusual haste in issuing the certificate on November 30, two or three days after the application for it had been made. I refer to section 13 of the Bank Act, which requires $500,000 to be subscribed. I would ask hon. members to mark these words:

> To be bona fide subscribed before the meeting of the subscribers is called.

Before the meeting of the subscribers is called, the act requires that $500,000 shall be bona fide subscribed. Notice of the meeting which took place on November 27 appeared first in the Toronto Globe of October 22. Therefore, according to the Bank Act, previous to or by October 22, $500,000 should have been bona fide subscribed. I put these questions to all reasonably minded members: Was section 13 of the Bank Act complied with? There is only one answer: section 13 was not complied with. Whose duty was it to see that section 13 was being complied with? There is only one answer: It was manifestly the duty of the Finance minister and the Treasury Board. If, then, that duty was not performed, was there negligence? Do not the circumstances indicate that there was negligence? Sir William Meredith says that if October 22 was the determining date, then the $500,000 was not bona fide subscribed. Whose business was it to determine the date? Can any person deny negligence in that regard? The application of Travers on November 27 for the certificate was accompanied by what purported to be a list of shareholders together with a statutory declaration of Travers in which, referring to the list of shareholders, he states that it is a list of the subscribers to the capital stock of the bank, correctly setting forth as to each subscription the name of the subscriber, his address, the number of shares subscribed for by him, the amount of such shares, and the amount paid in thereon. He also declares that each of the subscriptions is a bona fide subscription to the capital stock of the bank. Was that list true or was it false? That is a fair question. There is no doubt about it, the list was false; and if it was false the certificate could not issue. Whose duty was it to determine whether the list was true or false? Again, I say, that duty devolved undoubtedly on the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board. Was there negligence? I maintain there was.

Consider for a moment the $250,000 deposit. On October 6, the provisional directors gave Travers a power of attorney, and on October 9, Travers borrowed from the Trust and Guarantee Company $80,000, repayable in a month, on the security of promissory notes of subscribers amounting in the aggregate to $100,955, agreeing to pay interest on the loan at the rate of 10 per cent per annum and a bonus of $1,000, and on October 23, the day after the issue of the notice calling the meeting, he borrowed from the same company $20,000 repayable on demand on the security of promissory notes of subscribers amounting to $26,500 and certain shares of loan companies, valued at $20,500, which had been transferred to the bank in payment of subscriptions, agreeing to pay the same rate of interest and a bonus of $500. Again, I ask, was this in accordance with the Bank Act? The answer most positively is no. Whose duty was it to look into this matter? I say it was the duty of the Treasury Board and of the Minister of Finance. Was that duty performed or was it not? The answer is, it was not performed. If that duty devolved upon them and it was not discharged, I ask, was there negligence? I again establish that there was.

What had transpired that should have caused the Hon. Mr. Fielding to exercise special care? He said himself, as recorded in Hansard of 1911, at page 2679:

> There was gossip abroad concerning the Farmers Bank. I was well aware of it.

But, Sir, I submit there was a good deal more than gossip. The Monetary Times says that the Finance department had received six different warnings. Certain it is—this is not and never has been disputed—that on October 8, 1906, Mr. Leighton McCarthy wrote to Mr. Fielding that a number of subscribers for shares in the Farmers Bank would dispute the bona fides of the subscriptions. He said:

> Grave conditions have arisen which require careful consideration before the Treasury Board grants the certificate to the organizing of the bank.

On October 11 he sent a telegram again warning the Minister of Finance, and on October 19 Mr. McCarthy wrote the minister formally, asking that the Treasury Board stay action on the application of the Farmers Bank for a certificate. There are three distinct warnings, not one of which has ever for a moment been disputed by any person at any time, and all of these before the certificate was issued. We have evidence too that Mr. Henderson of Halton went to the Minister of Finance and warned him that the provisional directors were not carrying out the spirit and intent of the Bank Act. He had himself seen notes which were endorsed by provisional directors for the purpose of raising money, presumably to provide the $250,000. Later the Minister of Finance said to Mr. Henderson: "Henderson, I don't see why you should worry over this. You are not responsible. Besides, you did warn the government." I also call the attention of the House to another warning, and I quote from Hansard of 1911 at page 10,472.

Mr. Osler said:

> After the deposit had been made with the Receiver General and before the certificate had been issued, I met the Minister of Finance and had a talk with him about the Farmers Bank. I told him that it was a fraud, that the people connected with it were not worthy, and that the method taken for obtaining the necessary deposit was absolutely illegal. I knew that of my own personal knowledge, because I knew where application had been made to borrow the money on these endorsed notes; I did not know at the time from whom. I saw that the Finance minister was under a good deal of anxiety about the condition of affairs. The matter ended there so far as I was concerned until some time afterwards, when I learned that a certificate had been issued, and I again spoke to the minister, and said I was exceedingly sorry that the government had issued the certificate.

Further on he observes:

> It was notorious that the men at the head of the bank were not worthy . . . . Further than that, I may say that I had a conversation with my hon. friend from Halton (Mr Henderson), and he told me he had made the same represenation to the Finance minister.

Surely words like these coming from a man of the standing of Mr. Osler cannot be set aside. They constitute a warning which the minister should have heeded, and in failing to take cognizance of such a warning he was guilty of negligence. Mr. Fielding wrote Travers who assured him that everything was all right. Of course Travers would say so; he was a crook and he would not hesitate to give that assurance. Let me now quote from a statement of Sir William Meredith:

> That in thus dealing with these notes the provisional directors and Travers were guilty of a breach of trust does not, I think, admit of doubt, and for the manner in which the money borrowed was applied there was neither justification nor excuse.

Mark these words:

> I very much doubt whether in the circumstances it would have been right to have depended on the word of Travers, even if he had given the assurance for which the minister had asked. The information which had been conveyed to the minister had come from gentlemen of standing, and if it was accurate the declaration of Travers had made was untrue and it would seem to have been almost an idle thing to ask for an assurance that there was no foundation for the statements that had been made to the minister from the very man whose honesty was in question. . . . It is true that, as Mr. Fielding stated in evidence, Travers, so far as he knew, was a reputable banker; but that was not in my opinion, a sufficient reason for not having instituted an inqury as to the matters which had been called to his attention. Such an inquiry could easily have been made, and the delay occasioned by it would have been inconsiderable, and such an inquiry would, undoubtedly, have resulted in the discovery of the manner in which the $100,000 had been raised and in the refusal of the Treasury Board to give the certificate.

I quote further from Sir William:

I do not suggest that the minister would have been justified because of the information conveyed to him in recommending that the certificate should not be granted or that the Treasury Board because of it would have been justified in refusing to grant it. But having received the information it was in my opinion incumbent on the Treasury Board to have investigated the charges that had been made before coming to a conclusion as to whether or not the certificate should have been given.

I submit in all reason that failure to investigate under these circumstances constitutes negligence on the part of the Minister of Finance and of the Treasury Board. That brings us to November 30. On that date, the very day Travers obtained the certificate, Sir Edward Clouston, the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, wrote the deputy minister as follows:

In connection with the application of the Farmers Bank of Canada for the usual certificate from the Treasury Board, I have reason to believe that the money lodged or to be lodged at Ottawa as stock subscriptions cannot be regarded as paid up capital, and that a large proportion of the amount necessary to the obtaining of a certificate is a loan made upon the promise of its payment when returned by your department.

Permit me to request, if only for the protection of the public, the Treasury Board will exercise its rights to refuse to issue the certificate if it thinks best so to do until a thorough investigation has been made into the circumstances stated herein.

Some person may say "Oh, but that was on November 30, and it is only reasonable to suppose that as this letter was dated November 30 the minister did not receive it until the next day, and the certificate was issued on November 30." Very well, let us accept that if you like. This, however, is true—that the bank did not open its doors or commence business until the second day of January, 1907, one month after this letter had been obtained from the president of the Bankers Association, and just at the time that the certificate had been handed out to Mr. Travers. Taking that in connection with the other warnings I submit that the Finance minister should have gone to the telephone, got into communication with Travers and said: "Hold on, I do not want you to go ahead until I have some further interview with you, I want to investigate this a little further. I have received certain representations from the head of the Bankers Association, and I ask you to return that certificate, or to suspend any action upon it until I have had further time to investigate." If Mr. Travers then undertook to say: "I have the certificate and I am going ahead," then I submit the Minister of Finance had it within his power to tell Mr. Travers that he would take such steps to protect the public as were in his power, and he would have prevented the subsequent deplorable occurrences.

That brings us up to the time the bank had started business. Now I should like to refer to another matter a little later which shows that the government had further warning which should have caused action on the part of the Treasury Board and the government even after the bank started to do business. The bank opened on January 2nd, 1907, and on April 17, three months and a half after they had started to do business, the manager of its branch in the town of Milton, Mr. Vankoughnet, wrote as follows to the Deputy Minister of Finance:

Will you kindly give me your opinion as to the following: Our general manager (Mr. Travers) sends to the different branches lists of notes given in payment of our capital stock. These notes he makes the managers put through as discounts, crediting the amount to head office. This is figured in the government return as paid up capital and circulation issued to that amount. If I read the Bank Act correctly, section 76, he is asking us to do what is not right. As I do not wish to do anything contrary to the law, I should be much obliged if you give me the ruling on it.

In reply to this letter, Mr. T. C. Boville, Deputy Minister of Finance, writes as follows on May 1, 1907:

While it is not deemed expedient to enter into correspondence at this stage, the matter referred to by you is of sufficient importance to warrant further inquiry. This will shortly be made. I should like to have a copy of any of the notes.

On May 3rd Mr. Vankoughnet sent him one of the notes, and in the accompanying letter he declared that "the amount under discount at this office April 30th was about $111,885".

Well, Mr. Travers was asked to make a return covering this point, and he not only wrote but gave his oath. He swore that this was the state of affairs:

The portion of the $375,473 paid up capital of the bank as per return of March 30th, 1907, represented by promisory notes of the shareholders held by the bank amounts to $59,110.

So that Travers swore that the total amount of these notes held anywhere in Ontario or in Canada was only $59,000, while the minister had under his hand a statement from the manager of one of the branch banks—and a small one at that—showing that in that particular branch alone there was $111,885. Had the minister, with that statement of the manager of one of the branch banks under his hand, taken even a little trouble to examine into the affair it would have proved to him very conclusively that Travers was a scoundrel and a perjurer—there is no question about that. And as a result of investigation I venture to say at that early date the depositors would have been saved a heavy loss. Now, I ask you, under these circumstances, was there or was there not negligence on the part of the minister at that time, in 1907?

Now we come down to 1908. I need not go into details regarding the Keeley mine. There was sufficient published in the papers at the time, it seems to me, having regard to other circumstances, to have caused the then Minister of Finance to make further investigation.

I pass on now to another matter. On December 7th, 1908, Mr. Knight, Secretary of the Canadian Bankers' Association, wrote to Mr. Fieldnig as to a deposit receipt of the bank being offered for sale in New York under very peculiar circumstances. Here again was something which should have aroused suspicion in the mind of the minister, taken in conjunction with other circumstances, and caused him to ask for an investigation. I pass on now to 1910. In January of that year the minister received from Mr. William H. Hotchkiss, superintendent of insurance of the state of New York, several letters and telegrams showing recklessness and fraud, which again should have caused the minister to institute an inquiry. Here let me say that the recklessness and fraud which had been shown after the bank got its certificate were no worse than the carelessness manifested and fraud committed before the certificate was granted.

Now I ask you to consider this matter fairly and squarely. In February, 1924, Mr. Justice McKeown was appointed a commissioner to investigate the affairs of the Home Bank and in June of the same year he made his report. Under order in council No. 306 the commissioner was asked to submit answers to five questions. On the answers to these five questions the government based its right to pass the Home Bank relief bill granting relief to those who had suffered losses by its failure. Is it not fair then that the same five questions should be considered in connection with the Farmers Bank? If a moral claim for responsibility on the part of the government was established through the answers of Mr. Justice McKeown to those five questions, let us apply the same procedure to the Farmers Bank. The first question—and mark you, this was ten or twelve years after the Home Bank had been doing business; there is no question about that—was:

Whether in the years 1915, 1916, and 1918 representations were made to the Department of Finance respecting the conditions of the Home Bank, and if so what representations were made.

The answer of Mr. Justice McKeown was that there were no representations regarding 1915, but representations were made in regard to 1916 and 1918. The representations were:

An amount double the total paid up capital and reserve of the bank locked up in 4 accounts, the securities of which could not be realized on.

(c) Large loans disproportionate to securities.

(d) Specific instructions of Minister of Finance disobeyed.

(e) President and some directors indebted to bank through companies in which they had an interest.

If exactly the same questions were put in the case of the Farmers Bank, only taking the years 1906, 1907, 1908, and 1910 instead of the years 1915, 1916, and 1918, representations were certainly made by Sir Edmund Osler, Mr. Henderson, Mr. McCarthy, Sir Edward Clouston, president of the Bankers' Association in 1906, Mr. Vankoughnet, president in 1907, the secretary of the Bankers' Association in 1908, and this man from New York in 1910.

The second question is:

Whether, if such representations were made, a state of affairs was revealed concerning the condition of the said bank such as would have justified an investigation under the powers conferred upon the Minister of Finance by section 56A of the Bank Act.

The answer to that is the word yes. I say that if the same question were asked regarding the Farmers Bank the answer must be likewise in the affirmative. The third question is:

What action if any was taken by the then Minister of Finance upon such representations as may have been made?

In reply we were told that Sir Thomas White—

(a) Called for special returns under section 113 of the Bank Act.

(b) Called for report from auditor under section 56A.

(c) Sought and obtained information from Mr. Lash and from the president and directors, including detailed statements of certain accounts.

(d) Forbade further capitalization of interest on doubtful accounts.

(e) Secured promise from Mr. Lash and the president of a thorough investigation under the direction of Mr. Haney and Mr. McHaffie.

And so on. If we put the same question in regard to the Farmers Bank, we find that Mr. Fielding wrote to Mr. Travers and accepted his assurance. He did not call for special returns under section 113; he did not call for a report of the auditor under section 56A, and he did not secure a promise of thorough investigation.

Question 4 reads:

What effect would an audit under section 56A if made in 1915, 1916, and 1918, have had upon conduct of the affairs of the Home Bank and upon the position of the present depositors?

The answer is:

(a) Liquidation immediately following such audit.
(b) Amalgamation with another bank.
(c) The depositors would have suffered no loss if such audit had been made in 1916 or 1918.

If exactly the same question had been asked in regard to the Farmers Bank with application to the years 1907 and 1908, if you like, I maintain that there can be no doubt that had an investigation taken place then, liquidation would have followed and amalgamation with another bank, with the very good chance that the depositors would have saved nearly all, if not all, their money. Sir Thomas White was blamed for not investigating in 1916 and 1918 when the war was on. The King government came into office in 1921 and they had from that time until August, 1923, to make an investigation. They had the whole of the year 1922 and yet they did nothing in the way of investigation. Question 5 reads:

What was the financial condition of the said Home Bank in 1915, 1916, and 1918, and what steps if any could have been taken by the government to save the situation?

The answer to the first part of that question indicates that the resources of the bank had been squandered and so on. The same thing would apply exactly, word for word, to the Farmers Bank in the years 1908, 1909 and 1910. As regards the other part of the question—

What steps if any could have been taken by the government to save the situation?

—is answered in this way:

The only steps that the government could have taken to save the situation would have been to make a thorough investigation into the bank's affairs, which would have resulted:
(a) In forcing the liquidation of the bank.
(b) In bringing about its amalgamation with another bank.

Exactly the same thing would have occurred if any investigation had taken place in regard to the Farmers Bank.

May I sum up in conclusion? Mr. Travers and his outfit had failed for over two years to raise the necessary money to get the certificate. That should have been a warning to the minister to be very careful. Mr. Fielding himself had spoken to Mr. Travers regarding violations of the Bank Act, and he stated that he had been told that in some cases subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave to the provisional directors notes which were used in order to raise the money. With that in his mind, he should have gone beneath the surface, he should have investigated the apparent irregularities. He had Mr. McCarthy's letters of the 8th, 11th and 19th October. Furthermore, Mr. McCarthy, acting on behalf of a number of subscribers, had made an application to the high court of justice asking that the court order that these men be released from their subscriptions to the Farmers Bank, because of what? Because of fraud and misrepresentation made to them in getting their subscriptions. Mr. McCarthy had carried that case to the court and the court had decided that there was fraud and misrepresentation. At all events the men got back their money because of the fraud and misrepresentation under which their subscriptions had been obtained. That was before the minister.

On November 27, Mr. Fielding had an application from Mr. Travers for a certificate with the statutory declaration that the list of subscribers was bona fide. All the minister had to do was to look over that list and he would have found on it the names of every one of those men who had been released from their subscriptions by the high court of justice of this country. Was he negligent or not in not looking over that list? Were all the objections removed as soon as those men for whom Mr. McCarthy was acting had got back their money? Mr. McCarthy's interest in them as clients was, of course, finished; but while he had got back for those men their money on the ground that their subscriptions had been obtained fraudulently, he never withdrew from the court his charges of fraud and misrepresentation by having on prospectuses the names of persons as directors who were not directors, and on account of huge sums being paid in ways not authorized.

Mr. Fielding knew on October 19 that Major Thomas Beattie, whose name appeared in the prospectus right before him as one of the directors, had given his emphatic denial that he had ever subscribed a cent or allowed his name to be mentioned in any way in connection with the bank. He had before him the judgment of the court given on the 27th October, 1906, containing particulars of fraud, for instance, that a Mr. Robert Noble, who subscribed $3,000, was put down for $10,000; that John Sproat and James Murray, who had each subscribed $1,000, were put down for $10,000, and that a Doctor Stewart, who had subscribed nothing at all, was put down as subscribing $10,000. All Mr. Fielding had to do was to look at the list of subscribers and he would have seen that these men figured on the list as bona fide subscribers of the bank.

Mr. Travers told Mr. Fielding that he was authorized to ask for the certificate. Why did the minister not ask Mr. Travers to produce his authorization? I think he neglected an opportunity when he did not ask for it. Had he asked for it Mr. Travers could not have shown it, because he never had any authorization to ask for the certificate. If Mr. Fielding had asked to see the minute book of the provisional directors, he would have found there enough evidence to stop the whole thing. If he had asked Mr. Travers to show him the stock list as signed by the subscribers—and surely that was an easy thing to do—and had compared it with the list which was presumed to be a copy of the original list, he would have found at once that Travers had placed in his hand a fake list. There is no doubt about that, and I contend that that is an indication of negligence on his part. The minute book would have shown the Minister of Finance that the directors had collected from subscribers $210,000 in cash, and had paid out $41,000 improperly for commissions and expenses. It would have shown that Travers had borrowed $80,000 on subscribers' notes, all in contravention of the Bank Act. The Treasury Board had most direct and positive notice of the frauds. They had Henderson's warning; they had E. B. Osler's warning; they had McCarthy's letters; they had McCarthy's suit before the high court; they had the warning of the Canadian Bankers' Association; they had Vankoughnet's letter of April, 1907, and they had the letters from Hotchkiss, the superintendent of insurance for New York state. Was there or was there not negligence in paying no attention to all these warnings and allowing the certificate to be handed out?

This parliament, Mr. Speaker, has at different times voted large sums of money for the relief of persons in distress. I remember that on one occasion this House voted a sum, the amount of which I now forget, for the relief of those who had suffered in Paris from the floods. We have also voted money to relieve those who suffered from disasters in Italy, in Newfoundland, and in San Francisco. Why did we do this? Those who had suffered in these different cases had no claim upon the parliament of Canada except the claim of common humanity and common citizenship in a broad sense, but we voted the money of this country to these people who had suffered through no fault of their own. I am asking this House now to grant relief, not to people who live in other countries and have suffered loss through no fault of their own, but to farmers in various parts of the province of Ontario who through no fault of their own suffered loss through the failure of the Farmers Bank, and who feel embittered because they feel that in a measure at least the loss that they sustained was due to neglect upon the part of the government before the certificate was granted to the bank. I might add that only a short time ago parliament voted an annuity of $10,000 to the Hon. W. S. Fielding. There was no opposition to that. I was not a member of the House at the time, but I took occasion, as a former member of parliament, to write to the press in my part of the country at that time commending the government for this recognition of a man who had given such long and distinguished service to his country as Mr. Fielding had, but it is only natural that those who lost their all in the failure of the Farmers Bank, and in most cases the losses fell upon men in very moderate circumstances who could ill afford to lose, should have some little feeling of resentment or bitterness against the man who was at the head of the Treasury Board at that time. That feeling of bitterness I venture to say, would not be lessened by the fact that parliament saw fit to grant to him an annuity of $10,000 for the rest of his life.

I appeal to the government to do this act of justice, not only because it is an act of justice to those who suffered, but because it is due also, I think, to the Hon. W. S. Fielding, for fifteen years Finance minister and identified with the public service of this country for so long, in order to remove from the hearts of those who suffered the bitterness which it is only natural they should feel against those who were in charge of affairs at that time. I appeal also on the ground of compassion, because I take it that relief was granted to the Home Bank depositors on two grounds; first the moral claim in equity—I am not sufficiently versed in the law to know exactly what that means, but I know what you are driving at anyway, that there was a moral responsibility resting on the government because of negligence or error of judgment upon the part of Sir Thomas White and the Treasury Board in connection with the Home Bank, and that I believe was the main ground for the relief that was granted—and secondly, the compassionate ground. That would apply also to the loss through the failure of any bank. It applies with particular force in this case because, I repeat, of all the banks that have failed in Canada since more than fifty years, the Farmers Bank is the only one where the depositors have received nothing whatever from the liquidator winding up its affairs.

I therefore move this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and beg most earnestly that the government will give it their very serious and favourable consideration. The amount involved is very small. Following the line adopted in the case of the Home Bank and the restrictions placed on the relief granted in that case, I venture to say, without being in a position to speak positively that the amount involved would perhaps be not more than $300,000. I have placed this matter before the government and before parliament because I felt it my duty to do so. There were a number of losers in my county, where the loss amounted to about $125,000. That is sufficient warrant for me, as the representative of that constituency, in appealing for the favourable consideration of this resolution by parliament.

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, O.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), not that I think the principle is a sound one, but on the ground that we should hand out even justice to all. This House has granted relief to the depositors of the Home Bank, and that relief was granted on two grounds: first, to ameliorate the hardship which had been created by the failure of that bank, and secondly, on the ground that had the government acted earlier when rumblings were heard as to the unsatisfactory condition of the bank the loss to the depositors would not have been so great. Parliament, after due consideration, of both grounds, granted relief, and it was a godsend to many people in this country who had lost their all in the wreck and were at an age when their earning power was gone. If we were justified in 1925 in giving consideration to the depositors of the Home Bank, are we not justified in giving consideration to the depositors of another bank if similar conditions exist? In this case we claim that similar conditions do exist, on both grounds, on the compassionate ground, and on the ground of a moral claim for relief. If we treat one set of persons in Canada in a given way so far as the public treasury is concerned, are we not bound to treat another set of persons in identically the same way when conditions are the same?

Let us look for a few moments at the conditions surrounding the failure of the Farmers Bank. It suspended payment on the 19th day of December, 1910, with savings deposits amounting to $989,300. The bank was incorporated in 1904 by 4 Edward VII, Chapter 77, with a share capital of $1,000,000. Under section 16 of the Bank Act, unless it received its certificate to do business within one year, all its rights lapsed. The time for obtaining this certificate was extended in 1905, and again in 1906.

To obtain its certificate the bank must have $500,000 subscribed capital, of which $250,000 is paid up. This bank had great difficulty both in getting subscriptions and in getting payment for the part that was subscribed. Instead of collecting the $250,000 in cash, as it should have done under the provisions of the Bank Act, notes were taken from subscribers, and upon these notes moneys were raised to make the necessary deposit with the Dominion treasury. It was on the granting of that certificate allowing the bank to commence business that the obligation of the government rests.

A royal commission was appointed in 1913 to investigate the facts in connection with the organization and failure of the Farmers Bank. Sir William Ralph Meredith was appointed a commissioner and the commission directed him to investigate all material facts relevant to:

(a) The incorporation by act of parliament and the organization thereof.

(b) The application for and the giving by the Treasury Board of the certificate permitting the bank to issue notes and to commence the business of banking.

(c) The conduct and operation of the business of the bank, the amount of capital subcribed and paid up, the causes of suspension and failure, the extent of the liabilities and the value of the assets.

A deposit was made with the government on 23rd October, 1906, of $250,000. A meeting of the board of directors of the bank was held on the 22nd November, 1906, to pass resolutions authorizing them to apply for a certificate to commence business. The application was made on the next day to the Treasury Board. The Treasury Board met on the 30th November, 1906, and the certificate was authorized and issued the next day. The bank opened for business on 2nd January, 1907, and suspended payment on 19th December, 1910. The prospectus which was issued and filed in March, 1906, contained the names of various persons whom the promoters considered would act as directors if elected. Four of these men gave evidence before the royal commission and stated that no such consent had ever been given by them. The applications for stock provided for the payment of $10 down, $20 on allotment, and the remainder in seven monthly payments of $10 each. In a number of cases promissory notes were given payable twelve months after date to the Farmers Bank. In many cases no payments were made with the application or upon allotment. Chief Justice Meredith, at page 6 of his report, says:

> It is not open to question that $500,000 of the capital stock had not then been subscribed, and that $250,000 had not been paid by the subscribers.

On the 9th day of October, 1906, Travers borrowed from the Trusts and Guarantee Company $80,000, repayable in a month, on the security of promissory notes of subscribers amounting in the aggregate to $100,000, upon which he agreed to pay interest at the rate of ten per cent and a bonus of $1,000. On the 23rd October, 1906, he borrowed from the same company a further $20,000, repayable on demand, on the security of promissory notes of subscribers, amounting in the aggregate to $26,500, agreeing to pay a bonus of $500.

Chief Justice Meredith further says that in dealing with these notes the provisional directors and Travers were guilty of a breach of trust for the manner in which the money was borrowed and applied and that there was neither justification nor excuse for it. At page 8, he says:

> My conclusion on this branch of the inquiry is that the Treasury Board was induced to give its certificate by false and fraudulent representations on the part of Travers, and that if the facts I have mentioned as to the way in which the $250,000 was made up had been disclosed, the certificate of the Treasury Board would not have been given.

He further states that if the information which was given to the minister verbally by Sir Edmund Osler and Mr. David Henderson, to the effect that the money had been borrowed and had not been paid by subscribers had been disclosed to the Treasury Board, in his opinion the certificate would never have been granted.

Sir Edmund Osler was examined before the commission and I read the following from his evidence:

> Q. What was your interview with him, what occurred during that interview?—A. I told Mr. Fielding that I had knowledge that the money that was deposited there was practically obtained by false pretences, that it was not bona fide money obtained by stock subscripions.

Similar evidence was given by Mr. David Henderson, and by the letter which was read by my hon. friend from Frontenac, written by Leighton McCarthy, setting forth the full facts, a few days before the deposit was made. If the further information as given by Mr. McCarthy, who was acting in the matter for certain disgruntled shareholders, or those who had given subscriptions, had been acted upon then the certificate would never have been granted. Chief Justice Meredith finds that the officials of the Department of Finance appear to have treated Mr. McCarthy's letter as if it had never existed. He further states:

> It is true that, as Mr. Fielding stated in evidence, Travers, so far as he knew, was a reputable banker, but that was not in my opinion a sufficient reason for not having instituted an inquiry as to the matters which had been called to his attention. Such an inquiry could easily have been made, and the delay occasioned by it would have been inconsiderable, and such an inquiry would, undoubtedly, have resulted in the discovery of the manner in which the $100,000 had been raised and in the refusal of the Treasury Board to give the certificate.

It would appear therefore that if the certificate had never been granted the depositors would not have lost their money, because the bank could never have started operations without a certificate.

The above facts have been substantiated by the sworn testimony taken before the commission. This House of Commons granted a measure of relief, but the bill was defeated in the Senate. If you consider the other phase of the matter, with reference to compassionate allowance, it may be said that this matter is now some sixteen years old and that it is too late to grant relief on that ground. But is that a sufficient answer to the claim? If there are a number of people in this country who lost their all in the wreck of the Farmers Bank who since that time have been reduced to a state of penury, and are still living in that condition, then is it too late for this parliament to grant relief? I say not. We are asking for just the same consideration for the depositors in the Farmers Bank as was meted out to the depositors in the Home Bank. I know a man some sixty-eight or sixty-nine years of age who owned his home, and who sold out a little business two days before the suspension of the Farmers Bank. He deposited all his money in the Farmers Bank, and when the bank failed he had not a dollar left. His money was gone and his earning power was gone. Since that time he has tried to support himself by such little jobs as he could get, and his family are now taking care of him. Surely that case is worthy of consideration. I ask that relief be granted to those who are in straitened circumstances, to those deserving cases. If we take thirty-five per cent of the total savings on deposit, $989,300, it will amount to $346,255. There are no doubt a great number in that class, who would not and could not make the application on the lines laid down by the legislation in regard to the Home Bank. The result would be that only a small sum would be required to take care of the needy cases and those in straitened circumstances.

The Farmers Bank was conceived in iniquity and born in sin and its very name appealed to citizens of limited means. The business man, the manufacturer, the professional man, had his bank arrangements made; the people who did patronize the bank were those of limited means and they should be given some consideration.

To commence with, a mistake was made in the granting of the certificate. That may be safely assumed without casting any aspersions on the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding. He was a very excellent minister of the crown and is greatly respected throughout the whole Dominion. But with the great pressure of business surrounding him he could easily make that mistake. The evidence does show that a mistake was made in the granting of the certificate, or at least that it was granted without sufficient investigation.

Now, it is never too late to right a wrong, and we are asking only for the same measure of relief in this case as was meted out to the depositors of the Home Bank. Therefore I strongly support the resolution of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, as the facts in connection with the failure of the Farmers Bank have been placed before this House so well by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and as I drew them to the attention of the House in 1924, and as they were also presented to the House in 1925, I do not think it is incumbent upon me now to reiterate those facts. But I have them under my hand, and they are available to any member who will take the trouble to consult the report made by the commissioner, the late Sir William Meredith, who investigated the failure of the bank.

In my county of Halton a large number of depositors lost about a quarter of a million dollars by the failure of the Farmers Bank, and a good many shareholders also lost their investment and had to pay double liability. It was principally the men from that county who took action against Travers and the directors of the bank, charging them with fraud and misrepresentation in securing the bank's charter. I knew most of them personally. Persons subscribed for shares, although they could not pay for a single share, and they never did pay for the shares allotted to them. Those who took action against Travers and the directors engaged Mr. Leighton McCarthy to conduct their case, and the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding was notified of the fact. The facts adduced before the commissioner, the late Sir William Meredith, who was appointed to investigate the failure, proved absolutely that the government, through the Treasury Board, had notice of misrepresentation and perjury in connection with the application for a certificate, and it was acknowledged by that board. The Treasury Board is part of the government itself. The Minister of Finance for the time being is the chairman of the board, and consequently the representations made to it were made to the government itself. Therefore the government, through the Treasury Board, was responsible to the public in seeing that their interests were guarded in granting the promoters of the bank a certificate to carry on operations. It follows that the failure of the Treasury Board—the government—in this respect was negligence of the first degree.

As the charter was obtained by misrepresentation and fraud, it is not surprising that utter recklessness characterized the management of the bank. We know that dividends were paid out of capital. The directors were farmers, the majority of them from my own county—sound business men and successful farmers, but absolutely ignorant of banking, and they had to depend entirely on the advice of the general manager, Travers, who was proven to have perjured himself before the Treasury Board in securing the necessary certificate. The Treasury Board, having been warned of the misrepresentation and fraud practised by Travers, should have refused to grant the certificate.

In 1925 when the grant for a compassionate allowance to the depositors of the Home Bank was passed in this House Mr. Kennedy, the then member for Glengarry and Stormont, moved an amendment for the purpse of granting to the depositors of the Farmers Bank a similar measure of relief. The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) also moved an amendment requesting similar consideration for the depositors of La Banque du Peuple, La Banque Ville-Marie and La Banque de Saint-Jean. These two amendments, however, were voted down by a large majority. I voted against the resolution to grant relief to the depositors of the Home Bank because of the fact that the government had refused to consider the case of the unfortunate depositors in the defunct Farmers Bank.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this democratic country all the people are supposed to be equal and the humblest subject is at liberty to seek redress at the foot of the throne. Well, parliament is the highest court in the land, and on the occasion to which I refer, had the case of the depositors in these two defunct banks been presented by a couple of members, I am satisfied that the government would not have said to one: "We will give you a certain measure of compassionate relief"; and to the other, "We will not grant you any compassionate relief at all." When members representing the interests of a large number of people come before parliament and present two cases which in every respect are of equal merit, those two cases should receive the same equitable treatment from the government. But the case of the Farmers Bank depositors is eminently stronger than that of the Home Bank depositors. It has been proven to the hilt that if by reason of negligence the government, through the Treasury Board, were responsible to the depositors of the Home Bank, they are in still greater measure responsible to the depositors of the Farmers Bank. On that ground I submit that the government should accept this resolution and give a like measure of relief to the depositors of the Farmers Bank.

There is one other matter that I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Although it is seventeen years since the failure of the Farmers Bank, it is not yet wound up. At least in 1924 no return had been received by the Finance department from the liquidator with regard to the position of the liquidation proceedings, nor had any shareholder or depositor of the bank been notified. On two occasions I wrote the liquidator, but, receiving no answer, I took the matter up with the Minister of Finance, from whom I learned that there is still in the hands of the liquidator about $16,000 which has not been distributed. I would ask the Minister of Finance to look into the matter and request the liquidator, Mr. E. R. C. Clarkson, to have a final accounting made of the affairs of the Farmers Bank.

I support the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). It is one which I think should receive the very sympathetic consideration of the government. We have established the precedent that the depositors of a bank that has failed because of negligence on the part of the Treasury Board shall receive a compassionate allowance or, as the resolution puts it, that their claim in equity shall be accepted and considered by the government. The government has now an opportunity of doing what is nothing but justice to the depositors of the defunct Farmers Bank. Although some of them are in their graves they have left dependents who should receive consideration. I know that many of these people were hard hit by the failure of that bank. There was considerable suffering in consequence and I know that in one case at least the man who lost his money lost his reason. I also know that members of the directorate of the Farmers Bank were stripped of every dollar they owned. Men advanced in years have been compelled to work for their daily bread because of the total loss of their funds in the destruction of that bank. These particular depositors would not come in for consideration under this resolution. Having large sums invested in the bank in the way of stock, their double liability consumed the remainder of their capital; and their deposits would be too large to come under such legislation as was passed in this House in connection with the Home Bank failure. I again ask the Minister of Finance to take the matter into serious consideration.

[Mr. R. K. Anderson.]

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I desire in the first place to congratulate the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) on the very able, concise, fair and complete manner in which he has presented the case to this the highest court in Canada. He has done it in a manner worthy of any advocate, although he is not a member of the legal profession. Starting at the beginning he has given only facts established by courts through investigation and set forth in the records, and I am sure that all who have heard his address must admit its convincing character and the strength of the case he has made out. So complete has been his review of the situation that little can be added, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to repeat anything he has said.

It is perfectly clear that the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board are charged with a peculiar duty in connection with the incorporation of a bank, and we must, I think, come to the conclusion, on the undisputed facts as they have been disclosed by investigation, that in relation to the Farmers Bank that measure of care was not taken which the circumstances required, which the warnings that were given to the Minister of Finance demanded, and which it was undoubtedly his duty to exercise. This bank was certainly not regularly incorporated; it never had a real legal existence; and the irregularity of its existence was brought at a very early date to the attention of the Minister of Finance. But, strange to say, there was no investigation at that time, either by the minister or by any official of his department. An investigation would undoubtedly have disclosed that these warnings were substantially true and should have led to such action as would have prevented loss on the part of the depositors. The matter has slept during all these years and is now revived because of the action of the government in connection with the Home Bank; and every fact that can be relied on and cited as a justification for the action of this parliament in relation to the Home Bank exists in this case and applies perhaps with greater force to the Farmers Bank.

It is said that this claim is a moral one. I do not know of any higher claim than one based on moral grounds. Again, the claim is based on the ground of hardship, and undoubtedly the failure of a bank brings hardship to its depositors. Certainly in this case hardship resulted to a class of depositors who could ill afford to lose their money. The amendment introduced in committee in connection with the Home Bank proposal did not submit to the House, in as full and complete a manner as we have heard unfolded to-day, the situation to be remedied. In fact, the case was not then well made out. To-day, however, after listening to the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington I am sure we must all be convinced that he has presented a stronger case for the relief of the depositors of the Farmers Bank than was made out for the relief of the Home Bank depositors. I hope that this matter will reach a division, if that is necessary, although I should hope that the Minister of Finance would admit the logic of the case and announce on behalf of the government its readiness to grant the same measure of relief to the Farmers Bank depositors as was extended to those of the Home Bank. I am anxious that the question should be disposed of before six o'clock, and for that reason I shall not further take up the time of the House. I shall support the resolution, confident that a stronger case has been made out for these depositors than was submitted in the case of the Home Bank.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) who introduced the resolution asked us to consider it fairly and squarely. I think we are all disposed in this House to face issues fairly and squarely, but listening to the hon. gentleman's speech I felt—perhaps it was unintentional on his part, and perhaps I was somewhat sensitive in the matter—that he was not altogether fair to my predecessor, who, as everyone knows has been ill at home in bed for a long time. He is not here to defend himself, and I did think that my hon. friend was going a little too far in his attack on the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding when he tried to prove to a House composed of members who know very little of this old Farmers Bank question—because it is an old question—negligence on the part of the Minister of Finance of that day. I submit to my hon. friend that a fair reading of the records will go to show that whoever was to blame for the issuing of the charter to the Farmers Bank, it was not the former Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding. Why do I say this? Because the records show that on many occasions Mr. Fielding had absolutely refused to give a charter to this bank. Finally the matter was brought before the banking and commerce committee, and notwithstanding the objections of the then Finance minister, Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, the committee decided that there should be an extension of time in connection with the charter of the Farmers Bank. Mr. Fielding pointed out, and very properly so, that he objected, first to this company going on and doing business because he thought the name was intended to mislead people. He objected in the second place to renewing the charter because during the period the company had held it they had never been able to come up to the necessary requirements. This I propose to prove conclusively to the House a little later. Now a gentleman who was appointed by the government of Sir Robert Borden, a gentleman who for many years was the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, a gentleman who was recognized as one of the leading jurists of that province, after going very carefully into the questions connected with the failure of the Farmers Bank and very carefully looking up the record. said in the report which I have here under my hand that the Treasury Board did all they could do and were in no way responsible for the failure of the Home Bank, nor for giving it a charter.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Is it usual to submit the application for a certificate to the banking and commerce committee, and does that relieve the Treasury Board of responsibility?

Mr. ROBB: I am emphasizing this point because we are dealing with a familiar story. Sometimes we are told that ministers are a bit aggressive and that they are not quite fair. Sometimes people come before the banking and commerce committee and attempt to overrule the judgment of the Minister of Finance who has all the facts before him and the records go to show that in this case the banking and commerce committee, composed of the representatives of different parties, overruled the Minister of Finance.

Now I said a moment ago that I proposed to submit to the House conclusive evidence from Sir William Meredith, and hon. gentlemen can find in sessional paper 153A, the report of this gentleman who was appointed to investigate the affairs of the Farmers Bank. I agree with my hon. friend who moved this resolution, and with the other speakers, that Travers, who was at the head of the bank, was incompetent and dishonest. The records go to show that that statement is correct. But when my hon. friends say there was negligence on the part of the Treasury Board and on the part of the Minister of Finance of that day, the report of Sir William Meredith, appointed by the government they themselves supported, is against any such contention. At page 10 of that report Sir William Meredith says:

> I am unable to find that in this there was any neglect of duty on the part of the department, or to see that anything more than was done could have been done.

That is not the statement of a partisan; that is the statement of an independent commissioner, Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of the province of Ontario, who was appointed to investigate this matter.

Now what is the history of this Farmers Bank?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Will my hon. friend permit me? What has he to say regarding the quotation I gave from Sir William Meredith's report that it was incumbent upon the Treasury Board to investigate these facts before issuing a certificate?

Mr. ROBB: Well, I have quoted from the report, and I wish to emphasize the point I am now dealing with in answer to my hon. friend's repeated statements this afternoon, that Mr. Fielding and the Treasury Board were to blame. Against that assertion there is the report of this independent commissioner.

Now what is the story with respect to the Farmers Bank? Its recital may take a little time, but for the information of hon. members who were not in the House then—and there are probably many who have quite forgotten the occurrence—I propose to put on record a statement of the events leading up to the organization of the Farmers Bank. Right here may I say that it was only this afternoon, listening to hon. gentlemen who were presenting the case, that I realized that one-fourth of the total loss in deposits occurred in one county alone. The Farmers Bank was incorporated by act of parliament in 1904. In 1905 its charter was extended by parliament up to the end of a period of two years from July 18, 1904. In 1906 the charter was further extended by parliament for six months from July 18. The certificate of the Treasury Board permitting the bank to issue notes and commence business was issued on November 30, 1906.

The Farmers Bank suspended payment on December 19, 1910. In answer to my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Anderson) may I say that E. R. C. Clarkson & Sons were appointed liquidators, and their statement goes to show the state of affairs of the bank as at December 19, 1910. At that time the assets were $2,000,-250.05, the liabilities, $2,436,261.98, and the nominal deficiency $436,011.93. From a statement received from the liquidator showing receipts and disbursements for the period between December 10, 1910, and October 31, 1926, the following appears:

Receipts..	$1,372,829 22
Disbursements..	1,360,918 48
Balance..	$ 11,910 74

In addition to this balance there are assets consisting of $2,117 in the circulation fund and a property under option for $15,000 as to which there is uncertainty that the option will be taken up. The statement issued showed there would be no dividend to general creditors. My hon. friend from Halton says that although it is seventeen years since this bank failed there has been no accounting. I have a memorandum here which shows that on December 20 last, the liquidator, G. T. Clarkson, received his discharge from the Supreme Court of Ontario, all assets of the Farmers Bank having been realized upon and accounted for. So I imagine the matter has been cleaned up. If there was any other information in the department I should be very glad to give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I have a report which shows that in 1924 the balance was $15,951.37. If any statement made since then is in the possession of the minister I should be pleased to have a copy.

Mr. ROBB: I have no statement under my hand, but I imagine there must be such a statement because of the discharge of Mr. Clarkson with the announcement that all assets of the Farmers Bank have been realized upon and accounted for.

In addition to what I have already stated I may say that in 1911, on motion for committee of ways and means, Mr. Henderson, who was then member for Halton, moved in amendment:

> That a royal commission should be appointed to investigate the incorporation and organization of the bank, the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board, and generally to investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act.

That amendment was negatived. The trend of the argument was that the Treasury Board should not have issued the certificate, for the reason that the then Minister of Finance had been warned that subscribers were not paying cash, but giving notes in respect of their subscriptions. It was further stated that after the certificate had been issued, the department was warned by the manager of one of the branches of the bank that notes which had been given in reference to subscriptions for shares were being discounted at the various branches of the bank and the proceeds credited to head office.

Mr. Fielding, in speaking to the amendment on the 15th March, 1911, maintained that the time to have stopped proceedings was when the application for the charter was up before the banking and commerce committee. The bank was incorporated in 1904 and received extensions of its charter in 1905 and 1906, notwithstanding the objections of Mr. Fielding. In the latter year Mr. Fielding had opposed the granting of the charter, but the banking and commerce committee permitted a six months' extension, to which Mr. Fielding said that he had probably assented. Certainly if the banking and commerce committee were unanimous Mr. Fielding was not going to resist it, particularly as it was then represented that the committee were probably influenced by the argument that the country needed more banking capital; that there was a feeling in the country that the old banks had a monopoly of the business, and that if parliament opposed "the efforts of the farmers to have a share of the banking business of the country, you will be met by the cry that parliament is giving the old banks a monopoly." Mr. Fielding took the position, therefore, that:

> Parliament is responsible for the granting of the charter and I do not think that any reasonable ground of objection can be taken to the incorporation of the new bank in face of the fact that the incorporation of new banks is still regarded as generally desirable.

That was the position taken by Mr. Fielding at that time and I do not think that can be disputed. Mr. Fielding was in the House at the time and had access to the records.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the minister take the same attitude towards issuing the certificate as he is taking towards issuing the charter?

Mr. ROBB: At present I am defending the position which Mr. Fielding took. Mr. David Henderson, who was then the member for Halton and also chief Conservative whip, was a very estimable gentleman. I was in the House with him. It is no wonder that Mr. Henderson was then doing all he could for the depositors in his constituency, because we have the statement to-day from the present member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) that the deposits in the county of Halton amounted to about $250,000. Mr. Henderson then made the statement that he had warned the minister against issuing the certificate. Mr. Fielding took issue with Mr. Henderson on this, stating that he had searched the file and that no such warning appeared in the record. It was emphasized this afternoon that Mr. Leighton McCarthy had warned the minister that there were irregularities and that a certificate should not be granted to the bank. It is true that Mr. Leighton McCarthy did at one time advise the minister to go carefully; but the records show that Mr. Leighton McCarthy had communicated with the department on behalf of his clients, objecting to the issue of a certificate on the ground that notes had been given in respect of subscriptions. Mr. McCarthy's letters were dated October 18 and 19, and on the second of November Mr. McCarthy withdrew his objection.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why?

Mr. ROBB: I have not got the letter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman will pardon me. He could easily find out. Mr. McCarthy was acting as a lawyer on behalf of certain clients who, because of fraud, were asking to be relieved from their signatures as subscribers. Once he had got his clients relieved, his duty as a lawyer ended. He said: Yes, I do not object now, on behalf of my clients, to your issuing the certificate. I was objecting to it before.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): He never withdrew his charge of fraud.

Mr. ROBB: That goes to confirm that the minister was right in refusing to issue a certificate to this concern. A royal commission was issued on the 12th January, 1912, to the Honourable Mr. Justice Sir William R. Meredith. The commissioner states that in the method in which they dealt with the notes given in respect of subscriptions, the provisional directors and Mr. Travers were "guilty of a breach of trust," and that for the manner in which the money borrowed was applied there was neither justification nor excuse. He referred to the letter of assurance from Mr. Travers to the minister, stating that these statements were in fact untrue, and the language used in his letter to the minister was deliberately chosen by Mr. Travers in order to make it appear that he was giving the assurance for which the minister had asked, while he was in fact not doing so and could not truthfully do so. In the report which I have under my hand from the commissioner—and I repeat it—the commissioner states as to the issue of the certificate, as follows:

> My conclusion on this branch of the inquiry is that the Treasury Board was induced to give its certificate by false and fraudulent representations on the part of Travers, and that if the facts I have mentioned as to the way in which the $250,000 was made up had been disclosed, the certificate of the Treasury Board would not have been given.

The commissioner refers to verbal information given to the minister by Mr. Henderson and Sir Edmund Osler, and a letter from Mr. McCarthy, and he adds:

> I do not suggest that the minister would have been justified because of the information conveyed to him in recommending that the certificate should not be granted, or that the Treasury Board because of it would not have been justified in refusing to grant it.

The commissioner refers to the letter from the manager of the bank at Milton to the Deputy Minister of Finance informing him that promissory notes given in payment for shares were being discounted at the bank's branches and the proceeds credited to the head office. The department called for a special return in that regard. The commissioner was unable to find that in this there was any neglect of duty on the part of the department, or that anything more than was done could have been done.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is in regard to Vankoughnet's letter.

Mr. ROBB: I am quoting from the commissioner's report.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): In a previous paragraph it is shown that the commissioner has reference there only to Vankoughnet's letter. My hon. friend is rather leaving the impression that that applies before the certificate was issued. If he had continued his quotation of a minute ago, another paragraph would have shown differently.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister is evidently reading from a carefully prepared brief. He is reading only one-half of the commissioner's report. Equally opposite opinions can be given from the other half.

Mr. ROBB: I am presenting my case. The hon. gentleman who was presenting his case this afternoon did so without any interruption. The commissioner adds:

> Notwithstanding irregularities on the part of Travers and his misconduct in connection with the application for the certificate which I have mentioned, the evidence satisfies me that if the bank had been prudently and honestly managed there is no reason why it should not have succeeded.

Perhaps this is what the hon. gentleman wishes:

> The promissory notes that had been given by subscribers were for the most part good and were subsequently paid, and while it is true that if the certificate of the Treasury Board had not been granted the money of the shareholders and depositors would not have been lost, the efficient cause of that loss was the recklessness and fraud of those entrusted with the management of the bank, and not the granting of the certificate.

That is the statement of the commissioner who was appointed, and I repeat, notwithstanding the arguments of my hon. friend this afternoon, that the report of the commissioner who was appointed to investigate this matter, states that the treasury department could not have done any more than they did do.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): If the same arguments are applied in the case of the Home Bank—that is, if the management had been honest—the Home Bank would not have failed.

Mr. ROBB: I never argued that the management of the Home Bank was everything that was desirable.

My hon. friend complains that the measure of relief which Sir Thomas White introduced into the House in 1914 for the depositors of the Farmers Bank was rejected by the Senate. That is not a new thing for the Senate to do. It amended very considerably the measure of relief we sent over to it in connection with the Home Bank, and I suppose the Senate was simply exercising its right in the case of the Farmers Bank after it had fully examined all the records.

I have just one other word to add. My hon. friend, it seemed to me, this afternoon was going just a little far in attempting to give to his constituents the idea—perhaps it was good politics—that it was the Liberal party, the Liberal government and its Liberal predecessors, who were responsible for not having granted relief to the depositors of the Farmers Bank. As I say, in 1914 Sir Thomas White brought in a measure of relief for the depositors of the Farmers Bank, and that measure was defeated in the Senate. My hon. friend, if not directly, by implication indicated that it was defeated because the majority of the Senate at that time were not favourable to the government of the day. But thirteen years have passed since then, during seven years of which the government of which my hon. friend was a supporter, and later on a member, had a majority in both Houses, but during all those years they did not bring in a measure of relief for the depositors of the Farmers Bank. Why? Because that measure had been disposed of in 1914. To-day my hon. friend argues that we should come to the relief of the depositors of the Farmers Bank because we gave certain relief to the depositors of the Home Bank. It is true that we did give a measure of relief to the depositors of the Home Bank, but it was very strongly represented to us, and all the records of the department indicated, that there was some foundation for a claim in that case, because Sir Thomas White appeared before Mr. Justice McKeown, who was investigating the failure of the Home Bank, and gave evidence that under no circumstances would he have allowed any bank to close its doors during the period of the war, because the closing of one bank might have toppled over some of the others. That was the statement of the then Minister of Finance, and it was upon that statement that the representatives of the depositors of the Home Bank came to the government and said: "You have a moral responsibility. Had the Finance minister of the day closed the Home Bank in 1916, we who put in our deposits later would not have suffered." It was pretty hard to answer that argument, and it was upon that ground that relief was given.

I submit to my hon. friend who has presented this resolution, and to the House, that if we are going to reopen this question which has already been decided by parliament in 1914, and again decided in 1924 when an amendment to aid the Farmers Bank depositors was defeated in the banking and commerce committee—twice we have considered this matter, and twice parliament has decided that the depositors of the Farmers Bank are not entitled to any measure of relief—we should not only be reopening the case of the Farmers Bank, but we would have to go all the way back to the first days of confederation and examine the records of all the banks that have been mismanaged during that period.

I submit to the hon. gentleman and to the House that there is involved not a decrease of taxation, as was asked for recently in an amendment proposed from the other side and in an amendment proposed from the other corner, but rather an increase of taxation if we are going to introduce this principle.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I purpose taking up the time of the House for only a moment. The Finance minister (Mr. Robb) as usual has skated very skilfully around the subject matter of this resolution, and eventually he threw out the threat that the House must vote against this resolution because it would mean an increase of taxation. I think it would have been much fairer if the minister had chosen to meet the arguments of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington and discussed this question on its merits.

Let me say at once that I am not discussing the principle of recouping the depositors of any bank. The fact of the matter is that this parliament has established a precedent in connection with the Home Bank, and I think any one who followed closely the argument of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington must have come to the conclusion that the depositors of the Farmers Bank have a much stronger case than the depositors of the Home Bank ever had.

The Minister of Finance has confined his argument largely to the fact, as he says, that the Finance minister at that time had no warning of the condition of the Farmers Bank. He has quoted at considerable length from the report of Sir William Meredith, but he did not read it all, and for that reason I shall quote a few extracts. At page 8 of Sessional Papers, Volume 27, 1913, Sir William Meredith says:

> My conclusion on this branch of the inquiry is that the Treasury Board was induced to give its certificate by false and fraudulent representations on the part of Travers.

Further on he says:

> It is plain from the letter of the Finance minister to Travers, of 30th November, 1906, that the minister understood that section 13 of the Bank Act would not have been complied with if the $250,000 was made up wholly or in part of money raised on promissory notes given by subscribers for shares to the provisional directors and that he would have felt it his duty to recommend that the certificate should not be granted if he had known that part of the money had been raised in that way.

That is one point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance. Further on the commissioner says:

> That that information had been given to the minister before the certificate was issued appears from the testimony of Sir Edmund Osler and Mr. David Henderson and is shown by the letter of the 19th October, 1906, of Mr. Leighton McCarthy to the minister, which appears in Exhibit 5, pp. 2, 3. In that letter Mr. McCarthy states as follows:

"I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds and that a deposit either has been or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes or sufficient amount to make up $250,000."

He says further:

That the verbal information I have mentioned was conveyed to Mr. Fielding was not denied.

He continues:

The officials of the Department of Finance appear to have treated Mr. McCarthy's letter as if it had never existed, and, in my opinion, in that they erred.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that proves that the Minister of Finance had been warned. He knew perfectly well that the Bank Act was not being complied with, and sufficient evidence had been brought to his attention to justify his investigating the affairs of the bank.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House further because the ground has been thoroughly covered by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and I am hoping that a vote will be reached before six o'clock.

I just wished to point out that the minister, in quoting from the report of Sir William Meredith, quoted only that part that suited his case.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Edwards) which was negatived on the following division:

PAIRS

Mr. MALONEY: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Guerin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. FAFARD: I was paired with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was paired with the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. DUBUC: I was paired with the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. MacNUTT: I was paired with the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. GERSHAW: I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. White). I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I was paired with the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. MARCIL: I was informed by the whip, Mr. Speaker, that all pairs had been declared off. I was paired with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), but in view of that declaration I voted.

Mr. VENIOT: I am in the same position.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 24, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 214, to incorporate Guardian Trust Company.—Mr. Kay.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PORTSMOUTH PENITENTIARY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government order an investigation or enquiry into a riot or mutiny of inmates of Portsmouth penitentiary on Saturday, January 22 last, as reported in the press?
2. What were the causes thereof?
3. How many inmates were involved, how many were penalized, and how?
4. Under whose instructions were these penalties imposed, if any, and under what statute?
5. Is it the custom for assize grand juries to visit these institutions, and if not, why?
6. Are these institutions inspected, and by whom?
7. Who are the inspectors, what are their duties, what are their qualifications, and what salaries are paid them?
8. Are inmates classified and how?
9. What special classification is there for first offenders?
10. Are the terms of motion of last session adopted by this House to grant pay to dependent relatives being carried out, and, if so, how?
11. Is the government considering a complete reorganization of the whole staff of the aforesaid institution?
12. Will the whole question of prison reform be referred to a commission to investigate and report on in the next recess of parliament, or is it under consideration?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The matter has already been fully reported on and the staff of the Kingston penitentiary congratulated by me for the way in which they handled the situation.

2. Insubordination on the part of inmates working in one of the shops.

3. (a) 114 were more or less involved. (b) and (c) This information is treated as strictly confidential and ought not to be furnished excepting upon an order of the House.

Some thirty inmates could have been sent out to court and given long terms of imprisonment for what they did, but in penitentiaries, the object is to deal as leniently with inmates as they themselves, by their conduct, will permit.

The warden of a penitentiary has not an enviable task; in fact his task is a most difficult one, and at times calls for very stern and drastic action in order that the place may be made safe for the great majority of fairly decent men who are sentenced to incarceration therein.

No brutality is permitted in Canadian penitentiaries.

The superintendent was at the penitentiary on January 18 last, and was in almost every portion of it and did not receive one complaint from any inmate regarding any subject.

4. By the authority of the warden under chapter 147, the Penitentiaries Act, also section 179 of the penitentiary regulations.

5. (a) No. (b) Grand juries are appointed by and acting for provincial governments. They have, therefore, no jurisdiction in Dominion government institutions.

6. (a) Yes. (b) by the superintendent and inspectors of penitentiaries, engineers of penitentiaries and auditor.

7. (a) Mr. Gilbert V. Smith, Mr. H. C. Fatt and Mr. E. R. Jackson. (b) To thoroughly inspect everything in connection with the administration of a penitentiary and report to the superintendent the result of such inspection. (c) Mr. G. V. Smith has over 30 years' experience in penitentiary work. He is well qualified for the position of inspector. Mr. H. C. Fatt is inspector and auditor. He has over 30 years' experience in penitentiaries and in the handling of the criminal. Mr. E. R. Jackson is industrial inspector, and has apart from his duties as inspector generally the inspection of the various industries. (d) Salaries of inspectors range from $2,820 to $3,300 per annum.

8. Inmates are classified in so far as is possible within the one and same institution.

9. First offenders are segregated in so far as possible in the trade shops where they are under close observation of an officer continually.

10. The means and methods of carrying out the recommendations of parliament are under consideration.

11. No.

12. No. The handling of the criminal is today recognized as a science and as experts from all countries openly state that the Canadian penitentiary system is in advance of that seen elsewhere it is respectfully submitted that no commission to investigate Canadian penitentiaries is either desirable or necessary.

COLD LAKE GUARDIAN OF FISHERIES

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Did L. W. Shaw apply on the 13th of September, 1926, for the position of guardian of Fisheries for Cold Lake?

2. Being a family man and a member of the Canadian expeditionary force for nearly five years, for what reason was he refused the position?

3. Were there any other applications in before that made by L. W. Shaw? If so, how many and from whom?

4. Did L. W. Shaw send references supporting his application on 18th of October, 1926?

5. On what grounds was Mr. Turcotte of St. Paul de Metis appointed to the position of guardian of fisheries in preference to L. W. Shaw, when the former lives many miles away, while the latter lives at Cold Lake?

6. Is Mr. Turcotte a single man?

7. Did he serve in the Canadian expeditionary force?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. The appointment of Mr. Turcotte was considered advisable.

3. Yes. Two; Mr. Stanley McKenzie, dated September 1, and D. H. O'Meara, dated September 10.

4. Yes.

5. Answered by No. 2.

6. Yes.

7. No.

AUTHORITY OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES

Mr. NEILL:

1. Did the government receive from the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia a copy of a resolution unanimously passed by the Legislature of that province on December 17, 1924, the last paragraph of which read as follows,—

"Be it further resolved, That the government of the Dominion of Canada be respectfully requested to grant adherence on the part of Canada to no treaty or binding international obligation in any form whatsoever having the effect of limiting the authority or power of provincial legislatures in respect of the regulation of social and industrial activities within the provinces; and, further, that the government of the Dominion of Canada be respectfully requested to forthwith take the action necessary to bring about the denunciation of any and all treaties in so far as the terms and provisions of the same have the effect of depriving the Dominion of Canada of the power of regulation, control and prohibition of Asiatic immigration"?

2. Has the government taken any steps towards carrying out the desires of the British Columbia legislature as therein expressed?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. The representations of the legislature are receiving the careful consideration of the government.

CANADIAN INTERESTS IN CHINA

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What is the approximate number of Canadian nationals in China?

2. What is the approximate amount of Canadian investments in China?

3. Has the government considered the advisability of raising the status of the Canadian commissioner in China to that of consul?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No detailed census is taken in China, and no information is available as to the number of Canadian nationals. The Chinese maritimes customs estimates the number of British subjects in China at about 14,000.

2. No information.

3. The general question is receiving the consideration of the government.

LEEDS GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Have charges of political partisanship been made against any government employees in the county of Leeds, Ontario?

2. What is the name or names of the party or parties making such charges?

3. Have such charges been made in writing?

4. Has one Arthur G. Parish been appointed or authorized to investigate such charges?

5. Will the parties charged be allowed to have counsel on such investigation?

6. Will the commissioner take a shorthand record of the evidence and proceedings?

7. Is it the intention of the government to dismiss any employees who may be found by said commissioner to have been guilty of political partisanship?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET: Stands as order for return.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This seems to be a very simple question capable of a short and complete answer, and I see no reason why it should stand as an order for return.

Mr. RINFRET: The main reason is that inquiry must be made from all departments. I have no objection to allowing it to stand as a question, but it may take a little time to get the information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would rather have it stand as a question.

Mr. RINFRET: Stands.

Question stands.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY

Mr. KELLNER:

1. Has the Hudson's Bay Company obtained any crown lands in Canada since 1921?

2. If so, in what provinces, in what districts in each province, and what was the date of transfer?

3. By what authority were these lands transferred?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FREIGHT RATES TO BE CHARGED ON EASTERN LINES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,

1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the tariff of tolls to be charged on certain lines of railway now operated as a part of the Canadian National railways and situated within the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and the lines of railway similarly operated in the province of Quebec extending from the southern provincial boundary near Metapedia and near Courchesne to Diamond Junction and Levis.

2. That for accounting purposes the revenues and expenses of the said eastern lines shall be kept separately from all other accounts respecting the construction, operation or management of the Canadian National railways and in the event of any deficit occurring in any fiscal year in respect of the eastern lines, the amount of such deficit shall be included in a separate item in the estimates submitted to parliament for or on behalf of the Canadian National railways at the first session of parliament following the close of such fiscal year.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to incorporate the Halifax Harbour Commissioners, and to make provision for the improvement, management and regulation of the harbour of Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to incorporate the St. John Harbour Commissioners, and to make provision for the improvement, management and regulation of the harbour of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

COMPENSATION TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the act respecting compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffered injuries while performing their duties (1918, c. 15), to provide that compensation to employees in Prince Edward Island shall be the same as to employees in New Brunswick, and that any compensation awarded and any remuneration and expenses payable to any board, officer or other authority in this regard may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, to provide for a more adequate enforcement of the act; to prevent evasion of taxes; to impose additional penalties for neglecting to file returns and for default in payments or the destruction of records; and to make provision for the recovery of amounts due.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Fruit Act (1923, c. 15), to provide by regulation for the inspection of fruit intended for export, and the issuing of an export certificate or permit therefor, and for the fees for such inspection certificate or permit.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LIVE STOCK ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1923, and to make further provisions as to membership in live stock exchanges, the inclusion of co-operative associations, the rules, regulations and by-laws to be applicable to such exchanges, and penalties for violation of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BONUS TO COKING PLANTS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide encouragement for the production of a domestic fuel by heat treatment from coal mined in Canada, by means of cash payments made to those who produce such fuel in new plants from Canadian coal.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924, and to make such further provisions respecting allowances, benefits and contributions as may be deemed necessary for a better administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVANTS' WIDOWS' ANNUITIES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide annuities for the widows of certain civil servants.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canada Grain Act (1925, c. 33) in respect to the issue of warehouse receipts by a private terminal to the shipper or his consignee, and as to the contents of warehouse receipts issued by the person operating any country elevator.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the provisions of the Pension Act relating to the Federal Appeal Board, and to designate the number of members of which the board shall consist, the duration of their term of office, and their eligibility for reappointment.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' DAYS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, the 28th of March instant, and Wednesday, the 30th of March instant, and every Monday and Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for production of papers.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I would suggest that this motion stand in abeyance for some time at least, for various reasons. The Prime Minister and the House will remember, first, that the number of private members' days has been considerably curtailed because of the Christmas adjournment, and secondly, the time has been largely taken up by the discussion of the Georgian bay canal bill. I suggest to the minister that, for some time at least, private members be permitted to retain Monday, and I ask the Prime Minister to give this matter consideration before pressing the motion to a vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand my hon. friend is agreeable to having the motion carried so far as Wednesday is concerned, but would like to have the question in regard to Monday stand for the present?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to go contrary to the wishes of the House in the matter. I am quite willing to amend the motion to take Wednesday of next week as a government day; but I propose that on the Wednesdays following government motions shall have precedence, leaving over for further consideration the question as to reserving Monday for private members. I would therefore move:

That on Wednesday, the sixth of April next and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion as amended agreed to.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Is the right hon. the Prime Minister in a position to state approximately when the recent report of the Imperial conference will be submitted to the House for consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Tuesday, of next week, on the orders of the day, might be an appropriate time at which to take up the proceedings of the Imperial conference. As to procedure, the government has thought it would probably suit the convenience of the House if, on motion to go into supply, a statement were made with respect to the Imperial conference proceedings and hon. members could speak with reference thereto before the Speaker leaves the chair. Thereafter we would go into supply, on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, at which time incidental matters could be taken up more in detail. I think it would be advisable to adopt the procedure I have mentioned.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not the intention of the government to submit to the House a resolution approving of the terms of the Imperial conference report?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this respect the government intends to follow the example of the parliament at Westminster, an example which I think has been followed by the parliaments of the various dominions, including this country, on former occasions. There has not been, except with reference to a specific part of any report, any formal resolution in regard to the proceedings. The government therefore does not propose to bring in any formal resolution with regard to the proceedings as a whole. If any hon. member wishes to introduce a formal resolution either approving of or taking exception to any feature of the report of the conference he is of course, at liberty to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: Will that be on an amendment to the motion to go into supply?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An amendment can if desired be moved at that time; on the motion to go into supply an amendment can be made, as the hon. member knows. It is for each hon. member for himself to decide the time at which he shall bring in a motion and what form it shall take.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I think we have all understood that some form of ratification by this parliament was necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How will the Imperial authorities know whether we approve or disapprove of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just said the procedure in all the parliaments in the empire is identical on this respect. The government of Great Britain has not submitted to the British parliament a formal resolution with respect to the conference; neither have the governments of Australia, South Africa, New Zealand or any other country. With respect to the present report we do not propose to adopt a course of procedure different from that adopted by the other parts of the empire.

Mr. GUTHRIE: After the conference of 1923 we had resolutions on the order paper in respect to the treaty-making power, or the manner in which the treaty should be signed, the work of the conference, and we expressly ratified it in this House by resolution. What is to be the notice to the various overseas dominions that the parliament of Great Britain has accepted this proposal as binding? How are we to know when it comes into force unless some special action is taken by the parliament of Great Britain and by the parliaments of the overseas dominions? It is not in force now.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I point out to my hon. friend that in Great Britain they found it necessary to have legislation on one particular matter only, and that was with regard to changing the title of His Majesty the King. I understand a bill has been passed by the British House of Commons in regard to that. As regards other matters upon which legislation is not necessary nothing has been done. If any hon. member wishes to criticize he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Criticize what? There is nothing to criticize. There is no resolution before this parliament.

BRITISH COLUMBIA HALIBUT FISHERY

OBJECTION TO LICENSES FOR JAPANESE FISHERMEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): My attention was called the other day to an item appearing in a British Columbia paper regarding fears expressed by some people that large numbers of Japanese were going into halibut fishing. We have no definite information in regard to that.

In answer to a question asked by my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie), I may say that halibut fishing is carried on mostly beyond the territorial limits, and we have no real authority in regard to that. No licenses are issued for halibut fishing, and as the law stands to-day we have no authority to say who is and who is not entitled to engage in halibut fishing in that district.

WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

ORGANIZATION OF COMPANY TO PROVIDE STEAMSHIP SERVICE

The House resumed from March 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 142, respecting the Canadian National steamships, and to provide for the establishment of West Indies service.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this bill was practically completed in committee, and progress was reported in order that the government might give consideration to the inclusion of an amendment of a similar character to that which has been incorporated in the branch line bills. This amendment will result in adding a new section, No. 9. It reads as follows:

The company shall adopt the principle of competitive bids or tenders in respect of

(b) the sale or other disposition of the securities, but the company shall not, subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) of this act, be bound to accept either the highest or the lowest or any bid or tender made or obtained, nor be precluded from negotiating for better prices or terms.

Members of the railway committee will recall that with the exception that it applies to boats instead of lines of railway this is in the same form as the section adopted with respect to each of the branch line bills. The inclusion of this section will involve renumbering the other sections.

New section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILLS TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

ST. FELICIEN-MISTASSINI RIVER AND HERBERTVILLE-SAVANNE FALLS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 124, respecting the construction of Canadian National railway lines between St. Felicien and Mistassini river and between Herbertville and Savanne Falls, both in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The following has been substituted as new section 7:

The company shall adopt the principle of competitive bids or tenders in respect of—

(a) The construction of the said line of railway in so far as the company decides not to perform such work or any part thereof with its own forces;

(b) The sale or other disposition of the securities, but the company shall not, subject to the provisions of section 6 (d) of this act, be bound to accept either the highest or the lowest or any bid or tender made or obtained, nor be precluded from negotiating for better prices or terms.

New section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Old clause 7 becomes clause 8.

Section 8 agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GRAND'MERE AND EAST BURRILLS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 125 respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Grand'Mere and East Burrills in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I think it would facilitate your work on this and the other branch line bills if you would call sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and so on of each bill, which are identical. Then we could discuss the schedule, if anyone desires to do so, which of course is different in each bill.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: New clause 7 is the same as in the other branch line bill, No. 124.

New section agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, in regard to the schedule, I pointed out before the railway committee that the cost of this piece of construction is exceedingly heavy. It will be noted that this branch line of 7.9 miles in length is to cost $1,683,000, or $213,038 per mile. I am advised that the nature of the country is not such as to warrant this heavy expenditure. However, it was pointed out in the railway committee that this exceedingly high cost was largely due to certain very heavy fills and cuts. The objection I took there was that the improvement is of the nature of a final or permanent improvement to a railway which might be considered as of finished character and in first-class financial condition, and is not warranted in connection with a railway that essentially should be built as economically as possible. Therefore my position before the railway committee was that this expenditure is unjustifiable at this time, that the company might well expend the $1,600,000 on much more needed work elsewhere, and that this particular type of ultimate improvement could wait until the railway is in better financial condition. Furthermore, I would point out that if a three-mile section of the Canadian Pacific is used the balance of this branch line, namely, 4.8 miles, will cost $1,327,000 or about $270,000 per mile. Some of us who have followed railway construction bills through parliament for many years believe this to be the highest cost per mile proposed in any charter that has gone through this House. Personally I consider it an exorbitant charge and one which is unjustifiable under present conditions.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend expresses now the same views he gave in the committee. I can only put forward in answer to him the statement of the responsible officers of the road as to the immediate advantage to be gained by making this improvement, which will bring its own immediate justification. The hon. member takes the view that such an improvement as this cut-off would be justified only in connection with a road which is complete and in excellent financial condition. The officials of the railway, on the other hand, demonstrate that they can by means of this expenditure double their trainload behind the engine and thereby substantially reduce operating costs. They are satisfied, and they have demonstrated to my satisfaction, that this expenditure will immediately return more than 12 per cent upon the outlay in the way of reduced operating costs, and will increase the volume of business over the territory affected. That is my only justification for the proposed expenditure and my only answer to the criticism of the hon. gentleman. We regard this as an improvement of the kind that should constantly be made on the Canadian National lines—that is, an improvement in connection with which it can be demonstrated that the returns in reduced cost of operation will more than pay interest on the money spent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A good many members are not on the committee and would like some information as to why the cost of constructing this seven miles is so enormous. It has been stated that this projected work will cost more than any other seven miles of railway in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know that that is true.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been so stated. I should like the minister to gratify my curiosity by giving me some information explaining why the road should cost between two hundred and three hundred thousand dollars a mile to construct. The country is not difficult. The Canadian Pacific Railway has constructed a line through practically the same country and the cost of operation in this case is not anything like the amount proposed in this bill; it would not be more than a quarter of it. Again I would ask for an explanation of the expenditure of this enormous sum of money on so short a line of road.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot check the accuracy of my hon. friend's statement regarding the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway line in the territory. I trust he will supply me with precise information in that regard, if he has it, because it will be of assistance to me in judging whether or not the permanent officials of the Canadian National are correct in their presentation to me. With regard to the general question, the present grade on the main line is 1.5 per cent, and this work will reduce it to six-tenths of one per cent. The road was built in its present location because, as is often the case, it would have cost too much money at the time of its construction to produce a six-tenth grade. The hill, therefore, was climbed. The chief engineer of the Canadian National Railways informed the committee the other day that the cost of the work was almost altogether due to heavy cut and fill, with banks in the neighbourhood of fifty feet high on a portion of the construction. If my hon. friend's statement is correct, that the Canadian Pacific Railway have built through similar territory or through territory adjacent thereto at a quarter of the cost, I should certainly like to have the particulars and also the year in which construction took place.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister could get it if he applied to the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have given the information to others and would not hesitate to give it to the government.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that I should be at liberty to disclose the letter. I do not think they would object to giving the information.

Mr. BROWN: Is it not true that an explanation of the seemingly high cost per mile was the fact, as pointed out, that $185,000 was used in the raising of a bridge at the end of the line? This would reduce the seemingly high cost of $213,000 per mile to about $175,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There may be an explanation but I should like to know what it is.

Mr. KAISER: Has the minister taken steps to see whether running rights can be obtained over the Canadian Pacific line? The Canadian Pacific railway runs from Shawinigan Falls to Grand'Mere, and if running rights were secured over that line it would leave less than two miles of railway construction for the Canadian National. The duplicating of railway lines in this country is a matter of serious consequence to the people, particularly in Ontario. We realize there that the solution of our railway problem lies, not in the duplication of lines, but in coöperation between the existing railways.

Mr. DUNNING: Approaches have been made by the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific for running rights over three miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway line adjacent to this branch.

Section agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 56, to amend the Indian Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CANNON: The amendment introduced by the Senate is that the words "prima facie" shall be added before the word evidence in the third line of a clause. As the clause read, it might be interpreted as meaning that the evidence would be conclusive. With the words "prima facie" added, it means that the evidence may be rebutted.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 152, to amend the Canada Evidence Act as respects bank books and records.

Mr. SPENCER: May we have an explanation of this?

Mr. CANNON: This bill was before the House last year, and if I am not mistaken, it was adopted by the House. It had been previously passed by the Senate. It is based on the English law dealing with similar matters. Its object is to allow banks to produce in court certified copies of their books instead of having to produce the originals, as they do now. This is simply in order to facilitate the production of evidence. If the original has to be produced for some special reason, the bill provides that the judge may then give an order to that effect and the original will have to be produced. The only difference between the English law and this law as proposed is that our law applies only to criminal proceedings, because there only does our jurisdiction lie, while in England the same act covers both criminal and civil cases.

Mr. GARDINER: Have these copies to be certified?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $4,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners in an amount not exceeding $4,000,000 to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon the approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister give us a general statement with regard to this loan of $4,000,000?

Mr. CARDIN: The details are as follows:

Addition to No. 3 elevator including acquiring additional property necessary in order to complete new lease with United Grain Growers	$ 850,000 00
Water front development at D.L. 274 North Vancouver	500,000 00

Less amount provided for by loan and for which the approval of appropriations has not been given		1,883,410 95
Loan required to balance all accounts as above		4,000,000 00
		$5,883,410 95

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not taking any objection to the loan, but I should like to find out how the account stands at present as between the commission and the government. Are the interest payments kept up, and is the sinking fund maintained?

Mr. CARDIN: Oh yes. The harbour commission was very successful in its operations last year. The revenue for 1926 was $2,193,670.12, and the expenditure $1,193,007.77, leaving a balance of revenue over expenditure of $1,000,662.41. On account of bank interest there was paid $26,903.40 and for sinking fund $200,000.

There remains a balance in favour of the commission after all payments have been met of over $92,000; so that the year has been very successful and very profitable. To meet their obligations they have provided a sinking fund of a little over $800,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do you know the total obligation?

Mr. CARDIN: The total is $15,000,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No arrears?

Mr. CARDIN: No arrears.

Mr. KELLNER: Is part of this money to be expended to satisfy the legal claim of the Oriental Grain Company?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, the amount of $112,000. This claim has been submitted to the counsel of the harbour commission in Vancouver, and we have been advised by the Justice department that the commission should make a settlement of that claim.

Mr. KELLNER: The case has not actually been in court. Has it been settled out of court?

Mr. CARDIN: Not yet.

Mr. KELLNER: Do you intend to settle it out of court?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, we have been advised by the Justice department to do so.

Mr. KELLNER: I desire to make a remark with reference to that. In the first place the harbour commission purchased the old Woodward elevator for what is known as the Oriental Grain Company, and hon. members from Alberta will know who they are. We have the member for East Edmonton (Mr. Blatchford), president, and we have Frank Walker associated with him, Mr. Tobin who represented Wetaskiwin last year, and two or three others. They got a lease of that elevator, and, according to the information we have, proceeded to operate, but after a short time they accused the government or the harbour commission of violating the law and brought this action for $250,000. I do not know who is responsible for the mix-up, but certainly it was a very questionable business for the harbour commissioners to purchase the elevator in the first place, and then to lease it on an understanding that turned out as this has done. I question very seriously if this money is going to be used as suggested.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will read the report of the Royal Grain Commission he will find some pertinent observations with reference to this enterprise. It never was legally and properly organized. This property was turned over to a few political favourites —that is the honest fact in regard to it—of the harbour commission, and it is operated in such a way as to enable the alleged owners of it to assert the claim against the commission for interfering with them in the management of the enterprise. This was one of the worst jobs ever perpetrated on a free people. I have not the details before me, but I will obtain them. I will produce the report of the grain commission and show the circumstances in connection with it. I suggest that the minister make no settlement with these people under the present conditions without a thorough public inquiry with relation to the matter from its inception till to-day. It will not bear the light of day. Everybody in western Canada who is familiar with the facts knows that. When the bill is under consideration I will bring the matter to the minister's attention. I am speaking solely about the Woodward elevator matter and the Oriental Grain Company.

Mr. GARDINER: Will my hon. friend tell me whether this company was ever organized?

Mr. BENNETT: My recollection is that the charter was secured from the Secretary of State's department, but the observations in the Royal Grain Commissioner's report will indicate what was thought about it by the grain commissioner; considering the amount of capital that was paid in, in compliance with the terms of the act, his view was that the company was not legally or properly constituted.

Mr. GARDINER: What has the minister to say to a charge of that description?

Mr. CARDIN: I am not in a position to argue that matter. There may be something in what the hon. member has said; I am not in a position to contradict him at present. This was done by the harbour commission, dealing with the affairs of the company at that time. To-day we ask to have placed at our disposal $112,000 to meet the requirements but that does not mean that we will spend that amount. Before any money can be paid out the approval of the Department of Marine and Fisheries must be obtained; we are only taking authority to pay it if we find we have to. But we rely upon the advice of the counsel of the harbour commission and one independent counsel.

Mr. BENNETT: Will you give the names of the counsel?

Mr. CARDIN: Farris, Farris, Stultz & Sloan, and the other counsel is Mr. E. P. Davis.

Mr. BENNETT: He is one of the ablest lawyers in Canada, if not the ablest.

Mr. CARDIN: And outside of that we have the opinion of the Department of Justice that, in view of the circumstances we ought to try and make a settlement of that case. That is the advice we are getting from the Department of Justice. Before giving their opinion the Department of Justice must have considered the point raised by my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think they ever heard of it.

Mr. CARDIN: We are simply taking authority to make a settlement, but are not committed to make that settlement if we are not satisfied that we are justified in doing so.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that before the second reading of the bill the minister should look into the question of the organization and registration of the company.

Mr. CARDIN: I will.

Mr. GARDINER: Also ascertain the actual amount of capital in the company which has been paid up.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: When, in 1924, the last bill was before parliament granting a sum of money to the harbour commissioners, a discussion took place upon this very pertinent question and it is probable that the cancellation of the agreement came about as a result of that discussion in the House. Therefore I think the minister would be well advised, before the second reading of the bill, to have all the particulars, so that we may be able to expedite the legislation.

Mr. CARDIN: I will.

Mr. GARDINER: But without those particulars I can assure my hon. friend that we do not propose to let it go through.

With regard to the condition of No. 3 elevator, what extra storage is contemplated, what rent is now being paid, and what is the rent contemplated to be paid if the addition is made?

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid I am not in a position at the present time to give all the details my hon. friend is asking for. If he will permit the resolution to go through, I will bring in the information that he and others are asking for.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the situation with regard to the harbour commission elevators at the present time? Are any of those elevators under the control of the commission; that is, utilized by the commission itself?

Mr. CARDIN: There are negotiations at the present time to lease No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 to private companies, but I have no knowledge that an understanding has been reached as yet. I know that the commissioners are dealing with the representatives of these firms, or companies, or associations, with a view of leasing the elevators. From the information that has come to me I am inclined to think that these leases will be granted according to the requests made.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that before No. 2 can be leased it is necessary to construct a pier or jetty. Is anything included for such construction?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, it is provided for.

Mr. BENNETT: The pool get No. 2, I think?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Originally they were promised No. 1?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Why did the government change its mind and give the pool No. 2 when they still wanted No. 1?

Mr. CARDIN: If my memory is correct, another firm was already interested in No. 1, and we thought it advisable not to place the elevator in the hands of two organizations. This was explained to the representatives of the pool, and I am informed that when they left Ottawa they seemed to be quite agreeable to the proposal of the new commission.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this where a private company loads through No. 1?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Between now and the second reading of the bill, the minister might well consider the advisability of dropping the $112,000 out of this year's estimates, because the item will provoke a good deal of discussion, and I am satisfied that to get to the bottom of all the facts in connection with the claim of the Oriental Grain Company it should be sent to a special committee for consideration. I know the minister will agree with me, and the Solicitor General will advise him, that once you put in the estimates a vote to meet a prospective claim, the claimants will become so insistent in their pressure that they will get the money; whereas if provision for the claim is not made, you may be able to get it put on some basis that more nearly represents what, if anything, should be paid.

Mr. COOTE: Have the harbour commissioners power to lease elevators without the consent of the government?

Mr. CARDIN: No, they have to get the approval of the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the governor in council.

Mr. COOTE: Did they have the approval of the department and the government when they leased this elevator to the Oriental Grain Company?

Mr. CARDIN: I could not say at present.

Mr. STEVENS: They did.

Mr. COOTE: I trust the minister will get that information, and also as to whether they had the approval of the department and the governor in council to cancel the lease. It is the cancellation that has given rise to this claim of $112,000 by a company with a paid up capital of only $25,000. I believe the company was not prepared to go on with the lease. I certainly think it is a great mistake to include this claim in the money required under the bill. And why should the amount be included in capital account? If it is to be paid at all it should be paid by the Vancouver harbour commissioners out of revenue.

Mr. CARDIN: I think my hon. friend should not complain. By placing the amount in capital account he will have an opportunity of discussing it.

Mr. COOTE: That may be, but is it not a poor system of bookkeeping to put such expenditure into capital account?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will agree that, in the ordinary course of business, if judgment is given against a company for damages the money is not charged against capital but against operating revenue. Clearly the hon. member for Macleod is quite right in his statement that if this is a valid claim it should not be capitalized and so increase the tolls levied on the farmers of Alberta, because practically they are the only ones served by this elevator. Of the forty or fifty million bushels of grain shipped through Vancouver, 95 per cent comes from Alberta, the balance from northern and southern Saskatchewan points near the Alberta boundary. I think that is not too strong a statement to make. I submit that when you desire to capitalize what in effect would be the payment of damages arising out of operation, that payment should be charged against operating revenue, not against capital.

Mr. CARDIN: There may be a difference of opinion, but I think in the end the result would be the same.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. CARDIN: Tolls are collected in order to meet all the obligations of the harbour commission, and if this sum were placed in revenue account the result would be the same—the harbour commission would have to earn interest on it. The claim has been dealt with in this way in order that it may be brought before parliament with a view to getting approval before payment is made.

Mr. BENNETT: I can see what was in the mind of the minister. I understand that at one time the harbour commission was going to pay the claim out of revenue, but the minister's department very properly intervened, not because they did not believe it would be a proper charge against operation, but because the claim itself was of such a character that no well-conducted business would dare charge it up against operating revenue. However, it would be easy once it was put through parliament to make it a capital charge, and that would be the end of it. That is the real truth of the matter. I think the minister can give us some information in regard to it if he so desires.

Mr. KELLNER: What is the date of the opinion of the Justice department advising a settlement of the claim?

Mr. CARDIN: January 7, 1927.

Mr. COOTE: The list of expenditures read by the minister totalled about $5,883,000. The bill authorizes an expenditure of $4.000,000. Will he be good enough to explain how the balance is provided for?

Mr. CARDIN: We have to made a deduction of $1,883,410, the amount provided for by loan and for which approval had not been given. These expenditures were made, I understand, out of the revenue of the harbour commission.

Mr. STEVENS: And advances from the bank.

Mr .CARDIN: Advances had been made, but no approval had been given by the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the expenditure. It is proposed to place these amounts back into capital account.

Mr. COOTE: The amount was taken but it had not been authorized.

Mr. CARDIN: It was authorized by parliament but the expenditure was made by the harbour commission themselves out of their revenue.

Mr. BENNETT: Which raises a very important question.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, I see that.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister, I know, is aware of it from the way he spoke. If a large surplus has been accumulated by the operation of such a facility, which enables it without incurring debts to meet the obligations of new construction, I think it would be highly desirable, in order to maintain low tolls, not to allow the commission to reborrow money to make up that expenditure. The minister has had the matter under consideration on more than one occasion, but apparently he has yielded to pressure from those whom my hon. friend would describe as capitalists, and now proposes to capitalize this amount instead of allowing it to be charged against operating revenues. A very important principle is involved in that connection. If you have a surplus of a million and can carry out needed improvements to the extent of $800,000 without borrowing money, and have something left over, I do not think it is proper that you should come to parliament and get authority to borrow money as capital to replace that $800,000. That is not the way business is done, and the harbour commission should not conduct its affairs on that principle if the object is to maintain low tolls. I am sure the minister desires to do everything possible to improve transportation facilities at Vancouver and I know he realizes the importance of the tolls question to the farmers of Alberta. Alberta is seriously affected in this matter and it is of the utmost consequence that, wherever possible, improvements should be effected out of surplus revenues. Surplus revenues mean that, as a result of larger business, more tolls have been charged than otherwise would be the case. The tolls are fixed on the basis of a smaller volume of business, and as the volume increases the tolls bring in a correspondingly larger revenue. When this revenue surplus accumulates—and my submission is that is was not contemplated that there should be this larger revenue by reason of an increased volume of business—the surplus might properly be made available for needed capital expenditures so as to prevent the possibility of borrowings, which of course involve interest charges which must be made up by an increase in tolls. I can see that the minister has given the matter his consideration. It is a question which is not wholly free from, shall I say, grave results to those who supply the commodities which pay the tolls whereby the interest obligations of the commission are discharged.

Mr. COOTE: The people of Alberta are very much interested in the harbour of Vancouver. This year the Vancouver harbour commissioners appealed to the Board of Grain Commissioners to increase the tariff charges for handling grain through the elevator, and although the Alberta government protested, these increased charges, I believe, are now in effect. It is rather strange that the government has allowed the increase in these charges if it is true that the board have been able to make, out of their revenue, capital expenditures of $1,883,000. I do not know whether I understood the minister correctly, but that is what I thought he said. This state of affairs, I think, justifies the attitude of the people of Alberta and the action of the Alberta members during the past year in endeavouring to secure a representative of the grain producers from that province on the harbour board. I think we are supplying the tonnage which provides half the revenues of the port of Vancouver, and it does seem to me that the government might very well have given to the wheat producers of Alberta representation on the board. It is well known that there is a good deal of dissatisfaction in Alberta over the make-up of the Vancouver harbour board, and it is to be regretted that the government did not give some consideration to the claim of Alberta to have a representative of their own on the board. I hope that the minister, when he introduces the bill, will be able to give complete information regarding not only the matters which have been referred to to-day, but also in relation to the purchase of the Hastings mill site and the development which the harbour commissioners contemplate at that point. I should like him to give information also regarding the cost of construction of No. 2 elevator. It is important for us to know whether the parties who are negotiating for the lease of elevator No. 1 are to be charged a rental based on the cost of construction of this elevator. There is no comparison in the cost of elevator No. 1 and the cost of elevator No. 2. No. 1 was constructed by the government, under whose ownership it was operated, and it was later turned over to the Vancouver harbour commission at a cost of $550,000, which was only a little over 50 per cent of what the elevator was worth. I trust that the lease which is being negotiated with these parties will not necessarily be based on the cost of the elevators to the commission.

Mr. STEVENS: I desire to make a few observations regarding this rather important matter. In the first place, I support what my hon. friend (Mr. Coote) has just said in reference to fees. When the elevator fees in connection with the Vancouver harbour were increased I publicly opposed it and I urged the commissioners not to apply for the advance. I felt that the fees at that time were sufficient to pay for the cost of administration and operation, and I have no hesitation now in supporting my hon. friend's view in that respect. Furthermore, when the tonnage fee was increased from one cent to six cents per ton I considered that also too large an increase.

As regards the proposal for a representative on the Vancouver harbour commission from the province of Alberta, I would suggest to the government the advisability of enlarging the commission by increasing its membership to five and slightly changing its constitution. At present there are three commissioners, the chairman receiving a salary of $6,000 and the other two commissioners $4,000 each. The minister will correct me if I am wrong. After a long experience covering a number of years in connection with the operation of the commission, I have come to the conclusion that it would be better to have a chairman paid a salary of six or eight thousand dollars, and four commissioners who should receive an honorarium of about $2,000. These figures are of course arbitrary: they are not at all definite, being only a suggestion. These junior commissioners, if I may so describe them, need not necessarily be expected to give all their time to the commission; that is to say, it should not be a job for them. Rather they could sit as directors, meeting once or twice a month and dealing with matters of general policy of the board. In that way you could secure the services of some very eminent authorities on the classes of business transacted, such as a prominent shipping man, a grain man thoroughly familiar with the internal handling of grain as well as the shipping of it, and a prominent businessman who would be willing to give his time in part to the study of harbour matters, advising and coöperating with the board on all questions of policy, without necessarily devoting himself to administration. At the present time—I speak from memory—the board has a general superintendent who receives about $8,000 a year. They have a superintendent of elevators, an assistant superintendent of elevators and a foreman of elevators, and I contend that these positions are in excess of their needs. It seems to me that one superintendent of elevators would be enough, and I doubt if either the assistant superintendent or the foreman is needed at all. The general superintendent of the whole harbour, with a foreman at each elevator, should be able properly to safeguard the interest of the commission, and in that way a considerable saving could be made.

With regard to the $1,500,000 mentioned by the minister, I think the correct explanation is that out of previous appropriations made by parliament there still remains about that sum. The commissioners have been carrying on very extensive works and have exceeded the authorized payment by this government; that is, the payments they make must be authorized by the government, and while they have exceeded those payments by a considerable sum they have still kept within the general appropriation made by parliament. These extra moneys were paid, I understand, not all out of revenue, but partly in that way with the balance secured by an overdraft at the bank. If I recall correctly statements I have seen, that overdraft amounted to about $600,000 and this is a matter for which the commission might be criticized. I am not offering these remarks to the minister in a critical spirit at all, but rather that his hands may be strengthened in keeping proper control over this board as well as others. That overdraft of $600,000 was secured by the hypothecation of the securities represented by the sinking fund, which was an entirely wrong action on the part of the board. I think we must give the minister credit for having condemned this practice and for having corrected it, and I hope he will join with us in saying that it will not occur again.

Mr. CARDIN: It will not.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is necessary for the minister now to approve—and in the reorganization of the board I assume that he has considered and has approved of this over-draft—expenditures which are covered by previous appropriations by parliament to the extent of approximately $1,500,000.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask a question, just for information? Would it be necessary for the minister to bring this matter of $1,500,000 before parliament? Would it not be only necessary for him to give his approval to it?

Mr. STEVENS: I commend the minister for having done so; he need not have brought it before parliament, and I think he deserves great credit for having been frank with us. He has made a complete statement, and I may say frankly that all he needed to do was to ask for a certain sum, namely $4,000,000, to be used for future purposes, and to show how it was to be expended. But there was this unexplained and unaccounted-for difference for which the harbour board should have been criticized; I have not the slightest doubt that the minister and the deputy minister have criticized them strongly and bitterly for it, but it is as well to discipline these boards occasionally to keep them within bounds.

Before I pass on I would like to refer to the Woodward elevator, which was the reason for this lease of the Oriental Grain Company. That property should never have been purchased from Woodward originally; I wrote a letter to the commissioners in the autumn of 1922 or 1923, before they asked the approval of the government at all, and warned them that it was an improvident action, that they would have nothing but trouble if they purchased it, and that so far as I was concerned I would keep my skirts clear of it. They went on with the negotiations, and came to Ottawa where they finally secured the approval of the government to the taking over of the Woodward elevator. This project was originally entered into by a gentleman named Woodward, a grain man from Winnipeg, in which business he was a failure; he got into trouble and obligated himself to buy a large piece of waterfront on which he built a cheap structure, after which he went into a condition of bankruptcy. The harbour commissioners took over his whole bag of tricks and troubles, which never should have been done; following that there was an expenditure of public money to put the elevator into proper shape, which work was estimated to cost $600,000, but really required $1,000,000. The elevator now is probably in good condition; I do not question that, but the whole trouble from start to finish, including that connected with this Oriental Grain Company, came in the train of this original action, and I know that the harbour commissioners and the government have spent a good many anxious days wondering just how to extricate themselves from the results of that improvident action. I am not going to say that the government should not make a settlement; that is something no one should declare without having very carefully examined all the papers, but I do say that in making a settlement the government should scrutinize with great care any claim based upon that original transaction.

I want to repeat that the harbour board of Vancouver should be directed very sternly to reduce expenditures to a minimum, and to reduce their staff to the lowest possible point commensurate with the needs of maintaining a sound service there. I have criticized the board somewhat severely for certain things in the past, and when the estimates are brought down I intend to suggest some very practical ways in which expenditure may be curtailed. I want to tell the minister now that so far as I am able I will coöperate with him in keeping this harbour board within reasonable bounds, and I might also say that if the minister and the government will consider the suggestion frequently made that some representative from Alberta should be on that board, I would certainly endorse that action. I would insist, however, that such a representative should be one who really represents the grain business in Alberta, and not some one for whom a position is created. He must be a person representing the grain interest of that province and well versed in the needs of the trade, because the handling of 50,000,000 or 100,000,000 bushels of grain is a huge undertaking, and the more knowledge and wisdom that can be brought to bear upon that work, the better for all concerned.

Mr. COOTE: I would ask the minister if, when this bill is before the House, he will give us the number of employees in each year since 1921, and the total wages paid, because I think it can be shown that in comparison with the business done the harbour board have loaded up their staff to the point where it is really absurd. As a last request, if this resolution goes through now, I would ask the minister to be good enough to bring the bill down in daylight hours, and so give us a chance to get the information we really desire. Sometimes these bills are brought in about eleven o'clock at night, when the House is too weary to try to secure the information which it really should have.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no objection at all to the request of my hon. friend.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 215, to provide for a loan to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1920, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 105, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Regulations.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When the bill was in committee some days ago we passed the first clause and had a discussion on clause 2, when it was suggested that the bill, being somewhat of a technical nature, should be sent to a special committee in order that it might be considered in conference with officials of the department and others who might wish to be represented. That has been done and the committee have reported, suggesting some three or four amendments, a copy of which I am now sending over to you, Mr. Chairman. The first amendment is in regard to paragraph (b) of clause 2:

Defining official methods for biological testing.

I move to amend this clause by adding after the word "testing", the last word in the line, the words:

Which method shall permit manufacturers to have biological tests made in any laboratory.

This gives the manufacturer an opportunity of sending his product out to a laboratory without having to maintain one on his own premises.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister explain what he hopes to gain by this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As was stated some days ago in committee, under the subsection that it is desired to add to section 4 of the act we are proposing to standardize certain drugs that are mentioned in schedule B. If my hon. friend will turn to the schedule he will find the nature of the drugs there suggested. This will give us further power for the standardization of these special drugs. The matter is one that meets with the approval of the medical profession, and particularly now that we have agreed to make the suggested amendment it is not objected to by the manufacturers.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think the minister caught the meaning of my question. I quite agree with him that it is desirable to have drugs like these standardized. What I had in view was this: what control will the department have over these laboratories so as to be sure that it will get a standardized product—because this means subletting, so to speak, the contract for standardizing?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Our inspectors will secure samples. We will make our examination, and if the samples are not up to standard the manufacturers will be so informed.

Mr. McGIBBON: The samples will be rechecked at Ottawa?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. In regard to part IV of the schedule, the arsenical preparations, as my hon. friend understands, are very difficult to manufacture, and in order to be sure that they are up to standard we require a sample from each batch.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): How will this clause apply to drugs imported from foreign countries? Will the drugs be tested at Ottawa?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Firms importing drugs from foreign countries will have to come up to our standard. That is being done in Great Britain to-day where they are standardizing these drugs. It is also being done in France, and in fact in many countries certain standards have been established. If they come up to our standards, we will accept their drugs. If we find it necessary to visit their factories, we will do so at their expense. That is being done by the United States authorities at the present time. European manufacturers who are importing drugs into the United States have to come up to their standard and they submit to their inspection.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): As regards these pharmaceutical preparations imported from foreign countries, particularly from the United States, will there be a laboratory at Ottawa prepared to test and standardize these articles properly?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We shall have a laboratory at Ottawa to make tests.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Is any preparation being made for having such a laboratory established at Ottawa?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is one.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Is there one in existence now capable of doing this work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some other technical officers may be required, but the laboratory is in existence and I think it is now capable of doing the work.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Who is the officer in charge?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I forget his name for the moment.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I presume the laboratory will be under the Department of Health?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Where is this laboratory?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is in Ottawa a laboratory that will do this work. As my hon. friend knows, the department is situated in the Elgin building. There are also laboratories in Montreal, Halifax and Vancouver. I hardly think they will be equipped to do work of this character, but the Ottawa laboratory should be.

Mr. McGIBBON: I quite agree with the minister that it should be, but is it? I have grave doubts.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Once we undertake this work it will be.

Mr. McGIBBON: And that means the creation of a staff, probably a new department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McGIBBON: A new sub-department. I quite agree with the minister that this work should be done. While I may not be in order, I think the minister's whole department, not due of course to any fault of his, has fallen down lamentably in scientific research work. I took a great part in getting this act on the statute book, and it was distinctly understood at that time that we were to have a department of scientific research. That has not been carried out and I do not think we have a man capable of doing this work.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): The Department of Health was created for that very purpose, and so far as carrying out its main purpose is concerned, it has been a total failure. Has the minister formed any estimate of the cost of the establishment of a laboratory in order to make these standard tests?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think it is necessary to make any estimate. We are doing that kind of work to-day, and we have not had any complaints. It is true that the biological testing provided for under this section is outside the regular work we have been doing, but when this section becomes law, that will be provided for naturally; it is a matter of administration. So far as the testing of foods and drugs is concerned, that is being done to-day, and I have not heard much complaint; I have heard complaints from the people who got into trouble, but generally speaking the department's administration, I think, has been very good. I think that was demonstrated when the committee was discussing this bill the other day. The representatives of the manufacturers were present, and the general opinion was that the administration of the act had been good. These minor amendments will improve the act, more particularly in regard to drugs.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Seizure of suspected articles.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): What is the procedure in regard to these seizures? What is done with these articles?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are amending this section so that we can control the article beyond the period that is possible now under the act. Under the present law, after the article has been analysed we have no right to continue to hold it. This amendment gives us that right and brings the article under our control until proper disposal has been made of it.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Seizure.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think the minister knows—in fact, I have brought up several cases myself—that under this act his officials are interfering with the use of inert and harmless preservatives. Several of these articles mentioned in the act have been used by the manufacturers of certain articles of food for twenty-five or thirty years. Is the department still keeping up its interference with their use? I think the minister will remember that one of them is used in bologna sausages, which is a very cheap food. The preservative used by the manufacturer is an inert and harmless one, as the inspectors admit, yet they come around repeatedly and interfere. Could not the minister see that his officials give a more practical interpretation to the act so as to stop this interference?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the administration by the officials has been reasonable. The preservative mentioned by my hon. friend, while it is not altogether harmless, is deceptive. It gives the meat a colour which it otherwise would not have, and the person buying it is thereby deceived. That is the attitude of the department. I have had a number of cases before me recently. I know what my hon. friend is referring to, but there is an opinion in the minds of the officials that this substance should not be used because it is deceiving the buying public.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Not at all. The minister will agree that this article is sold because of its colour. If you changed the colour you would not sell the meat; that is the claim of the butchers. All the inspectors claim that it has no injurious effect whatever upon the meat, that the preservative is harmless and inert, but they interfere with its use just the same. That is the reason why I am so much opposed to giving these inspectors the powers they have, because they simply step in and interfere unnecessarily. When an inspector finds a condition of that kind, if he used the common sense that the minister suggests his officials use in the administration of the act, he would not interfere; but that does not happen. The men are brought up and fined. Not only that, but men are allowed to go around selling this article, and the butchers innocently buy it. Its colour is the means of selling it. It is a cheap food.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I shall be glad to consider my hon. friend's suggestion, but it is not a new matter in the department.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Will this clause empower the department to look after certain patented remedies that are on the market? There are many combinations of drugs on sale in our drug stores that are misbranded; they are labeled with names they do not deserve because of the drugs that are in them. I noticed one article in an Ottawa drug store called "double pepsin". There is no such thing as double pepsin, and I think the article in question has no pepsin whatever in it, but it is being sold in large quantities to the average consumer as a splendid remedy for indigestion. It may be a good remedy, but it is certainly not double pepsin, and people are buying it under a misconception. There are also many desiccated cereals, breakfast foods, that are supposed to be very nutritive which are not nutritive at all. Will the department undertake this amended act to investigate these articles and find out what is good and what is not, and have the ones that are no good taken off the market altogether?

[Mr. J. W. King.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The officials of the department are doing that work from day to day throughout the country. It is true that many of these articles should not be on the shelves and offered for sale. It is the work of the department to protect the public, and tests and examinations are continually being made to check these things up.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Would it be necessary to add the words "or any combination of drugs"? Is that covered as the section stands?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think it would be necessary to add those words.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I doubt if many combinations of drugs would come under this section.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think they would come within the definitions.

Mr. KAISER: The section says that whenever any article of food or any drug is reported as being adulterated or misbranded the inspector may seize and inspect the article. Does that refer to an inspector of the federal Health department, or to a municipal inspector appointed under the authority of the provincial board of health?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have inspectors throughout the various provinces who are going amongst the trade every day taking samples and having them sent in to the laboratory for examination. That work is being done by the officials of the Dominion Department of Health. If an officer of the provincial health department feels disposed to advise us in regard to a food or drug which he thinks is improper we shall be glad to have the information and make an investigation, but the work is done by Dominion officials.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has any individual the privilege of sending a sample to the department for analysis?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I think it is quite proper. If they wish to send a sample, or to call attention to articles which are on the market and of which they are suspicious, we are glad to have the information.

Mr. ANDERSON: They examine the food?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not so sure about that.

Mr. McGIBBON: If that were permitted, I think it would add to the usefulness of the department, because the inspectors of the department are more or less restricted.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): There are large quantities of what are termed non-intoxicating drinks on the market, such as orange crush and so on. I think the department is responsible for the fact that some of these contain a considerable amount of alcohol and are really more intoxicating than 4.4 beer. Does the department look into that matter and ascertain whether the aerated drinks contain no improper ingredients?

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do I understand the minister to say, with reference to food, that he objects to colouring being put in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, that is not so. There are certain standard colours which can be used in the manufacture of confectionery, for instance. These are allowed by the department. But is it wise that some preparation should be used, for example, in the making of sausage, to change the colouring of the meat and thus deceive the purchaser? The opinion in the department is that it is not fair to the buying public. The people who are manufacturing sausage should put good meat into it.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That would not refer to butter.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The analyst of the department reports that this is harmless, and that the only effect of the drug is to give colouring in a percentage of it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I shall be glad to take it up further with the officials. They have been making seizures for some time.

Mr. KAISER: The question may be looked at from the commercial aspect: a food or drug may be adulterated and the adulteration may have the effect of increasing the commercial value. But another element which is of far more importance is the question of selling goods which may not only be adulterated or misbranded but which may contain germs of disease. Will the analyst of the department undertake to look into matters of that kind and see that the foods are free from disease?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend speaks of canned goods. That matter comes under another act.

Mr. McGIBBON: With regard to the seizure of goods, who is going to stand the loss?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The person who has the product which is not up to standard.

Mr. McGIBBON: That might not be fair. A druggist might buy a quantity of goods in good faith, but they might contain some alcoholic extracts.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In section 10 provision is made to bring in the third party, and that will meet the situation.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there anything in any of the acts to compel anyone who sells these foodstuffs to show by way of a label or card what has been used in their preparation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a system of labelling which describes weight and so on, but I am not sure that it is the practice to describe the colouring matter that is used. Certain standard colours are allowed to be used in foodstuffs. They are known to the manufacturers. They are used more particularly in confectionery.

Mr. HEAPS: A person who buys a certain article should know what is in it, and the only protection is that which is given by the authorities. I think it would be wise if some amendment were made compelling the person selling these goods in which colouring matter has been used to place a label on them showing what they contain.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would possibly be developed by the regulations that would be made under section 4.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister consider putting such regulations into effect?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I should be glad to.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Will the minister give me some information about section 6, which says:

> Whenever any article of food or any drug is reported by a dominion analyst as being adulterated or misbranded—

And so on. How wide is that clause? Does it take in goods in cold storage?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The section is very definite. It reads:

> Whenever any article of food or any drug is reported by a dominion analyst as being adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, the department may order such article, and all other articles of the same kind which were in the same place at the time the article analyzed was obtained, to be seized by an inspector and detained by him until an analysis of the sample of the whole is made, and thereafter until the inspector has given an order for its disposal.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): It is so wide that it includes all drugs and food.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, it is confined to the act itself.

Mr. STEVENS: That is, within the meaning of the whole act.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The activities of the department are circumscribed by the act.

Mr. ESLING: Does the act provide for any analysis of beer? As the hon. minister is well aware, charges have been made on the floor of the legislature of British Columbia to the effect that beer is offered for sale in the province containing ether, resin and other chemicals. In fact it is frequently remarked that chemists rather than brewers are needed in the manufacture of this poisonous beer. Is it within the jurisdiction of the minister's department to take samples of beer for analysis?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not had brought to my attention any seizures of beer by my department under this act. I will make inquiries and inform my hon. friend later whether beer would come within its scope.

Mr. ESLING: Does not the minister consider that beer should come within the jurisdiction of this department for the protection of the public? I think he should have jurisdiction in determining the quality of a beverage such as I have described just as another department has jurisdiction over weights and measures. Surely anybody who drinks beer at random will readily realize the great difference in quality between the products of various breweries. I think the act provides explicitly what ingredients shall be taken into a brewery.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Beer is not classified as a food or drug under this act. Its manufacture is controlled under the Inland Revenue Act.

Mr. ESLING: But does not the minister think it would be a good thing to protect the public health by providing that beer be analyzed at the discretion of the department? Let his inspectors take samples here and there of this bottled poison and determine what should be done with it.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Analysts may be designated.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What will be the qualification for a Dominion analyst?

[Mr. R. K. Anderson.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have in the service men who are classified as chemists. This section will afford us the opportunity of utilizing their services and classifying them as Dominion analysts.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the basis of standardization of these drugs?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They will be tested biologically.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Distribution of samples.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This section has been amended.

The CHAIRMAN: All the words after the word, "drug", in the thirteenth line are stricken out and the following substituted:

Provided that this section shall not prevent manufacturers or wholesale dealers from distributing samples by mail or otherwise in compliance with individual requests for same, or from distributing samples to physicians, veterinary surgeons, dentists, registered nurses, hospitals, or to retail druggists for individual redistribution to adults only.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Schedule amended.

The CHAIRMAN: Part IV of the schedule has been amended by striking out all the words after "and" in the first line. Part IV will then read:

Organic compounds of arsenic and analogous preparations prepared for parenteral medication.

Mr. KAISER: Preparations of arsenic are inorganic. The proper word is not used.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is the proper wording as I understand it. It was discussed in committee and the amendment proposed does limit arsenical preparations to the medical purposes intended.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a third time?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Next sitting of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved the second reading of Bill No. 172 to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Contents of report.

Mr. MARCIL: I have received a number of letters inquiring whether the employees of the Income Tax branch will come under the Civil Service Commission as a result of this legislation.

Mr. EULER: This does not affect them in any way.

Mr. MARCIL: There is no change in the status of income tax employees?

Mr. EULER: Certainly not in this, and not in any legislation contemplated.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): What will be the duty of the Board of Customs which is to be appointed?

Mr. EULER: The Board of Customs is not a new creation. There has always been such a board consisting of certain officials of the department, together with the head of the Income Tax branch. This merely reconstitutes the board, which will consist of the Commissioner of Customs, the Commissioner of Excise, the Commissioner of Income Tax and the Assistant Commissioner of Customs. In addition, it was thought well to have some official of the Finance department connected with the Tariff branch thereof as a member of the board, because the relationship between the work of the Board of Customs and that of the Tariff branch of the Finance department is very close.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Do I understand that the members of the board will compile certain regulations? What are their duties?

Mr. EULER: The Customs board is a body to whom certain matters are referred for interpretation. When difficulties are encountered in the interpretation of certain clauses in the act we refer them to the board.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Board of Customs may declare rate of duty, or that goods are free.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Does this matter come under the Board of Customs as one of regulation? If any article is in question, does this board decide whether or not it shall be subject to the provisions of the act?

Mr. EULER: The explanation given on the opposite page is, I think, quite clear. It merely provides a period within which appeal may be taken. Heretofore the matter was finally disposed of once the minister approved of the decision of the Board of Customs.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Fine and imprisonment.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Subsection (b) of this section reads:

> If the value of the goods is two hundred dollars or over, be guilty of an indictable offence and liable on conviction to a fine of five hundred dollars, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than one year.

It seems to me that this section is altogether too drastic. The idea of putting a man in gaol for a period not less than a year and up to seven years for having smuggled goods in his possession is preposterous. It is going altogether too far. I know it was recommended last session but that was in a time of public excitement. It should be reconsidered.

Mr. EULER: I have no particular comment to make on the legislation passed in 1925 providing for punishment by imprisonment in the case of smuggling of goods valued at $200 or more. This provision, I think, has had a very good effect, judging by the reports received throughout the country. The very fact that such a penalty may be invoked serves as a deterrent to smugglers. This particular clause deals with an offence similar to that covered in the legislation of 1925. I may say that the court may impose either a fine or imprisonment, or both as it may see fit. If the court decides that imprisonment is too severe, it has the option to impose a fine.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Not under subsection (b).

Mr. EULER: I think that is the meaning of it. The law officer states that the court has the option of imposing either a fine or imprisonment or both, as it may see fit.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No. The act says, "and".

Mr. STEVENS: The real significance of that clause, as we found in our study of this interesting problem last year, is that you have to define commercial smuggling as distinguished from petty smuggling. It will be observed that the smuggling of goods less than $200 in value is treated more or less leniently; the class of smuggler for whom my hon. friend has some solicitude is not treated very harshly. The petty smuggler, does not bother with goods of any great value, he or she—and the she's are very prevalent in this class—do not smuggle anything except petty goods ranging in value from $3 or $4 to $10 or $20, but when it comes to commercial smuggling by organized gangs, the matter of a fine is nothing to them and that is what this country has been cursed with. The object of this recommendation last year was to give the department an effective weapon.

Mr. EULER: I must maintain the position I took before. I am not a lawyer or the son of a lawyer, and there are a great many legal gentlemen in the House who can interpret this section better than I can, but I am informed by the law officer of the department that while it states the person becomes liable to a fine and imprisonment, both are not made obligatory.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) says that persons in possession of smuggled goods to a value of more than $200 are conducting commercialized smuggling, but he is mistaken. I can take him to dozens of farms in Saskatchewan where he would find horses in the possession of farmers who bought them from dealers without knowing that they had been smuggled. If these men were arrested for having smuggled horses in their possession they would have to go to gaol for seven years without the option of a fine.

Mr. EULER: They are liable to such a sentence, but the judge would have discretion to impose either a fine or imprisonment.

.At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 15—Fine and imprisonment.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there in the present customs law any regulation which allows a person to bring into Canada free of duty, goods to any fixed amount, as is the case in the United States at present?

Mr. EULER: Nothing at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister take into consideration the enactment of some such law as would allow a person, if he is a bona fide traveller, to bring in free of duty goods to the value of say $50? Most people who travel abroad return with something, it may be a suit of clothes, a pair of boots, or a collar or a tie, and any person who comes in with such goods is or may be, without being aware of the fact, guilty of smuggling. If the law were so altered as to allow goods to the value of not more than $50 to be brought in free of duty, that would do away with a good deal of the smuggling which is done by persons who are travelling backwards and forwards between Canada and various other parts of the world, but which is not really done intentionally.

Mr. EULER: I have a good deal of sympathy with the thought expressed by the hon. member, but I think if that were done our merchants in Canada would rather object to it. I am not prepared to-night to father any such change. Before we rose at six o'clock there was some discussion as to the meaning of paragraph (b) of this clause. Some hon. members thought that the provision was too drastic. Paragraph (b) reads:

> If the value of the goods is $200 or over, be guilty of an indictable offence and liable on conviction to a fine of $500, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than one year.

I am given to understand there is some doubt as to the interpretation of that, whether the court could at its option impose the fine and, in addition, a term of imprisonment. I would suggest, in order to make the matter absolutely clear, that the second "and" might be changed to "or" and then at the end of the paragraph the words " or to both fine and imprisonment" might be added.

Mr. STEVENS: I want respectfully but very firmly to differ from the minister in regard to this change. I agree with his bill as he has it now. This is in accordance with the urgent request of the business men of Canada as represented before the committee last year, and it is in accordance with the recommendations of the committee. It is recognized as being absolutely necessary if we are to make these laws effective. Before the dinner recess the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) interpreted it as meaning that it would apply to some innocent farmer who happened to have a horse which might have been smuggled although he had no knowledge of the smuggling. It does not apply to any such case. Section 187 deals entirely with persons actually guilty of smuggling, guilty of the act, and not with persons being innocent in possession of smuggled goods. This particular clause has been requested and urged by those who have been suffering so severely from the competition of an organized commercial smuggling gang. I know I am reflecting the views of those who have been suffering in this way when I say that if this clause is abandoned, they will feel that most of the other amendments will be of little effect. I urge the minister to leave the clause as it is and to afford an opportunity to view the effect of the legislation in actual practice.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I have no good words to say for the smuggler, but we are now placing in the statute book a law which, in my humble judgment, seems very severe. I would like some day to join with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in this chamber in removing that thing which makes smuggling profitable. That is one of the real difficulties. Under the present system there are infringements of the law, and it seems that if a man smuggles to the extent of $201, he is liable to a fine of $500 in addition to imprisonment for a period of from one to seven years. That is entirely too severe a penalty for the crime, and I should be glad if the minister could modify that so that we would not be guilty in this chamber of passing anything so drastic.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I hope the minister will not alter the clause as he has intimated he may by inserting the word "or" in place of the word "and". I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that the desire of the business community is to stop smuggling, and unless we make the penalty sufficiently severe, we shall not succeed in doing so. This is an amendment to section 187 which applies only to those who are actually concerned in smuggling. It specifically names those who are liable:

> And every person concerned in such unlawful importation or removal shall incur a penalty.

The person has to be concerned in the smuggling. A person who subsequently is found in possession of smuggled goods will, if innocent, not be liable to the provisions of this section.

Mr. McINTOSH: He will be concerned in the smuggling.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If he was he would be liable, and properly liable, because he would be a smuggler, but an innocent purchaser of these goods would in no way be brought under the operation of this section. My view is that you have to make these penalties pretty severe if you are going to stop this practice. The whole trouble that arose in the last few years was due first to the fact that our penalties were not severe enough, and secondly to the fact that even such penalties as we had were not enforced. I hope the minister will not change this section. In introducing this bill into the House he has put his reasons for the amendments on the blank pages accompanying the bill, and I notice that his proposal has been received with great approval by all parts of the country. It has been announced in large headlines in all the papers that both fine and imprisonment are to be imposed on the smuggler, and that proposal has been well received by the public. They want to stop this smuggling, and they feel the minister is going the right way about it.

Mr. EULER: I think my hon. friend will find that the provisions in the bill are pretty drastic in many respects, as will be ascertained as we proceed. I would also draw his attention to the fact that it is not proposed to give any discretionary power to the judge with regard to the change that was made in the act in the session of 1925; imprisonment in such cases is still obligatory. That was distinctly for the offence known as smuggling. The particular clauses before us deal with offences which perhaps approach to the act of smuggling but are not, strictly interpreted, smuggling. For instance, he might bring in goods through a place not a port. That might be intentional smuggling, or it might not. Or he might remove goods before examination or payment of duty. That, I submit, is not quite so serious as a deliberate bringing in of goods without payment of duty, and these particular clauses deal only with cases of that kind.

Mr. STEVENS: I really would not like to let the minister go with such an interpretation as that. This is simply the interpretation of what smuggling is; it is really defining what smuggling is. We use the term smuggling in a broad, general way—let me put it this way: If my hon. friend's interpretation prevails, then all a designing smuggler would have to do would be to find a point on the boundary that is not a port and bring his goods across there; then he is not a smuggler; he is inadvertently coming into Canada with the goods, he could plead. The idea of this section is to make it clear that that is smuggling, that it is his duty to come in and report at the port of entry. That was the whole trouble along the boundary line down in the eastern townships, and in my province, and in other sections of the country where the boundary line runs through such an extended country that it is impossible for the government to have ports of entry at every crossing. Indeed, one of the great problems we were faced with was whether we should not close all the roads across the boundary except at ports of entry. This is one of the great problems. Now this section of the act, even before it is touched, defines smuggling as crossing the boundary with goods at points other than a port of entry; of course, knowingly, wittingly, is implied. If my hon. friend's interpretation prevails, he will simply be offering a premium for the smuggler to go to these out-of-the-way places for access into Canada. I must correct him in that: he is wrong in his interpretation there.

Mr. EULER: I do not think I am wrong in my interpretation. As I said, active, actual smuggling, as it was always known, deliberate smuggling, is not removed from the operation of the amendment to the act that was put through in 1925. I want to make the law just as water-tight as possible so far as actual smuggling is concerned. But there may be cases, and this was the idea in mind in drafting the bill before the House, although a little error was made, where a man may remove goods before examination or payment of duty. That might be the action of a deliberate smuggler, or it might not. It is quite conceivable that an innocent party might do that, and if we passed the section as it is now the judge would have no option in such a case; he would have to impose both fine and imprisonment. I would also point out to my hon. friend across the way that it does not follow, if we change this, that the judge will not impose both penalties. He still would have the power to impose both fine and imprisonment. We are merely leaving it to the discretion of the judge as to whether both fine and imprisonment shall be imposed.

Mr. STEVENS: That was the whole bone of contention in the discussion of last year.

Mr. EULER: If I were sure that it would have the effect that my hon. friend fears I would not suggest making any change, because, as I say, I want to make it certain that the smuggler will be punished. But I do not want to go so far as to make it obligatory upon the court to imprison a man who, after all, has no intention of smuggling, and I say that it is quite conceivable that that might be the case; he might remove the goods, for instance, before examination or payment of duty. He might be ignorant of the law. Many people do not know the law so well as perhaps hon. members of this House, and if an innocent person did that, the judge would have no option; he would have to send him to gaol. I would not like that to happen. If the judge in his wisdom decides that the man did it with the intention of smuggling, he has the power to impose not only the fine but imprisonment as well. It seems to me that perhaps the other might be just a little bit too drastic.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry, but I must conclude with protesting against the minister making the change. I warn him now that he is making a serious mistake.

Mr. McKENZIE: Coming from the prairies as I do, from a part of the country bordering on the Dakota boundary, I can fully appreciate what the minister has said. In my opinion this section is a little drastic as applied to a sparsely settled country such as we have on the prairies. We have a number of farmers in the constituency I represent, and the same thing applies all along the border of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, whose closest point to market is in the state of Dakota or Montana, as the case may be. They will probably go over to the nearest town on the other side of the border and buy a line of machinery with the intention of paying the duty, but on the way home they find there is not a custom house to which they can report within probably twelve or fifteen miles, and consequently they go home with their line of machinery intending to report at the nearest custom house at the first opportunity, but that may not be for several days sometimes. Now if this section passes, that man will be considered a criminal for those days in which he has failed to report. This section may be all right for the purpose intended. I am not trying to defend the professional smuggler by any means, but I am concerned about the man on the land who intends to carry on his business legitimately, but who owing to the long distance from the custom house does not find it convenient to report immediately.

I think also that there should be an easy method of appeal from the decision of these two justices of the peace who are mentioned in this section. I do not think that too much should depend on the judgment of two justices of the peace in imprisonment cases. I think there should be an easy method of appeal from their decision. To sum up, I think this legislation is entirely too drastic for a sparsely settled country such as our prairies.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the idea underlying our customs law is to prevent the professional smuggler from making a business of smuggling goods into Canada. In my view this amendment is entirely too drastic. My county borders on the states of Minnesota and Dakota, and the people in my district take a great deal of cream and milk to the United States. That is the only place they can sell the stuff. If these people come back with a pair of shoes for the children, or something of that kind, or perhaps some articles they get for the price of their product, they come under the penalty provided in this act.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they do not.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The penalty is $200.

Mr. STEVENS: They do not pay a fine of $200 for bringing in a pair of shoes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The justices of the peace in most of these places are liable to interpret the law strictly and give the offender the limit of the penalty. I agree there should be facilities for appeal with as little expense as possible to those charged, because these people cannot afford to pay the large sums which most of these appeals cost. I cannot allow legislation such as this to be enacted without protesting on behalf of the electors whom I have the honour to represent, and I will tell the Minister of Customs that I think I represent a county where there is no smuggling.

Mr. EULER: When we have a protest from one set of gentlemen who go to one extreme and another set who go to the other extreme on this question, I think I am about right.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Heenan moves:

That the word "or" be substituted for the word "and" in the third line of paragraph (b) of section 15, and that the words "or to both fine and imprisonment" be added at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister not consider that the provision "not exceeding seven years" is rather drastic? Make it one year and not less than thirty days.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend want to put a premium on smuggling again?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): No, but it is quite possible to make the punishment altogether out of proportion to the crime. There was a time in the old country when under the law a man could be hanged for stealing sheep, but no one was hanged because they could not get a conviction. If you make the punishment too drastic it will be impossible to obtain a conviction.

Mr. EULER: It is not necessary for the judge to impose seven years. He can use discretion.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I think the whole section is vicious. My hon. friend speaks about putting a premium on smuggling. He raised a great disturbance last year on the question of smuggling. It seems to me he went after the crudest form of smuggling—the man who smuggles something over the border, gets caught and has to go to gaol for seven years. But the man who smuggles a word into the customs tariff can get all the goods into the country he likes, free of duty, and goes off scot-free. There is a section in the customs tariff which says that wool of a kind and class produced in Canada shall bear three cents a pound duty. There is another section which says that the wool and the hair of the camel, alpaca, and so on shall come in free. We find that the friends of my hon. friend who are so concerned about putting a stop to smuggling can get all their raw wool in free by smuggling the word "wool" into another part of the tariff. Those are the people who are defrauding the country of revenue. If you take a man who smuggles an article into this country, or who is found in this country with the article in his possession, and send him to gaol for seven years, you bring the whole tariff into disrepute among the people, and it will bring the government into disrepute among the people. If you try to enforce such a provision as that you will find that the whole customs law will stink in the nostrils of right thinking people. I protest against it.

Mr. COOTE: I do not suppose I can prevent the section from carrying, but I would like to enter a word of protest against subsection (a). It is altogether too severe. If a man smuggles in a shirt I suppose he would be liable to a fine of $50 and imprisonment for a year. I would like to see a section inserted in our Customs Act similar to that in force in the United States, which country is always held up to us as an example of the high tariff. The citizens of the United States may once a year bring in goods up to the value, I think, of $100, without paying duty, simply by making a declaration that they have not previously in that year taken any goods into that country. Everyone who goes from this country across the line would probably like to bring in some little article when he returns, and under this act if he did not declare it he is liable to this fine of $50 and possibly imprisonment.

Mr. EULER: I will say for the information of the committee and my hon. friend that we never prosecute except where smuggling is done with commercial intent. It would be unwise to deprive the department entirely of the machinery for prosecuting real smugglers. If cases such as my hon. friend refers to arise, we never do prosecute.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Who is going to decide whether or not a man intended to smuggle?

Mr. VENIOT: You have to consider the circumstances of the case.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I have known cases where a policeman would go to the collector and say, "Do not collect duty from this man because I want to make an example of him."

Mr. HEAPS: The minister stated that the department did not prosecute in such cases as the one he referred to, and to which I referred earlier in the evening. Would it not be well to make that clear in the act? If we had such a provision in the act it might overcome the difficulty. Further, if such exemptions are allowed I do not care how stiff we make the penalty for the persons actually engaged in smuggling. I do not see why we should have two penalties in the act providing for the punishment of smuggling. I think it is an offence whether you smuggle $50 worth of goods or whether you smuggle $5,000 worth of goods. Here we are classifying it under two heads; one type of offender will be liable to imprisonment up to one year, and the other man liable for imprisonment up to seven years, yet it is quite conceivable that under certain circumstances the person who is smuggling in $200 worth of goods may be guilty of a worse offence than the man who smuggles a larger quantity. I understand that it is an unusual practice in law to have two penalties for the same kind of offence. I wish the minister would be good enough to state what the objections are to inserting in the act a clause which would grant exemption say up to $50 or $100 for persons who are bona fide travellers re-entering Canada, and who are, of course, Canadian citizens. Naturally this would exclude merchants from going abroad and bringing back merchandise, but it would allow a person who, say, travels to Europe or crosses into the United States once a year to come back with goods to the value that I have mentioned.

Mr. VENIOT: For a number of years I was in the customs administering one of the chief ports of New Brunswick, and during eight years of that time I was engaged in detecting smuggling on the high seas and on the border. In cases of petty smuggling, so to speak, instructions were always given that no prosecution should take place until a report had been made to the department, in order to prevent an officious official persecuting instead of prosecuting. If I mistake not, to-day the regulation is that where the seizure does not exceed two hundred dollars in value the officer is to report to the department for instructions. Where the value involved is over two hundred dollars I do not know what the regulation is now, but I should say from my experience that the officer making the seizure would have to report directly to the Customs department before taking action in the courts. In the case referred to by the hon. member the Commissioner of Customs could very well have an investigation made, and he would then be in a position to determine whether there was an attempt to evade the customs. In the absence of any intent to smuggle, I do not believe the department would order a prosecution. I live in a province that is almost surrounded by the sea and on the land side we are bounded by the state of Maine and the province of Quebec. I am free to admit that in the past there has been a great deal too much smuggling, principally by sea. Canadians crossing the border into Maine by automobile or other vehicle have to secure permits from our collector of customs and excise, and to present those permits to this official on their return. Where the customs officials had to close their offices to attend to some other important business, and the returning Canadian had no opportunity to declare any purchases that he had made during his visit, I have known officious officials to institute proceedings for violation of the law. Such cases might very properly be referred to headquarters for instructions. I think with the section in its present form our friends may rest assured that very little injustice will be done to those who may be trapped in that way.

Mr. HEAPS: Are prosecutions left entirely to the discretion of the Customs department?

Mr. VENIOT: When I was a collector of customs I was instructed always to report seizures up to a certain amount before taking legal proceedings.

Mr. HEAPS: A man bringing in fifty dollars worth of goods in the way I have mentioned would still be liable up to the amount of the customs duty?

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly; and if it was found that he was attempting to smuggle the goods he could be punished by the imposition of double the duty. That has been done in many cases.

Mr. HEAPS: My idea is to exempt up to a certain value goods brought in by a traveller.

Mr. VENIOT: Going backwards and forwards?

Mr. HEAPS: No, only once a year.

Mr. VENIOT: At the present time American tourists are allowed to take home a hundred dollars worth of goods purchased in Canada. I would suggest that we might allow bona fide Canadian tourists to the United States to bring home purchases up to the value of fifty dollars free of duty.

Mr. BROWN: Is the minister certain that the United States provision is still in force? I heard the statement made recently, seemingly with authority, that that provision had been cancelled.

Mr. VENIOT: It was in force up to the month of August last.

Mr. MANION: During the past year or two I have had a number of protests from merchants at the head of the lakes who sell goods to American tourists that those tourists are not permitted to take home one hundred dollars worth of Canadian goods. I communicated with Washington, and my recollection is that there is no such regulation in effect but that it is left entirely to the discretion of the customs agent. In a large proportion of the cases American tourists are not permitted to take home Canadian goods to the value stated. I do not think that this discretion is at all generally exercised.

Mr. BROWN: It was being permitted very generally at Winnipeg up to the time the statement that I have referred to was made, seemingly with authority.

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. VENIOT: It depends upon the officiousness—if I may use the term—of the official.

Mr. MANION: No, the authorities told me otherwise.

Mr. VENIOT: The American authorities advertised last summer throughout the province of New Brunswick that every American tourist was allowed to take back a hundred dollars worth of Canadian goods free of duty.

Mr. MANION: What authority?

Mr. VENIOT: The American consular agents in New Brunswick.

Mr. MANION: They are kinder to New Brunswick than to some of the other provinces.

Mr. BANCROFT: When I left Winnipeg, large departmental stores there were displaying placards with the information that American tourists were allowed to carry back $100 worth of goods duty free.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not believe that the penalty could be made high enough. If you want to stop smuggling you must have a penalty which will be a real deterrent. My hon. friend says that the penalty should be made to fit the crime. I agree with him, and there is no greater system of demoralization along the coastline of the maritime provinces, among the fishermen and other people there, than the practice of smuggling liquor. In my own county, for example, 550 fishermen leave the shore every Monday morning, remaining away all week. On returning on Saturday they come across the vessels of smugglers lying in what is known as Rum Row outside the three-mile limit and beyond reach of the law. These fishermen are engaged to land secretly the liquor brought in by the smugglers, and they do land it along the shores of northern New Brunswick. There are very few cases in which these fishermen do not reach their homes on Saturady night drunk and in such a condition as to leave them impaired.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Are these men smuggling whiskey into Canada or out of the country?

Mr. VENIOT: Into Canada.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): From the United States?

Mr. VENIOT: The whiskey is smuggled into Canada from St. Pierre-Miquelon. A good deal of the whiskey is landed in bonded warehouses import for export; it is then shipped to St. Pierre-Miquelon and smuggled back into New Brunswick. Even in the days when the duty was not so high and when whiskey was only $2.40 a gallon there was smuggling.

Mr. QUINN: Who gave the licenses to these export and import houses?

Mr. VENIOT: These houses receive their licenses on the authority of the attorney general of the province in which they are issued. If the attorney general does not sanction the issuance of them, the licenses are not given; that is my answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. QUINN: That is a good answer. I will give you more presently.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not discussing that question now, but if the hon. member wishes to take it up some time when it will be in order I shall be at liberty then to discuss it with him.

Mr. QUINN: I will tell the Postmaster General something before I am through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: We are not discussing bonded warehouses now.

Mr. QUINN: I can tell him about the dismissals—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think there should be any change in the penalty now proposed.

Mr. KAISER: Did I understand the minister to say that the smuggling was due to the raising of the duty?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say that. While the incentive may be greater with an increased duty, the lowering of the duty in my opinion would never stop smuggling.

Mr. KAISER: Is it the opinion of the government that a reduction in the customs duty would tend to mitigate smuggling?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): There is something in what the Postmaster General has said as to the demoralizing effect of the smuggling of whiskey; but it is not advisable on that account to punish all smugglers as harshly as is here proposed. I suggest that the smuggling of liquor be dealt with in a different act entirely and that in this legislation we deal with smuggling of general merchandise.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I gather that if it is proven that a man intends to smuggle he comes under this legislation. Who is going to prove intent? Is the prosecution to be begun before that point is established?

Mr. EULER: I have a few words to say in correction of a misapprehension that exists more especially on this side. Let me say at once that the country as well as the House expects us to make such changes in the act as will enable us to put an end to commercial smuggling, and in order to do that it is only fair for the department to ask for powers which will be adequate to cope with the present evil—powers that are a great deal wider than we shall have to exercise in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Where only a small amount is involved, a sum under $200, there is never any prosecution by the department; but where the amount exceeds $200 the prosecution is taken.

Some objection is raised to the power given justices of the peace. That is nothing new; there is an appeal from the judgment of the two justices of the peace to the county court judge. That has always been in the act. The minimum penalty of $50 is also already in the act. If the amount smuggled is small we never prosecute. Something must be left to the judgment of the courts and of the department. If we are confined to a hard and fast rule, the object of which is to obviate all possibility of injustice to petty smugglers, our hands may be tied so securely that we shall not be able to act when action is imperative. I think it is right, in view of all the conditions and having regard to the feeling throughout the country, that the department should be given, in extreme cases, such power as would not be exercised where the conditions did not warrant it. We shall do all in our power to stop commercial smuggling, but I can assure the committee that we will not use that power as an instrument to persecute anybody. Most of the objections that have been raised are objections which we have heard before; they are not new. They relate to provisions which are already in the act, and this debate will have done this much good: it will have made us more familiar with the existing law.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister has not answered my question.

Mr. EULER: I thought I did.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): I want to express my concurrence in the section now under discussion, the object of which is to prevent commercial smuggling, to use the minister's phrase, and in the event of smuggling to punish adequately those who are found guilty. I do not think the intention is to prevent of what might be called innocent smuggling; a lady returning from New York or Atlantic City during the Easter holidays may bring back a bonnet which is subject to duty under the strict application of the law, and she may fail to pay duty on it. That is not the smuggling contemplated by the act. I know as a matter of experience that the law is applied with a good deal of mercy in this respect. For instance, the law says that if goods are brought in in a conveyance, the conveyance shall be forfeited, while as a matter of practice double duty is generally imposed and the matter is ended. My contention is that the minister should be given power to impose an extremely severe penalty upon deliberate smugglers, and he should also be given some latitude for the exercise of common sense in respect of what may be called innocent evasions of the law. I concur heartily in the proposed amendment and if necessary will vote for it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I have an answer to my question? Suppose a man brings in goods to a value of less than $200. Is he prosecuted before the matter is referred to the department?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In speaking on this question I do not want anyone to conceive the idea that I am speaking for the smugglers. I quite realize that we must have drastic penalties and that we should do everything possible to stop smuggling, but nevertheless when you put a law on the statute books which is too severe I am not sure that it accomplishes the purpose intended. According to this provision, a person in possession of over $200 worth of smuggled goods is fined $500 plus some penalty, and it does seem to me that the man who brings in the goods to the value of say $201 is not in the same class as the professional smuggler who brings in goods worth a large amount of money. I would like to ask the minister if he has considered a sliding scale of fines, say $500, $1,000 and $2,000. At present it would seem to me that the small smuggler is being penalized very severely while the large smuggler is not penalized sufficiently. I believe the minister might look into that matter.

Mr. McINTOSH: I would not like this opportunity to pass without saying something in connection with this clause. We are trying to eliminate the professional smuggler, and the quicker that is done the better it will be for Canada. I think smuggling is in large degree the result of protection, and we on this side of the House are out to eliminate all undue protection and at the same time to stop smuggling. So far as this actual clause is concerned I would not make it an indictable offence; rather I would suggest fining a man according to what he smuggles; if he smuggles goods to the value of $1,000, fine him perhaps $2,000—make the fine commensurate with the offence. More than that, I can say that the representatives of Saskatchewan on this side of the House want to have the professional smuggler made a minus quantity in Canada, and in standing for a fair law we feel we will get further ahead in a few years in the wiping out of these professional parasites.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like the minister to give the committee some of his ideas on this particular point. I thoroughly agree with those members who have advocated the free entry into Canada of $100 worth of personal goods, brought in by tourists, provided of course that the smuggling traffic can be guarded against, but I did not hear the minister give us his views on this particular question. I do not like to force him to do so, but he has the act under his control and he may be able to clear up this matter with no further debate.

Mr. EULER: That is, after all, a matter of policy on the part of the government; I have not given it any particular consideration and I am not in a position to say anything definite in that regard. I think the reason why so many people are requesting that we grant a privilege which is supposed to exist for the benefit of those entering the United States is that there is some doubt whether that privilege still exists, or whether it will continue to do so.

Mr. McGIBBON: It exists at present.

Mr. EULER: I recently read in the newspapers that a decision was rendered in a United States court to the effect that the law permitting a tourist to bring goods to the value of $100 into the United States applies only to those tourists returning from Europe. However, perhaps that is not pertinent to the discussion, I know the great mass of the people would like to bring something in from the United States without paying duty on it, and I believe they are very much in favour of this idea. I do not say I would not be in favour of it myself, but at this time I am not prepared to make a pronouncement on it or to insert anything like that in the bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just to follow that up, might I suggest that as this would be a matter of government policy, and as a private member may not move an amendment which may involve loss or addition of revenue, it will depend entirely what attitude the government wishes to take whether or not this change will be made. I do not know the intentions of the minister, but if this bill is once passed it will require government action to bring about that change in the future.

Mr. EULER: I am open to correction, but I question very much whether that could be done in a bill of this kind. It appears to me that it is a tariff change and would be properly considered under that heading.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister would inform us—and I am asking only for information—who is to establish this value of $200 and on what basis? For instance, let us suppose that a man brings in goods to the value of $150; is the duty added to that value in order to bring it over the $200 limit, or how would that value be arrived at?

Mr. EULER: The value is arrived at according to the price paid for the goods, taken either from the invoice or possibly from what the man says.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The actual value?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Plus the duty?

Mr. EULER: Yes. When it comes into Canada it is worth what he paid for it plus the duty he should have paid.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then this clause is three times as drastic as it appears. If a man brings in goods to the value of $150 on which the duty payable amounts to $50, the duty is added to the purchase price and the poor devil will be proceeded against under the provisions of the act.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I believe this House and the country at large looks for something to be done to stop the smuggling of goods into Canada. We heard a lot last year about the customs investigation and thousands and thousands of dollars of the people's money has been spent—I may say wasted—to find out whether or not smuggling was being carried on. To-day legitimate merchants who buy goods and pay the duty look to the government for protection; they hope for some measure which will protect them by stopping the smuggling as much as possible. Therefore the Minister of Customs and Excise deserves a great deal of credit for bringing in this measure which, I think, will be an improvement.

Mr. POWER: I disagree altogether with the hon. member (Mr. Lavigueur) who sits next to me. I think the penalty is altogether too severe. Let us understand properly the functions of the Customs department. The Customs department is not a police department; it is not a department to inflict punishment on the citizens of this country; it is a department whose principal and ordinary function is to collect revenue. I have not much objection to the imposition of a fine of $500 on those who smuggle goods to the value of over $200; but when it comes to a question of sentencing a person to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than one year, the legislation becomes a perfect nuisance. Some poor unfortunate will smuggle goods to the value of $200 and it is easy enough for one to do that without perhaps thinking seriously of the consequences of the act. He is thereby placed, as I understand the legislation, at the mercy of two magistrates as to whether or not he will become branded as a criminal and go to the penitentiary for seven years. Really this is putting altogether too great power into the hands of the minister or of the Department of Customs. After all smuggling may be a crime, but it is not such a heinous crime that we must impose such heavy penalties. I would respectfully suggest to the minister that he make the gaol penalty much less severe.

Mr. PERRAS: I feel that the penalty is far too drastic. Would this penalty apply to wearing apparel, boots and shoes, dry goods or things of that description, or would any distinction be made between liquid and other goods?

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to support the views of the hon. member for Quebec South. I am sure the minister has the sympathy of everybody in this chamber in his efforts to prevent smuggling; but when you begin to put people into gaol, you are bringing upon their wives and families disgrace that will probably be handed down for two or three generations, and before you do that you should have some stronger excuse than simply the fact that a couple of hundred dollars' worth of goods have been smuggled into this country. I look upon a gaol sentence as being very severe, probably not so much on the man who is sentenced, but upon his wife and children. It is something that will follow them to the grave.

Mr. POWER: In many cases it is very hard on the husband if it happens to be the wife who goes to gaol.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member for Quebec South has more courage than I have. I would not say that before the House of Commons. If you make penalties too severe you bring the law into contempt. Many of us have had that experience in connection with legislation passed in Ontario during the last few years. When people have a contempt for the law, they will not be far away from anarchy. Our main object should be to have our people respect the law. I have voiced my objection before, and I will continue to do so as long as I am in this House, against imposing gaol penalties for what in the public mind is not a gaol offence.

I would like the minister to consider that because, by being too drastic, he may do more harm than good. We have to remember that the ordinary people in this country are not lawyers; they do not understand these penalties, and when they come into a police court and are tried by magistrates who are sometimes prejudiced, sometimes unfair, and I was going to say, never judicial in their decisions, we are putting into their hands too great a power. If these cases were all being tried by judges the matter would be different, but many of these magistrates are taken out of an office, some of them off a farm; they have no training in law, and their sense of justice is sometimes overridden by their prejudices.

Mr. EULER: Possibly my hon. friend may not have noticed that the penalty of imprisonment need not be imposed.

Mr. McGIBBON: But it may be.

Mr. EULER: I think it should be possible to impose that penalty in the case of the confirmed smuggler.

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. EULER: We want the power to go after the man who deserves the punishment. Those who are less culpable can be dealt with much more leniently under the bill as it now reads. The penalty may be either fine and imprisonment or only one or the other. It is not proposed to impose both fine and imprisonment. Some hon. members perhaps believe that this means where a man smuggles more than $200 worth of goods he must of necessity be sentenced to imprisonment. That is not the case. The point I am trying to make is that it is not obligatory on the court to impose the penalty of imprisonment. The court in its discretion may impose only a fine and surely it ought to have that power. The court has also the power to impose a sentence of fine and imprisonment, and I think it ought to have that power in some cases where we have a confirmed smuggler to deal with. It has the power, but it does not follow that it will always exercise that power. I would point out to the hon. member for Quebec South that it is not the minister who has that power; it is placed in the hands of the court.

Mr. EVANS: I think the minister would be well advised to hold this over and redraft it in such a way as to meet the wishes of a large portion of the members. It seems very unreasonable to me to classify as a professional smuggler and to make liable to the same imprisonment every person who happens to have been visiting the old country and to have returned with a few presents. I agree that the department should have all the necessary power to deal with the liquor question and commercial smuggling from the United States. The whole legislation relating to protection in this country has been too much in the hands of one man; too much power has been given all the way through to the Minister of Customs, and I would ask him to hold this over and redraft it in such a way as to differentiate between the ordinary citizen bringing in a few presents for his family and the commercial smuggler.

Mr. McGIBBON: My objection is not so much to the spirit of the legislation as to the power that is being placed in the hands of people untrained in the law. I might illustrate in this way what I mean. I know of a case that occurred a couple of years ago where a man was sentenced, I think, for three years in Kingston penitentiary for having stolen goods in his possession. The person who had stolen the goods swore that this man did not even know they were stolen, yet the magistrate convicted him and sentenced him to gaol for three years. If that had been in the hands of a judge I do not believe such a thing would have happened.

Mr. EULER: Indictable offences go to a judge except—

Mr. McGIBBON: Then my objection is largely overruled.

Mr. POWER: Even though it does go to a judge, I think seven years is far too much. We should not in these purely civil matters, and after all, that is all that the crime of smuggling is—it is only an attempt to cheat His Majesty's customs, and everybody knows that three-quarters of the people of this country do not consider it a crime—we should not, I say, create crimes by act of parliament with the intention of putting in prison people who really should not go there. We have enough crimes now in our criminal code without taking up the time of parliament in making more.

There is this further consideration. In the reorganization of the Customs department, I understand that there is to be at the head of the preventive service a man who hitherto has been dealing with the underworld, a man who has been in charge of the narcotic squad, in charge of the police whose duty it is to prevent the smuggling of goods into this country. This man must of necessity be someone who will not have the discretion and tact and the feeling necessary to deal with ordinary cases of non-commercial smuggling.

I doubt very much whether it is wise on our part to put at the head of the preventive service a man of that calibre. I am not saying anything derogatory of his character, for he must have been a man of some strength of character and of will to deal with the people with whom he had to deal. But when cases come before him such as he will have to deal with under this act he will be entirely out of his element, and I for one object to his being given the power which I suppose he will be given under this act to prosecute for violations of the law.

I would suggest to the minister that the term of imprisonment be not less than six months and not more than two years. Why, you can commit almost any crime on the calendar and get away with seven years, and I do not see why a specially made crime, as the result of agitation during the course of the last year or so, should be punishable to such a degree as it is under this act.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not see why in paragraph (b) the same option is not given as in paragraph (a). If the value of the goods is under $200, then the person convicted is liable on conviction to a fine or to imprisonment, or both; that is paragraph (a).

Mr. VENIOT: An amendment has been proposed.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I was not aware of that. In regard to what has been said as to the penalty being too severe, perhaps it is. At the same time, with whom are you dealing? If a man has courage enough to break into a bank or hold you up on the highway—and he is taking chances in doing that—and he gets away with a few thousand dollars, you would not say that seven years was too much for him; not at all, serves him right; and yet he had the quality of courage at all events. But here you are dealing with wholesale thieves, with men who are stealing not in small quantities but making a business of stealing wholesale.

An hon. MEMBER: Not altogether.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): To a large extent. I am referring now to the class of smuggler referred to by the minister himself, the man who has to be dealt with severely because he is making a practice of smuggling, as they have been doing in this country, stealing from the public revenues, not thousands, but millions and millions of dollars. I have no sympathy to waste on these people at all, not a bit. In so far as this is general and applies to all convictions for smuggling, I want to say that in my estimation it is not severe enough.

[Mr. Power.]

In dealing with these people who are engaged in the smuggling of narcotics, you should not stop at seven years; you should put them in prison for life. Better still, to save the country expense, they ought to be taken out and hanged. That is the way to deal with these people. There is no joke about that at all, because the men who are engaged for gain in the smuggling of narcotics are committing murder by degrees—the worst kind of murder. I have less regard for them than I have for the man who in a fit of passion kills his fellow-man; and I would deal with them just as severely as it was possible to deal with them. It may be that the term of imprisonment might be modified to some extent, but as to those who are going to make a business of smuggling, a business of wholesale stealing from the revenues of the country, men who are thieves and nothing but thieves, the law is there, and they disregard the law for the purpose of personal gain. I do not see, therefore, that they are entitled to any sympathy at all. I want to add a word of commendation of the minister for the vigorous manner in which he has undertaken to deal with these people. He deserves all kind of credit, and I wish him every success in his task.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Since the session was opened it has been made clearly manifest that we are going to maintain a customs tariff. This House has declared so by two votes, and if we are going to maintain a customs tariff, surely we must have some penalties for violation of the act. I agree in a large measure with what the Minister of Customs has proposed, that the penalty should be severe. However, I am entirely in accord with the suggestion made by the Postmaster General of allowing goods to the value of $50 to be brought into this country free by tourists. The Customs Tariff Act of the United States provides in paragraph 1695 that:

> Clothing actually owned by persons and in their possession at the time of their departure from a foreign country—

Shall be admitted, and paragraph 1696 provides that:

> Articles acquired abroad by residents of the United States for personal or household use, or as souvenirs or curios, but not bought on commission or intended for sale, up to, but not exceeding a total of one hundred dollars.

Shall be admitted free. I think if a good stiff penalty is imposed for actual smuggling, and some such regulation as they have in the United States Tariff Act is included in ours with regard to tourists bringing in a small quantity of goods, the difficulty that has been suggested here to-night will largely be overcome. The ruling given by the United States customs officials in the port of Detroit is that these goods shall be admitted free when brought in by bona-fide tourists touring abroad. It does seem to me that when we are going to have a customs tariff—and it seems we are, and a good high one, much to my regret—we have to have a stiff penalty for infractions of the law, but I believe that tourists should be allowed to bring goods up to the value of $50 or $100 into Canada, just as the American tourists are allowed to take goods back when returning to their country.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am quite sure that all members of the House are willing to support the minister in anything that will effectually deal with the professional smuggler. I wonder if instead of changing the word "and" to "or" in the third line of paragraph (b) he would make it read:

In the case of a previous conviction.

So that if the smuggler has been previously convicted the magistrate would have no option, but to commit him to gaol.

Mr. EULER: We have a section later on in the bill dealing with the same offence.

Mr. CANTLEY: I was not aware of that, but would not this be a good place to put it?

Mr. EULER: This section seems to have caused a great deal of discussion because of the penalty features of it. There are several other sections that also deal with penalty. I have no desire to force the measure through even if I could. I am quite willing to give it consideration. Possibly we might go on with certain sections which do not include this feature.

Mr. ESLING: Will the hon. minister consider an amendment to item 690A in the regulations? There has been talk of considerable latitude being allowed to tourists who bring in personal belongings. I wish to refer to the conditions that exist in some isolated communities. On the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway in the West Kootenay district the port of entry is Revelstoke. Many of the residents in the district along the Arrow lakes for a distance of one hundred miles are largely English families and at Christmas time they receive their plum pudding and other Christmas remembrances, but with great regularity those settlers are put to considerable inconvenience. They claim that these Christmas gifts should be admitted under the casual donations provision. I have in mind two concrete cases. For instance, at Christmas time a family in that district received from their own relatives in England a Christmas pudding and it was necesary to conduct a lot of correspondence with those families because they cannot get up to Revelstoke and back in less than three days to present their claim. The consequence was that last Christmas one family in that district did not receive their Christmas gifts. In the case of a haggis the customs collector went so far as to charge fifty-two cents to the family receiving it. Last Christmas season some of the families along the Arrow lakes did not receive their Christmas gifts from the old country until a week after the Christmas festival. Their plum puddings were held up—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. ESLING: It may be a joke to some hon. members, but it is no joke to these people. They are isolated and living about a hundred miles from the customs house and they are put to serious inconvenience until letters are sent back and forth between the customs officials and these people. In another case a charge of forty-two cents was collected from a settler for some shortbread sent from the old country for a Christmas present. Surely the customs officials should be permitted to exercise some little discretionary power in reference to Christmas presents. People expect to pay duty when they are sending to the old country to purchase goods, but when the parcels are marked "Christmas presents" I think the minister should ask the customs officer at Revelstoke to exercise a little common sense and let the parcels come in duty free.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister suggests that sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, stand.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there has been some little confusion between the granting of the authority to impose a penalty and the imposition of the maximum penalty. It does not follow that because the power is there it has to be exercised. Some of the observations that have been made would lead one to believe that hon. members were fearful that judges would, for a first offence, impose imprisonment of seven years in addition to the fine. We all know that that is out of the question. I quite agree with the section as drawn by the minister and presented to the House, and I believe it should be passed.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I would like to remind the hon. member for West Calgary of a little quotation with which he is quite familiar:

How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds
Makes ill deeds done!

Mr. BENNETT: I am so delighted that the hon. member has made that observation, because it shows how little he understands the character of the legislation. This is a judicial power, and it is subject to correction by the court to stop ill deeds, and not to make them done. Furthermore, it is a judicial power, and if anything wrong is done by the magistrate under our jurisprudence it is always open to the person who may be aggrieved to avail himself of the remedy accorded to him.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The poor man who cannot pay the fine must go to gaol; he cannot go to a higher court, by way of appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the solicitude of the hon. gentleman for those whom we heard of last winter will be received in some quarters as an act of very great grace indeed, and as indicating a sympathy for that class of the community that is much required.

Sections 15 to 20 stand.

Sections 21, 22 and 23 agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Look at section 23—

Some hon. MEMBERS: We are past that section.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It should not have passed. The same principle is involved here. Consider the penalty there—imposing on the man for having goods on the boundary line a fine not exceeding $1,000, or not less than $200, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment. I object to that section. It is in the same class with section 15.

An hon. MEMBER: It has been carried.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Not carried.

The CHAIRMAN: I declared the clause carried. If the committee wish it may be reconsidered.

Mr. EULER: It may stand.

The CHAIRMAN: On the suggestion of the minister clause 23 stands.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If clauses are to be slipped by in this way and if when an hon. member asks that a clause be reconsidered it cannot be reconsidered, we must protect ourselves by insisting that every clause be read.

[Mr. E. J. Young.]

Mr. EULER: I have suggested that it stand.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Thank you.

Section 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Being on board of smuggling vessel—penalty.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Here is another imprisonment penalty. I suggest that this clause also stand over.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How would it be to take all the penalties out of every infraction of the law? That is apparently what the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The hon. gentleman seems to think that any man found in the company of a smuggler or with smuggled goods in his possession is a thief and a coward. If I understand the law aright, a man found with stolen goods in his possession loses the goods; but we are providing here that if he is found with smuggled goods in his possession he is to be treated worse than a thief.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): He is worse than a thief.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is a nice sense of morality.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Let me cite the case of a young fellow as honest and honourable as any man born in Nova Scotia—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: He came from Lunenburg, I suppose.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If any man has anything to say against Nova Scotia let him say it.

Mr. MANION: You have just said it.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I am going to cite the case of a young man as honest and honourable as any man born in Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I say a young man perfectly honest. He happened to be on a boat off that coast, a boat that he understood was engaged in legitimate trade. Outside the three mile limit at the point of a gun he was compelled to do something that he found very odious indeed. Under this section that man would be branded a criminal.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): We must be careful in this legislation. I say again, there is no class of criminal that I detest more than the smuggler. Last year the customs scandal occupied most of our time and attention, with the result that these amendments are so drastic that they may bring the whole law into disrepute. Surely we have had sufficient experience to know that when we make penalties too severe we defeat the object we have in view and weaken rather than strengthen the law. With respect to the insinuation of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), I recall two cases of a similar nature, disagreeable cases, it is true, and one judge imposed a sentence of ten years and the other a sentence of six months. I have the highest regard for our judiciary, but when we hear of these marked variations in the penalties imposed for the same offence, we must be very careful that we ourselves are not responsible for enacting laws of such a drastic nature that they bring the whole law into contempt.

Mr. CANTLEY: I notice that in the third line of 216 the term "one league" is used. I presume the minister means three miles. This term is subject to misunderstanding, and as the words "three miles" are used almost everywhere throughout the act I suggest that this section be amended accordingly.

Mr. EULER: I have no objection at all.

Mr. VENIOT: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the words "one league" in the third line of 216 be changed to read "three miles."

Mr. CANTLEY: Three statute miles.

Mr. VENIOT: We had better be careful to distinguish between statute miles and marine miles.

Mr. CANTLEY: A statute mile is shorter than a marine mile, but I am not particular. The term "league" is out of date altogether.

Mr. VENIOT: I think we should make it read "three marine miles."

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 25 stands.

On Section 26—Keeping or selling, etc., goods unlawfully imported—forfeiture—burden of proof.

Mr. POWER: I think the opening lines:

> If any person, whether the owner or not, without lawful excuse, the proof of which shall be on the person accused,—

—are most objectionable. I do not know of any criminal act in which the accused is presumed to be guilty. A man charged with the most brutal murder is entitled to a fair trial, and the crown must adduce such evidence as will convince the jury that the accused is guilty. In this case a man who is on board a vessel which is liable to suspicion may be condemned—I suppose the conviction again is gaol for seven years—unless he can clearly show to two justices of the peace—who more often than not are uneducated and likely to be prejudiced—that he is not engaged in smuggling. As I have already stated, I think we are going altogether too far in these amendments. We are violating the very elementary rights of British subjects. I am surprised that my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who is one of the most staunch defenders of the rights of his fellow citizens, does not rise in his wrath and verbally smite the minister for daring to impose such penalties as are prescribed in this section. The very roots of individual liberty are being attacked, and I would suggest that the minister give careful consideration to this proposal before it passes into law.

Mr. EULER: This proposal is copied closely from the Customs Act in connection with an offence which it seems to me is milder than the one now under consideration. In that case it is provided that anyone who without lawful excuse, proof of which he himself shall establish, sends or brings into Canada or, being in this country, has in his possession any bill-heading or other paper or blank to be filled up and used as an invoice, shall be guilty of an indictable offence. That offence is not nearly so grave as the one under review.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That paper is used for purposes of fraud.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the minister mention an instance of lawful excuse?

Mr. EULER: I am not a legal man and I cannot interpret the law.

Mr. BENNETT: I am grateful to my hon friend (Mr. Power) for his observations as to my desire always to voice sentiments that favour the liberty of the subject. That however is not what we are discussing.

Mr. POWER: It is.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has such a wide knowledge of everything that he reminds me of what was once said of Macaulay: "If I knew as much about anything as he pretends to know about everything I should indeed be wise". I hesitate to make the remark I am about to make. Is there a desire on the part of the House to render nugatory all the efforts the minister has made to put on the statute book an effective law to prevent a recurrence of the conditions we had disclosed last year? Is that the object? If not, why make a joke of all this, as some hon. gentlemen seem to be doing? The truth is that in all jurisprudence, as my hon. friend from Quebec South so well knows, there are certain conditions which in themselves are regarded as prima facie evidence either of negligence or of guilt. For example, according to law of negligence, if a person travelling on a passenger train is injured, the very fact that the conveyance is one intended for passengers is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the company. We use the expression in law, res ipsa loquitur—the thing speaks for itself. So that in criminal cases where we have certain conditions which in themselves constitute an evidence of guilt, and therefore is prima facie proof of it, any person found in certain relationship to those conditions is presumed to be guilty of the offence involved. The onus of proving his innocence rests upon the person so found. In the particular section to which attention is called it will be observed that:

> If any person. . . . harbours, keeps, conceals, purchases, sells or exchanges any goods unlawfully imported into Canada—

—he must prove a lawful excuse. That is all. Take our laws relating to liquors. As my hon. friend from Quebec South knows, in Quebec, in Alberta and in Saskatchewan, under certain conditions, the onus of proving innocence rests upon the accused. Once a person is found in certain circumstances the onus is shifted and he must explain his position. This happens every day in respect of many matters I need not mention.

I shall not speak to-night on this question, but I desire to say this much before I conclude. I followed with a good deal of interest and some degree of effort all that was said last year with respect to the enforcement of the customs laws, and I learned then that men were perfectly willing to pay $1,000 at any time if they could get away with $5,000. They were quite prepared to pay $1,000 now and $1,000 again if by so doing they could gain $10,000, and this effort on the part of the minister and the government, by making the penalty so severe as to prevent a recurrence of what has so marked the administration of the customs laws of the country, must commend itself to hon. members. I do not say that severe penalties will cure evils of this kind, because they do not. But where you have a condition prevailing, a known condition such as that disclosed last year, and you find men flourishing as they do by gains ill-gotten from smuggling and from the importation of narcotics, it is time we made the penalties severe enough. Drastic penalties in such cases are found to operate as a powerful preventive. Let me give an illustration; take the case of whipping. Hon. gentlemen will recall that a certain class of criminal was perfectly content to suffer imprisonment for burglary, for housebreaking, for bank robbery and offences of that nature; but the moment you added the cat-'o-nine tails he became less eager to carry on his operations. The reason is psychological, as those will understand who have studied criminology. I remember reading some time ago an eminent criminologist's opinion in this regard. There is something in the psychology of this form of punishment so repulsive to the mentality of the burglar that he will not readily risk the possible infliction of the penalty, which therefore proves a strong deterrent. Here you have a type of man engaged in smuggling on a large scale; he is a professional, a member of an organized gang or clique which is trying not only to defraud the country of its revenues, but, as the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington has said, to work irreparable physical injury on our citizens. He traffics in narcotics and other drugs. I am not talking about the casual smuggler who brings across a bolt of silk; I am concerned with the class who are known to engage in a business which is a menace to the lives of people, as brought out before the royal commission now carrying on its investigations.

Mr. POULIOT: So that no one would risk the penalty, would the hon. gentleman be prepared to suggest the death sentence in this case?

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing could better accentuate the observations I made when I rose to my feet than the interruption of my hon. friend. There are under our criminal law three offences which may be punished by death; treason, murder and rape. The other day a judge imposed the penalty of death upon an accused convicted in Ontario of the last named offence and the Court of Criminal Appeal set aside that sentence. The point I make is this. The discretion as to what the penalty and the punishment shall be must always rest with the judiciary, but we have surrounded it with rights of appeal under which I venture to say there have been in this country very few instances of grave wrong done to any individual by reason of the severity of the punishment imposed. In addition to that there is the executive power which may always be set in motion for the purpose of relieving a convicted person from a penalty if under the circumstances there is evidence to warrant such action.

I am not going to trespass further on the time of the committee. I do say to my fellow members of this House, some of whom were not here last year, that if they have read the evidence given before that committee last year, and if they have been following the evidence given before the royal commission, they must realize the extent and the enormity of the injury being done to Canada through the loss of revenue. Not only have we been injured in that way, but also through the idea which has been going abroad in this country that by violating the law men may create great fortunes for themselves, and by their ostentatious display of their ill-gotten gains create feelings of envy and dissatisfaction in the minds of the decent people of this country. I think hon. members will agree that the time has come when we should at once say, "You are beyond the pale of our civilization, and the resources of that civilization are not yet exhausted against its enemies," to quote the language of Mr. Gladstone. We are now dealing with one of the resources of civilization, which civilization is threatened by the perils and evils which I have indicated without going into detail.

I suppose it is not usual for one on this side of the House to support an opposing minister with such warmth, but I know from what I have read and from what I have seen that we are facing great danger from the continuance of this condition in Canada, and it has become imperative that this gang of swindlers and smugglers can no longer become the leading men in their communities, displaying their ill-gotten gains, their high powered cars, their beautiful residences, their silks, satins and jewels, and thus arousing the envy of the less fortunate but honest people. We should brand them as criminals not only with a fine, but we should send them to the gaols of the country, and then and not till then will the laws of this country be observed.

Mr. BROWN: I am quite willing to believe in the good faith of those hon. gentlemen who have made objections to this bill, and who plead that undue penalties will be imposed upon people who are morally innocent. At the same time, I am inclined to fear that if the demands for the emasculation of this bill are successful it will leave the department with nothing more than a popgun with which to fight this evil. I think the knowledge gained last year through the sittings of that committee brought to our notice a condition of things which we must face in a most determined manner. Personally I am disposed to agree very heartily with the provisions which have been incorporated in the bill; some small amendments may be necessary, but in the main I believe we must adopt desperate remedies to cure desperate diseases. It may be true that ignorant and illiterate justices of the peace, men not accustomed to dealing with the law, may occasionally visit undue punishment upon individuals, but at the same time we must take that into account in all our laws, and we cannot depart from a sound principle because exceptional cases of hardship may arise. We must expect that that will be the case, but we cannot make laws to deal with exceptional cases. I repeat, I am afraid that if the suggestions of many hon. members are carried too far we will have nothing left which will be effective in meeting the condition of affairs which confronts us. I know in dealing with this question with the electors last fall I emphasized the need of considerable drastic measures to meet the deplorable condition revealed by the customs inquiry last year.

Mr. POWER: I would quite agree with the last two speakers if the majority of the people of Canada were professional smugglers, but those who carry on smuggling on a commercial scale are in the minority. If the resources of civilization are not exhausted, as my hon. friend has well said, surely we can find some means to punish these commercial smugglers without treating the whole population of our country as smugglers.

Mr. BENNETT: They will not be affected at all.

Mr. POWER: I will go further. My friend says the resources of civilization are not exhausted. Why, then, does he go back to the days of barbarism to find heavy punishments to inflict upon the people of this country? Many years ago sheep stealing was punishable by hanging; did that prevent sheep stealing? I think not; I am quite sure that on the contrary it prevented hanging. We are imposing heavy penalties on the people of Canada for infractions of the tariff law, while a large portion of the people of this country and a fair proportion of the members of this House regard any tariff law as morally wrong. So you place them in the dilemma of either following the dictates of their own conscience or violating the laws of the land. I do not agree with many who, like the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) may feel that the imposition of a tariff is morally wrong, but I do think consideration should be given to their views and that the penalties for carrying out what is after all no moral wrong to them should not be so heavy.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps my hon. friend would ask the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) whether the restrictions on the sale of liquor are morally wrong.

Mr. POWER: I am not at all interested in the views of the hon. member for Rosetown in regard to the restriction of the sale of liquor. I can quite sympathize with him if he feels that to a certain extent they are too drastic, but I do not wish to be brought into a controversy on that matter. I simply wish to point out to the minister that while for the time being he may have the sympathy of a majority in this House and perhaps of the majority of the people, he will find endless trouble in carrying out this act; time and again there will be brought to his attention cases of unfortunate people who have been unjustly condemned, and within a short time, in order to be workable, the act will have to be made far more lenient.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He stated this section was interfering with the liberty of the people; I do not agree with him, but the words are his. Does he not think that this is a case of sin following sin, of precedent piled upon precedent, since we made the fatal error the other day of interfering with free speech in this House?

Mr. POWER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would like to go back to the question I asked a few minutes ago, to which I would like an answer. I know that some time ago some gentlemen from Montreal went to the province of Nova Scotia and sold several automobiles that had been smuggled into Canada although they produced prima face evidence that the duty had been paid. I believe the victims are getting back their cars upon payment of the duty, and I see that the section as it stood previously was as follows:

> If any person knowingly harbours, keeps, conceals purchases, sells or exchanges any goods unlawfully imported into Canada, whether such goods are dutiable or not, or whereon the duties lawfully payable have not been paid, such goods, if found, shall be seized and forfeited without power of remission, and, if such goods are not found, the person so offending shall forfeit the value thereof without power of remission.

That would appear to me as quite reasonable and proper, but I can quite understand that it may have been difficult in a great many instances to prove guilty knowledge on persons who had such goods in their possession. What I would like to know now is whether the proposed section makes any change in the law other than shifting the burden of proof. The new clause reads:

> If any person, whether the owner or not, without lawful excuse. . . . harbours, keeps conceals, purchases—

And so on. Does that mean:

> If any person, without knowing the goods to have been smuggled, harbours, keeps, conceals, purchases.

It is important that we know this. How can a person in whose possession are found smuggled goods, escape the penalty? How can he go into court and show that he has a lawful excuse? Supposing he says that he was furnished with some sort of entry paper, would it be said by the court that he should have looked into and satisfied himself as to the genuineness of it? Would that be a sufficient answer by the crown to the excuse which he was offering? That is an important matter in that connection. I understand this is a copy of another section, and it may be that it is ample protection to the person who is accused, but the uncertainty should be cleared up. With regard to the general question of penalties, it is very important that we should scrutinize them, because undoubtedly the imposition of penalties which are too severe will not serve the object of carrying out the act properly.

Mr. EULER: I regret very much that I could not hear all my hon. friend was saying. If I heard him correctly, what I did hear was that he was objecting to the fact that formerly the clause contained the word "knowingly," and that word is now being replaced by the words "without lawful excuse." If that is his objection, the answer to that is simply this: It is practically impossible in these cases to prove that a man knew and so to secure a conviction. Under this clause he is given the privilege of making a lawful excuse. Just what form that may take, I am not able to say. It may be given in various ways.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the minister not think it is important to know that? There are men all over the country who may be proceeded against.

Mr. EULER: There is no doubt whatever that people were found unlawfully and knowingly in possession of smuggled goods, but it was impossible to show that they were knowingly in possession of those goods. We are now making it a little more difficult for those people to escape.

Mr. BOURASSA: In other words, I understand the object of the minister is to have the opportunity of reaching all the guilty parties, but with no opportunity for innocent parties, if they cannot prove their innocence, to escape. This is enlarging a very dangerous principle. I have always understood that from the point of view of moral law, as well as practical legislation, we should rather run the risk of letting one guilty party escape than of unduly punishing an innocent party. That is the great danger of legislation of this nature. I quite realize the object of the minister. Undoubtedly there is great difficulty in coping with the evil that was brought to the attention of the House last session by the committee of inquiry, but at the same time we should not let ourselves be impressed too much by the findings of that committee and we should think more of the dangers which we may run by introducing legislation that will either be impossible of application or work undue injury to people who will not be in a position to prove their innocence and thus to escape the penalties as they are provided for in this legislation.

Everybody knows that amongst officials of any department and especially those which are charged with the imposition of penalties, there exists the practice of enabling officers of the law to partake of the advantages of pursuit. Therefore they develop the spirit of finding guilty parties even when they do not exist and of endeavouring by all means to have parties found guilty in regard to whose guilt there is a doubt. They do this in order to justify their activities, to further their advancement with their chief, and to bring revenue to themselves. This is fully as great a danger to public morality as the amount of smuggling that may be done more or less under the application of a milder law.

If we had such a principle of severe punishment and such principles of evidence in all our criminal law with regard to offences of a much more immoral nature than those which are provided for by this legislation, the policy would be a general one; but as the matter stands now, with the leniency that is shown to such a variety and quantity of criminals and swindlers, especially in the financial world, I do not think the conscience of the country will be prepared to sustain a law of this nature and to make it easy for the government to carry it out. I think with the various members who have expressed the same opinion that the minister had better consider this matter further before it is passed definitely.

Section agreed to.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—Smuggling carrying offensive weapons.

Mr. POWER: I object to this clause which reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offense and liable to imprisonment for ten years, who while carrying offensive weapons is found with any goods liable to seizure or forfeiture under this act or any law relating to the customs, knowing such goods to be so liable.

Any hon. member knows very well that a large number of people who travel carry revolvers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POWER: I know they do. Perhaps they do not need to do so in Nova Scotia where my vociferous friends come from; but a great number of people, when they are travelling abroad, let us say, carry revolvers. It is known to a considerable number of hon. members that people think very little of bringing in a few packages of cigarettes or, if they are ladies, of bringing in two or three pairs of silk stockings. If you have that combination, an offensive weapon, such as a small revolver, and a pair of silk stockings found in the handbag of a lady coming across the border, she is liable to ten years' imprisonment. I simply point that out to the committee.

Mr. EULER: I might say that this clause is copied bodily from the criminal code. There is nothing new in it at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—Vessel leaving without a clearance, etc.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): This deals with the case of a vessel departing from a port in Canada without a clearance, and other very serious crimes, but the master of the vessel incurs a penalty of only $400, unless the cargo comprises wines or spirituous liquors, when the penalty is $1,000. There is no talk of imprisonment in this case, I notice. It says:

> If any vessel departs from any port or place in Canada without a clearance, or if the master delivers a false content, or does not truly answer the questions demanded of him——only a small fine of $400 is imposed, but the chap caught with smuggled goods in his possession, possibly not for commercial use at all, is liable to a penalty of seven years imprisonment. The two things do not go well together.

Mr. EULER: Surely the hon. gentleman must know that a vessel departing from a port in Canada without a clearance is entirely different from smuggling goods into the country. This is merely the case of a vessel departing without a clearance. It is not a very grave offence as compared with smuggling goods into the country.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In the opinion of many who took part in the customs investigation last year, and in the opinion of many thousands in the country, the trouble in Canada in the last few years has arisen from the desire to make money illegally through smuggling goods out of the country, and incidentally smuggling other goods in on the return journey. I say that if it is wrong to do one thing it is wrong to do the other. It is certainly wrong to allow a vessel to smuggle goods out of the country. We should not allow this contrast to stand. A vessel engaged in illegal smuggling operations escapes with a fine of $400, but the poor individual caught with a few smuggled goods in his possession is liable to a long term of imprisonment. I do not think the Canadian people will approve of legislation of that kind or will be morally behind it.

Mr. VENIOT: It has stood for fifty years.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That does not make it any better.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the penalty should be increased.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Melfort. It seems to me that these sections are in very, very great contrast. In one there is a very heavy fine and seven years' imprisonment imposed for a comparatively trivial offence, but in this case, where the social effects are very much more serious, there is imposed only a comparatively small fine, a fine that does not amount to anything in comparison with the value of the goods involved. If the hon. member for West Calgary found it necessary a little while ago to call upon this House to protect the country against vice, I do not see why he is silent at this time, because it seems to me we have essentially an evil here. I cannot see the distinction the minister is making between smuggling goods out of the country and smuggling goods into the country. If the minister was simply thinking in terms of a few little merchants who may be affected I could understand it but I do not think that is his calibre, and I would ask him to distinguish very clearly between these two classes of crime, the one smuggling goods out of the country, and the other smuggling goods in. I do not understand the distinction he draws.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. EULER: The fact that a vessel leaves a port without obtaining a clearance is not proof at all that she is smuggling goods out of the country. You cannot smuggle goods out of a country, so far as that is concerned. The mere fact that a vessel is leaving without a clearance may be an offence, but it is no proof of smuggling goods into any country, whereas when goods come into a country illegally, that is smuggling. There is a distinction; in the one case there is smuggling; in the other there is not necessarily smuggling.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true, but some of us who have followed the revelations of what has been happening on the western coast, which have been given considerable publicity in all our papers, and especially those of us who are resident in the west and have some knowledge of what has been going on, know that vessels have deliberately left ports ostensibly for Mexico or some other distant point, and the next day have arrived back in port again for another cargo. That seems to be fairly good evidence that there is something very wrong in such a procedure. What is the good of punishing the little man, putting him in gaol because he may have smuggled a few dollars worth of goods into the country, and allowing the man who is making a fortune to go scot free? I do not think the minister has at all answered my question.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the section?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think, Mr. Chairman, we have the right to hear from the minister a better explanation than he has so far offered.

Mr. EULER: I regret very much that the hon. gentleman does not comprehend what I say.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may be due to my ignorance, but I listened to the minister and I cannot see that he has given a reason that will warrant us in passing a clause of this character. I think in view of the serious character of the smuggling that has gone on on the Pacific coast, we should have some further explanation of this clause.

Mr. EULER: If it is the wish of the committee I have no objection to making the penalty greater; not at all; it is merely a matter of degree. But I do not think that the fact of a vessel leaving port without obtaining clearance is nearly so great an offence as smuggling goods into the country.

Mr. STEVENS: Would my hon. friend permit me? Perhaps I can assist a little in this matter. There are two things involved; there is the clearance of the vessel, and then there is the violation, if any, of the law in regard to the cargo of the vessel. Both these things are dealt with in this act. One of them simply involves the obtaining of a clearance by the captain; the other is where the cargo is composed of liquor, and that is what this whole thing refers to. There is a bond put up by the owners of the liquor, who may not be the owners of the vessel at all. That bond is for double the value of the goods, and in order to secure the release of that bond the owners of the liquor must produce a landing certificate. The whole trouble on the Pacific coast, as well as on the Atlantic coast, as was disclosed both by the committee of last year and by the royal commission was that the owners of this liquor were suspected of giving false landing certificates, and in some cases that was fully demonstrated. That is the crime to which my hon. friend refers. That is the offence which ought to be penalized very heavily, and I understand that we have already passed a clause—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—which deals with that very question of the landing certificate.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the penalty?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot say from memory. I think the privilege which had been granted by Canada is now practically wiped out.

Mr. EULER: That is the in transitu shipment of liquor.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it is now practically done away with. It grew up out of that practice. But the clearance of the vessel is a different thing altogether. Here is what really inspired—shall I say?—this amendment, particularly on the Atlantic coast; because on the Pacific coast it was carried on in a different way, on a larger scale altogether with larger boats. On the Atlantic coast there are smaller boats, fishing vessels and boats of that type that used to slip out of port without getting a proper clearance, and would then run to Rum Row or some other part of the coast. It is to deal with them that the penalty of $1,000 has been put in, in addition to the penalty of $400 which has been in the act for a long time. That fine is imposed on the owner of the vessel, the captain usually in the case of small vessels.

Another case in point was those vessels plying between St. Pierre-Miquelon, and Halifax. It was found that occasionally liquor would be smuggled, not by the vessel or the owners of it, but by parties engaging space in the vessel. This penalty is against the master or owner of the vessel for violating the law, so far as the clearance side of it is concerned. In addition to that there is the violation of the bonding privilege which carries with it an altogether separate penalty. I am not arguing the sufficiency of this. I am quite willing to support an increase of the penalty, but I am pointing out that there are two things involved, not merely one.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I recognize that there are two things involved, but why should a vessel leave a port without clearance? I can see no reason, except that there might be some reason in the master's mind. If he wants to hide the character of his cargo he may well wish to leave without a clearance. It may be no very serious thing to pass the immigration border without reporting. It is a technical offence to go across without reporting, but there is the provision disqualifying the one who does it from passing freely on the other side if he is caught. It may be no very serious offence in itself to fail to disclose anything he should declare in regard to goods that he is bringing in, but I submit that if he fails to go through the form provided by the government in reference to the clearing of goods then he comes under the law. In this particular case it seems to me it is the bounden duty of every master to take a clearance, so that we are not going further than we did in the other case if we say that the failure to take a clearance ought to be considered prima facie evidence that there is something wrong; and if we went as far as we did in the other case we would place the burden of proof on the master of the vessel. I am not saying it is fair, but that is what we did in the other instance. Of course, compared with the advantage that may be gained by the party if he gets his cargo through, the fine of $1,000 is a mere bagatelle.

Mr. BROWN: In the evidence produced last year it was made clear that the traffic in liquor was at the bottom of the whole trouble. I do not think there can be any doubt of that.

Mr. STEVENS: Very largely.

Mr. BROWN: In view of that fact it seems to me we should impose a severe penalty in a case of this kind. I am not familiar with the methods by which the business is carried on, or with the distinction which has been drawn between the two matters referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver

Centre. It seems to me that even with this provision it would be quite possible for a man who wanted to leave with a cargo of liquor to do so, and considering the amount of the fine he might very well be tempted to do so and refuse to obtain clearance papers, apart altogether from the question of bonding. It would still be possible for a man to leave our shores with a cargo of illegal liquor, even with a fine of $1,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it $2,000.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, any amount.

Mr. McGIBBON: Suppose the boat had a collision in port and got out in order to avoid a fine, do you think the owner should pay $1,000?

Mr. BROWN: You can rake up all kinds of exceptional cases, but we cannot give consideration to those. The penalty is not adequate and it should be adequate.

Mr. VENIOT: What part of the section does my hon. friend refer to when he says the penalty is not adequate?

Mr. BROWN: If the vessel has a cargo of spirituous liquor.

Mr. VENIOT: I move that it be amended and that the amount be fixed at $2,000.

Mr. BROWN: Make it $5,000, if you like.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The first part of the clause is more important than the second part. The first part deals with the vessel leaving port without a clearance. Not long ago such an act would be taken as prima facie evidence of piracy and a vessel leaving without a clearance would have to pay the penalty.

Mr. STEVENS: That applies not merely to vessels that might be suspected of smuggling liquor, but to any vessels. It must be remembered that, in the matter of clearances the Customs department has control, although to my mind it would be better if the granting of clearances were under some other department. In the case of small local vessels going out every few days, the master gets careless and does not report and the idea in imposing a $400 fine in the first part of the clause is simply to discipline the vessel. The latter part of the clause would apply to that class whom we suspect of practising smuggling as a business—illegal operation. There is that distinction. It is an anomaly which should not exist in this act, but it has been there from time immemorial.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is a difference between the two classes of shipping, and I suggest that this section be held over and reframed. The language is not sufficient. With reference to vessels leaving port without a clearance, there is the further offence of delivering a report of false content, and you are going to let the offender get away with a fine of $400.

Mr. EULER: That has been the law for thirty years.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Conditions and times have changed in the last thirty years. Thirty years ago there were no motor cars on the road, no radio, no commercial smuggling between the two countries and no reason for it, and to say that it was in the law twenty or thirty years ago is no reason why it should not be changed now to meet present conditions.

Mr. CANTLEY: I would suggest to the minister that it might be advisable to withdraw the section at the moment. I have reference to the last two lines—

> And the vessel shall be detained in any port in Canada until the said penalty is paid.

How can she be detained after the owner, has committed the offence and the vessel has sailed away?

Mr. VENIOT: It seems to me the point in regard to the clearing of vessels is not well understood. It does not apply to a vessel leaving Canada. It applies to the coastwise trade, vessels going from one port to another, and this committee does not want to impose extreme penalty on vessels doing a coastwise trade. If hon. members understood what this means to the shipping trade they would consider that this section was sufficient to meet the case. It is simply disciplinary. This very act has been in force since 1896, and in my experience in administering the customs laws of this country I have made many detentions where the captains neglected to clear their vessels in the coastwise trade, or even vessels clearing from one port in Canada with a part cargo to another port and leaving without a clearance. In those cases we have to detect them when they reach the other port in Canada before they finally go to sea. So really the penalty in the first part of this clause should not be increased; but where a vessel has liquor on board and the captain makes a false declaration to the collector of customs, he is guilty of perjury, for which the penalty should be severe. If the act is not enforced there will be all kinds of abuses, specially in the coastwise trade, and the customs authorities will lose control of those vessels.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I appreciate what the Postmaster General says about the difficulty of routine clearances, but this to my mind is a further reason why the clause should be redrafted.

Mr. VENIOT: We have had it for many years without any mistakes occurring.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Then why change it?

Mr. STEVENS: Only where the cargo is composed of liquor is there any change.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Everyone who has lived on the seacoast knows that vessels have to have routine clearances, but I do not think any argument adduced so far should convince the committee that the section should be passed. I ask that it be held over.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister consider that a fine of four hundred dollars is an adequate penalty for a master who "delivers a false content, or does not truly answer the questions demanded of him"?

Mr. EULER: That is not the only penalty imposed. Clause 254 of the Customs Act reads as follows:

> Every person who forges, counterfeits falsifies, or uses when so forged, counterfeited or falsified, any paper or document required under this act, or for any purpose therein mentioned, whether written, printed or otherwise, or by any false statement procures such document, knowing the same to be forged, counterfeited or falsified, or forges, counterfeits or falsifies any certificate relating to any oath or declaration or affirmation by this act required or authorized, is guilty of an indictable offence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under which clause would the department act?

Mr. VENIOT: Both.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment moved by the Postmaster General, that the word "one" in the twentieth line be struck out and the word "two" substituted, carry?

Mr. NEILL: Before the section passes I want to call attention to a phase which has not been mentioned to-night, and which I think is wrong. I know I will be told that it is nothing new, but I do not know that age particularly lends authority to an absurdity. The section reads that the master of any vessel who having received a clearance—perhaps he has liquor on board and has a legal clearance—goes out and takes in tow another vessel or performs any work without having mentioned in the report outwards his intention so to do, he is liable to a penalty of two thousand dollars. That is, he is supposed before he goes out to state that it is his intention to take a vessel in tow. He sees a small steamer or a gasoline boat in distress, takes it in tow, and for that act of humanity he is liable to a penalty of two thousand dollars or four hundred dollars.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. NEILL: I suppose someone will say that that penalty would never be enforced, but I think the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) will bear me out when I say that not long ago a Canadian boat going down the coast with liquor and away outside the legal limit of American control took a dozen or so men off a vessel in distress, and ran into the nearest port to land them, which of course brought her into American waters. Thereupon the master and crew were put in gaol for having liquor on board in American territorial waters. Here is a situation somewhat similar. Unless the captain knows beforehand that he is going to encounter rough weather, and to go to the rescue of a boat in distress he is liable to a penalty of two thousand dollars, simply for exercising the ordinary humanity of seamen. Would it not be possible to adjust that absurdity, or at least for the minister to give me an explanation?

Mr. EULER: The section applies only within the three mile limit in Canadian waters. We have no jurisdiction beyond.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will understand that this section would not apply in the case of a vessel helping another in distress. Here is the point in the tow. A tug might get its clearance for, say, Vancouver to Nanaimo and pick up a scowload of liquor. If the captain gets a clearance for the purpose of taking a tow, he is bound to so state. If, however, he wants to evade the excise law by taking in tow a cargo of liquor on a scow out in the gulf in order to land it further down the coast, he comes clearly within the act. My good friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is better versed in this than I am, but I think he will assure the hon. member that where a vessel picks up another in distress the Canada Shipping Act will amply cover the case.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be easy to insert "except in case of distress"?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but I do not think it necessary.

Mr. NEILL: We have rough water and boats in distress within the three mile limit.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In a case of this kind on whom is to be the burden of proof that the vessel was in distress?

Mr. QUINN: I should like the Minister of Customs to declare whether the three mile limit means three nautical miles or three land miles. I ask the question for the benefit of the present member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EULER: Three marine miles.

Mr. QUINN: Understand that?

Mr. DUFF: It looks to me as if you are within the three miles yourself to-night.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On Section 30—Contravention generally—forfeiture.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Chairman, I understand that if a man smuggles goods into this country in an old secondhand Ford car he is liable to lose his car, but if he uses a high powered Studebaker—which the rum runner generally does—he is not liable to have his car forfeited. Is that correct?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that that is not correct. I do not know on what the inference is based.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It is quite plain:

All goods shipped or unshipped, imported or exported, carried or conveyed, contrary to this act or to any regulation made by the Governor in Council, and all goods or vehicles, and all vessels under the value of four hundred dollars, with regard to which the requirements of this act or any such regulation have not been complied with, shall be forfeited and may be seized.

Then follows the next section.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The argument of my hon. friend from Weyburn is reasonable. A man smuggling goods in a vessel valued at $400 is liable to have his whole cargo seized. But a high powered car comes along—

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A car is not a vessel.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The section provides that all goods shipped or unshipped, imported or exported, and all goods or vehicles and all vessels under the value of $400, shall be seized.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The comma comes after vehicles. The "value of $400" applies to the vessels.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It seems to me that if you forfeit the whole thing in one case you ought to forfeit all in the other.

Section agreed to.

On section 31—If vessel is of value of $400 master liable to penalty of $400.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The minister may be glad to have his attention drawn to the fact that he may seize the vessel and exact its full value under this section.

Mr. EULER: We may seize the vessel now under another clause.

Mr. STEVENS: Only three words are being changed in this section. This is tried legislation which has been in use for years.

Section agreed to.

On section 32—Contravention of act in other respects.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): This section should stand over. There may be minor offences for which a man might be sent to gaol under this section and I do not think we should dispose of it without further consideration.

Mr. EULER: It is the same clause as in the Excise Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 33—Bribes.

Mr. POWER: The officer who accepts the bribe gets five years; the poor fellow who smuggles $200 worth of goods gets seven years. I just want to point that out.

Mr. GUERIN: We should not necessarily impose imprisonment. That should be left to the discretion of the judge. In some cases men have been sent to gaol without the option of a fine when in my opinion it should have been left to the judgment of the court to decide upon an alternative. It might be a serious thing to impose the penalty of imprisonment without the option of a fine.

Section agreed to.

Sections 34 to 36 inclusive agreed to.

On section 37—Counsel fee.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What is the explanation of this section?

Mr. EULER: The explanation is given on the opposite page.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The section provides for "a reasonable counsel fee in the discretion of the court." Why enact that there shall be any counsel fee?

Mr. POWER: Would this "reasonable counsel fee" be $200 a day plus $20 a day expenses, as in the case of the customs inquiry? Would that be a reasonable fee?

Mr. EULER: It is left to the discretion of the court.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Minimum penalty.

Mr. POWER: If there is one section worse than another in this bill it is section 38. I shall not discuss subsection 1 for the moment, but subsection 2 reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the Criminal Code or any other statute or law, the court, in a case of the conviction of any person charged with an indictable offence under this act, shall have no power to suspend sentences.

The reason as given in the explanation is that the proposal is intended to meet the situation which has arisen in prosecutions for indictable offences, where the accused has been committed for trial and the prosecution is conducted by the local crown attorney, who is not under the control of this department; the accused, having been found guilty, has been allowed his liberty on suspended sentence, contrary to the opinion and desire of the department. The judge hears the case, knows all its circumstances and, has had the accused before him. He is appointed by the highest authorities to administer the law and to give justice to all the citizens of this country and may decide in his wisdom that sentence may be suspended. Because of that fact and because an official located in the department at Ottawa, who knows nothing of the case and nothing of the circumstances surrounding it, thinks the judge should have imposed a heavy sentence, we are to change the whole system of law enforcement in this country; we are to take away from properly appointed judges the right to exercise mercy and suspend sentence. If there is anything more ridiculous I cannot find it on the statute books of this country, and I wish again to call the attention of the minister to the situation that will be created. Let us suppose that a man endeavours to cross the international border with half a dozen packages of cigarettes in his pocket or, as I said before, three or four pairs of silk stockings, he gets into an argument with the customs official and during the argument shoots and kills him. For the crime of smuggling the onus of proof is upon him; he must go to gaol; the judge cannot suspend sentence upon him, and he has all the forces of the law arrayed against him. For the crime of murder, for taking the life of his fellow man, he has first of all a preliminary investigation, during which he is given every chance. Then he goes before the grand jury, where a true bill must be found against him; from there he goes before a petty jury, where he must be declared guilty by his peers. In addition to that he has the opportunity of appeal, and he is not obliged to go into the witness box to give evidence on his own behalf. Under this law in every case in which the onus of proof is against him he must necessarily go into the witness box and give evidence and be at the mercy of the crown attorney, who may cross-examine him and rake up all the details of his past life. I think the condition would be intolerable. Under conditions such as these we will have police surveillance to an extent unknown in any of the countries of Europe. We have always boasted of the freedom of the individual, and I do not think this is the time to take away that freedom.

Mr. EULER: Since this clause has some relation to the other clauses which were disputed, I would suggest that it stand together with the others.

Section stands.

On section 39—Distribution of proceeds.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to ask first of all as to the present practice in regard to this matter?

Mr. EULER: The practice at present followed is that informers receive rewards only where there are actual proceeds resulting from the seizure or sale of goods seized. Very frequently goods are destroyed as for instance in the seizure of liquors; these goods may be entirely destroyed, and there will be no proceeds from the seizure. In cases of that kind the informer does his work but receives no reward whatever. That is unfair, and this change is intended to correct that.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I do not like that clause at all; it is outrageous. Every man who informs and gets someone else arrested and fined will be given a part of the fine.

Mr. EULER: A part of the seizure, but not of the fine.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): You are going to reward him for finding some one else guilty.

Mr. BOURASSA: The minister says the reward does not come out of the fine, but the section says:

Prescribing the manner in which the proceeds of penalties and forfeitures shall be distributed—

The word "penalties" covers a fine, surely.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. STEVENS: It may mean the double duty.

Mr. ERNST: In connection with the distribution of proceeds there is a matter I would like to bring to the attention of the minister; it does not fall entirely within this section, but perhaps it is covered more completely here than in any other section. In the case of an indictable offence a preliminary investigation is first held, and then the charge is laid or an indictment is preferred against the individual. In some instances men are kept in gaol for perhaps months before their case is heard, and during the time they are in gaol the expense of keeping them must be borne by the municipality in which they happen to be arrested, I have in mind one particular case which occurred in the county of Lunenburg some time ago; a vessel called the Ellice B was seized and five men were kept in gaol four or five months at the expense of the county. These cases are not exceptional; they are becoming more frequent every year, and it seems to me some provision should be made for the payment of a portion of the fines to the municipalities, at least in cases of indictable offences where a fine is also imposed. If witnesses are subpoenaed their fees must be paid by the municipality; the crown attorney is paid by the provincial government and the federal government which initiates the charge pays nothing except the fee of the special counsel who may be engaged. I would very much appreciate some expression in this connection from the minister.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to have some statement from the minister as to the meaning of the word "informer." Certain facts have come to my notice lately in this connection, and I would like the minister to tell me exactly what is meant.

Mr. EULER: The informer is the man upon whose information a conviction is secured or a seizure made.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the informer an official of the government, or may he be anyone at all?

Mr. EULER: Anyone.

[Mr. E. J, Young.]

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me that that is rather a vicious principle to adopt even in enforcing the customs laws of this country; it makes everyone a possible informer against his neighbour and I think a practice of that kind should not be recognized. I would far rather let the department have a larger preventive service of its own than to depend on outside information to secure convictions. A certain case came to my notice within the last few weeks of a person who was an informer; he did certain work for the preventive force of the Customs department. The same individual happens to be in gaol for doing the work of the Customs department. I have not much sympathy for that particular individual, but at the same time I do not think the government ought to put themselves into a position where their own informers are sent to gaol because they are doing the secret work of the government. Would it not be possible to cut out altogether this particular clause, so that if any information is required the officials of the department can go out themselves and secure it; that no rewards be given to informers but that proper wages be given to departmental officials?

Mr. EULER: It is a long established practice that rewards must be given if you are going to obtain information which will convict smugglers. It is perhaps offensive to most of us that men should be spying upon their fellowmen and so on, but it seems to be the only way in which you can obtain the necessary information in order to cope with the evil. The customs officials themselves cannot be informers and we have to depend upon others to supply us with information in connection with smuggling. Any seizures that are made or convictions that are obtained bring to the informer a certain reward. I admit at once the profession is not a particularly pleasant one, but it seems to be necessary in order to enable us to carry out the law properly.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister any information to give to the committee as to how this works out in actual practice?

Mr. EULER: I can merely say in a general way that it is found fairly successful.

Mr. VENIOT: If you do not do that you have to have an organized secret service which would cost the country a good deal of money.

Mr. ERNST: Can the minister give me an answer to the question I asked with reference to the policy of his department as to allowing municipalities, which are responsible for keeping the peace and have to bear a large share of the expenses in connection with these prosecutions, to obtain some portion of the proceeds from the fines?

Mr. EULER: I regret very much that I cannot give my hon. friend a definite reply except to say I am informed that I have no jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would like an explanation from the minister of a couple of lines in paragraph (n) which reads:

Prescribing the manner in which the proceeds of penalties and forfeitures shall be distributed—

The new part reads:

—and providing for payment to informers forthwith after seizure of an award based upon the value of the goods seized and not dependent upon forfeiture or proceeds of forfeiture.

I agree that the minister must have efficient help in order to enforce the law, but I do not understand the wisdom of giving informers payments based upon the value of goods seized forthwith after seizure, and not dependent upon whether those goods have been forfeited or not. If informers are going to be rewarded for simply going out and seizing, they will continue to do that and the department will get into serious trouble. If, as is quite possible, this depends upon seizure and conviction, I would suggest that the words "and conviction" be added after the word "seizure" in order to make this paragraph plain.

Mr. STEVENS: I may interject here that this was one of the very difficult problems with which we were faced last year. The sentiment expressed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was, I think, entertained by every member of the committee on the first approach of this problem, but we examined with care the officers of the department and this question was carried along for some weeks. The final decision was expressed in this clause in the report:

The committee recommends that the regulation governing the distribution of proceeds of fines and forfeitures be revised and that more liberal treatment be accorded informers and seizing officers.

The point referred to in this clause arose out of the situation. Very frequently as a result of information a seizure is made that is of distinct value to the country. I could cite many and illustrate some striking ones. Then for some reason or another the seizure is not immediately wound up, or a case may occur where the goods are of such a character that they are destroyed. For instance, let us take one of the most difficult things that the country is facing and has faced for years—narcotic drugs. If a seizure is made of narcotic drugs of considerable value, such seizure perhaps entailing on the part of the informer the greatest risk of any class of his work, those goods are destroyed; there is no return from them. The goods cannot be sold and a moiety given to the informer. Therefore this provides that in a case of that character the department, or the government, or the country, will pay to the informer a moiety proportionate to the value of those goods had they been sold instead of being destroyed, although it is distinctly in the interests of the country that the goods be destroyed. That is the reason for this amendment. I may add, as I said in my opening remarks, that I agree with all those who have a dislike for moieties to informers, or stool pigeons, or whatever you like to call them. All my life I have had an abhorrence of this practice. On the other hand there are many, I was going to say very respectable individuals who act as informers although there are many who are certainly far from respectable.

Mr. HEAPS: Do those people who are respectable do the work for the benefits that accrue from it?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, some of them make a profession of it.

Mr. VENIOT: Just as a detective does.

Mr. STEVENS: They are practically private detectives, if you like. I am not saying that it is a profession one would glorify at all, but it is one of those lines of business that is followed and that is seemingly very necessary in order properly to detect crime.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have no objection to the informer being rewarded for his services, but what I object to and what I would like to get the minister to explain is the part of the paragraph which reads:

And providing for payment to informers forthwith after seizure of an award based upon the value of the goods seized.

I appreciate the hon. member's explanation as far as it has gone in regard to goods that are destroyed. It is in the interests of the country that such goods should be destroyed; they cannot be sold. But if this is left as it is and the words "and conviction" are not added after the word "seizure", it is going to lead to criminals getting together, one of them acting as informer for the Customs department, another coming along with the goods and having them seized, his partner being rewarded and he himself appealing to the court and getting the goods released. This clause like many others in the bill is not worded so that the ordinary layman can understand what it means.

Mr. VENIOT: Does my hon. friend know that section 286 of the act gives the governor in council power to make regulations? This is not a statutory amendment; it is the power to make regulations to cover such cases.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The copy of the bill which I have reads:

Paragraph (n) of section 286 of the said act is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a copy of the act, and section 286 reads:

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, and in the manner hereinafter provided, in addition to the other purposes and matters in this act mentioned, make regulations for or relating to the following purposes and matters.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is there anything unreasonable in adding after the word "seizure" the words "and conviction"?

Mr. EULER: It still remains in the discretion of the government to make such regulations as it sees fit to deal with the situation.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): This is giving them power without a conviction having been registered.

Mr. VENIOT: It gives them power, but it does not make it obligatory upon them to do so.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What is the objection to adding the words "and conviction"?

Mr. STEVENS: There are lots of seizures and forfeitures without convictions; that is the trouble.

Mr. BOURASSA: With regard to the new and respectable class of civil servants which the acting minister of customs—

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the language that I used.

Mr. BOURASSA: The acting minister spoke of somewhat respectable informers. In view of his experience with the operation of the law, which apparently will be confided to his care, I think it would be well for him to organize that service, because, after all, what with those informers who are respectable, those who are not respectable, and those who are ordinary criminals and are going to partake with respectable criminals in some of the receipts of the Customs department, we should go a step further, I suppose, and have them classified by the Civil Service Commission. Those of them who are respectable, since the government and the laws of the land are going to encourage this kind of administration, should be put on the regular civil service list and a part of their proceeds should go to the pension fund, so that we might create in the land that kind of coöperation in the public service. Since it is found that the police force of the Customs department is not capable of dealing with the law and enforcing the penalties, since it is found that the ordinary principles of law as applied from time immemorial are not sufficient for the trial of individuals violating this law, since we are creating this new legislation for the correction of this enormous crime of smuggling, I would suggest that we make this new form of civil service an effective one.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Get a classification by the commission.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, and ratings and all that sort of thing which the Civil Service Commission does. That might help to stimulate the ordinary service of this department which is found to be totally ineffective for the application of the law. Really, seriously speaking, Mr. Chairman, I think it is most shameful that in a public law it should be declared that we offer a reward to one of the most contemptible and despicable classes of people. It may be necessary in war for generals to make use of spies. They may be obliged at times to bribe individuals belonging to the other army to get information; but I have never heard that it was considered that the spying process with which war is accompanied is acknowledged by law and rewarded by law, and of parliament voting the money. As far as I am concerned this whole clause is revolting to every sense of decency. It is all very well to pass laws to please a certain number of merchants in Montreal, Toronto, and elsewhere, to help them against the small smugglers, though we have been helping them for years past in the kind of smuggling they are carrying on themselves by false entries given to the regular officers of the customs service, as has been done from time immemorial, in Montreal at least, that I know of. It is all very well to pass extraordinary laws, drastic laws, immoral laws to help a small and powerful class of people who were evidently able to impose their will upon the last government and upon the present branch office of the Tory government; but at the same time as a Canadian and as a liberal-minded representative of the people I protest against such kind of legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: It is most interesting to hear the protest of my hon. friend with that facility of language he has for clothing his insinuations, but I would like to remind the House and the committee that this law that he talks about has been on the statute books for a great many years: indeed, it was originated and passed when he was a younger member of this House by the government of which he was then a supporter. I am discussing this subject as a member of the House, and I intend to exercise my right to discuss legislation without asking the hon. gentleman's permission to do so. I am taking this amendment as an amendment to an act that has been in force for a great many years. I took the opportunity of saying a moment ago to the committee that this whole subject, which is repugnant, I will admit, to practically all of us, was analyzed and discussed by the committee. We did the best we could to find some other solution for this method of detecting crime, but no other solution presented itself than the one that is presented here. It has been in the law since 61 Victoria, 62 and 63 Victoria, and 3 Edward VII. This amendment is merely adding a very few words. It is not introducing any new principle: it is no new departure from the law at all. It merely provides that where the goods seized produce no return, the informer in that case shall receive a moiety equal to the value of the goods or to the portion of the goods which would have come to him had they been sold.

There is not much occasion at this stage of the game to heap abuse either upon the minister or upon myself or others who may support his efforts to meet a very difficult situation. Let me add this. The whole country realized when the hon. gentleman took office as Minister of Customs that he was undertaking a very, very serious task. I wrote him a letter which he has on his file, when I left the office, tendering to him then my coöperation in making this department effective and efficient. Not only that, but I have offered him my coöperation across the floor of this House, and I think it ill behooves my hon. friend from Labelle to throw a few cheap slights at me because I am tendering to the minister the benefit of what little experience I may have had in this matter and what little support I can give him in getting this very difficult legislation through. No minister has as heavy a task as the Minister of National Revenue. His department has grown into an enormous one. A few years ago it was only the Customs department. What has he got to-day? Customs, all of the excise, which was a separate department when I came into this House, all of the sales tax, the income tax, and all the stamp taxes. He has more responsibility and a greater burden upon his shoulders than any other minister. In addition to that, because of circumstances which we will not analyze now, he found when he entered the department that it had, according to a report of a committee of this House, largely broken down. Without now making any recriminations as to why it broke down, the fact is there, and the minister is now trying to lift this department into some efficient state of organization. I am here to help him; I will give him my help to the best of my ability, and no clever, cheap quips on the part of my hon. friend from Labelle will intimidate me. I am not the Minister of Customs; I was for a short time, and I will give to the Minister of Customs the benefit of whatever experience and knowledge I have of this very, very difficult and perplexing problem.

Mr. BOURASSA: The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken if he thinks I want to have any cheap quips at his expense. On the contrary, I congratulate him that he still governs the Department of Customs, and that he has found a very devoted deputy and supporter in the present instance.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not sincere in that, and he knows it.

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not criticising at all the efforts that are being made to improve the administration of this department. The efforts that are being made to correct the administration of the department meet with the hearty coöperation of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have no objection to that either. I am simply saying that some of the provisions in this bill have been evidently worded and introduced with the desire to respond at any cost to the feeling that smuggling is the worst and the most abominable offence that can be committed, and also to please the interests of a certain class of people; and under that feeling we are simply forgetting some of the basic principles of legislation and public morality. That is my contention.

With regard to this very section, the hon. member says it is a mere repetition of the previous law. I think that is a false position, because on the opposite page, paragraph (n), we find the law as it stood:

(n) Prescribing the manner in which the proceeds of penalties and forfeitures shall be distributed.

That was the law.

Mr. STEVENS: And is the law to-day.

Mr. BOURASSA: Plus exactly what I denounced, what did not exist before.

Mr. STEVENS: No, my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. BOURASSA: I beg your pardon. The text goes on:

The words underlined in the new paragraph are added.

And these words are:

—and providing for payment to informers forthwith after seizure on an award based upon the value of the goods seized and not dependent upon forfeiture or proceeds of forfeiture.

So that the new words being added now are the official recognition of those informers.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course they are.

Mr. STEVENS: The principle of paying informers is in the act now and has been there for thirty years.

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not discussing that.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the whole point.

Mr. BOURASSA: I quite admit—we are forced to admit—that in certain operations of government and in the application of laws, ministers are bound at times to resort to certain processes which are repugnant. I compared the fact that informers were being used with the fact that at times spies have been used. But I objected to having informers brought into the law as regular servants of the government and paid by the government out of public funds.

Mr. STEVENS: They are used no more now than they were formerly.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, I beg pardon. In former times the minister could make use of them and pay them, but there was not an acknowledged system in the law of employment of informers, emphasized by the declaration of the minister that in all cases his officials accept information from anybody, from that class of respectable informers of whom the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has spoken, as well as from any scalawag or any criminal, who will now be placed in a position to exercise vengeance or blackmail most powerfully and will be able to place the whole burden of proof upon his victim. The judge will have no discretion in the matter and will have to take the evidence as it is made by the informer—respectable or non-respectable, criminal or otherwise, perjurer, perhaps, who will be the paid agent of the government of Canada, who will be offered a recompense by the government of Canada, and the judge will have to convict the victim who may be more innocent than the paid agent of the government acting under this law.

Mr. STEVENS: Which has been in the law and has been the practice for thirty years.

Mr. BOURASSA: Then we are in the face of a falsification; because the text of the law simply states that the minister may pass regulation to direct how the proceeds of the siezure will be distributed; but unless this is a falsification the informers were not acknowledged in the law and were not paid by the law. It was a discretionary power in the hands of the government to distribute the proceeds of the seizure as it is worded here:

Prescribing the manner in which the proceeds of penalties and forfeitures shall be distributed.

In other words it was a discretionary power exercised under a law far less rigid than the present provision and far less drastic.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. BOURASSA: I beg pardon.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will not argue that the adding of these words, which merely provide that in case the goods forfeited are not sold they can be provided for in the way prescribed here, is giving any more power in the distribution of moieties than is in the original act.

Mr. McMILLAN: Why add them?

Mr. STEVENS: For the very reason that in some cases goods are not realized upon, and this is to provide that in such cases the moiety may be paid.

Mr. BOURASSA: Under the text of the law as it stood there was no legal recognition of the services of the informer.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, there was.

Mr. BOURASSA: There was discretionary power given to the minister to distribute the proceeds of the seizure, and under that discretionary power his officials could reward the informer, but that was all. If the discretionary power given is all that is being asked for, why add these words? However, in a sense it is better to have it that way; because that shows the spirit of this new law, to be carried on against all principles of legislation and administration as applied in civilized countries.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to endorse what my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has said. This section is revolting in the extreme. To my mind the whole thing is revolting. We have been trying to-night to legislate for the administration of an act that is an evil in itself. In common with my hon.

friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) I do not mind saying frankly to this House that I have always taken the stand that protection is not only economically wrong, but that it is morally wrong. In this bill to-night we have differentiated between one evil and another. The man who brings goods into this country is liable under this measure to fine and imprisonment and his goods are liable to seizure. When the people defy the law by exercising what should be the inalienable right of citizens to buy and sell where they please, the utmost penalty is incurred. But when a cargo of liquor is sent out from a port without the captain securing a proper clearance, what is the penalty? We send that liquor out to demoralize the citizens and defy the laws of a friendly country, and we impose a $1,000 fine upon the offender, which to him is not more than ten cents to the ordinary man. The whole thing is immoral, the law is immoral. The act we are putting through to-night is an indictment against the nation. This very section is nothing more than the crowning act of an evil law, and is revolting in the extreme.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to test the feeling of the House. It seems to me that this particular practice is abhorrent to the good sense of all the members who have spoken on the section. I do not believe we are justified in encouraging other people to do what we ourselves would refuse to do. Let me quote the explanatory note:

> Informers, particularly with regard to offences against the liquor laws, take great risks of property and even life, and it is believed that if prompt awards could be paid as provided by this amendment the receiving of information would be facilitated.

This simply means that if we put up a larger reward we encourage those unfortunate individuals to take greater "risks of property and even life." In my own city a few years ago the police magistrate refused to take the evidence of informers, and their use was finally abandoned because it was found to encourage men who were essentially criminal in character. Therefore I move:

> That all the words after the word "repealed" in the nineteenth line to the word "forfeiture" in the twenty-sixth line be struck out.

It simply means deleting paragraph (n).

Mr. RALSTON: In reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Labelle, I do not think any new principle is being introduced by recognizing in terms an informer and the payment to him of a certain portion of the penalty. This is recognized in our Criminal Code in express terms in section 1041 and 1042. They provide that a moiety of any penalties imposed shall belong to the informer or person who sues for the same, and the other moiety to His Majesty for the public uses of Canada. I quite realize in common with other members that the informer engages in a rather undesirable job, but I do not think we are going outside our legislative purview in this instance. We are simply providing that whereas now the informer is paid only a portion of the penalty after the conviction, new regulations may be made under which he may be paid an amount based on the value of the goods seized.

Mr. BOURASSA: There is a radical difference between the case quoted by the hon. minister and this case. The former is a rather rare type of case and is surrounded by all the protection afforded to the accused person under the criminal law; but here you disregard all the principles incident to the trial of an accused person. You put him in the most unfavourable position with respect to the burden of proof and the discretion of the court, so that he can hardly defend himself; and then, having discarded all the guarantees given to the accused before he is found guilty, you invite thousands of individuals from the Pacific to the Atlantic to interest themselves in the application of this law in order to make money.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, the government has been making an honest effort to correct some of the abuses which were brought so forcibly to the attention of the House last year, and is quite sincere in its desire to stop smuggling. But it is now twenty minutes to midnight, we have been debating this question for over an hour and apparently the committee are somewhat divided. I for one feel that we have done a pretty good day's work. and I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of Customs to report progress. Probably on reflection hon. members will realize the propriety of the clause as presented.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance who is now leading the House says that the government has a sincere intention of passing this bill and improving the customs law.

Mr. ROBB: The bill was presented with the sincere desire of putting a stop to smuggling.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He will realize that the objections to the bill have not emanated from the Conservative opposition. We on this side have used every effort to assist the passage of this measure.

Mr. ROBB: We recognize that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The reason it has not been passed is that hon. members opposite, supporters of the government, objected.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I resent what has been said from this side of the House that this measure is fathered or assisted or initiated by anyone on the other side. The charge is not fair. The language used by the hon. member for Labelle that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is the acting minister of customs is not worthy of the generosity of the race from which he comes.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: I am not going into the merits any more than to say that no new principle whatever is introduced in this clause. The informer has always been recognized. It is merely an effort to carry out the recommendations made by the parliamentary committee last session. The opposition that has developed is more or less of a surprise to me. I beg to move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Friday, March 25, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fifth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Young (Saskatoon).

Fourth and fifth reports of the select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville).

Second report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hay.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi) moved:

That the second report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 216 (from the Senate), for the relief of Queenie Isobel Parks.—Mr. Bothwell.

Bill No. 217 (from the Senate), for the relief of Charles Shedrick Phillips.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Bill No. 218 (from the Senate), for the relief of Lavina Harrison.—Mr. Bell (Hamilton West).

Bill No. 219 (from the Senate), for the relief of Marretta Isobelle Grose Leach.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 220 (from the Senate), for the relief of Mabelle Amelia Bulmer.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

Bill No. 221 (from the Senate), for the relief of John Lauron Garfield Evans.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

Bill No. 222 (from the Senate), for the relief of Ernest Arthur Kingston.—Mr. Young (Toronto Northeast).

Bill No. 223 (from the Senate), for the relief of Norah Louise Patricia Campbell Chauvin,—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

NORTH HURON VACANCY

On the Orders of the Day:

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Will the government inform the House when they contemplate holding the by-election in North Huron?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry I cannot give any information to my hon. friend, but I will submit the question to the Prime Minister.

CARILLON FALLS POWER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the government tell us what its intention is with respect to the renewal or otherwise of the lease to the National Hydro of the Carillon water-power, and if the lease is to be renewed will the government give the House an opportunity of studying the terms and discussing the matter?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): I hope all these matters can be discussed when a certain bill goes before the committee on railways and canals, and I will be prepared then to indicate the intentions of the government.

OLD AGE PENSION BILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Following up an item appearing in the Ottawa press this morning to the effect that the Old Age Pension Bill was passed in the Senate yesterday, will the minister inform us if he is aware of it, and if he has received any official notice in any way other than the press report that such is the case?

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): My information is that the Old Age

Pension Bill has received the third reading and that not only has it passed the Senate but it has reformed the Senate.

ALLEGED POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): I wish to quote an item appearing in the Vancouver Province, which reads:

> Ottawa, March 19, 1927.—Alexander I. Fisher, Fernie, B.C. has been named commissioner to investigate charges of political partisanship preferred against government employees in British Columbia. Official announcement of the appointment of Mr. Fisher is made here. Mr. Fisher was formerly provincial member for Fernie.

Will the minister inform me what the duties of this man will be, at whose recommendation he was appointed, and if it is possible, may we have the correspondence leading up to his appointment laid on the table?

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Mr. Fisher was asked to act as commissioner to investigate certain charges of partisanship in the service. I may inform my hon. friend that Mr. Fisher has not found it convenient to act and that another commissioner will be appointed to make the investigation.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): I beg to lay on the table of the House a resolution passed by the municipal council of Burlington, Halton county, Ontario, against the renewal of the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company and opposing Bill No. 78.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 141, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I desire to say a few words with respect to this bill. Bills Nos. 139, 140 and 141 all contain the same subject matter and are really collateral amendments effecting the main purpose which the government has in view, and I trust I will be excused if I make one statement with regard to the three of them. I think every member of this House will be in favour of any efficient measures which are taken to create public confidence throughout the country in the constitution and administration of the Supreme Court of Canada. I notice in the report of the Imperial conference that it is suggested—and in fact the assent of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Justice to the recommendations of that report would seem to imply,—that, tentatively at least, they have agreed to the appointment of a sub-committee of the Imperial conference to inquire into, report upon and make recommendations with regard to amendments to certain imperial statutes, which give the statutory right to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to hear appeals from the appellate courts of the various provinces of Canada, and from the Supreme Court of Canada. A few years ago this parliament passed an amendment to the criminal code which now appears as section 1025. It provides that:

> Nothwithstanding any royal prerogative, or anything contained in the Interpretation Act or in the Supreme Court Act, no appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or order of any court in Canada to any court of appeal or authority, by which in the United Kingdom appeals or petitions to His Majesty in Council may be heard.

It was contended in this House at the time and subsequently in some of our courts that section 1025 did prevent the king in council from granting special leave to appeal in Canadian criminal cases. The constitutionality of the enactment recently came before the Privy Council in the case of Nathan vs. the King, which is reported in 1926 appeal cases, page 482, and the Privy Council decided it was void ab initio. They declared that the ancient prerogative right of each citizen of the British Empire to appeal to the king in council had been embodied in certain statutory enactments of the Imperial parliament, notably the Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1844, which expressly provided for the admission of any appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from any judgments, sentences, decrees or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad. Those acts also empowered the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, by sequestration of real and personal estate, goods, chattels and effects wheresoever lying within the dominions of His Majesty, to enforce obedience to orders of the Judicial Committee. I infer from the report of the Imperial Conference Committee that this government, at least as its views were expressed at the conference by the Prime Minister and by his colleague the Minister of Justice, contemplate amendment by the British parliament of those Judicial Committee Acts in such wise as to restrict, if not abolish entirely, the right of appeal from the Dominion courts to the king in council.

I do not think, that I would object to very decided restrictions upon the right of appeal to the Privy Council in criminal cases; nor in commercial cases, nor involving questions as between province and province, would I object to certain restrictions, because in my own practice I find that the right of appeal to the Privy Council in such cases often becomes a menace to the rights of individuals who have not sufficiently large financial resources to enable them to maintain their defence to appeals granted to large and wealthy corporations throughout Canada. In fact I believe that corporations of this character have made use of their financial strength to intimidate and to restrain litigants from maintaining judgments which they have obtained in the highest courts of this country, by threatening them with an appeal to the Privy Council, and, if the threat was not successful, putting an appeal into effect. The expenses of an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are ruinous to litigants of moderate means, and I think the time has come when the government might well consider the amendment of the Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1844 in such manner as would restrict the right of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to grant leave to appeal in many classes of commercial cases.

The decision of the judicial committee in the case of Nathan vs. the King was based, as all the lawyers of this House are well informed, upon the principle that acts of the parliament of Canada restricting appeals to the Privy Council are repugnant to certain sections of the Judicial Committee Acts, and that to the extent of that repugnancy they are null and void ab initio, by reason of the application of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865. I understand from the report of the Imperial Conference Committee, to which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice gave their assent, that they agreed with representatives from the other dominions that negotiation should be entered into and measures taken to secure an amendment or a repeal of the Colonial Laws Validity Act. With regard to that, there may be opportunity for discussion at another time.

But if we are to contemplate at the present time or within the near future the abrogation or restriction or limitation of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it becomes incumbent upon this government and parliament to strengthen as far as possible the Supreme Court of Canada as the highest appellate tribunal in this country. I presume that is what the Minister of Justice has in view. The measures which he has taken to strengthen that court do not altogether appeal to me, but I am merely expressing my own personal views. The other day I listened to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) discussing the question of longevity and the physical and mental incapacity that is supposed to overtake men at the age of 75 years, and I was glad to reflect that perhaps the difference between my own point of view and that of the hon. member was due to the fact that he and other young men in this House, who rendered brilliant service throughout the five years of the war, and who have since then given splendid public service in this House and elsewhere, have during the five years of war lived perhaps the same length of time that ordinary mortals like ourselves live in a score of years. Therefore it is but natural that now, before having reached even the prime of life, he looks forward to twenty-five years hence as a time when he would be physically and mentally unfit to perform the duties of his profession. But when sitting in my library last Sunday afternoon I was reminded of an old verse of Longfellow's which I looked up, in which he said:

> Cato learned Greek at eighty; Sophocles
> Wrote his grand Oedipus, and Simonides
> Bore off the prize of verse from his compeers,
> When each had numbered more than four-score years,
> And Theophrastus at four score and ten
> Had but begun his Character of Men.

That led me to the reflection that we have in the United States Supreme court, to which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred, one of the most brilliant judges that New England ever produced, one of the greatest authorities on English common law that we have ever known, a gentleman who now sits in the full vigour of his manhood and intellect, delivering judgments from day to day at eighty-six years of age.

There are others. For instance, I looked up another volume and I found that Sir Horatio Lloyd, the venerable recorder of Chester, England, performed the duties of his office to the entire satisfaction of the clients of the court over which he presided, until his death at the age of ninety-one. Lord Chancellor St. Leonards had full intellectual vigour until he died at the age of ninety-three. Lord Halsbury, one of our great lord chancellors, preserved his physical and mental power until he was over ninety years old, and he died recently at the age of ninety-six. Lord Mersey, another English judge, sat on the bench until he was over eighty-one years of age.

I remember another figure who played a great part during the recent war. I refer to Georges Clemenceau who really led not only the political but the military forces of France to victory when he was seventy-seven years of age, and who is now producing some of his best literary work at the age of eighty-six. Flammarion, the great French astronomer, died recently at the age of eighty-three, and until he was eighty-two years old he was taking a very active part in the scientific work of France. I looked up once more the biography of Viscount Morley, and I found that when he was over eighty years old he was writing the best of English of any writer of his time. Viscount Bryce, President Eliot of Harvard, Doctor Lyman Abbot, William Dean Howells were all active in literary work and mentally and physically fit at over eighty years of age. Levi P. Morton Vice-president of the United States, one time governor of the state of New York, one of the greatest bankers that the United States has produced, lived with full intellectual vigour until he was ninety-six years of age.

I recall that in our own country we have similar instances. I knew Sir Charles Tupper at the age of ninety, Sir Sanford Fleming at the age of eighty-five and Lord Strathcona at the age of ninety, all intellectually vigourous. Then I looked a little further along the shelf of my library, and I found that Michael Angelo and Titian when over ninety years of age were turning out their famous paintings, and in fact the critics say that some of Titian's finest work was done when he was ninety-nine years old. I looked into the history of old Greek literature and I found that Solon, Zeno, Pythagoras, Democrates and Diogenes were men of renowned intelligence and lively wit when they were over ninety years of age. Theophrastus, to whom Longfellow refers, published his great and famous work on the Character of Men when he was more than one hundred years of age.

I can instance great actors such as Macready who was on the boards until he was eighty, the divine Sarah Bernhardt until she was eighty-one; Miss Genevieve Ward scored a great triumph as Volumnia in Coriolanus when she was eighty-three. Sir Charles Wyndham, whom I have seen acting on the stage in London, held the stage until he was eighty-four years old.

After reading these biographies my pessimism was lost entirely in the sunshine of my fancy, and I began to look forward to that time, about twenty-five years hence, when I, having more leisure than I have to-day, might be writing essays on how to be happy and useful although one had reached the age of ninety. In view of all this it seemed to me that it was at least premature to pass a statute taking the judges of the Supreme court and the Exchequer court away from their duties at the modest age of seventy-five, provided that they were then physically and mentally capable of performing the duties of their office. Some of the ablest men with whom I have come into association are those well up in years. I might refer to my hon. friend for whom we all have a deep and sincere affection and who is now sitting at my right, the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) who has reached upwards of eighty years of age.

In other departments of life I found so many men who had only begun to learn wisdom at seventy years of age that it seemed to me it was a deprivation and prejudice to the interests of the country necessarily to decapitate judges at seventy-five years of age. That led me to reflect as to why the act to amend the Judges Act, which was passed in 1922, which appears as chapter 29 of 12-13 George V, an act which was introduced as a government measure and passed by this parliament, had not been effective for all the necessary purposes which are attempted to be achieved by the bill now before the House. I find that in the Supreme court to-day there is one judge of eighty-six years who has served for twenty-two years and who, if I interpret the Judges' Act aright, was entitled, upon completing a service of twenty years, to retire with a full pension.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Based, not upon his present salary, but upon his salary as it was before the last increase.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, based upon the salary which he accepted at the time of his appointment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know anything of the domestic affairs of the Supreme Court of Canada; but if, for instance, it is intended to remove that judge at eighty-six years of age. it seems to me that chapter 29 of the statutes of 1922 fully covers the case and provides the machinery necessary to effect that judge's abdication of office. Let me read section 26a:

> Any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court in Canada, or any local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or any judge of a county court, who is found by the governor in council, upon report of the Minister of Justice, to have become, by reason of age or infirmity, incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office, shall, notwithstanding anything in this act contained, cease to be paid or to receive or to be entitled to receive any further salary, if the facts respecting the incapacity or disability are first made the subject of inquiry and report in the manner hereinafter provided, and the judge is given reasonable notice of the time and place appointed for the inquiry, and is afforded an opportunity by himself or his counsel of being heard thereat and of cross-examination of witnesses and of adducing evidence on his own behalf.

The act also provides for a commission of inquiry, and makes further provision that His Majesty may grant unto——any judge who has been so found by the Governor in Council to be incapacitated or disabled by reason of age or infirmity as aforesaid, and who resigns his office, the annuity which he might have received if he had resigned at the time when he ceased to be entitled to receive any furthr salary.

Simply because a few men become incapacitated at the early age of seventy-five, why should we provide that all men, no matter what their physical or mental capacity may be at that age, shall be retired from these high judicial positions? I find that another judge who has been sitting on the Supreme Court for nine years, a very estimable gentleman and a personal friend of mine for many years before he accepted his high position, will be seventy-three on September 30 next; two years more and that judge, right in his prime, will be compelled to retire on a pension. I find that another justice of the Supreme court who has served two years will, in seven years, be seventy-five years of age, and he will then be retired in like manner.

For my part, I think that in the retiring of these two judges to whom I have referred we will be retiring a great portion of the judicial experience and intelligence now controlling the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The bill also provides for the appointment of an extra judge. At present six judges hold office; if I remember correctly five constitute a quorum, leaving one spare judge. Would it not be far better to restrict the number to six and to increase the salaries of the remaining judges? I know there is some hesitation on the part of certain members of the House to increase the salaries of those who hold high judicial positions, but the fact is that in the United States they pay higher salaries to the judges sitting on many of their state courts than we pay to the judges sitting on the Supreme Court of Canada. My ideal would be to have a Supreme court bench constituted of the very best legal intelligence that this country can produce, and I submit that the lawyers of Canada are not inferior in intelligence to the lawyers who plead before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council or to many of the judges who sit on that great court in London.

Appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada should be kept entirely non-political if possible. I am not advocating that I should receive such an appointment even if I were qualified and entitled to it, because under the reasonable conventions which exist in our province no English-speaking Protestant from Quebec has ever sat on the Supreme court, and in my opinion none will ever sit on that court for years to come. Therefore I have no personal interest in the matter, but I would like to see the salaries of the judges of that court made higher, so as to afford adequate inducement to the very best practising legal talent in the country to accept such appointments. Until we render that court entirely non-political and until we offer inducements which will bring to that court the very best legal talent Canada possesses, the country as a whole will not have the entire confidence in that court it should have, and therefore I would like to see its position improved in every possible way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Am I to understand that the only way of securing the best legal talent is by means of a very large salary? Are there none who would be willing to contribute their services for the good of the country?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no doubt there are, but sometimes those who are most vociferious in offering their services for the benefit of the country are the least qualified to perform these duties. Nevertheless, there is a further point which might be considered by my hon. friend. The practising lawyers in our large cities undertake very onerous responsibilities, and in many cases the cost of living in those large cities and the cost of carrying on their life work render their financial burdens very heavy. Sometimes it is very difficult indeed to induce men of high standing in the profession, in view of his personal commitments to accept the very meagre salaries that we now grant to members of the Supreme Court of Canada for judicial services.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the meagre salary now?

Mr. CAHAN: If I remember correctly the salary as fixed by this bill is $15,000 for the chief justice and $12,000 for the other justices.

An hon. MEMBER: You think that is meagre?

Mr. CAHAN: I do think that is meagre. I do not wish to be personal, but in the profession in the city of Montreal those who are by public opinion the better qualified for that service, those whose professional services are in constant demand, would average a net salary of at least $30,000 or $40,000 a year or more. No man who occupies a high position in his profession in Montreal, Toronto or in any other large city can live and maintain his position in the professional and social life of the city on a salary of $12,000 a year.

Miss MACPHAIL: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Does he not think that other people than those engaged in this very lofty profession may have the same desire to maintain a certain status? Would he not feel like extending this same generous spirit to all the other classes in Canada?

Mr. CAHAN: I venture to say to the hon. member for Southeast Grey that if she is making her inquiry in a personal sense, I have given of the very best of my life, as much as any other man living, to the service of the very class of people to whom she refers.

Miss MACPHAIL: I was not thinking of the matter in a personal way at all. I certainly did not mean my observations to apply personally but to the class for whom the hon. member is solicitous. The hon. member speaks of "the meagre salary of $15,000." I am sure the people of Canada would be much amused to hear that. I suppose even those people having this meagre salary must have a pension in order to tide them over their old age.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; they should have a pension. I still think, notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said, that the best service this parliament can perform for the class of people to whom she refers is to ensure that the highest intelligence this country can produce will qualify the judges who sit on the appellate tribunals of Canada.

Miss MACPHAIL: Do you not think that an easier and quicker method would be to so frame the laws of the country that persons of common sense can understand them?

Mr. CAHAN: It is very much better to have the laws written so that persons of common sense may understand them, but it has not always been found possible in the history of the country to provide sufficient intelligence for the readers so that they can understand laws however plainly they are written.

Miss MACPHAIL: Do you not think that having so many lawyers make the laws has something to do with the fact that they are framed in such a way that it takes a lawyer of acute mind to read them?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no doubt those opinions are entertained by the hon. member for Southeast Grey—

Miss MACPHAIL: They certainly are.

Mr. CAHAN: It simply discloses, I think, a lack of profound reflection upon the matter. My hon. friend has admirable common sense, we all know that, but I have seen very few speeches in which her common sense has elucidated the questions at issue before this parliament in such a way as to provide more plainly written statutes than we have at present. This is my plea and I think a grave responsibility rests upon the Minister of Justice who is leading the House this afternoon. The need is for the very best Supreme court that we can provide. It is absolutely essential for the welfare of Canada, and it is still more essential if, in the coming years, we are to limit, or restrict or abrogate appeals from our courts to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I believe for one that in respect of purely criminal matters, in respect of many classes of commercial matters, the sooner appeals to the Privy Council are restricted the better it will be for the litigants of this country. I do not include constitutional questions in that, I do not include questions arising as between province and province either, because I do not think that we have reached that development of the spirit of unity in this country which would warrant us at the present time in limiting or abrogating appeals to the Privy Council in the last two classes of cases named. Confidence is a plant of slow growth; and we who sit on this side of the House all look forward to the time, we hope in the not distant future, when such confidence will be created between all sections and all classes of this country, that we will not have to look abroad for a judicial arbitrator to decide in respect of our own local or political differences.

Mr. McQUARRIE: When this bill was last before the House I think the minister promised to bring down certain information. I suppose he has that information here to-day. He stated, I think, that representations had been made to him by bar associations, and by members of the judiciary asking that this legislation should be passed. I think the minister promised that he would furnish information in regard to those representations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I said that I would make a statement as to the number of cases in which it had been found necessary to call in judges ad hoc to sit in recent years, and I intend to do that when the bill is in committee.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understand that one of the judges of the Supreme court has been unable to act for over two years, one of the judges referred to by the last speaker. I was under the impression that on a previous occasion when this matter was discussed the minister did say that representations had been made to him by bar associations and members of the judiciary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friend had better let the bill go to committee if we are to have these mutual conversations. They cannot proceed on a second reading of the bill.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understand the minister promised to do exactly what I have stated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, no. I said that the matter had been called to my attention many times by both members of the bar and of the judiciary, and I have been considering it and have discussed it with various people. I never said I would bring in anything official and I do not intend to.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I must have misunderstood the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I ask if any representations in this connection have been made by the Canadian Bar Association?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not officially.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I did not catch the answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I said "no", not as to that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the minister care to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a motion for the second reading of a bill at which time only one speech can be made by an hon. member, and there can be no cross-examination. The hon. member may put such questions as he desires when the bill is in committee.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was simply asking a question.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Before the motion is put and the bill goes to committee perhaps it would be very appropriate for me to make a few observations with respect to a matter that I think sometimes is much misunderstood. It is alleged that the legal profession is more or less a close corporation, and that there is a very great desire on the part of its members to ensure large salaries for judges. I think those who hold that view have an entirely erroneous impression with respect to the matter. I have no intention of ever becoming a member of the bench and therefore, although I am a member of the profession, I think I can speak with some degree of fairness with respect to the matter. The real difficulty lies in the fact that judges are apart really—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: It is rather difficult for me to speak loud to-day because I am very tired, but I will do the best I can. I think there is a failure on the part of many hon. members to realize that judges are really the most important officials there are in the country. Some of my hon. friends may seriously differ from me with respect to that, and yet you remember that one of the most powerful minds of his time always regarded judges as being next even to the sovereign in the early days of the government of the country. Upon the integrity, the ability, the capacity and the right sense of justice of the judges of the country depends the progress of our civilization. Whether we like it or not that is so, and it is important that judges should be appointed to the bench who are first of all men of experience and learning, men of character and men of worth, because the administration of justice has rightly been said once to be almost an attribute of the Godhead itself. Now if men enjoying large incomes have no ambition to go upon the bench it follows that you have to fall back upon the second line, and instead of appointing the best men to the judiciary you have recourse to men of indifferent qualifications in their profession. In England it has long since been found that you have to pay your judges adequate salaries in order to attract the best men, and hence it is that salaries ranging from $50,000 to $30,000 a year are paid to judges over there, and the salaries are paid so that they will attract, as I say, the very best minds to judicial office. You will notice that the appointments made in recent years to the office of judge in England have been of men who were leaders at the bar. It is true that men who have held office as law officers of the crown take only one of two positions, that of Lord Chancellor or Lord Chief Justice, and with the exception of the attorney general and the solicitor general it has always been the custom for leaders of the English bar to look for places on the bench. Only a few days ago one of the great leaders of the English bar, the man who led for this country in the Grand Trunk Pacific arbitration case, was appointed to the chancery division.

He was enjoying a very large income, but he has taken a much lesser income and gone to the bench, for what reason? For the reason that the position is one of great dignity and carries with it a reasonable salary and an adequate pension in his old age, and no man will go to the bench in Canada and forego fifty or sixty or seventy-five thousand dollars a year if he does not feel that there is some assurance that, with the limited salary he receives on the bench, he will have some security for his old age. That seems to me to be elementary.

In England, where they have increased the salaries of the judiciary until they have attained their present figures, they have learned by experience that to appoint second-class men to the judiciary has been in the end the worst possible thing for the country. Nothing has struck me more than the respect, amounting almost to reverence, with which the judiciary in Great Britain is held by the common working people of the country, and I use that word in the sense of the man on the street. In this country you have a somewhat different condition prevailing, and I attribute it in part to the fact that because of the meagre salaries that are paid to judges on the bench, men of indifferent professional attainments, by virtue of political considerations, are elevated to the bench, and in the end it is a costly thing for litigants because they are compelled to appeal from time to time in order that justice may be done, whereas if first rank men, men of the highest capacity in their profession, occupying great positions at the bar and enjoying large incomes, can be induced to accept judicial positions, you have brought to bear upon the solution of the problems that affect the well-being of the country the very best minds within it.

My hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has suggested that perhaps the increasing number of lawyers in the legislative bodies of the country had something to do with the business that has to be transacted in the courts. That is hardly so. The great commercial cases, great matters affecting the constitution, great matters affecting the interests of the country as a whole, must necessarily find their way to the courts. For instance, in the evolution of our constitutional system of to-day, the interpretation of the British North America Act would never have been as perfect as it has been, with all its imperfections, were it not for the fact that there has always been the right of appeal to the Privy Council, where a single judgment expresses the opinion of that great court; there is no possibility of there being dissenting judgments or differences of opinion in that tribunal. Personally, I have always favoured a single judgment written, and that to a great extent is what is prevailing in our Supreme court to-day, because when a litigant reads that two out of three judges have found in favour of his opponent, and finds that the majority of the judges in the lower courts, in the appeal courts and in the court of last resort are in his favour, he is dissatisfied. That does not make for confidence, but it sometimes happens under our judicial system.

I should like the hon. member for Southeast Grey to realize that we are advocating adequate salaries for judges, not because they happen to be lawyers, but because you cannot attract the best minds, leaders of the bar enjoying a large income, unless you pay them adequate compensation for their services. These men who have given up their practice and gone to the bench were enjoying in many cases three and four times the income they now enjoy. For instance, one great leader of the English bar to my knowledge earned in one year £70,000. The highest salary he could possibly hope to obtain as a judge would be perhaps $50,000. If he went to the bench, to the highest judicial position, if his party were in power, he would receive a small pension on retirement. One of the most eminent English judges to-day, a retired Lord Chancellor, depends very largely on his pension. One of them, who is now giving great service at The Hague, a gentleman over eighty, is not in receipt of any pension because when he became Lord Chancellor he was content to abandon altogether the idea of a pension because his idea of public service was such that he felt he could afford to do it. It is idle to suppose that a man may attain the high position of judge, with all the social and other obligations that attach to it in Ottawa, and live as he should do on $1,000 a month, and be able to make any provision for his old age, and hence it is that the state has always provided a pension so that after a given number of years of service the judges may be able to retire and live in some measure of comfort.

But there is another reason. In the early days in Great Britain and elsewhere there have been cases in which as much as $100,000,000 was involved. When you have litigation of that character, if you have a man on the bench enjoying a salary of only $5,000 or $6,000 a year—and there are those who would endeavour to destroy the integrity of judges—think how great the temptation that may sometimes be placed in his way, sometimes has been; and so it has been found desirable that you should relieve them of any possibiliy of temptation, on the one hand, and get men of the highest qualifications, on the other, men of professional rectitude, men of character, men of the highest attainments to grace the positions they occupy not only by reason of their learning and ability, but by reason also of their character.

That is the effort that is being made in this country. Sometimes we have made appointments that have been political in their character. That is true; both sides have done it. It has been the reward sometimes for candidates who have run elections. Men have run elections, gone into a campaign, faced a constituency and said: Well, this is the only sure way by which I can get a judgeship. I know of cases like that, and so does my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and I regret to say that in every province in Canada you will probably find on the bench one or two men whose appointments have been made solely because of the services they have rendered of a political character. But if we make the salaries, the emoluments and the pension that attaches to office adequate then with the realization that work well done for the state will be recognized not only by the state but by the community in which the judges live, we may be able to break down slowly the pull and the pressure that comes from political considerations in appointments of this character and get our best minds on the bench.

What the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said with respect to some men having done their best work at an advanced age is certainly very encouraging to one of my years, and I heard his observations with the greatest interest and pleasure, but I do sometimes think that when men have attained the age of seventy-five or eighty years there is a strain upon their mental powers in a country such as this that makes it undesirable for them to continue the administration of justice. I have held that view for a great many years. I do not say that seventy-five is the age; it is difficult to fix, because we have striking examples in every part of the country of men who at seventy-five and perhaps over have done their very best work. But these are the exceptions.

I should like further to say that it is not fair to institute a comparison between a judge in an older civilization and a judge in a country such as this. Judges in England are appointed from the barrister branch of the profession. They have had none of the drudgery of solicitors. Men in Canada who practise the profession usually practise both branches; they are both attorneys, solicitors and barristers, and if you appoint these men to the bench I think in most cases it will be found that before they reach the age of eighty there is a conscious or unconscious failing of their mental powers. I do know that one distinguished member of the bar in this country declined judicial office because he said to me he felt that at his age—he had not attained eighty, but he was over seventy—he would not be able to discharge his duties in such a way as would be creditable either to himself or to the country. A former Minister of Justice declined to appoint to the bench anyone over seventy years of age, because he felt that it was improper to appoint to the bench anyone over that age, which may or may not have been correct. I do not desire to express a definite opinion with regard to the age, as between seventy-five or eighty, but I think you will find there is a general consensus of opinion among litigants in the country that when a judge has attained the age of seventy-five he has, not wishing to be unkind, outlived his usefulness. There are cases where this condition does not apply and there always will be such cases. But speaking generally when men have discharged the difficult duties and borne the wear and toil of professional work to the extent to which a successful practitioner does, at the age of seventy-five I think they should be willing to take a holiday and enjoy a well-earned pension. Whether seventy-five is the exact age or not, I am not prepared to say, but I do feel from my own observation that at the age of eighty no gentleman should be occupying a seat on the bench. That is my personal view.

Now with respect to this particular measure which will have the effect of retiring at once a member of the Supreme Court of Canada, I have had grave doubts in my own mind as to the soundness of legislation that terminates, in terms of age, a contract between the state and a judge which was not a condition of the contract when it was made. I mentioned my view to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice yesterday, because it will be remembered that under the British North America Act a judge is appointed during good behaviour or for life and when his commission is issued one of the terms of the commission is that very provision that he should hold office during good behaviour or life.

Now to add to that contract in reference to an existing judge a term whereby at the age of seventy-five he vacates office, or if he has already attained that age, he must vacate office, is really to create a breach of that contract by legislative authority, and it may well be that the question of compensation will be alleged to be involved, I, myself, presented that view to the Privy Council in connection with a case that arose in the province of Alberta, and the court then held that it was competent for the appointing power to select, because of the terms of that particular legislation, without involving a breach of contract, a particular person to be chief justice of the court in question, although there had been a chief justice under the previous legislation. That was a matter arising under a particular statute. This parliament has power undoubtedly to pass this legislation. It has not power to limit the age of provincial judges, because it is provided in the statute itself that no limitation of age shall involve their removal from office. That is altogether different from the federal court. This parliament could, if it so desired, abolish the Supreme Court of Canada, it could abolish the Exchequer Court of Canada, and it could provide by reorganizing the constitution of the court, that no person could hold office after he reached the age of seventy-five, but that would involve the destruction of the court. What we are now doing involves a breach of the contract between the individual who holds office at the present time and the state, because his patent of office declares that he shall hold office during life or during good behaviour. He is still alive. His behaviour is not questioned, and the state has now said that because he attained the age of seventy-five years some time ago, he shall now forfeit or surrender his office—that by virtue of the statute his office is abolished, notwithstanding his patent. I suggested that it might be desirable to consider the question as to how far this parliament was committed under these circumstances to pay him during his lifetime the salary attaching to his office. I only mention that. I do not suggest it in any sense as being critical of the measure, but I suggest it because it is involved in the discussion of this matter. I think the minister should carefully consider that point. He was good enough to mention it to me yesterday and I have given some thought to the matter since.

May I say to my hon. friends to my left, do not imagine for a moment that those who belong to the legal profession urge large salaries and retiring allowances to the judiciary in order to advance their own interests. This is not a close profession. It is a profession to which you will find, in the west particularly, that young men who have made their way by dint of toil and study have been attracted. It is important from the standpoint of the men who toil with their hands that there should be at all times in the country the utmost confidence in the courts of justice and confidence is begotten of a recognition and realization of knowledge, learning, ability and character. These attributes are of importance to judges. They are the instruments in the administration of justice. The essential quality of the Goddess of Justice is impartiality and justice is an attribute of God. If you are to have justice administered efficiently and faithfully, if you are to have confidence in the judges of our courts, to rely upon their judgments and to feel that the differences between labour and capital and the great issues involving property and men's liberties, privileges and lives are honestly and justly dealt with, it can be done only by attracting to the bench men with the qualifications and attributes to which I have alluded. It is for these reasons and not for any monetary consideration that those of us who have any hope and desire to attain judicial office do urge as strongly as we may that this high court of parliament should recognize that those who administer the law should be beyond suspicion and should be amply protected by sufficient salaries while they are able to discharge their duties and ample pensions when they are unable to do so.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): My hon. friend referred to political influence at times affecting the appointment of judges. Does my hon. friend think that if the judges to be appointed were at least nominated by the bar association it would tend to eliminate that undue political influence which at times creeps in?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from Wetaskiwin has raised a most interesting point in his question, and I am bound to say that one former Minister of Justice considered it his duty in connection with his appointments to the bench to consult the attorney general of the province and in one or two instances was good enough to consult the local bar association of the respective provinces. There is no doubt—and I can say this without giving offence to anyone—that every man who has held the onerous position of Minister of Justice—and I held it for a few weeks or a few months—can well realize how difficult it is to escape the pressure of politicians urging the appointment of a man whose sole qualification was that he ran an election and lost it, and having run one election did not desire to run another. That is one of the difficulties a minister of justice is faced with; therefore we must have sympathy with the Minister of Justice in those circumstances. He usually shields himself behind the excuse that he has consulted his colleague from the province from which the appointment is to be made, and that colleague, not being a lawyer, yields to the line of least resistance, and appointments are made about which it would not be well to say too much. But I think it would aid in securing the type of appointment I have mentioned if recourse were had to the bar associations or the law associations in the various provinces in respect of matters of that kind. It will be remembered that almost a scandal arose in connection with some judicial appointments in western Canada during the last ten years by reason of public protests being made against those appointments. Nothing is better calculated to lower the standard of the judicial office and its efficiency and effectiveness than to have that happen. We all know that and will agree upon it. For instance, it is difficult to get the public to believe that a man who has occupied a position in politics during which he has been proven to have been interested in transactions of a doubtful character, should be rewarded by appointment to the bench. That is one of the things with respect to which my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin has spoken publicly, and I am sure my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) will make some observations along the same line.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, two of the most eminent legal gentlemen in this House have taken the opportunity of passing a eulogy upon the bench and making a plea for adequate remuneration of the men who accept judgeships. Perhaps it is not out of place that one who has been endeavouring to represent the interests of that class which the member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) denominates the "common people" should have a word or two to say in this matter. For while the judges may find it necessary to accept the very meagre salary of $15,000 a year, it must be remembered that it is the "common people" who pay the bills.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my friend pardon me? He refers to judges receiving salaries of $15,000 a year. As a matter of fact only the Chief Justice of Canada is paid that salary. He also acts as administrator in the absence from Ottawa of the governor general, for which he does not receive any additional remuneration.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly the Minister of Justice would explain the nature of the functions exercised by the chief justice for which he receives an extra $5,000 as deputy governor general.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He takes the place of His Excellency the Governor General when the latter is absent from the capital as he is at the present time. While acting in that capacity the chief justice has to read over all the orders in council and sign them and to exercise the prerogative of mercy. I think my friend will admit that this is an important function.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Of course I presume he is able to do this because his other duties are not too onerous. We have had the doctrine stated in this House very clearly that you cannot possibly attract legal gentlemen enjoying a lucrative practice without offering very large salaries. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a rather deplorable condition if such men when needed for the service of their country refuse to render that service except in return for eight, ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year. We were told during the war that every man was expected to devote his time to the service of his country for $1.10 a day. For the life of me I cannot quite see why the service required from privates during war time should be so very different from that which is supposed to be rendered by men of high moral ideals during peace time.

The member for West Calgary suggests it is essential that work to be well done should be well remunerated. I agree with that principle. But I would point out that that is not the principle commonly applied to the everyday affairs of life. For instance, the average wage paid in Canada is less than $1,000 a year. Will anyone say that with the cost of living what it is to-day $1,000, a year is an adequate sum on which a man can bring up a family? The evidence given before one of our parliamentary committees last session was to the effect that an annual income of $2,200 was necessary to maintain an ordinary family according to recognized Canadian standards.

Why is it that we are asked on the one hand to give these comparatively large salaries to a few individuals on the principle that otherwise we cannot possibly attract the right class of men, and on the other hand to allow large numbers of people to live below the standards of a decent subsistence? It is easily accounted for, of course—these poor people are driven to accept what they can get. They do not take up carpentering, railroading, farming or any other work because they are attracted to it, but because they cannot earn a living in any other way. It is quite possible that if the large salaries paid to lawyers could be cut down a little in the first instance some of them might be induced to become judges.

We are told that our judges have social and other obligations. Well, I have no objection to their trying to maintain as high a standard of living as possible, but I would point out that there are large numbers of people in this country who have not even the means to secure the common necessities and amenities of life. It may be all very well for the judge to live in a highly restricted residential area; but on the other hand I would urge that the ordinary workingman ought to be assured at least a decent cottage, if you like, where he can live with his family in comfort and send his children to school. It is said that a great deal depends upon the proper dispensation of justice; but if children are forced at a tender age to go out on the street to earn a living because of the abominable conditions in their homes and the low standard of living there prevailing, why, I would say that we are pursuing a policy that inevitably will make work for our judiciary. If it is suggested that it might be a good thing to do away with some of these undesirable conditions immediately we are told that that would be paternalistic legislation. That term paternalistic always amuses me. If this proposal for judges' pensions is not paternalistic,—the caring for these poor gentlemen who have to maintain social and other obligations,—I do not know what it is.

It is further stated by the member for West Calgary that we ought to give good salaries in order that judges may overcome the temptations incident to their position, that otherwise they might be induced to accept bribes for the subversion of justice. Well, it is only two or three years ago since we revised the Bank Act, and at that time representations were made to us that the bank clerks were living on such small salaries that they were not even permitted to marry. And yet those clerks hold fairly responsible positions. I think we might then have passed legislation to enable those men to form an organization which would secure to them adequate salaries. But no, we could do nothing for them, even although we were told that some of them by reason of their meagre remuneration were tempted to commit acts of theft. All I am asking for, Mr. Speaker,—and I am serious in this—is that we in this House should seek to legislate equally for the well-to-do and for the poor people of this country.

I cannot allow an opportunity of this kind to pass without urging that those of us who are trying to represent the common people and their interests must not permit legislation of this kind to go through without calling attention to the special pleas that have been advanced, and the principles that have been enunciated. I would say that when other cases come up these hon. gentlemen in ordinary fairness, ought to recognize that they should be decided according to the selfsame principles which they have been advocating in this chamber. It is of course quite understandable that if many lawyers receive emoluments amounting to $10,000, $20,000, $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 a year, they would hesitate to take the smaller remuneration offered to judges. But that is only the beginning of the question. Again I would ask seriously why lawyers who are in what the labour men would call a union, a closed shop, should be permitted to receive such large salaries. I know it is very desirable that they shall maintain certain social standards and all the rest of it, but the point is that they are allowed to receive these large salaries and to maintain these social standards because of laws which are placed upon the statute books by this parliament and because of certain privileges which are granted to the legal profession in this country. I do not quarrel with them for trying to maintain high standards, but again I ask: Why should they unite with others to prevent other classes in the community from obtaining even the moderate standards which would quite satisfy most of them?

The hon. member for West Calgary made special reference to the men "who toil with their hands," and suggested that they ought to have a great deal of confidence in the judges. I am tempted for a moment to suggest that it is not by giving judges large salaries that you are likely to secure the confidence of those men who toil with their hands. One of the fundamental difficulties with laws to-day is the fact that those who make the laws, those who administer the laws, and those who sit on the bench are so far removed in their manner of life and indeed in their whole conception of life from the ordinary people that they are thereby almost disqualified from judging a case where on the one hand there is the ordinary man on the street to whom reference has been made, and on the other, the big corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. member with his classical education will remember that Justice is always pictured as being blind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. But I think in quite another sense than that intended by the classical authors, justice is often blind, blind to a whole range of the newer factors that have developed in our modern life. I must not go back to the old age pension debate. In the viewpoint that was advanced by some hon. members in connection with that debate, we had an illustration of my point. Hon. members urged the encouragement of thrift at a time when the older ideas have necessarily passed away because of changed conditions that prevail in our modern economic life. A judge might urge thrift in the old way. There are those who still urge that the employer ought to have a paternal relation to his employee, absolutely ignoring the fact that under modern conditions there is very little of the close personal touch that once existed between the employer and the employee. As Carlyle said many years ago, there is only a "cash nexus" uniting them. It must be recognized that under modern conditions a man passes from one occupation to another until before he has reached the age of sixty-five he has perhaps been in hundreds of different occupations. Many of the gentlemen who by their manner of life are so far removed from the ordinary people, seem to be absolutely incapable of understanding the struggles of the poorer people in our community.

Mr. BENNETT: Most of them were poor once.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member may have been poor once and underlying that is another fallacy to which I might well call attention. Because the hon. gentleman may have been poor once, because he may have struggled upwards and by his ability shoved his way into positions, or because he may have had certain privileges which others have not enjoyed, or because he may have been more fortunate in this, that or the other way, he thereby quietly and in a self-satisfied way assumes that it is all coming to him. I want to challenge that statement and the underlying position. In the first place we must remember that since most of us were children the pioneer days have passed, and under modern competitive conditions it is not so easy as it was in the days of our childhood, for a man to make his way. We must remember that we older Canadians who have had a chance in this country, have had it because we were, as we say, on the ground floor, and the newer immigrant who arrives has nothing like as good a chance as those who were here at the beginning or whose fathers were here before us. I do not want any of us to forget that we have had special privileges, and many gentlemen to whom wealth has come forget that they have obtained their wealth because of organized society and because of the coöperative work of thousands of their employees. It is merely an accident that now, because of the present conventions they have been able to claim as their own a considerable amount of that wealth.

If the hon. gentleman wants quotations, I would like to refer him to one whose authority he would recognize. I refer to Mr. Keynes in his introduction to the Economic Consequences of Peace, a gentleman whose writings I have no doubt the hon. member for West Calgary has read and who very clearly points out the vast changes that have come in the last few years. But some of these gentlemen have been so far removed, not intellectually alone but in their whole manner of life, that they can hardly realize the real needs of many of the struggling masses of the common people. I think it was Marie Antoinette who, when told that the people could not get bread to eat, asked why they did not eat cake. Many of our judges are almost as innocent of the real life of the people as was Marie Antoinette. They would reply: If they cannot get bread to eat, why do they not eat cake? There should be some valid reason why judges should be so far removed from the ordinary pepole. It is all very well to talk about justice in the abstract. In this House we very frequently hear the expression used: "Every legal gentleman ought to know"; I would vary this and say that even my lawyer friends ought to know that abstract justice does not get us very far; that in the consideration of any case the concrete relationships that exist at the present moment are the considerations that decide the case. When we come to the question of justice there are many new conditions that have developed in recent years and that must be taken into consideration.

Reference was made, as I said, to the necessity of maintaining the confidence of the men who toil with their hands. The very reason that the men who toil with their hands are losing confidence in the decisions of the courts lies in the fact that the justice which is given in the courts is very often a one-sided justice, a justice based upon the status quo, upon a well defined system of society, and really inadequate to meet the needs of the present day. If I might take as an illustration the conditions existing in the time of slavery in the southern states, the white judge who sat on the bench could easily dispense justice but it would not particularly appeal to the slave. The justice that he would be dispensing would be the justice that permitted slavery as an institution and which made the state responsible for the maintenance of that institution.

Many men who toil with their hands are now beginning to question the very foundations of our social order, and those who are placed in positions of responsibility are not going to maintain the confidence of the masses of the people unless they realize the changed standard of ethics that are gradually developing in the minds of the masses of the people.

There is just one other suggestion that I would like to offer to the minister. It does seem to me that when this act which seeks to amend the Supreme Court Act is brought forward the minister might very well remember the Imperial conference. Since Canada is acknowledged to be of equal status with Great Britain I do not see why we should not have the final decision of all cases made here in Canada. Surely the gentlemen who qualify in accordance with the very high standards and ideals set for them to-day should be able to decide even the most complicated and serious cases which come before our courts, and I cannot see that there is any necessity at present for appeal to a final court in Great Britain. I would respectfully submit to the Minister of Justice that it might have been well if he could have included some sort of an amendment looking towards this result.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to delay my own legislation, but I feel it incumbent upon me to say a word or two in regard to an aspect of the question which has been considerably discussed during the debate; that is, the salaries of the judges. I did not want to discuss it to-day, but in view of certain statements which have been made I wish to quote certain statistics, because the question will certainly come before the House if not this year then within the next two or three years. I might say that during the recent months I have received resolutions adopted by various bar associations and other bodies in Canada urging the advisability of increasing the salaries of the judges, and when my hon. friends are studying this question for future discussion they may find that the statistics I am about to give will help in reaching a decision.

I have no fault to find with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) except when he says that all the lawyers fail to appreciate the difficulties of the other classes. My hon. friend and other members of labour organizations and other bodies in Canada have been urging that the conditions of their own professions or employments should at least be equal to the conditions of the same professions or employments in the other countries of the world. So I think my friend will admit that there should not be cheap labour in the judiciary of the country any more than there should be cheap labour in the industrial world, and that what is paid the judges elsewhere should be paid the judges in Canada. That should apply as well as the principle that the wages paid railway employees or other members of labour organizations elsewhere should be paid to the same classes in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Following that argument, I wonder if the lawyers would consent to the introduction into this country of twice their present number from England or the United States?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not quite see the relevancy of the question, but I think they would be willing. The bar association of any province is not a close corporation as my hon. friend seems to intimate; all those who can qualify for admission are welcome to join that association.

Mr. STEVENS: If those lawyers came into Canada from England or the United States they would probably starve.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Possibly. In our sister dominion of Australia, with a population smaller than that of Canada, the chief justice of the federal high court receives a salary of £3,500, or more than the chief justice is paid in Canada, and the six judges receive salaries of £3,000, or $3,000 more than the judges in Canada. In South Africa, which is a younger dominion, the chief justice of the appellate division receives a salary of £3,000; of the four judges one receives a salary of £2,750, two receive £3,000 and one a salary of £3,250. In the Irish Free State, where conditions surely are not superior to those existing in Canada, the lord chief justice receives a salary of £4,000; the president of the high court receives £3,000; two judges of the supreme court are paid £3,000, and five judges of the high court receive £2,500. In Northern Ireland, where the population is not very large, the lord chief justice receives £5,000, and no one seems scandalized about it; two lord justices each receive £4,000, and two justices are paid £3,500. In the United States of America the chief justice of the federal supreme court receives $20,500, and the eight associate justices $20,000. In the state of New Jersey, with a population of a little over 3,000,000, the nine judges of the high court receive a salary of $18,000; in the state of Pennsylvania, where the population is a little less than 8,000,000, the judges receive a salary of $17,500; in Illinois, with a population of over 6,000,000, they receive $15,000; in the state of New York, with a population of over 10,000,000, they receive a salary of $13,700; in Massachusetts, $12,000; in California, $10,000, and so on. In England, as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has stated, the salaries range from £5,000 to £10,000, and even when there was a government in England headed by my good friend Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, if I may so call him, no one ever attempted to decrease the salaries because after all they must be based on conditions as they exist. You must pay the men whom you want to accept judicial positions salaries which, if not equal to what they are earning in private practice, are at least not very much inferior.

It was not my intention to discuss this question at all to-day, but in view of the statements which have been made I thought it well that I should deal with the subject a little, because it is bound to come up for future discussion at another time. So far as this bill is concerned, I am glad at all events that we all agree that everything must be done to make the Supreme Court of Canada a strong tribunal, and I agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that the best way to restrict appeals to the Privy Council is to make sure that litigants in Canada will have confidence in our own Supreme court. I am sorry the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George does not agree with me on the age limit; I will admit that there is ground for a difference of opinion in that matter. I can assure my hon. friend that only after serious consideration and after having discussed this matter with many people who have a deep interest in strengthening the Supreme Court of Canada, did I take it upon my responsibility as Minister of Justice to introduce this bill. I quite agree with my hon. friend that there are eminent judges who are wholly qualified to act as such after they have reached the age of seventy-five years, but as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has said, they are rather the exception. May I quote to the House the words of a man who has been Secretary of State in the United States, Mr. Chief Justice Taft, concerning this very question. In a book entitled Popular Government, at page 158, he writes:

> Congress has passed a law providing that all federal judges may retire after a service of ten years, upon attaining the age of seventy. The law is in form not compulsory because I presume it was thought doubtful whether congress had any power to retire judges, even though they continue the full salary as a life pension.

The constitution of the United States makes the tenure of office of a judge there during good behaviour, and congress has no right to make it compulsory.

Mr. CAHAN: That applies to federal judges only.

Mr. LAPOINTE: To federal judges only. Chief Justice Taft goes on to say:

> I think the absence of power in congress to do this is a defect. There is no doubt that there are judges at seventy who have ripe judgments, active minds, and much physical vigour, and that they are able to perform their judicial duties in a very satisfactory way. Yet in a majority of cases when men come to be seventy, they have lost vigour, their minds are not as active, their senses not as acute, and their willingness to undertake great labour is not so great as in younger men, and as we ought to have in judges who are to perform the enormous task which falls to the lot of Supreme court justices. In the public interest, therefore, it is better that we lose the services of the exceptions who are good judges after they are seventy and avoid the presence on the bench of men who are not able to keep up with the work, or to perform it satisfactorily. The duty of a Supreme court judge is more than merely taking in the point at issue between the parties, and deciding it. It frequently involves a heavy task in reading records and writing opinions. It thus is a substantial drain upon one's energy. When most men reach seventy, they are loath thoroughly to investigate cases where such work involves real physical endurance.

Well, this is the opinion of a man of great experience, and really it should have much weight with those who consider the question at issue here. My hon. friend has alluded to the Imperial conference with regard to appeals to the Privy Council. I think I will wait until that debate comes on to make a few comments on his remarks, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the minister a question before he takes his seat? There is an impression in western Canada—I know it exists in Saskatchewan and British Columbia—that either this bill or some other proposed legislation will make the retirement of county court and Superior court judges automatic attaining the age of seventy-five. I think the minister should make a statement on the subject, because letters and petitions have been circulated with respect to it. Perhaps many members have received communications; I know that I have.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a mistake. I dealt with the matter referred to when the resolution was in committee. We have no power to interfere at all with the judges of the Superior courts.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the provincial courts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, provincial courts.

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not be opportune for the minister to explain to the House in what respect chapter 29 of the statutes of 1922 is not efficient for the purpose of removing judges who really, at any age, are physically or mentally unfit to perform the duties of their office?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that is a matter which might be dealt with more properly when the House is in committee. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the bill, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

On the preamble.

Mr. CLARK: I think I can make my remarks, which have to do with the number of judges, on the preamble. I cannot say that I am in agreement with the increase proposed. I am open to conviction in the matter, but I can see no reason why any court should have seven judges. I am in full agreement with the principle of paying judges adequately. Nothing could be sounder than that, but I do not think it is necessary to tax the resources of Canada for the services of another judge. I see serious objection to a court of six judges, if six sit, and what I should like to propose to the minister is that there should be a provision that an unequal number of judges should sit—that is that five judges should sit.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Or seven.

Mr. CLARK: Or seven if there are seven. With a court of six judges five could sit and the extra judge write judgments in cases that have already been heard. That would meet the observation of my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) that there are too many judgments written in the various cases that come before the courts. If one of the judges in each case was detailed to write the judgment for the court, the court could approve that judgment and—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what is largely done at the present time.

Mr. CLARK: It is not done in all our courts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has been done for the last few years, I think.

Mr. CLARK: If that course is followed so much the better. In any event there is a real objection to having an equal number of judges sit. As an illustration I might cite a case which happens to be one of my own experience but still is more or less typical of what occurs. In this case I succeeded in the trial court. It was taken to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia. There were four judges sitting, and on an equal division of that court I won my appeal. The other side appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. I entered a motion to quash the appeal, because in my opinion there was no jurisdiction on the part of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia to give leave to appeal. My motion to quash was heard before the Supreme Court of Canada, and by an equal division, three to three, I lost. The court then decided against hearing the merits of the appeal because there were three judges who must necessarily dismiss the appeal because in their opinion the court had no jurisdiction to hear it. The appeal was therefore dismissed and I won after three equal divisions. Now I think this illustrates a serious defect in our judicial system and that we should provide against an equal number of judges sitting in our courts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that will be remedied to a large extent now, because in cases where the bench feel there ought to be a full tribunal there will be seven instead of six judges sitting?

Mr. CLARK: I would say no, because with seven judges there will always be somebody sick or somebody perhaps unavoidably away, and in a very large number of cases there will not be seven judges sitting. I see it in my own province, in the court of appeal. There are five judges, and I give them full credit for their attention to their duties, but very often there is an equal number of judges sitting, or not a full court. I would like to see a provision introduced into this act which would make it obligatory that an unequal number of judges shall sit. If the number is retained at six, that objective can be accomplished. Five will nearly always be available, and the extra judge can be engaged in writing judgments.

I think the minister will probably point out that it is the desire that the different parts of the country be represented on this court. I have the same desire that he has to see the different parts of the country represented. That is important in one sense, but in another sense it is of no importance at all because the laws of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island are practically the same as the laws of British Columbia or of the prairie provinces, with the exception of the statute law of the various provinces. That statute law is easily available to the court. The statutes are all collected here, and there is nothing easier than for the judges to look them up. The common law is the same in all the provinces. If it is the desire of the government that the various parts of the country be represented. that desire could be met by appointing, as vacancies occur, judges from different parts of the country, passing the appointments around, so to speak, so that Canada as a whole would be properly represented on this court.

Preamble agreed to.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 140, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 139, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On clause 1—Salaries.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am quite in accord with those who think that our judges should be well paid. If they are not, they cannot be got to serve, because no man, whether he be in this House or on the bench, is inclined to take very much less than he can earn. I think there is a great discrepancy between the salaries proposed to be paid under this act to the judges of the Exchequer court and the Supreme court, and those now paid to the judges in the appellate division of the Supreme court of Ontario. This Dominion, I understand, pays the ordinary judges of the appellate division in Ontario $3,000 less than they pay to a deputy minister. That is not right, Mr. Chairman. I believe in economy, in rigid economy, but—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend speak of the county court judges?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, I am speaking now of the members of the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely they are not paid $3,000 less than the deputy ministers.

Mr. RYCKMAN: They are paid $3,000 less than is paid to a deputy minister, because the ordinary run of salary for a deputy minister is $10,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, $8,000.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Some get $10,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think only two get $10,000.

Mr. RYCKMAN: More, I think. This Dominion of Canada pays to these gentlemen who sit on the bench, and whose great solicitude it is to measure out intelligent and even-handed justice, a salary of $7,000 per annum.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is $9,000.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Not by this government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. With the last increase made two or three years ago they are paid $9,000, and $1,000 more from the province.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not know that we should take the benefit of that, because that $1,000 is paid for other services specially rendered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I quite agree with that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The salaries of the judges have been commented upon this afternoon. We must, in common with all thinking men, realize that it is a question of what a man is worth in the market of judges or of the law, if I may put it that way. All who are familiar with the conditions know that these gentlemen who are appointed to the bench and are giving their service to the country—and it is a most painstaking service—would be able, if they were not serving the public, to receive very much more through the application of their ability in offering their services to other interests. I wonder if anyone who has had a case in court has felt himself shackled and his interests prejudiced by the fact that the judge who was to try the case, although probably a very fine man indeed, was not sufficiently mentally equipped to try the case intelligently; in other words, that the government of the country, in making the appointment, had not selected a man who could qualify properly for the position of a judge. I must say that I think in Canada those cases are few. But we are all familiar with the fact that those cases do exist in our courts, and the only way in which the best men will be got in these important positions—than which in my opinion there is none more important—will be by offering a sufficient return to the gentlemen whom we ask to serve. While anxious for economy and to curtail expenditure, I believe those who unfortunately have to go to court would feel that the government itself was acting in the best interests of the public if they increased the salaries of the judges and appointed to these high positions only the very best men obtainable.

The large fees and emoluments received by lawyers have been referred to this afternoon. I know of a case, although not in law, where an engineer was paid a salary of $1,000,000 a year. The people who employed him were glad to pay him that money because he was worth it. I know of other engineers who have received salaries of $50,000, $60,000 and $75,000. Those cases have come within my own knowledge. What is the reason these large salaries are paid? It is simply because the gentlemen concerned can command them. Their services are wanted and they are offered at a price. If you do not wish to retain them you need not do it. It is a question of the condition of the market in relation to that particular matter and walk in life. That being so, there should be no objection raised to the payment of a reasonable salary to our judiciary. I submit that our judges today are not paid what this Dominion of Canada can afford and what the Dominion would be well justified in paying if it wanted to provide for the needs of the people in the best manner possible so far as their relations with the courts are concerned.

Mr. HAY: I do not entirely agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. I do not say that it is a good thing to commercialize the position of the judges. In other words, I do not believe it is a question of supply and demand. I do not believe either that the people of Canada will censure this government for providing adequate salaries so that qualified and competent men will be members of the judiciary of Canada. I am not a lawyer and do not speak as a lawyer. The people themselves were quite content in years gone by with the judiciary and had a great deal of confidence in the judges of Canada. I do not think that the question of salary will always bring to our services perhaps the men we desire, because occupation creates a desire as well as the salary. But there may come a limit to the salaries which we can offer in this country, and at the present time, for the salary mentioned, $15,000, I think we would be able to find many capable lawyers with all the qualities of a real first class high court judge who would be willing to serve.

I listened attentively this afternoon to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and also to the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George combed all America and all Europe for very able men and women, keen of intellect and of great service to the community in which they lived, who had gone beyond the age limit. Our county court judges deal with minor cases, and when the act we recently passed becomes law it will apply to them. There ought to be no reflection on any man or woman in Canada on the score of age, but when we find that the minor court judges are required to retire from active service at the age of seventy-five, I think that provision ought surely in all fairness to apply to high court judges as well. We must all respect the judiciary of Canada, and we do. Fortunately or unfortunately we sometimes have to reflect on whether their appointment was by a Conservative government or a Liberal government, but I think in the Dominion of Canada we must congratulate ourselves on the high standing of our judges throughout the whole country and also in the Supreme Court of Canada at Ottawa. Many young men are coming forward in Canada who will be anxious to fill these positions which will be vacant before very long, and while I have no doubt the Minister of Justice will give every consideration to the suggestion made by his friends and also by those who sit on the opposite side, it is our desire and the desire of the country that the minister will take into consideration the appointment of lawyers of high standing in Canada, so that the judiciary may be respected, as we have had great respect for the judges throughout Canada in years past.

Mr. MARCIL: I have no objection whatever to the present bill. I have had to do in the past with the question of increases of salary of some of the judges. Public opinion in my province is that when a judge has served on the bench a term of years and becomes mentally and physically incapable of further service he should be entitled to a pension. We have in the province of Quebec a number of judges who have taken up other occupations and are still in receipt of pensions from this government. That has occurred by virtue of certain laws enacted by this parliament and which we have discussed over and over again. I think when the Minister of Justice again takes up this subject he should provide that in the superior courts of Quebec a pension will be allowed to a judge only when he is physically or mentally unable to act, not to one in enjoyment of all his faculties and who retires in order to take up some other remunerative calling. That is the grievance of the people in my province, and I have heard it voiced on this floor. Indeed, we have such cases at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the condition my hon. friend refers to has been already met. In 1919 it was enacted:

That no annuity shall be granted to any judge under the provision of section 19 or 24 unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such judge should resign his office.

Prior to that, a judge after a certain length of service had the right to retire and receive his superannuation unconditionally. Now it is in the discretion of the governor in council either to grant or refuse such a request.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it open to a judge who retires to take up some other profession, such as a university professorship, at a salary?

Mr. LAPOINTE: If he is still able to take up other work I think his request for retirement would be refused.

Mr. MARCIL: That is the abuse to which the people of my province object.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FRIEGHT RATES TO BE CHARGED ON EASTERN LINES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,

1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the tariff of tolls to be charged on certain lines of railway now operated as a part of the Canadian National Railways and situated within the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and the lines of railway similarly operated in the province of Quebec extending from the southern provincial boundary near Metapedia and near Courchesne to Diamond Junction and Levis.

2. That for accounting purposes the revenues and expenses of the said eastern lines shall be kept separately from all other accounts respecting the construction, operation or management of the Canadian National Railways, and in the event of any deficit occurring in any fiscal year in respect of the eastern lines, the amount of such deficit shall be included in a separate item in the estimates submitted to parliament for or on behalf of the Canadian National Railways at the first session of parliament following the close of such fiscal year.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this is the financial resolution preceding the introduction of a bill respecting maritime freight rates. It is quite usual for a discussion of the whole matter to take place on such a resolution, but I wish to suggest to the committee that in this case it will be much more convenient for members if the discussion is deferred until the bill is introduced. This I hope to do immediately and to have it distributed later on for second reading in order that the members of the committee may have before them the complete scheme proposed before they discuss it. It will then be possible to deal with the scheme much more intelligently than upon the resolution itself, which of course deals only with the financial part.

I should say, however, and I have no doubt it will be noticed, that financial provision is made only for the Canadian National Railways. Of course my attention has been called to the fact that in the report of the royal commission headed by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan the following occurs at page 23:

We are not overlooking that the other great railway system operating in the area would be entitled to equitable consideration if they find themselves prejudiced as a result of the reduction proposed.

The other great railway system referred to there, of course, is the Canadian Pacific. The Duncan report does not so state, but nevertheless it is a fact that there are several railways within the area referred to in addition to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific lines. This creates a problem for consideration, and at this stage I desire to say that the government agrees entirely with the principle set out in the sentence which I have just read from the Duncan report. I hope as the bill proceeds further to be able to introduce a provision satisfactory to the House and equitable in its terms which will ensure that other railways within the area will not be prejudiced as a result of the operation of the proposed legislation. Of course, I may require to introduce a new financial resolution in order to bring that about, but whatever form may be necessary we can deal with later. I am merely advising the committee now that it is the intention of the government to make provision in that regard.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister speaks of other railways. I suppose he refers to the St. John Valley railway and the Kent railway. Are there others?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The St. John Valley railway is now under lease to the Canadian National, and presumably would be included in any arrangement made for the Canadian National. The other lines that I have in mind are the Inverness railway—now under lease—the Quebec Northern, the Quebec Oriental, the Quebec and Northwestern, and another railway the name of which I forget. It runs up the Matane.

Mr. MARCIL: The Matane railway.

Mr. DUNNING: There may be others, but these are the railways which are directly affected as being within the area dealt with in the Duncan report. My hon. friend will, I am sure, recognize the difficulty of providing adequately and fairly for a condition such as that. It is now being carefully gone into and applies, as I say, not only to the Canadian Pacific but possibly to several other railways. The position is further complicated by the fact that these local railways now have special tariffs approved by the railway board, but which are higher than the prevailing rates in the territory concerned. That again adds emphasis to the difficulties of drafting a section which can be placed in the law and which will deal properly with this complicated matter. I hope, however, before the bill gets through the House, to be able to produce something which will be satisfactory. In the meantime if it is possible to defer discussion upon the whole question of maritime freight rates until that scheme is before the House in the printed bill that will, I am sure, facilitate the matter being dealt with.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the minister wish to give any information to the committee as to the probable cost of this proposed scheme?

Mr. DUNNING: To some extent that will depend upon the financial provision for railways other than the Canadian National, but as regards the Canadian National the provisions of the bill will involve approximately $2,000,000. I do not want to be too positive with respect to a figure for the reason that it depends somewhat upon the volume of traffic in any given year.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has stated that in order to complete what they have in mind, it will be necessary to include some other lines which are not included in this resolution. I would suggest to him that instead of going on with this resolution, it should be taken off the order paper and that the whole proposition should be included in one resolution so that, when the bill is introduced, the House will know exactly what we are facing.

Mr. DUNNING: I adopted this procedure really with the object of facilitating matters before the House. It was not proper to discuss with other parties who might be affected legislation which was in course of preparation, and until notice of this resolution appeared on the order paper, the other parties affected had no opportunity of discussing fully with the government the effect upon their railways or upon their business. It must be remembered that in the report itself there is this statement:

> We are not overlooking that the other great railway system operating in the area would be entitled to equitable consideration if they find themselves prejudiced as a result of the reduction proposed.

My hon. friend can well understand that when this resolution appeared on the order paper, other parties commenced to make representations to the effect that they were prejudiced. At that time it was necessary to choose between placing the principle of the matter before the House as soon as possible, and withholding the whole matter in the manner now suggested by my hon. friend, until that could all be ironed out. I might state that this resolution constitutes by far the larger financial burden, very much greater than any addition to it can possibly be. The bill itself, together with the statement which I am now making about the necessity of taking care in some way of the other situation, has the effect that my hon. friend desires, namely, of putting the whole matter before the House, and I think I can promise him that before the bill reaches second reading the proposed amendment in that regard will be available. In that way I hope to facilitate discussion and the passage of the measure through the House.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the fact that the Duncan report has been for such a long time in the hands of the minister and the members of this House, I should have thought the minister would be well aware of the possibility of prejudice to the other railway system by proceeding along this line, and he would be eager to find out just to what extent that prejudice would apply. It is unfortunate, I think, that he has introduced the resolution in this form. I would like to have seen the whole matter included in the one resolution, because this means simply that we shall be adding to the provisions of the bill piecemeal while it is passing through the House and the House will not know what we are dealing with until the bill is finally through. In view, however, of the fact that the minister has stated that before the second reading this matter will be cleared up, and all particulars will be before the committee, perhaps it is just as well to acquiesce in his request.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to obstruct my legislation, but my hon. friend apparently does not quite grasp the predicament in which the minister finds himself in connection with drafting legislation of this kind. To leave the door open and simply to invite the Canadian Pacific or any other great railway corporation to come in with you and help you to draft a statute is not the proper way to proceed. The Canadian Pacific or any other of these railways affected by this legislation had no intimation of what was contained in this resolution until it appeared on the order paper and the method of dealing with the Canadian National and the Canadian National alone became public. If one proceeded on any other basis I am afraid only confusion would result, and in any case it is not the part of wisdom for a minister of the crown to discuss with interested parties proposed legislation prior to its outline being presented to the House.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the minister has taken very weak ground. I did not for one moment intimate that the minister would approach all these railway companies to find out whether they were likely to be prejudiced or not. The report of the Duncan commission makes certain recommendations, and the minister when he read that report must have known whether it would affect all the railway companies doing business in that area.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite right.

Mr. GARDINER: He has in his department officers who could have given him the information whether or not these other railways would be prejudiced under this recommendation.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DUNNING: That is where my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the minister now say that he has no means through his department of getting that information?

Mr. DUNNING: Nor through any other department of getting any accurate information as to the extent to which other railways would be affected by this recommendation of the Duncan commission. That is one of the difficulties we faced in drafting the legislation.

Mr. EVANS: I am rather surprised that the government has seen fit to implement one part of the Duncan report in this way. When we appointed the Duncan commission to inquire into maritime conditions, they evidently found some underlying cause for the hard times in those provinces. The government by taking the report up piecemeal in this way has already given the House the impression that it has in toto accepted the recommendations of that report. I would rather, before dealing with the report piecemeal in this way, have had an opportunity of discussing the maritime report in its entirety and of finding out the real cause of conditions in the maritime provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: It is proposed to bring down in different pieces of legislation the remedies for the situation existing in the maritimes. Will the government agree that on any one of those pieces of legislation which might be accepted on all sides, a full discussion of the maritime report will be permitted?

Mr. DUNNING: I feel sure if an agreement can be reached as my hon. friend suggests, the government will have no objection to a discussion on the maritime report. That must of course be a matter of arrangement between the various groups in this House. The government has no hesitation in saying that it has no desire to avoid a discussion of the Duncan report, except in so far as discussion of the report as a whole overlaps discussion of the legislative measures which are necessary to implement the report and which are coming along from the various ministers concerned, I have no doubt that if such an arrangement is desired it can be made, and I will direct the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister if my hon. friend so desires.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it would be desirable to discuss the report in full, and as I have stated before, under the method proposed by the government in bringing down these resolutions the House would be debarred from discussing the Duncan report in full. If we can select one piece of legislation on which the entire report might be discussed I think it would satisfy all parties in the House and would meet the situation at the same time.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I agree with the other speakers that it is highly desirable that the House be given an opportunity to discuss this report in its entirety. There is no particular recommendation which can be considered apart from all the recommendations, and as far as I can see we can only discuss the whole thing together with clarity. I think the minister would be well advised if he permitted this resolution to stand until we are given a chance to discuss the whole question. I notice that the resolution suggests that provision be made to keep the accounts of the eastern section of the Canadian National Railways entirely separate, and I just wonder if the officers of the department or of the company consider that this can be properly done. The minister is probably aware that in various committees of the House and at different times the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway made it clear that it was practically impossible for them to keep separate accounts for the different divisions; that is, properly to proportion all the costs of the terminals, the rolling stock and the labour which are switched from one division to the other. These officials made it clear that it was practically impossible to allocate these costs to the different districts. I wonder if the officers of the railways in this case think it will be possible to keep the accounts entirely separate.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot agree with my hon. friend with respect to the desirability of letting this resolution stand until a general discussion on the whole report takes place. I am attempting to deal with a specific matter, a specific recommendation for which particular reasons are given in the report, and while it may interlock with the rest of the report, as all economic matters do interlock, nevertheless it is an intensely practical part of the report. I am taking this method of placing before the House a complete scheme to deal with the freight rate recommendations; this bill will be before the House as soon as I am permitted to introduce it, based on this resolution. I submit, Sir, that the House will be in a position to discuss the freight rate recommendations of the Duncan commission much more intelligently if they have before them on their desks the means by which this government proposes to carry out that resolution, much more so than would be the case if we merely discussed the form of the recommendations contained in the report. It is one thing for a commissioner to recommend certain things to be done, but it is quite another thing to set up the often very complicated machinery to accomplish that end, taking into account all the factors which the commissioner had in mind in reaching his conclusion. If the House will permit this resolution to pass and wait until the bill is placed before the members, as will be done between now and early next week, everyone will then have full information as to the proposals of the government implementing this particular recommendation of the commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In view of the explanation just given I will withdraw any opposition I may have expressed to the resolution. In that way I will make it clear that I am not opposing the measure itself, my only thought being that it would be much better to consider the Duncan report as a whole.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am entirely in accord with the proposals of the minister; we want to expedite this matter in every way, and I think we can have a far more intelligent discussion when the bill is introduced and we have the various proposals before us than we could have if we merely discussed the resolution. I think it will save time and will lead to a better discussion if we let the resolution pass and discuss the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not like the House to conceive the idea that we desire to hold up a proper discussion of this legislation; we desire to expedite the business of this House in common with all other groups, but I must repeat that I hope the government will see its way clear to give the House an opportunity of discussing the Duncan report in full, and I trust the leader of the opposition will approve of that suggestion. There are many things contained in the Duncan report which naturally will not come within the scope of the legislation proposed by the government and consequently members of the House will be debarred from discussing these particular points unless it is agreed between all parties that an opportunity for such discussion will be given. If the minister will assure the House that we will have that opportunity there will be no objections. Personally I am quite willing to let the resolution go through now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Even if no such assurance is given that opportunity still remains; the government cannot control us to the extent suggested by my hon. friend. If we so desire we can bring up this matter in any form on the motion to go into supply, but I think the measures in the report can be more intelligently discussed as we come to them.

Mr. EVANS: Since the Duncan report has been in our hands for some time and since this commission was appointed to find out what is wrong with the maritime provinces, I would ask if the government have come to the conclusion that the railway rates are all that is wrong there. If not, why do they pick out this one recommendation and bring it before us in this way?

Mr. DUNNING: The Prime Minister made a statement—my hon. friend surely could not have read it—in which he dealt with the whole report, and a number of the measures recommended in it in addition to the one now before us are now on the order paper ready to be proceeded with. I simply happen to be the unfortunate minister having the first of these measures in hand, and as to the order of importance I feel sure that some of my friends from the maritimes regard the question of freight rates as possibly the most important.

Mr. EVANS: I would point out to the minister that this House has never discussed the statement of the Prime Minister, and that we have not come to the conclusion that this question of freight rates is the cause of the whole trouble.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian National Railways and the tariffs of tolls to be charged on certain eastern lines.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, when the hour for private members' bills expired on Monday last, I had shortly reviewed the circumstances in connection with the incorporation of this company, and the various extensions that had been granted whereby it became possible for the company to continue in existence thirty years after its incorporation.

I had endeavoured to point out that the second reading of the bill affirmed the principle of the measure and that the principle affirmed by the House could not be varied in committee.

I had also endeavoured to point out that the granting of the charter involved the losing of large sums of money to this country in the way of annual rentals that might otherwise have gone to the exchequer. When we left that order of business I had been endeavouring to ask this House what was the principle of the measure under consideration, and I had not then concluded.

If hon. gentlemen are desirous of understanding what the principle of this measure is, it will only be necessary for them to look at the marginal note opposite section 1 of this bill, where they will find the words "Extension of time for commencement and completion". Nothing is clearer than that unless some legislative action is taken by this parliament before the 1st day of May next, this company will have ceased to function. It will no longer be enabled to carry on its undertakings; it will no longer be a factor in the development of canals or water powers. If that be so, and I think you will admit that it is so, we have to ask ourselves, I submit, but a single question. We lawyers, about whom we heard something this afternoon, sometimes have a fashion of testing a problem by making certain inquiries with respect to it. I have an inquiry to address to hon. members in this House to-night, and it is this: would you in your place as a member of this House of Commons at this time—that is the year 1927—pass an act incorporating this company with the powers indicated? That is the question. If you say yes to that, then you should vote for the second reading of the bill. If, in your conscience and by your reason, you could not say that in the light of the knowledge you now possess, you would rise in your place and vote to create a company with the powers that are given to this enterprise, then you should not vote for the second reading of the bill. Is that not fairly clear and obvious to everyone? Why? Because the bill—and I wish to bring it home to the minds of hon. members—divides itself into two separate and distinct undertakings; first, canals, and then power. If hon. gentlemen will look through the bill they will find that the principle of this proposed legislation is: To enable this company, the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, hereinafter called the company, to commence the construction of its canals, or any of them. That is the first. That is, that it may commence the construction of canals from the port of Montreal to Georgian bay, a distance of two hundred miles, through lakes, rivers and detours, and by the building of such canals make a waterway between those two points. That is the first branch of the undertaking. Go a step further, and we find the following:

—and subject to the provisions of this act, may, in connection with such construction and operation, exercise all the powers granted to the company by chapter 103 of the statutes of 1894 and amendments thereto.

And I read to this House the other evening, Sir, the section as placed in the act of incorporation when it was amended, by which the company was enabled to carry on its business as a power company. Therefore the powers of this company are divided into two branches: (a) Its canal undertaking; (b) Its power undertaking; and the principle of the measure is to renew the life of, revivify and resuscitate a company whose life will expire on the first day of May next. Unless you are prepared, as members of this House, to say that you would vote for the bill incorporating this company as it was in 1894 and subsequently amended, you should not vote for the revivification and resuscitation of the enterprise.

Let me go a step further. I am asked how I can establish that it is really intended that power should be the basis of this revivifying statute. All I can say with reference to this is that apart from what was said by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) the other night, and to which I referred in answer to a question by the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), if my hon. friends will take the trouble to read the language of the memorandum submitted by the applicants for this legislation they will realize that it is alleged in terms that it is power they propose to develop, and it is by the sale of power that they propose to pay the cost of putting through this undertaking. They say:

Therefore the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal have the exclusive and overriding right to the use of water on the Ottawa river, a right which, when put into force, destroys all other claims. Any existing users of water in the Ottawa river are, to the extent to which they interfere with the right of development and control of that river for navigation, interlopers with no legal status whatsoever.

Therefore this House is asked now to revivify and resuscitate this enterprise, with the promoters alleging that any existing users of water in the Ottawa river are, to the extent to which they interfere with the right of development and control of that river by the company, interlopers with no legal status whatever.

I submit the Minister of Railways will hesitate before he will involve the country in that form of litigation. He says there are power rights on that river granted to other companies in days gone by. The promoters have brought before the House a memorandum in which they have stated that they are the overlords, and that nobody can be permitted to interfere with them on that river, and that if they do so they are interlopers without any legal status whatever. Is it the policy of the House of Commons to involve this country in litigation for the purpose of having it declared, as the promoters have said, that they are the overlords upon that river? And this charter, in the language of these gentlemen, gives them supreme control over the Ottawa river, over two hundred miles of lakes and waterways, and they themselves allege that—it is not what I say in this House, it is what is alleged in the memorandum under which they seek this legislation—

> By the special acts respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal company, the parliament of Canada has authorized that company to develop the navigation of the Ottawa river.
> By so doing the parliament of Canada exhausted during the currency of these acts, the rights of the Dominion in regard to the granting of the use of water on the Ottawa river. Any executive authority granted by the Dominion for the use of water on the Ottawa river for any purpose except navigation and shipping is invalid as being ultra vires.

Therefore this company, that now seeks the sanction of parliamentary authority to breathe the breath of life after the first day of May next, alleges that this parliament has exhausted, during the currency of those acts, the rights of the Dominion in regard to the granting to anybody else of any powers whatever. Let there be no misapprehension. Every hon. gentleman who gives the sanction of his vote and authority to this measure is stating his willingness to call into being a body, an entity, a corporation, with the authority and privileges and powers which the promoters say belong to their company. I ask any hon. gentleman on either side of the House if he will do it in face of that consideration.

In the face of thirty years experience, in the light of the knowledge we have gained, would any hon. member vote to call into being a company clothed with these powers, powers which I say they do not possess but which the promoters allege they possess? Why call into existence the canal company under these circumstances? There are two reasons why we should not do it. It is not the policy of this country and has not been its policy to grant to a private enterprise the right to build canals and charge tolls. That is number one, and number two is that in view of our commitments with respect to railways and other means of transportation we cannot afford to lessen the revenues of our own enterprises.

And lastly we know that under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier nearly a million dollars was expended on surveys. I well recall when I first came to this House that Sir Robert Borden, yielding to the pressure put upon him with reference to this canal undertaking, granted the application for a royal commission. Investigations took place; the commission made reports and I say that nowhere in any report made upon this matter, nowhere in the notes of surveyors, will you find a single word that indicates that that enterprise may ever profitably or successfully function as a canal company. Then what are we doing? We are asked to give the breath of life to a dying enterprise that no single engineer says may be successful. We are asked to resuscitate a corporation that is dying, to which Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave its congé, when the surveys were completed after spending nearly a million dollars, and of which we have not heard as a living enterprise since the days of the reports of the Sanford Evans commission. So none of us would give it power or life as a canal company for the reasons I have indicated.

How many hon. members would vote to give it being as a power company? Would any hon. members hand over 200 miles of lake and river waterway with the million and a quarter potential power development to a private enterprise without a single dollar return to this country? Where is my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) —he who did so much for public ownership in the province of Ontario, he who lent his great power of intellect and the influence of his press to develop that enterprise in his province—where is he to-night? Does he say for a single moment that he would vote to give to this private corporation the authority to control 200 miles of waterway with the possible development of a million and a quarter horse-power without a dollar being paid to this country?

I pointed out to this House the other evening that under the initial lease made by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1908 to Mr. Crawford Ross the country was to receive two dollars per horse-power. It was subsequently reduced when it was provided that the development should be greater. I observe that 25 cents was named by the solicitor for the new interests that took over the charter. But the rental was fixed at $50,000, to be increased to a higher figure. If a full development of the million and a quarter horse-power on this 200 miles of lake and river waterway takes place the country is sacrificing not less than $500,000 per annum. Last Tuesday I put the loss at a quarter of a million dollars, but I find that figure is entirely too low. We get not a sou from the exploitation of these great natural resources. I challenge any member to point to a single instance of the resources of this country having been alienated without some compensation. Not a dollar, not even a cent, is to be paid by those who are asking for a renewal of this charter, although those who had the lease in the early days were to pay two dollars per horse-power at Carillon. That is the position. Therefore I do submit with confidence, Sir, that there is not an hon. gentleman in this House who, if he had to consider this act of incorporation de novo, would at this date vote to create this canal or power company.

I said on Tuesday that I hoped my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) would be here this evening. I understand he is absent by reason of a social engagement, but perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) will consider the legal argument that I propose to submit to the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought that might engage his attention for a moment. It has not been noted as a salient feature, but it is a matter of great importance to observe that three years after we became a confederation the parliament of Canada by chapter 24 of the statutes of 1870 passed an act declaring the Ottawa a navigable river, and that all works then existing or that might thereafter be built thereon should be works for the general advantage of Canada and should be subject to the exclusive power of the federal parliament. In 1898 we find a reference made to the supreme court as to the respective legislative powers of the Dominion and the provinces with regard to fisheries in navigable waters, and the Privy Council decided, Lord Herschell having delivered the judgment affirming the Supreme Court of Canada, that with respect to a river such as the Ottawa the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada extended to all matters, relating to the use of the waters for navigation and allied purposes. In fact, the Privy Council answered the questions submitted in the same sense as did the Supreme Court of Canada.

The matter is too familiar to members of this House for me to deal with it at length except to say that in the year 1925 the Privy Council had again to consider the whole question with respect to the ownership of navigable waters and of river and stream beds. Perhaps hon. gentlemen from Montreal will recall the decision in the Montreal harbour commissioners case. It was there decided—and I think it is very important that we should keep it in mind in this matter—by the law lords of the Privy Council that under the British North America Act the effect was to vest the harbour of Montreal as it existed in 1867 in the crown in the right of the Dominion; but to vest the bed and foreshore of the harbour in the crown in the right of the province. I find in the case, Montreal City vs. Montreal Harbour Commissioners, the principle is stated in these words at page 311 of the appeal cases for 1926:

> Under section 91 exclusive legislative authority is given to the Dominion parliament in the matters of navigation and shipping. Under section 92, head 10, lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting a province with any other province, or extending beyond the limits of a province, lines of steamships between a province and any British or foreign country, and such works as although wholly within a province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more provinces, are all taken out of the legislative authority of the provinces and placed (by section 91, head 29) exclusively under that of the Dominion parliament.

Then the judgment proceeds:

> But the question remains whether section 91, head 10, of the act, which empowered the Dominion parliament to legislate as to navigation and shipping, empowered that parliament to authorize the extensive works undertaken by the commissioners on the banks and foreshore and in the bed of the river. In considering this question it is necessary to bear in mind the nature of those works. They include, not only dredging operations, but an embankment and railway on the shore of the river, quays, a dry dock and ship repairing plant, and it would appear to be impossible that works of this character and extent could be constructed and used without an exclusive occupation of the soil equivalent to possession. Now there is no doubt that the power to control navigation and shipping conferred on the Dominion by section 91 is to be widely construed. As was pointed out by Lord Herschell in the judgment which he delivered on behalf of the board in Attorney-General for the Dominion v. Attorney-General for the provinces—namely, the first of the three Fisheries cases—the terms on which those powers are given are so wide as to be capable of allowing the Dominion parliament to restrict very seriously the exercise of proprietary rights in a fashion which, to a great extent, depends on the discretion of that parliament. What was said in that case about the enactment of regulations and restrictions in matters relating to fisheries being excluded from the competence of the provincial legislatures applies not less to matters relating to navigation and shipping. But while this is so, it does not appear to their Lordships that the right of the Dominion extends so as to authorize them to vest in a body like the commissioners an exclusive right to occupy property of the province without compensation and to erect upon it permanent works, such as quays, docks and railways.

There we have the last authoritative statement in respect of the matter. As was pointed out by Lord Herschell in the first of the three fisheries cases, the exercise of legislative power is one thing, the exercise of a proprietary right is another; and the proprietary right in respect of the river bed of the Ottawa, which is a navigable stream, declared so by parliament, is vested in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and not in this parliament. I want to point out a very significant thing, because it is of the utmost importance that in considering—

Mr. POULIOT: What does the hon. member think of the Maclaren case which was decided by the Privy Council in the early nineties?

Mr. BENNETT: That case is not at all in keeping with this. The case I am referring to was decided, as my hon. friend probably knows, in the closing days of 1925 and is reported in the 1926 appeal cases. It determines definitely, until legislation to the contrary is passed, that the legislative power regarding navigation and canals resides in this parliament, but that the proprietary right to the bed of the river and the foreshore is with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: My friend knows that in the Maclaren case the Privy Council decided that the bed of the Ottawa river belonged to the riparian owners to the medium filum aquae.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is dealing there with riparian owners, and the right of such owners is merely the right which has accrued to them from the respective provinces. But in the Montreal case the court was deciding whether or not the proprietary right with respect to the bed of the stream vests in the provincial legislatures or in the federal parliament, and it decided definitely that it vests in the provinces. So we have the provinces interested on each side of this river as proprietors of the bed of the stream, and there can be no dams erected for power purposes that utilize the bed of the stream unless and until the right to do so has been acquired from the provinces. That is the effect of the decision in the harbour commissioners case. They thought they had a right, because that right, they believed, was given to them by this parliament to deal just as they pleased with the bed of the harbour of Montreal. But the Privy Council said that the bed of that harbour and of these non-tidal streams does not belong to the Dominion; that it cannot exercise jurisdiction over the land, although it may exercise jurisdiction over the water which flows over the land. Hence the decision to which I refer. What does that mean? I well recall the circumstance when Sir Robert Perks came out to this country in 1912 for the purpose of effecting a further extension of the life of this enterprise. Sir Adam Beck came to Ottawa to protest on behalf of Ontario, and it will be observed that he succeeded in having added to the statute of the year 1912 these very important words:

Nothing in this act, or in any other act governing or affecting the company, shall be construed to authorize or empower the company to enter, or take, or use the public lands of the province of Ontario or Quebec without the consent of the lieutenants governor in council of the respective provinces, except to the extent necessary for the purpose of constructing the canal and necessary works incidental thereto, and for the purpose of developing power necessary for the operation of the canal.

Observe the words "necessary for the operation of the canal." That section was reënacted in 1913; it was reënacted in 1915; but it disappeared in 1918, and it has not since found a place in the legislation of this parliament. I leave to this House to determine the reason why. We did not then so fully know or understand or appreciate the limitations upon our legislative power as compared with that of the provinces. We now know them; we now understand them; we now appreciate them. I ask hon. gentlemen again: Can we, in the light of the knowledge which we now possess, give our sanction to the recreation of a company with the powers which I have indicated?

Let me go a step further. When this bill was before parliament in 1924, just as it was being given its third reading, the then Minister of Railways, the Right Hon. George P. Graham, made this statement as reported at page 1932 of Hansard of that year:

Mr. Graham: I was in the committee when certain immaterial amendments were made to the bill, and I rise now simply to say on behalf of the government—

Not for himself, be it observed.

—that although no objection is being taken to the extension of time in this case, it must be distinctly understood that this bill will not interfere in any way with any encouragement the government may give, or any work it may intend to do, in connection with the development of power on the Ottawa river. I say this because of course the Georgian Bay canal project includes the Ottawa river, and the powers embraced in this bill were given years ago when the government was making extended surveys and investigations in relation to the Georgian bay undertaking. This company's charter has been extended form year to year and I have no desire to prevent the retention of the powers they have; but there must be a distinct understanding that the extension of time granted by this bill does not preclude the government, if it so desires, from taking any steps which it may see fit towards the development of powers on the Ottawa river.

Compare that language, Mr. Speaker, with the language of the promoters of this bill. Then Mr. White interrupted, saying:

Mr. White: Will the statement of the minister have any effect if the purport of it is not incorporated in the bill?

Mr. Graham: I have written to Sir Robert Perks expressing the same views I have announced to-night, so that the company know perfectly well that the extension of this charter does not confer any powers which they had not before, and will give them no exclusive rights on the Ottawa river.

No exclusive rights, and yet the so-called brief of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) alleges that they have exclusive rights over and control this river as overlords. That is the position with respect to that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I held no brief such as the hon. member has mentioned. I did not use the brief which the hon. member has mentioned nor any of the arguments to be found in it.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "brief" was used by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I did not use the word in any offensive sense. The hon. member for Bow River stated that the document had been given to him by the hon. member for Ottawa, and it was placed on Hansard in that way.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the legal learning which the hon. gentleman has he will understand that it has no binding effect on my argument.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that it bound my hon. friend. I suggested only that it should bind the promoters.

Let me go a step further in this citation. The present Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) intervened, saying:

Mr. Forke: The minister's statement is simply an explanation; it does not alter anything?

Mr. Graham: Matters stand just as they did before.

Mr. Caldwell: How much development has taken place under this bill?

Mr. Graham: So far as I know, there has been just the preparation of plans.

Mr. Ryckman: What rights are maintained or contended for by the government?

Mr. Graham: No rights which the federal government has ever had are being interfered with by the extension of the charter. If my hon. friend wants me to go into a discussion of the question as between federal and provincial rights I am afraid I shall have a considerable task.

There it ended. That was the last extension. Since then, with the decision of the Privy Council in the Montreal harbour commissioners' case, can this House, in view of the contention made by the promoters of this measure, give its consent to the second reading? Can the Minister of Immigration, in the light of the very pertinent inquiry which he then made, do so? Can the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Euler), under those circumstances, do so? I venture to hope not.

I leave that matter with the House with one additional fact not referred to at that time by the then Minister of Railways, namely, that in 1870 the Ottawa river, with all improvements, past, present and future were declared works for the general advantage of Canada. In the light of those facts, how can this House treat this as a private bill?

In view of my desire to conclude what I have to say, I will refer to only one more matter. Should this House pass legislation, should it give its assent to the principle of a measure such as this, should it send to committee a bill which invites litigation against the Dominion? In terms the bill does that. Why? Because from information given to us the other evening by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) and from the three sessional papers to which I have already referred, we now know there are rival power interests contending for rights in the Ottawa river. We now know there is a rival power company which contends it has large rights upon that river. We know further, that those rights expire on the first day of May of this year. The Minister of Railways alleged that this was done practically for the purpose of having them synchronize. Unless this parliament intervenes, the rights of this canal and power enterprise expire on the first day of May and the rights and privileges of this private power company also expire on the first day of May. What then is the duty of parliament? Far be it from me to suggest what that duty should be for others. What is my duty? My duty is, so far as my vote and voice are concerned, to see to it that this parliament gives no new life to an enterprise that we would not in this day create if we were called upon to do so, and that we leave the river Ottawa free, by permitting this charter to lapse and by refusing to renew the license to the private company, reserving the vested rights of the owners of the 250 horse-power development.

The hon. member for Bow River this afternoon asked the Minister of Railways what he proposed to do, and the minister said that he was waiting for this bill to go to committee. The minister in his speech the other night had the hardihood to suggest to this House that the matter could all be threshed out there. He knew, or he should know, that the only thing that can be dealt with in that committee is the right of this company to a renewal of this charter. That is the principle of this measure. Therefore the committee could not there deal with the extension of the lease of a private enterprise, which lease has been extended to the first day of May next.

I know not what may be the duty of each individual member to his own mind, reason and conscience, but I know what my duty is. I know it is my duty on this occasion to vote not to send the bill to committee; to declare that it is, as it is indeed, a public measure fraught with the gravest possibilities of danger to the public interest and bringing no revenue to this country. I know it is my duty to say, so far as my vote and voice are concerned, that this company has had its day and ceased to be; that this company shall not be revived; that it shall not be resuscitated; that it shall not be a menace to the government of this country by preventing the bringing of revenue to the exchequer from the development of power on the Ottawa river.

But I do not stop there. We know that a small company with a development of 250 horse-power was licensed, and that that 250 horse-power development with one wheel may possibly be extended to 650 horse-power if desired. Let us instruct our Minister of Railways—if necessary I am prepared to move a resolution to this effect—that this House is resolved that this lease shall not be extended beyond the first day of May. Then what happens? We then leave the Ottawa river free; we leave the province of Ontario with its rights to the soil to the middle of the stream to deal with the situation as it pleases, to make arrangements with the Dominion government and with the government of Quebec for the development of electric energy. We leave the province of Quebec free to deal with its share of the soil under that stream as it pleases, to license private enterprise if it so desires or to provide for public development. We leave the two provinces free to pursue the course they desire as their interests may determine; we leave provincial rights untouched; we leave the right of this Dominion untouched, and we save to the people of Canada 200 miles of river and lake waterway with a million and a quarter horse-power of electrical energy, the revenue from which will come to the country. In times past we have leased these powers as we have developed our railways and canals, and they have brought much money to the exchequer of the country. Now we have a chance which rarely comes in the life time of men; this parliament, in the plenary exercise of its authority has the right to say, "We will not again call into being this enterprise; we will let it die the death it has merited, die from inanition, die because for thirty years it has done nothing, and because for that long period, more than half the life of this confederation, it has not exercised its functions, its powers and its privileges." We have an opportunity to say, "We will give you no new lease of life in the light of the knowledge we now possess."

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been silent. This is not a political matter; there are men of the Liberal faith who are stronger supporters of the doctrine of public ownership than any man on this side of the House, even any man to my immediate left. My friend the Minister of Customs is one. The great province of Ontario which now has nearly $300,000,000 invested in hydro-electric enterprises—provincial, municipal and civic—contains many men who are earnest supporters of public ownership. Through ill repute and good my friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) has given the great undertaking the assistance of his pen, his mind and his voice, and he is a Liberal. I have not been noted for my strong advocacy of public ownership but, Sir, this is more than that; it far transcends that principle. The question is whether or not I shall vote to hand over to private interests 200 miles of waterways and a million and a quarter horse-power of electrical energy without a dollar of compensation to the people of this country whether I shall invite the possibility of litigation between Quebec, Ontario and this Dominion. The time has now come when for the first time these two things synchronize; we have the expiration of the lease and the disappearance of the company; let them die the death together.

One word more, Sir, and I have concluded. It has been said that we on this side of the House among others have during all these years voted for the renewal of this charter without making a protest. I have shown that that is not quite so; I have shown that there were members alive to the importance of this matter in 1924 and that my good friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) was alive to its importance although it was not a matter affecting western communities. But, Sir, this is the thought I would leave with the House. Shall we blindly follow what we have done in days gone by or, in the light of wider knowledge and new experiences, mark out a new place upon the statute books? That is the question. Shall we be statesmen or politicians? Shall we be placemen or legislators? Which shall we be? I cannot conclude better than with words which have been ringing in my ears during the last few days as I have been thinking of this question, the words of a great American poet who, in the light of knowledge and experience said:

New occasions teach new duties: Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of truth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for West Calgary takes his seat I would like to ask him a question in reference to some remarks he made in the opening part of his speech; I was not in the House at the time or I would have asked him then. His remarks had reference to my visit to Atlantic City in the latter part of last month and the early part of this month. His words are to be found in Hansard of Tuesday the 22nd inst. at page 1446. I wish the hon. member would explain now just what he meant by the remarks made in respect of myself.

Mr. BENNETT: I stated it in very good faith; all that was meant was that the right hon. gentleman had gone to Atlantic City to recuperate his health; that he was accompanied by one distinguished senator and that a senator from Ottawa also visited Atlantic City at the same time. I pictured an imaginary interview, and I trust in so doing I did not do violence to my imagination. I also pictured the fact that a gallant knight passed through that city on his way from Washington to New York. I pictured the visit, and I pictured the anxiety with which that gallant knight passed through that community and his zeal for the public good at Newmarket contrasted with his efforts to secure this charter here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the concluding part of the hon. member's speech tonight he made some distinction between statesmen and politicians. As a statesman I wish he would tell us just what his present remarks mean?

Mr. BENNETT: Just what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whom does he say passed through Atlantic City at the time I was there?

Mr. BENNETT: The gallant knight who is backing this enterprise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who is that?

Mr. BENNETT: Sir Clifford Sifton.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I will say to the hon. member that I have never spoken to Sir Clifford Sifton with respect to this bill at any time, directly or indirectly; I was not aware that he was at Atlantic City, and in the circumstances, I would ask the hon. member to retract everything he said in respect of myself and Sir Clifford Sifton.

Mr. BENNETT: I gladly accept the statement of the right hon. gentleman and I gladly withdraw the statement that he saw Sir Clifford Sifton at Atlantic City or talked with him in respect to this bill. But we have a quotation in law, Qui facit per alium facit per se, which means, "the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal," and the sons speak with quite as much authority as the father.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reference to the last insinuation of the hon. member I will also say that so far as the sons are concerned, I have had no conversations with respect to this bill save that on one occasion in December or January Sir Clifford Sifton's two sons asked for an interview with the government. They desired that interview because the government had failed to approve plans which under the charter they had submitted in connection with the construction of the Georgian bay canal, and they wished to know whether, when a private bill was presented at the approaching session the government would obstruct the bill and prevent it from receiving the same treatment as that accorded other private bills. I intimated that I saw no reason why the government should treat one private bill differently from another. That was the sum and substance of the interview I had with the sons of Sir Clifford Sifton. During the course of this debate I have on one or two occasions, by chance, met Mr. Winfield Sifton. He said to me that he understood the government were taking the position of trying to prevent this bill from going to a committee, and asked me if that was correct. That was the substance of the intimation that he made. Concretely it was that the Liberal whip was giving Liberal members to understand that the wish of the government was that this bill should not go to the committee, and he wished to know from me whether or not the government had given instructions to that effect. I said that the government had not. That is in respect of this bill the sum and substance of any interviews I have had with Sir Clifford Sifton or his sons or anyone directly or indirectly connected with them, and now I ask the hon. member to retract his last insinuation.

Mr. BENNETT: No. After the last statement the Prime Minister has made I will no longer make an insinuation; I will make the statement based on his observations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the statement?

Mr. BENNETT: The statement is that assurances were given to the son of Sir Clifford Sifton that this motion would receive consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what you said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In conclusion I will merely say this: The hon. member ended his speech with an elaborate peroration and a quotation with respect to the regard that should be had for truth. I leave you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, to judge how close a regard in his remarks the hon. gentleman has had for the truth.

Mr. BENNETT: I will leave the right hon. gentleman, who is a master at judging truth in the light of his past record, to deal with the matter.

Mr. HOCKEN: What has the whip got to say?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I will speak when it is necessary.

On motion of Mr. Auger the debate was adjourned.

ADVANCEMENT OF BILLS

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of the representations which have been made to me that a number of private bills should be advanced a stage notwithstanding the fact that the hour for private bills has expired, I should like to get an expression of opinion from the House.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I should like to urge upon the House that unanimous consent be given to the furtherance of the remaining private bills. I am particularly interested in Bill No. 177, to incorporate The Free Methodist Church in Canada. This bill has been before the House on two previous occasions in two past sessions and has fallen by the way. This is therefore the third time it has been up, and the promoters of the bill are anxious that it should be proceeded with and brought to a successful conclusion. I would urge the House to grant unanimous consent that at least Bill No. 177 receive a second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: Am I to understand that the House grants unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Granted.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to incorporate the Halifax harbour commissioners, and to make provision for the improvement, management and regulation of the harbour of Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: The object of this resolution is simply to incorporate the harbour commission of Halifax, acting upon the recommendation of the Duncan commission on maritime province rights. We propose to give to that commission the same powers that are enjoyed by harbour commissions already existing in Montreal, Vancouver, and other ports. The powers granted in this case will be absolutely the same as in other cases. The bill to be founded on this resolution is practically a copy of the bills which have been enacted for the incorporation of the other harbour commissioners.

Mr. GARDINER: How many members will the commission consist of?

Mr. CARDIN: The bill will provide for the appointment of three members.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 225, respecting the Halifax harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Next sitting of the House.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to incorporate the St. John harbour commissioners, and to make provision for the improvement, management and regulation of the harbour of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: This resolution provides for the introduction of a bill to incorporate the harbour commission of St. John, New Brunswick. The bill will be along the same lines and exactly on the same principle as that relating to the Halifax harbour commission, although it will differ in certain details.

Mr. GARDINER: There is just one observation I wish to make to the minister. It is quite possible that it is necessary to have commissioners at the ports of Montreal and Vancouver, but the work of a harbour board at ports like St. John and Halifax will not be so extensive as at these other two ports, and I would ask the minister to take into consideration between now and the second reading of the bill the possibility of appointing at Halifax and St. John one chief commissioner who would give his whole time to the work of the harbour commission, with two assistants who might work only part time or be called into consultation as required by the chief commissioner. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre the other evening made a similar suggestion with regard to Vancouver, and I think in view of the possibility of obtaining men at St. John and Halifax who would be able to give a good deal of their attention to harbour works and still be able to look after their own bnsiness, we might in that way get a better functioning commission than if three full-time commissioners were appointed. I merely throw out that suggestion for the minister to take into consideration between now and the second reading of the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 226, relating to the harbour of St. John in the province of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMPENSATION TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the act respecting compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties (1918, c. 15), to provide that compensation to employees in Prince Edward Island shall be the same as to employees in New Brunswick, and that any compensation awarded and any remuneration and expenses payable to any board, officer or other authority in this regard may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I understand the meaning of the resolution, but perhaps the minister had better give us a word of explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: There is at the present time no workmen's compensation board in the province of Prince Edward Island. Government employees under the legislation now existing are dealt with by provincial machinery in the other provinces, and it is desirable to create in some manner machinery which will deal with injured government employees in Prince Edward Island. The government of that province does not intend to set up any workmen's compensation board, and this amendment to the act is designed to make the same scale and terms of compensation apply as would be the case if the employee were a native of New Brunswick instead of Prince Edward Island. So far as the machinery of operation is concerned, it is intended to work through the machinery of the government of Prince Edward Island. I shall be glad to furnish particulars as to the details of coöperation with the government of the island in this matter on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have the employees asked for this?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, for many years.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are these Dominion government employees?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 227, to amend an act to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Fruit Act (1923, c. 15), to provide by regulation for the inspection of fruit intended for export, and the issuing of an export certificate or permit therefor, and for the fees for such inspection, certificate or permit.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister explain this measure?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This bill is a very short but a very important one. It provides for the regulation of the export and grading of fruit in the same manner as cheese and butter are graded for export. For the last two years an inspector has been employed voluntarily by the fruit men at the various points to do the inspecting. An inspector was appointed in British Columbia and the result was very satisfactory, so much so that a large proportion of British Columbia fruit has either gone into the interprovincial trade or has been exported under government certificate. I think a very large percentage of the fruit has gone forward under government inspection. The province of Ontario has adopted a system of government inspection, and the maritime provinces have come to the conclusion that if they were to get the best results with their export fruit they would have to make provision for the inspection. This bill provides for such inspection. The inspection has been done voluntarily for two years in the same way as we inspect our grain for export and our butter and cheese for export.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 228, to amend The Fruit Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Go ahead.

Mr. MOTHERWELL moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: The bill has not been printed and distributed. I object to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The objection is well taken. The second reading will be set for the next sitting of the House.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOCK PRODUCTS ACT, 1923, AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1923, and to make further provisions, as to membership in live stock exchanges, the inclusion of coöperative associations, the rules, regulations and by-laws to be applicable to such exchanges, and penalties for violation of the act.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the bill been before the committee on agriculture, and have they adopted the resolution?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The resolution has not been before the committee on agriculture, but the bill will go there.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would like an explanation of the resolution.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As a result of certain differences that arose last spring between one of the live stock exchanges and a coöperative marketing association, it was drawn to the attention of the department that no provision was made for the coöperative marketing of live stock. It is true there was no special mention of the coöperative associations, because since the act was first drafted and since it got its last revision in 1923 the coöperative marketing of live stock has come into such prominence that probably from fifty to sixty per cent of the live stock that is marketed and delivered at our exchanges comes through coöperative sources. In addition to that the act has grown obsolete in some other respects; consequently it has been decided to make a general amendment of the act by giving more recognition to coöperative associations and giving the producers their representative on the exchanges through the live stock associations, introducing provisions that would give more control to the exchanges themselves, and also making certain provisions in regard to penalties. The bill is printed and I expect it will be on the files on Monday morning. On the second reading I propose to ask that the bill be referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization, and every oportunity will be given for all interests to be heard.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Was a conference held between the various live stock exchanges before the bill was printed? I understood the conference was to take place and all parties given a chance to express their views.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. In order to get at the will of the people as nearly as possible with regard to this important question, a conference of the coöperative live stock associations was held, and representatives of the agricultural departments of the four western provinces and all other parties interested in the question of live stock selling was held in the city of Regina on the 17th and 18th of February. A conference was also held of representatives of the five eastern provinces in the city of Ottawa on the 2nd day of March, composed of representatives from similar bodies—provincial departments of agriculture, the eastern live stock union and all other bodies interested in this matter were represented. The views and conclusions of each body were reconciled as far as it was humanly possible so to reconcile them. Their differences were ironed out and the results are embodied in this bill.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Have the various societies had an opportunity of reading this bill?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The purpose of this resolution is merely a warning that the bill is coming. I cannot very well give my hon. friend the contents of the bill, but it provides for what I have indicated—recognition of the principle of coöperative marketing, more control of exchanges, certain penalties for infractions, and so on.

Mr. NEILL: Is not this the act concerning which there was a legal decision last year throwing some doubt upon its validity as applied to the provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but since then eight of the nine provinces have passed a concurring bill, and the government of Ontario has already given second reading to a similar bill.

Mr. TOLMIE: When will these bills be available?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it will be on my hon. friend's file Monday morning. If he is going away he might borrow a copy.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 229, to amend The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1923.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, to provide for a more adequate enforcement of the act; to prevent evasion of taxes; to impose additional penalties for neglecting to file returns and for default in payments or the destruction of records; and to make provision for the recovery of amounts due.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Briefly, what does the minister propose under this resolution?

Mr. ROBB: The bill is intended to speed up collections. It will impose interest charges on outstanding and accruing arrears, and provide penalties where necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How do you propose to speed up collections?

Mr. ROBB: The bill will be tabled at once. It is based on the recommendations of the committee appointed last August, consisting of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the Auditor General and the gentleman who has charge of the Taxation branch.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Up to December last how much was in arrear in respect to sales tax collections?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. ROBB: The arrears of sales and excise tax amounted to $4,856,393.13, and covers 1792 licenses.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is up to what time?

Mr. ROBB: The statement does not say. I will get the information for my hon. friend before we proceed with the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 230, to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924, and to make such further provisions respecting allowances, benefits and contributions as may be deemed necessary for a better administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister if the bill which he proposes to base on this resolution makes any provision for temporary employees. There are a large number of temporary employees in the service, and for the last two years in particular I have brought to the attention of the government from time to time the anxiety and desire of these temporary employees to be made permanent. Many of them have been in the service for several years, and yet they are unable to secure the benefits accruing to permanent employees. If they are not covered, I would ask the minister to consider making provision for them.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to make a commitment as to incorporating the temporary employees in this act without having some more information before me from the superintendent of insurance. I am not sure whether my hon. friend means temporary employees who have been in some of the regular departments for many years or temporary employees who are in certain branches that for a time it was considered were temporary. I know the superintendent of insurance has this matter under consideration and when the bill comes down we might be in a better position to discuss the matter. As my hon. friend knows, the Superannuation Act was passed three years ago. In the administration a number of defects have been brought to the attention of the Department of Finance which is charged with the administration of the act. The amendments contained in the draft bill are for the purpose of removing these defects and making the act better serve the conditions it was designed to meet. Incidentally I may say to my hon. friend that I think it extends the period of election to July, 1927. That was in the bill as presented last year.

Mr. STEVENS: I refer not to men who are hired by the day for odd jobs, but to employees who are classified as temporary but who are really just as permanent as others except that they do not receive these benefits. I hold under my hand a communication from Mr. Knowles, National President of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, and I will read a clause or two which will indicate the condition which, I think, is one that should be rectified:

> Following up our communication regarding the "temporary employee" problem we are submitting the case for permanent appointment of the employees of the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment.
> With few exceptions the majority of the staff have served from seven to nine years with the department, and in a large number of cases the civil service appointment was made immediately after discharge from war service, others are indirect victims of war service, thus further adding to the term of public service.
> Practically every male member of the staff is a returned soldier of good record, as for the female employees, many have served overseas, while others are indirectly victims of war service brought about by a loss of near relatives in war areas.

And so on. Then there is another group. This is in another communication from the same gentleman:

> Cleaners in public buildings with fifteen years' service are classified as temporaries and others doing the same class of work in the same building with less than two years of service are classified as permanent.

Thus we have employees who have been for many years in the service still carrying on as temporaries, while others in the same building and doing the same class of work are on the permanent list and enjoying or having the prospect of enjoying the privileges that accrue to permanent employees. There are other cases: for instance all the employees in the Income Tax branch who have for many years been asking to be recognized as permanent employees. I am not at the moment arguing with regard to appointment by the civil service. What I am asking is that these employees, who are obviously regular employees of the government as much as any others who are ranked as permanent, should enjoy the same privileges and advantages as their fellow employees enjoy. That in a nutshell is my point and frankly I think this condition ought to be rectified. For the last three years and prior to that, but particularly during the last three years, they have been asking very urgently for this redress; they have been waiting from time to time, assured that redress would in all probability be afforded when certain consideration was given to the various acts affecting this. I am informed by these officials that they have during the last few weeks been anxiously awaiting the introduction of this legislation expecting that their grievances will be remedied under it. I would take this opportunity of urging the minister to make provision in this bill to take care of these various classes of temporary employees.

Mr. CLARK: This is an opportune time for the Minister of Finance to take this matter under consideration, and, in connection with the legislation now proposed to introduce a measure which will make permanent employees who have had a long service not only in the public departments but in branches mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and service overseas for a period of years preceding their service in the branches. Some of these men have now been serving the country for thirteen years. This matter has been brought repeatedly to the attention of the government. I myself have brought it to the attention of the government on at least three occasions this year and each time I have received an assurance that the matter was under consideration. Furthermore, on one occasion, I am not sure in what year, this matter was dealt with by order in council so that the claims of the cases referred to were in that way recognized.

One class not referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver is that of employees in the Soldier Settlement Board, who are to-day, I believe, carrying on work in connection with the empire settlement scheme. This is clearly not a temporary work such as the soldier settlement scheme might have been considered. They are being used now for the general work in connection with immigration, a very important work. The claims of these men should be recognized; they should be put on the same basis as other members of the civil service. I hope when this bill is introduced the minister will have dealt with these claims. It is not a difficult matter because it has been investigated before, and the claims have been recognized. I feel certain it is a simple matter to deal justly with them at this session.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I also have a large file with letters on it from various departments of the civil service, especially from western Canada. I did not know that this matter was coming up to-night, and so I am not able at this time to discuss it. I would like to ask the minister whether, when he brings down his bill, it would be opportune to discuss this matter. I suppose it would not be too late then to offer some suggestions and to have the minister take them into consideration.

Mr. ROBB: When hon. gentlemen have the bill before them they will be in a better position to discuss the whole bill.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the bill to be founded upon this resolution take care of the promise made by the Prime Minister the other evening as to the extension of time which employees in certain departments would be given for election?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House a few minutes ago when I made the explanation.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 231, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVANTS' WIDOWS' ANNUITIES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide annuities for the widows of certain civil servants.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister explain the class of civil servants included in this measure?

Mr. ROBB: The widows of certain civil servants retired under the provisions of the old Superannuation Act have petitioned that provision be made for annuities to them to the amount of one-quarter of the allowances drawn by their husbands. This provision for widows is the same as is contained in the new Superannuation Act for the wives of persons still in the service who transferred to the new act and did not elect to pay arrears to bring their contributions for their whole service up to five per cent.

[Mr. Clark.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 232, to provide annuities for the widows of certain civil servants.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BONUS TO COKING PLANTS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide encouragement for the production of a domestic fuel by heat treatment from coal mined in Canada, by means of cash payments made to those who produce such fuel in new plants from Canadian coal.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Before this motion is agreed to I would like to have some explanation from the minister in respect of this particular resolution.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bill will speak for itself, and I would much rather make the explanation on the second reading, it would be more appropriate. However, I would say to my hon. friend that this is practically the same bill as that introduced last year, to give assistance to coking plants.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this done in connection with the maritime report?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, it is fulfilling part of the Duncan report.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would like one word of explanation on this. What does the government propose to do?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is part of the provision to meet the recommendations of the Duncan report, and merely provides for the same assistance provided in the bill introduced last year to new plants for the transformation of Canadian coal into coke.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On what basis is the assistance to be given?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Assistance will be given to those who construct plants on the basis of the cost of the plant.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What does that amount to?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Four per cent on the cost of the plant in the case of private interests and five per cent in the case of municipalities. It is rather difficult to explain an intricate measure of this kind until the bill is before the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I just wanted a general explanation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Those are, in general, the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: That will extend over a period of years?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, a period of fifteen years.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 233, to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved that the House go into committee to considered the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the provisions of the Pension Act relating to the Federal Appeal Board, and to designate the number of members of which the board shall consist, the duration of their term of office, and their eligibility for reappointment.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister be good enough to explain the purpose of this resolution?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This resolution, and the bill to be founded on it will permit of the reappointment of some of the Federal Appeal Board commissioners in order that they may continue their work. There is this further change: whereas the act to-day reads that there shall be from five to seven members, it is proposed under the bill that there shall be three to seven members, thus permitting the government to reduce the number if they find it necessary to do so.

Mr. MANION: Are these appointments at the present time only temporary?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The last amendment to the act gave the government the right to make appointments for two years. That period will expire this season, and it is now proposed to extend the time or to grant power to reappoint if necessary.

Mr. MANION: Is the government reducing the number to three instead of five?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It will be in the government's power to do so, if the legislation passes, but it will be dependent upon the amount of work to be done. As it is now the membership may be five to seven; we are taking the right to make it three to seven. The number will probably be lessened if and when the work gets less.

Mr. MANION: For how many years are the members of the board to be appointed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the bill the period proposed is five years. It will be within the power of the government at any rate to fix a time within this period. We think it better to have a fixed term rather than to be bringing in amendments every second year.

Mr. ADSHEAD: There is no idea of changing the personnel of the board?

Mr. PRICE: This is an opportune time to interrogate the minister in regard to some question which I placed on the order paper at least ten days or two weeks ago—to be precise, on March 9. Those questions read:

1. Will legislation be introduced at this session of parliament providing relief for disabled and partially disabled war veterans at present excluded from pension benefits owing to the existing regulations?
2. When will the bill be introduced for the said purpose?

Now the minister has had ample opportunity to reply to these questions, and seeing that the matter involved is one of very great importance to returned men who have been unable to qualify under the present regulations, I should like to ask the minister what he has to say about it. I should like the minister to intimate, if it is possible for him to do so, that he is prepared to bring down legislation to provide for these men who are unable to carry on and to look after themselves. They should be well provided for, in view of their services at the front.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I must apologize to my hon. friend and to the House for not answering his questions earlier. An answer was prepared but it was not sufficiently direct and on that account I withheld it. I hope to give my hon. friend a reply within the next day or two.

Mr. ESLING: Is it not a fact that at the present time it takes almost a year to get a case before the appeal board, and is not that delay due to the fact that the board has to cope with such a volume of work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I did not hear my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ESLING: Is it not a fact that it requires almost a year for the appeal board to dispose of a case, for the reason that there are so many other cases awaiting decision? Yet this resolution proposes to reduce the number of members of the appeal board at the government's discretion, and that, apparently, will create further delay.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think not. It will be within the discretion of the government to reduce the number of members if they find the work is slackening off. There are many appeals yet to be heard, and the desire of the government now is to make it possible to reappoint the members of the board in order that the work may go on. If later it is found that the work is lessening and that it would be desirable to reduce the number of members, it will be within the power of the government to do so.

Mr. ESLING: Are you not in receipt of complaints to-day that these appeals are just about one year behind? Have not representations to that effect been made to the minister? If that is true, and if you reduce the number of members of the board, it will mean that there will be that much longer delay.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We do not propose to reduce the number now; we are taking power to do that in the event of the work slackening. What we have in mind is that the work shall be properly carried on. As to the number of appeals coming before the board, my hon. friend will admit, I think, that the task they have is a very difficult one. They can only accomplish so much work and the cases coming before them must be dealt with in turn. I understand the board are travelling east and west trying to overtake the work entrusted to them with a view to cleaning up, but in view of the number of appeals it will take some time to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: There is just one point upon which I should like to ask the minister for information. Some little time ago a case was brought to my notice in which it was proposed to apply for an appeal. This case will be heard in western Canada. Now I was notified by one of the officials of the appeal board that when the board reaches this particular point in western Canada in the spring, some time in April or May, no more appeals will be accepted for the present. That will mean that this particular appeal will not be heard until a year later. Is that the method of transacting business followed by the board? Is it not possible to arrange that they shall hear all pending appeals from that particular point when they get there this spring?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not familiar with the case my hon. friend speaks of, but I shall be very glad to bring it to the attention of the chairman of the board. I think when the board go west they should try to clear up all the cases that have been presented to them.

Mr. GARDINER: I merely make the suggestion that when the appeal board is sitting in any particular district it should stay there long enough to clean up all these appeals.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a waste of time and a great inconvenience to men appealing to have their cases put off for another twelve months.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the minister's information as to the real necessity for this board? That is to say, are there many findings of the pension commissioners that are found, upon appeal, to be unjust to the soldiers, in the view of the appeal board?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not the figures before me that would give the information for which my hon. friend asks; I did not know the resolution was coming up to-night. But when the bill comes up for second reading I shall have the figures here, and I think it will be shown that the creation of the appeal board has been justified; they have heard many cases. Some have been consented to and in other cases the judgment has confirmed the decision of the pension board. In the majority of cases the decision of the pension board has been confirmed, but in other cases a contrary finding has been brought in. Taking everything into consideration we think the creation of the appeal board has been justified and that they have performed a useful service.

Mr. McGIBBON: On what particular grounds are most of the appeals based? Is there any regulation covering the matter?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand that the soldier who has been refused a pension by the pension board on the grounds of non-attributability to service may appeal to the appeal board, and many cases have been appealed.

Mr. McGIBBON: I had a case before the board a few years ago where the appeal board—I am speaking from memory—found an aggravated disability, but could not award any pension because the primary board had stated that there was no disability. It seems to me that that is an anomaly in the act that should be corrected, and I would like to hear from the minister in regard to it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think there are difficulties there. Generally speaking I think these appeals are being taken and in the majority of cases, in fact, in practically every case, the appeal is sustained and a pension awarded. But in some cases there has been disagreement between the pension board and the appeal board, and such cases are allowed to stand.

Mr. McGIBBON: It would seem to me that in that case the main purpose of the appeal board is defeated. A man makes application to the pension board for a pension, he is refused, and he appeals to the appeal board, and although they find that he is entitled to a pension he cannot receive one owing to the previous decision of the primary board. Does not that seem ridiculous?

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is this seven-year limitation a cast iron rule so far as disability is concerned?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, according to the act to-day.

Mr. MILLAR: Does the lodging of an appeal entail any cost?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not.

Mr. PRICE: I should like to ask the minister again in regard to a question I have had standing on the order paper since March 9th, reading as follows:

1. Will legislation be introduced at this session of parliament providing relief for disabled and partially disabled war veterans at present excluded from pension benefits owing to existing regulations?
2. If so, when will the bill be introduced for the said purpose?

I would ask the minister whether or not he intends to bring down this legislation at the present session. He is throughly aware that hundreds of cases are not provided for under the present regulations. These men cannot possibly qualify for pensions under the present regulations, and I think it is up to the minister to let me have a reply to this question which I have had standing on the order paper for over two weeks. I would like some satisfaction. The minister has had hundreds and hundreds of complaints with regard to this matter. He must be in a position to size up the situation and I would like to know whether he will or will not bring down legislation at this session to provide for cases of this kind. I want a direct answer, yes or no.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, the question will be answered in accordance with the usual procedure.

Mr. PRICE: That is no satisfaction.

Mr. BRADY: I would like to draw the attention of the minister to a case that is more or less individual, but there are many such in Canada to-day. I refer to those returned soldiers who are debarred by the statute of limitations from obtaining a pension. After they came back from the war they did not apply for a pension for a period of years and when they did apply it was too late. I realize that if the law were left wide open many would apply who might not deserve a pension; nevertheless these men to whom I refer were big enough and patriotic enough to join the colours when the country needed them, and because they did not apply for a pension within a certain period after their return, to-day some of them although incapable of working, are outside relief. I know of a case or two where a returned soldier is dependent on the charity of the provincial government and is an inmate of a convalescent home. Those men are there, dependent on charity, simply because they did not ask for a pension within the time required. They are there as the result of their war service, but they are absolutely outside the pale of any consideration under the present law. I do not blame the government because I believe in the statute of limitations, but I do say that in this year of our diamond jubilee these particular cases should be considered. Some of these returned men to-day are physically unable to carry on even the common functions of life. Surely the government should listen with respect to the advice of the medical authorities who vouch for these cases and provide some relief for these deserving men. I appeal to the minister to give this matter his most serious consideration, and see if relief cannot be provided this session for these cases that are debarred otherwise from relief.

Mr. PRICE: I think I am entitled to an answer from the minister, and I think I am entitled to an answer, yes or no. Does the minister propose to do something at this session, or does he not? He is thoroughly familiar with the situation. He knows that there are hundreds of returned men in Canada to-day who are not fit to carry on, but who cannot qualify for a pension under the present regulations. The minister cannot have escaped considering this situation, because he has had hundreds of applications for a pension from these men. That is admitted, and I think it is our duty to make provision for such cases at this session. I again appeal to the minister to give me a yes or no answer as to whether he proposes to bring down the necessary legislation at this session to see that these cases are adequately provided for. We are entitled to the information; it is due not only to myself, but to the country.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that the question will be answered in the usual course when questions are called.

Mr. MANION: I think the question asked by the hon. member is a fair one. We are getting within reasonable distance of the end of the session. It is quite possible that we shall be out of here in three weeks, and I hope we will. That being so, it seems to me the government might well tell us what legislation they are going to bring down. We are dealing with the question of pensions and I think it is only fair that the question should be answered. The minister knows whether he is going to bring down any legislation this year to modify the Pensions Act. If he is not going to introduce further legislation he can give a straight answer, and I think we should not have to wait for the answer to the question on the order paper.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The matter has been and is still under consideration, and I am not in a position to state to-night what legislation will be brought down. The answer prepared by the department was not satisfactory; I considered it evasive, and I preferred to make a direct answer. I apologize to my hon. friend for not having an answer, but as I say, there will be a direct answer when questions are called. I thought that to-night the resolution would be accepted. It deals more or less with the appeal board and the question whether their term should be extended. If it is desired that the Pension Act be discussed on the second reading of the bill, well and good. I rather thought that when the estimates of the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment were before the House there would be an opportunity of discussing the matter of legislation regarding pensions. My hon. friend from Skeena a few moments ago suggested that we should do more than we are doing. I think if he would get in touch with the pension commissioners and the officers of the department he might obtain some information. Although there is a limitation of seven years, many cases are being dealt with to-day; the files of the soldier, or indirect evidence, are being considered, and many cases are brought before the board. Whether or not the period of seven years should be extended is a matter that I think should be discussed later, and I shall be glad to discuss it.

Mr. MANION: When questions are called, probably on Monday next, the minister will give an answer?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the question of the limitation of seven years be up for discussion before the session closes?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, on supply perhaps, or on the second reading.

Mr. MILLAR: Has the pension board the right to go beyond the seven years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. If evidence is adduced before the pension board that the soldier had disability during service—and his file will show that, that would be considered as an application as of date of entry on the file. Some of these cases are difficult and possibly slow in development, but many of them are being dealt with.

Mr. McGIBBON: Seeing that the minister is making provision to decrease if necessary the personnel of the appeal board, why has it been found necessary in the last six months to increase the personnel of the Board of Pension Commissioners? Why is it, when probably the peak of work in connection with the work of pensions has been passed, that the minister has found it necessary in the last six months to add to that board by order in council? I am not criticizing the appointment, but why was it necesary?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no intention at the present time to reduce the number of members of the appeal board, but in bringing in the legislation extending the period for five years we hope that in the course of three or four years their work will be pretty well concluded, and it may be possible to reduce the number. The suggestion comes from the chairman that the reduction might be made if the work should justify it. In regard to increasing the number of members of the pension board, it is true that an order in council was passed providing that one of the members of the service, a medical man, should sit in with the board and form a quorum. The board have found it necessary to do some travelling, and they suggested that Dr. Keyes be made a member of the board in order that they might have a quorum if they were travelling outside of Ottawa. There has been no increase in the staff as far as that is concerned.

Mr. McGIBBON: I cannot see that it is a sufficient reason for increasing the personnel of the board seven or eight years after the war, especially when the great bulk of the work has been done.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I wish it were.

Mr. McGIBBON: I differ from the minister. The preliminary examination, getting the history and so on, constitute, to my mind, the great bulk of the work. I am not criticizing the appointment; neither am I criticizing the fact that he has two medical men on that board. But there is one medical man on that board—I am not blaming the minister for it—who had no service at the front. I do not think that is fair. These positions, especially the higher positions of emolument, should if possible be given to people who actually suffered and were disabled, not to people who came back perfectly well, who probably did not have any more than a Cook's tour, as is the case with one of the medical men on that board. I think Colonel Thompson is an excellent man, and probably the recent appointment is just as good, but I cannot see any necessity to increase the staff seven or eight years after the war. The position carries $6,000 a year, I think. The time has come, in my opinion at least, when the creating of positions of considerable emolument should be at an end.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I know my hon. friend wants to be fair. The addition to the board has not increased the expenditure in any way. The officer who is serving at the suggestion of the chairman and members of the board is in the service as a medical officer and there has been no increase in the salary paid to him. It is merely to facilitate the business of the board that he may sit in and form a quorum when necessary.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not want to be understood as criticizing the appointment or the salary. But is it not a fact that members of the Board of Pension Commissioners are paid higher salaries than medical men in the service?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then you increase the expense.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then you were not fair to the appointee.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This gentleman is merely filling in to form a quorum when necessary. There is no increase in salary; it is merely to facilitate the work of the board and has been done at the request of the board.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am getting further at sea all the time. He is either a member of the board of commissioners or he is not. If he is he ought to receive the same salary as the others.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He is not a member of the board. I will be very glad to lay the order in council on the table, so that my hon. friend will understand it. There are times when a quorum is required. This gentleman is thoroughly familiar with the work and it is necessary that they should have a quorum in order to make a decision. He fills in on such occasions and acts in that capacity:

Mr. McGIBBON: Then he is not permanent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He is not considered permanent.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister be prepared when he brings in this bill to discuss the handicaps under which the Federal Appeal Board operates? Let me recount one of them. The Federal Appeal Board cannot change the diagnosis of the pension board, and upon that depends whether or not the ex-service man receives a pension. I contend that the appeal board should be able to decide the diagnosis just as well as the pension board.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I shall be very glad to have a discussion on that when the bill is before the House for second reading or on the estimates of the department. I think the discussion would be useful, for an important principle is involved.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is the very point I brought up. I can cite the minister a case where the Board of Pension Commissioners found no disability—I am not saying whether they were right or wrong—but the appeal board found there was disability. However, they could do nothing. Is not the position absurd? Will not the minister give this consideration in order to rectify what is obviously a defect in the act? I appreciate his difficulties, but we must not forget these cases.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I appreciate what my hon. friend says. We are dealing with a difficult proposition. On two occasions the House decided that the soldiers should have an appeal on the conditions stated, but I understand it failed to pass the upper chamber.

Mr. McGIBBON: I did not know that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is the situation as I understand it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Thanks very much.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. King (Kootenay) thereupon moved to introduce Bill No. 234, to amend The Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 171 to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions—"Labour Union" or "Union"—"Label".

Mr. STEVENS: On this clause would the minister kindly give us an outline of the intention of the bill so we may save time?

Mr. HEENAN: The bill simply gives permission to the labour unions to register their labels. Similar permission is granted in Great Britain and in forty-eight states of the union. But it is provided that no union label may be placed on goods without the authority of their proprietor. Power is given the Exchequer court to cancel the label under certain conditions. The bill also provides that once an employer gets the right to place the label on any of his goods, that right cannot be withdrawn without giving twelve months' notice. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is the judge as to what labels may be registered.

Mr. MANION: In regard to the twelve-month notice, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) mentioned to me a few minutes ago that he thinks in some cases this notice is not sufficient. But according to my reading of clause 6, subsection (b) the point is covered. This is the subsection:

> A labour union may authorize the use of any label registered by it and such authorization to use shall be subject to cancellation only upon twelve months' notice, unless otherwise specified in any agreement for the use of such label; and any goods may be at any time sold bearing such label, if when such label was used in respect of such goods, the person, firm or corporation was so authorized.

Will the minister tell me if I am correct in this? Suppose a company making a certain line of goods gives permission to the labour union to put on the label, and subsequently the union withdraws the permission, if the company at the end of the year still has some goods on hand so labelled they will be permitted to sell those goods?

Mr. HEENAN: The section is intended to cover that point.

Mr. MANION: I think it does cover it Apparently my hon. friend did not turn over the page. He is not very strongly in favour of the bill and had hoped to be here to discuss it. In subsection 3 of section 2 it is provided that the label shall not be placed upon any goods without the consent of the owner or proprietor of such goods. It seems to me that the owner is pretty well protected.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes. The representatives of the employers and the employees met the Labour department officials and agreed to the bill.

Mr. MANION: My interpretation is correct in respect to those two points?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the label become a proprietary label just like an ordinary trade mark?

Mr. HEENAN: It will, after the bill is passed.

Mr. STEVENS: Then this legislation is really administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce alive to what the Minister of Labour is doing? The Minister of Labour is not putting anything over him in the dark in his absence?

Mr. HEENAN: The Minister of Labour would not do that.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Suit of proprietor.

Mr. STEVENS: Can anyone but a member of a union apply to the Exchequer court for cancellation of registration?

Mr. HEENAN: Nobody but a labour union under the signature of the president or secretary.

Mr. STEVENS: According to that no other person would have the right of entry to the Exchequer court.

Mr. HEENAN: That is my understanding of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Is there any objection to anybody else having that right?

Mr. HEENAN: It would not fill the bill if any person could apply for a labour union label.

Mr. STEVENS: This is for cancellation of registration.

Mr. HEENAN: I did not catch the question properly. Anybody can apply for cancellation.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister be good enough to show me where that occurs in the bill?

Mr. HEENAN: Section 7 reads:

The Exchequer court of Canada may, on application—

It does not say who should apply.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 7 which has just been passed, provides that the Exchequer court may, on application, cancel the registration. Then section 8, as I read it, limits the power to apply to the Exchequer court to officers and so forth, of a labour union. But the other party to the agreement provided for, I think, in section 6, would not have the same right. Would the minister be good enough to explain why the other party to the agreement would not also have the right to apply to the Exchequer court?

Mr. HEENAN: I figure that any person would have the right to apply to the Exchequer court for cancellation.

Mr. STEVENS: That would appear to me to be common sense, but I do not see it provided for in this section; indeed, I think the reverse is the case. I had the opinion that the minister really intended that application could be made to the court by either party to the agreement, but section 8 limits that to one side of the agreement, to one party.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A difficulty arises here. In the act, section 18, which section 7 of the bill proposes to amend, provides that:

Any person who has registred a trade mark may petition for the cancellation of the same.

32649—101½

And so on. Then subsection (3) of section 7 of this bill provides:

The Exchequer court of Canada may, on application and after investigation and hearing of the parties concerned, direct the cancellation of the registration of any label.

And so on. That would look as if any person could apply for the cancellation of registration of a union trade mark or label, but in the case of a private trade mark only the person who has registered may apply for the cancellation. Is it the intention of the minister that the public at large shall be entitled to apply to the Exchequer court for cancellation, or only the person or union that has registered?

Mr. HEENAN: I have not studied that question, but section 8 does not deal with the question of cancellation at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am speaking of section 7. That is where the difficulty arises.

Mr. HEENAN: I would say that the person who owns the label would be the one who would apply for cancellation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then section 7 should be amended to make it conform to the provisions of section 18, which is printed on the opposite page, and which provides that only the person who registers is entitled to apply for cancellation. The language of the bill would imply that any person, including the trade union, can apply to the Exchequer court for cancellation of the trade union label.

Mr. HEENAN: Would this meet the difficulty?

The Exchequer court of Canada may, on application by the proprietor of the label—

Mr. GUTHRIE: On application of the person or union who has registered the label.

Mr. HEENAN: I think my hon. friend is right there.

Mr. STEVENS: It might be well to let this go as it is. We have drawn the minister's attention to the possible anomaly. If the minister will give the matter thought, an amendment can be made later, if necessary, in the Senate.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1920, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health) moved the third reading of Bill No. 105, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the House go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canada Grain Act (1925, c. 33) in respect to the issue of warehouse receipts by a private terminal to the shipper or his consignee, and as to the contents of warehouse receipts issued by the person operating any country elevator.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister explain?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The major feature of this measure is the same as the legislation which was before the House last year in the form of a private bill sponsored by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell). It first saw the light of day in the form of a subsection of a certain section of the original bill of 1925 known as the Turgeon draft bill, but for reasons I do not need to go into, it did not get through the House. Last year the measure did get through this House but became stranded in the Senate, also for reasons which I need not go into.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask the minister if this is the same as Bill No. 8 of last year in its entirety? I noticed that the minister said it was the same in the major parts.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was a section added to it by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) last year which is not included this year.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That was merely an amendment in committee, but I wish to know if the provisions of the original bill are precisely the same.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The provisions of the bill of last year will be found included word for word. The bill which is based upon this resolution is identical with the Turgeon draft of 1925 and the private bill of last year.

Mr. GARDINER: Are there any other proposed amendments to the Grain Act?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, there is a very small one, but I forget its nature; it is comparatively unimportant. I believe it is requested by the pools.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 235, to amend The Canada Grain Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Pensions—further amount required, $500,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might we have some explanation of this vote?

Mr. ROBB: This further amount is required to cover the retroactive awards made by the Board of Pension Commisisoners and the Federal Appeal Board.

Item agreed to.

To provide for legal expenses in connection with Winnipeg coal inquiry cases, $15,000.

Mr. SPENCER: May we have some further particulars in regard to this vote?

Mr. ROBB: It is to provide for the legal expenses in connection with the Winnipeg coal inquiry cases. The amount will be taxed by the Department of Justice.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1927, the sum of $860,331.05 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 236, for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1927.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Monday, March 28, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 237, to incorporate The Red River Driving Club.—Mr. Beaubien.

Bill No. 238, respecting The Subsidiary High Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters in the Dominion of Canada.—Mr. Bell (Hamilton West).

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved:

That the first report of the joint committee on printing be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing) moved:

That the fourth and fifth reports of the select standing committee on standing orders presented to the House on Thursday, 17th March, and on Friday, 25th March, respectively be concurred in.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the chairman kindly intimate what the reports contain.

Mr. LAPIERRE: The fourth report recommends that the bills which passed the House last session and did not receive the royal assent be passed at this session of parliament. The fifth report contains the evidence adduced before the committee, showing that the petition respecting a private bill was forwarded in error to the office of the Secretary of State and did not for that reason reach the House in time to be filed within the period prescribed for the receipt of petitions for private bills.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

SEDITION AND SEDITIOUS LIBEL

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 239, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain please.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This bill is similar to one which was adopted by the House last year but did not pass the Senate. The object is to repeal certain sections of the code which were added in 1919 concerning sedition and seditious libel to re-enact the provisions of the code as they were before those amendments.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF—DRAWBACK ON AUTOMOBILES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) an announcement which appeared in the Border Cities Star of Friday, March 25, and to ask him one or two questions in regard to it. The article reads:

Work will be started immediately on remodeling the plant of Canadian Products Limited, division of General Motors of Canada Limited, on Walker road, and the huge factories, will be reopened by January 1, 1928, according to a message received from Ottawa this afternoon sent by Edmond G. Odette, M.P., for Essex North.

The reason advanced by officials was that the existing Canadian tariff prevented the operation of the local industry on a profitable basis. Since the first of this year Mr. Odette has been working strenuously in an effort to have the tariff provisions which forced the closing of the Canadian Products factories modified. In his message to The Border Cities Star, the Essex North M.P. announced that he had finally been successful, and that the objectionable customs regulations had been modified.

I would ask the minister if any change has been made either in the tariff or the tariff regulations as stated by the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Odette); if so, was it done by order in council; and if such order was passed, will he lay it on the table of the House?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article in question, and I may say to my hon. friend that no such order in council has been passed. However, I think I know to what the article has reference—to the interpretation of the act passed last year whereby certain drawbacks were permitted in the case of 40 per cent Canadian content being in the manufacture of a car or, after April 1 of this year, 50 per cent. As to what would constitute 40 per cent or 50 per cent Canadian content respectively, was something for interpretation by the department. Representations were made that, for example, each model of any make of car should be required to come up to 50 per cent Canadian content; others stated that it ought to be allowed to spread over all the models of a certain make of car; others thought it should be applied on the product of the whole factory. While no order has yet been made, it may be that this will be done to meet the views of those who think they can extend their industry more under a certain interpretation of the act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under a little more protection, it will mean.

Mr. EULER: I rather think a little less.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister please do the House the courtesy of making the announcement from his seat when this important change is made in the interpretation of the tariff?

Mr. EULER: It is not an interpretation of the tariff at all. It is merely a matter of judgment as to whether you shall regard the product of a whole factory as being entitled to the drawback or whether it should be restricted to any particular model of car. That is all. However, if desired, I will make a statement to the House when the matter is finally settled.

CANADIAN MINISTER AT WASHINGTON

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING APPOINTMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—he is leading the House—as to whether we may expect by to-morrow a compliance with the order of the House for the letters of credence issued to the Hon. Vincent Massey as envoy plenipotentiary to Washington, the order in council passed by the Canadian government with regard to his appointment, the correspondence with respect to that appointment between the Canadian government and the Imperial government, and any order in council of the Imperial government with respect to this appointment to which the government has access. I should like these papers to be laid on the table of the House prior to the discussion on the Imperial conference report, which I understand is to take place to-morrow.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall be pleased to convey the request of my hon. friend to the Prime Minister, and I have no doubt it will be complied with.

[Mr. Euler.]

IMMIGRATION PUBLICITY

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LEAFLET

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, seeing the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) is in his seat, I desire to inform him that I hold in my hand a leaflet issued by the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is evidently distributed throughout the British Isles, calling for 14,000 farm labourers for Canada, and guaranteeing them employment. Is the minister aware of this, and are such leaflets distributed as part of the policy of the Immigration department?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, apparently the leaflet is issued by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and as the company is guaranteeing employment, I do not see any reason for any explanation on my part. The Canadian Pacific is a responsible corporation. It is bringing out immigrants and promising to furnish them employment or to see that they get employment. I have nothing further to add.

Mr. W. R. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister if his department has any regulations compelling steamship companies to bring out experienced farm labourers.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think there is any regulation to compel them to bring out experienced farm labourers but where they recruit experienced farm labourers and fulfil all the conditions, those immigrants are entitled to reduced fares.

THE CHINESE SITUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the other day when I asked a question with regard to China, it was treated more or less as a joke. Those of us who have relatives and friends in China do not consider the present situation as a joke. I would ask the government whether they will consider urging upon Canadian citizens now resident in China the advisability of withdrawing until after the civil war is over.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow me to submit his question to the Prime Minister for an answer to-morrow.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT—CORRESPONDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) the Minister of Justice will bring to his attention my request that there be laid on the table the correspondence between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Board of Grain Commissioners respecting amendments to the Grain Act. The bill will be before us almost immediately, and there is not sufficient time for me to make this request in a formal motion. I am sure the government will be glad to let us have the correspondence.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, I shall be pleased to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to do so.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

PELLY POST OFFICE, YUKON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to be good enough to expedite a return ordered by this House just a month ago to-day concerning the dismissal of the postmaster from the post office of Pelly, in Yukon Territory. It should not take a clerk more than an hour to get the papers ready.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): The matter has escaped my memory. I will certainly see that the return is brought down.

NOVA SCOTIA POSTMASTERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that an order of the House was passed on March 16 last for a return of copies of letters and other documents relating to the dismissal of three postmasters in Lunenburg county, and to ask when compliance with the order may be expected.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): The order relates to more departments than that of the Postmaster General. I will draw the attention of the Civil Service Commission to the matter and have the papers brought down.

Mr. ERNST: Mr. Speaker, I would direct the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that these three postmasters were not appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: What are their names?

Mr. ERNST: Brunswick Rhodenizer, of Upper Branch; James Backman, of Aspotogan; and M. A. Harlow of North Brookfield.

SEIZURE OF STEAMSHIP WESTERN

Mr. ERNST: I would remind the Minister of Customs that an order passed the House on March 16 for a copy of all letters, telegrams or other correspondence with reference to the seizure of the steamship Western and the disposal of its cargo. When may I expect that order to be complied with?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): I will make inquiries and have the order complied with as soon as possible.

REVALUATION OF SOLDIER LANDS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): I received this morning a letter from a returned soldier writing on behalf of a number of returned soldiers on the land, anxiously inquiring how soon they will be able to place applications with the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment for revaluation of lands. They are very anxious to have an opportunity of putting in these applications before they seed their land. I want to ask the government whether it is possible to give any information on this matter at the present moment.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration): The bill has not yet passed the House.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Friday, March 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. L. M. AUGER (Prescott): I feel rather bashful and nervous, following the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) who gave such a wonderful display of eloquence and fluency of language. Although I do not agree with his ideas I think I should congratulate him sincerely upon his vocabulary and the able delivery that marked his speech on Tuesday and Friday evenings. Words upon words came from the lips of the hon. member with such ease as to remind me of a gentle rivulet winding through a meadow in a narrow and shallow bed. Or, to change the simile, he clothed his ideas in an exterior of simple dignity so that on the surface they were attractive, but underneath there was no mistaking the fact that he was a true Tory; and although he himself is an able man it must be admitted that he serves a shallow and narrow cause, the cause of Toryism. One not acquainted with Tory inconsistency might well have been surprised the other day to find an hon. gentleman so wroth against insinuations and personalities, but he himself excelled in these. He intimated on rising that his purpose was to refute the insinuations that had characterized the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), and one had a right at least to expect that in his own speech he would have refrained from making insinuations. That however was not the case. The first part of his speech conveyed the unwarranted insinuation that the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) had engaged himself to renew this charter because of the electoral merits of the promoters. I do not wish to speak for the Prime Minister, but inasmuch as that strange suggestion caused so much hilarity I think it might be well to recall it to the House and ask hon. members to consider it. The hon. member painted his picture in such vivid colours that we visualized the Prime Minister listening to the Squire of Newmarket and then finding it impossible to vote against a renewal of the charter.

Sir, the picture represents a very vivacious image of what might be reality. But it is not reality; it is only fiction invented by the hon. member himself. And in view of his wonderful gift in this direction and the unlimited resources of his imagination, one is reminded of those lines from Gray's Elergy:

> Full many a flower is born to blush unseen
> And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

The rest of his speech was either an insinuation or a fallacious assertion that in voting against the amendment we on this side were playing the game of politics. We are giving 200 miles of lakes and rivers without receiving a dollar in return, spoliating the rights of Ontario and Quebec, and violating the great principle of public ownership. That is what the hon. gentleman says. Let me say that although I am not a lawyer, I shall not be deceived too easily by a member of that profession. In voting against the amendment we are not granting anything; we are not renewing the charter; we are not spoliating provincial rights, and we are not violating the principle of public ownership; we are simply declaring that in the opinion of the House the bill should go to the committee on railways and canals. As a matter of fact, all we are doing is to refuse to kill the bill at this stage, without that careful consideration which it ought to receive from the committee.

In order to make clear what my attitude is on this question, and what I gather to be the attitude of my colleagues, let me assure the House that we stand for no particular group of capitalists; we are not favouring either the Siftons or the Aldreds or the Grausteins. We are not opposed to public ownership in favour of private enterprise; we stand on the side of the government because we want a fair deal given everyone.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Which side is the government on?

Mr. AUGER: I repeat, we want everyone to get a square deal, and with that end in view we think that every project which is suggested for the purpose of contributing to a solution of our national problems should be very carefully considered. And the proposal for the construction of the Georgian bay canal, and the development of power along that route, is one of very great importance which deserves the close scrutiny of the people's representatives. That is my stand on this question, as I believe it is the stand my colleagues take. We firmly believe that if the bill were sent to the committee it could be better investigated than it can possibly be here. Now, what is the real objection to referring the bill to the committee? Is the bill of no importance? Obviously not, because the very fact that this House has spent so much time discussing it is proof that it concerns a matter of serious moment to the country. What then is the cause of the great opposition which it has encountered? It is this: that another private group is seeking for the rights of the Carillon power, and such is the situation that if the amendment is carried that private group will remain sole proprietor of the Carillon site. The House ought to consider this point carefully. The hon. member for West Calgary, the other day, gave the House the impression that if the amendment carried and the bill were rejected, the principle of public ownership would be vindicated. That is not so. Let me quote from the hon. member's speech:

> Unless this parliament intervenes, the rights of this canal and power enterprise expire on the first day of May and the rights and privileges of this private power company also expire on the first day of May. What then is the duty of parliament? Far be it from me to suggest what that duty should be for others. What is my duty? My duty is, so far as my vote and voice are concerned, to see to it that this parliament gives no new life to an enterprise that we would not in this day create if we were called upon to do so, and that we leave the river Ottawa free, by permitting this charter to lapse and by refusing to renew the license to the private company, reserving the vested rights of the owners of the 250 horsepower development.

This is not correct; there is another lease which was granted in 1913, which does not expire until 1974.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): For what horse-power?

Mr. AUGER: For 250 horse-power. But I would remind the hon. member that the private group owning that lease claim to be in the position of a lessee in possession, and that they have the sole authority to develop power on the Carillon site.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Only to the amount called for by their charter; unless they get additional authority they are limited to that.

Mr. AUGER: I am ready to be corrected if I am wrong, but this group claim that they possess the sole authority to develop electrical power in that region, and that no one else can proceed with a development of that kind on a large scale until 1974. Of course the Conservative members have well hidden that aspect of the case; they have not spoken of it, and their position in opposition to the renewal of this charter is well understood by everyone. It is only natural that this should be the case, because they gave to the company the leases which it obtained in the past. It would seem that they are interested in the company, according to the facts by which we may judge. In 1913 they gave this lease to the National Hydro; in 1921, at the time of the election, that lease was renewed with greater powers, and in 1926 it was renewed again.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely my hon. friend will be fair enough also to say that the lease was granted originally in 1909, and renewed in 1923-24 by the government of which he is a supporter.

Mr. AUGER: Because we stand in this case for a loyal and careful investigation of the matter; because we think it our duty to practise the virtue of justice and to safeguard the public interest and the general welfare of this country, the gallant knights backing the opposition to this bill have attacked us in various manners. They have insinuated that we were willing to violate the principle of public ownership and to despoil well-determined provincial rights; they have accused us of playing the game of politics and have depicted the Prime Minister as having made his decision on this bill on the electoral merits of the promoters. But against me personally they have come out with the most insidious attacks. The National Hydro has asked each municipality in my constituency to send in to the government the following resolution:

Moved by . . . . . seconded by . . . . that the council of the municipality of. . . . respectfully urges the parliament of Canada not to renew the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, known as Bill No. 78, as in our opinion this bill is not in the interests of the province of Ontario as it is an attempt to deprive the people of this province of their right to the powers to be developed from the waters of the Ottawa river; and further, that this charter has been in existence for thirty-three years, and no actual construction has taken place, and we believe the renewal of this charter would be contrary and prejudicial to the public interest.

But that is not all. The newspapers of my constituency have also attacked me, with the exception of the Prescott and Russell Advocate of L'Orignal. I quote from the Eastern Ontario Review, published at Vankleek Hill, the following open letter to myself:

An Open Letter to Mr. L. Auger, M.P.

For Prescott County as to His Position on the Georgian Bay Canal Scheme

Dear Mr. AUGER,

Your silence in parliament and moreover your reported disappearance; also the published information of the number of letters you have received from the fair sex all over the country, and the reputed number of marriage offers tendered you, has led us to wonder what you are doing in parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. AUGER: The letter continues:

No doubt you are aware that the county of Prescott has sent you to parliament for the good of the people of this historical county, not to further your own popularity with the fair sex. Just now a matter of vital importance is before the House of Commons, that is, the granting of another charter to the Georgian bay canal. Eight times has this question appeared, and eight times has been talked out. One division has taken place and Mr. Auger did not vote, nor was he paired. Now our youthful and handsome young member knows that if the Georgian bay canal scheme goes through that it sounds the death knell of the Carillon power development situated in the eastern corner of Prescott county and which would necessitate the spending of millions in our midst. What is his position? Does he intend to stand by Carillon or Georgian bay canal? No two ways about it. County of Prescott and its welfare versus the Sifton interests.

Another article of the same nature appeared in the same newspaper on Friday of last week. These insinuations are stupid, malicious and clumsy, but one is bound to sympathize with their author for his lack of common sense. One is also amused, because through his human cloak appears the ears and fur of the silly ass; nothing should be said in reply to this except that the man is entirely—and willingly—in error, and that he has a cause to serve which he does not openly avow. The attacks made against myself because I have not been active in working against the Georgian bay canal scheme are most unjust and unwarranted; they are not fair, because we can justify the stand we take on the amendment. We must vote against the amendment for several reasons, first that by so voting we do not grant anything, we do not accept the principle of private enterprise nor do we vote against the principle of public ownership. We do not grant a charter; we do not give away 200 miles of waterway; we give nothing to anyone. We simply desire carefully to study this scheme which is of such importance to the people of this country, and I believe that the people of Canada are sufficiently interested to desire that such a study be made. It appears that a vote for the amendment is only a vote in favour of the National Hydro, and not a vote for the principle of public ownership or the protection of provincial rights. I submit, therefore, that we have ample reason to vote against the amendment.

I think the project most important, because if the canal should be built it would mean greater facility of transportation. The fact has been demonstrated that the construction of this canal would mean a saving of time, of distance and of money in the transportation of goods from the west to the east, and from the east to the west. Its construction would result in greater facility of transportation which would help to solve one of our greatest national problems. It would help also to create a Canadian market about which our Conservative friends are continually talking. In my opinion improved transportation facilities would be more effective in building up a Canadian market than any action we could take through the medium of a tariff policy. Improved transportation would also widely advertise this country abroad. It would help to attract immigration which heretofore has been going to the United States. The republic to the south has always attracted foreign immigrants because that country has a reputation for planning and executing great works. Labourers flock there because they are reasonably sure of getting employment. If this canal were constructed it would result in such publicity for Canada as to accomplish quicker results than could be achieved through the action of immigration agents in London and other cities of the world. The construction of this work would also stimulate industry and commerce. The ordinary mind can scarcely grasp the benefits it would bring about; it would take an imagination like that of the hon. member for West Calgary to visualize them.

In concluding my remarks, let me quote not from a foreign source but from an hon. member sitting on this side of the House:

> My hope in sending this matter to the committee, would be that from that committee might come some constructive proposition that would help us to deal properly with a great national problem.

This was the view expressed by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). Further on in the same speech the hon. gentleman said:

> I take the position that we should send this bill to the committee, only in the hope that from the committee will come some suggestion to enable us to settle the question in the interests of the Dominion, whose rights in this great waterway are paramount.

And again:

> I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that this could be so done as to secure the end that we have in view—that these great natural resources shall be preserved and developed in such a way as to secure the maximum benefit for the great mass of the common people of Canada.

These observations of the hon. member for Lisgar, to my mind, contain an expression of sound Liberalism and true patriotism. I feel that in a country where private enterprise and public ownership have done so much for the public welfare we should not discriminate in favour of one or the other; after all they are only agencies. Whether a service is performed by one or the other of these instruments which the nation in the past has used to such great advantage should not concern us so much as whether the action performed is done properly and to the greatest degree will promote the common good. To private enterprise we owe the discovery, the colonization and the early development of this great Dominion, and to private enterprise we owe most of the prosperity that we enjoy. Yes, Sir, private enterprise has done so much for the welfare of Canada and is still operating so beneficially, that we cannot turn our backs upon it. It deserves better treatment than scorn, contempt and ingratitude; and if before the committee, to which I hope this bill will be referred, it is found that the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company can carry out the great project of constructing the canal and developing electrical energy, I cannot see that I could object to the measure for the reason that what is proposed is not a public enterprise.

Let us amend the charter, if necessary, in order to protect the rights of all concerned; but let us not delay or thwart the execution of a plan which means so much for the future of this country. In our vote on this question, let us consider not so much the question of the charter itself, let us consider not simply the principle of public ownership or the interests of the National Hydro or any other concern, let us not consider even the canal itself, but let us stand for the country that we love and cherish and whose interests we place above all other considerations.

In my opinion the stand we should take, in order to maintain our reputation as serious men, is the stand that was adopted by the hon. member for Lisgar. If we do that I am satisfied that we shall secure the end we have in view: that our great natural resources shall be preserved and developed in such a way as to secure the maximum of benefit for the great mass of the common people of Canada. Let us look to the committee to whom this project may be entrusted to consider the question in that light, and to make a careful and impartial study of the great problem of national transportation.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): In rising to continue the debate on this question, which has been discussed until the subject has almost been worn threadbare, let me say that I have no apologies to offer. I consider what is proposed here one of the greatest steals ever attempted in the twentieth century and when I say that I do not forget the things that have been put over the people of this country in the past.

After the very able speeches that have been made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), it is very hard indeed, as I am sure hon. members generally will agree, to find something new or interesting to say on this subject. Nevertheless, in the few remarks that I shall make I shall endeavour to avoid as far as possible rehashing any of the statements and excuses put forward by previous speakers, except to the extent necessary to preserve the continuity of my argument.

If I had my way I would not only wipe out the charter we are considering but every charter on the Ottawa river, and leave the Ottawa river and the power thereon free as it ought to be to the people of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I approach the consideration of this subject, and the question of the power development that is involved from the standpoint of what will contribute most to the upbuilding of the country. I feel that the development of power is as inevitably connected with the development of our country as in our timber, our minerals, our pulpwood, or any other of our natural resources. I look forward to the time when this Dominion will have a great increase of population, and when the provinces of Ontario and Quebec will be peopled by from twelve to fifteen millions of souls. I look forward with much interest to the development of the province from which I come and I wish to preserve to the public, rather than alienate to private interests, not only the water-powers located on this river but those existing on the other streams of Canada.

The charter, the renewal of which we are considering, has been in existence for something over thirty years and those who hold it have failed to live up to its terms. Otherwise that charter would not be before us to-day for renewal. We have to consider that renewal not only in the light of past events but in the light of to-day, bearing in mind the great increase in the value of electrical energy which has come about within recent years, and the enormous demand for it. I am one of those who believe it is the duty of the government and of parliament to preserve these great heritages of the past and to administer them as a trust for the benefit of the people. To me it seems strange that the government who are in power at the present time, although this bill has been before this House for the twelfth time, have had practically nothing to say on such an important issue.

I want to refer very briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) who introduced this bill. I have been wondering whether the promoters have been quite frank with parliament in regard to this project or whether their contempt for the intelligence of parliament is so great they thought they could, in the vernacular of the street, "put one over" the members of the House of Commons. This is what the hon. member for Ottawa said, as reported on page 1387 of Hansard:

> I come now to the question asked me a moment ago: Is this a canal charter or is its object the development of power? Well, no matter how the question may be argued; no matter what is said, I affirm that under the terms of the charter which the promoters of this bill are endeavouring to have renewed, nothing is contemplated but the construction of the canal.

Was the hon. member for Ottawa frank with this House or was he not? If he was frank with this House, was he frank with the company which he is supposed to represent in this House, because looking at the last paragraph of the bill I find that the promoters are asking for a renewal not only of their charter for the construction of a canal, but of the power rights which were slipped into this charter many years after it was originally granted? If they are asking only for the right to construct a canal, why is he asking to have confirmed in the present bill the power rights which were slipped in there in 1912? If they are asking for the power rights, why does he stand before parliament and solemnly declare that all the company wants is the privilege of constructing a canal? Furthermore, in the last clause it is provided that if certain conditions are not fulfilled the canal rights lapse, but there is not a similar provision in regard to the power rights. Therefore I say again to the hon. member for Ottawa that it appears to me that he has not been quite frank either with the House or with the company.

Let us look at his proposition as a canal scheme. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) was good enough to allow me to read the brief which was placed in his hands by the hon. member for Ottawa. In that brief I find that the estimated cost of this canal was $282,000,000. If we take it for granted that money is worth 5 per cent, the interest on that amount would be something over $14,100,000 per annum. Does he think any canal that had to pay yearly such a vast sum as $14,100,000 interest on the investment, could be made to pay as a canal project? I am quite positive there is not in the world a financial firm that would finance this project simply as a canal. What does that mean? It means that if we assume there would be a saving of three cents a bushel on wheat from the west, as is claimed, the freight rate would still be six cents a bushel, and that would involve, in order to pay the interest on the investment, bringing over this canal something like 235,000,000 bushels a year. Was ever a more absurd proposition put before a body of intelligent people? In addition to this we must remember that this canal would have to do business in competition with the other free canals of the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, looked at from a business standpoint, the thing is absurd.

Further, I find from the brief which the hon. member for Bow River kindly placed in my hands, that the company have no intention simply of building a canal system. They grant, as has been granted by everybody, that the navigable waters are under the control of the Dominion, but they make the express declaration that there are no surplus waters on the Ottawa river and that all those waters will be under their control as they will own the dams, control the sluiceways, and thus control the time and place at which the water is let out. Consequently they will be absolutely in control of the water-powers on the Ottawa river.

That brings us right up against the great proposition of provincial rights which has been fought out in the past in this country. I am surprised, when I look across this chamber, to see a government sitting here, called a Liberal government, when from the beginning of this debate to the present time, not a single member has risen in his place to defend the principle of provincial rights. My mind goes back in history to the days of Sir Oliver Mowat, the Hon. Edward Blake, and the great battles that were fought in those days by the Liberal party for provincial rights in this country. I say to myself: How are the mighty fallen! To-day there is not on the Liberal side a voice that can be raised on behalf of the provincial rights of this country. They sit there wedded to the big interests of Canada, helpless, and they have nothing to say on behalf of that policy which was one of the big factors in creating the great Liberal party of the past.

I would like, for example, to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) if he remembers the chorus of the Liberal campaign song of some thirty or forty years ago, a song written by the wife of a cabinet minister, the Hon. J. D. Edgar. whose painting we see out in the hall. It went something like this:

> The traitor's hand is on thy throat, Ontario, Ontario,
> Suppress the traitor with thy vote, Ontario, Ontario.

That was the campaign song of the Liberal party thirty or forty years ago. Where does that party stand to-day? Where are these great upholders of provincial rights in this country? I would like to ask the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) where he stands on this question. Is he standing up for the knight that formerly represented his constituency, or is he standing for the interests of the common people that he and his party love so well to talk about? Might I remind him in passing that the Conservative party of the province of Ontario, provincially speaking, is to-day endeavouring to carry hydro-electric energy to every farm in this country? They have spent millions already. They have built something like 1,800 miles of primary and secondary power lines, to carry that power to the farmers of this country. Is he going to stand up for the farmer who will have the power on his farm to grind his corn, to saw his wood, to light his barn, or for the housewife to churn her butter? Or is he going to stand up for the plutocrat and the big interests which are seeking to grab a million or a million and a quarter horse-power on the Ottawa river? When the farmers of this country and all the industrial interests of eastern Ontario needed that power so badly the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission had to go over into the province of Quebec to buy some 266,000 horse-power from the Gatineau in order to supply the wants of eastern Ontario. They have been blocked for years in their efforts to extend the great hydro of western Ontario in the east because of these big interests that were attempting to control the franchise on the Ottawa. Is he going to pass by the poor farmer and the workingman, and take his seat beside Dives at the rich man's table?

Where is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown)? He gave us an interesting discourse a while ago. He said: "I do not believe anybody can frame an amendment that will make the bill suitable, but I am willing to pass it on to committee in the hope I suppose that the promoters or somebody behind them may supply the brains to do it." Might I remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that a few months ago Mr. Harry Sifton gave an interview in Toronto. In that interview he told the press that the Liberal party had the halters on nearly all the Progressives of this country. As I look across the House and see Liberals to the front of them, Liberals behind them, Liberals to the left of them and Liberals to the right of them, I wonder if he was not speaking the truth. When I see men like the hon. member for Lisgar get up, because Harry Sifton cracks the whip, as he has done over the present parliament, when I see him using all the force he can to pull a $100,000,000 contract from the people of this country safely within the grasp of the big interests of Canada, I wonder what we are coming to in this country. Where is the great Progressive party that a few years ago shouted to the heavens for the interests of the common people? Have they departed or have they not? Well, we will soon know. When this vote takes place we will know whether Mr. Sifton has the halter upon these people or whether he has not. The people of Canada to-day are looking to this House, and they will look at the vote that is to be taken to-night, and to-morrow they will size up the situation and will know whether Mr. Sifton was right or whether he was wrong.

For a moment, let me visualize this graft, if I may. Let me bring before this House and the country the magnitude of it, in order that they may better know what they are voting on to-night. It just so happens, Sir, that I can very easily do this, because in the province of Ontario we have the Hydro Electric Power Commission which has developed electrical energy to the extent of something over 960,000 horse-power, not as great as this development will be, but something in the neighbourhood of three-quarters of it, and when I tell hon. members what that commission has done they will see the possibilities that lie before the people who obtain the franchise or the power rights on the Ottawa river, if they do obtain them. We have in the province of Ontario to-day, 410 municipalities using electrical power that was developed by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. There are 402,000 consumers. We have over 5,000 miles of transmission line with a generating capacity of 961,000 horse-power, and they have invested $276,000,000 in capital. They would have done more, Sir, had they not been retarded in the eastern end of the province and had not the whole provincial development been held up by such companies as are seeking today to renew this franchise. What has that meant to the people of Ontario? The cost of the power delivered to the doors of the people to-day is less than one-quarter of what it was before the hydro-electric came into existence. Let us visualize that and put it into dollars and cents, and we find that the saving to the people of the province of Ontario in 1925 was something over $36,000,000, comparing hydro with pre-hydro rates. Does that mean anything to the people of this country, or does it not? Does that tell the House and the country the possibilities that lie behind the franchise for the power on the Ottawa river—$36,000,000 saved to the people of Ontario in one year? They pay that much less than they would have had to pay under pre-hydro rates.

Let me give another comparison. It was stated in this House the other day that the rates under private ownership were lower than the rates under public ownership, as exemplied in the Hydro Electric Power Commission. I have in my hand a comparison which deals first with domestic lighting and heating. I will take the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London and Montreal, three of them under hydro, and one under private ownership, and then I will go to the United States and take Buffalo and Detroit. I find that for domestic lighting and cooking for the same quantity in each case, Toronto is paying $45.97, Hamilton and London the same, Montreal $76.87, Buffalo $174.20 and Detroit $124.38. Then for commercial lighting, which is a little bit different, Toronto is paying $357.60, Hamilton $140.48, London $228.50, Montreal $1,147.70, Buffalo $811.70 and Detroit $936.17.

I will not bother the House with the figures for power, because it is hardly germane to this matter, but the proportion is pretty much the same, showing that the preservation of this power for the use of the people is one of the great functions of parliament to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was a little confused at the start about the mystery surrounding this subject. We were told during the course of the debate that behind the bill was a mystery company. Some said it was Sir Clifford Sifton and his confreres, while others declared he had nothing to do with it. I do not know who is behind the bill, and I cannot say that I care. But I go back to some years ago when, I remember, the papers reported a similar mystery that surrounded the government of that day, of which the same man was Minister of the Interior. During the past week I have devoted considerable time to reading musty volumes of Hansard containing the debates between 1900 and 1907, and I was startled at the great mystery which surrounded the doings of the government at that time just as we see a similar mystery surrounding the present government. I found, for example, that there was then in existence a mystery company called the North Atlantic Trading Company. It seemed like the world at its creation—it was without form and void. But it had one distinguishing characteristic, an insatiable capacity for swallowing money. It was supposed to have its headquarters at Amsterdam, but no one there knew anything about it, for it apparently was not a corporate entity. With this mystery company the government of the day entered into an agreement under which the company were to get five dollars, or one pound sterling, for every man, woman and child that it brought into Canada. Where the immigrants came from did not matter; with the exception of the citizens of a few countries, everyone was welcome. And it did not matter whether they stayed here or not, once they were brought to this country the company was entitled to payment. Then I consulted the reports of the Auditor General and I found that the following amounts had been paid out to the company:

Period	Amount	Auditor General's Report: Date	Page
1899-1900	$ 5,353 33	1900	L18
1900-1901	23,817 60	1901	L18
1901-1902	35,916 00	1902	L19
1902-1903	34,553 33	1903	L23
*1903-1904	38,966 66	1904	L26
*1903-1904	111,330 99	1905	L26
1904-1905	55,396 25	1906	L25
1905-1906	24,333 33	1907	L25
1906-1907	36,901 50	1908	K33
	$366,568 99

*Total for 1903-04: $150,297.65.

It will be observed that a total of $366,000 odd was paid to that mystery company which though apparently without any corporate existence was very skilful in drawing money from the Canadian treasury.

I continued my research and I found that something mysterious happened in connection with half-breed scrip. An order in council was passed making it lawful to purchase this scrip from holders outside the Dominion, and in some mysterious way that order in council was suppressed for three months. During that period agents from Winnipeg used their time to good purpose and bought up some 30,000 to 35,000 acres of land covered by this scrip, for which they paid at the rate of from one to two hundred dollars for 240 acres of land. A mystery? Do hon. members see any similarity between the present mystery and the mysteries of those days?

I pursued my investigations a little further and found a mystery connected with Saskatchewan, called the Saskatchewan Land Company, to which 250,000 acres of land in that province, supposed to be desert, was sold for a dollar an acre. But strange to say, within two years afterwards it proved to be a very fertile rose garden. Another mystery? Why, of course, whoever heard of cold-blooded business men buying up 250,000 acres of desert land? I found also another company, this time in the Peace river territory, called the Peace River Colonization Company, to which was transferred 336,000 acres of land for a dollar an acre—twenty-five cents down, twenty-five cents in five years, and the balance in ten. I found further that extensive lands had been leased out there, and that nine of the leases were so drawn that they could not be revoked I have the names and the figures here, but I will not weary the House with them. Suffice to say that the leases covered 41,000, 60,000, 30,000, 47,000, 55,000, 48,000, 60,000 acres odd, and so on. Then something mysterious happened. People were allowed to buy ten per cent of this grazing land at a dollar an acre. Pursuing my investigation still further, I found another mystery. While the law permitted a man to buy only 320 acres of coal lands I found there had been alienated as much as 2,000, 4,000, 6,000, 8,000 and 10,000 acres to individuals and that in this way something over 72,000 acres of coal lands were sold at from seven dollars to ten dollars an acre that afterwards were resold at fifty dollars an acre. I will not weary the House with a recital of the other mysteries that I unearthed, such as the timber limits, Yukon liquor permits, et cetera. My only reason for bringing these mysteries of the past to the attention of hon. members is that we have to-day a mystery company behind which are certain mysterious individuals whom nobody seems to know. And those individuals have added to the mystery by telling us that they are prepared to build canals for the use of this country for nothing. I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) if he is credulous enough to believe that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the question?

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Agriculture if he is so credulous as to believe that this company, as they boast in their brief, would give Canada a canal system from Georgian bay down to the Ottawa river free of cost.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If we can get a canal for nothing, why shouldn't we take it? We don't often get an opportunity of that kind.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister, with his usual shrewdness, has answered a question that I did not ask him. I asked if he thought this company would be as good as their word and build us a canal for nothing. Does anybody believe it? And when I observe that apparently the same people are behind this company as were administering the natural resources of Canada in the past in the manner that my researches have indicated, I ask this House, I ask the country: Do you think we can be beguiled into betraying the people of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in taking from them a potential development of a million or a million and a quarter electric energy, and hand it over to a company simply because its promoters tell us that they are willing to build the canal for nothing?

Now, Mr. Speaker, my stand on this question is very simple. As I said before, if I could I would wipe every power company off the Ottawa river. I condemn every government that has renewed the franchise of this company since the value of these water-powers was known. I say to the House and to the country that it is the duty of the Conservative party, if no other party will do so, to stay here and fight this question from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, if necessary, until this franchise expires, if the House does not vote it down.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I have listened these many weeks with more or less patience, or impatience, to the arguments advanced on both sides of this controversy and I have tried to separate the wheat from the chaff, the relevant from the irrelevant, to discover what the real issue is. What is the question that is before the House to-day? What is the question we shall decide by our votes if we vote to-day? The question is not, shall we or shall we not have the Georgian bay canal? It is not, shall we or shall we not develop water-powers on the Ottawa river? It is not, shall we or shall we not have public ownership in this country? The immediate question which we shall decide by our votes is, shall we or shall we not send this bill to the committee to be investigated? That is the issue in the impending vote.

Much has been said during this debate about the principle involved. I ask, what is the principle involved? It is not the great principle of public ownership, neither is it the wicked principle of private enterprise. It is not the great principle of provincial rights, neither is it the principle of federal jurisdiction; for the question is, shall we refer this bill to the committee? Shall we investigate it and see what is in it? It is not even a question of the high and lofty principles of Sir Herbert Holt as opposed to the wicked principles of Sir Clifford Sifton; the question is, shall we investigate this bill and see what it proposes? The real principle which is at stake is this: shall this parliament maintain its ancient right to investigate, before its own committees, questions of great public importance? That is the issue in a nutshell. That is what we shall decide by our vote on this amendment.

Let me review for a moment the history of this project. The charter was issued for the canal away back in 1894. Those who secured the charter were to build the canal, and in exchange they were to have the water-powers. They could not secure the money to dig the canal. Why? Because the value of the water-powers, the revenue they hoped to get therefrom, did not in those days amount to very much. That charter expired and has been renewed from time to time, and now a new man has got hold of it. Power to-day is worth money, and he believes or he claims to believe that if we let him retain the charter he will be able to get sufficient revenue from the sale of power to warrant him in building the canal. Former holders of the charter used to come to the government of the country and ask for guarantees of their bonds; they would ask the government to go security for them so that they might raise the money to construct the canal. This man is not asking for any guarantee; he will build the canal with his own money if we give him the water-powers.

Considerable opposition has developed to the renewing of the charter. Let me go over some of the arguments that have been advanced as to why the charter should not be renewed. Some have argued that the project is not feasible and that the canal cannot be built; that is to say, that no Georgian bay canal that can be built could ever be made a practical grain route from the west. Others argue that the canal can be built and that it can be made a practical grain route. And the peculiar thing is that those who argue that the project is feasible, those who say that the route would be a practical outlet for western grain and would constitute an all-Canadian waterway, ask that the bill be sent to the committee where the engineers and others connected with the company could be summoned and where the whole matter could be investigated with a view to ascertaining whether it was feasible or not; while those who oppose the granting of the charter, and who hold that it is not feasible, are opposed to any investigation. Are they afraid the committee might find against them? As a rule, when a man has a just cause he welcomes an investigation. Why do these men oppose that investigation? Another argument we have heard repeatedly in this House against a renewal of this charter is that the Siftons never intend to build the canal. It is said that the bill as it stands has a loophole and that, if we pass it, Mr. Sifton and his associates will crawl through that loophole and take the water-powers with them, leaving the government holding the bag, so to speak. Those who make that assertion are not willing to have the bill go to the committee, while those who believe the undertaking to be feasible ask that it be submitted to the committee. They say, "Let it be investigated; let us look into the bill, and if there is a loophole we will close it up. We can bring Mr. Sifton and his associates and find out what their intentions are and whether or not they can raise money to build the canal. We can make a contract that will be watertight, in which there will be no loophole, and if they do not sign the contract we will not give the charter." What are those afraid of who refuse an investigation? If their cause is just they have nothing to fear from one, for I am sure they would be as ably represented in the committee as they are in this House.

I ask this question: If Sir Clifford Sifton and his associates, after they get hold of the charter, will not build the canal, is there any possibility that Sir Herbert Holt and his associates will build it? Sir Clifford Sifton has given or has offered to give a promise that he will build the canal, but my hon. friends say that he will not keep his promise. Do Sir Herbert Holt and his associates promise to build the canal? They promise nothing. We might as well acknowledge the fact that this is a fight between two interests, both seeking to control the water-powers.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to misstate the facts. There are two interests in the Carillon power. I regret to say that many speakers refer to this as the only matter of contention in this bill, but I would remind my hon. friend that Carillon is only one of the many powers on the Ottawa river, and it is the only power on the Ottawa river in which there are these two interests. The Hydro Electric, with which Sir Herbert Holt is associated—I do not know whether he controls it or not—has no interest in any power other than the Carillon, which, as I say, is only one of a dozen on the Ottawa river.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I understand my hon. friend's contention, but here is the point: the Carillon is one of the essential units of the Georgian bay canal, and if you alienate that power from the rest of the system the canal will never be built. And that is the trouble. It is the bone of contention at the present time, for it is the one power for which there is a market to-day. As time goes on, however, and as the country is settled, the demand for more power will extend to the other powers higher up the river, and the same question will present itself again.

A gentleman asked me the other day which of these two interests was likely to win in the struggle, and I told him I did not know, but that so far as I could see the Holt interests had had the better of it so far. I say that because they have succeeded in getting on their side all the advocates of public ownership. It is a peculiar situation to find the advocates of public ownership, the bitterest opponents of private enterprise in power as in other things, lining up on the side of a ccmpany whose aim is to secure a monopoly of power in Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the hon. member imply that the group in this section of the House who have taken a firm stand on this question are backing the Holt interests or will do so under any consideration?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No, I do not imply that, but I do imply that the Holt interests have been wily enough to persuade these gentlemen to help them pull the chestnuts out of the fire. That is the point.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Let me assure the hon. member that the group in this section of the House will oppose the alienation of these rights in any part of the system.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I have no doubt my hon. friend is sincere when he says that after they have eliminated the Sifton interests and have pulled these chestnuts out of the fire for the Holt interests, when the Holt interests want this power they also will be eliminated.

Mr. CAMPBELL: We certainly so intend, and I hope my hon. friends will assist us.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does my hon. friend speak only for himself or for his group?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think I am speaking for every member in this section of the House.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): There was once a young man who said in his heart, "I will serve the devil to-day because it suits my purpose, but to-morrow when he wants me to serve him I will refuse."

An hon. MEMBER: Was he from Weyburn?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn). When the morrow came he found that once having enlisted in the service of the devil he could not get his discharge.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I hope my hon. friend will take the lesson to heart.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The group who were wily enough to secure the coöperation of hon. members in that corner to serve their purpose in this case will be equally cunning in securing their coöperation and assistance in another case.

Mr. HEAPS: I object to the use of such language in this House. I think it most unfair and the hon. member should withdraw those remarks. So far as I am concerned no one ever saw me in connection with this matter and I have not been influenced by any member of this House or anyone outside the House. I do not think aspersions of that kind should be cast on any hon. members of this House, and I think the remark should be withdrawn.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I am not casting any aspersions on the character or integrity of any hon. member in that corner of the House. I simply say that in taking the stand they have taken they are doing the very thing the Holt interests desire; hon. members are pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for those interests. I do not doubt that my friends are as honourable as men can be, but those are the facts. Will any man say that their conduct in this matter is not acceptable to the Holt interests?

Mr. HEAPS: In answer to that question I can say that so far as the Holt interests are concerned, they will get just as much consideration from me as the Sifton interests, and I hope my hon. friend will follow our example and let us know where he stands.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is what I intend to do. It seems to me that in some quarters far too much stress is laid on public ownership; there is a disposition in some quarters to think that water-powers, canals, railways and public utilities generally exist for the purpose of being owned, and that the essential thing is who owns them, and where the title deed rests. To me that is of secondary importance; the essential consideration to my mind is not whether the title deeds to these utilities rest in the public treasury or in the strong boxes of private individuals, but what kind of service they give and what it costs.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I might ask my hon. friend if the one is not entirely dependent upon the other?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Not necessarily. We have had cases where private ownership has been very much abused, and the same thing has happened under public ownership. I think everyone will admit that the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission has been signally successful, but I sometimes wonder whether its success is not due almost entirely to Sir Adam Beck and his associates, and I wonder if Sir Adam Beck had been a believer in private ownership the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission would have achieved less success. That is a question worth considering.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member mention any electrical utility which is publicly owned and which has not been a success?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I do not know that I can, off hand. Figures have been quoted in this debate to show that power in Ontario is sold at less than it costs just over the line in the United States, where I believe power is developed under private ownership. Is that difference due to the question of ownership? Let us suppose the power developed at Niagara and sold in the United States was developed under public ownership and sold at cost; what would be the situation? Over there a market exists for ten or twenty times the amount of power available; the state hydro-electric commission, if such existed, would be selling power to a portion of the community at a very low cost while other members of the same community would have to get power from other sources at a higher cost, and this situation would exist. The state government would be selling power to one man at a lower cost than that man's competitor paid for power, in the same neighbourhood.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the public suffer from a condition of that kind?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Some industries would be discriminated against.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Some people would receive an advantage.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes, some people would get cheaper power. All the people would build a system to give cheap power to some of the people while the remainder would have to get power at a higher cost. That situation does not exist in Canada, and is not likely to exist here for many years yet.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Not so long as we maintain the principle of public ownership.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If the public took control of all the water-power in this country and if our population should increase to such an extent that there was not sufficient power for everyone, some people would have to go without, and those who could not get cheap power would have to obtain their power from coal or some other source at a higher cost.

Mr. HEAPS: On the same basis, would the hon. member claim that the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission should increase their rates to the level of the rates prevailing in the province of Quebec?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I do not say that.

Mr. HEAPS: At present Ontario manufacturers have an advantage over those of Quebec on account of the difference in the rate.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I think my hon. friend has missed my point. I do not mean to say that Ontario should have the same rates as Quebec, but I do say that if Ontario had a market for more power than could be provided, those who were getting cheap power would be getting it in part at the expense of those who had to get power from other sources.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. gentleman say that in the United States, where there are two rates prevailing, in consequence of that fact the lower rate should be raised until there was equality? Consequently would not the same argument apply in the province of Ontario, as compared with the province of Quebec? Would the hon. member raise the price in Ontario to meet the price in Quebec?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Ontario and Quebec are two provinces under two different governments; I am speaking of what would happen in one province or one state under one government. If the supply of power were far short of the demand, is it fair to all the people to ask them to furnish power to a portion of the people at less than the remainder can obtain their power for? To my mind the proper thing would be to sell the power for what it would bring in the market, and use the surplus revenue to reduce taxation. I think that would be quite in keeping with the stand of my hon. friends in the matter of the single tax. Public ownership in that case, where a portion of the people get their power at cost while the remainder of the people are deprived of power, is not quite in keeping with the position my hon. friends take in the matter of the single tax.

A very interesting question was raised by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) in regard to the right of this country to have that canal built at the expense of the people living along its banks. He argued that if you make the power pay for the building of the canal you make the people who live near the canal pay for their power, while the surplus would be used to build a canal for the benefit of people in a remote part of the Dominion, or for the Dominion as a whole. That is a very interesting question, and there is something in the hon. gentleman's argument. Who should be entitled to the power developed from a waterfall? Should its use be limited to the people living in the immediate vicinity of the development, or should those living perhaps two hundred miles away be permitted to participate also in the benefit? That question has not been settled, and it is one which might well be profitably discussed by the committee to whom it is proposed to refer this bill. Apparently those hon. members opposed to the bill do not want this question, and kindred issues, to be investigated. The Minister of Railways pointed out that there had been certain happenings in connection with the question of the lease of power which ought to be investigated. I am sure my hon. friends in the corner yonder do not want that investigation suppressed. They must be willing that all these matters should be looked into and I am quite sure that all hon. members on this side are willing also. I say to hon. gentlemen, therefore: Let the bill go to the committee so that anything which needs investigation can be inquired into.

I think the most ingenious argument in opposition to the bill came from the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). The hon. gentleman said: We cannot pass this bill, we cannot renew the charter to these people, because the water of the Ottawa river belongs to the federal government and the pebbles over which it flows are the property of the provincial government. He argued that the federal government could not build dams because they would have to be erected on property belonging to the provinces. Similarly we might argue that the provinces cannot build those dams because they would hold back water which belongs to the federal authorities.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is not that precisely the principle which Premier Taschereau stated only a few days ago?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Perhaps it is, but it serves to illustrate the problem involved which needs solution. There is a problem here which should be discussed and considered very carefully. But we cannot carry on the necessary inquiry in the House itself. We cannot bring experts here and ask them questions. We cannot put men on oath and examine them carefully. If the bill is sent to committee, however, we can carry out such measures, and there will be some hope of arriving at a proper solution.

Mr. HEAPS: All the questions to which my hon. friend has referred could be taken up even if the bill is killed.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No, they could not. If we kill this bill we ruin forever the prospect of building the Georgian bay canal.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The interests behind this bill have no intention of building the canal.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Surely my hon. friend does not say that the canal should never be built when the bill dealing with it has not even been sent to a committee for investigation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not say it should never be built. What I do say is that the interests behind this bill have no intention of building the canal.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If that be true let us bring those people before the committee. Let us put them on the stand and examine them as to their intention. Let us examine them to see whether they are in a position to build a canal, if they can raise the money to go on with the project, or what they are going to do. All we ask for is an investigation. Voting to send this bill to a committee does not commit us to the principle of private ownership or of public ownership; all it means is that an opportunity is afforded to have a thorough investigation.

There is one thing which we all know and which the country should know also—that the tactics adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last six weeks in blocking this bill had the result of depriving every member of his right to introduce legislation this session. There are on the order paper no less than forty-three resolutions, many of which stand in the names of hon. gentlemen in the corner diagonally opposite from where I am sitting. Not one of those resolutions will come up this session. Why? Because the tactics adopted by these same gentlemen have rendered that impossible. They have dammed back the proposed legislation just as effectively as the construction of dams on the Ottawa would dam back the waters of that river.

Mr. HEAPS: Was not the hon. gentleman himself guilty of similar tactics?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What tactics?

Mr. HEAPS: Talking against time. My hon. friend talked against a certain resolution last week to prevent it from going to committee.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We on this side did not block legislation for six weeks. In the case referred to I do not think I talked at as great length as my hon. friend did.

Mr. HEAPS: You were opposed to the principle of the resolution.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I do not like to make the suggestion because it is uncharitable, but is it possible that these hon. gentlemen have resolutions on the order paper which they do not want discussed, and are deliberately holding up this bill in order to dam back the proposed legislation?

Mr. EVANS: I should like to say that there are gentlemen in this part of the chamber who stood for public ownership of public utilities long before the movement was introduced into politics. Does not the hon. gentleman admit the principle of the bill when he argues that it should go before a committee, and will he state whether he believes in public or private ownership of public utilities?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I have spent considerable time trying to explain where I stood on the matter of private ownership. I think I told the House I did not attach very much importance to the question of ownership, but that what was important was the character of the service and what it would cost.

I have spoken longer than I intended, but perhaps it was not altogether my fault. Let me conclude by saying that the question before the House is whether we shall or shall not insist on our undoubted right to investigate these matters before a committee.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the question before the House. I ask the Speaker if he will be good enough to read the question. When the question is read hon. members will know exactly what it is. What my hon. friend has stated is not the question before the House although he has frequently said that it is.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That will be the result of the vote.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the question before the House.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That will be the result of the vote.

Mr. STEVENS: It will not be the result of the vote either.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If the motion rarries this bill will go to committee where it can be examined and dissected, and then killed or reported as the committee sees fit. When we send the bill to committee we do not bind ourselves to pass it.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to have the question before the House read. It is my privilege to have that done.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The amendment moved by Mr. Guthrie reads—

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to have the question before the House read, and the amendment also.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The bill before the House is the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). The hon. gentleman has moved that Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company—

Mr. STEVENS: Pardon me, is this not the question? That the bill be now read a second time? That is what we want to get. My hon. friend says it is not. I say that it is, and I should like to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is the question.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question is

That Bill No. 78 be read a second time, to which Mr. Guthrie moved in amendment, seconded by Sir George Perley:

That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Now my hon. friend knows what the question is.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What will be the result of the vote?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the question to debate, which the hon. member has not debated in any part of his speech.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What will be the result of the vote? If the motion carries the bill goes to committee.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr Speaker, I do not intend to depart from my customary practice of seldom and then only briefly addressing this House, but I cannot record my vote upon the question now before the House without giving some of the reasons why I intend to support the amendment. The subject has been exhaustively discussed. The logical and forceful speech of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and the convincing eloquence and close scrutiny of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) leave practically nothing to be said. I must confess that I was astonished a moment ago at the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), namely; "If we can get a canal for nothing, why should we not accept it?" He put that question as if he had considered that it terminated the whole discussion. I ask the Minister of Agriculture if in all this country there is a single canal, large or small, from the Newmarket canal in North York to the Welland canal, that has been acquired for nothing. There is not one, nor will there ever be a canal built in Canada for nothing. The taxpayers pay for every canal that we have. Therefore I take it that the Minister of Agriculture, in his usual good-natured and facetious manner, did not mean his remark to be taken seriously.

The question resolves itself into two parts: the transportation or canal part and the water-power part. In respect of the canal I say with full assurance that there is not an hon. member sitting in this House, there is not a reading man in all Canada outside of an insane asylum, and I should not think there would be many within the walls of such an institution, who believe that the money to build this canal, considered solely as a transportation system, can be obtained in any financial centre in the world. I recall well some thirty-three years ago when the charter was originally granted, when estimates were made as to the cost of the undertaking, and at that time the cost was placed at approximately $100,000,000. If $100,000,000 were required thirty-three years ago to construct a twenty or twenty-two foot waterway from Georgian bay to Montreal, I submit to the knowledge and intelligence of members that it will require at least two and one-half times that amount to do the same work to-day. That is not an exaggerated estimate, and so we arrive, moderately, conservatively, at a sum of $250,000,000 as requisite to build a system of navigation known as the Georgian bay canal capable of passing vessels with a draft of twenty feet or as they are sometimes termed, 10,000 ton vessels, the largest that navigate lake Superior and the other upper lakes.

First of all, even though the bonds were backed by the Dominion of Canada that money would cost close upon 5 per cent. Over and above that you have the cost of operating and the cost of repairs and maintenance. Therefore, figure it out as you will, you cannot arrive at a lower sum than $15,000,000 a year in connection with this project. What sane financier, what sane person is going to put a dollar into an enterprise from which not one cent of revenue is to be derived? Let it be remembered that I am speaking of the transportation scheme and not at the moment of the water-power end of it.

The promoters of this bill profess that they will complete this waterway to a depth capable of floating vessels of 10,000 tons. Where in the name of common sense are they going to get the money? The thing upon its face is absurd; it is too nonsensical for any serious man to mention for a moment. It will take $15,000,000 a year to carry the cost of this canal if it is built as professed by the promoters of the bill. In a circular which has been addressed to every member of this House the statement is made that by this proposed waterway there will be a saving of three cents a bushel in the cost of freighting from Fort William to the port of Montreal. Upon the basis of the largest quantity of not simply wheat, but grain, namely 295,000,000 bushels, that has come out of lake Superior ports—and I hope in the future that figure will be greatly exceeded—this saving of three cents a bushel will represent a little less than $9,000,000. Why, it would pay the taxpayers of Canada well—it would be money in their pockets—if they gave a subsidy of three cents a bushel to the farmers of the northwest for every bushel of grain they exported in the big crop year of 1925-26, because instead of the taxpayers of this country paying $15,000,000 a year to maintain the waterway, including of course interest on the cost, they would have to pay only $9,000,000 on a basis of an economy of three cents a bushel.

This is a point which has always appealed to me in connection with this question. After due consideration many years ago the Dominion government and the parliament of Canada concluded that the best waterway from lake Superior, lake Huron and the other upper lakes to the sea was by the Welland canal to the St. Lawrence river, or what is popularly known as the St. Lawrence waterway. We have invested already upwards of $60,000,000, I think, in the Welland canal, and it is not at all unlikely that before the enlarged canal is completed the cost will run to $75,000,000. The proposal is to have the transhipping go through in smaller vessels which can pass through the St. Lawrence canal, but I would think that ultimately, as soon as the finances of the country permit, the sensible, businesslike project would be to enlarge the St. Lawrence, so as to permit the largest of the upper lake freighters to pass right down to the port of Montreal, or, if you like, the port of Quebec, where transhipment would take place. Are we to enter deliberately, with our eyes open, into competition, by means of this Georgian bay canal, with the St. Lawrence waterways, in which we have already invested a great many million dollars, and in which every day of the year we are burying more and more money? A few years ago, in a fit of frenzied finance, the government and the parliament of this country—and I am bound to say with the approval of the electors—built three transcontinental railways where two at most would have sufficed. There is no one, I venture to say, who to-day does not regard that policy as a fatuous one, as an uneconomical one. We know that a good deal of the burden of taxation under which this country labours arises out of that extravagant railway policy of a few years ago, and yet hon. members stand up in this House and ask us to pursue the same fatuous policy in connection with water transportation and to build two canal systems where one is adequate.

Assuming, merely for the purpose of argument, that the Georgian bay canal project will be completed in the course of years, every bushel of grain that passes down it will be taken from the other waterway, the St. Lawrence, which we are completing at very great cost. The total revenue of all canals of Canada is less than $1,000,000, and of that $900,000 two-thirds are derived from elevating charges on the Welland canal and from some water leases on the Lachine canal. But I am glad to say that there is not one dollar of tolls upon our canals, and yet the promoters of this bill say to us that they will spend $250,000,000 upon the project without the imposition of one single dollar of tolls from which they can derive one penny of revenue. Sir, it seems to me that the project, as a canal, ought literally to be laughed out of the House.

Then we come to the other aspect, namely, the waterways. My attitude—I speak only for myself—in respect to water-power is that the matter should be left entirely to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. My understanding is that under a not very remote judgment of the Privy Council it was decided that the riverbeds and the shores belonged to the province, and without a dissenting voice the legislature of Ontario, although overwhelmingly Conservative in its party complexion, and the legislature of Quebec, equally overwhelmingly Liberal in its complexion, unanimously passed resolutions condemning this bill and asking parliament to throw it out. Surely those resolutions ought to receive some consideration in this House. I recall well many years ago, and the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) alluded to it in his address, when, misguidedly, a Conservative government, prompted by the request of one of their supporters, namely, the late Dalton McCarthy entered into a controversy with the province of Ontario over many serious questions such for instance as the Streams Bill, another relating to the licensing for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and other matters. In every instance the Dominion government was beaten. and the Conservative party lost caste in that province for many years because of its attitude towards the provincial government of Ontario. I warn the government, whether this bill goes to second reading or not, that if it cracks the party whip and induces members to vote on account of party allegiance for the second reading, it will be digging its own grave as sure as death and taxation.

There is another aspect of this question which in my judgment has not been adequately stressed, and it is the danger of getting into litigation over these waterways. At this moment the holders of the charter, popularly known as the Sifton interests, have not one single copper of vested rights. They acquired this charter, so the story runs, for speculative purposes and for none other. The charter expires on the 1st of May next, a matter of four weeks and a few days, and if the charter is allowed to expire the gentlemen who entered into this speculation will be out a few dollars. Dealing with the matter of vested rights, these people have had this charter for thirty-three years, and can any hon. member tell me where a single sod has been turned towards the construction of the work? The story goes—and I do not vouch for it, but I would not be surprised if there were some truth in it, knowing the moderation of the gentlemen who hold this charter—that they are willing to relinquish it for a recompense of $2,000,000. I admire their moderation! I wish I possessed even a modicum of it. But if we put this bill into committee, and if we report it back from committee—emasculated if you like, not even a skeleton, a bare shadow of the bill as it had been in the past—we will in a measure have confirmed certain rights to these interests. I am against such a course. Litigation will follow. No one knows it better than the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The provinces of Ontario and Quebec have already stated in the most unequivocal language that they will have recourse to the courts. If you give the promoters any kind of standing room, they will make it so difficult to move along the lines of the development of power that the whole project will be held up for an indefinite time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the members of the government have expressed no opinion upon the merits or demerits of this bill. What may be in their minds I of course, not being a Stuart Cumberland, cannot tell; but if their intent be to so emasculate the measure in committee that it will become innocuous and absolutely harmless, it seems to me that it is upon the principle of the prevention of cruelty to animals—that in order to make the operation less painful they should take an inch at a time off the dog's tail. As we all know, this is not an ordinary private bill. It would be better described as a public bill in the hands of a private member.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) told us this afternoon that he has had difficulty in making up his mind. He wants more information, he wants experts called and the matter gone into fully before the committee within—as we all hope—two weeks from prorogation. But if he has any doubt as to the meaning of the bill, I think he stands alone in this House and in the country, for its merits or demerits have been discussed on platforms and in the press ad nauseam, and there is no one so dull, no one so blind or stupid, as not to be aware that this is a fight by the promoters for power rights, and that it is not for one moment to be taken seriously as a transportation project.

Of course, we can all understand and sympathize sincerely with the position of the Prime Minister. There are such things, I suppose, as political debts. There is sometimes political work which must be paid for. I would not be surprised in the least if the desire of the first minister to send this bill to a committee is a payment on account, as it were, for services rendered by one of the promoters in an effort to avenge the defeat which in 1925 the Prime Minister sustained in North York. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to weary the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): No, I am going to close, I will not say with an appeal to the House, for I do not think there is an intelligent member sitting here who is not already fully conversant with the subject. There is nothing new to be said with respect to it. Ah! yes, there is another statement I should like to refer to. There has emanated from more than one member to your right, Sir, the statement that this is a fight between the Holt interests and the Sifton interests. I suppose as a Montrealer I might be suspected of lending my sympathy to the Holt interests but let me say that I give it to neither. So far as my voice would have anything to do with the result, I would wish that the provincial governments be permitted to settle this question. Let them be permitted to determine whether the Sifton interests or the Holt interests are to be paramount in this power development. As to myself, I care not a snap of the finger for the Holt interests any more than I care for the Sifton interests. I cannot believe that this House will—I was going to use the word stultify, but that may be too strong—I cannot believe that this House will make such an exhibition of imbecility—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would be milder.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): Very well, I will use it. I cannot believe that this House will make such an exhibition of imbecility as to give second reading to a measure which, if it ever emerges from the special committee, will have no other consequences than that of involving large and important interests in litigation to the prejudice of the people of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I had not any intention of speaking on this bill, but as I championed it in past sessions I deem it necessary to express my views on this occasion. I well remember making a speech favouring the Georgian bay canal, and the late lamented Emmanuel B. Devlin, the member for Wright, afterwards said in my hearing, although he did not know I was within range of his voice, "Baldwin has knocked the props from under my feet."

I speak in favour of the Georgian bay canal as I would of any other great waterway for the development of this country, for I believe this is the cheapest kind of transportation. A member on the other side of the House last week gave us an historical resume of canals back even before the birth of Christ and told us all about the waterways of China and thus down through history to comparatively modern times, showing that he had at least studied this method of transportation. To-day we find canals are not paying propositions. I notice quite recently that the Erie canal is not doing as much business as the old canal did. When I spoke of the Georgian bay canal project on former occasions there was not then any real appreciation of the wonderful assets we had in the hinterland of Quebec and Ontario. We had pretty much the same railway facilities then as we have to-day, but there was not the same necessity as now exists for the construction of a canal such as this. In the interior of Quebec and Ontario there is a wonderful mineral country and just now large sums are being spent in the production of gold, of which considerable quantities have already been found. It is intended to delve still deeper into the earth in search of this and other precious metals, and with iron ore, which the geologists believe to exist in that part of the country, together with copper, silver and other assets which undoubtedly are waiting tc be taken, there are great prospects ahead of these provinces. I do not think that the country there could be better or more cheaply served in the way of transportation than by means of such a waterway as is proposed. Our mineral products in these sections of Quebec and Ontario, of which I am speaking, would afford enormous traffic even though so far only the fringe of that country has been touched.

This question involves a conflict between private and public ownership. In my opinion, which differs from the view advanced by my hon. friend from Mount Royal (Mr. White), if the hydro-electric possibilities are such as have been depicted, this great wealth should contribute to the cost of constructing the canal. I believe that it could be so arranged as to have the revenue from this hydro-electric development pay in time, if not immediately, for the Georgian bay canal. If it comes to a question of American versus Canadian interests I would not hesitate to favour the development of this power by our own people. Someone has said that this is a matter of Montreal or the Holt interests as against Toronto and the Sifton interests. However that may be, I would have no hesitation in any instance in advocating that Canadians be allowed to develop this power rather than hand it over to American interests who, I am sure, would have but one purpose in view, namely, the exportation of power to the United States, making us hewers of wood and drawers of water to their own advantage. That I would oppose on every occasion. If hydro-electric power is to be developed an enormous amount of labour and capital will be required. Let us keep these in Canada; let it never be said that transmission lines in connection with the development of power along this route were constructed by outsiders for the benefit of foreign labour. Let us see to it that our great heritage of white coal, of which we have more probably than exists in any other country, we have been able to take advantage of and to exploit ourselves.

We are prone to speak of the vastness of this country, but I think I am within the mark when I say there is a possibility of our developing 20,000,000 horse-power in this country. This is one of the most glorious visions before Canadians to-day. I firmly believe that if the Georgian bay canal is built now, or at any time in the future, it should be built with the great water-power possibilities in view. I do not urge any haste in such a stupendous undertaking as this. In my own private affairs I have never robbed the future for the sake of the present. I believe in conservation. I believe in conserving all our resources, whether they be timber, our fisheries or our minerals, and not in being greedy and thinking only of ourselves. Let us think of posterity.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

This question cannot be decided without the most careful consideration. There is a multitude of complex considerations that must be weighed: provincial and riparian rights, federal rights, and all the rest of it—matters which this parliament cannot deal with without a thorough investigation. I believe the people are intelligent enough not to do anything that will divide province against province or the provinces against the Dominion. Let us do nothing that will result in litigation. I have confidence enough in the good sense of our people to believe that nothing of this sort will happen. It seems to me that the best way in which this whole question can be handled is to have the bill referred to the committee where it could be fully discussed.

We have heard a good deal about this charter hanging fire for thirty-three years. What are the reasons why no progress has been made towards the construction of the canal? The great, appalling war came along, and are we not proud of Canada to-day to see that her finances are in such good condition after that great struggle? Not only did the war interfere but the construction of the Welland canal was undertaken, and those who have seen that canal will know that it is a most ponderous undertaking; in the course of that construction it has been found necessary to dig through great banks of clay which have no solid foundation, entailing an enormous amount of work. I say without hesitation that I believe the Georgian bay canal should have been built first, which would have promoted the development of the tremendous resources of those portions of Quebec and Ontario in that vicinity; I believe a greater benefit would have been obtained to this country if the Welland canal had been allowed to wait until the construction of the Georgian bay canal had been finished. Some hon. members representing constituencies bordering the great lakes may not agree with that, but I maintain that the Georgian bay canal would have been a greater asset to the trade and commerce of this country and would have hastened the development of our great natural resources.

I do not care to elaborate upon this matter, but I am emphatically in favour of this bill being sent to committee where those who are backing it may appear and make known their promises and pledges in this connection. I would not allow the great hydro-electric possibilities of this country to be destroyed without first making certain that this canal will be built. I am not enough of an engineer even to approximate the cost of this undertaking, but I believe this canal should be built piece by piece, beginning at the Ottawa end if you will and gradually extending it until it is completed. Not one horse-power of hydro-electric energy should be sacrificed or given away to anyone, whether they be Canadian or foreign, until a binding agreement has been made between the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario and the federal government. These three governments should work in conjunction and in perfect unanimity, under an agreement which will be binding upon each for all time, in order that this may be a source of great national development and an undertaking of which all Canada may be proud.

Mr. R. E. RYERSON (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up more than a few moments of the time of the House on this question, but representing as I do an industrial centre which has enjoyed for many years the full benefits of the hydro-electric system of Ontario, I deem it my duty to protest against the granting of a renewal of this charter and against any measure which may appear to menace the future of this great public-owned enterprise.

For the purpose of a better understanding of the attitude of the people of Ontario, and particularly those served by hydro in their relation to this question, I would like to state a few facts pertaining to the early history and present status of this project. The Ontario Hydro Electric system did not originate with the Ontario government or with any one individual, as has been frequently stated on the floor of this House. The entire plan was carried out and now stands as a partnership affair between the government of Ontario and the municipalities served by the system, both as to construction and financial obligation. The government is responsible for the purchasing, development and transmission of electrical energy to the gates of the municipalities which, on their part, take care of the construction and maintenance of distribution plants and stepping-down stations. A small league of municipalities comprising the cities and towns of Toronto, London, Brantford, Guelph, Stratford, Woodstock and Ingersoll were the initial pioneers in advocating and planning this great development.

The early efforts of this league were directed towards the preservation, development and public ownership of the vast potential power at Niagara Falls, which was rapidly being sacrificed and given away to large private interests, greatly to the advantage of American industry and American citizens. This pioneer work, which included surveys, engineers' reports and a general campaign of publicity, was carried on for a number of years. In 1903, at the request of these municipalities, the Ontario government of that date passed an act authorizing the creation of the Ontario Power Commission, with power to investigate the feasibility of the development and transmission of Niagara power to points in central and southern Ontario, and to prepare plans for such a purpose. The personnel of the commission was named by the league of municipalities, and the entire cost was borne by that league. Those nominated to the commission were:

E. W. B. Snyder, St. Jacobs, president.
P. W. Ellis, Toronto.
W. F. Cockshutt, Brantford.
Adam Beck, London.
R. F. Fessenden, electrical engineer, Washington, D.C.

Before the final report of this commission was completed a number of other municipalities joined the league, including Hamilton, Dundas, Paris, St. Thomas, St. Marys, Mitchell, Kitchener, Waterloo, Hespeler, Preston and Galt. After the completion of this report and at the request of this now influential league of municipalities—and with the persuasive powers of Adam Beck—the then government under the leadership of Sir James Whitney adopted the plans and took over the project. The Ontario Hydro Electric Commission was created, under whose management and supervision the original plans were developed and extended into the present system, which has saved millions of dollars to the consumers of power in this province. The people of these municipalities have watched with a justifiable pride the wonderful success and growth of hydro, and naturally look with alarm and suspicion on any action by this parliament which would appear to interfere with or jeopardize the future success of this great public undertaking.

I not only voice my own disapproval of this bill, but desire as well to add the protest of the city of Brantford, which unanimously passed the following resolution:

That the council of the municipality of Brantford respectfully urges the parliament of Canada not to renew the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, known as Bill No. 78, as in our opinion this bill is not in the interest of the province of Ontario as it is an attempt to deprive the people of this province of their right to the powers to be developed from the waters of the Ottawa river, and further that this charter has been in existence for thirty-three years, and no actual construction has taken place, and we believe the renewal of this charter would be contrary and prejudicial to the public interest.

I also have a communication from the town council of the town of Paris, enclosing a similar resolution, which reads as follows:

That the council of the municipality of Paris, Ontario, respectfully urges the parliament of Canada not to renew the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, known as Bill No. 78, as in our opinion this bill is not in the interest of the province of Ontario as it is an attempt to deprive the people of this province of their right to the powers to be developed from the water of the Ottawa river, and further that this charter has been in existence for thirty-three years and no actual construction has taken place, and we believe the renewal would be contrary and prejudicial to the public interest.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have been an interested spectator during this debate which has now lasted for some three weeks, and I have at times wondered why there is this wide divergence of views on the question which is now before the House. As I look across the way at the members representing the United Farmers of Alberta, also my good Labour members and other members on the other side who in the most trenchant language condemn those who would send this bill to committee, I think I can assure them—and I would preface my remarks by saying that honesty and sincerity is written all over their countenances—that with all their professions they are not more true nor more loyal to the principle of public ownership than are those who would treat this bill as all other similar bills are treated, namely, by sending it to committee. Oh, yes, but someone says, when we vote on the second reading, when we submit the measure to committee, we are committed to the principle of it. I am inclined to think that theory was rather badly shot in 1925 when the Petersen contract was before the House. We all recall very well that long drawn out debate, and members on the opposite side of the House who were opposing that measure going to committee declared that we were admitting the principle of subsidies to steamship companies or the principle of subsidies itself.

Mr. STEVENS: There was a marked distinction. That was a public government measure, not a regular private measure, and it went to a special committee for consideration.

Mr. WARD: That is a stronger reason why this, being a private bill, should go to committee.

[Mr. Ryerson.]

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to remind my hon. friend that on that particular memorable occasion to which he refers, the Prime Minister notified the House that, notwithstanding all that he said, a vote on that occasion would not be considered as a vote for the principle of the Petersen contract.

Mr. WARD: Quite so, and there and then we established the precedent. I think it was taken for granted upon that occasion that we were not committed in any way to the principle of the measure, and I am sure there are a large number of hon. members who may vote to send this bill to committee, who do not consider that they are thereby committing themselves on the question of public versus private ownership.

I was not surprised at the course which our Conservative friends followed. It was a very characteristic one; they took that same natural Conservative attitude, smug, self-righteous, that they are the only people who are defending the rights of the masses. I think I can assure them also that there are in this House others who are just as anxious, just as determined as are my good friends the Conservatives, to promote the interests of the great mass of the people. The Conservative party, at least up to the present, have never been conspicuous in respect to the rights of that great mass of the people known as the taxpayers of this country, and particularly in respect to public ownership.

We have, however, in this particular question one feature that is unique in the economic life of this Dominion, if not of the American continent, in that the river in question, the Ottawa, which has been recognized for at least a hundred years as a navigable waterway, forms an interprovincial boundary. I do not presume to be an authority on constitutional matters, but according to our constitution the water of this stream belongs to the people of Canada. The river bed, as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) told us the other night, belongs to the provinces, and therefore he contended—and I think it was an ingenious argument—that this set up an unsurmountable problem. Let me tell him that there is no problem at all because, while it may be true that the river bed belongs to the provinces, the Dominion has the right of expropriation at any time and can expropriate for any purposes which it sees fit.

But this constitutes an added reason why this whole question should go before the committee. We have, as I have said, a stream of which the water belongs to the Dominion and the potential powers belong to the provinces.

On one side of the Ottawa river we have a province that is avowedly in favour of private ownership and on the other side a province professing public ownership. I wonder if our friends who are opposing this measure and who are declaring that this project should be developed as a national undertaking, as I quite agree it should be, will tell us just how under those circumstances they are going to develop the Ottawa river. We are up a blind alley. Is that not a fundamental reason why this whole measure should go to committee where we can get some light in order to pass an intelligent judgment upon it?

I would not have taken part in this debate had it not been that I believe the time has arrived—and I am very much surprised that up to date no one in this chamber has suggested it—for the appointment of a federal hydro-electric power commission. In Ontario of course we have the hydro power commission, and someone may say, "Well, why not let the provinces attend to such matters as the controlling of hydro power?" Very true, but it has to be remembered that the three prairie provinces do not own or control their resources, and I am told by competent engineers that there is known to them at the present time something in excess of ten million of potential hydro power in these three prairie provinces. I have been told that there is something in excess of seven million now known in the province of Manitoba alone. We now witness the struggle that is going on, as we are told by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) between two great financial rings to get control of the powers of what is just a stream; for the Ottawa river is only a little stream compared with the Nelson, the Churchill, the Mackenzie and the Yukon rivers. Someone has said that there is a million and a quarter horse-power involved. I have made some inquiries and I find that these same competent engineers tell us that they will never develop more than 750,000 horse-power on the Ottawa river. Now we have all this struggle, three weeks of the time of parliament, practically every hour which has been allotted to private members for the consideration of private bills and private measures has been given over to this one question, a matter involving 750,000 horse-power, while as I say there is known to the engineers at least ten million horse-power certain to be developed in the three prairie provinces. These natural resources are to-day controlled by the federal parliament, and the experience, Mr. Speaker, of this long range administration of the last two years has not been very satisfactory to western Canada in respect either to power development or to pulpwood and many other resources which I might mention. The time has arrived when it is essential that these powers should be developed in the best interests of the people of Canada; and if my Conservative friends are as desirous as they appear to be—and I think they are—they will support at once the suggestion of a federal hydro-power commission which will take charge of every power in Canada, whether it be on the Ottawa, the Nelson, or any other river. It may be of interest to this House to know that a certain group of financiers have already an option on the largest single power site on the Nelson river, known as the White Mud falls.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. member give us a little information about that particular matter?

Mr. WARD: I am not desirous of going into the history of the matter, but a certain financial ring already has an option on this power site. I am given to understand that the International Paper Company is now endeavouring to get control of or to buy up the option. When the people of Manitoba are forced to stand by and see two foreign financial rings barter with their very birthright—that is the spectacle we have in Manitoba—with the five million of horse-power on the Nelson river, within about six hundred miles of the city of Winnipeg and about the same distance of some of our western cities, is it not patent to us that in the near future we must take drastic steps to control these powers for the people of western Canada, or of all of Canada if you like, rather than continue the policy which we have been following, of dealing them out in parcels to foreign interests, or to financial interests even though they are not foreign.

With the completion of the Hudson Bay railway; with the opening up of such great resources as are to be found on Belcher islands, where, I am given to understand the largest iron ore deposits on the American continent are to be found; with the vast pulpwood resources along the Nelson and Churchill rivers, we can readily see that by long range administration the best results cannot be obtained. I am making no reflection whatever upon our present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who is now in charge of these resources, but he has a big job on his hands. His task is far too great to enable him to give proper consideration to the resources of any one province and have them developed as they should be.

Before concluding I desire again to urge upon the government and upon this House the absolute necessity in my judgment of constituting in the very near future—as I think this would be an opportune time—a federal hydro power commission. I would not have risen at all were it not that I had hoped that during this debate some member on the front benches of the official opposition, or some member of the government, would have come forward with a suggestion that the time was ripe for the appointment of such a board. Without any doubt, by far the biggest question, economic or social, in the Dominion of Canada to-day is the matter of hydro development. There is no other single feature of our life that reaches into every avenue of our economic development as that of electricity, and as the years go by it will become increasingly important that the development of hydro must be preserved for the benefit of the people and not allowed to get into the hands of any great financial ring.

I am anxious—and I have no hesitation in saying so—to see this bill go to committee. I want to assure the House that I am not interested at all in the fortunes of either the Siftons or others.

Mr. McGIBBON: Help them along.

Mr. WARD: I have not been lobbied, I can assure the House, in any way by either the Siftons or the Holts. I want to say to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) that he need not fear. I want to be able to pass intelligent judgment on the matter. I do not think a solitary member of this House, including the hon. member for Muskoka, is in a position to render an intelligent decision upon this very important problem. I think it is absolutely essential that we send this bill to committee, if for no other reason than that out of that committee I hope will come a suggestion for the appointment of a federal hydro power commission.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): When I was speaking at the opening of this debate I referred to the fact that those interested in this bill, as well as the public generally and the newspapers, were very apt to refer to this matter only in connection with the Carillon canal and the Carillon power. I endeavoured to make it plain at the time that this is only part of the issue before us to-day. I explained that it was an erroneous view and that the bill deals with all the powers on the Ottawa river, of which the Carillon is only one. This afternoon the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) referred to the matter. I do not think I should have risen to say anything about it had not the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning)—the only member of the government who up to this time has spoken on the subject—made a special point of the Carillon power. His remarks made on March 14, will be found at page 1194 of Hansard. The following is a short extract:

> I deem it necessary to give to the House, if possible, some accurate information respecting the history of what I might call, "the bone of contention", because beyond any question that bone of contention is the Carillon power. There is not a member of the House who is not aware of that fact, nor is there a member who does not know also that the contention for the bone is, at the present time, not between any public ownership bodies, but between two great private interests.

I disagree entirely with the hon. minister's statement. He might characterize the Carillon as the knuckle, but it is by no means the whole bone. Carillon is in the county of Argenteuil, which I have the honour to represent in this House. One end of the dam to be built at Carillon would be on that side of the river. The people of Carillon are very anxious to see this power developed, and they have waited for its development for thirty years, patiently or impatiently, which ever way you like to put it. I see in his seat the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who by the courtesy of the electors represented Argenteuil during one parliament, from 1921 to 1925, but notwithstanding all the influence he then had he did nothing towards the development of this power. There are rumours abroad as to who controls the Georgian bay charter. There are also rumours current as to who controls the National Hydro-Electric Company, which has a lease of the Carillon falls from the Department of Railways and Canals. Personally I have no information as to who really controls, but I think I made it abundantly clear on the earlier occasion when I spoke on this bill that I am against the renewal of the Georgian bay charter. As for the lease of the water-power at Carillon, I may say again for the information of the House that in 1925 one of the gentlemen most interested in it came to the county and worked against me as strongly as he could in the election. Therefore I am not here to advocate their claims. But we want this power developed, provided always no right is given to export it. True, a great part of the power when developed would be sent to Montreal and other cities, but its development would be sure to lead to industries being established in the locality, and the people there need the power.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Railways and Canals is wrong. Carillon is only one of the many water-powers covered by this bill. In order that every member may realize that that is the fact, I reiterate that this charter covers all the powers on the Ottawa river, the Mattawa river and the French river, and that Carillon is only one of those powers, although it is a large one. In other words, the rich prize that the promoters of this bill are seeking is the control of 200 miles of lake and river and rapids with a potential horse-power of a million and a half, as has been stated on several occasions while the bill has been before the House. On the Ottawa river there is a million and a quarter horse-power, and the power on the other two rivers will bring up the total to a million and a half or perhaps two million. That, I claim, is the bone of contention, and I hope hon. members will not allow any argument to becloud the issue on that point.

Now a few words as to the bill itself. Section 1 provides that:

> The Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, hereinafter called "the Company", may commence the construction of its canals, or any of them,— or any of them be it noted.

> —and expend fifty thousand dollars thereon, on or before the first day of May, one thousand nine and thirty, and may complete the said canals and put them in operation before the first day of May, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six.

The section concludes:

> —and if such construction is not commenced and such expenditure is not so made, or if the said canals are not completed and put in operation within the said periods respectively, the powers granted to the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said canals and works as then remains uncompleted.

I draw particular attention of hon. members to these words:

> —the powers granted to the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said canals and works as then remains uncompleted.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would it not be possible for the company under this authority to develop one or more of the water-powers and sell the electric energy without in any way operating a canal? In considering this point I will not refer to Carillon.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Since the hon. gentleman has seen fit to ask that question, will he kindly read the last portion of section 1 in the light of section 5 of the act of 1906, which repealed section 43 of the original charter, and then tell this hon. House whether he is still of the same opinion?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As I said when speaking before on this subject, my idea is that the best way to deal with the matter is to let the charter lapse, and have the government take it over under this clause.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does my hon. friend mean that the government can take the charter over after it has lapsed?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is merely a matter of verbiage. What I mean to say is, the government should take it over under the powers contained in the section to which he has referred. But that has nothing to do with the point I am trying to make with regard to section 1 of this bill. As I read section 1, it is altogether possible for the company to develop one power on the Ottawa river in the way I shall set forth, without proceeding any further. If hon. gentlemen will listen to me before shaking their heads they will agree with what I am going to say. In considering this point I will not refer to Carillon at all, because that raises the question of rival interests. Let us suppose that this bill should become law and that the charter were renewed under the terms of section 1. Could not the Georgian Bay Canal Company go to Deux Rivières, 150 miles from Ottawa, and there build a canal and lock, spending $50,000, as they are obliged to do under this section, or even more, which would be in no way connected with the rest of the canal or works? Could not the company then build a dam to develop water-power, and not to be used for canal purposes? Would it not be possible for them to develop the water-power at that particular point, having built a canal in that section in order to carry out the specific terms of section 1, and thereafter sell the electricity thus produced, without doing anything further?

Mr. LAPIERRE: Would not the committee stage be the appropriate place to settle that question?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Before I conclude I shall have a few words to say about the committee stage of these proceedings. Let me in the meantime develop the point I have in mind regarding the powers conferred by section 1. I am not a lawyer, and I am not affirming that what I have suggested can be done. I am, however, asking this question: Is it not possible under the terms of section 1 for the company, if they see fit, to do as I have outlined? Could they not, by building the canal and lock at that particular point and so complying with the terms of this section, sell all the power thereby developed without completing any of the rest of the waterway? And could they not do that at other points on the Ottawa river?

If they did, what remedy would there be? All that this parliament could do would be to declare the powers of the company null and void as respects so much of the canals and works as then remained uncompleted. But parliament could not take away the works already built. This section provides that they shall complete and put into operation the whole of the works before the first of May, 1936. But suppose that when that time came nothing had been done except the construction at Deux Rivières, where by building a high dam and putting the water back twenty miles or so they could develop a large horse-power: what remedy would the country have in that case? None. And the same argument would apply to other rapids and waterfalls on the Ottawa river.

It seems to me that this is a question worthy of the most serious consideration by members of this House. My view of the matter is confirmed by the following quotation from a letter which has been tabled and which is already in Hansard. The letter bears date January 17, 1925, written by the Deputy Minister of Justice to the Deputy Minister of Public Works in reference to the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal, and the last sentence reads:

> In any event it seems to me that approval should be withheld unless the work proposed to be constructed will afford traffic and navigation facilities between points which can reasonably be regarded as terminal points of a canal.

That is the opinion of Mr. W. Stuart Edwards, the very capable Deputy Minister of Justice. In other words, he considers that no bill should be passed which would enable the company to develop one or two powers on the Ottawa river without proceeding to the construction of the canal itself.

I am more and more impressed, as I have listened to this debate, with the view that this is a question which should be settled by the two provinces concerned and the Dominion, the parties sitting around a table and coming to a satisfactory conclusion. This is a public matter of the gravest importance, having regard to the respective rights of the provinces and of the Dominion. I know there is considerable difference of opinion about it, and I have no doubt the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who will follow me, will differ from some of the other lawyers in the House. He will agree with me, however, that the provinces have some rights on the Ottawa river, just as I am prepared to agree with him that the Dominion also has rights. I do not think these rights are well defined; at least, that is my opinion speaking as a layman. It seems to me that the only way in which the interest of the people can be safeguarded—because, after all, we are all for the people, whether we be members of a provincial legislature or of the House of Commons—is for the provinces and the Dominion to get together and come to some arrangement regarding the development and the division of water-power on this great river.

Before I sit down I want to say a word in regard to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). When I ventured to oppose the second reading of the bill I had no idea that the newspapers and the public generally would be so keenly interested in the question. I declared then that I was not trying to prevent the bill from going to the committee; I merely wanted to have members of this House as well as the public fully informed regarding the facts. I wanted the members here, before the bill was considered in committee, to be fully seized with the gravity of the situation, more especially in view of the fact that water-power has become an asset of such vital importance to everyone in this country. As I said before, I look forward to the time when our children, or at any rate our grandchildren, will have houses heated with white coal. And that being so it is my opinion that this asset should be retained as far as possible by the people. I think I made it abundantly clear then that I was against the renewal of the charter of the Georgian Bay Canal Company, and as the discussion has proceeded in this House it has become evident that there is a strong feeling in the country that the principle involved in the bill should not be embodied in a private measure. It is a public question which should be dealt with in public legislation. That being the case, and public interest having been aroused as it has been, I think the leader of the opposition was quite justified in moving his amendment to the effect that this matter being of a public nature should be dealt with in a public and not in a private bill. Under the circumstances I shall be very glad to support the amendment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I do not rise for the purpose of either supporting or condemning the merits of the proposed bill, nor do I intend to discuss its expediency. Nor shall I go into the advisability of leasing to private companies the rights of developing power on the Ottawa river, whoever the directors of those companies may be. I shall not even discuss the policy of public ownership, although I may say that while I am not vociferous or fanatical in support of that policy, I have had occasion in the past to defend it against some gentlemen who are most violently opposed to the present bill. My purpose in rising is rather to perform what I deem to be my duty.

In the course of this debate, and outside of parliament, voices have been heard pleading and arguing for the rights of the provinces with regard to water-powers in navigable rivers, but so far no voice has been heard asserting the rights of the Dominion government. Without hestitation I have come to the conclusion that it is my duty as a member of the government and as Attorney General for this Dominion to defend the rights of the Dominion government in that respect; I do so the more easily because two years ago, when I occupied my present position, I had occasion to give my opinion on that very subject long before the renewal of this charter was before this House for discussion. In 1925 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to me a letter which he had received from the premier of the province of Ontario, and asked me what I thought were the respective rights of the federal government and of the provinces with regard to such water-powers. I wrote a letter under date of June 1, 1925, which I desire to now read to the House:

My dear Prime Minister,

Referring to your letter of the 17th ultimo, re. development of additional power at Carillon rapids on the Ottawa river, I may say that ever since the year 1894 the improvement of navigation between Montreal, Ottawa and the Georgian bay has been given earnest consideration by successive administrations, and has formed the subject of parliamentary legislation authorizing the construction of the necessary works. For many reasons, which need not be detailed here, the erection of such works has been postponed from time to time, with the result that no major improvement has been made in the navigation of the Ottawa River. Leases have, however, been already granted covering navigation works at Carillon, one of which was dated the 31st March, 1911, and the other the 1st December, 1921.

With regard to Mr. Ferguson's suggestion that the action of this government should be made dependent upon the consent of the province of Ontario, my understanding is that any power which may be developed at Carillon will result from the erection of works for the improvement of navigation by or under the authority of the government under the powers conferred upon the Dominion by the British North America Act. Therefore, in so far as any questions regarding the improvement of navigation are concerned, the matter appears to be one in which the Dominion must proceed upon its own responsibility. It may be, however, that in the carrying out of these powers, or in the construction of the proposed works some interest of the province may be affected, and I think therefore that Mr. Ferguson should be informed that this government would welcome any representations which his government may desire to make upon the subject. So far as I am aware, any interest which the province may have in the matter is of a limited character, depending possibly upon the ownership of lands in the bed of the river or within the area to be flooded. Any interference by the Dominion with such right or interest would form the basis of compensation which might be agreed upon by the governments concerned, but which, in any event, could be determined by adjudication.

I suggest that Mr. Ferguson be informed that so far as the improvement of navigation and the incidental development and disposal of power is concerned, this government is desirous of serving the best interests of Canada, and would be glad to receive any representations or suggestions which the provincial governments may desire to make as to the advisability or otherwise of the proposed scheme, but that this government is unable to recognize any right on the part of the province to control the Dominion in the exercise of its constitutional powers.

Yours faithfully,

ERNEST LAPOINTE.

This opinion was sent to the Prime Minister after consultation with the officers of the Department of Justice, and was based on opinions given on various occasions by them and by their predecessors in the department.

Reference has been made in the course of this debate to a judgment delivered by the Privy Council in November of the same year, six months after this opinion was given. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the judgment of the Privy Council not only says nothing contrary to the opinion then given, but is rather in conformity therewith. I have a copy of that judgment in my hand, delivered in a case between the harbour commissioners of Montreal, the city of Montreal and the government of the province of Quebec. The harbour commissioners of Montreal, acting by virtue of the powers given them by this parliament, had constructed quays and other works and had used for that purpose certain parts of shores of the St. Lawrence river which were declared to be the property of the government of the province of Quebec. Here is what was stated in this judgment:

Now there is no doubt that the power to control navigation and shipping conferred on the Dominion by section 91, is to be widely construed. As was pointed out by Lord Herschell in the judgment which he delivered on behalf of the board in the first of the three fisheries cases . . . . the terms on which these powers are given are so wide as to be capable of allowing the Dominion parliament to restrict very seriously the exercise of proprietary rights in a fashion which, to a great extent, depends on the discretion of that parliament. What was said in that case about the enactment of regulations and restrictions in matters relating to fisheries being excluded from the competence of the provincial legislatures applies not less to matters relating to navigation and shipping. But while this is so, it does not appear to their lordships that the right of the Dominion extends so as to authorize them to vest in a body like the commissioners an exclusive right to occupy property of the province without compensation—

Those are the important words.

—and to erect upon it permanent works, such as quays, docks and railways. It may well be that when the interests of navigation require it—

I call the attention of the House to these words.

—the Dominion parliament has authority to authorize the compulsory acquisition of lands on the terms of paying compensation; and it is to be noticed that the acts of 1873 and 1894 contain provisions of that nature. Their Lordships do not desire to throw any doubt upon the validity of those provisions. But in the present case no attempt to apply them was made by the commissioners, who took possession of and occupied the foreshore and bed without following the procedure laid down by the Railway Act, and in Their Lordships' view the provisions of section 91 (10) (of the British North America Act) standing alone did not justify their proceedings.

In the conclusion of that judgment they repeat again that in their view the harbour commissioners had no right to enter upon and take possession of the lands of the province without compensation.

Any impression that may have been created that the Dominion parliament have no power to authorize the erection of dams in navigable waters is certainly erroneous. The interest which any province can have in the erection of dams in navigable waters is such as it may possess by virtue of its proprietary rights in the bed or the solum, or a certain proprietary interest which it may have in the fisheries. The power to authorize the erection of a dam on any such works is, I claim, exclusively vested in the Dominion parliament; and the only limitation upon the power of the Dominion to expropriate provincial property for the purposes thereof is the limitation mentioned in the judgment of the Privy Council in the harbour commissioners' case, namely, that such power shall not be exercised without compensation. In that case the Privy Council did not decide that the Dominion could not authorize expropriation of provincial crown lands. On the contrary, they decided the opposite. They held in effect, that the particular statutes which authorized the harbour commissioners of Montreal in relation to these works were not effective to vest the provincial lands in question in the harbour commissioners unless compensation was paid for them.

Now whatever doubt there might have been as to the effect of that judgment has certainly been dispelled last year in another case which went to the Privy Council, namely, the reference which was made concerning the application of the Nipissing Central railway to build their line across crown lands of the province of Quebec. An application was made to the governor in council by the Nipissing Central railway, which is really a subsidiary of the railway belonging to the government of the province of Ontario, to be authorized to build their line through the crown lands of the province of Quebec under section 188 of the Railway Act. The province of Quebec took the stand very strongly that this section 188 of the Railway Act was unconstitutional, and that the Dominion government had no right to authorize any Dominion railway to take over lands belonging to the crown in the right of any province of Canada. Reference of this question was made to the Supreme Court of Canada and then to the Privy Council, and the judgment of the Privy Council was along the lines of the judgment which I have alluded to in the case of the harbour commissioners of Montreal. Their Lordships decided that section 188 was perfectly within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and that the Dominion railway authorized by this parliament had the right to take over the lands belonging to the crown in the right of the province, provided they paid compensation for them.

The solum of a river bed is property differing in no essential characteristic from any other lands, so that apart from the question of compensation above referred to, the interest of the province is no greater than that of any private owner of the bed. Now the legislative power of the province to legislate with regard to provincial property is subject to the paramount right of the Dominion to legislate with regard to Dominion property. Section 91 of the British North America Act gives the power to the parliament of Canada to legislate with regard to: navigation and shipping; fisheries; canals; and works for the general advantage of Canada; and the Dominion has ample power to authorize such works as come within these and other provisions of the British North America Act even without the consent of the provinces.

So far as the situation at Carillon is concerned, any proprietary interest which either Ontario or Quebec may have cannot be very considerable, because by section 108 of the British North America Act the public works and property of each province enumerated in the third schedule to the act became the property of Canada. The third schedule enumerates, amongst other properties:

(1) Canals—

And I wish the House to remember these words.

(1) Canals with lands and water-power connected therewith.
(5) Rivers and lake improvements.

Those which were existing at the time of confederation were specially stated in the British North America Act as being transferred to the Dominion of Canada. Chapter 28 of the consolidated statutes of the province of Canada, 1859, section 10, provides that:

—the several public works and buildings enumerated in the schedule to this act marked A, and all materials and other things belonging thereto, or prepared and obtained for the use of the same, shall be and continue to be,—except such (if any) as have been lawfully transferred to any municipality, company or party,—vested in Her Majesty, and under the management of the said commissioner for the purposes of this act.

Schedule A contains, under the heading "Navigation, Canals and Slides," the following item:

All such portions of the Ottawa river from the city of Ottawa upwards as have been or shall be improved at the expense of the provinces, the ordnance canals below the city of Ottawa and the Rideau canal and works.

Under these provisions the canal or canals at Carillon were vested in the province—I mean by the act of 1859—and by virtue of the provisions of section 108, schedule three, of the British North America Act, became the property of the Dominion at confederation, together with any "river improvements" which may have existed at that time.

The question of what interest, if any, the province may have in any water-powers which may come into existence by the erection of works for the improvement of navigation beyond what is required to operate the works has not yet been judicially determined. But I wish to call attention to this fact: the province of Ontario initiated two actions against the Dominion in the Exchequer court in the year 1912, with a view to having the contentions of the province adjudicated upon so far as the Trent canal and Welland canal are concerned, but the province has never proceeded with the litigation nor taken any other step to have its claims passed upon by a judicial tribunal. When the question comes to be determined, I believe the court will have to take cognizance of the fact that the provincial title to the bed of the river is burdened by the public right of navigation, which considerably decreased its value; that upon payment to the province of compensation for its proprietary interest in the bed of the stream, such interest according to the judgment of the Privy Council in the Montreal harbour commissioners' case, will be extinguished. Furthermore it has been held that the ownership of the bed of a river does not carry with it any proprietary interest in the waters which flow over it. The surplus waters in question do not exist by nature but are brought into being by the Dominion in the exercise of its powers.

If we take into consideration all that I have already mentioned as to the proprietorship of the canals as well as the improvements on the river having been transferred under the British North America Act to the Dominion of Canada at considerable cost and, I think, a cost disproportionate to any revenue which may be derived from the use even of the power, it follows that until the matter is judicially determined, the Dominion must regard the provincial interest in such water-powers as not being so considerable as some hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate have claimed.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has alluded to the fact that in 1912, when the charter of the Georgian Bay Canal Company was renewed, a clause had been inserted for the purpose of meeting the demands of the province of Ontario. It was also inserted in 1913 when an amendment to the act was sought and given. It was also inserted in 1915, but it was omitted in 1918. Without being offensive to my good friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), may I remark that he was then a member of the government of Canada, and if it is a crime to-day to let a private bill giving a charter to the Georgian Bay Canal Company come before the House, surely it was not a particularly religious act or a manifestation of sanctity to do that in 1918, and more especially when there was omitted from that bill a clause which previously had been inserted to meet the demands of Ontario?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I may be wrong, but I think the minister is in error in saying that the clause was omitted from the bill. It was, but it was not repealed in the former bill, was it? It was continued. If the minister will make investigation he will find that that particular section is still in force because it was not repealed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But why did my hon. friend and his friends at that time change the wording of the clause? In 1918 a clause was inserted saving the rights of the Dominion government but omitting those of the province, although the latter provision had been put into the former charter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was done because the section in the former charter was still in existence. It was not repealed and it is in existence to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think it would have done any harm to repeat it in the bill of 1918.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It would not have done any good.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for West Calgary admitted that it was omitted in 1918. Of course I think he and I are agreed on this, that in 1918 many queer things were done by the government of the day. I am sorry I was unavoidably absent from the House on Friday night when the hon. member for West Calgary made a very interesting speech. I will comment only on this observation of his as reported on page 1576 of Hansard. He said:

> What is my duty? My duty is, so far as my vote and voice are concerned, to see to it that this parliament gives no new life to an enterprise that we would not in this day create if we were called upon to do so, and that we leave the river Ottawa free, by permitting this charter to lapse and by refusing to renew the license to the private company, reserving the vested rights of the owners of the 250 horsepower development.

That is a repentance on the part of my hon. friend, because he was a member of the government that a few months ago renewed the lease.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend, I think, has misunderstood the situation. The lease to which I had reference was the lease that existed in 1911.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: As the government had accepted the responsibility of cancelling the order in council made on the recommendation of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and thereby assumed the responsibility until the first of May, I said: let it die on the first of May and do not extend it, and I say so now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But if this government had not cancelled that order in council, the lease would be in existence long after the first of May next.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the time within which the company would have to expend the money would expire before that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My good friend ought not to try to excuse himself. It is nice to have signs of repentance.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: New occasions teach new duties.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This bill asks for the renewal of a charter granted by the parliament of Canada and renewed, if I am not mistaken, twelve or thirteen times. Its renewal is asked again. It may be that in view of failure of the company to carry out the works which it was authorized to build, in view of the fact that the development of electrical power and its use all over Canada have brought about a change in the situation, it may be that it would not be expedient to renew for the thirteenth or fourteenth time the charter of the company, but it is for the committee to decide whether to do so would be expedient or not.

So far as I am concerned, if one half—and I wish everybody to listen to me—of the statements which have been made during the course of this debate are true, I will oppose the bill when it comes to its final stages; but I want to give what is granted to everybody in a free country, a hearing to interested parties before a committee of this House. That is why I will vote for the second reading of this bill; but when the other stages come, I am from Missouri; I want to be shown.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising is not to discuss either the merits or the demerits of this particular bill, but rather to draw the attention of the House to what appears to be a very material change in its procedure, and in this connection to the difference between public legislation and private legislation, and the function which parliament was intended to serve in reference thereto. Hon. members will, I think, agree that parliament was created primarily for the purpose of enacting measures in the interest of the public generally. Parliament was not created primarily for the purpose of dealing with private legislation. We have only to look at the rules adopted in relation to public and private measures to see how entirely different is the procedure in the two classes of measures.

I need not review the procedure in regard to public bills; it is known and understood by every hon. member in this House. I would, however, draw the attention of parliament to the fact that as respects private legislation there is a material difference. In dealing with private legislation, parliament acts partly in a legislative capacity, partly in a judicial capacity. Before a private bill can come before this House the parties who are interested are required to pay a fee in order to entitle them to have their petition even considered.

They are obliged to advertise in the public press and in the Canada Gazette with reference to the measure which they intend to present to the House. Before a committee of the House, the parties opposed to them are permitted to appear and to be heard by counsel if so desired. In other words parliament's duty with respect to private legislation is to act partly as a legislative body and partly also as a judicial body. It is apparent that except for most exceptional purposes, the House of Commons collectively is not so constituted as to undertake work of a judicial character. For that reason arrangement is made in the procedure whereby private bills are referred to committees, constituted primarily for the purpose of considering from a judicial point of view whether or not the legislation is of a character which parliament should entertain and pass, and it is for that reason that, with respect to the second reading of private bills, it has never been understood that parliament is passing, excepting conditionally, upon the general principle which is involved in the legislation that is before the House. I think it is important that this should be clearly understood, because if we once permit a departure from the general rule which parliament through its many years of existence had adopted, we shall be establishing a precedent that may be fatal to the progress of legislation in this chamber.

It was on the 25th of February last that the present bill respecting the Georgian bay canal was first discussed in the House. From that day to this on practically every private members' day the time of parliament has been occupied with the discussion of this particular measure. Four full days of the time of parliament have been occupied in the discussion, and the one hour set apart for private legislation has been taken up on eight other different days. On about twelve or thirteen days for the period of time set apart for a consideration of private legislation the time of this House has been exclusively occupied in discussing matters relating to the Georgian bay canal. I contend that of itself that is a sufficient answer as to the propriety of the course which parliament has been taking. It was never intended under any rule of this House that private legislation should occupy such a large part of the time intended to be devoted to public matters by those who were sent to this House to represent the people in reference thereto. The authorities on private and public legislation are in accord in laying down the distinction between the importance to be attached to the second reading of a private bill and that to be attached to the second reading of a public measure; they make it quite clear that, unless the general principle of a private bill is contrary to the public interest, that bill ought to go to committee, there to be adjudicated on with reference to its expediency.

Now, the general principle of a bill does not mean the details of the measure. It does not mean the various matters incidental to the measure; it means simply what the words themselves purport to mean, namely, a broad principle applicable to legislation generally, and equally applicable in one part of the country or another. The general principle to be decided in reference to a private measure is, so to speak, the public morality of the particular measure, whether or not the measure is of a kind that parliament ought to entertain, having regard to its character in a broad way—not the particular application of the measure, not some special feature, not its expediency at a particular time or place, but the broad general principle. Let me illustrate: if a private bill were brought in to license a gambling house, parliament would say at once: "There is here a general principle which we cannot entertain", and the bill would be thrown to one side. But if a private bill is brought into the House to give authority to some person to construct an edifice, or a canal, or a work of any particular kind, the principle there is the principle of allowing the construction of the particular kind of device or structure referred to, whatever it may be. If a bill is brought into the House with regard to the licensing of power or the granting of power rights, the general principle there is not whether rights should be granted to a particular company, not whether rights should be granted at a particular place, but the broad principle whether parliament ought to grant licenses for power, or give power rights at any time or place.

May I quote one or two authorities in support of what I have just said? First of all, I will refer to a statement by Mr. Francis Palgrave, made before a special committee of the British House of Commons as early as the 22nd June, 1832, because it helps to disclose how private legislation has found its way into the discussions of parliament:

> The ancient rule as to petitioners for private legislation said Sir Francis Palgrave, was that "no person should come before parliament as a suitor, or trouble parliament if, on the face of his petition, he could have right at home. If there was any other mode of obtaining redress he was not to apply to parliament, but if from the insufficiency of the law or any other similar cause he could not obtain redress, then the supreme court of parliament was to give him a speedy and effectual remedy. This course continued until the time of Richard II, when courts of equity were gradually established. The remedial jurisdiction of parliament wholly ceased and was only revived under James I. Private acts of parliament have arisen out of the ancient petition for redress and were formerly called the "Privilegium" because parliament in passing them was considered as granting a privilege. For this reason the committees of the House investigate the facts in each case and report. The House, in reading a private bill for the second time, decides that the matter involved is one which may be looked into by the committee. It is only in case that an exceptional principle is enunciated that the second reading is refused."

I would ask hon. members to note these words by a well-recognized authority on both private and public legislation:

The House in reading a private bill for the second time, decides that the matter involved is one which may be looked into by the committee. It is only in case that an exceptional principle is enunciated that the second reading is refused.

Mr. CAHAN: Would my hon. friend explain his position: Is this not an exceptional case? That is the question which is in the minds of many hon. members of this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My answer to my hon. friend is that this is the thirteenth time that the bill to grant a charter to the Georgian Bay Canal Company has come before the House and that it has been favourably passed upon on all previous occasions. How can my hon. friend say that an exceptional principle is being enunciated?

Mr. CAHAN: I heard the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) the other night distinctly state to the House that the gist of this measure was not a canal project, but a project for the development of power, and it made a great impression upon my mind.

Mr.MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. Minister of Railways made that statement at all, with all due respect to my hon. friend. I think he said the bone of contention was power rights as between private interests arising out of the canal project. That is a matter that can well be elucidated in committee of the House. That is why, if referred to the committee, the bill would serve to bring out possibly not only the interests that are asking for this particular measure, but the interests that are opposing it, and which it is very much in the public interest to have known.

I pause here to indicate to the House the different views taken by some hon. members in reference to the principle which is being considered. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) devoted I think, more time than any other hon. member to discussing the question of principle, and in the course of his speech he enunciated four different principles as those underlying this particular measure. Surely my hon. friend will admit that a committee of the House in deciding the general principle of the bill must lay down one general principle, not four. The first principle laid down by my hon. friend will be found in Hansard at page 1454. There he is reported as follows:

My friend has asked me what is the principle of the bill. Its principle is determined from reading the bill itself. The bill divides itself into two parts: (a) canal, (b) power.

A little further down, concluding the paragraph, my hon. friend says:

The construction and operation of power plants with authority to sell power to consumers. That is the principle of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: With all that has gone before it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the first statement, made on the night of March 22 last. Speaking last Friday, my hon. friend is reported at page 1571 of Hansard as having said:

If hon. gentlemen will look through the bill they will find that the principle of this proposed legisation is: To enable this company, the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, hereinafter called "the company" to commence the construction of its canals or any of them.

That is principle number two, emphatically so stated.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister has no right to misstate the matter. I was then repeating what I had already said in the first instance, and I said in terms that the purpose of the bill, was, first, canal and, second, power. That is a restatement.

Mr, MACKENZIE KING: The last thing I wish to do is to misrepresent my hon. friend in any way. He says the last part is a restatement of the first. I would say, rather, that it is supplementary, and I think he will agree that in so saying I am doing him justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me take the third principle he enunciated. At page 1571 of Hansard there appears the following, which probably is also a supplementary principle:

Therefore the powers of this company are divided into two branches: (a) Its canal undertaking; (b) its power undertaking; and the principle of the measure is—

What? Not to construct canals, not to develop power, but—to renew the life of, revivify and resuscitate a company whose life will expire on May 1 next.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then at page 1665 of Hansard we have the fourth statement:

The right of this company to a renewal of this charter. That is the principle of this measure.

May I draw the attention of the House to those four statements of general principle—first, to construct and operate power plants, second, to enable a company to commence the construction of its canal, third, to renew the life of, revivify and resuscitate a company whose life will expire, and, lastly, the right of a company to a renewal of its charter. If any one of these is to be considered as a general principle underlying a bill—using the word "principle" in its broad sense, forgetting the reference to any particular question of expediency in regard to this particular measure—I say on any of those principles this House would be justified in letting a bill go to a special committee.

What is wrong in principle, in this House agreeing to the construction and operation of power plants? Is there anything wrong in the general principle? That is one statement of the general principle of this bill. It may not be expedient, but that is for the committee to decide. There may be allegations of fact that cannot be supported in the committee; but the broad question of principle is simply whether this House should allow as a proper bill to be considered by a committee, a bill relating to the construction and operation of power plants. Take the second principle enunciated by my hon. friend—to enable the company to commence the construction of a canal. Since when has it become wrong in principle for this parliament to permit the construction of a canal? That is the only principle laid down there. It has to be a principle which applies from one end of this Dominion to the other. You cannot refuse on ground of principle the construction of a canal on the Georgian bay or on the Ottawa river, and not at the same time thereby establish a precedent to govern at some future date and other place say this construction of a canal in the maritime provinces or in British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the right hon. gentleman without interrupting—is there upon the statute books any act incorporating a canal company and empowering it to charge tolls?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is aside from the question altogether.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the whole question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whether it is proper that a particular canal company should charge tolls is a matter for a committee to inquire into.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may ask the Prime Minister a question: Is there not involved the principle whether this country is prepared to allow a private enterprise to construct a canal through national waters?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whether a private company should have the right to construct a canal anywhere is a perfectly reasonable question. It involves no improper principle.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not that the very point at issue here that we have to decide on the second reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. The point I am trying to make clear to my hon. friend is this: that the expediency of a particular project is part of the judicial work which parliament carries on through its committee. All this House is asked to pass on in the way of principle in referring this bill to a committee is, as I read the measure, the principle of the construction of a canal. Some gentlemen say it is a question of power, others say the renewal of the charter is involved. These are broad principles, and all parliament does is to refer the matter for further consideration by a committee before any legislation is adopted. Let me say to my hon. friend that parliament has already referred this very matter twelve times with respect to this particular measure. So we are not laying down any new principle at the present time.

May I read one or two other authorities? Sir Courtney Ilbert, late Clerk of the British House of Commons, states:

The proceedings on private bills resemble more closely private litigation between parties interested than a discussion on questions of public policy. The procedure followed for their introduction is different from that provided in the rules for public measures.

The Canadian House of Commons has adopted forty-one special rules respecting private legislation. A petition has to be presented and accepted. Applicants have to advertise in the local newspapers and in the Canada Gazette. A deposit has to be made before the House considers the bill, and parliamentary agents are authorized to appear before the committee on behalf of the interested parties. The object of a private bill is to induce parliament to make an exception from the general law for something which cannot be obtained by means of the general law.

Dodd and Wilberforce on Private Bill Procedure at page 20 has the following:

> The House does not profess to decide upon the second reading as to the truth or otherwise of the allegations of fact upon which a proposed bill is based, and in conceding a second reading to a private bill the House is regarded as merely giving its sanction to its general principle on the hypothesis that the committee to which it is afterwards referred finds those allegations proved. It is usual, therefore, to allow a second reading, except where the bill enunciates some principle which the House is not prepared to affirm.

If we take the references made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to what the principle of this bill is, up to the present moment no principle has been cited which, as a general principle, this House should not be prepared to recognize one on which a private bill might be considered by a committee.

Let me give a further citation which has an immediate bearing on this bill inasmuch as it refers to a parallel case in the British House of Commons. The Hon. Mr. Lowther, for many years Speaker of the British House, had been before his elevation to that office chairman of committees of the House of Commons, and in that capacity gave more attention to matters of procedure in the House than possibly any other member. As chairman of the committee of ways and means, Mr. Lowther, speaking on February 25, 1896 said:

> The rule which the House had generally followed, and he thought very wisely, had been to allow the second reading of private bills to go through unless any strikingly new principle happened to be enunciated therein, and in such cases the House must pause before it accepted the principle. Certain objections had been taken to the bill by the hon. member who raised the opposition to it, but he thought they were all committee objections, and that the proper place to deal with them would be in committee, not upon the second reading. No new principle being promulgated, the House would do well to follow the rule it had invariably followed in former parliaments—namely, to give the bill a second reading, and send it upstairs, in order that it might be dealt with there in the usual manner.

That is taken from the Parliamentary Debates, fourth series, volume 2 37, 1896.

Mr. EVANS: May I ask the Prime Minister this question here and now? I gather that he admits that the construction of a national waterway under private ownership and control is a perfectly legitimate matter for this House to consider. Is that right?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are times and seasons for all things, and on fourteen occasions, I think, this House has done the very thing which my hon. friend suggests is at this moment an improper course for us to take. And I believe the hon. gentleman was a member of the House on some of those occasions.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Why repeat it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a question of expediency for the committee to consider. I cannot say what view the committee will take of the measure, but I am sure that all representations that can be made will be submitted to the committee. Furthermore, every member of the committee is a member of this House. In that regard let me make it clear what particular committee will be charged with the consideration of this bill. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) indicated the other evening that the bill would go to the private bills committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I corrected that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not the intention. Let me read rule 101 relating to bills and petitions:

> Every private bill, when read a second time, is referred to one of the standing committees as follows: bills relating to banks, insurance, trade and commerce, to the committee on Banking and Commerce; bills relating to railways, canals, telegraphs, canal and railway bridges, to the committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; the bills not coming under these classes to the committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and all petitions for or against the bills are considered as referred to such committee.

Inasmuch therefore as this bill has reference to canals it will go to the committee on railways and canals.

In support of my contention that the bill is one concerned with canals, may I, Mr. Speaker, quote your own statement in taking exception to an amendment which was moved by an hon. member on the night of March 21. On that occasion Your Honour made the following assertion:

> The purpose of the bill apparently is for the construction of a canal.

And elsewhere:

> As a matter of fact the bill is simply for the extension of time for the construction of a canal.

May I say, speaking for myself, that that is the only general principle which I think it is possible properly to apply to this bill: it is a bill relating to the construction of a canal, and as such it should be referred to the committee on railways and canals for adjudication. It will then be for the committee on railways and canals to say whether it is such in fact and whether it is expedient for parliament at this particular time to entertain the measure in the form in which it has been sent to them.

Before I conclude I should like to quote the following reference which has been submitted by my hon. friend opposite from his point of view. I desire to quote it in support of my contention. I refer to what Bourinot has to say at page 599, of the fourth edition, in reference to the second reading of private bills:

> The second reading corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it, the House affirms the general principle, or expediency of the measure. There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public, and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked. A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee. Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the House will not consent to the second reading; but otherwise the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee.

I desire to reiterate what I said at the outset. Should the amendment of my hon. friend opposite carry and this bill not be permitted to go to the committee, we shall have established with respect to private bills a new precedent which may become an instrument not only for consuming the time of parliament but for preventing the House from having the opportunity which it should have of dealing with public legislation. More than that, it may become a very powerful instrument for preventing other parties, who have private legislation to be considered by parliament, from ever obtaining a chance for that legislation to be dealt with. We are now, I hope, within measurable distance of the conclusion of the session, and if this debate continues much longer, as it easily can if hon. members are determined to obstruct private legislation, all other persons having private bills to be considered at this session will lose their opportunity entirely. Only by common consent of both sides of the House have a number of private measures gone to the committee. But for the Speaker having taken a generous view of the wishes of the House, and by my hon. friend opposite and myself having agreed at each stage to allow certain measures, which stood on the order paper below the Georgian bay canal bill, to go to committee, practically the whole of the private legislation of this session would have been held up until the present moment. It must be apparent that once the precedent is established which it is sought now to create, this parliament is opening the door to a course of procedure which in the future may prove perilous. If persons who are interested in defeating a private measure find a successful method to be that of defeating it on the second reading of the bill in this House and before it goes to a committee, we may expect interests, adverse to other private legislation, to adopt similar methods. It is quite possible that we may find parties interested in defeating private legislation resorting to this method as a means of preventing other legislation from ever being considered by parliament. This method of obstructing the second reading of private bills may be resorted to as a means of preventing not only the particular measure being discussed but any measure subsequently introduced from ever receiving from parliament the consideration it should.

In this particular matter there is involved a wider principle, namely, whether we shall depart from the time-honoured custom of permitting private bills to receive their second reading and to be referred to a committee, conditionally, the understanding being that the committee as a judicial body shall determine whether or not it is expedient, in the light of all the facts and circumstances, for such bills to be favourably reported upon. The question now to be decided is whether we shall recognize and continue that custom, or whether we shall begin a new course of procedure that may affect the whole trend and progress of public business in this House. Let me point out that when this bill goes to the committee it will be not only the right but that it is the duty of every member freely to exercise his judgment.

There is no commitment of any kind on the part of the government in respect to this measure. The government has no interest whatever in this measure apart from having it dealt with as other private bills are dealt with; with as other private bills are dealt with; the government has never had any interest, directly or indirectly, other than to see that all parties who appear here with respect to private legislation are treated alike. Should the bill come back from committee hon. members of this House will be as free as possible to vote as they please with respect to the measure. All I am asking at present, as one who has some responsibility for procedure in this House, is that hon. members consider this vote as one having reference primarily to the procedure of this parliament in regard to private legislation generally.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I desire to take only a few moments of the time of the House. I think everyone agrees entirely with the authorities cited by the Prime Minister with respect to private bills, and I think the House should deprecate any effort to talk out a bill which is really a private bill, to prevent it from passing simply by an exercise of the vocal powers of the members on every hour and every day when private bills may be discussed. The House can have only one opinion in that regard. But the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in the carefully prepared statement which he made to the House to-night, disclosed that there are very grave issues of public policy involved in the subject matter of this discussion.

I do not pretend to give an opinion on the constitutional questions involved. But I have always been under the impression that the provisions of the act of confederation and the schedules thereto, to which the minister made allusion, created prima facie very strong ground for the argument that the Dominion parliament, having legislative jurisdiction over certain navigable waters, and having legislative jurisdiction with regard to canals at the time of confederation, took over and vested in the crown in the right of the Dominion government not only the canals then in existence but the water-powers then being developed supplementary or ancillary to the construction and operation of these canals, and became vested with the right to utilize these water-powers for hydro-electric purposes; and that when thereafter parliament had undertaken to legislate in regard to canals, and when the government had undertaken to construct canals, the use of the waters and all rights in and to the hydro-electric power developed as ancillary to the construction of those canals, vested in the Dominion government. There are strong grounds for that contention, and, in view of other matters which will come before parliament in the next few years, it is advisable that that issue should speedily be decided by the highest courts of the country, in order that we may know, in connection with the development not only of the canals on the Ottawa river but the canals on other great rivers whether, having constructed the canals, the crown in the right of the federal government has the property title and interest in and to the hydro electric power thereby developed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I am disposed to believe that the crown in the right of the Dominion government has that title, and if so we may settle this question of the title to hydro-electric power developed by government canals on navigable streams in a way which will not be in accord with the contentions of the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec. That being so, and that question of title having been raised in relation to this bill, both by the legislature and government of Ontario and the legislature and government of Quebec, it is clearly apparent that this bill involves questions of grave public policy. I would be the last to attempt to prevent in any direct or indirect way any private bill from going before the standing committee which has power to investigate its merits and hear the evidence of the parties concerned; but, in respect of this bill, the moment the issue arose that it involved grave questions of public policy, questions concerning which the legislatures and governments of Ontario and Quebec had taken a strong stand, then it became the duty of this government to assume full responsibility in the matter and either to request the promoters of this bill to withdraw it for the time being or, with full knowledge of the issues involved, for the Prime Minister, as the leader of the House, from his place in the House to rise and take full responsibility for the measure, and ask that it be placed upon the public orders as a government measure. In view of the issues which are involved it would be wrong for this House any longer to regard this as purely a private bill involving nothing more than is involved in the ordinary private bill coming before the House. That is my opinion about it.

The Prime Minister has stated that on some twelve or thirteen occasions similar bills have been before the House and have passed the second reading and been sent to committee. All I can say in that regard is that the issues which are raised to-day were not raised on any of those occasions, and, if these issues had been raised by the governments of the two adjoining provinces on any previous occasion, it would then have become apparent that grave matters of public policy were involved, and, in fulfilling its due responsibility of guarding the public estate which is vested in the crown in the right of the Dominion government, the government would not have allowed the bill to go before the committee on private bills. As soon as a private bill clearly takes on the aspect of a public bill, just so soon should all the rules with regard to public bills apply, and just so soon should the government assume the responsibility of dealing with it as a public bill. That is my view of the question.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should apologize to the House for rising after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had apparently closed the debate. I may also say that I do not propose to answer the more or less constitutional argument advanced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). This bill being a private measure, I should like to state very clearly at the outset that I am speaking not as a member of the government but rather as the representative of a constituency which takes a very keen interest in the principle of public ownership. If I may be pardoned for making the reference, I might say that the constituency of North Waterloo, which I have the honour to represent, is the birthplace of the great hydro electric enterprise in the province of Ontario. The men who initiated that enterprise—which I think is the outstanding successful example of a great public utility—the men who initiated that enterprise in a practical way were men from the constituency of North Waterloo, and it was in the city of Kitchener, in that constituency, that the power from Niagara was officially inaugurated. And so Kitchener was a leader in the initiation and use of Niagara power in the province of Ontario The city of Kitchener has been very successful along other lines in the conduct of public utilities under public ownership; and it was because of that, and for other reasons, that a good many years ago I became convinced that the great majority of public services upon which depend the convenience and the prosperity of the people in general ought to be owned and controlled by the people themselves. In that I also include the development of some of our natural resources such as, for example, the development of water-powers on our great rivers.

The bill under discussion touches that principle at two points; that of the construction of the canal, and the development of the water-powers following upon the construction of the canal. So far as I am concerned I would oppose the bill itself on both counts. If it is indeed feasible, which I very much doubt—I doubt whether the Georgian bay canal can be constructed—I would say that when the time comes when it ought to be constructed it should be built by the people of Canada themselves. But the matter of power, I think, is at the moment of more importance than the canal; and I would regard it as almost unthinkable in these days, with the advancement that has been made in the development of water-powers, in the province of Ontario at least, that the control and ownership of such powers should be placed in private hands. I also realize the difficulty with regard to the matter of public ownership with regard to the powers on the Ottawa river. As it happens, our friends in the province of Quebec—and I have no fault to find with them at all—are not so favorable to the principle of public ownership as we are in the province of Ontario, but I would make this suggestion: that since the Dominion undoubtedly has rights on the Ottawa, and as both provinces undoubtedly have rights on that river, it is advisable, and I think feasible, that a conference should be held between the three governments for the purpose of arriving at a satisfactory settlement of the various rights and to decide upon an equitable arrangement with regard to the powers on that river. You might have several solutions, and I want to advance one which has not yet been mentioned in this House: it might conceivably be decided at such a conference that it would be in the public interest that some private company should be given the development of these power rights. I do not think that would follow; I hope it would not. It might be decided between the provinces that they could get together and in a publicly-owned enterprise develop the powers on the Ottawa river. And then there is this further suggestion I should like to make, although it may be regarded as impracticable. The Dominion government has undoubted navigation rights on the Ottawa river, and I have been informed that it would be a not very expensive undertaking to canalize the Ottawa river from Carillon down to the St. Lawrence—that it would cost very little. In connection with that development several hundred thousand horse-power could be secured, and it might be regarded as a very good solution of the whole problem if the Dominion government developed the power, and then sold it to the Ontario hydro commission and to those in the province of Quebec who might desire to purchase.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am willing.

Mr. EULER: While I think there is no misapprehension in the House as to the meaning of the motion upon which we are to vote to-night, I think there is some misapprehension throughout the country because of propaganda—may I call it?—in the press in one way and another. I would not say it was intentional propaganda, but I believe that throughout the country, and largely in the province of Ontario, there is an impression that the vote at this particular moment decides whether the powers on the Ottawa river shall be given to private interests or whether they shall not. Now that is a misapprehension. After all, what we are voting on to-night is whether this bill shall go to a committee or whether it shall be killed here. I believe there are a good many hon. members, especially on this side, who are quite willing, and perhaps even anxious, that the bill should go to a committee, and yet when it comes to the point of deciding whether the bill shall pass or not will be absolutely opposed to it. But I am inclined to think that opinion is not entirely unanimous on the other side with regard to that point. I think I am correct as to that because I remember very well on the occasion when the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) spoke on the original motion he was not opposed to sending it to committee. Here are his exact words:

> I shall take this opportunity again to make plain my position as I am anxious not to be misunderstood in the matter. It is not my intention to prevent the bill from being referred to and considered by the committee on railways.

So that there must have been some change of opinion on the part of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Would the minister tell us how he intends to vote himself?

Mr. EULER: I will tell my hon. friend in a few minutes. There are those who think that the ordinary and regular course with respect to private bills should be followed in this case, and that it ought to go to committee. There are others, like my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) who believe an important principle of public policy is involved and therefore that the bill should be dealt with on the second reading. I am not quarreling with either of these opinions; I think there is room for argument in both cases. I do believe this though: that the important thing to remember is—whether the bill shall carry or not. The motion to-night does not decide that. It merely decides whether it goes to committee or not. There are those of us, and I am almost one of them, who think that we should not consider at any length the principle of granting power rights on the Ottawa to a private concern. If some hon. members believe that this bill should be fought at every turn, I would suggest it would have been just as appropriate, instead of fighting it on the second reading, to have fought it on the first reading, and to have had nothing to do with the proposal whatever. I am not particularly bound to precedent; perhaps less so than any other hon. member here. I think we bow entirely too much to precedent. We have first, second and third reading of a bill, and of a resolution, and the same thing takes place in the Senate. I think our committee on rules which made suggestions as to the form of those rules might very well have gone a little further and cut out some of the red tape with which we are burdened in the House now.

In conclusion I wish to say this, and I say it without offence to anybody: I do not for one moment imagine that the constitution will be shattered into fragments if this bill does not go to committee. Neither do I believe that if it does go to committee, anybody's conscience, so far as public ownership is concerned, will be violated in any particular.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Our status will not be changed?

Mr. EULER: Not at all. It is to me merely a matter of method, as to where this bill shall be done to death; whether it shall be killed in the House on the vote which will follow, or whether it shall meet exactly the same fate in committee, because I am convinced that the committee, as I think it ought to do, will kill the bill. The province of Ontario—and perhaps I can speak for that province more than for any other part of Canada—is almost unanimous against this bill. I have received telegrams and letters from at least fifty or sixty municipalities all asking that this bill be not allowed to pass, but I have not received one from a single municipality asking that this bill should not go to committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister may be able to explain the matter to them.

Mr. EULER: I will. I shall have no difficulty about that. I am sure that nothing which might be adduced before that committee could change my opinion as to the advisability of not allowing this charter to be renewed again. I am free to say that I am opposed to the bill in its entirety. I have no particular objection to its going to committee; but I do say this—and none other has said it—that if this bill should by any chance survive, if it does go to committee, when it returns to this House for third reading I shall assuredly vote against it and oppose it with all the power I may possess.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you, Sir, as well as many other members of the House, must be much impressed with the spectacle which we have witnessed to-night in the belated statement of the position of the government in regard to this bill. The first minister to speak, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) reviewed at considerable length the constitutional feature of the bill. But I will draw to the attention of the House the fact that his whole argument was based upon the premise that we were discussing the question of the right of the Dominion government to deal with matters pertaining to navigable waters. The whole of his citations, his own learned judgment or statement of his opinion, the statements from the Privy Council, the Supreme Court of Canada and the Privy Council again, all referred to matters having to do with navigable waters. No person on this side of the House or, indeed, in the House, has argued that this parliament has not the absolute right to deal with measures pertaining to navigable waters. What those on this side who have taken the constitutional question in hand argue is that this bill is as a matter of fact a deceitful measure. It is given to this House as a measure for the construction of a canal, when every hon. member knows—and all who have spoken except the hon. member fathering the bill acknowledge it—that it is in fact a measure for the promotion of water-power development, an altogether different proposition. None of the citations of the Minister of Justice dealt with that feature of the case.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who followed, spent practically all his time in an effort to establish the principle of sending this bill to a committee of the House and to impress upon the House and the country that it was the duty of the House to send the bill to a committee; that the House had no real choice in the matter; that if we did not do that we would violate some cherished principle of constitutional and popular government. As a matter of fact all the rules pertaining to this subject, every citation he made, as well as the practice of this House and of the British House, are to the effect that the second reading is the occasion upon which, if we have an objection to the principle of a bill, that objection should be registered.

Not only is that the case, but according to our rules governing private bills, if this bill goes to the select committee, that committee have no power to alter the principle of the bill. That committee cannot vary the nature of the bill from what was sent to them by this House. With the consent of the promoters of the bill they may vary it to some extent; but if they do so, they must report the variations to the House. Furthermore, that committee are not permitted to follow the suggestion made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) namely to kill the bill. By the rules of the House they are specifically precluded from delaying or in any other way killing the bill. They must report the bill to the House. It is infinitely more of an invasion of the rights of the citizens of Canada, which rights were referred to so touchingly by the Prime Minister, to refuse to report the bill to the House than to refuse to send the bill to committee. What I want to impress upon the minds of every hon. member who has been arguing on this point is that the committee have no right to vary the principle of the bill; they have no right to curtail the powers contained in the bill, and they must report the bill to the House. They have no right by underhand methods to assassinate the bill, as has been suggested by the Minister of Customs.

Mr. EULER: Have they not the right to report to the House unfavourably on the bill?

Mr. STEVENS: They may report unfavourably.

Mr. EULER: Does that not kill the bill?

Mr. STEVENS: I will admit that they may report to the House that in the opinion of the committee the preamble should not carry, but that is not the suggestion that has been made. The suggestion that has been made is that the bill will go to the committee; that there it will be shorn of its objectionable features, and that this and that protection will be added to it. I submit that cannot be done.

I come now to my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. We appreciate the delicacy of his position.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And that of others.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. We know perfectly well the Minister of Customs is absolutely opposed to the bill. We knew that before he said so. We know perfectly well that his judgment—and it is a judgment of a very sound character—is wholly against the principle of the bill, and this is the time when he ought to vote against that principle. I will venture to say this to the minister: If he had taken that stand when the government were talking this matter over and had told his colleagues that he as a member of the government would oppose the bill as his conscience and judgment dictated, the government would not be standing behind the bill to-night. They would not dare to do so because, being divided on the question, they could not face this House. To escape the dilemma the Minister of Customs says that he will vote for the second reading, but with the distinct understanding that this bill will go to a committee where it is to be given an underhand death, smothered to death, strangled in the dark somehow. That is not, I submit, consistent with my hon. friend's usual courage. No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and those who think like him ought to vote against this measure on the second reading, when the principle of the bill is under consideration and being decided.

In regard to the bill itself, I have already stated that the reason I object to it is that, on the face of it, it is a piece of sham and deceit. There is not a member of this House, with the exception of my hon. friend who promoted or who is fathering the bill in the House—and to him I will come in a moment—who has asserted that this bill is for the purpose of constructing a canal. Every hon. member who has spoken—and I have followed the debate with care—has emphasized the power feature of this bill. Furthermore, it is known to everyone in the House that this canal would never be built by Sir Clifford Sifton and his associates if they were shorn of the rights to take the power incidental to such development. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that this is a power bill and not a canal bill.

In the second place, I make the point that if the canal were to be constructed, assuming that they would construct the canal, it is calculated and intended that any cost of that construction shall be borne by moneys raised on the power feature of the bill. What does that mean? It means that whatever power is developed out of that one million and a quarter horse-power on this waterway will have to bear, in addition to the cost of the power, the cost of the canal. In other words, such power cannot and never will be developed and sold to the public at as low a price as would be the case if it were a purely power project. That is a feature which we should take cognizance of, and if we put our imprimatur on the principle of the second reading of the measure we as a parliament are approving, or at least those who vote for it, of that proceeding.

The point was raised by my hon. friend who is fathering the bill in the House that there might be compensation features in case the crown desired to take over the work. I have the clause under my hand. This again is a reason why we should reject the measure. We know the canal is not to be constructed; every hon. member is cognizant of that fact. And if we support the principle of the bill and we invoke clause 5 of the act of 1906—section 43 of the original act what do we let the government and the country in for? That section provides that His Majesty, his heirs and successors, may assume the possession of this property, and by way of compensation shall pay to the company the value of the work actually done by the company up to the time of the giving of such notice, the making of plans, the cost and value of the plants and otherwise upon the ground; together with the value of all tangible property of the company. Everything that the company has, including the charter, its plans, its plants, its expenses to date—all must be paid for. We must compensate them for all these things and the value of the power incidental to it. Already, according to the brief brought to this House by my hon. friend from Ottawa, we find that the company expect to develop very large quantities of electrical energy. Does any hon. gentleman in this House, much less a member of the government, who has had experience in this matter suggest for a moment that there will not be a claim for compensation for the relinquishment of the power? They declare that if they get this charter through they will have absolute control of the water-power on these waterways amounting, we are told to some million and a quarter horse-power —one of the most valuable franchises ever given to a private interest in the history of Canada. That is a pretty broad statement, but I will venture to repeat it; that we are at this moment about to vote on one of the most valuable franchises ever given to any private interest in the history of this country. And what is the country to get in return for it? Absolutely nothing. There is not within the confines of the bill a single provision to give any return to the country for this stupendous franchise.

My hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Ward) this evening sought to justify the stand that he has taken, and I desire to point out to him the rather anomalous position in which he finds himself. I want to impress upon him and upon other hon. members the danger of supporting the measure or voting for the second reading. It is all very well to say we can explain it away to those who are not familiar with parliamentary practice, but the fact of the matter is that we are voting for a principle and we are voting for the approval of this bill when we vote on the second reading. My hon. friend said this evening that he would suggest the erection of a federal hydro-electric commission to take over the water-powers on all our rivers and streams in Canada. Then he complained that Manitoba was being exploited to-day by the lease which he said this government had made to some private interests on the Nelson river. Let him follow me for a moment. He complains because the Interior department had given a lease—I never heard of it, by the way—of water-power on the Nelson river in Manitoba, and that the people of Manitoba have been deprived of their rights. If such a lease has been given I agree with him. But what is he doing to-night? He is voting to deprive the provinces of Quebec and Ontario of a similar right. It is true that the water-powers and natural resources of Manitoba do not constitutionally belong to the people of Manitoba; still he complains because in the administration of the water-powers of Manitoba this government is depriving the people of Manitoba of any say in their development. Yet by his vote to-night, he will attempt to deprive Quebec and Ontario of the very right which he complains they are being deprived of in Manitoba.

Mr. WARD: Will my hon. friend explain to this House—I am seeking for information—just how the water-powers of the Ottawa river are to be developed under the circumstances I pictured in my remarks?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot recall in detail the circumstances pictured by my hon. friend, but there is no difficulty in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec coming to an understanding regarding the development of water-power on their rivers or on bordering rivers. Furthermore, we have the premiers of both provinces telling this government—not telling the government, but through Mr. Speaker telling the House—that they object to this parliament usurping the powers and rights which they in each province claim for their own. That is before us officially, and can we not trust these two premiers and their governments to make their own arrangements? They are not children; they do not require the federal government to make arrangements for them. It is their right, it is their power, they claim it, and no constitutional argument has been put forward to-night or at any other time to successfully combat their claim. So I submit they will work out that problem themselves.

Mr. WARD: Is it not a fact, and has it not been stated in this House repeatedly, that the water of the Ottawa river belongs to the people of Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The only claim the Dominion government makes to the water of the Ottawa river is for navigation purposes. For instance the right of diversion for waterworks or for electric energy belongs to the provinces. Even the fish in the river belong to the provinces. There is no question about that. The bed of the river also belongs to the provinces. The only right the Dominion has is, as I have said, the right regarding navigation. I say again, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this is not a navigation bill. That is the point we make. The government takes the position that this is a navigation bill. They know it is not. My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that Sir Clifford Sifton will never come before this government and seriously ask for authority to construct a canal for navigation purposes short of excess water-power, never in the wide world. The whole House knows that this is not a navigation scheme, a canal scheme. It is a power scheme, the most gigantic ever conceived in Canada up to this time, under the guise of and falsified as a canal scheme.

Now my hon. friend the sponsor of this bill said to the House the other day—and this is where I made the exception a moment ago—that no power was to be sold except the surplus which might be developed over the needs of the canal. Again I want to point to the deception of that statement. I do not mean that in a discourteous or unparliamentary sense. I mean in so far as those behind the bill are concerned, the promoters; it is their deception to which I refer. And this is the deception: they come to parliament asking for a right which was granted in 1894, when the generation of hydro-electric energy was problematical; it was not a demonstrated commercial success for long afterwards. At that time they secured under their charter the right to the surplus power—surplus power which then and for many years afterwards had no value and no significance, and which meant very little to any person in this country except a few perhaps with vision. But to-day electrical energy is of primary and paramount importance to the people of Canada, especially the people of Ontario and Quebec in the territory adjacent to these water-powers. The very industrial life of these two provinces is dependent upon the future development of hydro-electric energy. Therefore I come to what my hon. friend said when in the course of his speech he sought to lead the House into this state of mind: Well, they were only getting a mere bagatelle, just the surplus power. As a matter of fact the power required for the canal would be a mere modicum of the power possible of development. I venture this statement, Mr. Speaker, that the 250 horse-power now being developed at Carillon would be ample to run the canal or even a larger work for all time to come. But we are told they can develop three or four hundred thousand horse-power, and it would be this surplus that they would have to sell to the public. We contend that this is not fair to the people of these two provinces or to the country as a whole.

Now I wish to say a word or two regarding the bill itself. I have all the various bills under my hand, and I notice that in every one of them the list of directors is set forth; but I call the attention of the government and of the House to this significant fact, that by section 2, of the bill now before the House, to which we are about to give second reading, the section in the 1924 act which sets up the directorate is repealed, and if passed this bill will leave the company without any directorate at all so far as the records show. We have asked who are the directors. I want to ask the government: Do they know who are the directors of this concern? Surely this company is of sufficient importance that the House should be at least advised whom they are incorporating or re-incorporating. Who are to be the directors? Who are the people that are asking for this bill? It is not set out in the bill before us. It is deliberately deleted from the bill.

Furthermore, as my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) very properly pointed out this evening, all this company has to do is to start development at, say, the two largest water-powers on the waterway, one I understand at Carillon and the other farther up the river this side of Mattawa—I do not know the exact name—where I am told they can develop three or four hundred thousand horse-power; indeed one person told me the potential development is six hundred thousand horse-power. Supposing the promoters take possession of these two spots, commence their work under this charter—if it is given to them. They need not build a single foot of waterway on either side of these powers. All they need do is simply to develop the waterway at those points, take possession of the water-powers and utilize them, and then tell the government: You can have the rest of the canal if you want it. That is the principle of the bill. I say to the Prime Minister that under the rules of the House if this bill goes to the committee it will not be competent for the committee to vary the bill in these respects to any great extent, except with the consent of the promoters. I am quite sure that they will never consent to deletion of the right to develop hydro-electric power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend this question: if it were to appear to the committee that the company were seeking to get powers which were not granted under its original charter, would not that be a sufficient ground for the committee to report against the House accepting the bill?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; but I want to point out to the Prime Minister that these powers are in the original charter. That is the right they have, as my hon. friend who sponsors the bill very properly pointed out. I cannot put my finger on the clause, but the original charter gives the company the right to take power in addition to that needed for the canal, and this right has been continued down to the present time. They can only sell power in excess of that required for the canal. Of course, that is ordinary common sense; but they are entitled to that power. How are their tolls fixed? By the railway board. That is in the original charter, and that is what we are quarrelling with. When the original charter was secured this power was valueless, it was a mere incident to the canal and was not considered of any importance at all. But during recent years, particularly during the last ten years, and more particularly during the last five years, the demand for power has become such that it is a subject of paramount importance, and the canal sinks into insignificance in relation to the value of the power. And that is the reason, if I may impress this upon the mind of the Prime Minister, why we are so bitterly opposed to the bill. It is not to stop genuine private interests from going to a committee, not at all; it is to prevent private interests securing a right under the guise of promoting something altogether different from what they are attempting to secure.

Mr. CANNON: Under the charter as granted would it be possible for these people to develop power without building the canal?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, certainly.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly not.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has just taken his seat. A moment ago I pointed out that the promoters can build a canal at Carillon falls with the necessary dam and locks. They would, incidentally to that work, develop from 200,000 to 400,000 horse-power. They could go up the river this side of Mattawa and there construct a dam, together with the necessary locks, and develop, I am told, from 300,000 to 600,000 horse-power more, and nothing in this bill now before us would oblige them to complete the waterway in between. Let me read what is here proposed:

> The company may commence the construction of its canals, or any of them.

I want the House to bear those few words in mind. This is not a canal; it is a series of canals; it is not a specific work, but a whole chain of works. They may construct its canals or any of them before a certain time:

> And if such construction is not commenced and such expenditure is not so made, or if the said canals are not completed and put in operation within the said periods respectively, the powers granted to the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said canals and works as then remains uncompleted.

The powers shall be null and void—to what extent? As respects that portion of the works and canals that remains uncompleted. The language is as clear as it could possibly be, and the intent of the promoters is equally obvious.

Mr. CANNON: Judging from what my hon. friend has read, is it not a fact that the power developed, either on the whole of the works or on any section thereof, will always be incidental to the completion of the whole canal or of any section of it?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly. The power at these falls will be incidental, if you like to make it so.

Mr. CANNON: It has to be.

Mr. STEVENS: But what we claim is that these dams ought to be constructed for the purpose of power and not ostensibly for the purposes of the canal. In other words, we say that these promoters are coming before parliament with a deceptive measure. They come before us with unclean hands. They are seeking to deceive parliament, although I am ready to admit that parliament is not deceived. If you give the second reading to this bill you put the stamp of approval on the effort of the company to deceive this House and conceal what their real intent is.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. member pardon another interruption? This will be my last question. Am I to understand that my hon. friend would not be against the bill if it were really what it purports to be, and if the House were not deceived by it?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I would be against the bill in any case, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. I may anticipate his next question, which he will not ask, seeing that the one he has just put he said would be his last. His next question would be, "Why have you voted for this measure during the last sixteen or seventeen years?" As a matter of fact I do not know that I always did vote for it, because it has always been a question with me; but I may state the reason why I would oppose it now in any case. I am speaking from memory and am therefore subject to correction, but I think I may safely say that during the past thirteen or fourteen years, two groups of experts, one appointed by the government from its own staff, and the other under Mr. Sanford Evans, have made a most exhaustive examination of this whole canal project, and the last report of Mr. Sanford Evans was submitted about the year 1920 or 1922. I am not sure about the exact date, but in any case the report was brought down a few years ago, and in both instances these experts declared that in their opinion the canal scheme was not feasible. Until that time it was problematical whether it was or not, but that was their report. My own conviction is that, even if it were a straight canal scheme, it is not feasible.

I do not think it is worth my time to go into other reasons for rejecting this measure. I could cite other and very sound reasons, but that is not necessary. The canal feature of the bill is not argued in this House as an excuse for passing it, and I venture to say you would not get half a dozen members here to vote for the measure on the strength of the canal proposal. I have not heard a single member, apart from the hon. gentleman who has fathered the bill, who did not emphasize the power aspect of the project. I would not vote for the bill on either ground. But, to repeat myself, I am opposing it because, under the guise of a proposal to build a canal on this worn out charter, the bill seeks to obtain control of a million and a quarter horse-power, and is therefore the largest, the most significant and the most valuable franchise ever sought by a single corporation in the history of Canada.

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Just for a few moments I want to indicate to the House what is involved in this matter. I want to point out what we are giving away in this bill and contrast that with the development that has taken place on the Niagara river. About the very time that this company came before parliament another company approached the Ontario government with a proposal to develop power at Niagara Falls. The House will be interested to know that the Ontario government gave to that company, an English concern, a contract for the development in perpetuity of all the power at Niagara Falls for the sum of $25,000 per annum. That, I say, was about the time that the present company came on the scene on the Ottawa river to build a canal. At that time the transmission of electrical energy was not known, and this English company, not being able to transmit any power, were forced to abandon the contract. There is now being transmitted in electrical current on the Niagara river at Niagara Falls over 1,000,000 horse-power, an amount equal to the horse-power that may be developed on the Ottawa. Does this House know what the province of Ontario is doing in addition to the development of hydro? That province, apart from what it is doing for the people of Ontario and of Canada, is paying a rental of $500,000 per annum to the parks commission for the upkeep of the parks of the province. In other words, this power which we are giving away is worth at least the amount which the Ontario government is paying to its parks commission. The power on the Ottawa river as a rental proposition is valued at $1,000,000 per annum. Is this government as a government going to overlook such a condition? Are hon. gentlemen opposite not continuing a pretty good franchise to their friends at $1,000,000 a year? I want to ask this government whether the Sifton family have not had enough out of the country. Is it not time that some of these gentlemen of the west, who know something of this group, realized that this government has no right to give them any more?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend why he keeps on repeating the statement that this government is giving away rights?

Mr. CHAPLIN: This government is backing the proposition. We have found that out now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has made that statement because it is the insinuation which hon. gentlemen opposite have thrown out repeatedly in the course of this debate. I wish to make it absolutely clear that the government is in no way committed to the project, nor has it been so committed at any time directly or indirectly. This is a private bill in which the government has no interest other than to see that it is treated as other private bills are treated, and any remarks to the contrary are entirely false and unwarranted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In reply to the Prime Minister I would say that all he has to do to prove his words is to take off the whip and let the House decide the matter on division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I again rise to a point of order, I ask whether or not the remark just made by the hon. gentleman, in view of what I have already said, is in order, and whether he should not be called upon to retract it?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see the question of privilege or the point of order. The Prime Minister has stated, not only to-day but on Friday as well, that the government has no interest directly or indirectly in the present bill. The hon. gentleman has only to accept the word of the Prime Minister. Now what does he mean by "taking off the whip?" I do not know; the Speaker does not know what the hon. gentleman meant, and until I do know what is meant I cannot rule.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am quite willing to accept the word of the Prime Minister, but I simply ask him to take off the whip.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does my hon. friend mean by that?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Everyone knows what the whips are doing with respect to this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I still ask what my hon. friend means when he says, "take off the whip." I ask him to give a statement which is clear and candid.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not know that I can talk more plainly; that is as clear as I can make it. I simply elucidated what I meant when I said the whips were working on the job and getting the members to vote as they were told.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Guthrie) which was negatived on the following division:

Tuesday, March 29, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, April 6, prox., and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the sittings of the House shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days.

He said: The government will take Wednesday nights after to-morrow.

Mr. SPENCER: After to-morrow?

Mr. SPEAKER: After to-morrow. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. COOTE: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to refer to what appears to be an error in the Votes and Proceedings of March 24. I think it was understood by the House that beginning to-morrow, we would take Wednesday for government business. I notice, however, in the Votes and Proceedings the date is given as Wednesday, April 6. I therefore move:

That on and after Wednesday, March 30 instant, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

MONDAY SITTINGS

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say that to-morrow I may move that the House take Monday as a government day also. I am giving notice now in order that hon. members may have an opportunity to think it over in the meantime.

Mr. MANION: Carried.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS COMMITTEE

MOTION TO REDUCE QUORUM

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy):

That the quorum of the committee on privileges and elections be reduced to nine.

Notice of this motion was given by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis).

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this is a recommendation by the committee?

Mr. KELLNER: No, Mr. Speaker, this is a motion that was submitted by the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Joliette, about two weeks ago. At that time some objection was taken to it and the motion was allowed to stand. Now we are making the motion again.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is in order to reduce the quorum of a committee without any report from that committee asking for the change.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I might explain to the Minister of Justice that this motion is being made because we have not yet been able in four attempts to get a quorum of the committee together.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but who is making the recommendation?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The chairman.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The chairman has no power to recommend anything.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to put the facts before the House? The committee on privileges and elections, of which I have the honour to be the chairman, has been called together on four different occasions, but we were unable to proceed for lack of a quorum. Without a quorum the committee could not sit and consequently could not report to the House. At the instance of some members of the committee I moved in the House to have the quorum reduced to eight or nine members, and objection was taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) on the ground that as this was a very important committee the quorum should not be reduced. I must admit that I had not up to that time given much thought to the matter, but it struck me that probably it might be just as well not to reduce the quorum. Moreover, as I had no authority from the committee itself—because, as I have just stated, the committee did not sit regularly,—I decided to let the matter stand until such time as other members might move to have the reduction made. Now the question is before the House, and as I have stated the facts it is for the House to decide.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): In supporting the motion I would point out that the quorum of this committee is much larger in proportion to its membership than that of any other committee of the House. With so many committees meeting at the same time it is often quite difficult to secure a quorum in a committee of this sort. There are some very important matters to come before the committee and I think it would be in the best interests of the House if the quorum were reduced.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I remember when the question was raised in the House on a former occasion by way of a motion moved by the chairman of the committee. I had had no notice of that motion and therefore had not had time to consider it, and I did ask that it be allowed to stand over until the following day. The motion, however, was not brought up again, and nothing has been done until to-day. I conclude, therefore, that there is no objection to the motion and that under the circumstances it would be well to reduce the quorum of the committee to nine as requested. There are one or two important measures before that committee. It is, I think, the desire of all hon. members to conclude the business of the session as expeditiously as possible, and it is just likely that our proceedings may be delayed if we are not able in the meantime to get the business of that committee done. I think the quorum should be reduced to allow the committee to function.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I suggest that the chairman of the committee ascertain the hours at which other committees are sitting and if possible fix, for the assembling of the committee on privileges and elections, an hour which does not coincide with the time of meeting of other committees. I am a member of the committee in question and I think that in every case I have received a notice, another committee has been sitting at the same time in which I happened to be very much interested. It seems to me that a quorum could be obtained if the chairman summoned the committee to meet at ten o'clock in the morning, or at eleven o'clock on days when other committees are not meeting at that hour.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): In view of the opinions expressed by hon. members I would not be opposed to allowing the motion to stand.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can see no objection to the motion carrying. It would help to expedite the business of the House in which we are all interested.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House can, of course, always suspend the rules. Generally the House acts on the initiative of the committee, on whose report it proceeds. In the present instance, however, I think that, inasmuch as there would be real injury if the committee did not meet at all, it would be advisable to adopt the motion. The House must take its stand on the question, and it was because of the desirability of having the business of the committee proceeded with that I was ready to accept the motion as being in order. The committee must meet and if it cannot do so a remedy must be provided. However, the motion stands.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

W. T. GOODISON (West Lambton) presented the second report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. GOODISON moved:

That the second report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATION OF SALE OF POISONS

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to regulate the sale and inspection of poisons represented as a means for preventing, destroying, repelling or mitigating fungi, weeds, insects, rodents, or other plant or animal pest, collectively or individually affecting agriculture, and to provide for registration, the payment of fees thereon, and penalties for infraction of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the Prime Minister whether a decision has yet been reached with respect to the civil service salary revision?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I can promise my hon. friend that the government will make a statement on the matter early next week.

UNITED STATES EMBARGO ON MILK AND CREAM

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House a matter of vital importance to our section of the country and to those border counties in the province of Quebec which ship milk and cream to the United States.

A headline in a local newspaper says: "Milk and cream embargo hits eastern townships farmers." I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question, but before doing so I would like to be permitted to explain that the market for the cream produced in the district surrounding Sherbrooke and to the south of that city is in Boston and the New England states; cream from this section has not been shipped to the city of Montreal. Therefore I think the government should immediately take this question up with Washington through our new minister and see to it that the embargo is lifted at once. This is the season of the year when the milk supply is increasing, and the matter is of vital importance. I ask the Minister of Agriculture if anything is being done in this connection.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I would say to my hon. friend that about noon yesterday we received official information through the Department of External Affairs, and they in turn through Hon. Mr. Massey at Washington, that this embargo had been placed on Canadian milk and cream due to an outbreak of typhoid in Montreal, thought to be caused by an infected milk supply. Immediately the officers of my department got in touch with the Department of Health and with the medical health officer of the city of Montreal, to see exactly what was the situation and what could be done in order to expedite the discovery of the source of contagion. We had a telephone message from the medical health officer of Montreal this morning, but the only information we were able to elicit was that the contagion was pretty general and that the source had not yet been discovered, either in the city through the medium of any dairy or in the country at the source of supply. Mr. Stephens of the National Dairy Council was in communication with the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Jardine, at Washington, in the hope of raising the embargo as it would affect those localities which have not shipped any cream or milk to Montreal for the past six months. Until twelve o'clock to-day, however, no word had been received with respect to that matter, and that is where the matter stands at present. Everything is being done to locate the source of contagion, but until the source is located and the contagion removed I am afraid the general embargo cannot be lifted, although it may be taken off as against those localities which are not now and have not for the past six months shipped milk to Montreal.

[Mr. Howard.]

CANADIAN MINISTER AT WASHINGTON

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING APPOINTMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Yesterday I asked the leader of the House, in the absence of the Prime Minister, as to whether or not a return might be made which was called for by a resolution of the House passed over a month ago, including the letters of credence issued to Hon. Mr. Massey, as minister plenipotentiary to Washington, the order in council passed by the Canadian Privy Council with respect to his appointment, any correspondence between the Canadian government and the British government with respect to the execution of those letters of credence by His Majesty the King, and a copy of any orders in council passed by the Privy Council of Great Britain with regard to that appointment. Some time has elapsed since that order was passed, and I was hoping that those documents might be laid on the table of the House before the discussion to-day commenced.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I was not present yesterday when my hon. friend raised the question, because I would then have directed his attention to the fact that the return was made a fortnight ago. I am afraid my hon. friend has overlooked that fact, but if he looks at the votes and proceedings of March 16, at page 292, he will find that the Secretary of State tabled a return of the papers asked for.

I might say that my hon. friend's motion asked for a number of documents which do not exist. It sought instructions from His Majesty the King to the present minister at Washington; there were no such instructions and therefore none could be brought down. The letter of credence from His Majesty the King to the President of the United States was tabled, and I will send to my hon. friend a copy which I have under my hand at the moment. Then my hon. friend asked for a copy of an order in council by the King in Council with reference to this matter; I notice that in some of his writings he has made the statement that an order was passed by the King in Council, or must have been passed, and my hon. friend has been looking for it ever since. As a matter of fact there was no order passed by His Majesty the King in Council in Great Britain; the only order in council recommending the appointment of Mr. Massey to Washington was the order in council of this government, which has been placed on the table. Then my hon. friend asked for any general instructions on behalf of the government to the Canadian minister. There are no general instructions; the minister is instructed specifically from time to time with reference to questions as they come up. There have of course been verbal instructions but no general instructions have been given in the form of a written document.

I will send to my hon. friend the three documents which it is possible to table in answer to his motion, and which were tabled some time ago.

Mr. CAHAN: I am sorry I overlooked it. Usually one receives a notice from the department concerned when papers are laid on the table of the House; I suppose I must have overlooked that notice, because I certainly am not accusing the department of negligence in the matter. In order to make it quite clear, however, I would ask how the order in council passed by this government was communicated to His Majesty in order to secure from him the issuance of the letters of credence, if there was no correspondence in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, acting upon the request of our government in the matter, would communicate the order in council through the proper channel in Great Britain.

Mr. CAHAN : How would it be communicated by this government to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By cabled despatch.

Mr. CAHAN: By cabled despatch?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think so.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the correspondence be laid on the table whether it is by cable or by letter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to lay any further correspondence on the table, but I do not think the particular correspondence for which my hon. friend is now asking was covered in his original motion.

Mr. CAHAN: I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that I was in England at the time, and my recollection is that I had a word with Sir Austen Chamberlain in regard to the matter, and as to the method of having His Majesty approached. I may also say to my hon. friend that I had a personal interview with His Majesty. It was understood with the British government that the order in council of our government would be the one on which His Majesty would act in making the appointment.

TYPHOID OUTBREAK IN MONTREAL

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I wish to ask the Minister of Health whether his department is taking any part in the endeavour to cope with the outbreak of typhoid fever in the city of Montreal? May I be permitted to supplement the question with one or two statements?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. KAISER: I wish merely to fortify my attitude in asking the question. The matter of public health, I am informed by the best judicial authorities in Canada should be in the hands of the Dominion government. According to the British North America Act we have not assigned to the provinces—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question should be put without supplementing it by a speech. The hon. member should confine himself strictly to putting a question, otherwise he must give notice of what he intends to ask which, perhaps, would be the better procedure.

Mr. KAISER: My reason for asking the question is this: It should be realized what this outbreak of typhoid means for Canada. Out of 1,225 cases of typhoid fever—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KAISER: —thirty have become carriers of disease and that disease is likely to be spread all over the Dominion. Therefore it is an important matter, and I should like to know what the Department of Health is doing to cope with the outbreak.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): In reply to my hon. friend I wish to say that knowing the limitations of the Canadian Health department, I have merely asked the deputy or officers of the department to get in contact with the provincial and municipal authorities in order that we might be advised as to the conditions existing in Montreal.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as the Ottawa water is contaminated in the spring, would you be so obliging as to issue instructions in order that drinkable water be supplied to the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is asking if proper measures have been taken for safeguarding the water supply in the parliament buildings. I may inform him that this morning the usual supply of water from the Ottawa river was replaced by Tally-ho water.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. J. A. MACDONALD (Kings): I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a motion passed on 23rd February asking for the production of certain papers, and to say that the documents have not yet been tabled.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): I may say to my hon. friend that I was not aware that the return had not been brought down. I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

THE CHINESE SITUATION

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Yesterday I asked a question but the Prime Minister was not in his place and it was therefore deferred until to-day. I am not quite sure whether the Canadian government has jurisdiction over Canadian citizens resident in China, but I would ask whether the government has considered urging upon those Canadian citizens the advisability of withdrawing from China until after the civil war is over?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of the civil war existing in China at the present time intimation has been given to foreign residents in that country to move from interior points. It has not, however, been thought necessary to advise their leaving China altogether, and the government of Canada has not given any special directions advising that Canadian residents should leave China.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Supplementing my question, may I ask whether, on account of the great danger to life in Shanghai, it is intended to leave Canadian citizens behind barricades in China?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend must make some allowance for the intelligence of the citizens of Canada who are in China. They surely are in the best position to judge as to what may be necessary and advisable.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

DEBATE ON STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AND AMENDMENT OF MR. GUTHRIE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of supply.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, by agreement between the different parties in the House it was arranged that this afternoon a statement should be made with regard to the proceedings of the recent Imperial conference, and that following the statement hon. members should be free to discuss the conference proceedings before Your Honour leaves the chair. Subsequently in committee on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs any matters of detail on which hon. members may wish to have further information can be elaborated.

It may perhaps answer in advance questions that will arise in the minds of some hon. gentlemen opposite, and help to remove doubts as to the position of the present administration in the matter of its representation at the recent conference, if I mention to the House that the first intimation the former Liberal government had of the intention to hold an Imperial conference in 1926 was last year in the month of January. At that time a communication was received from the British government asking if it was probable that Canada would be able to be represented at a conference in the month of June, or later in the year. A reply was sent to that communication indicating that political conditions were more or less uncertain in Canada, and that it was doubtful whether anyone would be in a position to leave to attend an Imperial conference in June. It was suggested that the conference might better be postponed for another year, but if not for a year at least till the fall. As hon. members know, when June came political conditions were very unsettled. During the concluding months of last year's session members of the administration had very little time to give to the problems that were to come up at the conference. Indeed the intention was, had the government remained in office, to take advantage of the period of recess that would follow the session carefully to prepare with respect to the various subjects on the agenda. However, the Liberal administration resigned at the end of June, and the Conservative administration then took office. That administration continued in office until on in September; I doubt if during that period the hon. members of that administration had any time to give to Imperial conference matters. When we resumed office the date set for the conference was upon us. I mention this simply to bring out the circumstance that when my hon. colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and I left to attend the Imperial conference in September we had had no opportunity whatever of studying the agenda, and were really scarcely aware of the subjects that were to come up for discussion. There is one point, however, that I would like to make quite clear, and it is this, the moment the government came into office it decided that Canada would be represented at the conference, regardless of how inconvenient that might be to those members of the administration who might represent the Dominion. Upon resuming office in September the first communication I addressed was to the Prime Minister of Great Britain to say that the Minister of Justice and myself would represent Canada at the Imperial conference and that we hoped to be able to be present on the opening day of its proceedings.

The conference opened on October 19 and continued its sittings until November 23. During that time there were twenty-three plenary sessions of the conference. May I make clear at the outset that the conference in character was what by name it is described as having been; namely a conference. It was a conference of the prime ministers together with other ministers of the dominions and of the British government discussing matters of mutual interest and common concern, but in no sense was it a cabinet council. At a preceding conference great care was taken by my colleagues and myself to make it clear that we had no authority from the parliament of Canada to become members of an Imperial council seeking to lay down policies with regard to imperial affairs; that we were there as representatives of the Dominion of Canada to confer with representatives of other governments of the empire, to reach such conclusions as it might be possible to reach and then to report them to our respective parliaments, but that we had no authority whatever to bind in any particular in advance the parliament of our country. That position was restated at the opening of the recent conference, and I therefore hope that from the outset it will be clear to hon. members that in no particular has this parliament or this country been bound by any conclusions that were reached by members of the conference that met last fall.

An effort was made with respect to the different questions on the agenda to reach a common agreement, and common agreement was arrived at with respect to practically all the matters which appeared on the agenda. That common agreement finds expression in the report of the conference, and in the course of my remarks this afternoon I shall assume that hon. members not only have received copies of this report but that if they are at all interested in the proceedings of the conference they will have perused the report. There has been laid on the table not only a printed copy of the proceedings of the conference but a supplementary volume in the nature of appendices and a larger summary of the proceedings. These two documents give the main outline of the proceedings of the conference.

Perhaps I should mention to the House the method and order of procedure adopted in conference. The representatives of the several dominions and of the British government met around the council table at No. 10 Downing street. The proceedings opened by a short address delivered by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Mr. Baldwin reviewed the proceedings of preceding conferences and also gave an outline of recent developments on matters of inter-imperial interest. The address of the Prime Minister of Great Britain was followed by addresses by the prime ministers of the other dominions. They will be found in full in the printed report of the appendices to which I have just referred.

Following the introductory addresses the question of trade within the empire was next dealt with at a plenary conference. Addresses were delivered by the President of the Board of Trade and by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs outlining the point of view of the British government with respect to inter-imperial trade and questions relating thereto. This general review was followed by similar reviews by representatives of the different dominions.

The next subject to be considered was that of foreign affairs; perhaps I should not say foreign affairs—I should make the statement broader and say inter-imperial as well as foreign relations. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs delivered an address outlining at considerable length Britain's foreign relations in all of the countries of the world, basing his statements upon the latest information gathered from the various embassies and legations of Great Britain in different parts of the globe, and also upon the accumulation of data which has its existence in the Foreign Office. That statement was necessarily highly confidential and it could not be given to the public generally. It was followed by statements on the part of the prime ministers of the different dominions with respect to those external relations of their countries which they felt might be of special interest to those assembled.

not be advisable to have those questions discussed at a full conference, but that better progress could be made if the constitutional issues were referred to a committee of the conference where there would be greater freedom of discussion than at a large meeting at which shorthand notes were taken of all the proceedings. Accordingly a committee, of which the Right Hon. the Earl of Balfour was chairman, was appointed to deal with the question of constitutional relations as they affected both relations within the empire and the relations of the dominions and Great Britain with foreign countries. When that committee met it was found advisable to appoint from its number a sub-committee to deal with one special phase, namely that which relates to the negotiation, signing and ratification of treaties and matters pertaining to conferences at which different parts of the empire may be represented. My colleague the Minister of Justice was named chairman of that committee. I shall come back a little later on to the conclusions of these various committees. I am at the moment merely seeking to give a review which will indicate the scope of the work of the conference as a whole.

Next in interest to foreign affairs and inter-imperial relations as a subject of general discussion at the conference was the question of defence. This was dealt with in the first instance by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, then by the senior officer of the chiefs of staff sub-committee, Admiral of the Fleet, Earl Beatty, in a survey of the general strategic situation. Meetings also took place at the Admiralty, the War Office, and the Air Ministry, in which the situation from the standpoint of His Majesty's government in Great Britain was presented in greater detail. These meetings and addresses of the Minister for War, First Lord of the Admiralty and the Minister for Air were followed by addresses on the part of representatives of the Dominions with respect to the services—army, navy, and air—of the respective dominions. Matters which were thought to be of special interest to the conference as a whole were brought to its attention in that manner.

In addition to the general review which took place at the full conference, and the detailed discussions at the admirality, at the War Office, and at the Air Ministry, at which experts gave an account in a more detailed way of some of the problems of defence that from the British point of view were considered by the British government as important enough to bring before the conference as a whole, there were demonstrations of the various arms of the service in operation at different centres illustrative of the developments of modern warfare—a naval review off Portland, an army mechanical display at Camberley, and air demonstrations at Croydon and Cardington.

In addition to these main subjects of interest, trade, foreign affairs, inter-imperial relations, and defence, a number of economic questions were brought up for consideration. Hon. members may recall that in 1923 there were two conferences which carried on their proceedings simultaneously; there was the Imperial conference so-called, and the Imperial economic conference. At the Economic conference, questions relating to economic matters were discussed. On this occasion there was but one conference, with the result that so far as economic questions were concerned, they for the most part came to be dealt with by permanent officials of the different governments accompanying the delegations or resident in London. They took up questions that in part had been, prior to the meeting of the conference, the subject of communication between the different governments. Economic matters that were thought to be of sufficient importance to bring before the conference as a whole were brought before it in its concluding days. After the various committees had met, there was placed before the body as a whole the various conclusions to which the different committees had come.

I should like to bring out this fact, if I may, that throughout the conference, with respect to the different matters placed before the conference, its members seemed to desire not to discover points of difference, but rather to arrive at as many points of agreement as might be possible. May I say with reference to the British ministers whom we met, that I failed to discover from the beginning to the close of the conference the slightest evidence of any desire to treat the matters before the conference from a party point of view. Nothing could have been fairer, nothing could have been more patriotic in the true sense of the word, than the manner in which, from beginning to close, the British government dealt with the representatives of the other governments present at the conference. I stress that at the moment because I hope that in our own parliament these matters of inter-imperial interests and concern may be viewed from a higher level than that of questions of party politics giving rise to party controversy. I shall sincerely endeavour in presenting this subject this afternoon to present it from what I may say expresses the Canadian point of view rather than from the point of view of the representative of a political party in this House.

Coming to the proceedings of the conference, I will take up first those which are to us, of less immediate concern and reserve for the concluding part of my remarks the subjects in which I think the House is more especially interested, at least at the present time.

The economic questions might, I think, be omitted from discussion at the present moment, more particularly as all that I would be in a position to say about them will be found fully covered in the report which the House has before it.

I will just enumerate the subjects that are dealt with in the report: overseas settlement, workmen's compensation, research, forestry, exhibition within the empire of empire films, industrial standardization, Imperial shipping committee and Imperial economic committee, maritime conventions, oil pollution of navigable waters, statistical questions, and taxation questions. So far as these various questions are concerned, I do not think there is anything of a controversial character in the report. The effort of those who were assembled at the conference was with respect to many of these matters to find more effective means of gathering statistical data and of coördinating efforts between different parts of the empire.

Perhaps I might say one word on the subject of overseas settlement, as being of more interest to the House than any of the other topics. One thing that was apparent in the discussion of migration was that in all parts of the world the unsettled conditions had very materially changed the situation in the matter of emigrants. In presenting the Canadian point of view of overseas settlement, attention was drawn to the fact that immigration to Canada through government assistance is not as easy a matter as it was some years ago. There are not available at the present time lands which can be given away as homesteads, and in addition, the cost of transportation by ocean has increased very materially. The social laws of England, providing funds for the unemployed, have made it from the point of view of some persons less desirable to emigrate than formerly. With respect to assistance, I think it is true that the present administration has gone further than any previous administration in assisting migration from Great Britain to this country. Under the British Empire three-thousand family settlement scheme, this government has entered into a generous arrangement with the British government in regard to bringing settlers here. One step that was taken during the conference was to provide for the inspection of immigrants by medical services established in Great Britain, so that emigrants could leave the shores of Great Britain with the certainty of being admitted here, at least, so far as the test of physical fitness is concerned, and not have to run the risk which has been a deterrent in many cases in the past of being obliged to return after having crossed the ocean. The government's policy has been to assist agricultural labourers, domestic servants and juvenile immigrants, but to confine its assistance in the matter of assisted passages to those classes. The report upon the work being done in Canada made by the British officials who visited this country last year was one of a highly commendatory character.

On the subject of communication, there were taken up methods of improving the steamship services as between different parts of the empire. The question of the Pacific cable came up incidentally, and an agreement was reached between the different governments as to the basis upon which future reserve funds should be expended. Other points that have been in dispute between different parts of the empire were satisfactorily settled and an agreement was arrived at under which a bill was to be introduced in the British parliament. This has since been done.

On imperial air communications, I should perhaps mention that the discussion helped to make apparent that we are on the eve of a vast development in long distance flights. Possibly no part of the conference was more impressive than that which related to the development of aerial navigation and air services, not only as factors in times of war but as agencies in the promotion of peace and progress. Fortunately, so far as Canada is concerned, it was possible to make a statement of the part played by our air services, which was of the highest character. During the period of the war, though this country had no aerial service, it did contribute 10,000 men to the air force, and since the war there has been a very great development, largely on the civil aviation side. With respect to surveys, the patrolling of forests, of coast areas and in other directions, a marked advance has been made by the Canadian service.

The British government intimated that they were anxious to experiment in airship flights, and asked the dominions if they would coöperate toward that end. It appeared to my colleague and myself that the citizens of Canada would wish to have this country coöperate closely with Great Britain in an experimental air service between the British Isles and the Dominion, and we undertook—it was the only undertaking we gave without the sanction of parliament, with the full expectation however, of receiving such sanction, to say that this country would be prepared to establish mooring masts and to provide the necessary meteorological data to enable the experiment to be made within the next year or two. That undertaking was cordially appreciated by the British administration.

On the question of defence, I have already outlined what took place. Perhaps I need only add that no commitments were made on the part of Canada with respect to defence. Indeed no requisitions were made on the part of the British government for action on the part of the dominions. The resolution of the conference of three years ago was approved. Hon. members will recollect that that resolution sets forth that it is for each dominion, through its government and its parliament, to decide upon its own defence, and upon the character and extent of its coöperation with other parts of the empire. In other words, it is for this parliament to say in all matters pertaining to defence just how far Canada shall go.

Among the other subjects dealt with were some that related more particularly to the colonies, protectorates and mandated territories. As this dominion is not interested in an immediate way in any of these questions, I need not more than mention that they were subjects of consideration by some of the dominions.

I come now to what, from the point of view of this dominion, I assume to be the most important of all the matters discussed at the conference, namely, constitutional issues and questions relating thereto. First of all may I explain how these questions came to play the important part which they did in the conference proceedings? I mentioned the other day that Canada did not put forward concretely any particular matters to be taken up at the conference. I should not like that statement to be construed as meaning that Canada has played no part with respect to many of the questions that were raised. As a matter of fact the position which this country has taken all along of being a self-governing dominion with full right to control its own domestic affairs, both internal and external, necessarily brought to the fore many important questions which seemed to suggest a possible conflict with that point of view. Some of these questions we in Canada have long since worked out satisfactorily, but they are assuming an importance in other parts of the empire similar to that which they assumed here many years ago. An outstanding impression one receives from a conference such as the Imperial conference is the vast difference that exists between the different dominions of the British Empire. To refer to the dominions as a class, as though they were all of a type, is I think a mistake. There is need for the recognition of the individuality within the empire of each separate dominion. There are differences of historical background, of racial composition, of economic development and of political evolution, all of which go far to make the differences between the dominions themselves vastly greater in many particulars, than any differences between this Dominion and Great Britain. It is largely for that reason that some of the questions which created a good deal of discussion at the conference were brought forward. Questions that we, as I have said, have regarded as settled for many years past, have come to assume an importance in South Africa and in the Irish Free State which they have not assumed here for many years, and naturally those countries were interested in having all such questions determined.

Broadly speaking, the first duty and effort of the committee that dealt with the constitutional questions was to formulate a statement which would clearly define the position that has been attained by the self-governing dominions in their relation to Great Britain. That position is set forth in the report as one of equality of status, permitting of free coöperation between the different parts of the empire. It is natural that the constitutional questions should assume a considerable magnitude when we recall the fact that the transition from a relationship within the empire of imperial control and colonial subordination to one of equality of status, with free coöperation between the different parts, is the greatest political transition that possibly the world has witnessed, the most momentous, and the most unprecedented political development of modern times. It was inevitable that this transformation, which has gone on with special rapidity since the war should create new problems that would have to be faced, should make it necessary from time to time to take stock, to consider ways and means of making forms correspond to facts, and of adjusting relations with foreign countries to the new conditions. So far as the dominions were concerned, in their relation to Britain, they started out in a position of colonial subordination. It was recognized that there was an Imperial control over the dominions. In the course of years, however, by here a little being gained and there a little, in the political evolution that has occurred, a change has come about; and whatever we may say when we come to refining from technical and legal points of view, we no longer think of the dominions as being in a position of colonial subordination nor of the British government as in a position of Imperial control in relation to other parts of the empire.

To solve the constitutional question it was necessary to find some common ground and agreement on the part of all sections of the empire regarding the new status which has been attained. How that status has been attained and to whom the credit is due is another question that can be discussed by itself. Certain it is, however, that to no one group or cause is the change to be attributed: it is part of the evolution of the last half century, an evolution that was tremendously accentuated by the war. The change that has come about is one that can be described as a change from a position of Imperial control and colonial subordination to one, as I have already said, of equality of status and free coöperation as between the dominions and Great Britain. That being set out as the basis of a common agreement, it became necessary to consider in relation thereto many forms which, if not entirely, at any rate to some extent, have become obsolete and which appear to be in conflict with the altered situation. That brought up various constitutional questions which were the subject of considerable discussion. Once having stated clearly that the position attained to-day was one of equality of status, it then became necessary to examine, in the light of that statement, existing legal, judicial or administrative forms which seemed to be in conflict therewith, and to see how far these obsolete forms were a vital consideration. That was how the committee came to give so much time to the consideration of some of the matters to which I shall now refer.

May I be allowed to quote to the House the statement which was agreed upon as setting forth the present position of the dominions, on the one hand, and of Great Britain on the other, in their relation to each other. And here let me stress this point: this statement relates not to the strictly legal position but to the constitutional status which has been reached. In a speech recently delivered in Edinburgh Lord Balfour declared that law had always followed a little behind constitutional practice and development; and that very sound opinion, I think, may well be kept in mind in considering this large question of the constitutional position of the different parts of the empire at the present time.

I will read the paragraphs of the report which bring out the significant passage:

> The committee are of opinion that nothing would be gained by attempting to lay down a constitution for the British Empire. Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution; while, considered as a whole, it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organization which now exists or has ever yet been tried.
> There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The significant points in that statement are, first, the emphasis it places upon the complete autonomy of the dominions in the matter of their own domestic and external affairs, and secondly, the allegiance to a common sovereign. These two are stressed as being points of agreement among the various parts of the empire as represented at the conference.

Let us now consider this general statement, taking up in turn existing forms or laws that seem in conflict with it. As a first, not in order of consideration but as illustrating the evolution that has taken place, let me begin with the king's title. The conference decided to change the title of His Majesty the king. That change grew out of the altered position of the Irish Free State, which is one of the self-governing autonomous dominions. The title of His Majesty heretofore has always been "of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," et cetera, "King". It was pointed out by representatives of the Irish Free State that inasmuch as that state was a self-governing dominion, and an agreement having been reached at the time of its establishment that it should be placed in the same category as the other dominions, it should no longer be linked up with the United Kingdom in the description of the king's title. By agreement, therefore, between the British government and the Irish Free State it was proposed that the title should read: of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King," et cetera, it being understood that the title was of geographical and not of political significance. In order to meet an objection raised on the part of northern Ireland, it was agreed that the parliament at Westminster—this was not done by the conference but by the British government—should hereafter be described as "the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland" and not as "the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." That matter was one which really was the subject of an agreement between the Irish Free State and the British government at the time the Irish Free State was created, and the conference was simply asked to acknowledge the situation as being a proper one in the light of the broad principle of equality of status between the dominions—the Irish Free State being one of them—and the British government.

The next subject to be mentioned in this connection relates to the position of the governor general. I have already stated that the change from a position of colonial subordination to one of equality of status as regards the dominions has been a matter of political evolution. When governors general were first appointed to this country—just as governors, are appointed to-day to the colonies—there was an acknowledged position of colonial subordination in the relation of the Dominion to the mother country. That, however, has long since passed away, and the position of Governor General has come to be understood as that of the representative of His Majesty the King. Speaking in a previous debate the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said that the position of Governor General had in no particular been changed, that it was set forth in the British North America Act and remained as stated there. I agree with my hon. friend as to that; the position has not been changed but what has been changed is this: It is now perfectly clear that the Governor General is advised by the ministry of the Dominion to which he comes, and is no longer free to accept advice from His Majesty's government or from any department of that government with reference to the affairs of the Dominion of which he is Governor General.

Mr. CAHAN: Has not that been the case since Mr. Blake was Minister of Justice?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not be at all surprised to learn that Mr. Blake emphasized that aspect of the question very strongly.

Mr. CAHAN: Instructions to the governors general were changed at his request.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I wish to bring out clearly is that the conference was speaking for all the dominions, and not merely for the Dominion of Canada. We have undoubtedly led the way in bringing about the present constitutional position of the Governor General, and I think it can be said that there is no longer any possibility of doubt that the Governor General is the representative of His Majesty the King and in no way the representative of the government of Great Britain or of any department of that government.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask a question there? Last year, why did my hon. friend insist that the governor general get advice from the colonial office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend had waited a moment, he would have heard me speak on that subject, because I intended to refer to it and I shall be glad so to do. Notwithstanding the accepted constitutional position, governors general of Canada up until very recent times have, I think, felt themselves in many particulars largely the agents of the British government. One has only to pick up some recent biographies to see wherein governors general of Canada have been communicating with the Colonial Office very much from the point of view of being the representatives of the Colonial Office and of the British government rather than the representatives of His Majesty the King. That, I take it, is not likely to occur in the future, and if it ever should occur it will be perfectly apparent that it is a wholly unconstitutional position.

Mr. CAHAN: They will be more careful in writing their own biographies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may be true. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has asked me why, I advised the late Governor General, Lord Byng, to confer with the British government at the time I requested dissolution. Had I asked Lord Byng to communicate with the British government with regard to any matter which was a Canadian question pure and simple, and not with reference to a particular course of proceeding on a constitutional matter which might be brought to his attention, I would feel that as Prime Minister I had tendered advice to His Excellency which did not recognize the position I have already stated to be that which the Governor General of this country should maintain. But what was the advice I tendered to His Excellency? It was that he should ask the British government not whether there should be a dissolution in this country, not its decision with respect to any concrete question before the Canadian public, but rather, what in the event of His Excellency being presented by his Prime Minister with an order in council asking for a dissolution would be the proper constitutional course for him to adopt.

Mr. CAHAN: But I might remind my hon. friend that the advice of the Prime Minister was then before the Governor General.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite true; I had advised His Excellency that I thought there should be a dissolution of parliament. His Excellency was not disposed to grant a dissolution; I should not say he was in doubt as to whether he had the right of dissolution, because I think His Excellency held the view that he was in a position to decide that question irrespective altogether of his ministry. I did not agree with him in that; I felt that the Governor General, being in the same position as His Majesty the King, should act upon the advice of his ministers, and when I saw that His Excellency was not inclined to act upon the advice of his ministry, in order to save a constitutional question from being raised, I sought to take every step possible to have His Excellency follow the constitutional course. I suggested that before taking a step which would be unconstitutional and which would be recognized by all parts of the British Empire as such, His Excellency would do well to ascertain from the British government what he should do if confronted with a request for a dissolution.

Mr. CAHAN: But might I ask another question? In doing that was not my right hon. friend asking the Governor General to take advice from the government of Great Britain with regard to an issue raised in respect of Canadian affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made it perfectly clear to His Excellency at the time.

Mr. CAHAN: It must have taken a great deal of casuistry to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may be accustomed to casuistry, but I am not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was doing the best I could to have His Excellency follow a constitutional course, and I think if my hon. friend will reflect a little he will agree that His Excellency might have done worse than to have accepted my advice.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask another question, just as a matter of clearing up the situation? Did not His Excellency take the attitude that he represented the king and not the government of Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not sure that I have caught the significance of my hon. friend's remark.

Mr. MANION: I will repeat it. I am just surmising, but did not His Excellency take the attitude that he represented the king and not the government of Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exactly, and it was on that basis that I suggested that His Excellency should communicate with the British government, as to the constitutional course of procedure, because only a very few months before His Majesty the King had been advised by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to grant a dissolution, and His Majesty granted dissolution on that advice. I advised His Excellency that as he was representing the king, he should do what His Majesty the King in like circumstances did in Great Britain.

Mr. MANION: Then why ask His Excellency to take advice from the government of England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not advice in the general acceptation of the term. I was asking His Excellency to find out, as one who had received instructions from the British government, what was the constitutional course if he were asked by his Prime Minister for a dissolution. As I pointed out, the constitutional course in Great Britain has been established beyond all peradventure for over a hundred years; the King acts upon the advice of his ministry with respect to dissolution, and I was asking that the representative of the king in Canada should do exactly as His Majesty the King would do in Great Britain, especially as if a wrong constitutional course were taken it was very likely that results would follow which might be very far reaching and possibly inimical in some parts of the empire.

Mr. CAHAN: Was not that exactly the same as asking the Governor General to take the advice of the Secretary of State for the Dominions as to his constitutional duties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will only believe that what I was really seeking was to advise Lord Byng along constitutional lines and trying to prevent a mistake, he will understand my point of view more clearly. May I say in order to make my position quite clear that I added that after His Excellency had received an opinion he could do what he liked with it; I did not say he was bound to act upon it. I wanted His Excellency to get as wise counsel as he could possibly get, and there were no other sources from which I could see that he could obtain it. May I add this further: I said to His Excellency that I would have no objection to his calling in Sir Robert Borden, a former Prime Minister of this Dominion, and asking his advice as to what was the right constitutional course to take in a matter of that kind. I did not urge it, but I made the suggestion. Any student of British constitutional history knows that in certain circumstances, His Majesty the King is entitled to call in elder statesmen no longer in office to confer with him before he finally makes up his mind on a course which involves a great constitutional issue.

Mr. MANION: Is my hon. friend prepared to call in other governments to advise him?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Other privy councillors.

Mr. MANION: No, but other governments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend forgets that there is a special relationship between the government of Great Britain and a governor general who is sent out from England.

Mr. MANION: I thought he represented the king.

An hon. MEMBER: Now he does, but not last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall now read what I said to His Excellency in this regard. I take it from my letter of June 28th:

> Your Excellency will recall that in our recent conversations relative to dissolution I have on each occasion suggested to Your Excellency, as I have again urged this morning, that having regard to the possible very serious consequences of a refusal of the advice of your first minister to dissolve parliament, you should, before definitely deciding on this step, cable the Secretary of State for the Dominions asking the British government, from whom you have come to Canada under instructions, what, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for the Dominions, your course should be in the event of the Prime Minister presenting you with an order in council having reference to a dissolution.

Now there was only in the absence of a suggestion of the kind one of two possible courses for His Excellency to take: either to decide the matter himself, without advice from any quarter, or to accept the advice of his Prime Minister; and I think that I was rendering the then Governor General the greatest service possible when I sought to have him fortified from a source that the House will admit is a good one, with respect to the right course of procedure on a constitutional issue that was then a matter of discussion between us. I continue quoting:

> As a refusal by a governor general to accept the advice of a prime minister is a serious step at any time, and most serious under existing conditions in all parts of the British Empire to-day, there will be raised, I fear, by the refusal on Your Excellency's part to accept the advice tendered, a grave constitutional question without precedent in the history of Great Britain for a century, and in the history of Canada since confederation.

There were the possibilities of a very serious situation. Fortunately it has been solved satisfactorily by the people of Canada, but if the people had not given the answer they did, that question would have been far from settled up to the present day.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I suppose there would have been a revolution.

An hon. MEMBER: Shut up.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I will shut up when I like.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just go a step further and say a word as to my action, which was a chivalrous action, in that particular.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Which was a chivalrous action intended to prevent the Governor General from making the mistake which he did make—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and which action has been grossly misrepresented by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have sought to interpret that act as an effort on my part to throw a certain onus upon the British government, to have it appear that in some way there had been Downing street control. In order to make clear to the House exactly what my own wishes were in the matter, I desire to read one or two communications which passed between certain of the ministers in Great Britain and myself immediately upon my tendering my resignation as Prime Minister. I knew that hon. gentlemen opposite would attempt to have it appear that an issue was being created between Great Britain and Canada, and I sought to take the one step—and the only step that I could take—to make it perfectly clear from the start that there was no issue between Downing street and the government of this country. The minute I had tendered my resignation as Prime Minister I sent a cable message, to be given to Mr. Baldwin, the Prime Minister of England, and to Mr. Amery, Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, setting forth my relations with the British government during the entire period I was Prime Minister. I could not send that communication myself direct as Prime Minister, because I was no longer in office, but I sent it to Mr. Larkin, the High Commissioner for Canada, to be transmitted to the Prime Minister of England and the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

Mr. CAHAN: Was that after your resignation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My resignation was announced in this chamber shortly after two in the afternoon. This communication was sent at about a quarter to three on the same day.

Mr. McGIBBON: When you were only a private member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At that time I was a private member; I had ceased to be Prime Minister.

Mr. CAHAN: What right had you to communicate through Mr. Larkin?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had the same right as my hon. friend has when he has a communication he wishes to make.

Mr. CAHAN: Not a communication to the British government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say further that if there had been a prime minister, if there had been a secretary of state for external affairs, if there had been a government, I would have asked the government or some member of it to send that communication. But we had not a prime minister, we had not a secretary of state for external affairs, we had not a government. We had no one who could officially send a communication, and I was anxious that the British government should understand the situation in its true light just as quickly as possible. This is the cable which I sent to Mr. Larkin immediately on my resignation as Prime Minister of Canada:

I wish to advise you immediately of my resignation to-day as Prime Minister of Canada. Would you kindly so advise the Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, and Secretary of State for Dominions, Mr. Amery, giving reasons as set forth in my statement in House of Commons this afternoon which was in following words:

"The public interest demands a dissolution of this House of Commons. As Prime Minister I so advised His Excellency the Governor General shortly after noon to-day. His Excellency having declined to accept my advice to grant a dissolution to which I believed under British practice I was entitled, I immediately tendered my resignation which His Excellency has been graciously pleased to accept. In the circumstances as one of the members of this House I would move that the House do now adjourn."

I wish you would express to both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Dominions my deep appreciation of the very cordial and happy relations which have existed between us throughout my tenure of office as Prime Minister of Canada.

W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

This communication was forwarded to Mr. Amery and Mr. Baldwin by Mr. Larkin, and the following replies were received:

Dominions Office, Downing Street, S.W. 1,
30th June, 1926.

Dear Mr. LARKIN,

It was good of you to send me yesterday a copy of Mr. Mackenzie King's telegram announcing his resignation.

I am glad to know that he like myself has appreciated the cordial and happy relations which have existed between us during his tenure of office, and I have to thank him for the unfailing courtesy and consideration with which he has dealt with the various matters which, from time to time, I have personally brought to his notice.

Yours sincerely,
L. S. AMERY.

The following communication was received from the Prime Minister:

10 Downing Street, Whitehall, S.W. 1
1st July, 1926

Dear Mr. LARKIN,

I write to thank you for your letter of the 29th June, in which you sent me Mr. Mackenzie King's message upon relinquishing his office as Prime Minister of Canada. This event marks the end of a period during which, as Mr. Mackenzie King says, our relations have been consistently most cordial and happy.

I should be grateful if you would be so good as to thank Mr. Mackenzie King for his kindly message which I have very much appreciated.

Your sincerely,
STANLEY BALDWIN.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like to ask the Prime Minister since when the High Commissioner became the official medium of communication between this government and the government of Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Since the High Commissioner's office was created. That is what the High Commissioner's office is for.

The High Commissioner is the representative of the government of Canada in England in its relations with the different departments of government in England and with regard to matters relating to Canadians in the old country.

Mr. McGIBBON: That was not a communication from the government of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member sends a communication to Mr. Larkin I am sure he will treat it with great courtesy. I have stated the reasons why the communication was sent in that way. I thought it was desirable that the British government and the public at large in Canada as well as Great Britain should know immediately that my resignation was in no way due to a difference between the British government and the Canadian government. That was what I was endeavouring to make clear and I hope my hon. friends opposite will be able to appreciate that that was a stand very much in the interests of the old country and of this country, having regard to the issue which had arisen at that particular time.

Mr. McGIBBON: That does not answer my question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While I am on this subject, as indicating how it is viewed by constitutional authorities of very high repute, may I read to the House a communication which was sent to the Edinburgh Scotsman on the 16th March of this year by Mr. A. Berriedale Keith. I think members of the House know that Mr. Berriedale Keith is the author of Responsible Government in the Dominions, Imperial Unity in the Dominions, Dominion Home Rule in Practice, Constitutional Administration and Laws of the Empire, and other works and that he holds a very distinguished position as a constitutional authority. Mr. A. Berriedale Keith has evidently observed in the press of the old country, through despatches sent from this side, an endeavour to misrepresent certain aspects of this particular situation, and as a constitutional authority he has written to the Scotsman communicating his view which I now wish to read to the House. The first part of it refers to a matter, that came up a short time ago and that I referred to in parliament, of an alleged understanding between the former Governor General and myself. I made it quite clear at the time that the whole matter was a fabrication and that I thought it was doing an injustice to the then Governor General to assume that anything of the kind would have been attempted by him, as it would have been quite improper for him to have permitted any understanding with respect to the holding of office. This matter is also referred to by Mr. Berriedale Keith. This is what appears in the Edinburgh Scotsman of March 16, 1927:

Constitutional Issue in Canada

The University, Edinburgh,
March 15, 1927.

SIR:

The constitutional issues in Canada, the Conservative view of which is clearly set out in the message from your Ottawa correspondent in your issue of to-day, are so important that a comment based on constitutional practice may be permissible. The alleged "gentlemen's agreement" has been declared by Mr. Mackenzie King a complete fabrication, and it need only be added that since the well-known case of Sir W. Ellison-Macartney in Tasmania in 1914 it has been clearly unconstitutional for a governor to make any bargain with ministers as to the terms on which they are to remain in office, and it is quite unfair to attribute to Lord Byng a breach of a clear rule of constitutional usage.

The vital question of Mr. King's action in advising Lord Byng to consult Mr. Amery appears to me to have been seriously misunderstood. No one could deny that Lord Byng was an Imperial officer subject to the royal instructions, conveyed through the Secretary of State. The point at issue was—what did these instructions enjoin in the case where a prime minister asked for a dissolution, and presented for approval an order in council for that purpose? Was it Lord Byng's duty to investigate the political situation for himself, and decide on his own responsibility what was best for Canada? Or could he follow the British practice—recently signally illustrated by the immediate acceptance by His Majesty of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's advice in 1924—and act on the advice of his ministers? The custom of the Australian states supported the use of a personal discretion, but no Canadian Governor General since federation had ever declined advice. Lord Byng was without political experience, and it appears to me that Mr. King acted with much common sense in advising him, before taking a decision which, as he rightly anticipated would have very far-reaching consequences, to ask the Secretary of State what the royal instructions really meant. I confess that, while I have always held that Lord Byng erred in his decision, it appears to me that much of the responsibility really rests with a system under which a Governor General is sent out without any clear instructions as to the place which he is to occupy in the structure of government. Happily, the resolution of the Imperial conference of 1926 should effectively prevent any Governor General in future being placed in so uncomfortable a position as was Lord Byng.

I am, et cetera,

A. BERRIEDALE KEITH.

I pass to the next subject that came up, and that is the system of communication between the British government and our government. In the old days of colonial subordination all communications came from the British government to the Canadian government through the Governor General. The practice began when the Governor General was avowedly the agent of the British government. During the war a new practice was adopted of direct communication between the prime minister of a dominion and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. There has been no definitely established practice since then, and in view of the declaration that the Governor General was representing His Majesty the King and was not the representative of the British government, it became important to consider whether the custom of always forwarding communications to a Dominion government through the Governor General should be continued or not. It was felt by the conference that there was no more reason, logically or constitutionally, why communications should be sent from the government of Great Britain to a Canadian minister or Prime Minister through His Excellency the Governor General, than why a communication from the Canadian government to the Prime Minister of England or the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs should be sent through His Majesty the King. It was decided that, having regard to the equality of status, the practice that should be adopted hereafter would be one of direct communication of government with government, thereby eliminating the possibility of a Governor General being drawn into controversy or discussion with respect to despatches that are immediately passing between governments. It will take a little while to have this new arrangement worked out, but it is being worked out at the present time.

The next subject was that of the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties, and the representation of the dominions along with the British government at conferences and gatherings at which the representation of all or a certain number might be expected. As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, the Minister of Justice was chairman of the committee which dealt with that subject, and I think I might therefore well leave to him the statement to the House on that phase of the work of the Imperial conference.

I pass now to a reference to the operation of Dominion legislation which appears to be in conflict with the broad principle of equality of status that was laid down. That was another most important subject considered. May I make it quite clear that the conference never assumed that there were not certain laws existing which appeared to conflict or which did conflict with equality of status between the dominions and Great Britain as broadly stated. Indeed it was frankly admitted that some did conflict and it was because of the conflict that they were brought up for consideration and discussion. To have a very few individual acts that appear to conflict with a generally established position, and to have that situation admitted and dealt with, with a view of bringing about equality of status to the full, is a very different thing from having an old order which has passed away understood as still existing, and thereby permitting many people who are only too anxious to make difficulties between Great Britain and her Dominions to emphasize the idea of subordination. It was to get free of this kind of question which agitators, if I may use that expression in a general way, delight in bringing up, the apparent exceptions to a general rule, that the conference deliberately undertook the consideration of this matter of the operation of laws that seem in conflict with the general position of equality of status. What was the first apparent exception that was brought up? It was the question of the disallowance of Dominion legislation by the British government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are we to understand that the only purpose in taking up these particular overriding acts was in order to meet the objections raised by agitators?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend must not take too seriously my reference to agitators.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I simply wish the Prime Minister to make it quite clear, because I think he will agree that it is most important that the House and country should understand exactly what the motive was in taking up these questions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motive was to get unanimity of understanding and to prevent misunderstanding in any quarter. I will come to what I meant when I spoke a moment ago about agitators, and I think my hon. friend will see clearly that I was justified in using the expression. I was referring to the power of disallowance of a Dominion act. There is a power that has not been exercised so far as Canadian legislation is concerned for fifty years. I doubt if anyone in this country, except a few students of the constitution, is aware that the British parliament has the right to disallow certain legislation which this parliament passes.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the British parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The British government; I beg pardon. There is an obsolete law. It had significance at one time, but its significance has entirely gone. It remains a law; as Sir Robert Borden has said somewhere it is still a matter of legal right, but constitutionally it is dead, and it is from the constitutional point that these matters are being considered at the present time.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the Prime Minister mean that it would be unconstitutional for the British government to exercise either reservation or veto?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what Sir Robert Borden has stated most emphatically.

Mr. CAHAN: I would rather have your own statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say so also unless His Majesty were requested so to do by a Canadian ministry. Let me make this remark at once to relieve my hon. friend's mind with respect to the point he was going to note down, that this does not apply to any right that is guaranteed by special statute or by the constitution. I think my hon. friend has given himself a lot of unnecessary trouble and pain through overlooking the fact that the conference was careful to state that whatever is guaranteed by the constitution and whatever is laid down in a specific statute on the question of the right of the British government with respect to Dominion matters will not be interfered with in any particular. A committee has been appointed to consider this particular aspect with a view of seeing whether, in the light of the general statement that there is equality of status, there should not be some modification, but the conference has done nothing directly or indirectly to affect any right conserved by the constitution or by any specific law drafted in reference to matters of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: With reference to disallowance or reservation. That is dealt with on page 15 of the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I think the country has been unduly alarmed due to the circumstance that this particular fact was apparently not in the minds of those who were commenting on this question. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is right! He says the country has not been alarmed, that only some individuals have.

Mr. HOCKEN: John S. Ewart.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my hon. friends to look at page 15 of the report of the conference, where they will find the following:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

On this point we propose that it should be placed on record that, apart from provisions embodied in constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation, it is recognized that it is the right of the government of each Dominion to advise the crown in all matters relating to its own affairs. Consequently, it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by His Majesty's government in Great Britain in any matter appertaining to the affairs of a dominion against the views of the government of that dominion.

Mr. CAHAN: Might I ask a question, with the utmost good faith? Does that mean in reference to Canada that sections 55, 56 and 57 of the British North America Act, dealing with the reservation and veto of Canadian statutes by the Imperial government, remain in full force and are recognized by the terms of the paragraph which the Prime Minister has just quoted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The British North America Act remains exactly as it is in all particulars.

Mr. HANSON: That is what Taschereau says.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And in that he is quite right. It remains exactly as it was in the beginning, and it cannot be changed except in the manner which the British North America Act itself expressly provides.

Mr. CAHAN: Then what becomes of the power of reservation and veto which is provided in the British North America Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just explained that the power is just what it has always been. It has not been exercised for fifty years: it is impotent in practice, and is not likely to be exercised at any time with respect to Canadian legislation.

Mr. CAHAN: But is not that due to the restraint of the parliament of Canada in passing legislation, rather than to the power of disallowance or veto, which is here recognized, having become obsolete?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Undoubtedly the parliament of Canada has exercised judgment in the legislation it has passed, but I submit to my hon. friend that if he really wishes to raise an issue between Great Britain and this Dominion he need only have the British government begin to disallow legislation which this parliament may enact. For fifty years that power has not been exercised, and to all intents and purposes it does not exist as a constitutional right to-day.

Mr. CAHAN: It is affirmed in this very report as a constitutional right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No British sovereign to-day would think of disallowing an act of this parliament on the advice of the British ministry. He would wish to have the advice of His Majesty's advisers in this country. Unless the subject were one which is set forth in the constitution of the country or relating to something which the constitution was intended to safeguard—

Mr. CAHAN: Or set forth in imperial acts.

Mr. HOCKEN: May I ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think it is fair to the Prime Minister to be interrupting him all the time. This is a very important debate, and it seems to me the Prime Minister should be allowed to continue.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg pardon. I was deeply interested in the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will allow me, I think I can explain to him wherein this has a significance. So far as the question of disallowance is concerned, it is not a matter of any great concern to this parliament or to this country because it has not been exercised for fifty years, and we have no fears of its being exercised. But take the position of Ireland, and then you begin to see why this question was brought up at the Imperial conference, and why the interpretation which the British ministry has placed upon it is a wise one. The Irish Free State came into existence in 1921, and one of the clauses of the act bringing it into existence provided with respect to constitutional questions, that matters affecting the Irish Free State would be carried out in accordance with the practice and custom of Canada. That is what made it important to have an interpretation, so far as Canada was concerned, of the significance of disallowance.

Now may I draw this to the attention of the House? In the Irish Free State you have a body of members who have separated from those in the north of Ireland. They have withdrawn the representation which they formerly had in the British House of Commons, having now their own parliament dealing with their own affairs. If you grant that the power of disallowance lies in the hands of the British government, then, so far as the Irish Free State is concerned, the situation is this: that the men who within the last three or four years have been given the right of self-government are obliged to have all their legislation subject to disallowance by a government that politically may be hostile to them. Does not my hon. friend agree with me that I am entitled to say that that is the kind of a situation which agitators delight in? All that is needed to create trouble in southern Ireland with respect to the power of disallowance is to point out that gentlemen sitting at Westminster, who politically are the sworn enemies of the right of self-government in the Irish Free State, have the right to disallow any act of the parliament of that state. The British government took the broad view that such a situation should not be allowed to develop in that way, and they have given in clear terms their own interpretation of what their course of action with respect to disallowance will be. The British government themselves have done this. They have said with relation to legislation passed by the parliament of the Irish Free State that they would not disallow such legislation except upon the advice of the ministers of the Free State parliament, not the ministers of the British parliament. Is not that the sort of thing that makes for unity and harmony within the empire? And the same thing is true in its application to South Africa. South Africa has grave racial problems. An agitator there can make capital of the fact that legislation passed by the South African parliament may be disallowed by the British parliament. But the minute that the British government come forward with a broad liberal principle and say we will so far as this power of disallowance is concerned exercise it in a constitutional way, namely, where there is a self-governing dominion we will recognize equality of status and we will have that power of disallowance exercised only on the advice of the ministry of the dominion concerned, there all possibility of agitation is at an end. That was the principle laid down with respect to disallowance. And so I might go on and say with regard to such matters as the right of appeal to the Privy Council that there again the position was clearly stated, that it was for the dominion itself, possessing self-government to the fullest extent, to say whether or not it wished that right of appeal limited, cancelled or continued. In other words, what the British government, along with the other dominions sought to do was to make it clear that when we speak of self-government—autonomy—in relation to domestic and external affairs, the words mean exactly what we say they do. I shall leave this part, because it gets into the realm of legal controversy, to my friend the Minister of Justice to deal with.

The same class of argument or objection as has been raised in this House came up in the House of Lords and was answered by the Right

Hon. Earl Balfour himself, speaking for the conference and the point of view which it presented. I will ask the House to bear with me while I read one or two of the criticisms that were made in the House of Lords on the points I have just been mentioning. They resembled closely the criticisms which hon. gentlemen opposite have been making. Then I will ask my hon. friends to listen to how Lord Balfour replied to those criticisms. Lord Balfour's reply is the answer that I would make to similar criticisms here.

Mr. CAHAN: It is most unconvincing in view of the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will not be convinced by Lord Balfour, a former Tory prime minister of England, nothing under heaven will convince him.

Mr. CAHAN: He is the keenest dialectician and casuist in the House of Lords.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Lord Balfour was dealing more particularly with lawyers, and I would address his reply especially to my hon. friend, because Lord Balfour was confronted with just the kind of objections that my hon. friend has been making—objections based on some legal technicality which has really little or no force so far as the constitutional position is concerned.

Mr. CAHAN: And he was meeting it with the same casuistry which the right hon. gentleman is now displaying.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us listen to the statements. Lord Parmoor, taking part in the debate in the House of Lords on December 8, spoke as follows regarding restrictions:

First of all, their own powers are circumscribed and restricted under their own constitutions granted by this country, under the operation of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and under the well-known principle, which is not only true in theory but has been acted upon frequently, that as regards matters essentially affecting the mother country the British parliament at Westminster has a supreme authority over all dominions and colonial possessions.

Further on he said:

No one can say that the dominions, for instance, are in no way subordinate to the British parliament in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs. They are subordinate, not only in theory but in practice, in constitutional practice, in many directions both as regards their domestic and their external affairs.

And a little further on he added:

It has been authoritatively laid down that the obvious purpose and meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act are to reserve the right of the imperial legislature to legislate for the colonies to which a local legislature has been given, and to make it impossible for the colonial legislatures to enact anything repugnant to the imperial legislature, but not otherwise to derogate from its general legislative authority. As a matter of fact, under the Colonial Laws Validity Act and what is known as the principle of reservation, a series of matters has been reserved or kept under the jurisdiction of the British parliament at Westminster. For this reason: although you may lay down a principle of this kind in very wide language, yet when you come to its operation you will find that in a considerable number of cases what may appear to be a mere act of a local legislature of a dominion is of a character that may substantially—I use that word purposely because it is a word that has been applied in legal language—affect the interests of the mother country.

Mr. CAHAN: That was Lord Parmoor. The right hon. gentleman said he was quoting Lord Balfour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Lord Parmoor is putting forward the views that my hon. friend would wish to put forward.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly I can present my own views.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exactly. Then may I read what Lord Balfour said in reply? What I have just read is the argument presented from the point of view—

Mr. CAHAN: Of the agitator.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of the lawyer who is looking to the technical, legal interpretation rather than to the constitutional position as it is to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: He was president of the council in the Ramsay MacDonald government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer made by Lord Balfour is this:

I must honestly say that to this part of the speech I have the most fundamental objection. He seems to me to have approached the subject entirely in the wrong spirit. He does not deny that he sympathizes with those declarations; he does not deny that that is the sort of idea that he himself cherishes; but he says: "What folly to lay down the general principles on which this empire is now constructed. I think you should first settle all the preliminary details, and smooth away all the technical difficulties which have their origin in the long history of our overseas dominions."

I cannot imagine any policy from which I more profoundly differ. You are to set yourself every kind of problem, every sort of difficulty which may conceivably arise in the course of applying the broad principles of equality of status before you dare to announce that equality of status exists.

Can anything be more legal or less statesmanlike? I cannot even put myself in the frame of mind of the noble Lord on that subject. He asks, for instance, if the Dominions want to separate from us what exactly would happen then, what sort of notice ought to be given, by what procedure would it be done? You might as well consider all the causes of divorce before you decide upon the problems of matrimony.

Does not the noble Lord see that it would be impracticable for the conference of the Dominions and the Mother Country to meet at Westminster to say: "Well, on the whole we are inclined to think the idea of empire is one to which we may all look forward and which will embody equality of status, but just think of how many questions we must decide before we get to that point. Here is this difficulty and there is another difficulty arising out of the act of 1865. There are all these problems with regard to the Merchant Shipping Act. We must settle all those before we decide on what principle this collection of self-governing states is to work together." I boldly say to your Lordships' House that that is from beginning to end the wrong way of going to work. We have gone on exactly the opposite way.

Then, referring to a speech he himself had made before, Lord Balfour continued:

I said in reference to the relations between the mother country and the dominions:

"My own personal view is that the relations are those necessarily of equality. None of us conceive that of this conglomeration of free states one is above the other. One may have more responsibility than another, one may be in more dangers than another, one may be closer to the centre of international complications than another, but all are on an equality. That is the very essence, as I understand it, of the British Empire. As to exactly what that equality involves, as to exactly what degree of responsibility each has for the other, on that I personally think very little is gained by refining, discussing or defining."

Then he concludes:

Remember exactly what the position is. In this country we are all familiar with the idea of equality between the self-governing portions of the empire. I will not give the quotations, but it has been stated by various high authorities for the last quarter of a century and has never, I think, been formally contradicted within these shores. But that is not the position in all the Dominions. In many of the Dominions there is a minority—in most cases, I dare say, a very small minority—who are always following the train of thought which recommends itself so much to the noble Lord. They are always looking at these survivals of an earlier past and saying: "how can you consider that we in this or that Dominion are on an equality with the mother country when we find still unrepealed this or that statute? If you are to allow that kind of statement to go uncontradicted, unqualified by the broad considerations of equality with which you ought to begin, of course you can get in an audience mixed up in local controversy a certain amount of opinion in favour of the assertion that, whatever talk may go on in England, in this or that Dominion things are far otherwise and the boasted equality between the various self-governing parts of our empire does not, in fact, exist. It does, in fact, exist.

What is contrary to the fact are these survivals of a previous condition of things, survivals which have no practical effect, which have no practical interference with that equality which each part of the self-governing parts of the empire may justly claim for itself, but which no doubt can be set out in a formal document which, if you choose to treat the whole thing as purely a question of law, might have an effect, and as I believe has had an effect, in local controversies overseas. There is but one way of getting rid of that difficulty, and getting rid of it forever, and that is to take advantage of the presence within our shores of the Prime Ministers, who are representative each of his own Dominion, meeting round a table discussing this question in all its aspects and coming unanimously to the conclusion which I have ventured to say represents British opinion, and to agree that it may be desirable to consider this or that difficulty in the future, but that the broad principle—never interfered with on any important point—stands, that no control is exercised by any single one of the self-governing parts of the empire over any other part of the empire.

That is as conclusive a statement of the position that the conference sought to lay down as it would be possible to present.

When my hon. friend at this moment asserts that it is all nonsense to talk about equality of status he runs completely counter to his hon. leader, who made a statement in this House in the course of the speech on the Address. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) outlined what had taken place at the different imperial conferences that have been held. He declared that the idea of equality of status was not a new one and that for many years past we had been claiming that equality. But he made one statement which was very emphatic and positive as to the time at which that equality had been recognized. Let me read to the House what the hon. member said. He is reported in Hansard at page 27, December 13, 1926, as follows:

The next conference was that of 1921. There had been a good deal of change in the position of the overseas dominions since the 1917 conference; not only had we been recognized as free and equal nations, but we had actually signed the treaty of Peace, I suppose the most memorable treaty of modern or of ancient times. There we stood in Paris shoulder to shoulder with the other nations of the world and recognized as being on an equality with Great Britain and the other nations.

Could there be a more positive statement than that or one more comprehensive? That is what the leader of the opposition said, and I wonder whether my hon. friend will differ from him. If he does, then there is considerable difference in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member went on to say:

Therefore when the conference met in London in 1921 a question immediately arose as to whether it was now necessary to call a constitutional conference pursuant to the resolution of 1917. The constitutional situation had greatly changed; our position had become definite and accepted.

That is the view of the leader of the opposition. Let me again point out that the question of equality of status is not a matter that has been determined by this last conference; it is one of political evolution. What this last conference has done has been to give to the world an authoritative statement of an agreement on the part of all parts of the empire to that broad principle of equality of status.

Mr. CAHAN: How was that agreement evidenced?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By a report unanimously adopted by the conference, which report was approved by the British government as well as by the representatives of other governments present.

Mr. CAHAN: Does approval of the Prime Minister constitute approval on the part of Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid we shall have to wait forever before my hon. friend will approve it.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not a fair answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is to be any approval at any time I doubt whether a more authoritative one could be found than that which the last Imperial conference gave.

Mr. CAHAN: Which the Prime Minister of this country gave on behalf of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Which I agreed to, yes, on behalf of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Could no more authoritative approval be given by Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend thinks that in giving that approval I went contrary to the views of this parliament, I ask him to move a resolution to that effect and let us debate it in this House. If he does we shall get an expression of opinion on the part of parliament, and I venture to say that parliament will endorse the position taken by the Imperial conference on the question of equality of status.

Mr. CAHAN: There are other things.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has taken a long time to secure this authoritative statement regarding the relationship between the dominions and the mother country. May I remind the House that the first person to declare, in a manner which served to attract general attention that Canada was a nation, with an equality of status with other parts of the empire, owing a common allegiance to the king, was the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This was at the time of Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee in 1897. In that year, speaking on July 7 at the Constitutional Club, as reported in The Times on the following day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

The British Empire is a galaxy of free nations. The bond of the British Empire is allegiance to the king, without distinction of race or colour.

I ask my hon. friend to compare that declaration made in 1897 with the declaration of the Imperial conference of 1927 and he will find that both essentials are identical. Each lays emphasis on the national character of the Dominions, each lays emphasis on the common bond of allegiance to the Sovereign. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was decried by the friends of my hon. friend as being a separatist because he sought to give this country the status of a nation and equality in status with other parts of the British Empire, but the position Sir Wilfrid Laurier took at that time has at last not only been vindicated but come to be recognized throughout the British empire and throughout the world.

I would be very wide of the mark if I omitted as the most important of all the factors which have hastened this recognition the great part taken by this country and by the dominions as a whole throughout the period of the great war. The declaration we have here is virtually the declaration of the position of our Dominion as it would be expressed by the men who fought in the war, and who, through the general who led them at the close, gave expression to their views in the heart of London. I have in my hand a copy of an address which I had the privilege of listening to in London in 1919, delivered by Sir Arthur Currie who was, if I recollect aright, receiving the freedom of the city of London. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) was at the time Canadian High Commissioner in London, and through his courtesy I had the privilege of going with him to the Mansion House and listening to this address. I desire to read a part of it to the House, because it seems to me to express exactly what the Imperial conference has expressed with respect to the status and position which should be recognized throughout the empire as existing between its different parts. On May 27, 1919, at the Mansion House, Sir Arthur Currie spoke as follows:

At this time and in this place all we can say now is that the war has brought about many rapid and drastic changes in the viewpoint of the dominions concerning their relations with the Motherland. They now believe that it is urgent that a new basis shall be found which will strengthen the British system and which will recognize that certain component parts of the empire have earned for themselves the status of nations, and they are anxious, among other things, that every suggestion of political inferiority shall be removed. In the many branches of war activities, either in the field or at home, as soldiers or as manufacturers, or in the sweeter realm of mercy, the dominions have proved themselves second to none, and have earned for themselves a proud place amongst the civilized nations of the world alongside Great Britain.

The national spirit of the dominions has been matured by the war, but the ties which bind the empire together have in no way been weakened. On the contrary, I believe there is now a strong feeling that machinery should be erected that would make out of the British Empire a constellation of nations free, equal, united by good will, common ideals, reciprocal confidence, all under one flag and one King. These nations, although enjoying absolute freedom in the working of their particular destinies, should have a voice commensurate with their singular interests in the empire as a whole. Under equal rights, equal privileges, they should, through the medium of the machinery provided, share equal duties one toward the other in the broadest spirit of coöperation, and in the councils of the world should speak definitely under the authority accruing to the combination of power, broad wisdom, and high ideals which it would represent. There is no reason why Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand, should not be to England in relation to the empire what Glasgow, Liverpool and Manchester are to London in relation to the United Kingdom, and I believe that a political system that would bring about the realization of this ideal would prove an everlasting benefit, not only to the empire's constituent parts, but to the world at large.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this statement by Sir Arthur Currie, voicing as I believe it does the views of the men who fought overseas in the Great war, constitutes a statement of the position which exists at the present time throughout the empire, a position of equality of status between Great Britain and the self-governing dominions, and I believe it is a position which instead of challenging in any particular we should be proud to assert on every possible occasion.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House has been very glad to hear the exhaustive statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to the proceedings of the Imperial conference held in London during October and November, 1926, which for the first time have been up for discussion in the parliament of Canada as a definite question. In introducing the subject this afternoon the right hon. Prime Minister stated that by agreement it was arranged that the discussion should come up in this way. By that language the Prime Minister could only have meant that by agreement this afternoon was fixed as the time for the discussion, because I never for one moment considered that a question of this kind would be brought up on a motion made by the government itself that you, Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me say to my hon. friend at once, that I meant we would take it up at this time; it was a matter of arrangement.

Mr. BENNETT: An arrangement of time but not method.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree that the time was arranged but not the method, and when the suggestion was made to me there was nothing further from my mind than that such a method should be selected for this important discussion.

This matter was discussed to some extent at an earlier date this session, Mr. Speaker. On December 13 last, when the House was occupied in discussing the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the subject received some considerable attention, and reference was made this afternoon by the right hon. the Prime Minister to that debate. No objection was taken to his so doing and I presume the same courtesy will be accorded me, because it is my desire to make reference to the remarks of my right hon. friend on that occasion to show the idea I had with regard to the method to be adopted by the government in bringing this question to the attention of parliament. During the discussion in December last my right hon. friend made it abundantly clear that the report of the conference would be submitted to parliament in due course; he did so in precise and emphatic language which will be found at page 43 of Hansard:

> It was a conference of representatives of the different governments, and everything that conference did, before it begins to bind a single part of the empire, is subject to the approval of not only the governments but also the parliaments of the different parts of the empire.

A little further down on the same page he used these words:

> I may say to my hon. friend that the government intends to put the report before this House just as it appears, and to recommend its adoption.

There can be little surprise, therefore, that I was misled by the positive statements made by the Prime Minister on December 13 last. I assumed that my right hon. friend would bring this report forward to-day in the form of a motion expressing the approval of this House of the report and the proceedings of the conference of 1926. When he spoke in this chamber on the 13th of December last he declared that he would do so: he meant to bring the report here and ask this House to confirm and approve it. But in the interval he has changed his mind for some mysterious reason best known to himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I give my hon. friend the reason?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not just now. I do not want to be interrupted and I do not want to be discourteous either; but I myself do not interrupt and I do not like to be interrupted. For some mysterious reason best known to himself, which he did not give the House to-day, the Prime Minister has changed his method of procedure. He does not now ask parliament to approve this report. As I listened with the greatest respect and with the greatest attention to his remarks this afternoon I gathered that in his view all the consent, or assent, or approval, which this parliament need give had already been given by the Prime Minister when he supported the motion in the Imperial conference which carried the report. I must dissent entirely from that position. I submit to my right hon. friend and to the Minister of Justice that they never were authorized by this country or this parliament to go to the conference for any other purpose than to confer, to advise, and to consult, and the Prime Minister had not the power, nor had his Minister of Justice, nor had either or both of them, to commit this parliament or this country to a single proposal, and it cannot be done to-day save through the action of this House. It has always been laid down in this House, and I think in the conference itself, that all proceedings at these conferences are purely advisory.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And my hon. friend the Minister of Justice interjects the remark "hear, hear".

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a truism surely.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does he agree with me in that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does he agree that this parliament has not in any way, shape or form been committed upon the report of the conference?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then why the discussion this afternoon? Why take up the time of parliament further if approval of parliament is not asked by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and will not be asked by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was not taken up in the British parliament.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not discussing the action of the British parliament. I am talking of the action of this government, and of the statement made by the Prime Minister in this House on the 13th December last that this matter would be brought up, a report laid before parliament, and the approval of parliament sought. That has not been done. It should have been done; and I entirely dissent from the proposal that we in this country or in this parliament can be committed in any degree whatever by the action of the Prime Minister and his cabinet in a matter of this kind. I mention this particularly now in view of what took place at the conference of 1923. The danger of the situation is that unless we do take some definite action in regard to these proposals, as time goes on we may be taken to have acquiesced in them whether we have done so or not. That is precisely the difficulty in which we find ourselves in regard to the conference of 1923. In the conference of 1923 certain recommendations were made in regard to the negotiation and the ratification of treaties and carried unanimously. That conference was attended by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and by the then Minister of Justice, Sir Lomer Gouin. They heard the resolution in regard to treaties read and discussed at the conference; they both voted for it, at least they did not dissent, because the report says it was carried unanimously; but it has never been laid before this House for approval or adoption. What are the words of the resolution itself? It says:

> The conference recommends for the acceptance of the governments of the empire represented, that the following procedure should be observed in the negotiation, signature and ratification of international agreements.

It recommends "for the acceptance of the governments concerned." Parliament has never approved that resolution. Is it possible that the government has approved it? Because "government" is the word used in the resolution. Is it possible that an order in council has been passed by this government, of which parliament knows nothing, approving the resolution in respect of treaties passed in 1923? I do not think that any order in council has been passed. I do not think the government has ever approved the resolution of 1923. I am sure the House has never approved it. Now the difficulty is this: We have acted upon that resolution without approval. It may be said we have adopted it, and I think we should be very careful that we are not involved in the same manner in the present instance. In the year 1924, and again I think in the year 1925, treaties have been ratified and signed in accordance with that resolution passed at the conference of 1923, which was not to come into force until it was accepted by the governments of the self-governing dominions. This government has never accepted it so far as I know, but we have acted upon it and consequently we will be held to have ratified it.

Now I think my right hon. friend realizes that if we simply discuss the present resolution, if parliament takes no action upon it, if we allow it to lie upon the table without dissenting, we will be held, as the years go on, to have acquiesced in it and to be bound by it. I propose then to offer formal dissent, to make clear that this parliament has not approved of it and is not bound by it. I submit that the principle that ministers are entitled to go to these conferences and in any way commit this country is absolutely untenable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No man could have made it plainer than the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier did in the conference of 1902, again in 1907, and again in 1911, when he even objected to the change of the name from "Imperial conference" to "Imperial council." He said the words "Imperial council" might imply a body which has some power to enact or to legislate. He dissented from that idea altogether, and made his dissent very marked and very plain. No one has ever considered, from his day down to the present time, that the mere reports of these conferences, although unanimously passed, committed anybody until they had been expressly approved by parliament.

My right hon. friend has brought this matter up in such a way that it is difficult to express ourselves without being charged with partisanship in so doing. No one knows better than my right hon. friend that any motion we may make, by way of amendment to the motion now before the chair, is a motion of want of confidence in this government; and nobody knows better than my right hon. friend that he can successfully stifle free discussion and the expression of free opinion on this question by simply saying to his followers behind him, "This is a want of confidence amendment and must be voted down." He has taken a strangely inappropriate opportunity to consider this question in an absolutely unpartisan manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wishes to bring in a motion, I will undertake to say on behalf of the government that we shall not regard it as a want of confidence motion?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Whether he so regards it or not, it is, and it would be an amendment to a motion to go into supply. I think, however, my right right hon. friend in his speech in the House to-day has discussed this question upon fairly broad principles and has so far as he possibly could, avoided that taint of partisanship which he is always inclined to impute to this side of the House in our discussions and as he did impute to me when I discussed this matter in December last. I will discuss this question upon just as high a plane and upon a plane just as nonpartisan as has my right hon. friend, and in the remarks which I propose to offer upon this matter I shall have no regard whatever to party politics. I shall have regard only for the well-being, present and future, as I see it, of the Dominion of Canada. It may be that many will be in absolute disagreement with the propositions which I propose to lay before this chamber before I conclude my remarks; but I am convinced that I am right in the view which I hold, and I discern in this proposal elements of the gravest danger to this country, although not perhaps in the immediate future. I do not say that serious dangers exists to-day; but what I fear in this report is that it opens the door to future possibilities which may end in serious consequences to this country and the time to avoid and to check the possibilities of future trouble is now.

The difficulty could have been avoided very easily by the insertion of a few words in this report. Had the Prime Minister and his colleague the Minister of Justice fully appreciated the whole matter involved in this report, a slight limitation or reservation in respect of Canada might have saved the situation. I do not for one moment say that the whole report is open to objection, far from it. In regard to most of it, I heartily agree with the Prime Minister. I could go over many of the statements which he has made to the House this afternoon, and in regard to them I would have to express my full accord. Nor do I take issue with his remarks in regard to equality of status; I agree with him on that point. To my mind he laboured the question of equal status far too much in his speech this afternoon. We have always asserted an equality of status for this country; whether our assertion has at all times been well founded or not is another question. We have at all times during my public life proclaimed it; we rejoice in it and we desire to maintain it. But any proposal which by any possibility may interfere in the future with the special conditions and circumstances which exist between peoples and provinces in this country we must avoid.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, before the six o'clock adjournment, while discussing the report of the Imperial conference of 1923, I had stated that that report had never been adopted by this House. I must express my thanks to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) for having drawn to my attention that during the closing days of the last session of parliament a resolution was submitted to this House, which was adopted, approving of the resolution of the conference of 1923. I had looked through the records for 1924 and 1925, but I had not looked through those for the year 1926. I find, however, that during the last week of the last session the report of the conference of 1923 was formally adopted by a resolution of this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I think he is mistaken. What was adopted was that particular part of the report which related to the signature, negotiation and ratification of treaties, but the report itself as a whole was not submitted to parliament.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is the resolution I was discussing this afternoon, which was made subject to the ratification of the governments of the various dominions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That one resolution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My point was that it had never been adopted, although we had acted upon it in regard to one or two treaties. For some reason or other, at the close of last session it was thought necessary to bring in a resolution to adopt that particular resolution of the Imperial conference of 1923. If it was necessary to do so on that occasion, is it not far more necessary on the present occasion that a similar course should be taken by this House to adopt the much more important report which is now before us for consideration? Why, Sir, as I read the reports of the former Imperial conferences they fade into insignificance in contrast with the report of the last conference. The former reports deal with matters of minor interest as compared with the pronouncements made by the conference of 1926. In none of the former reports was there any recommendation which one might consider a recommendation for any constitutional change. But in this instance by the language of the report itself constitutional principles are discussed and recommendations are made involving what one must pronounce to be grave constitutional changes in this country.

Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a time when definite action should be taken by parliament in regard to an Imperial conference report that time is now. Indeed, so various have been the statements made and the opinions expressed in regard to this report by ministers who actually took part in the conference as representatives of this country and by others who represented other parts of the British Empire, so various and so diversified have been the expressions of opinion in regard to what the conference actually did, that the public of this country has no clear idea of what actually took place from what has been actually reported. I place side by side the statements made by three of the prime ministers who attended the conference of 1926. First, I take the statement made by the Prime Minister of Australia when he was in Canada in January last as reported in the press at the time. He said:

> There is nothing really new in the status or relations of the British dominions as a result of the recent conference. The rights now enjoyed have existed ever since the termination of the war.

That is clear and distinct language which we all understand. Then I compare with that the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister made in this House on December 13 last, when he said:

> I believe the work of this conference will take its place in history by the side of those great charters which have stood in one form or another for a larger freedom.

Next I place side by side with that the statement attributed to the Prime Minister of South Africa, who said:

> The British Empire now exists as a name only.

When three of the participants in conference make statements so irreconcilable as those which I have just read, it is little wonder that the public in this country and perhaps in other parts of the British world are at a loss to know what actually did take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to mislead the House as to what I said or the significance of it. He has read a part only of what I said. I stated that the resemblance to the charters of a larger freedom lay in the fact that none of them purported to set forth anything that was new, but rather to register the point that had been attained—exactly the same meaning and intent as that conveyed by the reference of the hon. Prime Minister of Australia, which my hon. friend has read.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is a very different statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The language can mean only one thing, that this larger freedom of which the Prime Minister speaks is a new acquisition to the self-governing powers of this country, or something to this effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend do me the justice of reading the remainder of that statement, and not take a part of one sentence and separate it from its context?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will inform my right hon. friend through you, Mr. Speaker, that the statement is to be found in full in Hansard of December 13 last, and that the quotation which I have read is accurate. I think, Sir, with such a diversity of opinion as I have described it becomes necessary to examine somewhat critically the actual report of the conference, and in doing so I assume that one may attach the ordinary meaning to plain English words. There is one thing to be said about this report, the preliminary part of it at all events, that it uses very plain and very precise language, and from the language of the introduction one can gather that the report deals not only with fundamental principles affecting the relations of the various parts of the British Empire inter se, but also the relations of each part to foreign countries. It is an inclusive report. It deals not only with inter-imperial relations, but also with the the relations of this Dominion and of the other dominions with foreign countries.

Now, what are the definite pronouncements of the report? The first is that the dominions are autonomous communities. I assume that means that we enjoy full and complete rights of self-government. I do not know that I could amplify that statement better than by a quotation from a speech made on December 13 last by my right hon. friend, which will be found at page 43 of Hansard. He said:

> With regard to the domestic and external affairs of this Dominion, the Imperial conference has said that in the opinion of its members those rights of control are just as full and complete with respect to Canadian affairs as are the rights of the British government in respect of the domestic or external affairs of Great Britain.

We know that the rights of Great Britain with regard to external and internal affairs are absolute, full and complete. So we may assume from the clear statement in the report that we are autonomous communities and that our rights in regard to both external and internal affairs are full, absolute and complete.

Next there is a definite pronouncement of equal status. My right hon. friend and I are agreed upon that point. I think we all understand the meaning of the expression, "We have equal status."

Next we have a declaration that we are in no way subordinate to one another. That is, this Dominion is not subordinate to any of our sister dominions, neither are we in any way subordinate to the parliament or government of Great Britain.

A little lower down we find another very precise declaration:

> Every self-governing member of the empire is now the master of its destiny. In fact, if not always in form, it is subject to no compulsion whatever.

I doubt if more inclusive and more conclusive language could be used to express the meaning intended to be conveyed than is employed in these declarations. Autonomous communities—of equal status—subject to no subordination—masters of our own destiny—subject to no power of compulsion. These are the main declarations of the conference in regard to the constitutional position of this country. The language is clear, definite and precise, and it refers both to our internal and to our external rights and authority.

Keeping that language prominently in view, let us pass to the next question which was discussed by my right hon. friend this afternoon, and upon which he and I are, I think, again in pretty close agreement. He next referred to the right of disallowance of Canadian Acts on the part of the government of Great Britain as enacted in section 56 of the British North America Act, and also the right of reservation of a bill for the signification of the royal pleasure as enacted in section 57 of the British North America Act. My right hon. friend has expressed an opinion to-day in respect to both these sections in which I concur. I regard both of these sections to-day as inoperative. I think only on a single occasion in the last sixty years has an act of the parliament of Canada been disallowed by the British government. I believe also that only some fifteen bills have ever been reserved for the signification of the royal pleasure, and of these only one has failed to obtain the royal assent. But sections 56 and 57 still exist unrepealed in the British North America Act, they still constitute the letter of the law. Around them, however, has grown up constitutional practice and constitutional custom —which have actually superseded them in practice. I make this statement on pretty strong constitutional authority, and among other authorities, may I cite Sir Robert Borden, an outstanding constitutional lawyer in this country. He has stated in his brief work, Constitutional Government in Canada, that these sections of the British North America Act are practically inoperative to-day and that no government of Great Britain would dare—I do not think he used the word "dare"—that no government of Great Britain would at this late day advise His Majesty to disallow an act of the Canadian parliament in regard to our own affairs, nor would such an act of this parliament ever be reserved for consideration before receiving the royal assent. The letter of the law is still in the act; the strict legal right still exists, but the constitutional right has overridden it, and, as expressed in much better language by Earl Balfour in the House of Lords, quoted in this House this afternoon, "the constitutional right is the right which prevails." Consequently I am in agreement with my right hon. friend when I say that we are not greatly concerned with these particular sections in regard to disallowance or reservation of acts of this parliament in regard to our own affairs. Those sections are inoperative and will never be called into operation again in regard to any measures pertaining to the domestic or internal affairs of this country. No British government would ever advise the disallowance of a Canadian Act and, if it did, a very serious situation would prevail, as stated by my right hon friend this afternoon, in which view I entirely concur. Consequently I am not much concerned with this aspect of the matter. The report makes direct mention of it, and I agree that the reason for alluding to this question in this report was due to the peculiar situation that exists in the Irish Free State and possibly, as well, the situation that obtains in South Africa. Now the right of reservation has been distinctly retained in the report where that right occurs in constitutional acts; not so with regard to the right of disallowance. That has not been retained. The section in question in the report refers only to the right of reservation. There has been referred to a committee of experts, to be set up hereafter, both the question in regard to disallowance and the question concerning the right of reservation. These experts will, I have no doubt, meet at some time in the future and report upon these questions, but we in this country need have little concern with any report they may make. I submit that so far as this parliament and this country are concerned, these rights of disallowance and reservation are gone; they are fallen into desuetude. On that point I think we are all agreed.

Let me go a step further. The next question touched upon by my right hon. friend was that of appeals to the Judicial committee of the Privy Council, and in that connection he at once enters upon a discussion of constitutional principles involving constitutional alterations—modifications in the constitution of the country of very far reaching consequence. It is, I submit, now and always has been, the inherent right of a British subject in any part of the world to bring his complaint or grievance to the foot of the throne. Such is the popular language in which this special right is always expressed. Some seventy or eighty years ago an act was passed by the parliament of Great Britain constituting the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as the final tribunal for the settlement of claims and disputes within the empire, and the bringing of petitions for the redress of grievances to the foot of the throne in practice now means an appeal to that tribunal, the court of final resort in the British Empire. We as British subjects have always enjoyed the privilege of bringing our complaints to the foot of the throne, for, as I say, that is our inherent right. It applies to British citizens throughout the world. According to this report, however, this parliament is now authorized, if we see fit, to prohibit appeals by the citizens of Canada to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the future. Let me read the exact paragraph in the report touching upon this question. It is to be found at page 16:

> Another matter which we discussed, in which a general constitutional principle was raised,—

Note the language; a general constitutional principle was raised.

> —concerned the conditions governing appeals from judgments in the dominions to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. From these discussions it became clear that it was no part of the policy of His Majesty's government in Great Britain that questions affecting judicial appeals should be determined otherwise than in accordance with the wishes of the part of the empire primarily affected.

I think, from the statement made by my right hon. friend this afternoon, that he and I are in perfect agreement in our views on this point, and if I understand the meaning of the language I have just read it is simply this, that if it be the will of the parliament of Canada that appeals to the Judicial Commitee of the Privy Council be abolished our will shall prevail. If we pass an act through this House and the Senate to abolish such appeals, such appeals shall no longer be permitted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In federal matters, yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no limitation here concerning federal matters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows that is what it means.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think it does mean appeals in federal matters. It applies to the appeal of any subject on any question. If we abolish appeals we abolish them in toto. We are given the power if we choose to exercise it. I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to this matter; personally I am not in favour of the abolition of these appeals, but there is no doubt that this parliament now has power under this report to abolish them if it so desires. I agree that in a dominion which has full powers of self government, with absolute and complete control over its internal and external affairs, there is something anomalous in the fact that our own courts have not the final determination of our own cases. I do not know that I can do better than to use the language of Professor Berriedale Keith, a high authority upon constitutional questions, and one who was quoted with great approval by my right hon. friend this afternoon. In writing to The Outlook as recently as February 5 of this year, he says in regard to these appeals:

> Of the questions at issue, that of Privy Council appeals is theoretically simple. It is obviously absurd to declare that Canada is autonomous and an equal member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and at the same time to hold that the courts of the Dominion are unfit to do justice to an unfortunate lady who has an accident while seeking to enter a Canadian railway station, to take one of the issues recently decided by the Privy Council, overruling the Dominion courts.

And although I admit the position is anomalous, I still maintain that the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be continued. I think in this parliament undoubtedly we will maintain the right of appeal; but in years to come we may have parliaments in this country where a different opinion may prevail. We should preserve this right of appeal to the judicial committee because I believe it constitutes our greatest constitutional safeguard. The only real difficulty which arose at the conference in connection with appeals to the judicial committee was in the case of the Irish Free State, which case my right hon. friend elaborated this afternoon. In regard to appeals from the Irish Free State the whole question was postponed until the next Imperial conference, because there were special difficulties in regard to the Irish Free State which did not exist in connection with the other dominions. In this article Professor Keith goes on to show why the question of Privy Council appeals is of vital interest to the Dominion of Canada. He says:

> Secondly, if power were given to each dominion to limit or abolish appeals at pleasure, Canada would be placed in an invidious position. If she decided to permit appeals to go on, she might be held to be deliberately accepting a status of subordination derogatory to her dignity as the premier dominion in status, resources, and population; if she felt bound to stop appeals, Quebec would be deeply resentful, for Quebec sees in the Privy Council the final bulwark of her provincial autonomy and her control of her language and religion.

This is the opinion of Professor Keith, who was quoted with such approval this afternoon by my right hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What authority has he to speak for Quebec?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He has pointed out in the quotation I have just read the importance of these appeals in regard to the constitution of this country. First I point out that in the language of the report itself, the proposed change involves a change of constitutional principle, and I am one of those who believe that there should be no constitutional changes in this country until the proper parties assent thereto.

What may this proposal ultimately involve? I cited an instance last December in my speech which I might give again. If we remove the right of appeal to the Privy Council, in regard to domestic matters this parliament will certainly be all-powerful. Five years hence, ten years, or a generation hence, when the personnel of this House will perhaps have entirely changed, when new men with new ideas occupy these seats, what is to hinder a constitutional change of a very radical kind, if there be no appeal to the Privy Council? If the right of appeal to the Privy Council were abolished to-day I see no reason why this parliament could not pass a law to abolish the use of the French language in this chamber, and I will tell you how it might be done. We would simply have to pass a motion to change the rules—as a few days ago we passed a motion to change other rules for this parliament—to provide that the French language should not be used in the debates in this chamber. It will be immediately said that the question would at once be taken to the courts but with a favourable House of Commons and Senate we might pass an act prohibiting any action being taken in the courts. This has been done before; it was done under the War Measures Act and it has been done on two occasions in the province of Ontario. We have the undoubted right to do so. I do not say that we could do so with great propriety, but we would have the right to do it; there would be no appeal to the Privy Council to check us; there would be no power to disallow our motion or our rule, so that we could act without hindrance. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the House, that the outstanding safeguard of the constitutional rights of the people of this country in many respects is to be found in the appeal which lies to the Judicial Commitee of the Privy Council, and this report enables this parliament to abolish these appeals should it ever see fit to do so. Should we have such power? Should we be able in this parliament to change the constitution of the country in this manner? We have never possessed such a right up to the present time. Australia is expressly given power to change its constitution; so are South Africa, the Irish Free State, New Zealand and even the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. The first enactment of section 93, subsection 1, gives each province of Canada the right to change its constitution save in one respect, that pertaining to the office of lieutenant governor. We possess no such power in this parliament: Why was that power withheld? We know the reason; we know that confederation in this country was brought about by agreement and through a spirit of compromise; we know, and the fathers of confederation well knew, that there existed two great predominant races in Canada, the English race and the French race, with different ideals, different languages and to a large extent different religious views. These two great races had to be brought together and harmonized to make a united Canada. It was the spirit of compromise which brought about confederation. The fathers of confederation saw to it that there should be no power in the constitutional act of this country which might enable those coming generations or centuries later to alter the basic terms of the confederation agreement. That is the reason why this parliament was not given power to amend the act of confederation.

But my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have brought back a report, involving important changes in constitutional principles, particularly in respect of appeals to the judicial committee, a report which would enable this House to destroy the greatest constitutional safeguard enjoyed by minorities in this country. Have the provinces who originally formed confederation been consulted in regard to this proposal? Should any serious change in our constitution be permitted without the approval of the parties who originally executed the agreement which formed the basis of confederation? To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most serious proposals brought before this parliament in a generation. It is a most dangerous power. Not perhaps to-day—I am not afraid of the situation in Canada to-day—but a time will come when we will be gone from the scene. The opportunity may then be at hand for some succeeding parliament to undo by a single act much of the good work which has been accomplished during the past sixty years. Why then permit this important proposal of this report to go unchallenged in this House? Why not submit it directly to the parties most interested, to the provinces of the Dominion of Canada who made the original agreement? Is this entirely a dominion affair, think you, Mr. Speaker? Is it not well known that appeals nowadays are very often taken directly from provincial courts to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that they never approach the Supreme Court of Canada at all? Does this proposal not interfere to some extent with the rights of our citizens in the various provinces of Canada who do not desire to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but who prefer to appeal directly from the courts in the provinces to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? The provinces have never been consulted in regard to this proposal. The provinces were not represented at the Imperial conference. Yet this report, brought back to us by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Justice, might enable us by act of this parliament, without consultation with the provinces, to destroy this great safeguard of constitutional right in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is one aspect of this report which most deeply impresses me. I feel gravely concerned about it. I know that in many sections of this country there is great concern about it. If we may alter special provisions in our constitution in one regard we may do so in other regards. There are many anomalous conditions in our constitution to-day. The country has developed upon somewhat different lines than was anticipated at first. It is alleged that in some respects there is over-representation in one of the chambers of this parliament in regard to certain provinces of the Dominion. If we are able of our own motion to abolish appeals to the Privy Council, and if there be no power of disallowance of our acts, what is to hinder this parliament from changing the constitution of this parliament in regard to representation in the upper house—a domestic matter, an internal matter, something that does not interfere with a single interest outside the Dominion of Canada? Who can say us nay? Are we not masters in our own house? Are we subordinate to any power whatever? Have we not full autonomous powers of government in this country? Then who shall say us nay? The Minister of Justice will of course argue that the British North America Act still stands, that it has not been repealed. But what authority is there to enforce it? I ask him that question. If there be no appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, what super-authority exists over our legislation? Trouble would at once arise if the government of Great Britain sought to interfere. It would never attempt to do so. The British government acts upon constitutional principle. It would never interfere with the exercise of a constitutional right of this country, and the British government itself has joined in sending this report forward to us.

There are other elements in connection with this report that will require some consideration. We have already gone pretty far in regard to the question of treaties during the last sixty years in this country. I do not object to it, but the difficulty I see is this: where is it going to land us? I am and have always been a strong supporter of the proposal that Canada should have the right to negotiate her own commercial treaties; but when we reached the time of the war we went far beyond the negotiation of commercial treaties. We engaged as a nation in the negotiation of the treaty of Versailles, one of the greatest peace treaties ever known in the history of the world. The question is, have we gone too far? Does the House realize that we have no authority to make treaties under the British North America Act? Section 132 of that act enables us to perform all treaty obligations entered into by Great Britain. That is the last enactment on the subject. We have no statutory power to make treaties, but we have gone ahead making them. How much further are we to go in this respect without consulting the provinces? The making of treaties may some day involve us in very, very serious consequences. I do not mean trade treaties, I mean other treaties. We may seriously involve provinces by our treaty making propensities. Let me cite a case which has occurred to my mind. Suppose this government should undertake to negotiate a treaty with Japan, a foreign nation. Suppose we were to grant to Japan lands which are owned by Canada in the railway belt in British Columbia, for settlement or otherwise, and that a protest should come from British Columbia to the effect that we have no power under the British North America Act or under any other act to make such a treaty. Well, our only power is that given in the report of the conference of 1923 and the conference of 1926, and we might act to the detriment of the rights of British Columbia. We might do likewise in regard to the inland fisheries of Ontario if we so desired; we might make a treaty with United States. Ontario might protest, but we could go on and make the treaty. All this involves a very serious change in the constitutional development of this country. I do not say it is a wrong, I uphold it; but at the same time do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that we should have the approval of the provinces in regard to these matters before we proceed much further?

There is a demand in this country which has arisen very largely on account of the report of the conference of 1926, a demand founded in my mind on a misapprehension, but a demand voiced very largely by some of the newspapers which give very strong support to the present government, that Canada take power to amend our constitution, I take the instance of the Manitoba Free Press, I quote one or two of the very clever and well considered editorials which have appeared in that well known Liberal journal in regard to the question of the amendment of the Canadian constitution, and I say that if these views here expressed are prevalent in this country it is time something was done to check them. Such views are bound in the end to lead this country into difficulties. In the Manitoba Free Press of the 23rd of November last I find an editorial headed "The Charter of Dominion Independence", which reads as follows:

The declaration by the Imperial conference as to the true relationship between the British nations appears to meet the situation created by the necessity of meeting the demands of the dominions, at least of some of them, that there be a formal and explicit recognition by definition of their complete equality with Great Britain in powers of self-government both with respect to external and internal affairs. The conference is not a legislative body; but, representative as it is of all the governments of the empire, its expression of opinion as to the powers of the dominions means that any dominion which cares to do so can now go forward in the exercise of full powers with the certainty that all legal checks will be removed.

All legal checks removed!

It imposes upon the British parliament an obligation to coöperate with the dominions in the removal of all anomalies which prevent the full functioning of dominion powers.

This point can be illustrated by a reference to Privy Council appeals. The resolution affirms that appeals should only be allowed where the dominion is a consenting party; this is not legally the case now. The judicial committee of the Privy Council has held that Canada has no power in law to prohibit appeals in criminal cases as she sought to do by legislation passed nearly forty years ago. Similarly in the Admiralty courts the Canadian laws with regard to shipping are found to be subordinate to the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain. On these and similar points it will be necessary for the British parliament to remove the legal bar against free action by the dominions. We assume that the appointment of the committee by the conference to consider this needed legislation is preparatory to this being done. Once this is done the situation as between the dominions and Britain will be this: That while in its technical terms the British parliament will retain its overlordship, no legislation by the British parliament, past, present or future, will apply in any dominion without its formal consent. The division in authority is so complete in fact that the formal enfranchisement of the dominion parliaments would go no further; and presumably this final step can be taken by each dominion at will. But before this can be done by Canada, we must settle some domestic questions, notably, by what means we are to amend our constitution?

I quote also from the same paper under date of December 8, 1926:

The question of how the constitution of Canada is hereafter to be amended, which has not been given the consideration which its importance calls for, will now require attention in view of the situation which arises as the result of the constitutional declaration by the Imperial conference.

I quote another extract taken again from the Manitoba Free Press under date of January 5, 1927. It is headed "Amending our Constitution", and it reads:

Recent articles in the Free Press urging the necessity for obtaining machinery whereby Canada can amend her own constitution, have drawn angry comments from a number of Quebec papers, including the Patrie and Action Catholique. The anger does not matter; the important thing is that there is recognition, even though unwilling, of the facts of the situation. The Free Press has pointed out the desirability, from the viewpoint of the interests of the provinces and of the racial and religious minority, that Canada should take over the power of amending her constitution upon conditions which would supply reasonable safeguards for these interests. We can see in these suggestions nothing to support the fears, to which the Patrie and other Quebec journals give expression, that with the amending power vested in Canada the privileges, linguistic and religious, of the minority will be in danger from the majority. It is, in fact, just the other way about. As matters now stand the protection which the minority thinks it enjoys is non-existent; and in suggesting that it be restored by a reasonable agreement between the Dominion and the provinces, to be determined by conference, the Free Press is certainly not conspiring against the rights of the minority.

It will be seen at a glance from the extracts which I have just read that the theory of a good many people in this country is that under this conference report we now have power to amend our constitution. I submit that we have no such power; but if we are to proceed to abolish appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the thin end of the wedge will certainly enter into the body politic. I cannot agree to the proposal that Canada be given that power; I distinctly dissent from it. I notice an article copied in the Winnipeg Free Press from La Presse of Montreal and I am going to put it on Hansard. It reads:

Think this over: What will become of the guarantees we enjoy under confederation when the Canadian parliament becomes absolutely supreme in the country, and when, as a result, the British parliament will have no control over the Dominion?

The Canadian parliament, if it so wishes, will have the absolute implicit right to change, prune and amend our constitution. Defenceless, and with no means of redress, we will be obliged to give way before the will of the majority.

In the light of past experiences, is it not right to ask whether the objective sought by some, at least, of the more vehement supporters of this theory is to wield the supreme control, exercised without right of appeal, in order to bring into effect certain aims which they have cherished for many years?

This must give us to think and must also convince us that we should not sacrifice too much for the sake of this fashionable recklessness.

Mere words are sometimes an extremely dangerous form of payment. They provide no funds with which to pay back what has been taken.

The view of La Presse is to a large extent re-echoed in the language used not long ago by the premier of Quebec in the legislature of that province. I quote from the speech of Premier Taschereau as reported in the volume of the Round Table for March current where he says:

What does the future hold for us? I do not know, but I pray the men who direct our affairs at Ottawa, and I am sure that it is their view also, to remember that the constitution which rules us must never be changed without the consent of the province of Quebec and of each province, expressed by its legislation.

We entered into confederation on certain conditions which we believed necessary for the safeguarding of all that is dear to us, such as language, schools, laws, belief, and provincial autonomy. One of the clauses of the federal pact is that the Canadian constitution cannot be changed in its essential parts without the assent of the British government. I believe that this very necessary condition may be even more necessary to-day than it was in 1867.

I am endeavouring to impress upon hon. members as best I can the seriousness of the protest which I make. I protest in the first place that this parliament should in no sense ratify this report without amendment. I protest in the second place that no constitutional changes should be permitted under this report or otherwise unless they have first been approved by the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. Let me repeat what I said at the outset. So far as the larger part of this report goes, I entirely agree; I do not express an adverse opinion in regard to any of it, more than to say that I fear it will leave the door open in the future for complications which we little estimate to-day.

I fear that a time may come when opinion in this country may change and another generation may seek to pass through this parliament legislation which may ultimately disrupt this dominion. We cannot judge of the future by the present. We will soon all pass from this scene. Our children or our children's children may be here. My most earnest desire is to preserve in this country a united Canada. We have now lived for sixty years under our present constitutional charter; we have had our little squabbles, it is true, but they have never amounted to very much. We have had no real difficulty in working out our destiny. Why then introduce changes? Why introduce the possibility of trouble in the future? Why not stamp with our disapproval that portion of this report which opens the door to constitutional change? Why not place in the report a saving clause in reference to this Dominion? The situation in this country is not like the situation in Australia. In Australia they have nothing to fear from this report. Australia can accept it in full. Premier Bruce, when he was in this country, emphasized the fact that in Australia 98 per cent of the people were of Anglo-Saxon extraction. He and his people have nothing to fear from this report.

We in this country have a different situation to face. We realize our peculiar situation in this chamber and throughout Canada. Let us have strict regard to the original contract which brought this confederation into being. Let us stand by those principles. I am not one of those who say that there shall be no change. Changes are bound to come, but let them come in the proper way. Let them come with the approval and consent of the people who made the original bargain and the people who in the final determination should be consulted in regard to a measure of this kind. I therefore beg to move, seconded by Sir George Perley:

That all the words after "that' in the motion be struck out and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

That it is not desirable that this House should be deemed tacitly to have acquiesced in the declarations and recommendations contained in the report of the proceedings of the Imperial Conference, 1926.

That in the opinion of this House the proceedings of the recent Imperial conference and the declarations and recommendations contained in the report of the Imperial Conference Committee on Inter-Imperial Relations should not be binding upon the parliament of Canada until approved by a formal resolution of this House; and that until such approval is obtained this government shall not be deemed to be authorized to take any steps to carry into effect the recommendations contained in said report;

That it is also the opinion of this House that no amendments should be procured to the British North America Act to give effect to said report or otherwise, which would affect the rights, powers or privileges of all or any of the provinces of Canada, as they now exist under the terms of said act, unless the same are first approved by the legislature of each of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed, I hope, to compliment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) upon the high tone that he has given to the debate on this important question. Once more I find myself in the somewhat difficult position, though I rather like it, of agreeing partly with the Prime Minister and partly with the leader of the opposition, but largely disagreeing with both.

On one point, first, I entirely agree with the Prime Minister, in his repentant attitude with regard to the position which the government has taken, or might have taken, on this report. The leader of the opposition blames the government for not having brought in a formal resolution of approval of the report; but I think he has furnished much argument to justify the government in not asking the House to approve the report. As far as I am concerned I thank the government for having left me in the happy position of not having to vote either in approval or disapproval of this report; because, although it contains much that appeals to all of us and a good deal that will appeal to some of us, it also contains a good deal that should be condemned by most.

A learned foreign observer of things British and Canadian, Mr. Lawrence Lowell, has recently expressed the view that one of the interesting features of this conference and of its report is that it at once satisfies those who advocate a distention of the bonds of empire as between Great Britain and her self-governing dominions, and also those who wish to see those bonds strengthened. He might equally well have said that it dissatisfies both those who look to complete independence as the desirable future of the dominions, and those who look to a closer and permanent coöperation. In fact, a careful reading of the report shows that the one concentrating thought upon which all the members of the conference agreed was to put therein something to satisfy everybody, and if possible nothing to dissatisfy anybody—a pretty heavy task even for a body like the Imperial conference, and headed by such a master of casuistry as Lord Balfour as he was aptly described this afternoon by my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan).

Another reason for which I think it would not have been proper to propose to this House a formal motion of approval of this conference is that, unlike most similar documents, it contains very few concrete propositions. It is more of a dissertation upon the various subjects submitted to the conference; it is an expression of collective opinion, the supposed consensus of thought of the representatives of Great Britain and of the various self-governing dominions who conversed together behind closed doors during five weeks. But in the absence of any concrete resolution on the basic principles at issue, in the absence also of the expression of opinions given by the various representatives, I do not see how we can be expected to pass judgment upon the findings of the conference.

At the previous conference the present Prime Minister of Canada advocated the necessity of, or at all events the great advantage to be derived from, more publicity being given to the deliberations of the conference. I fail to find, either in this summary of proceedings or in the big volume of appendices which was published afterwards, that the same request was made this year by any member of the conference. The result is that we do not know the personal views expressed either by the representatives of Great Britain, or those of Australia or Canada, and so forth. I quite understand, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, that with regard to foreign affairs, with regard to those intricate and delicate matters forming the subject of negotiation between the British government and foreign governments the world over, it would not have been proper to publish at once all that was given out before the conference either by Mr. Chamberlain or the other representatives of the Foreign Office who attended the conference. But with regard to those questions concerning the relations between Great Britain and the various dominions, with regard to principles of policy, with regard to the negotiation of treaties, and so forth, I fail to see why we should not be informed of the views that were expressed there by the representatives of Great Britain, of Australia, of Canada, of South Africa and of Ireland. Nobody can believe that they all expressed the same views on all of these principles, on all aspects of all the various questions at issue, and on the solutions proposed for these problems. It is therefore impossible for the various parliaments of the empire to pass judgment on the attitude of their representatives at that conference without knowing the particular attitude that was taken by each of them in those deliberations.

Let us take first the passage which has been mostly commented upon, not only in the various countries immediately concerned—Great Britain and the self-governing dominions—but all over the world. I mean the passage in reference to the constitutional relations between Great Britain and those dominions. I happened to be on the ocean coming back from Italy to America when this report was issued; and in the short summary of despatches given out on the ship every day a paragraph was wired from London or Paris or Berlin—I am not quite sure which, but evidently from an international news agency—giving out a summary of this report. It was all centred upon the declaration of equality of status; and it was mentioned in a couple of lines that it signified a deep change in the internal organization of the British Empire, and therefore in its relations with the outside world. Naturally it interested me very much; but knowing something of what had been going on in previous conferences, and also something of the work which preceded this conference, I remained rather skeptical and landed in New York with the idea that probably a publication of the whole report would demonstrate that there had not been such a radical revolution. I knew enough of British traditions to feel certain that matters of great concern to the British Empire are not dealt with in this manner.

So I began studying the report. The Prime Minister has spared me the task and the House the annoyance of having it read once more. I will content myself with repeating the main paragraph dealing with the present relations of Great Britain and the dominions:

Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Then it goes on:

A foreigner endeavouring to understand the true character of the British Empire by the aid of this formula alone would be tempted to think that it was devised rather to make mutual interference impossible than to make mutual coöperation easy.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I venture to express the view that not only a foreigner, but even a Britisher, even a close student of British history and the British constitution, if he stops at studying closely this formula, may feel somewhat puzzled as to its real meaning.

Let us deal first with the nucleus of the formula—the declaration of "equality of status," which has been mostly talked of, either favourably or unfavourably. I need not tell the House that, as stated by the leader of the opposition, in his excellent and interesting speech, there is nothing new in this declaration, although I understood at first that he took exception to it. May I point out, however, that far from being a new principle introduced in the internal relations of the self-governing countries of the empire, it is the logical and unavoidable outcome of the principle of self-government acknowledged to every community of free British subjects, at least as far back as the report of Lord Durham, and the natural development which that principle has taken in practice in its various applications ever since. May I quote to the House an opinion expressed in the early sixties by one of the most thoughtful and clear sighted English jurists of the last century, Sir Erskine May? In the first edition of his Constitutional History of England, which I think was published in the year 1861, after an enumeration of the facts connected with the evolution of self government in the various dominions he wrote:

To conclude this rapid summary of colonial liberties, it must be added that the colonies have further enjoyed municipal institutions, a free press, and religious freedom and equality. No liberty or franchise prized by Englishmen at home has been withheld from their fellow-countrymen in distant lands. Thus, by rapid strides, have the most considerable dependencies of the British crown advanced, through successive stages of political liberty, until an ancient monarchy has become the parent of democratic republics in all parts of the globe.

I at once call attention to the distinction drawn by May between the characteristic of the English nation and the characteristic of the daughters throughout the world—an "ancient monarchy" and new "democratic republics".

But such a transition, more or less rapid, was the inevitable consequence of responsible government, coupled with the power given to colonial assemblies, of reforming their own constitutions. The principle of self-government once recognized, has been carried out without reserve or hesitation. Hitherto there have been many failures and discouragements in the experiment of colonial democracy; yet the political future of these thriving communities affords far more ground for hope than for despondency.

England ventured to tax her colonies, and lost them: she endeavoured to rule them from Downing street, and provoked disaffection and revolt. At last, she gave freedom, and found national sympathy and contentment. But in the meantime, her colonial dependencies have grown into affiliated states. The tie which binds them to her is one of sentiment rather than authority. Commercial privileges, on either side, have been abandoned: transportation,—

Not in the sense that we understand it—the transportation of wheat, for example—but the transportation of convicts—

—for which some of the colonies were founded, has been given up: patronage has been surrendered, the disposal of public lands waived by the crown, and political dominion virtually renounced. In short, their dependence has become little more than nominal, except for purposes of military defence.

That was before confederation.

But parliament has recently,—

I think it was in the session of 1861—

Parliament has recently pronounced it to be just that the colonies which enjoy self-government should undertake the responsibility and cost of their own military defence. To carry this policy into effect must be the work of time. But whenever it may be effected, the last material bond of connection with the colonies will have been severed; and colonial states, asknowledging the honorary sovereignty of England, and fully armed for self-defence—as well against herself as others—will have grown out of the dependencies of the British Empire. They will still look to her, in time of war, for at least naval protection; and, in peace, they will continue to imitate her laws and institutions, and to glory in the proud distinction of British citizenship. On her part, England may well be prouder of the vigorous freedom of her prosperous sons, than of a hundred provinces subject to the iron rule of British pro-consuls. And, should the sole remaining ties of kindred, affection, and honour be severed, she will reflect, with just exultation, that her dominion ceased, not in oppression and bloodshed, but in the expansive energies of freedom, and the hereditary capacity of her manly offspring for the privileges of self-government.

I do not think I exaggerate when I say that these were then the prevailing sentiments among the governing classes of England, and confederation was made possible as between French and English, as stated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), and possible, as well, as between the daughter state and the motherland, just because that spirit prevailed. There was no fear expressed on the part of Great Britain because Canada would one day reach her full-fledged independence; and instead of opposing that spirit there was a feeling of pride in seeing the daughter look forward to a future just as glorious as the past of the mother country had been.

Two or three years afterwards the government of the province of United Canada undertook that very task which was considered by May, and by the English government, as the last step to be taken by a colony to become absolutely independent of the mother land: I mean the organization of its land defence. England reserved to herself the control of foreign affairs—the root cause of all wars and difficulties with foreign nations—and also the full and exclusive responsibility for the external defence of Canada by sea, the colony undertaking the defence of her land. That was the basis upon which confederation was consummated. Twenty years later, at the first Imperial conference, when for the first time this new policy of imperial coöperation was raised, Sir Alexander Campbell, the representative of the Canadian government, reminded the British ministers and the representatives of Australia, New Zealand and Cape Colony, as it then was, that the agreement which had been concluded between Canada and Great Britain was that Great Britain, by reason of her position as a world power, was bound to defend Canada on the seas at her own expense, while all that Canada had pledged herself to, as a consequence of her full internal independence, was the organization of the defence of her territory. And he repeated there and then that upon that basis confederation was entered into. If the leader of the opposition is so much concerned, as he evidenced this afternoon, about the preservation of confederation in its entirety, if he wants to preserve untouched the principles of the federal pact as between the various elements of Canada, he should also be in favour of the resurrection of that policy under which Canada would have no responsibility for any of the imperial enterprises of Great Britain as a consequence of her situation as a world power.

I took the trouble to collect some authorities to prove that throughout the course of our history since confederation until the last war, there has never been expressed in England any doubt as to the potential independence of the self-governing dominions nor as to their right to assert that independence completely at any time they may see fit. Let me quote at random an opinion of Sir Frederick Pollock, who surely was not a revolutionary radical. I have not the date, but I know that it was a good many years after May—because I remember having met Sir Frederick Pollock—that he said:

> Leave the conventions alone and look at the facts, and you find that the self-governing colonies are, in fact, separate kingdoms, having the same king as the parent group, but choosing to abrogate that part of their full autonomy which relates to foreign affairs. . . . The sovereignty is a figment; the states of the empire stand on an equal footing.

Take next the opinion of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, whom nobody has ever charged with a tendency to disrupt the empire. In the year of the queen's jubilee, at a time when so many opinions of varying shades were being promulgated, he declared most positively in a speech delivered at Birmingham on June 21, 1897:

> The throne is the only constitutional connecting link between the colonies and ourselves. In all else these great self-governing communities are as independent as we are.

A good many years later a statesman whose name has been frequently mentioned in this debate, Lord Balfour, or, as he was at that time, Mr. Arthur Balfour, leader of the Conservative party in Great Britain, writing to The Times on February 1, 1911, said:

> I believe, from a legal point of view, the British parliament is supreme over the parliaments of Canada or Australia, or the Cape or South Africa, but in fact they are independent parliaments, absolutely independent.

Another Conservative statesman in England, Mr. Bonar Law, at that time Colonial Secretary, speaking in London on September 13, 1916, advanced precisely the same view: "These great dominions are in fact independent states".

It seems to me, therefore, there was nothing to excite public opinion one way or the other when the report came out that this conference had asserted what as a matter of fact has been the unequivocal opinion of all legal and political authorities in Great Britain during the past sixty years. Such surprise as was evinced in the Dominions was due rather to that state of mind to which Lord Balfour alluded in what I may call the conversation between himself and Lord Parmoor in the House of Lords. Truly, in the dominions, strange to say, people are less prepared for assertions of independence than they are in Great Britain. Just what the cause is I do not know. No doubt it is due in large part to that long state of subjection, shall I say, or protection, at any rate that condition of incomplete nationhood in which Canada and the other dominions have existed for so many years. The most apt comparison I can suggest is the mentality that characterized certain classes among the black population of the southern states during the war of secession. An admirable American writer, the late Thomas Nelson Page, who died as United States Ambassador to Rome, has depicted that spirit in some of his delightful novels portraying life in the southern states during and after the war of secession. Among the slaves attached to the estates of the great landowners of Virginia, who constituted the true aristocracy, the landed gentry of that country, there was a class of slaves who lived permanently with families from generation to generation. The women were the nurses—the mammies, as they were called— to the children of the family, while the men served as butlers, coachmen, and so on. They were splendidly treated, the attitude of their owners to them being in striking contrast with the conduct of the slave owners described by Harriet Beecher Stowe in Uncle Tom's Cabin; and when the war of secession came, although these slaves were not obliged to do so, they were eager to fight for their masters because of the love they bore them. That perhaps was a natural sentiment, but the peculiarity of that psychology was apparent when Lincoln launched his proclamation of freedom. It was most indignantly received by these blacks. They were loath to exercise the responsibilities of freedom. They did not want to earn their living by their own initiative; they wanted to be possessed, to be protected. They wanted to live in that happy state of semi-animal, semi-celestial irresponsibility in which they had dwelt for generations. They were therefore described by the rest of the freed negroes as "quality niggers" with whom they had nothing in common, and both classes detested each other cordially. The modern colonial imperialist who claims that he is free, and that he likes this kind of freedom, but who refuses to exercise more of that freedom, who is afraid of the responsibility which will accrue to him if he has to deal with the constitution and the laws of his country, if he has to discuss racial problems with his fellow citizens, would seem to have some of this "quality nigger" spirit. It is the only parallel I can find in history. To be frank, I must say that that spirit exists in the province of Quebec as elsewhere, and without being personal I can say that of recent days it has received its most vivid expression in the language of the premier of that province who, by the way, has been styled by the Montreal Gazette, knowing something of the matter and of the man, as a Tory of the Tories.

The evolution which is the natural and inevitable outcome of the principle of self-government, was anticipated at the time of confederation not by the radicals and not by the Liberals who opposed confederation, but by the very founders of that confederation. Take the views expressed by Sir John A. Macdonald with regard to the authority of parliament and the relations between parliament and the crown or the representative of the crown, in presenting to the House the Quebec Conference resolutions upon which the Confederation Act was founded. He then said:

> With us the sovereign, or in this country the representative of the sovereign, can act only on the advice of his ministers, those ministers being responsible to the people through parliament.

Without drawing too many red herrings across the trail, I modestly expressed the view last summer that if the late leader of the Conservative party had reminded the late governor of this short passage in our constitutional history, perhaps a good deal of misunderstanding could have been avoided. In a later speech on the same resolution, and in answer to a very able Liberal or Grit representative from Ontario, Mr. J. H. Cameron, Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> My honourable friend refers us to the language of the Constitutional Act to show how limited our constitution is; but by that act we are empowered, in the widest language that could be employed, to make laws for the peace, welfare and good government of the people of Canada. There could be no larger powers conferred upon us, and although it is quite true that our political existence is only statutory—

Mind you, those were only the dawning days of full autonomy > —that constitutionally our judges have no right to commit for contempt, and that we have no prescriptive rights such as those which the imperial parliament possesses, yet this is equally true—that we stand, with regard to the people of Canada, precisely in the same position as the House of Commons in England stands with regard to the people of England. And no man who values representative government would consent to sit here under a less extensive commission—no man will get up and disclaim the possession of such powers.

Now with regard to foreign relations, although in those days not much thought was given to foreign relations outside of purely commercial treaties, Sir John A. Macdonald, with his broad vision, his keen common sense and his true British spirit, with the smallest dose of quality niggership existing then in the minds of our statesmen, was not afraid of thinking of the establishment of foreign relations. He said:

> I am strongly of opinion that year by year, as we grow in population and strength, England will more see the advantages of maintaining the alliance between British North America and herself.

As you see, he termed the new relation between Great Britain and Canada as one of "alliance;" and to show that by that he did not mean an exclusive alliance, he added immediately:

> Does any one imagine that, when our population instead of three and a half, will be seven millions, as it will be ere many years pass, we would be one whit more willing than now to sever the connection with England? . . . . And, when, by means of this rapid increase, we become a nation of eight or nine millions of inhabitants, our alliance will be worthy of being sought by the great nations of the earth. I am proud to believe that our desire for a permanent alliance will be reciprocated in England. . . . The colonies are now in a transition state. Gradually a different colonial system is being developed—and it will become, year by year, less a case of dependence on our part, and of overruling protection on the part of the mother country, and more a case of a healthy and cordial alliance. Instead of looking upon us as a merely dependent colony, England will have in us a friendly nation—a subordinate but still a powerful people—to stand by her in North America in peace or in war.

That was sixty years ago. The objects which the founders of confederation had in view were first to establish between the new confederacy and the motherland terms of alliance on a footing of equality; then to reserve to the new confederacy the right to have terms of alliance with foreign nations; and finally to confine the military duties of Canada to the defence of her own territory as a portion of the empire, and to come to the rescue of Great Britain in North America, and nowhere else.

Undoubtedly, as was said this afternoon and as has been said very frequently in the last ten years, the participation of the dominions in the last war has hastened that evolution and has brought us nearer the goal which Sir John A. Macdonald had in view together with the other founders of confederation. We were brought nearer in a sense; but there is another point which I wish to make clear and upon which I differ just as much with one leader as with the other. The war has also distracted us from the safe path in which the founders of confederation had directed the course of Canada. While advancing the principle of equality, it also beclouded the issue of our relations with Great Britain and the other portions of the empire. That very sensible English statesman of Canadian birth, not a genius but a man of much common sense, Mr. Bonar Law, pointed out during the war how deeply changed was the basis of relationship between the motherland and the dominions. In the course of the same speech from which I quoted a sentence a moment ago he said:

> So far as the dominions are concerned, this war is being carried on under conditions which never existed in the world before, and which it is almost incredible to believe could have existed now. These great dominions are, in fact, independent states. We could not have compelled a single one of them to send a man or contribute a penny. But they have sent their best, not so much to help us as to help the empire of which they are a part.
> These conditions can never occur again. It requires great good-will and good sense on the part of both the dominions and the authorities at home to enable the arrangement to work by which one set of men contribute lives and treasures and yet have no voice as to the way in which those lives and treasure are expended. That cannot continue. There must be a change.

That was in September, 1916. A year previous he expressed the view that "after this war the relations between the dominions and the mother country could never be the same." Every thoughtful man was convinced of that. But what were to be the relations after the war?

Was it possible to combine the spirit of autonomy in a gradual evolution to the point of full independence, as was conceived at the time of confederation, and the new system of so called free coöperation which had developed first during the South African war and had come to its full amplitude in the last war? This has ever since been a directing thought of all British statesmen, whether Tories, Liberals or Labour. Their thought has been: how can we preserve the coöperation of the dominions in time of war, and get rid of them in time of peace? Because after all that is their thought, and a most natural one. In periods of peace, when the British have to deal in their diplomatic relations with all the situations on earth which you can imagine, to negotiate with all governments, they do not care to have the Canadians, the Australians, the South Africans and the Irish accompany them everywhere. In analyzing this report, I thought of the feeling which the British diplomats must have when they see the representatives of all sister nations—or as they still say between themselves, "those bloated colonials,"—coming and butting in. They have that kind of feeling which the directors of the British museum would have should half a dozen cattle drovers of the west come with their broncos to inspect their precious collections. I cannot altogether blame them. There is much robustness in the assertion of colonial thought, but there is not always in it that fine appreciation of things and it has not yet developed that scientific way of lying in a gentlemanly fashion so necessary to successful diplomacy. On the other hand, the British wish to preserve the means and the ties by which, in days of strife, they will get the men and the treasure from the dominions to help them in all their imperial enterprises. At the same time, they are prepared not only to grant us but to urge us to take all we can of our self-governing powers. In order to keep us occupied at home, they want to get rid of those political relations which may have been necessary some years ago; they are in just as much if not a greater hurry to get rid of them than we are. So if you take into account that feeling, if you take also into account the circumstances—the peculiar and very different circumstances—under which the representatives of the various dominions have to carry on their internal government and their external policies, you will readily understand that in this conference, as in every other conference, a formula had to be found without any regard to logic, without any regard to harmony of thought and purpose, but in which something had to be inserted to please everybody.

Mr. CAHAN: Without any regard to facts.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, to a large degree. I go further. I think I am justified by my knowledge of history in saying that there will never be an Imperial conference, or any political body in which the representatives of Great Britain and the various self-governing dominions meet to discuss various propositions of internal economy or external policy upon which they can agree. If they are bound to agree in formulas they must lie to each other in the expression of their thought, and also lie to the respective peoples; or if they want to tell the whole truth, if they want to express the thoughts and the aspirations of their respective peoples, they must express differences of opinion, because the conflicting interests cannot agree, because the aspirations are not the same, because differences are caused by geographical, historical and economic conditions. And so, if there is an agreement it must be a very loose agreement; it cannot cover the whole field or even a very small portion of the field of the relations which can be established between those various countries.

Let us examine the extraordinary formula contained in this report and compare it with what precedes and what follows it. We are told:

> They are autonomous communities. . . . equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs—

At the same time we are declared to be "within the empire." I never heard of an empire constituted in that manner. The idea of empire, the essence of empire, carries with it the necessity of hegemony of one nation over several other nations. That hegemony may be exercised by force, after conquest, as it was in the old classic example of the Roman Empire; as it is now in the British Empire composed of Great Britain, India, and her other subordinate colonies. Or you may have a federated empire such as the Holy Roman Germanic Empire which lasted from the ninth to the seventeenth century, or again in its new form as founded in bloodshed in 1871 by Bismarck. That was the ideal of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. That was the ideal he proposed to the free people of Canada and the various dominions, but they would not have it, and here we have the avowal that that process of a federated empire has been found impossible. But then I repeat: If Canada, Ireland, Australia and New Zealand are equal in status to Great Britain and in no way subordinate to Great Britain in any matter of war and peace, how can we form part of the empire? Where is the head of that empire? It cannot be said that it is the Imperial conference. We have had again the statement this afternoon of the Prime Minister, endorsed by that of the leader of the opposition, that that conference has no power of legislation, no power of government. It cannot define, it cannot direct, it cannot accomplish anything, except express opinions one way or the other, very often one way and the other together, then report to the various parliaments, and never ask for any approval; and that is what I like best in the attitude of the government. And yet you tell me this is one empire! Well, no. Of course there still exists a British Empire, the one I mentioned a moment ago, that one composed of England, of India, of all the subordinate colonies, of all the protectorates, of all the "mandated" countries, according to the vocabulary which diplomatic hypocrisy has adopted to define the works of plunder. But of that empire we form no part.

Mr. CAHAN: Or the "quality niggers," you are leaving them out.

Mr. BOURASSA: The "quality niggers" are not in the empire; they are nowhere. Of that empire we do not form part. In the government of that empire we have no influence whatever. In the policy imposed upon the British government by the fact that the British nation possesses one-quarter of the globe, we have nothing to say or do except to coöperate of our own free will when war is declared against her or when she declares war because of the fact that she possesses India, three-quarters of Africa, a large portion of America and most of the scattered islands on the seven seas. Because England, in her devotion to humanity, has been obliged to shoulder the white man's burden to that extent, she is frequently at war. As a matter of fact, that peaceful nation has been more frequently at war than any other in the last hundred years. Then, we are called upon to give our "free coöperation" in support of a policy in the inception of which we have no responsibility, in the conduct of which we have no participation at all, and in the results of which we have no benefits. I claim that those terms are unworthy of Great Britain, of Canada, and of those great men who in Great Britain and in Canada laid down that principle of equality which is now proclaimed to heaven but which is not followed up by acts

If we are not in Britain's empire—and nobody can claim at the present time that we are—is it true that we form part of the "commonwealth of nations," composed this time no more of the empire, but simply of Great Britain and the other self-governing dominions? I am waiting for someone in authority, either on this side or on the other side of the ocean, to define what is a "commonwealth of nations." I have heard of various forms of commonwealths. When Cromwell had beheaded Charles I and taken from parliament the bauble, he changed the definition of the kingdom into the commonwealth of England. When the puritans, not satisfied with the sanctity of the old state not yet regenerated by their brethren, went to Massachusetts to develop a more perfect form of holy government, they called their new country the commonwealth of Massachusetts. The new Australian confederacy calls itself the commonwealth of Australia. In those various forms you have either a united country with one legislature and one executive power, or a confederacy of various provinces who agree to give up some of their powers of execution and legislation in order to form one commonwealth. The word in itself tells us it is "wealth or weal put in common." How can you call by the word "commonwealth" a gathering of nations who claim that they are absolutely independent one of another; that they have the same equality of status; that none of them is subordinate to another? Of course you can call that a commonwealth because you can always adopt any word you like, but it does not correspond with anything in history or in constitutional law of which I have ever heard.

Our very learned, logical and distinguished jurist, Mr. Ewart, has had no trouble in demonstrating how that title, if anything is meant by it, cannot correspond with the claim that has been made of equality of status. I observe that one of his contradictors opposed to him the authority of Mr. Zimmern, undoubtedly a high authority on these matters, because Mr. Zimmern has made use of the expression "commonwealth of nations". He has made use of it just as, I suppose, somebody might use the expression "The king of Canada" in reference to our Prime Minister. Supposing that expression had been in use for six months, nobody, not even the right hon. gentleman himself, would believe he is the crowned head of Canada. In like manner Mr. Zimmern has spoken of the commonwealth of nations; but when he came to define the basis of the relationship between England and the self-governing dominions, how did he do it? This will be found at page 42 of his very valuable work, "The Third British Empire":

> The British Empire at the present moment is living under two distinct regimes. It has, as it were, an old skin which it is engaged in casting and a new skin which is forming as fast as the old disappears. . . . We have seen that since the war Great Britain has conceded to the dominions the right of separate membership in the League of Nations, the right of a separate diplomatic system, the right of separate negotiation and signature of treaties, and the right to decide for themselves the issues of foreign policy, including the question of peace and war.
> What is the situation resulting from the concession of these rights? Let us face the fact that, viewed coldly, the resultant political entity is something looser than a sovereign state, something looser than a confederacy or even an alliance, because no written bond exists between the dominions and Great Britain or between the dominions themselves. It is in fact more accurately described by the word "entente". The British Empire of 1914 has become a British entente, a group of states, each independent and with full control over its policy, but bound together by cordial feelings and by arrangements for mutual consultation at more or less regular intervals.

This is the construction which this learned authority put, even before the Imperial conference, upon the constitutional relations between Great Britain and the dominions. I ask myself: Has the declaration of the Imperial conference changed this? If it has not, if in fact the relations between Great Britain and Canada, not to speak of the other dominions, are as they were seen by this clear-sighted constitutional authority before the conference, has the conference altered that to authorize the British government, or the Canadian government, or the Australian government, to say that we are no more an entente of British states, but that we have become a commonwealth of nations? If it has, then we ought to know it.

Another expression which is contained in that definition and which I think is not according to the facts is that we owe a "common allegiance to the crown." It is sufficient to compare a couple of articles of our constitution and of the constitution of Ireland, the latest in that magnificent development of self-government in the British dominions or in the countries allied to Great Britain, to realize how fallacious it is to say that there is common allegiance to the crown. Of course if what was meant was the allegiance of individuals, there might be some justification; but evidently what was meant was the allegiance of those nations to the crown. I claim that at the present time there is not a parity of allegiance between the various dominions. In our constitution it is expressly stated by article 9:

> The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the queen.

In the constitution of Ireland article 2 reads:

> All powers of government and all authority, legislative, executive, and judicial in Ireland are derived from the people of Ireland and the same shall be exercised in the Irish Free State (Saorstat Eireann) through the organizations established by or under, and in accord with, this constitution.

Thus we have the source of all power defined by constitution as being in the one case in the person of the sovereign, or in the crown, and in the other in the people of the country. Of course I admit that in practice this has come to the same thing. With the exception of perhaps a few antiquated Tories in this country who think that the king or his representative could have something to do personally with our government or our legislation, nobody would oppose the principle that all powers of legislation and execution are derived in fact from the will of the people. Nevertheless, if our constitution is to remain untouched, as the leader of the opposition claims it should, then we have to acknowledge that all powers in this country are derived from the crown, whereas the crown has acknowledged that in Ireland all powers are derived from the people.

Now, take the oath of allegiance. In our constitution it is very simple. It is an oath of personal allegiance to the king—"I do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria." In Ireland the oath is drastically qualified. Here is their oath:

> I. . . . do solemnly swear true faith and allegiance to the constitution of the Irish Free State as by law established, and that I will be faithful to His Majesty King George V, his heirs and successors by law—
>
> Not because he is king, no, but—
> —in virtue of the common citizenship of Ireland with Great Britain and her adherence to and membership of the group of nations forming the British Commonwealth of Nations.

So that in Ireland it has been declared in the constitution, as accepted by the British parliament and the British king, that the allegiance of the Irish nation to the king is subordinated to the constitution, and to the adherence of both countries, England as well as Ireland, to the terms of the constitution and the terms of the treaty entered into between the two nations. Surely you have there an example of the tremendous progress which the principle of self-government has made, and therefore how can it be said that we form part of one commonwealth of nations united by one common allegiance to the king? In fact, if logic had presided over these deliberations, the formula that would have justified those cries of triumph or anger we heard all through the months of November and December, would have been expressed somewhat in this way:

"Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa are autonomous communities equal in status, in no way subordinate one to the other in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by their allegiance to the same crown and freely associated on such terms as they determine from time to time between themselves."

Such a formula would have corresponded with the claims put up by the upholders of equality of status, but it surely does not correspond with the formula that has been adopted, and why? Because this would have been accepted by the Irish; it would have been accepted by the South Africanders; it would have been putting the stamp of the conference upon the principles laid down by General Hertzog at Stellenbosch, last summer, when he was preparing his conference program, and also upon the statement he made to the London press when he arrived in England. But it would have been opposed by Australia and New Zealand; and naturally, the British government, desirous of pleasing all the daughters of the empire, and also of taking the best advantage of the situation, found a formula which gave sufficient satisfaction for the time being to the Irish and the South Africanders; it appeased also the fears of the Australians, and at the same time made it possible for the British government in the next war again to count upon them all coming to her rescue if she has need of their help. It was very cleverly done, I admit. Once more the British have proven that they are masters of modern diplomacy. I admire them for it; but as a Canadian, believing now, as I did last fall, and previously, in the principles laid down at the time of confederation, I am bound to say that the declarations of that conference do not come up to the hopes of those who had expected that for once in the history of these conferences there would be something of the old nationalist spirit as was expressed by Sir John Macdonald sixty years ago.

Now how was the unanimity achieved? I do not know; I was not there, and we have no report. In fact, in order that I should not even be tempted to be indiscreet I fled from London the moment the conference began; but I had been there long enough to know a little of what was going to happen. How was the unanimity achieved? I think it can be easily found out from the report. First, the title of the king was changed to satisfy the Irish. My Irish friends know what sympathy I have with them and their country, but I am bound to say in all frankness that our Irish friends are a good deal like our French-Canadians —they are very often too apt to be content with words. However, they were very glad to be able to go back home and show what they had accomplished at the conference, to show that Ireland did not form part of the United Kingdom any more. But what surprises me is that the other dominions—no, not the other dominions, the dominions, because Ireland is not a dominion; Ireland does not acknowledge it is a dominion; Ireland asserts that it is a nation. Now if there is equality of status, if we all stand alike, are we a nation in the same sense that Ireland is? How is it that Canada, and Australia, and South Africa, were not put in the same position in relation to the king that Ireland was put in? I do not attach much importance to titles, but being given the other circumstances it is significant I think that the special position of Ireland in that so-called commonwealth has been acknowledged in the title of the king, whilst Canada, Australia and South Africa remain with the rest of the subordinate colonies in the general classification of dominions. Let there be no error. We call ourselves self-governing dominions, but by his title the king and his ministers are obliged to consider us exactly as they consider the black tribes of Africa, because we form part of the empire; we are among the dominions of the king, not the dominions that are masters of themselves, but the dominions that are possessions of the king. We all know that the good king would not attempt to put us in his trousers' pocket; but if his title were to correspond to that great declaration of equality of status, why are not we self-governing dominions put in exactly the same position as Ireland?

I come next to the status of the governors general. That, I think it can fairly be said, was a bouquet presented to the Prime Minister of Canada by the British government in a delicate manner to congratulate him on his latest victory in asserting the right of the people to determine their fate according to their wishes, and not according to the wish of any governor. I was very glad to have this afternoon the expression of opinion of such an authority on this question as Doctor Keith. I thought when I read the correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and the late governor that, apart from the desire of pleasing the right hon. gentleman, perhaps the British also wanted to put any future governor in a position where it would not be possible to repeat the experience through which the late one passed. Well, suppose they did; it was a wise thought. Anyhow, that is one matter clear. There will be no such discussion in the future. No governor will henceforth be put in the position of anguish in which I am sure his late Excellency was put when, in his no doubt sincere desire to do his duty, he thought that relying on the advice of Mr. Meighen instead of Mr. King was probably the best service he could do the country. No future governor will be put in this very anxious position, and the Governor General will be consoled with the thought that he is placed in the very same position which the king occupies in England, which will be best for all concerned.

With regard to foreign representatives, there you can see an evidence of the desire of the British ministers to please at once Canada and Ireland. They acknowledged, and they had the whole conference acknowledge, the right of the dominions to be represented in foreign countries by their own envoys. Of course, the British ministers took the precaution to add a couple of very modest lines, saying that where we had no such special representatives we acknowledged that our interests should continue to be looked after as they are now. In other words, Canada, in the exercise of her independence, has relations with one country; in all other countries in which she may have interests she is represented still by British plenipotentiaries. Which shows there is still a little difference between the exercise of our sovereignty and that which the British government exercises.

Another matter which was evidently placed there to please especially the Irish was the power of the dominion governments to grant its exequatur to foreign consuls. I know that was a matter in which the Irish government was much concerned, and they had no difficulty in securing this recognition.

So in those matters of form there was evidently a desire on the part of the British representatives to do all they could to please the colonials. I call them so because it is more convenient. It is an old word, and the change in fact has not been such that I think it absolutely necessary also to change the word.

With regard to those matters of internal government that have been referred to both by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, undoubtedly there was a keen desire on the part of all to bring this portion of our legislative and executive powers in harmony with the new definition of equality of status. At the same time—and I do not blame the conference for it—it must not be forgotten that as a matter of fact nothing has been accomplished. Notwithstanding the resolutions that were passed with regard to disallowance, reservation, extra-territorial jurisdiction and the operation of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, the leader of the opposition has time to prepare himself for the calamity which will come to us when we are free, because those things have been simply referred to a subcommittee. To whom the subcommittee will report we do not yet know; but I think everybody is in agreement that anything that can be devised by that subcommittee will become law only when it has been legislated upon by the various parliaments concerned.

Now, with regard to the power of veto, it is easy to find out that as a matter of fact there has not been any change. At least that is the opinion of the Prime Minister of England because, when on November 25 last he was asked what had become of the power of veto, he said:

> This aspect of the position of the governors-general was not dealt with in the report of the committee on inter-imperial relations, and I am not aware that any change is contemplated.

Sir C. Kinloch-Cooke: Is there any change in the right of veto?

The Prime Minister: No change that I am aware of.

So there is quite a little difference of opinion between the leader of the Tory government in England and the leader of the Tory party in this country with regard to the actual change in the veto power of the Imperial parliament; but as the hon. gentleman has pronounced himself in favour of the suppression in law—as it is suppressed in fact—of both the power of disallowance and the power of reservation, I will not insist on this point.

With regard to control of our merchant shipping, it has been the subject of correspondence, of exchange of views, of protests between England and the Dominion not only since the birth of confederation, but ever since we have pretended to exercise some jurisdiction over our trade on the high seas. I do not see that it has been much advanced, but at least this time it has been referred to a sub-conference. So there again the leader of the opposition need not be afraid: we are not yet freed men; we are still in our position of quality niggers.

As to appeals to the Privy Council, upon that point the hon. gentleman has made a very interesting pronouncement and one which certainly challenges the attention of all members of this House and all other true Canadians. He has connected with that the whole question of inter-provincial relations and of minority rights with regard to education—I suppose he had that in his mind—language and other privileges, or rights, as we call them, which we French-Canadians and Catholics claim to have under the British North America Act. But we claim them also under a longer, a more enduring and a more important title—that of the birthright of the founders of this country and of the population that has made possible a Canadian nation, not to be absorbed into the great American commonwealth to the south of us.

I am not going to discuss the question of appeals to the Privy Council from the legal point of view; I leave that to the gentlemen belonging to the legal profession. But with regard to the opinion of the province of Quebec, I am bound to say in the most friendly spirit to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, that if he thinks the sentiment of Quebec is reflected by those papers from which he read extracts, or even by the premier of the province, he is entirely mistaken. Not all, but most of those papers are morally in the hands of—no, morally they are nowhere; but they are financially in the hands either of some people that are very little preoccupied with minority rights, or in the hands of advertisers who of course appreciate very much the money of the French-Canadian population, as clients, but care very little about their constitutional rights. As for the premier of Quebec, of course he is a very learned and able gentleman, and a clever lawyer. He has been a successful politician for many years. But upon matters of this nature the leader of the opposition can rest assured that the premier of Quebec does not represent the feelings, the aspirations or the thoughts of the province, and especially of the younger generations growing up there. The definition that I mentioned a moment ago is sufficient to explain why Mr. Taschereau cannot represent the views of Quebec. Of course, as I have said, he is a very clever and able man; and he has kept for his government and his party the title of Liberal, because whatever bears the stamp of Toryism or Conservativism cannot show itself for some years in the province of Quebec. But in mind, in policy and in principle, the Montreal Gazette—which is a far better authority and especially an older one on Toryism than the leader of the opposition—perfectly described Mr. Taschereau when it called him "A Tory of the Tories." In fact he is far more of a Tory than two-thirds of the Conservative members in this House, and he still has in his mind the idea that the throne, the Privy Council, the intervention of Great Britain may be our salvation. He has had a few people to express the same views. To every one of those, not only now but for twenty-five years past, I have put the question: Show me one instance in which the power of England has been exercised effectively to protect us, either by way of legislation, by way of disallowance, or by judgment of the Privy Council? Mind you, I am not saying this in any spirit of animosity towards the British government, the British people or the Privy Council. On the contrary, I am giving this as testimony of their good faith; for it is evident that once they acknowledged Canada to be a free autonomous country they could not see the necessity for any section of the Dominion going across the ocean every six months to ask the British government to intervene in the internal affairs of Canada or to put our own house in order.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has spoken of the great danger of disunion which might arise in the future if we were free to deal with our constitution as we saw fit and to abolish appeals to the Privy Council. Let me discuss for a moment the question of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I remember an instance in which the Privy Council gave judgment in favour of a French Catholic minority. This was in the second case in connection with the Manitoba school question, and I can mention it now seeing that the learned old gentleman to whom I refer has gone to his reward. Lord Herschell told me once in the presence of others—it was not confidential and he was speaking long after the affair—that his great trouble in framing the second judgment in the Manitoba school case was not to discover the truth and to render judgment accordingly, but to couch the judgment in such terms that there would be no contradiction between it and the first judgment, and consequently no diminution of respect for the Privy Council. A very pious desire undoubtedly, but one which certainly shook my faith in the infallibility of that tribunal.

As regards the high and distinterested judicial discernment of that body, I might cite another instance connected with minority and provincial rights. I refer now to a case of marriage in Quebec which attracted some attention in that province, but a great deal more in Ontario, which was not concerned with it. The paper edited by my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) discussed the case at considerable length, keeping it before the country for months. Money was collected in all the Orange lodges with a view to having the principles of liberty vindicated before the Privy Council as against domination on the part of the Romish church. The funny thing is that the two parties concerned were a young man and a young girl who had married in the province of Quebec. They were two Catholics and after their marriage they found an obstacle in their way. There was a mother-in-law in the case and because of her they separated for three or four months. They then appealed to the canonical tribunal who, taking the facts as they were, declared the marriage to have been null and never to have existed. In the meanwhile the mother-in-law had the good sense to go to her reward or her punishment, as the case might be, and the two parties got together again and married. The Orange lodges were still much concerned about the matter and they spent a great deal of money, hiring some of the most learned counsel in London to plead the case. The argument was heard in full before the Privy Council, and to the great surprise of counsel representing the canonical tribunal, he received, some weeks after the case had been heard, word that Their Lordships wanted to hear it once again because they had not been satisfied with the plea. Meanwhile Lord Cave, later on or previously Lord Chancellor, came to Canada and inquired in various quarters —I have my information at first hand in this regard—whether a judgment for or against the parties concerned would cause greater trouble among the Catholics or among the Protestants, and therefore he wanted to know in what way that high impartial tribunal should give judgment.

The Privy Council is a magnificent tribunal in itself, but as everyone knows it is essentially a political body. In matters where no political issue is at stake I believe they apply strictly judicial principles.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a question of privilege. In my opinion, attacks on living members of the court of last resort in the British Empire are out of order in this parliament.

Mr. BOURASSA: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have done with that question. But I wanted to bring forward some arguments to prove that after all opinions must be formed not only on great formulas and declarations but also on facts; and I desired to show to this House that, in the province of Quebec as elsewhere, there are reasons for desiring the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council. There are people who, not being barristers, have no interest to go yearly to London at the expense of their clients, people who, not being members or directors of great companies, have no interest in discouraging the small pleader, the labourer who seeks compensation, the widow who claims some small amount in damages, from taking the opportunity of having their rights vindicated. Because there are clever lawyers who can advance constitutional arguments or questions of future rights and all the rest of it, the small pleader is dragged from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. I happen to know of a case which occurred in Hull, a poor individual having been killed by a railway engine. The company was sued by his dependents and judgment was given in their favour by the superior court, by a majority of the court of review, by a majority of the court of appeal, and finally by a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada. Appeal was taken, however, to the Privy Council and the claim was disallowed. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff, the astute lawyers of this great company having found that there was a constitutional issue, which resulted in this poor devil having to pass through five jurisdictions.

Mr. BENNETT: I recall the case against the Hull Electric and I may say the decision was precisely the opposite. The judgment of the Privy Council went finally in favour of the plaintiff.

Mr. BOURASSA: Possibly; nevertheless there is no sense in dragging a poor pleader in a small case of that nature before a tribunal outside of this country, a tribunal which cannot conceivably be as well versed in our municipal and civil laws generally as our own Supreme court and which can know much less of the facts than our own judges.

There was another case the details of which I know perhaps more intimately than my hon. friend. This was the case of a disagreement between a farmer in the province of Quebec and the Canadian Pacific Railway. This farmer was represented by the law firm of the then premier of the province. Compensation was claimed under the civil law, while the company claimed powers derived from the parliament of Canada on the ground that it was engaged in a work for the general advantage of Canada. There was a constitutional issue at stake. In order to make sure that they would get judgment in their favour the company paid the claimant the full amount of his damages upon receipt of a signed agreement that he would not appear in the appeal. The case was taken to the Privy Council—this time I am sure of the facts—and there adjudicated upon, and judgment was given in favour of the company in what was practically an ex parte case. This is the situation. Surely then, in face of such facts, it will not be contended that appeals should be taken to the Privy Council, merely for the protection of minorities, especially when one thinks that in such cases there is no sanction.

I repeat, I do not blame the Privy Council for not seeing to it that on constitutional questions their judgments are not enforced. Does the leader of the opposition or any other defender of minority rights, beginning with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), claim that the King of England should send a regiment to force Catholic schools upon the province of Manitoba, for example, in consequence of the judgment rendered in 1894? The leader of the opposition has spoken of the possibility of the French language being abolished in this House. The French language is guaranteed by the Manitoba Act just as firmly as it is guaranteed in the British North America Act; but it has been abolished by the legislature of that province in violation of the constitution; separate schools have been abolished in Manitoba in violation of the most solemn promises given to the minority. One judgment has been rendered by the Privy Council; it has not changed the position, and I repeat that the reason is because there is no sanction. We of the province of Quebec, the living men of to-day and of to-morrow, do not want to rely indefinitely upon a so-called protection of this nature. We are manly enough to be prepared to discuss in the future with our fellow citizens of Canada, whether Protestant or Catholic, whether French or English, whether from the west or from the east, every one of those rights which we claim to be ours, not because they are contained in a few articles of law in a printed book, but because we know that in the hearts of all right thinking Canadians there is a desire to see that justice is done. And if we are to maintain that unity of which the leader of the opposition has spoken, it is not to be done by declarations of law or the adjudications of a tribunal either in Ottawa or in London, but by the desire of all thinking Canadians to maintain the spirit of confederation and the constitution of Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, I for one do not think we need be afraid that our constitution is going to be affected because of this involved and very obscure report of the last Imperial conference. Everyone is agreed upon one point; it did not pass laws and could not pass them; it did not amend our constitution and could not do so. Therefore the fact that we discuss the report to-day does not mean that we agree to it; on the contrary, it would have been impossible for the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition or any member of this House to bring forth a concrete resolution either to adopt this report or to set it aside by a formal declaration. You could not do that without disallowing some things in which you believe or approving some things to which you do not agree. It has been framed in such a way that every one can take something out of it but no one can take the whole of it, and I think that is what Lord Balfour meant. I do not want to be too hard; I do not want to leave the impression that there is nothing in the former part of the report to satisfy those who aspire to freedom, who look upon full-fledged independence in time to come as the only outcome for a self-respecting people of various origins but united upon the basic principles of British liberty; I admit that in these declarations there is a slight advance towards that goal. But no one need be afraid; for my part I am prepared to be patient. I am not in a hurry to sever relations with Great Britain, but I think we should take out of that report those ideas which are encouraging to that fast-growing number of Canadians who aspire to be Canadians first and last; who aspire to stand by Canada in its relations with foreign countries and also in its relations with other British countries, as Liberals and Conservatives did some sixty years ago. The Canadian spirit has not yet been destroyed by the new imperialistic doctrine borrowed from Prussia by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. I think those who have kept that ideal, both Canadian and British, will find some consolation in this report because, as the Prime Minister said, for once at least all the representatives of the self-governing portions of the empire have agreed upon certain principles which will be the landmarks of our advance towards the goal which we have in view.

But with regard to foreign relations and matters of war, not only has there been no progress but there is a marked retrogression even from the conference of 1923, and it is there that I find the triumph of British diplomacy; or rather I should say of Tory imperialist diplomacy, because it must not be forgotten that at present England is governed by a Tory imperialist government. I felt somewhat scandalized this afternoon when I heard the Prime Minister shelter himself under the maternal wing of good old Lord Balfour. I would not have thought that the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie, fresh from his victory over the combined forces of imperialism, Toryism and colonialism, would have looked upon Lord Balfour as his angel guardian in these matters. I think, however, the right hon. gentleman did not do it so much to express his own thoughts as to perhaps throw a little confusion into the consciences of hon. gentlemen opposite; but he would be better to not do so. I think he has not, I have not and no one has found the way into the conscience of some at least of these hon. gentlemen; and he would do better to appeal to the feelings of his own friends, to the growing spirit of Canadianism in this country. That is the advice of a disinterested friend.

In that report, let us see how Lord Balfour prepared that scientific combination of the principle of equality of status with the exercise of sovereign powers in foreign affairs:

> Equality of status, so far as Britain and the dominions are concerned, is thus the root principle governing our inter-imperial relation. But the principles of equality and similarity, appropriate to status, do not universally extend to function.

Now we begin to have the fine distinction:

> Here we require something more than immutable dogmas. For example, to deal with questions of diplomacy and questions of defence, we require also flexible machinery—machinery which can, from time to time, be adapted to the changing circumstances of the world. This subject also has occupied our attention. The rest of this report will show how we have endeavoured not only to state political theory but to apply it to our common needs.

In the House of Lords, when questioned by Lord Parmoor,—whose authority I would rather accept, not as a Liberal but as a Canadian with Liberal tendencies, than that of Lord Balfour,—Lord Balfour defined the situation in the words quoted by the Prime Minister this afternoon, practically the same words as used in this report, but a little clearer. There were no colonials there, so he thought he could speak a little more openly, I suppose. He said:

> There cannot be, of course, equality of function in this empire. That must depend on the circumstances of the moment. At the moment and for many years to come—many, many years to come—

Let the leader of the opposition think of that when he foretells the revolution that is coming so soon.

> —the main burden of defence must necessarily fall upon this country. For many years to come—perhaps for an indefinite period—owing to our geographical position, the leading part, and at present by far the most important part, of the conduct of our foreign affairs must also fall on this country.

Now in explanation of this, in the same passage a part of which the right hon. gentleman read this afternoon, he added a quotation from his previous declaration before the conference, in the month of July:

> Personally I think the duties of all the other members of the empire to us are not less than our duties to them, but as to the particular conditions under which that great duty is to be exercised, I do not believe anything is gained by inventing hard cases beforehand.

Now, Sir, let us reduce that to common human language as used in the colonies, and in the light of past experience. What does it mean? It means that while acknowledging in right and in fact to the self-governing dominions all the powers of internal government they wish to exercise, while acknowledging to them the right to exercise their independence in external affairs when they wish to do so, Great Britain claims, in a delicate and careful manner, on account of her geographical position, the right to conduct the foreign affairs of the empire, and counts upon the dominions to give her their free coöperation when she has need of it in diplomatic affairs but mainly in war operations that may follow a rupture of diplomatic relations. That has been the whole history of the relations between Great Britain and the dominions ever since the South African war. Now the question is: Are we going to go back to the basic principle of the policy enunciated at confederation time? That is, are the duties and responsibilities in regard to war matters to correspond with the duties and responsibilities with regard to the conduct of world's policies? The leader of the opposition was told during the debate on the address that he had confused equality of status and equality of stature. But that is not the distinction that is made by Lord Balfour, that is not the distinction that is made by leading imperialists in England. It is a difference between status and function. And what do they mean by "function"? They mean the right, and quite properly so from their point of view, to initiate and conduct all foreign relations; they mean the full liberty to deal with those relations according to the situation which England occupies in the world, not only as a European power in her dealings with continental nations—with France, Italy, Germany, Spain, Greece, Poland or other countries—but also her dealings with the great powers of the world on account of her position as the vastest empire that has ever existed, an empire which brings England in constant difficulty with one nation or the other. Now I ask every true Canadian in this House: are we responsible as a people for that situation? What responsibility have we for the conquest of India by England in the eighteenth century? What responsibility have we for the adoption by modern England of the policy propounded by Cecil Rhodes of painting Africa in red from the Cape to Cairo? What responsibility have we for the fact that England at the present time believes she is bound to remain mistress of the seven seas? It is said at times: Oh, but Great Britain with her mighty power protects us. How, and why, and from what danger? In that partnership of free coöperation, of coördination of forces, that has been laid down in this last conference, and upon which we are told all the representatives of the empire have agreed, what are the relative positions of the partners? There you have Great Britain, the mightiest power on sea, and in some respects on land, that exists to-day—the power that was to a certain degree the cause of the last war, not because she wished it, but because her situation in the world forced her in this instance as she has been forced, or believes she was forced, in every instance during the last three centuries, to curb the power of any nation that threatened her supremacy on the seas as well as her commercial supremacy. Are we responsible for that? England has carried out wars, and has won them to a large extent, to maintain her supremacy on the seas. We are told that that supremacy is our protection. I ask again: Ever since the one hundred and sixty years that Canada has been a British possession, when has a gun been fired by England for the defence of Canada because of a Canadian cause? When has a British vessel set to sea to go and meet some enemy of Canada aroused to anger by some action of this country?

Mr. LADNER: What about the events of the war of 1812?

Mr. BOURASSA: The hon. gentleman is simply anticipating my argument. It is said that England in her dealing with foreign affairs, in her war preparations has to take into account her geographical position, her supremacy—

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a point of order. It is not competent under our rules to attack in this House a friendly power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: The point of order is this. We have a rule that it is not competent in this House to attack a friendly power. If England a friendly power, is to be attacked in this way and made responsible for war I ask the chair for its ruling.

Mr. BOURASSA: On the point of order I wish to say that I am simply arguing—

Mr. BENNETT: There is a point of order raised.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have a right to speak on the point of order. The hon. gentleman is not yet the kaiser of this House. He may become the kaiser of the Tory party next fall but even when he occupies that position there will still be some freedom of speech in this House; I can tell him that. I was simply developing the circumstances—historical, geographical and political—in which Great Britain finds herself to-day, and if the hon. gentleman had been patient enough he would have seen that I was preparing to render to the British government and the British nation a much more thoughtful and reflective homage than he has ever thought of doing by simply worshipping, in words at least, English power while dealing with American financiers.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made what he says is an observation on the point of order. He says the point of order is raised upon his "homage" to England. I rise to direct the attention of the presiding officer in this chamber, namely Your Honour, to the fact that an attack has been made upon a friendly power. If we have equal status—and we assume we have—then an attack in this House on a friendly power is out of order and has been out of order from time immemorial. Observations with respect to the member of the House who raises the point of order hardly answer the point of order although they may bring deafening cheers from those who agree with them. The point is: how far shall we in this House permit any hon. member to attack a friendly power?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What did the hon. member for Labelle say which was an attack on a friendly power?

Mr. BENNETT: Did my hon. friend not hear him? It is not the first time this session that this has been said in this House by the same hon. gentleman, and I made up my mind that I would direct the attention of the chair to it the next time it was said. England was held to be responsible for the Great war; English statesmen were being attacked for their attitude and policies towards this country, and reference was made to what we had suffered by reason of the imperial, grasping attitude of English statesmen. The attack was very definitely delivered, but it certainly was an attack that we would not permit to be delivered against a friendly power as, for instance, the one to the south of us.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I was not listening to the particular remarks of the hon. member for Labelle. If imperial questions and policies are to be discussed in this House, surely members have the right to criticize as well as approve them.

Mr. BENNETT: To attack measures has always been legitimate, but to attack, in the terms used by the hon. gentleman, a friendly power such as Great Britain, is, in my judgment, wholly without the rules and I have heard Your Honour so rule with respect to individuals. Judges have been attacked in this House to-night. The Lord Chancellor who has to sit in judgment upon our cases has been attacked in this House. He never visited this country while he was Lord Chancellor. He has been held up to ridicule. When I raised the point of order then, Your Honour was not in the chair. I think the point has now been reached when we should call a halt. I am quite content with whatever Your Honour may decide.

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 19 reads:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof; nor speak beside the question in debate. No member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Then some cases are cited under that rule in Beauchesne and Bourinot. I find nothing in the rules and in the proceedings, customs, and usages of the House of Commons whereby a member is prevented from discussing from an historical or even from an appreciative point of view the policy of a friendly power. I do not know that by his remarks the hon. member for Labelle has insulted or libelled the nation which was said by the hon. member to be a friendly power. I am quite sure that it would be out of my power to prevent an hon. member from criticizing or discussing or appreciating the policies of Great Britain or the policies of the government of Canada. Surely if a member was speaking of or criticizing even severely the government of Canada, he would be much nearer home, and yet the freedom of speech which we enjoy in this parliament must go so far as to allow criticism of His Majesty's government in Canada provided that such criticism is made in the proper terms.

Mr. BENNETT: As regards one observation which Your Honour has made, I think you were not in your place presiding at the moment the statement was made which came directly within the rule. It was not merely slander; it was of a type that I shall not describe, in saying that Lord Cave came to Canada and inquired whether a judgment in a given sense—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: His Honour was not in the chair at the time.

Mr. PARENT: The decision has been given.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is the sense of the government I am content. Let the slander continue.

The SPEAKER: I have been in the chair for an unusually long period this evening. I took the chair at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: The Deputy Speaker was in the chair at the time.

Mr. SPEAKER: In any case the chair is not supposed to be vacated. I was away for about twenty minutes in order to take a little relaxation, but I heard from behind the chair the remark made by the hon. member for Labelle. It has nothing to do with the present point of order. Even then I did not find that the hon. member had exceeded the rules of parliament. This is what Bourinot says at page 358:

All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the Speakers of the British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

I heard the remark. It is true I was not in the chair, but I do not know, if I gathered well what the hon. member for Labelle said, that I would have declared the remark out of order.

Mr. BOURASSA: Permit me, sir, to express my sincere thanks to the hon. member for West Calgary for the opportunity he gave me of taking a little rest. That will also enable me to pursue and to conclude upon the subject with perhaps a little less heat than my young man's temperament has caused me to speak. I was just referring to the position in which England finds herself all the world over on account of her geographical position and as the head of that enormous empire of which we form no part, as regards which we have no responsibility. That geographical position, as I said, puts her into the most difficult position in which any nation has been placed within the memory of man or the records of history. When the hon. member, in his righteousness and zeal for the empire, interrupted me, I was going to say, although in a milder form, things that have been said frequently in the House of Commons of England where everybody is free to appreciate the policies of Great Britain or of Canada or of any other country. There it was pointed out that although by temperament, by desire, the English people are probably to be counted amongst the most peaceful of European peoples; that although they had a wish and a spirit for peace which perhaps no other country, especially among those continental countries which have lived alongside of other nations armed to the teeth for centuries, possesses—and there is undoubtedly a more peaceful spirit in England than there is in every one of the other countries of Europe, excepting of course small countries like Switzerland or Holland,—nevertheless on account of those conditions to which Lord Balfour appealed, in order to preserve to England a predominant and privileged position in the direction of foreign affairs, England during the last century has been brought into more wars of attack or defence, of resistance or conquest, than any other country on earth. This is the result, not of the policy of one man, not of the thoughtful or wilful direction given to English policy by one party or one government, but of the historical development of the empire.

Every empire is by force based on armament. Every empire is bound to remain armed in order to maintain itself and to resist the aggression of other nations who aspire either to some of its possessions or to rival some of its activities. I have said time and again that, in the governing of that empire, in the direction of the foreign policies directed therewith, the English have shown more disposition to peace, especially after a period of war, than any other great conquering and imperial power. I have testified to that fact time and again speaking in the French language in my own province. During all the years which preceded the war I opposed this false principle of imperial coöperation, because I anticipated what it would lead us to. But ever since the war I have supported the English policy of peace, because England at the present time, and for some years to come, is and will be more interested in maintaining peace in Europe than any other country. She has more at stake. First of all, in her disinterestedness she was loaded with a larger amount of plunder from the last war than all the other countries. She has enlarged her empire by thousands and thousands of square miles in Africa. She has taught Australia, South Africa and New Zealand to found little empires of their own, to grab all the German colonies in their neighbourhood, whether in German West Africa, Samoa, the New Hebrides, or the other German colonies in the Pacific ocean. England consequently finds herself in this position, that in the matter of foreign relations, she has the most difficult part to play. She wants to put Germany on her feet again. She wants to remain friendly with France, and also to curb France's growing military power. She wants to make use of Italy on the side of France against Germany, or on the side of Germany against France, as the case may be. She has endeavoured to play the game between Turkey and Greece, and now between Jugo-Slavia and Italy. She has a hand in every diplomatic situation in Europe and the world over. Therefore, it is not surprising that the British diplomats do not want to see associated with them in every diplomatic step they take, the representatives from Canada, from Australia, from South Africa and from Ireland, who have no direct interest there, and who therefore might be either a useless appendage to British diplomacy, or might become very obnoxious should they offer opinions different from those of the English diplomats engaged in those delicate negotiations. It is therefore not surprising that since the Lausanne affair there has been no tendency on the part of Great Britain to encourage dominion representation in imperial affairs. It is no surprise, then, that in this report everything was done to becloud the issues as they were raised in 1923, and to attenuate the operation of those resolutions adopted in 1923 and ratified by this House last year.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the hon. gentleman, with respect to Britain's interest in the diplomatic affairs of the continent, would it not be fair for him to add that Britain, in addition to paying her own obligations, has also paid the accounts of the continent of Europe, and is to-day taxing her people more heavily than any other country in the world?

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not see any relevancy in the question. I have never accused England of not paying her debts. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, his interruption has nothing to do with the argument I was making. However, I will not imitate his leader and say I will take no interruptions, although his interruption is absolutely irrelevant.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman may not see the relevancy, but that is no reflection on the question I am raising. The hon. gentleman has commented in a most critical way on the part Britain is taking to-day in the diplomatic affairs in Europe, and my questions was—

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to stand a question, but not interruptions of this nature. The hon. gentleman is free to make a speech after I have spoken. I will imitate his leader to that extent. If the hon. gentleman's ears are too full of Tory cotton to hear my words, then let him clear his ears and he will understand me. I was, on the contrary, rendering testimony to the genius of British diplomacy, saying that it is ahead of every other diplomatic service in the world. I was saying that on the whole, in spite of the enormous empire that England possesses and rules, she has done more perhaps than any other nation could have done to avoid war, and after war has come, to establish peace. I have just been stating that I have rendered that testimony to British diplomacy, to British policy and British statesmanship, not only in speaking in this House, not only speaking before English-speaking Canadians, but in my own province, and sometimes to the scandal of some of the Tory associates of my hon. friend in the province of Quebec, who accused me of being a traitor to France because I supported the tenets of English policy as against French policy after the war. I endeavour to view these things, first, from a Canadian point of view because I am a Canadian, and then I endeavour to make use of the little knowledge I have of history and contemporaneous affairs to try and find some principle of justice and equality in these matters, and to endeavour to create in my province and in my country a current in favour of peace and against all war alliances either with Great Britain or any other country.

To come back to the point where the hon. gentleman interrupted me, I was saying that in the conduct of these delicate diplomatic negotiations by which England is endeavouring to establish peace in Europe and be an essential instrument in the establishment of peace between the other countries, she remains the arbiter of Europe. I was saying, and I think the whole trend of diplomacy in the last three years has shown, that British diplomats do not care to have us associated with them. I do not blame them for that; we have no business to be there, but I draw from that the conclusion, as Sir Campbell Bannerman stated twenty years ago, as Mr. Chamberlain stated previously, and as Mr. Asquith stated later on, that responsibility in war hangs together with responsibility in diplomacy. Then England finding that she must conduct her diplomatic service in her own way, I do not see why we should in advance promise her in vague terms armed coöperation in case those diplomatic negotiations should again lead her into war. I simply ask that the principle of justice, of equality of duties and responsibility in function as well as in status, be laid down as the basic principle; and this principle should run, not only in formulae, but in reality as between Great Britain and her daughter states who take pride in the fact that they are just as capable of maintaining the principles of British government as are the people of Great Britain.

To show you how in this last conference the main preoccupation was to modify those resolutions of 1923, first let me refer to the general principles which the sub-committee on foreign affairs discussed. The report says:

> We went on to examine the possibility of applying the principles underlying the treaty resolution of the 1923 conference to matters arising in the conduct of foreign affairs generally. It was frankly recognized that in this sphere as in the sphere of defence, the major share of responsibility rests now, and must for some time continue to rest, with His Majesty's government in Great Britain.

Therefore, there is no equality of status there. This is the passage that was read by the Prime Minister this afternoon, or at least I think he made allusion to it. Then, in another part of the report, reference is made to the power of initiating negotiations:

> When a government has received information of the intention of any other government to conduct negotiations, it is incumbent upon it to indicate its attitude with reasonable promptitude. So long as the initiating government—

I think this means the British government > —receives no adverse comments and so long as its policy involves no active obligations on the part of the other governments, it may proceed on the assumption that its policy is generally acceptable.

> Where by the nature of the treaty it is desirable that it should be ratified on behalf of all the governments of the empire, the initiating government may assume that a government which has had full opportunity of indicating its attitude and has made no adverse comments will concur in the ratification of the treaty.

Further on it is stated that:

> The making of the treaty in the name of the king as the symbol of the special relationship between the different parts of the empire will render superfluous the inclusion of any provision that its terms must not be regarded as regulating inter se the rights and obligations of the various territories on behalf of which it has been signed in the name of the king.

Now, Sir, what is to be deduced from this statement? That every time the British government initiates negotiations it is suppposed to inform the various dominion governments; if those governments do not immediately enter protest with the British government, or do not disclaim any responsibility in the negotiations, and if the arrangements which may be entered into by the British government are signed by the king as the symbol of the relationship defined in this paragraph, then all the dominions that have not protested are supposed to acquiesce in the result. In other words, in every treaty or diplomatic arrangement made by Great Britain from which we are not specially excluded, as we were from the Lausanne treaty, and from the Cannes arrangement between Mr. Briand and Mr. Lloyd George, we are included by tacit consent, if this language means anything at all. Well now, this is contrary not only to the spirit of the resolutions adopted in 1923, but it is in direct contradiction to the resolution that was voted here last summer. Because after we had ratified those resolutions of 1923 defining the conditions under which treaties were to be negotiated either by one part of the empire, or by the whole empire, or by one portion of the empire in the name of the rest, we had this added:

This House approves of the procedure proposed for the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties and conventions, and considers further that before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of any treaty, convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the parliament of Canada should be secured.

I hope the Minister of Justice will tell us if in the sub-committee of which he was the chairman, and in the discussions either of the general committee or of the conference at large, reference was made to this resolution as adopted by the parliament of Canada on June 21 last. It is certainly very important for us to know whether or not the British government and the other dominion governments have been informed of the unanimous decision rendered last summer by the parliament of Canada on this important question. Otherwise if we let the report go in its present form, it means that we acquiesce in the new interpretation placed upon the responsibilities of the dominions for the diplomatic relations entered into by the British government as worded in this last report. This, I think, would be very dangerous, and I find an example of it in the manner in which the Locarno treaty was brought in.

What mandate had our representatives or the representatives of any of the dominion governments to give their moral approval to the Locarno policy? It was brought up last year in this House. I did my best to explain the Locarno treaty as I understood it and as it is understood by many people who have followed all the negotiations that preceded and accompanied those famous agreements. I have no doubt that they were made with the intention of helping the cause of peace; but there is no question that they contain provisions for war—for war either against France or against Germany in certain cases. It may be said that approval given by the conference to the Locarno treaty does not carry with it active coöperation; but it certainly carries with it certain things. Certainly not for nothing was the approbation of the conference asked. Attention was called in the British House of Commons to the exclusion of the dominions from the treaty of Locarno. Mr. Amery, the very able and very clever Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, was asked whether any of the dominions were now associated with Great Britain in her responsibilities under the treaty, to which he replied that they were excluded by article 9; but he called attention to the resolution submitted to the imperial relations committee, unanimously approved by the conference, whereupon Captain Garro-Jones interjected:

Is the right hon. gentleman aware that the resolution submitted by the inter-imperial relations committee has no solid foundation whatever, and has he made any representations to the foreign secretary that no further obligations should be entered into which will leave Great Britain isolated in this way?

To which Mr. Amery replied:

I do not think that the resolution passed by the conference expressing their satisfaction at the policy of His Majesty's government is not a solid contribution.

I do not know what Mr. Amery had in his mind, but I should like to know what the Canadian government have in their minds. If their adherence to the Locarno treaty means that they approve of the policy which necessarily must grow out of that treaty, then it is about time we should know, because many people in Europe are of the opinion that the Locarno treaty is but a makeshift and that from that treaty new wars may arise just as well as that peace may be established. It may be said that we are not responsible for any war that may arise out of the Locarno treaty; but surely the British government has no need of five or six polite words on paper of approval of their policy unless it means something tangible for them when the day of test comes to put that policy into execution.

The question is being frequently put to Great Britain—I know enough of European affairs to be able to state that it is being put practically every day—"In the name of whom are you speaking; are you speaking in the name only of the British kingdom or in the name of the six nations who waged war with you last time?" That was the position at the London conference. The French government and the Italian government refused to have the various dominions represented there alongside of Great Britain because, as they said to the British government: "We want to deal with one nation, not with six." Well now, if we are six nations with equality of status, free to direct without any subordination our foreign affairs, then it means that in these foreign relations Canada should be allowed one opinion, Great Britain another, Ireland another, South Africa another. But if in every instance to support the principle of coöperation means that we must be one, then our equality of status remains purely on paper and as a matter of fact we fall into line with the rest of the empire and simply become dummies. In that case we merely endorse a policy prepared in London at the dictates of British diplomatists, a policy put into action through our coöperation when the time comes for paying the fiddler.

I do not say that imperial partnership is not a fair proposition, but I claim that the time has come when we should impress upon the people the importance of making an intelligent choice in the light of full reflection. We must decide one way or the other, not now, not perhaps five or ten years hence, but at some time or other. We cannot remain within the empire and at the same time be a full fledged independent nation. We might as well attempt to square the circle as try to carry on a permanent policy at once imperial and national along these lines. This has been tried and it has failed in every instance. I admit that British genius for government is perhaps superior to the genius of any other nation that has ruled any large portion of the world in the past. Nevertheless, even British genius cannot run counter to the laws of human nature, the laws of geography, the laws of economics and the laws of nationality as evidenced in one country after another as they attain the position of fullgrown nations.

It seems to me that the ideal conceived and announced to the world by those great men who initiated in the sixties the negotiations which resulted in confederation was at once a much higher and a much more practical ideal than the present policy of squaring the circle. In this so-called coöperation, the British claim for themselves, and properly so, the right to determine their policy in accordance with their geographical conditions, and others, as the report declares. Well, have we not the same right? If we have equality of status surely we have the same right to take our own position into consideration. And what is our position past, present and future as we may conceive it? It is this: Canada is so situated that it has never been, probably will never be, the cause of Great Britain or any other portion of the empire running the risk of war on our account.

I was interrupted a moment ago with a question regarding the war of 1812. Will anyone who has the slightest knowledge of history, as taught even in the Ontario schoolbooks, seriously entertain any doubt as to the cause of that war? The British government claimed the right to visit neutral ships. And what had we to do therewith? No more than we had to do with the quarrel between the British government and the thirteen American colonies at the time of the revolution in 1775. Yet Canadian territory was invaded and occupied by American armies merely because Canada was associated with Great Britain and the empire.

Mr. LADNER: My hon. friend is not dealing with the point of my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LADNER: This ridiculous laughter does not facilitate the proceedings. My question did not relate to the cause of the war of 1812. My hon. friend stated that Britain at no time had ever assisted Canada by men or by ships, and my question was whether or not she did not assist us both by men and by ships in the war of 1812. I know she did.

Mr. BOURASSA: Let the hon. member open his ears. I said at the outset, I stated it a second time, and I repeat it now for the third time, that Britain has never spent a dollar, never armed a soldier, never manned a ship in any war caused by Canada. Does the hon. gentleman understand that now? On the other hand, Canada has been brought into two wars from a cause arising from British policy—a quarrel between Great Britain and the United States. I do not say that the British were wrong in these wars.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member must not twist what I said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have been three times as courteous to the hon. gentleman as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) was to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I want to imitate statesmen as far as I can. If the hon. member wants to ask a question he may do so, but I am not going to be distracted from an already too long argument by discussions on the side.

Mr. LADNER: I want to correct a misstatement of the hon. member with respect to what I said. I referred to his words, that Britain had not come to the assistance of Canada, and I refuted that statement. What the hon. member said as to Canada having been the cause of any wars was something he interjected later on.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not think the hon. gentleman wants me to repeat my words. He will see them in Hansard to-morrow. Let me once more tell him what I said. Canada has never been, because of its own policy or because of its situation, the cause of any war engaged in by Great Britain or any other portions of the empire. That is my assertion and if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied, if he considers it the utterance of a French Canadian nationalist and rebel, let him refer to the numerous declarations of that past respected leader of the Conservative party, Sir Charles Tupper, in this regard. I myself heard Sir Charles Tupper, in the old House which was destroyed by fire, make the statement that, after his experience as leader of the government and as Canada's representative in Great Britain, he had come to the conclusion that for no consideration whatever would England run the risk of war with the United States on account of Canada. Furthermore, when the agitation began to make itself felt for contributions on the part of the dominions to imperial armaments, when the argument was advanced, that we should not shirk our responsibilities having regard to the protection we enjoy from the British fleet and the fact that Great Britain had fought to protect our territory, Sir Charles Tupper met this argument, not once or twice but ten times in speeches and in letters to the English press, which I could quote if time allowed.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. BOURASSA: Very well, then, I am prepared to give it. For once hon. gentlemen opposite will hear true national Conservative doctrine which will show them what evolution has taken place in the Tory party in the last thirty years. Let me quote Sir Charles Tupper, speaking at Winnipeg in 1893; he said:

> I deny that we are a burden to the empire. I say that if to-morrow Canada was dissevered from the crown of England, if to-morrow Canada became a portion of that great republic which lies to the south of us, England could not reduce her army by a man, nor her navy by a ship. She would want more soldiers and sailors and ironclads than she has to-day in order to maintain her prestige. I say, if this great continent was closed, as closed it would be to the ships of England, under the circumstances I have named, if they had no harbour in which to run or a place where they can obtain a ton of coal or a spar, instead of England being strengthened, she would be enormously weakened.

He goes on to describe that weakening process. Then,

> I deny that we are a burden. There is not a pound of British money spent in the Dominion of Canada, from end to end, for any Canadian purpose.

He further demonstrated that the only contribution Canada could make to imperial defence, compatible with her own dignity and the principles of government, was to organize her own territory, to make stronger that portion of the empire for which she is responsible, and to refrain from meddling in the policy of Great Britain or to contribute in any manner to the imperial navy or the imperial army.

That view was upheld not only in theory but in practice as well by the Conservative party until the new days of imperial gospel came. In 1885, for the first time, an appeal was made to the spirit of imperial coöperation; appeals were made to that false sense of colonial vanity which we call national dignity. "Oh, we must go to the rescue of England, because she is prepared to fight for us." That was at the time of the Soudan war; but the leader of the Conservative government at that time, Sir John A. Macdonald, refused point blank, both to the English government and to the Canadian jingoes and quality niggers, to spend one cent of Canadian money in that war. He said, "This is not the understanding we have had with the British government; we have no understanding but to defend our own country."

Now, Sir, if it is a crime in our day to stand by the doctrines of the founders of confederation, I stand committed, because I stood for that principle before the South African war, during the South African war, before the great European and during that war, and I stand by it to-day. I am not expressing only the personal opinion of a few Quebec idealists; but I know from a correspondence covering the country from one end to the other and extending over the last five years that I am now openly expressing, and because I am accustomed to stand all the risks of the position I take, the growing feelings of a large number of Canadians of all races and origins in all the provinces of Canada, who are beginning to realize that if Canada is to remain worthy of her origin and is to be a dignified and worthy scion of British civilization, she must develop those principles of self-government and self-concern which have made Great Britain an example to all nations in the world in our day.

Sir, do we want to render a real service to the empire? Let us take the advice given to us by the present representative of Great Britain in Washington, Sir Esme Howard, who said last year, "The duty of Canada or rather the best service Canada can render to the empire is to interpret Britain to the United States and to interpret United States to Great Britain." Well and good, because on the one hand we are an American nation and always will be such, and on the other we are associated with Britain. Whatever the future of the empire, whatever the future of the other countries of the world, there can be no doubt that Canada will always be a nation in America. Therefore we have in common with the great nation to the south permanent interests stronger and more binding than any political bonds we can have outside of America. On the other hand, due to our dual origin and to the maintenance in Canada of a French population speaking the French language and maintaining the foundation of the French civilization while absolutely and exclusively Canadian in feeling and British in political tendencies, along with a large population originating in the British Isles and new comers from the continent of Europe, we have here elements of civilization at once European and American which must be the link between the great commonwealth to our south and the more retarded but perhaps more idealistic nations of Europe. But if we want to interpret Britain to the United States and the United States to Britain, we must speak in terms of peace; we must make it clear, either through the League of Nations or the Pan-American Union, to which we should have belonged for many years, that Canada, constituted as she is, is in a better position to advance the cause of peace than perhaps any other nation on earth. One of the reasons is that any preparation for war we would make would be absolutely useless to us. Just a few weeks before Lord Fisher resumed command of the Admiralty, he said to me, "It is foolish on the part of Canada to spend money in naval armaments or imperial armaments. It is foolish and useless, because you may rest assured that England will never fight for Canada against the United States, the only country which can successfully attack Canada—not because we are not willing to do so but because we cannot. Therefore why should you spend your money in participating in a defence which is useless to your country? If you want to make Canada safe from outside attacks, do not come here to London and talk with our shipbuilders, but go to Washington and make a working arrangement for the defence of your country in common with the United States." But I said, "Oh, Lord Fisher, we have such great patriots in Canada that they would never admit of such a shameful thing as having an understanding with a foreign country to defend us." He said, "Are you so foolish in Canada? Don't you realize that the world is made up of such dependency? Do you consider that we in England are humbling ourselves because we rely on the French army to fight for us on the continent, and because France relies on the British navy to protect her northern coast, as for years Germany relied on England to protect her, and as we relied on Germany to occupy France while we took her colonies? Do you think it is humiliation for Belgium to count on Germany to defend her against France, or on France to defend her against Germany? No country on earth can get along without an understanding with some other country, and the most natural understandings are made between people who are neighbours and who have common interests." Therefore I say that if we are in need of defence we will not find it in Europe; we would do better to have a cordial and worthy understanding with the United States in time of peace and in view of war, and to rely on the United States for the succor which Great Britain will be unable to give us.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why not have annexation?

Mr. BOURASSA: The only way by which we can prevent the absorption of Canada by the United States is precisely by having the best possible understanding with that country. If we continue to do as we have done in the past and build upon dreams, delusions and alliances against nature, upon reliance on racial sentiments legitimate in themselves but insufficient; if we disregard the economic and social conditions which will determine our future policy just as economic and social conditions have determined the policies of European countries, in the last century particularly, one of these days we will wake up in a fool's paradise. It would be far better to maintain a spirit of Canadianism and to prevent the social, economic, mental and moral penetration of Americans into the souls of our young people, and then have an understanding as between government and government such as all countries have.

In doing that, Sir, we would simply be continuing what has been the British policy ever since the days when George Canning concluded with President Monroe an alliance or an understanding under which the United States made good for England on the remainder of her possessions in America, providing England took care that neither France nor Spain would endeavour to possess any portion of America again. That was not quite idealistic, but it was a very sensible and practical policy, which has held good ever since. It is one of the strangest things I have ever experienced in my lifetime: whenever I go to England I meet Tories, Liberals, statesmen, diplomats and journalists, disagreeing on all points of policy, except on the Monroe doctrine. They consider and have considered for a century that the Monroe doctrine is the permanent basis of British politics in America; but this great Canadian nation, ready to swallow up the whole of the empire and to fight with nations in Africa or elsewhere to make the Union Jack float everywhere; oh no, we are too big, too proud and too dignified to do what these little English statesmen have been doing for centuries.

I think, Sir, if we do that and raise the voice of Canada in favour of peace and disarmament, not only would it be the best service we could render to the empire, but it would be the best protection Canada could have. Provided, of course, we couple it with a declaration, an unequivocal declaration, that Canada means to stand neutral in wars declared by England to which this country is not a party.

That again may scandalize some people; but the idea was propounded by one of the leaders of the Tory party before confederation, one of the founders of confederation, one of the men whose statues adorn the grounds which surround these buildings. D'Arcy McGee was elected as a minister of the crown, then entered the government which made confederation possible, by declaring in Montreal West, represented in part by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Bell), that Canada should look in the near future to a declaration of neutrality acknowledged in international law, not only by Great Britain and the United States, but by the rest of the world. Nobody was scandalized at that. The leader of the Labour party in Ireland, Mr. Johnson, took exactly the same position at the Interparliamentary congress held at Washington two years ago. That is my own view, and I think it will be the policy of the British Empire before long. It will be a consequential development of the declaration made in London last summer along the lines of self-government. Are we going to wait until after the dominions that are less favourably situated than we are take the lead in these matters? In the past it was the pride of all Canadians that Canada had taken the lead in the development of self-government, that Canada had been the pioneer in the assertion of the rights of all self-governing British communities to rule themselves according to their own ideas. It was the pride of Canada to be the eldest daughter in the galaxy of nations that were born out of British liberty. Are we now going to step backward and wait until the South Africanders, until the Irish, lead us on the path of liberty? Surely that is not the ideal we are going to give to the next generation, to the new generation of Canadians—either French, or English or foreign born—who have come to this country because they thought they would find here the principles and policies which exemplified their ideas of progress and advancement. Therefore in the name of British tradition, in the name of what is best in our French-Canadian traditions—but in the name especially of our Canadian homes, in the name of the generations yet to come—I would ask, if something had to be asked from this government, that there be ratified in this pronouncement of the conference of the empire everything which makes for progress, which makes for more liberty, which makes for peace—peace in the empire and peace outside of it. But I would stand decidedly opposed to every retrogressive measure, to every equivocation which has been put into that report in order to becloud the issue and satisfy at the same time those who want to go forward and those who want to step backward. My hair is white but I am still young enough I think to look to the future and to speak to my fellow citizens in the spirit of the future. It is from that youthfulness of heart that I speak as I do in all sincerity as a Canadian, as one who admires and loves British institutions—not blindly, not for what they cover of the sins which England has committed just as any other nation, but for what they contain of nobleness of purpose and of breadth of aspiration, for what they contain of hope, of peace, and of liberty for the world at large and Canada in particular. I stand upon that ground to-night as I did in all the years of peace and war, at the expense of my political advancement but because I thought I owed that duty to the country I love, to the country in which I was born and in which I expect to die.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 216, for the relief of Queenie Isobel Parks.—Mr. Bothwell.

Bill No. 217, for the relief of Charles Shedrick Phillips.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto).

Bill No. 218, for the relief of Lavina Harrison.—Mr. Bell (Hamilton).

Bill No. 219, for the relief of Marretta Isobelle Grose Leach.—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 220, for the relief of Mabelle Amelia Bulmer.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto).

Bill No. 221, for the relief of John Lauron Garfield Evans.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto).

Bill No. 222, for the relief of Ernest Arthur Kingston.—Mr. Young (Toronto).

Bill No. 223, for the relief of Norah Louise Patricia Campbell Chauvin.—Mr. Garland (Carleton).

Bill No. 237, to incorporate The Red River Driving Club.—Mr. Beaubien.

Bill No. 238, respecting The Subsidiary High Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters in the Dominion of Canada.—Mr. Bell (Hamilton).

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.48 p.m.

Wednesday, March 30, 1927.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fifth and sixth reports of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. —Mr. Parent.

Sixth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. —Mr. Young, (Saskatoon).

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) moved:

That the fifth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS—REFUNDING OF FEES

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendations contained in the fifth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, the fees and charges paid on Bill No. 110 to incorporate the President of the Lethbridge Stake; and on Bill No. 145, to incorporate Thousand Islands International Bridge Corporation, be refunded, less the costs of printing and translation.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendations contained in their sixth report, the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines be permitted to sit while the House is sitting.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Is it the intention of the committee to deal with other subjects than that of the Peace river bill?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Yes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon) moved:

That the recommendations contained in the sixth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to print, for the use of that committee, an additional 100 copies in English of evidence taken, and of evidence which may yet be taken, by said committee respecting Peace river district proposed railway routes to the Pacific, be concurred in providing the type is standing.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House I beg to move that on Monday the 4th of April, 1927, and subsequent Mondays until the end of the session government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence over all other business excepting questions and notices of motion for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 17c

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Since there is a possibility that the debate on the Imperial conference may not conclude this afternoon, and since Your Honour leaves the chair to-morrow and Friday without the question being put, with the consent of the House I would move that rule 17 (c) be suspended for the sittings of March 31 and April 1, 1927, in order to enable the debate to proceed in the regular way.

Motion agreed to on division.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

R. S. ROBERTSON, K.C.

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was Mr. R. S. Robertson, K.C., appointed to act for the government in a certain municipal inquiry into Toronto harbour, and when?
2. What sum has been paid, and, what is yet owed him?
3. Who requested his appointment: (a) what persons; and (b) what Liberal association?
4. What other sums from 1921 to 1927 has Mr. Robertson received from the government, and for what purpose?
5. Will the government also hold similar inquiries into purely federal harbours: (a) of Montreal; (b) of Vancouver; (c) of Quebec?
6. Will said inquiries be instituted as in the case of Toronto without any charges?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Mr. R. S. Robertson, K.C., was retained to act for the government in an inquiry into matters pertaining to the business of the Toronto harbour commissioners under the provisions of the Inquiries Act.

2. No payments have been made to him; his account is for $5,775.81.

3. Mr. Robertson was retained on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice.

4. None.

5. No similar requests for inquiries have been received in the case of (a) Montreal (b) Vancouver, (c) Quebec.

6. Answered by No. 5.

RELIEF FOR WAR VETERANS

Mr. PRICE:

1. Will legislation be introduced at this session of parliament providing relief for disabled and partially disabled war veterans at present excluded from pension benefits owing to existing regulations?

2. When will the bill be introduced for the said purpose?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Present pension legislation provides pensions for all disabilities "attributable to or incurred during military service" and for "disabilities resulting from injury or disease or the aggravation thereof incurred during military service". No ex-soldier who is so disabled is denied pension. But responsibility cannot be accepted for those whose disabilities are not related to war service.

2. The government does not intend to extend the present provisions of the Pensions Act by further amendments this year.

SCHOONER EDDIE JAMES

Mr. LOVIE:

1. Was the schooner Eddie James seized by the Department of Customs and Excise at Summerside during the year 1925?

2. If so, what quantity of liquor was in the cargo?

3. How was said liquor disposed of, showing quantity, brands of each kind, to whom sold, and at what price?

4. Was the duty paid on the liquor by the purchaser at the time of purchase or when it was taken out of bond?

5. If when taken out of bond, what were the dates of release, quantity, duty paid at each time and to whom it was released?

Hon. Mr. EULER:

1. Yes.

2. 1,055 cases.

3. After release by decision sold by owners to Prince Edward Island Commission for Enforcement of Prohibition Act. No information as to sale price.

POST OFFICE AT WELLSDALE, ALBERTA

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. Has the name of the post office at Wellsdale, Alberta, been changed?

2. If so, what is the new name?

3. Did the residents petition for the change?

4. If so, how many petitioned for it, and how many against it?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.

2. Clandonald.

3 and 4. No petitions received. The change was recommended by Archbishop O'Leary of Edmonton and by the district superintendent of postal service, Saskatoon, who stated that the new townsite on the C.P.R. where the post office was located had been named Clandonald. Objections were received from Bishop Gray, of Edmonton, and from Geo. J. Stockwell and T. J. Souder of Wellsdale.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF RETURNING OFFICER. COUNTY OF MONTMAGNY

Mr. CAHAN:

What amount was paid as travelling expenses (mileage) to the returning officer in the county of Montmagny at the general elections of 1921 and 1925, respectively?

MARINE AND FISHERIES DEPARTMENT

DIVISION INTO TWO BRANCHES WITH DEPUTY MINISTERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the act respecting the Department of Marine and Fisheries to provide that the department shall consist of the Marine branch and the Fisheries branch, and that two officers may be appointed by the governor in council as Deputy Minister of Marine and Deputy Minister of Fisheries, respectively.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

POSTAGE RATE ON NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act and to reduce the postage rate on certain newspapers and periodicals from one and one-half cents to one cent.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

APPOINTMENT AND SALARY OF THE CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into commitee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Dominion Elections Act and to provide that the Chief Electoral Officer shall be appointed by resolution of the House of Commons, and shall be paid a salary of six thousand dollars per annum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED STATES EMBARGO ON MILK AND CREAM

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Mississquoi): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he has any information to give to the House to-day with respect to the embargo placed by the United States government upon the exportation of milk and cream from any place within a radius of two hundred miles?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to my hon. friend I may say that the Department of Agriculture is in communication, both by phone and by correspondence, with the Departments of Health of both Quebec and Ontario with the object of localizing as far as possible any possible source of rural typhoid contagion. An officer of the department has gone down to Montreal to-day with the same object in view. Until the source of contagion is discovered and the causes removed I am afraid we will have to suffer all the inconvenience of the present embargo.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL

LEASE OF CARILLON POWER TO NATIONAL HYDRO ELECTRIC COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to ask the Minister of Railways whether it is intended, as a matter of policy on the part of the government, to refer the lease granted to the National Hydro Electric Company for the development of power at Carillon, or the subject matter of it, to the committee which will consider the Georgian bay canal bill, and if not what steps will be taken with respect thereto?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I expect fully that the whole question regarding the Ottawa river will naturally come before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in connection with the discussion of the bill which has been referred to it.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): In that connection may I ask if the Minister of Railways, or perhaps the Minister of Justice, would lay on the table an opinion on this subject given by Mr. Newcombe about 1918 when he was Deputy Minister of Justice?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

I think the opinion was given in reply to a submission by the Ontario government. It would be convenient if we could have that opinion laid on the table before this matter is considered in committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If any such opinion exists I will be very pleased to lay it on the table.

CUSTOMS INVESTIGATIONS IN QUEBEC

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr J. F. POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask the hon. Minister of Customs and Excise if it is within his knowledge that Inspectors Duncan and Knox, who are at present holding investigations in the province of Quebec, do not speak a word of French?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): It is within my knowledge that these officers have held or are holding investigations. I have no information, however, as to their knowledge of French.

RETURNED SOLDIERS INSURANCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): On two previous occasions, I asked a question in regard to returned soldiers insurance. The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, and many other organizations, have recommended an extension of this insurance for a period of at least one year. I think the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment stated on two occasions early in the session that the matter was under consideration. I wonder if a decision has been reached.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment)): In reply to my hon. friend I would state that the matter of extending the period of insurance for returned soldiers, and suggestions coming to the department from returned soldiers organizations throughout Canada, have been given careful consideration. In view of the extent of the matters already dealt with it has been deemed inadvisable to undertake to bring down further legislation this year with regard to insurance or pensions.

ODESSA AND ENTERPRISE POSTMASTERS

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I would ask the Postmaster

General if instructions have yet been given to the Civil Service Commission regarding appointments to fill the vacancies at Odessa and Enterprise, Ontario, and if not what is the reason for the delay?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I regret that I cannot give that information from memory, but I will look into the reasons for the delay, and let my hon. friend know to-morrow.

RURAL MAIL BOXES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): It is getting near spring, and I would ask the Postmaster General if he can tell us when he will have boxes for the rural mail delivery?

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot tell my hon. friend on what date I shall be in a position to award tenders. We are examining fifty-two models of boxes, and a process of elimination is now under way in order to determine which would be the best model. I am personally directing that work and I feel that we should, if possible, get the very best model available. Unfortunately, I have been so much taken up with the duties of my department that I have not yet been able to complete the work of elimination.

Mr. CLARK: Leave it to the officers of your department and then the work will be well done.

Mr. VENIOT: I know just as much about mail boxes as they do, and that is the reason I am taking a hand in it myself. I want to make as good a selection as possible because I have to accept the responsibility for what will be done. I may say that I expect in a very few days to deal with the matter.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would suggest to the minister that he could follow the same course that he has followed in the elimination of postmasters.

Mr. VENIOT: In that regard whatever I have done has been in the public interest and I intend to continue to act on that principle.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is it the policy of the government to supply these boxes at actual cost?

Mr. VENIOT: We will follow in future the system which has prevailed in the past.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Will they be supplied at cost?

Mr. VENIOT: I could not say, because I have not looked into the matter, and as my hon. friend knows I am new in the department yet. However, the same principle will obtain in the future as in the past.

CANADIAN MINISTER AT WASHINGTON

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I promised the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that I would bring down any correspondence obtainable in the nature of communications between the British government and our own respecting the appointment of the Canadian minister at Washington. I beg to lay copies of those communications on the table. I have already given my hon. friend copies of them.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

DEBATE ON STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AND AMENDMENT OF MR. GUTHRIE

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 29, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as it is possible that in the course of my remarks I may disagree rather strongly with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) with respect to some points of his address of yesterday and the amendment which followed it, I am pleased to preface my remarks by congratulating him on the tone of his address. Indeed the form deserved commendation more than the substance. I am pleased also to say that I agree with him at least on the first statement which he made as to the nature and functions of the Imperial conference, a statement which should dispel much misconception in that regard.

The Imperial conference is not an executive, nor a government, nor a cabinet; it is a consultative body and nothing else. That was the position taken by all prime ministers of Canada in the past and by those of the other dominions of the empire as well. It is a consultative body composed of representatives of the various units of the empire who meet, get each other's opinions, discuss conditions and problems which affect all or some of them, and, in the light of knowledge and impressions received and communicated to them, may afterwards if necessary recommend to their respective parliaments any legislation or executive act which may best suit the need.

To assert that the Imperial conference may change the constitution of Canada or the constitution of any other dominion is an absurdity. The conference has no power to do that and it could not undertake to do it. There was formerly throughout the British Empire a school of opinion favouring a sort of imperial federation or the creation of a central body representing all parts of the empire and having executive duties and powers. This scheme has been rejected by the overwhelming will of the peoples of the empire. We would never accept it in Canada; we would never agree that problems affecting Canada should be decided by a body in which Canada would be submerged and in the minority, and where decisions would be reached by a majority composed of friendly people, if you will, but friendly outsiders.

But if we do not want a central body with executive powers over all the nations of the empire, we also do not want disruption. We want to preserve as much as possible the association of the nations of the commonwealth, and the Imperial conference is one of the means of preserving if possible this association by promoting friendly meetings, friendly discussions of problems, and friendly intercourse. I repeat: The Imperial conference of 1926, no more than Imperial conferences of the past, could not alter or change one iota of the British North America Act or the constitution of any other part of the empire. What the conference could do and did was to affirm, to reaffirm, principles which have gradually come to establish themselves very firmly in place of other principles which governed in the past with regard to the status of the nations of the empire, and to call attention to certain usages, conventions, or practices which may not altogether harmonize with the adopted principle of equality of status of all the nations of the commonwealth.

These premises being laid, I state, whatever may be said to the contrary, that the achievements of the conference of 1926 and the spirit of coöperation which alone could make them possible, make it an historical event in the history of the British commonwealth of nations. The conference has crystallized the principle of equality of status which was already recognized and which was the logical outcome of the development of the various nations. It has published a definite, clear and official adherence to that principle. It has done so in such a way as to make it the greatest contribution to the permanency of the free association of the nations of the commonwealth. It is the final and unequivocal acceptance of the principle of unity and liberty, unity preserved and enshrined in the British throne, and liberty in all domestic and external activities of the various nations of the commonwealth. It is no longer, as has been said by some writer, the case of "daughter am I in my mother's house, but mistress in my own". The family is a family of sisters equal in their rights and activities.

It is a magnificent tribute to the broad-mindedness, wisdom and statesmanship of the public men of Britain that they have unequivocally accepted this great principle that the foundation of the commonwealth rests upon the solid rock of liberty, economy and equality of the various parts thereof. It is stated in the report that such a tendency was both right and inevitable. In this they do not agree with some Canadian newspapermen, but I think their opinion is more free from bias and political partisanship than those of our contradictors on this side of the ocean. May I say that I have been surprised to find that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and their supporters in the press have taken exception to the principle of equality of status and equality of nationhood.

Mr. McGIBBON: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who says no?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will take the Hansard of this session and read the speech of his leader, he will see that although my hon. friend the leader of the opposition yesterday changed to some extent his line of attack and is now hanging his amendment upon a sentence of the Imperial conference report concerning the Privy Council, he did not do so in his speech on the address. Then it was equality of status that was harmful and dangerous for the minority in this country. The press of Canada supporting my hon. friends opposite are not agreed among themselves, because there are two schools of critics, one claiming that no change has been made, and the other claiming that a terrible and a dangerous change has been made. To the first school I say that if the
