dominions were satisfied to accept their views in the matter, then, to use the language of a great British writer, they would not be worthy of the stock from which they sprang. But it is not the assertion of a new doctrine, and my friend the leader of the opposition has seen to some extent the error of his ways in that respect, for in his address yesterday he said that he agreed with the principle of equality of status. Still, I want to set the matter right before the Canadian people. I want to show that it was not a new principle which was crystallized, if you will, in the report of the conference, but a principle to which adhesion had been given in the past, and especially during the last ten years, by the public men of Canada both in this House of Commons and elsewhere. I shall not quote the words of my late lamented leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I wish to quote the words of writers or speakers friendly to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Let me first quote from the memorandum which Sir Robert Borden circulated on behalf of the prime ministers of the dominions in March, 1919, when the present leader of the opposition was a member of his government:

All the treaties and conventions resulting from the Peace conference should be so drafted as to enable the dominions to become parties and signatories thereto. This procedure will give suitable recognition to the part played at the peace table by the British commonwealth as a whole, and will, at the same time, record the status attained there by the dominions. The procedure is in consonance with the principles of constitutional government that obtain throughout the empire. The crown is the supreme executive in the United Kingdom and in all the dominions, but it acts on the advice of different ministries within different constitutional units; and under resolution IX of the Imperial War conference, 1917 the organization of the empire is to be based upon equality of nationhood.

The leader of the opposition, as I said, was a member of the Canadian government at that time. He is responsible for the doctrine asserted in that document, but I do not remember that he submitted it to the House of Commons either before or after that document was circulated. It goes on:

It was the reiteration of the principle laid down by the Imperial War conference of 1917, which stated in their resolution, "that any readjustment should be based upon a full recognition of the dominions as autonomous nations of the imperial commonwealth."

The word "autonomous" did not seem to agree with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition yesterday—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh yes, it did.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend seemed to be horrified by "autonomous."

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad to see my friend is coming back to the light of yesterday.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was nothing in my remarks yesterday that would justify the statement of my hon. friend. However, I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very well. May I also quote from the despatch sent on December 4, 1918, by the government of Canada to the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister, then in London. The government here, of which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was then a member, was afraid that even Sir Robert Borden would not go far enough then, and they sent him a telegram reading as follows:

Council to-day further considered Canadian representation at Peace conference and is even more strongly of opinion than when you left that Canada should be represented. Council is of opinion that in view of war efforts of Dominion other nations entitled to representation at conference should recognize unique character of British commonwealth composed of group of free nations under one sovereign and that provision should be made for special representation of these nations at conference even though it may be necessary that in any final decisions reached they should speak with one voice. That if this is not possible you should form one of whatever delegation represents British commonwealth.

Those of us who had the privilege of being members of the House of Commons in 1919 will remember the pride with which the members of the then administration spoke in the House of Commons of the tremendous step forward they had achieved in acquiring equality of nationhood for Canada in the British commonwealth, and they were rather abusive of the members of this House who did not see exactly eye to eye with them in the matter. The then Minister of Justice asserted, in the name of the government, Canada's absolute right constitutionally to govern herself in accordance with the laws made by the parliament of Canada. Listen to his words:

It has not been claimed on this side of the House that this treaty made Canada a nation; nor has it been claimed that anything that happened at the Peace conference made Canada a nation. Canada has grown to nationhood and Canada is a nation; and she does not go seeking anywhere to any of the allied or associated powers, to any foreign power, to Great Britain herself, to the entire Peace conference, to confer upon her the gift of nationhood. Peoples, starting under the tutelage of other countries that have sent forth their sons to establish colonies, in the course of time, as they grow, come to acquire qualities that belong to no colony. What is the proper position of a colony as towards its mother country? Why, it is the position of a child in the nursery. It takes the directions of its mother country: it follows the mother country without any question in whatever line of action that mother country chooses to adopt as governing its conduct towards the outside nations of the world. And when that line of conduct leads to conditions that call for the facing of those outside nations in arms, while the relationship is purely that of guiding and governing mother country and dependent colony, then it is the business of the mother country to provide not only for her own defence, but to carry upon her own shoulders the burden that may result from the line of conduct which she and she alone has chosen to adopt; and if her child colony over there, that had nothing to say about how those conditions were brought about, is exposed to danger, it is for the mother country to defend it. Was that the situation in regard to Canada? Nationhood is a matter of fact; it is not a question of what is written in a statute book or what is declared by one nation in relation to another.

Mr. MANION: Whom is the minister quoting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The then Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty. But he used even stronger language. At page 196 of Hansard, 1919, he said—and these words have much bearing on the present debate:

As regards the constitutional question the hon. gentleman has told us, and a number of others have also stated, that we have a written constitution and that that is the last word. We have a written constitution enacted for what purpose? It was enacted to distribute throughout this federal country the powers of legislation. The Privy Council is on record as having said that the whole field of legislation had been by that act conferred upon the Dominion of Canada, either upon its central parliament or upon the parliaments of its provinces. When that was done the last work that a written constitution could do was done. But because we had that written constitution we did not cease to live under that British constitution that is not written in books, that rests upon the continued practice of the British people—of the people of the British Empire, which includes us Canadians as well as the people of the United Kingdom. I was surprised the other evening to hear the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) say that the British constitution was limited to the United Kingdom, as though we had not all of us for years boasted—and no man did it more frequently nor more eloquently than the late leader of the Liberal party—of our enjoying all the benefits and advantages of the British constitution—and it is not all written in the British North America Act.

I do not want to read it all, but I will simply quote the last words:

I have referred to the recent discussion with regard to the aviation law. Over in Great Brtiain they recognize our national status and that constitutionally the whole field of government of Canada is ours. It is only in this country that you find the little man who wants to hang on to the colonial status of his country and to insist that she is subordinate to and to be governed by another portion of the empire. However great that portion may be—and we all respect it, we all recognize what she was the source of for us all, and we shall all be happy to recognize her as the first among these equal nations—we contend that, as a matter of fact, we stand as an equal nation within the empire.

The then President of the Privy Council, Mr. Rowell, and the Minister of the Interior, who was then Mr. Meighen spoke along the same lines and defended the same principle. I suppose that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was in accord with them at the time. In 1921 the Prime Minister of Canada, in one of his speeches published in a book entitled Overseas Addresses, at page 15, says:

We legislate each for ourselves unfettered; we advise through separate councils a common sovereign; we confer together in order to better understand the wider over-riding common interest; between a sense of independence and a sense of unity there is no clash but harmony. On these principles our own league of nations has survived, and it has served the world wonderfully well.

Mr. Meighen, during the same debate said —and I find his words in Sir Robert Borden's book Canadian Constitutional Studies, pages 113 and 114—

In May 1921, the Canadian Prime Minister—

In the Manchester Guardian centenary number, May 5, 1921

—declared that the relations between the constituent parts of the empire must be based upon a conception of complete freedom and equality in national status. Further he observed that the practical need would be met by clearly understood and definitely accepted declarations of principle with improvements in so much of the form and content of the existing mechanism as may be found to be obsolete.

I could quote numerous words of Sir Robert Borden, especially in his book on constitutional studies, but I suppose it is useless for me to do so. The same doctrine was preached and expounded by all the statesmen of the other dominions, and may I especially mention Mr. Hughes of Australia and General Smuts of South Africa, and they were accepted by the Prime Minister and the various public men of Britain. I have quotations here from Lord Milner, Mr. Amery and Mr. Lloyd George but I would not like to trouble the House by reading them. Never did my hon. friends opposite, who were at the head of the government, express any fear as to the working of the theory of equality with regard to minorities or any other sections of the Canadian people.

May I remark that in all these discussions which took place the statesmen of Great Britain and the empire referred to history and emphasized the fact that the present organization of the empire and the problems of government which it presents cannot be understood unless they are studied in the light of historical development. Not only is it the result of a long historical growth, but it is dependent on unwritten conferences, delicate adjustments and slowly established practice. It follows that it is not only not the law or the written documents which must be consulted, but also history and the understanding and the ideas of the people, and the meaning of the outward forms of our institutions. One of the great features, I believe, of the report is that which affects the king. The king is recognized more than before as the keystone of the structure of the empire. He becomes the head of each state of the commonwealth in a more intimate and national sense. As a result of this his position is probably more secure than ever. Whoever directs the affairs in Great Britain, whatever government is called to power in Great Britain, will see to it that the only bond which keeps the various nations of the empire together is permanently retained. The moment that republicanism has overthrown many of the thrones of Europe the British monarchy has got to increase its prestige. The crown centralizes the common ideas and the common traditions of the commonwealth. In this connection may I quote some words of His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, in one of his public utterances:

> The king, as the constitutional sovereign of the empire, occupies exactly the same place in Canada and in the whole British Empire as he does in Great Britain, and his house, although originally founded in Great Britain, belongs equally to all the other nations of the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, I have dealt perhaps too extensively with this school of critics who claim that a big change was brought about by the conference. I will now deal with the other school which says nothing was done. I will point out some of the things which the conference did, not for the purpose, as I have already said, of creating a new status, but of harmonizing the existing conditions with the principle universally adopted and recognized. I will deal briefly then with the subject from three standpoints, the political, the legislative and the judicial. In the political field some modifications have been agreed to regarding the form of treaty and the proceedings accompanying such treaty. I had the honour to be appointed chairman of the committee which was charged with the duty of considering all matters relating to treaties. This was a very important committee indeed, and its work was a difficult one, but I am pleased to say that a solution was found which was acceptable to all members of the committee. It is impossible for me to deal at length with this particular subject, but perhaps I may mention what the practice in future will be as a result of the work of the committee. Hereafter treaties will be made and signed, not by and for the British Empire, but by and for Great Britain and such other portions of the empire as may be concerned in those treaties. Heretofore, even though we might be interested in any treaty of any description, if we were not represented during its negotiation and at the signing of it, the treaty was entered into nevertheless in the name of the British Empire as a whole. The change in the wording of the treaty in this regard is of the utmost importance. There will be no longer any need of the provision which has been known as the exclusion clause, such for instance as was incorporated in the Locarno treaty. That clause was to the effect that the treaty in question could be enforced in any of the dominions only after they had agreed to come within its provisions. Such a clause, as I say, will no longer be necessary; it will serve no useful purpose for the reason that we shall be involved in any treaty only if we are a party thereto. Treaties will be made by the king not in the name, not of the British Empire but on behalf of Great Britain and whatever other section of the empire may be a participant in and a signatory to the negotiations.

Another important change concerns the appointment of plenipotentiaries representing the king in connection with negotiations leading up to treaties and the signing of those treaties. When a few years ago I was appointed plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty with the United States it was stated by constitutional writers that no real change had been made inasmuch as my appointment by His Majesty the king was the outcome of an order in council passed by the Imperial government.

The same with regard to the issuance of powers and the ratification that must take place after the signing of a treaty. That ratification was also made by His Majesty the king upon an order in council of the Imperial government and not of the Canadian government, even where Canada was concerned. Now treaties signed on behalf of Canada will be signed by a plenipotentiary appointed by His Majesty the king upon a recommendation of the Canadian government, and the issuance of powers will be made also upon the recommendation of the government of Canada. In the same way the ratification of treaties will be carried out upon the recommendation of the government of this Dominion. All the other formalities which, according to constitutional writers, have been adhered to as symbolic of the unity of the empire have been discarded as being no longer in harmony with the conditions now prevailing among the nations of the empire; for, as I have pointed out, the one great symbol of unity now is His Majesty the King. Let me observe that for this as for most of the other matters included in the report there is no need for any legislation; all that is needed is to harmonize the practice and usages with the present constitutional position of the dominions.

I come now to an objection raised yesterday by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that possibly we might now be tacitly involved in a treaty in which we had taken no part, by reason of the fact that we had not responded to the call of the government initiating the treaty. In consequence of the change that has been brought about, all the nations of the empire are on the same footing, and no treaty must necessarily be initiated by Great Britain. We in Canada have the right to initiate any treaty which concerns ourselves. If we initiate a treaty relating to matters in which some of the other dominions may have an interest, surely it is our duty to inform those dominions in that respect. Take for instance the case of a treaty which we might enter into with the United States with regard to the fisheries in the Atlantic in which Newfoundland would be concerned. Our duty, in accordance with the procedure that has been accepted, would be, before entering into negotiations, to inform Newfoundland of our intention to make a treaty with the United States in that matter, and if Newfoundland desired to join she would be free to do so. If, on the other hand, she did not answer—and only in that case—then undoubtedly we should be free to carry on our negotiations and Newfoundland could not complain. But there is a reservation: Newfoundland would not be in any way bound should the treaty in any way involve her in active obligations. In such a case Newfoundland, or any other dominion for that matter, although she might not have responded, although she might have neglected to declare her position in the matter after being informed of the intention of the Canadian government to enter into negotiations, would not be involved in any active obligation as a consequence of the making of that treaty. Even here the principle of the equality of status is confirmed more markedly than it was before because, as I have stated, we are all on an equal footing. If a treaty concerns us we have the right to initiate it and we inform Great Britain or any other part of the empire of our intentions in the matter if they are interested therein.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just how far does the principle of equality of status extend? Does it extend, for example, to treaties involving assistance in the event of war?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I am sure it does not, and this by reason of these words:

> It must, however, before taking any steps which might involve the other governments in any active obligations, obtain their definite assent.

In any case where any other government may be involved in active obligations—and the hon. member is referring to a case in which there would be such obligations—then the definite assent of the government involved must be given.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is this the implication of the minister's remarks, that Canada in future will hold a neutral position unless she has given her assent to participation in such a treaty?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The discussion of that phase of the matter would lead me into a long argument.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But it is so essential.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I say that Canada will always be free to take whatever steps she thinks fit. She will not be bound to any active obligation.

Now, as to foreign affairs, the outstanding feature of the report is, I believe, the definite recognition that neither Great Britain nor the dominions are committed to any active obligations except with the assent of their own governments or parliaments. It is stated clearly in the report. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) yesterday invited me to speak of the Locarno treaty, owing to the fact that some one had made reference to it in the British House of Commons. If my hon. friend reads the resolution in the report, as I am sure he has done many times, he will see that it is merely an expression of congratulation to the Foreign Secretary of England for the part he took in trying to bring about peace in Europe. I do not think I am betraying any secret when I say that we have taken the position that we are not bound by the Locarno treaty, which was initiated and entered into by the British government without the coöperation of Canada. I have no criticism to offer in that respect; it was largely a matter of concern to the government of Great Britain, and was a European matter. As I have seen it expressed in the newspapers of this country, we may be bound to some extent if there is a war between the nations which are signatories to the treaty; we may have some obligation on account of our membership in the British commonwealth of nations and as members of the League of Nations, but our obligations as British subjects and as members of the League of Nations are quite different from the obligations which we would assume if we were to guarantee the boundaries between France and Germany, thus assuming obligations with regard to foreign powers at a distance of over 3,000 miles from the limits of Canada. I think we have exactly the same reason for not entering into that treaty as Great Britain had when she refused to give the same guarantee to the eastern boundary of Germany as she gave to the western boundary. The eastern boundaries of Germany touch on Poland, and in that connection the British government refused to sign any guarantee. That guarantee was signed by France, but the British government refused to be involved in the question of the boundaries on the eastern side of Germany because they were too remote, and the same reason would apply with us so far as the western boundary is concerned. So I may say to the hon. member for Labelle that Canada has not ratified the pact of Locarno and is not a party to it.

The change with regard to the Governor General also comes under this heading of political modifications. The Governor General is no longer in any respect an officer of the Imperial government; he has virtually the position of a viceroy, having the same prerogatives and powers as His Majesty the King. He is no longer a channel of communication, as he formerly was, and although in this country I have heard and read that this was not a change, the gentlemen representing Britain who signed the report had a different conception, because they state in the report that it is a change.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask a question? Was not the same thing agreed to at the conference which Sir Robert Borden attended?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I answered that question before it was asked. Indeed, it was a change going much deeper than most people realized. Heretofore the Governor General, notwithstanding what was stated to the contarary, was the representative of the British government, as well as the representative of the king. He acted as a channel of communication between the governments of Great Britain and the dominion; he represented to the Dominion government the wishes of the British government, and kept the British government in touch with the views of the Dominion executive. There was certainly something anomalous in the position of a Governor General who was bound to accept the advice of his ministers but who was at the same time informing another government of the policies and the wishes of those same ministers. It may be that it is important, and I think it is, that the British government should be represented in Canada as Canada is represented in the capital of the empire, but the British government must and should be represented by an official who would not be the representative of the king and who would not be the Governor General of Canada.

So far as the legislative sphere is concerned, it is in some respects difficult to harmonize the principle of equality with existing conditions and with special situations which have to be considered. Here is what the report says with regard to the general principle covering the matter:

> On this point we propose that it should be placed on record that, apart from provisions embodied in constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation, it is recognized that it is the right of the government of each dominion to advise the crown in all matters relating to its own affairs. Consequently, it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by His Majesty's government in Great Britain in any matter appertaining to the affairs of a dominion against the views of the government of that dominion.
> The appropriate procedure with regard to projected legislation in one of the self-governing parts of the empire which may affect the interests of other self-governing parts is previous consultation between His Majesty's ministers in the several parts concerned.

The points on which there seems to be a conflict with the doctrine of equality are very few. They are the powers of disallowance and in some cases reservation of dominion legislation, the doubt as to the powers of the dominion legislatures to enact laws having to do with extra-territorial jurisdiction, and more particularly the provisions of the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865. Nothing definite has been suggested in the report as to the change which should be made with regard to these subjects, but the conference has recommended that a committee of legal experts should be appointed by Great Britain and the representatives of the dominions to inquire into the whole matter and make recommendations that would safeguard all interests and still agree with the general principle laid down by the conference.

I will deal briefly with each one of these subjects. I am glad everyone who has so far taken part in the debate, even my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, has agreed that the power of dissallowance is obsolete and can be said at present to have no constitutional effect. Indeed, Sir Robert Borden used very strong language in that regard, when he said that this power is constitutionally dead. There are, however, in the constitutions of some dominions, matters which have to be reserved for the assent of the king in order to protect certain particular interests. For instance, laws affecting alterations of the powers of the states of the Commonwealth of Australia have to be reserved for the assent of the king under the constitution of Australia; laws affecting the constitution or powers of the provincial councils of South Africa and certain acts of the lower house there must also be reserved. All these features would have to be considered by the committee of legal experts.

Perhaps at this stage I might say something about the rights of the various dominions to change their own constitutions. I have already had occasion, even during the present session, to refer to the British North America Act, and to give the reasons why in that constitution power was not given to the Dominion of Canada to alter it. Confederation was a compromise. The provinces agreed to give up some of their powers and entrust them to the federal authority, while taking to themselves certain other powers, and within the limits of their jurisdiction they are as supreme and they have just as many rights of self-government as the Dominion of Canada has within its own jurisdiction. The power of altering the constitution was not given in the British North America Act because of the circumstances of this country, to which I need not refer. In Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the Irish Free State they have this power of modifying their own constitution, but not to as large an extent as some people seem to think.

Mr. BENNETT: Except Australia.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Australia? Well, some of the states of Australia cannot—

Mr. BENNETT: I mean the commonwealth.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The commonwealth itself has wide powers, but they have to be exercised by absolute majorities in both houses of parliament and approved on referendum by the electors; and every time any change with regard to the relations between the commonwealth and the states of Australia has been sought that change has always been defeated when the referendum went to the people. In New Zealand some important constitutional changes would have to be reserved for the royal assent. In South Africa changes affecting the number and distribution of seats in the lower house, the native franchise in the Cape province, and equality of the Dutch and English languages can be brought about only by two-thirds majority of both houses at a joint sitting.

Mr. BENNETT: After ten years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, after ten years, and as I said before, changes affecting the provinces of South Africa have to be reserved for the assent of the king. In this country, as I have already stated, the provinces are autonomous in their own sphere. The crown acts with regard to provincial matters upon the advice of the government of the province. As I had occasion to state in other circumstances, when we speak of the autonomy of Canada we speak of Canada as the confederation of nine provinces, each one of those provinces having as supreme powers within its own sphere as the federal authority here has with respect to its sphere. May I quote here the words of Sir Robert Borden in the House of Commons in a speech delivered in 1917 with regard to the crown acting upon the advice of the provinces in those matters:

> The crown acts in the United Kingdom and in all the self-governing dominions of the empire, it acts in the United Kingdom upon the advice of the ministers of the United Kingdom, it acts in each of the dominions upon the advice of the appropriate ministers—in federal affairs, upon the advice of federal ministers; in provincial and state affairs, upon the advice of provincial and state ministers. It is the same crown throughout, acting upon the advice of different ministers. That tie of allegiance to the crown is the tie which chiefly binds together the empire to-day so far as constitutional considerations are concerned.

The language of the report preserves the right of the provinces which are absolutely self-governing in those matters coming within their jurisdiction. The principle of equality is not, I submit, affected by such condition, which is merely the expression of the will of the people.

Many people claim that the fact that we cannot in this parliament alter our own constitution is creating a state of subordination. I claim that so long as this condition exists because of the will of the Canadian people, a condition which will exist as long as the Canadian people wish it to do so, changes that could be made shall have to be made by the parties to the contract. But that condition, which is dependent upon our own wish in the matter, does not, I claim, create a state of subordination. I deny most emphatically that a condition of subordination and colonial inferiority is essential to the preservation of the rights of minorities in Canada. And let me tell the leader of the opposition that those for whom I claim I have some right to speak, have always fought for responsible government and for self-government in this country, for freedom and national status within the British Empire and under the British crown.

As I have already stated, the report of the conference does not and could not in any way modify the pact of confederation. Let me say, without any hesitation, however, that in this matter I entirely agree, without any reservation, with my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), to the effect that our own protection, as far as those rights are concerned, depends upon ourselves, that we must look to ourselves for the safeguard of our rights and our interests. No authority outside of Canada can effectively protect them for us. We must rely upon ourselves for the safeguard and protection of those rights, working in coöperation and understanding with our fellow Canadians in this country. It would not be possible, Sir, to secure the permanent adhesion of any section of the Canadian people to any plan whereby there would be any political force superior to their own government and their own constitution which could, even indirectly, have authority to control their actions. It is not an act of isolation or indifference; it is an act of readiness to serve in the nation's own way. If Canada goes wrong, she will go wrong on her own responsibility and on her own motion, but Canada will never go wrong; I think I may say that.

Now my hon. friend read yesterday what he said were words of the premier of Quebec published in the Round Table. I may say that I have a letter from the premier in which he is far from blaming or criticizing the part which my right hon. friend and myself have taken in the conference; and he took the trouble to send me—because some newspapers had reported him in that light—a copy of the Chronicle-Telegraph, in which his speech made on the occasion when Lord Willingdon was in Quebec, appeared in its entirety. Here is what he said:

> Since these last few days, I am still prouder because Canada and the other dominions, by unanimous consent, have been admitted, on equal terms, to the family table.
> The British Empire is to-day a great and powerful society of great and powerful nations. They are not united by chains even of golden links, but by bonds much stronger, which appeal much more to human hearts and human minds, bonds of mutual trust, common interests, sincere and everlasting friendship. Such bonds are unbreakable, and I admire the spirit that prevailed at the Imperial conference and which brought out such results. Never could the bonds which unite us be stronger than those by which we are held together.

If I read English well, this is not a criticism. May I now say a few words concerning the rights claimed by Canada and other dominions to have extra-territorial effect attach to their legislation?

Mr. MANION: May I ask a question for my information and for the information of the House? I am trying to understand the minister as I generally do. Do I understand him to say that his attitude is that he would be perfectly satisfied to see the parliament of Canada absolutely able to change our constitution as regards all matters relating to our internal affairs without submitting the question to the Privy Council in England?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should my hon. friend say that when, even in a debate which we had during this session, I opposed a motion to that effect coming from an hon. member? I said that no change has been made. I said that no change to the British North America Act can be made without the consent of the parties to the pact and I have said that in this speech. My remarks concerning minorities in Canada are quite independent of that. I said that no change had been made; but as regards the protection of minorities, I have not the fears which the leader of the opposition has.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish in any way to put words into my hon. friend's mouth, but I listened as attentively as I could and I drew that conclusion from his remarks. Some of my hon. friends say that they drew the same conclusion, so that my hon. friend is somewhat to blame.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member wants to attach that impression to my remarks.

Mr. MANION: I do not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am well aware of the language I have been using; I have given some attention to the preparation of this speech, and I do not think any hon. member will be able to lend to my remarks a sense which they do not possess. I know what I mean and I think I am saying it pretty clearly.

Mr. MANION: I think the hon. member should thank me for making his remarks clear, because it was not clear to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend thinks he deserves my thanks I will extend them to him with great pleasure, but I think we shall wait until my remarks appear in Hansard.

Mr. MANION: I can get along without the thanks.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can get along without the interruption too. There has been doubt as to whether the dominions possess the right to give to their legislation or enactments extra-territorial effect. The courts have decided both ways. At times the Privy Council has decided in favour of granting that right to the dominion, and at other times it has denied that right to the dominion. The courts in the dominions themselves have also not been unanimous in that respect. We in Canada have always claimed that we have that right. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who seems to be absolutely adverse to changes, I know has not claimed it; but the governments of Canada have claimed it and the matter has more than ever after the war come to a head from a practical standpoint.

In 1920 the president of the Air Board asked this government to take the necessary steps to make it clear that legislation or regulations concerning aviation would follow Canadian subjects even after they had crossed over the boundary line. We have the same complication with regard to customs matters. It seems necessary for Canada that Canadian subjects who, for instance, conspire outside the limits of this country to defraud the public treasury, should be amenable to the laws of the land. In 1920 the then government—and again I must say that the leader of the opposition was a member of it—adopted an order in council asking the Imperial government to amend the British North America Act so as to make it clear that Canada has this right of extra-territorial jurisdiction. May I be permitted to read a couple of sentences from that order in council, because its language suits me better than the present language of some hon. members opposite? It reads:

Whether the laws of Canada in like cases impose a similar obligation upon the domestic tribunals may be a debatable question, and the purpose of this report is to submit that the existence of any doubt as to the propriety of resolving that question in the affirmative is incompatible with the true purpose and intent of the constitution of the Dominion, and the position which Canada occupies as a constituent state of the empire exercising with respect to all matters appertaining to the self-government of Canada, sovereign legislative authority.

And further there is this fine language in the order in council:

In the growth of the constitution the United Kingdom and the dominions have under His Majesty relations which may be assimilated to those of independent sovereign states—

If a Liberal had even written or signed such a doctrine it would be termed a rebellion.

—each exercising within its own compass exclusive and independent sovereign powers of legislation and government, and which make it constitutionally the duty of the parliament of the United Kingdom on the one hand, to see that its legislation does not invade the appropriate sphere of dominion authority, and for the parliament of the dominion, on the other, to see that its legislation is confined within that sphere. By the observance of these principles perfect harmony is ensured, but the attribute of unlimited sovereignty with its incidents is just as essential for the peace, order and good government of Canada within its constitutional range of authority as it is for the United Kingdom within its own domain, or for the empire as a whole in relation to imperial affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: Whose order in council did the minister say that was?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is dated the 5th February, 1920.

Mr. BENNETT: On the recommendation of whom?

Mr. LAPOINTE: On the recommendation of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend says: "That is what I thought," but the Minister of Justice did not pass the order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He recommended it; it was passed by the government, and the leader of the opposition was a distinguished member of that government. After this was adopted by the government of that day, steps were taken for the purpose of giving effect to it. A resolution was first introduced into and adopted by parliament; but its language did not suit the officers of the crown in England, and I myself two or three years ago introduced a new resolution, the language of which had been agreed to in both England and Canada. Unfortunately that resolution was amended by the Senate in a way that made it quite unworkable; but we have the assurance that when an address is sent by the Dominion of Canada to the Imperial parliament, we shall obtain that change. The reason why no step has been taken in that direction this year is because this question of extra-territorial jurisdiction is submitted to a committee and there is no reason why we should precipitate ourselves in the matter.

Mr. CAHAN: What was the nature of the resolution to which the Minister of Justice referred?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is how it reads:

An enactment of the parliament of Canada if expressed to operate extra-territorially shall have and be deemed to have had that operation if and in so far as it is a law for or ancillary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Was that an address to secure an amendment at that time to the British North America Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That was made by way of an address. I come now to the Colonial Laws Validity Act, which is one of the imperial enactments which is going to be considered by this committee of legal experts. It is indeed a relic of olden days when only a partial measure of self-government was enjoyed by the dominions. By the Colonial Laws Validity Act, which is an act of 1865, it is enacted that:

Any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such act of parliament, or having in the colony the force and effect of such act, shall be read subject to such act, order, or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

It is on the provisions of this act that the Privy Council last year declared invalid article 1025 of the Criminal Code of Canada, which prohibited appeals to the Privy Council in criminal matters, and the judgment that was delivered was based on this act because there are in existence, as my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said the other day, two old laws, one of 1833, and one of 1844, granting to subjects of His Majesty in the colonies the right to take their case to the Privy Council.

Mr. BENNETT: Colony or dominion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Or dominion, but at that time there were really no dominions in existence. I must say that Sir John Thompson, when he was Minister of Justice for Canada, took a strong attitude to the effect that in matters which were within the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada under the British North America Act, the legislation of Canada superseded the legislation of the Imperial parliament passed prior to the enactment of the British North America Act. Though I do not like to place my opinion beside that of such a distinguished Minister of Justice as Sir John Thompson was, I do not agree with him, and as a matter of pure law I think the Privy Council was right in saying that the Colonial Laws Validity Act rendered invalid and unconstitutional article 1025 of the Criminal Code. I do not know whether my hon. friend from West Calgray will agree with me in that.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has left out one sentence that he intended to say. The Privy Council decided that with respect to Canada the section is binding. I wholly agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What I say is that article 1025 of the Criminal Code was on the statute books of Canada from 1888; it had been accepted by the people of Canada, and if any old legislation, legislation almost one hundred years old, obstructs the will of the Canadian people, I am in favour of repealing it. I may say that we were to submit a question in this regard to parliament during this present session, but it has been postponed to the next session owing to the appointment of the committee which is going to deal with this matter.

Now I come to the question of appeals to the Privy Council, which was perhaps the most interesting and the most important part of the remarks of the leader of the opposition yesterday. I call the attention of the House to the language of the report concerning appeals to the Privy Council. It says:

Another matter which we discussed, in which a general constitutional principle was raised, concerned the conditions governing appeals from judgments in the dominions to the judicial committee of the Privy Council. From these discussions it became clear that it was no part of the policy of His Majesty's government in Great Britain that questions affecting judicial appeals should be determined otherwise than in accordance with the wishes of the part of the empire primarily affected. It was, however, generally recognized that, where changes in the existing system were proposed which, while primarily affecting one part, raised issues in which other parts were also concerned, such changes ought only to be carried out after consultation and discussion.

The leader of the opposition took strong exception to this part of the report of the conference; indeed, it was upon this part that his fears were based with regard to the rights of minorities in Canada. I may say that this part of the report is simply stating what the facts are; it is stating the position as it exists, and I am ready to join issue with my hon. friend in that regard. I took the position at the conference, and I am pleased to reiterate it here, that in so far as appeals to the Privy Council are concerned, there are differences of opinion in Canada as to whether or not they should be retained. I myself would not be in favour at the present time of doing away with appeals to the Privy Council, but the position I took there, and the position I take here, is that it is for the people of this Dominion of Canada to decide whether they want to retain these appeals or not. These questions I think ought to be discussed not in a political sense altogether, and I am afraid that there was some political flavour to the remarks of my hon. friend yesterday and to the amendment with which he concluded his remarks. However, if he wants to place this question in the political arena, I for one am prepared to follow him into that arena, and to plead that it is for us in the Dominion of Canada to decide whether we want to retain those appeals or not. In saying that, Mr. Speaker, I am only following the stand that was taken in 1875, fifty years ago, by Edward Blake when he was Minister of Justice for Canada. Edward Blake claimed that it was for Canada to decide as to that, and I repeat with Edward Blake with regard to this prerogative, which is called an imperial prerogative—that is, the right of any British subject to go to the foot of the throne with his case—how is it that this prerogative does not apply to His Majesty's subjects in Great Britain? How is it that the people of the colonies enjoy the exercise of this prerogative when the people of Great Britain can have final judgment passed by the courts of their own land, without appeal to the Privy Council? I am not one of those who believe that we should do away altogether with appeals to the Privy Council. I think that in some matters, for instance matters regarding constitutional issues, the gentlemen of the Privy Council should hear our appeals, although in that loyal state of Australia they have done away with the right of appeal on constitutional matters—and for what reason? They said it was for those in Australia who knew the conditions in the commonwealth to decide as to Australian matters, and certainly any citizen of this Dominion is free to proclaim whether or not he believes in the retention of appeals to the Privy Council.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister give the House one real reason why he still adheres to the idea of that form of subordination?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must say that I think that on questions arising for instance between the Dominion and the provinces with regard to matters which the provinces claim are within their jurisdiction, and in respect to which they are in conflict with this Dominion, it may be proper that the appeals should be to the Privy Council, but I am not a fanatic in regard to this matter at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I had hoped the hon. minister was not, because recalling a sentence of his speech recently, I took it he did want to be inconsistent. On ourselves we must depend for protection of our rights and toleration as among ourselves. I would like him to apply that principle to this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That does not mean that I am opposed to appeals to the Privy Council. But I must say it is not the Privy Council on which I rely for the protection of my rights or the rights of others.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then why not do away with the appeal to it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a question for discussion and deliberation, but I would not like to say that I would favour doing away altogether with appeals to the Privy Council.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is getting very near it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have a strong leaning.

Mr. CAHAN: Sliding downhill very rapidly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who expressed such fears about this matter touching the prerogative of the Privy Council, came into the parliament of Canada, I think, four years before I did. I have been here twenty-three years; I think he has been in parliament twenty-six or twenty-seven years, and he sat here silent while a section was being enacted in the statutes of Canada many years ago doing away with appeal to the Privy Council in certain matters. My hon. friend sat absolutely silent. He did not think the privileges of the minority, or his privileges, were interfered with by that amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said nothing about minorities.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, if so I am in the judgment of the House. I am glad he is now seeing the error of his way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said there was a constitutional safeguard to be found, and in regard to this safeguard I do not apply the same reasoning to criminal appeal.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the same principle.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If the prerogative does not exist in regard to criminal appeal, why should it exist in other matters?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said it did not matter much with regard to Australia because the constitution of Australia was not the same as ours.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not a question of right but of opportunity. We cannot do away with these appeals by enactment in this parliament. When the question is discussed of course my hon. friend may oppose the proposition.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It was not a question of fear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a question of fear on the part of my hon. friend, but I am trying to allay his fears in that regard. Really I do not think that we are so linked up with that prerogative for the preservation of the rights of any section of people in Canada as my hon. friend would seem to believe. I cannot agree with my hon. friend, and I would have to go back one hundred years to meet him on any common ground in that respect and adjust my views to what I believe his idea to be. As far as the rights of Quebec are concerned, my hon. friend read a few lines from Keith in that regard. He is a great constitutional writer—none better—but when he says that in Quebec the opinion of the people is so-and-so he is talking about something he has read in some of the papers in Canada which do not represent Quebec and the views of Quebec. Let me tell him that, far from being frightened about Quebec, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and I have received telegrams in the last three weeks from St. Jean Baptiste Society, from L'Action Francais and from influential bodies representing the French race—and I know the Premier of Quebec has received them also—asking to do away with the appeals to the Privy Council. Surely they have not the same fear as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I may say that perhaps the judgment in the Labrador case has had the effect of turning the minds of some people in that direction, but not with me. I said that I thought perhaps the Nadan judgment was according to law. I think that what must be done is to repeal the Colonial Laws Validity Act on which the judgment was based. In many parts of this country there has been an agitation on account of the judgment in the Nadan case. I do not say anything about the Labrador matter. I do not say that the judgment is perfect. I would have liked a different judgment myself, but after all the Labrador case was not an appeal to the Privy Council. It was not an ordinary case. Both Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada found a troublesome question in regard to the boundary and agreed to submit it to the Privy Council, a sort of judicial tribunal and selected by both parties, and the losing party must accept the decision.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not a court case. It was a submission to arbitration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So that that is not the feeling that animates me, but to alleviate the fears of my hon. friend with respect to Quebec I will tell him that the men in Quebec who represent really the aspirations of French-Canadians are applying to have the appeal to Privy Council done away with. On all these subjects no motion for ratification surely was necessary. The principle has been recognized as it was before, and if legislation is necessary after the expert committee has done its work, then such legislation would be submitted to this parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: This parliament?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Or the British parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, this parliament also.

Mr. CAHAN: I hope that promise will be kept.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have heard in this House, not in the course of this debate, but in the course of the debate on the address, that it was important to keep this parliament in some state of subordination because of the possibility of a foolish government in Canada enacting crazy legislation which would affect certain rights and privileges and then having no safeguard to prevent this legislation going into effect. Those who use this argument should apply the other end of it too: it might well be that the crazy government instead of being on this side of the House might be on the other side. Possibly there are people in Canada, especially among the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, who would like to be subject to the control of a parliament in Great Britain which might not represent their own views. During the great strike two years ago in England, all the newspapers declared that Britain was on the verge of having a communist government at the head of the country's affairs. I do not think all Canadians, even on the other side of the House, would care to be under the control of or to be in any way subordinate to a communist parliament on the other side of the Atlantic. It is my honest belief as a Canadian that we stand in less danger of having a foolish government in Canada than do the people in any other part of the world.

The work of the Imperial conference of 1926 has been accepted everywhere, not only in Great Britain but in the dominions, as having been of great value. It is commended in all quarters. I should like to have the time to quote many expressions of opinion in that regard, for even men who went there far from being satisfied left with a sense of satisfaction which means something to those who have at heart the preservation of the empire. Here is what General Hertzog said before leaving London:

> I feel that nothing has ever before been accomplished so calculated to lay a deep and enduring foundation for national coöperation between members of the British commonwealth of nations and insure real good feeling between us all.

A very influential American newspaper, the Washington Post, commenting on the conference, wrote:

> It may be observed that if the government of George III had possessed the wisdom of the government of George V, there would have been no declaration of independence, and the United States would now be part of the British commonwealth. The evolution from an empire to a commonwealth is accomplished by mutual consent, and no written constitution will follow to bind the bargain.

Mr. Amery, who I need not say is a strong imperialist, has the following to say:

> The conference marks the acknowledged coming-of-age of the younger nations of our commonwealth, and that is a great fact in history which it is worth while pausing a moment to recall. I think the time will undoubtedly come when the growth of the younger British nations in the bosom of the British commonwealth will be recognized to have been at least as great an event in the history of the world as the coming into existence of other nations during the last fifty or sixty years which have attracted much more public attention, because they have come into existence as the result of wars, whether wars that have led to unity, as in the case of the coming into existence of the united Italy or the united Germany, or wars which have broken up older organizations, as those which have created the new countries of central and north-eastern Europe. . . . What it does mean is that each partner in the empire is equally entitled to exercise every function of national life, and if any such function is carried on for it by some other part of the empire, that is a matter of consent, of convenience, of mutual arrangement, and not evidence of subordination on the part of one partner in the empire to another.

In this country, unfortunately, the situation is not what it is in Great Britain and some of the other dominions of the empire. Before I commit myself may I be allowed to quote certain words from an important periodical in this country, the Dalhousie Review,—all the more important, perhaps, in that the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is numbered among its directors. At the conclusion of a very clever and significant article on the work of the Imperial conference the writer says:

> No one appears to have any serious complaint to make against the decisions of the conference with reference to Canada. Then why a Tweedledum-Tweedledee partisan wrangle over them? Why not accept gratefully what has been accomplised, and devote our united efforts to perfecting the good work in all its details?

This is the first time in Canada, as I believe it is the first time in the history of the British commonwealth of nations, that an amendment has been moved in the shape of the one submitted in this instance, and speeches have been delivered outside of parliament such as have been made in this connection, as a result of the work of an Imperial conference. Heretofore when the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues were attending an Imperial conference—and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) was at one time a member of a government that took part in such a conference—did parliament take exception to their work? Did anyone ask that the approval of parliament be granted? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and those who were members of the House of Commons at the time, to bear in mind the words of hon. gentlemen, that these were sacred issues which ought not to be made the subject of political propaganda and partisan discussion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister assured us that these decisions of the Imperial conference were not binding unless ratified by parliament. How else, then, can we obtain sanction for these decisions except as a result of free discussion in this House?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no complaint to make about free discussion, but I think the amendment goes a little further than free discussion; and I say that my hon. friends of the Conservative party, by the voice of their leader and the moving of this amendment, have sounded the first discordant note in the British commonwealth with regard to the Imperial conference. Are they sincere? Is my hon. friend sincere? As I have said, never before was any motion introduced in parliament such as the one now proposed, and my hon. friend never before protested against such a course as we are now following. Do hon. gentlemen think that they help to preserve the empire by adopting such an attitude? Do they think they are adding to the value of the Imperial conference? Last fall after the general elections, which I believe were held on September 14,—the conference was to open in London in October—views were advanced that under the circumstances Canada could abstain from attending the conference: it was an arduous undertaking for men who had been during the course of two years in the thick of a political fight which we all recollect. Conservative newspapers and Conservative public men expressed the view in no uncertain terms that it was the duty of the government returned to power to attend that conference; it was a sacred duty, and we would have been strongly and bitterly criticized if we had not done so. We did go there, with no preparation of any kind; I do not complain of that, but we were there six weeks, during which time we endeavoured to represent Canada as best we could, and I do not think Canada has reason to complain of our work.

Mr. IRVINE: Might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would my hon. friend let me finish?

Mr. IRVINE: I am very sincere in this. I want to know if there is any good reason why this report was not brought before parliament at an earlier date?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not see why I should be asked such a question in the middle of a sentence which concerns an altogether different matter. I say that we were there trying to do our duty, and I think we did our duty. Is it fair, after coming back to Canada with the sense of having been loyal to our task and of having fulfilled it to the best of our ability that I, for instance, should be confronted with the statement that I have neglected and compromised interests which are dearer to me than they are to the leader of the opposition? If he will permit me to say so, I believe in my modest way that I am just as able to protect those interests as he is. I believe it is not fair; I believe it is not conducive to empire building, and I believe that if Canadian public men must face that kind of warfare perhaps some of them might very well come to the opinion already held by others that they should not attend these conferences but should look for the settlement of Canadian questions on this side of the water, by Canadians and in this country only. That is where my hon. friends are leading with the warfare they are now waging, and I claim it is not fair.

Mr. Speaker, the rights of the minorities in Canada and the rights of the minority in Quebec can, I believe, be safeguarded by myself quite as well as by the leader of the opposition. He is afraid for the future, and for those who will come fifty or one hundred years from now; let him unite with me to correct the present evils instead of looking so far ahead. This is not a fair way to conduct political warfare on a question of this kind. I do not wish to say more in that regard, but I resented very much and still resent the implications contained in the speech of the leader of the opposition and in the amendment which he brought forward. I have done my duty, and I think I can still do my duty.

I know this attempt will be futile, however, and I will forget it altogether in order to bring my remarks to a more pleasant and happy conclusion. There is no such thing as an indefinite status quo in national life; populations grow, conditions of life change, and it is the part of wisdom for governments to legislate for present and future requirements. The British Empire is composed of men of almost every race; it includes nations developing their destinies under various racial, economic and political conditions peculiar to themselves. In our membership we have elements which, outside of the empire, would often lead to war, but the aim is to evolve a system by which various interests, even though at first sight they may seem opposed and antagonistic, may be coördinated in such a manner that individual national sentiments and industrial and economic development may be fully promoted and encouraged by the various means and policies best suited to the respective peoples, at the same time engendering sympathy and good feeling towards one another. Such was the spirit which animated the men who took part in the conference of 1926. The British Empire has been founded and is maintained on and by compromise. There could not be a more striking illustration of that than to see a Dutchman from South Africa, a Frenchman from Canada and an Irishman from the Free State meeting on an equal footing with the public men of Great Britain, and coöperating with them in an endeavour to find the best mode of preserving the association of our nations.

We are celebrating this year the sixtieth anniversary of confederation; the work of building a nation in Canada has been achieved, and no more evidence of that fact is needed than the debate which is now proceeding. We may say with pride that on the whole the task of the statesmen of 1867 has been successful. Our country, as well as the British commonwealth of nations, is founded on compromise. There may be some who are impatient for changes in the pact which was agreed upon in 1867, and I would be the last to suggest that some modifications might not be made which would improve conditions. I fully agree that the problems of 1927 must be settled in the light of conditions which exist in 1927; that the questions of to-day must not be settled as they would have been settled by the men who lived sixty years ago, but as they would have been settled had those men been living to-day. But certain essentional and inherent conditions of our national existence require the greatest care and prudence in their study, and whatever suggestions may be considered the basis of the pact of confederation must be maintained at least in so far as our internal affairs are concerned. Sir, the principles and fundamental ideals which underlie that pact are the fuel necessary that the torch may burn brighter and illuminate through the darkness of our conflicts and difficulties the road to peace, progress and nationhood in this country.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I can cordially congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice upon the strength and vigour of his argument, and in many respects we on this side will, I am sure, quite heartily agree with him. A large part of his address comprised the reading of selections from orders in council passed and statements made by members of Conservative administrations from time to time since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, down to the present. I yield to no man, Mr. Speaker, in my advocacy of a self-reliant, strong and vigorous national life in Canada. I yield to no man in advocacy of the cutting off of every antiquated encumbrance which would prevent, or tend to prevent, the development in Canada of a national life of the highest character and the greatest intellectual vigour. This country comprises half a continent. Our population numbers nine millions of people. We have resources available to us such as no other population of like number in the wide world possess to-day. We have problems of every kind and description—political, social, educational and industrial—to solve for the great advantage of the country to-day, and for its material and moral prosperity and progress in the future. Therefore we on this side are as strong nationalists in all that pertains to the development of Canada and its national life as were our predecessors—Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Thompson, or any other of the old leaders of the Conservative party to whom the minister made reference this afternoon. But we on this side, and the party which we represent throughout the country, do conceive that the best aspirations and traditions of the two great races that originally founded the Canadian confederacy—and the men of all other races who have come in and declared themselves brothers of the blood with us in building up and developing Canada will find this to be the case—that we are true to our best traditions, that we will be carrying out our highest and best ideals, that we will best ensure the integrity and stability of this country for all time, by maintaining our political unity, not only with the British crown but with Great Britain and the other dominions beyond the seas; and whatever difficulties and problems we may encounter in working along that line, I say that the end to be attained is far more consistent with our best traditions of the past, is far more honcurable to the two great races in Canada, than to form any other conceivable connection with any other political power for the purpose of securing our national defence and the maintenance of the integrity of this country. But those are not the only issues which are presented to us to-day.

We have heard the Prime Minister of this country make the definite statement to the House that this report of the Imperial conference would be submitted to parliament with a recommendation that it be approved by us; but there is the further consideration that the new policy which he introduced last session can only be affirmed and continued by the carrying out of that program to which he pledged himself on December 13 last, in the debate on the address, when he said that the report and every portion of it, as it was written, would be submitted for the formal approval of this House. He speaks about other imperial conferences having been held in times past and no decision having been taken thereon by the House of Commons. But at the very last session of the House he introduced a new resolution, dealing with the report which had been adopted by the Imperial conference of 1923. He then declared that that report had been unanimously approved by the government's representatives at the Imperial conference, but that was not sufficient. He stated that not only did the ministers of the other self-governing dominions take the same position, in giving their assent to these resolutions, that what Canada had done with respect to a certain particular treaty was done in the right and proper way, but that the conference had further stated with respect to certain classes of treaties in the future that the procedure then adopted should hereafter be followed. Therefore he came before the House and declared that he required from the parliament of Canada a resolution which would express the definite approval of the program enunciated at the Imperial conference of 1923, whereby the action of future governments of Canada wou'd be restricted to the scope of the resolution and the schedule which he then presented to parliament, and he declared that for all time in the future, until parliament had ratified amendments or modifications thereto, these resolutions would be binding upon the successive governments of Canada, in conformity with the principles announced at the Imperial conference, with regard to the negotiation of treaties and the extent to which they would be binding upon this parliament—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend just to make the point clear as to the scope of the reference he is making? It was one portion of the report, that which dealt with treaties, that was submitted to the House, not the entire report of the conference. I think he will agree as to that.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, and I remarked at the time that the resolution on Imperial defence, which was ratified by the right hon. gentleman, was in the opinion of many quite as important, that he had hesitated, to use a mild term, to ratify that portion of the report, but that portion which seemed to be consistent with his own policy,—with regard to the negotiation of treaties—he had brought down and had requested the formal approval of parliament to it. That being so we have now laid on the table of the House another report of the later Imperial conference of 1926. I submit that it is perfectly clear, as stated by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) last evening, that this new report as submitted with regard to the negotiation of treaties, amends and modifies in very essential particulars the resolutions which were adopted by this parliament last year. Under the resolutions of the Imperial conference of 1926 the parliament of Canada may be bound in respect of a large class of treaties by the mere indifference or neglect on the part of the Prime Minister or the Minister of External Affairs to enter a protest against the negotiation or confirmation of a treaty affecting this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I am afraid I cannot sit still and say nothing when he makes a statement to which I must take complete exception. I do not in relation to treaties agree with his interpretation of the report or the manner in which he is giving it.

Mr. CAHAN: During the debate on the address I called attention to specific clauses of this resolution dealing with the negotiation of treaties, where for the first time it is introduced into an Imperial conference report that the government of any other dominion or the government of the United Kingdom having once notified us with regard to the negotiation of a treaty in which we might be interested, and the government of this country having neglected to register a protest, we could be deemed bound to adhere to the provisions of that treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. If that is my hon. friend's interpretation, he is not reading the report correctly. I might state what my interpretation is and then he can say if he disagrees. Each government is bound to notify the other governments so that they will all be aware of the intention. If no exception is taken by a government, then the government which is making the treaty may assume that it is at liberty to go ahead. Before, however, any particular government will be bound in the matter of obligations under a treaty, it must specifically agree to be so bound. That follows in another part of the same document.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot give to it the same interpretation which the right hon. gentleman does. With regard to the negotiation of treaties this is the new provision:

When a government has received information of the intention of any other government to conduct negotiations, it is incumbent upon it to indicate its attitude with reasonable promptitude. So long as the initiating government receives no adverse comments and so long as its policy involves no active obligations on the part of the other governments, it may proceed on the assumption that its policy is generally acceptable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So long as its policy involves no active obligations on the part of the other governments, it may proceed.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, and we have the definition of the Minister of Justice that the term "active obligations" refers particularly to such obligations as might result in war. There are treaties negotiated and likely to be negotiated which might affect the most intimate commercial relations of this country, which might affect the status of Canadian citizens in any part of the world, which might be prejudicial in every respect to the interests of Canada, and yet for the first time we have it introduced into a report of an imperial conference, in amendment and modification of the principles laid down in the resolution submitted to us last session, that such treaties may become binding upon us; that we may be morally bound to carry them out, even though they have not received the assent of this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just ask my hon. friend to be kind enough to read the last sentence of the paragraph from which he was reading. He has omitted, not intentionally, I am sure, the one significant sentence.

Mr. CAHAN: It is like other sentences in the report in that you can take any meaning you wish out of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The restriction is emphatic and clear.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with this part which reads:

> Where by the nature of the treaty it is desirable that it should be ratified on behalf of all the governments of the empire—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my hon. friend is skipping the sentence. He is reading the next paragraph. Let him read the sentence between the one which he is now reading and the one which he read before.

Mr. CAHAN: The initiating government—> —must, however, before taking any steps which might involve the other governments in any active obligations, obtain their definite assent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exactly.

Mr. CAHAN: That is restricted solely to active obligations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the only obligation that means anything.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: It is restricted solely to active obligations, whereas I stated that in the opinion of the Minister of Justice today active obligations imply military sanctions and the like. But those other treaties may infringe upon the natural rights or the nationality rights of Canadian citizens throughout the world, and yet by the mere neglect of the department over which the Prime Minister presides, those treaties may be concluded without having ever been submitted to this parliament.

However we may differ in our views as to the construction of that particular clause, there can be no doubt in the mind of the right hon. gentleman that there are in this Imperial conference report two or three closely printed pages which modify, amend and change in very considerable particulars the resolutions which were submitted to this House at the last session. I ask him now whether he is going to submit this new report—he has stated he is not—for the approval of parliament. If he does not do so, which will be binding upon this parliament—the resolutions of 1923 which were ratified during last session, or the resolutions of 1923 as modified and amended by the resolutions contained in the Imperial conference report of 1926?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wishes to introduce a resolution advocating that this parliament should endorse these resolutions, I will support him in that regard and I think the government also will.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why did the government not do so?

Mr. CAHAN: Was there ever such an exhibition by a prime minister in any country? Having taken his position as representative of this country at an Imperial conference dealing with a great charter of liberty which is to stand for all time, he returns to parliament; he pledges his honour that he will produce the report to parliament and ask parliament for its approval; then within a few weeks he renounces that pledge and now he asks a private member of the opposition to stand up and move the adoption of the report. This shows simply the farcical position to which the policy of the Prime Minister reduces national government in this country.

Mr. ERNST: Quebec's backbone shivers.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not dealing with that phase of the question. The Prime Minister at the Imperial conference endorsed every jot and tittle that appears in this report. In making an address at the House of Lords' dinner he stated, dealing with the report:

> In all that has been recorded you of the motherland and we of the dominions are in complete accord.

It was not only the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice of this Dominion who were in complete accord. Not only did the Prime Minister propose to speak on behalf of himself or his government, but he spoke or alleged that he spoke on behalf of the parliament and the people of Canada; and yet his courage has so oozed out that he dare not now present the report for the approval of parliament. In the address which he submitted to parliament through His Excellency the Governor General he declared:

> Members of my government have just returned to Canada from attending the meetings of the Imperial conference. The report of the proceedings of the conference, together with its recommendations, will be placed before you for consideration.

Has that pledge been carried out?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is before the House now for consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not before the House for consideration. The right hon. gentleman dare not place it before the House for consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is before the House for consideration now.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman dare not move a resolution for its favourable consideration. He leaves it to private members on this side of the House to propose such resolutions, if need be. What has come over the mind of the hon. gentleman since he prepared this address for His Excellency the Governor General, or what has intervened to prevent him from carrying out his pledge? At Toronto on February 4, 1927, the Prime Minister referred to the Imperial conference as giving wholly new force and meaning to the constitutional position of Great Britain and the dominions—I had the advantage of listening to the right hon. gentleman's statements over the radio, and I was surprised that many of his emphatic statements did not appear so clearly in the public press. On making inquiry of the press as to the reason why, I was informed that the press report had been in the hands of the newspapers for some time before the address was delivered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon friend cite one emphatic statement to which he attaches significance that was made at that meeting but was not reported?

Mr. CAHAN: I could if I were to tax my memory. There was a very different tone with respect to many statements. The words and the expressions used in many, many respects conveyed a different impression to my mind as I listened, from that of the hard cold type which I read the next morning.

Mr. CANNON: That is quite different.

Mr. CAHAN: This is the official report of what the Prime Minister said at that meeting:

> That position now carries with it the imprimatur of an Imperial conference voicing in one note of common agreement the opinion of all parts of the British Empire as to the basic principles on which that empire rests.

He proceeds:

> To have common agreement on the part of all members of the British commonwealth of nations on so fundamental a root principle governing our inter-imperial relations is no small achievement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the right hon. gentleman assume, like Pilsudski, the dictator of Poland, or like Mussolini, the Prime Minister of Italy, that he can attend a great conference like that and speak for the whole people of Canada, that he can bind the whole people of Canada to the fundamental principles embodied in that report, and yet be so negligent of his duty and responsibility as to refuse to present the work which he in part created to the House of Commons and to the parliament of Canada for ratification?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend wish to know why I did not bring in the report and submit it for the adoption of the House? I wished to make that statement yesterday when the leader of the opposition brought up the point. I stated that I could clear his mind at once, but he would not give me an opportunity. I shall be very glad to make that statement now if my hon. friend will give me the opportunity.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it long or short?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will not be very long.

Mr. CAHAN: In view of the pledge which the right hon. gentleman made in the address, I think it was due to himself that he should have made that statement when introducing this matter on the motion for going into supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will allow me, I thought the reason was so apparent that it did not even enter my mind to make that explanation, but I will give the reason immediately if my hon. friend will allow me.

Mr. CAHAN: Will it take long?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will take a very few minutes, but I think it will be worth while.

Mr. CAHAN: You hardly have time; it is nearly six o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the second time I have been refused the opportunity by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CAHAN: I will give the right hon. gentleman the opportunity on the opening of the debate to-morrow if he desires it.

According to this report, Canada is admittedly a member of the British commonwealth of nations. But who authorized the Prime Minister of this country to give Canada's assent to this common agreement which is declared to be of such surpassing importance? Were the Prime Minister and his colleague the Minister of Justice authorized by parliament to give such assent? I know of no such authority. And if not from parliament, what was the source of the authority which they did exercise, or purported to exercise, in binding Canada as a whole and the parliament and people of Canada to that new agreement? At Toronto, as well as in this House, the Prime Minister declared that this was one of the great charters in British history. He said:

> I have said, and I wish to repeat, that in this particular the conclusion of the conference as embodied in the report of the committee on imperial relations, will, I believe, hold a place in history by the side of the great charters of human freedom which comprise so large a part of what is known as the written portions of the constitution of Great Britain itself.

And yet we of the parliament of Canada, and the people of Canada on whose behalf he purported to act, have never authorized him to give assent for any other than his own government. He has no authority from parliament; he has no authority from the people's representatives in parliament, and yet he dares take the responsibility of refusing to submit the report to parliament where it can be dealt with clause by clause and accepted with reservations, or otherwise, as parliament sees fit.

Mr. ERNST: Mussolini was a pigmy to him.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: I notice that the Prime Minister quotes from the Spectator a very emphatic paragraph:

> For years to come the report will be regarded as a charter of freedom for the British commonwealth of nations.

And yet having assumed the right to voice the views of the Canadian people at the conference, not only their views as to our constitutional status, but their views with regard to the procedure that must be taken to repeal or modify imperial statutes which have been in force for years, with regard to the procedure which must be taken to make amendments to the merchant shipping acts under which every ship of British registry in Canada sails from Canadian ports to any part of the world, as well as grave amendments and modifications to the Admiralty Courts Act, upon which is based the jurisdiction of every Admiralty court in this country, and as well the abrogation, modification or amendment of the Judicial Committee Acts which ever since 1833 have governed the right of petition by litigants in this country to the Privy Council of Great Britain—the Prime Minister proposes, without the sanction and approval of this parliament, to make such grave amendments, modifications and changes as never before at one time were proposed in the history of this country. He proposes to carry out those changes simply upon the ipse dixit of the new autocrat in Canada who sits in the seat of the Prime Minister of this country, aided by the action of the Imperial parliament, in which we are not represented, and with which we have no means of communication at all except through the Prime Minister of this country.

As it is six o'clock I move the adjournment of the debate. I propose to consider those various modifications and the responsibility which Canada has to take in approving of them.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 31, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

That the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1926 and the Public Accounts for the year ending March 31, 1926, be referred to the select standing committee on public acounts.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): The only remark I have to offer in regard to this motion is that it is rather late in the session to bring down the reports of the Auditor General and refer them to the select standing committee on public accounts. There will be no opportunity to do anything this year, and I think the government should have referred these accounts to this committee a month or two months ago.

Mr. ROBB: I quite agree with the observations of the leader of the opposition, and until to-day I thought these accounts had been referred to that committee.

Motion agreed to.

OVERSEA SETTLEMENT—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. During the summer of 1926, did the Department of Immigration and Colonization conduct the Earl of Clarendon, chairman of the oversea settlement committee, and Mr. T. C. Macnaughten, vice-chairman, on a trip inspecting British family settlement and future settlement opportunities in Canada?

2. Was the province of British Columbia visited?

3. If so, what districts were covered?

4. What opinions, if any, were expressed by the British visitors as to the settlement opportunities in British Columbia?

5. Have any agreements been negotiated providing for coöperation in settlement between the Dominion and provincial goverments in Canada, and the oversea settlement committee jointly?

6. Are any such agreements in process of negotiation?

7. In any such agreements either negotiated or under consideration, has the government of the province of British Columbia participated in any way?

8. Has the government of the province of British Columbia submitted to the Dominion government any definite proposals as a basis for such settlement agreements?

9. Certain large tracts of lands in British Columbia are owned as the Fielding family's holding at Salmon River, near Prince George, Lord Exeter's holding near Exeter on the P.G. & E. railway. Has the British Columbia government, or the Dominion government, made any proposals for the settlement of these lands?

10. Was the Dominion government instrumental in bringing a number of Esthonian families under Sir John Pitka to Canada in 1924? If so, were these people settled in the Stewart lake district, British Columbia? Were they settled under provincial or dominion auspices? Has the settlement been successful?

11. Has a property known as the Amiens farm in the Fraser valley, near Matsqui, British Columbia, been sub-divided for the settlement of British families? If so, how many families have been settled? What type of family was selected for this settlement? Has this settlement been successful to date?

Hon. Mr. FORKE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The oversea settlement committee party was taken by motor car from Sicamous south through Okanagan district, touching Enderby, Armstrong, Vernon, Kelowna, Summerland and Penticton. The party then went by rail to Vancouver. Two days were spent in motor trips to farms and settlers in the Fraser valley, after which the Courtenay and Victoria districts on Vancouver island were covered by motor car. The party then travelled over the P. and G. E. railway from Squamish to Exeter and from thence by motor car along the Cariboo trail to Quesnel and Prince George with a further day's motoring in the Buckley valley near Smithers and Telkwa. Altogether the party were motored over 1,200 miles in British Columbia, and they visited nearly 50 British families on the land.

4. The British visitors were of the opinion that the province of British Columbia offered excellent opportunities for the assisted settlement of British people. They were particularly impressed with the settlement opportunities along the Canadian National Prince Rupert line.

5. Yes.

6. Yes.

7. Yes, correspondence is now in progress.

8. Answered by No. 7.

9. No.

10. Sir John Pitka, as a result of a trip made to Canada in the summer of 1923, brought a party of Esthonians to Canada in 1924 and secured a location near Stewart Lake. The party was met at Halifax by land settlement officers and conducted through to Vanderhoof where they were turned over to the provincial government. The department has but meagre information as to the success of the colony but understands that progress is slow owing to the lack of capital. A number of new settlers have arrived since the first party of 1924.

11. The Amiens farm has been sub-divided and eleven families have been settled. Scotch dairy farmers were selected. The settlement thus far has given outstanding evidences of success.

EXPORT OF HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

Mr. HANSON:

1. Is there now current a license to the Maine and New Brunswick Power Company to export hydro-electric power to the United States?

2. If so, when was such license first issued?

3. Is it the intention of the department concerned to continue the yearly export license to this company?

4. Is the government aware that the company in question, or interests closely allied to this company are at present promoting opposition to a measure in the Maine legislature looking to the creation of storage facilities for hydro-electric development in the province of New Brunswick, and in the light of such information is the department willing to renew the export license of this company?

Hon. Mr. MALCOLM:

1. Yes.

2. The current license was issued on April 14, 1926. The first license was issued on November 9, 1907.

3. The company's application is now under consideration by the government.

4. Representations have been received from the Prime Minister of New Brunswick, relative to the renewal of this export license. He requested that his representations be treated confidentially at present.

HOG GRADING SYSTEM

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to an article which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire of March 17, 1927. I shall read about ten lines from this article and then base a question upon it. The article is headed, "Hog grading system likely to be changed," and it goes on to say:

An important change in the hog grading system which has prevailed in Canada for the past five years may be made, as result of altered conditions. The Dominion government has been asked to call a conference of the men who went into the matter in 1921, to discuss the whole problem and work out a solution once more. This fact was made known by S. E. Todd, secretary treasurer of the Council of Canadian Meat Packers, who yesterday addressed the legislature's standing committee on agriculture.

My question is, has Mr. Todd, secretary of the Packers council been given authority to announce the federal policy in this matter before agricultural committees in other provinces?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lincoln was so busy asking a question of my colleague beside me that I am not sure whether I caught the hon. member's question or not, but I happen to have had placed before me since coming into the House the paragraph that he has read from the Toronto Mail and Empire. With respect to the announcement or statement alleged to have been made by Mr. Todd before the agricultural committee of the Ontario House. my hon. friend will notice that the word "may" is used there:

An important change in the hog grading system which has prevailed in Canada for the past five years may be made, as result of altered conditions.

The article also states that the Dominion government was asked to call a conference. That is not correct. When it was learned by the department that certain changes were contemplated by the packers, a departure we thought from the arrangement made in 1921, I at once took the responsibility of calling a conference of those who participated in the original conference in November, 1921, together with representatives of some additional organizations that have come into existence since then. Consequently a conference has been called, not to declare any new policy but rather to permit these various representatives to confer with each other and find out what changes, if any, were necessary due to the altered conditions in the world markets with respect to the grading of bacon.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Would the minister lay on the table a copy of the record of the conference of packers, government officials, and others, held in 1921 to discuss hog grading, the 10 per cent premium, and bacon grading, and also copies of the resolutions which came before that conference?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: An order was passed only the other day asking that that be done, but we have not yet got around to it. There are a good many questions of a similar nature; they all seem to have accumulated at once. My staff are very busy, but the information asked for will be brought down, and it will answer more thoroughly than I have done to-day the question put by the hon. member for Peace River.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): May I ask the Minister of the Interior if he has any information to give the House at this late stage of the session as to the progress of the case dealing with the diversion of water through the Chicago drainage canal?

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I have nothing new to communicate, but I will be very glad to discuss the matter in committee of supply. We have not secured from the United States government permission to release the notes recently exchanged and which were spoken of earlier this session.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister any information as to when the case is likely to be concluded, and will he also tell the House whether Canada is represented by counsel?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You mean before the United States courts?

Mr. MANION: I mean, has the government entrusted anyone with a watching brief?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have not given a watching brief but we have a representative there.

Mr. MANION: Who is he?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Cory.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Did I gather from the Minister of the Interior that Canada was represented at Washington by separate counsel on the proceedings in reference to the Chicago drainage canal? I understood him to say that somebody had a watching brief for the Dominion. I have heard that Mr. Cory, son of the Deputy Minister of the Interior was attending the conference in some capacity. Is he the gentleman who holds the watching brief for Canada in this important investigation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): "Watching brief" is hardly the proper term to use. We had Mr. Cory attend all the sittings and listen to the representations that have been made in connection with this matter before Mr. Justice Hughes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does my hon. friend not think the matter is of sufficient importance to employ on behalf of Canada some eminent counsel in the United States to watch these proceedings?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I hardly think that course would be warranted. We have a full report of all the proceedings, and if necessary can later on employ eminent counsel to advise in the matter.

UNITED STATES EMBARGO ON MILK AND CREAM

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER (Compton): May I draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that I have received a letter from Mr. H. J. Carlos, of Paquetteville, expressing the great discouragement of the farmers in his district on account of the embargo on the exportation of milk and cream to the United States. I should like to know whether any progress has been made looking to the raising of this embargo?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): As I announced yesterday, officials of the Department of Agriculture were in correspondence with the Quebec Department of Health and the Ontario Department of Health asking them to give us a complete record of all or any outbreaks of rural typhoid in any part of the embargoed area. We have reports from both Departments of Public Health and the report for Ontario is very satisfactory. During the last two months there has been only one outbreak in any part of the embargoed area in that province and the particular district concerned does not in any event ship milk to Montreal. Consequently, with regard to Ontario, we have a very good foundation upon which to lay a request that the embargo be circumscribed. I wish I could make the same report with regard to the dairy districts in Quebec; but until our special representative who went to Montreal yesterday returns and submits his report, I would rather defer making any comment regarding that part of the embargoed area.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

DEBATE ON STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AND AMENDMENT OF MR. GUTHRIE

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 30, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in reviewing the report of the Imperial conference committee and the special report on inter-imperial relations, I felt that the committee itself in the first section of that report rather deprecated the idea that it was then and there laying down a new constitution for the British commonwealth or empire. Their statement in section 2 of the report that the dominions—

—are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs—

—they themselves describe as a "formula" or a mere political "theory" of which they restrict the application by declaring:

But the principles of equality and similarity, appropriate to status, do not universally extend to function. Here we require something more than immutable dogmas.

I could well fancy that Lord Balfour drew up that part of the report. Similar language may be found on many pages of his works on philosophy. Having described their "formula" and propounded what they call their "dogma" and again as their political "theory," they declared:

We have endeavoured not only to state political theory, but to apply it to our common needs.

And they add:

Existing administrative, legislative and judicial forms are admittedly not wholly in accord with the position as described in section II of this report.

Which deals with equality of status of Great Britain and the dominions. That means, as I understand it, that the existing forms are not in accord with this formula, or dogma, or political theory of equality of status which they have laid down. Then they proceed to examine existing forms, as they say:

—with special reference to any cases where the want of adaptation of practice to principle caused, or might be thought to cause, inconvenience in the conduct of inter-imperial relations.

That is, they declare, in effect, from their point of view, that in the matter of such adaptions, as are proposed, of practice to principle, convenience is to be made the paramount issue. Therefore they deem that a slight change should be made in the title of the king and they proceed to declare:

That the Governor General of a dominion is the representative of the crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the dominion—

I call particular attention to that.

—as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's government in Great Britain or of any department of that government.

The Prime Minister, in referring to some statement that I have made in times past, suggested that I contended that the status of the Governor General had not changed, and that prior to the time of the preparation of this report, the status of the Governor General in the Dominion of Canada was that of a representative of the sovereign. Section 9 of the British North America Act of 1867 has already declared:

The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the queen.

At this point the Prime Minister, for the purpose, I think, of vindicating his past record, introduced into the discussion certain matters relating to the episode of June and the first days of July last which led to his resignation and to the formation for the time being of another government. In dealing with that I wish to point out that section 50 of the British North America Act provides:

Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

The act itself further provides that the Governor General in Council shall exercise his powers—

With the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

He must act on the advice of the government of Canada; but section 50, dealing with dissolution, says that the Governor General and not the governor in council shall have the right of dissolution. That brings us back to the episode to which the Prime Minister referred and in connection with which he attempted a vindication of his advice to His Excellency the former Governor General of Canada. That episode extends back to September 6, 1925, when, speaking at Richmond Hill in Ontario, the Prime Minister of that day, who is the Prime Minister of this day, declared:

Immediately upon the return of the Governor General to the capital yesterday I waited upon His Excellency at Government House and presented to him the many considerations for an appeal to the electorate before another session of parliament, which I have presented to you this afternoon.

I do not intend to enter into the details of those considerations. They were set forth in a very lengthy speech last session, and in another discussion in the previous session I placed the most important paragraphs upon the records of Hansard. But the chief reason, as he then stated was—and this was a representation which he had then made to His Excellency:

Is it sufficient that as a government we should continue in office, drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers, and enjoying the other fruits of office, when great national questions press for solution, with which for want of an adequate majority in parliament we are unable satisfactorily to cope?

As the result of those representations made by the Prime Minister to His Excellency, the late Governor-General of Canada, Lord Byng, undoubtedly an understanding was reached between the Prime Minister and the Governor General, limited in effect, it is true, limited in effect no doubt, but an understanding that under the conditions which then existed he should be granted a dissolution of parliament and an appeal to the people. The election was held on the 29th October, 1925, and a few days after, on the 4th November, the Prime Minister of that day, who is the Prime Minister of this day, gave to the press a lengthy communication which he himself has placed upon the records of Hansard during the last few days. That statement shows that again the Prime Minister approached the Governor General to endeavour to induce him to permit of the calling of parliament under the circumstances which then existed, which were that the Prime Minister had not returned from the electorate with a majority of the House to support him, and that in fact he was not then the leader of the largest political body in this House. Again there was an understanding reached between the Prime Minister and His Excellency to the effect that parliament would be called, and if we are to read between the lines, subsequently there were consultations between the Prime Minister and His Excellency, which resulted in His Excellency agreeing that his address should be brought down to parliament, that new issues should therein be introduced to parliament, and that the Prime Minister should have another opportunity of securing in this House a majority which he had failed to secure on his appeal to the people.

The Governor General of Canada of that day was conversant, I have no doubt, with the instructions which he had received by the letters patent and instructions issued to him by the king. Those letters patent are the same word for word as they have been for over twenty years at least, and in the letters patent which the Prime Minister laid before the House the other day these and these only are the instructions from His Majesty to the Governor General with regard to dissolution:

> And we do further authorize and empower our said Governor General, to exercise all powers lawfully belonging to us in respect of the summoning, proroguing or dissolving the parliament of our said Dominion.

So that His Excellency, Lord Byng, from the express instructions which he had received, knew that in respect to the dissolution of parliament he represented the king in the exercise of the king's prerogative, and that he represented no other person or official in the British government. The position of the present Prime Minister with regard to that dissolution has changed on several occasions. In the revised Hansard of last session, at page 5222, he says:

> In being declined the right of dissolution I believe I was declined that right because His Excellency had the honest belief that some other member of this House could be found who as prime minister could carry on the business of government in this country in the way it should be carried on, befitting the dignity and honour of parliament, and which would therefore avoid the necessity of a general election.

And again on June 30, in the evening, I think it was, after the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen had accepted office, the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, said:

> I for one do not intend to offer any criticism whatever of the constitutionality of the course taken up to the present time.

So that at that time the Prime Minister admitted that in respect of the refusal to take his advice for the dissolution of the House, and in respect of the acceptance of his resignation, Lord Byng had acted in an entirely constitutional manner. I do not know whom Lord Byng consulted, but if he had looked at Keith, the edition of April, 1924, to which the Prime Minister has given his approval, he would have found the following:

> It is, for instance, obvious that the crown cannot constitutionally grant a prime minister who has obtained one dissolution and had been defeated, a second dissolution of parliament, if any other means of carrying on the government could be found.

I infer that, as the Prime Minister himself, in the words I have just quoted, used almost exactly the same terms, he was fully aware of the view of Keith with regard to that matter.

I come now to another matter. Day before yesterday in the course of the debate the Prime Minister eulogized his own conduct by saying that he had acted towards His Excellency in a most chivalrous manner. I wish to call his attention to the debate in those hectic days and nights of the latter part of June, and particularly to a debate which occurred on the night of the 30th June, and certain altercations between the right hon. member and myself. In discussing the question that night I referred to the present Prime Minister, then leading the opposition, as resigning without considering the interests of the country, which demanded that he should have offered to see that the departments of government should be temporarily administered pending the selection of his successor. I refer to revised edition of Hansard at page 5217. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if ever there was a time in the political history of the Prime Minister, if ever there was a time in the political history of this parliament, when the leader of the opposition, having then resigned the high office of prime minister of this country, should have been perfectly frank and clear in his statements to the House, should have given to the House, if he gave anything at all, the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth in respect of his recent communication with His Excellency, that time was the night of 30th June last, when the House was deciding that important question then before it. Let me quote from Hansard, and I will leave out the echoes that came from various parts of the House, because there was a great deal of confusion:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: I did not refuse to carry on. May I say further that after tendering my resignation I distinctly stated to His Excellency, and stated it in writing, that I was prepared, if His Excellency so desired and should ask me, to keep my resignation in abeyance until he had had the opportunity to take such further steps as he might wish to take.

That was clearly understood by this House, whatever may have been the intention of the leader of the opposition of the day, as meaning that in the ordinary course and following the usual precedents, precedents which are without exception I think in the political history of Canada, the Prime Minister had offered to continue in the administration until a new prime minister might be selected and would have had the opportunity to select his associates so as to form an administration for the government of Canada. When that statement was made, I replied as follows:

> Mr. Cahan: I do not wish to raise the question, but unfortunately His Excellency cannot be present to give his testimony as to what took place.

Then there was a storm, and the Chairman of the committee compelled me to withdraw that statement as being a reflection upon the veracity of the leader of the opposition of the day. Hansard goes on:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Fortunately I have a copy of the letter in which I tendered my resignation. May I say to my hon. friend that when I spoke first to His Excellency on the matter of resignation, it was on Saturday. I had several interviews with him before the final resignation was accepted.

Bearing that statement in mind, I felt it my duty on the opening of parliament to place upon the order paper a motion asking for the production of the correspondence between the present Prime Minister, who was also then Prime Minister, and His Excellency Lord Byng. That correspondence has been produced, rather reluctantly, by the Prime Minister; in fact, if I understood his suggestion to the House it was that whoever moved for the production of that correspondence would have to assume a very great and a very grave responsibility. Nevertheless, we persisted in the motion, with the result that there has been produced certain correspondence and certain letters, which have been placed upon the record of Hansard. One of them, however, has not yet been read to this House, although it has been referred to, and I am going to read it and put it upon Hansard, and make certain comments upon it:

Ottawa, June 28, 1926.

His Excellecy
The Right Honourable the Baron Byng of Vimy, G.C.B., K.C.M.G., Governor General of the Dominion of Canada, Ottawa.

My dear Governor General,

Your Excellency having declined to accept my advice to place your signature to the order in council with reference to a dissolution of parliament, which I have placed before you to-day, I hereby tender to Your Excellency my resignation as Prime Minister of Canada.

Your Excellency will recall that in our recent conversations relative to dissolution I have on each occasion suggested to Your Excellency, as I have again urged this morning, that having regard to the possible very serious consequences of a refusal of the advice of your first minister to dissolve parliament, you should, before definitely deciding on this step, cable the Secretary of State for the Dominions asking the British government, from whom you have come to Canada under instructions, what, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for the Dominions, your course should be in the event of the Prime Minister presenting you with an order in council having reference to a dissolution.

Note that. Note that the Prime Minister of that day, in an official statement, expressed in writing to the Governor General of the day, insists that he came to Canada under instructions from the Secretary of State for the Dominions. I would like to know where in the record are those instructions. The only instructions that can be found in the official documents are instructions from His Majesty himself, and there is not a suggestion either in the appointment of Lord Byng as Governor General, or in the letters patent and instructions issued to him, that he was to act otherwise than as a Governor General or Viceroy exercising the prerogatives of the king. The letter proceeds:

As a refusal by the Governor General to accept the advice of a prime minister is a serious step at any time, and most serious under existing conditions in all parts of the British Empire to-day, there will be raised, I fear, by the refusal on Your Excellency's part to accept the advice tendered a grave constitutional question without precedent in the history of Great Britain for a century and in the history of Canada since confederation.

If there is anything which, having regard to my responsibilities as Prime Minister, I can even yet do to avert such a deplorable and, possibly, far-reaching crisis, I shall be glad so to do, and shall be pleased to have my resignation withheld at Your Excellency's request pending the time it may be necessary for Your Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

I am, Your Excellency,
Yours very sincerely,
(Sgd) W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

Therefore the Prime Minister of that day, in tendering his resignation, sought to lead—shall I say mislead?—the Governor General of Canada into believing that he was a mere agent for the Secretary of State for the Dominions, and that it was his duty, in relation to a crisis which had occurred in the domestic affairs of Canada, to seek the advice of the Secretary of State for the Dominions as to his conduct on that occasion. Further, in the debate yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he had also urged upon the Governor General to take the advice of Sir Robert Borden. Well, if it had become known to this country that His Excellency had taken the advice of a retired prime minister, who had owed his support to the Conservative majority in this House, what an uproar would have been created throughout the length and breadth of this country? I admit that in times of grave crisis there are precedents for His Excellency convening his Privy Councillors, but always men of both or of all political affiliations, in order that they, as the experienced and wise statesmen of the country, may give him advice, but never yet have we heard of a prime minister when seeking a dissolution of the House urging the Governor General or a viceroy or even the king himself to take the advice of a retired politician of the opposing political school as to what His Excellency should do in the premises. Now, what was the effect upon the country? The Prime Minister said that the result of the general election was a vindication of the course that he had pursued in establishing a new and important political principle. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if there was any such decision by the electorate—which I do not admit—it was obtained entirely on misrepresentation as to the actual issue before the country. Not only did the Prime Minister convince me personally that night, but he convinced the members of this House and the people generally that, following the usual precedent, he had, in tendering his resignation, offered to carry on the administration until his successor would have ample opportunity to select his cabinet and to present to the country an administration duly formed and sworn into office. That was the impression given throughout the entire Dominion. In fact, in the province of Quebec I remember well—and I have taken just a few quotations—the Governor General was criticized repeatedly in view of the attitude which he had taken—it was assumed that he had consulted the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs—and his conduct was characterized as that of a "subaltern" of the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. Let me refer to a speech made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—made in the utmost good faith, I believe, because he was thoroughly persuaded that the Prime Minister had fulfilled his whole duty to the House in making a statement that was full and frank and true in every particular. Misled by that statement, the hon. member for Labelle, speaking at Papineauville about July 15, 1926, or a few days later, said:

> But not only the Governor General let Mr. King go without taking that preliminary precaution—

That is, the precaution to secure from the Prime Minister his assent to carry on the administration until his successor could be appointed.

> —which no king of England since George III and no government head in Canada before has ever failed to take (namely, to retain Mr. King in the premiership until his successor might be selected), but Mr. King having offered in writing to retain power until another government could be formed, he refused to take notice of that offer.

That is, that the Governor General had refused to take notice of the offer of the then prime minister to carry on, when now we know the whole truth that His Excellency as the representative exercising the prerogative of the king in this country, had refused at the behest of a discredited prime minister to seek his instructions from the Colonial Office. The hon. member for Labelle then proceeded:

> But our Governor General is not only the representative of the king. He is appointed by the British government. The question which would be of interest to have answered is: Did he act as king or as an employee of the British government?

Then in view of the statements which had been made by the Prime Minister upon his retirement and of the subsequent statements which had been given by him to the press, the hon. member for Labelle continued:

> No one will make me believe that he—
> The Governor General.
> —did not wire to London. It is true that Mr. Amery, the minister of the colonies, said he had nothing to do with it, but I know Mr. Amery, and when these ministers of the crown find it necessary to prevaricate a little they do not stick at telling a big one.

And on that issue the Prime Minister went to the country! That is the grave constitutional issue which he, by failing to present the full facts to parliament and the people, led the electorate to believe that they were required to give a decision upon. Therefore I say that when he now flatters himself that he secured the approbation of the people of Canada for what he himself calls his "chivalrous conduct" towards the late Governor General, he is resting under an entire misapprehension. Now, I do not intend to go further into that question. I am not here to enter into any discussion with the Prime Minister as to the attitude of the right hon. the late leader of the opposition, Arthur Meighen. It is not my office to do so. Whenever the Prime Minister wishes to provoke a discussion of that kind he will find that the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen is fully equipped, intellectually and otherwise, to give him the answer which his conduct deserves But in the debate yesterday the Prime Minister referred to a certain article in the Dalhousie Review.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. He refers to the Minister of Justice; I made no reference to the Dalhousie Review.

Mr. CAHAN: I accept the correction. It was the Minister of Justice. I was referring to yesterday afternoon's debate, and the Prime Minister spoke on Tuesday. Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Justice in referring to this point quoted from an article in the Dalhousie Review, which he attributed to the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who happens, by virtue of his high position as a Doctor of Laws of that university and his munificent bequests to it as one of its friends and advisers, to be also one of the directors of the Review published by the university. But that article was not written by the hon. member for West Calgary. It was contributed by Professor R. McG. Dawson, a professor in one of the universities of the United States, who undertook to advise the people of Canada as to their rights and privileges in the premises.

I am not any more concerned with this issue than to say that it is absolutely necessary from time to time to vindicate the rights and privileges of the parliament of Canada in which we sit as members. Legally the ministry, or the government, is unknown. Constitutionally it must derive whatever powers it has from parliament, and not always necessarily under the statute. Parliament is the real custodian of the prerogatives of the crown which ministers are accustomed to exercise. Therefore the rights of a ministry may be taken to be such, and only such, as presumptively have been given by parliament, whose executive committee the ministry is, including the right to exercise the prerogatives of the crown as such in a constitutional sense. The Prime Minister referred to an episode at Westminster, and I will state my best information in that regard. In 1910, His Majesty refused dissolution to Premier Asquith, the present Lord Oxford, but granted it later in the same year when, according to the sovereign, different considerations and circumstances demanded a different conclusion. Again I am informed that in 1923—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend give the source of his information so that we may know what importance to attach to it?

Mr. CAHAN: I obtained my information from the documents of the time, which I can look up again if necessary. Lord Oxford referred to it not long ago in a public statement, and I understood that it was referred to in a debate of last session on this very issue. I have a further statement, the source of which I cannot give but which I have no doubt I have seen, and my memory is usually fairly accurate. In 1924 His Majesty the King refused to grant dissolution to Premier MacDonald. Dissolution was subsequently granted but before that was done the sovereign consulted his privy councillors representing both political parties, some political opponents of Premier MacDonald and some political friends, and after that consultation the king did grant dissolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it very important that we should have the source of this last statement, because it goes very far in disclosing what took place between the king and his advisers.

Mr. CAHAN: I saw it in the public press, and I took the opportunity of consulting one who should know, an authority on such matters, but whether or not I am at liberty to give his name I do not know. If there is any doubt about it I will withdraw the statement; I thought it was well understood that such was the case, but if the Prime Minister thinks there is any doubt as to the accuracy of that statement I will withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think there is great doubt.

Mr. CAHAN: I will leave it at that for the moment, but my information was that dissolution was refused at one time and granted at another. One statement I do wish to make is that an examination of all the precedents, British, Dominion and colonial, arising during the last century, will disclose that no dissolution has ever been advised and granted while a motion of censure against the ministry has been pending in parliament. Dissolutions have been granted after motions of censure have been passed, but there is a great difference between the two cases. The one case involves interference with parliament in the midst of a conflict with its own ministry, and while that ministry is on trial; the other case involves merely a reference—and usually a necessary reference—to the electorate of the country for decision of an issue which stands concluded as between parliament and the ministry. The electorate is the final court of appeal, but without fear of contradiction from any precedent which has been established I say that the parliament of Canada in all cases, having tried the ministry, is entitled to pass its judgment, and that no ministry has the right to attempt to dissolve the court before which it is being tried until a verdict has been rendered upon the issue in question. No cases can be found in which the sovereign or any viceroy representing the sovereign has attempted at the request of a prime minister to destroy the very court before which he and his colleagues were compelled to appear. If we are now to have the new rule that at all times and under all circumstances the prime minister of this country is to have a dissolution upon request, we may have a dissolution to-morrow; then returning beaten the prime minister, being the sole adviser, may request another dissolution and so we may have the most tyrannical, despotic and autocratic efforts made to destroy civil liberty in Canada. Therefore before the Prime Minister flatters himself that he has established a precedent, we must have further enlightenment upon what actually took place between him and Lord Byng last summer.

To proceed further, it is recommended in this report that very grave changes be made in a series of imperial acts which have applied to the Dominion of Canada ever since this Dominion was established. These imperial acts apply to almost every ramification of our civil and commercial life. In the report of this committee as embodied in the Imperial conference report, it is recommended that every imperial act, which is not in accordance with the new constitutional status alleged to have been established at the London conference, is to be modified and amended; and, if I understood him correctly, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday stated that when this is all accomplished the sole bond between this country and Great Britain and between this country and the other dominions will be our common sovereign. Is that really what it will mean when this political program is carried into full effect? There is a difference of opinion with regard to that, and I notice that Mr. Ewart raised the issue in the Ottawa Citizen of March 1, 1927. I do not cite what he said for the purpose of approving of it, but in referring to Right Hon. George P. Graham, a former colleague of the Prime Minister, Mr. Ewart said.

> I wonder whether Mr. Graham, or any of his applauders, could tell what he meant. Did he mean that Canada's part should be equal to that of the United Kingdom? Or did he mean that Canada's part should be subordinate to that of the United Kingdom? If he meant that Canada's status was to be equal to that of the United Kingdom, he meant that Canada would be a sovereign, independent (same thing) state, for that, undoubtedly, is what the United Kingdom is. He meant that the only political association between the two countries would be their allegiance to the same sovereign.

I may be mistaken, and if so Hansard will not bear me out, but I understood the Minister of Justice to state that when these reforms now recommended were carried out, these dominions would simply be associated by reason of the fact that they had a common sovereign. Therefore, with respect to Mr. Graham's statement, Mr. Ewart says:

> He meant, therefore, that Canada would cease to be a part of the British Empire. If then, Canada's status is to be equal to that of the United Kingdom, she will not be working out her destiny "by remaining a part of the British Empire."

[Mr. Cahan.]

Now there is a clear-cut policy. It has a considerable support in this country no doubt. There has been a propaganda carried on—cleverly and ably carried on by Mr. Ewart himself—in favour of the establishment of that status. Is that the status the Prime Minister wishes to achieve? If so, it is impossible, I think, Mr. Speaker, for him to continue long to make such speeches as he recently made at Toronto. They are irreconcilable with this theory which was announced, I think, by the Minister of Justice yesterday; or at least, I have not sufficient intelligence to discover the point of concurrence. That means that the Prime Minister of this country by giving assent on behalf of Canada at the Imperial conference to the carrying out of all these reforms, by a special committee to be appointed for that purpose, has given, or assumed to give, the support of Canada to a policy of destroying the whole fabric of the present constitution in so far as it covers our political relations with Great Britain and our political relations with the sister dominions. And if he is permitted to assume that he has now the tacit support and approval of this parliament merely because he has laid that report upon the table of the House, then he will assume that, being the leader of the House and the Prime Minister of the country, he has right and authority to go on and carry out all these alleged reforms.

Now, how are these reforms to be carried out? There is not one of them which depends, necessarily depends, upon any resolution or any statute of the Canadian parliament; they may one and all be carried out by an imperial enactment, or by amendments to existing imperial statutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to interrupt my hon. friend in order, if possible, to avoid further interruptions. I hope he will not infer that because I am not raising any questions with respect to interpretations he is putting on the remarks of the Minister of Justice, or the linking up of remarks made by others with the names of the Minister of Justice and myself, I think he is justified in so doing. I do not wish it to be understood that because I do not interrupt him when he is doing this I agree with any of his remarks.

Mr. CAHAN: I accept the statement at once, and I hope the right hon. gentleman does not assume that when he makes an elaborate statement to the House hon. gentlemen on this side approve exactly of what he does say, even though they may not express dissent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have often heard my hon. friends make remarks to the effect that I was present and heard certain statements and did not take exception to them. That is what I want to make clear.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know that I ever made a statement of that kind, but the hon. gentleman is already assuming, in reference to the most important declaration ever placed before the parliament of this country, that parliament acquiesces in it because it has not yet expressed dissent.

Now with regard to the question of the reservation and the veto of Canadian acts—the hon. gentleman says that is obsolete as a constitutional practice. It is obsolete with respect to Dominion affairs. It is obsolete with respect to every matter concerning peace, order and good government in Canada. Edward Blake achieved that away back in the seventies, and the statement of his argument will be found, I think, in sessional paper No. 13 of 1877. Since that time there has been no effort to reserve, to disallow or to veto an act passed by the Canadian parliament. Edward Blake placed it on the strong, substantial basis that with respect to matters appertaining to the domestic affairs of Canada the crown, as represented by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, should not intervene and should not veto, and that with respect to imperial or inter-imperial affairs, while the law would still remain on the statute book, it was best obviated by restraint on the part of the government of the parliament of Canada. Therefore, in the letters patent which are issued to His Excellency the Governor General, there is no direct reference, I think, to sections 54, 55 and 56, of the British North America Act, which are still in existence, at least as laws; but his instructions provide that His Excellency shall respect such laws as are or shall hereafter be in force in our said "Dominion." The instructions are that the Governor General is to carry out the laws "as are or shall hereafter be in force in our Dominion."

With reference to the disallowance or reservation of Dominion legislation, the Imperial conference report says:

> On this point we propose that it should be placed on record that, apart from provisions embodied in constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation, it is recognized that it is the right of the government of each dominion to advise the crown in all matters relating to its own affairs.

Now that specific statement is there. Sections 55, 56 and 57—if those are the particular sections—of the British North America Act still remain in force and with full legal effect, and the conference decides that "apart from provisions embodied in constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation," the right of the government of each dominion to advise the crown is in full force and effect. The report continues:

> We are of opinion that there are points arising out of these considerations, and in the application of these general principles, which will require detailed examination, and we accordingly recommend that steps should be taken by Great Britain and the dominions to set up a committee with terms of reference on the following lines:—
> To inquire into, report upon, and make recommendations concerning—
> (1) Existing statutory provisions requiring reservation of Dominion legislation for the assent of His Majesty or authorizing the disallowance of such legislation.

Now to show you how open this report is to diverse opinions let me call the attention of the House to the fact that in the House of Commons of Great Britain this matter of reservation and disallowance of dominion acts was referred to on November 25th, 1926, The official report is as follows:

> Sir Clement Kinloch-Cook asked the Prime Minister, in view of the conclusions reached by the committee on inter-imperial relations, whether any change is contemplated in respect of the right of a governor to refuse assent to any measure passed by a dominion parliament, or to reserve any measure for the consideration of the crown.
> The Prime Minister (Mr. Baldwin): This aspect of the position of the Governor General was not dealt with in the report of the committee on inter-imperial relations and I am not aware that any change is contemplated.
> Sir C. Kinloch-Cook: Is there any change in the right of veto?
> The Prime Minister: No change that I am aware of.

That clearly indicates to my mind that the Prime Minister of England regards this report as dealing only with reservation and veto in connection with acts of those dominions whose statutory constitution do not contain express provisions for such reservation and veto. But that does not concern me so much as the fact that with regard to all these proposed amendments to imperial statutes, it is proposed that a committee shall be set up by Great Britain and the dominions "to inquire into, report upon, and make recommendations" regarding the abolition, modification or amendment of those imperial statutes which affect almost every department of life in this country.

The policy which the right hon. gentleman is urging, the policy which has been adopted by the Imperial conference in view of the strong representations made chiefly, I assume, by South Africa, is that the inter-imperial constitution as expressed in imperial acts under which we live and have our being to-day, is to be wiped out, and what is to take its place? What provision is being made for a new arrangement or understanding or agreement between Great Britain and those dominions or between the dominions themselves with respect to the preservation and maintenance of that vast body of rights, privileges, and interests which they mutually enjoy and which we have hitherto enjoyed in Canada? That is the essential issue, and that is why I hesitate, by any tacit assent, to give to the Prime Minister and his colleague the right to proceed to secure from the Imperial parliament the abrogation of those imperial statutes which are so intimately connected with our political life to-day.

For instance, there is not only the question of reservation but the matter of providing for Dominion legislation having extra-territorial effect. I agree there are some vestiges which ought to be removed. I have not looked into the law recently, but I remember in my practice a few years ago a case in which a man residing with his wife and family in Montreal went to secure work in the United States. Having prospered, he committed the bigamous offense of attempting to marry another woman there. Then prospering still further, he brought back to Canada this second alleged wife or mistress, established her in a house on the adjoining street, and to the great disgust of the entire social community was rearing another family of children. When the lawyers were discusing the question of how he could be brought before the courts and punished for the crime of bigamy, it was ascertained that, while under the criminal law in this country we could punish a Canadian citizen for going beyond the territorial limit with the intention of committing a crime, yet if he did not proceed beyond the territorial limit with the intention of committing a crime, though he actually committed a crime abroad, our courts and our laws had no jurisdiction over him.

I remember again when it was proposed that we should have a Canadian navy, it was assumed that we could have ships of war for the protection of our commerce on the high seas. I remember pointing out to Sir Wilfrid Laurier that under existing legislative powers Canada could not enact any law governing the conduct of the officers and men of those ships when once they had proceeded beyond the three mile limit; that as regards Canadian laws the sailors might mutiny or commit other crimes beyond that limit but there was no Canadian law under which they could be punished, and the Canadian parliament had no jurisdiction to enact such a law. The result was that an amendment was made to the imperial statute dealing with that particular matter.

I agree entirely that with regard to such matters as these the time has come when, for the peace, order and good government of Canada and Canadian citizens, there should be conceded to this parliament power to enact laws ancillary to the administration of public order in Canada, under which we will be enabled to punish Canadian citizens who have committed crimes abroad and subsequently returned to Canada. Those certainly are matters which should be dealt with, but how far will the Prime Minister go with his committee? Who are going to compose it? Will the opposition members of this House be represented on it when the inquiry is to be made? Is the inquiry to be a partisan study and the whole matter brought before the House, after being considered by only one section of the House? Is it to be a study made by a commission before which those interested will have an opportunity to appear and present their views? How will the commission be made up?

I have every respect for the Prime Minister as chief of the government of Canada, and I never will be found wanting in that respect when he goes abroad either to the Imperial conference in Great Britain or to any other country to represent Canada. I am prepared to stand by the Prime Minister of this country in the administration of all important inter-imperial and external affairs; but as the consideration for that I demand that in all those matters he will deal frankly with parliament; that he will recognize that parliament is the constituted authority in this country; that the authority of his office is derived only from parliament, and that it is due to parliament that he should report to and secure the approval of parliament for every step which he takes in those grave matters.

The Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865 is important in this respect that, as stated by the Minister of Justice yesterday, it prevents the parliament of Canada from passing an act abolishing appeals to the Privy Council, and therefore when we sought to abolish appeals in regard to criminal cases, we found that the legislation which we passed, I think, section 1025 of the Criminal Code, was void ab initio.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is a court of appeal for the colonies only. It is true that it continues the prerogative right of British citizens of any part of the world to appeal to the foot of the throne. It derives its original jurisdiction from the fact that British citizens going out from England to all parts of the world and establishing settlements in America, say, or in Asia, were deemed to have the right of appeal to the king in council from the arbitrary laws that might be passed by the constituted assemblies in those colonial territories. But no citizen of Great Britain has the right of appeal to the Privy Council except in certain classes of cases relating to the administration of the Church of England. Personally, and in this I am speaking for myself, and for myself alone, I regard an appeal to every one of the king's courts as an appeal to the king. I regard an appeal to any one of the king's courts of final resort as the equivalent of an appeal to the sovereign judicial authority in this country which was previously represented in the sovereign alone, and therefore, in regard to criminal matters, I can see no reason why appeals to the Privy Council in criminal cases should be longer admitted; but as I interpret the law, no act passed by the parliament of Canada can abrogate that right. As I said the other day, and one can simply judge from his own experience, there are certain classes of commercial cases in which the right of appeal to the Privy Council might be limited or restricted, but there are other cases in which I do not think, under the conditions which at present prevail in this country, the right of appeal should be entirely taken away.

Now what does the Prime Minister propose? He is to appoint Canadian members to a committee which is to take steps to carry out this modification of the Judicial Committee Acts, under which appeals are now made. Is that committee to report back to this parliament and secure the approval of this parliament? Not necessarily, because the Prime Minister can secure an abrogation of the Judicial Committee Acts or of any part of them by the parliament of Great Britain, in which this country has no representation whatever, and in view of the position which the Prime Minister has assumed at the Imperial conference, his ipse dixit there is supposed to represent, and is accepted by the government of Great Britain as representing, the prevalent opinion of the majority of the Canadian people and the approval of the Canadian parliament as a whole.

If we are proceeding to break down, piece by piece, the constitution which prevails with respect to inter-imperial affairs without substituting any new agreement or convention in its place, we now have a right to ascertain and to know how far the Prime Minister intends to proceed. The better way, it seems to me, would have been for him to have bravely carried out the promise which he made to the House on December 13, and to have submitted this report to parliament and asked for its approval. That would have placed us in a position where, without any vote of want of confidence necessarily, we could have expressed our views as to the conditions under which these proposed modifications should be obtained, as to the extent to which they were advisable in the interests of Canada, and as to the reservations which we might desire to make to the carrying out completely of the recommendations contained in that report. But the right hon. gentleman has not kept his promise. He has repudiated it for certain reasons known only to himself. He had the opportunity to present those reasons to the House in his address of two hours in length; he can again speak upon the amendment which has been moved, and I think that this House ought to have placed before it, on his responsibility as Prime Minister, the procedure he intends to adopt and the extent to which he intends to go, in carrying out these recommendations contained in the Imperial conference report.

There are other matters that affect us very materially indeed. Take the matter of shipping. Every one of us knows that there is really no such thing as a Canadian ship except it be some ship that does not come under the registration for marine purposes. The ships which are built in Canada and which are owned in Canada are registered in Canada, it is true, but they are registered in a registry provided by imperial legislation, and when these Canadian ships so-called, which are really British ships under British registry, sail from Canadian ports to the utmost parts of the world they are from the time they pass beyond our three-mile limit under the jurisdiction of the imperial act known as the Merchant Shipping Act. The Imperial conference points out that this Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, more particularly clauses 735 and 736, are not consistent with the constitutional status of the dominions and Great Britain, that is the equality of status now assumed, and they advise that a sub-committee be appointed:

> To consider and report on the principles which should govern, in the general interest, the practice and legislation relating to merchant shipping in the various parts of the empire, having regard to the change in constitutional status and general relations which has occurred since existing laws were enacted.

As I said before such an inquiry will have multifarious ramifications with regard to Canadian shipping and even to the coasting trade of Canada. Shipping legislation of the Canadian parliament at present may not come into operation unless and until it receives the approval of His Majesty the King of Great Britain; and moreover, any treaty rights or privileges enjoyed by the shipping of a foreign government in respect to the coasting trade of Canada, or any other dominion, is not now liable to be abrogated or restricted by any act of the Canadian parliament. This country has a very large shipping interest, and if we are to become so separated from the empire that the sole political connection shall be found in the one symbol of the same king for all the different parts of the empire, if we are to become separate and independent sovereign states, as many contend, we must proceed at once and secure the assistance and advice of the very best minds that this country can produce in a sort of constitutional convention to ascertain what shall be the basis of our maritime rights in the future, and what shall be our future relations in this respect with Great Britain and the other British dominions.

Take our admiralty courts. Our admiralty courts in Canada exercise a jurisdiction conferred by the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, and our Canadian laws establishing such courts and their procedure and practice, are still subject to the approval and confirmation of the government of Great Britain. We by our statutes provide the procedure only, and the procedure in those courts must be recognized and approved by a department of state in London before coming into effect. Now what does the right hon. gentleman propose? Does he propose to abrogate all these admiralty courts in Canada as they at present exist? Does he propose to pass new acts which shall give them their jurisdiction? Does he propose that hereafter there shall be such an extension of our extra territorial rights that we by act of the Canadian parliament, will have supervision and control of Canadian ships in whatever part of the world they may be? What will he substitute for admiralty courts in this country? What is his prevision in regard to this question? He is entering upon a tremendous task, and what is he proposing to do? Is he to do it as his own mind suggests, or is he to seek the coöperation and approval of parliament, step by step, as he proceeds? The very fact that he has refused to submit this report to parliament, although he has promised to do so, leaves in our minds grave doubts, and leaves in the minds of a great body of intelligent people in the country grave doubts as to whither we are proceeding. Many men are asking, "Watchman, what of the night"? and the watchman, in the person of the Prime Minister, refuses to make any response or to give any clear definition as to what he intends to do.

Take the question of equality of judicial status. We have had that question before us, and it has been discussed under the provision dealing with the abolition of rights of appeal to the Privy Council. Now judicial equality or equal status in judicial affairs can be achieved, it seems to me, only in one of two ways. If appeals are to continue to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, then we must have the right vested in parliament and government of Canada, to appoint a number of representative Canadian judges to that court, who will not be under the influence of British opinion, but where they will sit as Canadian appointees having their stipends or salaries provided by the Canadian parliament, and so represent Canada on that court. If, on the other hand, we are not to have permanent Canadian representation on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, then the question arises as to the amendment by the Imperial parliament of the statutes providing an appeal at the present time, so as to restrict those appeals to such matters as meet with the approval of the Canadian parliament. Therefore the Judicial Committee Acts should be considered also, and we should have a clear statement from the government as to what we are about to do in these matters. Take our relations with foreign countries; are we to have inequality in respect to foreign affairs? We cannot have it unless this country is prepared to take its part in the matter of imperial defence. Following the conference which the Prime Minister attended where all are alleged by him to have been in agreement, I find that Mr. Fitzgerald, Minister of External Affairs, on 15th December, in the assembly, of the Irish Free State made this report of the conclusions reached:

> The conclusions of the Inter-Imperial Relations Committee were intended to make clear the implications of co-equality, and to prepare the way for the gradual elimination of legal machinery and administrative practices not in conformity with that principle.

With that interpretation I presume we all agree. Then in replying to inquiries as to the position of the Irish Free State in the event of a declaration of war, Mr. Fitzgerald said:

> So far as I can interpret it, it would mean on strictly theoretical constitutional lines that the king could only declare war when he had simultaneous unanimous advice to that effect from all the governments. That would be the constitutional position.

Is that the position taken by the Prime Minister in this country, or does he accept the theory that Great Britain may declare war and that Canada may maintain peace? Does he accept the theory there propounded that in all respects the declaration of war must receive the practically unanimous approval of the governments of the various dominions? Does he assume that Great Britain no longer can declare a war which might affect the interests of Canada without the full sanction and approval of the government of Canada? What is his theory on which he intends to build up a new constitution of inter-imperial relationship as between Great Britain and the dominions? That we have a right to know, and particularly because at the Imperial conference, when all were agreed, Mr. Bruce said:

> I suggest that though we have an equality of status it carries with it some responsibility to share the common burden of defence as a set-off against the great advantages we have received in recent years from our connection with the empire.

Mr. Coates said:

> Could not the burden of construction of the necessary ships be borne in greater proportion by those dominions who do not consider themselves so vitally concerned in Singapore? As I understand it, the policy of developing it as a naval base is approved, and the work is to be continued at considerable cost. That being so, and on the principle that he who gives at once gives twice, it seems important that offers of assistance from the dominions and India should soon be made.

And I notice that a publicist so well known as Edward Salmon, in reviewing the work of the conference, says:

> Equality of status within the empire implies equality of responsibilities also.

Mr. Balfour on December 8, 1926, referring to the matter of imperial defence as dealt with by the report of the Imperial conference, said:

> I should say that so far as this country is concerned, we are bound to go to war to defend any part of this empire which is in danger. Personally, I think the duties of all other members of the empire to us are not less than our duties to them; but, as to the particular conditions under which that great duty is to be exercised, I do not believe anything is gained by inventing hard cases beforehand.

That is his statement in the House of Lords which the right hon. gentleman opposite did not quote when reading part of that statement. This Imperial conference report also ratifies the resolutions passed in 1923 dealing with imperial defence. It seems to suggest that in regard to imperial defence there is to be complete coöperation between Great Britain and the several self-governing dominions. What attitude does the right hon. gentleman and his government take in regard to that? Do they admit the principle? He and his colleagues sat in the Imperial conference when these discussions were being carried on. They heard the declarations of Mr. Coates and Mr. Bruce there. The Prime Minister declared at the House of Lords dinner that their opinion was unanimous with respect to all that had been done. Yet when Mr. Bruce and Mr. Coates, in passing through this country, had the courage to say here exactly what they had said at the conference and exactly what they had said in public discussions in London, I find the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at the Toronto meeting suggesting in very emphatic terms that these gentlemen had better keep their opinions to themselves while in this country, and I remember seeing in the press another statement made by the Prime Minister somewhat to the same effect.

What does all this mean? If we are to have an Imperial conference report submitted to us, let us have the whole of it submitted, and let us understand once and for all what is the constitutional theory which will hereafter govern the relation of Great Britain and the dominions in the matter of imperial defence. Let us have some clear idea and pronouncement in regard to it. I have a strong suspicion that whatever excuses the Prime Minister may give for not having produced the report to this House for its approval, it will be found that one of the chief reasons, although not announced, is that he and the members of his government, and the members supporting him on the government side, are not in complete accord, and that he with the skill of the equestrian, which he has often displayed, is attempting to ride two horns of a dilemma and has not the courage to come before the House with any clear enunciation of policy in regard to it.

Also, we have had the suggestion that hereafter the Governor General is not to be the medium of correspondence between this government and the British government. The Governor General represents His Majesty the King now. I do not know who takes responsibility for the Governor General. Does my right hon. friend the Prime Minister suggest that in all that the Governor General does at the present time, his speeches and public pronouncements, he, the Prime Minister, assumes responsibility on his behalf to the House and the country? I do not know just exactly what his relationship is to the Governor General. But one thing is clear, that when it was found necessary to appoint an envoy extraordinary to Washington, the Governor General was the means of communication between this government and the British government and the king. And to whom did the Governor General report in the correspondence brought down by the Prime Minister yesterday? The Governor General, acting for this country, made his communications through the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, and the replies which are presumed to come from the king to this government are sent by the same British minister. Has that practice ceased, or is it to continue? By what means does the Prime Minister have access to His Excellency? He stated yesterday—and I assume it was in a jocular mood to divert my attention for a moment—that in the appointment of the Hon. Mr. Massey as envoy plenipotentiary to the United States he had seen the king. Hereafter whenever a representative of Canada is to be appointed to any foreign state, or a commissioner is to be appointed by the king at the request of the Dominion government to take part in any foreign negotiations, will the Prime Minister leave the Dominion and visit the king personally, take him apart in secret and advise him, without allowing His Majesty to consult with his British ministers in regard to the appointment? I ask the Prime Minister, despite all this talk that we have in the public press, to which his own speeches have given encouragement, is it not the fact that for the present and in the future he assumes that in all these matters the communications expressing the will and advice of the Canadian government will not pass to the king directly, will not be given to him orally by the right hon. gentleman on his visits to England, but will pass through the British Foreign Office, where they will be under the supervision and, to a certain and large extent, under the control and direction of the British Foreign Office as before? Or is the contrary the case, that hereafter the British Foreign Office is to have no direction and no control over the Canadian government in these affairs, and that the High Commissioner in London—who was selected to make the Prime Minister's post mortem political statement to Mr. Baldwin as Prime Minister of Great Britain,—will first receive the advice of the Canadian government and will then seek access to the sovereign in order to transmit that advice to him?

We have, Mr. Speaker, a preposterous condition before us. We have the right hon. gentleman proceeding to London without having given one moment's consideration to these great problems. He announced to the House that he had given no consideration to them. Even if he had, he is not in a position to give any final opinion in regard to them because he has not consulted with this House, to which he is responsible, with regard to these great constitutional changes which are now proposed. He now seeks by the tacit approval of this House, not having the courage to present a report of his own work for its approval and confirmation, to proceed to disrupt every one of these constitutional ties which bind and connect us with Great Britain and Ireland and with the dominions beyond the seas. And while he has endorsed and proposes to carry out a policy of disruption and destruction, he has not one single positive idea to present to this House as to the formation of any new convention or as to the new alignments and political connections which are absolutely necessary if the position of Canada is to be maintained in this world.

I ask then the government to accept this amendment to his motion in its entirety and thereafter to deal with us frankly. Let the Prime Minister accept the amendment; let him admit to this House that he has not now the necessary parliamentary authority; let him admit that he does not desire by any tacit consent to secure the approval, or the apparent approval, of the parliament and the people of this country to these great changes. In the making of these changes, whether by the Canadian parliament or by the Imperial parliament—because the Imperial parliament may carry them all out—let him now give us a solemn promise that before they or any of them are made he will come to this House and secure its necessary authority and consent. Why, when he has failed to bring down the Imperial conference's report, why when we are prepared to present our views in this short amendment, does he not accept those views with manly courage and wait until he can later present the Imperial conference report as a whole and obtain its ratification and sanction by this House with or without amendment.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to attempt to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Cahan) through the ramifications of his speech. There is much in what he said, without agreeing with it at the moment, that I submit might well be responded to by the Prime Minister. I think a very serious indictment has been levelled against the right hon. gentleman. I for one have hesitated to condemn him unheard, and so until this moment I have refrained from expressing publicly or privately the opinion which I hold following the publication of certain correspondence until I heard the right hon. gentleman's position thereon. I think it is only fair that the House should hear both sides of this question, and I trust that before the debate is closed the Prime Minister will give to the House an explanation of his position in respect to it. I wish to say, however, in fairness to everybody, that I cannot follow the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in the position he assumes of wanting to know everything categorically, specifically, dogmatically, immediately. As a matter of fact, I doubt very much whether, even if everything were specifically produced before him and every declaration dogmatically determined, the hon. gentleman would not still find himself disposed to discredit most of it.

On the question of casuistry, I do not think I am going beyond the limits of parliamentary debate when I submit to the House words that the hon. gentleman himself used some years ago. I do not intend to flatter him when I say that the speeches which he has made on Canada's political relations with the empire have always been of intense interest to me, but in none of them have I come across a passage with which I am in such complete agreement as the following. This is taken from a speech made by the hon. gentleman before the Canadian Club of Boston on the evening of Tuesday, January 30, 1912.

An. hon. MEMBER: What hon. gentleman?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member who has just taken his seat. He said then:

> —in a measure, the natural result of the development in the minds of the Canadian people of the national idea, of the consciousness that they have become a Canadian nation, endowed with a distinctive national character, permeated with a vigorous national life, vested with national responsibilities, and withal, masters of their own national destiny.

The statement is so complete that it requires no further elaboration; I would simply submit to the House that it was made in 1912, whilst the hon. gentleman was in possession of the full faculties of a mature mind—and somebody interjects that he was not in politics, but I do not wish to use such an unfair reference. I will say that those words "withal, masters of their own national destiny" would place the hon. gentleman entirely outside of his argument of to-day.

Mr. CAHAN: Not a bit; I quite agree with them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman would now tie us up irrevocably in the empire and make us obligated to the Imperial government in ways which are entirely repugnant to us. That may be casuistry; it may be a change of heart or it may be anything. The hon. gentleman has something to explain in that regard, as the Prime Minister has something to explain in connection with the matters which have been placed before him.

Mr. CAHAN: I accept entirely what I said in Boston, if I remember it correctly. I do not think I have changed at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then is it by a process of casuistry that the hon. gentleman makes consistent his remarks of this afternoon with this splendid quotation? Let me again emphasize those words:

> —a Canadian nation endowed with a distinctive national character, permeated with a vigorous national life, vested with national responsibilities and, withal, masters of their own national destiny.

How under heaven can we be masters of our own national destiny if we are subject and subordinate to some imperial authority? If I have misunderstood the hon. gentleman I apologize; if I have been misunderstood I will ask the hon. gentleman to apologize.

I was delighted with the speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday. I think he laid down his case in as clear a manner and interpreted it in as broad a form as even I could have anticipated from a member of the government in dealing with the work of the Imperial conference. Let me remind the House of one or two sentences which he used, which I took down as he said them. He said that this constituted the final acceptance of the unity of the so-called dominions and the British throne, and liberty in all external and domestic affairs. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has endeavoured to demonstrate that this is not true. To a degree he is right, and if I were willing to follow him into the legal facts in regard to his criticism I might be compelled to agree with him entirely. But I want to say frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I am in a very pleasant frame of mind this afternoon, and do not intend to be carried away into an unnecessarily cavilling or critical attitude. I am prepared to accept in faith the utterances of both our delegates to that conference. I do not think they have done any harm; I have not seen any great evidence of it, and while they may not have done any great good let us be grateful that at least no harm has been done, and in that spirit approach this report. The Minister of Justice declared that equality of status was not a new principle, and gave us illustrations of that fact. I agree entirely with him as several other hon. gentlemen have agreed. Equality of status is a principle very deeply rooted in the hearts of our people, and goes back far beyond even the quotations which have been referred to in the course of this discussion. I have in my hand a book called The Union of the British Provinces, by Mr. Whelan, one of the gentlemen who was very active in the days preceding confederation. It is a strange thing and perhaps an unhappy circumstance that we have not on record a verbatim report of the speeches then made, but in two very rare documents, so rare that it is almost under bond that one secures a loan of them from the library, one may find reports of the speeches of the various delegates to the different conferences which took place before confederation. In one of them Sir John A. Macdonald, speaking at a banquet in Charlottetown, on September 1, 1864, is reported by Mr. Whelan as follows:

He had, however, every reason to believe that the result of the convention which held its sittings in Charlottetown for the past week would lead to the formation and establishment of such a federation of all the British North American provinces as would tend very materially to enhance their individual and collective prosperity, politically, commercially and socially; and also give them in their united manhood that national prowess and strength which would make them at least the fourth nation on the face of the globe.

Again at Charlottetown in September of the same year Hon. George Etienne Cartier is reported as having used these words:

They (the delegates) met to inquire whether it were possible for the provinces, from their present fragmentary and isolated materials, to form a nation or kingdom. Canada of herself—

That is Upper Canada at that time.

—could not make a nation; neither could the maritime provinces of themselves become a kingdom. It was, therefore, essentially necessary that those national fragments and resources of all the provinces should be concentrated and combined in order that they, in their trade, intelligence, and national power and prosperity, might be rated as at least the fourth nation of the world.

That is, not only in size and resources, but in status and as to rank and title. I am offering these references to the House because of the statement made by the Minister of Justice yesterday when he said that the work of building the nation has been achieved. Has it? I simply wish to submit these references and ask the House if that work has been completed; frankly, I do not think so. I think we have gone a long way in that direction, but before we start blowing the trumpets or waving the flags it would be as well to see what was in the minds of the fathers of confederation and what was their vision of the destiny of this country, and perhaps we will then arrive at a clearer idea as to how far or how little we have progressed since that time. In my opinion we have progressed very far, but not so far as we should have progressed under more favourable conditions.

At page 16 of the same work, in the course of another speech made by Hon. T. H. Haviland, one of the delegates, he said that from all he could learn the provinces would ere long be one great country from the Pacific to the Atlantic. There was another conference held at Halifax, and by the way, they went in very strongly for conferences in those days, and every conference was either preceded or followed, or both, by immense banquets. Those banquets should be to us a mark upon which we should centre our appreciation, because I rather think that if it had not been for the banquets, many of the things we now know to have been said prior to confederation would not be known to us, and possibly many of the things which were said would not have been spoken were it not for these banquets. We have learned that under wine men open their hearts and tell the truth. If that be the case it makes the quotations I have been using all the stronger. We find at pages 24 and 25, reporting the banquet at Halifax the following utterance by the Hon. George Etienne Cartier, a man of considerable renown, a man whose record is certainly that of one of the great leaders of confederation:

When we come to the territory occupied by these provinces, we see again another great element requisite for the foundation of a great state.

It was not a colony, it was not a great dominion, it was "a great state," a sovereign state these gentlemen had in view. Again at page 25 he said:

Knowing as we do in Canada, that we possess so large a personal element—that we have cleared so much of our territory as would secure to us as respectable a position as many of the European powers, we want to be something greater yet; but that cannot be unless you unite with us.

Another authority corroborates many of these statements—Mr. J. H. Gray, who has written the Confederation of Canada. He has repeated word for word the very statements reported to have been uttered by Sir John Macdonald, then John Macdonald, George Etienne Cartier, and many of the others who took up and discussed this matter at that time. At page 44 we find Sir John Macdonald speaking at Halifax. He says:

If we can only obtain that object—

What object?

—a vigorous general government—we shall not be New Brunswickers, nor Nova Scotians, nor Canadians, but British Americans, under the sway of the British sovereign.

Again he says:

In discussing the question of a colonial union, we must consider what is desirable and practicable; we must consult local prejudices and aspirations. It is our desire to do so.

In the conference we have had we have been united as one man—there was no difference of feeling—no sectional prejudices or selfishness exhibited by anyone; we all approached the subject feeling its importance; feeling that in our hands were the destinies of a nation; and great would be our sin and shame if any different motives had intervened to prevent us carrying out the noble object of founding a great British monarchy, in connection with the British Empire, and under the British queen. (Cheers.)

I do not think a more emphatic pronouncement was ever made by anyone in this country in favour of an independent sovereign state under the sovereignty of the British crown. It is not necessary for me to go further. If hon. gentlemen will simply consult the speeches made before confederation, the debates that took place in the House at that time, the debates that took place at the conference in London, it becomes readily clear that the objective of John Macdonald and George Etienne Cartier—if not of others certainly of those two; they were the guiding figures; they were the men who made the submissions to the conference, and their guiding thought was the creation of a nation on this side of the Atlantic—not a subordinate nation, not a colony, not a dominion, but a sovereign nation in connection with the British Empire, united with the rest of the self-governing dominions under the sovereign. But beyond that they did not go. Just how far have we come? At the conference that took place in London, and indeed prior to the London conference, the objective is made very clear. At page 20 and 21 of Pope's Confederation Documents we find Mr. Macdonald moving on Thursday, 20th October, 1864:

That the executive authority —

This was just prior to going over to London.

That the executive authority or government shall be vested in the sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and be administered according to the well understood principles of the British constitution by the sovereign personally or by representative duly authorized.

At page 39 of the same work we find a report on the resolutions adopted at the conference of delegates from the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the colonies of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, held in the city of Quebec. Amongst the resolutions then adopted was the following:

The executive authority or government shall be vested in the sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and be administered according to the well understood principles of the British constitution by the sovereign personally—

By the sovereign personally!

—or by the representative of the sovereign duly authorized.

It is as clear as possible that without precipitating a debate of an objectionable nature, the intention was to establish a sovereign state under the sovereign personally or a representative of the sovereign duly authorized.

We now can pass to London. In London on the 4th day of December, 1866, a conference of delegates from Canada was again held. It was held at the Westminster Palace hotel. Had I known that at the time I was in London I would have gone to see if the old place was still there. If it is still there I am sorry I missed seeing it. But at that hotel the following resolution was passed by the conference:

The executive authority or government shall be vested in the sovereign of the United Kingdom and Ireland, and be administered according to the well understood principles of the British constitution by the sovereign personally or by the representative of the sovereign duly authorized.

There was never any idea in the minds of the great guiding figures of confederation that we should be subject to the Colonial Office or any representative of the Colonial Office. If there was to be any link, any visible link, between us and the mother country it was to be the king in person, or his representative, and no one else. Now one of the resolutions consists of just one sentence but it is worth quoting as we pass on:

That Her Majesty the Queen be solicited to determine the rank and name of the federated provinces.

Sir John Macdonald knew very well what his ideas were as to the rank and also the name. He made it very clear in his speeches, but at all these conferences he refrained from disclosing them for fear of arousing the abuse and vituperation of the little Canadians who saw only subordination of our state in future. And so Sir John Macdonald most astutely refrained from inciting in any way a discussion which might precipitate violent debate. Some indication of the cleverness of that gentleman may be found in a letter which he wrote just prior to going to London in which he indicated that it was important that no reverberations of the attitude to be taken at the conference should be spread throughout the dominion prior to the enactment of legislation. Once the act became law then everyone would agree to it and it would be all right.

It struck me at the time I read this that it was rather typically Tory. I do not think there is any doubt about the attitude; it certainly was not democratic. There was no indication that he wanted to submit the matter for consideration to the people who might not have agreed with him. He took that attitude for the purpose of preventing reverberations that would have destroyed his objective.

Now in the same volume, Pope, Confederation Documents, on page 115 there is given part of the debate which took place on Thursday, 13th December, 1866, on the resolutions of the Quebec conference. I quote the following:

Mr. McDougall: Why assert that the sovereign is commander in chief when it is part of the constitution of England?

Mr. Macdonald: I am not prepared to admit that. The sovereign is not absolutely the commander in chief of the militia of England except by proclamation.

Mr. McDougall: I am prepared to go to the same lengths as is constitutional in England.

Mr. Macdonald: Read it in connection with the third resolution.

Mr. Tupper: Then constitutional advice will be necessary.

Mr. Macdonald: Any powers given by statute to the sovereign must be exercised constitutionally.

Shortly after their arrival the first draft of the proposed pact was drawn up, and I would ask the House to note that Macdonald left blanks for the title of the new state. The first draft reads:

After the passing of this act—

These colonies which he had mentioned—

—shall for the purposes hereof, form and be one province or confederation, under the name of.

And then there is a blank. But in the second clause of the draft he repeats again the source of authority: the queen personally or her representatives. One gets some conception of the obstacles in Macdonald's way when one reads the report of the next draft, this time the draft of the Colonial Office of the 23rd January, 1867. This is reported at page 141 of Pope's volume. Note what the Colonial Office wanted; note what was in their mind as opposed to that which was in the mind of Macdonald and the delegation:

Whereas the union of the British North American colonies for purposes of government and legislation would be attended with great benefits to the colonies and be conducive to the interests of the United Kingdom:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows.

And then follows the word "preliminary". Clause 2 states:

It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, at any time not later than , by letters patent under the great seal of the United Kingdom, to declare the union of the colonies of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick into one colony, with such name as Her Majesty thinks fit.

It was to be a grouping of colonies, and for what object? In reading over the documents of that period it is quite clear that the only objective in the minds of those short-sighted British statesmen or the Colonial Office employees was to concentrate the colonies into one government and so more easily to control and manage the then scattered governments of the colonies in North America. Clause 3 states:

The Governor General of British North America shall, within after receipt by him of the letters patent declaring the union, proclaim the same by publication thereof in the Government Gazette of Canada, and thereupon the union shall have full effect, and the said three colonies shall thenceforth form and be one colony.

We find that repeated in clauses 4, 5 and 7. The reference is entirely to the formation of one colony and not of a nation free and equal or anything else. We find the third draft of the third conference reported on page 159. Will hon. gentlemen please note that in the previous delegates draft, blanks had been left in the space where the title was to be, and it is fair to assume that in the interim Her Majesty was consulted. If she was consulted, then certainly she must have agreed to a title now used for the first time in the draft of the conference. Note this:

4. Within calendar months next after the passing of this act—

These various provinces of Canada—

—shall form and be one united dominion, under the name of the Kingdom of Canada, and thenceforth the said provinces shall constitute and be one kingdom under the name aforesaid, upon, from, and after the day so appointed as aforesaid.

Clause 7 adopted completely from Macdonald's Quebec resolution reads:

The executive government and authority is and shall be vested in the queen.

I therefore submit that in all probability and indeed one is justified in assuming that in all certainty Her Majesty had been consulted in the interim and had given her consent. Otherwise, after Macdonald's public statements and after the resolutions that were carried, they would not have dared to include in this draft a title which he had already declared to be a matter for Her Majesty to decide. However, the obstacles raised in the Colonial Office were too great, and we find reported at page 212 the final bill in which Macdonald had had to admit that he had lost his great objective and had compromised. We will find out in a moment the reason why. Section 3 of the final draft reads:

It shall be lawful for the queen,..... to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed—

And so on.

—the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall form and be one dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three provinces shall form and be one dominion under that name accordingly.

The compromise had been reached. It was not to be a colony but it was not to be a sovereign state. It was not to be a kingdom. Macdonald had sought the one; the Colonial Office had sought the other. A compromise had been reached and a dominion, a subordinate, inferior title and rank had been secured. If one seeks the reason why Macdonald capitulated, one can find it in Pope's volume at page 312 on which appears a letter written by Macdonald to Lord Knutsford repeating many years afterward his chagrin, his bitter disappointment at the weakness, lack of vision on the part of the Colonial Office people. He said:

A great opportunity was lost in 1867 when the dominion was formed out of the several provinces. This remarkable event in the history of the British Empire, passed almost without notice. The new confederation had at the time of the union about the same population as the thirteen colonies when they rebelled and formed a nation imbued with the bitterest feelings of hostility towards England—feelings which by the way exist—

As he said at that time:

—in as offensive a form now as they did on the day of the declaration of independence.

The declaration of all the British North American provinces that they desired as one dominion to remain a portion of the empire, showed what wide government and generous treatment would do, and should have marked an epoch in the history of England. This would probably have been the case had Lord Carnarvon, who, as colonial minister, had sat at the cradle of the new dominion, remained in office. His ill omened resignation was followed by the appointment of the late Duke of Buckingham, who had as his adviser the then Governor General Lord Monck—both good men certainly, but quite unable, from the constitution of their minds, to rise to the occasion. The union was treated by them—

And this was simply the reflection of the general attitude of the Colonial Office.

—as if the British North America Act were a private bill uniting two or three English parishes. Had a different course been pursued, for instance had united Canada been declared to be an auxiliary kingdom as it was in the Canadian draft of the bill, I feel sure almost that the Australian colonies would, ere this, have been applying to be placed in the same rank as the Kingdom of Canada.

Pray pardon this long discursive letter, which I have been tempted to bore you with, by the pleasant and cool breezes of the lower St. Lawrence—

And so on.

Yours faithfully,

John A. Macdonald.

But Macdonald wrote to that letter a postcript part of which was suppressed for some time by his biographer. I will read the part that was published in the first editions of his biography:

P.S. On reading the above over I see that it will convey the impression that the change of title from kingdom to dominion was caused by the Duke of Buckingham. This is not so. It was made at the instance of Lord Derby, then foreign minister, who feared the first name would wound the sensibilities of the Yankees.

So we failed to become a kingdom because Lord Derby feared to hurt the sensibilities of the Yankees. It may not be too late to adjust that position. I do not think there is any danger of hurting the sensibilities of our friends to the south. After living on their border a nation, in effect, if not in fact, for sixty years, surely we have shown them that we have much in common with them not only in tongue, but in aspirations, in many of our ideals, in our religious and social customs, and so forth. Surely the time has come when we must admit to ourselves that the power on the part of the American people to understand and sympathize with our aspirations is sufficiently equal to our power to understand and sympathize with theirs, and is there any one in this House who will condemn or attempt to condemn the aspirations of the republic to the south? I for one will not, nor do I think anyone here will. Therefore, why take it upon ourselves to asume, as Lord Derby unfortunately did, that we might be hurting their sensibilities if we assumed the position to which we are entitled by the findings of this conference which are now before us?

But that quotation is not complete. In Pope's volume I, 1894, the whole of it was not given, but subsequently in a letter published in the Ottawa Citizen in July, 1917, Sir Joseph Pope wrote as follows:

Origin of Name

I agree with you in characterizing as erroneous the statement publicly made to the effect that at the Quebec conference in 1864 the name "Dominion" was selected for the new confederation. The only allusion at that conference to the subject of name that I am aware of, is the 71st resolution, which says:

"That Her Majesty the Queen be solicited to determine the rank and name of the federated provinces."

Nor is this surprising, for in 1864 the fathers were engaged in laying the foundations, not crowning the edifice.

"United provinces" was employed in 1866 merely as a temporary convenience while drafting the bill. In the margin of one of Sir John Macdonald's memoranda of the London conference there appears, written in his own hand, one under the other, probably in inverse order of his preference, the words:

Province Dependency Colony Dominion
Vice Royalty
Kingdom.

Apropos of the rejection of the title of "Kingdom", I may say that when I published my Memoirs of Sir John Macdonald, out of consideration for the then Governor General, who was the son of the Lord Derby criticized, I omitted a portion of Sir John's remarks. I now quote the whole sentence which he wrote as a postscript to his letter to Lord Knutsford of 18th July, 1889:

"P.S.—On reading the above over, I see that it will convey the impression that the change of title from "Kingdom" to "Dominion" was caused by the Duke of Buckingham. This is not so. It was made at the instance of Lord Derby, then foreign minister, who feared the first name would wound the sensibilities of the Yankees. I mentioned this to Lord Beaconsfield at Hughenden in 1879, who replied: 'I was not aware of the circumstance, but it is so like Derby, a very good fellow, but one who lives in a region of perpetual funk'."

In none of the papers on this subject of confederation is there anything to indicate that it ever occurred to Sir John Macdonald that his desire to have the new confederation styled "The Kingdom of Canada" might one day be interpreted to mean a looking forward on his part to Canadian independence. He evidently considered that the term "Kingdom" does not necessarily connote independent sovereignty. The kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland might have occurred to his mind, just as, at a later period, one would naturally think of the kingdoms of Saxony, Wurtemburg, Bavaria, or, for that matter, the Empire of India.

There is another quotation, by the way, that may throw a little light on Lord Derby's capacity. It is taken from Lord Newton's book on Lord Lyon's, volume II, page 105:

There can be no possible doubt as to Lord Derby's sincerity; indeed, he was so constitutionally averse from an adventurous foreign policy that a year or two later, Lord Salisbury said of his colleague that he never could have brought himself to annex the Isle of Man.

That brings us down through the various stages to the final draft of the bill. May I recall to the House the fact that on the day this debate opened, on Tuesday last, we celebrated, or should have celebrated if we wanted to celebrate—I wonder if there was any reason to do so—the passing of that bill through the British House. I do not think any hon. gentleman referred to it. It is simply a matter of interest to be noted in passing, but it is nevertheless true that this bill to which I have just referred passed the British House of Commons on that day, and so we see why to-day it has been found necessary to go back to England to struggle again and again, as we have been struggling, to achieve that state which Sir John A. Macdonald himself and those associated with him in those days sought to establish at that time.

Some of the speakers who have taken part in this debate have explained the attitude of the Colonial Office at that time, and their attitude since, as well as the attitude of the officials of departments over there at the present time, sometimes in criticism, sometimes not. Of them I do not wish at the present moment to make any criticism. I wish simply to submit in passing that if there is anything I do regret about this report it is that it has not been made as clear as I would wish just exactly what status we have achieved by adding not only to the qualification of our status as given in the report, but as well the definition as to our title. Why worry? Some poor old ladies, you know, Mr. Speaker, are fearfully worried about the possible loss of the word "dominion". I can sympathize with their point of view, but I do not think they quite understand. Use makes us love many things. Why should we use the word "dominion"? Let us study the dictionaries in regard to this word. The Oxford dictionary defines "dominion" as:

1. The power or right of governing or controlling.

And it gives as an example of the use of the word this sentence from Sir T. Herbert's Travels, year 1634, page 29:

Those Moguls got the dominion of those countries.

And another example from Freeman, 1867, page 215:

Foreign dominion in any shape would soon become hateful.

Yes. The Oxford dictionary gives a second definition:

2 (b). The territory owned by or subject to a king or ruler or under a particular government or control.

Example: Dominion of Canada (colloquially, the Dominion) the title under which the former colonial provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, etc., in British North America were united into one government in 1867.

That is the example given in the Oxford dictionary. Webster defines dominion as:

That which is subject to sovereignty or control.

Specific examples:

(a) the estate or domain of a feudal lord.

(b) territory governed; the tract or country considered as subject; as the dominion of a king.

Then follows this statement:

Dominion has no technical meaning as used in the names Dominion of Canada, Dominion of New Zealand, etc., but the name is popularly taken as implying a higher political status than the term "colony".

That is all. So it is quite clear that the term "dominion" indicates or implies inferiority to sovereignty or nationhood.

Mr. JACOBS: In his readings did not the hon. gentleman come across a statement to the effect that the man who first suggested the name "dominion" for Canada was Sir Samuel Leonard Tilley? I think it was he who was responsible for it; I did not know that Lord Derby was. Sir Leonard Tilley came across a passage one day in the Psalms —my hon. friend will remember that he was a biblical scholar—reading "And He shall have dominion from sea to sea." He thought that that was a very appropriate name for this country, seeing that it was bordered by the two oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. I hope the hon. gentleman did not get the impression that I attributed the title "dominion" to Lord Derby, not by any means, nor can my remarks be taken as having done so. What I did suggest was that the attitude of Lord Derby and those associated with him at that time, their lack of vision, their incapacity to realize the possibilities of the new situation, were the factors that prevented the formation of a sovereign nation on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. JACOBS: But accepting the interpretation of Sir Samuel Leonard Tilley, does not my hon. friend think that it was a dignified title to give to this country?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member is welcome to his opinion thereon. I would welcome, without any particular criticism of the immediate title, the title to which we are entitled, and that is all.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, in the summary of proceedings of the Imperial conference held last year I find two or three sentences in regard to the British Empire which attract my attention. At page 12 of the report I find the following:

> The British Empire is not founded upon negations. It depends essentially, if not formally, on positive ideals. Free institutions are its life blood. Free coöperation is its instrument. Peace, security and progress are among its objects.

> "Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution; while considered as a whole, it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organization which now exists or has ever yet been tried."

I subscribe to those statements and I think we would do well to appreciate the fact that we cannot compare the British Empire to any other empire which has ever existed; it has been established on an entirely different basis from anything else in the history of the world.

Whatever was the thought back of the holding of the first conference I think every person will agree that these talks, which started in a very small way, grew in proportion as the years went on and that the last few of those conferences held in more recent years were of very great importance. I believe the thought back of these conferences was that it would be advisable for the various parts of our widely scattered empire to send representatives to confer and talk over matters of general interest to all, and out of those conferences has grown, I believe, because of the increased knowledge of each part thereby obtained by all the parts, a stronger bond of sympathy and a more definite and better understanding.

Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other statesmen of this country who have at times attended imperial conferences came back very modestly, and very modestly reported to the people of Canada what had taken place. Last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) crossed the ocean to attend the conference. They came back from the conference telling the people of Canada that they had obtained from those tyrants overseas,—they did not use those words but they have been used by one hon. member in speaking in this House—that they had wrung from those tyrants in the mother country a new charter of liberty, and that a new Magna Charta had been obtained through their wonderful efforts. In the speech from the throne this year a reference was made to the report which would be placed before this House, and in the debate on the address a very definite statement was made by the Prime Minister that the report would be placed before parliament and that parliament would be asked to give its sanction and approval to the report. For some reason or other that promise has not been carried out. It seems to me it is becoming a habit with this government to make promises in the speech from the throne which are later disregarded. Last year in the speech from the throne definite promises were made which were not carried out and no attempt was made to carry them out. This year we have had the same thing with respect to this very important matter of the Imperial conference. I do not know who is the dictator in regard to this matter, but we do know that the government have been dictated to in regard to other matters; for instance, they were dictated to by Sir Clifford Sifton in regard to the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal. Sifton was the dictator, and Premier King was the dictatee. They were dictated to last year by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr Bourassa) in regard to a return to Alberta of its natural resources. In that case the member for Labelle was the dictator, and the Prime Minister was the dictatee. And now, notwithstanding the definite assurance of the Prime Minister that the House will be asked by resolution to approve of what had taken place at the conference, some person has dictated again, and the definite promise made is not to be carried out. In connection with this matter I would call your attention to the fact that on the 13th of December a question was put by the leader of the opposition to the Minister of Justice in regard to this report. Mr. Guthrie inquired:

> Is he—

That is the Minister of Justice.

> —willing to take the risk of the enactment into law of the proposal in the report?

To which the Minister of Justice replied:

> Surely.

Then the leader of the opposition said:

Perhaps in a few days the minister may hear from Quebec, and the report may yet have to be amended.

Well, apparently the minister did hear from Quebec, or from some place else, because the promise that the matter would be dealt with in a definite manner by this House has been abandoned by the government.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) this afternoon talked learnedly about preconfederation days and as to certain matters that took place at that time. His references were very interesting, although I may say, without being discourteous, that I fail to see just what bearing they have upon the matter before us. What was, after all, the basis of union in 1867? Subject to the special provisions affecting Ontario and Quebec, and to which they had voluntarily agreed, the provinces were to have equality of status and rights, possession of their natural resources, and complete control of their educational and other local affairs. I think I have stated the situation correctly. Having in view the very specific clauses of the British North America Act in regard to each province having control of its natural resources, I think I have stated the matter correctly in saying that they were to have autonomy or equality of status. They should have received those resources long ago.

In that connection I want to refer you to remarks made by the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) and also by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at a large meeting held in Toronto in the month of February last. Referring to what he calls "the first fruits of a declaration of equality of status" the Prime Minister is reported in the press as saying:

Who is there in the British Empire to-day who is prepared openly to advocate a doctrine of inferiority or subordination?

Well, I would answer that question, in view of what has transpired, by saying that he and his government are the ones who have done that very thing in the matter of the transfer to the western provinces of their natural resources. Referring to Great Britain and the dominions, the Prime Minister used these words:

It was laid down that each was an autonomous community within the British Empire; that in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs they were in no way subordinate one to another, that all were united by a common allegiance to the crown, and that all were freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations. In these particulars, all of which relate themselves to status, there is not only similarity but equality. In other words the position and mutual relation of Great Britain and the dominions was defined as one of equality of status.

Having regard to the action of the government in reference to the transfer to the western provinces of their natural resources may I ask your attention while I paraphrase that statement of the Prime Minister? I paraphrase it in this way: "It is laid down that each province is an autonomous community within the Dominion; that in any aspect of their domestic affairs they are in no way subordinate one to another; that all are united by a common allegiance to our common country and all are freely associated as units of confederation. In these particulars all of which relate themselves to status there is similarity and there should be, although there is not, equality."

On the same occasion the Minister of Justice described the main achievement of the conference as being "a definite, clear and official adherence to the doctrine of equality of status," declaring that the men of his race were in the forefront of the battle for responsible government. He added:

They believe in self-government, freedom and national status within the British Empire and under the Brtish throne, and that they do not believe a condition of subordination and colonial inferiority essential to the preservation of their sacred rights.

He also said:

Autonomy means self-government in all matters. I even suggest that distinguished visitors would perhaps be better advised if they refrained from offering so much advice to the people of Canada, as to how they should deal with matters which are exclusively their own business.

May I also paraphrase that statement in reference to the attitude and action of the government regarding the transfer to the west of their natural resources? I paraphrase it in this way: "The western provinces believe in self-government, freedom and provincial status within confederation and under the constitution, and they do not believe a condition of subordination and provincial inferiority essential to the preservation of their sacred provincial rights."

What does autonomy mean? Will any person, giving a definition of the word "autonomy", which means self-government, say that these western provinces have self-government? Have we nine provinces in Canada to-day within the meaning of the word "province", as defined by the British North America Act? We have six provinces in Canada to-day, and three legislative units, —Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, which are not provinces to-day within the meaning, within the specific words of the British North America Act, and in their definition of what a province is. Talk about imperialism in this country as has been talked by some members in this House! We have had exercised on the floor of this House, and very recently at that, an imperialism in so far as the provinces are concerned, in depriving those provinces of their legitimate rights. The Dominion as a trustee for the property of those provinces has played the part of a political bandit, and has stolen or taken to itself what belongs rightfully to those provinces. So, when some hon. members speak about imperialism, I would ask them to estimate whether or not we have not a form of imperialism exercised by the federal parlament in its attitude to the undoubted rights of the provinces.

Some excellent speeches have been made during the course of this debate. One of the most attractive speakers in this House is unquestionably the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). When he speaks in parliament he always attracts attention. So does the man who is haranguing a crowd outside of a circus tent attract attention, not so much because of what he says as because of the spectacular manner in which he says it. The hon. member for Labelle made in this House one of his characteristic speeches in his characteristic manner, in his characteristically offensive manner. He sang his hymn of hate, and in doing so he ran the whole length of the scale from pianissimo to fortissimo. He reminds me of a car on a scenic railway which rushes down the incline with a roar as if to gather strength for the climb ahead, pauses at the summit, as it were for breath, and then repeats the performance. So the hon. member for Labelle, carried along on the flood tide of his own verbosity, punctuated his utterances with blasts of rodomontade and thrasonical bombast and bedecked those utterances with facial contortions and acrobatic gesticulations.

Mr. FAFARD: Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to compare an hon. member with a scenic railway?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well I will apologize to the railway. I am sure that the hon. member for Labelle will take note of the interruption of my hon. friend. I know that he and many more of the members who sit around him recognize the power that the hon. member for Labelle is on the platform, the influence that he can exert there either for their election or against it, and very often, because they are afraid of him, they pay to him obeisance which down in their hearts they do not feel.

An hon. MEMBER: He is failing.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, he is failing. The ravages of age are coming on him as on others. Even the smile which for years he has cultivated so assiduously as a political asset is now only a grisly skeleton of what it was in former days. That smile has reached a point where it can no longer perform its use to him. His affected urbanity cannot conceal the bitterness which is seething within.

Mr. FAFARD: What has that to do with the Imperial conference?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Probably if my hon. friend waits a while he may find out. I am giving him at the start something that will not strain his gray matter too much.

Mr. FAFARD: It is a scenic railway speech.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I told my hon. friend I am very sure that he has already qualified himself entirely in the eyes of the hon. member for Labelle. I am sure the hon. member for Labelle will not put up any candidate against him. What I or anyone else may think of the speech of the hon. member for Labelle, one thing at least is certain. The hon. member for Labelle will always have one devout worshipper at his shrine and that is the hon. member for Labelle. It is certain that he is thoroughly dissatisfied with everything and every other person on earth. It is just as certain that he is completely satisfied with himself.

The hon. member has made spectacular pilgrimages from one end of this country to the other advertising himself as an apostle of peace, a peace founded on discord which he himself assiduously creates. He has advertised himself as an apostle of Canadian unity, a Canadian unity whose foundations rest, through the efforts of the hon. member for Labelle, on separatism. What was the object of the hon. member for Labelle in his venomous statement—because it was venomous—some time ago when he insinuated that Canadian nickel had been given to Germany for armament purposes, with the knowledge of the imminence of war?

Occasionally the hon. member for Labelle pays a tribute to British institutions, but he invariably digs into the dust heaps of antiquity for something to discredit any word of praise which might fall from his lips in regard to British institutions. He has persistently misrepresented everything British with the view of lessening respect in Canada for everything British. In regard to British institutions, in favour of which, as I say, he occasionally has a word to say, what was his attitude when they were in danger of extinction during the time of the war? On what did he feed those who read his articles in the press or who listened to his utterances? Did he seek to inspire patriotism to meet the crisis that we faced at that time? Am I not absolutely correct in saying that on every occasion when the empire has been menaced, the hon. member for Labelle has been found with voice and pen on the side of the enemies of the empire? When was he ever loyal to any party or any leader? His speeches and writings contain the bitterest references to Laurier that were ever uttered or written by any man in this country. When has he ever done anything to promote peace, harmony and unity in this country? Has he ever been satisfied with any party, with any leader?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Has he ever been satisfied with anything or anybody except himself?

Mr. BOURASSA: And the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards): I am quite satisfied with him.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): As I said a while ago, and the hon. gentleman is giving a demonstration of it now, his affected urbanity, that skeleton of a smile, that grisly grin cannot hide the seething tempest within. But I did not expect the hon. gentleman would come in and demonstrate my words as he is doing.

What was back of his insinuation—this gentleman who talks of Canadian national unity—that Great Britain was responsible for the war? What was back of his statement that not an English soldier would have crossed the channel on behalf of either Belgium or France except for the basest of motives? What was back of his statement that Great Britain was a stranger to international loyalty? What was back of his statement that Canadian leaders had grotesquely misrepresented the real causes of the war and the real situation as between France and England? Why did he deprecate Canada's gifts of flour and cheese and other foodstuffs during the war? Why did he refer to Canada as giving those things to very rich England, while the Belgians were starving and Canadians were going hungry? What was back of all that? What was his purpose? I repeat that the hon. gentleman on every occasion when our empire has been threatened, on every occasion when British institutions have been menaced, has been found giving by voice and pen such aid and comfort and encouragement as he could to the enemies of our empire.

Where was the hon. member for Labelle at the time of the war? I would like to quote to the House here tonight in his presence, a statement from a compatriot of his, in a newspaper published in the province of Quebec, a paper that he does not agree with, of course; that goes without saying, because he does not agree with anything unless he writes it himself. But listen to what La Patrie says in its issue of October 10, 1918:

> It will be remembered that on the 2nd of August, 1914, during the very first days of the war, Mr. Henri Bourassa, director of Le Devoir was in Cologne. What could he be doing in Germany at that particular moment—

Mr. BOURASSA: On what date?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The 2nd of August.

Mr. BOURASSA: I was in Paris that day.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I guess you did not get to Paris till a little later.

Mr. BOURASSA: I was in Paris on the 31st of July.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): At all events I am giving my authority for this statement, and I think I am right in saying that this statement was not contradicted in the columns of the hon. gentleman's paper.

Mr. BOURASSA: I never care to contradict things. I do not contradict the hon. gentleman. Let him go. I am simply saying it is a falsehood; that is all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I remark that the mere fact of the hon. member for Labelle calling a thing a falsehood does not make it a falsehood.

Mr. BOURASSA: But the fact that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington says something does not make it a verity.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am going to say some more things, and may I say with all due respect to this Napoleon of journalism and of everything else connected with public affairs, the hon. member for Labelle, I will accept, and I believe most of the people of this country will accept the statement of La Patrie before they will that of the hon. member for Labelle. The statement continues:

> What could he be doing in Germany at that particular moment when the central powers were busy launching throughout the world a host of secret agents thoroughly equipped with instructions for propaganda and a most efficient spying service? We do not know. Mr. Bourassa, in any event, displayed remarkable agitation at that time, when he hastily traversed France and the Atlantic to re-enter Canada—glad indeed to avail himself of the protection of the British flag, against which he has been raging since then. He arrived in Montreal August 21st.

I do not suppose that even the hon. member for Labelle will have the hardihood to say that he has not raged both before and ever since against the British flag and everything British.

Now we will take another date, October 12th, where in the same paper I find this:

On July 30, 1914, when hostilities had already been declared between Austria and Serbia, the general conflagration appeared inevitable to all; Russia and France were rapidly mobilizing their armies and Germany's forces were already in line. Mr. Henri Bourassa was at Colmar in Alsace, therefore on German territory. Colmar is twenty-five or thirty miles from the French frontier, where Mr. Bourassa, of French origin and a British subject, as he so loudly proclaimed a few days later, could have passed without any trouble had he so desired. But Mr. Bourassa did not turn his steps towards the French frontier. He left for Strasbourg, where he was July 31st. Strasbourg, one of Germany's strongest bases along the western frontier, a stronghold maintained to defend, when occasion arose, the provinces taken from France in 1871, was evidently on that date under military authority. Is it not strange that Mr. Bourassa should head straight for the enemy's citadel—as declaration of war against England was imminent at the time—instead of for France? Mr. Bourassa, however, elected to go to Strasbourg, and to our knowledge, he was not molested by the Prussian soldiery, although to the latter every traveler had to show a clean slate, and women were undressed under the pretence that this was necessary as a protection against spies.

I read also this:

If the Boches let Mr. Bourassa through so easily, why did they detain Doctor Beland so long—a Frenchman and a British subject, just like the Nationalist boss?

That is, in that respect, but not in any other. Why did they keep Doctor Beland? They kept Doctor Beland because they believed he was a real British subject, and they thought it would be better for Germany to keep him in prison than to let him go back to Canada to use his influence, as he would have done had he been here, in helping Canada to do her part in the war. You may infer, then, why they let Mr. Bourassa go. Whether or not the Germans knew what the hon. member for Labelle would do when he got back to Canada, I do not know, of course; but the fact is there, that while all that western frontier was bristling with German bayonets and all the preparations for war, the one Canadian, Doctor Beland, was shut up in a prison, and the other one was allowed to go freely wherever he liked, travelling up and down, wending his way amongst his friends the Huns, going where he chose without let or hindrance, and then he comes back to Canada, and as soon as he gets back here, and all the time during the war that he was in Canada—he will not deny this; he cannot deny it—he used his voice and pen from the time he arrived in Canada until the war was over, and since, in doing all he could to give encouragement to our enemies, the Germans, during the great crisis of the war, doing all he could to break down respect for Britain and British institutions, discouraging as far as he could the Canadian boys from doing their duty in that war.

The hon. member for Labelle does not care very much for what I say, I know. In that respect may I tell him that I care just as little what he says. The hon. member for Labelle enjoyed himself the other night in making his speech. He enjoyed himself, as he always does, in attacking everything British and throwing his slurs and sneers at everything British. But he did not stop at that. He made some reference to a divorce or marriage case in the province of Quebec. I might ask the hon. gentleman opposite what that has to do with the Imperial conference? He was perfectly willing to listen to talk about the Tremblay and Depatie marriage case. He was not concerned about the Imperial conference then. Not at all. But since the hon. member referred to that case—and of course he misrepresented the facts in referring to it—may I be permitted to say a word in that regard? He found fault with the Orange order because he said the lodges of that order collected money to carry this case to the Privy Council. Yes, we did. It cost us thousands of dollars. May I tell some hon. members opposite—it would be no use for me to tell it to the hon. member for Labelle—but I still think there is an element of fair play in most of the hon. members opposite—that members of the Orange order are obligated just as much to defend a Roman Catholic in his or her constitutional rights as they are to defend a Protestant. Well, that is amusing, of course. I am not surprised at the hon. member for Labelle treating that as something amusing. He said the fight that this woman was putting up to defend her rights and her honour was a funny thing. Those are the words he used—a very funny thing. He also made the woman a party to the appeal to the canonical tribunal, which was not true. She was not a party to it. The poor woman had not the money to fight for her rights and honour. This may be very amusing to my hon. friend from Labelle, but it was not amusing to the order of which I have the honour to be the head. We did not see anything funny in a woman fighting for rights, fighting for her honour, and fighting to prevent people branding her as an adultress and her children as bastards. It was amusing to the hon. member for Labelle, but not to us. We did raise money and sent it over, in order to assist in obtaining justice for that woman who had not the means herself to put up for the defence of her honour. Yes, we have used our money for other purposes too. May I tell some hon. members on the other side of the chamber that our Orange lodges were not only recruiting centres for enlisting men to go to the war, but hundreds of them were collecting agencies and collected money and material which were sent overseas for the relief of the Roman Catholic refugees who were driven out of Belgium by the friends of the hon. member for Labelle. They had no claim upon us from the standpoint of creed, but they had a claim upon us and the order to which I belong responded nobly. I should like to tell my hon. friends further in regard to that order to which he has referred that we are to-day maintaining orphanages in nearly all of the provinces, taking care of, clothing and bringing up as good citizens children who have been deprived of the care and protection of their natural protectors. I desire to say also—and I say it with pride—that the order which only elicits a sneer from the hon. member for Labelle, enlisted some forty or fifty thousand soldiers and sent them overseas. Thousands of them are sleeping in soldiers' graves in Flanders to-day. While my hon. friend during his lifetime, or the greater part of it, has devoted his talents and his energies in trying to lessen respect for British institutions and for everything British, I want to tell him and hon. members of this House that the Orange order in the hundred years of its existence in Canada has, in every crisis of our country's history, proved itself to be a hundred per cent dependably British. An institution which has done that, which has played the game as this order has done, is a real asset to this or any other country, and I do not propose to sit here and allow the hon. member for Labelle or any other member to cast any slurs or sneers at that institution.

The hon. member brought my name into his speech and asked, "does the leader of the opposition, or any other defender of minority rights, beginning with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, claim that the King of England can send a regiment from England to force Catholic schools upon the province of Manitoba?" It was a very silly question to ask of any member of the House. Why, certainly not, but allow me to state in that connection that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington does stand for and is willing and ready at all times to defend, minority rights and majority rights as well. There is such a thing as the rights of majorities in this country, and there is such a thing as responsibilities of minorities as well as the responsibility of majorities, and so far as his reference to Catholic schools is concerned, I will say—and again my attitude is in strong contrast with his—that so far as the schools are concerned—and I speak not merely for myself but for the order of which I am the head—let any province of the west establish as many kinds of schools as they want. That is their business. It is not my business, neither is it the business of the hon. member for Labelle. If the province of Alberta or the province of Saskatchewan see fit to establish separate schools, I repeat that is their business and any attempt on the part of this parliament to prevent Saskatchewan or Alberta or any other province from establishing separate schools will be resented, and I will be among the first on my feet to put up a fight against that attempt. That is the position I take in regard to these schools. I say the provinces are entitled to handle those matters themselves. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Quebec have that right. How long would we in the province of Ontario submit to this parliament attempting to pass legislation telling us what schools we should have? How long would the province of Quebec submit to this parliament undertaking to dictate to them the kind of educational system they should have? The first to protest against such interference would be the hon. member for Labelle. Yet that is what he wants to have imposed on the provinces of the west. He talks about imperialism! When he gets on that subject he fairly froths at the mouth because of his hatred of anything imperialistic, of anything British. He cannot talk on that subject for five minutes without having a brainstorm—at least I have never heard him without noticing that peculiar result. Imperialism! Always respresenting that we are being throttled and shackled by some power in England. That is what he has tried to make the people of Canada believe. And yet this gentleman who is so deadly opposed to anything along imperialistic lines, to any interference from the outside, does not scruple to adopt the imperialistic principle of putting shackles on the free citizens of the provinces of the west.

I am not very greatly concerned about changes in the constitution. It does not seem to me to be reasonable to suppose that a constitution laid down sixty years ago, with the very best intention in the light that they had at that time, with such vision of the future as they possessed at that time, and which was no doubt the right thing at that time,—I say it does not appear to me to be logical that that constitution should be continued without changing it one jot or tittle in any respect in order that it may apply to the changed conditions of this day or some future time. I believe that some changes should be made. But I want to say this, Mr. Speaker. If I understand correctly this report and some of the speeches that have been made in this House, and if the intention is to sever our connection with the mother country and allow the Dominion to change its constitution at will, I warn hon. members that when all restraints are taken off there will be an agitation throughout this country that will stir it as it has never been stirred since confederation. And that agitation will not be confined to any one province; it will be just as marked in the west as in some parts of the east.

As to minorities, I have less reason to be concerned than have hon. gentlemen sitting opposite. Why? I would ask them to take the official figures of the census of 1911 and of 1921, when they will find that the percentage of the total population of French origin in 1911 was 28.52, and in 1921 27.91. I would remind them that in the province of Ontario in those ten years the population of British origin increased by 1.4 per cent, those of French origin by .4 per cent; in the province of Quebec the population of British origin decreased by .6 per cent, those of French origin by 1.2 per cent; in New Brunswick the population of British origin decreased by .1 per cent, while those of French origin increased by 6.2 per cent; in Nova Scotia the population of British origin increased by .9 per cent, those of French origin by .3 per cent; in Prince Edward Island the population of British origin increased by 1.1 per cent while those of French origin decreased by .5 per cent; in Manitoba the population of British origin decreased by .9 per cent, those of French origin by .1 per cent; in Saskatchewan the population of British origin increased by 1.9 per cent, those of French origin by .8 per cent; in Alberta the population of British origin increased by 8.3 per cent, while those of French origin neither increased nor decreased in percentage; in British Columbia the population of British origin increased 9.5 per cent, while those of French origin decreased .1 per cent. In other words, in four provinces there has been a decrease in the population of French origin, in four provinces an increase, and in one province neither an increase nor a decrease; whereas in regard to the population of British origin, in six provinces there has been an increase in percentage and in three a decrease. So having regard to the fact that in the Dominion as a whole in 1901 the population of French origin represented 30.7 per cent, in 1911 28.52 per cent and in 1921 27.91 per cent—a steady decrease—my hon. friends opposite if they have any concern for minorities, should be more concerned than I. I believe that with a proper system of immigration the percentage of our population of British origin will be very greatly increased as compared with those of French origin in the next ten or twenty years.

I repeat, Sir, the protection of minorities should not wholly engage our attention; we should also concern ourselves with the protection of majorities in this country. In other words, while we have the privilege of sitting in this House we should do our part to safeguard the future of the Dominion in every respect so far as the rights of all classes of the people are concerned, and we are doing less than our duty if we do not do all in our power to safeguard those rights.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could give to this House many more arresting facts regarding the career of the hon. member for Labelle, but he is a never-failing source of interest himself. I think it would be a very sad thing indeed for this country if we hastily decided to do away with the right of appeal to the Privy Council. Just so long as we have men in this country like the hon. member for Labelle, who shows a disposition to ride roughshod over the rights of the people as he did with the people of the west; so long as we have men of that kind exercising their influence along that line, I say we should stick to our safeguard and retain the right of appeal to an independent tribunal, the Privy Council.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take as much of the time of the House on this debate as previous speakers have taken. The essence of the report made by the committee on inter-imperial relations to the Imperial conference, which was unanimously adopted by the conference, is found on page 12 of the report. I refer to the definition of the relationship which exists or is alleged to exist between Great Britain and the dominions:

> They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

I propose to confine myself to a discussion of this definition in so far as it deals with the autonomy of Canada in her domestic affairs. Within that sphere I feel that a great forward step has been taken, that this declaration of equality is perhaps the most important constitutional pronouncement made since confederation, and that it is pregnant with great possibilities for Canadian national development.

There has been much criticism of this definition, much debate as to its meaning and much misunderstanding of its implications. There are those who say on the one hand that it marks the end of the British Empire as we have known it, or at any rate the commencement of a new British Empire essentially and fundamentally different from the old. On the other hand there are those who say that no change whatever has resulted, that the definition is merely a statement of the constitutional status which has already been acquired in practice although not hitherto universally recognized. Possibly there is a great deal of truth in both these statements, yet in my opinion neither is strictly accurate. With all due respect to those who have expressed these various views as to the work of the Imperial conference and the results achieved, I prefer to regard this definition not so much a statement of existing fact as a declaration of what ought to be; not so much a declaration of equality as a promise of equality. Everyone must remember that until legal effect is given to that declaration we do not legally possess that equality.

In order that we may arrive at an appreciation of this definition I think it essential that we attempt to analyse the actual status of Canada both from the strictly legal point of view and from the point of view of constitutional development and practice. By so doing we may perhaps be able to view the definition in the light of existing facts and so better understand its implications and the consequences resulting therefrom. I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible. If I should present for the consideration of this House a point of view which is to a large extent that of a lawyer, I crave the indulgence of the House. I shall attempt to put the legal position as baldly and as briefly as possible.

The Dominion of Canada owes its existence as a legal entity to the British North America Act, a statute passed by the parliament of Great Britain. That statute is the charter of Canada, beyond which Canadian legislatures, whether they be federal or provincial, cannot validly go. In law the parliament of Canada is subordinate and inferior to the parliament of Great Britain; as a legal proposition that is not open to dispute and we must remember that in law that inferiority exists. This legislative inferiority of the parliament of Canada is of two kinds; first, that which results naturally from the fact that the parliament of Canada was created by the parliament of Great Britain, is bound by the terms of the charter which created it and is therefore inherently dependent. In the second place there is that inferiority which results from the fact that the parliament of Canada is still in law subject to the paramount legislative authority of the parliament of Great Britain which alone has power to change the terms of the British North America Act and, either by an amendment to that act or by the enactment of some other act, to enlarge or abridge the measure of self-government which we now enjoy.

As to the first heading of inferiority, that which is inherent in the parliament of Canada and in the Dominion of Canada as a dependency of the parliament of Great Britain which created it, it has been held, for example, by the Privy Council that it does not lie within the legislative competence of a self-governing dominion such as Canada to pass legislation affixing penal consequences in Canada to acts committed outside of Canada. In that view of the law it would not be possible for Canada to punish persons for offences such as murder, arson, theft or bigamy committed outside of Canada. It has been argued that the powers of self-government possessed by Canada must be confined to matters or things within the territorial limits of Canada; in other words, that Canada has no power to pass legislation having an extra-territorial operation or effect. No such limitation exists on the powers of the parliament of Great Britain, because the British parliament is sovereign, and the Canadian parliament is not. On two occasions the parliament of Canada has passed resolutions on this subject for an address to the British parliament asking for an amendment to the British North America Act to remove this anomaly, once in 1920 and again in 1924, but although both houses of parliament passed these resolutions unanimously on both occasions, no action has yet been taken by the British parliament.

The second aspect of subordination lies in the fact that Canada is still subject, notwithstanding the terms of the British North America Act, to the legislative authority of the parliament of Great Britain, the only sovereign legislature in the British Empire. It is quite true that a very large measure of autonomy and self-government was conferred upon Canada by the British North America Act, but that self-government is subject to limitation and supervision by the British North America Act itself, and by other acts of the parliament of Great Britain extending to Canada.

The British North America Act set up an elaborate system of checks and balances. Certain spheres of jurisdiction were assigned to the provinces, and in order that there should be a check upon the powers of the provinces the Dominion government was given the right to disallow provincial legislation if it thought it necessary to do so in the interests of Canada. The remainder of the legislative field was assigned to the Dominion parliament, and similar checks on Dominion legislation were provided by sections 55, 56 and 57 of the British North America Act. These sections have already been discussed, and I shall therefore deal with them very briefly.

Section 56 deals with the right of the government of Great Britain,—not the parliament of Great Britain,—to disallow legislation even although it has passed both houses of parliament, has received the royal assent and has actually gone into operation. Every act passed by this parliament must be sent to one of the secretaries of state in Great Britain, and remain subject to disallowance for a period of two years from the time the act was received by the Secretary of State. If this right of disallowance had been regularly or frequently exercised it would no doubt have given rise to great irritation and great annoyance, but the right has not been exercised. As far as I am aware the right of disallowance given by the British North America Act to the British government has been exercised only once, namely, in 1873, some fifty-four years ago. Section 56 still remains intact in the British North America Act, and the present practice in regard to that section is that all acts passed by this parliament are sent every year to London, and it is intimated through the Secretary for Dominion Affairs that "His Majesty will not be advised to exercise his powers of disallowance" in regard thereto.

Sections 55 and 57 deal with another right of supervision, namely, the right of the Governor General to withhold the royal assent from a bill even although it has passed both houses of parliament, or to reserve the bill for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure. I am not greatly concerned with the exercise of the veto power which is conferred upon the Governor General by section 55, for I am convinced that constitutional practice will provide for its proper use. I do not believe it is any more likely that the Canadian Governor General would exercise his right of veto in Canada in respect of Canadian legislation, than that His Majesty the King would exercise that right in Great Britain in respect of British legislation. I think that that is particularly true since the recent declaration, which merely crystallizes the idea already developed with regard to the position of the Governor General in Canada. I believe that this definition of the Governor General's position in Canada as the representative of the crown marks a great step in the direction of equality of status, and I would suggest that steps be taken to change the title of His Majesty's representative in Canada from that of "Governor General" to that of "Viceroy", in order to indicate more truly the actual position which His Majesty's representative now occupies.

With regard to the right of reservation of bills for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure, I wish to point out that this right was fairly frequently exercised at the time of confederation and for some time subsequent thereto. The royal instructions to the Canadian Governor General at that time expressly required the Governor General to reserve in all cases for Her Majesty's pleasure, certain well defined classes of bills. This right of reservation was exercised prior to 1890 on some fifteen occasions, although as a matter of fact the royal assent was refused only in one case. In 1876 Mr. Edward Blake, then Minister of Justice, protested against the regular exercise of this right of reservation. He contended that the proper practice to follow should be to allow the bills to become acts of parliament, and go effectively into operation, and rely solely upon the right of disallowance if it were the opinion of the British government that such legislation was objectionable. He realized of course that the British government would hesitate very much more to exercise its right of disallowance in respect of an act that had already gone into operation, than to exercise its right of reservation. As a result of Mr. Edward Blake's protest the royal instructions were changed in order to omit any mention of special classes of bills. It was intimated, however, very clearly at that time that the right of reservation was not given up, but that its exercise as a regular practice was abandoned, and the maintenance of the right is expressly referred to in the report of the Imperial conference. I agree with most of the hon. members who have spoken on this subject that these statutory rights of supervision and disallowance, in view of the constitutional practice that is followed, do not constitute any serious limitation of Canadian autonomy. It has been said that these rights are, in practice, constitutionally dead. Since these rights are constitutionally obsolete no useful purpose is served by the retention of sections 55, 56 and 57 in the British North America Act, and in my opinion they should be repealed. It is inconsistent with the declaration of equality of status which we are discussing that they should be retained. If our legislation is ultra vires, the courts which are constituted for that purpose will so find. If our legislation is within the legislative competence of our parliament then we are the best judges of the wisdom and the expediency of such legislation, and it should not be subject even to nominal review.

The Dominion power of self-government is further restricted by virtue of the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865, and that is a very serious limitation. Section 2 of that important act provides as follows:

> Any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such act of parliament, or having in the colony the force and effect of such act, shall be read subject to such act, order or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

This statute affirms the right of the parliament of Great Britain to legislate for the colonies, and in law Canada comes within that category for the purposes of this act. Just as the parliament of Great Britain by the British North America Act conferred powers upon the Dominion of Canada, so it can increase or diminish those powers as it sees fit, and it has done so. In law two propositions are perfectly clear. First, the Dominion parliament has no power to pass legislation which runs counter to any act of the parliament of Great Britain extending to Canada, and with all due deference to the hon. leader of the opposition, I say that it cannot even now amend the British North America Act or pass legislation that is repugnant to it. Second, the parliament of Great Britain is under no legal restriction whatever. It may pass any legislation it sees fit and no court will declare that legislation ultra vires. It may make such legislation applicable to the Dominion of Canada if it chooses to do so, and so legislate for the people of Canada without obtaining their approval. In practice the British parliament does not generally do so, but since confederation it has done so in several cases, for example; the Extradition Act, 1870; the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870; the Fugitive Offenders' Act, 1881; and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, regarding which we heard this afternoon. This power of the British parliament is not constitutionally dead, and as long as this distinction exists, it is absurd to speak of absolute equality of status.

I have endeavoured to set out the inequalities of legislative power between the parliament of Canada on the one hand and that of Great Britain on the other. It is obvious and undisputed in spite of constitutional development and practice. The Imperial conference itself recognized the existence of the inequalities to which I have referred and thereby admitted that the definition of equality which they arrive at must not be taken literally. The conference recommended that steps should be taken by Great Britain and the dominions to set up a committee:

> To inquire into, report upon, and make recommendations concerning—
> (i) Existing statutory provisions requiring reservation of Dominion legislation for the assent of His Majesty or authorizing the disallowance of such legislation.
> (ii) (a) The present position as to the competence of dominion parliaments to give their legislation extra-territorial operation.
> (b) The practicability and most convenient method of giving effect to the principle that each dominion parliament should have power to give extra-territorial operation to its legislation in all cases where such operation is ancillary to provision for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion.
> (iii) The principles embodied in or underlying the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and the extent to which any provisions of that act ought to be repealed, amended, or modified in the light of the existing relations between the various members of the British commonwealth of nations as described in this report.

With that recommendation of the conference I heartily concur.

There is one other aspect in which inferiority exists, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred to it in the brilliant and masterly address which he delivered yesterday in this House. While it is within the power of Great Britain to decide for herself how her laws shall be administered, no similar right is given to Canada. Even if Canada should desire to prohibit appeals to the Privy Council, she has no power to do so. Her lack of rights in that respect has been settled on two occasions. In 1875 when a bill was introduced in this parliament to create a supreme court for the Dominion, it was the expressed intention of the ministers to prohibit appeals to Her Majesty's Privy Council. They were however notified by the government of Great Britain that the bill could not be sanctioned unless the royal prerogative to hear appeals was preserved. Accordingly a saving clause was inserted in the bill and the bill received the royal assent. In 1888, some thirteen years afterwards, an attempt was again made, this time in criminal cases, to prohibit appeals to the Privy Council. Section 1025 of the Canadian Criminal Code seeks to accomplish that purpose. Since 1888 many applications for leave to appeal in criminal cases have been made to the Privy Council; but in every case the application for leave to appeal has been refused, thus showing that the Privy Council believes that we administer our criminal laws in a just manner. Year after year the Privy Council has refrained from discussing the validity of the section which I have mentioned, but in 1926 it settled the question in the famous case of Rex versus Nadan, a liquor conviction case from Alberta. There was no greater reason inherent in the case itself for deciding the constitutional question in that case than in the other cases which had come before that body, and in fact there was less. It was widely suggested at the time in London that there were special reasons why the point should now be settled, namely that it was desirable to have a precedent established in case the Irish Free State should desire to prohibit appeals to the Privy Council. The constitution of the Irish Free State is declared to be similar to that of Canada. If Canada cannot prohibit appeals to the Privy Council, then neither can the Irish Free State. The leader of the opposition in the course of his address on Tuesday last stated that we now have the right to abolish appeals to the Privy Council. The Privy Council disagrees with him. In the Nadan case it held that section 1025 of the Canadian Criminal Code was ultra vires and that Canada could not effectively prohibit the appeals to the Privy Council, because of the British statutes of 1833 and 1844 relating to appeals and because of section 2 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act. I am not concerned with the reason for the decision, but I am concerned with the decision itself that Canada has no right to decide for herself whether her judicial system shall be self-contained or not.

This then is the legal and constitutional relation of Canada and Great Britain in regard to legislative power—Great Britain free and unrestricted in all her legislative functions—Canada limited in power and subject to supervision and control in such power as she possesses. How can there literally be equality of status under such circumstances? In my opinion Canada does not possess complete autonomy; she is not equal in status, to Great Britain and this parliament is still, as it always has been, subordinate to that of Great Britain. I am not complaining of that inequality, for whether Canada is equal to Great Britain or not, I would rather live in Canada than in any other land under the sun. I am not contending that Canada is suffering any great hardship from that inequality, and I am not desirous of stirring up any agitation whatsoever, but I see no useful purpose in attempting to conceal from ourselves the true, actual state of affairs. The Imperial conference attempted to reconcile in one definition equality of status and the maintenance of the empire. The phrase, "equality of status, within the empire", is, in my opinion, in law a contradiction of terms.

What then does this declaration of equality mean, since it does not accurately set out the true state of affairs and is manifestly contradictory in its terms? Why should we be so pleased with it in Canada? It has been hailed as a great charter of liberty, and, in my opinion, rightly so. Notwithstanding its inaccuracies, notwithstanding its contradictions, it marks a new era in empire development and promises new life to the Canadian nation. What is the effect of such a declaration of equality made between Great Britain on the one hand, and Canada on the other, between a superior and an inferior? The declaration does not imply independence. It is not tantamount to a declaration of independence, for the very terms of the definition hold the various constituent parts of the empire within the empire and presuppose the continued existence of the empire. The declaration in my opinion, if any meaning can be given to it, involves and implies two things: first, an implied agreement by Great Britain that she will not exercise the sovereign powers which she legally possesses except at the request and with the concurrence of the dominions; it is simply a crystallization of the constitutional practice that has gradually developed; and secondly, and this is very important, there is an implied promise by Great Britain that she will place the dominions in a position as near to equality as is consistent with the maintenance of the empire. In this view the declaration involves, on the one hand, a renunciation of powers by Great Britain, the superior, and on the other hand, a granting of powers to the dominions, the inferiors, in order that their status may approximate to equality as closely as possible. May I interpret the declaration also, not as a statement of existing facts, but rather as an ideal to be aimed at, and may I repeat the statement which I made at the outset, that the declaration is a promise of equality? In my opinion the declaration is tantamount to a statement by Great Britain, which was a party to it, that Canada and the other self-governing dominions are now entitled to the maximum amount of autonomy and the maximum amount of self-government that is consistent with the maintenance of the empire.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the hon. member would be good enough at this point to elaborate just what he means by the maximum amount of autonomy which we might have consistent with the maintenance of the empire?

Mr. THORSON: I am coming to that. I have already indicated in the course of my remarks the various respects in which Canada falls short of that maximum amount of autonomy and that maximum amount of self-government but let me enumerate them again:

1. Complete freedom from the supervision and control of our legislation by the government of Great Britain, even although that control and supervision be nominal.

2. The right to pass legislation having an extra-territorial effect if we deem it desirable in the interests of Canada to do so.

3. The right to decide for ourselves how we shall administer our laws, and to prohibit appeals to the Privy Council if we so desire.

4. The right to amend our constitution as we may deem it necessary without the intervention of the parliament of Great Britain.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the new charter which Great Britain is prepared to grant to Canada when Canada is prepared to receive it.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If Great Britain goes to war without our consent, are we not involved in the war whether we will or no?

Mr. THORSON: I made the statement at the outset that I proposed to confine my discussion solely to autonomy in so far as the domestic affairs of Canada are concerned.

This, Mr. Speaker, I repeat, is the new charter which Great Britain is prepared to give to Canada as soon as Canada is ready to accept it. Even if no legislative action is taken by the parliament of Great Britain then, although no great change of status will have taken place by virtue of the declaration of the Imperial conference, nevertheless a portion of that charter has been conferred upon us because the constitutional practice of Great Britain not to interfere in Canadian affairs has been crystallized. But in order that the promise of increased autonomy and increased rights of self-government should be fully implemented, more is required than the mere declaration of an imperial conference, for we must never lose sight of the fact that the imperial conference is a conference solely, and that it has no legislative authority whatsoever. If we are to get that increase of autonomy and that increase in our right of self-government, then it will be necessary to pass appropriate legislation, and that legislation must come from the parliament of Great Britain. No court of law in this country or elsewhere would pay the slightest attention to the declarations of such a body as the Imperial conference in so far as its legislative authority is concerned. We must remember this, Mr. Speaker, and I give this as a reason for laying such stress upon the legal aspects of the question. After all, our autonomy is measured by our power and by our right to translate our wishes into binding law. I do not imagine for a moment that this grant of further autonomy will be conferred upon us immediately, or will be conferred upon us against our will. There is a peculiar elasticity about the British constitution, for legal sanction very rarely precedes constitutional development. Great Britain will not make the grant until Canada is ready to receive it. Perhaps Canada is not yet ready to receive that grant, but that day, in my opinion, is not far distant.

What are the implications involved in the acceptance of this grant by the Dominion of Canada? If the grant is made, and it will not be made unless we are prepared to accept it, then we shall have the right to control entirely our judicial system, and to abolish appeals to the Privy Council if we so desire. We shall have the right to control entirely our constitution in so far as our internal affairs are concerned and we shall have power to amend the British North America Act as we deem necessary. We shall be complete masters in all those matters which concern ourselves alone. Why should we not have that right? Are we who are British subjects in Canada less entitled to complete autonomy and less entitled to the fullest right of self-government, than those British subjects who reside in Great Britain? Are we less competent to manage and control our own affairs? Are we less worthy of trust? It has been suggested repeatedly by many speakers—and the hon. leader of the opposition has not been without guilt in that respect—that the guarantee of Great Britain to protect minorities by the exercise of her right of disallowance and her paramount legislative authority has been withdrawn by virtue of this declaration of equality of the Imperial conference, that a great blow has been struck at the rights of minorities and that these rights are in great danger. This suggestion—and in my opinion it is not a worthy one—has been made solely for the purpose of alarming our fellow citizens whose language is French and whose religion is Roman Catholic. In answer to that suggestion I say that even if the declaration of the Imperial conference does involve, by implication, a renunciation on the part of Great Britain of her powers of control and supervision over Canada, there is no danger whatsoever to the rights of minorities. If the guarantee of Great Britain has by implication been withdrawn then the guarantee of Canada still remains intact. Is our bond worth less than that of Great Britain in a matter that is so vital to national unity and so essential to the continued existence of Canada? If any power of amending our constitution is to be conferred upon us—and in my opinion it ought to be conferred—then that power of amending our constitution must be subject to two things and two important principles must be kept in mind. Firstly, the power of amending our constitution must be elastic enough to provide for sound national development, so that we may be permitted to dream of a day when we shall cease to be a group of warring provinces, jealous of one another's rights, and become in very truth a united nation. Secondly, the power of amending our constitution must be subject to the rights which our fellow-Canadians enjoy, both in respect of language and religion. We must be willing, if it is necessary, to renew ourselves in the name of the people of Canada the guarantees in that respect given at confederation. They were our guarantees then. They have been our guarantees in reality ever since, and they must remain our guarantees in the future. I have no doubt that the genius of Canadian statesmanship will make it possible to devise some machinery for amending our constitution that will preserve those two great principles that I have enunciated, provided the task of building that machinery is approached in the proper spirit of mutual trust and confidence, and unless we develop that spirit of mutual trust and confidence in our national affairs there is really no purpose in attempting to build a nation in this land of ours, for a nation that is not based upon these fundamental principles cannot endure.

The Imperial conference regarded the report which it submitted as the foundation for the work of subsequent conferences. So, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to accept, and I do so gladly, the declaration of the Imperial conference, in so far as it relates to autonomy in our domestic affairs, as a foundation upon which to build this land of ours, as a starting point from which we shall march along the pathway that destiny has marked out for us, content with the present and absolutely fearless of the future, confident in the realization that a great heritage has been bestowed upon us, conscious of our growing national strength and power and hopeful that we shall become in time a united nation, imbued with the great principles of liberty, equality and fraternity. Upon the bedrock of these great principles we shall continue to build the nation which is in the process of construction, liberty of self-development, equality of language and religion, united in the fraternity of a common love of Canada; for that common love of Canada, that common devotion to the country which gave us birth and will receive our ashes, is after all the real test of a true Canadian.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): A good deal has been said in this debate, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the legal points at issue. Perhaps I may be permitted to emphasize the more practical aspects of the question before us. The most important question, it seems to me, with regard to the Imperial conference is this: Is Canada bound by the decisions and recommendations of the conference? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) says "not unless these are ratified by parliament". Yet curiously enough the government has made no effort whatever to have these decisions and recommendations ratified. The question comes before us, as we know, in a way that makes it extremely difficult for us to give expression by vote to our approval or disapproval of the various measures proposed. I take it then that unless there is ratification by this House, for which no provision is being made, Canada is not bound by the recommendations or suggestions of this report. It is commonly said by the press gallery, after a debate on a private member's motion, that the discussion "was academic". I fancy that the best that can be said with regard to our discussion in this House during the last two or three days is that it is largely academic in character. Perhaps after all, at least from the standpoint of those of us who cannot endorse all the recommendations, it is just as well that we should not pass resolutions with regard to this report. It at least leaves Canada free from some of the obligations which might otherwise be entailed.

Was anything, then, really accomplished by the conference? Immediately after the conference we were inclined to think that it marked a new era, that all the high tributes paid by the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) were true, and that we were being given a charter of new and enlarged liberty. In the course of this debate it would seem that really this so-called new and enlarged liberty does not amount to anything. Perhaps the truth will be found somewhere in between. Personally I think the conference meant a good deal. Probably the greatest accomplishment is that we can now claim autonomy without being charged with disloyalty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is something.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Something, yes—I think it is a great thing. I repeat, now it is quite possible for us to claim autonomy without being charged with disloyalty. After all, Lord Balfour is quite respectable company. Let me repeat some of the phrases of the report, which are perhaps the greatest gain we have derived from the conference:

The self-governing communities.

Again:

Our autonomous communities.

Again:

Equal in status.

Again:

In no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs.

Again:

Every self-governing member is now master of its own destiny.

And again:

It is subject to no compulsion whatever.

Surely these are wonderful phrases and ought to satisfy us all. But I would ask very frankly; are these in fact true? Unhesitatingly I answer, No. Let us get away from camouflage. Let us face the actual situation.

But first of all let me direct attention to the fact that the so-called self-governing communities form only a very small portion of the British Empire. Throughout the debate we have been talking as if the British Isles, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, the self-governing dominions, were the British Empire. That is very far from being the fact. A great many other communities and considerations must be taken into account if we are to discuss imperial affairs, and these have hardly been touched throughout the course of the debate.

We were told by the Prime Minister that information in regard to foreign affairs was "highly confidential". That sounds strange in what is supposed to be a democracy. These foreign affairs are secret, and although self-governing dominions, we must simply accept the few crumbs of information that may be handed to us.

With regard to the other parts of the empire, the Prime Minister said the other day:

Canada is not interested in any immediate way.

I wonder whether he is correct in that statement. It is an easy way of getting rid of some very difficult problems. But I would ask him: What about Egypt—was not Canada interested there a few years ago? What about South Africa—was Canada not interested in any immediate way in that country a few years ago? What about India—is Canada not interested? What about China these days—is Canada not interested? We have had no discussion whatever with regard to these communities within the British Empire which are not so largely self-governing as our own. This question was dealt with at the Imperial conference. According to the report:

Mr. Amery opened by a description of the variety and size of the colonial empire ranging from small self-governing communities like the island of Malta to the vast possessions in tropical Africa. He then emphasized its interest and economic importance to other parts of the empire, pointing out that its total trade, which had expanded enormously in recent years, was now over £500,000,000 per annum. He laid stress on the importance for the future to the rest of the empire of the adequate development of these great areas, over two million square miles in extent, lying mainly in the tropics, and on the fact that production in the tropics was complementary to the industrial production of the temperate zones.

He was here speaking particularly of the colonies, protectorates and mandated territories.

A recent writer estimates that nearly nine-tenths of the whole habitable globe is under white domination. I wonder whether we can realize that. In regard to population he adds that of every seven people in the British Empire six are coloured. So whilst we have been talking here about the British Empire, we have been concerning ourselves about a portion only of its population—at the very most of one man out of every seven.

A very interesting book has recently been published on imperialism and world politics by Professor T. Parker Moon. He finds that:

The imperialistic nations of to-day possess colonies and protectorates which, taken together, are seven times the size of Europe and half the earth's total land surface. Six hundred million human beings, a third of the human race, are directly subject to imperialist domination.

Imperialistic domination! What does it mean? I do not think I can give a better definition than that expressed by a recognized authority, Mr. J. A. Hobson:

Imperialism is a depraved choice of national life, imposed by self-seeking interests which appeal to the lusts of quantitative acquisitiveness and of forceful domination. . . . Its adoption as a policy implies a deliberate renunciation of that cultivation of the higher inner qualities which for a nation as for an individual constitutes the ascendency of reason over brute impulse. It is the besetting sin of all successful states, and its penalty is unalterable in the order of nature.

This is the British Empire which was represented, at least to a limited extent, at the Imperial conference, and I would suggest that we cannot altogether avoid a discussion of the larger issues involved.

Back in the Old Greek democracies it will be remembered that a small group of free men dominated a large slave population. We are very largely in the same position to-day: a comparatively small group of white people, self-governing, dominate an enormous number of coloured races in every part of the world. We do not solve our own problems here in Canada or the problems of the other self-governing dominions unless we recognize these wider aspects of our problem. It is true that India was supposed to be represented at the Imperial conference, and I believe one of her representatives was Lord Birkenhead. I wonder what his idea of empire is. We have had the British Empire lauded; now let us find out what Lord Birkenhead, an official representative of India, has to say with regard to his ideals of empire. I quote from an article of his appearing in The Empire Review of December, 1923, in which he says:

So Greece succeeded Rome, teaching the entire world during the whole of its stern, dominating, and imperial sway, that might was right, and that a sharp sword in the hand of a disciplined soldier was the most persuasive argument in world diplomacy.

According to Lord Birkenhead that was the great lesson Rome taught us as well as the rest of the world. After decrying idealism he states in another paragraph:

For many thousands of years the emergence of new and martial nations has been gradually marked by violent readjustments of national boundaries.

That, of course, is a very mild and rather euphemistic way of putting the more ugly truth that these nations have won their places in the sun by brutal conquest. He goes on:

The world continues to offer glittering prizes to those who have stout hearts and sharp swords. . . . It is for us to march with heads erect and bright eyes along the road of our imperial destiny.

I wonder whether anything is stronger in the philosophy of Nietzsche or the writings of Von Bernhardi. Yet that was the statesman who was present as a representative of our largest dependency and who, according to despatches, claims to-day that the natives of India are unfit for self-government.

Perhaps I might say in passing that I was rather struck with the difference between this imperial conference and that conference which was held about a year ago, the first British commonwealth labour conference. Attending the latter were Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and other leading statesmen of Great Britain. I do not think it is necessary for me to inform this House that in all probability it will be only a matter of a comparatively short time until this newer group of statesmen will be at the helm in Great Britain. That is one reason why I would not like to loosen any of the ties which now unite us to Great Britain, but I would remind some of the gentlemen who speak so highly of the present brand of imperialism that one of these days their loyalty may be very severely tested, when men who have other ideals for the inferior peoples have the place of power. In order to remind hon. gentlemen that there is an alternative policy, may I quote a few sentences contained in the famous draft report of the Labour party in Great Britain. They rely——not on an enforced dominion over subject nations, subject races, subject colonies, subject classes or a subject sex, but, in industry as well as in government, on that equal freedom, that general consciousness of consent, and that widest possible participation in power, both economic and political, which is characteristic of democracy.

And again:

With regard to that great commonwealth of all races, all colours, all religions and all degrees of civilization, that we call the British Empire, the Labour party stands for its maintenance and its progressive development on the lines of local autonomy and "home rule all round"; the fullest respect for the rights of each people, whatever its colour, to all the democratic self-government of which it is capable, and to the proceeds of its own toil upon the resources of its own territorial home; and the closest possible coöperation among all the various members of what has become essentially not an empire in the old sense, but a Britannic alliance.

I would like to urge that we to-day, in claiming our own autonomy, must not overlook the claims of those who have not yet attained even to the forms of self-government.

Now let us go back to the question with which we started. Are we, the so-called self-governing dominions, equal in status with the motherland? I think the report itself recognizes very clearly that that is not the case, when it states:

> Existing administrative, legislative, and judicial forms are admittedly not wholly in accord with the position as described in section 2 of this report.

Lord Parmoor, in his forthright fashion, stated the case very clearly, and I would say that his position still stands notwithstanding the reply of Lord Balfour as read by the Prime Minister. Let me quote a paragraph from the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, referring to Lord Parmoor:

> He thought it was clear as matters now stood that, whatever might be the aim in the future the dominions were not "autonomous communities within the British Empire." Their own powers were circumscribed and restricted under their own constitutions granted by Great Britain, under the operation of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and under the well-known principle that as regarded matters essentially affecting the Mother Country the British parliament at Westminster had a supreme authority. The dominions were subordinate not only in theory but in constitutional practice in many directions as regarded both their domestic and external affairs.

I am not going to dwell on those matters which have been touched upon by previous speakers, such as the fact that our legislation may be disallowed, that there are certain types of legislation concerning which there is a reservation, and the limitations imposed by Colonial Laws Validity Act. I would, however, emphasize once more that we have at present no right to amend our own constitution. We talk about equality of status with the motherland; can you imagine the motherland coming to Canada and asking for the right to amend her constitution? The thing is absurd. As a matter of fact, as I pointed out in the debate on the address, in this respect we are not even equal to Ireland, which can modify its constitution; we are not equal to Australia and we are not equal to South Africa; so far from being equal in status to the motherland we are inferior even to those dominions which have more recently received their constitutions.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), in discussing appeals to the Privy Council, suggested that we should have some external authority to check any radical tendencies which might develop later in Canada. That seems to me a most extraordinary position to take. Why should we be so fearful of what may happen to those who come after us—our own children? Surely nothing could be more characteristic of a Conservative than a position of that character. I take it that we should insist that we have a perfect right to be our own last court of appeal. So long as we are not, it is nonsense to talk about equality of status.

Let us consider another matter, that of merchant shipping, which is a very practical question. Several years ago we discussed the evils of the North Atlantic shipping combine, and as we all remember we did not get very far with that. But I think we realized then, if not before, that all our shipping interests were subordinate to those of the motherland. Again, why talk about equality of status when in this matter even at the Imperial conference the motherland reserved the right to keep us in that position of subordination?

Further than that: On a matter that has been concerning us in recent days, that of extra-territorial jurisdiction, in an article on Dominion Autonomy in the March issue of Queen's Quarterly I read this paragraph from Mr. J. S. Ewart:

> At present, Canada is unable to regulate the conduct of her citizens at any places beyond her geographical area. Every sovereign state has jurisdiction over its own citizens, wherever they may be, and, for violation of regulations may punish them when they return within its own territory. Canada has no such power. She cannot, for example, prescribe rules for observance by her fishermen or her aviators when beyond the three mile limit from her shores. Up to this time, the British parliament has assumed to exercise that jurisdiction over Canadians. And as far as it is revealed by the proceedings of the Imperial conference, it would appear that the premiers assented to the continuance of the practice—

So it would seem that if our aviators go outside the three mile limit immediately they cease to be within the jurisdiction of Canada. Under these circumstances there may be some knotty departmental difficulties. Think of the questions of discipline and administration that will concern us before very long if this is allowed in practice.

But in all seriousness, it is only a day or two ago that I asked the Prime Minister with regard to Canadians resident in China. He told me that intimation had been given to foreign residents in that country to move from interior points. He did not say, he was very careful not to say, that the Canadian government had given that intimation. The fact is that the Canadian government has no right to give such intimation, that the Canadians resident in China are quite out of the jurisdiction of the Canadian government. The Prime Minister said further that the government of Canada has not given any special directions advising that Canadian residents should leave China, and he added:

> My hon. friend must make some allowance for the intelligence of the citizens of Canada who are in China. They surely are in the best position to judge as to what may be necessary and advisable.

I submit that statement hardly comes with very good grace from the Prime Minister of a great country equal in status with Great Britain. Surely we are not going to surrender authority over our citizens in that way, and simply get out of our difficulties by saying our citizens must exercise their own good sense under the circumstances. I feel strongly in this matter, as the very next thing will be that some of our citizens in China will be getting into trouble, or be pushed into a position of danger. Then there will be an outcry all over this country and a demand that we must save Canadian lives. It seems to me that this question of extra-territorial jurisdiction is a very serious one. Someone near me advances the idea that this concerns the Minister of Justice, I presume the suggestion is that the minister will be entirely outside of the jurisdiction of the country once he leaves our shores. Possibly ministers of justice, like consuls, have special privileges.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that although a good deal has been accomplished by the conference its decisions are very unsatisfactory indeed as regards foreign affairs. I quote from page 21 of the report:

> It was frankly recognized that in this sphere, as in the sphere of defence, the major share of responsibility rests now and must for some time continue to rest, with His Majesty's government in Great Britain.

The Prime Minister assures us that Canada has no commitments, and it would seem as if his statement is largely borne out by that of the report itself. Neither Great Britain nor the Dominion can be committed to the acceptance of active obligations except with the definite assent of their own government. And yet I would point out that in this clause, as in almost every clause of the report, there are saving clauses. I think perhaps I should not be going too far if, to use an American expression I called them "jokers". In legal documents it is those saving clauses which largely nullify what seems to be placed in the main body of the provisions concerned. With respect to active obligations, it is all very well to say that we are not compelled to send so many troops unless we decide in Canada to do so; but no member of the government has said that the Imperial conference has changed in the slightest what has generally been accepted to be the situation—that if Great Britain is at war Canada is at war, whether we like it or not. Do we then say that that is equality of status? Under those circumstances would we say that we had no commitments? On this very point Lord Balfour spoke as follows in the British House of Commons:

> I should say that so far as this country is concerned we are bound to go to war to defend any part of this Empire which is in danger. Personally I think the duties of all the other members of the empire to us are not less than our duties to them.

He says Britain is bound to go to the aid of any part of the empire which is in danger. He suggests that we in turn are bound to go when any part of the empire is in danger. What does that mean? Surely it is a fairly definite commitment if such a statement as that is allowed to go unchallenged. I would point out that the arrangement is a very one-sided one indeed. That is, we are a small part of the empire, with very little voice in the foreign policy of the empire, and yet we are liable to be dragged into one of the imperialistic wars as to the cause of which we have no concern whatever. I can see that this may be a very great benefit to Great Britain, at least to certain groups in Great Britain. I want to make it very clear that when I speak against British imperialism I am denouncing a particular type of control exercised by a comparatively small number of people in Great Britain, and repudiated by a very large number of the English people themselves. I am not against Great Britain. I know that all over the British dominions to-day, and most especially in the very heart of the empire, meetings are being held to protest against the very kind of thing that I am protesting against to-night. I know that there is a large portion of the Labour party that is definitely opposed to the very evil that I am protesting against to-night—that is, that a comparatively small number of active industrialists and financiers are able to get control of certain concessions in various parts of the world, and then be in a position to utilize the machinery of the empire to defend them when they get into difficulties, or permit them still further to carry on their exploitation of the peoples of these more backward countries.

I am thinking particularly, as doubtless a great many of us are thinking these days, of the situation in China. As far back as 1923 the Toronto Globe published a report of a speech by Dr. Sherwood Eddy in which he presented a terrible picture of the nascent factory system in Shanghai. I want to read a couple of paragraphs from that report:

There are at least fifty cotton mills around Shanghai and more are going up. Thousands of children down to the age of eight or nine are employed. Little girls, eight or nine years of age, were standing between double rows of whizzing, unguarded machinery, steadily but wearily feeding the machines. One mite, perhaps eight years of age, was curled in an exhausted heap on the cement floor sound asleep. Over in a corner, under a pile of waste, a tiny baby was spending the night, while his mother worked at a machine nearby. . . . In one small hospital there were one day this winter three children under ten years old. The arm of one had been caught in an unfenced machine and was all but torn off. The leg of another was smashed from hip to ankle by the teeth of a machine. The third, a little girl, had been caught by the hair in her machine and her scalp torn off. Not one of these accidents would have happened had the machines been fitted with safety devices. Most of the accidents happen in the night shifts, between two and four in the morning. Such are the terrible conditions in Chinese industry.

This is no fanciful picture. I have under my hand figures with regard to the low wages paid and the wretched sanitary conditions that prevail. These are not taken from the report of some visiting foreigner. I would refer anyone who is interested to the report of the Child Labour Commission appointed by the municipal council of Shanghai in 1923. It was these atrocious conditions that led to the trouble of a year ago. It is the continuance of these conditions in Shanghai that has caused so much trouble throughout the length and breadth of China and that has made the British people to be hated there above all foreigners who are living in China to-day. Can we condone such conditions as these? In a manifesto issued by the Independent Labour Party of Great Britain I read that:

Hong Kong and Shanghai banking corporations for many years have paid dividends of roughly 50 per cent.

There you have the cause of the trouble—huge dividends, huge financial interests, and those interests posing in the orient as "Britain". I come back to Canadian residents in China to-day, and I would urge upon the government that they do not permit Canadian men and women to be used as a screen to protect the interests of those who are intent chiefly on exploiting China. I am not speaking merely from the standpoint of Canadian labour. Responsible bodies all over England to-day are holding meetings "Hands off China," and protesting against this particular type of imperialism. I would like to quote a recognized authority whose sincerity no one in this chamber will doubt. Bertrand Russell said a few months ago:

If we were fighting for a great cause, the prospect of loss might be faced with heroism. But the exact opposite is the case: we are fighting against everything progressive, upright, and intelligent in China, in favor of everything ignorant, reactionary and corrupt. We are fighting to keep civilization under in a great nation, in order that it may be the easier to exploit. We are fighting for the right to shoot down young unarmed students when they protest against the killing of Chinese workers by Japanese capitalists in labor disputes. We are fighting to prolong anarchy and civil war among self-seeking militarists dependent upon foreign support. We are fighting to preserve everything that is bad and to prevent the growth of everything that it good. This, alas, is our position throughout Asia. This is the sacred cause which we pursue with a pig-headed obstinacy that must, before long, bring ruin and national disaster upon us. Both as a patriot and as an internationalist, I view the situation with feelings little short of despair.

We in Canada must be on our guard lest we lend ourselves to the manipulations of a group of imperialists which is largely composed of exploiters. I would reiterate that in taking this position to-night, I am taking the position which the Labour party, a large and representative section of the people of England, are assuming in the old country at the present time.

Coming back more directly to the report I should like to ask: Why the resolution on Locarno? If I remember aright, the dominions were not consulted with regard to the Locarno treaty; we gave no assent to the Locarno treaty, and yet, notwithstanding this, the representatives of Canada joined, I understand, in this resolution:

The conference has heard with satisfaction the statement of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to the efforts made to ensure peace in Europe, culminating in the agreements of Locarno.

Further than that, I ask: Why the attitude of the representatives of Canada towards compulsory arbitration in international disputes? To be frank, I think that attitude is distinctly disappointing. I hope, perhaps even before this debate closes, we shall have some further explanation as to this matter. Let me read this extract from the report:

Whilst the members of the committee were unanimous in favouring the widest possible extension of the method of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes—

Again, I presume, this is a general clause that is given out for the consumption of the public. It sounds well, but the clause goes on:

—the feeling was that it was at present premature to accept the obligations under the article in question.

I would ask when any reform was not premature. Yet apparently our represenative acquiesced; and we read on still further:

A general understanding was reached that none of the governments represented at the Imperial conference would take any action in the direction of the acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the permanent court, without bringing up the matter for further discussion.

Thus to a considerable extent our hands are tied. We cannot urge compulsory arbitration for the settlement of international disputes unless we discuss the matter still further with the other members of the conference. I should have thought Canada ought to be in a position to conclude, let us say at once, a treaty of compulsory arbitration with the great United States and with a number of the countries of northern Europe, but we cannot do that without further consultation. I would hope, however, that even before the next Imperial conference steps will be taken in this direction. I note that the Right Hon. Sir Austen Chamberlain, when asked with regard to the procedure, replied:

An Imperial conference offers the most convenient opportunity for discussing such matters, but no doubt another method could be found, if necessary.

Hence the matter is still open for our consideration and I would respectfully submit that the greatest contribution that Canada could make to the cause of peace would be, not by following the lead of the older nations and building up larger armaments, but rather by leading the way in securing peace treaties with other nations and in recognizing that there is no subject upon which it is not preferable to arbitrate rather than to go to war.

But more serious than that, the report would seem to indicate that Canada is committed to common action for defence. I confess that when I heard the Prime Minister describe the military, naval and air demonstrations, I felt that I was in England rather than in Canada. The whole atmosphere was English rather than Canadian, and I am very much afraid that the Prime Minister must have been unduly influenced by his surroundings when he consented in any way to endorse the programme which was accepted by the Imperial conference. We read such phrases as this in the report: A committee is to be established on imperial defence. Is that committee to be purely advisory? I would suggest that we can hardly set up a committee of that kind without more or less committing ourselves to Great Britain in the question of defence.

I read further, that the chiefs of staffs are apparently to form a permanent sub-committee to deal with imperial defence. Still further in the report I read of an imperial defence college. Again it would seem to me that we are becoming more and more involved in the imperial war policies of Great Britain. Above all, I read of imperial air routes. I wonder where are the Liberals to-day who fought so strenuously against an imperial navy a few years ago. They are not fighting against an imperial navy to-day, because an imperial navy is not being proposed. We have developed beyond that. We have developed a more effective arm of warfare, and that is the air force. It is in this new region that we are being compromised to-day, and so we are committed, as far as I can see by the report, to imperial air routes. I am afraid that the Prime Minister has unfortunately been led astray on this point, and perhaps in some moment when he was less on his guard and did not fully realize all the implications of the matter has been led to consent to an arrangement of this kind. I felt somewhat confirmed in this view when I read an article not long ago in Toronto Saturday Night, of February 12th, from which I should like to read a paragraph or so:

Mr. King goes the length of remarking that no nation that cares either for its commerce or its people can afford to be indifferent to the many considerations of which they (the possibilities of aviation and wireless communication) compel us to take account, but the Prime Minister does not go so far as to challenge the settled convictions of Mr. Woodsworth and other pacifists in the parties that support him in parliament. He does not declare for preparedness against the possibility of war. The indignation of Miss Macphail can be imagined had he done so. He subtly circumvents the pacifists by giving his defence policy a civil complexion. One gathers that he is "sold" on aviation, as a means of defence in the event of war, and that he prefers to create an air force in Canada, but its establishment is not to be a provocation to international strife for it will have civil duties to perform.

I rather like that phrase, "sold" on aviation, because I am inclined to think, unfortunately, that it expresses a good deal of truth. The Prime Minister has been "sold" on aviation. I would like to use that slang word "sold" in another sense. I hope the Prime Minister will be "sold" in as it seems to me that we are starting in on quite wrong lines when we enter upon such a course. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention, in passing, to the reports of the experts in civil aviation appointed by the League Preparatory Commission for the Disarmament conference. I will read only one paragraph:

> It is desirable that governments should refrain from prescribing the use of military features in civil aircraft material, so that this material may be constructed for providing the greatest possible measure of security and most economic return. In this connection and with a view to differentiating still further between material of civil and that of military aviation, it is considered particularly desirable that as far as possible the use of military aviation material in civil aviation undertakings and in the operation of air transport lines should be avoided.

If that comes from the League of Nations as advice, and possibly as a warning, it does seem as if our government before it embarks upon a larger expenditure of moneys for aviation should take it into serious consideration. We should very sharply distinguish between civil and military aviation. There has been a very excellent series of articles in the Ottawa Citizen on this particular question, which I would commend to the government. It would seem as if it were a mere accident that the navigation of the air has been so largely developed by the military authorities, only I suppose advances in aviation came during the war time, but surely it is high time that we recognized that there should be navigation of the air for quite other than war purposes, and that the best results can be accomplished by building up our own civil aviation departments. I hope that the government will travel along that line, and I am sure that if it does, it will receive a great deal more enthusiastic support from this House than if it insists that our air force must be a unit in this imperial air force to which the report refers.

I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker. I should like, however, to say that had a sub-amendment been possible, we should have moved to have had this report referred to the committee on industrial and international relations. A few years ago, at the suggestion of the Prime Minister himself, that committee was set up. To date there have been no international problems referred to that committee. There is no doubt whatever that since the war we are realizing more and more clearly that Canada must consider not only matters of domestic interest, but also our foreign relations. It cannot be expected that the people at large will take an intelligent interest in foreign affairs unless there is a very great deal of general discussion, and I do not know how we can better foster that interest than by having foreign affairs given frequent consideration on the floor of this House and in the appropriate committee of this House. There have been so far very few opportunities offered. Only after an imperial conference or when the estimates are up, have we had a chance of discussing our foreign affairs. If the policies of the government with regard to agriculture or immigration or the national railways must be referred to committees, and discussed in committees, and recommendations brought back by the committee to the House, I do not see why that ought not to be the case with regard to our foreign affairs. I am perfectly well aware that, traditionally, foreign affairs have been considered to be something by themselves. It has been considered that they should be left in the hands of diplomats, and the diplomats have considered them secret, but surely we have learned since the war to protest against secret diplomacy, and if we believe in this protest we ought to set up the machinery for discussing our international affairs out in the open. We ought to establish the practice of so doing right here in this House. It would seem to me that the Prime Minister might possibly have avoided something of the partisan character of this discussion had he earlier in the debate referred this report as a whole to the committee on international relations. I know that this would have been an innovation. I know perfectly well that we would have to feel our way, because nothing of that kind has ever been done in committee. But we must begin some time, and if we do not at this stage endorse any of the recommendations of the conference I suggest that at the first opportunity the Prime Minister might be induced, possibly at some later session of this parliament, to refer to a committee, some of the recommendations or suggestions contained in the report. This course is desirable in order that we may become informed as to the great questions at issue and in order that we may give a lead to public opinion in this time of peace, so that if unfortunately there should be some international dispute at a later date we would have a well-informed public opinion and a people who would be able to judge these questions on their merits.

I am not one of those who believe that Canada any longer can lead an isolated life; undoubtedly we will have to accept our wider responsibilities. But I would venture to say—and I say it in the light of the ambiguities of this report—that there must be no responsibility unless we have an effective voice in the formulation of policy. Notwithstanding the fine phrases in the early part of the report, I think it will be admitted that so far as the foreign policy of the empire is concerned, we have to-day no effective voice.

I cannot conclude without suggesting that we must not confine ourselves too closely to the political aspects of imperialism. We have been speaking tonight in terms of politics; we are talking in terms of a great political empire, but I would remind the House that there is developing side by side—or I should rather say underneath—the political forms those economic forces that are perhaps more important and more vital than the political organizations. Our people to-day are crossing our international frontier; they travel back and forward; our goods travel back and forward, and capital travels back and forward. Whilst we are talking about kings and governors general and consuls, we must remember that the great industrialists and financiers to-day exercise an even greater power over the people than diplomats and kings. We must be careful lest we allow these political forms to cloud our eyes and make us incapable of perceiving the newer and stronger economic forces that hold alike promise and danger for the world. The world is becoming unified in part because of these great forces; the danger is that these great forces will attain such power that they may oust even that degree of political democracy to which we have attained.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I have listened, Mr. Speaker, with some interest to the speeches which have already been made, and I would like to refer to one in particular, namely, that of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I must say that that hon. member never speaks in this chamber without engendering some heat, not only on his own part but on the part of some of the others who listen to him. The hon. member asked some very pertinent questions regarding our connection with the rest of the empire. Why, he asked, should we partake in Britain's wars brought on by a policy in the making of which we had no share? On the face of it, answering that question, I would say we should not be held responsible and should not be obliged to furnish men and money to fight any other nation's enemy which is not an enemy of ours. But somehow in the past we have been a part of this empire, whatever we shall be in the future, and I have never been able yet to separate myself as a Canadian from responsibility for empire matters, seeing that we ourselves are a world-trading nation. Our greatest customer in the past has been Great Britain, and no doubt she will be for some time to come. But our commerce has gone throughout the whole world, over the seven seas, in safety, as free as Britain's own commerce, practically without any effort on our part or any expense to this Dominion. I am sure, Sir, that had we not a friendly country to the south of us in the United States we would have appreciated the connection with Great Britain in the past far more than we have done.

The hon. member for Labelle denounces imperialism. He is scandalized that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should quote even Lord Balfour, and he uses the word "colonials" in a derisive sense to show the attitude of British statesmen towards the representatives of the Dominion. In reply to this, I should like to say that Britain has sought for many years to get the Dominion to take a greater share and assume more responsibility in the forming of her foreign policy. For many years it has been shown that the difficulty in this connection arises from the world-wide extent of the British Empire, making almost impossible an adequate means of conference on all international matters requiring prompt decision. Canada no doubt has felt this to some extent, but she has felt it a thousand times less than Great Britain. It was that feeling which in the end led us to appoint a representative—a minister or plenipotentiary—to Washington. If it can be said that Britain has not appreciated our problems on this hemisphere, much more might the same be said of the Dominion regarding international affairs. Whatever may be our status henceforth, I hope we shall still coöperate and share each other's burdens as a commonwealth so far as such coöperation may be found practicable.

As for myself, Mr. Speaker, I am British born, and I am proud so to declare to-night. Indeed, Sir, if there was any inclination on my part or on the part of many of my friends in this corner of the House to forget it, we are promptly reminded that we are simply "imported" Canadians. I question if in any country in the world to-day there can be found more men imbued with the spirit of rabid imperialism than in Canada, and I include in this category my hon. friend from Labelle and many who sit on the same side of the House with him. The principle of coöperation of the overseas dominions with the motherland has been due to that equality of freedom and status enjoyed by each part, and our Canadian imperialists to-day—I say this in all seriousness—might well take a lesson to heart from this fact. It is because of the very freedom that has been allowed each part that the different races that compose the population of Great Britain are loyal to a central authority to which they each in turn contribute.

It will be remembered that at the last session of parliament an agreement was entered into by the government with Alberta to give that province control of its natural resources. The agreement was laid on the table of this House. The bill in its original form was unobjectionable, but when the hon. member for Labelle examined it his imperialistic spirit burst forth in all its fury, and he threatened a revolt unless the bill was amended so as to bind the province to maintain separate schools for all time to come. Imperialism! We need to examine ourselves even to be honest in argument. The very spirit that prompted the speech of my hon. friend is exactly the same spirit that sent the French army into the Ruhr. The spirit that demanded a contract of Alberta in those terms is exactly the same spirit that dominated France when she repudiated her obligations to her chief ally and saviour in the Great war, and instead of reimbursing Britain as she should have done, she kept her factories going night and day to furnish twenty million rifles and other munitions of war to Poland—all actuated by that spirit of domination. The same arrogant spirit of domination of one part of this Dominion is dictating to some of the other provinces how they shall administer their internal affairs, particularly education. That to me would indicate a desire to teach our children loyalty and subserviency to ideas contrary to the considered welfare of the people themselves.

The Dominion government has assumed to itself the imperialistic power of dictating to the provinces, and I say frankly that I am still looking to the Privy Council as a possible means of securing the rights to which we are entitled in the western provinces. Because of this I am in accord with the spirit of the amendment; and so far as I can learn from the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the government itself is going to accept the amendment, for he has already said that no changes can be made in the constitution—he goes even further than the amendment—without the consent of the provinces. I am glad he has laid down that principle as a guide for the future.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member agree with that policy?

Mr. EVANS: Why shouldn't I?

Mr. HEAPS: I am just asking the question.

Mr. EVANS: It is all right. I say, Mr. Speaker, that any representative from the prairie provinces who at the promised conference this summer between the Dominion and the provinces will agree to anything that is likely to endanger the right of reference to the Privy Council will not be expressing the wishes of his people. I am expressing to-night the feeling of the majority of the people of Saskatchewan when I say that as far as that province is concerned we shall be just as willing to be governed from Downing street as from St. James street, Montreal, or King street, Toronto.

No decision would ever have emanated from the Imperial conference unless it was reached unanimously, and if the conference has done anything to clarify our status it has done so only because of the freedom and equality of every unit of the great British commonwealth of nations. Canada is a replica almost of the British Empire, and this confederation cannot be held together unless by the equality of status and freedom of every unit. I believe the spirit that underlay the idea of confederation was that the Dominion parliament should be what the provinces choose to make it. But it has become an imperialistic dictator in its attitude to the provinces, which are, or should be, autonomous parts within the confederation. I repeat, Sir, I am glad the Minister of Justice has laid it down as a ruling principle that the constitution cannot be amended but by the consent of the provinces.

When the hon. member for Labelle so fervently denounced British imperialism I recalled the speech he made at the beginning of last session. It is well to consider this question in the light of practical politics and history. On page 1686 of Hansard the hon. member accuses Britain of being the cause of the Great war. I do not know why he should have gone out of his way to so accuse Britain, but he did. Now, I think he is not only unfair, but it seems to me that he purposely overlooks several factors which resulted in that world catastrophe. The chief reason no doubt was trade and that ambition to dominate with imperialistic control which was held by some of the nations; and for either of those Germany was not wholly to blame. In my opinion Canada did her share to bring about that great world catastrophe, in fact I do not know that Canada is not as directly responsible for the great world war as any nation on earth. I believe to-day that the British preference which we inserted in our tariff was the cause of a great deal of enmity and had much to do with the Great war. Of course, outside of that cause there was the overpowering ambition of France to regain her lost provinces. But let us recall an historical fact within the memory of most members of this House. France and Russia formed an alliance for offensive and defensive purposes; France even boasted that she would make Germany pay for her three-year military service, and Russia on the one side and France on the other kept raising a tariff wall against Germany. When we inaugurated the British preference Germany begged to be included in that scheme in some way, finding that Britain was her best customer, but it was two-facedly said in this House at the time that Germany was seeking to bring about a cleavage between Britain and her colonies. I say to-night, Mr. Speaker, that had we been agreeable to that proposal there would have been formed in the world at that time a real free trade union, and the faces of the nations would have been turned toward peace instead of toward war. It was not the fault of Britain, but it must be admitted that a fair share of that fault lies at the door of this Dominion, because by the greed and avarice of our Canadian imperialists, who sought to obtain for themselves not only the direction of the forces of wealth and industry in this Dominion, but the direction of the terms of living of the rest of the nation. This they did without regard to the rights of those parts of our country with fewer representatives in this House.

In conclusion I want to say that freedom is the very essence of loyalty, and that this Dominion can be a confederation in the real sense of the term only as every part of it is as free as is set forth in the declaration of the Imperial conference, under which we are declared a free nation within the British Empire. Our confederation must be built upon that freedom.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.08 p.m.

Friday, April 1, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Jacobs.

Eighth and ninth reports of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. —Mr. Parent.

PRIVATE BILLS—REFUNDING OF PENALTY FEE

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) moved:

That, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the eighth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, the penalty fee imposed in respect to Bill No. 221, intituled: "An Act for the relief of John Lauron Garfield Evans," be refunded.

Motion agreed to.

CHARLO STATION POSTMASTER

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I beg to lay on the table return to an order of the House passed on the motion of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Grimmer). I might explain that the order asked for a return in connection with the dismissal of the postmaster at River Charlo. There is no such dismissal, but there was a dismissal of George Chalmers, postmaster at Charlo Station, and I am giving the papers in connection with that.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Harbour Commissioners of Chicoutimi in an amount not exceeding $500,000, to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

STATEMENT BY MR. RINFRET OF PROPOSED REVISION

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish, on the orders of the day, to make known to the House the proposed salary revision of the civil service to date from to-day, April 1, 1927.

1. All classes in the classification of the civil service of Canada, both inside and outside, up to and including $5,100 per annum are to be increased by $120 per annum in both minimum and maximum salary rates, and each employee will receive an increase of $10 per month dating from April 1, 1927, with the following exceptions:

(a) No increase will be granted in the minimum for the junior clerical grades (Clerk, Grade 1) and for the classes of equivalent or lower grade, and for certain other classes which were increased by salary revision, 1924.

(b) All temporary employees will receive an increase to the new minimum of the class except in those classes where no increase is to be made in minimum salary rates.

(c) Any employee who is now in receipt of a flat increase in salary granted by the salary revision of 1924 in lieu of former bonus payments, shall now receive an increase in salary equal to the difference between the amount of such flat increase now received and the increase provided for the class in which his position is classified not however exceeding the new maximum rate of his class.

(d) Classes which were increased by $180 per annum or more by the salary revision of 1924 will be increased in maximum by $60 and employees in these classes will receive an immediate increase of $5 per month.

(e) A small number of other classes which were increased by salary revision of 1924 will receive such increases in minimum and maximum rates as to bring the classes into harmony with other closely related classes and the employees in these classes will receive immediate increases corresponding to the increases in the maximum of the class.

(f) Employees who are eligible to receive statutory increases from April 1, 1927, will receive this proposed increase in addition to the annual statutory increase.

LIQUOR EXPORT

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to ask the Minister of Customs if there is any new order or regulation affecting the export of liquor from Ontario to the United States.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): There is no such order whatever.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I beg leave to present to the House a certified copy of a resolution passed by the town council of St. Marys, Ontario, on March 21 last—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SANDERSON: —re Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

PENSION LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I would like to ask the government if it is the intention this year to bring down any legislation to correct discrepancies in certain statutes regarding ex-service men and their dependents, or if the matter is to be shelved again so that parliament may prorogue at an early date.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): In making an announcement respecting pension legislation I may say that several features have been taken into consideration. In the first place the Pension Act that was originally drawn up in 1919 was amended in 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, and 1925. On several occasions these amendments were the result of long deliberation by special parliamentary committees appointed for the purpose, and on one occasion the result of a protracted investigation of general reëstablishment measures by a royal commission appointed in 1922, the final report of that commission being submitted to the government as late as 1924. The important feature of all the above is that the Pension Act has received the very close attention of parliament during past years.

This year there have been presented to me by various soldier organizations, resolutions asking mainly for additional benefits to be provided by change in the regulations of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Board of Pension Commissioners, and additional benefits to be provided under the Pension Act. The total number of these resolutions is approaching two hundred, of which more than fifty suggest changes in the pension legislation.

I also call the attention of the House to the fact that there was recently inserted in the Pension Act a meritorious clause under which cases of real merit or hardship can be awarded pension at the discretion of the Board of Pension Commissioners and the Federal Appeal Board, even though such cases are not provided for under the ordinary terms of the Pension Act. I may say that already a number of pensions have been awarded under this provision.

I do not think the members and the country generally fully appreciate the nature and extent of the numerous proposals which have been made. Many of these suggestions involve ramifications which can be foreseen only after careful and detailed examination. There are extended commitments involved and there must be a thorough canvass of the effect on other classes not dealt with. It would be apparent I think to anyone who read the accumulation of material which has come to me during this session that there could be no fair opportunity during a session of parliament for the government to give the consideration and thought which matters of this kind deserve. I may say that in the recess, attention will be given to the practicability of a consolidation of the Pension Act, and these proposals involving statutory changes will be considered in that connection.

In the meantime, I think that some of the suggestions may be found to be quite possible of being dealt with by administrative rather than legislative action and I propose to consider that method of procedure.

I can also say, and I feel sure that this will be regarded as of very great importance by those who are interested in these matters, that while the government cannot at this session consider extending the principles upon which pensions are granted, they have under consideration amendments relating more or less to procedure, one of which will deal with the extension for a further term of two years of the period within which applications for pensions may be received. It is my purpose to move this amendment when bill No. 234 is again in committee.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister spoke of administrative action. Is any interim provision likely to be made for handicapped men?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That matter is one that is always before the department, and ways and means are being sought from time to time to provide for these handicapped men.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) May I ask the minister if there has been a definite promise made to the representatives of the ex-service men that legislation would be brought in this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Can the minister assure the House, in view of his statement that amendments to the Pension Act will not be brought down this session, that they will be brought down early next session?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would say this, that if the government after an opportunity of reviewing the material that has been presented to it, is of the opinion that legislation should follow, we will be in a position to bring it before the House early next session.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I sympathize a good deal with the attitude the minister takes in this matter. There are certainly a lot of demands, and it is a very busy time to deal with them during the session of parliament, but in view of that, and the fact that the appeal board is nearly a year in arrears, what puzzles me is that the minister should bring in a bill to lessen the number of the appeal board.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The bill does not limit the number.

Mr. MANION: It does not necessarily, but it gives power to the government to lessen the number of the appeal board.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Bill No. 234 empowers the government to appoint commissioners for a term of five years, and leaves it within their power to reduce the number or to keep it as it is at present.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BEAUBIEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with an article in this morning's Ottawa Citizen headed "Western M.P. is Planning Move to Kill Canal Bill". It goes on to say that "Mr. Bissett, Liberal member for Provencher" is presenting a resolution in favour of a royal commission. I wish to state, first, that Mr. Bissett is not the member for Provencher, although he would certainly be worthy of representing that historic county, and secondly that this article is as inaccurate as an editorial appearing in the same paper yesterday morning criticizing the Liberal-Progressives.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RULE GOVERNING THE PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS TO PARLIAMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I just want to mention a matter of order. There was presented to-day by my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) the resolution of a town council. Your Honour has on several occasions this session ruled such matters out of order when presented from this side of the House. I think the rule should be made known and established that all who wish to petition parliament may do so, but that they must comply with the rule, and that resolutions will not be received.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is well known and must be adhered to. This was simply a resolution, and I would have declared it out of order, but there was so much conversation in the House at the time that I could not hear what the hon. member was saying.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): If the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) had heard that resolution read, which he did not, I do not think he would have made any objection to it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I object to the form entirely.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only by petition can outsiders address themselves to parliament.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ROSEDALE BRANCH

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 178, to amend an act respecting the construction of the Canadian National Railway line being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly, in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister inform the House whether the agreement in regard to this joint section between the two companies has been signed?

Mr. DUNNING: As I explained in the committee, the agreement has not been signed, but the negotiations, I am informed, are nearing completion.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

COMPENSATION TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 227, to amend an act to provide compensation where employees of His Majesty are killed or suffer injuries while performing their duties.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 49 to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Limitation of borrowing powers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section was amended, was it not?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: It was amended in committee by striking out all the words in subsection (a) of this section, line 10, down to the word "called" in line 22, and substituting therefor the following:

(a) A notice of the by-law and of the meeting of the shareholders called to approve the same, shall be published in four consecutive issues of the Canada Gazette and in four consecutive weekly issues of a newspaper printed in every city or town in Canada where the company has its head office or a branch office, and the said notice shall also be sent and given by registered mail to every registered debenture holder, whether resident within or outside of Canada, and to the chief agent or chief agents of the company for the sale of debentures of the company outside of Canada, at least sixty days before the date for which the said meeting is called.

Mr. CANNON: Section 2 provided that companies should be entitled to increase their borrowing power to eight times their capital and reserve. Under the present act it is fixed at four times. An amendment was carried which fixed it at five times.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the original proposal the borrowing power was fixed at eight times?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee reduced it to five?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the government considered the suggestion to make it six times as a fair compromise?

Mr. ROBB: The government has no objection to make it six times; indeed we advised that. In the case of many other companies there is no limit. It is purely a question of practical demonstration, but we could not re-open it in the committee. I understood there was fair unanimity with regard to the proposition to make it six times, and the government offers no objection to that if it is desired.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there is no objection to it, I move that the word "five" be struck out and the word "six" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. GARDINER: When the matter was before the committee a good deal of objection was taken to the provision in the bill as first introduced for increasing the borrowing power to eight times the capital. The committee discussed this matter very thoroughly and arrived at a compromise decision to allow the company to increase the borrowing power from four times to five times. I would like to point out that, with the exception of one company, none of the other companies have come anywhere near using the privilege they now have, which is a borrowing power to the extent of four times the paid-up capital. I think we should leave the figure at five, because we must remember these companies can increase their borrowing power by increasing their capital stock, and it appeared to the committee that five times would be quite sufficient.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If I remember correctly, in the committtee there was an amendment moved to increase it to six times. The trouble in committee as I recall it was this: several of the members of the committee wished to have it eight times and some did not wish to have the figure as high as six times. In the first place a vote was taken on the proposition to fix the figure at six; those wishing to have it placed at eight, and those wishing to have it fixed at less than six all voted against the amendment, another amendment could not be moved and the amendment to have it placed at five was carried. I believe that had it been possible at first to vote on the question as to whether the committee would allow eight times, that motion would have been defeated, and a motion to have it placed at six would have carried. I agree with the leader of the opposition that it should be six.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I think the hon. member for Moose Jaw is quite correct. I believe I was the member who moved the amendment that five be substituted for eight. The first amendment proposing to substitute six for eight was the one that most of us favoured. That was voted down and the other amendment, making it five, was carried. I think six would be more acceptable to the loan companies than five, and I recall that the Finance minister in our committee said that either six or five in place of eight, would be quite acceptable to him. So that as the one who moved the amendment to insert "five" instead of "eight", I may say that it would be acceptable to me to substitute "six" for "five".

On section 3—License must be obtained—Conditions for granting etc.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I wish to record my objection to this clause on the ground that it is ultra vires of the parliament of Canada. A most respectful request has been addressed to the government to have this question determined before the bill becomes law, and I think the request should be granted. As expressed by the resolution supported by the premiers of all the provinces when they recently met, they are united in the view that this provision is within the purview of the provinces. Its enactment therefore will precipitate litigation, the result of which, following cases of an analogous character that have already been determined by the courts, must be against the clause. I am unwilling to assist in the passing of laws that subsequently may be found to be ultra vires of this parliament, and as the point in doubt could be cleared up in a short time, I think the clause should be submitted to the Supreme court.

Sections 4 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to register my position in regard to this bill. I stated it clearly in the committee, and I will state it now in this House. In my view the vesting in the Department of Finance of the annual licensing of loan and mortgage companies, with power for the same department to cancel those licenses, places upon it and upon the government responsibility for preserving the solvency of such companies incorporated under Dominion statute, and makes the department the guardian of the interests of all the creditors of those companies. This policy in this as in many other cases will, I have no doubt, lead in the future to repeated applications to parliament for reimbursement of losses upon insolvency. I am entirely opposed to such a policy. I have discussed it at length in the committee, and I wish now simply to register my objection to it.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 51 to amend the Winding-up Act.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Subject to Part III.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was this bill considered by the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. CANNON: Yes. I may be allowed to explain the object of the bill. In the Winding-up Act a sort of preference is given to policyholders residing in Canada. This bill places all policyholders, whether living in Canada or elsewhere, in the same position when a company is wound up.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Application to life insurance, etc.

The CHAIRMAN: In line 15 on the second page the word "sixty" has been changed to "ninety."

Mr. CANNON: That is to extend the time for notices in order to make sure that all the interested parties will be reached.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to state my objection also to this bill. It purports to take from the courts the power of declaring when a company is insolvent. Under the Winding-up Act the insolvency of a company is always a matter for judicial decision, and, before that decision is given, all parties in interest are afforded an opportunity to be heard in a judicial proceeding, whereupon judgment is given as to whether it has been clearly shown that the company is insolvent and should be wound up. This bill, together with the Insurance Act of 1917, makes it impossible for a company to carry on business except under an annual license from the department. I think that is a wrong departure, and that it is very likely ultra vires of this parliament to enact such provisions. As to whether the act of 1917 in that respect is within the powers of the parliament of Canada to enact should be judicially determined at the earliest possible date. At the present time there is a majority decision of the highest appellate court of Ontario declaring that similar licensing provisions are ultra vires. But the second point is this. When an official of the Department of Finance has declared that in his opinion the license of the company should not be renewed, the fact of the official's refusal to renew the license is taken as evidence, complete and final, that the company is insolvent. In such a case it no longer remains a matter for judicial decision as to whether the company is or is not insolvent; it is in fact decided to be insolvent by an official of the department who is utterly unqualified to exercise such a discretion, and who has not the judicial experience necessary to enable him to decide the question. I admit at once that this matter has passed the standing committee, but I regard it as most pernicious legislation in this respect. I think it is far better that the decision as to whether a company is solvent or insolvent should be left entirely to the courts; it should not depend upon a discretionary decision, as to the renewal of the license, to be given by an official of the department who, as I say, is without experience, or to be given by any political agency such as the government of the country or any department thereof.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 52, to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—License must be obtained.

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to register the same objection to this bill as I raised in connection with the previous one. I regard it as the most pernicious legislation that could possibly be placed on the statute book, to provide that the life of insurance companies, loan and mortgage companies and trust companies should be continued from year to year subject to an annual license to be granted by the minister or by any permanent official of the Department of Finance. In order to carry on the class of business which these companies do carry on it is absolutely necessary that they should make provision not for one year but for many years, and this attempt to bring these companies under political control, by providing that after they are incorporated by statute of this parliament their continued existence shall be in the control of political heads of political departments, is most pernicious. It is on its face obviously an attempt to bring the entire financial operations of financial companies throughout the length and breadth of the country under the control of a department of the government. That, I repeat, is pernicious and it will be found to be so. It promises so many evil results that I take a longer time than I otherwise would to point out some of these evils in detail. Let me mention one of them. As in the case of the claims of the Farmers bank and the Home bank, this bill makes the minister the guardian of the interests of the creditors of all the trust companies incorporated by the Dominion of Canada. That guardianship cannot be carefully and efficiently exercised by any officials whom that department now has in its employ, and if by their negligence or their inefficiency, if through any default of theirs, conscious or unconscious, these companies become insolvent, the creditors of such companies will have an even stronger claim for reimbursement from the treasury of Canada than had the depositors of the Home bank. This legislation is simply piling up trouble for the future and creating, against the treasury of the country, a vast number of claims for reimbursement from the treasury for which precedents have already been established. Having stated that, I have nothing further to say except to register a general objection to the bill.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMIC POISONS

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to regulate the sale and inspection of poisons represented as a means for preventing, destroying, repelling or mitigating fungi, weeds, insects, rodents, or other plant or animal pest, collectively or individually affecting agriculture, and to provide for registration, the payment of fees thereon, and penalties for infraction of the act.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a resolution upon which a bill is to be based that will be referred to the committee on agriculture. It deals with agricultural poisons such as potato and apple sprays, and insecticides and fungicides generally. It is proposed to enact this bill very much after the manner of the act respecting fertilizers, and it will be regulatory in its character. Certain penalties will be provided for infractions of the law, and authority will be given to make regulations.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has there been no control at all over these matters in the past?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, there has been no legislation with respect to them in the past. These poisons are exclusive of poisons handled by medical men, veterinarians and druggists.

Mr. GARDINER: What is contemplated by "controlling the sale" under this resolution?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, all those who have these poisons for sale will have to be registered.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the point I want to get at. In western Canada, for example, the municipalities sometimes secure and sell strychnine for the destruction of gophers. Would they have to be registered?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The poisons include those for the destruction of rodents, gophers and the like. Some of the poisons that have been on the market in the past are, it is claimed, more conducive to fattening the gophers than killing them.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister did not catch my point. I am asking particularly with respect to municipalities in western Canada. Will they have to be registered under this act, the same as druggists, if they sell gopher poisons?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If they sell poisons by retail I presume they will have to come under the act. I forget the terms of the bill, whether they make that plain or not, but all retail dealers selling these poisons will be expected to register. However, when the bill goes to committee that point will be elucidated.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to say for the information of the minister that in western Canada we formerly had to pay a high price for gopher poison, and the government of Saskatchewan passed legislation to allow the municipalities to secure the poison and sell it to residents. All I want to make sure of is that provision be made that these municipalities may buy and resell this poison.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the bill goes to the committee on agriculture there will be ample opportunity to consider its provisions.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the object of this proposition? Is it to protect the gophers who have been provided wth poison, or something called poison, which fattens them? What is the purpose of this proposed legislation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend wants to make a little fun about this matter.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Not at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The chief industries that have asked for this provision, and have been doing so for three or four years, are the fruit growers and the potato growers of Canada. Their sprays are of vital importance to them. Unless they are able to spray successfully their fruit and potatoes it is all day with those products. We want it to be all day with the gophers and the bugs rather than the fruit and potato crops. That is the purpose of the proposed bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister mean that the sprays that have been sent out for use in orchards have not been of any value, or that they have been dangerous when used?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There has been no law in the past regulating the component parts of these poisons to determine whether they were poisonous or whether they were really foods. The result is that growers have been spraying their apple trees, and sometimes their potatoes, with preparations which were not posionous at all, and sometimes, as a result of spraying with ineffective poisons, they lost their crop. It is proposed to enact that those who undertake to sell such poisons shall put up preparations that are what they purport to be and that will be effective.

Mr. HANSON: I should like to back up what the minister has said. Fruit growers associations, I think, have been endeavouring to get this legislation put through for the last two or three years. I am glad the minister is introducing a bill of this kind, and I hope it will be effective for the purpose for which it is intended.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it intended to compel the manufacturers of fungicides and insecticides to put on the package the chemical analysis of the article?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Approved analysts will be appointed to whom samples suspected of not being up to the mark will be submitted for analysis. I suggest that we can proceed more satisfactorily if we consider the bill in committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I desired to call that point to the attention of the minister because I know that is what the fruit growers of Nova Scotia are demanding. They wish provisions to be enacted similar to those existing with regard to the sale of fertilizers. They regard this matter as very much akin to that of fertilizers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not only have some of the insecticides and fungicides proved useless, but many have proved exceedingly injurious and have destroyed the foliage of trees.

Mr. McGIBBON: I presume that when the minister refers to the appointment of analysts he has reference to some of the men already in the employ of the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the case of a number of acts like those dealing with feeds and fertilizers there is provision for the appointment of what we call approved analysts. There is no salary connected with the position, but the public will know that these men are recognized by the department as properly qualified approved analysts.

Mr. HANSON: Is it the intention of the department to set up a bureau to handle this matter? I did not understand that there were any such new officials to be appointed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 257, to regulate the sale and inspection of agricultural economic poisons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg to move that the bill be now read the second time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has the bill been printed yet?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been printed and the idea is to send it to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the bill available so that members may read it?

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill has been printed.

Mr. CAHAN: It has not been distributed, I think.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been printed but not distributed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is to go to the committee on agriculture?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The purpose of asking for the second reading is to permit of the bill going to the committee on agriculture.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

MARINE AND FISHERIES DEPARTMENT

DIVISION INTO TWO BRANCHES WITH SEPARATE DEPUTY MINISTERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the act respecting the Department of Marine and Fisheries to provide that the department shall consist of the Marine branch and the Fisheries branch, and that two officers may be appointed by the governor in council as Deputy Minister of Marine and Deputy Minister of Fisheries, respectively.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. HANSON: Is it the intention to appoint to the position of Deputy Minister of Fisheries an official presently in the employ of the department or some outside person?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Beyond saying that the government will endeavour to make the best appointment possible, I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any information.

Mr. HANSON: That of course is no answer at all. I should like to know. A great deal of the good that we hope will come from this division of the department and the setting up of a new Deputy Minister of Fisheries will depend upon the person of the official appointed. If it is intended to make a political appointment, we shall not gain the effect that was intended to be gained by the Duncan report. If behind this move there is the intention to do what the members of the Duncan commission sought to accomplish, a great deal of good will be achieved and I heartily endorse the proposal. I believe that to be the crux of the situation. If a political appointment is to be made, the purpose of the legislation will be defeated. If the reverse is the case, I will welcome the legislation and I am sure it will be welcomed by the maritimes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The purpose of the resolution is to carry out the recommendation of the Commission on Maritime Claims. Until the legislation is passed, in the nature of things, the government will not have before it the consideration of the appointment of a deputy. That is all I wished to imply in my reply, but an effort will be made to secure the best person possible.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this entail the appointment of a new minister of the crown?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the present time it will not. I should like to have it understood that later on the government may bring in a measure to create a separate department of fisheries.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think that has ever been asked for as a business proposition by the people of the maritime provinces. We are already over-governed in this country. We have too many political heads of departments in Canada now and the cabinet could very well be reduced in numbers. I think the Prime Minister, in some lucid moments which he has had in days gone by, has agreed to that proposal He would like to reduce the number, but political exigency and expediency are such that, instead of the number of portfolios in this country being reduced, they are constantly being increased, with the result that we are top-heavy in the departments of government. There is no demand in the maritime provinces for the appointment of a political head, but there is a genuine demand for the appointment of a competent deputy who will give his whole time to the functions of the department.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 258, to amend the act respecting the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved that the House go into committee on the bill.

Mr. HANSON: Has the bill been printed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is in printed form.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that we do not go into committee until we have an opportunity of reading the bill.

Motion stands.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

POSTAGE RATES ON NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act and to reduce the postage rate on certain newspapers and periodicals from one and one-half cents to one cent.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the rate per one hundred pounds or per pound?

Mr. VENIOT: Per pound.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the Postmaster General kindly explain the purport of the resolutions and also what classes of newspapers and periodicals it applies to?

Mr. VENIOT: Under the present act certain classes of newspapers and periodicals are charged one and one-half cents a pound. Subsection (3) of section 53 of the old act reads:

Newspapers and periodicals which are required to be transmitted for a greater distance than is mentioned in the last preceding section—

That is forty miles.

—or the publication of which is of greater frequency than once a week, and the newspapers and periodicals described in the immediately preceding sub-section, upon any copies in excess of the circulation of 2,500 copies, shall be subject to postage at the rate of three-quarters of a cent on and after the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, and until the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, and one and one-half cents thereafter, for each pound weight or any fraction of a pound weight, and such postage shall be prepaid by postage stamps or otherwise as the Postmaster General from time to time directs.

With reference to those newspapers and periodicals, the rate is changed from one and one-half cents to one cent per pound.

Mr. HANSON: Will that reduce the rate below the cost of carriage?

Mr. VENIOT: The rate is somewhat below the cost of carriage now. I may say that the reason for this is that the Post Office Department is losing revenue because owing to the high rate of one and one-half cents per pound for delivery of newspapers specified in subsection 3, the large dailies especially are now using motor trucks to deliver their papers for a distance of thirty and forty miles, and in some cases they are sending large parcels by freight, and in other cases by express. With the rate reduced to one cent a pound, the post office will get an increased volume of business because these papers will refrain from using these motor trucks in order to send these parcels out. We anticipiate that the revenue will be increased, owing to the volume carried, to such an extent that whatever deficit there may be at the present time will not be increased.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do you not carry them free now up to forty miles?

Mr. VENIOT: Not these papers; weeklies. I will read the section that refers to the other class of newspapers:

(2) Newspapers and periodicals published not more frequently than once a week in any city, town or village which has a population of not more than ten thousand persons shall be entitled to be transmitted by mail free of postage to the extent of a circulation of 2,500 copies per issue within a distance of forty miles from their place of publication.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Veniot thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 259, to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Postage rates on certain newspapers and periodicals reduced from 1½ cents to one cent.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, will you kindly see that the bill is distributed before we proceed?

Mr. VENIOT: The bills have been printed; they should be distributed, but as apparently they are not, I am willing to move that the committee rise.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not objecting to this proposed change in the law at all, but I want to comment on what the hon. minister said when we were in committee on the resolution. We are carrying these papers now for one cent and a half a pound at a loss, and the minister puts up the argument that by carrying them for one cent we are not going to make so big a loss. It may be true that with this decreased rate the newspapers will not use motor trucks so much or send so many of their newspapers by express, but it is an extraordinary argument to say that because you are losing money carrying them for one cent and a half, you will carry them for one cent, in order not to lose so much. The hon. gentleman would never apply that principle to any private business that he controlled himself. He would never say in regard to his own business: In order to reduce my loss, I am going to carry these papers for one cent; in that way I shall do a larger volume of business, and my loss will be less than it is now.

Mr. VENIOT: I can give the hon. gentleman an example in connection with the Post Office Department. Before the letter postage was reduced some years ago from three cents to two cents, there was a defiicit in the Post Office Department, but inside of two years from decreasing the rate there was a surplus of $450,000, owing to the increased volume of business, and that is what I anticipate in this connection.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I submit that that is hardly a fair argument, because you were not paying the railways all the revenue you were getting for carrying the letters. The reason that you had a deficit there was that you had not enough business. You were not paying the railways more than you were getting from the public for carrying their letters, but in this case you are paying the railways more than you are getting from the newspapers for carrying their papers.

Mr. VENIOT: We are not paying the railways more exactly. If the hon. gentleman understood the situation better, he would not object. The whole of the cost is not the railway transportation. It is in the distribution by rail and otherwise through the Post Office Department. The railway transportation is not the whole cost.

Mr. McGIBBON: If I understand the working of the minister's department correctly, the low rate given for the distribution of magazines, catalogues, and such like is applicable for a distance of thirty or forty miles, and in my town I have seen carloads of magazines coming by train and motor truck and being dumped into the post office, making a large amount of extra work for which the officials of the post office are not being paid anything extra, and through which the country must lose a considerable revenue. I would ask the minister if he has ever considered modifying that regulation in order to increase the revenue of his department.

Mr. VENIOT: While I was considering this amendment I had a discussion with some of our mail superintendents along those very lines, and the matter is being looked into, but I am not in a position to state that anything definite will be done this session. I think there are certain privileges granted under the Post Office Act that ought to be modified in regard to the distribution not only of certain periodicals but of advertising matter as well

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest to the Postmaster General that, when the bill comes before the committee again, he have such information at his hand as can be obtained in the department, to show what the carrying of newspapers costs this country as well as any loss sustained.

Mr. VENIOT: I can give that information now, but perhaps I had better wait until the matter is before the House again.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister obtain the cost of carrying on the business of the mail order houses, which are greatly injuring the retail trade of this country?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no greater privilege given to the mail order houses than is given to any other wholesale or retail stores for their mail order business.

Mr. McGIBBON: Except it is given for limited distribution.

Progress reported.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

APPOINTMENT AND SALARY OF THE CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Dominion Elections Act and to provide that the chief electoral officer shall be appointed by resolution of the House of Commons, and shall be paid a salary of six thousand dollars per annum.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would like a word of explanation.

Mr. CANNON: The Dominon Elections Act, section 19, says:

Mr. Oliver Mowat Biggar, of the city of Ottawa, one of His Majesty's counsel, is hereby appointed Chief Electoral Officer.

Colonel Biggar, as every hon. member of the House will agree, has given full satisfaction in the performance of his duties. He has intimated to the government that he intends to relinquish his post, and notwithstanding representations made to him, he has persisted in that intention. Therefore it is now necessary to provide for his successor. The section of the act naming him as Chief Electoral Officer will require to be amended, in order that we may now appoint someone to perform his duties. The bill which will be introduced following this resolution will have two objects; first, to see that in future the Chief Electorial Officer shall be appointed, not by the government but by the House of Commons, and a resolution will be introduced this session to provide for the appointment of a person to replace Colonel Biggar. The present Chief Electoral Officer is in receipt of a salary of $12,000 a year, the salary now paid to a judge of the Supreme court, having the same standing as a judge of the Supreme court, by the wording of the act. Besides his duties as Chief Electoral Officer, paragraph (d) of section 19 says:

Subject to the performance of the foregoing duties, act as counsel for the crown or the attorney general in such causes, prepare such opinions, and make such inquiries as the Governor in Council may from time to time direct.

It is not the intention of the government to require the new Chief Electoral Officer, in addition to his duties as Chief Electoral Officer, to perform duties as counsel for the government, and that is the reason why the salary, instead of being $12,000, will be reduced to $6,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When the present Elections Act was passed in the House, I think in 1921, I happened to have charge of it, and I remember well this section under which the Chief Electoral Officer was originally appointed. He was appointed, I might inform the committee, under practically a joint arrangement or recommendation made between myself, representing the then government, and my right hon. friend representing the then opposition. I remember that we consulted in regard to the person who should be appointed to this position, and it was mutually agreed that Colonel Biggar would be an admirable man. I suggest to the government that there should be some consultation before any names are submitted in the present instance, and I fancy the government will probably follow that course, because I realized when the original act was passed that we were laying down a principle for the future. It is very important that the person appointed to fill this position should not only be an outstanding man, as far as possible removed from party politics, but a man who has the confidence of all parties in the House. I am satisfied there are many such available for the position. In the case of Colonel Biggar it was considered at that time that, as the government had a great deal of litigation, it would be an excellent thing to have a man who could be utilized as government counsel. I do not know that the work in that respect is as great now as it was after the conclusion of the war, and the necessity for having a government counsel may not exist at the present time to such an extent at all events as it did at that time. I would also suggest to the government, that when they come to the question of selecting the appointee, the principle of promotion should not be overlooked. With these remarks I have no objection to the resolution being carried in its present form.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that I agree entirely with the hon. the leader of the opposition as to the course of procedure. The intention of the government is to have a conference in advance between the leaders of the parties, and if possible to agree upon a name. I also agree with my hon. friend that where it is possible to recognize merit in the appointment this should be done.

With respect to the services of government counsel I might say that the government would hesitate to dispense with the professional services of Colonel Biggar, were it not that the Solicitor General has undertaken to carry on the work performed by Colonel Biggar as government counsel. I think it advisable to let the House know that the hon. the Solicitor General is undertaking, on behalf of the government much of the professional work which formerly was assigned to the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. CAHAN: What will be the tenure of office of the new appointee? Is that regulated by the existing statute, or will it be regulated by the amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will be the same as heretofore.

Mr. GUTHRIE: His tenure of office is the same as that of a Supreme court judge; he is removable only on an address to parliament.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Does the government intend to amend any other part of the Elections Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not this session.

Mr. CANNON: I have the bill here. The only change, in section 19, as pointed out by the leader of the opposition, will be in relation to Colonel Biggar, stating that the Chief Electoral Officer will be appointed by a resolution of the House of Commons. Therefore the Chief Electoral Officer will remain in office according to the remaining paragraph of the section.

Mr. HANSON: Having regard to the fact that the Chief Electoral Officer has the status of a Supreme court judge, does the Prime Minister think that he can get a man for the salary of $6,000 who would be of such character and standing as to command the confidence of the whole country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The status of a Supreme court judge had reference, I think, to the circumstance that Colonel Biggar was recognized as having a very high standing in his profession. The present intention is to have regard primarily to the capability of the appointee to fill the position of Chief Electoral Officer, not the position as well of government counsel.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cannon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 260 to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 228 to amend the Fruit Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOK PRODUCTS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 229 to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1923.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 231, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—"Misconduct."

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of those who were not here when the resolution preceding this bill was introduced, will the minister be good enough to state shortly its purport?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The bill is to correct some of the anomalies and defects that have developed since the act was passed three years ago. The time for taking advantage of the act is extended to July of this year. My hon. friend will recall that a measure for this purpose was brought in last session, but failed to pass the Senate.

Mr. HANSON: Is there any extension of the principle of superannuation?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, is it proposd to extend superannuation to officers in the government marine service? I understand that those officers are not included in the civil service, nor have they the benefit of superannuation or pensions.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps progress will be expedited by my explaining to the House that the superannuation scheme is based on contributions by civil servants, which are calculated on an actuarial basis. Any departure from the scheme will add to the cost; for instance, if the scope of the act should be widened in such a way as to change the prospective length of service basis. Such a departure would be brought about by including employees occupying obviously temporary positions liable to be terminated at any time; employees paid otherwise than on the basis of a stated annual salary; employees occupying positions which, though technically permanent, are not so. In other words, the act is not intended to include any employees whose sudden withdrawal from the service would impose unexpected demands on the funds. If the basis of the superannuation scheme were widened as I have stated, or in any other way not contemplated by the framers of the act, then undoubtedly it would be necessary either to increase the amount of contributions by the civil servants or for the government to bear a larger proportion than one-half the total cost of the scheme. So my hon. friend will see that to do what he suggests would be unfair to those who are already contributing to the scheme.

Mr. GARDINER: Do lighthouse keepers come under this act?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, those who are permanent.

Mr. GARDINER: On what basis are they retired?

Mr. ROBB: I know that a number of lighthouse keepers have to engage help and they have asked for an allowance on the basis of the contribution they have made, taking into account what they have paid out to their assistants during the season. The Department of Justice rules that this would not be actuarially sound and would not be fair to minor employees.

Mr. GARDINER: In such case how would the minister compute a fair salary to the lighthouse keeper himself in view of the fact that he has had to pay for help? Do you get a return from him showing what he has paid out?

Mr. ROBB: The computation is made on the basis of a return from the Department of Marine and Fisheries regarding the salary actually due the head lighthouse keeper himself.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand that in the case of civil servants on the permanent staff who went overseas their absence during military service is counted in computing their superannuation. I believe that is correct. This however is not true of those on the temporary list, even though such employees may have been in the service of the government ten years or longer; the time they served overseas is not counted towards their superannuation.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend referring to employees on the permanent staff?

Mr. MacLAREN: I first stated what I understood to be the condition regarding permanent employees and I am contrasting that with the position of the non-permanent men. Although a man may have been in the service of the government for many years—ten years or more—the time he put in during the war is not counted, notwithstanding that he was given leave of absence by the department. It seems to me there is a good deal to be said for these temporary employees.

Mr. PETTIT: Does this bill make provision for men in the outside service, such as lock and bridge tenders, at the Welland canal?

Mr. ROBB: If they are on the permanent staff and come within the range of salary, and if they comply with other conditions relating to contributions.

Mr. PETTIT: What about those holding seasonal positions?

Mr. MacLAREN: Has the minister no comment to make on the point to which I have called his attention?

Mr. ROBB: All these cases are considered by the Department of Justice, who advise the department administering the act. On December 16, 1920, there was passed an order in council which was amended on October 31, 1921, laying down general regulations to give permanency, by means of what was known as the blanketing process, to temporary employees. That order in council remained in force until 1924 when the Civil Service Commission advised that it had been in operation long enough and should be rescinded. It was therefore cancelled. I know there has been some criticism of this blanketing method; those who were not included in the process at that time now claim to have a grievance. Let me direct the attention of the committee to certain provisions of the bill. Subsections 5 and 6 of section 8 provide:

(v) periods of past non-contributory service in or under any branch or portion of the public service of Canada which had ceased to exist prior to the coming into force of this act shall be counted for the purposes of this act.

(vi) persons whose duties or employment are of a seasonal character shall be deemed to be civil servants within the meaning of this act and eligible to be contributors thereunder and their periods of work and of lay-off from the works shall be counted for the purpose of computing any allowance or gratuity under this act.

The foregoing provisions will, I think, meet the views advanced by my hon. friends.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would submit the case of another class of employees, the caretakers of armouries under the Department of National Defence. Many of these men have been in the service of the government for twenty years and are to all intents and purposes permanent employees; yet they are compelled to submit to the injustice of having to put in a renewed application every six months for the positions they hold. I know of one man in Kingston who has been for twenty years in the one position and whom nobody would think for a moment of replacing. Surely such an employee ought to be made permanent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will give some information regarding these caretakers.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to be advised in the matter. Do they work all day or only part of the time? We have not heard about it before.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): They are permanently employed day in and day out, living in the armouries.

Mr. RALSTON: A long list of such cases has been submitted to me and I am trying if possible to find some means of putting this class of employees on a more permanent basis.

Mr. MARCIL: After the announcement made by the Secretary of State to-day I consider this a red letter day for government employees.

Mr. GUTHRIE: First of April.

Mr. MARCIL: Civil servants are to receive increases ranging from $60 to $120 and I wish now to speak for a class of employees of whom there are a good many in my constituency. These people have served the government faithfully for a good many years, some of them for a quarter of a century. They did not contribute to any pensions fund and now they are left without any resource, and the government seems unable to do anything for these faithful servants. I should like to ask the minister whether it would not be possible to do something at the present time for people who had been in the employ of the government for fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years, but who did not contribute a penny to any superannuation fund, and are now practically penniless? Is there no authority under which provision can be made for such cases?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is the Old Age Pension Act.

Mr. MARCIL: But I am referring to persons who are government employees. There are many such cases all over Canada, and I want to know from the Minister of Finance if there is not some authority in the existing laws whereby provision can be made for some of these cases?

An hon. MEMBER: What particular class?

Mr. MARCIL: I have in mind the case of one man who was agent on an Indian reserve for twenty or twenty-five years. He was a permanent official, but he was not asked to contribute anything to any superannuation fund. Now he is in straitened circumstances, and I thought there might be a provision in the law somewhere to take care of such a case as that. I understand that in the case of former ministers of the crown the Treasury Board has power to investigate when they are in necessitous circumstances and come to their relief. I was wondering whether it would not be possible, either under the existing law or by means of an amendment, to provide for cases of the particular nature that I have indicated.

Mr. ROBB: I do not know of any such provision in the act nor would I care to recommend the enactment of such a provision. I think it would be a very dangerous power to confer. The Treasury Board might be met with importunities that would be hard to resist politically and that could not be met on any sound actuarial basis.

With respect to the observations of my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross) that matter is under review. We shall have to see whether we can devise some method of treating such cases fairly, but I cannot make any commitment at the present time.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It is a very worthy case.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would draw the attention of the minister to the situation of a class of postmasters in this country who have been working on commission. I have in mind one such postmaster who has been in the service of the country for nearly sixty years. He is now carrying on with considerable difficulty because owing to the low salary which he derived from commissions, he was unable to lay by anything for his old age. To-day that man is in a very unhappy position. He is endeavouring to carry on but with very great difficulty. I wonder if the minister has ever considered providing for cases of this nature? The man I have in mind will never retire until death compels him to do so, and yet some provision should be made for him.

Mr. ROBB: I quite appreciate the position of my hon. friend's postmaster because I recall that at one time, when the present Speaker was Postmaster General, I brought to his attention the case of a postmaster in my own riding who claimed that he was the oldest living postmaster in Canada. However, under the act he could do nothing for that man at that time, and we cannot do anything now because these men do not come within the class of cases in which superannuation is allowed.

Mr. MALCOLM: I was chairman of the committee that made the recommendation on which the act was based. The act was designed to meet the case of new entrants to the service, but provision was made to allow those contributing under the previous superannuation acts to come in upon paying the difference in the contributions. At the time referred to strong representations were made with respect to unusual cases such as those to which the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) have called attention, but those to whom the framing of the act was entrusted felt that the measure would be jeopardized if an attempt was made to provide for all such cases. I recall representations on behalf of some such servant as the hon. member for Kingston has spoken of, but he was under the Militia department and that department had its own pension system. I think there is a good deal to be said on behalf of old caretakers, however, and if the Superintendent of Insurance could frame a suitable amendment I would be glad to see the minister adopt it because the committee were certainly sympathetic to such cases.

Mr. McGIBBON: I ask the minister whether he does not think that it is in the interests of the public that cases of the kind I have indicated should be looked after. Men of that age cannot live very much longer; it is inevitable that they should disappear before very long. It does seem to me that something ought to be done to provide for persons in such a situation.

Mr. MARCIL: Supplementing what I have already said the Indian agent in the case to which I have referred was appointed at $150 a year. His salary was ultimately advanced to $300 but the department is paying $700 to-day to the agent who is discharging the same duties. The present occupant of the office will probably benefit by a pension, whereas his predecessor who worked for half the present salary may have to be looked after by the municipality. Certainly something should be done for this man who has reached the advanced age of over eighty. It is a poor object lesson to the people of Canada if, when the time comes for them to retire, we cannot provide for those who served the country so long and so faithfully and upon the low salaries that then prevailed.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The minister spoke of those under the old superannuation acts having to pay the difference between the contribution fixed by the old acts and that fixed by the present law. I believe civil servants have to pay not only that difference, but also four per cent on the arrears. This has kept many civil servants from coming under the new superannuation law. Although they would be able to pay the amount of the difference they feel that they cannot pay interest on the arrears and live decently. Is there no way by which the government can do away with the provision requiring the payment of four per cent interest so that all the members of the civil service can come under the Superannuation Act? I think the government will find that in time it would pay them if they did that. Then all the civil servants would be under the new act. At present they are not, and some day the government will have to provide in some other way for those who have not come under the act.

Mr. MALCOLM: In reply to my hon. friend may I say that the act as worked out by the committee was placed on an actuarial basis, one-half being contributed by the employee and one-half by the state. That made it very difficult to consider the case of a man who had never paid anything into the fund. Such a man could never be expected to pay five per cent of his total salary for the whole period in which he was in the government service because he would not likely be in a position to make such a heavy payment. At the time the act passed this House, with very strong support on both sides, it was felt that as it had been worked out on an actuarial basis there was no further need for contributions by civil servants other than those for which the measure provides. The upper chamber however felt that there was, and that those who were under the old scheme and coming into the new, were not contributing sufficient to the new scheme. The upper chamber therefore amended the bill by making necessary the payment of 4 per cent simple interest. They did not ask that it be compounded. I do not know what influence my hon. friend has in the upper chamber. He has some relatives there, and I would suggest that he get his relatives to introduce a bill in the upper chamber and to endeavour to have the upper chamber accept the bill as it was passed by this House.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I should like to make some remarks on clause 4 if we are to take them clause by clause. As regards clause 1, many civil servants suffer because a charge is made against them, perhaps by some head of a department, and they do not have a trial. I am a great believer in the fairness of something like a court martial, so that when a man is charged with misconduct he has an appeal or a hearing before he suffers directly from the charge.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to draw the attention of the minister to what I consider an injustice in the administration of the present Superannuation Act. A man entering the employ of the government and being dismissed or leaving it in less than ten years is not eligible to secure a refund of the money which he has paid into this fund. I have had referred to me a particular case which the minister now has in his hands, showing how this injustice works out. This man was employed as a farm instructor for a period of nearly five years, and the very fact that he was in the government employ for that length of time would indicate that his services were reasonably satisfactory. He was however dismissed. I am not familiar with the reason why he was dismissed, but he is to-day in a very unfortunate position. His wife is sick in the hospital; he is without work and without a dollar, and yet the very considerable amount of money which he has paid into this fund cannot be returned to him. I admit that this is not covered by the act, but it is covered by a ruling made by the Treasury Board in conformity with the act. I would like to ask the minister if there is any possibility of a change being made in this ruling of the Treasury Board so that cases of this kind may be dealt with and justice rendered to the parties concerned.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will recall that under the old act a man retiring at any time, and under the present act a man retiring in less than ten years, cannot get a refund. My hon. friend will observe that even in the good civil service of Canada we have discovered some employees who could not get a refund if they retired voluntarily, but who, knowing that they might if they were dismissed, invited dismissal for the purpose of securing a refund. This provision is for the purpose of clearing that up.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That hardly deals with the case to which I am referring. It makes no material difference whether this was in the old act or in the new. The point is that an absolute injustice was done to this man. He perhaps may not want to pay into the fund but he is compelled to do so. He has no alternative, and yet when he is dismissed from the service, or leaves the service through apparently no fault of his, so far as I can understand, or at least does not leave the service voluntarily, a considerable portion of his salary is confiscated. Actually 5 per cent of that man's salary over a period of four and a half years service has been confiscated. That is practically a dishonest proceeding.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend arguing on behalf of the taxpayers of his constituency or on behalf of some particular employee?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am arguing in reference to this particular case, but in a general way I am asking for justice for any employee who may be placed in a similar position. If contributions to the civil service fund were voluntary; if this man went into it understanding that he was paying the money voluntarily, taking his chances of losing it later, I could quite understand in that case he would have to be prepared to lose if he were dismissed or left the service within ten years. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways what an employee of the Canadian National Railways would say if 5 per cent or any particular amount were deducted from his salary and kept in a fund of this kind, and nothing returned to him under such circumstances.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the exact principle underlying the provident fund in connection with the Intercolonial.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is no refund made to those men?

Mr. DUNNING: The only fund we have is the Intercolonial provident fund and it is conducted on this very principle.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The employees of the whole railway would not stand for anything of that kind.

Mr. MALCOLM: They do.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It is most unjust. If contributions to the fund were voluntary, I would see no injustice; but when they are compulsory, you might just as well pay the man that much less salary in the first place because when he has left the service through no particular fault of his own, he cannot get a refund.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend, in making such a statement as he does, is certainly very poorly informed in regard to the principle of superannuation acts. There is a great difference between an annuity whereby a man gets back the money paid in, plus some small rate of interest, and an insurance policy under which he may win a large amount of money or to which he may be a heavy contributor and lose. If some did not lose there could not be the returns paid that are paid to civil servants who put in the full thirty-five years service, receive the superannuation of 70 per cent, and live for many years afterwards. Every superannuation scheme in existence, the New York Central scheme, the New Zealand act, the Canadian Pacific superannuation act, were considered by the committee, and this act as recommended was a combination of the opinions of the men on that committee as covering most fully the views representative of all parties in the House and also of the men administering superannuation acts which were outstandingly good in America.

Mr. HEAPS: Were the employees consulted and were they satisfied?

Mr. MALCOLM: Representatives of men's organizations by the score were in front of us. We had actuarial advice on this plan. If a man does not want to come into the civil service on a contributory plan, he does not have to do so. Under the old act a man contributed to a plan and he got certain refunds, but the state was contributing nothing. The hon. member for Mackenzie cannot show me an act based on the principle of superannuation whereby a man is allowed to elect to make it an annuity. If a man goes into the scheme, puts in his full period of service, retires and lives for many years, he is bound to get out more than he puts in. If a man after putting in his full period of service retires, draws the superannuation and lives only one year, of course an injustice is done; he never gets back all the money he has paid in. The same thing is true of life insurance. All life insurance is bound to benefit some more than others. The principle of the thing is to benefit the civil servant who lives a long time so that in his old age he will not be in want. The act also takes care of widows to the extent of 50 per cent of the superannuation of the civil servant and there is a grant of so much for each child. None of these benefits could possibly come to retiring civil servants if there were not some sources of revenue beyond the actual contributions. All cannot possibly take out with interest what they pay in under this scheme.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If the contributions to the widows and orphans are largely made up by taking the money from men like this, an injustice is certainly done.

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. HEAPS: I asked if the employees were satisfied to come under the act.

Mr. MALCOLM: It was the civil servants of Canada who requested this act, and they were all delighted when it was brought into force. We were pressed week after week and month after month by the civil servants themselves to bring down this act. They wanted it, and they are still pressing for further amendments.

Mr. McGIBBON: That might all be true; nobody is denying it, but the principle raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie is the injustice done to a man who has been in the service five or more years and may be forced out. That is a different matter altogether. I can tell the hon. minister that there was a time when life insurance companies took that stand, but they do not do it to-day; they dare not do it.

Mr. MALCOLM: Which stand?

Mr. McGIBBON: The stand of retaining the premiums of those who dropped their insurance. No insurance company would dare do that to-day. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie is absolutely sound. You should not rob one man to pay another. It is not just that a man who has been paying into the fund for a number of years should lose everything he has put in if, for some reason or other, he is forced out or has to drop out of the service. Nothing under heaven can justify that. If the state is not contributing enough to enable those who remain in the service to get a pension, it is its duty to contribute more. It is not fair to make a levy on the man who for one cause or another is forced to drop out of the service after contributing to the fund for a number of years. As I said before, life insurance companies once took that stand and retained the premiums of those who dropped out, but they do not do it to-day.

Mr. MALCOLM: The life insurance company makes no contribution; it all comes from the individual. But in this case the government contributes as well as the civil servants and all the contributions go into a general fund to pay the pensions of those who remain in the service.

Mr. McGIBBON: You never help the man whose money you retain.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, we help the other man who stays on.

Mr. McGIBBON: You are retaining his contributions unjustly.

Mr. MALCOLM: We do not retain his contributions. They all go into the fund for the benefit of other civil servants who stay in the service.

Mr. McGIBBON: The man is the loser. There is no justice in that.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no justice in superannuation anyway.

Mr. McGIBBON: If a bank dismisses one of its servants, they pay him what he has contributed into the pension fund, plus interest, and I submit that that case is on all fours with this.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, it is different. My hon. friend surely knows that in connection with the Superannuation Act which was brought down, and which civil servants were so desirous of having brought into force, they are quite prepared that some shall be losers for the benefit of those that stay on. When the civil servants make their contributions for the first ten years, the state makes an equal contribution. The $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 that was in the old civil service fund was transferred to this new fund, and many of the men who were under the old scheme dropped out without any benefit whatever. There cannot be one hundred per cent justice in superannuation, because some will win more than others, and if one man wins, some other man must lose. If you want to have a return of contributions to those who drop out of the service, which was never discussed before the committee by the civil servants who were pressing for this bill, there would have to be a heavier levy both upon the employee and upon the government. This Superannuation Act was worked out practically on the principle of the New Zealand superannuation act, modified by some clauses in the Canadian Pacific Railway and New York Central acts, and in every instance the civil servants themselves were pressing for the bill to be brought into force.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister contradicted me, but he has not said one word to justify his contradiction. I was comparing the provisions of this fund with those of a bank, and he said that there was no comparison.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is not.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why? Do not the bank employees pay into a fund? Do not the banks also pay?

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not know that they do.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then do not contradict me.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not think the banks pay into the fund.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think they do. I say I have known cases, and I know it is their policy whenever they dismiss a man to return his contributions.

Mr. VENIOT: Some banks do not contribute.

Mr. McGIBBON: Some of them do, and the case is on all fours with this. I say there is no justice in this parliament passing a law to retain a man's money to which he is justly entitled.

Mr. ROBB: As I pointed out earlier, this measure was framed after very careful consideration, and after consultation with the actuaries and also with the civil service representatives. When it was first brought down, it met with the approval of the civil service representatives, and it meets with their approval to-day, with the exception of some points where we propose some corrections after the experience of some three years. We are now bringing these amendments in to meet the wishes of the civil service. We brought in a measure last year extending the period during which they could determine whether they would come in under the new act or not. We are extending it again now. My hon. friends opposite offer some objection. My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario brings up certain grievances, but he offers nothing constructive. How do my hon. friend and the hon. member for Mackenzie propose that the deficiency in the fund which would be created by returning contributions shall be met? Do they want the contributor's pension reduced? If they do, let them say so, and we will consider it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I want the parties to pay who are going to benefit. The government ought to pay it.

Mr. MALCOLM: The government does not benefit. The government is a contributor.

Mr. ROBB: I repeat, we have pointed out to the civil service representatives, who came to us no later than this week, that it was getting late in the session, and that we were not sure that we could get this measure through. I told them frankly that I did not propose to stay here all summer to try to put this measure through, but I am ready to listen to anything constructive. If hon. gentlemen are simply going to find fault, and raise the case of one man here and another man there who wants his money back after voluntarily contributing to the fund, and they are not prepared to offer anything constructive, I shall have to tie the bill up so that we can consider during the year what would be the effect from an actuarial standpoint. We would have to consider how much more the government would have to contribute in that case, because either the government or the other civil servants would have to contribute more if the present scale of pensions is to be continued.

Mr. CANTLEY: I understood the minister to say that the man went into the scheme voluntarily, and now he wants his money back. I think it all depends on circumstances. It is true he went into the scheme voluntarily and made his contributions, but it was on the expectation that he would remain in the service until such time as he would be eligible for superannuation. But he has been dismissed, and all he asks is that you pay him back, not what you contributed, but what he contributed himself.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is a good business man, but he has missed the point. I have pointed out that in the experience of the Treasury Board we have discovered that some people were actually seeking dismissal so that they might get their money back.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not dealing with such a man at all, but with the man who comes into the service and contributes voluntarily because he expects to stay in the service long enough to get the benefit of superannuation. You dismiss him and confiscate what he contributed. All he asks is that you return to him, not what you put in, but what he contributed himself. What is the answer to that?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When a man is dismissed, does he not get back the money he contributed?

Mr. VENIOT: No, not under the new scheme.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the answer?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Minister of Trade and Commerce dismisses my plea in favour of this particular man by the assertion that the principle on which all superannuation acts are based is that some men in particular circumstances must lose and others gain, that those who leave the service within ten years must contribute five per cent of their salary to the pension fund for the benefit of those more fortunate who are permitted to remain in the service. That, in effect, is what he says. I want to point out where he is wrong. My complaint is not against the act. The act is all right. My complaint is against the ruling of the Treasury Board. The Minister of Finance implies that those of us who are criticizing have offered nothing constructive. I want nothing more constructive than the act itself; the act is quite satisfactory. Let me read subsection 3 of section 10 of the act:

> Nothing herein contained shall be understood as impairing or affecting the right of the governor in council to dismiss or remove any contributor from the civil service, and on such dismissal or removal the governor in council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board pay to the contributor the whole or any part of his contribution under this act as may be deemed expedient.

Can the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that the act was based on the principle that a man in this position should not have his contributions to the fund returned? How can they make that assertion in view of that particular clause in the act? What I complain about is that after this act is passed and after all the arrangements are made the Treasury Board takes it on itself to make a ruling. This ruling is dated December 17, 1926, and it specifically deals with this case. It leaves this man outside the operations of the act. I am not complaining of the act itself. Some hon. member has asked that this document be read. It is rather a lengthy document, but I think I had better read it all. It reads:

> The board had under consideration sundry submissions recommending, under the provisions of section 10 (3) of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924, repayment of the contributions of employees dismissed or removed from the service. They also considered a memorandum prepared by the superintendent of insurance, at the request of the board, as to the advisability of authorizing such refunds.

> The superintendent of insurance reported:
> 1. That this provision was not intended to apply generally to all cases of dismissal.

I would ask my hon. friend to take particular note of that first clause.

> That this provision was not intended to apply generally to all cases of dismissal.

Then section 2 reads:

> 2. That employees with less than ten years' service cannot obtain refund of their contributions upon resignation; that consequently, it would be advantageous to such employees to be dismissed.

And section 3 reads:

> 3. That the benefits under the act had been fixed on the understanding that there would be accruing to the fund, the contributions of employees retiring with less than ten years' service; and that if these contributions are not retained, the basis for maintenance of the fund would be destroyed.
> The board, concurring in the report and recommendation of the superintendent of insurance, are of opinion that:
> 1. Refund of contributions should not be authorized to employees with less than ten years' service, who are dismissed or removed from the service.

That covers this particular case. I submit the act was not based on that principle, because the subsection I have read states clearly that the government shall have the right to refund the amount paid in by such employees. Certainly no one can claim the act was based on that. I can quite understand persons now in the service maintaining that that provision should be carried out. Why, an acceptance of the principle embodied in the ruling of the Treasury Board simply means confiscation of part of the salaries of the unfortunate employees, which was intended to be left for them in their old age, their widows and orphans. The argument that the civil service is behind it is no argument at all. Parliament is above the civil service. It is the duty of parliament to give justice not only to the civil servants who have been in the service sufficiently long to draw their pensions, but also to the less fortunate employees who are dismissed before they have been ten years in the service, and a part of whose salary is confiscated.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend referred to the privilege of appealing to the Treasury Board. There was the case submitted to the committee of the man who might be dismissed through the abolition of his office, although he had committed no offence against the department in which he worked. The man who retires voluntarily loses his contributions under the act; the man who commits some offence relating to his position or against the department is not supposed to get his money back, but the man whose position is abolished has the right of appeal and the Treasury Board may return to him his contributions.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That confirms what I said; apparently the act intended to make a refund to employees who were dismissed.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, except where a man was dismissed without cause, such as the abolition of the office, where there was no offence on his part. I may point out to my hon. friend that immediately after the war representations were made that we had a very large civil service. Of course some departments would naturally become less heavily manned as years went by. Where a man had to be let out through the abolition of the office, having done nothing wrong himself, he should be allowed to get his money back.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The act does not say that.

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In any case of dismissal the governor in council has the right to make a refund of the amount paid in. But the minister states there was an afterthought, that this is something that came up afterwards: that an employee who wanted to leave the office and avail himself of the opportunity could perhaps use his fists with his superiors and gets around the act. We have a ruling of the Treasury Board on that. What the minister says confirms my opinion that the act was not intended to apply as it was applied in the case to which I refer. If it was found out afterwards that is was simply tempting the employee who wanted to leave the service to be dismissed, then I maintain the government should have dealt with it in some other way to render justice to those who were dismissed.

Mr. DUNNING: What other way?

Mr. CAMPBELL: That he should ask the Treasury Board to carry out the original intention of the act. That is all I am arguing. I am complaining of the ruling of the Treasury Board; I am not complaining of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: I am a member of the Treasury Board, and as such have had to consider, along with the other members of the board, cases of this kind. The abuse which the Treasury Board sought to correct under the section my hon. friend referred to arose from the fact that an employee who retires voluntarily with less than ten years' service should not have his contributions returned. My hon. friend will admit that proposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is covered by the act.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am not complaining of that, but I am complaining of the interpretation given to the act by the Treasury Board in cases of dismissal.

Mr. DUNNING: We find this abuse existing: that men knowing that if they retire voluntarily, having served for a period under ten years, they could not receive their contribution, did something which compelled dismissal. So that there had to be consideration by the Treasury Board of the circumstances of dismissal in each case, as to whether or not the circumstances were such as to warrant the return of the contributions. There is hardly a meeting of the Treasury Board at which matters of dismissal and the relationship of the fund to these dismissals have not come before it for consideration, and there has to be a complete file of the circumstances in each case to enable the board to decide whether it is a proper case for the return of the contributions. There are other classes of cases. There are men who have been dismissed on account of defalcations, and when such a case arises it has to be shown to the board that that was the cause of dismissal. Does my hon. friend suggest that there should not be discretion somewhere in order to determine whether, even in cases of dismissal, contributions should or should not be returned? I submit that the discretion is absolutely necessary. So far as the general plan is concerned, it is in fact a pool. A man who puts his money into this scheme does not do so expecting to get more out of it than his contributions. The principle of pooling is the maximum good of all those participating in the pool. Some must bear a greater share of the burden in order that there may be equal benefits in case of disability or old age. There is no way of overcoming that inequality unless we adopt the annuity principle. Then unquestionably the payments either from the government or the contributors, or both, would have to be substantially larger than under this scheme.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Chairman, I submit that my contention is absolutely confirmed by the Minister of Railways. We have a frank admission from the treasury benches that as the act was framed the contributions of this class of employees were to be refunded. Therefore I submit that the contention of the Minister of Railways that the act was not framed with that in view is not correct. The present policy of not refunding in such cases is an afterthought.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend misunderstands my statement. The ruling of the Treasury Board is in conformity with the discretion given to them under the very section of the act that my hon. friend read.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Apparently the discretionary powers are entirely taken away. If there was a certain discretion vested in the Treasury Board; according to the act, and they could deal with cases of this kind, I would have no complaint; but, as I say, all discretion is taken away. I claim that any employee is entitled to have the act carried out in the spirit in which it was framed.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the hon. member will recall when this act was passed he would know that the committee to which it was referred was composed equally of members from each side of the House, because at the time the government had not a decided majority. The committee unanimously recommended the bill and it was enacted. When it came into the House the then Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) offered no criticism. In fact the only criticism came from the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who said that the measure was very generous, but he shuddered to think of the payments that the taxpayers would have to assume. If we had wanted to be more generous we would have to ask a large contribution either from the civil servants or the government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I again point out that I am not complaining of the act at all?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is not carried and will not be for a while if that practice is indulged in. I protest against the Minister of Finance threatening to throw this bill over because we attempt to improve it. I am not particularly concerned about our civil servants. I think they are pretty well paid and protected in every shape and form, and I do not think their work is very hard. Many a man in this country has got a day's work done before the civil servants commence their duties. I am not complaining of that, for I know that the nature of the work is such that it must be transacted during certain hours. But the Minister of Railways has brought up a subject which to my mind is very important. I do not see what principle he could introduce into the Civil Service Act that would be more destructive of the morale of the service. He admits it himself and says that there is trouble every day. When people think that they are not getting what belongs to them they are going to fight for their rights, and I think he will continue to have trouble so long as this clause remains.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I did not say that we have trouble, I said the Treasury Board has to deal with cases for the return of contributions to dismissed men. That is simply carrying out the intent of the act, it is not trouble. The only way to avoid it, as I pointed out, is to change the basis of the scheme, and provide that anyone, whether dismissed or retiring voluntarily, shall get his contributions refunded. In order to accomplish this the state would have to pay more and the contributors considerably more than they are now paying. We cannot carry on the scheme actuarily at the present rate of contribution if we admit that those who retire voluntarily or otherwise shall get their payments back.

Mr. McGIBBON: Probably I am mistaken, but I thought I distinctly heard the minister say that at nearly every meeting of the Treasury Board they have to consider these cases. If that does not indicate trouble I do not know what does.

Mr. DUNNING: No, that is just the ordinary business of the board.

Mr. McGIBBON: To my mind the principle is wrong. If the government wants to do something for the civil service, let them do it, and let them call upon those civil servants who are going to participate in superannuation help to that end; but the principle of making them contribute a certain percentage of their salary and then retain those payments is wrong.

Mr. WARD: May I ask a question of the Minister of Railways? He appears to be speaking for the Treasury Board.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I just butted in.

Mr. WARD: If this legislation passes, will the Treasury Board still have the right to consider the cases of all civil servants who have been dismissed?

Mr. ROBB: Not those with less than ten years' service. I would direct my hon. friend's attention to the regulations under paragraph 8, subsection 7.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the civil servant who is charged with misconduct any right of appeal? If so, to whom?

Mr. ROBB: He would appeal to the Treasury Board. We have had such appeals. I may say that this week representatives of the civil service have brought to our attention their desire to be represented on the board administering this act. There is much to be said in favour of the proposal, and we will work it out later.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I agree that the committee have certainly gone a long way towards removing dissatisfaction by their definition of "misconduct," and it should do away with any cause for appeal. But some civil servants are under an immediate superior whose word goes. In case of an appeal the subordinate has to proceed through his superior officer. I know for a fact that such appeals have often been pigeonholed, and I think the civil servant should be allowed to appeal direct. I am thoroughly satisfied with that definition of misconduct, but there should be some settled way of dealing with appeals. The appeal should go to a higher authority than the man's immediate superior.

Mr. ROBB: It is a matter that comes under the Civil Service Act rather than under this.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is there any way in which it is covered?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know.

Mr. MacLAREN: How many years' service is required to enable a widow to claim a superannuation allowance?

Mr. ROBB: Ten years' service on the part of the employee.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like more information regarding lighthouse keepers? The practice in certain lighthouses is for the keeper to hire a number of assistants. He is paid a certain sum of money and out of that he must provide all the assistants he requires, sometimes one, two or three. When the time comes for his superannuation by what method does the department arrive at the actual salary on the basis of which he will be retired?

Mr. ROBB: The superannuation allowance is made on the basis of his net salary.

Mr. GARDINER: These lighthouse keepers contribute to the superannuation fund on the basis of a fixed salary?

Mr. ROBB: On the basis of their net salary.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. CANTLEY: Not yet.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

INCORPORATION OF PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE

The House in committee on Bill No. 110, to incorporate the President of the Lethbridge Stake.—Mr. Jelliff—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this bill give us a short explanation of its purpose?

Mr. JELLIFF: This bill passed the House of Commons and the Senate last year, but owing to the dissolution of parliament failed to receive the royal assent.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GATINEAU TRANSMISSION COMPANY

The House in committee on Bill No. 66, to incorporate Gatineau Transmission Company —Mr. Fontaine—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. CANNON: This bill appears on the order paper as if there will be Senate amendments. This is evidently a misprint because the bill has not gone to the Senate. It was amended in committee.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the nature of the amendments that were made in the committee?

Mr. CANNON: The amendment was one suggested by myself to clause 11. Certain objections were raised to clause 11 as it read, on account of the expropriation powers therein mentioned and the rights which might belong to other companies operating in the same territory. Therefore I suggested that the clause should be amended in order that whenever the company should wish to operate in Quebec they would do so under the supervision of the Quebec Public Service Commission, and when operating in Ontario, they would do so under the supervision of the Hydro Electric Commission, and that we would strike off, starting from line 40, all the words beginning with the word "except." There were two exceptions as to the jurisdiction of the Hydro Electric. These exceptions have been eliminated so that the company is absolutely under the control of the Hydro Electric.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Cantley.]

On section 11—Approval by Quebec Public Service Commission and Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

Mr. IRVING: As amended?

Mr. CANNON: The clause reads now in the bill as amended in committee.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 to 16 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BAPTIST CONVENTION OF ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

The House in committee on Bill No. 153, respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Proviso.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I would like a little explanation about this bill. I am rather surprised to see that there is no provision in it for protecting vested rights that have been acquired previous to this date. It seems to me that that is a very unusual omission from a bill of this kind.

Then I find that section 1 provides that the convention, on a three-fifths vote of the delegates present at any time, may pass a regulation that some of the delegates shall no longer be entitled to attend the convention, and that some of the churches may no longer select delegates for the convention.

I have received a communication from Lachute, which I did not get in time to present to the private bills committee yesterday, and as it expresses my views I shall take the liberty of reading it:

That the members of the Lachute Baptist Church hereby express their entire disapproval of the amendment proposed to the act incorporating the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec for the following among other reasons:

1. That it is destructive of the independence of Baptist churches.

2. That it would give to a three-fifths vote at any convention the power to declare by resolution what is or is not in harmony with the objects of the convention, while the resolution may be entirely out of harmony with, and destructive of, the principles and doctrines held by the denomination, and through this resolution absolutely to cut off any church from its vested rights as a free and independent Baptist church in the convention.

3. That every Baptist church in the convention is possessed of vested rights in certain trust and endowment funds held for the work of the denomination, and the cutting off of any church from sending delegates to the convention would automatically nullify all their interest in the said endowment and trust funds.

4. That it clothes the convention with such powers as would inevitably imperil the freedom of the ministry.

5. That it would tend to bring the domestic affairs of the churches into discussion in the convention, either to prove that a church is out of harmony with the convention, or to enable a disappointed minority in a church to appeal to the convention to justify themselves against the minister or pastor and the majority supporting him.

(Sgd) G. F. CALDER. S. GOLDSWORTHY, Church Clerk.

I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that this bill has been carefully considered by the committee. I am not a member of the private bills committee myself, but it seems to me that these two objections to the bill are very serious ones. In the first place, there is no saving clause in regard to the vested rights of any community of the Baptist church, and further, it seems to me hardly in order that three-fifths of the members present at a convention should be able to pass a resolution excluding the delegates from some of the Baptist churches, or a resolution that certain Baptist churches should no longer have the right to send delegates to the convention. I should like to have some explanation of these matters from some member of the committee here who is conversant with them.

Mr. RALSTON: I am perhaps not too conversant with the facts out of which this bill has arisen, but the sponsor for the bill is not here tonight, and he asked me if it did come up to say a word in explanation to the committee.

I am sorry that my hon. friend from Argenteuil was not at the committee, because I can assure him that if he had been there he would have listened for at least three hours to a complete discussion of all the points to which he has referred by gentlemen who were thoroughly in touch with them and would have been able to give him very much more close range information than I can.

In a word, the purpose of the bill, as I understand it, is to bring the organization known as the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec into line with the organizations of that body existing in other parts of Canada. I understand that the Baptist convention is incorporated in British Columbia and the western provinces, and there they have the usual powers of any domestic corporation as to discipline, as to the conduct of their affairs, and who shall send delegates. Down in the maritimes, particularly in New Brunswick, there is a similar act of incorporation, but the Maritime Baptist Convention is not, I understand, incorporated as a convention.

I would draw the attention of the committee to this, that a convention which is not incorporated has, I think, in law the power to do exactly what is suggested in the section to which my hon. friend has referred, so that all that is sought here is to supply an omission in the old act of 1889, in which it is provided that each regular church is entitled to send delegates, and nothing is said whatever as to the disciplinary powers which may be possessed by the convention, in case it becomes necessary or is thought advisable to use those powers. In the case of any club or domestic organization, its domestic affairs are under its control, but I understand that this body is advised that because of this omission there is doubt whether they have power to control who shall and who shall not send delegates to the convention. The purpose of this section is to supply that omission.

With regard to property rights, may I just say a word? The Baptist churches throughout the world are autonomous bodies. Each church owns its own property. The convention or the coöperative assembly through which they work has no property whatever, and has no interest in the property of the churches, so the body which is incorporated here holds no property, and has no interest in the property of the individual churches, and all that the churches may do, and the only interest they may have in the coöperative work, is to send delegates who can vote on various matters that come before the convention, with regard to the good of the denomination and relating to the objects for which the convention is brought together. In that connection I want the committee to have the fullest information, because there are two or three boards which are appointed by the convention, namely, a board to hold funds for the home missions, a board to hold and administer funds for foreign missions, and a board to administer superannuation funds for aged and infirm ministers. The convention as such has no property in the fund whatever. The funds are contributed by the individual churches and all the convention does is to nominate the members of the board. My hon. friend from Argenteuil probably does not know also that under the act which incorporated McMaster university this convention is authorized to appoint a board to deal with matters pertaining to that educational institution. That is not under this act, but under the act incorporating McMaster university, and so, as was pointed out before the committee, in connection with the question of property rights it would seem as though those who go to vote at the convention have no more interest in the property which is being administered by those boards whom they elect than the persons comprising the governor in council which elects the board of the Canadian National Railways would have in the property of the Canadian National Railways. I therefore think that the suggestion which was made to the committee is sound, that if you insert what is called a saving clause with respect to property you give some astute lawyer an opportunity of saying "Well, parliament must have thought, notwithstanding the apparent plain provisions of the act, that there was some property interest somewhere", and probably an argument would be founded on that basis. I submit that it would be unwise and unnecessary to insert such a provision, because if you look at the proviso proposed it is purely a section for the purpose of excluding the church from sending delegates to the convention and does not purport to affect property. I submit there is no such thing as property in this concern, and the operation of this association is such that it does not normally acquire property.

The other proposition was as to the three-fifths vote. My suggestion to the committee is that the usual procedure for action by such a corporation is to proceed by a majority vote—majority in matters of discipline as well as matters in connection with property and the general affairs of the corporation. In this case I understand that it was the idea of the promoters of the bill that whoever it dealt with might be assured that there was no desire captiously to interfere with the attendance of anybody at the association, and so the three-fifths majority was suggested. In the ordinary case I think it would be fifty per cent.

I desire to refer to another matter. Under the provisions of this act it does not come into force until it is ratified by the convention itself, which gives full notice to all interested of the possibility of action under this legislation. Although I am a member of the denomination, I do not happen to be a member of this convention. I understand there are some 508 churches in the convention and that a protest was received—any hon. member can correct me if I am wrong—or sent in by thirty-five churches to the people who are opposing this bill. The further statement was made that a protest has been received from individual members of 120 churches in all but when it was analyzed it was found that that meant that one individual member of a church might count as one of the 120. So that I think as the matter stands the bill represents the desire of 508 churches, with the exception of 35, and with the exception of some individual members from some 85 other churches.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: My hon. friend says there are no property rights involved, and I am quite sure he is stating it as he understands it. Sometimes errors are made in a matter of this kind. Would there be any objection to putting in a clause safeguarding any vested rights, a clause similar to that which has been put in other bills? We inserted such a clause in a bill a few minutes ago.

Mr. RALSTON: I anticipated that suggestion, and I made what seems to me to be the only answer which could be made to it, namely, that I have no idea that there is any property of which any church referred to in section 1 will be deprived. I have not exhausted my investigation, but I have taken some pains to get information and I cannot see that there is any likelihood of any church being deprived of property interest by being refused the right to send a delegate to this convention. I do suggest, therefore, being a member of the bar myself, that it would be unwise and would be unduly casting a cloud on this association if we insisted that, as a condition to this corporation getting the power that other corporations have, they should have something added that would in a lefthanded way suggest that somebody had property rights when apparently none exist.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is well that the committee should understand that this is a private bill and cannot be amended without notice.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I think if the hon. member for Argenteuil had been at the meeting of the committee yesterday he would have agreed with everything the hon. minister said. I endorse every word which has been uttered by the Minister of National Defence. This bill will have no effect on the endowment fund or superannuation fund. Before the committee we had Rev. John MacNeil, Doctor Shields and others. Already the thirty-five ministers represented by Doctor Shields have started a seminary college of their own and have withdrawn their support from the organization. The committee on private bills yesterday carried the bill unanimously, and there is nothing else for us to do; therefore I hope the measure will pass through this House without further discussion.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 231, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.—Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock section 1 was under consideration.

Mr. MacLAREN: I want to direct to the attention of the minister now in charge of the bill a concrete case which has been submitted to me. Suppose a civil servant should die, say, six days before the expiry of the ten year period which is necessary to entitle his dependents to superannuation. I understand that it is the practice at present to pay to the dependents of civil servants who die during the month the full amount of salary for that month. If that were done in the case I am supposing—and this is not a hypothetical case, for it has been brought to my notice only to-day—would not the fact that the salary would be paid for the full month extend the time of service of the deceased so as to complete the ten year period? What is the minister's interpretation of the statute in regard to this point? Would the dependents, under such circumstances as these, be entitled to the allowance?

Mr. GUTHRIE: By the way, who is in charge of the bill?

Mr. CANNON: The bill stands in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), but I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) is familiar with the subject. There was a good deal of discussion this afternoon which I think might be continued in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister give an estimate of what the bill will eventually cost the country?

Mr. MacLAREN: First of all I should like to have an answer to the point I have brought forward. As I say, this is not a hypothetical case; it has actually come to my notice. A civil servant dies six days before the end of his ten year period, and the present practice is to pay his salary up to the end of the month in which he dies. Does the minister think that this practice would apply to the payment of the superannuation allowance so as to complete the ten year period? I should like to know whether the minister thinks that in that case the dependents would be eligible to receive the allowance.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not see that it would make much difference whether death occurred one month or one year before the end of the period. I agree with my hon. friend that it does seem an injustice to deprive the dependents of the allowance which they would otherwise receive, merely because the man died just a few days before the necessary time had elapsed. However, the ten year period is arbitrary, and the same problem would arise no matter what length of time we might fix.

Mr. MacLAREN: But I am pointing out that the present practice in the payment of salaries is to grant the salary to the end of the month in which the civil servant dies. If that same practice were observed in the case I have cited the result would be to extend the time of service so as to complete the requisite period.

Mr. MALCOLM: The date of death determines the status of the beneficiary.

Mr. PETTIT: As I understand the act, the civil servant is not entitled to repayment of moneys paid in unless he has been in the service the full ten years. It seems to me that anyone who becomes incapacitated or who is removed by the department from any cause other than misconduct as set out in subsection 1 should be entitled to receive what he has contributed.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not believe my hon. friend was in the House this afternoon when the matter was discussed. Certain objections were raised which appeared to be well taken. However, the purpose of the bill is to provide certain benefits for civil servants. When the bill was first introduced that question was very carefully considered. It has to be admitted that the benefits of the money paid in do not accrue to those retiring after a service of less than ten years. In case of dismissal, as has been pointed out this afternoon, the Treasury Board has discretionary power to review the case. As the Minister of Finance pointed out, to add provisions to the bill conferring any further benefits would really entail a complete revision of the assessment necessary to provide the payments. Therefore I do not think the committee would be well advised to disturb the principle of the bill at this stage.

Mr. PETTIT: The minister spoke of those dismissed for misconduct, but what about those who have become incapacitated? Should not provision be made for them?

Mr. MALCOLM: The bill provides for those who become disabled within the ten year period.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Mr. EVANS: Will those employees who have served continuously under the Soldier Settlement Board for the last seven or eight years be reckoned as permanent employees, and will they come in under this scheme? It does seem unfair that they should be regarded as temporary employees after serving continuously so many years. Moreover, it would be very hard for many of them to reëstablish themselves in their pre-war occupation.

Mr. MALCOLM: The question of the treatment of employees of the Soldier Settlement Board is under review by the Department of Justice. A separate bill will have to be framed to cover those cases.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Before the House rose at six o'clock I was appealing to the minister on behalf of an employee who had been in the service of the government for about four and a half years. During that time this man had paid in five per cent of his salary to the superannuation fund, and under subsection 3 of section 10 the governor in council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, is empowered to refund to him the amount he paid in. Owing, however, to a ruling of the Treasury Board the taking of that course is prevented. I would ask the minister if this particular ruling of the Treasury Board, is, like the law of the Medes and Persians, not subject to change, or if there is a chance of this man, through appeal to the governor in council, getting a redress of his grievance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is always a chance that an appeal can be taken to the Treasury Board. The decision in that man's case is not final; his case may be reviewed again.

Mr. CAMPBELL: As I understand it there is no appeal from this ruling. I should like to have some assurance from the minister that this man can appeal to the governor in council and have his case heard.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is nothing final about a ruling of the Treasury Board. A restatement of the case before the board may be asked for, and the board have full authority to revoke their previous decision. There is nothing final about the board"s decision in the sense that it cannot be reviewed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do I understand that the Treasury Board are now in a position to hear and consider an individual case notwithstanding the ruling given?

Mr. CANNON: In this special case the decision can be changed by the board itself, or can be changed on appeal.

Mr. CAMPBELL: To whom can this man appeal? Is there any appeal from the decision of the board?

Mr. CANNON: He can always appeal to the governor in council from the decision of the board.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But apparently, according to subsection 3 of section 10, the governor in council can only refund this money on the recommendation of the board. In that case I understand there is no appeal.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me: We will assume that there is a decision of the board adverse to this person in whom he is interested. In that case the only remedy that lies is either to come before the board in some way or other and have the board change its decision, or, if that method cannot be taken, proceed by way of appeal.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Appeal to whom?

Mr. CANNON: To the governor in council, in order that the decision already given by the board may be altered.

Mr. McGIBBON: Before we go any further, can the minister give the House an idea as to what the cost to the country will be?

Mr. MALCOLM: It will depend a good deal upon how many civil servants under the old act are transferred to the new act. Civil Servants have the option of remaining under the old act, and the period of election to come under the new act has been extended and has not expired yet. I am very sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend the figures that I thought were here. The balance to the credit of the fund in 1927 was $13,999,000, practically $14,000,000, or about three and a half millions greater than the year previous.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would that be the ultimate cost per year?

Mr. MALCOLM: That will be about the average yearly cost.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Before the section carries I should like again to bring to the attention of the minister the possibility of arranging for some definite appeal in regard to dismissal for misconduct. I would therefore move:

That section 1 be further amended by adding the following:

That in case of appeal by a civil servant against his dismissal for misconduct, such appeal shall be heard by a representative of the minister of the department concerned, a representative of the Justice department, and a representative of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. EVANS: I would draw the attention of the Solicitor General to a question that was asked in this House on March 21 referring to employees of the Soldier Settlement Board. The reply to that question was given by Mr. Robb who said:

I will direct the matter to the attention of the superintendent, although I think it has already been submitted to him by the board.

Has anything been done in this direction yet, and cannot the government promise any relief for these men, seeing that they are practically permanent employees? I think they should come under the Superannuation Act.

Mr. CANNON: I will inquire and let my hon. friend have the information.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that this amendment is out of order. I do not wish to prevent the hon. gentleman from discussing it, but this clause refers to the interpretation section of the original act, and I think it would be out of order to hitch on to one of the paragraphs of the interpretation section of the original act a provision for an appeal from a dismissal. No doubt there is in the act some other place where such a provision could be inserted.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not care where the provision for an appeal is inserted; so long as it is inserted in the act.

Mr. DUNNING: The proposed amendment is not a proper one to this act, which is the Civil Service Superannuation Act. It could appropriately be offered as an amendment to the Civil Service Act, because the question of causes of dismissal and the like is dealt with in that act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is proper.

Amendment negatived.

On section 2—Application of part I.

Mr. NEILL: I think this is the appropriate place to bring before the government and the House the claim of two small bodies, in the one case of civil servants and in the other of persons who ought to be classed as civil servants, to come under this act. This is not a revolutionary matter or a suggestion to change the basis of the act. It involves no greater contribution or no less superannuation allowance. Possibly it involves a little extra expense on the part of the government, but only in the regular proportion which the government contributes under the act. The amount is small because they are two small bodies. If they had not been small bodies numerically and serving the country in remote places, perhaps their claim would have been considered before now. If they had numbered two or three thousand and lived in Ottawa, the justice of their case would have ensured that it receive consideration before now. The one case is a matter of including civil servants who are now really civil servants but who are not allowed superannuation. The other is a matter of including as civil servants people who should be classed as civil servants, and I cannot for the life of me understand why they are not so classed. I have in my hand a very modestly drawn up petition from the officers of the ships of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, a petition which in polite and respectful language sets forth their case. The trouble with these men is that they are prohibited from being members of the civil service because the Civil Service Act contains a section which reads:

> This act shall not apply to any position on any ship of His Majesty until parliament otherwise enacts.

Of course, not being civil servants, they do not come under the Superannuation Act. It is unnecessary for me to argue or stress the advisability of giving superannuation to civil servants, because that has been conceded all along the line and that is what this act is about. We will therefore commence with the premises that it is just and proper that men in the service of the country should be encouraged, by looking forward to superannuation, to stay with their department and give it the value of their experience. These men are prevented from doing that. They have to do a great deal of rather strenuous work. They serve the fisheries protection service and also the lighthouse service. They are out in all sorts of weather and under very strenuous conditions. They are expected at times to risk their lives in the performance of their duties. This is not a particularly nice service, and it is the very type of service that makes it highly desirable for the government to encourage them to stay with it because their experience is worth a great deal more than that of a man in a merely clerical position.

I am more familiar with the Pacific coast, and I know that the knowledge which these men must acquire in performing their duties makes it eminently desirable that the government should encourage them to remain in the service instead of having the best men picked up by the commercial companies because of their usefulness. I do not suppose more then sixty or seventy men would be involved so that the expense would be small. If they were made civil servants, they would be eligible for superannuation. That covers that phase of the question.

The other class to which I wish to refer is that of telegraphists, agent operators, agent linesmen and linesmen in the government telegraph service. They may be a little more numerous. They are prohibited, for a totally different reason, from enjoying the benefits of superannuation. Those who are telegraphists, agent operators or agent linesmen are all civil servants, appointed by the Civil Service Commission, so that with the exception of linesmen they are all civil servants, and they are certainly permanent because they continue in the service for twenty or thirty years. Why are they not allowed to enjoy the benefits of superannuation?

In the case of the employees of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment the argument used for prohibiting them was that the department was only a temporary establishment which would in time pass away, and the government did not want to have the heavy responsibility of pensioning these people after only a few years' service. But people of the class to which I am now referring continue in the service practically all their lives. I know of cases of both men and women telegraphists who have been twenty-five years in the service, and who, if they are laid off to-morrow, will not get a cent of pension. Many of these people do not appreciate the position they are in because they have been drifting along under the benefits of the Calder Act under which a number were superannuated and received a reasonable superannuation. Many of them hardly grasp the fact that when the Calder Act under which they were eligible for superannuation was done away with, they were no longer eligible under this superannuation act. The quibble, for I can hardly call it anything else, which was employed to deny them the right to come in under the superannuation act like other civil servants was this. Some brilliant genius invented the theory that they were not paid a stated annual salary and the act states that only those are eligible who are in receipt of a stated annual salary. The fact that these salaries are paid monthly does not seem to make any difference. Some of them have been paid for twenty-five years. For instance, a woman has drawn her stated annual salary, receiving it month by month, received her annual holiday and everything else; she is a permanent civil servant; but because of this beautiful theory that she was drawing what was called current wages and not a stated annual salary, she was declared ineligible. That is a mere quibble that should be set right. These people are not drawing current wages because that would suggest that the amount was fluctuating from month to month; that if the market was a little brisk, we would expect to see their wages increase. These people like all other civil servants receive an annual salary paid monthly and the amount of their salary will be found year out and year in, in the Auditor General's report. Now because of that theory, that obsession I might almost call it, that they are not being paid a stated annual salary, they are not allowed to come in. I think that is practically the whole case, and it needs only to be stated, I think, to show the injustice they are suffering. I hope that if the minister in charge of this bill cannot see his way to insert this amendment, which would not involve much trouble or expense, he will at least give us the assurance that he will consider the matter during the recess with the prospect or the intention of bringing these people in next year. But I would like to hear the minister's view as to why these two classes of men are not eligible to come under this act.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. gentleman has both asked and answered the question. The answer he gave was the very answer which I would have given. They were not included because none of the prevailing-rates men were included, and they were treated at the time the bill was introduced as being prevailing-rates men. To give my hon. friend the assurance that their case would be reconsidered would not be very difficult for me, because I recall distinctly that some of us on the committee at the time were of the opinion that some further consideration should be given to the prevailing-rates men who were kept on permanently year after year, and were in receipt of what was practically an annual salary, although it was not regarded as such. I think the member for Comox-Alberni knows that the Minister of Finance is going to consider these cases further during the recess, and I think that assurance is all he requires.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have received a number of letters with regard to certain classes of civil servants. There are, for instance, a number of civil servants in the Income Tax branch, which will shortly come under the National Revenue department, who have been in the service and doing the same work in some cases for thirteen or fifteen years, but who are still classified to-day as temporary employees, and because they are receiving $100 per month, no deductions are made for superannuation, and they do not come under the Superannuation Act. Some of these employees desire to be classified as permanent employees so that they may come under the Superannuation Act. All that is required, I understand, is that they should be classified as permanent employees in order to enjoy the benefits of this act, and I would like the minister to give me the asssurance that their case will be considered.

Mr. ROBB: Such of the employees as are considered of a permanent nature might be considered.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Surely a man who has been in the employ of the government and doing the same work for thirteen to fifteen years should be considered a permanent employee.

Mr. SPENCER: What constitutes a permanent employee?

Mr. ROBB: It is pointed out to us from time to time that there are employees who have been in the public service for many years who are not classified as permanent. All those who are permanent contribute.

Mr. WARD: Is it true that there are even departments of government that are not considered permanent departments, the employees of which could not possibly be considered permanent employees under any circumstances?

Mr. ADSHEAD: We have elevator operators and cleaners who have been working in the public buildings here for fifteen years, and who are classified as temporary employees and therefore cannot come under the Superannuation Act. Surely the lowliness of their occupation cannot be debarring them from receiving the benefits of this act. Though their occupation be lowly, it is just as useful and just as honourable as the work done by a man drawing $1,500 a year, and it should not debar them from coming under this act.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Calculation of allowance contributor having served previously to becoming a contributor.

Mr. MALONEY: On several occasions during the last year it has been brought to my attention that previous to the war, and for a few years after its commencement, several civil servants were superannuated on the basis of their salaries of those days. That superannuation allowance seems very, very small indeed at the present time, and I would ask the Minister of Finance if he would not give consideration to the cases of these people many of whom to-day are aged and actually in need.

Mr. ROBB: Of course, my hon. friend understands that their superannuation is based upon their contribution, and their contribution is based upon their salary.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): A number of employees are put in a peculiar position by the operation of this section. I refer to some of the very oldest employees in the penitentiary who have been under what is known as the Penitentiaries Act. Under that act they were allowed a gratuity for good conduct. Section 33 of the Penitentiaries Act provides that:

> The eligibility of any officer to be paid such a gratuity shall not be affected by his promotion heretofore or hereafter to an office which makes him a member of the civil service, as defined for the purpose of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act.

That provision in the Penitentiaries Act will be wiped out, I believe, by this amendment to the Superannuation Act. These officers are now given the option of deciding whether or not they will come under the Superannuation Act. It has already been stated this afternoon by one or two speakers that those officers who have been in the service for twenty or twenty-five years will have a very large amount indeed to pay into the fund if they have to pay five per cent of their salary, plus interest. These employees feel that just as soon as this act passes they will be in this position; they would be entitled as penitentiary officers to a gratuity allowance which would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,000, and if they retired as soon as this act passes they could draw that amount, and then re-enter the service as an official. I think one official of the penitentiaries branch has already done that, but those who continue in the service must pay five per cent of their former salary, plus interest, in order to get the benefit of this act. It would almost bankrupt these men to pay that amount, and some of them could not possibly do it. Therefore, they feel it would only be just if the act contained a provision that they could draw the gratuity to which they would be entitled for their good conduct, and have the same applied to the payments necessary to come under this act. I do not know whether I have made myself clear to the minister, but the case of these men is, I believe, worthy of consideration before this bill passes. They have until July to decide whether or not, they will come under the Superannuation Act. The minister of course may say, "why, they need not come under it." But they feel that if they do not come under it the only thing they have for their twenty or twenty-five years' service is a gratuity which they are given as a piece of charity. By some little act or infraction of some section they may be refused even this gratuity, and they have no appeal, so that after twenty-five or twenty-six years' service they have nothing coming to them. For that reason I was anxious to have inserted an amendment to provide that there should be some board of appeal; that the decision as to whether or not civil servants had broken the regulations should not be left to the ipse dixit of some superman above them. However, that has been voted down. To-day they have no appeal, and they may be put out after twenty years of service, as happened in the case of one official of the penitentiary a few years ago, without a single cent coming to them. In the case of this official there was not a black mark against him except a little infraction of the rules, or some technicality. I think it is only fair that these men should be given some consideration in the way of a payment which they might apply towards the amount which would bring them under the Superannuation Act.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot find anything in the clause under consideration that places them in any worse position than they now are.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): They cannot be in a worse position.

Mr. ROBB: They have the option of coming in under this scheme or of remaining under the old scheme to which they have contributed. We have already extended the time for coming under the act, and by this legislation we propose to extend it till July of this year. There is nothing in this clause that puts them in any worse position than they now are, but if my hon. friend will write to the department indicating just what he means, it can be taken into consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The department know the position very well; they have been written to in regard to it. These employees have not the amount of money which it would be necessary for them to pay in in order that they might be brought under the act; therefore they must stay out, and if they stay out they have nothing.

Mr. ROBB: They can pay it by instalments.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): But the large instalments which they would have to pay would leave them practically nothing to live on. The longer a man remains in the service the worse position he is in, because this money is not his; he is deprived of it on account of some infraction or some little technicality after he has given perhaps twenty-six years of good service.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will admit that there is nothing whatever in this measure which takes away the gratuity. He knows, too, that in insurance matters we must work on an actuarial basis.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): My hon. friend will admit that we have had actuarial bases which we believed were perfect, but we afterwards found they were wrong and the figures had to be changed several times. These old employees were under the old Penitentiaries Act, which provided that the gratuity would not be taken from them; yet it has been taken from them, if I understand this measure. The government has broken its agreement. If they come under the Superannuation Act they lose this gratuity, and the Penitentiaries Act stated that they would not lose it.

Mr. ROBB: I will have the matter looked into, but I do not know that anything has been taken away.

Mr. McGIBBON: Take the case of a widower with children over eighteen years of age; if he dies what becomes of his contributions?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend speaks of children over eighteen years of age. Subsection 3 of section 7 of the act says:

> If a contributor dies while in the civil service and leaves no widow and no child under the age of eighteen years, the governor in council may grant to the dependents of the contributor, in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council under the provisions of section eleven of this act, an amount not exceeding the amount of the contributions made by the contributor under the provisions of this act without interest.

That is, there is power now to make that allowance to dependents provided there is no widow and no children under eighteen.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is not obligatory, but permissible.

Mr. DUNNING: Each case is treated on its merits.

Mr. McGIBBON: It strikes me there would be a large number of those cases. I think something should be put in the act so that these people would know what position they were in.

Mr. DUNNING: In practice the dependents always get it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like the minister to give us an assurance of that.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is meant by dependent in that case?

Mr. DUNNING: The words are:

> "Dependent" of a contributor means and includes the father, mother, brother, sister and child of a contributor who is at the date of death of the contributor dependent upon the contributor for support.

That answers also the question of my hon. friend from Muskoka. The section I read previously uses the word "dependent."

Mr. McGIBBON: As long as it is reasonably certain that the amount of money they contribute will be returned I am satisfied.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, provided they are dependents.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister not consder striking out of the clause the words which require the civil servant to pay four per cent interest on the arrears of his contribution?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. NEILL: That is the condition in which the government originally passed the act, and presumably the government feel the same way about it to-night. It was changed in the Senate, but perhaps the Senate would be more inclined to accept it now.

Mr. ROBB: This brings it into harmony with the act as passed by the Senate last year, and I would like it to go through in this shape. I do not want to take any chances.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does that money go back to them whether the children are actually dependent or not?

Mr. DUNNING: Under this section they have to be dependent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think that is unfair. I daresay thousands of men have come under that provision in the act; they have been forced for ten or twenty years to contribute five per cent of their earnings, and when they die the money cannot be collected for their children.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh no.

Mr. McGIBBON: Am I wrong?

Mr. DUNNING: I can only quote the law to my hon. friend:

"Dependent of a contributor" means and includes a father, mother, brother, sister or child of a contributor who at the date of death of the contributor is dependent upon the contributor for support.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is the point I make; it spoils the whole thing. You take part of a man's estate, and although he may have children over eighteen years of age that he would probably want to educate, the fact that they are over that age makes it impossible.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend understands that if they are dependent upon the contributor for support, even though they are over eighteen they come within the provision.

Mr. McGIBBON: There are very few children over eighteen years of age who would benefit.

Mr. DUNNING: But there are a good many fathers and mothers.

Mr. McGIBBON: True, but a great many of them may be dead.

CIVIL SERVANTS' WIDOWS' ANNUITIES

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 232 to provide annuities for the widows of certain civil servants.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—"Contributor"—"Widow".

Mr. SPENCER: Would the chairman kindly read each section? Some members have not had time to peruse the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Chairman, may I raise my voice in favour not of the widows but of other dependents of old civil servants? I have in mind the case of a bachelor who has a sister, and should he unfortunately die, she will be left absolutely penniless. He has asked me to use my influence with the Minister of Finance to insert an amendment in the bill which would provide for the dependents of unmarried civil servants.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, we have had representations similar to that just made by His Honour the Speaker on behalf of other classes of dependents. It has taken us more than two years—as a matter of fact it is not quite complete, but complete enough for this purpose—to estimate the cost to the country of including widows in the annuity benefits, and if we are to take in bachelors' relatives and others, I say frankly to the House that I will withdraw the measure because I am not in a position to tell the country how much extra cost would be incurred.

Mr. McGIBBON: I suggest that the minister take in fishermen and miners.

Mr. ROBB: Not in this bill.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, if I understand the situation correctly, this is an enlargement of the provisions already in force. Will the minister explain the bill a little more fully so that we may have a better grasp of its purpose?

Mr. ROBB: I will present the memorandum which I have here in explanation of the bill:

This bill provides for the payment of annuities to widows of contributors to superannuation funds Nos. 1 and 2 who died in service or after superannuation.

Any contributor to those funds who remained in the service after July 19, 1924, was eligible to transfer to the new fund, which provides for annuities to widows of contributors to the fund who die in service or after superannuation.

If, on such transfer, the contributors do not make good the difference between the contributions actually made to the old funds and five per cent, the rate required under the new act, the widow's allowance is one-fourth of the husband's allowance.

This proportion has been taken as the basis for the allowance to widows under this bill. The bill provides for annuities to widows equal to one-fourth the allowance the husband received or would have received if he had been retired at the date of his death.

Mr. MANION: If a man in the civil service pays money into any superannuation fund, is it not paid back to his dependents after his death?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know of any cases where that is not done.

Mr. MANION: I have had a number of complaints at different times of men who have paid into the superannuation fund for several years, but on their death the money has not been applied for the benefit of their relatives. It seems to me that under no circumstances should money so paid into the superannuation fund be kept back from the relatives.

Mr. ROBB: Where there are dependent relatives they always get the money.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister state from what source the funds for these annuities will come?

Mr. ROBB: This will come out of the consolidated revenue fund. The estimated total cost this year is about $105,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If a widower dies leaving a family all over the age of eighteen, do his children receive anything out of the fund, or has he simply been paying into the fund out of his salary without any prospect of compensation so far as his dependents are concerned?

Mr. ROBB: This has nothing to do with the fund. My hon. friend was not following me when I read the memorandum as to those who were eligible under this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am merely asking a question as to the position of a widower under the present superannuation act. If he dies there is no widow to get the money and if his children are all over eighteen it would appear that his contributions go for nothing.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is conflicting this with the old act.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Remarriage.

Mr. CANTLEY: I take it that the Treasury Board is to constitute itself censor of the morals of widows.

Mr. ROBB: No, but someone must stand up for the taxpayers, including my hon. friend, who pays taxes. There must be some board to determine in these cases who should be entitled to come under the act. This makes provision for those who remarry. Surely my hon. friend does not want the country to pay everybody in the land indiscriminately.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, but I believe in the country carrying out its contracts.

Mr. BROWN: Judging by the remarks that are made here, and by what was said by civil servants who appeared before the committee when we were drawing up this measure, the idea seems to prevail that we are building up an estate for people to leave to whomsoever they please. That is not the case. It is intended to provide for the declining years of civil servants and their immediate dependents. Once let us free our minds of the notion that we are creating estates for civil servants to dispose of as they please, and we shall get rid of some of the difficulties that appear to worry us about seeming injustices to people who do not get back all the money they put in. This legislation is intended to relieve distress under certain conditions and not to build up estates.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed, from March 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 172, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. Euler—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the House was last in committee on this bill section 15 was under consideration.

Mr. EULER: On the last occasion an objection was raised to the fact that the amount of $200 provided for in this section might be regarded as including the duty. My colleague the Postmaster General has an amendment to move in this regard.

Mr. VENIOT: I move that section 15 be amended to read:

(a) If the value for duty of the goods is under $200, be further liable on summary conviction before two justices of the peace to a penalty not exceeding $200 and not less than $50, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment; and

(b) If the value for duty of the goods is $200 or over, be guilty of an indictable offence and liable on conviction to a fine of $500, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than one year; or to both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BROWN: I think that "dutiable value" would be a happier expression.

Mr. VENIOT: No, the term used is the usual customs term.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 15 as amended carry?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before it is carried I think I can express the regret of a good many hon. members on this side that the minister in charge of this bill has surrendered.

Mr. EULER: To whom?

Mr. GUTHRIE: To some of his own followers, after the rather courageous stand which he took in this House when the bill was last under discussion.

Mr. EULER: I made this suggestion the other night when the bill was under discussion. The only actual change made is with regard to the value for duty.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee will remember that when the bill was last under discussion, the minister's own supporters were not prepared to accept the measure in the form in which the government presented it to the House. I believe that the bill as printed and presented to the House was in the form recommended by the committee as a result of the investigation last year.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It carried out the idea of that committee and was drafted by the government to carry out their recommendation. We had the spectacle here the other evening of this bill being vigorously attacked by the government's own supporters, to such an extent in fact that the Minister of Finance, who was leading the House at the time, had to give up the fight and ask that the committee rise. Throughout a rather strenuous evening the Minister of Customs stood well to his guns and he showed some spirit and some courage. We on this side regret that he has surrendered at last and that he has come before the committee to-night with a prearranged amendment which one of his colleagues has moved reducing the penalty by providing for an alternative penalty of fine or imprisonment, or both, whereas the government's proposal originally was that the penalty for those guilty of this offence of smuggling where the value of goods was over $200 should be fine and imprisonment. I regret that the minister and the government have surrendered in this matter.

Mr. EULER: Just one word in reply to my hon. friend. He has repeated the word "surrender" quite frequently. He ought to know because he was here himself, that this very suggestion was made on the evening when this bill was debated before. Moreover I explained at that time that the word "and" was an error; that it was never intended to put the word "and" in the section and it should not be there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Such errors do not occur in government bills.

Mr. EULER: There is absolutely no surrender in any respect whatever. The bill is exactly the same as when I proposed it with the one exception that we are adding the words "value for duty" so that the duty itself will not be added to the value so far as the penalty is concerned. That is all that has been done.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have made my protest.

Mr. EULER: I wish to say to my hon. friend that I resent his suggestion that I have surrendered in any respect whatever. The bill is exactly as it was before with the exception of the addition of the words "value for duty."

Mr. MANION: Perhaps it is very far from a surrender when the minister brings in the change on Friday night when all those members who talked on the matter have left for their homes.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It is pretty nearly time that the government and the opposition both realize that the elected representatives of the people should have something to say in framing the legislation of the country.

Mr. CLARK: Did you cause the surrender?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, there has been no surrender.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In estimating the value for duty are narcotics and liquor that are smuggled included?

Mr. EULER: It includes all kinds of merchandise.

Mr. ADSHEAD: And narcotics?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Narcotics and liquor should be entirely separate.

Mr. EULER: Narcotics are dealt with under the Narcotics Act.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I understood the minister to say that they came under this law.

Mr. EULER: They come under the Customs Act as well but they are dealt with under the Narcotics Act.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The Postmaster General suggested the other night that where there was an officious officer reference was made to the department before prosecution took place. I think that is rather an objectionable system. As I remember it last year—I was not in the House but there was a good deal of election talk on the matter—there was a gentleman by the name of Moses Aziz who took part in an election campaign and was recommended to be prosecuted for smuggling liquor. His case was sent to the department and the papers were left there for several weeks because the minister was too busy to deal with them. The opposition took occasion to say it was purposely done because he was a favourite of the government. I do not say that, but I do maintain that the reference to the department of the question as to whether or not a man should be prosecuted lends itself to the accusation of patronage or favouritism in the interests of party. I really think it should be left to some independent tribunal, not connected with the department, to decide whether the man charged with smuggling should be prosecuted or not.

Mr. HEAPS: In subsection (a) those guilty of smuggling have to be tried before two justices of the peace and are liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment. That is where the value of the goods is under $200. Does the same thing apply in paragraph (b)? Will an offender under paragraph (b) be tried before two justices of the peace?

Mr. EULER: Under paragraph (b) we deal with indictable offences. If the offender so desires, instead of being tried before two justices of the peace he may be tried by a judge and jury.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister give consideration to my suggestion in regard to an independent tribunal to decide whether men charged with smuggling shall be prosecuted or not?

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member mean with regard to an amendment to this bill?

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister take the matter into consideration?

Mr. EULER: I shall be glad to do that.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—If articles not found sum equal to the value forfeited.

Mr. EULER: These clauses are all of the same nature, and we are making the same change with regard to the value for duty.

Mr. VENIOT: I move that section 16 be amended by striking out the word "and" in the third line of subparagraph (b) of subsection (2) and inserting in place thereof the word "or"; and by adding at the end of subparagraph (b) the words "or to both fine and imprisonment," and by inserting the words "for duty" after the word "value" in the first line of subparagraph (a) of subsection (2) and in the first line of subparagraph (b) of subsection (2).

Mr. EULER: This makes only this change: It makes the value for duty $200 instead of having the duty included, for instance, in the invoice price. The other change makes it optional whether the penalty is to be fine or imprisonment. That is the whole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GLEN: The first sentence of subsection (2) reads:

If the articles so forfeited or any of them are not found—

And so on. What is the meaning of these words? If the articles are not found, how will it be possible to arrive at their value?

Mr. EULER: From any other available evidence. For example, there might be invoices.

Mr. GLEN: If the minister will refer to the section that is being amended, it reads:

If any goods are imported into Canada in any vehicle, other than a railway carriage.

And so on. This is only the interpretation or elucidation of the section. Subsection 2 reads:

If the articles so forfeited or any of them are not found, the owner at the time of importation, and the importer, and every other person who has been in any way connected with the unlawful importation of such articles, shall forfeit a sum equal to the value of the articles.

Mr. EULER: You might be able to get at the books of the exporter so as to ascertain the value.

Mr. GLEN: The minister misunderstands me. Articles might be brought into Canada by some vehicle, and those articles would be forfeited, but if they are not found how can you arrive at their value? And if you cannot arrive at their value, how can you lay a prosecution under this section?

Mr. PETTIT: The value might be very small, as shown in evidence before the justice of the peace. I would suggest that the value there be the value as fixed by the government appraiser.

Mr. EULER: I would say again to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) that there are various ways of arriving at the value of the goods even if they are not found.

The man might have invoices in his possession. You might have access to the books of the man who sold him the goods. That would establish the value, but until you have some knowledge of the value you cannot of course proceed in this way.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Forfeiture of sum equal to value if goods not found.

Mr. VENIOT moved:

That section 17 be amended by striking out the word "and" in the third line of subparagraph (b) of subsection (2) and inserting in place thereof the word "or;" and by adding at the end of subparagraph (b) the words "or to both fine and imprisonment," and by inserting the words "for duty" after the word "value" in the first line of subparagraph (a) of subsection (2) and in the first line of subparagraph (b) of subsection (2).

Mr. MANION: This has the same effect as the other amendment?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY: The fourth line of paragraph (a) reads:

Not exceeding $500 and not less then $50.

Should that not be $200?

Mr. EULER: That is right.

Mr. VENIOT: I move that the word "five" be changed to "two" in the fourth line of paragraph (a).

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. QUINN: Is the same mistake not made in paragraph (b)?

Mr. EULER: No. That is correct. The offence is an indictable one.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18—Conductor and employees.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a similar amendment to be moved to this section as was made to section 17, and I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—Vessels used in conveying liable to forfeiture.

Mr. VENIOT moved:

That clause 19 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "offence" in the fifth line of subsection 3 of proposed section 196, and inserting in place thereof the following: "to a fine of five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than one year, or to both fine and imprisonment," and by inserting the words "for duty" after the word "value" in the ninth line of subsection 2 and in the third line of subsection 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 20—Procuring persons to assist in smuggling.

Mr. EULER: This section deals with the procurer. As it stands here, the procurer is regarded as a greater offender than the smuggler himself. That would not be fair. and we are going to recast this section in such a way that the procurer will be punishable in exactly the same way as the smuggler himself.

Mr. VENIOT: I move:

That section twenty be amended by striking out all the words after the word "customs" in the sixth line of proposed section one hundred and ninety-seven, and inserting in place thereof the following:—shall

"(a) If the value for duty of the goods is under two hundred dollars, be liable on sum mary conviction before two justices of the peace to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars for every person so procured, hired or induced, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment, and,

(b) If the value for duty of the goods is two hundred dollars or over, be guilty of a indictable offence and liable on conviction to a fine of five hundred dollars for every person so procured, hired or induced, or to imprisor ment for a term not exceeding seven years and not less than one year, or to both fine and imprisonment."

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does that mean that he shall be liable for a term of one year and not less than one month for every offence? From the way the amendment has been read I take it that the fine is for every offence, but that there is only one single term of imprisonment provided for. I think the intention probably was to make the punishment imprisonment for every offence.

Mr. EULER: If one person procures half a dozen other people there is only one term of imprisonment, and that is for the procurer.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There will be six fines, but only one term of imprisonment for the procurer if he is found guilty? I think that is hardly fair. If a procurer induces three persons to smuggle goods across, he may be fined by the courts $600 or not less than $150, if he is proven guilty, but as against that he can only be given a sentence up to twelve months and not less than one month. It might be more profitable for him to take the imprisonment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. EULER: Section 23 has not been carried, Mr. Chairman.

On section 23—Placing dutiable goods in building upon the boundary line.

Mr. VENIOT: I move to insert the word "or" in place of the word "and" in the twenty-fourth line, page 9 of the bill.

Mr. MANION: Was this a mistake of the draftsman using the word "and" instead of "or" all through the bill?

Mr. EULER: Yes, it was the intention to make the punishment optional, but the bill was drafted the other way. That was in the mind of the draftsman, but not in the mind of the minister.

Mr. MANION: The minister is sincere about that?

Mr. EULER: Quite so.

Mr. MANION: He actually looks it.

Mr. EULER: I stated that the other evening when the question first came up. I read the explanation which had been placed in my hand, and which stated that it was within the discretion of the court to inflict either fine or imprisonment or both, and hon. members behind me found fault with that and said: No, it is obligatory on the court to inflict imprisonment. I was surprised, and when the House met after eight o'clock I made the explanation that it was not so intended, and it certainly was not, according to the information I gave the House before we rose at six. We are making these changes all through the bill to conform exactly with the intention in the first place. There is no surrender.

Mr. MANION: The minister made so many explanations that we cannot be expected to remember them all. However, if my hon. friend from Melfort, who found most complaint, is satisfied, I do not see why we should complain about it over here.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I was simply trying to make this bill more workable, more efficient, so that the country could be rid so far as possible of smuggling. I can tell my hon. friend that I and my constituency are not interested in smuggling, for two reasons: We do not believe in it, in the first place, and we are too far away from the border. My intention in speaking the other night was simply to make the bill more workable, because if you make the penalties too severe, such as the justices will not care to inflict, your object is defeated. That was experienced in Ontario in connection with the Ontario Temperance Act. Magistrates would not send their neighbours to gaol for breaches of the law. The hon. member for Fort William will realize in the near future that if his law and regulations have not the sympathy of the magistrates, the law will not be given effect to. That was the only purpose I had in speaking the other night. It was to help the minister draft a law that would be satisfactory.

Mr. MANION: I wish to congratulate my hon. friend from Melfort and the Minister of Customs. They both seem to be satisfied tonight.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister give us some information about section 21?

Mr. EULER: That was passed the last time the bill was before the House.

On section 25—Being on board of smuggling vessel.

Mr. EULER: I move that section 25 be struck out. There is no necessity for it.

Mr. MANION: Is this part of the retreat?

Mr. EULER: No. We had thought of making every person found on board a boat carrying smuggled goods prove he was innocent of smuggling. Perhaps it is going a little too far, and I am willing to have the section struck out.

Mr. MANION: We have learned that people on boats are not always guilty.

Motion agreed to.

On section 37—Counsel fees.

Mr. EULER: I move to strike out this section. It merely has reference to fixing counsel fees in the discretion of the court, and has nothing whatever to do with smuggling.

Mr. MANION: Have you any more lawyers you wish to appoint as counsel?

Motion agreed to.

On section 38—Maximum penalty.

Mr. EULER: I move that we strike out subsection 2 of 285A section 38. That deals with the powers of magistrates to suspend sentence. We thought it was a little severe. We are quite willing to leave it to the judges whether a sentence be suspended or not.

Mr. MANION: It has been suggested that instead of imposing a penalty for the offence we should give a medal to those who get through with it.

Mr. EULER: Will my hon. friend donate one?

Motion agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 39—Distribution of proceeds.

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

That all the words after the word "repealed" in the nineteenth line to the word "forfeiture" in the twenty-sixth line be struck out.

Mr. EULER: I ask the committee not to insist on this amendment. It deals with the matter of informers and the paying of informers. There is great difficulty in getting these informers to work if they do not receive their pay quickly after giving the information. It is most unfortunate that we have to use these men, but it is necessary. This has particular reference to the matter of informing in regard to the smuggling of liquor, and it usually becomes advisable for the informer not to remain in the neighbourhood long after he gives the information, yet he ought to be paid.

Mr. HEAPS: Were we not informed that the person who lays the information respecting the smuggling of liquor receives no money at all?

Mr. EULER: If the liquor is sold he certainly gets his share of the proceeds.

Mr. HEAPS: The liquor or the cash?

Amendment (Mr. Woodsworth) negatived.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 235, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

[Mr. Euler.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Mr. MANION: Does this bill cover all the amendments that it is intended to make to the Canada Grain Act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 226 relating to the harbour of St. John in the province of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, after some conversation with the Minister of Railways I understood that his was the first bill to come up to-night and that none of these harbour bills would be dealt with. The members interested have, I think, left the chamber on that understanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend does not wish to proceed with this bill we can take up another, but I may say to him that the bill dealing with the Halifax harbour is almost verbatim et literatim with this, and we thought that if we could get through one of them to-night we might save that much time.

Mr. MANION: If the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has no objection, and the Prime Minister is agreeable, we might dispose of this bill with the exception of one clause, for I think the member for St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren) would like to be present before the measure is finally disposed of. Maybe the minister in charge of the bill can give us an explanation of its purpose.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, this bill is simply to incorporate the harbour commission of St. John along the same lines as the harbour commissions of Montreal and Vancouver, and it contains practically the same clauses as are in the acts relating to those two harbours. We might proceed with the bill, and if it contains anything which is not satisfactory to my hon. friend we can reserve it to be dealt with when we reach the third reading. I may say that the bill has been submitted to the city council of St. John and they have accepted it.

Mr. MANION: I do not doubt at all what the minister says, but I should like the member for St. John to state his views. I observe that he is here now.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the mayor and city council of St. John are willing to accept the bill as drawn.

Mr. VENIOT: I might add that recently I had an interview here with representatives of the city council of St. John and they are favourable to the bill. Besides that, the mayor has wired me that he is perfectly satisfied with its terms. There is necessity for immediate action on the adoption of this bill because the legislature of the province is sitting, and should this bill pass they will have to enact legislation empowering the city of St. John to conduct a plebiscite under its act of incorporation. If there is no serious objection to any of the clauses, it would be well to put the bill through to-night so that the legislature could be advised on Monday and proceed with their legislation.

Mr. MacLAREN: I trust that we will proceed with the bill now. There are many urgent reasons for putting the bill through at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. HANSON: I am quite agreeable to the passage of the bill. I was simply waiting until the members directly interested were in their seats. The city of St. John owns a very substantial amount of harbour property. Is there any provision in the bill for taking it over? If so, at what price?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, at an agreed price of $2,135,000.

Mr. JELLIFF: I have not had an opportunity to look over the bill. Will the control of grain operations fall under the jurisdiction of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. CARDIN: That is my information.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the regulations they have power to make any rules for handling the traffic of the port.

Mr. HANSON: I am anxious to see this bill pass, but the success or failure of the harbour under a commission will depend very largely on the cost to be borne by the traffic going through the port. Does this bill provide that the tolls or rates to be charged by the harbour commission shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. JELLIFF: I should like an answer to my inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CARDIN: My understanding is that the grain traffic in the local elevators will be under the control of the grain board.

Mr. SPENCER: Are the tolls charged by the harbour commission subject to approval by the governor in council?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, the tolls have to be approved.

Mr. SPENCER: Is that the case with regard to the Vancouver harbour board?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the case with all harbours.

Mr. KELLNER: I do not think the Vancouver harbour commission is under the jurisdiction of the department so far as the operation of elevators is concerned. The tariffs charged by the elevators are not subject to the approval of the governor in council and when any change is required it is simply referred to the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is speaking of the grain elevators?

Mr. KELLNER: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is different from the harbour commission. In that particular case the elevators are operated by the harbour board. Of course, tolls charged by the elevators are subject to the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. HANSON: Is it the general policy to confer powers of expropriation upon harbour commissions? Powers of expropriation are extreme, and I see by section 13 that this power is conferred on the corporation. I appreciate the fact that it may be necessary, but in such legislation passed in the province of New Brunswick it is customary where this power is granted to make it subject to the approval of the lieutenant governor in council. Of course, if that is not the practice in Dominion legislation I have no objection, but if this is a departure I think the approval of the governor in council should be required.

Mr. CARDIN: This provision appears in the other acts. It involves capital expenditure which of course must be passed on by the governor in council.

Mr. HANSON: I appreciate that, but it is hardly the point I make.

Mr. BELL (St. John): An understanding has been arrived at, I believe, between the city of St. John and the minister, and the terms of the bill as presented are quite satisfactory. I should however like to make a suggestion here with regard to tolls. I have been asked by the city council to find out whether it would be possible for the government to consider including in the bill the following provision:

Rates, tolls and charges for the conduct of business shall not at present be imposed in excess of those now in force and such rates, tolls and charges shall be fixed from time to time so as to enable the port of Saint John to compete successfully with other ports and places on the Atlantic seaboard in the United States of America or elsewhere.

Mr. CARDIN: It would not be practical to fix the rates, which must depend upon the circumstances of the port. If we fixed the rates by statute we should be obliged to come back to parliament to make such changes as might be found necessary. The rates are determined by the commission and submitted to the governor in council for approval, and that I think is the proper way to deal with the matter.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand that the provisions of this bill are similar to those in other acts relating to harbour commissions.

Mr. CARDIN: Absolutely.

Mr. VENIOT: The rates will be fixed by the port of St. John, in whom the city council will have faith.

Mr. BELL (St. John): I do not think there is any desire on the part of the city to introduce any contentious question. In the past there has been some trouble in the matter of rates and the city council would like to have something definite enacted in this regard. However, if that is not possible the bill as drawn will be satisfactory. I do not bring the question up for the purpose of criticizing the bill.

Mr. CARDIN: This bill is framed to meet the recommendations of the Duncan commission, before whom representatives of St. John appeared and gave evidence. As regards the rates to be charged, I think we may safely leave this matter to the harbour commission; they will undoubtedly look after the interests of the port of St. John. The commission will comprise men residing in the locality and taking a special interest in the development of the port, and it is only natural to assume that they will frame their schedule in such a way as to attract trade to the port. It is much better, I think, to leave the matter to a commission of local men rather than to officers residing in Ottawa. We should have some confidence in the men who are to be appointed as commissioners and we can safely rely on them.

[Mr. T. Bell.]

Mr. BELL (St. John): That explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON: The minister will agree that the success or failure of the traffic through the port will depend on whether the tolls are reasonable or excessive.

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly.

Mr. HANSON: And naturally the rates will be made as attractive as possible. I have no further objection to offer.

Mr. GARDINER: With reference to the question raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge, as to whether any elevators that may be established will come under the grain commissioners, I would remind the minister that in 1925 when the new grain act went through —I am speaking from memory of course— provision was made for putting all harbour commission elevators under the control of that board. It may be necessary to include in this bill a section putting in the same category the elevators in this case. I will look up the act of 1925 and in the meantime perhaps the minister will let this section stand.

Mr. CARDIN: On the third reading of the bill we can deal with my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. GARDINER: That will be satisfactory.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Harbour limits defined.

Mr. HANSON: Are there any parts of the harbour that are exempted?

Mr. CARDIN: None excepting the ferry landing and certain lots for fishing purposes.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Expropriation of land.

Mr. HANSON: Is not the expropriation power given to the corporation in this section too wide? If the power to expropriate is made subject to the approval of the governor in council I shall be perfectly satisfied. In New Brunswick it has not been customary to grant such power to private corporations or public corporations without the consent of the governor in council. That is the only suggestion I have to make with regard to this clause.

Mr. CARDIN: The clause as framed is practically a reproduction of the clause which appears in the statutes relating to other harbour commissions. We thought it would not be fair to place the harbour commission of St. John in a different position from that of other harbour commissions.

Mr. HANSON: Well, I have thrown out the suggestion.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 to 32 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the preamble is carried I would ask if there should not be a provision in the bill for an annual audit of accounts of the harbour board?

Mr. CARDIN: There is already provision for an audit in the Revenue and Audit Act. My hon. friend will also find that there is provision in one of the clauses for an officer of the Marine and Fisheries department making an investigation and audit of the books and affairs of the harbour commission. I think therefore, that the question of an audit is already adequately provided for. However, the matter can be raised again on the third reading of the bill if my hon. friend deems it necessary to take that course.

Mr. GARDINER: It is quite proper that an officer of the department should make an independent audit, but what I had reference to more particularly was the desirability of an annual audit. If the minister will find out whether these harbour commissions come under the Audit Act and will let us know when the bill comes up for third reading, I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. CARDIN: I can state to my hon. friend now that they do come under the Audit Act.

Mr. GARDINER: There is another point I may as well bring forward at this particular time, and that is that members of the House should have a little more information with regard to the financial standing of these harbour commissions, which are very important bodies having the control of public property. But we do not get any reports from them as to their financial condition and how they carry on their business. I would suggest to the minister that it might be advisable to supply hon. members with a copy of the annual statement of the different harbour commissions so that we can get in better touch with the business they are doing. I am satisfied that would save a good deal of trouble both to the minister and to the commisioners themselves. If we are in possesion of full information on these matters we would probably not be so suspicious as we are sometimes inclined to be.

Mr. CARDIN: I think it is already provided that information of the character asked for shall be supplied to members of the House.

Mr. GARDINER: In that case I shall only ask that the minister ascertain whether an audit is provided for under the Audit Act and give us that information when the motion for third reading is made.

Mr. CARDIN: I feel sure that provision for an audit of the accounts of harbour commissions is made in the Audit Act, but I will ascertain beyond doubt and inform my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON: Is it an independent audit or a departmental audit?

Mr. CARDIN: It is made by the Board of Audit which has been created to carry out work of that character.

Mr. HANSON: If that is so it should be satisfactory.

Mr. CARDIN: I think there is an error in section 25 which I have just noticed. It is provided that the corporation may "in the following cases seize and detain any vessel within the limits of the province of Nova Scotia". That is manifestly an error.

Mr. HANSON: In my copy of the bill it is "New Brunswick".

Mr. CARDIN: My copy is wrong then.

Mr. MacLAREN: In my copy it reads "within the limits of the province of New Brunswick".

Mr. CARDIN: Then the error has been corrected in other copies of the bill.

Mr. HANSON: May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that the bay of Fundy is partly within the province of New Brunswick and partly within the province of Nova Scotia and that it has been looked upon as a mare clausum. Has the minister given any consideration to that matter? I am just suggesting it for his consideration.

Mr. CARDIN: I will give consideration to that point.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. CARDIN moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: It was understood that this bill would not be read a third time to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

Motion stands.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 62, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credits for farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: Are these amendments satisfactory to the minister?

Mr. ROBB: The bill as it passed the House of Commons was identical with the bill which passed the House of Commons last year, with the exception of two small amendments, one in section 5 subsection (2), in which the shares of the board are declared to be non-transferable. The amendment in the House of Commons was to insert after the word "transferable" the words "except at the option of the board." The bill, as it comes back to the House for concurrence is in exactly the same form as the bill which was concurred in by the House last year, with the exception of the provision for recognition of colonization societies, and this was an amendment made by the House of Commons itself.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 230, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to determine fair price.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister explain the last paragraph in section 2?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. ROBB: In some cases companies have set up subsidiary organizations to whom they sell their products, and taxes are paid on values lower than the fair market price. The present section is designed to protect our revenues against this.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Regulations.

Mr. MANION: Before we go on with this bill, might I suggest to the minister that the ex-Minister of Finance, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is not present. I have no particular objection to this bill going on provided that we report progress on the last clause and, if necessary, allow any discussion on the last clause when the bill comes before the committee again. Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. ROBB: That will be all right.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Trustees, assignees, executors, et cetera, to obtain certificate that all charges are paid before distribution.

Mr. MANION: This is the clause that is to be held up. I believe the bill regarding the Halifax harbour commissioners is to go through, and then I think we shall have done a fairly good day's work.

Progress reported.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 225, respecting the Halifax Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. GARDINER: These two bills respecting the harbour commissions at Halifax and St. John are not exactly the same. Will the minister explain the difference?

Mr. CARDIN: They are exactly the same except that in the case of St. John, the harbour was under the control of the city, was city property, and we had to assume certain obligations of the city of St. John. That was not the case in Halifax. That is the only difference.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Borrowing powers.

Mr. GARDINER: I notice that in this bill, as in the other one, we are granting certain borrowing powers. Does that mean that the commission will have power to float bonds and debentures, or will they have to come to this House just like the other commissions when they want to borrow money?

Mr. CARDIN: Everything they borrow has to be approved by the governor in council. They can borrow money and give as a guarantee the revenue of the port, but all subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this a similar section to that contained in the other acts?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: It is to give the governor in council an opportunity of looking over the proposed borrowings, and probably to keep the commissioners from landing into the mess the Vancouver harbour commissioners got into?

Mr. CARDIN: We have the power to stop any borrowing.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Powers of corporation not to be restricted by provincial statutes.

Mr. MacNUTT: This section says:

Notwithstanding anything contained in any act of the late province of Nova Scotia or of the new province of Nova Scotia—

Might I ask what is meant by the late province of Nova Scotia and the new province?

Mr. CARDIN: That relates to certain by-laws which have been passed by the city of Halifax with the authorization of the provincial government.

Section agreed to.

Section 29 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume the minister will give the same understanding here with regard to the elevators being brought under the grain commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one order here for the consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 61, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act. The government is prepared to accept those amendments. and if hon. gentlemen opposite have no objections we might take that up now.

Mr. MANION: I do not think it will take any time at the next sitting of the House. I myself would not object but there are some members who are not present now who might wish to discuss them.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.27 p.m.

Monday, April 4, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move:

That on and after Tuesday, the 5th of April, 1927, until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m. there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Will my right hon. friend consider the suggestion of including Saturday next in that motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought of holding that in reserve for the present until we see what progress we make by meeting in the morning on and after to-morrow.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I would like on behalf of this part of the House to protest against this motion. Various very important committees are sitting this week right until next Friday, and many of us would like to be in the House and in the committee at the same time. This of course is impossible. It seems to me that if the work is so pressing or if we are so anxious to get away from this parliament, we are not justified, when some of us ought to be attending committees, in starting morning sitttings. For that reason I hope the House will not accept the motion.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister that the House, instead of meeting at eleven o'clock in the morning, meet at two o'clock in the afternoon. That would be a difference of just one hour and I think we would get through just as much business. Every possible effort is being made by members on the opposition benches to assist the government and to facilitate business. In view of that and in view of the rate at which we are getting through business, I see no reason for starting morning sessions at this particular time. Every member has a great deal of work to do other than attending the sessions of the House, and if a member has to sit in the chamber from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven at night it is impossible for him to do justice to his work. If the Prime Minister would take into consideration sitting at two o'clock in the afternoon, we would get through business just as well as by sitting in the morning.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): If I had any assurance that we would have to sit only from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night, I would not feel so strongly against this resolution. I have a clear recollection of the last weeks of the previous session when, although we started at eleven o'clock in the morning, we sometimes had to sit in this chamber until six o'clock the following morning. If I were sure that this motion would accomplish the end which we have in view I would not oppose it. On Tuesday last we sat here from three o'clock in the afternoon until five minutes to midnight so that three hon. gentlemen could each make a speech. I do not know how those hon. gentlemen are going to get along when we apply the new rule limiting them to forty minutes. We have spent four days in discussing the Imperial conference report and we have not yet arrived at a decision. As a matter of fact there was no motion before the House to discuss except the motion to go into committee of supply.

I want to voice a protest against what appears to be unreasonable haste to wind up this session. Last year along about the 1st of July I stated in this House that I wanted to go home and many members made a good deal of fun at my expense because I used that expression. I still want to go home when the business of the House is concluded; but last year when I made that statement parliament had been sitting for about six months. This year parliament has been sitting not quite two months. One reason why I am rising in protest against this motion is because I have received numerous telegrams from ex-service men's associations throughout Canada protesting against parliament proroguing in such a hurry and using that as an excuse for not bringing in some further legislation dealing with ex-service men's problems. Might I quote one sentence from a letter written to me recently by Mr. Lapp, superintendent of the service bureau of the Canadian Legion? He said:

> The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League now appeals to you in the name of those who were disabled by war service and the dependents of those whose breadwinners gave their lives in the service of Canada, to remain on duty at your seat in the House of Commons of Canada for a sufficient length of time to fully consider these matters.

Many other members have been receiving similar telegrams, and I say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the House and of the government that it really does not look quite right for this House to make such an effort to conclude its sittings this week. While I am very anxious to return home whenever the work of the session is completed, I do not think any hon. member can contradict me when I say that if this House prorogues this week or even by Wednesday night of the following week, the estimates must be put through in a manner that will not permit proper consideration.

Mr. MANION: As they always are.

Mr. COOTE: My hon. friend says, "as they always are." I think that is a good argument for something I have often urged in this House, and that is that the estimates be sent to a select committee for consideration, but I have never been able to get the House to adopt that suggestion. I do not suppose that I shall be able to prevent this House sitting morning, afternoon and evening, or even all night, if it wants to do it, but I simply want to make my protest as a member of the House.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I should not be doing what I deem to be my duty if I let this opportunity pass without a reference to one question which concerns me so far as it relates to the adjournment of the House, and that is in connection with soldier legislation. I too have received communications of various kinds, and I have felt, and I feel, that the responsibility is really upon the government for not having brought down this legislation some time ago, and they should not give as an excuse now for not bringing it down the desire on the part of members for an early close of the session. As far as I am concerned, and I believe that a great many other hon. members feel the same way, for the fellows and the dependents of those who spent four years in the trenches in France on our behalf, we can well afford to spend one day or four days or a week or a month, if need be, to deal with any soldier legislation that may be necessary, especially in view of the shortness of this session. In that respect, therefore I protest, and I say that the government should deal with that legislation, and should not offer as an excuse for not doing so the desire for an early prorogation of the House.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can assure my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Ladner) that the government's desire in the matter of closing at a certain date has nothing whatever to do with its decision with respect to legislation relating to the returned soldiers. The Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King) made a statement to the House last week in which he gave the reasons why the government thought it inadvisable to amend that act this year beyond the one or two amendments that the minister mentioned would be brought in. I can assure my hon. friend, having regard to the number and character of the representations the minister has received, it would not be possible for the government, even if we were to be here for another month, to arrive at a decision different from that already reached in regard to those particular phases of legislation respecting returned soldiers.

I would say to my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), who spoke of sitting late at night, that I do not think he will find anyone on this side of the House, certainly not on the government benches, who will desire any more than he does to sit up after eleven at night or midnight. The purpose of starting in the morning at eleven o'clock is if possible to get through by eleven o'clock at night, rather than running on until two or three o'clock in the morning. There does appear to be a general desire on the part of all members of the House, as far as I have been able to gather, to conclude the business by the Easter recess.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We may not be able to do that, but I think if we begin the morning sittings at once, we shall very soon ascertain whether we can or not, and it is with that purpose in view that the government has introduced this motion, which I hope the House will accept.

Mr. COOTE: Would the Prime Minister then be good enough to accommodate hon. members who may be attending some committee of the House when some item in which they are interested comes up, by postponing consideration of it until they can be here?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is an entirely reasonable request. I might say that the government will endeavour in every way to meet the convenience of members of the House, and if they will just speak to the whips we will seek to have the business so arranged as to best suit the convenience of all.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

REPEAL OF PROVISION FOR DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN CLASSES

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 269, to amend the Immigration Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker, this is the same bill that passed the House last session but failed to pass the Senate. I think the purpose of the bill will be best explained by reading the section of the Immigration Act which it is proposed to repeal. This bill repeals section 41 of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1910, as enacted by chapter 26 of the statutes of 1919. The repealed section reads as follows:

41. Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or Canada, or any of the provinces of Canada, or the government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada, by force or by threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes, and shall be liable to deportation in the manner provided by this act, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof and of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein any such person may be, forthwith to send a written complaint to the minister, giving full particulars: Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

2. Proof that any person belonged to or was within the description of any of the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of this section at any time since the fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, shall, for all the purposes of this act be deemed to establish prima facie that he still belongs to such prohibited or undesirable class or classes.

I might add that we are repealing section 41 because section 40 of the Immigration Act really covers all that is necessary in regard to sedition and similar offences against the state.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

VOTING BY TEACHERS AND STUDENTS

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 270, to amend the Dominion Elections Act (Voting by teachers and students).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BANCROFT: This bill seeks to amend paragraph (c) of section 29 of the Dominion Elections Act, which reads as follows:

Who has ordinarily resided in Canada for at least twelve months and in the electoral district wherein such person seeks to vote for at least two months immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election.

As the election writs are usually issued about two months before election day, the present act disfranchises all persons who change their places of residence during four months immediately preceding the date of an election.

School teachers begin their duties about September 1st and students in the higher institutions about October 1st.

Every federal election since 1896 has been held during the fall months. All teachers and students who, in following their respective duties, change their place of residence at the beginning of the school year, are disfranchised under the present act.

This amendment exempts teachers and students from paragraph (c) of section 29, provided that they can satisfy the registrar that they are otherwise qualified to have their names placed on the voters' list.

This amendment affects approximately 61,000 teachers and 120,000 students.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

BLASPHEMOUS LIBELS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 271, to amend the Criminal Code (Blasphemous libels).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVORCE COURT—ONTARIO

Hon. G. B. JONES (Royal) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 256, (from the Senate), to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and annulment of marriage.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BOYS:

1. How many estates of bankrupts have paid fifty cents on the dollar or over?
2. How many have paid less than fifty cents?
3. How many bankrupts have received a discharge since the introduction of the act?

Hon. Mr. CANNON:

1, 2 and 3. The Minister of Justice has no information.

DAIRY CATTLE IN CANADA

Mr. CAYLEY:

1. What is the number of dairy cattle in Canada?
2. What proportion are pure breds?
3. What is the average yield of milk per cow if known?
4. What is the estimated cost to carry a cow for one year?
5. What is the probable value of her products for a year?
6. Has the government any policies in effect looking to the improving of this situation; if so, what are these policies?
7. How many inspectors are employed throughout Canada in R.O.P. work among dairy cattle?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the number of milch cows in Canada for 1926 was 3,951,335.

2. Approximately 1.7 per cent.

3. The annual production of the average dairy cows is estimated at 4,000 pounds; the average production of cows supervised under the cow testing system of the Dominion Live Stock branch for the last five years is 5,924 pounds milk—(eight months period); the average mature record of pure bred cows of the various breeds entered in the record of performance in 1925 was 11,175 pounds.

4. The feed cost of a dairy cow, as fed on the average farm, for one year would be between $50 and $60.

5. The average value of products per cow is approximately $60 per annum, on the basis of $1.50 per hundredweight for milk.

6. Yes. The Canadian record of performance system, under which production records of pure bred herds are supervised by the department. Inspectors visit the herds with reasonable frequency about eight times per year. The inspector stays for two days on each occasion; checks the weights recorded; makes the butter fat test for each cow entered, and reports milk yield recorded at the time of his visit in comparison with that recorded during the days immediately preceding. The herd owner obtains information of great value to him regarding the merits of all the cows in his herd as a result of these tests. The primary purpose of the work is to provide production credentials for the dams of dairy bulls, and under this system, a policy of advanced registration of dairy bulls based on the record of performance test is in operation.

7. At present the number of inspectors on the record of performance staff is 41, but the staff is being increased by ten additional inspectors.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS—COMPENSATION

Mr. LUCAS:

1. In what year were the first cattle slaughtered in Canada for bovine tuberculosis?

2. What total number of cattle have been slaughtered in Canada for bovine tuberculosis to December 31, 1926?

3. What total amount of compensation has been paid for cattle slaughtered in Canada for bovine tuberculosis to December 31, 1926?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. The first cattle destroyed in Canada for tuberculosis by the Dominion Department of Agriculture were slaughtered in the fiscal year 1915-16.

2. By the Dominion Department of Agriculture, 73,609.

3. $4,190,574.51.

CONFERENCE ON HOG INDUSTRY

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Does the Minister of Agriculture propose calling a commission to discuss the swine policy of the Dominion?

2. If so, when, and why is such a conference necessary?

3. Have the invitations for a conference gone out? If so, to whom, and has any provision been made for members of parliament for representation at the conference?

4. What will the conference aim to accomplish for the hog raisers and hog feeders?

5. Have the packers submitted a report to the minister or to the department on the present marketing situation? If so, will the minister lay a copy of this report on the table of the House?

6. When was the conference held at which it was decided to pay the ten per cent premium, and was it understood at this conference that the ten per cent premium would be permanent?

7. In view of the official statement by the government some time ago to the effect that bacon grading would be placed under government regulations, what has been done to develop such regulations both in regard to bacon for export and for distribution to the retail trade of Canada?

8. Are any experiments being conducted or is a definite study of the system of distribution in Canada under way at the moment which would likely provide information for the further development of a bacon policy in Canada provided fixed differentials have to be discontinued?

9. Have the packers been active in endeavouring to popularize the discontinuance of the ten per cent premium?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.

2. (a) The conference is called for April 22 and 23. (b) In view of the fact that the agreement between the packers, the producers and the departments of agriculture was arrived at in a general conference, it has seemed to the Department of Agriculture to be advisable to call a similar conference to further discuss the whole situation, in view of the packers having given notice that they propose to discontinue the payment of the ten per cent premium.

3. Yes, the invitations were sent to the following:

4. The conference will be invited to consider the future of the hog industry, having in mind its continued improvement and its present relation to world markets.

5. (a) Yes. (b) A copy of this report is attached.

6. (a) The original swine conference was called on November 2nd and 3rd, 1921. (b) The resolution as passed at the 1921 conference reads as follows:

Resolved that all interests represented at the conference agree that the future of the Canadian hog industry depends upon the production in Canada of select bacon hogs, and declare themselves unreservedly for the principle that a minimum premium of ten per cent should be paid for hogs suitable for the production of Wiltshire bacon.

There was considerable discussion about the permanence of the premium on the part of producers' representatives, the opinion being voiced that it might be temporary. Following this discussion Mr. Fox of the Wm. Davies Company made the statement in discussing the matter that he saw "no reason why the premium should not be permanent." Another statement made by Mr. Fox was " I myself have no doubt that it is going to last indefinitely." Following Mr. Fox's remarks Mr. McLean, Harris Abattoir Company stated as follows: "The most important thing that Mr. Fox said in supporting the resolution was that our interest at any rate lies along the line of this being not for six months or a year but forever." Following this discussion an opportunity was given to the packers to express themselves individually. The packers intimated that they were in accord with the motion. It was then put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

7. Tentative plans were outlined some three years ago with the view to providing for the official grading of bacon for export, but for reasons which seemed good at the time, these were not put into effect. With regard to the retail trade in Canada no official action has been taken in this direction.

8. Informal investigations of this subject have been made.

9. No information.

Copy of Packers' Statement Submitted at Recent Meeting of Packers' Representatives, Joint Swine Committee and Government Officials

At a conference of all parties interested, held in November of 1921, plans were made to encourage the production of the kind of hogs required to supply the British market with the best quality of bacon.

Two specific actions were agreed upon, the one interlocking with the other. The first was that market hogs should be divided into grades by Dominion government graders. The second was that where differences in price were paid for the various grades such differences should be on a minimum basis of ten per cent of the grade of "select bacon" hogs over the second grade, the "thick smooth" hogs. Thus the "thick smooth" grade became the basic grade for pricing purposes. Price differentials for the other grades were left to market conditions to establish. The policies adopted were, of course, purely experimental, no one having exact knowledge of how they would work out in practice. The understandings arrived at could not then, and cannot now, be looked upon as being permanent.

As the policy was put into operation two big factors began to emerge that complicated the carrying out of the understanding.

1. It had been hoped that the premium of 10 per cent was to be a minimum premium and that it would be widened. But as the general quality of the hogs improved the difference in value between the "select" and the "thick smooth" grade narrowed instead of widening, owing to the better quality of the latter grade. Thus, whereas in the beginning there was a wide difference in value between the average quality of the "thick smooth" grade and the "select" which might have justified the 10 per cent premium the improvement of the "thick smooth" grade tended to narrow the difference in value to a point below 10 per cent. The premium which we believe was always recognized as an artificial and arbitrary figure adopted for the purpose of encouraging improvement became more artificial as time went on.

2. It was found if not impossible certainly impracticable to more than partially organize the sale of hogs by farmers in such a manner as to have each farmer paid for his hogs according to quality produced. As the whole object of the policy was intended to do just that thing, the whole effort was weakened to the extent that the plan failed to accomplish its object, i.e. the payment of the individual farmer for his hogs according to grade.

Other difficulties might also be cited, such as conditions at Montreal where because very few of the hogs were used for the British trade a scheme intended to operate mainly in connection with this trade was very difficult to apply and finally when applied functions only in an arbitrary manner and is practised only by a few of the total number of operators on the Montreal markets.

But in spite of the difficulties encountered the effect has undoubtedly been to direct the efforts of all farmers in Canada to the production of a better quality of hogs. Even in the districts where hogs never have been bought on grade the hope that by the production of a better article more money might be received for it has been a factor sufficiently strong to effect improvement. By modifications which would have placed price differentials on a more natural basis and by organization in other ways most of the difficulties that were encountered probably could have been overcome. But seven or eight months ago a catastrophe overtook our industry which could not be foreseen or the full effects measured until some months after it began to operate. It is now only too plainly evident that a number of factors working together have at least for the time being ruined our trade with Great Britain. It came so suddenly and its effects were so severe that before the exporting packing plants could determine what to do it had cost the packers several millions of dollars and resulted in a most severe drain on their finances.

During the greater part of the year 1925 and 1926 the margin between the cost of feed in America to produce hogs and their selling price has been very wide, the profit over the cost of feed running from $7 to $10 per hog on a 200-pound hog. Thus even countries that had to buy their feeds from us could easily increase production and undersell us on the British market without loss and indeed, until lately, at a fair margin of profit. The general level of prices for bacon and hogs has been for years, excepting for short periods, quite high and this has encouraged such poor countries as the Baltic states of Europe to go into the bacon business.

But the main factors that brought about the sudden collapse of the market was due to causes that originated in Britain. These were the embargoing of fresh pork imports from Holland and the weakening of the purchasing power of consumers through the effect of the great coal strike. The embargo took effect in June and in the ensuing six months Holland turning from the fresh pork trade to cured bacon sent over 60,000,000 pounds to the British market. The Baltic states increased their exports during 1926 over 1925 by about 31,000,000 pounds. This flood of European bacon coming on top of the greatly weakened buying power of the people caused prices to collapse.

In the United States and Canada, however, hog prices did not follow the course of bacon prices in England. Hog production in the United States was away below normal and prices remained far above the relative values of bacon in England. It is this situation that has been the biggest factor of all in forcing Canada out of the English market. Packers hoped for some time that it could not continue and that the high prices for hogs in the United States would increase production, but there does not now appear to be any quick solution of the problem by this means.

For a short period during the early part of 1926 bacon prices justified high prices for hogs in Canada. It had been a common experience of our packers to have prices of bacon drop below hog values and then come back again. If packers were hopeful of the situation hog prices often did not follow these drops in bacon values. So after bacon prices began to drop in 1926 hog prices carried along at an unjustifiable level, creating excessive losses which might have been minimized if the progressive nature of the decline could have been realized at the start. Finally hog prices came into line with prices in the United States. But the decline in bacon prices was so great that the loss was as serious as ever.

*Loss †Gain

Thus the losses mounted with astonishing rapidity. Canadian packers loath to abandon their natural market held on long after they should have curtailed their shipments. Finally, their finances drained to the limit, they have had to almost abandon the British market, at least for the present. With the collapse of the British trade, packers have been forced to seek other markets, mostly in the United States. But in these markets our special type of hog receives no special consideration. Temporarily the select bacon grade when used for its special purpose, the British trade, sells at a greater loss than the other grades when they are used in the domestic trade or exported to the United States. In the domestic trade both the "select bacon" and the bacon type "thick smooth" hogs are superior to the fat type and poor quality thick smooths and the other grades. In the United States markets there are practically no differences in value for any of our grades of hogs, except of course, roughs, sows and stags.

Thus 10 per cent premium, always artificial, and even with normal conditions in the British market, becoming somewhat difficult, has now become impossible except under special conditions. Where production conditions are such that the percentage of shops, heavies, etc., allow of deductions that balance the premium the system though not justifiable might possibly be maintained were it not for the export of hogs to the United States. Buyers for these markets not being able to realize any difference in value for the different grades avoid offerings of hogs with any considerable percentage of "selects" or pay a flat price for all grades. In the district and for the shipments of hogs having the biggest percentage of "selects" the greatest difficulties have arisen. It must be recognized that where the biggest percentage of "selects" are produced the hogs as a whole are of superior quality, so that hogs in these districts really are worth more for the domestic trade. But while this is true, nevertheless it is largely a fact that the bigger the percentage of "selects" the bigger the loss to the export packer if paid for on grade. Thus in Ontario where the biggest percentage of "select" hogs are produced and which is also in close proximity to the high priced eastern United States market at Buffalo the situation has been most acute and the buying of hogs on grade has largely collapsed. The effect of flat buying in competition with a certain amount of buying on grade has been to produce unfortunate anomalies. The hogs of southwest Ontario are from the standpoint of our domestic market our poorest hogs, but are accepted on the Buffalo market at the highest price for their weights of that market. Prices for Ontario hogs are largely being based on the price of southwest Ontario hogs and "thick smooths" throughout the rest of Ontario must be merely equal to the flat price of "southwest" hogs. Thus the extra cost of selects is badly out of line with the general value of products. In the west the same condition exists but because the percentage of selects is generally low and the "outweight" grades comparatively high it has been possible to maintain to a great extent an artificial condition.

What then is to be done about it? There does not appear to be any prospect of a quick return of normal production in the United States. There is also the possibility that the corn borer will make serious inroads in the United States corn belt within the next four or five years. The Baltic states of Europe will undoubtedly try hard to maintain their output. Poland has a population of about 28,000,000, largely agricultural, which must be reckoned with. Holland being a dairy country will continue a very considerable hog production and there is no reason to suppose that she and Denmark will not be able to maintain their present efficiency.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

On the other hand sooner or later Europe and America must arrive at corresponding levels of prices for hogs and pork products. Before the war our European competitors were large producers of hogs, a great part of the products being absorbed by Germany, France and Austria. As these countries return to normal industrial activity this condition must eventually return. After all hog production cannot exceed grain production. Formerly Denmark, Holland, Sweden and Germany purchased much of their hog feeds from Russia, Transylvania and Roumania. If any of these countries now go into hog production it reduces the grain available for export. It does not seem that Europe, unless it increases its grain production, can as a whole greatly increase its hog production. Temporarily the British market may be loaded with European product. Lastly, it does not appear that the United States will for some years at least be a natural market for our hog products. When normal production returns they will not longer want our hogs. If our hogs at any time are a menace to the United States farmers they will probably close them out by raising the tariff. We now have to pay a duty of ½ cent per pound on live hogs, ¾ cent on fresh pork and 2 cents on processed pork. Thus our prices have to trail after the United States prices and if prices in the United States go down to something near their cost of production they will be below our costs which will force us to return to the British market.

So at least until the time comes when we can see the future more clearly we cannot afford to lose sight of the British market. Up to the present time almost the total burden of the struggle to maintain connection with that market has fallen on the packers. Are our farmers prepared to do something to maintain the possibilities of a return to that market? All that is required is to continue the present policy of breeding the bacon hogs. This will not cost anything as our hogs will sell at least on a par with the American hog. Suppose that at the worst the bacon bred hog brings no premium, by maintaining his blood lines the farmer will be able to return to the British market whenever the time is opportune.

It was to be expected that the artificial means set up in 1921 to accomplish a specific purpose would eventually have to be placed on a natural basis. Eventually each grade of hogs would have had to seek their real level of value whatever that level was and the plan would have had to be modified to establish natural conditions. If our normal markets had been maintained this could almost certainly have been done to considerable advantage to the industry. But it must be recognized that there is now a serious danger of making a change because the change cannot but be drastic in its working. For these reasons packers have given months of consideration to the matter. It is greatly desired to retain graded buying to as great an extent as possible. But it is also recognized that it is useless under present conditions to try to set up anything even of a modified kind of artificial arrangement. Therefore, it is proposed that the grading be continued and each grade be priced according to its value. If the bulk of our surplus hogs or their product is exported to the United States any differentials between the grades will have to depend on the values established by the domestic market. If the British trade returns the high class bacon hog will return to its own. In the meantime the bacon hog blood can be retained and increased without any sacrifice by our farmers.

The Dominion Department of Agriculture has assumed a great responsibility and work in connection with the grading of hogs, and the popularizing of the bacon hog ideal. The Provincial Departments of Agriculture have given most valuable and able coöperation. It is fitting at this time that full credit should be given to the officers who have been engaged in the enterprise of building up the quality of our hogs. Confronted with this new situation the task of these bodies in continuing improvement work may be more difficult, but in view of the possibilities of the future the work, is we believe, still of utmost importance. It is unfortunate that such changes as eventually would have been necessary in the grading plans could not have been worked out at a time when market conditions permitted a clearer view on which to formulate policy, but as we are dealing with conditions beyond our control we think it must appeal to the judgment of everyone that the only sound policy is to put into operation a system that is and will be sound under any conditions that may arise."

RESTRICTED AREA FOR BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS

5. How many reactors were found on the first test?
6. What percentage of cattle tested reacted to the first test?
7. What was the cost of compensation in each area in the first test?
8. How frequently are the cattle in such areas retested?
9. What are the advantages of such areas?

13. What are the rates of compensation paid for slaughtering animals?
14. Is compensation paid for all reactors?
15. Does the province or the municipality play any part in the bringing of an area under this policy?
16. Who pays compensation for reacting cattle that are slaughtered?
17. Are there any such areas in the United States, and how is compensation paid there?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. A restricted area is a definite specified territory constituted by order-in-council a quarantined area in so far as bovine tuberculosis is concerned for maintenance as a bovine tuberculosis free area.

2. Six.

3. (a) The province of Prince Edward Island; (b) The parish of Manor Sutton in the county of York and the parish of Flume Ridge in the county of Charlotte, in the province of New Brunswick; (c) The counties of Beauharnois, Chateauguay and Huntingdon in the province of Quebec (d) The municipalities of Roland, Dufferin, Thompson and Grey in the province of Manitoba; (e) The municipalities of Longlaketon, McKillop, Millington, Last Mountain Valley, Mount Hope and Wreford, in the electoral district of Last Mountain in the province of Saskatchewan; (f) An area of approximately 5,600 square miles extending from the gulf of Georgia to Agassiz, bounded on the south by the international boundary and on the north and east by the Dominion railway belt, in the province of British Columbia.

4, 5, 6, 7.

	No. of cattle in area	No. of reactors at first test	Percentage of Reactors	Compensation Paid
P. E. I. area	94,772	561	0.59	$ 14,194 00
N.B. area	2,642	20	0.76	513 33
Quebec area	52,446	4,172	7.95	150,785 00
Manitoba area	22,892	1,306	5.7	43,062 00

B.C. area	46,174	3,643	7.9	124,010 00

8. This depends upon the percentage of infection in an area; the greater the infection the more frequently are general tests conducted.

When the infection has been reduced to less than one per cent an interval of three years may occur between general tests.

9. The advantages of such areas include all those resulting from the maintenance of healthy cattle. As all cattle in an area are tested, all reactors destroyed and all infected premises cleansed and disinfected, a clean area is provided for the healthy cattle, and infection of clean herds reduced to a minimum.

10. Yes.

11. The government's object is to establish a restricted area in each province and to gradually increase these areas. Their location will depend upon the applications which may be received.

12. At any time the necessary funds are available.

13. Maximum compensation for a grade animal is $40 and for a pure bred $100.

14. Compensation is not paid for reacting grade bulls, steers, nor for reacting cattle with lumpy jaw, but is paid for all other reactors.

15. The regulations provide that applications may be made to the Dominion Department of Agriculture, by the Minister of Agriculture of the provincial government, stating that the province is desirous of federal aid in the eradication of bovine tuberculosis from a restricted area, upon and subject to the provisions of these regulations. The provincial government must agree to assist in the enforcement of the regulations by conducting prosecutions of persons accused of obstructing, or refusing to assist federal inspectors engaged in the work of testing cattle, and of persons who in any way refuse to obey the regulations,

16. The Dominion Department of Agriculture.

17. Yes. They are termed modified areas. Have no definite information regarding manner in which compensation is paid, but understand the state, county and municipality contribute.

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, documents and other correspondence between the Department of Customs or any officials thereof, and officials of the Customs department in the province of Nova Scotia, or any other person or persons, whether officials of such department or not, relating to the discharge of George Banks of Caledonia, in the county of Queens and province of Nova Scotia, as inspector of customs at the said place, and the appointment of his successor.

WEST RIVER STATION POSTMASTER

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda, telegrams, reports and other documents or correspondence relating to the post office at West River Station, Nova Scotia, and the dismissal of Colin Mackenzie as postmaster thereof.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I do not object to the passing of the motion, but I desire to point out that according to the terms in which it is worded it does not relate to correspondence with any department of the government. It is broad enough to include correspondence with anyone. It reads, "Correspondence relating to the post office at West River Station." That may mean with the Public Works department or any other department. I think my hon. friend has reference only to correspondence with the Postmaster General.

Mr. ERNST: I am quite willing to have the motion corrected. I want only the correspondence with reference to the dismissal of Colin Mackenzie.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Correspondence with the Postmaster General?

Mr. ERNST: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

CONFERENCE ON HOG INDUSTRY

Mr. GARDINER:

For a copy of the records of the conference of packers, government officials and others, held in 1921, including discussion relating to hog grading, the ten per cent premium, bacon grading and resolutions.

EMPLOYMENT OF DISABLED VETERANS

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I desire to ask the Postmaster General a question. I have received—and I think a number of other hon. members of the House have also received—telegrams and letter of various lengths and from various parts of the country, from war veterans associations and amputation associations, protesting against the proposed order that no amputation cases shall be allowed to sit for examinations to qualify for positions in the Post Office Department, the reason being that the efficiency of the post office service would be impaired by employing disabled men. While there is a question on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for London (Mr. White) in regard to this matter, I think the question is of such importance that it is worthy of notice at the present time, and I hope that no such unfair rule will be put into force.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I am preparing an answer to be submitted to the House. There is a misunderstanding in certain respects, regarding this matter and I wish to have the answer properly prepared so that it will be fully understood when it is submitted to the House.

PENSION LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the government the following telegram:

Understand government has announced no pension legislation. Ask you impress government Legion amendments important, need immediate attention. Surely men who gave their health for Canada important as Georgian bay canal.

I want to ask the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King) if it is not possible for the government to reconsider their decision and bring down amendments to the act along the lines suggested.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Mr. Speaker, I made a statement on Friday regarding the government's position in relation to amendments to the Pension Act at this session. I then indicated that the resolutions and data brought before me by the various returned soldier organizations covered a very large field, and that it did not seem possible to give them the consideration that they should have while parliament was in session. But I did intimate that although the government could not consider extending the principles upon which pensions are granted, they had under consideration amendments to the Pension Act, and I suggested there would be several amendments introduced when Bill No. 234 is again in committee. I suggested, for instance, that it was my purpose to move an amendment extending the time from seven to nine years during which claims for pensions might be received. It is also proposed to bring in an amendment that where new evidence has been secured within a year, and placed before the Board of Pension Commissioners, there shall be a rehearing of the appeal. These amendments will be introduced when Bill No. 234 is again under consideration.

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the statement made by the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, may I call his attention to two telegrams which I have received. The first is dated April 2 and states:

North Toronto branch Legion urgently requests that effort be made to get through returned soldier legislation this session.

HAROLD BREULS.

The second telegram is dated April 3, and is as follows:

We note with considerable alarm that the government has stated that no pensions or other soldier legislation will be considered before parliament prorogues. Are those responsible for this action prepared to accept the blame for the unnecessary hardship and suffering now borne by those in dire need of remedial legislation. We ask, Sir, your prompt action and support in bringing the recommendations of the Canadian Legion before the present session. Thanking you for your past activities in the interests of justice and fair play,

Respectfully yours,

T. HOLLOWAY, president Western Branch Post 49, tuberculosis section Canadian Legion British Empire Service League.

In the course of his statement the minister called attention to the lengthy memorandum he had received from the representatives of the returned men. This memorandum has been in the minister's hands for a considerable time, and I think some legislation should be brought down this session to give effect to the proposals therein put forward when Bill 234 is again before the House. I draw these telegrams to the attention of the minister in the hope that he may reconsider his decision at the earnest request of these returned men.

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the government that I also have received telegrams from all the posts of the legion in my constituency complaining of the delay on the part of the government in connection with bringing down the legislation just referred to, and respectfully urging the government, if possible, to do what they can to take action during this session.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): The minister a few days ago stated that a number of these complaints regarding pensioners could be taken care of by the meritorious clause. Has he given any special attention to that clause, or has any particular effort been made to meet any of the cases under that regulation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A number of cases have been settled under that regulation.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not know, but a number have been disposed of.

Mr. ARTHURS: A considerable number of these cases might come under that regulation.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CAHAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, although not very important, I wish to refer to the remark of the Prime Minister on Thursday last that he had grave doubts as to the accuracy of the statement which I then made with regard to dissolution being refused to Mr. Asquith and subsequently granted to him. I have not had an opportunity of visiting my own library, but I have communicated with one of my household, and I find that the source of my information was the memoirs of Sir Almeric Fitzroy, then Clerk of the Privy Council. In the second volume at pages 422 and 423 he refers to the incident of His Majesty the King at first refusing Mr. Asquith's demand for dissolution and subsequently granting it. Also among my private papers there is a note as to Mr. Asquith's speeches of December 18, 1923, and May 24, 1924, which were published in the English papers at the time. As to the reference I made to a dissolution having been granted to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald at the close of nine months of his regime, after he had been defeated some ten or a dozen times in the House, I find the source of my information is an attorney of very considerable eminence who was writing in a friendly discussion as between two who were interested in the same constitutional question. But as the correspondence is marked "personal" I shall have, at a later date if possible, to give with more precision the source of my authority for the statement. With regard to it there may be some doubt in view of the contention of the Prime Minister. As to the other statement, it seems to me that the memoirs of the Clerk of the Privy Council at the time of Mr. Asquith's premiership places it beyond doubt.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a very interesting speech, but it is too short.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend will see on referring to Hansard that my interruption related to his reference to the dissolution granted to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, not to his remarks with respect to Mr. Asquith. My hon. friend has been kind enough to show me the memoirs to which he referred, and I told him that I thought they were somewhat inconclusive. However, I do not wish to question his statement on that point; but as to his remarks on the dissolution granted to Mr. MacDonald, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe he has not been correctly informed.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly.

NORTH HURON VACANCY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I will not ask the government why the writ has not been issued for an election in North Huron, but will confine myself to the question: When may we expect the writ to be issued?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this parliament passed a law some time ago requiring writs to be issued within six months of the time a constituency had been declared vacant. I am pleased to inform my hon. friend that the writ will be issued within that time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope they will keep within the law at least.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES—REVISION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the government that I have received a number of protests from Amalgamated Civil Servants protesting that a number of those in the lower classes will not get the benefit of the $120 increase resulting from the recent salary revision. The salaries of these lower grades, it is said, are already below the cost of living line. I would therefore ask the government to reconsider the revision so that these grades will get consideration.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to direct the attention of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) to my hon. friend's question, and ask him to reply to it when he is next in his seat.

NOVA SCOTIA REPRESENTATION—EXTRA MEMBER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State—I see he is not in his seat, but my question can be transmitted to him and perhaps he will answer it to-morrow—as to whether or not he has received any communications from Halifax with regard to an extra member for the province of Nova Scotia; and if so, what action the government proposes taking in the matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might answer my hon. friend's question. I believe a communication of the purport to which he refers has been received and is now under consideration; as to the action to be taken in regard to it, I am afraid it will not be possible to give a definite reply this session.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I repeat my request, made over a week ago to the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), to expedite a return ordered by the House on February 28 last in relation to the post office at Pelly, in Yukon territory.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I will have the return tabled to-morrow.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I also request the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) to be good enough to expedite the return to an order made on March 9 last in connection with the appointment of a person to fill temporarily the position of mining recorder at Mayo, Yukon. The return could be prepared in a few minutes.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I will see that it comes down.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FREIGHT RATES TO BE CHARGED ON EASTERN LINES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian National Railways and the tariffs of tolls to be charged on certain eastern lines.

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite willing to make a brief statement now regarding the bill, but I presume that hon. members would much appreciate the opportunity of cross-examining me in committee. I suggest therefore that we allow the bill to get into the committee stage, when I shall be able to deal with it in detail. That would be the better course unless there is a desire that I should make a speech, which I feel sure is not wanted.

Mr. MANION: How does my hon. friend feel about it himself?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not particular.

Mr. GARDINER: I am rather surprised that the Minister of Railways has not given some explanation of this proposed legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: I am ready to give it right now if my hon. friend will sit down. I would rather make a speech than take criticism for not making it. I thought that every member of the House was sufficiently familiar with the subject of the much discussed Duncan report to have studied the relationship of this particular bill to the recommendations of that report with respect to freight rates, and to be prepared therefore to discuss the details of the bill as they arose in committee. However, I am very glad to make a general statement with regard to the matter.

As hon. members know, the royal commission appointed by the government with respect to maritime claims, comprising Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, the Hon. W. B. Wallace and Professor Cyrus MacMillan, reported upon those claims, among the most important of which is the matter of freight rates. The commission found, as set out in the preamble to the bill we are now discussing, that certain national, imperial and strategic considerations prevailed with respect to freight rates in the maritime provinces which were not present in relation to freight rates in the rest of Canada. They also found—here I am paraphrasing the report— that these considerations had been adequately met up to 1912, when increases in the freight rate structure in the maritime provinces came into effect, and that since that time these rates have been continued up to the present moment. As a matter of fact, from time to time they have been increased along with the changes made in the freight rate structure of the rest of Canada. The Duncan commission report that the recommendation which they make, to be found at page 22, is in their estimation as fair a measure of these national, imperial and strategic conditions as can be suggested and that it will have the effect particularly of restoring in the maritime provinces the parity of rates which the people there enjoyed prior to 1912. That is to say by the action proposed by the commission the relationship of freight rates in the maritime provinces to freight rates in the rest of the Dominion would be made approximately the same as it was prior to 1912.

Let me read exactly what the commission propose:

> We recommend, therefore, that an immediate reduction of 20 per cent (so that 192 will become approximately 155) be made on all rates charged on traffic which both originates and terminates at stations in the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways (including export and import traffic, by sea, from and to that division), and that the same reduction be also applied to the Atlantic division proportion of the through rates on all traffic which originates at stations in the Atlantic division (excluding import traffic by sea), and is destined to points outside the Atlantic division.
> For this purpose, we cannot regard the Atlantic division as ending at Riviere du Loup and Monk, which are its present western limits. The divisional points should, in our view, be

Diamond Junction and Levis, Diamond Junction being the point at which the Transcontinental railway meets the old Intercolonial railway and Levis the point to which, in 1879, the Intercolonial railway was extended.

The bill now before the House meets that recommendation except in two particulars to which I shall now refer. The recommendation of the Duncan commission might be taken to imply that the reduction of 20 per cent might apply upon through rates from the maritime provinces to the United States. The legislation before the House does not provide for the reduction to apply upon the Atlantic division proportion of international rates. I shall be pleased when the bill comes before the committee to go into the reasons in detail as to why we could not include that in the bill. I may however state now, on the second reading that in our opinion the people of the maritime provinces would not receive any benefit from such provision had it been incorporated in the bill. I shall be glad to go into the matter more fully and give the details at greater length on the particular section of the bill when in committee.

The other omission, if omission it can be called, is that the 20 per cent reduction will not apply upon goods coming from overseas through maritime ports for distribution within the maritime provinces. That matter raised grave discriminatory questions affecting traffic coming through our ports destined to further western provinces, and the government could not see its way clear to give a 20 per cent reduction on import rates to that part of Canada which is already closest to the port through which the goods are imported. It would create a discrimination against the rest of the country, and in committee I will give the figures to indicate to our maritime friends on both sides of the House that the amount involved in the import rates is, from their point of view, very small indeed, while to make this concession would be establishing a principle which I doubt very much could be defended in this House.

The Duncan report then goes on to recommend the manner in which the relief extended should be borne. At page 22 of the report will be found the following:

> The cost of this relief should be definitely borne by the Dominion government, who will make the necessary reimbursement to the Canadian National Railways through the medium of the Canadian National Railways budget, without impairing the financial results of the operation of the system.

To carry that out provision is made in the bill that the deficit on the Atlantic region which by the terms of the bill is extended to Diamond Junction and Levis, as recommended, shall be kept separately and a separate item introduced in the railway budget each year to cover that deficit. Then the Duncan report goes on to say:

> We are not overlooking that the other great railway system operating in the area would be entitled to equitable consideration if they find themselves prejudiced as a result of the reduction proposed.

That is a very easy way for a royal commission to escape the solution of a very difficult problem; it is very simple phraseology, but the solution is not so simple. In the first place there is not only the other great railway system to consider but in addition there are at least half a dozen other railway corporations within the area dealt with by the royal commission with respect to freight rates. I do not know that I can remember off hand their different names, but there are at least six other railway corporations which would undoubtedly be prejudiced or affected in their operations by this legislation if some machinery were not set up to take care of them.

This matter is covered in section 9, which relates not only to the other great railway corporation mentioned in the report of the commission but also to all the other railway companies operating within the area which is described as select territory for the purpose of legislation. I should say in this regard that I believe that as a result of this legislation it may be necessary for us to give consideration to the acquisition of some of these lines now being separately operated in the area from Levis and Diamond Junction to the Atlantic ocean as a part of the National system. That is a matter on which we cannot see clearly at present; it will of course require experience for us to determine the effect this legislation will have upon these various enterprises and upon the service which the people in the various districts served by these lines are receiving. That, however, is a matter not dealt with in this bill, but which I know will be raised by some of the members from the various districts concerned.

I do not know that there is anything else I need say on the second reading of the bill except to commend it to the tender mercies of the House as the first instalment—and a very large instalment—of the government's policy in implementing the recommendations of the Duncan commission.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few brief observations on the second reading of this bill, and in so doing I wish to approach consideration of the problems involved in a very sympathetic manner. In the first place I should like to observe that this is the first legislative fruit of an agitation which has been going on in the maritime provinces for a considerable period of time, and which resulted from the great economic depression which made itself felt there immediately after the end of the war. I believe that depression was greater in extent in the maritime provinces than in any other portion of Canada, although the rest of the Dominion suffered in common from the economic developments following the cessation of hostilities.

The first manifestation of this economic development was in the federal election of 1921, when a solid Liberal delegation was returned from Nova Scotia. I may say in passing that I do not propose to treat this matter from the standpoint of party politics, although from statements made by the Prime Minister announcing this legislation and from the action of a small body of Liberal politicians in New Brunswick it may be necessary to revert briefly to the political aspect. As I say, the economic depression in the maritime provinces made itself manifest in the result of the general election in 1921, when the province of Nova Scotia sent a solid delegation of sixteen members to support the present Prime Minister; when the province of Prince Edward Island sent a solid delegation of four members to sit behind the Prime Minister and when the province of New Brunswick practically divided. It is my considered judgment that had that large delegation, knowing the economic conditions which obtained in the maritime provinces at that time, pressed upon the government of the day those considerations which were subsequently brought to their attention by gentlemen representing the maritime provinces from this side of the House, it would not have been necessary to wait five years for the legislation brought down to-day, and we could have avoided five years of depression with the consequent loss of earning power, prosperity and economic manhood and womanhood. Because of the failure of those gentlemen representing the maritime provinces in the fourteenth parliament of this country, grave dissatisfaction arose in that part of Canada. The first result of that dissatisfaction was shown in the Halifax by-election, after which came the Kent by-election and finally the general elections of 1925. I claim, Sir, that this legislation brought down to-day is the direct result of the action of the people of those provinces in the year 1925. Be that as it may, I think history will accord to those gentlemen who took up the flaming torch of maritime rights during those years the credit which is their due, notwithstanding what may have been said here, there, or elsewhere.

The greatest need of the maritime provinces undoubtedly is in connection with this very question of transportation; on that I think we all agree. I think I can safely say that there is a certain degree of satisfaction felt by all parties representing those provinces in the bill immediately under discussion, and I say that as fairly as I possibly can. I must also say, however, that the people down there will find themselves very much disillusioned when they learn what has been authoritatively stated by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) to-day, that these rates do not apply to international shipments. Speaking for the producers of New Brunswick, I can say that by far the greater volume of the tonnage shipped over our railways is international tonnage, consisting of pulp, pulpwood, lumber and the products of our fields, particularly potatoes. I do not refer especially to fish because we do not export so much of that commodity from the province of New Brunswick; that is a matter more particularly affecting Nova Scotia. I do know of one company in the province of New Brunswick which makes a daily shipment of at least two train loads of forest product, and that industry will not be benefited to the extent of one dollar by this legislation. For that reason I am sure there will be great disappointment in the maritime provinces when the people there come to realize that this legislation does not go as far as the Duncan report recommended, because if I recollect aright—and I have read the report on many occasions—there is absolutely no reservation on the part of the commissioners with respect to international freight rates. I know the reservation was made by the Prime Minister in his announcement. I think I know, at least I have heard, of some of the difficulties that the administration has encountered. It may be the case—and if so I do not wish to lay any blame on the administration—that those conditions have been insurmountable. But if that be the case, then it only adds to the disappointment of the maritime provinces in that particular respect. Speaking with perhaps an all too limited knowledge of the subject, I venture to say that, because of the omission of the reservation in the plan proposed by the Duncan commission, the maritime provinces will be robbed of at least one-half of the fruits under this particular head. I understand that there is no control by any judicial body—

Mr. DUNNING: I missed what my hon. friend said just now. Did my hon. friend say that by not getting the international freight rates, the maritimes would be robbed of one-half of the fruits?

Mr. HANSON: That is my judgment. It may be erroneous.

Mr. DUNNING: It is quite erroneous.

Mr. HANSON: Weeks ago I asked the Minister of Railways if he would give me a statement of the probable cost to the treasury of Canada of the readjustment of rates proposed by the Duncan commission. Unfortunately, whether he could or could not do so, he did not give me the information which I sought. I concluded that for reasons connected with the administration or for some other good and sufficient reasons the hon. gentleman did not want to give that information.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I stated in the House only the other day, in response to a question asked, I think, by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), that I had only just then received any reasonably accurate estimate and I gave it to the House.

Mr. HANSON: I am glad to hear that. It escaped my attention. I am not making any criticism of or charge against the minister in that connection. But with respect to this particular matter I am satisfied, from the reports which I have received from those who are supposed to be in a position to know, that the large industries in New Brunswick will receive little or no benefit from this particular part of the legislation in question.

As regards the Duncan report in connection with the matter of transportation, there is another disappointment in regard to the new location of the Atlantic region, or shall I say the new geographical limitation imposed by the Duncan report and adopted by the government? There is very little tonnage originating in the maritime provinces destined for points north and northwest and within the new limitation of Diamond Junction and Levis. Practically all the goods that we ship west over the National railways are destined for points beyond Diamond Junction or beyond Levis as the case may be. As I understand the matter, the commission were not asked to fix Levis and Diamond Junction as the new delimiting points, although all agreed that Monk and Riviere du Loup were useless in that regard. But the new geographical limitation that was asked for repeatedly by the maritime provinces was the city of Montreal which was the western terminus of the Intercolonial railway in the year 1912. I have not yet heard from any authoritative source any good reason why the region was not extended. In the original inception of the regional idea there was never any good reason advanced why the western terminus of the Atlantic region was fixed at Riviere du Loup rather than Montreal. I want to tell the administration, as respectfully but as firmly as I have language to command in which to tell it, that the maritime provinces will not be satisfied until the Atlantic region for freight rate and administrative purposes is extended to Montreal, and that if we do not get that now—and I understand we are not going to get it now—we intend to keep up the agitation in the provinces in season and out of season for the extension of that region to Montreal. That was the terminus of the Intercolonial railway in 1912 and down to the time when subsequently to the act of 1919 it was merged with the National railways. I know I voice the sentiments of the people of the maritime provinces in that respect.

In connection with this freight rate matter as outlined in the bill another feature, which may be perfectly clear but which is not clear at all events to me, is in regard to certain railways to which the minister has alluded, which may or may not be affected by this legislation. I am referring now to the case for example of the Dominion Atlantic railway which begins and ends in Nova Scotia which, so far as I understand the situation, is not in competition with the Canadian National Railways, and which may not be affected by the terms of this bill. I propose however to leave whatever remarks I have to make and to reserve judgment on that point until we get the bill into committee.

In conclusion I say that in so far as this is a measure of justice to the maritime provinces, it is welcomed by the people there and when the balance is struck the government will receive from the people of the maritime provinces whatever meed of credit is their due. At the moment I do not desire to say anything further. We welcome the legislation as a halfway measure for what we are to get, and I warn the government that this is only the first instalment of what the people of the maritime provinces want in matters of transportation and transportation rates.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I appreciate very much the short statement which the Minister of Railways has made in regard to this particular piece of legislation. I had hoped that on the second reading of the bill, before the principle of the legislation was accepted by the House, the minister would have given a little further explanation than he did. But we appreciate the explanation which he has made because it gives us some intimation of what is intended. I do not want to criticize to any extent the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). He has made the statement that this is only a part or portion of what the maritime provinces expect by way of legislation in order to assist them in their economic struggle.

Mr. DUNNING: I understood the hon. member for York-Sunbury to say that with respect to transportation rates this was only a halfway measure.

Mr. GARDINER: That makes the statement all the more ridiculous. I have a great deal of sympathy for the maritime provinces. Some two or three years ago I had the privilege of going through a part of the maritime provinces and, getting into close touch with the people there, we were able to gather at first hand some information as to the disabilities under which they were labouring at that particular time. Since that occasion I have not had the privilege of being down in the maritime provinces, consequently I cannot say whether they have improved their economic condition since then. No doubt it probably has improved to some small extent, if not to the extent that they would like.

This proposed legislation arises out of the report of the royal commission that was appointed last year to inquire into the question of the alleged maritime claims. The representatives of the maritimes who have presented their claims have stated on many occasions that the people of the maritimes were under a handicap or disability because of the fact that they had entered into confederation. As far as the report of the commission is concerned, it rejects that contention altogether. The commissioners state emphatically in their report that in their viewpoint that claim cannot be substantiated. Let me quote from the introduction to the report:

> The outstanding fact, it seems to us, is that the maritime provinces have not prospered and developed, either in population, or in commercial, industrial and rural enterprise, as fully as other portions of Canada. We are unable to take the view that confederation, is, of itself, responsible for this fact. The trend and nature of economic development generally throughout the last sixty years has made within the maritimes changes in the structure of business and employment which are unrelated to confederation, and which would have taken place whether or not the maritime provinces had been independent units outside of Confederation. Even within confederation there has been such a measure of responsibility resting on each province for its own development that much at least of what has happened within the Maritime provinces must be related to their responsibility and not to the responsibility of the Dominion.

That is a very emphatic statement, Mr. Speaker, and it comes from the commission itself. They state that much responsibility lies within the maritime provinces themselves, that they themselves are largely responsible for the condition they are in to-day, and not the Dominion as a whole.

There is another quotation I wish to make from the report, and this is my last, dealing with the question of a general stocktaking in Canada, a review of the situation throughout the length and breadth of the country in order to see how the component parts of the confederation are progressing and ascertain their needs, if needs they have. On page 1 of the introduction to the report the commissioners state:

> But reasonable balance is within accomplishment if there be periodic stocktaking. We venture to regard the present occasion as such a period of stocktaking, so that in the future progress of the common great enterprise the prospects of the maritime provinces may be brought into line with the prospects of other parts of Canada and the prospects of the Dominion as a whole.

I think every hon. member of this House will accord support to that statement. Realizing as we do how far-flung this country is, and its great diversity of interests, it is only reasonable to expect that once in a while a general stocktaking of the situation within Canada should be had in order to see how the component parts are progressing.

Coming to the proposed legislation, we find set out in the preamble, as the minister has already stated, certain claims. In the first place, the Intercolonial railway was built as part of the confederation pact. There is no question about that; no one denies it. The next claim is that this railway was built primarily for national and imperial reasons, together with the object of giving the manufacturers and traders of the maritime provinces a larger market in the central and western provinces of Canada. It is quite true that this railway was built primarily because of confederation. It is true also that the route it follows is a much longer route than probably would have been chosen if it had not been that the builders had to take into consideration national and imperial needs and the necessity for an outlet and inlet on the Atlantic seaboard.

But there is another question that is also important in connection with this railway. It is claimed that because of the course followed, the curvatures and the grades are not such as will allow the railway to be operated with efficiency. That is a very important consideration which the proposed legislation does not take into account. This legislation does not make any provision for the elimination of these sharp curvatures and heavy grades, and consequently we are not going to have a railway which can be operated efficiently. This point should not be lost sight of in dealing with this important matter. But I will come back to that a little later.

It is claimed that the rates in the maritime provinces have increased to a greater extent than they have in other parts of Canada. That in a measure is true. We must remember that while there was an increase in certain classes of rates in 1912, there was also an increase in local rates in 1916, I believe, and I wish to deal with that a little more fully so that we may have these rates properly before us. I am going to take the time of the House for a few minutes to follow the rate structure from the earliest time of which we have any records down to the present, so that the House may understand the situation.

Following the opening of the all-rail route between Montreal and St. John, New Brunswick, the through rates from the maritimes to points west were made up of arbitraries over the Montreal rate. The earliest record is the tariff of 1891-1894, showing an arbitrary of 30 cents added to the Montreal rate to make the through rate to and from St. John. The record is not clear between 1894 and 1900, but during this period the arbitrary was reduced from 30 to 20 cents, and the 20 cent rate was continued until 1916, when in the eastern rate case it was raised to 24 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: What record is my hon. friend quoting from as to rates? The railway during the period he speaks of was being administered by the then Minister of Railways, and there should be accurate information as to rates.

Mr. GARDINER: So far as these reductions in 1916 are concerned, I am quoting from the eastern rates case. Probably the minister will have the record.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend referring to grain rates?

Mr. GARDINER: No, general rates.

Mr. DUNNING: On what commodities, for what classes of goods?

Mr. GARDINER: On all commodities. Following the percentage increases and decreases from 1918 to 1921, the rate became as high as 47½ cents on September 13, 1920, and it was reduced to 42½ cents on December 1, 1921.

The 1922 judgment of the Board of Railway Commissioners reduced this arbitrary applicable on traffic to western Canada to the old rate of 24 cents, but it did not change it on traffic in eastern Canada west of Montreal. However, in 1924 the Canadian National Railway, in conference with eastern interests, reduced the arbitrary to 32 cents, so that to-day we have the following arbitraries in effect: St. John to eastern Canadian points, add 32 cents to the Montreal rate to points west; St. John to western Canadian points, add 24 cents to the Montreal western Canada rate. These amounts advance from the farther points and vary to the extent that the Yarmouth rate is 56 cents over the Montreal rate to western Canada and 64 cents over the Montreal rate to eastern Canada points, or 32 cents more than the St. John-Montreal arbitrary in each case. My understanding of the legislation is that these arbitraries are to be reduced by 20 per cent on all traffic to and from the Atlantic division.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is quite wrong there.

Mr. GARDINER: Traffic originating in the province.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend said "to and from".

Mr. GARDINER: I mean from. As regards the class rate scale in the maritimes, this was on a lower basis than the rest of eastern Canada up until 1912. At that time it was put on an equality. As there was no general increase in Canada between 1912 and 1918 this accounts for the maritime claim of the rates being 92 per cent higher than they were in 1912 as compared with 55 per cent in the rest of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's figures are wrong. The figures are 155 as against, 192.

Mr. GARDINER: It is 92 per cent increase, or 192. As a matter of fact the correct comparison is maritimes 92 per cent; rest of eastern Canada 80 per cent, the difference of 12 per cent being the advantage the former enjoyed previous to 1912. Notwithstanding the fact that western Canada class rates are only 50 per cent above pre-war rates as against 80 per cent in eastern Canada, the actual class rates in western Canada are as much as 20 per cent higher than eastern Canada, varying in different mileage down to 3 per cent higher.

Mr. DUNNING: Again my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: No. In addition eastern Canada has what is called schedule "A" class rates—and these rates are the class rates on which the traffic moves—which are again much lower than the rates above, than which western Canada rates are from 3 to 20 per cent higher.

An examination of the tariffs in effect to-day from the maritimes to Montreal, Toronto and other large markets in the central provinces shows that the general level is lower than the lowest general class scale basis in effect in Canada to-day, namely schedule "A".

For example: St. John to Montreal, distance 488 miles; schedule "A" would be $1.04, actual rate is $1.00½ and note that this short Canadian Pacific Railway mileage is the rate over the longer Canadian National Railway mileage. St. John to Toronto, 822 miles; schedule "A" rate would be $1.33 per 100 lbs., while the rate in effect is $1.15, so that one can see the advantages the maritimes have which the west certainly have not.

The other two proposals are 20 per cent reduction on all local rates on traffic originating and terminating in the Atlantic division. The 20 per cent reduction in local rates is in my judgment a vicious proposal in this piece of legislation. It is to all intents and purposes a subsidy to the consumers and shippers and can have no effect in the expansion of trade. The legislation itself in my judgment cannot be supported as being fair and equitable to all concerned. It would seem to me that legislation of this character should be national in its scope, and if it cannot be national in its scope, then we should try to find out some other method of dealing with this matter.

I am going to read a statement made by F. J. Watson, the Canadian National Railways expert who appeared before the Board of Railway Commissioners. This statement is taken from volume 2 of the railway commission report, pages 4620, 4621 and 4623. He says:

In the framing of freight tariffs generally between the maritime provinces and the territory Montreal and west irrespective of the reason therefor, a greater reduction than 200 miles has been made in practically every instance, as the following examples, both of class and commodity rates will illustrate:

From Saint John to Montreal the distance via Canadian National Railway Company is 729 miles and the first class rate $1.00½. Schedule "A", which is the lowest basis of class rates in Canada to-day, provides a rate of $1.00½ per 100 pounds for a distance of 480 miles, so that the difference between 729 miles and 480 miles, namely 249 miles, has been eliminated.

Of course the shorter mileage from Saint John to Montreal via the Canadian Pacific railway fixes the class scale referred to, but this does not alter the fact that 249 miles have been absorbed, and while Saint John itself is competitive there is a considerable local territory east and north of Saint John through Moncton where competition does not exist, and whereby under the application of recognized rate-making principles the full distance would be taken into consideration. For example take Moncton; the distance from Moncton to Montreal is 649 miles and the first class rate $1.00½ per 100 pounds, which, as already stated, is schedule "A" basis for 480 miles, so that in the case of Moncton 169 miles have been eliminated.

When we come to Halifax we find the first class rate to Montreal is $1.04 for a distance of 838 miles, while this rate of $1.04 would apply, under schedule "A", for only 520 miles, so that 318 miles have actually been taken out of the Intercolonial railway in constructing class rates from Halifax to Montreal.

In the same manner 328 miles have been cut out of the distance from Mulgrave to Montreal, and 391 miles from Sydney to Montreal.

To Toronto, which may be taken as typical of western Ontario, we find the distance from Saint John via Canadian National railways to be 1,060 miles with a first class rate of $1.15 per 100 pounds, which is the rate under schedule "A" for 640 miles, so that 420 miles have been disregarded and the same principle observed from Halifax to the extent of 489 miles, from Mulgrave 499 miles, and from Sydney 562 miles.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that first class?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, first class. The statement continues:

The same policy or principle has been carried out in connection with commodity rates, and taking potatoes as an example, upon which there is a general mileage scale lower than the class rate applicable in all Canadian territory east of Port Arthur and Armstrong, we find the distance say from Charlo, N.B., to Montreal is 461 miles and the commodity rate 32½ cents per 100 pounds. The mileage scale referred to applicable throughout eastern Canada gives a rate of 32½ cents for 325 miles or a shrinkage of 136 miles. From Shediac, N.B. to Montreal, a distance of 666 miles, the present rate on potatoes is 34 cents per 100 pounds, which under the special mileage scale mentioned would only apply for 350 miles, indicating a shrinkage of 316 miles.

From Charlo, N.B. to Toronto, 812 miles, the rate is 43 cents per 100 pounds, which rate applies under the mileage scale for 525 miles, representing the elimination of 287 miles; and from Shediac, N.B. to Toronto, 997 miles, the rate is 43 cents per 100 pounds, which would apply for only 325 miles under the mileage tariff referred to, showing a shrinkage of 472 miles.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the date of those figures?

Mr. GARDINER: They will be found in volume 502 of the railway commission reports. I merely read that statement to show that the claim of the maritime provinces, that they are paying on the full mileage of the old Intercolonial railway, is not correct, and that a large portion of the mileage has been elminated by virtue of their paying rates on the shorter mileage instead of on the actual mileage.

If this statement of Mr. Watson's is correct, it certainly destroys the argument of the maritime provinces that they are working under a disability because of the fact that the Intercolonial railway was built for strategic purposes and not solely as a business proposition. I presume that Mr. Watson, being connected with the Canadian National Railways, presented that statement before the Board of Railway Commissioners as a traffic expert knowing just exactly what he was talking about, so we can disregard once for all the claim of the maritime provinces that they are paying higher rates because of the extraordinary length of the old Intercolonial railway, which was laid out for strategic reasons.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Where does my hon. friend find the claim made that we are paying higher rates on account of distance?

Mr. GARDINER: That claim has been made by the maritime provinces ever since I have heard anything about maritime claims.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): I should like my hon. friend to quote one instance so we will have it concretely before the House.

Mr. GARDINER: I will quote one later when I have had an opportunity to refer to papers which are in my office. There is one other point I should like to bring to the attention of the House, and it is very important. The Intercolonial railway, I understand, was always operated by the Department of Railways and Canals. I have read several reports of the railway, and I have never yet found that it ever paid operating expenses.

Mr. HANSON: You have not read very much.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman had better read that over again.

Mr. GARDINER: Very well, I will do so. I am going to take an example from the 1905 statement. In that year the total revenue for the railway was $6,783,522, while the operating expenses were $8,508,826, showing a deficit on operation of $1,725,303. Nothing is allowed for interest on the investment. I have not been able to find where any interest has ever been paid from the revenue of that railway. The capital in 1905 is presumed to be about $77,000,000. The rate of interest at five per cent on that capitalization represents $3,850,000.

Mr. HANSON: Can the hon. gentleman show that the canals of this country, which were built solely or at least very largely for the benefit of the west, ever paid any interest on capital account?

Mr. GARDINER: The canals were not built wholly for the benefit of the west. It is true the west has benefited from the building of some of these canals. But as to freight rates, we have to pay them, and naturally we expect that in those rates provision is made for the interest charges and also for dividends in the case of a privately operated railway. Now, the interest charges at five per cent added to the deficit give a total of approximately $5,570,000. This does not take into account the Prince Edward Island railway at all, the operating deficit on which in 1905 was $151,375. So in that particular year hon. members can very well see what it cost the Dominion to run those railways. At the present time it is hard to say what the deficits are on the eastern section of the Canadian National.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably when we get into committee the minister will be able to tell us what the present-day deficit is. I rather fancy it is very substantial, but I have not the figures, so I refrain from making any specific statement as to the amount. The minister has not given us any information as to what will be the probable cost of this proposal. I think the other day he estimated that it would probably cost the country $2,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me. I should not like a wrong statement to get into the record. I stated that so far as we could now forecast it would cost $2,000,000 for the Canadian National. In addition, provision must be made for the other lines. A correct estimate is not possible in the absence of knowledge of what the future traffic will be.

Mr. GARDINER: I was going to qualify my statement by saying that the minister added that there were several other railways in the maritime provinces for which no doubt money would have to be voted, but he did not have at the time information as to the probable cost.

Now, the other day I noticed in the Citizen a statement by a Mr. Cornell who, I understand, appeared before the Duncan commission on behalf of the maritime provinces in regard to freight rates. No doubt he is familiar with his subject, because he must have given it a good deal of study in order to represent the provinces in this matter. I cannot say whether or not his statement is correct, for here again we are lacking in some information, and I am merely going to read it as an indication of what he thinks is going to be the cost to the country by virtue of this legislation. In the Ottawa Citizen of March 24, 1927, appeared the following:

Ottawa, March 23.—"The implementing of the Duncan report with regard to transportation costs and facilities will undoubtedly be a long step toward reinstating a proper basis of transportation costs and services in the Maritimes," says a statement issued here to-day by F. C. Cornell, K.C., who presented the case for the maritime governments with regard to freight rates before the Duncan commission.

Mr. Cornell estimated that $5,000,000 would be a conservative estimate of the amount involved in the rate reductions.

It is quite true, probably, that Mr. Cornell thought the Duncan report would be implemented in full, which would naturally take into consideration the traffic that my hon. friend who preceded me dealt with. However, it will be interesting to listen to the Minister of Railways in committee and discover what his estimate is of the cost to the taxpayers of Canada. It is presumed that this bonusing of rates to the extent of 20 per cent is going to make a good deal of difference to the people of the maritime provinces. In some particulars it may assist them somewhat, but I am very doubtful whether on the whole it will create the measure of prosperity which we should all like to see in the maritime provinces in the near future.

Last year, representing the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth in this House, was a gentleman who, fortunately or unfortunately for himself, is now in another chamber. I wish to quote a brief paragraph from a speech he made last session on this maritime question. The remarks I am about to read, from revised Hansard of 1926, page 3436, refer to the freight rate on fish, and I hope hon. members will follow me in this quotation, which has an important bearing if the contentions therein set out are correct. The member in question had this to say:

Now as to fish. Can we, through the process of cheapening the freight rates, ever find a sufficiently large market in central Canada for our fish so as to enable us to build up a great fish industry in the province of Nova Scotia? Hon. gentlemen must take this fact into account: the man who catches the fish gets from one to two cents a pound for it. Afterwards there is a shrinkage in the fish to the extent, perhaps, of forty or fifty per cent. Finally it is sold up here for twenty-five cents a pound, and the freight amounts to $1.80 per hundred pounds. You can see from these figures where you are going to get in, undertaking to create a big demand for fish in the central provinces through the process of cheapening the freight rates. If we are ever to have a market established here for our fish there must be a lessening of the spread between the price as paid to the producer and what the consumer has to pay for his fish.

I do not know whether the gentleman just quoted was correct in his statement that the fishermen receive from one to two cents per pound for their fish. Probably the figures he gives in regard to freight rates are absolutely correct. Nor am I sure whether that same fish is sold at twenty-five cents per pound in this part of the country. But when you take into consideration the fact that, according to this gentleman's statement, it costs only $1.80 per 100 pounds to transport fish from the maritime provinces into central Canada, it will be realized that a 20 per reduction in freight rates will not amount to very much so far as the fishermen are concerned. I do not think they will benefit to any great extent. Furthermore, I doubt whether the consumer, so far as any of these rates go, will receive any great benefit from the present proposal. It is quite probable that before this bill passes the House we shall hear members referring to special legislation that has been adopted in the matter of freight rates in regard to the grain growers of western Canada. It would be only natural to expect, after the statements I have made, someone to get up and say "You in western Canada have received special legislation, and it is due to the maritime provinces that legislation of a similar character be enacted in their interests." If this proposed legislation were of the character of the Crowsnest pass agreement I do not think there could be any great objection to it. I am going to give a short history of the Crowsnest agreement so that the House may be able to draw a comparison between it and the proposed legislation now under consideration. This will help us to judge the two methods of approach to an important question. Before the railway committee last week one of the officials of the railways made the statement that the Crowsnest rates were a losing proposition for the railways in the west. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will probably recall that statement. In order to make the matter understandable to hon. members in all parts of the House I propose, as I say, to give first of all a short history of that western agreement, comparing it with the present proposal, and then I shall quote some evidence that has been given only recently before the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Up until the year 1896, I believe, railway companies used to come to the government of Canada and secure subsidies by way of land and money grants, but the people were getting pretty well tired of that sort of thing. Finally, when the Laurier government came into power in 1896, the Canadian Pacific Railway approached the government for assistance in the construction of what is known as the Crowsnest pass railway. True, the government felt that in view of public opinion they could not give a straight money grant or subsidy, but they found ways and means of meeting the difficulty. There were certain rates in effect at that particular time on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government of the day gave a cash grant of so much per mile in consideration of an agreement entered into by the Canadian Pacific Railway that the rates should never be higher than they were then. It cost this country $3,400,000 to implement that agreement with the Canadian Pacific, and since that time grain rates in western Canada have been below that level for many years. Hon. members, more particularly those who were in this House some years ago, will recall the fact that the western rates were finally suspended, coming into effect again in part in 1922, and partly again at a later date.

Now, the claim has been made that these Crowsnest rates are a losing proposition for the railways, and in that regard I want to place on Hansard, for the information of hon. members, certain evidence bearing on the subject. What I am going to read is taken from the records of an investigation before the Board of Railway Commissioners under date Tuesday, March 8, 1927, a short time ago, as found at pages 4439 and 4440. Mr. Mallory, the director of the bureau of statistics of the Canadian National Railways, was the gentleman under cross-examination at the time, the examiner being Mr. Symington of Winnipeg Let me observe before I go further that I am quoting this evidence merely in order to make a comparison between the Crownsnest pass agreement and the present legislation. The examination reads:

Q. Now Mr. Mallory, I am looking at exhibit No. 126, pages 69 and 70. I see that in the first six months of the year 42 per cent of the freight revenue yielded 1.47 per cent of the net profits, that is Canadian lines.—A. Yes.

Q. That is true, is it not?—A. I assume your figures are correct.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Q. They are your own figures. The percentages are shown at a glance. You can say it is correct.—A. I have not checked them over, but I will take your word for it.

Q. In the last six months 57.94 per cent of the traffic produced 98.53 per cent of the net profits, on Canadian lines.—A. Yes.

Q. That is, taking the two six months periods. —A. Yes.

Q. In the last six months' period the greater portion of the traffic was handled in the west, was it not?—A. The ton miles accrued in the last period, the greater portion would be in the west.

Q. Yes.—A. I would have to check that up. I would not like to say that offhand.

Q. You are saying it, and you will find it in your returns; 70 per cent of that traffic was grain traffic; 72 per cent I think you gave us for the last four months.—A. In the west 72.6 per cent of the traffic.

Q. 72.6. per cent of that traffic was grain traffic.—A. Yes.

Q. Looking now at page 70 of the same exhibit, taking it in another way, the number of tons carried one mile in thousands that is your gross ton mile, is it not?—A. No.

Q. Is that the revenue tons one mile?—A. I think it is the net ton one mile.

Q. Are these figures compiled from the Dominion Bureau of Publications? Are they in the Canadian National statement the revenue ton miles?—A. That is right.

Q. On your whole Canadian system you carried 38.72 per cent of your revenue ton miles, and you earned 1.47 per cent of your net in the first six monts; that is right, is it not?—A. Yes, that is right.

Q. And in the second half you carried 61.28 per cent of the revenue ton miles on your whole system.—A. Yes.

Q. And you earned 98.53 per cent of your net earnings?—A. That is right.

Q. And again it is during the last period the percentage of grain movement is so high. the figures you gave me a moment ago.—A. It is 72 in the last four months of the year.

Q. And 60 throughout the year.—A. Sixty throughout the year, so that the first period would be less than 70.

Q. And the Canadian system, Mr. Mallory, in the year 1924, also at page 70, entered the last six months business with a deficit of $10,000.—A. Yes.

Q. And emerged with a net profit of $11,-764,000 at the end of the year.—A. Yes.

Q. In 1925 it ended the six months period with a total net earning of $352,000 and it earned in the last six months $23,493,000 throughout the whole Canadian system.—A. Yes.

I have also a table which I ask permission to place on Hansard without reading. It will thus be available to hon. members.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the hon. member give us an outline of the contents of the table?

Mr. GARDINER: The table gives those figures which substantiate the answers to these various questions and the fact that the Crowsnest rate is a paying rate.

Mr. RALSTON: Was it filed as an exhibit?

Mr. GARDINER: This is the evidence before the railway commission.

Mr. RALSTON: Was the table filed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes it was. The table is as follows:

GOVERNMENT OF SASKATCHEWAN

EXHIBITS IN GENERAL FREIGHT RATES ENQUIRY, 1925. FILED BY COUNSEL FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF SASKATCHEWAN. COMPILED BY ALEX. McDONALD, WINNIPEG.

P. 68

In the last four months of 1925 the Canadian Pacific Railway moved 52 per cent of the freight traffic (ton miles) and only 34 per cent of the passenger traffic (passengers carried one mile) and net earnings of $26,554,611 were produced therefrom, as against net earnings of $15,393,122 in the first eight months of 1925.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is quite a difference between these two classes of legislation. In the legislation now before us it is proposed to grant a subsidy to certain classes of traffic in the maritime provinces, while the Crowsnest rates on grain are a paying proposition. It is true that there is a maximum above which the railways are not supposed to charge, but notwithstanding what the railways and those who apologize for the railways have said, the evidence I have just read is ample proof that the Crowsnest rates are paying and at least the Canadian lines of our Canadian railways earn the greater bulk of their profits through the hauling of grain from western Canada. It is quite true that during the six months' period indicated in the statement I have read there is quite a movement of other goods, but that is by virtue of the fact that the harvest is imminent in western Canada. The grain movement causes these other movement of goods, and hon. members will recognize at once the value of the grain grower in western Canada to the total business of this country.

I do not think this particular legislation will be of very great help to the maritime provinces, because it does not touch any of the basic economic problems which they have to face. Unless you deal with those problems all that can be said of this legislation is that it is simply a handout for the time being. It is very similar to a man who comes to your back door out of work and hungry; you give him a handout by way of some food or a little money but that does not solve his problem of being out of work and unable to earn a living.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? How would he solve what he calls the fundamental economic problems of the maritimes?

Mr. GARDINER: I will come to that later. Therefore I say that this legislation does not touch any of the basic economic needs of the maritime provinces. There are no doubt a good many things which could be done for the maritimes, but we must remember that we have not before us the evidence which was taken by the commission, and are not therefore in a position to say whether any study was made of the economic problems affecting that part of Canada. I am rather inclined to believe that such a study was not made, and in my judgment the proper way to approach this question would be to go into the basic economic needs of the people dealing more particularly with their natural products and their natural resources. That should be the foundation of any legislation calculated to assist the people of the maritimes in recovering their economic prosperity.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Will my hon. friend permit a question before he leaves the matter of the Crowsnest pass rates? When the Crowsnest pass rates on grain were retained by this House, was my hon. friend in favour of that legislation?

Mr. GARDINER: I certainly was.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Can my hon. friend show the difference between the two pieces of legislation? The same object is sought in both cases. The method of arriving at it is immaterial.

Mr. GARDINER: I thought I had already explained the difference between the two pieces of legislation.

Mr. ERNST: What is the difference in principle?

Mr. SHORT: This legislation is designed to increase the business, as was the case with the Crowsnest pass legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: I was coming to that. Here we are going to subsidize the railway.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is any subsidy to the Canadian National lines necessary if business increases sufficiently? A subsidy would not be necessarily involved in this legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will permit me, I will make my own speech and will come to that subject a little later. No doubt there are several other things which could be done. For instance, when I was in the maritimes some three years ago, I was informed that cold storage plants were very essential to the fishing industry. That is a matter which might be given some consideration. I believe we have on the statute books to-day legislation that will assist in providing cold storage facilities for our fishing industry.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that an announcement is made to-day in the Montreal Gazette and Halifax papers respecting the establishment of a cold storage plant under that legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: I had not heard it but I am pleased to hear it. If further cold storage facilities are required in order to assist the fishing industry, the matter should be looked into and given every consideration.

There is the question of developing new markets. It is quite true that we may transport from the maritime provinces into the central provinces and western Canada certain commodities, but in my judgment those commodities will be what may be termed natural products. As regards manufactured products, unless the product is one manufactured from a natural product of the maritime provinces, it seems ridiculous to grant subsidies in connection with freight rates in order to transport from the maritimes manufactured goods which are already manufactured in Ontario and Quebec. It is true that we might do a good deal to develop foreign markets for the products of the maritime provinces. It might be necessary, for instance, to appoint special commissioners who have a good knowledge of the natural products of the maritime provinces, so that they might go into the world markets and assist in creating new markets for those provinces. Since I have been a member of this House I have heard members from the maritime provinces state in this chamber that there is only one thing the maritime provinces want and that is higher protection. That statement has been made on several occasions.

Mr. ERNST: Who made the statement?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has on several occasions made the statement or something similar to it.

Mr. HANSON: I never made that statement. I stated that we required protection for certain of our industries and I repeat the statement. We require it in regard to steel, for instance.

Mr. GARDINER: I accept the hon. member's statement; but the situation as I see it is that the maritime provinces are in much the same position as we are in western Canada in regard to manufacturing. We in western Canada can not expect to be much of a manufacturing country, and I do not think the maritime provinces can expect to be much of a manufacturing country.

Mr. DUNNING: Why should they not?

Mr. GARDINER: Except in regard to their natural products.

Mr. ERNST: We have quite a number.

Mr. GARDINER: I am glad to hear that. The reason why I make that statement is this: We have in Canada a banking system which controls the whole credit of the country. The boards of directors of those banks are mostly men in big industries in central Canada. If they find in the maritime provinces, or in western Canada, as the case may be, an industry which is competing to any extent with their particular industry, they are always in the position of being able more or less to withhold the credit of the bank and, by withholding that credit, to cripple the industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ERNST: Give an instance.

Mr. GARDINER: I think, if hon. members will examine the situation thoroughly, they will find that when the head offices of some banks were transferred from the maritime provinces to Montreal or Toronto, that was the time when industry in the maritime provinces commenced to decay.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is no connection whatever.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a big connection. Our banking system as it exists at present lends itself to monopoly.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): It is the best in the world.

Mr. GARDINER: I will admit it is very fine for those who are in it; it is the best banking system in the world for those who are bankers and control the banking system. But credit is a factor which should be given consideration because, after all, the question of credit to any business is very important.

If you cannot secure reasonable lines of credit, or if you have to submit your case to the head office in either Montreal or Toronto, probably a thousand miles away, you are not going to receive the same consideration as you would if there was a head office in the locality or a different banking system. It is reasonably safe to say that the banking system of the United States, while it is true there have been many casualties, has been largely responsible for the splendid development of that country, because the people who control those different banks, localized as they are, are interested in the development of the locality and consequently those parts of the United States flourished to a greater extent than they would have done under our banking system. I merely throw out as a suggestion that this matter might be given some serious consideration. I know hon. members to my right will pooh-pooh the idea that there is any connection between banking credit and success in business. There is a very close connection. Without reasonable banking credit you can never hope to make any business a success.

I regret that the government has introduced this legislation in this manner. I wish to see the maritimes prosper; I would like to see this House do everything legitimate to allow them to prosper, but I think the best way to give them an opportunity to prosper is to give them an opportunity to help themselves. I am not of opinion that handing out bonuses or subsidies of this description is in the interest of the people to whom they are handed out. There are many things that could be done to assist the maritime provinces. I am not satisfied that the commission made a proper economic study of the situation. If they had done so, I think their report would not be as it is to-day, because in my judgment, at any rate as far as the report indicates, they did not begin to touch the basic economic factors, and until you remedy the conditions that attach to those economic factors, there can be no prosperity in the maritime provinces. Handing out bonuses may help them for a time, but it will be only for a time and they will be back here asking for something else.

Mr. VENIOT: Just as you were.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that we got from this House anything for which we did not pay. I think we in western Canada have paid for everything we have received, and furthermore I am going to say this, that we expect to pay for everything we get in the future, if we ever get anything. My hon. friend seems to be very much perturbed about the situation. I would challenge him to show where western Canada has ever received from the hands of this House anything for which we did not pay.

Mr. VENIOT: If that is a challenge, I will take it up when the time comes.

Mr. MacNUTT: What about the Crowsnest pass?

Mr. GARDINER: I have already explained that. The hon. member probably was not in the House at the time. I am opposed to this legislation and I am going to vote against it. But if the maritime provinces or the government can bring forward a legitimate proposition that is going to remedy the situation that exists in the maritime provinces, I can assure my maritime friends that I shall be only too willing and eager to support it.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. member has given the figures for first-class rates pertaining to the maritime provinces and compared them with rates in the rest of Canada. Has he the figures for articles that come under other classifications? The first-class rates include only a very few commodities. Does the same proportion apply in respect of the other classifications?

Mr. GARDINER: I was dealing with first-class rates and I used only the first-class rates.

Mr. ERNST: Does the same proportion apply with respect to rates for other classes?

Mr. GARDINER: Pretty nearly so far as I know. I will probably give some further information before the debate is concluded.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on the second reading of this bill. It was rather my intention to wait until the bill came before the committee of the whole House. I thought that after the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) had fully explained the purport and effect of the bill, it would then perhaps be in order for me to meet as far as possible any criticisms that might be made in connection with the action of the government in implementing the recommendations of what is known as the Duncan report so far as they touch upon freight rates in the maritime provinces. Had it not been for the remarks of my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who always seems ready to drift into a political fight no matter how the other members of this House may feel over a bill of this kind, I would not have spoken on this occasion.

After I was elected in the last campaign and was honoured with a call to form a part of the government of this country, I revisited my native province and was met on all sides by Conservatives and Liberals, and I wish to state here that assistance was offered to me by the leading Conservatives in the province of New Brunswick, as well as by the chief Conservative associations. They were all prepared to forget party affiliations, to forget whatever party politics we may have played in the past, so that Liberals and Conservatives of the province of New Brunswick, at least, could join hands in bringing to a successful issue the requests of the people of the maritime provinces. It was left to my hon. friend from York-Sunbury to inject into this discussion a political spirit which should not exist here to-day. I regret it very much, Mr. Speaker, because since the Duncan report has been before the country I have received the sympathetic aid of many leading Conservatives in the province of New Brunswick in whatever efforts I might be inclined to put forward in bringing the Duncan recommendations into effect. I am sure the hon. member for York-Sunbury is not voicing the feeling of the other Conservative members of the province of New Brunswick when he attempts, for the sake of a little political aggrandizement, to surround this discussion with a political atmosphere. But since he has done so, I think it is only right that I should place before this House at least some part of the history of the agitation on behalf of what is known to-day as maritime rights.

My hon. friend from York-Sunbury referred to a small group of Liberals in the province of New Brunswick who, he says, have injected a spirit of political partisanship into this fight. He is referring, no doubt, to a motion moved on the floor of the legislature of New Brunswick in connection with the Duncan report, which motion was treated by the government of the province as a want of confidence motion and voted down. If that is the basis for his injection of a political atmosphere into this discussion, I regret it very much, and I want to say to the hon. gentleman that the Liberals sitting on this side of the House have nothing whatever to do with what is being carried on to-day from a provincial standpoint in the legislature of the province of New Brunswick. I do know that the Liberals who are sitting there in opposition, eleven in number, are strongly in favour of this government carrying out the recommendations of the Duncan report, and if the word of the Premier of New Brunswick can be relied on, and I believe in this instance it can—politically I have no faith in him, but when it comes down to a question of this kind, and where he feels it is in the interest of his province to support such a movement as this, I have considerable faith in his word—when I see that the Premier of the province of New Brunswick through the press and other channels of communication has told the province of New Brunswick that he is entirely satisfied with the action of the government in bringing down legislation implementing the Duncan report, and when he goes to the point of stating that this government has implemented the Duncan report one hundred per cent, it ill becomes the hon. member for York-Sunbury to say to this House and to the province of New Brunswick that we on this side of the House in bringing down this legislation that we are pledged to bring down are only giving half a loaf so far as the Duncan report is concerned, more particularly in the matter of freight rates.

Mr. HANSON: Altogether in the matter of freight rates.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not what the Premier of New Brunswick says. He says that we could not do any more than we have done in the matter of freight rates, and I am prepared to accept the word of the Premier of New Brunswick against that of the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. HANSON: When the Premier of New Brunswick gave that interview, was this freight rates bill before the House of Commons? Had he seen it? Did he know it did not provide for international freight rates?

Mr. VENIOT: The Premier of New Brunswick knew that there would be international complications arising, and he so stated. He was honest enough to say that if those international complications did arise, then the Duncan report could not be implemented to its fullest extent so far as freight rates were concerned. That was the statement of the Premier of New Brunswick, and I want to give him credit for it. That is more than I can give to the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

My hon. friend from York-Sunbury states that this is the fruits of an agitation that has been going on for a number of years in the maritime provinces, and he refers to what was known as the solid Nova Scotia group at one time in this House. He says that the government of that day turned a deaf ear to all their requests. Has my hon. friend forgotten that in 1920 the three Liberal governments of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island sent a memorial to this very House, to the Conservative government of that day—I am not referring to this to make any political capital but merely to keep the record straight—and the Conservative government of that day, of which my hon. friend from York-Sunbury was a supporter, turned a deaf ear to that memorial. Does not my hon. friend remember that in 1920 in the legislature of New Brunswick, led by the Hon. Walter E. Foster, a Liberal premier, he and the leader of the opposition, the Hon. J. B. M. Baxter, a Conservative, both joined hands in passing a resolution unanimously, which was afterwards passed by the legislatures of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, asking the government of that day to take into consideration the grievances of the maritime provinces, and stating specifically what those grievances were?

To a large extent the Duncan report supports the requests that were made at that time, in 1920. Not a word was said, no reply even was given to the representations then made by the three governments of the maritime provinces, and in 1921, again to keep the record straight, the same representations were made, and when the elections came on in that year the representative of the province of New Brunswick in the government of Canada, being then the Minister of Customs in that government, sat in council, and there was staring him in the face the request of the maritime provinces to protect our Canadian ports, and to prevent the export of wheat through American ports. He sat there when an order in council was passed by which he consented that $1,450,000 should be voted for the maintenance, upkeep and repair of the docks in the port of Portland, against the claims of the city of St. John, New Brunswick. That is the record, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to go any further into that. I merely mention it because I want to keep the record straight, and I hope the next time my hon. friend speaks of maritime rights he will leave the political issue out of it.

I do not intend to go to any extent into the details of the argument which have been presented. I am much surprised that my hon. friend from Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) is not more sympathetic, coming from a place of that name, when he knows that in old Acadia, the oldest colony in Canada to-day, there is a feeling in favour of what we call fair play, and I want to say to him that he has a misconception of the reasons why the maritime provinces are asking for this measure of justice. I want it to be distinctly understood —and I believe it is understood, and it will not be necessary for me to say it—that the maritime provinces are not before the House of Commons as suppliants for favours. We are here standing on the pact of confederation, and when my hon. friend from Acadia makes a comparison between this legislation and the legislation that brought about the Crowsnest pass rates, it is apparent he never has studied history. If he had studied the history of confederation he would have found that there was a pact between the fathers of confederation and old Canada, at that time Ontario and Quebec, that if we would consent to come into confederation they on their part would do so-and-so in order to help us out commercially, economically as they said, and otherwise, and when they laid the proposition before the maritime provinces those provinces were very prosperous. In 1867 Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island were prosperous, and showed greater prosperity than the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. While I am a strong and firm believer in confederation, while to-day I would not change my allegiance so far as confederation is concerned, I want it to be understood that I come down from a family that fought confederation from the beginning almost until the death of the parent that brought me into this world. I later on understood what confederation would mean, not only to Canada but to British connection on the North American continent, and for that I stood and for that I stand to-day. I want the rest of Canada to understand that when Nova Scotia and New Brunswick came into confederation in 1867, drawn into it almost against their will, when they were called upon to make the sacrifice they did it on account of a deep rooted sense of loyalty to the British Empire and a desire to maintain British supremacy in this half of the North American continent.

When the proposition was placed before the maritimres to go into confederation, the question of constructing a national railway came up, and it was pointed out that the Intercolonial railway could in five years become a paying proposition, but not if we were forced to build it, or to consent to its construction, along or in the direction laid down. By whom? Not by Canada of that day, Ontario and Quebec, but as a result of representations made from Great Britain through the admiralty to our Canadian authorities, that to build a road along the line originally proposed would endanger British connection, because at any time an unfriendly nation—although at that time the nation to the south was not unfriendly—might take charge of the railroad and prevent the transportation of troops and prevent the ports of Halifax and St. John, from being used in aid of Great Britain should war break out. The railroad was distinctly promised to the people of the maritime provinces and there is no gainsaying the fact. People may say "You cannot find it in the law". It is true it is not enacted in the law, but Canada can depend upon the honour of its public men such as Sir John A. Macdonald, or Sir George Etienne Cartier, or the Hon. George Brown. We in the maritime provinces depended on their word of honour, and I desire to say to this House that the word of honour of these men, in so far as it touched or related to the Intercolonial railway, was kept until 1912.

For forty long years the Intercolonial railway was administered and operated in accordance with the promise given to us when we entered confederation. The freight rates at that time were arbitrary and preferential and so arranged as to bring back, or help to bring back, to the maritimes something in return for the sacrifices they made when in the name of loyalty they came into confederation. Up to 1912 the maritimes enjoyed those rates, and I want to correct my hon. friend. Sir Andrew Duncan need not say it to convince me of the truth of the statement; I knew it before Sir Andrew came to this country. The Intercolonial was completed in 1876, and it would appear from the evidence we have that from that time till 1912 the interests of the maritime provinces were fairly well guarded, the freight rates structure being such as to take into account the requirements of their traffic.

Let me once more keep the record straight. In 1912 an act was introduced into this House of Commons sanctioning the increase of freight rates on the old Intercolonial, and my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who has tried to inject a tinge of politics into this matter, might go back to that record and ask who was in power at that time. It was not the Liberal party that was in power in 1912. I want to draw the attention of the House, especially the attention of my friends in the far-off corner, to the fact that in 1912, before we undertook to increase the freight rates on the Intercolonial and make them equal to the freight rates in Upper Canada, the Intercolonial had a surplus of $1,000,000. While I am on the question of surpluses and deficits, let me say to this House that in all the forty years of operation of the Intercolonial the operating losses were a little over $9,000,000, while during the same period the surpluses amounted to $1,666,000. So during the forty years the railway incurred an indebtedness of only about seven million dollars.

Mr. SPENCER: Was any allowance made during those years for interest on the capital investment?

Mr. VENIOT: Can hon. gentlemen show me any instance of interest being allowed on government expenditure in the west?

Mr. SPENCER: That does not answer the question.

Mr. CANTLEY: Or on any public works?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. As my hon. friend suggests, no interest is allowed on any public works that the government constructs. It is not a fair basis of comparison, and I am surprised that my hon. friend from Battle River should ask the question.

Mr. SPENCER: I asked the question for the sake of information. I am glad the hon. minister has informed the House that no interest was allowed.

Mr. VENIOT: All right. Let me go a little further for the sake of those who have not read the history of the maritime provinces. When New Brunswick and Nova Scotia came into confederation we had a railway from St. John to Shediac, and another, the old eastern section, from Halifax down to New Glasgow. Each of those railways was being operated by the provincial governments and making money. We handed them over as a part of the Intercolonial to the government of the day as one of the terms of the confederation bargain. We had undertaken to continue the road from Truro to St. John, and thence to the American border in order that we might get our natural and manufactured products into the New England states. What happened? The Imperial government in conjunction with the government of Canada, then Ontario and Quebec, forbade us to proceed with our undertaking for fear of international complications that might arise, and we were forced to accept this road along the north shore, 250 miles more in length than it otherwise would have been, to reach the seaports of the maritimes. It is for these reasons that to-day we are asking that faith be kept with us in regard to the Intercolonial railway.

Now, some of my hon. friends in discussing this matter tried to be fair, I suppose, but they were not fair. This may be because they do not entirely understand the situation. I am not going to undertake to meet the hon. gentleman from Acadia on all the freight rate comparisons he made between different sections of the west and the east. Allow me to say, though, to him that we do not regret any transportation advantage now enjoyed by the western provinces. Indeed, we are prepared to continue it because we are patriotic enough to pay our share, to help with our little mite in making the west more prosperous, even if we have to go down deep into our pockets to do so. I would remind my hon. friend that to-day wheat from the west is being hauled to our Atlantic ports over the old Intercolonial at a percentage rate lower than the actual haulage cost. The percentage is .63 cents per ton mile, while in the maritimes it costs us for through freight or otherwise 1.090 cents per ton mile. Now, although we are hauling western freight below cost and thus creating a deficit, we are not complaining. My western friends will always find the maritimes ready to fight side by side with them for what they can convince us to be right; and what we are prepared to do for them in the way of fair play we expect they will do for us in so far as the maritimes are concerned.

Mr. EVANS: Does not the wheat that goes down over the Intercolonial to-day take that route at the request of the maritimes?

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend should not raise that question. If it would not benefit you you would never send it over the Intercolonial. If it were not for the fact that we are in a hurry to prorogue parliament before Easter, I would be delighted to discuss that point with my hon. friend. But I want to go a little further. I am not aggrieved because of the criticism of my hon. friend from Acadia, for I feel that both sides have a right to be heard, and that we should point out as far as possible the righteousness—if I may use that word—of our case. My hon. friend made a comparison of local and through rates on similar mileage. Why did he not make a comparison of what I might call the domestic freight rates within his own province with what we are paying in the maritime provinces on the same mileage? I refer to this because I have heard it in the corridors of this building and in the lobbies of the hotels that we in the maritimes enjoy much lower local rates than Ontario and the west. It is not true. I have in my hand a comparison of freight rates for a 200-mile haul in the maritimes, in Ontario and in the west on grain and wheat products. In the maritimes the rate is 25 cents per hundred pounds, in Ontario 18 cents, and in the west 20 cents. Even Ontario gets a lower rate than the west. Now, let me take the rates we pay on our potato crop, which to Prince Edward Island and to New Brunswick, and to a large extent to Nova Scotia, is what the wheat crop is to the west. On an equal mileage we are paying for the transportation of this commodity per 100 pounds the highest freight rates.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I ask the hon. member to give the figures for hauls between certain points?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. For a 200-mile haul the rate in the maritimes is 23 cents, while on the prairies it is 22½ cents. I have not the Ontario figures.

Mr. COOTE: Will the hon. member give the points between which these rates apply?

Mr. VENIOT: There are a good many points which I am afreid my hon. friend cannot catch. Take a five hundred mile haul: the rate is 40½ cents in the maritimes and 38½ on the prairies.

Mr. COOTE: Unless the different points are given it is hard to verify the figures.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): These are standard mileage rates.

Mr. VENIOT: It need not be at all difficult to verify the figures. I give you a two hundred mile haul and you may take it wherever you like. My hon. friend says that he cannot verify the figures I have given. Was he able to verify the figures given by the hon. member for Acadia?

Mr. COOTE: What is the minister quoting from?

Mr. VENIOT: I am quoting from the freight rate tables of the Canadian National Railways prepared and compiled by one of the best expert freight men in the Dominion of Canada. Now some hon. members who have been listening to me may have some doubts as to the justice of our claim for what is ours by right under the pact of confederation. For the sake of these hon. gentlemen let me quote the observations of one of our great statesmen of that generation with reference to the Intercolonial railway. Speaking at Halifax on September 12, 1864, Sir John A. Macdonald said:

I do not hesitate to say that, with respect to the Intercolonial railway, it is understood by the people of Canada—

That is, Quebec and Ontario.

—that it can only be built as a means of political union for the colonies. It cannot be denied that the railway as a commercial enterprise would be of comparatively little commercial advantage to the people of Canada.

Then Ontario and Quebec.

While we have the St. Lawrence in summer, and the American ports in time of peace, we have all that is requisite for our purpose. We recognize, however, the fact that peace may not always exist, and that we must have some other means of outlet if we do not wish to be cut off from the ocean for months in the year. We wish to have greater security—to know that we can have assistance readily in the hour of danger. In the case of union, this railway must be a national work, and Canada will cheerfully contribute to the utmost extent to make that important link without which no political connection can be complete in Canada.

There Sir John A. Macdonald recognized this as a national enterprise and he was fully cognizant that the honour of Canada—that is, Quebec and Ontario—was at stake. If the Intercolonial had been built as a commercial enterprise and the maritime provinces had entered confederation distinctly on the understanding that the road would be built only as a commercial railway, then we of the maritimes to-day would be ready, to use a common expression, to take our medicine with the rest of the country. But that is not the case; we came into confederation on certain definite and well understood conditions. Just as Ontario and Quebec, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia all entered confederation in their respective days on condition that certain things would be done, so the maritime provinces joined the union fully believing that the pact would be lived up to so far as what was promised them. The government of this country is therefore in duty bound to adhere to the conditions of confederation, no matter what sacrifice this may mean to the treasury of the Dominion. That is the stand we take to-day, and it is the stand which I know every honest man in this House and in the country, every man who believes in British fair play, every man who believes that our public honour should be vindicated, will defend. Although we may not always see eye to eye with one another in our political transactions, although we may not all play the political game on the same side, the time, I firmly believe, has come when the people in this Dominion, of all shades of political opinion, are broad enough in mind and spirit to see that after sixty years of confederation the maritime provinces shall receive their due. I have faith enough in the broadmindedness and the sense of justice of Canadians to believe that there will be a general desire in this country to endorse such legislation as is necessary to implement the confederation agreement so far as the maritime provinces are concerned.

The Intercolonial was taken away from the maritimes in 1912 for no satisfactory reason whatever; it was not necessary to increase freight rates in order to make it self-sustaining. I therefore appeal with confidence to hon. members in all parts of the House to restore to us in that part of the Dominion that which rightfully belongs to us, and which will put us in a happier position, where we can feel that we are not abandoned by the rest of Canada. I know that when justice is done the maritime provinces by this Dominion there will be a widespread spirit of contentment in those provinces and a greater degree of happiness than at present exists. There never has been any fear on the part of the people of the maritime provinces that that section of the Dominion would ever become disloyal, either to Canada or to the British Empire at large. The people of the maritimes, in this sixtieth anniversary of confederation, are just as true to the Dominion as they have been at any time in its history, and if such calamity as occurred in 1914 should take place again I can assure the House that the maritime provinces will once again rally to the defence of British institutions. All we ask now is that we be given that modicum of fair play to which we are convinced we are entitled.

Mr. COOTE: Before the minister concludes, may I ask just one question? Is there any justification, from that statement which he has quoted from Sir John A. Macdonald, for the claim of the maritimes to have lower local freight rates than other parts of Canada?

Mr. VENIOT: Sir John A. Macdonald recognized that, in view of the fact that the Intercolonial railway was built for strategic military purposes, nothing would militate against the province of Nova Scotia or the province of New Brunswick in so far as domestic transportation was concerned. I did not take the trouble to read the whole of Sir John A. Macdonald's speech, but I would recommend it to my hon. friend's perusal, as well as the speeches of Howe and Brown. Brown opposed the construction of the Intercolonial for two years, but what was his attitude in 1866 before the conference was called in London? The Intercolonial railway was to be a national enterprise, and although he said it might not be a commercial success they wanted the road built in order to send Canadian traffic through the Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John. Ever since that time successive governments, both Liberal and Tories, have been letting too much freight go through Portland instead of through those two Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with conditions in the maritime provinces, I realize that we are face to face with a serious problem which is of consequence not only to the maritimes but to the whole Dominion. This bill is brought in as a government measure to provide relief for the maritime provinces so that they, at the expense of the taxpayers generally, may find a market in the Dominion of Canada. But why the government first of all selected this part of the Duncan report and made it their measure as the first and chief way of creating prosperity down by the sea, is best known to themselves. All I can say is that I am utterly opposed to it, for two reasons. In the first place it is vicious in principle and it cannot but lead to serious consequences in the future. In the second place it does not meet the situation, as the difficulty which the maritime provinces are experiencing is due less to freight rates than to other causes.

But let me deal with my first reason for opposing this measure. If confederation is to be a success, every part of this Dominion must be on an equality, and for this reason I say that this legislation in itself is unreasonable. The commission that was created to study conditions in the maritime provinces has not found there anything essentially different from what is prevailing in other provinces, with the exception perhaps of those industrial centres which lean upon the protective tariff and the politician. The rural parts of Ontario are in exactly the same position. The commission too asserts on page 10:

But the vicious part of the whole matter in my opinion lies in the fact that the government in 1925 put on the statute books a bill to provide for the equalization of freight rates over the whole Dominion. That bill has been a dead letter ever since. The government has made no attempt to equalize freight rates, but now it seeks to place one-fifth of the freight rates of the maritime provinces on the rest of the Dominion, including the three prairie provinces which are already paying from 15 to 20 per cent higher freight rates than any other part of this country.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend referred to a statute enacted in 1925 for the equalization of rates. Can he give me the reference to the statute in question? What is the chapter and the title?

Mr. EVANS: I do not have the act with me, but I will get it for the hon. gentleman when the bill comes into committee.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend quite sure that there is such a statute?

Mr. EVANS: Quite sure. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) quoted from an account of the investigation which took place lately before the commission. I will not repeat his quotations, but I would like to read part of an editorial that appeared recently in the Free Press of Winnipeg, a newspaper which MacLean's magazine says is the Manchester Guardian of Canada. The editorial reads:

> The investigation going on at Ottawa at the present into railway rates in Canada has already performed two notable services to western Canada. The first is that the old argument that the railways, under the Crowsnest pass agreement, hauled grain at a loss in western Canada has been exploded.

I would like my maritime friends to observe this:

> The second is that it has been established that the railways have been keeping their general rates from 15 per cent to 20 per cent higher on the prairies, not because of any real reason, but because they have been able to get away with it.

Public men made the east and particularly the maritimes believe that the east was being soaked in the matter of rates in order to make up the loss in the west on hauling grain. At the investigation the railway experts admitted to Symington and Pitblado that the prosperity of the railways depended on the western wheat crop. The editorial continues:

> At the rate investigation at Ottawa admissions have been obtained from high railway officials that wheat is not carried at a loss. The railway officials have been unable to maintain their argument that they lose money carrying grain at the same time that they increase their net profits when there is a lot of grain to be carried.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon. gentleman aware that only a matter of a few weeks ago the railway officials admitted before the Board of Railway Commissioners that the western grain traffic was very, very profitable?

Mr. EVANS: That is what I am reading, from the Free Press editorial.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely if there is evidence available such as mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) we should have the evidence itself quoted, instead of an editorial based upon the evidence. I am very anxious to see that evidence that the railways are making handsome profits in connection with the handling of grain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I shall be glad to show it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to have it quoted and put on Hansard.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We are on the second reading of the bill, and there are rules of debate applicable to the second reading, all of which are being disregarded. I agree with the minister that the bill should go into committee where we could have a full discussion, but this is not the stage to carry on a debate of this kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who has the floor may allow a question out of courtesy, but no cross-examination or general debate can take place.

Mr. EVANS: I promise the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) that he shall have that information. I cannot but express my surprise that he is not already acquainted with it.

Mr. DUNNING: I must be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that I was not speaking of my own acquaintance with it, but of the desirability of getting the actual evidence, instead of editorial quotations, placed upon Hansard. While I am on my feet, may I say with reference to the point of order raised by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), that I had thought of raising it myself this afternoon. What we are discussing is a maritime freight rates bill, which is now up for its second reading, but hon. members are using the occasion to place on Hansard all sorts of views with respect to the banking system of Canada, free trade and tariffs, and freight rates in other parts of Canada. I did not attempt to go into any of these matters in introducing the bill, and I presume, Sir, you would rule me out of order if I attempted to reply to them. As a matter of justice I think hon. gentlemen should be held more strictly to the question now before the House.

Mr. EVANS: I would adhere strictly to the rules, Mr. Speaker, but the Minister of Railways did not raise any question of order when my friends from the maritimes were condemning the Crowsnest pass agreement as one of the factors why they have to pay such high freight rates.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear any such expression from any member who spoke from the other side.

Mr. EVANS: Well, it was said.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think that statement was made.

Mr. EVANS: The legislation to equalize freight rates was enacted, in my opinion, to find an excuse for robbing western Canada of statutory protection against the skyrocketing of freight rates, and it has lain dormant here for two years, during which time a part of the crop has been hauled out, not on Crowsnest rates, but at a higher rate not regulated at all by the Crowsnest pass agreement. Now added to that, we have to bear one-fifth of the rate charged in a part of Canada which lies by the sea, and which, from an export country like Canada, should find a market for its products overseas. The maritimes also have the advantage of having a line of boats running below cost to their most prolific market, under the West India agreement, and the deficit on that service will have to be met every year by the country at large. The west has an average rail haul of 1,800 miles to reach tidewater, on which it is charged from 15 to 20 per cent more than any other part of the Dominion.

Again, I would quote an editorial from the Free Press which has gone out throughout western Canada, and I hope the west is taking particular notice of this. The Free Press of Winnipeg asks: "If this is the case, why should the west have to pay rates averaging 15 to 20 per cent higher than the tariff in eastern Canada? Have we been paying more because the railways were able to get away with it? Why should the rates be higher in the west especially when it has been shown that the cost of operation on the prairies is lower than anywhere else in Canada." This is something for the west to think about.

The admission made by Mr. Watson before the railway commission that a special privilege is given to the manufacturers on their products going to western Canada which somebody else has to pay for was quoted by my hon. friend from Acadia this afternoon. That admission clarifies the situation somewhat. But that is not all the privilege these manufacturers receive at the people's expense. For instance, the rates from Ontario and Quebec to the maritime provinces or to maritime ports are to-day 18 cents per hundredweight less than from the maritimes to Quebec and Ontario points; the traffic expert of the three prairie provinces is my authority for that statement. I want to tell this House that while the Crowsnest pass agreement did prevent to some extent the skyrocketing of freight rates in western Canada, the manufacturers in this privileged area in Ontario and Quebec enjoy a rate both ways that does not begin to cover the cost of the service.

Another feature of the policy of the government is this, that while ignoring their own measure to equalize freight rates over this Dominion, they also ignore the fact that the present rate structure to and from the maritimes is based on the short straight haul of the Canadian Pacific railway, and not as put forward by the maritime righters on the Canadian National railway, our old Intercolonial, which was constructed over a route 250 miles longer than it should have been. Those 250 miles which were built, as they say, for strategic purposes, are surely a benefit to those provinces since the railway rate is based on the short haul, and it has been responsible for a part of the deficit which the country has had to meet nearly every year. This has been practically a subsidy to those provinces ever since confederation. The 20 per cent proposed in this bill is an extra subsidy to be paid to cheapen the transportation of products of the maritimes going west. It is not meant to widen the markets of the maritimes for their products by hauling them further west, but is simply to be a charge on the taxpayer presented by way of a bill each year by the railway companies to parliament for the haulage of freight over this division. No one knows what it will cost. If it proves successful in improving conditions it will be to that extent each year an increasing burden on the rest of the Dominion. I say it is unfair because the present rate is based upon the Canadian Pacific railway straight haul, and not on the National Transcontinental. No one who has advocated maritime rights in this House during the last two or three years has ever once asserted that any pledge was given to these provinces at the time of confederation regarding this matter: that, after providing means by which their produce could be marketed in the Dominion, the Dominion was to pay any part of the haulage cost. No pledge was given regarding freight rates, and no one expected that part of the freight rate would ever have to be paid for them; in fact the Duncan report failed to establish the fact that any of the present trouble was due to any promises or pledges given at confederation. The rates in the maritime provinces have never been higher than the rates in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and anyone using the Crowsnest pass agreement as an argument for this subsidy must not forget that the Crowsnest pass rates were higher than in any other part of Canada on a given commodity over a given distance.

But let us look at this matter from another angle. When the maritime provinces, by agitation and threats of secession, can obtain a free gift of one-fifth of its rail rates, which are lower now by fifteen to twenty per cent than in some other parts of the Dominion, is it not natural that western Canada may ask herself if she is not paying too high a price to remain in confederation, and there will be more excuse for complaint than has ever been in the maritime provinces. Further than that, what will the industrial areas of Ontario and Quebec care how much they pay in taxes to meet their subsidy each year, as long as they can pass it on in the price of the goods they manufacture down here, and compel us to buy at their own price? By this measure I say the government is simply increasing the dose of the dope that has already reduced the country to a state of helplessness. This legislation is only a short cut-out for the time, and I can but classify it as shortsighted, unfair, vicious and unstatesmanlike. I am in sympathy with the maritime provinces as they are, but I want to meet conditions as they exist and go to the root of the evil now.

Mr. SHORT: Give us your remedy.

Mr. EVANS: I will. Now I come to my second reason for opposing this bill. I have said that it does not meet the situation, as the difficulties of the maritime provinces are due less to freight rates than to other causes. Those causes of impoverishment to-day are common to every province in the Dominion, and no one is feeling the result any more than the three prairie provinces. I contend the difficulty is common to every province and parts of provinces throughout Canada, with the exception of those towns and cities in central Canada which have thrived by the adversity in other parts, of which adversity they have been the cause. I hold in my hand a pamphlet entitled, The Position of the Maritime Provinces in the Political Economy of Canada. It contains a lecture given by L. W. Simms. It would be well perhaps for this House to know who Mr. Simms is. He is president of the T. F. Simms & Co. Limited, St. John, N.B., president of the St. John Board of Trade. He is also president of the maritime board of trade, vice president of the Canadian chamber of commerce and second vice president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. Surely this man knows what he is talking about. I will quote one or two paragraphs from this pamphlet. He says:

Turning to industry; the story of the maritime provinces under this head since confederation is a long series of tragedies. Some would-be comforters have tried to convince us, without knowledge of the facts, that the hard times in the maritimes were but the result of post-war depression that was common to all sections; but this industrial record belies them. You will find splendid industrial plants in many places in the maritimes standing gaunt and empty, or the stark ruins of once thriving industries staring mutely in a setting of tumbling cottages, once happy homes, their owners forced to go to New England for a livelihood. Not a few of these have been bought out, closed down, and dismantled by central Canadian competitors.

Then after describing how industry under the system of protection has been closed out to the maritime provinces by combines located in this central area, he says that the customs tariff and the law of trade restriction reduced the people to the state of slavery.

Mr. SHORT: Where are they reduced to slavery?

Mr. EVANS: Wait a minute. He crystallizes the whole situation by relating an incident, and I think there is nothing like an incident to bring home to anyone an unjust position. He says:

A year or so ago, a circumstance occurred which is unfortunately not an isolated instance of the nationally disruptive forces that commercial life has been guilty of. The jobbers of central Canada in a certain commodity went to the producers of this article, all of whom happened to be located in Ontario, and stipulated that no jobber in the maritimes was to get within ten per cent of the price they received. The size of their combined business was too important to be ignored, so the manufacturers agreed. Quite by accident a maritime wholesale house discovered the discrimination and protested vigorously. One manufacturer yielded to his protest for fair play, with the result that the central Canadian jobbers punished him by depriving him of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of business.

That is what is the matter with the maritimes to-day.

Mr. SHORT: Is that slavery?

Mr. EVANS: It is slavery. It is price fixing, which means death to industry. I had a resolution on the order paper dealing with this matter.

Mr. SHORT: How about the wheat pool in the west? Is that slavery too?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EVANS: I did not catch the question. I will pause for it.

Mr. SHORT: If that combine is slavery, what about the wheat pool in the west—is not that slavery too?

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman cannot distinguish between coöperative company which collectively sells the product of its members, and a combine which under the law is able to put its own price on the commodities that it sells to the public.

Mr. SHORT: Do not the wheat pool put their own prices on the wheat in the west?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. EVANS: As I said, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman fails to distinguish between coöperative enterprise and a combine formed for the purpose of price-fixing. The wheat pool operating in the west to-day is a co-operative enterprise and is able to a very great extent, not wholly, to market the wheat of its members at a price which it obtains against the competition of the whole world, and the benefit of that price accrues to the members of the pool, but formerly the combines reaped the benefit. That is one of the remedies that I would recommend to the maritime people to-day—to coöperatively market and distribute their own products.

An hon. MEMBER: They do.

Mr. EVANS: Well, we are aiming to do so in the west. Mr. Simms goes on to say:

The government and the railway commission may do much to adjust more equitably the burden of our abnormal 3,700-mile length and 100-mile width, but the business men of the country can, I believe, do much more by getting together and substituting a broad patriotism for short-sighted selfishness; a patriotism that will yield far larger returns to each of them, and thus evolve a policy of equitable distribution on a give-and-take basis.

I maintain, Sir, that they do not have to do it on a give-and-take basis. Not only the manufacturers but the distributors have a price-fixing power in the Dominion to-day.

Mr. SHORT: Do not the wheat pool fix their prices?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EVANS: No, the wheat pool sells its products in the markets of the world against world competition. In doing that it has to compete with the cheap labour of Asia and certain countries of Europe where men are paid a few copecks a day. It is unreasonable to compare the wheat pool with combines that are organized by the politicians of this country. The customs and tariff acts to-day are so administered as to give not only the manufacturers but the distributors the price-fixing power that they desire. Mr. Simms has well pointed this out in the paragraph which I have read from his address. Surely my friends from the maritimes are bound to take note of this fact.

Now, the government instead of meeting the real cause of trade stagnation in the maritimes, which is practically the protective tariff, have withheld the maritime report from this House for discussion, and in this piecemeal fashion seek still to aid the same combines which with this price-fixing power have despoiled the maritimes and now seek to clean up the whole Dominion. I say that deliberately. When the burdens of the maritimes are placed on the taxpayers of the whole country, it is simply a declaration on the part of the government that they are not willing to meet the real cause of the evil—the price-fixing power which they have given to these combines. Is it any wonder that maritime freight rates are high? Is it any wonder that freight rates are high throughout the Dominion? It is simply because the railway workers, to some extent, have been able to organize and demand a wage rate somewhat commensurate with the high cost of living caused by these combines. Let us meet things as they are. I tell the government right here that this measure ought not to become law until at least the bill passed in 1925 to equalize freight rates over the whole Dominion is put in force.

Mr. DUNNING: Again I ask my hon. friend for a reference to that statute.

Mr. EVANS: I will get it for you.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not exist.

Mr. EVANS: No excuse can be given for robbing western Canada of the Crowsnest pass agreement, which is not now being applied on the haulage of any commodities going west, and only to a very small portion of western territory on grain going east. I hope the west will take notice of what is being done. Then they will ask themselves the question: What part have we in confederation?

I want to repeat, though, Mr. Speaker, that I am sympathetic towards the maritime provinces. Why? Because we are in the same boat. We in the west have to meet the same conditions. I would urge the government not to beat about the bush as it is seeking to do by this bill. Confederation is a great and providential gift, and it is surely a travesty on our statesmanship that now on the eve of our jubilee celebration parts of this great Dominion are ready to withdraw from the union. What is the reason? Class privilege—nothing but class privilege. All industries in the Dominion, particularly since 1879, have leaned on the politician. It is time for a change. This Dominion can be a prison or a palace to its people as we choose either to follow the path of economic class selfishness or to further the righteous cause of humanity.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on the second reading of this bill will be very brief. I realize the desire on the part of every member to finish this session at the earliest possible moment, and I would not say anything on the bill at all if I did not deem it my duty to do so. Thus far in the debate no one on either side of the House has given expression to a very wide spread sentiment existing in the maritime provinces at the present time, namely, a sentiment of appreciation of the efforts of the government in introducing this and other measures for the benefit of the maritime provinces. I was very much surprised this afternoon to hear the partisan speech of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I should like to remind the House that in his remarks he did not in any way represent the true sentiment, either Liberal or Conservative, of the maritime provinces. I can assure hon. members that the feeling of the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island is one of appreciation of the government's activities at the present time.

I do not propose to go very fully into the merits of the bill before the House. The bill carries out one of the findings of the commission which was presided over by Sir Andrew Duncan. It has the weight of the findings of a non-partisan, independent and judicial inquiry presided over by a brilliant Englishman, which of itself, in my opinion, creates the presumption that these findings are sound and should be implemented by legislation.

I want to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) and particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the statesmanlike way in which this whole question of maritime rights has been handled. If we look back on the agitation which has been made for a recognition of maritime claims I think it will be agreed that there is not a man in this House, indeed there is not a person in the maritime provinces, who will not now say that the proper step to have taken was precisely the step that was taken, namely, the appointment of an independent commission of inquiry. It will be recalled that, during the course of the agitation for maritime rights, various views were put forward by various persons in the maritime provinces as to what should and what should not be done in that part of Canada. The Conservative party conducted the agitation for some years with great political success. They suggested a number of remedies of various sorts. Some of these suggestions have been condemned by the Duncan commission while others have been partially adopted. The course of the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia in the matter of maritime claims has been a tortuous one. In the year 1923 they started by advocating secession of the province. A little later they branched off to secession of the Intercolonial railway; and in the array of remedies which they advocated one was always in the forefront, namely, the restoration of the integrity of the Intercolonial railway. No one believes to-day that the integrity of the Intercolonial railway should be restored, that is to say, that the Intercolonial should be withdrawn from the Canadian National system. As a matter of fact the Duncan commission specifically finds against anything of that sort being done. I say, therefore, that the Prime Minister took the proper course when he decided, prior to the session of 1926, upon the appointment of a non-partisan commission of inquiry. It will be remembered that in the session of 1926 the government was bitterly assailed by the members from Nova Scotia on the Conservative side because of the appointment of that commission. It is quite interesting at this time to find the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) attempting, as he did this afternoon, to claim for the Conservative party credit for what has been accomplished. It is interesting to refer to Hansard of last year to see what stand was taken then by hon. members on the Conservative side of the House in relation to the appointment of this commission. My predecessor in the representation of Hants-Kings on page 969, said this:

> Surely we have a right to conclude that Bourbon stupidity could not be better exemplified than in the present proposal to appoint a royal commission to inquire into this matter.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis said on page 1415:

> We want no commission to tell us what is required to bring prosperity to this part of the country. . . . . We have no faith in commissions of this sort; they will not satisfy the minds of the people. . . . Why waste the country's money on needless expenditures of this kind.

That was the attitude of the member for Digby-Annapolis in the last session of parliament. At page 2331 the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) said:

> I have no present intention to here or now attack the personnel of the proposed commission, but for the weighty reasons I have referred to and others eqally important we decline to submit our case to or to be in any way guided or obligated by any finding arising out of an investigation by such a commission.

Later on:

> I again tell the government we do not want a commission.

The junior member for Halifax, at page 436 of Hansard, is reported in terms most emphatic against the commission, while the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, as reported at page 1351:

> We do not want any commission in Nova Scotia.

The hon. member for Inverness is reported as follows on page 1407:

> As to the appointment of a commission of inquiry, however, I want to tell them that on October 29, the people of the maritime provinces appointed their own commission. That commission now sits within the four walls of this chamber.

It would be very interesting if we had the recommendations of that "commission" put into force at the present time rather than the recommendations of the Duncan commission. To begin with, in regard to the question of freight rates, the Duncan commission has recommended three times as much in the way of benefits to the maritime provinces in this direction than the Conservative party ever advocated. The whole remedy as prescribed by the Conservatives of Nova Scotia for the conditions in those provinces consisted in the reduction of freight rates on certain traffic originating in the maritime provinces and terminating in central Canada.

That was the sum total of their proposal. You may scan their platform from beginning to end and you will not see any evidence of its having occurred to them that there was anything wrong with other freight rates than those on traffic originating in the east and terminating in central Canada. The Duncan report, on the other hand, properly recognizes the importance to the maritime provinces of local traffic and of the export trade. I was very much interested this afternoon to hear, from the lips of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, admissions which he never would have made in 1911, for instance, the admission that maritime produce is rushing by carloads from New Brunswick into the United States. In my own constituency, I know, the most important feature of the Duncan report, so far as freight rates are concerned, has to do with the export rates. In my constituency we grow a great many apples. Of this commodity we export more from that constituency, than is shipped from any other part of Canada. Some time ago I had occasion to look into the figures to see where these apples went and I found, taking the last five years, that of every 100 barrels of apples packed and shipped in Nova Scotia only seven went to the central provinces, while nine were sold in the maritime provinces and no fewer than eighty-four were sold abroad, most of them in the English market. Take potatoes, of which we raise large quantities: ninety-nine per cent of our potatoes go to the United States, Cuba and the West Indies. In the county of Hants we have large deposits of gypsum, more probably than in all the rest of Canada put together. Last year our output was 600,000 tons, practically all of which went to the New England States and to New York. Take, again, evaporated apples. We sent 300,000 barrels of apples to the evaporators in 1925. The finished product went largely to Germany and the Netherlands. Practically all of it was marketed abroad. And a great many of our other farm products such as turnips and strawberries, to mention a few, go to the New England states; others produced in the constituency, and which I cannot recall at the moment, find their markets abroad. It is therefore of the utmost importance to people in that part of Nova Scotia that the export rates should be lowered. From the map it may be thought that, being on the sea, we have no export rates to pay. This is not so. In the matter of apples, for instance, the rate from the town of Berwick in the county of Kings, which is a large shipping point, to Halifax was seventeen cents per barrel in 1915; it is now thirty-four and a half cents. The shippers consider that the rates on apples form an onerous burden which is not justified by the circumstances, and they are looking with great interest to the action of the government with respect to export rates.

With regard to the course this debate took this afternoon, I do not intend to pursue the lines of inquiry which were then started, but I agree with a great deal of what has been said by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). From the best consideration I can give the economic history of the province of Nova Scotia I believe that the question of tariffs is more important than that of freight rates, and that the greatest injury to that province has been done by the protective policy of Canada. I am not here to enter into a discussion of protection versus free trade, but I believe that the population figures, the figures relating to industry, and the facts which are apparent from an examination of the whole countryside show that the decline has been rapid in the province of Nova Scotia since and because of the protective tariff of 1879 and those which have followed. I am fully aware that certain industries in Nova Scotia may benefit from a protective tariff, such as the steel industry and possibly the coal industry, but nothing is more useless and nothing is more absurd than for hon. gentlemen to get up in this House and advocate a duty of $1 or $2 or $3 on coal, because at present it is not at all practicable.

Mr. CANTLEY: Why?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will tell the hon. member why. The Liberal and Progressive sentiment of the country is against it on low tariff principles, and the Conservative sentiment of the country is against it on business principles.

Mr. CANTLEY: If I may be allowed to say so, the leader of my hon. friend is on record to the contrary.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all; I think my hon. friend is entirely wrong.

Mr. CANTLEY: I can show my hon. friend a little later.

Mr. ILSLEY: Consider the Conservative party in Canada at present; we find one group from the maritime provinces which probably would be in favour of a higher duty on coal; we find a group from Ontario which would certainly be against a higher duty on coal, while the third group from the province of British Columbia would also be against it, because in that province they depend very greatly upon their export trade. As my hon. friend knows, a market for 50 per cent of the output of the Crowsnest pass mines is found in the United States, and about 10 per cent of the output of the Vancouver Island mines is marketed in that country. The United States has a countervailing duty; that is, the duty there is equal to the Canadian duty on coal. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said the other night in the course of another debate, a duty of $1 on Canadian coal would automatically raise the American duty to $1, which would put out of business a great many of the coal mines of British Columbia. I suppose no man in the House better knows the sentiment of the country with regard to the question of coal than does the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald), who represents a coal mining constituency. In the Halifax Chronicle of February 5 he is reported as follows:

> On the general trade policy recommendation of the report, and its lack of tariff recommendations, Mr. MacDonald said candidly, "With regard to duties on coal I am not hopeful."
> He said his experiences on the coal committee of the House last year had convinced him that central and western Canada are immovable in their opposition to such relief for the east.

That question was raised in the House, and his answer corroborated rather than contradicted that statement, because he said it was probable that central and western Canada would be against it. It is well known, so why do my hon. friends opposite tell the people in the coal mining constituencies that if returned to power they would raise the duty on coal? That is absolutely impractical as a political proposal, and I venture to say that hon. members on the other side of the House know it.

To come back to the argument from which I was distracted, I was about to say that I agree to a large extent with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) as to the fundamental causes of the decline of the maritime provinces. I think the Canadian tariff is probably the greatest cause, and that next in importance comes the American tariff. That is particularly true with relation to the fishing industry; twice in the history of Nova Scotia our fish have had free access to the American market, once between 1854 and 1866 under the old reciprocity treaty and again between 1873 and 1885 under the Treaty of Washington. During both of these periods the fishing industry was prosperous, reflecting a great deal of prosperity upon the province as a whole. We rejected a third opportunity in 1911, for which the great majority have been sorry ever since.

Mr. SHORT: Might I ask a question? Did we not have practically free access into the United States in 1912 or 1913, after we rejected the reciprocity treaty in 1911?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; there was a lowering of the tariff.

Mr. SHORT: And many articles were placed on the free list.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. gentlemen to come back to the question of freight rates.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the question of my hon. friend I will say that under the democratic tariff the duty on fish was lowered for some years, and perhaps some kinds of fish were allowed to enter the United States free. At any rate, that does not in any way detract from the argument I have been making.

I have referred to the Canadian and American tariffs, and next in importance to those have been the high freight rates, the gradual rise of freight rates on the Intercolonial railway. The historical course of events was set out very well this afternoon, and I do not need to repeat very much of it. The Intercolonial railway was built not as a commercial enterprise but as a public work, a national undertaking; its route was chosen not from commercial considerations but because of strategic considerations, and the understanding was that it was to be a great highway of traffic between the maritime provinces and the central parts of Canada. From its completion in 1876 until 1912 the understandings entered into at the time of confederation were faithfully carried out, but in 1912 when Hon. Frank Cochrane became Minister of Railways in the Borden government the rates on that railway were raised. As the rates were raised, and to the extent that they were raised, traffic was frozen along the Intercolonial railway; industries were forced out of business, and the raising of those rates contributed in a very large degree to the lamentable decline of industry in the maritime provinces which is so apparent at present. From 1918 to 1923 the Intercolonial railway was the only line in Canada which was not under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners; various local rates were raised here and there and the shippers had no means of redress and no court to which they could appeal.

I am thoroughly in accord with the spirit and the provisions of this bill, and I wish to express the gratitude of a very great number of people in the maritime provinces for the step taken by the government in this matter. I deplore such remarks as that it is only a half a loaf, and about keeping up the agitation, as stated by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) this afternoon. On this side of the House, and I think on the other side as well, I believe we have a fair degree of unanimity of opinion; we have heard members from Quebec and from the western provinces express their sympathy with the maritimes and say they are prepared to back up the government in the steps which have been taken in introducing this and other measures. Nothing could be more fatal to the cause of the maritimes and nothing is more certain to forfeit the respect of the rest of Canada than to have a group of agitators continue to talk about this being only half a loaf and about keeping up the agitation until all sorts of things are obtained, things which are reported against by the Duncan commission and which, as a matter of fact, would not be of any real merit or benefit to the maritimes.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, just prior to the six o'clock recess I listened to a fine address delivered by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). I was however rather surprised when he claimed that at the time the maritime provinces entered confederation they were enjoying a period of great prosperity. He asked the members to look up history in order to find out the facts concerning confederation. On looking up those facts I find that just prior to confederation the prosperity which had previously been apparent in the maritime provinces was already on the wane. I find that coincident with the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty with the United States in the year 1865, I believe, prosperity began to decline in the maritime provinces. To confirm that particular view I looked into the report of the Duncan commission, and I find this stated on page 10 of that report:

> We feel that the historical narrative given to us took too little account of the gain to maritime trade arising from the reciprocity arrangements of 1854-66, and the reactions of the American Civil war, and too little account of the changes that were bound to follow the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty which was practically coincident with confederation.

That does not bear out the statement made by the Postmaster General. The report goes on to state at the bottom of page 10:

> One more historical feature we must mention. It would not be straining history to say that the maritime provinces were themselves among the first to give birth to the vision of a confederated dominion, and that leaders of thought in these provinces who considered it to be their duty to oppose union in 1867, did so not so much because they were opposed to the conception of confederation but because of the particular circumstances in which it took form.

A not unimportant feature of these circumstances was that maritime trade had grown considerably since 1855, because of the conditions to which we have already referred, and the temporary character of that trade (particularly with the abrogation of reciprocity) could not at that particular moment be so well realized as in the retrospect of to-day.

That brings me down immediately to the findings of the Duncan commission. Some people seem to have a great deal of faith in commissions. I have on more than one occasion expressed my opinion in regard to type of commissions usually appointed in the Dominion of Canada. I had not very much faith in the personnel of this commission, and I am referring particularly to the one who presided over it. I remember that in 1925 the same Sir Andrew Duncan was appointed to investigate coal conditions in the maritime provinces. I remember how the same gentleman, even though at that time the men in the maritimes were earning a wage which was below a subsistence level, reported in favour of a 10 per cent reduction in wages. In addition to that he made some statements that are rather unusual as coming from a commission. When a commission is reporting on wages, it usually reports that the first charge on industry is wages. That is not the case with the report of the Duncan commission, which stated:

> We also recommend that, for the future, fluctuations of wages should be in accordance with the ability of the industry to pay, as determined by the proceeds of coal operations, and indicate the outline of a scheme with that in view.

In other words, if an industry is in a position of bankruptcy, the men who work in that particular industry would receive practically no wages at all. I wanted to find out who Sir Andrew Duncan was, and I was rather interested to learn only very recently that he is at present vice-president of the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation of Great Britain. It was rather startling to me to find out that the gentleman who had been appointed to preside over a wage inquiry in Nova Scotia was formerly secretary and subsequently vice-president of the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation of Great Britain. I wondered what would be said if we brought into this country as chairman of an arbitration board the vice-president of the American Federation of Labour. I presume we would have an enormous howl from the industrial interests who happen to be concerned in such an investigation.

I have another complaint to make in regard to the commission. In the first place this commission was composed of Sir Andrew Duncan, a gentleman from Ontario and a gentleman from Nova Scotia. If a commission was going to be appointed, I do not think anybody from Nova Scotia ought to have been on it because that would give the commission one in favour of that province. If we were going to have an impartial commission we should have three commissioners outside of the provinces that were affected. In the second place no one appeared before the commission who could in any way rebut the views that were presented before it by counsel for the various provinces down by the sea. Nova Scotia had its representative before the commission who presented a very strong argument in favour of that particular province and the other provinces who were part of confederation were brought in. But no one was present on behalf of the other provinces of Canada or on behalf of the Dominion of Canada who could offer one word in rebuttal of that evidence.

It was claimed in this chamber this afternoon that the real agitation for the rights of the maritime provinces commenced in 1921, when a solid Liberal bloc from the maritimes came into this House, and that in 1926 that situation was reversed when almost a solid Conservative contingent came to this House determined to fight for maritime rights. It was also claimed that the adverse conditions of 1921 were responsible for bringing the question of maritime rights to a head. I think in all fairness the maritime provinces were not the only provinces in Canada to suffer as a result of after-war conditions. There was in Canada hardly a province that was not in bad shape in 1921 and subsequent years. Although it is claimed that the maritime provinces were harder hit than almost any other part of the Dominion, I do not believe anybody was harder hit than the farmers in the prairie provinces. Those farmers, who had been selling their wheat for $2.40 or even more per bushel found that in that year the price declined to about $1.00 per bushel. When such a huge drop took place in that staple commodity of western Canada, the west suffered to a much greater degree than the maritime provinces. In the same period, from 1921 onwards, the west made very little progress; in fact, I can safely say that the west, instead of going forward, went backwards. The population of western Canada in those years showed no real increase; in fact I can and I will prove in a moment that in the large industrial centres of western Canada the population actually declined between 1921 and 1926. I have some figures here, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the city of Winnipeg, and I think what was true of the city of Winnipeg was true also of many other industrial centres in western Canada. According to the figures compiled by the city assessor of Winnipeg, the population in 1916 was 201,981; in 1921, 196,947; 1926, 197,125. The school enrolment which has an important bearing upon these figures, was 27,514 in 1915; 1920, 33,006; 1925, 40,767. There was an increase in the enrolment of the school children in Winnipeg of 13,253, while there was a decrease in the population during the same time of 4,856.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. What has the school population of Winnipeg to do with maritime freight rates?

Mr. HEAPS: If I might explain, Mr. Speaker, we have before us the Duncan report, which deals with the decline in population, and therefore the question of the decline in population in other parts of Canada may have some bearing upon the particular question before us.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the second reading of a bill dealing with freight rates.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, but the hon. gentleman is answering some statement made this afternoon by the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). I hope, however, that the hon. member will come more closely to the question at issue and discuss freight rates.

Mr. HEAPS: It may be pretty difficult, Mr. Speaker, to keep exactly within the confines of the bill itself. I notice that the Minister of Railways did not get up and check his own colleague the Postmaster General when he was wandering from the subject this afternoon.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear him wandering into Winnipeg.

Mr. HEAPS: No, but the freight rate question wandered into Winnipeg as exemplified by the fact that the Duncan commission sat for some little time in the city of Winnipeg. They wandered there anyhow.

I do not think it is fair, Mr. Speaker, to blame confederation for the conditions that exist at the present time in the maritimes. I think there may be other conditions that have brought about the depression in the maritimes apart altogether from the pact of confederation. Supposing that confederation had not come into effect; would the position of the maritime provinces be any better than it is to-day? I think there has been nothing given to show that it would be any better. Perhaps the nearest parallel that we have is the colony of Newfoundland. Newfoundland has been a self-governing colony all through.

She refused to come into confederation, and Newfoundland to-day is in no better position than the maritime provinces, if as good. I think the increase in population in Newfoundland—perhaps the Minister of Railways will not like me going into this question of population again—has been about the same as in the maritime provinces.

The maritime provinces have been complaining a good deal about the position in which they find themselves. I have in my hand some figures pertaining to the capital expenditure and receipts of the maritime provinces, and I find that in the year 1924 the per capita taxation of Prince Edward Island was $3.76; Nova Scotia, $3.72; New Brunswick, $3.60. I compare those figures with the figures of some of the western provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: Again, Mr. Speaker, I rise to point out that this is a freight rates bill, which has nothing to do with provincial taxation. I rise only in the interests of order and to keep the discussion more closely to this very important matter which is before the House.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not this bill arise out of the Duncan report, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill certainly is the outcome of the Duncan report, but it touches only one phase of that report, railway rates, and this legislation is brought in to correct what has been considered as a grievance of the maritime provinces. I quite understand, however, the trend of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, and if we were now discussing the whole Duncan report I would say that he was perfectly in order, but we are discussing in connection with this bill only one phase of that report, and I would ask him kindly to confine his remarks to that phase of the report.

Mr. HEAPS: It is perhaps a little hard, Mr. Speaker, after all the other members have had the opportunity of discussing tariffs and every other question in connection with this report, that I should find myself in the unfortunate position where I have to confine myself strictly to the bill before the House. But I gladly accept your ruling, and I will try as far as possible in my remarks to keep within the rules of the House.

The question then arises as to whether these reduced freight rates are going to solve the problem of the maritimes. Supposing this palliative which is now suggested by the government does not palliate; supposing it does not bring prosperity; what is going to be the consequence? Will the representatives of the maritimes then come here, as has been suggested, and agitate for something more that they want, agitate to have the rate extended as far as Montreal, and if that does not help them sufficiently, to have it extended as far east as Toronto? Will there be any finality to it? The fact is, in my humble opinion, that reduced freight rates are not going to solve the problems of the maritime provinces, and I object to this legislation on the ground that it is going to give to the maritime provinces a preferential treatment which I do not think they ought to have any more than any other part of Canada. We are in this particular bill giving to a geographical area within the confines of confederation a preferential treatment, and in my opinion you cannot have confederation on a sound basis when you give preferential treatment to certain provinces within the confederation, because where you show favouritism on the one hand, you are bound to create an injustice on the other, and where you have an injustice you are going to have an agitation to have that injustice remedied. The consequence is we are now setting up a precedent for someone to come forward at a later date and ask for similar privileges for other parts of Canada. I am in favour of giving privileges to none, and of treating all people in all parts of Canada in exactly the same way.

It has been stated that the Crowsnest pass rates are in themselves something akin to what is proposed under this bill. Personally I cannot see the similarity at all. In the Crowsnest rates as existing at the present time a preference is given to a certain commodity which passes through three or four different provinces over a long haul. In this bill we are confining its provisions to the geographical area of three provinces, and we are giving a twenty per cent rebate on all local traffic in those provinces, in an area which commences and finishes in the three maritime provinces. It is altogether different from anything in the Crowsnest pass agreement as it exists at the present time, and those who try to show us that this is equal to or similar to the Crowsnest pass agreement are not, in my opinion, conversant with the situation.

I now come to the question as to how much this is going to help the great masses of people in Nova Scotia. Will it give the workers of Nova Scotia any better working conditions? Will it give them higher wages? I do not think so. I think that ultimately all the subsidies given under this bill will find their way to a very small percentage of the people of those provinces; the great masses of the people there will receive very little indeed of the money which it is proposed to expend in the maritimes. The minister has claimed that these subsidies will amount to about two million dollars, as far as one of the railways is concerned. It will amount to twice that sum before we get through—four million dollars. And who is going to receive it? The railways will receive part of it and the large industrial and financial institutions will receive a great part of it. But the masses of the people of Nova Scotia will receive very little indeed. I hope I am in order in reading a reproduction from an article which appeared in MacLean's Magazine of October 15, 1926. It is written by a gentleman who is a good Conservative I believe. This is what he says about the maritime question—and I think it has something to do with freight rates:

> There are fishing communities where half the population drink in promises of wharves and breakwaters for six weeks. For the next four years they wonder when the material is to arrive, and then they start all over again. During the recent provincial campaign in Nova Scotia clever publicity men on both sides ignored the real issues, invented ridiculous slogans and appealed to the emotions and lowest instincts of the people rather than to their brains. In Queens county opposing candidates threw pulp mills at one anothers' heads, but it is a safe guess that the river Mersey will wind its way to the sea for many a long day before its waters lap the tanks of "the largest pulp and paper mill in eastern Canada."
> Is Canada playing fair with the maritime provinces? Who leased for ninety-nine years six hundred thousand acres of Nova Scotia's pulp and timber lands to be culled for export, at an annual rental of one cent per acre? Who developed hydro-electric power at a cost of millions of dollars, permitted it to fall into the hands of a corporation for one cent per kilowott hour, to be retailed to the citizens of Nova Scotia at approximately ten cents per kilowatt hour?

An hon. MEMBER: A Liberal government.

Mr. HEAPS: That may be all right, but it was not the Dominion government. If it was the Liberal government of Nova Scotia who committed the blunder, it is the people of Nova Scotia who should right these wrongs.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members must confine their remarks to the matter before the House, and I think the present discussion is not relevant.

Mr. HEAPS: During the whole afternoon the different speakers covered the situation and a good deal of the discussion was from this angle. They went into the question of confederation, into the various industrial questions and many other matters, and I am very sorry that I am unable to follow the hon. members in the remarks which they made. I would like to deal with many of these subjects, but under the ruling you have given, Mr. Speaker, I shall not be able to do so. The question of the wealth of the provinces was mentioned very often by counsel for Nova Scotia and mentioned also in the report itself, and if the government adopts the course of having the report brought in piecemeal and comprised in several bills it is impossible for any hon. member to deal with the report itself. It is a most unfortunate thing, because personally I would have liked to discuss the whole report. There are so many phases of the Duncan report which are outside the scope of any one bill now before the House that we find it impossible to discuss the basis of the report. And I think it is more important to discuss the reasons why the report has been brought in than to discuss the report itself.

I was saying that I did not think that the report was going to bring prosperity to the great masses of the people of Nova Scotia, and, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I find myself so restricted—which was not the case with other hon. members—I will close my remarks with that statement.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): It was not my intention to take part in the debate on the second reading of this bill until I heard the remarks of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) this afternoon. I think that some of the statements which he made should not go unchallenged. He seemed to be under the impression that the freight rates paid by the maritime provinces are higher than those which are being paid in western Canada. I am not very well supplied with quotations on railway rates, but I have here a few rates which might be some indication of the charges which are being levied in western Canada as compared with the east, on certain commodities.

I find that the rate on coal oil from Fort William to Tompkins, Saskatchewan, 978 miles, is $1.17, while the rate from Sarnia, Ont to St. John, New Brunswick, 980 miles, is only 68 cents. I find that on binder twine the rate from Fort William to Pilot Butte, Saskatchewan, 767 miles, is 98 cents, while the rate from Montreal to Halifax, a similar distance, is only 64 cents. The rate on agricultural implements from Fort William to Tilley, Alberta, 1,129 miles, is $1.17.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the hon. gentleman tell me if the same rate does not apply to his own territory, and does the rate not carry it considerably further than the particular point to which he refers?

Mr. COOTE: Not to the best of my knowledge. I think these rates which I am quoting are fairly comparative. Then the rate from Hamilton to Halifax, a distance of 1,129 miles, is 63 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. member tell me what he is quoting from, so as to enable me to follow him? If he is quoting export rates as against domestic rates, I should like to know for my own information. The minister requires to examine these things. Just what tariff is it that my hon. friend is quoting?

Mr. COOTE: These figures are taken from Canadian Pacific Railway tariff No. W4965 C.R.C. No. W2655. The distances are from the official distance table of the company. I will quote only one or two more—they seem to be so objectionable to the hon. minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all. I really need the information. If my hon. friend is making a fair comparison, the rates he is quoting are very significant and need looking into. If, on the other hand. the comparison is between export rates and domestic rates, the House well knows the difference between the two.

Mr. COOTE: Some of these points I will quote are not export points. The rate on agricultural implements from Fort William to Swift Current, 929 miles, is 98 cents; from Hamilton to Edmundston, N.B., a similar distance, the rate is 61½ cents. The rate on binder twine from Fort William to Gull Lake, 964 miles, is $1.17; from Welland, Ontario, to Edmundston, N.B., 967 miles, the rate is 66½ cents. The rate on wire, iron and nails, and so forth, from Fort William to Swift Current, 929 miles, is $1.14; from Welland to Edmundston, N.B., a similar distance, the rate is 57 cents.

This afternoon the Postmaster General spent considerable time telling us what eastern Canada had done for the west. I think it might be well if the people of eastern Canada knew something of what the people in the west have done in contributing to railway earnings. I am going to quote from the evidence given by Mr. Symington before the special transportation rates committee of this House in 1923. He took the figures I am about to quote from data supplied by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the railway commission, and anyone can verify the figures by referring to the official reports of that committee. He said:

For the years 1907 to 1911 inclusive, the net earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway on western lines as compared with eastern lines are as follows: on eastern lines, $43,500,000; on western lines, $91,500,000; or 110 per cent greater in western Canada than in the east.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend give the comparative mileage?

Mr. COOTE: I have not the comparative mileage before me. I am trying to show the Postmaster General what western Canada has contributed to the net earnings of the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. VENIOT: The Postmaster General never denied that western Canada had done its share. I found no fault with western Canada at all.

Mr. COOTE: I am not finding any fault with eastern Canada either, but I am trying to enlighten the Postmaster General on what western Canada has done.

Mr. VENIOT: You need not.

Mr. COOTE:

For the next five year period, 1912 to 1916, the net earnings on eastern lines were $60,000,000, while on western lines they were $152,000,000, or 154 per cent greater. For the next five-year period, 1916 to 1920, the net earnings on eastern lines were $70,000,000, while on western lines they were $144,000,000, or 105 per cent greater. For the year 1921 the net earnings on eastern lines were $11,000,000, while on western lines they were $30,000,000, or 157 per cent greater.

For this total of sixteen years the net earnings on eastern lines were $184,500,000, while on western lines they were $417,500,000.

There seems to be a pretty general impression in this House that the railways in western Canada are not getting sufficiently high rates, but I think these figures should quiet the fears of hon. gentlemen in that regard.

Then I should like to remind the House, when it is thought that western Canada is getting some undue benefit in respect of freight rates, of a speech delivered by Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in New York on February 22, 1925, to an audience of railway men. Referring to the Canadian Northern railway, he said:

While a great conception carried to physical completion it failed because it was built before its time, and could not be operated successfully through the dislocation of war time. If instead of turning its prairie lines into a portion of a transcontinental system, the owners had been content to make as their termini the mountains on the west and the Great Lakes on the east, they would have been the wealthiest men in Canada, and Canada would not to-day be facing the railway burden it is compelled to bear.

I hope hon. gentlemen will compare the earnings made by this railway in western Canada during the period I have given with what the Intercolonial was able to accomplish during the same period in the maritime provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know the House is very anxious to adjourn by Easter, and I should not like to be held responsible for delaying prorogation, but I want to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). It seems to me that if this bill passes we are doing something very substantial for the maritime provinces. But the hon. member for York-Sunbury says the maritimes are not going to be satisfied until they get Montreal fixed as the western end of the Atlantic division of the Canadian National system. He also warns the government that this is only the first instalment of what the maritimes expect to get. If so, I am looking forward with a good deal of interest to what the "first instalment" is going to cost. Then maybe we can get some vague idea of the ultimate cost. The Postmaster General this afternoon referred to certain pledges made by Canada, or what was then Canada, to the maritime provinces to induce them to enter confederation, and he said that now we were only carrying out the terms that were really agreed to at that time. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces in western Canada had nothing whatever to do with any promise made to the maritimes, but I want to say right now that we do not object to any promises so made being carried out, although our only share in these to-day appears to be to help pay the bill. The railway commission found away back in 1914 that freight rates in western Canada were from 15 to 18 per cent higher than in the east. That view was concurred in by the late Hon. Frank Carvell in one of the judgments which he gave as chairman of the railway commission. It is true that the increases which have been made since that time were slightly larger in western Canada than in the east, but I think the railway commissioners themselves are still of the view that the rates in western Canada are higher in general than they are in the east. I cannot see how anyone can say that the maritimes are only getting justice if western Canada is called upon to pay her share of the 20 per cent which will probably have to be handed over by the government to the railways. If the maritimes consider that it is just that they should have lower freight rates than central Canada because central Canada gets some advantages from the tariff and other things, then I think that we in western Canada are justified in the statement that we are entitled to the same preferential treatment. Is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) prepared to accept that as a principle in fixing freight rates in Canada to-day? The pledge I refer to, so far as I can find it in the report, is to the effect that the Intercolonial railway, having been built for strategic reasons and being therefore 200 miles or so longer than it would be if constructed in a direct line, should impose only such charges as would be justified in connection with a direct route. I do not think the maritimes are paying any greater charges to-day than they would if the line had been built over the shortest course; that is to say, the through rates to the maritimes are all based on the length of the Canadian Pacific Railway, short haul.

I would not object to the legislation now before us if it applied only to interprovincial traffic. If we wanted to do something to make it easier for the maritimes to trade with central Canada we should, in my opinion, give sympathetic consideration to such a proposal. But I do not see why one part of Canada should be singled out for preferential treatment in connection with local freight rates rather than any other section of the country. I do not see how the principle can be defended. I almost feel like saying that if the Minister of Railways can swallow that proposal, then surely we ought to admit that it is probable the whale did swallow Jonah.

I listened to the minister this afternoon as he spoke in support of this bill—or rather, spoke on the bill, because I could not find very much in his speech that was in support of it. I may be doing him an injustice, and I do not want deliberately to do so. But, as nearly as I can remember, the reason he gave for bringing in this bill was that the Duncan commission had recommended it. I agree with the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) in the statement he made in his speech on the budget, that this investigation was a very one-sided affair, what the legal men, I believe, term an ex parte hearing. Only one side was represented. The Dominion government itself was too busy with an election campaign to be represented at the inquiry, and everybody else who should have been looking after this matter was also busy. But evidently somebody in the maritime provinces was interested and was busy entertaining the royal commission, putting them in the humour to recommend something that would certainly be of some benefit to that part of Canada.

There are one or two things in the report that strike me as being somewhat peculiar. It is pointed out at page 10 that the commission did not find that any pledges had been made to the maritime provinces at confederation which the commission would be justified in endorsing. Let me quote briefly from what is stated on page 10:

As much indeed was admitted by witnesses who discussed this aspect of the case with us in the course of the evidence, and there were none who would assert, with any degree of positiveness and assurance, to what extent, and in what ways, there could be precise apportionment of fault to confederation. The truth is that the responsibility of confederation can only be a matter of speculation and not of proof.

It seems to me that the commission have stated in fairly definite language that they are of the opinion that it was not proved to them that there were any pledges made to the maritime provinces at confederation which had not been carried out, and that conditions in those provinces could be regarded as being in no way attributable to any failure to observe any such pledges.

Mr. DUNNING: The language my hon. friend quotes certainly is not to the effect of what he says.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me that is the only inference to be drawn from it. But suppose we agree that a pledge was given to the maritime provinces that a railway was to be built—let us admit that— and that although the railway would be longer than it should be inasmuch as, for strategic reasons, it followed the course of the river St. Lawrence, keeping in Canadian territory, it would not impose such rates as might be termed strictly commercial. Let us suppose that. But was there any promise, implied or otherwise, that after the railway was built local rates within the maritime provinces themselves—and there were railways in the maritime provinces before the Intercolonial was built—would be lower than in other sections of Canada? Surely that was not implied in any pledge given the maritime provinces. At any rate I have never heard it stated in this House, nor do I recall any such argument presented by members from the maritime provinces in the last six years.

The recommendation of the Duncan commission as to freight rates is to be found at page 22 of the report. It seems to me that there is one sentence in particular that calls for some explanation. Let me quote:

He further explained that, owing to grades and curvature, the operating and maintenance expenses of this branch of the railway were much greater than the average of the rest of the system and,—

[Mr. Coote.]

These are the words I want to direct attention to particularly.

—still further, that winter conditions in the maritime provinces necessitated special expenditure arising from snow and ice conditions.

I want to ask: Since when has it been adopted as a principle, in the fixing of freight rates in Canada, that because operations in a particular part of the country are expensive, therefore there shall be a reduction there in freight rates? The people of Alberta and British Columbia particularly are suffering from high freight rates; the interprovincial rates, I believe, are 25 per cent above the level of the rates charged on the prairies. This is due to difficulty of railway operation on the Canadian Pacific between Alberta and British Columbia through the mountain section. Now, are we going to reverse our railway rate policy in Canada and declare that because of difficulties in the mountain section, similar to those referred to in the paragraph of the report I have just quoted, therefore lower freight rates will be conceded? The rates are higher on the prairies than they are in the maritime provinces at the present time, and I say without fear of contradiction that there is no part of Canada where railways can operate so cheaply as on the prairies, and particularly in the western end. They are not bothered much with snow and ice conditions there, although the general opinion in Canada may be very much to the contrary. In the part of Alberta in which I live we never see a snow plow, and we have no snow and ice conditions to combat. Nevertheless we are paying higher rates.

It does seem to me that there is no true economic basis for this freight rate bill. I regret very much that a Liberal government has fallen for this idea of bonusing freight rates. Where is it going to stop? Why let us stop with the maritime provinces? Why have not the prairie provinces as much right to ask for the same thing? Why should not the Peace River country ask for the same thing also; they are isolated a thousand miles away from the ocean? Why should the maritime provinces be the only ones to receive such a benefit? I will put this question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) because he will have to arrange to pay the bill. Why should the maritime provinces get a 20 per cent lower rate on the butter for instance, which they hope to export to England, over that part of the haul which is across New Brunswick or Nova Scotia to tide water, while the farmers of Alberta must pay a higher rate if they desire to ship through Atlantic ports, on a three thousand mile rail haul? I cannot see on what grounds this legislation is introduced unless it is in the nature of a compassionate allowance to these provinces. Some maritime province members may be impatient with us for opposing this bill at all, but I wish they were in our position. We are seven hundred miles from the Pacific ocean, but the railway commission says that because the Canadian Pacific railway has a difficult section of line to operate through the Rocky mountains we must pay a rate 25 per cent higher than that paid by the people on the prairies. Then we have a bill presented to us by which the Dominion government is to pay 20 per cent of the freight rates on the products of the maritime provinces in order to get them to the sea board possibly one hundred or two hundred miles away; that is beyond our understanding. I do not doubt at all that the legislation will go through, but—

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Is he not asking at present for substantially the same principle to be applied to coal coming eastward?

Mr. COOTE: No, I have not yet asked for it, but I can assure the minister that it will not be very long before we will ask for it, because when this bill is passed the principle is firmly fixed. I would ask the minister a question. Is he prepared to give to all the other applications for preferential treatment just as favourable consideration as was given to the application of the maritime provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to answer that when it is my opportunity.

Mr. COOTE: Then I would ask the minister a further question. Does he consider it good policy to place such legislation upon the statute books simply because a royal commission recommends it? As near as I can gather that is about the only reason the minister can give. He may have other reasons, which I would have expected him to present to the House on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave them once and I will give them again.

Mr. COOTE: If this House gives second reading to a bill they agree to the principle, and I was a little surprised this afternoon that the Minister of Railways expected the House to give this bill its second reading with no further arguments than had been advanced at that time.

Before sitting down I would like to say that if this proposal were to assist the maritime provinces in their dealings with the other provinces, that is, to assist interprovincial trade by lowering rates over this long distance which separates them from central Canada, I would view the legislation very sympathetically, as I would view any legislation which would help bring western and eastern Canada closer together. May I say to hon. members that we in the west are under a great handicap. Under the tariff system of this country we are compelled to trade with central Canada; we are compelled to buy our supplies in central Canada; they must be hauled for a long distance across practically one thousand miles of rocks and Christmas trees, as one hon. member used to put it, and we have to pay the freight bill. Central Canada does not pay it; we pay the freight on everything we bring in and on everything we send out. Under these circumstances we feel this long haul very keenly, and we sympathize with the maritime provinces in their endeavour to overcome a similar handicap. It is true that the haul in their case is not so long, but it presents a difficult problem. But we fail to understand, why local rates in the maritime provinces should be reduced 20 per cent with the Dominion government paying the bill, because that means that every section of Canada must pay a share. Because I think this policy is unsound, Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against the second reading of the bill.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am sorry to detain the House at this late stage and at this late hour of the evening, but I feel that it is my duty as a supporter of this bill to give the House some reasons why I think it should receive the support and sympathy not only of those in the maritime provinces but of Canadians generally. I would not be human and I would not be of the generous disposition generally accredited to Canadians if at the outset I did not express the appreciation and the satisfaction which exists in the maritime provinces with the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 18. I also wish to place on record our acknowledgments to the commission presided over by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, of which Judge W. B. Wallace and Doctor Cyrus Macmillan were members, for the work they did. In four months' time that commission dealt with questions which have vexed and perplexed the souls and tempers of the people of the maritime provinces and of other parts of Canada as well for a good many years. The subject had been dealt with repeatedly in speeches; it has been the subject of election programs and campaigns, and in that short time these gentlemen heard evidence and arrived at conclusions far-reaching in character which I at least, as one Canadian, believe will do much to solve the problems and settle the difficulties which have existed. I feel that not only the sympathetic spirit with which they approached this question but also the businesslike attitude and expedition which they displayed is worthy of note in these days when commissions are reputed to take so long and to be so dilatory in their work. Notwithstanding what has been said from some parts of this chamber to-day, I believe the country generally is indebted to these gentlemen for the work they have done and for the way in which they dealt with the task in hand.

As for the Prime Minister, I want to express my personal appreciation of the earnest consideration he has given this matter and of the statesmanlike way in which he has carried out what we regarded as honourable obligations to the people of the maritime provinces in view of the appointment of this commission. I do not propose to make a partisan speech, but the Liberal party can at least say to the people of Canada that after speeches had been made on this question and after it had been a political football for a good many years, they dealt with the matter in a businesslike fashion, appointed a commission, told the people of the maritime provinces to bring on their evidence and make their case, and directed the commission to make a finding in accordance with the facts, and to make concrete recommendations. That commission acted promptly and made these recommendations, and it was with a great deal of satisfaction indeed that the people of the maritime provinces heard the announcement of the Prime Minister that these recommendations would be carried out. I am sure he would be the first to acknowledge that the decision which was arrived at came not only from efforts of his own, but from the generous spirit manifested by his colleagues in the cabinet, by members on this side of the House and I believe on the other side as well, and generally by the people of Canada, who felt that the time had come when this problem should be effectively dealt with. Therefore I feel that it is only doing justice that we should recognize—as I know the people of the maritimes do recognize—the splendid spirit in which this report and announcement have been generally received by all parts of Canada.

I regret that in this House there has been the suggestion of an issue between the east and the west. I deprecate any idea of competition between the east and the west for special favours at the hands of this parliament. I presume each hon. member has at heart the particular section of the country from which he comes. A man who came from Nova Scotia would be a very poor Canadian if he were not a Nova Scotian too. A man who came from Alberta would be a very poor Canadian if he did not stand up for the rights of his province. But I feel that when we come to this parliament, these problems can best be solved by taking a broad Canadian view of them, and I would commend to hon. members in the other corner of this chamber the action which was taken by that solid bloc from Nova Scotia in 1923 when they solidly voted for a very similar measure to that which is being asked for to-day on the part of the maritime provinces, namely the Crowsnest rate legislation. In that they showed that they as Canadians were anxious to help to solve the problems of the west. I believe, before the vote comes, our friends will feel that they as Canadians should be equally solicitous and anxious to help in this way to solve the problems of the east.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon. gentleman not rather asking us to stretch our generosity a point when he remembers that the government, under the same leader which he has to-day, took away from us all the westbound rates under the old Crowsnest pass agreement?

Mr. RALSTON: I will deal with the Crowsnest pass agreement. May I just make this point now? I am not making this statement in the spirit of throwing it up to anybody; I am doing it only in order to indicate that this parliament is big and broad enough to deal with the difficulties of any particular section which feels that it has problems which call for solution. The Crowsnest pass agreement and the statute which was passed in 1923 did what this legislation does not suggest doing. It said that for all time to come, or at least for as long as the statute remained in existence, the freight rates which existed away back in 1897, nearly thirty years before, on grain and flour, should be reverted to in the year of grace 1923, and that those rates should apply not only to the stations to which they applied under the Crowsnest pass agreement and to Canadian Pacific lines, but to all lines and between all stations. That was at least a spirit of justice. The hon. member for Bow River uses the term "generosity". It may have been a spirit of generosity. Nevertheless it was something which it was thought was required at that time by the people of western Canada and it was freely given by this parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman is still stretching our generosity. He has overlooked entirely my reference to the fact that the government in which he is now a minister took away from us the westbound rates under that agreement.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not aware of any taking away. If my hon. friends got for all time a rate which had been in existence thirty years before, notwithstanding the fact that the cost of labour and cost of operating must have doubled since then, and if they got it between all stations and on all lines of railway, surely that must have been some quid pro quo for not restoring the old westbound rates between the original stations on the Canadian Pacific. My hon. friend also knows that immediately an application was made to the Board of Railway Commissioners citing the Crowsnest agreement as a new basis of rate making and asking that the Crowsnest rates should apply westerly as well as easterly. I mention that simply in order that hon members in the country may realize that this House has endeavoured to deal fairly with all sections of Canada.

I must confess that I do not know as much about western rates as some hon. members have suggested they know about eastern rates. I can only take what records I have and be subject to correction if in any way I am speaking other than by the book. In regard to the difficulties of the maritime provinces in connection with freight rates, the increases in rates began, as has been said to-day, in 1913 when a 10 per cent increase was imposed on Intercolonial railway rates alone without any corresponding increase in rates in other parts of Canada. That was followed in July, 1915, by another increase of 5 per cent on Intercolonial rates, and still the rest of Canada suffered no increase. That was followed again in November, 1915, by another 5 per cent increase in rates on the Intercolonial railway alone. It was not until a year after that an increase of 5 per cent was made in freight rates in Canada, and I call the attention of the hon. member for Bow River to this fact that this first increase by the Board of Railway Commissioners applicable outside of the Intercolonial Railway applied only to stations east of Port Arthur. That was followed in 1918, March 15, by what is known as the 15 per cent increase which applied east and west both, but it excepted wheat, which is a pretty important commodity out west. That was followed again on August 12, 1918, by a 25 per cent increase in rates all over Canada, but what happened? When that increase was imposed all over Canada, the 15 per cent increase which had been imposed by the previous order was knocked off so far as western Canada was concerned. This left the maritime provinces and Ontario with the pyramided increases of 15 per cent and 25 per cent, whereas the western provinces suffered only the 25 per cent increase. That was followed on September 13, 1920, by a further 40 per cent increase—40 per cent in eastern Canada, and 35 per cent in western Canada. A provision was made that on January 1, 1921, a reduction was to take place, but the reduction in western Canada was a reduction down to 30 per cent of the previous rate, whereas the reduction in eastern Canada was a reduction down to 35 per cent of the previous rate. Thus, comparing eastern and western Canada respecting increases in freight rates, we have first a 10 per cent increase, then two 5 per cent increases and then a 15 per cent increase, all on eastern rates but not on western rates, and the first three of these applied to the Intercolonial railway alone.

In addition my hon, friends know that branch lines to a great extent have been built in western Canada. I am finding no fault with that whatever; but when the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) referred to the comparative operating revenue on the Canadian Pacific in eastern and western Canada respectively I do not think he was giving us very much useful information. This all depends on the comparative mileage in the east and west of road that is operated.

Mr. COOTE: Is the fact that these railways are very often in competition with each other for a certain piece of territory in which to build a branch line not pretty good evidence that they want more mileage in western Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: I am endeavouring to show that eastern Canada along with western Canada has tried to do its share toward providing railways for western Canada, and that these railways in western Canada just as much as the railways in eastern Canada are not attempting to pay the interest on their investment, because it is part of the development of Canada that western Canada shall have an opportunity to have its wheat transported for export purposes.

Somebody suggested in this chamber this evening that the west was paying 20 per cent more for transporting its wheat than the wheat rates in the maritime provinces. I want to refer my hon. friend to what I understand are the comparative rates on grain and grain products, not in any spirit of criticism, but only so that the facts may be known. Let us take a 200-mile haul.

The rate on grain and grain products for 200 miles in the maritime provinces, I am told, is 25 cents per 100 pounds; in Ontario, 18 cents per 100 pounds; in the western provinces, 20 cents per 100 pounds.

On potatoes, the rate for 200 miles in the maritime provinces is 23 cents per 100 pounds; in the prairie provinces, 22½ cents per 100 pounds.

On lumber, the rate for 200 miles in the maritime provinces is 14 cents per 100 pounds; in the prairie provinces, 11½ cents per 100 pounds.

So I do feel that the criticism is not quite accurate when hon. gentlemen are suggesting that western rates are already 20 per cent higher on grain, and that it is now proposed to reduce the maritime province rates by a further 20 per cent.

I would also call the attention of hon gentlemen to this. This country is expected to provide for the building of the Hudson Bay railway. The eastern members expect to vote for that railway. I think members on all sides of the House are pretty well committed to it, and there is going to be no grudging about expending that money. If conditions warrant the railway will be built and it will be for the benefit primarily of the western provinces; further it will divert a certain amount of traffic from the eastern ports, but nevertheless it has been dealt with as a Canadian policy and I assume that members on both sides of the House will support it.

I had a statement made up in order that the House may realize just exactly what has been done in this country of ours with regard to transportation, of expenditures and commitments by the Dominion government on railways, waterways and immigration from 1867 to 1925. I may say that the expenditure on immigration is a very small amount. I am going to hand this statement to Hansard. It is as follows:

Dominion Government Expenditure and Commitments on Railways, Waterways and Immigration—1867 to 1925

Aid to All Railways

		Expenditures in maritime provinces	167,998,856
		Deficit	$141,913,144
		Annual interest on above at 5 per cent	7,095,657

I will just give the House the totals if I may be permitted. The grand total of federal expenditures and commitments for railways, waterways and immigration since confederation is $2,817,389,222.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): How much of that has been expended in the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot give that, but the amount which has been expended in the maritime provinces, of that $2,817,389,222 is $167,998,856. The amount which would have been expended had the maritime provinces had railway expenditures made within their borders proportionate to their contribution based on population would have been $309,912,000. In other words $141,913,144 more than the share of the population of the rest of Canada has been expended outside the maritime provinces, and the maritime provinces have paid it. I am not suggesting, and this House will understand me I know, that there should be a meticulous accounting, and that you should argue that because the maritime provinces have contributed that $309,000,000 odd, they should ask that it all be expended within their own borders. But I do say that it makes a fair case at least for suggesting that if that extra $141,000,000 odd has been spent for the purpose of developing the natural resources of the rest of Canada and the transportation of those resources to market, the maritime provinces might fairly ask that in some other way they be compensated, and that some additional assistance be given to them in the development of their natural resources. That is fair, I think.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the hon. gentleman basing his argument for decreased freight rates for the maritime provinces on the suggestion which was made by the Postmaster General this afternoon that there was some promise made at confederation which has not been carried out?

Mr. RALSTON: I am dealing with the argument of the hon. member who last spoke who was pointing out the difference between the treatment of the east and the west, and I am endeavouring to show that the expenditures which have been made in connection with transportation facilities have paid no regard to the amount which the maritime provinces have contributed.

Mr. KAISER: You are taking the population as of what date?

Mr. RALSTON: In 1921.

Mr. COOTE: Has the hon. member any figures to show the amount expended since confederation on steamship subventions and on harbours and rivers in the maritime provinces as compared with the western provinces?

Mr. RALSTON: I thought I had those figures under my hand; I have them somewhere, but I can assure my hon. friend that the fraction they make of the expenditure in the rest of Canada is very small. That will not help my hon. friend very much if he has the idea there is any large disproportion in the expenditures on public works in the maritime provinces as compared with the rest of Canada. May I just say here, for the benefit of my hon. friend, who has no wharves in his constituency, that public works, wharves, breakwaters and things like that do not run into money like the construction of railways or canals. You can build a good many breakwaters and wharves for the price of one railway terminal.

Just one other figure with regard to comparisons between the east and the west. I have here the ton-mile earnings. Ton-mile earnings mean the amount which is paid by the shipper for carrying one ton of freight one mile. The ton-mile earnings on the railways in 1925 in the Atlantic region of the Canadian National railway were 1.130, while the ton-mile earnings on the western region were .764; in other words, it cost the people of the maritime provinces, or of the Atlantic region, 33⅓ per cent more than those of the west to carry a ton of freight one mile. Those figures are for the year 1925.

Mr. COOTE: I suppose the hon. member would admit that the earnings per ton mile depend largely on the number of miles the railways carry those tons.

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all; that is just where my hon. friend is wrong. The per ton-mile earning just represents one ton carried for one mile, and the only thing which can throw out the calculation is if you get some high class freight which yields a very high revenue per ton per mile. No, the per ton-mile is the best and soundest way by which to decide how a country is taxed for its freight.

One other thing. We have heard a good deal about the Crowsnest rates, and my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) had something to say with regard to those rates and certain evidence which had been given. He is right and he is wrong. He read some evidence given, I think, by a statistician of the Canadian National railways to the effect that under the Crowsnest rates the railways had paid. I want to point out to him that apparently it is not because of the Crowsnest rates that the railways have paid, I have been referred to the evidence given by Mr. Watson of the Canadian National railway on March 24, 1926, page 6269, before the railway commission in the freight rates investigation where this evidence appears:

The Chief Commissioner: Do I understand you to say that $6,000,000 a year was the loss in the grain movement?

Mr. Watson: Yes, west of the lakes.

The Deputy Chief Commissioner: And east of the lakes you are not aware?

Mr. Watson: No.

Apparently—and this is not by way of recrimination at all, but according to that evidence the grain rates taken alone did not at that time pay the cost of the service performed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. RALSTON: All right. I am simply quoting the evidence. Anyone may question it. I, of course, have no knowledge of the matter, so I am giving the page and line so that hon. members may comment as they see fit. So much for the west. I have referred to these matters only in order to show that equitable consideration is to be given in connection with railway matters all over this country.

I do not propose to go into the inception of the Intercolonial. It has been dealt with at length. It has been said that military and strategic considerations had influenced the location of the road, but I come immediately to the finding in the report of the Duncan commission, on page 21, which it seems to me clinches the matter. I am going in a moment to deal with the argument that the decision of the commission was ex parte. They say:

The maritimes case on railway rates was put to us in very considerable detail. The railway commission is at the present time dealing with these same details, and we have not formed any opinion on these matters so far as a judgment on their merits would involve consideration of railway administration and policy. On the broader question, however, of the incidence of the existing rates as a whole upon industry and employment in the maritimes, we have come very definitely to the conclusion that the rate structure as it has been altered since 1912 has placed upon the trade and commerce of the maritime provinces (a) a burden which, as we have read the pronouncements and obligations undertaken at confederation—

Some hon. members suggested that there were no pronouncements.

—it was never intended it should bear, and (b) a burden which is, in fact, responsible in very considerable measure for depressing abnormally in the maritimes to-day business and enterprise which had originated and developed before 1912 on the basis and faith of the rate structure as it then stood.

With that as the starting point the commission proceed to say that in their judgment the changes which have been made in the rate structure since 1912, the increases which have taken place in the maritimes as compared with the rest of Canada, is as fair a measure as can be made of the disadvantages under which the three provinces suffered and of the special considerations which should be thought of when fixing the rate structure for those provinces.

They recommend a twenty per cent reduction in the local rates. Someone asks why. Let me deal with that for a moment. They recommend that the rates between stations on the Atlantic division shall be reduced by twenty per cent. I have already pointed out that that would only approximately put them back to the comparative position which they held before 1912, because there had been the various increases which had been made in the maritime rate structure, without corresponding increases in the rest of Canada. But there are reasons why the local rates in the maritime provinces should have been on a different basis, and might have been in the first place put and maintained on a different basis from the local rates in the rest of Canada. In the first place, the principle of rate-making is that the railways may charge "what the traffic will bear." That is the time honoured formula—not "all the traffic will bear," but "what it will bear." One factor is the value of the commodity. You naturally charge a higher rate on diamonds than on coal, and more per mile for a short haul where there is dense traffic than for a long haul where you have little traffic. These are all factors to be taken into consideration. Taking that as a basis the situation in the maritime provinces was that industries were from time to time established for the benefit of the people of those provinces and for the manufacture of goods for domestic consumption. Rates were made on such a scale that the products of those industries would move to their customers. The position was not the same as in Ontario, where a man could manufacture goods and could almost throw them over his back fence into his customer's yard, but in the maritimes they had to move them a great many miles; therefore the unit rate had to be lower the further the goods had to travel. Another feature about the maritime traffic was that these goods were not carried in carload lots as they were in Upper Canada. Goods in the maritime provinces had to be moved as way freight and consequently the class rate had to be lower than in Upper Canada where the same goods got the benefit of a low car load rate. Distributing centres gradually formed at Moncton, Sackville, Amherst, and other places. In all these places where wholesale houses were established, rates were fixed so that they could reach the local market and compete with the man from Ontario, who had the advantage of the through rate although they had a longer haul. These were some of the matters which entered into the rate making on the Intercolonial when it was a separate entity from the Canadian National Railways. And lastly, they were dealing with a population only one-fifth the density of Upper Canada; therefore if a man was to serve his customers and get his goods to market he had to have a lower rate, because he had less goods to handle, his average haul was longer, and he was unable to do business on the larger scale. And so because of these factors the local rates in 1912 were considerably lower than the rates in other parts of Canada.

Now in reference to the deficit, which has been so much talked about; notwithstanding the fact that the maritime provinces had 250 miles of non-commercial road, notwithstanding that they had as I say only one-fifth the density of population of the other provinces of Canada, that they had not the possibilities of trading enjoyed by other provinces, and the railroad had not the same traffic, the rates were such and the transportation tax imposed on the maritime provinces was such that in thirty-seven years there was only seven million dollars of a deficit on the Intercolonial. What would have happened if the 250 miles of railway had been cut out, and if we had been able to save our operating expenses on the 250 miles of road which was non-commercial? Take the lowest rate of operating expenses on any road in Canada and you will find that in ten years the maritime provinces would have saved, if that 250 miles of road were eliminated, some $14,000,000, which means that the deficit would have been wiped out and the maritime provinces would have shown a surplus. Hon. members must remember this fact—which was presented to the commission—that there are many other conditions in the maritimes which make it very expensive to operate the railroad, the climatic conditions, expensive terminals, car ferries—the effect of all these is included in the deficit.

Mr. COOTE: Would the hon. minister not admit that the maritime provinces have a more dense population than the western provinces?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend about that.

Mr. COOTE: Alberta has about the same population as Nova Scotia, and the minister knows the difference in the sizes of the provinces.

Mr. RALSTON: I am only stating—and I say it without offence—what occurred before Alberta was heard of as a province. The condition I have outlined is what prevailed in the maritime provinces when Alberta entered confederation.

One of my hon. friends said something about the fact that the west was not bound by the undertakings which were made at the time of confederation. Alberta came into confederation after the promises had been made, and not only after the promises had been made but after conditions had become crystallized, and when as I say traffic conditions had developed as they were before 1912. That is the situation with regard to local rates. And so when the people of the maritime provinces discovered that the Intercolonial was being put in as part of the great National system and that all the rates were to be made uniform, they realized that difficulties would arise and that manufacturing and distributing centres which had flourished under the old conditions were likely to be adversely affected. As we all know, the situation did become worse. I am not one of those, Mr. Speaker, who contend that the only difficulty down in the maritime provinces is freight rates. I said that very frankly before the Board of Railway Commissioners a year ago, and I repeat it now; but I do feel that a return to the freight rate conditions which relatively speaking existed before 1912, will be of advantage to every producer and consumer in the maritime provinces. I am of course particularly interested in the fishing business of my constituency and while lower freight rates will be a benefit, the future of that great industry lies largely in the opening of wider markets, particularly in the United States. I cannot stress too strongly my personal opinion of the importance of continued and earnest activity with that object in view.

I am reminded that besides local rates there is another recommendation contained in this report and sought to be carried out by the bill. That recommendation is for a reduction of 20 per cent on the maritime or the Atlantic region proportion of the through rate. This simply means that the maritime manufacturer ought to be able to get his goods to Upper Canada on at least the same rate basis as if he distributed them locally. Montreal is the first great competitive market for maritime goods. There the maritime manufacturer meets his competitor from Toronto, and he wants to have somewhere near an even chance. I grant there is a longer haul from the maritime provinces to Montreal than from Toronto, but let me say that geography has been wiped out too many times in connection with freight rates for us to worry about it to-day.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: You will find in Ontario zones of two or three hundred miles where the rate is identical from any point within that zone to points outside. My hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) to-night quoted a rate from a point in Ontario to a point in the west. I have not the rates before me, but I will undertake to say that if he looks at the tariff he will find that the rate applies not only to the particular point he mentioned but to a hundred miles on each side of that point. Geography is wiped out entirely by the flat rate or zone system, and it is recognized everywhere. Further, as the Minister of Railways says, my hon. friend was comparing export rates with domestic zone rates, and as everybody knows, the two have nothing whatever in common; they are fixed on an entirely different basis. It stands to reason that the maritime manufacturer should at least have the benefit of the opportunity of marketing his goods in Upper Canada if we in Canada are to develop domestic trade at all. I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite, or at least some of them, advocate that that is the only and ultimate market for the maritime manufacturer. I am bound to say that I do not subscribe to that doctrine. But the way he can get a chance to place his goods there is by having his freight rates reduced.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: At that point would the hon. minister explain a little more clearly why there should be a reduction in the purely local rates? I cannot quite see his reason.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to be discourteous in the slightest, because I know my hon. friend is seeking for information, but I have already gone over the ground pretty thoroughly and the explanation is somewhat long. He will understand that the object of this bill is to get back by an arbitrary figure of 20 per cent reduction to the basis of 1912 when local rates were lower; or to put it another way, to wipe out the disproportionate increases which have been made in maritime rates since 1912. His question is really why were the maritime rates lower before 1912? I will try and restate what I have said, and will put the last reason first. First, because of the sparse population; second, because of the long establishment of industrial centres in the maritimes, local rates from which were made sufficiently low to enable manufactured products to move to the manufacturer's customers; third, because of the establishment of distributing centres at certain points in the maritimes and the fixing of distributing rates to move the goods, and, fourth, because of the small volume of goods moved, the less than carload rates had to be made considerably lower than in Ontario and other parts of Canada where goods generally speaking moved at the low carload rate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would it be true, as stated on the floor to-day, that the greater the volume of local traffic the greater the bill that will have to be paid by the government?

Mr. RALSTON: No. You have to have an engine and train crew with only twenty cars, and if your volume of traffic requires a forty-car train you necessarily reduce the ton-mile cost. I think everyone will acknowledge that the minute you begin to divide your overhead by a greater volume of business down goes your cost.

Mr. BROWN: Is not that the explanation of the low ton-mile cost on the western prairies?

Mr. RALSTON: Possibly.

Mr. SPENCER: What the hon. minister says is quite true as far as the cost to the railway goes; but as far as the Dominion exchequer is concerned, the more freight that is moved, the freight rates being the same, it will have to pay one-fifth of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has not studied the bill.

Mr. RALSTON: If he studies the bill he will find that the Dominion treasury pays the deficit, not one-fifth of the cost. That was the objection suggested to the method proposed by the commission. It is overcome in this bill by the provision that the federal treasury shall pay only the deficit. I do hope that within five years the record which my hon. friend says is true of the Crowsnest rates may prove to be true also of the maritime rates, and that because of the lower rates we may have a surplus. The peculiar thing was that after the rates were raised in the maritimes in 1918 and 1919 on the amalgamation of the Intercolonial with the larger system the deficits began to increase, and instead of one or two million dollars they were from five to six million dollars a year although the rates were higher.

The lower westbound rate permits the maritime manufacturer to deal with his customers in upper Canada and to compete with Ontario and Quebec firms. I wish to put on record what I think is of some significance in our national development. I confess it was a surprise to me when it took place at the meeting of the Board of Railway Commissioners in Moncton. Quite unsolicited, a resolution was presented from the Board of Trade of Toronto formally and distinctly recognizing that the maritime provinces were entitled to a market in Quebec and upper Canada. The last paragraph is, I think, worthy of going on Hansard. It was read by Mr. Thomas Marshall, traffic manager of the Toronto Board of Trade, and is as follows:

The Toronto Board of Trade is desirous that our friends of the maritime provinces obtain some measure of relief which will assist them in marketing their products in the central provinces, and to that end would favour extending to them a reasonable westbound freight rate differential, and feel that in so far as the membership of this board of trade is concerned it would not object to such an adjustment in class rates as would be found necessary to recoup the carriers for loss in revenue ensuing from such a reduction in the westbound rates.

It pretty nearly marks an epoch in the history of the Dominion when a board of trade in central Canada says, in effect, if the railways are going to lose by making a rate which permits the maritime shipper to send his goods to the markets of Ontario and Quebec, we are willing that there shall be such an adjustment as will recoup the carriers for that loss. I thought it showed a very fine spirit. Somebody will ask, why are not eastbound rates reduced also? For a very good reason, well known, they tell me, in freight rate making. The man on the circumference who has to trade towards the centre is entitled to a little better rate than the man who, situated in the centre, can trade towards both sides of the circle. Therefore, while the Halifax or St. John shipper gets a certain rate to Montreal or Toronto, the Toronto man will not, under the recommendations of the Duncan report, receive equal consideration coming east. The rate which will take goods from Halifax to Toronto will probably bring goods from Toronto only as far as Truro; or, putting it the other way, the rate for goods from Toronto to Halifax will probably carry goods from Halifax to a point 100 miles west of Toronto. As I say, the man on the seaboard can trade only in one direction and he is therefore entitled to an advantage. Some people have been shocked by this, but I may assure the House that this provision was recognized in the freight rates as they existed up to 1912. For example, the rate from Montreal to Halifax was 56 cents, whereas from Halifax to Montreal it was only 50 cents. In May 1912, however, the whole thing was ironed out, and a 56 cent rate was inaugurated both ways. Before 1912 from Montreal to Sydney the rate was 64 cents as against a rate from Sydney to Montreal of 55 cents. The same thing appertains in the United States. The rate from Chicago to Boston is $1.49 per 100 first class, whereas from Boston to Chicago it is only $1.42; from St. Louis to Boston it is $1.73, and from Boston to St. Louis, $1.66. The difference was specially accentuated on what we know as the differential all-rail route, which is a route in the United States from Boston to Chicago participated in to a large extent by Canadian lines, and the differential there is as great as on the standard all-rail route. The through rate from Chicago to Boston is $1.49 whereas from Boston to Chicago it is $1.42 the reason for the lower rate in one direction being as I have stated.

I will not at this stage deal at any length with the question of international rates, but in committee I shall if necessary have a word or two to say with regard to the international and import rates which are excluded from the provisions of this bill. I do not want to delay the House further with any citation of rates. I merely want to emphasize what I stated a few moments ago with reference to my appreciation of the provisions of this bill and the manner in which the Duncan report has been received. The bill will, I think, be found to be a practical implementing of the Duncan report, as to local and through Canadian rates. But it is something more than that. There are in the maritime provinces certain roads which are not under the control of the Canadian National Railways; I might mention the Dominion Atlantic railway, owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific from St. John to Montreal, the Sydney and Louisburg, the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company's road from Springhill to Parrsboro, and some others. These are not dealt with directly by the Duncan report, but the commission suggests that if, as the result of a reduction of rates on the Canadian National Railways, the "other great railway system" meaning of course the Canadian Pacific Railway, finds itself prejudiced, then "equitable consideration" should be given it. This means that if, in the case of the Dominion Atlantic Railway for example, the conditions were such that it was competing with the Canadian National Railways on some certain traffic and had to bring its rates down to the new reduced rate of the Canadian National in order to hold the business, then the government should make some provision to help out. But there is no suggestion anywhere in the report that if the Dominion Atlantic is not forced by competition to reduce its rates, the government shall come to the assistance of those making use of the railway. In other words the report only applies in terms to traffic on the Canadian National Railways or on such portions of the Canadian Pacific as are in direct competition and therefore have to reduce their rates. Section 9 of the bill provides however that all railways in the maritime provinces, whether competitive or otherwise, who reduce their rates below the normal in accordance with the spirit of the act, shall be reimbursed. It seems to me that this is carrying out in a broad spirit and not in the spirit of the half loaf, as suggested by one hon. gentleman opposite this afternoon, the recommendations submitted in the Duncan report. It meets the practical situation more than half-way, for it shows a determination to do full justice by the people of the maritime provinces and is an evidence that the government, having put its hand to the plough, will not turn back and that the shipper on a line other than the Canadian National has not been forgotten. By the way it has been said that the Dominion was not represented on the hearings before the commission. That is true, but the railways and their experts and their counsel were there, and it must be remembered also that the very constitution of the tribunal was such as to justify confidence in the thoroughness of its investigation and to ensure that all statements made and contentions put forward were duly tested and weighed.

I am not standing here as a special pleader for the maritime provinces. While it is true I come from Nova Scotia, I fully realize my responsibilities as a member of the government of Canada. Let me remind the House that confederation was, in the broad sense of the term, a partnership entered into by four provinces. Five more have come in and there is no use in our trying to get along if some of the provinces are unhappy and discontented. I believe that a reasonable effort has been made to bring contentment where there has been dissatisfaction. We in the maritime provinces have had no quarrel with the rest of Canada in anything that this Dominion has done to benefit other sections of the country. When other provinces have received what they felt to be their due, in order that their prosperity as members of Canadian confederation might be assured, we have always ungrudgingly supported their claims. When the province of Quebec added to her domain what was virtually an empire, when her railways were subsidized, her canals deepened, and Montreal was made an ocean port; when Ontario had her area trebled and her canals built; when Manitoba was doubled in area and means were afforded whereby the products of that province could be marketed at a cost 25 per cent lower than could the products of the country immediately to the south; when Alberta and Saskatchewan, in view of special circumstances, received substantial annual subsidies to facilitate their entry into the Dominion in at least comparative affluence; when, in the interests of British Columbia the construction of three transcontinental railways was authorized and that province had extended to her certain special treatment in relation to her railways; when all these benefits were received by the other provinces of Canada the people of the maritimes gladly acknowledged the right of their fellow citizens to generous treatment. It is in the same spirit of justice that the maritime provinces appeal to the House to-day to recognize the claims now made and to support the legislation now being brought down implementing the recommendations of the Duncan commission. My hon. friends in the far corner opposite suggest that railway rates are not the only thing. I agree and they seem to have overlooked that the program announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 25 included a great deal more than freight rates.

I want to impress upon the House that this report and this legislation mean much more to the people of the maritime provinces than is involved in a mere mathematical calculation, or in the printed words of a statute. I believe it will be and in fact it has already been received by the people of my native province as an earnest and genuine evidence of the practical good-will which those in other parts of the Dominion bear toward them. And so the people of these provinces will I believe realize that their fellow citizens throughout the country have sympathy with them—and in using that word sympathy, I mean it in its root sense as "thinking along with" them—and when you get different races, different provinces or different localities thinking along with one another there cannot be much doubt of their ultimate understanding and of the agreement and unity which is bound to follow. We have industry and energy and intelligence down there by the sea. Our people have become a bit discouraged, sometimes irritable, and, most disturbing of all, have felt a sense of injustice. I am prepared to believe, however, as I want the House to believe, that this legislation brings to them a new outlook, a new conception of Canadian unity, a new determination to ply their individual trades and vocations with vigour and industry and thrift, and a renewed eagerness to help make this Dominion, as a whole and without distinction as to provincial boundaries, a better place in which to live and a model of contentment and progress for the democracies of the world.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the whole House enjoyed the very able exposition of conditions in the maritime provinces which has just fallen from the lips of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). It must be remembered, however, that the bill with which we have been dealing this afternoon is a concrete proposal. The debate on the second reading of this bill has assumed rather wide proportions, and has involved a discussion of practically the whole maritime situation and a very general discussion of the Duncan report itself. In the few remarks which I propose to offer this evening I will try to confine myself to the bill now before us, which is entitled, "An act respecting the Canadian National railways and the tariffs of tolls to be charged on certain eastern lines." Lest silence on the part of those sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, should be construed as dissent from the proposal, I desire to offer a few remarks.

We on this side of the House desire in every way to facilitate the passage of these proposals arising out of the Duncan report, and desire likewise to expedite the passage of the various measures. The report has been before parliament and the country for several months now, and we assume that we have all read it, considered it and digested it. Personally I can say I have considered it very fully; I have discussed it with many men qualified to speak upon the subject and have also discussed it from an academic point of view in one of our institutions of learning. Therefore I have no hesitation in saying, Mr. Speaker, that as far as it goes the Duncan report is acceptable to those who constitute the official opposition in this chamber.

It is not my intention to go over the whole question to-night; I think it is unnecessary, and I will content myself with this remark; This is the second reading of a bill, but throughout the whole afternoon and evening it has resembled very much the discussion of a bill in committee. I have no objection to that if we do not have to go through the same discussion when the bill gets into committee, but I do think it has gone pretty far for a discussion on the second reading of a bill such as this. I am satisfied from a careful study of this bill that it carries out the main features of the Duncan report in regard to freight rates, and as such it should be adopted by this House. I do not consider and have never considered the maritime provinces in the position of communities basing their claims upon charitable grounds; I have always considered the claims advanced by these provinces to be founded upon principles of equity and justice, and the more I have studied them the less reason I find to dissent from any of the views expressed by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and his colleagues in this report. If I could offer a criticism it would be that the report does not perhaps go far enough in the way of remedial arrangements for the maritime provinces. I agree with the argument of the Minister of National Defence; I could enlarge upon it very much, perhaps, but I am satisfied that the House is now fully seized of the whole situation, and under the circumstances I believe it is our duty to pass these bills as expeditiously as possible.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker. I may say that I have no intention of being intimidated by those cries of "question"; I intend to say what I have to say and if there are any interruptions it will mean that I will occupy the time of the House so much longer.

At the outset may I say that I wish to make a few observations on this bill, and in doing so I find myself in the somewhat unhappy position of differing with the rest of my colleagues in this part of the House, differing not on principle but on practice, not on fundamentals so much as on incidentals. I feel, Sir, that in the consideration of maritime problems I must defer, and I think we from the west must defer, to a considerable extent at least to those gentlemen from that section of the country who should understand better than we from the far west can understand what their particular section of the country requires. In the last few years we have had under consideration many western problems, and in the consideration of those problems the members from the maritime provinces, from Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia were obliged of necessity to defer to us, who understood those problems and who should know the best remedies. Nevertheless, Sir, it is fitting and proper that I should give my own opinions of the problems of the maritime provinces, and in so doing I do not wish to express myself dogmatically at all; I am not inferring that they are really the problems of the maritimes, because I am prepared to leave that largely to the members from that section of the country. I wish to give to the House, however, what I feel to be some of the problems of the maritimes which have not been dealt with in this report.

May I say, first, that as I understand it the lack of markets is perhaps one of the fundamental problems facing the maritime provinces to-day, and in a measure at least that may be due to the protective system under which this country has been run for many years. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I have a little more sympathy for that part of the country than some of my friends who have never lived there, because half of my life was spent in the provinces by the sea. I well recall in my boyhood days hearing many bitter acrimonious debates on the question of the protective system, and I recall that in Prince Edward Island at any rate in the early days the great majority of the people were of the opinion that they had lost something by entering confederation, that by coming under the Canadian protective tariff they had lost the markets of the United States which they considered they could have held if they had remained out of confederation. I am not going to state whether or not that is so; I am simply going to give the House the impressions I received in my boyhood days when I heard these questions discussed in that part of the country.

I remember the feeling in the maritimes in 1896, when the Liberal party came into power after being out of office for many years; the great mass of the people thought the promises of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Richard Cartwright would be put into effect immediately, and a good many people thought that on the day after the election the grass would grow greener than it had been the day before, that the wheels of industry would start to hum in the maritimes and that the thousands of their young men and young women who had sought jobs and made homes in the United States would in time come back to the maritimes. But, Sir, they were disappointed. I am not going to enter into the history of that time, but the fact was that the new government simply carried on the policies of the old. They usurped the Conservative policy and no change whatever in tariff policy followed the change in government. It is possible that the maritimes sacrificed something in coming into confederation. It is possible that if they were outside of confederation to-day, they might negotiate with the United States a reciprocity treaty which would be of some advantage to them and, by admitting United States manufactured goods in free or at reduced rates of duty, they might be able to secure a favourable position for trade in that part of the country. I am not prepared to take a dogmatic stand on that. That may or may not be so. But I feel that those provinces sacrificed something in this regard when they entered confederation, and because they sacrificed something, it behooves the Canadian parliament to reimburse them, in a measure at least, for what they have lost.

I agree with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) that, in so far as I have studied the question, the troubles of the maritimes are due in some degree to the centralization of banking power, the centralization of the control of our banks. Some hon. gentlemen from the maritimes in this chamber to-night seemed to question the opinion of the hon. member for Acadia when he made a similar statement on the floor of this House. But I have in my hand a pamphlet written by the Hon. F. B. McCurdy, who is not unknown to many of my hon. friends, and he places this as one of the principal problems of the maritime provinces.

Mr. ERNST: Is the hon. member aware that the Hon. F. B. McCurdy is to-day an avowed secessionist?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The only difference between the Hon. F. B. McCurdy and many others is that he is quite honest and frank in stating his opinions. From the time I was five years of age in the maritime provinces to the time when I left there twenty-five years ago, I have heard secession talked in season and out of season, and every time I go down there I hear the same thing. I do not blame those people for talking secession, and I think, as a result of insistent propaganda on their part, they are getting some relief to-day. I am endeavouring to look at this from the standpoint of the maritime provinces.

Let me come back again to this pamphlet issued by the Hon. F. B. McCurdy. He points out that in the early days when the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island controlled their own banks, those banks were housed in very modest structures. He paints a beautiful picture of the palatial edifices in which these banking magnates are housed to-day, and he shows how all this expense is shouldered on those who use the banks. He goes back and speaks particularly of the Halifax Banking Company.

Mr. DUNNING: I rise to a point of order. When the Speaker was in the chair a little while ago, he ruled that the discussion in future on this bill should be along the lines of freight rates, the subject matter of the bill before the House. If I have followed my hon. friend's remarks correctly, we have come back to a discussion on banking. I merely suggest that the ruling which was made while the Speaker was in the chair should be adhered to by all speakers so that we may expedite business.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am basing my remarks on the preamble of the bill which deals with the Duncan report and I submit that the whole question of maritime problems can be considered on the preamble which I am discussing. In deference, however, to the request of the minister to facilitate the passage of the bill, I will take as little time as possible, but I want to point this out because I believe it is one of the problems of the maritimes as well as one of our western problems. The Hon. Mr. McCurdy, referring to the Halifax Banking Company, made this statement:

> Probably the total annual cost of the president, board of directors, and the inspection staff of the Halifax Banking Company did not exceed $8,000 or $9,000.
> The total amount of its investment in bank premises was $1,800; in safes and office furniture for its head office—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. According to a ruling given earlier this evening, I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks more closely to the bill before the House dealing with the freight rates.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I bow to your ruling. I submit however that the preamble should give me the right to discuss anything dealt with by the Duncan report. In conclusion on this point I will read the closing sentence in this pamphlet. He says:

> Centralization and autocratic control are rampant in this country, as well as the States, and it is not improbable that the next revolt in that great country will be against the system that is rapidly reducing the human being to the position of an inarticulate cog in a huge machine that operates for profit alone.

I wish to deal briefly with the reference made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to the Crowsnest pass rates, and in this at least, I assume that I am in order because I am discussing the question of freight rates. The minister stated that those rates were not profitable to the railways. I think he quoted Mr. Watson of the Canadian National Railways as stating that in 1926 the haulage of grain in western Canada meant a loss of $6,000,000 to the Canadian National Railways. I will give my hon. friend in that regard a few figures which will perhaps convince him and which, I think, should convince any reasonably minded member that the Crowsnest pass rates to-day are profitable to both of the great railway systems.

First, I might refer to the freight rate investigation in 1922 before a committee of this House. Before that committee we find Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific railway, predicting that if the Crowsnest pass rates came into effect in the next year, the Canadian Pacific railway would fall short by $15,000,000 of paying its fixed charges and dividends. That is a remarkable statement. Yet what do we find? In addition to paying fixed charges and dividends we find that the Canadian Pacific had a larger surplus than they had the previous year. That was after the Crowsnest pass rates had been in operation for one year, so we see how much the predictions of these officials are to be relied upon when the question is one of dollars and cents to them and when they are trying to influence a committee of this House.

I am not going to weary the House with lengthy quotations, but we find Mr. Hanna, president of the Canadian National Railways, making similar predictions for that road. He predicted that the deficit in 1922 would be $26,000,000 or $10,000,000 more than it was in 1921. Instead of that the deficit was considerably less than it was the previous year. I am going to give just a few figures for different months which, I think, should show clearly to any unbiased mind that the handling of grain means a considerable profit to both the railway systems. I will take the Canadian Pacific Railway for the year 1924. For the first four months of that year their net earnings were a little over $5,000,000. For the next four months, May, June, July and August, their net earnings amounted to $9,000,000. Those were the eight months in which little or no grain was being moved. When we come to the next period, September, October, November and December, the four months in which the great bulk of the traffic is grain, what do we find? We find that instead of $5,000,000 or $9,000,000, the net earnings amounted to $22,000,000 or more than for the previous eight months.

In the first four months of 1925 the net earnings amounted to $4,980,000; in the next four months they amounted to $10,000,000; but in the last four months of the year, the months in which again the great bulk of the grain was handled, we find the net earnings increased to the enormous total of $26,500,000. Surely in face of those figures no hon. gentleman who will give intelligent consideration to the subject can say that grain is being transported at a loss. Again we find that in the year 1925 the net profit was $23,000,000, but the four grain-handling months accounted for over $20,000,000 of that $23,000,000. I have similar figures here for the Canadian National Railway. I find that in 1924 their total net revenue was $11,764,000, of which $11,197,000, or almost the whole thing, was earned in the four months in which the grain was being moved.

When we come to the operating ratio, which is really one of the decisive indications, telling us how much money the railway has to spend to earn a dollar, I find that in 1921 the operating ratio of the Canadian Pacific Railway was 82.28; that is, the railway had to spend 82.28 cents to earn one dollar. The next year, 1922, was the year in which the Crowsnest rates were fully in effect, the year in which Mr. Beatty predicted that their net earnings would fall below the amount necessary to pay fixed charges and dividends, but what do we find? Instead of increasing, we find that the operating ratio decreased to 80.55; in other words, the railway made 2 per cent more profit than the year before, and so on; the profits crawled up year after year. That should clearly prove to anyone that the Crowsnest rates mean a profit to both railway systems.

In the consideration of the particular question before the House I must admit that I cannot find room for the criticism of the government that has come from other speakers in this section of the House. I am not entirely convinced that this is the fundamental remedy. I believe that there are probably other remedies. I think there are other questions that the Duncan commission might have investigated and should have reported on. But looking at it from the strictly legal point of view and from the standpoint of precedent, which is what seems to govern everything in this House, the government appointed a commission to inquire into the grievances, alleged or real, of the maritime provinces. They appointed a commission of able, capable men. I think this House would have approved of the personnel of the commission had it been asked to do so. The commission came back and made a very definite report to the government, and for the life of me I can hardly see what else could be expected of the government than to carry out these recommendations. Therefore I find myself in the position where I cannot criticize the government for carrying out the report of their own commission. The bill we are considering was framed with that end in view, to carry out the recommendations of the commission.

When I listened to the speeches of several of my colleagues in this section of the House, I compared them with speeches I heard here in 1922 against the Crowsnest rates, when some of the members from the maritime provinces opposed, and bitterly opposed that legislation, and again in 1924 they opposed the building of the Hudson Bay railway and many other issues of interest to the west. I think, after all, we have to be a little broader. We have, as Burns would say, to try and see ourselves as others see us. We have to try and judge a thing from the other fellow's standpoint. I believe the members from the maritime provinces who opposed the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and who very bitterly criticised the decision of parliament in 1922 to reinstate the Crowsnest rates, were just as honest and sincere in opposing those measures as my friends in this corner of the House are in opposing this. They looked at it from the standpoint of the maritime provinces. They were not as well acquainted with the problems of the west as we were. But in the last analysis parliament deferred to the wishes of the west, and I think in this matter we have at least to defer to the wishes and opinions of the people of the maritime provinces.

The question of rural credits, for instance, is not one of interest to the people of the maritime provinces. When I visit down there the people I meet always want to know why we in the west should want the parliament of Canada to give us cheap money. They say they can always go to a neighbour and borrow what they want at five per cent. They do not understand our problem, and naturally they object to parliament, for which they have a responsibility, being tied up to this thing. Another thing I always hear about when I visit down in the maritime provinces is the Crowsnest rates. The people there seem to think they have a distinct grievance on that account. Some people whom I know will always be convinced that parliament did them a great injustice in 1922, when it gave us a rate which they think is not profitable to the railway. Again, take a measure such as the amendment to the Canada Grain Act, which is of vital importance to western Canada. Our maritime friends offered no objection to those amendments, although most of them are not interested in the matter, and a good many of them may think that it is not striking at the root of our problems in the west, but they were fair and deferred to our judgment in the matter because we were dealing with our own problems, and I am asking my hon. friends in this part of the House to grant to the people of the maritime provinces the same consideration which we have received at their hands in these other matters.

Another great burning question in western Canada to-day is the return of our natural resources, and just here I might say that it is a matter of concern to our people to see something extra new being given to the maritime provinces when we see by this report that a province like New Brunswick is securing 37½ per cent of its revenue from its forests; when we do not even control our own timber. That is a grievance of ours, but I realize that to oppose the granting of this measure of relief to the maritime provinces will not assist us in western Canada to get possession of our natural resources. I ask my hon. friends from the maritime provinces to continue to extend to us the consideration which they have in the past, and at some future time I trust that this parliament will be fair to us and give back to us our natural resources, which are of vital importance to us.

I do not wish to delay the House any longer. I have some more notes, but I think I have said sufficient. I am supporting this bill with certain mental reservations. I will frankly admit supporting it in the spirit that is emphasized on page 11 of the report of the Duncan commission, and in concluding I would just like to read those words because they furnish the guiding principle of my action here to-night.

> We believe that the claims which these provinces have submitted in connection with the present condition, and the future possibilities, of their own part of the Dominion, should now be reviewed with sympathetic consideration and understanding, so that in approaching the future a better balance of territorial prosperity can be assured, and the original hope of confederation—unity, prosperity and contentment for all the provinces, as well as for the whole of Canada—can be made capable of realization.

I think, sir, if we in this corner of the House by supporting this bill can bring about anything like that and assist in maintaining Canadian unity in this country of ours, the little sacrifice it may mean will be amply repaid.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, after such a long debate as we have had to-day, and at this hour, I do not propose for one moment to discuss the subjects raised by this bill, although I regret not having the opportunity, because many of the points that have been raised I am sure could be successfully refuted. But a measure of this character is one of such tremendous importance to many of us that I would not like this opportunity to pass without placing myself on record, and I feel that I am fully justified in saying that all the maritimers on this side of the House will coincide with my statement in these few words; that we are thoroughly behind the bill.

Hon. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): I think this matter has been pretty fully discussed and that anything further that any hon. members may say will be merely a repetition of what has already been stated. Coming from the maritime provinces as I do, I suggest that if there is to be a vote it be taken now, but if a vote is not to be taken, that we pass the bill.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): This discussion has wandered far afield from the subject matter of the bill itself, and I do not intend to follow in the many by-paths taken by some of the hon. members.

There are two outstanding criticisms of the measure. One comes from the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and it is very plain in its terms. He states that the bill does not go half far enough. He will accept it as a half measure, or less than that, of what is really due to the maritimes with respect to freight rates and transportation matters. I regard his view as sectional in the extreme from that point of view.

Mr. ERNST: Personal.

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon. friend from Lunenburg says, a personal rather than a party view. The other criticism comes from the members for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), Macleod (Mr. Coote) and Rosetown (Mr. Evans), and is sectional in an entirely different way in my judgment. My mind goes back to the time when we who come from western Canada were putting up the fight for the return of the Crowsnest rates and their application to the whole of our western territory. I took some part in that fight, and I know what it means to feel as the people in the maritimes feel with respect to this matter. I know that the people of western Canada feel grateful to the parliament of the whole of Canada that the Crowsnest charter of freedom was returned to us with respect to our major product, and I want to express that gratitude to-day, because we were then, and may be again, in the position which the maritime provinces occupy to-day, that of coming to the parliament of the whole of Canada and asking for the measure of what we regarded as simple justice with respect to something which was vital to our economic welfare.

My hon. friends in the corner spoke ostensibly for the people of western Canada in criticism of this measure, treating it as if it were a measure of special privilege to the people of the maritimes instead of a measure of economic justice to them. I think it was my hon. friend from Macleod who impugned my bona fides in presenting the measure, indicating that I presented it in a half-hearted fashion, and so forth. We inserted a preamble in the bill; it is rather an unusual thing to preface a bill with a preamble, but it was the government's desire that this rather extraordinary measure—because measures of this kind are extraordinary—should be prefaced with a set of reasons as clear as we could formulate them; so the language of the Duncan report was condensed and put in the form of a preamble to the bill. I say to my hon. friend from Macleod that I come from western Canada; I expect to have to defend myself out there from the kind of attack which he and his friends will make with respect to this measure, and I will tell him now the ground of my defence. It will be found on pages 20 and 21 of the report of the royal commission. The chairman of the commission certainly cannot be accused of having behind him a history which would incline him to lean toward a particular section of Canada, but rather the attitude of mind of a judge brought from the old land, a man of wide experience and of high attainments who would look at this matter not from the point of view of one biased in favour of eastern Canada or western Canada or any part of Canada, but as one seeking to help Canada as a whole in the solution of an acute problem. He says:

> We think, however, that a balanced study of the events and pronouncements prior to confederation, and at its consummation, confirms the representations submitted to us on behalf of the maritime governments in regard to the ultimate construction of the railway.

Then I turn to paragraph (c), page 21:

> That to the extent that commercial considerations were subordinate to national, imperial and strategic considerations, the cost would be borne by the Dominion and not by the traffic that might pass over the line.

I am content to ask the people of western Canada to take a big Canadian attitude and not a little Canadian attitude on a matter of that kind. I am content, Sir, to meet my hon. friends opposite on that ground in western Canada. I think I know the broad, generous spirit of the people of the plains, and I am sure they will be content to give to the people of the maritime provinces the measure of economic justice indicated by the commission which weighed judicially all the facts of the case.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. COOTE: How late does the Prime Minister intend to sit to-night?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Finish the bill.

Mr. ERNST: Finish it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We might see if it is not possible to make progress with a few of the clauses.

On section 1—Short Title.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by the leader of the opposition, by the Postmaster General, the Minister of National Defence, and last but not least by the Minister of Railways. I have observed the broad view taken by these members on the question of maritime rights, and I have noticed the wholesale way in which they accept the bill. We in the province of Quebec feel it our duty and consider it a pleasure to accept this bill. I think I may be permitted to speak for my province, especially for the district and city of Quebec. The favourable reception of this bill makes me hope, Mr. Chairman, that the reasonableness of the claims of the city of Quebec may in the near future receive similar consideration in this House, for I think we in the city of Quebec have a claim as strong as that of the maritime provinces. For many years we have been promised consideration of the railway situation in the Quebec district. We have been asking for the equitable freight rates which were promised at the time when the legislation went through parliament in 1903 for the building of the Transcontinental railway. Indeed, one of the objects of the building of that line at a cost of $180,000,000 was to bring the grain of the western prairies to the seaports of Quebec, Halifax and St. John. I was pleased to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) and his colleague the Minister of Defence (Mr. Ralston) espouse the rights of the maritime provinces, and I hope that the claims of the city of Quebec may find equally able champions. The Postmaster General stated that at the time of confederation verbal engagements had been made by Sir John A. Macdonald, George Brown and others and that the claims of the maritime provinces were based on legal and moral obligations. Well, Mr. Chairman, the obligations of the Dominion towards the city of Quebec are based on just such legal and moral grounds. The city of Quebec subscribed $650,000 towards railway building and handed over to the Dominion a property worth over $2,000,000 without any compensation whatever, as I mentioned a few minutes ago. But outside the written contracts we had the verbal promise of Sir Robert Borden in 1913 that Quebec was to receive what was due to her.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend, but I know a number of hon. members would like to discuss the claims of their various communities. It would be wholly unreasonable for us to do so, yet if one hon. gentleman presents such claims others will be tempted to follow his example. I submit that the claims of another province are scarcely in order. I know my province has a claim that I might be tempted to argue, but I do not think it should be done under this bill. As the Minister of Railways has repeatedly asked to-night, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we keep within the bounds of the bill.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Mr. Chairman, before you give your ruling let me call your attention to the title of this bill:

An act respecting the Canadian National Railways and the tariffs of tolls to be charged on certain eastern lines.

I submit that what I am discussing is relevant to the bill now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. gentleman that the clause under discussion is number one, Short title. Therefore his remarks are scarcely in line with the subject before the committee.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Mr. Chairman, I submit to your decision.

Section 1 agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put it through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DUNNING: I withdraw my motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. minister leave to withdraw his motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

On section 2—Eastern lines.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the 20 per cent subsidy apply to that portion of the line which runs through the state of Maine?

Mr. DUNNING: The question arises on section 9, and can better be discussed when we reach that section.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: You and the committee are using the reprinted bill, I presume, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

On section 4—Preferred movements—Local traffic, all rail, etc.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, this is a very important bill, and personally I protest against certain members shouting "carried." I thank the Minister of Railways for his suggestion that the committee might rise and report progress. I realize that the committee can go on all night if they wish to put the bill through without consideration, but lately we have been too busy in the House to read these bills carefully and to consider them thoroughly clause by clause. If this bill is to be passed holus bolus to-night the various clauses will be called and declared carried, but I do not see how members can be held responsible for the provisions of such an important bill if this procedure is to be adopted. In view of what is taking place I think my protest is fully justified.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DUNNING: With much of what my hon. friend says I am in agreement. I have not given weeks of study to the evolution of this bill without knowing something of its complex and far-reaching character, and in continuing I simply deferred to what appeared to be the general wish of the House to proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: I am entirely in the hands of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. DUNNING: It is rather a compliment that they are willing to take so readily the clauses of such a complex bill.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, if we are going to carry on I would ask that you read the bill clause by clause so that we may follow it intelligently.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): On this section I would ask the minister to make the explanation which he mentioned in his speech on the second reading in regard to why international rates are excepted from the preferred movement.

Mr. VENIOT: It comes under clause 5.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): The explanation should be given on section 4.

Mr. DUNNING: We went very thoroughly into the question of international rates, and I may say, especially for the benefit of my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson), that having agreed to the major principle of the Duncan report with respect to the 20 per cent reduction, the difficulty was not the financial load involved in the extra amount which would have accrued had it been possible to include the maritime province proportion of the international rates. I may tell him that the total freight receipts from the international outbound traffic—that is, the Atlantic division proportion of the Canadian National returns—was only $1,300,000 out of a total of $10,800,000 last year from the whole of the movements contemplated by the Duncan report.

Mr. HANSON: Has the minister the figures for the Canadian Pacific movements?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the figures for the Canadian Pacific Railway for the same movement, but they are negligible compared to the other movements to which I have referred. The problem in connection with international rates is simply this: international through rates are not controlled by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada nor are they subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States. The railways concerned, both American and Canadian lines, agree upon a through rate and submit it to these respective national bodies which control rates in the two countries, but in reality the matter is one of agreement. I am sure my hon. friend appreciates the business shrewdness of the Americans. Let me ask him, therefore, whether he really thinks that the American roads would agree to a reduction on through rates, let us say, from Bathurst to Boston without arranging for an equivalent reduction on goods coming from Boston to Bathurst. The American people are not so slow as that. I can assure the hon. gentleman positively that we could not make an arrangement which would enable the 20 per cent advantage to be passed on to the Canadian shippers, and I say that after having thoroughly investigated the matter and made the fullest inquiries as to means whereby this could be done, presuming we included international rates within the scope of the bill.

Mr. HANSON: Can the minister tell us what the proportional movement would be over each, and if any attempt was made to get a reciprocal arrangement?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, the matter has been discussed, and while of course no formal presentation was submitted either to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to the Board of Railway Commisioners, tentative approaches were made. I might point out, in order to illustrate the complexity of the arrangement such as would apply in connection with international rates, that at the present time there are four routes over which lumber may be moved from New Brunswick to the United States, and the same rate applies over all four. Although the proportion of that rate applicable to the Canadian railways is different in each case, the aggregate is the same. If we applied the provisions of the Duncan report to the Atlantic division proportion of these international roads, we should have four different rates on lumber from New Brunswick to Boston; and these four different rates would apply in some cases from the same town to the city of Boston, depending upon the particular route which the lumber took in course of transit. Let me point out still further, as proof of our inability to make an arrangement, that there was in existence in the summer of 1925—my hon. friend will remember this if he is familiar with the lumber business, as I gather he is—a temporary reduction of rates on lumber from points in northern Maine served by the Bangor and Aroostook Railway, and the Canadian National Railways were successful in having this reduced basis extended into New Brunswick. This meant a reduction of four cents per 100 in the existing rate. The reduction when first made was to expire at the end of 1925, but before that date negotiations were conducted with the United States lines looking to a continuance permanently of the reduced rate basis. Our railways wanted the reduction continued. The United States lines however, flatly refused to continue the reduced rates, although they agreed to one month's extension into 1926. The reasons advanced by the United States lines for their refusal to continue the reduced rates are set out clearly in a report submitted by the general freight traffic manager to his vice-president. Perhaps it would clear the situation if I read from the report:

Mr. Fort of the Boston and Maine and Mr. Eaton of the Maine Central presented their situation, which, in substance, was that if these rates were continued they would be compelled to reduce their local rates throughout New England. It was not altogether a matter of competition with Pacific coast lumber travelling via the Panama canal, but in their own lumber fields in Maine, New Hampshire. etc., where they were being importuned to reduce their rates because of the reductions made in northern Maine and the New Brunswick district.

Mr. Fort's contention was that the Lumber Association of New Hampshire and some of the interests in the state of Maine on the Maine Central had brought forward such pressure that if they continued to participate in these reduced rates they would have to reduce their local rates and that would reflect itself in demands for reductions in their rates on water borne traffic, whether from the Pacific coast or elsewhere.

Then follow instances cited by the American railways in which, under the reduced schedule, through rates were actually lower than local rates from American lumber centres to the city of Boston.

Mr. HANSON: Is not that true in Canada also?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is missing the point. The Duncan commission's recommendation is that the 20 per cent reduction shall not be applied to inbound freight, and that would mean increasing the discrimination against the Americans. Now we know from experience in dealing with the people to the south of us, as well as from consultations that have been held in regard to the matter, that we could not pass the advantage to the maritime producers even if we did make provision therefor in this legislation. We could of course incorporate it in the bill, but as a matter of fact the American railways would get the advantage, for the simple reason that they would put up their share of the rate to a point which would ensure that their shippers should not be discriminated against. That is my judgment after careful consideration, and I can assure the committee that the government is dealing with the matter in no parsimonious spirit. It was not a question of the increased amount that would be involved, which would be only between $250,000 and $300,000 additional.

Mr. HANSON: I am willing to accept the minister's explanation although I must say that it is with great regret that we find ourselves in the position indicated. My information is that the movement was very much larger than the minister's figures would lead us to believe, and that a real advantage would be gained by the shippers of New Brunswick if they could get this 20 per cent reduction on that movement. My information further is that the amount of traffic moving backward would be negligible as compared with the westward or southwestward movement, but of course if nothing can be done nothing more need be said. I did not make the suggestion in an acrimonious spirit, but our people have been looking for this reduction and will be disappointed if they do not get it. If it cannot be done that is all there is to it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It was not in a spirit of criticism that I asked the minister to make the explanation, because that is one of the things recommended by the Duncan commission which the government have not been able to implement. I think sufficient reason has been given by the minister as to why the recommendation in that regard could not be carried out. There is another point, Mr. Chairman, on which I think it wise to have information and that is found in subsection (c), of section 5, which has to do with imports into Canada. I think that is also an exception to the recommendations of the commission, and it would be in the interests of the country generally to have on record the reason why that was excepted.

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad to be able to give the reason. On that point the government is of opinion the Duncan commission did not give due weight to all the factors involved in the proposal that the area of Canada which lies nearest to the sea should have in addition to the ordinary low import rates, which are lower in any case than local rates, a 20 per cent cut from that special schedule of import rates for the benefit of people who, in the nature of things, now pay a lower import rate than any other people in the Dominion of Canada. Of course there immediately arose the consideration of whether the usual principle should be adopted, that is, that a reduction should apply not to those who had the advantage of being nearby but rather to those who had to pay a higher rate on account of being a long distance from the port. We could not work out any scheme whereby that advantage could be given to importers further west than the maritime provinces without upsetting the whole schedule of import rates in Canada, therefore we thought it better not to apply it in the maritime provinces. May I say also, with regard to the figures—I think I am correct but I will check it up—that from memory the total amount involved in freight receipts in this connection on the Canadian National Railway last year was $117,000. That is not the 20 per cent, but the 100 per cent, of freight receipts in 1926 under the special import tariffs for which no provision is made.

Mr. GARDINER: I would ask the minister if he can now give us the information he promised this afternoon with regard to the total amount involved. When we were speaking on the second reading the minister said that when the House got into committee he would be glad to give us that information.

Mr. DUNNING: My estimate with regard to the Canadian National railways, based upon the 1926 business, is approximately $2,000,000; with respect to the Canadian Pacific railway, based upon the 1926 business, it is between $400,000 and $500,000. I have no means of making an estimate with regard to the small lines, that is, the Quebec lines up to Gaspé and the other local lines in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but that will be a very small amount. I think we can say that the total initial cost, based of course upon the 1926 business, would be in the neighbourhood of $2,500,000. I do not wish to be tied down to that figure, because it depends upon the development of business and the relationship of that business to operating expenses.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a question to ask the minister. Will the expansion of the Atlantic region for freight rate purpose affect the operation of the railway?

Mr. DUNNING: Not necessarily. Section 6 says, "For accounting purposes, but without affecting the management and operation of any of the eastern lines . . ." The management and operation is still under the control of the board, as it always has been.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Movements not preferred.

Mr. COOTE: For many years we in this House have had demands from the maritime provinces that steps be taken to increase the import and export of goods through maritime province ports rather than through United States ports. May I ask the minister if, in his opinion, there is anything in this bill intended to increase the volume of the export and import traffic through the maritime provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection (c) of section 4 is as follows:

> Traffic moving outward, export traffic, rail and sea, from points on the eastern lines through ocean ports on the eastern lines destined overseas.

Mr. GARDINER: That does not answer the question of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I think his inquiry was addressed more particularly to the goods from further west, either western Canada or Ontario and Quebec.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: That is covered in the section now before the committee, and I am sure my hon. friend can read it as plainly as I can. I might say, however, with respect to grain, that the present differential of Halifax over Montreal represents the lowest cost of moving grain anywhere of which I know; it is one cent per bushel. That is the differential, and there is no plan recommended by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and his associates or contained in the bill intended to reduce the rate between Montreal and Halifax.

Mr. MacLAREN: I might say that that matter has been referred to the board of railway commissioners for consideration, and the Duncan commission expressly excluded it from their report.

Mr. DUNNING: I should have mentioned that, and I am glad my hon. friend has called it to my attention.

Mr. COOTE: I take it the whole question of freight rates in the maritime provinces was referred to the railway commission, but the Duncan commission did not wait for that.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Separate accounts to be kept.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask the Minister of Railways to explain the relation of section 6 to section 9? Is the Dominion government to pay the whole 20 per cent, or merely the deficit which may arise?

Mr. DUNNING: I would first ask for a small amendment to this section. I move that the word "railway" be inserted before the word "fiscal" in line 47 of page 3, which will make the sentence read, "In the event of any deficit occurring in any railway fiscal year in respect of the eastern lines . . ." This is just for the sake of clarity, in order that we may know what year is referred to.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Would the minister tell us whether the government is to be liable for the deficit only or for the whole 20 per cent? Under section 9 it would appear that the government is liable for the whole 20 per cent, but under section 6 it appears to be only the deficit.

Mr. DUNNING: If I may, I will deal with section 6 now and with section 9 when we come to it, in order not to complicate matters. In section 6 we are dealing with railways owned by the government of Canada, in which the government is the shareholder and upon which we are now meeting the deficits. In connection with these lines—and be it remembered that we expect these lines will, as the figures which I gave a little while ago will demonstrate, carry most of the traffic affected by this legislation in the proportion of at least four to one as compared with the other lines—we are proposing to set up separate accounting for the lines covered by this measure and to come to parliament each year with a separate item in the railway budget for the deficit on these lines. I want to say to my hon. friends in that corner who are disposed to be critical of this whole bill, that the deficit figure which will be brought forward in the next railway budget will include not only that portion of the deficit due to the operation of this legislation but the general deficit upon eastern lines. It must in the nature of things. I attempted to work out a scheme whereby we would keep the deficit due to this 20 per cent separate from the ordinary operating deficit on the eastern lines, but it was too complicated to be worth while. Consequently the provision in clause six is being put before the House: that is, with respect to Canadian National lines there will be each year in the railway budget a separate item covering the deficit on eastern lines, but without in any way otherwise affecting management or operation of the eastern lines.

Mr. GARDINER: At this point could the minister give the committee any indication as to the present deficit on those same lines?

Mr. DUNNING: The operating deficit on the Atlantic division from Rivière du Loup, which is the present terminus, was in 1926, $4,777,000. My hon. friend must understand that I am speaking from memory, but I think the figure is practically accurate.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister have any objection to amending clause 6 by suppressing these words in the first and second lines:

But without affecting the management and operation of any of the eastern lines.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I could not accept that amendment, because it is desirable to leave the management free to deal with management and operation as from time to time circumstances may warrant. We are quite clear that for accounting purposes we desire this portion of the line separated, but we are not quite clear that we should tie the hands of the management in any other way.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister agree to suppressing the words "and operation" in the second line?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I could not.

Amendment (Mr. Dunning) agreed to.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to suggest to the government that this would be a good time to adjourn. It is ten minutes after twelve o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put the bill through.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Other companies may make competing tariffs.

Mr. HANSON: Why is the first subclause of clause 9 made permissive instead of peremptory?

Mr. DUNNING: The other lines involved cover such a wide range of types of railway operation that it was difficult to arrive at a suitable wording. I may say that in one draft I had the word "shall", and found, in connection with some of the local lines, that they had special freight tariffs of their own higher than the rates now in effect in the area referred to and especially authorized by the railway commission as a result of particular conditions operating in that area. Therefore I thought it advisable to leave the matter permissive instead of mandatory. My hon. friend is probably interested and I know the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) is interested in whether or not the Dominion Atlantic Railway, which, while a separate corporation, is owned by the Canadian Pacific and which serves a large portion of Nova Scotia, will put these reductions into effect. I may say in that connection that, as soon as the financial resolution appeared on the order paper, the Canadian Pacific very naturally wanted to know where they came in. As a result of interviews and consultations between the parties affected, including some of the other railways as well as the Canadian Pacific, the present clause as it appears in the reprinted bill was evolved. During those consultations I received from President Beatty of the Canadian Pacific absolute assurance that these rates would be met in full on all lines controlled by the Canadian Pacific in the area affected. Further than that I cannot go.

With respect to other lines of railway I am finding new lines of railway down in the maritimes every day or two. I get a wire from some railway I never heard of before and which I find some of my maritime friends never heard of before asking if they will not be permitted to put this tariff into force and to secure the benefits of clause 9 in the reprinted bill. I feel sure that this feature of the clause will work out satisfactorily without being mandatory, because if it were mandatory, other more serious problems would arise in connection with some of the local lines.

Mr. SHORT: Are we to understand that this clause covers practically all railways in the maritimes outside of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific? I am very much interested in the Dominion Atlantic Railway because it runs through the whole of my constituency. It is one of the prominent railways in Nova Scotia; it covers 217 miles from Yarmouth to Halifax, one of the most important parts of the province. I want to know distinctly from the minister whether it is going to be included in this 20 per cent reduction.

Mr. DUNNING: As I said a few moments ago the Dominion Atlantic, if it so desires, may under clause 9 file a tariff meeting the tariff set forth in this legislation. I have the assurance of President Beatty of the Canadian Pacific, which controls the Dominion Atlantic, that such tariffs will be filed and that the rates will be met on the Dominion Atlantic.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it that under this particular clause the country will be called upon to reimburse to railways other than the Canadian National the full 20 per cent reduction.

Mr. DUNNING: Again I can only refer my hon. friend to the language of the clause. It was a very difficult thing to devise because of the fact that, if we said in so many words that the difference between existing normal rates and the rates reduced by 20 per cent would for all time, or at least so long as this statute remained in existence, be paid by the Dominion, we might very well run into difficulty in a few years time on account of increases in the volume of traffic consequent upon the reduction and a consequent decrease in operating ratio due to a greater density of traffic, while the Dominion would still be paying the flat 20 per cent. In drafting this clause an effort has been made to get around the difficulty by providing that the railway commission shall be required to certify what would have been the normal tolls on that railway in that area if this special legislation had not been in effect. In that way we hope to have the conditions sufficiently elastic so that if there is a great increase in traffic and, as a consequence of greater density, a better operating ratio is obtained, the Dominion government will not then be compelled to pay the full 20 per cent. That is the principle of section 9. But my hon. friend is quite correct, that to start with 20 per cent will have to be borne by the government.

Mr. SPENCER: Otherwise it will be put up to the railway commission to say whether lower rates will be charged?

Mr. DUNNING: No. If my hon. friend will read subsection 3 he will see that it provides:

> The board on approving any tariff under this section shall certify the normal tolls which but for this act would have been effective and shall, in the case of each company, at the end of each calendar year promptly ascertain and certify to the Minister of Railways and Canals the amount of the difference between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls above referred to on all traffic moved by the company during such year under the tariff so approved.

If my hon. friend will then read subsection 4, he will see that it provides:

> The board shall, in every third year and at any time upon the request of the governor in council, ascertain and certify to the Minister of Railways and Canals whether under the provisions of the Railway Act, the normal tolls referred to in subsection three hereof, should be revised and in the event of such revision the revised normal tolls shall thereafter be used instead of the normal tolls referred to in the said subsection in calculating the difference to be paid to the company thereunder.

Mr. IRVINE: Suppose that through the reduction the traffic increases considerably so that in 1928 the railway companies will make more money than they made in 1926; would the government still have to pay this 20 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: I expect that it will be the duty of the Department of Railways and Canals each year to watch the operation of this statute with great care. In each third year it will be the duty of the railway commission in any case to take into account such factors as that mentioned by my hon. friend, but in addition to that being done every third year, the governor in council may demand that it be done at any time in order to ensure that there shall be a reasonable parity between the improvement made in operating ratio upon the railway and the amount paid annually by the Dominion.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the $2,500,000 which the minister mentioned a moment ago include all that we shall have to pay next year under the 20 per cent reduction?

Mr. DUNNING: We propose to celebrate the diamond jubilee of confederation by bringing this act into effect on July 1st, so the whole year will not be involved. But on the basis of the 1926 volume of business and on the basis of the spread set out in this law, it will be about $2,500,000 a year; that is to say, if it runs from the 1st of July, 1927, to the 1st of July, 1928, I would estimate that about $2,500,000 may be involved.

Mr. STEVENS: And as the traffic improves, the spread diminishes; is that right?

Mr. DUNNING: We hope it will.

Mr. HEAPS: Some time ago I asked a question as to that part of the Canadian Pacific railway line which runs through the state of Maine, and the minister said he would give an explanation on section 9.

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection 1 of section 9 speaks for itself. It says:

(1) Other companies owning or operating lines of railway in or extending into the select territory may file with the board tariffs of tolls respecting freight movements similar to the preferred movements, meeting the statutory rates referred to in section seven of this act.

That means that the Canadian National Railway under this act has a certain rate from Halifax to Montreal; that is the outbound movement referred to in a previous section. The Canadian Pacific also has an outbound rate from Halifax to Montreal. The fact that the Canadian Pacific passes through the state of Maine makes no difference whatever. They meet the Canadian National rate between these two points, and hence they get the benefit on that portion of the mileage which is in the maritime provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Do they get the 20 per cent on that portion which is not in the maritime provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: The railway commission will certify what the tariff would have been but for the existence of this legislation, and they will be paid that.

Mr. COOTE: I would ask the minister to be good enough to explain to me just what is meant in the fourth line of subsection 4, where it says: "whether under the provisions of the Railway Act, the normal tolls referred to in subsection 3 hereof, should be revised."

Mr. DUNNING: The normal tolls are the tolls at present in existence on the lines in question and approved by the board—the tolls which would continue to be in existence but for this act—the tolls which necessarily must be used as the basis of calculation for the payment to be made to railways other than the Canadian National. My hon. friend will see therefore in a moment the importance of having the ordinary provisions of the Railway Act apply to a revision of these normal tolls, although they are no longer being used for freight rate purposes, but merely for the purpose of calculating what is due the railways under the statute. Therefore we require to have provision made whereby the railway commission can revise the tolls which should have been charged but for this legislation. Is that clear to my hon. friend?

Mr. COOTE: I would ask this question to clarify it: Does this subsection mean that if the rates outside of the maritime provinces should go up or down, a change will be made in the 20 per cent such as to keep the rates in the maritime provinces at the level they will be under this act when it comes into force?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot follow my hon. friend there; I do not quite know where he is going. But perhaps he would be satisfied with this general assurance, that all the provisions for elasticity under the control of the railway commission which could be inserted in this act have been inserted.

Mr. COOTE: Is it the intention of the government to have the committee rise, and adjourn the House when this bill is reported?

Mr. DUNNING: I am content to rise at any time. I am completely in the hands of the committee.

Mr. COOTE: The only reason I ask is that I want to know whether or not there is any further business coming on to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, we will just get this through.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10, 11 and 12 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. HEAPS: I move to add to the bill the following clause:

That this act shall remain in force for a period of ten years from the date on which it comes into operation, after which the act may by parliament be renewed either in its present form or with such modifications as the then existing conditions may render desirable.

Mr. DUNNING: I must oppose that amendment because it seeks to bind future parliaments. I am surprised that my hon. friend should arrogate to this parliament sufficient wisdom to make it absolutely certain that no future parliament for ten years shall have authority to amend or change this act. I will not do that at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Then do I understand that parliament may within the next ten years amend the present act?

Mr. DUNNING: The authority of parliament remains supreme, but my hon. friend's motion would undermine that supremacy.

Mr. HEAPS: If there was no question asked and no statement made, it might be taken that this was something which was being granted in perpetuity.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. HEAPS: It is all right to say, "No, no," but I have seen these things happen previously and the inference has been drawn, because there is nothing in the act to the contrary, that it will simply continue in force and that no changes can possibly be made in it.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the amendment is really out of order, as limiting the power of parliament.

Amendment (Mr. Heaps) negatived.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

TO SIT WHILE HOUSE IN SESSION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the House, I wish to present the following motion from the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization:

That the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization shall have leave to sit while the House is in session.

Three bills were referred to this committee last Friday, and I have not had an opportunity of calling the committee together to make this recommendation, but perhaps the House will consent to my moving it to-day as the House decided yesterday to sit at eleven o'clock in the morning.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

OTTAWA IMPROVEMENT COMMISSION ACTS TO BE REPEALED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to bring in a measure,—

1. To provide for a Federal District Commission and to repeal the acts respecting the Ottawa Improvement Commission;

2. To authorize the payment to the commission of the sum of $250,000 a year for a period not exceeding sixteen years from the first day of April, 1927, and to make provision for borrowing powers, the issue of debentures and the repayment thereof.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES—WESTERN PROVINCES

JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I would like to inquire from the Prime Minister if we are likely to receive before the close of the session the report of the judgment of the Supreme court relating to the natural resources of the west.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend that information at the moment, but I will speak to the Solicitor General about it as soon as he comes in, and later in the day I may be able to answer my hon. friend's question.

NATURALIZATION ACTS AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): May I ask the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) if he can inform us when the second reading of Bill No. 115, to amend the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920, will be taken up?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I am sorry I cannot give a definite reply to my hon. friend. It may still be taken up in the course of the week, but I cannot give my hon. friend any specific date.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES—REVISION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a reply to a question put yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) concerning the proposed salary increases for the civil service. The hon. member remarked that it had been represented that a number of civil servants in certain classes would not get the benefit of the $120 increase, and he asked if the government would reconsider the revision so that these grades would get consideration.

Perhaps we can go more fully into that matter when the supplementary estimates covering these increases are before the House. I might say, however, that the principle underlying these increases is that every member of the service, outside and inside, should get an increase of $120, but exceptions have been made regarding those civil servants who have already partially or fully received that amount of increase since 1924.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): In connection with the minister's statement, I have before me a telegram and a letter from the Amalgamated Civil Servants protesting against the exception of the classes referred to in paragraph (d) in the minister's statement the other day, which provides for an increase of only $5 a month for the majority of those civil servants. I would ask, first, if the Secretary of State will tell the House what proportion of the civil servants come within that exception (d). The Amalgamated Civil Servants also draw attention to the increase provided for the railway mail clerks. A comparison is quoted which shows the railway mail clerk as in receipt of a salary of $1,740, with a minimum of $1,080, as compared with the same class in the United States, who receive a maximum of $2,600 and a minimum of $1,800. I mention this comparison because in other classes the comparison between Canada and the United States is equal. For instance, the district superintendents in both countries receive $4,200, the chief clerks receive $3,600, and there is a very great disparity in the lower grades.

Mr. RINFRET: The two questions verge on the same subject. The exception (d) in the report as presented to the House the other night, which I have not before me, covers mostly and almost exclusively, I think, the postal clerks and railway mail clerks. These clerks, Mr. Speaker, demanded an increase in 1924, of $240. They have already received since that time $180 increase, and that is the reason why it is proposed this year to grant only the difference—that is to say $60—meeting, as we understand, fully their demands. Representations have been made to me since the time I made my statement to the House, and we are looking into the matter now. In reference to the question of bringing their salaries up to a parity with the salaries in the United States, we will consider that later on, when the full receipts of the service are on a parity with the receipts of the United States.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister tell me whether the proposed increase includes letter-carriers? I have had a number of inquiries.

Mr. RINFRET: It was the intention to include them. We are going to ask the House to vote an amount covering those increases, but there is nothing final in the proposals so far in regard to these classes.

Mr. KAISER: Are the rural mail carriers included in that?

Mr. RINFRET: It all depends whether they come under the Civil Service Commission or not. If they are under contract, of course they would not come under it.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

DEBATE ON STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AND AMENDMENT OF MR. GUTHRIE

The House resumed from Thursday, March 31, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): At this late hour of the session, Mr. Speaker, and at this late stage in the debate I do not intend to take up very much time. I shall endeavour to confine my remarks within the space we are allotting next year to speakers in the House of Commons. Before commencing my remarks dealing with this question, I desire to express my very great regret, which I know is shared by the whole House, that the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), on account of illness, is unable to take his place to-day and resume the debate, as was his intention. The hon. member for West Calgary deals with such questions so brilliantly and ably that his speeches, even when hon. members on the other side do not agree with his view, are always listened to with great interest and attention; so that it is really the loss to the House if the hon. member is not able to come here at some time and take part in the debate on a question which he is so pre-eminently qualified to discuss.

The fact that a large proportion of those who have spoken on this question are constitutional lawyers, and that I am not, may possibly bring to this debate something from me that represents the viewpoint of the layman rather than the viewpoint of the constitutional lawyer. We have heard some very able disquisitions upon the question from the standpoint of constitutional law. I intend in my brief remarks to deal with the matter from the standpoint of the man on the street, rather than from the viewpoint of legality. There is no more fascinating study probably in the whole range of politics, at least for a Canadian, than the study of the gradual constitutional development of the British Empire, and many citizens of Canada, in fact perhaps all reading citizens of Canada, have given a great deal of attention and thought to that question. When one remembers that the British Empire comprises a quarter of the people, and a quarter of the area of the globe, that it takes in all races, creeds and nationalities, that it touches all the continents of the world, and that it comprises practically all the various forms of government from the most democratic constitutional monarchy to the government which is perhaps undemocratic because of the backwardness of the people governed, it is easily understood why the question is so interesting.

Never before in the history of the world have we had an empire such as the British Empire. The Roman Empire, the Turkish Empire, the Russian Empire, the German Empire, and any of the empires which have existed in the past have borne only a slight resemblance to the British Empire as it is to-day, and that is why the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), when he was speaking, mentioned that the word "empire" as he understood it, and the word "commonwealth" as he understood it, were not properly applied as they are applied to-day to the British Empire and the British commonwealth of nations. I admit that from the dictionary standpoint if you will, the words "empire" and "commonwealth" do not apply as they are used to-day, but it simply means that the words "empire" and "commonwealth" are given a broader meaning and a wider significance than they have received in the past, and I believe they are, like many new words which are getting into the dictionary from time to time, and will be interpreted in the future as properly used when used as they are at present. It is apparent to the most superficial reader that the constitution of Canada has been growing as the years go by, just as the British constitution has been growing in the same way. In fact I think it is apparent even to superficial readers that the actual growth has been faster than the legal growth; in other words, that there are clauses in the British North America Act which apparently are still in force, but which are really obsolete, so far as we are concerned. The spirit of the constitution and the letter of the constitution are not exactly the same. There has been an actual evolution towards complete autonomy which has not been recorded at all times in the British North America Act. One author expresses it in this way: that changes have been taking place in inter-imperial relations without resort to imperial legislation, simply by the creating of new conventions of the constitution; and it seems to me that since we may change our constitution without recording such change in the British North America Act, or since the British may change their constitution by new conventions, there is danger of a report of an Imperial conference such as this being accepted by the House without such an amendment as has been moved by my hon. leader. If we accept the report of this Imperial conference without discussion and without making it clear that it is not a legal, binding document upon this House, some day we are likely to find that one of the conventions—and I use the term rather broadly—mentioned in the report may have upon some of the parties to the compact an effect which it was not the intention of this House or of the parties to the compact to permit to happen. I think it was Sir Robert Borden who used the phrase "legal power" as opposed to "constitutional right." For example some of the speakers mentioned the power of disallowance by the British parliament of some Canadian legislation, a power which still technically exists, but which has not been exercised for about half a century, and which for that reason is obsolete. Therefore the constitutional right to-day would not permit the British parliament to change or veto our legislation, but the legal power is still existent in the constitutional act.

The same thing is true in regard to the constitution of Great Britain. The king is empowered to veto legislation passed in Great Britain but his practice of doing so is virtually obsolete. In other words, we are gradually becoming a completely autonomous state. I may be quarrelled with for making that statement, but I shall deal with it in a moment. We are part of an alliance of nation states acknowledging a common allegiance to the crown. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) used the term "unity and liberty". The term "unity with liberty" appeals to me as better expressing what is meant. Just as England has been becoming more democratic by the king having less power and the people gaining more power, so in exactly the same way we have been growing in the attributes of nationhood. There has been in our constitutional power a gradual growth which, I think, has been satisfactory to most people except some constitutional experts, in some cases self-constituted constitutional experts, and perhaps some youthful Canadians who with all the impulse of youth are going ahead as Rosebery one time said, "with all the heedless rhetoric of ambitious youth." Therefore I believe, generally speaking, the gradual evolution of our constitution has been satisfactory to most of the people of this country.

There are a few facts which, it seems to me, as Canadians, whether Liberals, Conservatives, Progressives or whatever group we belong to, we might as well admit:

1. That our autonomy has been increasing and is to-day almost complete.

2. That our international standing among the nations of the world has also been reaching a high position and has to-day almost arrived at the stage of our being a nation absolutely and completely in the eyes of other nations.

3. That there are to-day in Canada no colonials. Every one of us is in a sense a national, if I may modify the use of that word a little. We are all nationals in this that we believe our country is developing gradually into a great nation, becoming more and more a powerful nation among the nations of the world. I do not believe any one takes the reactionary attitude that we should go back on that progress.

4. That everybody in our country has a strong desire for peace not only at home but internationally. In that regard I think the British commonwealth of nations is a league of nations in itself, helping us very materially towards maintaining the peace of the world. Our own league of nations, the British commonwealth of nations, is actually an example for the larger and more important, if you will, League of Nations which exists and which is not carrying out its functions to the same extent that the British commonwealth of nations is carrying out its functions.

With those general remarks from the standpoint, as I stated, of a layman, I wish for a few moments to deal with the Imperial conference as it appears to me. As I read in the press the reports of that Imperial conference when they were first published, before we had the authoritative report placed on the table of the House, it struck me that few if any changes were made in our constitutional position. It seemed to be merely a report of things as they were, an announcement in plain English of our position. The London Times called it "an authentic picture of the empire as it is," and it struck me at that time at least that that was a complete description of the result of the Imperial conference.

But since then contradictory statements have been made by various leaders, particularly by some of the prime ministers who attended that conference, and those statements make all those interested in the question of the development of Canada look into the matter a little more deeply. Mr. Bruce, in his speech at Montreal, said there was no modification of status at all. Mr. Hertzog said that the empire signifies nothing more than a mere name. That is a much more extreme statement than that of Mr. Bruce, and our own Prime Minister, if I may boil down his words somewhat, said that this was among the great charters which have stood for a larger freedom.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire a little later to say a word about the reference to this being a charter of freedom. All speakers on the other side have not quoted my words in that connection. I prefaced what I said by the words, "in that particular"—and I will refer to it a little later—the particular being that there was nothing new in the report of the conference, but that it rather stated something that had already been stated and acknowledged as a fact. In that particular I compared it to the great charters of history.

Mr. MANION: I certainly do not wish to do my right hon. friend any injustice in the matter. I believe he made the same objection when the leader of my party was speaking. If one looks at the three assertions, the most one can say is that our Prime Minister's assertion, if we take his words as stated now, agrees more or less with the statement of Mr. Bruce, but neither of them agrees with the statement of Mr. Hertzog of South Africa. Therefore the argument remains the same, that we have good ground for looking into the real reason for some of those statements. The clause that has been most discussed in the report appears on page 12 of the Summary of Proceedings. I will read only the lines in italics. Speaking of the group of self-governing communities, the report states:

They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

With ninety per cent of that probably nobody could quarrel at all; but with the statement that we are absolutely autonomous, absolutely equal one with another, I think, in view of the fact that there is in England the power to change their constitution without submitting the question to any other part of the empire, and that that power does not exist in Canada, we can hardly state truthfully, when looking at the facts that we are absolutely equal constitutionally. The Minister of Justice in his speech stated that there was no inferiority—and I am certainly not arguing for inforiority—as long as we were willing to admit this condition and willing that this condition should continue. I think I am quoting him correctly. Just to admit a condition does not remove it. To admit a fact does not remove it. For example, a man might admit that he was in poverty; he might say that he was perfectly willing to remain in poverty, but that would not make him a millionaire. The same is true in regard to our constitution. To admit that we are willing to continue thus is not necessarily to put us on an equality with Great Britain in this respect. Therefore to my mind it might be well for us to look at the facts without, in doing so, being accused of colonialism or a desire to be subordinate to some other part of the empire.

The claim that has been made by some, that we are in a position of new superiority does not appear to me to be sustained by the facts, for the simple reason that our present status is the result of a gradual growth hastened, it is true, very materially by the war. Our position as a virtually autonomous self-governing nation within the empire was long ago conceded. One might go back quite far among the records of progress in the empire to prove this assertion, but three or four brief quotations will I think suffice to illustrate the point I am making. For example, in 1911 at the Imperial conference Mr. Asquith is reported as having said that the responsibility for foreign relations could not be shared by the dominions with the British parliament.. In 1912, however, the same Mr. Asquith delivered a speech in which he practically retraced his steps in this regard and admitted that there had been an increase in power on the part of the self-governing sections of the empire; and he recognized their right, later on, of participating in the guidance of foreign affairs in the empire. This shows the growth that was taking place. Richard Jebb, a much quoted authority who has written many interesting books on this subject, in one of his books published in the year 1911 advocated an imperial parliament or federation; and in the 1911 conference Sir Joseph Ward of New Zealand embodied this proposal in a motion which failed to receive the support of Sir Wilfrid Laurier or any of the other dominion representatives attending that gathering. Since that time the imperial federation idea has I believe become defunct. The same Richard Jebb two years later, in 1913, wrote a book—I cannot at the moment recall the title but I have read it—in which he described the dominions as nation states, and from the idea of nation states he proceeded to the broader conception of what he called a Britannic alliance. At the Imperial War conference of 1917 our position was clearly stated, and perhaps I may be allowed to quote two or three sentences from the declaration then made:

The Imperial War conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special imperial conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities.

They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the dominions as autonomous nations of an imperial commonwealth and of India as an important portion of the same.

That was a clear enough definition of our position as seen by the Imperial War conference of 1917. I shall give one other quotation, and that from Mr. Lloyd George.

It has been cited before in debates on this question, but it will bear repetition. The statement to which I refer was made in 1921 at the Imperial conference, I think, when, speaking of the self-governing parts of the empire, Mr. Lloyd George said:

> They are signatories to the treaty of Versailles and of all other treaties of peace. They are members of the Assembly of the League of Nations and their representatives have already attended meetings of the league. In other words, they have achieved full national status and they now stand beside the United Kingdom as equal partners in the dignities and responsibilities of the British commonwealth.

These quotations are, I think, sufficient to show the point of view generally taken in regard to this question. Apparently, therefore, there has been no change in our status as it was recognized some years ago. It has long since been admitted that we were, ultimately at any rate, to be fully autonomous states, and while many other opinions might be quoted to illustrate the widespread acceptance of that fact years ago, it will be admitted, I fancy, that within the past few years, particularly since the war, we have broadened our autonomy. It seems to me that we have developed, from the standpoint of national autonomy to national manhood, just as unconsciously in a way to ourselves, and in a sense as unobserved by other nations, as sons grow to manhood unconsciously to their parents and very often unnoticed by friends and neighbours.

If I may briefly sum up what I have said I shall have concluded that branch of my remarks. We are to-day, in my opinion, virtually independent states within the British Empire, owing a common allegiance to the crown, but not equal to Great Britain so far as the power of making constitutional changes is concerned. There are still many anomalies in our constitution, which anomalies, like others that have existed in the past, will gradually be removed. The Canadian people will without doubt ultimately rule the destiny of this country through its parliament, and if Canadians through their parliament should ever decide to sever the ties of empire and become an independent nation there would be no question about the British parliament accepting that decision. Internationally we are rapidly attaining complete nationhood, as evidenced by our presence at the negotiation of the treaty of Versailles and our signature to the covenant of the League of Nations. And why should we not attain that nationhood when we consider such countries as Bulgaria, Poland, Belgium, the Argentine or Brazil?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is not fair to compare us with them.

Mr. MANION: I agree with my hon. friend that it is hardly fair to compare us in civilization and progress with some of these other countries. At any rate, to be modest, we may safely say that in civilization and general progress we are not behind any of the countries I have mentioned.

Now I wish to deal for a few moments with the remarks of my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. ADSHEAD: The hon. member has spoken of our complete nationhood. What voice have we in the declaration of war or peace? Is that not decided by Downing Street?

Mr. MANION: Our voice in the declaration of war and peace has not so far been very strong, but that is one of the deficiencies which time will remedy. It just proves the statement I have made that we are not on an equality at the present time with Great Britain.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The Imperial conference report states that the same phase of "equality of status" does not function. Perhaps the question of our part in declaration of war does not function.

Mr. MANION: I am going to discuss briefly now some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Labelle. I regret very much the attitude which that hon. gentleman so often assumes in this House and which, if it does not reflect his true state of mind on the subject, is a serious injustice to himself. At any rate he appears to entertain a strong dislike, if not an absolute hatred, for Britain. It seems to me that such an attitude can do nothing but injure the hon. gentleman's own compatriots by inspiring antagonisms, dissensions, unrest and misunderstandings between them and the other people of this Dominion. Nay, more: he inspires antagonisms between the people of this country and those of other parts of the empire. This is well demonstrated by his reference to Lord Cave, whom he cited the other day as having expressed an opinion which would certainly be unworthy of a great judge—an opinion alleged to have been offered on a subject which was sub judice in the Privy Council. The hon. member declared that Lord Cave had made the statement while in Canada. Lord Cave has since then, however, absolutely denied the allegation. But suppose that he had made the statement ascribed to him: that would not prove the uselessness of the Privy Council; it would merely prove the indiscretion of Lord Cave. I have no desire whatever to do the hon. member for Labelle any injustice; my sole intention is to bring about a better understanding among the people of this country and between us and the rest of the empire. I ask, what good can it possibly do for anyone here to be continually taking an attitude which must necessarily result in misunderstanding, not only among Canadians themselves but among the different peoples of the empire?

I may observe—I hope without any suggestion of conceit—that a good deal of my reading has been historical; and let me add that, being so far as I know of pure Irish descent, I am not inclined to give any blind allegiance to England. In other words I am not a blind worshipper at the shrine of England, and I say that quite frankly in view of the remarks I am going to make. Even taking that into consideration, after having read a good deal of history and after having considered world conditions I feel that the world owes a great debt of gratitude to Great Britain for her achievements in parliamentary progress, her advancement in democracy, for her successful colonization of the far corners of the world, and for her general high ideals of liberty and freedom. To make the statement that England has made mistakes, some of which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) continually quotes, is merely to admit that the governments of England have been made up of human beings. Every government the world has ever seen has made mistakes, even the government of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and looking back at some of the mistakes made by Great Britain it seems to me that she has paid dearly for many of them. I have read a great deal of the history of Ireland, and I say here without caring much whether it pleases or displeases anyone that I have felt for many years that England made terrible mistakes in her government of Ireland. But she has suffered very much for many of those mistakes, because in the last war, for example, if she had accepted the suggestion made by Mr. Gladstone in the eighties that Ireland should be given the home rule which she possesses to-day, Ireland would have been a very patriotic ally instead of more or less of a thorn in the side of England. Again in the case of the American colonies mistakes were made by a stubborn king and a stupid prime minister which drove those colonies out of the empire; if those mistakes had not been made the United States might have still remained a part of the empire. I submit, however, that taking into consideration all those mistakes having to do with Ireland, with the American colonies, and with other parts of the world, and putting on the opposite side of the balance the honourable and noble achievements of Great Britain in the advancement of the world, she deserves the gratitude of the whole world for the progress she has helped bring about.

To say that Great Britain has made mistakes may be easily balanced by taking into account some of the mistakes made by other countries, and as I thought of the remarks I am now making I jotted down from memory a few mistakes which came to my mind. Think of the mistakes Spain made in Cuba, for example, which led to the Spanish-American war; then the Spanish persecution of the Netherlands. Consider also Austria's oppression of northern Italy in the years gone by; Germany's treatment of the people of Alsace after the Franco-Prussian war; Russia's treatment of Poland and the Tzarism which followed, and the Sovietism which followed the Tzarism and which to my mind is an even worse type of government. Then there was the treatment of the Huguenots by France, and the attempts of Louis XIV and later of Napoleon I to dominate the world and to become despotic rulers of the whole of Europe. I mention these mistakes not to criticize these various countries but to show that other countries have made just as grievous and even greater mistakes than those made by Great Britain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even in China?

Mr. MANION: Yes, probably even in China, but I will not go into the Chinese situation just now; I will leave that for my hon. friend. Now I will point out one of the good things done by England which should appeal to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and which I am sure does appeal to all members from Quebec sitting opposite. England conquered Canada and took it from France; in the ordinary course of events, especially in the spirit of those days, it was to be expected that England would wipe out the French language entirely to make this a British, English-speaking, dominion. Instead of that there could not be fairer treatment, it seems to me, given to any group of people than was given by Great Britain to the 60,000 French-Canadians who were then living in the province of Quebec. I think her treatment of those French-Canadians at that time is well epitomized in the words of Lord Elgin to Earl Grey in 1848. It is true that Lord Durham did suggest in his report that the French language would be and perhaps should be submerged, but the words of Lord Elgin are, I think, worthy of being placed on Hansard although they have doubtless been quoted many times before. In 1848 he wrote as follows:

I am very anxious to hear that you have taken steps for a repeal of so much of the Act of Union as imposes restrictions on the use of the French language. . . . I must moreover confess that I for one am deeply convinced of the impolicy of all such attempts to denationalize the French. Generally speaking they produce the opposite effect from that intended, causing the flame of national prejudice and animosity to burn more fiercely. But suppose them to be successful what would be the result?. . . . Depend upon it, by methods of this description, you will never Anglicise the French inhabitants of the province. Let them feel on the other hand that their religion, their habits, their prepossessions, their prejudices if you will, are more considered and respected here than in other portions of this vast continent . . . . and who will venture to say that the last hand which waves the British flag on American ground may not be that of a French Canadian?

It seems to me that those words completely cover the treatment of the French language and the French religion, if you will, the Catholic religion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: The Catholic religion is largely the religion of the French speaking people; there are some French speaking Protestants, but they are not numerous. At any rate, I refer to the treatment of the Catholic religion. The treatment of the French minority is well shown in those words of Lord Elgin, and so far as I know it has been carried out almost entirely to this day. The treatment of the Boers by England after they were conquered, and I believe her treatment of India and Egypt, have been largely beneficial to those countries, and show Britain's great desire for freedom.

The reason I have mentioned Britain's treatment of the French in Quebec after the conquest of Canada is for the purpose of contrasting the treatment of the French people in Louisiana by the Americans after Napoleon sold Louisiana to the American government in 1803. At that time Louisiana comprised not the area it contains to-day, but a territory made up of the present states of Mississippi, Arkansas, Minnesota, Dakota, Nebraska, Oklahoma and some other sections of other states, and at the time it was sold it contained about 80,000 people most of whom spoke French, which was the common language of the people of that day. But within eight years, in 1811, English was made the official language and French was not recognized. I desire to quote here an historical authority in the words which follow.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask a question? Was not that done in the face of protest from the inhabitants of that country?

Mr. MANION: Yes, and I am going to read one or two of the protests which I have under my hand and which I copied in the library after the speech of the hon. member for Labelle, from a work on the history of Louisiana. In 1811 there was passed by congress an act to enable the people of the territory of Louisiana to form a constitution and state government. I quote the words of section 3 of that act:

The constitution to be formed. . . . shall be republican. . . . and its records of every description shall be preserved, and its judicial and legislative written proceedings conducted in the language in which the laws and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the United States are now published and conducted.

That is, the English language. It is not surprising that when Louisiana was organized and the English language was introduced discontent resulted, and Laussat, the colonial prefect who had handed the purchased territory to the United States, writes in 1804:

Hardly had the agents of that government taken the reins in hand, when they accumulated errors on errors and blunders on blunders.

He refers to:

—the leading characteristics of their administration, such as the sudden introduction of the English language, which hardly anybody understands, into the daily exercise of public authority, and in the most important acts of private life.

Even in 1823 the governor complains of the hardship of "requiring our records to be kept in the English language." That is a contrast that, I think, is well worthy of consideration by my good friends from the province of Quebec. It is well worth their while to remember the contrast between the treatment of the French people of Louisiana by the Americans when they purchased the territory, and the treatment of the French Canadians of Quebec by the English when they conquered the territory.

Mr. MARCIL: The conditions were not the same in Louisiana and Quebec. The French people were masters of the situation here; they were not in Louisiana.

Mr. MANION: I do not know how the French Canadian people could be masters of the situation when they had just been conquered.

Mr. MARCIL: How many British people were there in Canada in 1759?

Mr. MANION: On the other hand, this historian states that there were practically no English speaking people in Louisiana at that time. The language there was French; practically all the people spoke French, and it was the language of conversation at that time. However, I am making these remarks in all good faith. I certainly do not wish to offer any criticism of my hon. friends; I have no such idea in mind. All I am saying is that at any rate other countries have not treated the French people as the British have treated the French in this country. Surely it is worth remembering that if, by any chance, Canada became a part of the United States, the three millions of French speaking people in this country would be completely submerged in the 125,000,000 of American people. In view of that it seems to me that the people of Quebec must sometimes, in listening to the speeches of the hon. member for Labelle, ask themselves: whither is he leading us? It might be well also to remember that the independence of Canada, which is being advocated by some people to-day, would probably mean the gradual absorption of Canada by the United States.

Now, Sir—and I am reaching the end of my remarks; I have spoken perhaps a little more slowly than I usually do and have therefore taken more time than I meant to—we may as well remember that while other empires throughout the world were wiped out during the war the British Empire remained. The German Empire has been changed to a republic; the Russian Empire has had its whole form changed; and the Turkish and Austro-Hungarian empires have been broken up. And why is it that the British Empire remains probably stronger than it was before? It is because of the innate justice of the laws of that empire, the domestic ideals of its people, the generous treatment of dependencies, the honesty in public dealing, and the freedom of the institutions of Britain. Let me in this regard read a very brief quotation by Richard Washburn Child. That gentleman, an American writer, in a long article on the British Empire, published in the Saturday Evening Post, on January 22, makes these observations:

> Even the anti-British fanatics in the United States must have an intuitive sense that the world is a little more safe and orderly when Great Britain and her dominions are safe and well ordered.

And then a little lower down:

> We are forced to the conclusion, too, that since the war, sorely vexed, sorely menaced by conflict within and necessity for readjustments without, the British civilization, its mind and its action, have been on the whole liberal, trustworthy and splendidly courageous.

That is the opinion of an American, and it surely would be finer and nobler on the part of all Canadians—the member for Labelle and the rest of us—to acknowledge the blessings which the world has received through Britain rather than be continually harping upon the mistakes which Britain has made, and perhaps pulling rather a long bow in harping upon those mistakes. We should not forget that if in this country we sow the seeds of disunion, dissension and intolerance, we will reap defeat. If, on the other hand we sow the seeds of unity, confidence enlightenment and patriotism, we will garner the fruits of a happy, prosperous and united Canada.

In closing may I say in regard to the amendment, that I believe it to be necessary, and that it might well be accepted by the government in view of the contradictory statements which have been made by various speakers on the question. The hon. member for Labelle and the hon. Minister of Justice have rather given me the impression—if they have not stated it emphatically—that this amendment is not necessary. On the other hand the Prime Minister of Quebec is very explicit in wanting to retain those privileges which we possess at the present time. I will just quote a few words from Mr. Taschereau which I have here. The date is January 14, and the extract is from a report of a meeting of the previous day. Mr. Taschereau said on the occasion referred to:

> I think that fidelity to our British ties is necessary for our national survival, that we should zealously watch over its preservation and that we are not ready to leave it to a majority of the whole of Canada to say, without the consent of our province, what its future constitution should be.

That is the opinion of Mr. Taschereau. The hon. member for Labelle, I presume, thought he was insulting Mr. Taschereau when he called him a "Tory of the Tories," and said that he did not speak for the province of Quebec. I submit that the Premier of the province of Quebec, no matter who he may happen to be, certainly has as much right to speak for the province of Quebec as my hon. friend. And it may be added, perhaps, that in this day of rather extreme radicalism throughout the world—not only in Canada, although perhaps less in Canada than elsewhere—a little Toryism, if you will, is rather a good thing in order to counteract some of that extreme radicalism.

But to my mind this amendment is necessary if we are to retain the rights of the different parties under the pact of confederation. That pact was an agreement and arrangement between different parties, and I do not know that this parliament, or any part of the Dominion, would have the right to change that pact without the consent of the other parties to it. That is virtually the idea which the amendment of my hon. leader expresses.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in closing, I wish to say that I shall support the amendment. I am not supporting it in any spirit of colonialism or with any idea of the subordination of Canada to other parts of the empire. I am supporting it because it is based on justice and fair dealing as they relate to the parties to the compact of confederation. I say, Sir, that no matter what our ultimate destiny may be in Canada, that destiny will be a happier one if it is attained finally through honourable and fair acts—honourable and fair not only to the peoples throughout our own country, but to the other peoples of the empire and of the world.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did not the leader of the opposition say in presenting the amendment that it was to be regarded as a vote of want of confidence?

Mr. MANION: That may be but the Prime Minister stated, if my hon. friend will remember, that if the House did not want it to be so regarded, he would not consider the amendment as a want of confidence motion.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But the leader of the opposition said it was a motion of want of confidence.

Mr. MANION: I submit that if the Prime Minister accepted the amendment, it could hardly be taken as a motion of want of confidence.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): I have two criticisms to make of the report and the action of our representatives at the Imperial conference. The first criticism is that practically the whole time of the conference was employed in discussing academic questions, while our representatives were faced with great practical problems upon which the prosperity of this Dominion and of the empire depend. Of course, men have different types of minds; and for me it is rather unfortunate that our two representatives at that conference were students of constitutional law and, perhaps, not as fully equipped with such practical minds as seemed to be necessary for the work of the conference. I fancy if the Prime Minister had taken his Minister of Railways with him, or his Minister of Finance, or his Minister of the Interior, all men I think of a more practical turn of mind than the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister himself, some of these practical problems would have received more consideration.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think I would leave him at home. The conference, Mr. Speaker, was faced with three great problems—inter-imperial trade, imperial defence, and immigration—and the Prime Minister has not brought back to us anything in the shape of a solution of any of these problems. It must be clear to all the members of this House that the welfare of this country, of Great Britain, and of the empire at large depends upon the solution of these three problems.

Take the question of inter-imperial trade, on which Mr. Coates laid so much emphasis in his speeches while he was passing through Canada. We are bound now to the empire by sentiment, a very powerful agency for holding people together, but our trade is running more to the United States than it is to Britain, and the influence of trade and commerce upon the relations of different states is almost, if not quite, as powerful as the influence of sentiment. One of the things that is going to bind the empire together is inter-imperial trade. We have in the United States, as Sir Alfred Mond pointed out not long ago, the greatest and most powerful economic unit in the world, exercising so much power that there is now in the process of creation on the continent of Europe another great European economic unit. We have the one firmly established; we have the other about to be established. In neither of those units does the British Empire figure, and if all the dominions are turned loose to deal with this, that, or the other great economic unit in a foreign country, the result cannot be anything but disastrous to the empire. There should, Sir, in my judgment, be established a third great economic unit within the British Empire. We have in the different portions of the empire all the resources that are necessary for civilization. We could form within the empire the most powerful economic unit in the world, surpassing that of the United States, surpassing anything that could be created in Europe. France and Germany and Czecho-Slovakia are now coöperating in the formation of another great economic unit, and if an attempt were made to improve inter-imperial trade relations, the welfare of this country and of all the other dominions, as well as of the mother country, would be greatly advanced. More than that, it would add to the sentimental bond already existing, another bond that would secure the perpetuation of the empire, and not merely its perpetuation, but an increase in its economic and political power.

Judging by the statement made by the Prime Minister when he was leaving Quebec for the conference I took it to be his desire to make the empire stronger and stronger.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: But I think the Prime Minister was rather led away from that phase by what I might call some malign influences, and gave his attention at the conference to what seems to me, and must appear to anybody else who studies the report of the conference, a purely academic question. This country cannot go on increasing its trade and other relations with the United States, and decreasing its trade with the mother country, without that having an effect upon our political condition. The one thing that is necessary to make the empire enduring is to create a great British Empire economic unit, which is another name for inter-imperial trade and the closest possible commercial relations between all the different parts of the empire.

Mr. ADSHEAD: According to the statistics, the United States is our best customer. Would the hon. gentleman prevent our merchants from selling goods to the United States?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not so foolish as to think we could prevent our merchants dealing with the United States. I do not know where my hon. friend gets that idea. We are not limiting the personal liberties of our people to trade here or there. What I am arguing is that this government and the governments of the other dominions should have all sat down at that conference and planned some way by which they could trade together to a larger extent than they are now doing.

Mr. COOTE: Would the hon. member advocate that we should trade freely between the different parts of the empire without tariff barriers?

Mr. HOCKEN: In other words, my hon. friend asks me if I am in favour of free trade?

Mr. COOTE: Within the empire.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am in favour of something of that kind, but I have not formulated my ideas so definitely that I can answer the question just as my hon. friend asks it. But I say that there should be an inter-imperial preference. That would be the first step, and from that you could work out, with every decade that passes, closer and closer relations between the different parts of the empire.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the same objections to which my hon. friend has alluded apply in the case of the importation of American capital into Canada? Are we at all in danger of falling under the sway of the United States by having such a large American investment in this country?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think that the penetration of United States financial interests into Canada must have a very powerful influence upon our future. I do not know whether that answers my hon. friend's question. But as to preventing capital from coming to this country from any part of the world, I think that is an impossible idea. I would not propose anything of the kind, but I would do what I could to favour British capital coming into this country and having our great natural resources developed by British capital for the interests of the empire first.

The policy of the Conservative party, as I understand it, has not changed since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. He was for Canada first, and the first interest of this parliament and of the people of this country is Canada. As has been said elsewhere, the people of Canada can do nothing of as great importance to this country as developing our own resources and making the country prosperous. If every dominion of the empire were prosperous, and all standing side by side with the mother country, with inter-imperial trade widely and firmly and soundly established, the whole empire and each and every part of it would be more prosperous. But that is a little in advance of my argument.

I think what should have been done at the conference was the laying of a foundation for a system of inter-imperial trade for the immediate benefit of all parts of the empire, and also having in view the binding of the different parts of the empire more closely together. Mr. Bruce stressed that very strongly on the question of defence when he was in Canada. I think it is the duty of this dominion, and the duty of every other dominion, to make some contribution to the defence of our empire. Whether it shall be a contribution to the imperial navy, or whether that contribution shall be made by way of creating a navy, as has been done in Australia, is a matter for deliberation, but we cannot get away from the obligation that rests upon us of doing what we can for the defence of our own country. The idea expressed by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that we should go to the United States and say, "We are depending on you for the protection of our teritory," is a humiliating position for any state to put itself in. No self-respecting people will go to a foreign state and say: We cannot defend ourselves; we depend upon you to protect us. Surely the people of Canada are not going to put themselves in a position of that kind. Now, having regard to the forty minutes—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not apply.

Mr. HOCKEN: I know it does not, but it ought to. I want to submit a few ideas or thoughts on the question of immigration. I think that in that respect this government is open to very serious criticism, and that the conference is open to criticism. Something should be done at least to formulate, or to begin formulating, a scheme for transferring the surplus population of the mother country to this Dominion, and on the part of this Dominion there should be a more sympathetic recognition of the desire of the mother country to reduce its surplus population and still to keep them under the Union Jack. We can and we ought to bring from the British isles well on to a million people a year, and this country can take care of them. Instead of doing that, our immigration department for the last four or five years has been, as some person has remarked, a department of exclusion rather than a department of immigration. The conditions that are set up might very well be loosened to the advantage of Canada. I do not believe our regulations should prohibit a man coming to Canada unless he is going to work on a farm. I believe the British people have sufficient initiative, that once they reach a young country like this, with its abounding opportunities, they will find themselves placed in a very short time, and every family that comes to Canada makes that much more business for the people of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand my hon. friend to say that our regulations should not prohibit a man coming into the country unless he is going to a farm. I do not know that that is what he meant, but I think that is what he said. I am not aware of any regulations to prohibit anyone coming in from England.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is a regulation, Mr. Speaker, which I think prevents us encouraging to the extent of assistance any but agricultural labourers and domestic help.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but I wanted my hon. friend to correct his statement, because his words would imply that Canada was prohibiting other classes coming from England to this country. True, the assistance which we give is confined to certain classes, but that is very different from prohibiting other classes from entering.

Mr. HOCKEN: I thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention, but what I had in mind was that we should give assistance to all classes and not merely to agricultural labourers. I would give assistance to workingmen and to mechanics, believing as I do that every family that comes to Canada makes sufficient work for others to make up for any labour that may be performed by them.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is it not a fact that to-day we cannot get people into this country from northern Italy under practically any conditions, unless we get a permit from the department?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have found it pretty hard to get permits for anybody to come in, but that is a side of the subject that I do not think it is necessary to go into.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What would happen in the case of trades which are already overcrowded? Suppose that mechanics were to come here and engage in those trades, would it not add to our volume of unemployment?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, I do not think it would. I think if you place ten thousand families in Canada, the needs of those ten thousand families will make up for any employment they engage in.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No industry has a greater surplus of production than agriculture.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think that is correct, because they are constantly leaving the farms. I point out to my hon. friend that more people are leaving the farm than are leaving any other form of industry. That must prove that there is a surplus production on the farm.

Mr. COOTE: Then why bring in more agriculturists?

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is what the government is doing. Ask the government that question?

Mr. HOCKEN: That only strengthens my point. I would bring in every British settler who is in good health and able to take his place in the economic life of this country.

Mr. FORKE: And assist them?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, and their presence here would increase the prosperity of all classes in Canada. I think we need a new immigration measure. My hon. friend has been Minister of Immigration for a short time, and from his exertions I hope the country will fill up more rapidly than in the past, when the country was left without a minister, having merely an acting minister, and the officials not able to decide policies. The department being without a head could not function efficiently. However, I believe my hon. friend is seized with the necessity of filling up the country, and will do his best, whether it is going to be as good as it ought to be or as good as it might be is a matter to determine in the future. I give the minister credit for desiring to do his best. I venture to say when the conference met no person in this country was fretting about our status. There was no talk of our status, except by a few separationists like John S. Ewart, and the Native Sons of Canada who want to cut loose from the British Empire every time they hold a meeting of the lodge, just a mere handful of people who are looking for a new declaration of status. The great mass of the people were not concerned about it at all and are not now concerned.

Mr. COOTE: Has the hon. member any good authority for making that statement about the Native Sons of Canada.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have this authority, that almost every month I receive a resolution from some organization. I do not know whether that would be sufficient proof for my hon. friend or not. I have received resolutions of that character from Calgary, Vancouver and Toronto, passed by the Native Sons of Canada and they are all of the character I have described.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to be unfair and leave the implication which his words would leave on members of the House, when he says that the men who are interested in the status of this country except as a mere academic question are naturally separationists.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would not go that far. I think there must be some who are interested —some of the academic mind of my hon. friend, who like to delve into constitutional problems and puzzles.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There are real Canadians who are interested in the status of this country outside of academic questions, and I resent the suggestion of the hon. member. I think it is most unfair.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think so, I think the men of practical minds who want to solve the problems of the country are not the ones who are figuring about our status at all. They are not the ones who want to break any of the bonds that bind us to the mother country. They think in the best interests of Canada we should remain a part of the British empire in perpetuity. At least, that is my idea. It is not necessary that I should read this italicized paragraph in the report. We all know what it sets out, but it does not set out any more than Sir John A. Macdonald proposed at the time of confederation. I have a quotation from Sir John A. Macdonald, taken from the confederation debates, in which he said:

> Instead of looking on as a merely dependent colony, England will have in us a friendly nation to stand by her in North America in peace as in war.

There are some who would like to strike out the last three words.

> The people of Australia will be such another nation, and England will have this advantage, if her colonies progress under the new colonial system as I believe they will: that, though at war with all the rest of the world, she will be able to look to the nations in alliance with her and owing allegiance to the same sovereign, who will assist in enabling her again to meet the whole world in arms as she has done before.

Sir John A. Macdonald was something of a prophet when he made that statement, because on two major occasions the Dominion of Canada has stood beside the mother country in war and, in my opinion, will be prepared to stand beside her again if the integrity of the empire is threatened.

It appears to me that when the time of the conference was spent in order to get this declaration, a great deal of aid and comfort was given to those dominions which want to separate from the empire. Just how much influence Premier Hertzog of South Africa and Premier Cosgrave had in directing the trend of the discussion, I do not know. But the conference has done something which puts each of these two dominions into the position of being able to say any day that she is an independent state; that she has no connection with the British Empire or with Great Britain. From the statements which have been made by both of those prime ministers, I do not think any man can have a reasonable doubt but that their aim and purpose is to separate from the empire.

Mr. Hertzog says that the British Empire is now a mere name. That statement does not look as though he had very much interest in the empire or that he thought South Africa had very much interest in it. As for the Irish Free State I think we are all pretty well convinced that at the first favourable opportunity an Irish republic will be established owing no allegiance to the empire, not recognizing the king as their sovereign, and setting out to make alliances with foreign nations, nations that are foreign to Great Britain and, quite within their rights and powers, to make alliances offensive and defensive with the enemies of the empire. I do not think I am misstating the sentiments of the Irish Free State when I go that far. What we have done in this document is to put the Irish Free State and South Africa into a position where they can at any time they please realize that ambition. Before this declaration was made, there was a slight bond preventing that; they would have had to create a revolution in order to separate from the mother country. But with this declaration standing as it is—and I conceive it to be irrevocable—there is only one further step for any dominion to take to separate itself from the mother country and from the empire. Therefore the conference played fully into the hands of those two prime ministers representing dominions which are not very favourable to the continuance of the empire.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Would the hon. member keep the dominions within the empire by mere force and not by bonds of friendship?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think any dominion can be kept in the empire by force. I may not have a very keen mentality but I have sense enough to realize that. The situation before this declaration was made was different from that which exists to-day. Speaking for Canada this declaration means nothing at all; it does not add to any liberties or freedom that we had because, starting from the time of confederation, the most responsible statesmen we had declared the position of Canada to be practically what this conference says it is. Therefore our freedom has not been extended.

But there is a marked difference between having an unwritten recognition of our rights, our status and our freedom, and having a written declaration. Prior to this time Canada has not suffered in its liberties. Every person in this country knew that the British parliament would at any time have said to this Canada: If you want to join the United States, there will be no compulsion from this side of the water to prevent you. This country has been free at any time it chose to go into annexation with the United States republic. Yet that was not declared. Now it is declared, this declaration puts us into a position where we can say to Great Britain: Well, we are going to change our political status; we are going to join with the United States instead of remaining with the motherland. I want if I can to emphasize the point that this country, before this declaration was made, was in a much better position as a part of the empire to remain a part of the empire, and that this declaration does not add anything to our freedom.

I am one of those who believe that Canada has been not only free but under no compulsion ever since confederation to do anything the British government wanted or would try to compel us to do. We have been fairly well a dutiful daughter of the empire, and that is the relationship which I think ought to persist practically as long as we last. These definitions of our status serve materially to encourage all those who believe in Canadian independence, all those who would like to cut the bond that binds us to the mother country. I would be mistaken if they did not become more active now than they have been in the past. We have had a good deal of propaganda in that direction, but it has not met with much success. The people of Canada are too firmly convinced of the wisdom of continuing under present conditions rather than of becoming an independent nation, but this declaration enables us to do anything we like at any time.

There has been some talk about the amendment of the British North America Act. This declaration of status puts this parliament into the position of changing the British North America Act at any time and in any way it chooses. My right hon. friend says that the British North America Act stands where it always stood. That is not the case. Any parliament in the future, ten, twenty, thirty or forty years hence, has only to bring that declaration into this House to enable it to change the British North America Act, or to change any other act, or to pass any law which the majority of this parliament representing the people of Canada desires to pass. It must be remembered that the report states that the dominions are:

> In no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs.

If that be the case and if that view be taken by some parliament in the future, we can amend our present constitution in any way at all. There can be no escape from that.

Mr. COOTE: That will be fine.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is perfectly satisfactory to my hon. friend. Since this declaration has been made and is irrevocable we have to face the situation, and it will be for the people of Canada, who still believe that the British Empire should be strengthened rather than weakened, to play their part in the political life of this Dominion in such a way as to ensure that separation shall not take place.

Mr. COOTE: Does my hon. friend argue that we should be in any inferior position and not on an equality of status?

Mr. HOCKEN: We have never been in an inferior position. In the confederation debates Sir John A. Macdonald spoke as I have quoted him, and his argument always was that the acts of this parliament were supreme, as indeed they have been proved to be by the fact that no attempt has ever been made by the British parliament to disallow any of them.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): How is it that for many years commercial treaties in behalf of Canada were made by Great Britain?

Mr. HOCKEN: If it comes to that, I think that any commercial treaties made by this parliament even now would require the signature of the king.

Mr. MORIN (St. Haycinthe-Rouville): On the advice of his Canadian ministers.

Mr. HOCKEN: No commercial treaties made on behalf of Canada have ever been repugnant to the Canadian people, so that in that respect we have been as free as in other directions.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What about the Colonial Laws Validity Act?

Mr. HOCKEN: Now, these are the two major criticisms I have to offer. In the first place, the time of the conference was not employed to the advantage of this country and the rest of the empire, as it might have been, and real practical problems were not discussed. No attempt was made to begin the solution of them, and these problems are the things that are of importance to Canada's future prosperity rather than any new declaration of our status. In the second place, our representatives at the conference coöperated with the representatives of South Africa and the Irish Free State to put those two dominions desiring to bring about the disintegration of the empire in a position to do so at any time they choose.

[Mr. Coote.]

I want now to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). And by the way, my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) has been criticized because he presumed to reply to that hon. gentleman. Let me say that so long as attacks of the type made by the hon. member for Labelle are launched in this House they will be answered, and the fault, if fault there is, is not with my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington but with the hon. member for Labelle, who started the controversy. He was most offensive in his remarks and to have allowed him to get away with it would have been a shame. A good deal of his speech must be taken with little credence. For example, he quoted Lord Cave as having come here for a certain purpose and having done certain things, and two days afterwards we have a denial from Lord Cave to this effect, "There is no foundation for it whatever." That is to say, there is no foundation for the statements of my hon. friend from Labelle. The hon. gentleman also quoted Lord Fisher as having made some statements which would be strikingly absurd coming from a British admiral. But Lord Fisher is dead and cannot make any denial. Now a man who repeats, in the public manner in which my hon. friend repeated in this House, a private conversation of such a character, is in my judgment lacking in the first principles of gentlemanliness. Private conversations should not be repeated here, and especially the private conversations of a dead man.

I am for the British Empire and I am for a continuance of it. I am for the continuance of Canada as part of the British Empire, and I would strengthen rather than weaken the bonds that now bind us to the mother country. I have a vision of this country when it is populous, prosperous, and powerful, perhaps with a hundred millions of people, still standing beside the mother country shoulder to shoulder, because of what the mother country has done for us and what the mother country has done for the world. Great Britain has given liberty to the world, and in my opinion this country will make its largest contribution to civilization, standing side to side with the great empire of which we form a part and thus contributing still further to the welfare of humanity. We have inherited Britain's splendid traditions and I believe it is the most glorious destiny into which we can come, a hundred years hence, to be still a part of the British Empire, perhaps the most populous part of the Anglo-Saxon sections of it, perhaps the most prosperous part, perhaps the most powerful part, but still a part, recognizing where the head and heart of the empire is and still standing loyally by British traditions.

It is not necessary for me in my humble way to pay tribute to Britain. Let me rather content myself with quoting an eloquent and just tribute paid by a great Frenchman, Victor Hugo, who, standing on the shores of his native land and looking over the English channel, wrote thus:

Over that sea, in calm majesty, lies the proud isle whose existence consoles me for a thousand continuous crimes, and vindicates for me the processes of Providence. Yes, yes, proud England, thou art justly proud of thy colossal strength—most justly of they proudlike repose. Stretched upon the rock, but not like Prometheus, and no evil fiend to rend thy side, rests the genius of England. He waits his hour, but counts not the hours between. He knows that it is rolling up through the mystic gloom of ages, and that its chariot is guided by the iron hand of destiny. It will come, it is coming, it has come. The whole world, aroused as by some mighty galvanism, suddenly raises a wild cry of love and admiration, and throws itself into the bounteous bosom of England. Hence forth there are no nations, no people, but one. Undividable will be the world, and the world will be one England. Her virtue and her patience have triumphed. The lamp of her faith, kindled at the apostolic altars, burns as a beacon to mankind. Her example has regenerated the erring, her mildness has rebuked the rebellious, and her gentleness has enchanted the good. Her type and her temple shall be the Mecca and the Jerusalem of a renewed universe.

Mr. L. S. RENE MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): However much we may differ regarding the resolution now before the House we can all agree, I think, with the noble sentiments expressed so eloquently by Victor Hugo.

The question of the relations of the various parts of the British Empire inter se and of the relations of each part to foreign countries was the main question considered at the last Imperial conference. It is one of great importance as it involves the destinies of the whole of the empire, and is delicate to deal with because, in the study of this problem, we find no enlightenment in precedents. History has never known such relations and we are handicapped by the rules of international law which have not provided for such conditions.

It is not my intention to study in detail the terms and bearings of each part of the resolutions which were adopted at this conference, I will confine my remarks to a few general ideas on the matter, which in my mind must have been some of the guiding principles of our representatives at this conference and should form the basis of any future developments. The problem which our representatives had to face was to conciliate conditions apparently contradictory, the condition of peoples enjoying their full freedom, claiming full sovereignty and desirous of becoming international persons in the family of nations, with an association or union of a group of sister countries under one nominal head, carrying with it certain restrictions to the rights and liberties of its members.

The evolution of Canada from a crown colony to her present international position has been slow but gradual, steady and inevitable. There were apparently only three solutions to the problem of her relations with the mother country, that is, subordination, federation, or separation.

Subordination was possible for a time, but it could not last. Canadians of English descent who immigrated into Canada were not subject to any degradation; they preserved absolute equality of citizenship with those of their compatriots who had remained on the shores of the mother land; they could not submit for long to a status of inferiority and as their political and economic needs increased they were bound to claim the right to settle them by themselves and in the light of their own interests. As the sense of devotion to the country of their choice or the country of their birth developed in themselves, they were bound to throw off all bonds of inferiority or subordination.

French Canadians who had elected to remain in the land where they were born and which they loved had perforce to submit for some time to domination, but they were also bound to claim for themselves the right to solve their own problems; government by Downing Street or by its officials was even more unbearable to them than it was to their compatriots of British origin because it was a foreign yoke.

The troubles and difficulties to which a government by domination gave rise in Canada led certain British statesmen to consider Canada as a millstone around their necks, to lose interest in her welfare and development and to grant her responsible government, avowedly as a first step to separation and independence. It was shortly after this period that a policy of imperial federation began to be preached by certain British statesmen, and the idea took root in the minds of many people in both Great Britain and Canada. The idea of an imperial federation evoked the formation of a political union between a group of countries dispersed throughout the different parts of the world, rich in natural resources and raw materials susceptible of enormous development, and which, closely and indissolubly united, would take a somewhat predominant place among the nations of the world.

The dominating influence of such an agglomeration of nations was bound to be, for a long time to come, with Great Britain, and naturally her public men were the most enthusiastic protagonists of this new policy, although it had many adherents in the dominions. To many people patriotism meant devotion to the country of their birth or the country of their ancestors; to them Britain was yet the home country and her wealth, her prestige and her power were looked upon by them as their own, even though they had no participation in her government. Any kind of representation in the government of this federation would satisfy them. Others, however, felt that in such a federation the dominant role would belong to one of the parties and that the position of the others would be of secondary importance; that by such a federation they might be involved in the turmoil of the quarrels and jealousies of the European states with which Great Britain is geographically and economically so intimately connected; that they might be embroiled in mandates, protectorates, extensions of territories and sometimes conquests in which they would have no particular interest and that, on account of the diversity of needs of the different component parts of this federation, a centralized authority might force us to sacrifices which might be unnecessary and prejudicial, consequences which it was best to avoid in every possible way.

Truly imperial when considered from a British point of view, such a federation when applied to countries so far apart, with interests so different and sometimes so contrary, could only mean subordination, inferiority and sacrifices for the citizens of certain of its component parts, so this project of a federation did not materialize, and there remained the third solution, that of separation.

There is in the mind of every human being a tendency, an aspiration, a natural instinct to enjoy the fullest freedom possible; sovereignty, which applying to states means national freedom, is just as much a natural aspiration as individual freedom. This natural instinct which kept us away from federation was bound to draw us towards separation and independence, but in our case these natural and normal aspirations were tempered or mitigated by many factors; ties of blood, ties of affection, common idealistic traditions and a common outlook on public affairs, which called for the maintenance of a solidarity inconsistent with separation. The attainment of manhood renders tutelage odious but does not release the bonds which unite a family together; so attainment of nationhood calls for the removal of all bonds of inferiority, but does not in any way, when these bonds are taken off graciously, alter the sentiments of affection and the spirit of coöperation which unite the members of one family together. So Canada, when she attained nationhood, acknowledging her filiation to Great Britain, could not claim her independence nor wish for separation, and none of the dominions were ready to cut off the ties which bound her to the mother country. Each of them naturally aspired to unfettered freedom and liberty but was ready and anxious to maintain with Great Britain bonds of coöperation entailing a large amount of solidarity, provided these bonds be not imposed forcefully but be voluntarily agreed to as between equals and in the common interest.

Subordination, federation and separation have been left out as a solution of the problem of the relations of the different parts of the Britannic commonwealth, and these relations have taken the character of a partnership, or more accurately, since there are no written undertakings, of an entente which, whilst maintaining the full freedom and liberty of its component parts in all matters domestic or foreign which relate to their own particular interests, yet unites them to preserve the integrity, the influence and the prestige of the whole. Under this system the empire has evolved from a single state to a group of states and the advantages of federation, without its dangers, are being made consistent with the fullest national aspirations and the greatest freedom.

In all matters relating to the internal government of the country, the rights and liberties which are the appanage of independent and sovereign nations have been de facto, enjoyed by the self governing dominions for a long time; and within a few years these rights and liberties have been extended to foreign relations. Thus Canada took part in the negotiations of the Peace conference, signed the treaty of Versailles and entered the League of Nations with the standing of a complete sovereign nation. She has negotiated and signed other treaties through her own ministers, has contracted treaties in the name of the king acting on behalf of Canada—as distinct from the king acting on behalf of the empire—she has made treaties respecting the delimitations of her frontiers, she asserted her freedom from the responsibilities assumed by the British government without her participation; and has enjoyed in one case, and may have the right whenever she chooses to exercise it, her own diplomatic representation; in a word she has acted as a nation with full powers of sovereignty. This is a state of things which should have satisfied the legitimate desires and ambitions of all liberty loving and patriotic citizens, but there was still lacking a full understanding and acknowledgment by foreign nations. The resolutions adopted at the Imperial conference have given sanction to these rights and have been a notification to foreign nations of this new status and constitutional freedom. Foreign nations had been slow to grasp such a constitutional development, deceived as they were by the theory of the written law, in many ways inconsistent with this situation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. member take the ground that the notification to the foreign nations of this new standing will be effective without resolutions of ratification passed by this House?

Mr. MORIN: I think that the resolutions passed at the Imperial conference, accepted generally as they were by Great Britain—in her case so emphatically—and by representatives of the British dominions, are a sufficient notification to the other countries of the world that we have been granted a new status.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Without any acceptation by this House?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Or by the parliament of Great Britain even, or by any other parliament?

Mr. MORIN: Well, we are accepting them.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose for recess the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) had asked me whether I thought that the decisions of the Imperial conference as to the status of the dominions would be accepted by foreign nations without the approval of the parliament of Canada or of that of Great Britain. I had answered him that these resolutions having been unanimously approved by the representatives of all the dominions and by the British government, foreign nations could not properly require a more emphatic statement of the situation. But apart from that, I may say that approval by the parliament of Canada would not give to the decisions of the Imperial conference any more weight unless they were approved also by the parliament of Great Britain and by the parliaments of the other dominions which took part in this conference over which we have no control.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just to be clear, does the hon. gentleman really take the position that the representatives at the Imperial conference could commit this country to a certain line of action without any reference at all to the parliament of Canada?

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): We must make a distinction. There were no active obligations undertaken at the conference in the name of Canada. There was merely a declaration of our new status. That is the purport of these resolutions. They do not carry any new obligation that I know of. These resolutions, moreover, have left unsettled a certain number of points which were referred to in the very remarkable speech made by a colleague of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre sitting on this side of the House; they have left unsettled certain conditions which are the last vestiges of our colonial days, and a formal approval of these resolutions by parliament at this stage might give to these conditions a character of finality which is not to be desired.

The views which I was expressing, Sir, were that the resolutions adopted at the Imperial conference had acknowledged that we had the right to exercise practically all the functions of a sovereign state, but that these yet lacked the full sanction and acknowledgment by foreign nations, and the importance of these resolutions lies in the fact that they were a notification served upon foreign nations of our new status and constitutional freedom. Foreign nations had been slow to grasp our constitutional development, deceived as they were by the theory of the written law, in many ways inconsistent with such independence, but which under the unwritten constitution of Great Britain is superseded by usage and practice. There was need of a public pronouncement in respect of this new status, and it was the main mission of the last Imperial conference to make it.

There are, and there will be for some time yet, different schools of thought in the dominions on this matter of the relations between the component parts of the Britannic commonwealth, and it seems an anomaly that these resolutions should have been commended by practically all groups. The inconsistency is more apparent than real, because, as a matter of fact, these resolutions do not fundamentally change our relations with Great Britain or the other parts of the British Empire; they do not create new rights; they definitely sanction rights already exercised and acquired; they raise the international standing of the dominions to a status of equality with that of Great Britain, and they alter accordingly the forms and proceedings of their relations. They cannot be read as meaning in any way a parting of the ways from the commonwealth, but the nature of the ties which unite the dominions to the mother country has lost any character of inferiority or subordination which existed in the past, to take up the character of an association between free countries, entered into voluntarily for their mutual benefit. Such a modification could only respond to the expressed or latent sentiments of all citizens having in their heart a natural and normal aspiration to manhood and to nationhood; it means no disintegration of the empire; on the contrary, if I am not mistaken, it will produce more cohesion. It could not therefore but satisfy all shades of opinions, all of which could find in it some comforting features.

The importance of these resolutions cannot be minimized. Their publication made a tremendous sensation throughout the world as was shown by the commentaries of the foreign press, and there was everywhere a ready disposition to recognize the new international standing of the dominions, and to alter relations accordingly.

One of the keenest students of the British constitution and of things Canadian, Mr. Lawrence A. Lowell, the president of Harvard University, in an article published in the April number of Foreign Affairs expressed the following appreciation of the consequences of these resolutions.

As a result of this conference he says that "the self-governing dominions have become legally and politically, in both domestic and foreign matters, independent states"; they have been brought "to a condition of full constitutional independence." These resolutions are "a notice that the dominions have come of age, have full rights of citizenship among the states of the world, and are to be treated accordingly." But the "spirit of coöperation remains strong," he adds, and as a result of the work of the conference "the cohesion of the different parts of the empire will become stronger rather than weaker."

[Mr. L. S. Morin.]

I concur in these conclusions, Mr. Speaker, and holding these views I can only look upon these resolutions as of momentous importance, as marking an epoch in the history of our country, and commend the work of the Prime Minister and his colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at this gathering.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, it will probably not be useful to the House for me to make any remarks at this stage of the proceedings in the discussion which has your attention, but I feel that this is one of the most important matters with which we have to deal during the present session. While there is not a report before us for adoption or rejection there are embodied in the discussion ideas which have to do with our very existence as part of the British Empire. I do not hesitate to say that I am of those who feel that we must not in any way, by thought or deed, interrupt in even the slightest measure the continuity of the connection of this Dominion with the British Empire, that we must go on for all time an indissoluble part and parcel of that empire. I look with a great deal of apprehension upon reports such as this which deal with so important a subject, and yet are not considered worthy by those who present them to be the subject of a motion in this House. If, as has been truly said, I take it, the Prime Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) were merely in conference with representatives of other parts of the empire, without their deliberations or conclusions having any binding force, then the documents we have before us as a report of the Imperial conference could carry no sanction for any action to be taken. That seems to be agreed upon. However, it was brought back as an achievement, as something that our representatives at that conference had been able to get for us. It was represented as being a new charter in fact, and as far away as the Dominion of South Africa we heard from the Prime Minister of that British dominion that it meant the end of the British Empire. When views so divergent concerning the results of this conference have been expressed by our friends in South Africa, our friends in the Irish Free State, and our friends, the constitutionalists, who are so ready to inveigh against the principles of our constitution, we should have something concrete and definite with which this parliament might either agree or disagree. Even to have brought in a report which has no sanction, which does not carry with it the endorsation of parliament, and which is met without any response, and left on Hansard, or on the records of the House in the terms in which it was brought to us, must, it seems to me, carry some implication in the future. We cannot tell how this matter will be taken up in time to come. It may be argued from this deliverance which has been brought back to us that this may be the case or that may be the case. Who is to say? If it is only a report, the presentation of which elicits no response, and which is denied the endorsation of the House, then I say it would have been better never to have been written at all. If it has been placed before us by the Prime Minister and has become a part of the records of the House, then I think the House should declare that it does not agree either with what different people in South Africa have said about it, or what anyone in the future may care to deduce from the words of that report. To my mind the amendment of my hon. leader (Mr. Guthrie) suggests the only way of dealing with the subject at the present moment. That is, if there are implications to be drawn from the report, we should deny them and say that this House is not bound by any implication to be drawn from that report. It seems to be sound common sense that we should be on record in some such way as that. Personally I am not afraid of imperialism, either the imperialism which some of my hon friends to my left, who do not altogether deny that they are of the communist party—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member has referred to some of us who spoke earlier in the debate and has implied that we are in allegiance with the communist party. I want to say emphatically that we have no connection with the communist party, and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the statement he has made.

Mr. GEARY: I am very glad to welcome the denial that my hon. friend has given. I am only suggesting, while he may have no allegiance with that party, that the views he is called upon to express at times are I think rather in sympathy with the views of the communist party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no.

Mr. GEARY: I am glad to have that assurance. That leaves it in a more or less definite form. Be that as it may, there is a certain school of thought, communist or otherwise as you may call it, which distrusts imperialism, because imperialism means to them the setting of the workers of one country against the workers of another, and they fear the term "imperialism," because imperialism to them does mean that the common interests of the workers of a country are perhaps interfered with by that sort of imperialism which demands that the material interests of the workers of one country shall involve the interests of the workers of another country. That is the imperialism of my hon. friend. The imperialism objected to by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is that which would involve the Dominion of Canada in war. That is a fetish with him, almost an obsession. He seems to visualize some condition in which the Dominion of Canada is to be drawn into a war. Where the Dominion of Canada has gone into a war, an imperial war if you like to call it such, she has gone into it wholeheartedly, with the assent of the people through their representatives in parliament. I am free to subscribe to this: that if the occasion should ever arise where the interests of the British Empire are involved, and in which we feel we are interested and should take part, then no one but the representatives of the people here in parliament should say whether or not we should take part in that war. I do not subscribe to any doctrine which says that the people of the country should be called upon to decide it, but the elected representatives in the House of Commons in this country should be able to decide the matter, as they have always done in the interests of Canada. I do not say that every war that occurs in which the empire is concerned necessarily involves Canada, but there may be wars in which we have such a vital interest, even if it does not touch our shores, that the people of Canada will rise to say that we must take our share in imperial defence or otherwise as the case may be.

Mr. ADSHEAD: As citizens of Canada, are we not at war when Britain is at war, no matter whether we go to war ourselves or not?

Mr. GEARY: My hon. friend is quite right. It is almost a truism that as we are a part of the British Empire when the empire is at war we are at war, and I think nobody will find fault with that declaration. The Dominion of Canada has risen from a small beginning to a mighty place among the nations of the world. It has risen as part of the British Empire. It depends for a great deal of its force and effect throughout the world upon the fact, not that it is an independent nation or that it has an independent status, not that it can be said to be separated from the British Empire, but, as I said before, because it is always indissolubly a part of the British Empire. If my hon. friend has any fear that the design of those who advocate continuity of membership in the British Empire, is to look forward to some controversial occurrence, such as a war, he is mistaken. We are not looking for such a thing, or advocating it. There is no such thing as the militarist or jingo spirit existing on this side of you, Sir, but we do feel that we cannot sit as members of this House—and I speak for myself now—and remain content always accepting the position that although we may be bound to take care of our own shores, we are not bound under any circumstances to protect ourselves by land or sea elsewhere on this globe. I am one of those who feel that if the conference report means anything, it means that we have attained to such a position that we are in a sense, not necessarily autonomous, but independent, so that for instance in case of war we cannot be called upon for contributions by way of taxes or anything of that sort. We are of course autonomous in that sense, but I cannot understand a relationship which disclaims any dependence upon the British Empire, but which is still content, without assuming one cent of the expense, to accept the protection of the British Empire even when our interests are vitally concerned in other parts of the world.

I do not approach this subject in any partisan spirit. That is not my object in saying what I have to say. I feel deeply that such conclusions as have come before us crystallized in the report of the Imperial conference will, unless we are very careful, tend in the direction of the separating, if you like to call it so, in one sense or another of this dominion from the rest of the dominions of the British Empire. That is why I dread to see part of our constitution put into writing. Except in so far as the British North America Act may be considered a written constitution, we have lived not under a written constitution but under a constitution that has grown up from precedent to precedent. It has been satisfactory so far, and for that reason I dread very much seeing put into writing any declaration of our constitutional or any other kind of status, especially when we know perfectly well and have known since the war and long before, that nowhere is there an intention to interfere with us in our external or internal affairs; that England, while she might be very sorry and hear with regret of any determination on the part of this country to sever itself from the empire or from the homeland, would raise neither hand nor voice to deter us from so doing if that was our sincere wish and desire. We have been independent in that sort of way for many long years, and nothing was required to be put into writing at this stage to declare what we already knew well. That has been one of my objections to this Imperial conference report, that we are reducing to writing something of which we do not know the meaning, something which in the future may be construed for or against this view or that so that no man knows what the result may be.

What is the answer to that? The answer from the other side of the House is that the report does not bind in any way; that it is simply an arrangement reached by those attending the conference; that it does not involve Canada or the House of Commons. If that be the case, why was it done? If it was meant to be a record of attainment to be crystallized into something that the people could look at so as to see what was done, we should have that statement from the government. As it stands now it is on the records of this House without any sanction at all, and the only sensible course this House can take is to adopt the amendment moved by my hon. leader (Mr. Guthrie) stating definitely that, no matter what the report may say or what inference may be drawn from it, it does not mean certain things as are set out in my hon. friend's amendment.

We are to-day faced with the situation that we have in the empire of China a danger to many of our nationals, how many I do not know. I have heard it stated that there are as many as six thousand. I do not care how many there are, they are just as much entitled to the protection of their lives and property if they be only one hundred as if they be one thousand. We are, as I understand the matter, not taking any steps directly in regard to that situation. If we are independent, if there is an autonomy, a status of sorts that relieves us of obligations to the British Empire and the empire from obligations to us and dissociates us from any responsibility as members of the British Empire, we would be at this time taking some steps to ensure that the lives and property of our nationals in China were protected. There are missionaries, business men and others there, with their wives and children.

Mr. COOTE: What does the hon. member consider a national? I do not understand that we have any such persons there as Canadian citizens.

Mr. GEARY: I am not going to stick at the question which the hon. member is asking in good faith. When I speak of nationals I perhaps do not use the proper term. I mean Canadians. My hon. friend knows many of them personally. I know many who have gone from my city and other parts of my province and who are engaged in activities of one sort or another in China.

Mr. COOTE: In an international sense would they not be considered simply British subjects and not Canadians?

Mr. GEARY: I am not, as I say, sticking at a word. Let us admit that they are British subjects. Does that mean that the Dominion of Canada, by the mere fact that those people are known as British subjects, is relieved of all responsibility as regards the protection of their lives and property? That is the point I am making. Others know much more about this matter than I do; the government is more closely in touch with the situation, and I am not suggesting that they should send a force or anything of that kind. My point is that we are leaving those lives and that property to the protection not of Canada but of the British Empire.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it not conceivable that the lives of Canadians in China would be a great deal safer if there were no British gunboats threatening Chineses ports?

Mr. GEARY: That would lead to an academic discussion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am serious, but I do not insist on an answer.

Mr. GEARY: I know the hon. member is serious in what he says, but I believe his view is mistaken. I do not believe the arts of peace extend that far. From what I have read of proceedings in China, the presence there of United States as well as British gunboats has had a considerable effect thus far at all events in preserving lives and property. Perhaps when the millennium comes, we shall be able to cast aside all means and methods of offence and defence, rest secure in the feeling that every man will treat another as his brother and that nobody will be in trouble the world over. That has not happened as yet anywhere, it certainly has not happened in China. I instance that only as indicating the curious discrepancy between the definition of autonomy and independent status and the actual facts as they exist in China at the present time.

As one who has scanned the report more or less closely I feel there is in it nothing that causes concern at the present moment. I do not think however we should be called upon to adopt it in its entirety without very careful consideration. The government, having through its leader and the Minister of Justice brought the report before this House, should be prepared to present it to the House with a definite recommendation, and let it be discussed backwards and forwards, through and through, until we know to where it leads and where it has left us, so that this House may have an opportunity of deciding now on the spot exactly what it is prepared to do in regard to the report. But having the matter before us in this vague way, one cannot get away from it by the mere declaration that it binds nobody, ministers of the crown have subscribed to it one way or another. Therefore the resolution of my leader is along the only lines that this House can safely adopt.

As we go along we find in this country people who are taking advantage of almost every opportunity that offers in some way or another, perhaps only by word, to distinguish between our position and that of the other dominions of the British Empire, to separate us somewhere, to take away the appeal to the Privy Council, to have a king of Canada instead of the king which we have at the present moment, to do this, that and the other, all little matters that go towards a general drift in the way of separatism. I feel that the people of Canada do not desire any such thing.

I believe we have prospered and been happy in our connection with the British Empire, and we can continue to be happy in that connection. We can go forward in the eyes of the world never so well as we can as part and parcel of the British Empire. Anything that tends, even by suggestion or implication, in the slightest way to destroy the ties binding us to the British Empire is abhorrent to me. We should guard against anything of that sort, because I believe the people in this Dominion as represented in this House value as they value nothing else their Canadian nationality and their Canadian nationality as it now is part and parcel of the British Empire. We can go on together as we have done in the past. But strong as that empire may be, let us not by any act or deed of ours, by anything we may say, tend to dislocate the union now existing between us. Let us play our part in conserving the strength of that beneficent empire. In that strength, serene and proud, we in Canada will continue to be part and parcel of the British Empire, never to be dissociated from it, pursuing our own way and proud of our own country, but prouder of it because it is an integral part of a great agency of civilization and advancement which the world has come to regard as its main instrument for progress.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before touching upon the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) I should like to comment on what seems to me to have been a deliberate effort on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent what I have said with respect to the significance of the recent Imperial conference. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was, I think, the first one to seek to have the House infer that I had made a statement to the effect that the report which was the outcome of the recent Imperial conference was in the nature of a charter which had been wrested from the British government, and that such a statement indicated an attitude of arrogance—I am not quoting the hon. gentleman's words but their meaning and intent—which the people of this country would not wish the leader of the administration to assume. The leader of the opposition, in the course of his remarks, seemed to me to be endeavouring to have that impression gain ground by quoting merely a part of my utterance, and by declining to take notice of the correction I wished to have made, when I drew his attention to the fact that I was being only partially quoted, and sought to have the full statement I had made presented to the House. Instead, he said that my remarks would be found in Hansard exactly in the terms he had quoted, which was not true. There have been other references by other speakers to the same effect, and in view of this fact I think I am justified in asserting that hon. gentlemen opposite have deliberately sought to have a certain impression created with respect to what I had said as to the significance of the conference, which impression my remarks would warrant in no respect.

Perhaps I can put the position in its true light by reading to the House from the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the interruption on my part and his reply thereto. On March 29, 1927, as recorded in Hansard, the leader of the opposition made the following statement:

> I place side by side the statements made by three of the prime ministers who attended the conference of 1926. First, I take the statement made by the Prime Minister of Australia when he was in Canada in January last as reported in the press at the time. He said:
> "There is nothing really new in the status or relations of the British dominions as a result of the recent conference. The rights now enjoyed have existed ever since the termination of the war."
>
> That is clear and distinct language which we all understand. Then I compare with that the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister made in this House on December 13 last, when he said:
> "I believe the work of this conference will take its place in history by the side of those great charters which have stood in one form or another for a larger freedom."
> Next I place side by side with that the statement attributed to the Prime Minister of South Africa, who said:
> "The British Empire now exists as a name only."
> When three of the participants in conference make statements so irreconcilable as those which I have just read, it is little wonder that the public in this country and perhaps in other parts of the British world are at a loss to know what actually did take place.

I interrupted at that stage, as Hansard shows:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to mislead the House as to what I said or the significance of it. He has read a part only of what I said. I stated that the resemblance to the charters of a larger freedom lay in the fact that none of them purported to set forth anything that was new, but rather to register the point that had been attained—exactly the same meaning and intent as that conveyed by the reference of the hon. Prime Minister of Australia, which my hon. friend has read.
> Mr. Guthrie: No, it is a very different statement, Mr. Speaker.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: No, it is not.
> Mr. Guthrie: The language can mean only one thing, that this larger freedom of which the Prime Minister speaks is a new acquisition to the self-governing powers of this country, or something to this effect.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: Would my hon. friend do me the justice of reading the remainder of that statement, and not take one sentence and separate it from its context?
> Mr. Guthrie: I will inform my right hon. friend through you, Mr. Speaker, that the statement is to be found in full in Hansard of December 13 last, and that the quotation which I have read is accurate.

Now I would ask the House to refer to Hansard of December 13 last, bearing in mind the words of my hon. friend, that the quotation as he gave it was accurate. I would now point out to the hon. gentleman that the quotation was not accurate, for not only did he not associate the sentence with the paragraph but he did not even quote the entire sentence. He gave part of a sentence, and that part only which would leave a completely misleading inference. The sentence to which I refer in my remarks made on December 13 is as follows:

> In that particular, I believe the work of this conference will take its place in history, so far as the statement of inter-imperial relations is concerned, by the side of those great charters which have stood in one form or another for a larger freedom.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition omitted altogether the words, "in that particular," which began the sentence. What was "that particular"? It is indicated in the words immediately preceding:

May I say here what I said publicly in London before coming away, that I believe from the Canadian point of view the merit of the conference will be not in a statement of what has been gained so much as in the statement of what has been attained and is now acknowledged to be altogether beyond debate. I think it is true that all the great charters of freedom in British history have for the most part not purported to introduce anything new or revolutionary. They have purported to be a statement of those rights which the citizens of the day believed were theirs and which they regarded as established. They were a formal statement which could be appealed to by future generations as indicating the point of agreement that had been reached with respect to the several matters with which they dealt.

Then followed my words, "in that particular," and so forth. The leader of the opposition omitted those words, and when I asked him to be good enough to do me the justice of quoting the sentence precisely he declined to do so. He omitted the words "in that particular" but quoted the remainder of the sentence:

I believe the work of this conference will take its place in history, so far as the statement of inter-imperial relations is concerned, by the side of those great charters which have stood in one form or another for a larger freedom.

There followed then these further words:

I believe this great conference, once party controversy is removed and we get a true perspective of it, will stand out in history as a conference which has revealed how broad, deep and enduring within the British Empire are the foundations of national autonomy and imperial unity.

I submit that anyone reading the full statement as I have now given it, will find it impossible to draw from it the inference which hon. gentlemen opposite have been seeking to give to my remarks, not only in this debate but in discussions throughout the country. I should not like to think that my hon. friend had misrepresented me deliberately and I hope he will now admit that I was right in taking exception to his quotation of what I had said as being only partial, and his not giving to my words the full meaning that attaches to them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the original statement I made in reference to the significance of the conference. I have read the statement made in this House after returning from the conference. Let me now read the statement I made before leaving England. It was made at a dinner given by the Empire Parliamentary Association at the House of Lords in England on November 27, the concluding day of the conference, which dinner was attended by representatives from the other dominions as well as by members of the British government, all of whom were called upon to address the gathering. The statement which I made at the time and which in substance I have repeated since will be found in the London Times of the day following the dinner, a copy of which I have in my hand:

For a time, the real work of the conference may be obscured in controversy, but when controversy subsides, and history lends a truer perspective, it will come to be recognized, not only in all parts of the British Empire, but by the world at large that the conference of 1926 has revealed foundations of national autonomy and imperial unity deeper, broader and more enduring than many have dreamed.

Speaking for the Dominion of Canada, I can say that the pride of our people in the achievements of the conference will, as respects Canada's relations in domestic and external affairs, lie not in what has been gained, but rather in what has been attained, and is now no longer open to debate. Our pride will be the greater in that this acknowledgement is made without a dissenting voice; that in all that has been recorded you of the motherland and we of the dominions are in complete accord. The charter of the liberties we individually and collectively enjoy may, to appearances, have been enlarged. In reality, there has been, as respects British political institutions, natural development along inevitable lines.

That was the statement made in the presence of the British ministers and the representatives of the other dominions. No exception that I could discover was taken by anyone who was present or indeed by the British press, and it was not until this particular statement was misrepresented in the manner I have indicated that exception was naturally taken to what was supposed to have been the claim I made with respect to some great gain which had been made at the Imperial conference at the expense of the British government or of Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my right hon. friend permit a question? How does the Prime Minister account for the impression received by such an important organ as the Manitoba Free Press, let us say, which has repeatedly asserted that Canada has entered into some new status in its relation to the mother country approximating complete independence, which impression has apparently been taken from the utterances of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend had stopped before he made his last remark I might have been able to reply immediately. I do not see why he thinks the Manitoba Free Press has taken its impressions from my utterances.

Mr. STEVENS: Very well, I will drop that sentence; I merely added it in explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Manitoba Free Press has taken its impressions from its own reading of the documents and from the knowledge gained in its own way of what took place at the conference, and is entitled to its own opinion like every other journal in this country.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the impression received by the Manitoba Free Press an erroneous deduction to take from the activities of the Imperial conference? I am anxious to get the thing correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to have before me the text of that part of the article in the Manitoba Free Press to which my hon. friend refers, before I express an opinion on it. I do not say that this is the case, but it is quite possible that quotations have been made from the Manitoba Free Press as they have been made from my speeches, apart altogether from the context, and I would like therefore to see the article and judge of the expression before commenting on it.

To proceed with what I was about to say, may I recall to the House the exception taken by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) to my making utterance of the kind I have just read. If I recall his words correctly, my hon. friend said that I had no justification for saying that any principles had been established by the conference, and he went on to ask what right I had to speak in the name of the Canadian people.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the right hon. gentleman read from that statement made at the House of Lords dinner exactly what he did say about this new covenant, or whatever the term was, which was agreed to by all the dominions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just read it.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the right hon. gentleman read it again? It was that to which I referred and in respect to which I said I did not understand whence the Prime Minister received his authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will read it again:

> Our pride will be the greater in that this acknowledgement is made without a dissenting voice; that in all that has been recorded you of the motherland and we of the dominions are in complete accord.

Mr. CAHAN: I took exception to that.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me read the statement made by Mr. Baldwin, the Prime Minister of England, on the same occasion, which will be found to be identical in meaning if not in the same terms. I desire to give this for the purpose of making it clear that the criticism which hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to focus on the leader of the government in Canada is applicable in equal measure to the prime ministers of all the self-governing dominions and the Prime Minister of Great Birtain, as well as to the other members of the British government who were present. As long as that is understood I have no objection to my hon. friends levying any criticism they may have to offer, but I do take exception to having the impression go abroad not only throughout the British Empire but throughout the world as well that so far as Canada was concerned her representatives adopted an attitude which was singular in this particular direction, and not comparable to the attitude taken by the prime ministers of the other self-governing dominions. I will just quote one paragraph from the remarks made by Mr. Baldwin:

> "We emerged from the war transformed. Great Britain emerged no longer isolated. Science had decreed that whether Great Britain liked it or not she was for all time an integral part of Europe. The dominions emerged matured, grown up to man's estate and conscious of their manhood, with its privileges and its obligations. We have recognized that fact," continued Mr. Baldwin, "we have acknowledged it to one another and that is really what we have said in this historical document. We are the last people to indulge in theories and definitions, but we have stated there a fact. We have tried to see things as they are and put them forth for the world to read. That is a very different thing from plucking a plant up by the root every year to see how it is growing. We have never done that and we have never attempted to define terms too closely, even at the risk of being thought an illogical people. Now we have published to the word our conception of the status of the communities which comprise the British Empire.

If my hon. friend will take those words of the Prime Minister of England and put them beside my own words which I have quoted, he will find that their meaning and significance is to all intents and purposes identical. Mr. Baldwin was expressing appreciation of the fact that the representatives of the dominions and the representatives of the British government were as one in their general concensus of view as to the status existing between the different self-governing parts of the British Empire in their inter-imperial relations. He was expressing further an appreciation which I think was felt generally throughout the British Empire that there had been a consensus of view which was unanimous on that particular matter.

Now, what was the status on which we all agreed? Reference has often been made in the course of the debate to the text of the report itself; we will grasp its significance better if we take broadly the possible alternative conceptions of the relations of the different self governing parts of the British Empire to one another, Great Britain included. There is no escaping one or other of these alternatives. Either the dominions, in relation to Great Britain, are in a position of colonial subordination, or they are in a position of equality of status. There is no escaping this alternative: in relation to the dominions either the position of Great Britain is one of imperial control, or else it is one of equality of status. Now you cannot get away from one or the other of these positions; and when you come to discuss the questions that arise as between the different parts of the British Empire there comes immediately to the fore, the query, on what fundamental basis are you going to settle these questions? Are you going to lay down the basic principle as one of imperial control on the part of Great Britain and colonial subordination as respects the dominions, or are you going to say that the basis that has been achieved—not all in one year but over a large number of years—the point that has now been reached, that has been attained in the evolution of the great structure of empire, is one where the self-governing dominions hold an equality of status with the mother country? I venture to say that understood in that broad light there is not an hon. member of this House who will take exception to that statement of the position. See what the effect is the moment that position is acknowledged. So long as it is not acknowledged you have within the self-governing dominions the strongest kind of reason for agitation against imperial control, the strongest kind of reason for agitation against colonial subordination. The minute the status is declared and known to be one of equality to permit of effective coöperation between the different parts that moment you remove throughout the empire the basis for agitation on that particular ground. I wish to say that when the conference met there was in one or two parts of the British Empire a great deal of agitation which the British government I know viewed with a good deal of concern. There was a condition very unsettled in South Africa; there was a certain unsettled condition in Ireland. The minute the position was made clear that so far as the relations of Great Britain to these dominions was concerned it was not one of imperial control but was one of equality of status—each self-governing part of the empire in its relation to the other part being on a footing of equality for the purpose of effective coöperation—that minute the agitation subsided and those responsible for it were obliged to change their note.

Take the effect of the conference, for that, after all, is the best way to judge of results. What has been the effect in South Africa? The feeling in South Africa to-day towards Great Britain is vastly different from what it was before the conference took place. It is not one of estrangement from Great Britain. On the contrary there is every evidence of a desire on the part of South Africa to remain within the British Empire and a feeling of pride in the position of South Africa in the empire; and the same, I believe, is true in regard to the Irish Free State. I wish to take very strong exception to the words which were spoken here this morning by my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) to the effect that there was represented at that conference a couple of nations of the empire that were seeking to separate, and that the representatives of Canada were doing their part in helping to make it easy for them to get away. Those are not the exact words of the hon. gentleman but that is their intent and meaning. I say to my hon. friend that I do not think that he uttered the sentiments of his own heart or his own mind when he used those words; he was talking from a purely political motive at that time. I do not believe that my hon. friend feels in his heart that the representatives of this Dominion went to that Imperial conference with any such object in their minds—

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —or that either of them played any such part. My hon. friend spoke about coöperation on the part of the Minister of Justice and myself with the prime ministers of Ireland and South Africa. He did not say anything about coöperation with the prime ministers of Australia or New Zealand. Yet both the latter gentlemen have visited this country, they have spoken publicly from coast to coast; and at the many meetings which they addressed they declared emphatically that the representatives of Canada had coöperated with them, and were at one with them in the views that were expressed at the Imperial conference. More than that. I would ask my hon. friend, if he has among his numerous friends and asquaintances, as I believe he has, those who are closely in touch with the British government in London, if he would enquire from them as to the kind of part which was played by the Minister of Justice and myself at the Imperial conference—whether it was a part which sought to make the problems of empire more difficult, or whether it was a part which to the uttermost sought to help to bring about unity in imperial affairs. If hon members opposite will communicate with those members of the British cabinet who were at that conference, I challenge them to find one who will do other than admit that the part played by Mr. Lapointe and myself was the part of men who were doing their utmost to bring about unity, and to remove the occasions for discord within the British Empire; and I affirm that it comes with pretty poor grace from gentlemen who profess to have such a love of the empire, and to be the especial exponents of empire, to do their utmost to destroy the work that has been done by the representatives of this country in company with the representatives of other parts of the empire with whom they find no fault and whom they are over zealous to praise.

Now let me go back to the statement I have made as to the results of the conference as embodied in its report being worthy of being placed beside the great charters in Britsh history. I have in my hand a copy of the London Spectator which I think is as Conservative an organ as is published in Britain. Certainly no one will challenge its high standing, no one will challenge its interest in the empire, no one will challenge the great skill with which it is edited. The dinner at the House of Lords took place on November 27. On that same day the London Spectator came out with an article on the conference. I had not seen this article at the time I made my speech; I had at the time no knowledge of its existence. What was the view this great British journal took of the significance of the Imperial conference? The article is headed "The British Commonwealth's Charter of Freedom" and the first paragraph reads as follows:

> The eagerly awaited report of the Inter-imperial Relations Committee of the Imperial conference was issued on Saturday, November 20, and an epoch-marking document it is, whatever may be said to the contrary. For years to come the report will be regarded as a charter of freedom for the British commonwealth of nations. The document may well rank with our most important state papers, for in it are set forth the basic principles on which the British Empire rests. Never was the genius of the British people for adapting their political institutions to the changing needs of the day more apparent. Here is no written constitution which will bind future generations, but rather a confession of faith in what the empire stands for in 1926, and an indication of how best to insure its permanence.

Now there is a statement identical in its intent and meaning with the one I made, and to which such exception is being taken at the present time. It does not say that the work of the conference amounted to nothing. It attaches very great significance to the fact that we have reached a point in the evolution of empire where we were able by common accord definitely to state a position of vast consequence to all parts of the empire.

But let me quote from a speech made by the Right Hon. Mr. Amery, Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, a speech delivered at the Constitutional Club on December 16th, and reported in the London Daily Times of December 17th. The speech was on the Imperial conference and it is easy to see what significance Mr. Amery gives to the conference, speaking on behalf of the British government. This is the quotation from the Times:

> The conference had cleared the way for future coöperation by getting rid of certain misunderstandings as to the relative position of the dominions and ourselves which had survived into recent years and were a cause, not only of difficulty as between the dominions and ourselves in our efforts to coöperate, but also of internal political difficulty in more than one dominion. Lord Balfour had achieved not the least of his many great achievements in being responsible for a report which marked a new and useful stage in empire coöperation. It might be said with truth that there was really nothing new in the conclusions of the Balfour committee, but this report was only typical of many other great documents in our constitutional history. Our procedure has never been to lay down a constitution for the future, but rather, from time to time, to see how the constitution had developed and to take note of the stage which had been reached. That was, in essence, what the Balfour report did.

Exactly the same statement in intent and meaning as the one which I have made as to the significance of the conference itself.

Now I come to the next point that has been stressed in this debate, and that is the criticism of myself and the government for not submitting the conference report for the approval of parliament. My hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) gave, I think, three grounds on which he felt the report should have been submitted: First, that I had stated when speaking in the debate on the Address last December that it was the intention of the government to submit the report to the House; second, that the report of 1923 had been submitted in whole or in part for the approval of parliament, and therefore that this report should also be submitted to parliament; and thirdly, that I had no right to speak on behalf of the people of Canada, that the only body that had that right was this parliament, and that I should put the report before parliament so that parliament could pronounce upon it. I think I have stated correctly in intent and meaning my hon. friend's different arguments.

I did state, Mr. Speaker, in December last that it was the intention of the government to submit the report to parliament for its approval. But sometimes second thoughts are better than first thoughts. I confess that I had no sooner made that statement to parliament than I was told that my reason for so doing was to force a division in this House: that I knew I had come back from the conference with a report that would command the confidence of parliament and would help to give the government a good majority, and that I was intending to put this report before parliament and compel a division upon it, or else the acceptance of the report in its entirety without division, which would, of course, bring greater credit to the administration than ever.

Mr. CAHAN: Who raised that objection, may I inquire?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have heard it raised in a number of quarters. I have not to go very far to disclose how right I am in what I am saying. The amendment which my hon. friend has brought into the House to this motion to go into supply was an amendment that was intended as an amendment to the report when it was brought down, not the exact words, but there was the intention on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, if the adoption of the report had been moved, to move an amendment to it. Hon. gentlemen know that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not for me to go into the counsels of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have good reason for knowing that there was the intention of moving an amendment if the report had been placed before the House for adoption. If there was no such intention, I fail to see what is the object of an amendment to a motion which is simply for the purpose of enabling us to discuss the report.

Having in mind, Mr. Speaker, what took place at the conference, having in mind the difficulties there were in reaching the point of unanimity which was reached, to the great satisfaction of all parts of the empire, I did not feel that it would be in the interest of inter-imperial relations or in the interests of the British Empire to take a course of procedure in this parliament which would provoke a division here when division had not taken place upon the report in any other part of the British Empire. and I decided that I would change the course of procedure so as to avoid anything of the kind.

May I say this? When I made that statement in the course of the debate on the address, hon. gentlemen opposite had been indicating an adverse attitude towards the report. I was speaking in the spirit of the leader of a party who is conscious of his position, and when I stated that I was prepared to bring that report in here and have its adoption moved in the House, I will admit frankly that I was not giving the consideration which I perhaps should have given at that moment to the effect that that particular course might have outside of this House and outside of this country. I was not thinking sufficiently, I will frankly admit, of the possible effect in South Africa, in Ireland, in New Zealand, in Australia, in India and in the British parliament, of a division in this parliament and of the kind of debate which we have already had over this amendment; nor had I then given as much thought as I have since given to the course of procedure adopted in the other parliaments of the empire.

When I first spoke on this subject, I made it clear that I was going to avoid in my address so far as might be possible anything in the nature of party politics or a partisan view, and my hon. friend opposite was kind enough in the course of his remarks to say that he felt in that particular I had kept true to my purpose as indicated. I deliberately kept away from anything that might prove controversial, hoping that in regard to these inter-imperial matters this parliament would give to the empire the same kind of united expression as the Imperial conference itself had given. In the British House of Commons, as is known here, when questions of foreign relations are being discussed, the political parties have an understanding which has become a tradition in British public life, that on issues of that kind they will not divide parliament if it is possible so to avoid. They will discuss freely the merits of the several questions, but they will not divide the House. They will seek in foreign affairs to be as one when it comes to parliament, as representing the country against the rest of the world. I think we in this House can afford to follow British tradition in that regard, and if that tradition has any value in respect to foreign affairs, it has fifty times greater value when it comes to be applied to inter-imperial affairs. There, if anywhere, we should seek to avoid the kind of political division which would cause other parts of the empire to believe that on these great questions that lie at the very root of the unity and the maintenance and perpetuity of the British Empire we in this House are not at one. That was my reason, and I now wish to say to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that I think he will be taking the right, the wise and the patriotic course if, after the discussion which has taken place, he should withdraw his amendment, and not have this House divide upon a question of imperial unity as it has come to us from the Imperial conference. If he is unwilling to withdraw his amendment, then of course the government has no alternative but to allow the vote to be taken. But if the vote is to be taken, I appeal to hon. members of this House by their numbers to make it clear that they do not wish to countenance a course of the kind, but that they are prepared to share the point of view of those who follow a larger and finer tradition in regard to inter-imperial relations when these relations are being discussed on the floor of parliament.

May I say, speaking of other parts of the empire—

Mr. CAHAN: Does that statement of the Prime Minister imply that this House is expected by quiet acquiescence to approve of any action taken by the Prime Minister and his colleagues at imperial conferences in the future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all, and nobody knows that better than my hon. friend. If my hon. friend has an indictment to draw against the Prime Minister, let him frame it and bring it in here and move it. I am prepared to stand and defend the course I have taken. If my hon. friend thinks I have taken a mistaken course, let him bring in a motion to that effect, and let parliament express itself upon it, but do not let him come forward in regard to a report which is accepted unanimously in all parts of the British Empire and divide this House in a way which is going to create a false impression in the other dominions of the empire and in the motherland. Take the practice as it is, as we see it in different parts of the British Empire. In Great Britain in the House of Commons, as far as I can discover, they have not even debated the question of the conference. Questions have been asked of the ministers and the ministers have replied. There have been discussions on matters that have come up in which reference has been made to what took place at the conference, and the freest comments made in regard to these matters. But in no place in Britain up to the present time has there been any criticism of the British government's attitude with regard to the conference, or any division with respect to the report. In the House of Lords there was a brief debate, and how was it brought on? Lord Parmoor, on behalf of the opposition, moved for certain papers to permit of a discussion. Lord Parmoor made his statement and Lord Balfour replied to him, and after the reply Lord Parmoor said that he accepted in full all that Lord Balfour had stated and added that unanimity was the thing to be sought, he therefore asked leave to withdraw his motion for the production of papers, which leave was granted. That was the method of procedure there. There has been no division in the South African parliament, or in New Zealand, and in Australia there has been no discussion that I am aware of.

Mr. CAHAN: No opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And even in Ireland, in the Irish Free State despite what we have heard said of fighting propensities and the stirring up of dissention, there was a debate but there has been no division. Is Canada going to be the first part of the British Empire to create a division on a matter that was one of unanimity at the great Imperial conference? Is that the attitude which hon. members opposite propose to take? They may take it, but they will have to take the responsibility that goes with it. As leader of the House, I am striving to secure what I believe to be the patriotic, the right and proper attitude, and I suggest in the light of what I have stated that when this discussion is concluded, after every hon. member has had his free say, the hon. leader of the opposition should withdraw his motion. Otherwise to other parts of the empire and to the world at large, there will be the spectacle that while there has been a declaration to the world generally of the unanimity that exists within the empire on imperial affairs, there will appear to be evidence to the contrary, because of the Canadian parliament in reference to the report not having acted in accordance with the course adopted by other parts of the empire.

Let me come to the second reason which my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George gave as to why this resolution should be submitted to the House. It was that the report of the conference of 1923 had been submitted. I think he said the report of 1923, and I corrected him and said that there had been only one portion of that report submitted.

Mr. CAHAN: The part in regard to treaties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me explain to the House why a particular part was submitted to parliament, and in so doing I suggest that it forms a kind of precedent which we might well follow in regard to matters contained in the reports of Imperial conferences. There were two reports of the conference of 1923, one the report of the Imperial conference and the other of the Imperial Economic conference, dealing with the same class of subject matters as are dealt with in the one report of the last conference. Those two reports were placed before parliament just exactly as this report was placed by tabling, and by order of the House having copies printed and distributed. That was done in 1924. The conference was held in 1923. In the session following no action was taken on the report. It was not submitted for approval. In the session of 1925 no action was taken, and in 1926 the part of the report which related to a certain procedure with respect to treaties was presented to parliament and parliament was asked to adopt it. Why? Because in the interval there had been received from the British government a statement of some of the matters that would be on the agenda of the ensuing conference, and one was the further consideration of the question of treaties, the procedure, with respect to negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties. This parliament has taken a different view than some of the other parliaments of the empire with respect to the approval of treaties. We have taken the position that a treaty cannot be held to be binding on Canada until it has been approved by our parliament—that it cannot be ratified until approved by parliament. Now there had been no expresion of view from the Canadian parliament on that all-important matter, and it was to get an expression of view on that important matter, to get the endorsation of this House on the course of precedure laid down and which we had already followed with respect to three or four treaties which we had negotiated that this House was asked to approve that particular part of the report before the conference of 1926 took place. So that when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and myself went to the conference we were able to state, "This is the position of the Canadian parliament on this matter."

I will mention a further consideration, which will appeal, I am sure, to my hon. friend's sense of humour, if to nothing else. No one of us in the House was at all certain as to who might be going to the conference from Canada. Some hon. members thought that the then leader of the opposition had a chance of going. We were taking good care to see that if he did go, with his Tory point of view, he should not be in a position to have this country bound by treaties unless this parliament in the first instance had approved of them. We wished to have the course clearly mapped out, so that no matter who might go to the conference he would have to support his position the decision of the House of Commons as to the attitude Canada wished to have placed before the conference with respect to the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask the Prime Minister if it does not appeal to his sense of humour that this resolution of the leader of the opposition is in complete accord with the Prime Minister's declaration of last session that in all these questions the approval of parliament should first be obtained, and that we do not desire the Prime Minister to deem himself authorized to carry out these reforms without the sanction of parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to any feature of this report, parliament will have ample opportunity of passing upon it if in any particular it conflicts with the point of view of this House.

Then a further factor which may help to explain the situation is this: the former Liberal administration took a certain position with respect to the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties prior to the conference of 1923. Hon. members who were in the House at the time will remember we had a lengthy debate on the halibut treaty, negotiated between Canada and the United States, with respect to the conservation of the halibut fisheries on the Pacific coast. When the treaty came up for consideration we took the position that it was a bilateral treaty affecting only the United States and Canada, that it did not affect any other part of the empire; that as such it was for the members of the Canadian government to negotiate with the government of the United States. We thought His Majesty should give full powers to our representative, just as we had given full powers to the representatives of the British government in the negotiation of treaties which concerned them only. We were criticized very strongly, not by my hon. friend, but by some other members. It was said that we were making a great departure inasmuch as we were going to negotiate a treaty with our own minister, and were asking that full powers be given a Canadian minister. We were told this treaty business was something off of which we ought to keep our hands. We proceeded however along lines which we thought were right and which this parliament ultimately unanimously approved. What followed our negotiation of the halibut treaty? When the Imperial conference of 1923 met, there had been all kinds of misrepresentation with regard to our position. The question came up for discussion, and when the conference had all the facts before it, it endorsed the position of our government. The conference laid down that, with respect to the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties, where only one part of the empire was affected, it should have the right to negotiate those treaties itself and to arrange for the signature of them and for ratification at the instance of its own government or parliament in accordance with the method that the parliament concerned wished to adopt, either formal approval by the parliament or simple approval by the government.

That was the position when the conference of 1923 was held. Following that conference we negotiated with the United States three more treaties in accordance with the procedure laid down in the conference of 1923. One treaty related to smuggling, another to the extradition of offenders, and the third to the boundary between this country and the United States. All three treaties were negotiated by Canadian ministers. The Canadian minister in each case received full power from His Majesty the King upon the recommendation of the governor in council of this country. The treaties were brought into this House of Commons, approved by this House, and after approval by this House they were ratified by His Majesty the King on the recommendation of the government of this country.

We had adopted here a course of procedure with respect to a number of treaties, and before a new Imperial conference was held we desired to get full approval of that course of procedure, knowing that the matter of negotiation of treaties was to receive further consideration at the ensuing conference. That is the reason that a portion of the report of 1923 was presented. If it affords strong reasons why with respect to particular portions of this report this parliament may from time to time think it advisable formally to endorse a course of procedure outlined or to express its view thereon, that is very far from being the equivalent of asking this parliament to adopt in full a report which covers a very wide range of subjects and which, no matter how long a time this parliament might take, it would be impossible for it to debate fully from beginning to end.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the Prime Minister's position that it would be right that Canada should be committed, for example, to a scheme of imperial air routes without any discussion or decision by this parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I think this parliament should have full opportunity to discuss any scheme, no matter what it is, that has a bearing upon the relations of this country with other parts of the empire.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I understand the matter then, we are not so committed by letting this question go as it is to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know what my hon. friend has in mind and I will give my attention to it for a moment. In the course of my remarks the other day, I mentioned that there was one particular thing, one single act out of all the rest, in regard to which the Minister of Justice and myself, acting on behalf of the government of Canada, felt that we were justified in committing this country to some extent, in the belief that in so doing we would have the full support of parliament.

In the discussion at the conference on the question of commercial air routes relating to an immediate probable development of airship navigation, a request was made by the Minister of Air to the governments assembled at the conference for one or more to agree to coöperate with the British government in making a test of aerial navigation for commercial purposes, by going the length of agreeing to undertake to put up a mooring mast to which airships could be moored and to gather meteorological data sufficient to enable those who were doing the navigating to feel secure in the course which they were taking. That request was made in an informal way; there was no resolution or anything of the kind about it. I said to my colleague who was beside me: it seems to me that the people of Canada will welcome an experiment which is going to help to develop trade between England and our dominion, no matter how that development takes place. We all know we are on the eve of great developments in air flights, and at the conference the Minister of Justice and I knew that Africa, Australia and India had already established their commercial routes with flights from one part to the other. We felt that we would be derelict in our duty if we did not take advantage of that moment to endeavour to get the first flight of airships across the ocean between Canada and Great Britain rather than between Australia, or Africa, or some other part of the empire and Great Britain. So we said that we would be prepared, when parliament met, to ask parliament to vote what was necessary to pay for a mooring mast and to undertake that particular work of experimentation. That item is in the estimates and it will come before parliament, in fact the estimates are before the House now. If we have taken a wrong stand in that, parliament can review our stand; parliament can refuse to pass that estimate.

We were not endeavouring to escape the authority of parliament; but ministers of the crown from the nature of their position are obliged to act or to fail to act on particular occasions, and they can be held as liable for the one course of procedure as for the other. In the circumstances I would have felt, had we not acted as we were glad to do and as I believe the people of Canada will be glad we have done, in stating that Canada was prepared to experiment with the mother country in the matter of air navigation across the Atlantic, this House might very well have taken exception to our course and criticized us for our failure to act. That was in so far as I am able to recall the only commitment made at the Imperial conference directly or indirectly in any regard.

Mr. CAHAN: If the Imperial conference report is adopted or accepted by this parliament, does not that imply that Canada shall participate in imperial defence otherwise than by a mere air route?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not admit any implications in the report at all. The report means just what it says. As regards questions of defence and the like, no commitments at all were made at the Imperial conference.

May I come to the third reason of my hon. friend why the report should be presented, and that is that I as Prime Minister and my colleague as Minister of Justice representing this country had no right to speak for Canada, for the Canadian people? I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the chamber this morning when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) made his speech which, by the way, may I be permitted to say was a model of moderation, fine in tone and equally good in substance? When he made that speech this morning the hon. member quoted from the premier of Quebec, and in the course of his remarks said that the premier of Quebec had the right to speak for the province of Quebec. Will my hon. friend deny that?

My hon. friend knows very well that someone has to be in a position to speak for the country. When a country has pronounced itself with respect to a government and has placed ministers in office, it gives to their office certain powers and obligations. I say to my hon. friend that the constitutional method of procedure with respect to domestic and foreign affairs is for ministers of the crown to have the right to negotiate. They may not have the right to bind parliament, without the approval of parliament, but they have the right to negotiate and to express sentiments with regard to general public opinion.

Mr. CAHAN: May I say that my contention was that, having represented Canada, the hon. gentleman should submit to parliament for its approval the report which he approved? Otherwise he remained without authority to carry out its terms.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will see his own words in Hansard. From the regard which I have for him, I shall be a little surprised if one day he does not rather wonder how he came to use them. My hon. friend, I think, understands very well the rules of debate, and on most of these imperial questions I believe he desires to make his contribution as useful and helpful as possible. But I say to him, speaking across the floor of the House, that, judging from the impression which his remarks the other day created in the House, his effort on that occasion was one not so much intended to contribute in any constructive manner to the consideration of imperial problems, as to be as abusive as he could of the Prime Minister.

Mr. CAHAN: I am sorry the Prime Minister took that impression.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not mind the abuse; I am quite prepared to listen to it. I do say to my hon. friend however, with all respect, that if he thinks that sort of thing makes for unity within the empire he is very much mistaken. I may tell him frankly, as my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said from his seat the other day, that if ministers of the crown, after having done their utmost on behalf of their country to further unanimity and good will in imperial affairs, are to receive from the loyal opposition of the country as their only reward as much abuse as can be heaped upon them, it will be increasingly difficult to get ministers to attend these conferences and to devote to the task they undertake that time and concentration which the country might wish them to give such duties.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that I had no right to speak for Canada; they declare that I should not have dared to say whether we were at one with other parts of the empire. When they draw their indictment against me on this ground I should like to ask them what their indictment would have been had I refused to make an effort to find agreement at the conference. I knew before I left for the conference that an effort was being made by hon. gentlemen opposite to have it appear that I was going to England to make all the trouble I could. As a matter of fact, the first impression which my hon friends opposite sought to create was that I did not intend to go to the conference; that for some reason or other I had a dislike for Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and the man who has just said "hear, hear" is responsible for much of the language of that kind. Let me say that nothing could be more unpatriotic, more unworthy of a British citizen than such an insinuation. I tell hon. gentlemen that there is no man within the empire who has a greater love for it than I have; there is no man who believes more strongly than myself in the wisdom of preserving the empire as the greatest agency for peace and goodwill and progress in the world. It is for that reason that I say now, emphatically, that when a party or its members seek to have it appear to the world at large that one who is imbued with that spirit, and who entertains that regard for the British commonwealth of nations is engaged in an endeavour to dismember the empire, they are going a long way towards sowing seeds which some day may bear the kind of tares they would not wish to see. It is easy enough to sow the wind but the time comes thereafter when you reap the whirlwind, and I tell my hon. friends opposite that any man who seeks to make party gain out of imperial questions fails to play his part as a true British citizen or a patriot. I do not think I need repeat that when I left Canada I made it clear that so far as our Dominion was concerned our relations with the mother country, as well as with other parts of the empire, could not be better than they were. From the moment I entered upon the proceedings of the conference until the very close of those proceedings every effort I could possibly put forward was made with the sole object of seeking, as far as I could, to help remove such differences as existed and to bring out that demonstration of unity which every true lover of the British Empire will appreciate.

I had no intention of referring to my own part in the conference, but hon. gentlemen have made it necessary for me to state my position more fully than I otherwise should have done. I need not detain the House longer, but in conclusion I would again appeal to my hon. friend to consider the wisdom, after the close of this debate, of withdrawing the amendment he has submitted.

The amendment is unnecessary and misleading. The position has been made abundantly clear to parliament that the report of the Imperial conference in no way commits this country or this House to anything, nor does it deprive this parliament of any right or power now exercised. To agree to an amendment such as the one now proposed is to create an entirely misleading impression with respect to the contents of the report of the conference, and the significance thereof. Let me take the first clause:

> That it is not desirable that this House should be deemed tacitly to have acquiesced in the declarations and recommendations contained in the report of the proceedings of the Imperial conference, 1926.

Suppose that clause is accepted; what is the implication? The implication is that where a resolution of this nature has not been adopted with reference to previous imperial conferences this House has tacitly acquiesced in the reports of those conferences. For my part I am not prepared to admit that this country is bound by a single report of any imperial conference. As I stated emphatically at the outset, the imperial conference is not a parliament, nor is it a council empowered to lay down policies. It is no more than a gathering of representatives of different parts of the empire delegated to state their views and to indicate their conclusions. I submit, with respect to this report and every other report of any imperial conference, that, except to such extent as this parliament desires to endorse and to be bound by what appears in any of these reports, they have no binding effect whatever. The purpose of the conference is to help as far as possible to bring about some symmetry on the part of the various parts of the empire in the working out of many problems they have in common; to provide between them some more effective means of coöperation; to lay down broad principles and methods for dealing with such matters as call for joint or common consideration; and to ensure effective coöperation whenever the necessity for coöperation may arise and the parliament concerned may decide upon it. I repeat that imperial conferences are not parliaments or councils empowered to make constitutions for the empire. I ask the House therefore not to agree to any amendment which will leave the implication that, where there has been no formal resolution with respect to reports of this nature, this House has tacitly acquiesced therein.

Mr. CAHAN: Did not the Prime Minister in submitting his resolutions at the last session say that previous reports had tacitly bound this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not.

Mr. CAHAN: I would refer the right hon. gentleman to Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister did not say that. The second paragraph of the amendment reads:

> That in the opinion of this House the proceedings of the recent Imperial conference and the declarations and recommendations contained in the report of the Imperial Conference Committee on Inter-imperial Relations should not be binding upon the parliament of Canada until approved by a formal resolution of this House.

All this has already been made perfectly clear; no one in this House has any misconception as to the extent to which the report is binding. There is therefore no need for the House to divide on that point. But take the rest of the clause:

> And that until such approval is obtained this government shall not be deemed to be authorized to take any steps to carry into effect the recommendations contained in said report.

This morning the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) complained that sufficient time had not been given to the consideration of trade, of migration and of defence. He thought there had been too much purely academic discussion on the question of status. May I say to my hon. friend that while he paid the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and myself the compliment of being academic and the still greater compliment of apparently having directed the affairs of the conference, we were not responsible for the agenda. We took it as it was presented to us and as it appeared when we got there, and if these constitutional questions assumed large proportions it was not because of our representations. It must be remembered that the conference was representative of all parts of the British Empire, and that many of these questions were of great concern not only to some of the other governments of the self-governing dominions but to the British government as well.

If this amendment is adopted the government is prevented without the approval of parliament from even carrying out the administrative measures mentioned in the report, and may I say that in a very large part what is there in the way of recommendation relates to matters of administration which it is hoped will help bring about a more effective coördination and coöperation. Consider the matter of trade statistics; certain standards are laid down to which it is hoped all parts of the empire will conform. We are to be prevented from even attempting to conform to these standards, while other parts of the empire are prepared to do so. The report suggests certain investigations should be made with respect to certain commodities effecting empire trade but until this parliament formally agrees to it we are supposed to say, "No; we are sorry, but we cannot give our consent to any inquiry being made until parliament formally approves of our so doing". I am sure that on reflection my hon. friend will not wish to press matters that far. Then in the concluding paragraph it is stated:

> That it is also the opinion of this House that no amendments should be procured to the British North America Act to give effect to said report or otherwise, which would affect the rights, powers or privileges of all or any of the provinces of Canada, as they now exist under the terms of said act, unless the same are first approved by the legislature of each of the provinces of Canada.

It has been stated over and over again that the position so far as the British North America Act is concerned is now exactly the same as before the conference was held, and there is no need of discussing that act on an amendment bearing upon the report of this conference. The conference was held in October and November of last year, and today the British North America Act is in exactly the same position it was in last September; it stands in exactly the same position, so far as the people of Canada, are concerned as it stood before the conference. What then is the need of bringing the British North America Act into a discussion of the report of this conference?

I take a further exception. The amendment goes far beyond the report in its reference to amendments. It says:

—no amendments should be procured to the British North America Act to give effect to the said report or otherwise—

Note the "or otherwise." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the subject of amendments to the British North America Act is big enough to be dealt with alone and should be discussed in this parliament by itself without being confused with this particular report.

In conclusion may I say that if hon. members will reflect they will, I believe, have reason to feel that in every part of the British Empire to-day there is cause for congratulation that those who happened for the time being to be in certain representative positions were in agreement on great, broad principles which, understood between them, help to make for more effective unity and greater coöperation between all its parts. I say there is cause for congratulation and I believe the people in all parts of the British Empire are proud and pleased that that position has been reached. Now I ask this House not to destroy the good effect of that work of unity and goodwill performed in London by beginning here in Canada a division with respect to this great question of inter-imperial relations which is so far reaching in its effects on all parts of the empire and as well on imperial relations with other parts of the world.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that if the leader of the opposition speaks now he will close the debate.

An hon. MEMBER: He has already spoken.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no right to reply; I was only going to answer the intimation of my right hon. friend, but if anyone objects I have no desire to go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My right hon. friend has intimated in very strong language that under the circumstances I should withdraw the amendment which I moved to the motion before the Chair. I do not know whether or not he desires me to answer his intimation, but I think the House will agree with me that the speech he delivered to-day had such a strong flavour of partisanship and so lacked anything in the nature of conciliation that he could hardly expect me to take seriously the request he has just made. However, I think we can get over the difficulty quite nicely—if my hon. friend sees a difficulty, which I do not.

In the amendment which he has just read clause by clause I think there is something to which every member of this House can subscribe. This amendment does not in any way transgress the subject matter of the Imperial conference; it expresses neither assent nor dissent with regard to a single matter which was discussed at the Imperial conference; it merely affirms principles to which every hon. member of this House will, I believe, readily agree. The first principle is that tacit acquiescence should never bind this parliament. But, my hon. friend says, that may have an effect on other conferences. It has had effect already. We bound ourselves by tacit acquiescence in regard to the question of treaty making from 1904 until the end of the war, when we signed the Treaty of Peace. We have never ratified a conference report in that respect, but by acquiescence we have attained the right to negotiate treaties. I do not think tacit acquiescence should bind us in these matters, and I think the House will agree with me. To the second declaration my hon. friend has already subscribed under ordinary circumstances, and he was ready to move it in this House on December 13, last. It declares that nothing in this report should bind this parliament until parliament has approved of it. The third principle is that we should not in any way commit ourselves to any legislation or any proposal which in fact or by implication would give us the power to amend our constitution in any way without the consent of the provinces of Canada.

I submit that these are principles to which we can all subscribe, and if unanimity is desired in this connection—to which I have nc objection—let the Prime Minister accept the amendment. He announced in this House that he would not treat it as a motion of want of confidence, and we do not ask him to do so; we can pass this amendment unanimously and by so doing we will lay down principles with which I am satisfied we all agree in our hearts. I believe the amendment is right in principle, that it will be found to be right in practice and will be adopted in this country sooner or later, so why divide over it now? Let me also point out that we do not raise in this amendment a single issue which was raised at the conference; no one can misconstrue this amendment, and for the satisfaction of my right hon. friend I am going to tell him that the amendment was prepared on Saturday morning, and was not thought of until he startled this House on Thursday with the announcement that he did not intend to carry out the intimation he made on December 13 last, when he said he was going to ask the House to approve the report.

I cannot withdraw the resolution; I feel that it is right, but I do invite my hon. friend to join with us in passing it unanimously.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Guthrie), which was negatived on the following division:

With the unanimous consent of the House I would agree to withdraw the motion and we can go on with item No. 19 on the order paper, the second reading of Bill No. 233, to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw his motion? Carried unanimously.

Motion withdrawn.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

BONUS TO COKING PLANTS

PRODUCTION OF DOMESTIC FUEL FROM COAL MINED IN CANADA

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines) moved the second reading of Bill No. 233, to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the House goes into committee on this bill, would it not be fair if the Minister of the Interior followed the example of the Minister of Railways yesterday, and gave a statement in explanation of the purpose of the measure?

Mr. STEVENS: He can do that in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is true that the second reading of the bill was declared carried, but there was so much noise in the House at the time that I feel justified in acquiescing in the request made by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bill is intended to meet in some measure the suggestion contained in the Duncan report which we have been discussing here, and upon which legislation has been introduced with respect to freight rates and other matters of importance to the maritime provinces. It is not, however, confined entirely to the maritime provinces. The assistance proposed to be given under the bill is for the purpose of encouraging the erection of plants for the manufacture of by-product coke. I propose when the House goes into committee to introduce two amendments that will make it very clear that this aid is only to be extended to domestic coke, and will not in any way touch the metallurgical production of coke. The main object of the bill is to encourage the use of Canadian coal in the manufacture of coke, which we hope will in a large way supplant the use of anthracite in the acute fuel areas of central Canada. There has been a great deal of discussion in the House with respect to the fuel situation in what we call "the acute fuel area of Canada," which comprises the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba. Although there is a low grade coal available quite close to the boundary of Manitoba, yet that province imports a very considerable quantity of American bituminous and anthracite coals for domestic purposes, as do the other provinces named. This assistance is granted in the hope that it will encourage to some extent the use of Canadian bituminous coal in the municipalities of Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa, and that the market for this coal will be extended farther provided transportation rates warrant it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the drawbacks at present given to certain plants in Hamilton and Winnipeg be continued if this bill passes?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no intention to interfere with the drawback which has always prevailed in connection with the metallurgical production of coke. We are merely putting the domestic coke on a parity with the metallurgical coke on which a drawback is at present given. In addition it is hoped to encourage the consumption of Alberta coal for coking purposes in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Will coking plants at present in existence get the benefit of the proposed subsidy?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, they will not. The only way you could benefit plants already in existence would be by granting a bounty. This aid is to encourage the erection of plants for the manufacture of domestic fuel. It is not in any sense a bounty that would be applicable to plants already in existence.

The bill speaks pretty largely for itself and requires little explanation except as to the amounts that it provides for assistance in various localities. The hope is that it will encourage the manufacture of the Canadian product as far west as this city in the eastern part of Canada, and as far east as Winnipeg in the western section of Canada.

A word about the existing plant. There is only one, and it is in the city of Hamilton. This will not in any way interfere with the coke that is manufactured there and distributed throughout the area which that particular plant serves. This assistance is being given for the purpose of supplanting so far as that is possible the use of American coal by coke manufactured from our own bituminous coal. At the present moment the American product is coming into the cities of Montreal and Quebec, and it is necessary to make the assistance fairly substantial owing to the fact, which perhaps our maritime friends will not admit, that there is a considerable difference between the American product and the Nova Scotia product used in the manufacture of coke; not in the coke product itself, but as hon. gentlemen know, the by-product obtained in the manufacture of coke is of considerable importance and cuts down the manufacturing costs very considerably. The high sulphur content in the Nova Scotia coal makes it difficult to wash the gas, and the sale of the gas, of course, has a tendency to cut down the production costs. That difficulty in connection with washing the gas is not so prevalent in the American product as it is in the Canadian product. I think, however, and the work done by our geological research officers tends to confirm this, although drilling would be necessary to prove it, that there are seams in Nova Scotia which if opened up would be quite equal to the American product, but at the present moment they are not accessible.

May I say that the agitation carried on for the consumption of Canadian coal has brought the Nova Scotia bituminous coal into this market at Ottawa, so something has been accomplished in that direction. So far as this bill is concerned, it is designed for the purpose of supplanting to a greater degree than at present the importation of American anthracite coal. We have demonstrated that the manufacture of coke from the American product has reduced the tonnage of American anthracite coming into Canada from 5,000,000 tons in 1923 to 3,500,000 tons last year, and if rates are so adjusted as to bring Alberta lignite coal into western Ontario, the importations of American anthracite will be reduced by just that much more. We are bending all our energies in that direction with a view to supplanting the importation of American anthracite into this central portion of Canada, and we are asking that this assistance be given for the encouragement of new plants for the manufacture of coke for the purpose of further reducing the anthracite supplies required in eastern Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? The motion is carried.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understood that as I had not heard the motion declared carried I would have the right to discuss this question before going into committee. This is an important matter. The principle of it is perhaps the most serious aspect of it. If the principle can be agreed upon the details are nothing, but inasmuch, Mr. Speaker, as you admit a disturbance in the House for the moment, those members who did not hear the motion carried should have an opportunity to say something now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I put the second motion in order to allow the hon. member to make his statement. Does the hon. gentleman not think that members will have more opportunity to get answers to questions in committee?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire no questions and no answers. It is the principle of the bill I am opposed to, and as the minister has made a brief statement, I would like to say a few words in regard to it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think this is an important point of order. When a motion is declared by the chair to be carried, I think the whole House is bound by it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If we hear it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is true I declared the motion carried, but there was great noise in the chamber at the time, and that is why in fairness to those who did not hear the question I allowed the minister to make the statement he usually makes on a bill presented to the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But we cannot go further than that. If we go into committee now my hon. friend will have every opportunity of discussing it, and I have no doubt we will consent to discussing the principle. If he discusses it now we will have a double discussion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There will be no effective discussion of the principle of the bill in committee. This bill involves commitments which may amount to over nine million dollars, and surely that is of sufficient importance to entitle hon. members to discuss the principle of the measure. The minister in his little speech certainly made no effort—although I felt that he was uncomfortable when he made his speech—to apologize for the vicious legislation he is introducing, and I say this with all deference and kindness to him. He proposes now to set up a new subsidized industry—just one more, adding to the many that are pressing down on the backs of the taxpayers of the country, and to benefit a small section of the country. The statement that it is going to benefit Alberta coal is wholly ridiculous, and no one knows better than the minister the truth of the remark I made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I want to put my hon. friend right in that respect. So far as this bill is concerned it will undoubtedly be beneficial to the coking plant now being erected in Winnipeg for Alberta coal, which intended to use American coal.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The problem is as to the amount which can be used. I propose to touch briefly on that, and I trust I can disabuse the minister's mind as to the value of the proposals. The development in Winnipeg is so absolutely limited that it will amount to nothing. I think that statement is absolutely true. Apart from this measure a similar bill was placed on the order paper some two or three years ago by the present minister. That bill met with such disapproval from the ranks of the hon. minister's own party, that, apart from the attitude of the opposition, the bill was withdrawn and not introduced again. The pressure was too strong, but now, under the excuse of the Duncan commission report, they introduce this vicious measure. The Liberal party appealed to the electorate on the basis of low tariff and anti-special privilege and anti-bonus proposition. Now they propose to introduce as vicious a piece of legislation as ever could emanate from the Tory party. No wonder the leader of the Tory party wishes to rush it through. It is in accordance with their principles. It is one of the most alarming and one of the most repellent features of the whole session. It is not only in this matter that they are deviating from their avowed principles; we have had other instances of special privileges and the giving of rights that were extraordinary, in view of the declarations of my hon. friends opposite. We find the Georgian Bay Canal bill being pushed forward. We find the twenty per cent eastern railway rate reduction put through last night in violation of their own ideals, and probably we will have the Russell patent bill, vicious as it is in its principle; and it will be supported by hon. members opposite. Now we have this legislation. I throw up my hands in despair when we find the great old Liberal party sinking into the morass of Tory legislation. This is the most disgusting and appalling feature of the legislation of this session.

As to the general principles of the bill, there is no question that there is an acute fuel area in the central provinces. There is no question that there is an abundant supply of coal in eastern and western Canada to supply the eastern and western provinces. The one great difficulty is the distance of the supply from the market, and instead of attempting to adjust transportation rates through the railway commission, and instead of taking some action to bring into effect the findings of the Board of Railway Commissioners when made, we find the government trying to meet it by introducing legislation of a character tremendously important and overwhelmingly burdensome. I am astounded at the action of the Liberal administration. The total anthracite shipped into the country is now 5,000,000 tons. The total coke shipped into the country is 668,121 tons. These figures remain relatively about the same one year with another. At page 8 of the publication of the Dominion Fuel Board, entitled, Coke as a Household Fuel in Central Canada, one can find a complete summary dealing with the exports from United States to Canada of coke and anthracite. As to coke being a substitute for and replacing anthracite, there is no quarrel. He says, and I agree,—and that is the apparent idea in this bill—" we are going to replace by this bill a part of the present importations of anthracite by about 2,000,000 tons now being used in the provinces." I find in this same report, which supports the idea of a subsidy for the coking plant, at page 11, a declaration that anthracite prices are bound to become prohibitive. The reason given is the limited supply in the United States, the growing disinclination of the people of the United States to allow exportation of anthracite to Canada, and in addition to that the steady replacement, which would be enormously increased by satisfactory freight rates, of the anthracite by our own domestic coal. But the conclusion the Fuel board arrived at in connection with this was that the ultimate prices of anthracite in Canada will grow to a point where the people will not be willing to use it. It will be too high, and the people will turn their attention to cheaper fuel. The solution of the problem, rather than establishing a bonus or setting up a subsidized industry, is the adjustment of the freight rates. On that point I will quote from a statement of the Fuel board which corroborates that position. I am not quarrelling with the quality of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coal. It is true that sometimes sulphur contents are too high to make it possible that the first grade quality coke can be produced from it alone.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I notice that provision is made in the bill for the importation from foreign sources of about 30 per cent of the coal to be used in these plants. If the hon. gentleman who has just said "no," is satisfied and can convince the House that a first-grade coke can be produced from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick coal, then I submit that there is no excuse, if this bill does pass, for permitting the importation of 30 per cent, which is quite a proportion, of other coal.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The best proof that we can make satisfactory coke out of Nova Scotia coal is that we have been doing so for a number of years. One hundred per cent would be much better but we feel that 70 per cent use of Nova Scotia coal is a step in the right direction.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that can be shown to the House, it would have been much more patriotic, to use a phrase that has been used so much this afternoon, if the government, if it is sincerely behind the bill had, in introducing it, implied by the very nature of it the use of 100 per cent Canadian coal instead of paying subsidies to plants that will use only seventy per cent Canadian coal. At page 14 of the same publication will be found this statement:

> In other words, if coke produced from these coals can be sold at a price which will give heat units equivalent to other fuels, it will rapidly come into favour.

There is no question about that. But note the hypothesis:

> If coke produced from these coals can be sold at a price—

The question that is worrying me is whether under this scheme we can produce coke so cheaply and economically that people will buy it instead of the anthracite and other coals that are coming in. A couple of years ago I had the pleasure of visiting the city of Troy, New York, and of going over the extensive coking plant they have in that city. I was informed that it was the last word in coke oven plants. I found that that plant was producing 365,000 tons of coke a year, or roughly 1,000 tons a day, but in the production of that the company also produces, as a part of its process, 16,000,000 cubic feet of gas a day. Every authority on coke and on the marketing of coke admits that coke can be satisfactorily and economically marketed only when there is a full and satisfactory market for the gas by-product, which is the principal by-product of the carbonization of coal. In this particular instance in Troy there was a ready market at its door; but I would ask hon. gentlemen to note this and to ask themselves in turn: Is there a single district outside of Montreal and Toronto where similar conditions can be said to exist in Canada? This plant under contract was supplying with gas from its plant no less than the cities of Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Cohoes, Rensslaer, and Watervliet, all of them industrial towns in the Hudson valley. If you can show me any single centre in Canada where little industrial cities or towns are grouped closely enough together to make it possible economically and profitably to dispose of the gas by-product, I admit there would be some sense in establishing or in assisting in the establishment of coking plants. There is no such situation in Canada excepting, as I said before, the two cities of Montreal and Toronto.

There is another point which occurs to me. If a ready market can be found for the gas and if the coke itself will find a ready market at an economic price, then I submit that there is no necessity for a subsidy. The thing should stand on its own feet if it is a commercial proposition. Why is it necessary to undertake to bonus, to subsidize to the extent of four per cent per annum of the total capital cost of the plant in the case of a municipally owned plant and four per cent in the case of a privately-owned plant, if the thing is economically feasible? If it is not economically feasible, why under heaven launch the country into an undertaking that, under pressure, political and otherwise, may develop in Canada another great subsidized industry sapping the taxpayers in annual payments? That is wrong, and I will go further in a few moments in indicating what the actual cost will probably be if advantage is taken of this measure.

In the United States I find there are several coking plants already established. There is no question as to the economic feasibility of the carbonization of coal provided that a ready market for the gas by-product is found. There are at least five or six plants, in some cases municipally-owned, in other cases privately-owned, where coking has been going on for some time, and in Great Britain and Germany they not only are experimenting but actually have developed quite a number of plants for the carbonization of coal. This same publication, dealing with this point of markets, states at page 21:

> There is a market in Canada for all the coke for domestic fuel that the country can produce, both by coke oven and retort.

There is no question about that. There is in my opinion no superior fuel, not even anthracite, to coke if it is a good coke. I will admit that there is a ready market for the coke itself, but the point is, as I said a moment ago, that unless you can dispose of the principal by-product and the other by-products, the thing is not commercially profitable, and therefore the development of coking plants is not advisable. The report of the Fuel board itself admits that, unless the market for the by-product can be ascertained, it is not feasible. At page 21 the report states:

> Coke ovens cannot be established in every city in central Canada, and can be economically operated—selling coke and gas at fair prices—only where there is a market for the gas.

The report of the Fuel board is very specific and clear on that. We pass on then to a survey of the possibilities in this country, and we find that the board actually undertook a survey of the whole market for gas and coke. They chose several cities which I will name in a moment, but they make this comment at page 29:

> The cities chosen are those where the domestic gas demand is sufficient to warrant installation of ovens and successfully support a by-product coke plant.

But even then the demand would be only half supplied, because under the contention of the board itself, they can dispose of only a fractional part of the total domestic fuel requirements. The only portion which they could dispose of would be the portion dependent upon the market for the gas by-product. The cities and districts in which that survey took place were Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa, Toronto, Port Colborne, Hamilton, London and the border cities. If the total potential market that can be developed for each city and zone is estimated, it would mean a production of roughly in the case of the different towns:

	Tons a day
Quebec	150
Montreal	1,200
Hamilton	232

This is not for city requirements alone; this embraces a whole zone.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): What is the definition of a zone?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The zone laid down by the fuel board is the territory surrounding a centre in which a plant might be established, throughout which zone, without overlapping other zones, coke could be disposed of.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Is the hon. member aware that at the present time gas is being transported more than one hundred miles in Ontario.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I was not aware of that particular fact.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): It is being transported between Hamilton and Brantford.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad to hear that. I am not disputing the possibilities of carrying gas, because I think gas can be carried a long way, even in this House. At page 29 of the report the statement is made by the Fuel board that with cheap lake transportation of coal and a large market the conditions are most favourable for the installation of a coking plant, and that the demand for domestic fuel will be only half supplied. I do not think it would be half supplied. Toronto has a market for 1,000 tons of coke a day; that is to say, it could support a plant of that capacity. Ottawa and district can support a market of 300 tons daily, and London a market of 294 tons.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What statistics is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): These statistics are taken from the report of the Fuel board entitled, Coke as a Household Fuel in Central Canada. It was published in 1925 by the Dominion Fuel board. It refers to coke for domestic purposes only, and we are not dealing in this bill with coke for metallurgical or other uses of that kind. For that reason I take the report as a basis of discussion. On the basis of an admitted cost of $3,500,000 for a 1,000-ton plant the total capital involved I have estimated to be $12,000,000. The Fuel board itself estimates it at $11,000,000 but in my opinion it would be higher. Putting it at $12,000,000 the interest at five per cent would amount roughly to $600,000 per annum, so that the total involved during the term in which this bill would be operative would be $9,000,000. We are asked to commit this country to an outlay of $9,000,000 for the purpose of establishing a subsidized industry.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is on the assumption that we use Canadian coal in all these plants.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope the minister had in mind the use of a sufficient quantity of coal—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This bill does not provide for the transportation of Nova Scotia coal beyond the city of Ottawa, so that my hon. friend should confine his argument to Ottawa and points east.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am suggesting the implications of the bill. I have pointed out what would be involved if full advantage were taken of the subsidy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will note that the bill provides for $1 a ton maximum payment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As a maximum.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It would take $2.40 a ton to carry Nova Scotia coal to Windsor.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister overlooks the fact that both east and west have been struggling for some years to secure a fair railway rate, so that that objection would be at once removed if both sides could get sympathetic action on the part of the administration to which the minister belongs, either in the way of assistance—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The railway rate to be provided would not take freight from Windsor eastward.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is getting fearfully impatient. Perhaps he has reason to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all; but I do not want the hon. gentleman to cover ground which the bill does not include.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understood the minister to say that, because of the freight rate, coal from the maritime provinces could not be used under this bill further west than Ottawa. I say to him that as soon as the Board of Railway Commissioners is prepared to do so it can recommend that the government take action in that direction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The railway commission will have nothing to do with the ninety-cent rate.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the minister suggest that the introduction of a lower rate under the Board of Railway Commissioners' cost finding will not result in a greater flow of maritime coal west beyond Ottawa?

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Minister of Trade and Commerce interjects, no. That is the very reason why the board was asked to ascertain the actual out-of-pocket cost in order that a rate might be fixed at which coal could be moved to points further west than suggested by the minister. At page 35 of the report the statement is made that the first plants to be established will have the cream of the market. This is a declaration of the Fuel board. Taking as an example the city of Montreal and district we find there a possible market for 720,000 or 740,000 tons, whereas I am informed that it is proposed by a company taking advantage of this bill to erect a 400,000 ton plant. This plant will secure, according to the statement of the Fuel board, which I have just quoted, the cream of the market, and by this very fact discourage the setting up of other plants. So the free encouragement that the bill proposes would be in itself destructive, in so far as supplying the fuel requirements of the Montreal district is concerned.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

The House in committee on Bill No. 107, respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Cahan.—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Proportion of profits of participating business to shareholders to be reduced.

Mr. IRVINE: Has this bill been reprinted?

The CHAIRMAN: No, the amendments are noted on my copy.

Mr. CAHAN: The banking and commerce committee did not order the bill to be reprinted.

Mr. HEPBURN: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the select standing committee on banking and commerce I opposed it; I have not since had occasion to change my mind, but in fact am more opposed to it now than when it was before that committee. Before the bill is passed I think it would be well for this House to consider it carefully, especially in view of the growing importance of insurance in our economic life. After the usual camouflage, this bill provides that this company may increase its capital stock from $1,500,000 to $4,000,000, and that is one of the main purposes of the bill. This increase in the capital stock will be brought about by means of distributing stock bonuses and not by paid up cash at all, and having done this the company will be able to conceal from the participating policyholders and the policyholders in general the actual profits paid on the capital stock, which is the other main purpose of the bill.

We do not want to be unfair to insurance companies; we realize that they have certain responsibilities and that their stocks are more or less speculative, but in view of the fact that the company has already built up a reserve of $56,000,000 from profits, which fund now is the property of the shareholders, I feel that those shareholders have nothing to worry about.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

I would like to place on Hansard a short statement concerning this company. The original paid up capital was $305,000 and in premiums another $120,000, or a total of $425,000 actually paid in cash. In 1921 a special dividend of $350,000 was paid to the shareholders and stock bonuses to the extent of $845,000 have also been issued, making a total of $1,195,000. Adding this to the amount originally paid in, we have the capital of the company amounting to $1,600,000. The nominal dividend is 15 per cent on this amount, and last year profits of $225,000 were divided among the shareholders on the original investment of $305,000, or at the rate of 73.8 per cent. On the total paid in capital, including the $120,000 collected in premiums, the rate was 52.9 per cent. If this bill passes the capital stock will be increased to $4,000,000 by distributing bonuses, and with the usual 15 per cent dividend they will divide $600,000 annually among the shareholders which is equal to 141 per cent of the total cash paid in by the shareholders. At present the company does not need to draw on the profits of the participating policyholders in order to pay the 15 per cent on the $1,500,000 of capital, but to show that they intend to do so if this bill passes and they are allowed to increase their capital, they have provided in the bill itself a fixed rate ranging from 3 per cent to 4 per cent which may be taken from the policyholders, so that there can be no question as to their real purpose, and I do not think this is fair to the policyholders. When the president of the company appeared before the banking and commerce committee he said that the policyholders were in agreement with the shareholders in this move and that they had approved of the action of the company at the annual meeting. I doubted that statement very much, so as a member of the committee I asked how many policyholders were present at the annual meeting and I think he said there were fifty. I question very much whether there was one of those policyholders who did not have some interest other than that of an ordinary policyholder, but even granting that fifty policyholders were present out of 500,000, that means only one out of every 10,000 was present at the meeting. No formal notice of the meeting was sent to the policyholders, though the president said that some sentence on the company's receipt form advised policyholders of the meeting. I am satisfied that perhaps almost 100 per cent of the policyholders who have no other interest in the company would be opposed to this bill, because it means that the company will be enabled to take money out of their pockets to swell the dividends of the shareholders.

I do not want to ask the House to take my word for it, so I have here some of the evidence given by the former president of this company before the Royal Commission on Life Insurance in 1906. The extracts which I am about to read are found at page 2802 of the evidence taken before that commission, where in reply to a question about the capital, he said:

> I have been repeatedly requested to allow shareholders to pay up more and I have always refused. . . . Simply because we did not need the money.

The examiner made the following statement:

> That is an excellent reason. You did not need the money, and there was no reason why you should permit shareholders to put in more money to be drawing down interest.

His reply was as follows:

> Taking away more of the profits belonging to the policyholders. Of course I fully appreciate that I am under oath and you want all the information that I have. The reason that guided me particularly in refusing was always that it would be a tax on the policyholders.

Now I have a great deal of respect for the Superintendent of Insurance for the Dominion, Mr. Finlayson. I think he is one of the very few men who will not be swayed by any influence other than his own good judgment. I know that he is opposed to this bill and rightly so. It is unfair to the policyholders; it is almost a breach of contract with the policyholders. In the second place when the camouflage is removed it is nothing more or less than an attempt to conceal the actual profits being paid to the shareholders. I pointed out that they will be enabled to pay $600,000 annually, or at the rate of 141 per cent, if this bill goes through. This principle has been put in force by so many companies and corporations in Canada that its effect is like that of the tariff—it is bearing too heavily upon the public. I think if there is anything this parliament can do to stop this practice it should be done, and I for one intend to vote against this bill on its third reading.

Mr. IRVINE: I opposed this bill in committee; I am glad of the opportunity of opposing it again to-night. When the bill passed committee I do not think one-third of the membership was present owing to the fact that there were other committees sitting simultaneously. I am of the opinion that if we had had a fairly good representation in the committee the bill would not have passed. It passed by a very small margin as it was.

I wish to oppose this bill chiefly because I regard it as a device by means of which the shareholders of the Sun Life Assurance Company will be permitted to collect a larger toll from the profits of the policyholders. This is not the first device which the company has practised in this regard. I wish to substantiate that statement by quoting briefly from the report of the Royal Commission on Life Insurance, dated February 28, 1906. I quote from page 20 of that report:

> During 1891, and the first half of 1892, dividends at the rate of twelve per cent, and since and including the latter half of 1892, at fifteen per cent, have been declared, besides the bonus of 2½ per cent upon the old stock in 1897.
> Carrying to the credit of the shareholders' account the ascertained proportion of profits and interests has not, however, enabled the company to pay these dividends, and from time to time the directors have resorted to various devices for the purpose of increasing the shareholders' account, so as to enable it to pay the dividends which have been paid.
> The first of these devices was to credit the practically defunct accident branch with considerable sums of money, upon the theory that that branch in years past had been charged more than its proportion of the general expenses of the company. The accident branch being so credited out of the current profits, the sums so credited were brought into the shareholders' account, for the purpose of augmenting it and so enabling the dividends to be paid. Three sums were so credited to the accident branch and brought in to the detriment of the policyholders; $2,000 in 1895; $4,000 in 1900; and $30,000 in 1902; and the evidence is that there are still at the credit of the accident branch considerable sums of money, the intention being to bring these also into the shareholders' account. It is manifest that in revising the charges made in past years to the accident branch, the directors of the present day have undertaken to overrule what may be presumed to have been the well informed and deliberate decision of the directors of former years as to the proper proportion of expenses to be charged to that branch, and your commissioners think it clear that the revision was undertaken solely as a device for maintaining the shareholders' account.
> Another improper means by which the shareholders' account has been enabled to provide the dividends paid to shareholders is by similarly revising the rate of interest allowed upon capital in addition to its share of the profits in past years. The method adopted has been to go through the years as far back as 1877 and to allow, instead of the rates which were allowed, a rate of six per cent, which has been imposed at six per cent, compound interest, from 1877 down. The result of this has been to bring into the shareholders' account $9,088.34 (in 1901).
> A third method of swelling the shareholders' account has been to go back to the year 1897, when the new capital was issued at a premium of $30 per share, and to bring into the general shareholders' account interest, compounded at six per cent, upon that premium. This revision of the earlier dealing with this premium, to the prejudice of policy holders, was also, in the opinion of your commissioners, improper. In this way the shareholders' account was swollen in 1905 by the sum of $37,930.73.

I think that extract, Mr. Chairman, will be sufficient to show that the company is not beyond practising devices for the purpose of increasing the profits of the shareholders.

Now I want to have a look at section 1 for a minute. Section 1 provides that at the end of the present year the percentage of participating policyholders' profits taken by the shareholders shall be reduced to four per cent. This is fixing the rate to be received by statute, and by so fixing the rate the shareholders are deprived of the privilege of reducing the percentage of their profits even if they should desire to do so. Subsequently it is provided that there shall be reductions to 3½ per cent and 3 per cent. First, I protest against the fixing of these profits by statute. But the most objectionable phase of the first section of the bill is that it represents the company as being magnanimous. It will sound good to be able to say that they are only being paid four per cent. But when we take this section into consideration with sections 2 and 3 we will find that the company is not as magnanimous as would appear under section 1. I shall have occasion in a few minutes to refer to the meaning of this as brought out in sections 2 and 3. Meanwhile I would point out that section 1 of the bill represents a curtailment of the power of the shareholders to reduce the percentage of profits by a majority vote. It appears to do something in favour of the policyholders, while really it is strengthening the position of the shareholders at the expense of the former. It is very doubtful if any considerable percentage of the policyholders of this company know anything at all about this bill, and it is to be doubted if any percentage of those that do know understand its real significance; for unless one clause were explained in relation to the other it would be very difficult for an ordinary layman, unless he was looking for it in particular, to know just exactly what is the real meaning of the bill.

Now I want to deal with the second section of the bill, and I ask, why this company should desire to increase its capital? The reason why any company would want to increase its capital would be, I suppose, one of two. It might want to increase its capital in order to make the company more stable. For instance, if there is too narrow a margin between the assets and liabilities of the company it might be advisable to increase the capital. I do not think, however, that the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada would like the people of this country to believe that the reason why they are asking for this increase in capital is in order to stabilize the company because of there being too narrow a margin between assets and liabilities. Indeed, there is no such danger.

There is another reason why a company might wish to increase its capital, and that is in order to draw greater profits. If this company is in need of more capital to guarantee the stability of the company, then perhaps it would be the duty of parliament to pass this bill; but if, on the other hand, the company is in good financial standing and further capital is not required for good business reasons, then an extra two million dollar capital would simply be an extra burden on the company, and the profits paid thereon would not have been honestly earned. Moreover, all such profits must eventually be gathered from the policyholders. If this latter be the position obviously parliament would be doing a very great wrong in passing this bill.

I propose to inquire into the position of the company in this regard: Does the Sun Life require an additional two million capital? Before referring specifically to the financial position of the company and to the shareholders, I wish to make an observation or two in a general way in respect to capital in relation to the insurance business, and then to refer specifically to the paid up capital of this company.

There is a very great doubt, Mr. Chairman, whether capital is required at all in insurance companies. We will all agree that in most business enterprises capital is essential, and we might even go so far as to say that in the initial stages of an insurance company a certain amount of capital is essential. But when the insurance company has become established, then the more capital it has, the more dangerous it is for the company, for that capital is unnecessary; it becomes an additional burden upon the company. Writing insurance is the best insurance for an insurance company. If the stability of any established insurance company in Canada were to depend upon the amount of capital subscribed, there is not one of them that is safe; but that is not the basis of their stability. The basis of their stability is their policyholders and the business that they do. The insurance business is the safest business in the world, and capital is the greatest hindrance that it has. If we are going to permit this company after it has been established for so many years to increase its capital now that it has become so prosperous that it does not know what to do with its profits, I think we should be very remiss in our duty indeed. All that one has to do is to imagine that the amount of profits now being paid on the capital stock of insurance companies were left to swell the reserves; we can readily see how much better the position would be in that case. But if you increase that capital, an extra charge for profits will be made directly on the policyholders, and to that extent you would embarrass the company.

That capital is not required in well-established insurance companies may be proved by the tendency to-day towards mutualization. Some of the greatest insurance companies in the world have become entirely mutual. For instance, we have the Prudential Insurance Company mutualized. Then we have that company which is I believe the greatest of its kind in the world, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, with its Canadian head office in this city; that company, I believe, is entirely mutual. I understand that the stockholders were bought out for one-third the value of the stock at the time the change was made. The company is now a mutual one, and its shareholders are its policyholders. Not one cent of profit is taken from the earnings of the company to pay stockholders.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say that it would be more in keeping with the modern tendency if the Sun Life Assurance management were taking steps towards mutualizing the company and doing away with all stock whatsoever, rather than trying to increase its capital, which would mean the gathering of more profits from the policyholders.

Again, the policyholders do not need additional capital for their security. On the contrary, it is a detriment to the policyholders, because it will involve paying a larger amount of the participating policyholders' profits to the shareholders than would otherwise be necessary to provide reasonable dividends. If we authorize the increased capital asked for in this bill, it will no doubt be distributed in the way of stock bonuses or special dividends to which the participating policyholders will be called upon to subscribe.

The present paid up capital of the Sun Life Assurance Company is $1,500,000. Let us stop to realize that no other insurance company in Canada has such a large subscribed capital. Indeed, no other company has a capital exceeding $1,000,000, and yet we have one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest Canadian company not satisfied with that amount of capital but coming here and asking us to increase it. Of that present paid up capital of $1,500,000, $1,195,000 has been paid by way of stock bonuses or special dividends, and only $305,000 has been paid in cash by the shareholders. I want you to take notice of this, Mr. Chairman. The annual amount required to pay the dividend is now $225,000, so the shareholders of the Sun Life Assurance Company collect 73 per cent annually on their investment, that is 73 per cent on the amount of money that they actually put into this company. If the capital of the company is increased to $4,000,000, as is asked for in this bill, and is distributed by way of stock bonuses or special dividends, as will almost certainly be done, and if the present rate of dividend of 15 per cent is continued, the amount annually required for shareholders' dividends will be $600,000. The amount of capital actually paid in to the company in cash by the shareholders would remain as at present, $305,000, and the annual dividends therefore would represent 197 per cent profit per annum on the capital originally invested in the company. Surely a condition of that sort is worthy of the attention of this committee. Surely when these facts are placed before us we shall realize our responsibility to the policyholders, who may be regarded as the general public. These profits can only be paid at the expense of the policyholders. The profit which now goes to shareholders on unnecessary capital should either increase the profits of policyholders or go to the reduction of the cost of insurance. Policyholders' funds are virtually trust funds. In this regard I wish to make another short quotation from the report of the commission already referred to, under the heading, "The relation of directors to policyholders and their interests, including questions of individual or concentrated control, and the powers and duties of directors with regard to investments and management generally":

> It seems to the commission of importance to define the nature and position of the funds resulting from the operation of insurance companies. Save in so far as capital stock plays a part, these funds are either a reserve kept in hand to discharge the insurance obligation or a surplus resulting from a charge upon the persons insured in excess of what it has cost to insure their lives. The policyholder contributes both reserve and surplus, and where business is done upon the participating plan it is the surplus moneys that are called profits.

A little further on I read:

> And what is the character of these funds? Are the purposes to which they are being devoted consistent with that character? Your commissioners have no doubt that accumulated insurance funds are, in every essential particular, trust funds. They belong to the policyholders and not to the shareholders. The directors are not in possession of them as trading capital in any sense or to any degree. They are not subject to trading risk. They are held in trust for investment and to be eventually paid to those whose moneys they are. Being trust funds the function of the directors in regard to them is the function of trustee. Once the subject is put upon this simple basis the criterion for determining the proprietary of any particular dealing by the directors with these funds also becomes simple. Ought a trustee to do this with trust funds? Once this is recognized as the test, all difficulty disappears.

I think I will be able to indicate before I am through that this company has enjoyed the trust funds in a manner which can scarcely be considered as proper under the conditions which should govern these funds as laid down in the report of the commission which I have quoted. The quotation which I have just given indicates the broad vision of the trusteeship and service which should be found in life assurance companies. Compare the quotation which I have just given with the apparent attitude of the company mentioned in the bill, which notwithstanding that it is now paying seventy-three per cent on its shareholders' capital, and notwithstanding the fact that it is drawing annually the amount of $300,000 upwards for this purpose, now declares that it will never reduce the present percentage of the participating policyholders profits below five per cent unless it is permitted to increase its capital to $4,000,000, which will enable it to pay 197 per cent per annum to its present shareholders, while all the time appearing to pay but 15 per cent.

Now we come to section 3, and this is where another phase of the device to which I referred in my opening remarks becomes apparent. Section 3 permits the par value to be reduced from $100 to $10 a share. The object of this is to enable the directors to quote dividends of so much per share rather than so much per cent. Suppose the shares remained at $100 and the regular dividend is increased 40 per cent or $40 per share, this rate would look bad to the public. If, however, the capital shares are reduced to $10 the dividend will be only four per cent per share, which looks much better because the public will not know that the par value of the shares has been changed and will therefore be led to believe that $4 per share means 4 per cent and not 40 per cent as is the case. That is really the meaning of clause 3.

The three sections of the bill which I have reviewed can only be described as I have described them—as a device by means of which this company will be able to get a larger share of the company's earnings which properly belongs to the policyholders. This I say is an act which is discreditable to the company concerned. I ask this House to defeat this bill in the interests of the company itself, for if the real meaning of this bill ever becomes known it would bring about a very serious setback to the company. Once let the policyholders of the Sun Life realize that parliament has authorized the shareholders of the company to make a profit of 197 per cent next year on their investment, and that to be taken from the earnings of the company, which really belong to the policyholders, and the Sun Life will receive the worst setback of its existence.

Let me now place on Hansard a comparison between the non-participating rates, twenty pay life, at age thirty-five, of the Sun Life and other companies. This will be a comparison between the Sun Life and A, B, C, D, and E companies. The table is as follows:

NON-PARTICIPATING RATES—20 PAY LIFE—Age 35

	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.

So that it would appear to me that if large profits can be made for the shareholders on unnecessary capital stock, it would be advisable rather to devote such profits to the reduction of insurance rates.

[Mr. Irvine.]

I want also to refer to the shareholders' surplus account. The following figures cover the period from 1917 to 1926, under headings of: Regular Dividends, Special Dividends, Stock Bonuses, Interest Credited, et cetera:

There is another very interesting summary to which I would like to refer. This deals with non-participating and shareholders' surplus fund from December 31, 1921, to 1926. It might be noted that the surplus in this fund belongs wholly to the shareholders. I will not trouble to read the details of this page of figures, I will ask the permission of the House to place it on Hansard.

Mr. CAHAN: I object.

Mr. IRVINE: If the hon. member objects, I shall be glad to read it all. Perhaps that will suit my hon. friend a little better. I was trying to conclude my remarks in time to have this bill come to a vote. The statement is as follows:

Mr. WARD: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. IRVINE: I would allow him to ask two questions.

Mr. WARD: Does the hon. member happen to be a policyholder in this company?

Mr. IRVINE: I am sorry to say that I am not. If I were a policyholder I would speak even longer than I am going to.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Is the hon. member connected with the Metropolitan Life directly or indirectly? Is that one of his reasons for endeavouring to talk out this bill?

Mr. IRVINE: That is a suggestion which could come only from a certain type of mind. I must say emphatically that I have no connection directly or indirectly with the Metropolitan Life. I am not even a policyholder, and as the company has no stock I could not hold any stock. I am not working for that company.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the hon. member not a member of an eternal life assurance company? Is he not a preacher?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: I was waiting until the hilarity on account of the witless remark of my hon. friend had subsided. His remark is just about as wide of the mark as he usually is with his sallies. Of course I recognize his sharpness and at times his pointlessness. Well, taking his remarks whence it comes, I hope he will have external and internal and eternal insurance.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Are these views the personal views of the hon. member or those of Mr. Trotzky?

Mr. IRVINE: That is the best joke tonight and hon. members do not laugh at it. I do not know what the views of Mr. Trotzky are on anything but if Trotzky is a very bad man, I should say that he must have drafted the bill which is now before the House. I cannot conceive of any Trotzky going beyond this in injustice and unfairness. This bill is nothing short of a constitutional and moral way of pilfering other people's money. I say it is moral because it is generally done, and it will be constitutional if we pass this bill. Nevertheless it is a means by which the shareholders of the company may pilfer the pockets of the policyholders. Having answered my hon. friend's question I proceed now to give the rest of the statement.

Mr. BIRD: Has the hon. gentleman any connection with St. James street, Montreal?

Mr. IRVINE: I have about as much connection with St. James street, Montreal, as I have with Trotzky, and I do not imagine that I should be any more welcome with one than with the other. The statement continues:

I am sorry I was forced to weary the House with the reading of these items, but I have another table which I am anxious to have appear in conjunction with the foregoing. I do not wish to take up the time of the House reading it, and if hon. members will give their consent I am prepared to hand it to Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. IRVINE: Very well, I appreciate the taste which hon. gentlemen appear to have cultivated for figures. It promises well for the consideration of the estimates, which no doubt will be taken up shortly. The following table has reference to amounts received or credited on account of capital.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the hon. gentleman give the total assets of the company at the present time?

Mr. IRVINE: I hope my hon. friend will not interrupt me until I have read the table:

It being nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for the consideration of private bills having expired, the House will now revert to the previous order.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon) presented the eighth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon) moved:

That the recommendation contained in the eighth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the printing of 500 copies in English and 200 copies in French of evidence being taken by said committee respecting bill No. 78, an act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, be concurred in, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to know my standing in this matter. I understood that we reverted to the order of business being debated at six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The presentation of this report can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House, in order to facilitate the business of the House.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What is the effect of this report?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is simply a request that the evidence taken before the committee in relation to this particular bill be printed, and that rule 74 in connection therewith be suspended.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember that the committee requested that the evidence be printed for the convenience of members of the committee and of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

BONUS TO COKING PLANTS

PRODUCTION OF DOMESTIC FUEL FROM COAL MINED IN CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles Stewart (Minister of Mines) for the second reading of Bill No. 233, to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When the House rose at six o'clock I was drawing attention to the report of the Dominion Fuel Board entitled, Coke as a Household Fuel in Central Canada, Bulletin No. 5, from which I quote:

> Although there is room for a plant in all the cities mentioned, the first plants built will have the advantage of picking the cream of the market.

This bill proposes to encourage the establishment of those first plants, and I submit if that is the case the bill by its very nature will prevent the accomplishment of its alleged purpose, namely, the establishment of adequate coking facilities in all the centres capable of maintaining such plants, to supply 50 per cent of the domestic fuel requirements of the two central provinces. Therefore this legislation will discourage private investments later. If on the other hand the bill did take cognizance of this danger and prevented the organization of a company under the subsidy until that company was prepared to erect a plant sufficiently large to take care of all the requirements of that particular zone, the bill would then create a subsidized monopoly unless steps were taken to control the prices at which both coal and gas would be sold. Let me give an illustration. According to the report the city of Montreal has a potential market, including the surrounding district, for 870,000 tons of coke per annum. That estimate is arrived at by estimating in turn the quantity of gas which can be sold economically. I am informed that a company is being formed to take advantage of the bill and erect a plant with a capacity of only 400,000 tons, which means that a market for 470,000 tons will be left for those who come later, but if the cream of the market is taken by the first plant I submit that it is most improbable that any further investments in coking plants will be made in Montreal. If on the other hand the bill insisted on the construction of a plant in Montreal capable of producing the total coke requirements of that district a subsidized monopoly would be created which would be even more vicious than the first proposal. You create a monopoly subsidized by the government of this country, the government having no control over the rates at which either gas or coke may be sold.

There is one other point. This bill proposes to encourage the establishment of coking plants producing gas in large quantities in centres where to-day there are plants developing gas the owners of which had the initiative to open up and develop the field, and who have already made heavy investments. You now propose to put up a subsidized gas producing plant side by side with an industry which in many cases is struggling to get along. Let us take for example the city of Ottawa, to which the minister referred as one of the cities which would be affected under this bill. In the city of Ottawa we have a gas company; I am paying gas rates and it is my opinion that the charges are not exorbitant. Now it is proposed under this bill to subsidize a second company to sell gas in competition with the company already established and which has already made its investments and commitments. That I consider to be most unfair in every way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think I can save my hon. friend a lot of useless argument which he is presenting at the moment with the very best intentions, if I tell him it is not proposed to subsidize these plants for the purpose of creating a monopoly. It is simply desired to get them to utilize Canadian coal in preference to American coal. The price of the American product will always regulate the price in Canada, the duty being left off, and we are simply attempting to substitute Canadian coal for that imported from the United States.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The delightfully ingenuous argument of the minister is not at all convincing. I am showing as plainly as possible the fact that if the full requirements of each zone are supplied under this bill we will be creating a monopoly, no matter what the minister says and no matter what may be the intention of the administration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Suppose the zone is supplied at present with American coal; what would be the difference in supplying that zone with Canadian coal?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I agree that it would be preferable to consume Canadian coal under fair economic conditions, but if the minister studies Hansard subsequently and allows himself a little more time for consideration he will realize that if advantage is taken of the bill to the degree which the Fuel board indicates, irrespective of the minister's opinions or intentions we are creating a subsidized monopoly with subsidized plants taking care of these requirements. The only consideration which will enter into it will be the competition of imported anthracite and coke.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not finding fault with my hon. friend's argument, but when it is argued that we are creating a monopoly, I say that no monopoly could be created for the simple reason that we are doing nothing under the sun except proposing to grant a sufficient sum to encourage plants that otherwise would use American coal. Take the plant proposed to be established in Montreal. There is no definite assurance that its promoters will avail themselves of this assistance to use American coal; I hope they will not. They are proposing to build a plant in Montreal capable of turning out 400,000 tons of coal. All we are attempting to do is to get them to use Canadian coal instead of American. That is all, nothing more.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the minister cannot see it by this time I have failed utterly in my attempt to persuade him that the effect will be what I have stated. I agree entirely with the minister—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say that I agree with my hon. friend that there cannot be a plant unless there is a distributing system already owned by the municipality or by private corporations?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is quite right in this respect, that a 400,000 ton plant will not create a monopoly, but it will discourage the building of other plants to meet the requirements of the other 470,000 tons for the reason that is given in this report—that the cream of the milk having been skimmed off by the first plant to take advantage of any subsidy, only the dregs will be left for those who come after. I follow that up by stating that if the bill had taken the precaution to provide for meeting all the coke requirements in each zone, then you would have a plant established able to take care of 870,000 tons, and so you have the creation of a monopoly. There you have the argument placed for the third time before the committee.

I now come to deal—

Mr. WARD: Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point will he permit me to direct a question to the Minister of the Interior?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No; I am afraid not.

Mr. WARD: I think it will further elucidate the point you are making.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You may make a speech afterwards. I have the floor, and if I yield to your request I am afraid it may imperil my rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. All this is very irregular. The hon. member for Bow River has the floor and may not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I come now to the other by-products. The possibility of a gas market for these coking plants is discussed in this report, but to my amazement it occupies only two pages, and there is no indication whatever—either by survey, inspection, by tabulation of statistics, or by a compilation of any figures—as to the potential markets for gas. There is no indication whatever in it that there will be a market available for the gas to be produced from these plants.

Ammonia sulphate is the next by-product, in point of volume, from the carbonization of coal. At page 44 there is one short page given to discussing the market possibilities in this country, in one sentence of which the limited nature of the market at the present time is indicated by the statement that "an educational campaign, if properly attempted, should create a demand for home consumption." There is no doubt but that there is a market for ammonia sulphate in the West Indies and some other places where they have been using it for some time. Possibly the plant at Montreal could dispose of its surplus in that way; but the other plants at Ottawa, Toronto, or wherever they may be established, would find it very difficult to take advantage of the proposal from an economic standpoint. Of course if a plant were established in Quebec, it could avail itself of the ocean transportation to the West Indies.

The next by-product is light oils. Now the report itself definitely lays down the statement that in plants of 500 tons carbonizing capacity per day, or less, it is not profitable to recover the light oils. The suggestion is made that they should be left in the coke, and to that degree at least add more bulk and more volatile matter to it, but you would be losing a valuable by-product by so doing. I understand that in England and in Germany, since the close of the war many investigations and experiments have been carried on in this line of work their endeavour being to reduce the minimum quantity of gas produced from coal and increase in proportion the light oils available, which of course would be very valuable; but unless the plant is capable of producing at least 1,500 gallons per day, the extraction of oil is not profitable. When we take the figures I have quoted this afternoon showing the total production per day per plant in the zones outlined in the report, in only two instances will it be found profitable to put up a plant of this nature and produce and take out the oil as one of the by-products. Tar products, of course, are always valuable and readily disposed of. There would be eight or twelve gallons to every ton.

As to breeze, that product could be disposed of to industrial steam and other furnaces, or could be disposed of to a limited extent in the plant itself.

Now at pages 114 and 115 of the report I find estimates given of the cost of plants. I gave the House this afternoon an estimate of my own of the cost of a plant producing a thousand tons of coke per day. That estimate was based on the cost of the Troy plant, one of the most efficient and up-to-date plants in North America to-day, and which was visited by some hon. members opposite as well as the members of the committee a couple of years ago. The Troy plant cost about three and a half millions, but the labour conditions in the plant, and in the district surrounding it, were deplorable. I asked hon. gentlemen who were there if they were not struck by the pallor, the emaciation, the miserable, wretched physical condition of the workers and their families within the vicinity of both the blast furnaces and the coking plant. I found out on examination—by inviting statements from some of the foremen and others—that the wage paid ordinary labour in the plant was 42½ cents an hour. The highest wage paid in the plant was paid to technical workers, that is expert men like the acetylene welders, or men engaged in work of that mechanical character. They are paid 75 cents an hour. This condition in the United States where conditions are supposed to be so splendid. Forty-two and one half cents an hour for the average labour; 75 cents an hour for the expert or dangerous labour. I asked: How many hours a day do you work? And to my utter amazement I found that these men in the plant were working twelve hours a day.

Mr. COOTE: As bad as the House of Commons.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just as bad as the House of Commons. On receiving that answer I asked if the workers were allowed off time for their meals. I found that they were not; they were compelled to eat their meals while the work was in progress. I submit that similar conditions should not be created in this country. If coking plants are to be put up I submit that the workers should be paid reasonable wages and should work under proper conditions. Turning to page 114 I find the estimate given there is not much below the one I gave the House. Let me quote:

> The plant in table XXI would as a rule consist of a single battery of ovens, from 45 to 60 ovens in the battery, the number of ovens being dependant on the size of oven, style or type, and the coking time. The coking time plays a very important part in the physical characteristics of the coke produced. Such a plant should produce about 7,300 M cubic feet of surplus gas per day and 700 tons of coke. The coke yield varies with the grade of coal used and the plant practice, a yield of 70 per cent commercial coke from dry coal being a fair average.
> The expense items in the table are the usual ones allowed and are conservative. The labour rates are based on Canadian conditions. Such a plant would cost about $2,500,000 for a 700-ton plant.

Let us glance for a moment at the table of expenses. We find there—and may I call this to the attention of the Labour party in this House—that ordinary labour is estimated at 50 cents an hour, and repair labour 60 cents an hour. Think of it, Mr. Speaker. We are proposing to establish an industry in this country, paying the employees 50 cents an hour for ordinary labour and 60 cents an hour for repair labour. The table of expenses given in this report is as follows:

Expenses	Per ton dry coal
Operating labour (50 cents per hour)	$0.750
Repair labour (60 cents per hour)	0.180
Repair material	0.200
Supplies and lubrication	0.050
Fuel	0.400
Tank car rental	0.030
Switching	0.020
Manufacturing materials	0.150
Power and water purchased	0.120
Miscellaneous other expense	0.050
Total operating expense	1.950

Adding the coal cost to the fixed charges and the expense of operation gives a total cost of $9.46.

Now I turn to a publication entitled "Some New Aspects of Low Temperature Distillation," by Harold Neilsen, at the request of the Smoke Abatement League of Great Britain. On page 6 this expert on European coking plants and European methods lays down this doctrine:

> In my paper before the South Wales Institute of Engineers, in April, 1922, I drew specific attention to this, and tried to prove that unless this figure is low, the economic success of any low temperature distillation process is highly problematical. It will take too long to go into details of the production costs here, but it will suffice to say that the overall costs today per ton of raw material treated, including:
> Depreciation on capital cost, including foundations and buildings and complete plant,
> Fuel for carbonising,
> Cost of handling material,
> Power and steam,
> Labour,
> Maintenance and stones, etc.,
> should not exceed 4s. per ton.

That is about $1 per ton. The figure given by the Fuel board is roughly $2, $1.95 to be exact, so we are 100 per cent above the lowest economic figure given by this expert.

Now I come to the capital cost, including everything. According to this expert, and he ought to know, it should not exceed from 10 to 12 shillings per ton of raw material dealt with, or $2.50 to $3. The figure we have in the fuel board estimate here is $9.40. This would indicate that costs in Canada will be too high for economic development.

Walking out in the city of Troy, Mr. Speaker, it occurred to me to examine the retail prices in order that we would have some idea of what relief we might expect in this country under a similar proposal, and I found right there beside the plant, with no railway charges to pay, nothing but the wagons to haul, a price of $11 a ton. The coal for coking in Troy cost them from $5 to $5.40 per ton. Coal in this report is estimated to cost $7 per ton, so you have a cost right immediately at the door of the plant in Canada of $12 to $13 per ton. That is not so bad. The immediate consumer in the little city, if it was economically feasible to build such a plant, might gain some advantage, say about $1 per ton over the anthracite price.

As to the possibility of developing this trade to any extent outside the city, that is hopeless on account of the present railway rates. I will deal with that point before I close. In the Hamilton plant which was mentioned this afternoon, I find that they are using entirely American coal. They are using that under drawback, and 70 per cent of it is the celebrated Elkhorn coal, which is a very high volatile coal from the United States, and 30 per cent of it is the equally celebrated Pokahontas coal, a bituminous, low volatile coal. They are using 100 per cent American coal in that plant, and I ask you how? By securing from this Liberal government a drawback of 99 per cent of the cost of the coal that is used for this purpose.

The minister informed me this afternoon, in answer to a question, that it was not the intention of the administration to affect in any way the drawback, and that it was to be continued. At the same time the minister challenged me when I stated that under this bill there would not be one dollar of advantage to the Alberta coal producer, and indeed I am beginning to be a little timid of its effects elsewhere if this drawback is to be continued. Let me point out one or two facts in connection with it. Specific mention has been made of the city of Winnipeg. The minister thought that a plant in Winnipeg would be able to develop a partial market for our Alberta coal. The Winnipeg Electric Company have operated a gas-producing plant for many years. Some time ago they introduced a battery of by-product coke ovens. The primary object of both plants is the same, that is, the production of gas, with coke as a by-product. This by-product plant was built prior to the tariff amendment of 1925 which admitted United States bituminous coal for coke-making purposes practically free of duty. The United States coal used in the gas producing plant is not entitled to a drawback of duty, but coal imported for use in the by-product ovens, although used for the same purpose is entitled to the drawback or subsidy. Every ton of coke produced in this plant from American coal is sold in direct competition with Alberta domestic coal in Winnipeg. Note that, Mr. Speaker: Every ton of coke produced from American coal in this plant is sold in direct competition with our own Alberta coal.

I do not think I need go further than that simple statement to indicate to the minister that any belief he may have had that this policy would provide a market for our Alberta coal in Winnipeg is dissipated and must remain so as long as that drawback continues. Let me say this. Although I have from time to time deplored the practice of imposing duties, and I do still deplore it, yet I say to the minister that there is nothing so utterly inconsistent and ridiculous as imposing a duty for certain purposes, such as to keep out a commodity which is entering into competition with our own commodities in this country, and then upon pressure from private interest, for private exploitation and private gain, to permit the importation of that commodity on a drawback duty of 99 per cent. That is a most vicious principle, and I am sure the minister agrees with me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say this to my hon. friend? The moment that you put a duty on, you increase the cost to the consumer. My hon. friend will not deny that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Quite right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend agrees that the imposition of the duty raises the price to the consumer. By leaving the duty off we protect the consumer, and if we want to use our own product the logical thing is to assist by way of bonuses so as to keep the price down to the consumer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is going to allow American coal to come in here under a drawback of 99 per cent, and then we are going to subsidize private interests to develop and sell coke from Canadian coal in competition with the coke produced from imported free American coal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hate to object, but I shall certainly take a few minutes to explain this point to the committee. My hon. friend is arguing from wrong premises there absolutely. There is no such thing as creating a monopoly under this bill.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is back to the monopoly again. I hope he will deal with this question when I get through, but may I have a rest from the interruptions which have been very numerous. At page 134 of the report of the Fuel board they deal with this question of railway rates, to which I promised a few moments ago to refer before I close. It is quite clear that even the fuel board itself did not believe in the commercial feasibility of establishing coking plants. Note what it says:

> There is no single factor of more importance to the coal and coke industry than that of transportation.

In that we all agree. It goes on:

> It is proposed to point out the conditions existing and just how these affect the by-product coke oven and gas industry.

Then it gives a table showing the rates in effect on coke on a mileage basis, with which I shall not weary the committee, but hon. members will find it on page 134 of the report. The fuel board goes on to make this statement:

> It is only reasonable to assume that after coke plants are established and tonnages in quantity are assured, the railways will grant commodity rates, which will bring not only freight markets to the railways, but cheaper coke to the public.

In short, the board itself realizes that the biggest problem in connection with this matter is not the subsidizing of private interests to develop coking plants, but the reduction of transportation rates, a point which I have consistently argued in this House.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will admit that the board is now referring altogether to the transportation of Canadian coal.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, that is what I am referring to now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend has just stated that the Fuel board did not believe in the establishment of coking ovens.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all. I said the Fuel board had, by implication at least in this statement, inferred that the establishment of coking ovens without a reduction in rates was not economically feasible.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will say for Canadian coal, I will agree.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All right. I understood the object of the bill was to use Canadian coal in these plants. My hon. friend is getting away from that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, but I do not want the hon. member to understand that the Fuel board were against the general practice of making coke.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Fuel board, according to their own statement, clearly realized that unless there was a reduction in railway rates the production of coke was not necessarily nor even probably profitable or commercially feasible. I will read again from this report, page 134:

> It is only reasonable to assume that after coke plants are established and tonnages in quantity are assured, the railways will grant commodity rates, which will bring not only freight markets to the railways but cheaper coke to the public.

The rates quoted were the Canadian rates. I now turn for a moment to the comparison in this table on page 135, between the American and Canadian rates. The American rate from Detroit to Montreal is $4 a ton, approximate distance 560 miles and the per mile rate 0.715. Then we take the Canadian rates on that basis, Hamilton to Montreal $3 per ton, approximate distance 377 miles, rate per mile 0.786, rate per same basis as Detroit, $2.70, as compared with $3. The United States rate has the advantage of 30 cents per ton over our rate. Then the rate from Montreal to Ottawa per net ton is $2.50, distance 115 miles, rate per mile 2.17, rate per same basis as Detroit 0.82. Then Montreal to Quebec, the rate is $2.40, distance 172 miles, rate per mile 1.40, rate per same basis as Detroit 1.23. Then the rate Montreal to Sherbrooke, $2.40, distance 106 miles, rate per mile 2.26, rate per same basis as Detroit 0.75. Then Boston to Sherbrooke, $3.60 per net ton, approximate distance 272 miles, rate per mile 1.32, rate per same basis as Detroit 1.96.

In every instance there is a very serious difference in favour of the United States rate. This report indicates that there are other disadvantages under which we suffer and which should be removed. Another disadvantage is that switching charges are high. In many localities these now amount to 80 to 90 cents per ton. In the Connellsville coal and coke region, and other points in the United States where any considerable tonnage is moved, the switching charge is 19 cents per ton.

The final statement in the transportation division of this report is as follows:

> The favourable side of the transportation question lies in the receptive attitude of the railways.

I am afraid if we are going to rely on that it will be a long time before we get an adjustment in rates.

> Although, perhaps, the complexities of rate-making render a complete answer to this perplexing question most difficult, it may be possible to go a long way towards a satisfactory solution by merely laying the facts before the proper authorities.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should not pass. I will give a summary of my reasons in a moment. Let me at this stage call the attention of the minister concerned and of the administration to an editorial in a newspaper which is favourable to the government and has supported it strenuously during the recent election campaign, and is still supporting it. I refer to the issue of the Ottawa Citizen, March 21, 1927, referring to the new methods being developed in the United States and Germany. It reads:

> In the report of the Royal Commission, proposed new by-product coke plants would be established at Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, Port Colborne and London. Together they would produce annually 1,376,000 tons of coke and 13,795,000 "million" cubic feet of surplus gas, according to the way the figures are tabulated in the report. Presumably it should be 13,795,000,000 cubic feet. The House will need to satisfy itself that this enormous proportion of surplus gas can be commercially marketed: otherwise the cost of the coke would be higher.
> It may be possible to dispose of 4,000,000,000 cubic feet of gas annually in Montreal and 5,000,000,000 cubic feet in Toronto; but before government assistance is voted parliament will need to make sure that such by-product coking plants are the most economical method of treating the coal.

The quotation then continues:

> It would pay Canada to get the very latest information, particularly about low temperature carbonization as it is being developed in Great Britain. It is no longer a laboratory experiment, but is being tested commercially.
> Nova Scotia would benefit by waiting, at least for one more session. The demand for Nova Scotia coal, under the process as tabulated in the report of the Royal commission, would obviously be restricted to the ability of the by-product coking plants to dispose of the surplus gas. A process to produce oil in large quantities, without any such enormous surplus of gas, would allow a greater expansion of the industry.

I submit that if we proceed with this bill now we may be assisting in the establishment of coking plants which in five years will become obsolete and will be thrown back on the administration, or we will have to pay increased subsidies.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They cannot be thrown back on the administration.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then you will have established an industry which has failed. I turn now to a paper which I do not think is so favourable to the administration, but whose orthodox views will appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House. The Monetary Times of March 25, 1927, referring to coking plants, has this to say:

> The proposed encouragement for the coking industry is a matter that is of quite equal importance to central Canada as to the maritimes. The fuel problem in Ontario and Quebec is in urgent need of a solution. Coke is already growing in popularity in these provinces and the opportunity for the government policy is favourable. The interest of the maritime provinces is in the use of Nova Scotia coal. The Dominion Fuel Board is understood to be satisfied that a satisfactory coke for domestic purposes can be produced from most of the seams operated in the Cape Breton coal fields. It is, of course, desirable that Canadian coal should be used for this purpose if possible; but it is also desirable that the industry should be so organized as to be able to stand upon its own feet. It would be a misfortune if the result of this branch of government policy were to be to set up an industry which could live only at the cost of repeated subsidies from the public exchequer.

No more complete condemnation of the scheme could come from any newspaper than to indicate that nothing was more obnoxious than to set up an industry whose continued existence would depend upon annual subsidies from the government. I do not wish to be destructive. I think we can find a way out in this matter. Why not make a loan direct to accredited individuals or companies desirous of developing this industry, at a reasonable rate of interest? If a group of individuals in Montreal desire to build a 400,000-ton plant, make them a government loan at a reasonable rate of interest, and let the taxpayers of the Dominion have security on the property until the loan is paid off.

I appeal to hon. gentlemen in the ranks of the Liberal party opposite who have stood against special privilege; I appeal to the Liberal Progressives, those hon. gentlemen who would appear to have lost the progressive part of their title, to accept the suggestion which I have made and to induce the minister to put this policy of his on a loan basis instead of on a subsidy basis. Make a loan, have an interest in the company, own it ultimately if necessary, or get your loan paid back to you. Use the same policy with respect to these companies as you are using in the matter of the Montreal harbour commission, the Vancouver harbour commission and others. If you like, have your Dominion Fuel board act as the body to supervise the development. I offer that suggestion to the minister in the hope, the vain hope I admit, that realizing its constructive possibilities, he will consider the withdrawal of this bill for one session, for two reasons.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly not on a plan of that kind.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The first reason is in order that the feasibility of the plan which I propose may be examined. I do not suggest for a minute that it has no flaws, but there are possibilities in it. The second reason is in order that we may prevent the too hasty development of coking plants that may not exist feasibly or economically for more than a few years if low temperature carbonization proves commercially advantageous.

I appeal to hon. gentlemen who profess real Liberalism not to start this vicious thing again, to restart or continue subsidizing private interests in the establishment of new industries of this nature. The evil thing has already set its roots deeply into our country; it is taking from our people too heavy a toll every year. No one knows that better than hon. members from the prairies who sit opposite, who were not long ago our own colleagues holding the views which I hold to-day and who, I am satisfied, hold them at this moment, but who, because of the position in which they find themselves, may not wish to exert their real convictions and to satisfy their consciences by opposing evils of this kind. I appeal to them to remember their former ideals and to help us in our opposition to legislation of this nature.

I am opposed to it because the investigational and experimental work in this matter is not yet completed. We should not enter into the construction of these plants until we are satisfied that they will completely meet the requirements for a long time to come. These plants may be obsolete in a period of five years and you will have lost your subsidies without doing much if any good. The feasibility of the whole plan is seriously in question for the reasons I have given, namely the difficulty of disposal of the gas by-product which is the principal by-product of the coking operation in our Canadian plants. The capital cost estimated by the Fuel board, which cost will undoubtedly enter into any arrangements with the administration of this concern, is, according to an expert, too high to permit of economic development. The plan will not even scratch the real fuel problem in those areas.

A satisfactory readjustment of transportation rates would be infinitely better, not as a matter of charity or special privilege, but as a cost rate under which nobody would lose anything but when the business increased, probably a profit would be realized on the movement of a volume of tonnage by the railway company. The last and final reason is because this is creating another "special privilege" interest which we shall have the greatest difficulty in removing from our backs in the years to come. For these reasons I am opposed to the second reading of the bill and I will vote against it.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): I do not rise for the purpose of unduly protracting the discussion on the bill introduced by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), nor do I wish to follow in all its details the lengthy address of which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has just delivered himself. As a representative of the maritime provinces I think I voice the sentiments held by my associates from those provinces when I say that we are all disappointed that the hon. member for Bow River, whom we hold in high regard not alone personally, but also for his splendid gifts of intellect, has seen fit to use that ability tonight in hostile criticism of this bill; a bill calculated to be of great benefit to the people of the maritime provinces, and especially to the coal industry, which is one of the most important industries in those provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I know my hon. friend does not wish to do me an injustice.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am entirely friendly and sympathetic to the interests of the maritime provinces and if an economically sound proposition were introduced I would be glad to support it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: My hon. friend has a most peculiar manner of showing his sympathy. My hon. friend comes as I do from a Canadian province which possesses vast and extensive coal deposits. I know he must be as anxious as I am to see developed in this country a national fuel policy under which Canada will so far as possible be made independent of a foreign nation in the matter of her fuel supply. And in spite of the fact that my hon. friend has used his voice and intimates that he will exercise his vote to prevent this bill from going through, whenever he or any of his colleagues or associates from Alberta brings up in this House any measure dealing with transportation or anything else tending to improve the condition of the coal industry of that province, or to increase its coal output, or to bring that coal to the markets of central Canada, then in direct opposition to the attitude that he has taken to-night, my voice and my much inferior abilities will be raised in support of the legitimate claims of the province from whence he comes.

My hon. friend in the first part of his speech said there were certain objections which could not be met in respect of the establishment of coking plants. One of the chief objections was that we had no all-absorbing market for our gas such as the House of Commons provides on certain occasions. If he will refer to the report from which he quoted at some length to-night, he will find that the author of that report takes an entirely different view. He will find for example that the very eminent engineer who compiled the report from which he quoted stated in it that he made an extensive survey of conditions in Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, and Port Colborne. He then goes on to say:

> The cities chosen are those where the domestic gas demand is sufficient to warrant installation of ovens and successfully support a by-product coke plant.

He also states:

> Other localities such as the "border" cities, can erect plants as soon as the industrial or domestic gas demand is sufficient.

He goes on further to say on page 34 of the report that at the present time there is a total market in Canada for some 2,628,000 tons of household fuel. The writer, having in mind the possible disposition of the gas and other by-products, points out that by the establishment of coke ovens at the present time, a production of 1,376,300 tons of American anthracite could be displaced by Canadian coke. I think that is sufficient evidence of the feasibility of the project which this bill has in mind to encourage.

I am in favour of this bill because it aims at the further development of the great coal resources of the Dominion. It is intended to bring about a wider distribution of Canadian coal in Canadian markets. I am in favour of it because it is a step in the direction of a national fuel policy for Canada, and that is something which should meet with the approbation of every patriotic Canadian who has the industrial and commercial interests of Canada at heart. Coal is one of the basic elements in the industrial progress of any nation, for no great industrial achievement is possible unless a nation possesses coal deposits and can properly utilize them. Coal is by far the most important of all the mineral products, and next to coal in importance is iron. The existence of coal and iron deposits throughout the world has profoundly influenced modern civilization. The greatest commercial nations in the world to-day are the United States, Germany and England all of which owe their industrial and commercial greatness in no small measure to their coal deposits. If Canada is to take its place in the sun industrially and commercially, if it is to occupy that position in industry and commerce which a bountiful nature ordained should be ours, then I say this parliament must of necessity take steps to inaugurate a national fuel policy. And this is one such step. I may say to my hon. friends that when they bring into parliament any measure calculated to assist the coal industry of Alberta we from the maritime provinces will support it just as we had expected that they would support us in connection with this bill.

It is an anomalous, an illogical position for Canada to allow the central provinces to depend upon a friendly but none the less rival industrial power for their fuel supply. It is a situation that should not obtain because in Canada we possess 17 per cent of the total coal reserves of the world. Our concern should be to bring Canadian coal to our industrial centres, and this can be done if proper measures are taken by this parliament.

This bill will not only be of advantage to the province of Nova Scotia, but it will be of very material advantage to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. At the present time these provinces depend almost entirely upon American anthracite for their domestic needs. That is an insecure position. It is a position which no self-respecting country should care to be in. It is a dangerous position for any province to tolerate. It is dangerous for this reason chiefly, that according to mineralogists the supply of American anthracite coal is being rapidly depleted. Already, as those who have given study to the question know, what were two very important sources of supply of American anthracite, namely, the Carbondale and Scranton districts, which ten years ago were important sources of supply, have by this time petered out, and to-day they produce practically no coal. In 1924 there were presented to congress no fewer than three resolutions to the effect that the United States government should place an embargo on the exportation of American anthracite. What would be the position of central Canada to-day had such action been taken by the government to the south of us. It is time for us to take serious cognizance of the situation and to see to it that there shall be available some suitable substitute in the event of the supply of American anthracite being at any time cut off. But apart from the uncertainty of being able to secure American anthracite we have the positive assurance that as the years go on, according as the American supply diminishes, the price of anthracite coal to the consumer in Canada will go up. I venture the prediction that within half a decade if the people of Ontario and Quebec can obtain any American anthracite at all, they will have to pay a very much higher price for it than they are paying now. I say, therefore, that this bill the object of which is to displace as far as possible, American anthracite by a fuel which is superior to it, and which can be and is sold at a lower price, will materially assist the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It will also greatly assist Nova Scotia inasmuch as the coal industry is one of the most important of our activities. Upon that industry almost one-fifth of our population depend for their livelihood, and the great problem we have to face in our coal industry is our inability to provide employment for our workmen in winter. When our coal is banked throughout the winter it generally breaks up and consequently it is more difficult to dispose of. It is not so easy to sell it in that state, and the re-handling charges add materially to the cost of the coal. It has therefore become practically impossible for us to bank coal in winter, although this would provide employment in that season. If this bill goes through and the coal is used for coking purposes at Montreal and other centres, we shall certainly bank our coal because then we shall not care whether it disintegrates or not, because it has to be broken up in any case before it can be coked. The result will be that we shall produce over 500,000 tons of coal a year more than at present. And we shall thus give in wages to Nova Scotia miners about a million dollars a year more than at present. My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) had a great deal to say about the workingmen; there was much pathos in his voice as he referred to them. I would have him consider the workingmen in Cape Breton island and the miners of Nova Scotia generally who to-day must go without employment in winter, and whose wives and children on such occasions are in needy circumstances. I would ask the hon. gentleman to be sympathetic toward a project which has as one of its objects the providing of work in winter for men such as I have described.

I do not intend to discuss the bill at any great length, but I would point out to my hon. friend from Bow River, who was critical of it because it concerned only Nova Scotia—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, no; that is not fair.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I do not want to be unfair to my hon. friend, but that is the way I understood him.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would oppose it as strenuously if it applied to Alberta.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Then my hon. friend's position is a great deal worse than I thought it was.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is at least consistent.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: This bill rises directly out of the recommendations of the Duncan report. It is supposed to apply primarily to Nova Scotia and to the maritimes generally, and those who come from coal producing sections of the west should give it their sympathy and support because in the future they may require the sympathy and support of the maritime representatives for measures calculated to improve the coal industry of Alberta. This is one of the vital recommendations of the Duncan commission, having as its aim the stimulation of one of the most important industries in our province. To-day the people of Nova Scotia are looking to this parliament as they have never looked before; in these days when the report of the Duncan commission and the measures implementing that report are being discussed, a million Canadians down by the Atlantic seaboard have their eyes focused on the parliament of Canada. These people feel that in the past, injustices have been done them, and they feel that their provinces have not kept pace with the onward march of Canadian progress. This mental attitude produces a condition which is bad for Canadian unity and which unless removed may be fraught with serious dangers to Canadian union as well. I do not claim that the people of the maritime provinces have done more than the people of other provinces. But I do say that they have always assumed their fair share of the burden; they have always made their share of the sacrifices, and they have maintained faith with the rest of Canada. To-day, in travail and difficulty, they confidently expect that the rest of Canada will not break faith with them. If the measures of the Duncan report, and particularly those calculated to stimulate industrial activity in the maritimes, go through, they will have a wholesome psychological effect upon the people of those provinces. As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said in one of the best speeches delivered this session, "as the celebration of Canada's sixtieth anniversary approaches, as a result of these recommendations being implemented the maritime provinces will take new heart and renewed confidence in the sense of justice of the rest of Canada and the parliament of this country. They will look forward with renewed confidence and optimism to the future and with courage undaunted "greet the unseen with a cheer" realizing that "the things they go to do will be better things than they have ever done," and their future within confederation will be a better future than they have ever known. In order to bring about that happy result and in order that there may be amity and coöperation between the different parts of Canada, I ask hon. members to-night sympathetically to consider our claims, that the national good of Canada may be promoted. If they do that I think there will be greater sympathy with the legitimate claims of the maritime provinces as set forth in the Duncan report.

Mr. Speaker, I very cheerfully give my support to the Minister of Mines on this bill; I congratulate him for introducing it and everything I can do to facilitate its passage will certainly be done. I would, however, say that one part of the argument of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) impressed me; I refer to what he said about item 1049 of the present tariff. I think perhaps there is a little inconsistency in formulating a policy to produce coke manufactured from Canadian coal while we allow American coal for the manufacture of coke to enter Canada under a drawback of 99 per cent. To my mind that rather nullifies the effect of this bill, and I hope the minister will take serious cognizance of that fact and that this clause will ere long be removed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would like to say a word or two in connection with some of the remarks made by the previous speakers. I do not want to take more than a moment to explain to the committee my contention, which is that the bill is not designed for the purpose of creating a monopoly, which fact I think I can establish at once. It is not intended to capture the entire market for coke but simply to encourage the manufacture of domestic fuel from Canadian coal in so far as the present facilities will permit. That is, you must have the network of pipes in every city to dispose of the gas, and the extent to which you can dispose of that gas is the limit to which you can manufacture coke.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not sure about that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is as conditions are at present. A great deal has been said about new processes, with which I do not propose to deal at all. At the Hamilton plant, where this process is away beyond the experimental stage, a good deal of the gas is being consumed in the heating of the plant itself while the balance is distributed through the city mains. Therefore that is settled; coke can only be manufactured to the extent to which you have provision for the distribution of gas, or the consumption of gas if you prefer those words. Neither the fuel board nor anyone else ever thought that as the gas distribution systems exist at present in the cities, we could supplant all the anthracite coming into Canada. Under existing conditions, however, we can supplant anthracite to the extent of over 2,000,000 tons, and altogether in Canada, last year we only used

3,500,000 tons of American anthracite. We used 5,000,000 tons in 1923, so I point to the fact that we are making some progress in providing a substitute for anthracite coal, which, as my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) has said, will probably be denied us altogether in the near future. Our object is to be in a position to supply a substitute fuel when that time comes. Electricity is playing an important part as a substitute for this domestic fuel.

Now let us come to the purport of the bill before the committee. Whether or not this bill passes we are given to understand on the best authority that a coking plant will be constructed in Montreal, capable of consuming 400,000 tons of bituminous coal. All we are seeking to do is to give assistance without taking responsibility for a single brick in that plant; under certain conditions we desire to provide for assistance to these companies if they will use Canadian coal in preference to coal coming from the United States.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it fair to say that that assistance will amount to two-thirds of the capital cost of the plant?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, it cannot go beyond the figure of one dollar for every ton of Canadian coal used, so the total amount will depend entirely upon the percentage of Canadian coal used. If less than 50 per cent of Canadian coal is used, no assistance will be given.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My figures are to the contrary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My friend is basing his figures on the cost of the plant which, while it is a consideration, does not enter into the final determination of the amount to be paid. We are not seeking to say that we will deny these companies the right to earn part of this assistance if they do not use 100 per cent of Canadian coal, but we do say that they should use at least 70 per cent of Canadian coal and not less than 50 per cent. By means of this encouragement we are seeking to get individuals, private or corporate, to transfer their affections from American coal to Canadian coal. All the avenues for the transportation of bituminous coal into this central region lead from the United States. People are using that fuel, and they do not readily transfer their affections from the American to the Canadian product. The assistance proposed to be given will be for the purpose I have indicated. My hon. friend suggests that we should loan money to the companies to build a plant. But that would mean our going into the business ourselves, and it is now past the experimental stage. The Hamilton plant has proved beyond all question that the manufacture of coal into coke and its sale for domestic purposes meets the necessities of the case.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If we made loans we should at least get our money back, but here it is proposed to make a straight gift.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend's argument was followed to its logical conclusion there would be very grave doubts as to that because of what he says as to the feasibility of the high temperature system and the possibility of its being scrapped within fifteen years. The life of such a plant is fifteen years anyway and then it has to be entirely renewed. May I say for the information of my hon. friend that we are watching new systems of experimentation in the carbonization of coal just as closely as possible. There is not a single thing happening in any of the important coal bearing areas of the world where we do not watch progress of developments. I agree with my hon. friend that if low temperature carbonization proves to be feasible and workable it will reduce the cost very materially, but the conversion of coal into coke will also have a very material effect upon the cost. I disagree with the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton who has spoken in connection with the reimposition of the duty—because that is what he means. The reimposition of the duty would at once raise the price to the consumer. On the other hand my contention is that under this system of assistance, and of encouraging the substitution of Canadian coal for American, we do not raise the price to the consumer one iota. We keep the price level, because the competition still exists and that is what should prevail. It may be said we ought to try to shut out American coal altogether, but we do not view the matter from that standpoint. I want to say very frankly that I am not one of those who advocate the giving of subsidies very strenuously, I never did; but if my hon. friend calls this system vicious I say it is the least vicious system that could be adopted in connection with the encouragement of industries to use Canadian products.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if the minister would give an explanation of the statement he made earlier in the day in reference to the proposed drawback in connection with a Winnipeg coking plant?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I would be very glad to. There is a feeling in the minds of some westerners that we should reimpose the duty on Canadian coal because the drawback is nothing more or less than a return of the duty paid on the entrance of the coal crossing the border to be used for coking purposes. Metallurgical coke comes in free, and I want to say to my hon. friend that if he attempted to put a duty on metallurgical coke every manufacturer in this country would raise a howl to high heaven. I have thought, and I still think, that if the manufacturer was entitled to free coke, the consuming public were surely entitled to free coke as a substitute for anthracite. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Bow River that this assistance will not help Winnipeg. It will do no harm to any industry but it will substitute in a large degree the use of Canadian coal for American coal in the city of Winnipeg—of Alberta coal if you like. I hope our maritime province friends will not take offence when I say that Alberta coal is equal to the best grades of the United States coal for coking purposes.

Mr. HEAPS: What I am trying to get at is the fact that in the city of Winnipeg, in addition to a private gas and coking plant, there is a publicly owned central heating system and the latter ought to be treated at least as well as the gas plant owned by a private corporation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid I did not catch my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. HEAPS: I want the central heating system that we have in the city of Winnipeg to be placed on exactly the same level as the private gas plant. I do not think we should give a drawback to one and not to the other. Personally I should like to see the central heating plant, which is owned by the city, using Canadian coal to the extent of one hundred per cent if it is at all possible. When the central heating plant was originally built that was the idea entertained, and I believe the city of Winnipeg went to considerable expense in putting in equipment for the drying of the coal. I do not know whether it was on account of the quality, or whether it was due to other reasons, but they have not found it profitable to use Canadian coal entirely. It is quite possible, however, that if assistance, such as is promised to the private corporation in Winnipeg, were granted to the central heating system it might be able to use more Canadian coal than it is using at the present time. May I point out further that the gas plant in the city of Winnipeg comes into direct competition with our electrical public utility there, and if it is granted an extra allowance in the form of a drawback or subsidy, such as is proposed here, it will be in a position to compete more easily with that public utility. In the city of Winnipeg the people are using more electricity than gas for domestic purposes. If the government is granting a subsidy it certainly should grant such aid to the first publicly owned steam heating utility established in the Dominion of Canada and prevent it from being exposed to unfair competition.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should rather regret what my hon. friend fears, but I think he missed the point which I tried to illustrate before, namely, that the subsidy will not increase the use of coal. This assistance is proposed to be given in order to substitute the use of Canadian coal for American coal. It would have no effect in reducing the price of the gas or coal either so far as that is concerned, or at least of very materially reducing it. The assistance proposed is simply based on the amount required to make it profitable, or a little more profitable, to use the Canadian product in preference to the American. My hon. friend says that if used to a greater degree it will interfere with the sale of electricity. But to the extent to which coal is being manufactured into gas there will be competition anyway. All that is being done is in the hope of encouraging the substitution of the Canadian coal for the American. I want to get that idea home to my hon. friend. May I say to my hon. friend, in connection with the coal for his central heating plant, that I remember the day when we were supplying almost 90 per cent of the necessities of Winnipeg from Alberta coal? There are two reasons why a change has come about. One is that bituminous coal never was cheaper in the history of American mining than it is to-day. It is at possibly the lowest point it could touch. Naturally it is reaching a little farther out to-day, and probably the competition is a little stronger. That is not true of our Alberta coal. The Alberta members will agree that the price is somewhat higher to-day than it was at the time we captured the Winnipeg market. Therein lies the difference. I agree with my hon. friend from Bow River that the solution of this difficulty lies in the transportation question, which is now before the railway board.

Mr. HEAPS: Supposing the central heating plant in Winnipeg is using large quantities of American coal and that by granting a subsidy they would use large quantities of Canadian coal. Would the minister give them the same subsidy for converting that coal into steam as will be granted in the case of coal converted into coke?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think that difficulty will be cured entirely by a readjustment of the rates. That is the feeling we have in Alberta, at all events.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am, of course, entirely in sympathy with the object of the minister in bringing down this bill, but I am utterly at a loss to understand the basis on which he deals with the matter. I do not see how it is possible for this measure to be of very much advantage to us in Nova Scotia so long as item 1049, to which my hon. friend from Inverness referred, remains in the tariff. If coal for this purpose is to be admitted free of duty as it is now, what inducement is there for the proprietors of these proposed new plants to use Canadian coal? For more than thirty years I have had some connection with the coal business and the production of coke in retort ovens. I quite appreciate the advisability and approve of using a mixture of coal for the production of coke. Coal from different seams, even if identical in analysis, will produce a stronger coke if mixed together than coke produced from any single seam. Why this is so, I do not know, but it is so, and therefore I have not any doubt that a mixture of 30 per cent of one class, and 70 per cent of another class, of coal will produce a better quality fuel.

The minister said that coke should not bear a duty. Why not? Coal, which is a natural product, bears a duty, and if coal is entitled to a duty, coke, which is a manufactured product, is still more entitled to protection. I cannot follow the reasoning of the minister in that matter. I know of no reason why a manufacturer in this country should not pay a duty on all his material, the finished product of some other industry and if he has sufficient protection on his finished product. I do not know whether the minister will agree with me in that or not, but I would like to know what is the answer to my question as to why he retains tariff item No. 1049. Of course, the minister is quite familiar with it, but for the benefit of the House I will read it. Tariff item No. 1049 provides that bituminous coal is subject to a drawback of 99 per cent:

> When imported after the twenty-fourth day of March, 1925, by proprietors of by-product recovery coke ovens and converted into coke at their by-product recovery coke ovens. Provided that no drawback shall be paid under this item on coal converted into coke at a gas retort plant or at a plant using any other process than the by-product coke process, also provided that drawback payable under this item is in lieu of drawback payable under any other item.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As my hon. friend knows, anthracite coal comes into Canada free.

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, but it should not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not going to get into an argument as to whether it should or not, but as a matter of fact it does come in here free, and has done so for a very considerable number of years, the idea being, I believe, to cheapen the cost to the consumer. When we sought to supplant anthracite by coke we found that the metallurgical coke was also imported free. Run-of-mine coal bore a duty of 53 cents and slack of 14 cents, but the difficulty of enforcement as between the slack and the run-of-mine caused a great deal of trouble, and we reduced the duty on run-of-mine coal by 3 cents and increased the duty on slack to 50 cents, so all bituminous coal coming into Canada bears a duty of 50 cents a ton. In order to put domestic coke on a parity with metallurgical, but more particularly to put it on a parity with anthracite coming in free, we give a drawback of 99 per cent, as prevails with regard to the metallurgical. That is the reason there is a drawback, to put them on a parity.

Mr. CANTLEY: I thank the minister for his explanation, but he is simply reasoning backwards; that is all there is to it. The fact is, if you are going to protect the coal industry at all you must protect it by putting a duty on all classes of fuel that compete with coal. What is the effect as regards the Ontario plants which use American coke which is brought in there free? It means that the miner in Nova Scotia who is mining coal for use in the steel plants of Cape Breton is working without any protection at all. In addition to that, he is more than one thousand miles from his nearest competitive market, say in Montreal. That is one of the grossly unfair discriminations which we have had to suffer from in Nova Scotia for several years, and, with shame I say it, the party that I am supposed to support were the ones who put that into force. But nevertheless it was wrong. We all make mistakes, and that is a mistake that ought to be now corrected. I cannot really understand how the minister expects to get any advantage from this proposal so long as item 1049 remains on the tariff list.

There is another point. I do not want to appear as though I were not supporting this measure, but I would ask the minister where is the fairness of bonusing new plants of this kind and leaving other plants that are already built and in operation without similar protection or assistance? Why is that attitude taken? It seems most unfair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are no existing plants except your metallurgical plant in Sydney—

Mr. CANTLEY: I think there are.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): None of the new standard type except the plant in Hamilton.

Mr. CANTLEY: Are there not two plants in Hamilton?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, one plant, the Steel Company's plant.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think there is another as well.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are making metallurgical coke entirely.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister is in error; the fact is that all the plants are making and selling a very considerable portion of their product as domestic fuel to-day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Gas plants?

Mr. CANTLEY: No, coke oven plants. A very considerable portion of the coke made in Cape Breton is sold as domestic fuel, and the quantity is growing. They are entitled to equal consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where do they sell it? In their own locality?

Mr. CANTLEY: They not only sell it in their own locality, and to each of the maritime provinces but they also sent a very considerable tonnage up the St. Lawrence this year, and that tonnage is increasing. Over 70,000 tons came up this year, and that trade will increase, and should increase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is that 70,000 tons used for domestic purposes?

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes. It is crushed coke broken to certain sizes best suited for domestic consumption. There are other features that I shall not refer to now, but I do not understand why a straight bonus is not paid instead of paying a certain percentage of the cost of construction of the plant. What is the objection to giving a straight bonus?

Mr. MacLAREN: The object of the bill is to encourage the use of Canadian coal in the manufacture of coke, and so substitute it for anthracite. I think it is also in the mind of the minister to encourage the use of Canadian bituminous coal. With both of these objects I am in full accord, but I cannot help thinking that the minister might go further in the encouragement of the use of Canadian bituminous coal. A drawback is allowed, for instance, in the case of coke ovens in Hamilton. I do not suggest that that be disturbed, but I would ask the minister to consider the point most carefully and in future, in the erection of further coke ovens, provide that this item 1049 should not apply to them, so that there will be no further drawback allowed in respect to the importation of American bituminous coal. I presume the minister has considered that matter carefully. I hope he will see that that is a feasible thing. I do not for a moment suggest upsetting present conditions in regard to those ovens that are now obtaining the drawback. That would probably make the matter difficult, but here is a chance of proceeding under the bill with these coke ovens without the application of the drawback which is now in existence.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definition.

Mr. MacLAREN: I thought the minister was going to say something in answer to my question on section 1.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The matter my hon. friend refers to comes under an item in the tariff, and of course must be applicable to all Canada.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is a tariff that is dependent upon the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot make it apply to plants now coming into existence without making it apply to those already in existence. It must be general. There is no zone system to which it can be applied.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If you subsidize coal at $1 a ton when it is to be manufactured into coke, why could you not subsidize all coal manufactured into briquettes?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We spent a lot of money on that proposition. I desire to insert an amendment to section 2, which would be paragraph (d), to read as follows:

"Domestic use" means use in the home or use solely for the direct heating of any building.

Mr. HEAPS: I raised a point a few minutes ago with reference to the city of Winnipeg. They have a central heating plant there. Instead of converting coal into coke they convert it into heat, and this plant heats about a hundred buildings in the centre of Winnipeg. If the government is giving a subsidy to coking plants for using Canadian coal, I think there is no reason why this central plant in Winnipeg should not be put in the same position as a coking plant.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Nova Scotia coal is being used to heat this building from the central heating plant, but Nova Scotia coal will never be used for the manufacture of coke in this city unless something is done to put it on a parity with its American competitors. Nova Scotia coal competes with American product here and has captured the market. Therein lies the difference between what my hon. friend is asking and the assistance I am proposing.

Mr. HEAPS: The comparison is not a very good one. By what we have done in Winnipeg we have practically cut out the use of coke in that city. It is not used in the parliament buildings. Most of the buildings which were heated by American coal are now being heated fifty-fifty by Canadian and American coal, and I am anxious for Canada to get the other fifty per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Our hope is that the reduction in freight rates would make it possible to use one hundred per cent Canadian coal. I am simply trying to substitute Canadian coal for American coal for the manufacture of coke in this country. I am not going into the whole bituminous coal field. In the case my hon. friend refers to it would be nothing more than a glorified heating plant which would be used in an apartment house, so that my hon. friend's suggestion would lead into an unlimited field.

Mr. HEAPS: The plant I refer to is something more than a glorified heating plant in an apartment house. I hope when the minister comes to Winnipeg he will take the opportunity of visiting the plant. If he does he will find that the heat is sent from the plant a distance of probably a mile in the city, which is something quite different from a glorified heating plant in an apartment house. The city of Winnipeg has spent well over a million dollars in establishing that plant, and I think they should receive a little more encouragement than they have received from the minister, especially when any plant which is to come into competition with them will receive some benefit from the bill now before the House.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister expect that one of these plants will be built in Winnipeg? Is there any reason to expect that?

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a plant already in existence there; it has been there for some time. They have a gas plant as well, and they are using the old beehive ovens, the sole purpose of which is to manufacture gas which is very much inferior to the domestic fuel. What is proposed to be done in Toronto will be done elsewhere, and what they are doing in Montreal will be done elsewhere. They are tearing down the old plants and substituting the new ones.

Mr. COOTE: No existing plant can receive any benefit from this plan?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not under this bill. This is in order to try out this scheme to see how it will work.

Mr. COOTE: Any company that has a plant at present and that wishes to secure the benefit of this legislation will have to establish a new plant?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I thought the minister could tell us whether he had some expectation that advantage of this legislation would be taken in Winnipeg so as to help the market for British Columbia coal.

Mr. HEAPS: Am I to understand that if an old plant remodels itself to a certain extent, it will come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, if the product of the plant is up to the standard that we will set for fuel. The difficulty is that there are at present in existence two or three processes that make an inferior fuel which we would not be warranted in calling domestic coke in the real sense of the word. The fuel will have to be up to a certain standard before we will grant the subsidy. Of necessity you must have a modern plant to manufacture that class of fuel. I do not wish to decry the output of beehive ovens, because there are engineers who will come along and say that you can manufacture perfectly good fuel in a beehive oven. What we are asking is that a modern system of by-product coking be installed before we will offer assistance.

Mr. HEAPS: Was not the Winnipeg plant which was referred to remodelled about two or three years ago and a modern up-to-date system installed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I believe something of that kind has been done.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give the committee any idea how many of these plants will be established if this bill goes through?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the assistance provided for in this bill is taken full advantage of, it would not extend beyond this city, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John. They are probably the points to which this would apply.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister explain why only 70 per cent of Canadian coal is required?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For the reason that if we insisted on 100 per cent Canadian coal, we would very likely, with the subsidy that we are offering have no Canadian coal used.

Mr. COOTE: Is that because they cannot make this coke from Canadian coal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A very much superior quality of coke can be manufactured by blending.

Mr. COOTE: That is the real reason?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Where is it provided in this bill that the coke must be up to a certain standard?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That will be provided for in the regulations.

Mr. COOTE: It is not in the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister does not agree with our friends from the maritime provinces that first class coke can be made from 100 per cent maritime provinces coal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a wide difference of opinion about this question and one only gets into an endless argument about it. It is the old, old story of a dispute by eminent engineers as to the quality. I have devised this for the purpose of using as large a proportion of Canadian coal as possible. If the proportion goes below 50 per cent we pay nothing.

Mr. CANTLEY: We might as well clear up this question of the quality of our Nova Scotia coal. There have been manufactured wholly from Nova Scotia coal millions of tons of coke equal to any coke that is made on this continent. In the report of the Dominion Fuel board they then refer to the question of washing coal and they put the cost of washing at 50 cents a ton. There is no doubt whatever that such a figure is ridiculous. We have been washing coal in Nova Scotia for nearly forty years and the cost is but a fraction of the amount referred to in the report. What the minister has in mind is the sulphur content. The sulphur can be washed out; it is being washed out every day not only in Nova Scotia, but in the United States, Wales, Scotland, Belgium, Germany—everywhere where coke is being manufactured. Practically no coal is used today that is not washed to remove the sulphur or ash or both. We may as well at once get rid of the idea that we cannot produce in this country really first-class coke made from domestic coal, because we can, and are so doing, not only in the east but in the central provinces and in the west. To suggest anything else is rather beneath our intelligence.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not want to enter into any argument with my hon. friend. Suffice it to say that while I did not discuss this question with Mr. Gray, my officials discussed it with him, and I went into it very fully with officials of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, who are going to establish this big coking plant in Montreal. On the basis of the information which I received from those officials I drafted this bill in the hope that we would substitute with Canadian coal the large proportion of coal that will be used in that plant in the manufacture of coke. I was told very plainly that if some assistance were not given, not one pound of Nova Scotia coal would be used. Therefore, without entering into any discussion of the merits or demerits of the case, I may say it is based on that information. They are practical men who are investing $6,000,000 of their money in the construction of this plant, and I think they must know their business.

Mr. COOTE: I think the minister mentioned that they would have to use 50 per cent of United States coal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under 50 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Where is that stated in the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not very clear, but I have a table of the contents in which it works out on the basis of a dollar a ton drawback, so that when you get less than 50 per cent of Canadian coal you get no subsidy whatever.

Mr. COOTE: Paragraph (a) of clause 3 reads:

> To use during each year in the manufacture of coke, coal mined in Canada to the extent of at least 70 per cent of the total coal so used.

I do not see how they can get it under 50 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If less than 70 per cent of Canadian coal is used, a penalty is imposed by which the subsidy disappears when less than 50 per cent of Canadian coal is used.

Mr. WARD: The subsidy will be on a sliding scale from one dollar down to nothing?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It becomes less if they do not use 70 per cent until it disappears at 50 per cent.

Amendment (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Amount of annual payments.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister explain a little more clearly the proviso made in this clause for the sliding scale?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps I can best explain this by referring to the chart taking Montreal as a centre. The chart is as follows:

Quantity of Canadian coal used	Assistance per ton of coke
70 per cent	86 cents
65 per cent	69 cents
60 per cent	50 cents
55 per cent	27 cents

And it disappears at less than 50 per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think that proposal is a satisfactory one. This bill is presumed to be primarily for the purpose of utilizing Canadian coal. The minister now says that below 70 per cent there will be a sliding scale down to 50 per cent and that the assistance given will be reduced in proportion to the amount of Canadian coal used between these percentages. No assistance will be given if less than 50 per cent of Canadian coal is consumed. We are supposed to be paying 4 per cent on the total cost of the plant, including land, buildings, machinery and so forth. If it is the intention of the minister to have such a sliding scale as he has indicated, why not put it in the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is in the bill and I have given a concrete example to show how it will work.

Mr. GARDINER: There is nothing in the bill to indicate it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The 100-ton plant unit, which is the lowest unit that can be economically operated, will cost far more proportionately than the 400-ton plant, and therefore the maximum of 4 per cent on the construction of the plant is thought advisable. After all, the assistance must be earned by the tonnage of the plant. It is not proposed to tie up a large sum of money without making some provision for saving the investment in the event of strikes or of any difficulty in securing Canadian coal. They may use American coal if they cannot possibly obtain the Canadian product, but the intention is to encourage the use of our own coal, and that is why we are granting the assistance. And we are fixing a sliding scale for the very purpose of stimulating the production of Canadian coal. We say emphatically that there is no reason why 70 per cent of Canadian coal should not be used with an admixture, if you will, of 30 per cent of the American product. Beyond that point we will not go. We might very well have made 70 per cent an arbitrary figure, but we thought it advisable in order to encourage the use of Canadian coal to have a sliding scale down to 50 per cent, and if they use less than that amount no assistance will be given.

Mr. GARDINER: Now that the minister has given that explanation I see the matter more clearly. There are certain interests in Montreal who want to secure backing from the government in order to float their bonds and to obtain the money to build the necessary plant. Once they get the plant built and have an assurance that it will be a success, then so far as Nova Scotia coal is concerned they may or may not use it, just as they see fit. If it suits their purpose to use that coal, well and good; if not they will use American coal. If it pays them better to use American coal, they can use it, and, while the subsidy which they would otherwise receive from the government will go by the board, they will nevertheless have the backing of this House when they go to float their bonds in order to raise money to carry on their operations. I understood that this legislation was intended in the interests of the people of Nova Scotia; that is the excuse given for it. If, however, you do not make it effective in relation to Nova Scotia coal, then I suggest it should be withdrawn.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is not assuming that this bill will help the sale of bonds?

Mr. GARDINER: The guaranteeing of interest will be a factor in the situation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no guaranteeing of interest.

Mr. GARDINER: They can go on the market and say, "We intend to take advantage of this legislation, which provides that in the event of our using 70 per cent of Canadian coal the interest is guaranteed". That is what it is to all intents and purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, exactly the opposite.

Mr. GARDINER: For goodness' sake, then, don't claim that this is in the interests of Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is not a subsidy bill. After the plant has been completed, the bonds have been sold, and they are producing coal the assistance will begin, and not before. There is absolutely no possibility of the bill being of any assistance in the floating of bonds.

Mr. GARDINER: It is true that they will not be able to secure any assistance until they have the plant in operation, but will this bill not help them to secure money? They can take the bill on the money market and say, "This is what the government will do for us if we use Canadian coal."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If they carry out the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: Certainly; that is true. But it seems to me you are misleading the people of Nova Scotia, in that they expect this legislation to be a factor in helping to solve the coal mining difficulty down there, whereas it is problematical whether it will.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Let me assure the hon. gentleman that I have been very strongly urged to guarantee bonds and I have absolutely refused to recommend any such course to the government. Those who buy bonds are the most shrewd investors in the world, and we may rest assured that every provision of this bill will be thoroughly looked into before the legal authority who passes on bonds will give his assent to the purchase of bonds in this case. Our Nova Scotia friends have scrutinized the bill carefully, and as it was designed in their interests I hope it will do all that I have indicated. I trust it will have the effect of substituting Canadian coal for American.

Mr. SPENCER: Suppose one of these plants in the city of Montreal should use 70 per cent of Nova Scotia coal for a year and then discontinue its use. How much would the government have paid the plant during that year?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They will be paid $1 a ton as a maximum on all Canadian coal used, if they use 70 per cent. If they use less than 70 per cent, the assistance is reduced until, below 50 per cent, it is withdrawn altogether.

Mr. SPENCER: There is nothing to guarantee that they will use a ton of Nova Scotia coal if they do not want to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are not tied down in any way.

Mr. COOTE: Would it not be more satisfactory to leave it at 70 per cent?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am told that this large concern in Montreal will not agree to the use of 70 per cent of Canadian coal, although I contend that it can. Of course I cannot compel them to use it, but I am not asking the government to guarantee any bonds or to become responsible for the plant. We simply say that when the plant turns out its product, on the basis of a certain percentage of Canadian coal consumed in their operations, it will receive the assistance provided for, and on no other condition.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Coming from a coal district I am deeply interested in this matter. Needless to say I am not opposed to the proposal; I am strongly back of it, and I think the government are to be congratulated for bringing in this bill and that the two ministers from the maritime provinces are especially to be thanked. I know how difficult it is to get an ideal bill under such circumstances; we from the maritime provinces would like to have this bill set the limit at 100 per cent of Canadian coal, as was the case with the old bill. We realize that that is impossible, however, and we are quite content to get this 70 per cent limit because we realize that the additional 30 per cent may be necessary in order to make suitable coke.

There is another feature which was in the old bill, and that is the penalty clause. Under that clause the manufacturer of coke had to pay one dollar per ton as damages for every ton of American coal he used in the manufacture of coke, but that clause is not included in this bill. As the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) pointed out a few moments ago, there is another feature of this bill which should receive some consideration. If the contractor uses 70 per cent of Canadian coal he will receive the full subsidy; that is graduated down to 50 per cent, and after that he gets nothing. I would suggest to the minister the advisability of inserting a clause to prevent a manufacturer of coke from taking advantage of this particular situation which might arise and saying to the American coal producer, "I am getting a subsidy of so much a ton if I use Canadian coal; I would rather use American coal if you will meet that price." That is a situation which might very likely arise, because the man in Montreal would very likely prefer American coal as against Nova Scotian coal I would suggest that under these circumstances when they begin to use American coal at the 50 per cent limit, they should pay this penalty and should not be entitled to the subsidy, which I think would meet the situation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid my hon. friend would create a great many complications and difficulties. As the bill now stands the manufacturer is penalized for anything below 70 per cent. If he goes beyond 70 per cent he earns the full assistance, but if he drops below he is penalized until he reaches less than 60 per cent, when he will get practically nothing.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. King (Kootenay) moves to amend clause 4 by adding after the word "coal" in the twenty-fourth line the words "for domestic use."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to ask two questions. First, does this apply to plants already in existence.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then in connection with any undertakings of the government or any contracts which they let it is usual to insert a fair wage clause. In the cases of these plants subsidized by the government, will the minister undertake to see that fair wage clauses are inserted?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The government will have nothing to do with the construction, but we will see that a fair wage clause is inserted in connection with the operation of the plant in every case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what I was particularly thinking of.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The clause will be inserted as in every government agreement.

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

[Mr. F. MacDonald.]

On the title:

Mr. MacNUTT: Before this bill passes I would like to inform the minister that any criticism from this side of the House is constructive rather than destructive. I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) advanced a very strong argument regarding the existing plants throughout Canada, and I did not hear the minister make any reply. Whether there is one or whether there are a dozen plants at present in Canada surely they should have some consideration under this bill. The position which they will occupy, operating along with plants established under this subsidy, is exactly the position the railways in the maritime provinces were in, and it will be remembered that a clause was added to a previous bill in order to place those railways in the same position as the Canadian National Railways. I suggest to the minister that before the bill advances a clause be inserted to protect the existing coking plants established in this country to-day from what would be a handicap of one dollar a ton compared with those receiving a subsidy under the new bill as brought down.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may say for the information of my hon. friend that we went very thoroughly into that question and spent two weeks making a study of the question of assistance to the plants already in existence. May I say to him that there is just as much difference of opinion as to the product being turned out by the beehives as there is about the quality of the product of the Sydney coking plant, and I found it almost impossible to provide assistance of that character without running into unending difficulty as to whom we would assist and whom we should not assist. We intend to set a standard for the fuel; the Fuel board will be the judge, and this bill is designed for the assistance of new plants. Give us an opportunity to try this out; give us an opportunity to see what can be done in Montreal in the way of substituting Canadian coal for American coal, which is the intention of the parties who are constructing that plant, and in that way you will sell 300,000 tons more of bituminous coal from Nova Scotia than is being sold at present. Let us try this bill before we venture into the other field which presents so many difficulties. I would ask my hon. friend to give us a year in which to try out this measure and see if we cannot make some progress along this line. I am perfectly willing to go into the consideration of other plants manufacturing fuel which may be equal in quality, but the difficulty arises as to saying where such assistance shall stop.

Mr. CANTLEY: I should like to ask the minister one other question. Suppose a concern in Canada has a coking oven plant that is ten or fifteen years old, and in view of this legislation they conceive it would be desirable to scrap that plant and build a new one. Would the new oven plant get a bonus of four per cent on its cost?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No such case is likely.

Mr. CANTLEY: Then what is the advantage under the minister's scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The advantage is that they will be using Canadian coal in place of American.

Mr. CANTLEY: Suppose, in the case to which I have reference, they were using Canadian coal before.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I doubt whether anyone would scrap a plant simply for the purpose of earning this subsidy.

Mr. CANTLEY: That would depend on the age and condition of the existing plant.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): In view of the provisions in the bill that plants must be built according to certain specifications is it not possible to insert the fair wage clause in the measure?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On construction?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not particularly interested in construction except to keep tab of costs. As my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has pointed out, it is much more important that the employees who will be running the plant for at least twenty or twenty-five years should have protection than those persons who will probably be employed only for a short time. I do not know what excuse we should have for interfering in such a matter. We are not in any way taking part in the construction of plants.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): But the government still intend to keep control of the situation. A person coming to the government and asking for a subsidy would not necessarily receive it. The government will decide in its own wisdom whether such a coking plant is necessary; in the event of one being already in existence it is not likely that another plant would be built to put the other plant out of business.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should say not.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): With the consent of the House I should like to present the tenth report of the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can do that a little later.

Mr. SPEAKER: This can be done only by unanimous consent.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 226, relating to the harbour of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick.

He said: When this bill was being considered in committee of the whole it was understood that on the third reading I would answer one or two questions put to me by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), referring particularly to the audit of the affairs of the commission. My hon. friend asked me if I would ascertain if these harbour commissions come under the Audit Act. I have ascertained that they come directly under the Audit Act passed in 1925.

Mr. GARDINER: There is just one other point that the minister was going to enlighten us upon, and that was as to whether the elevators built by these commissions come under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners. I may say that I have looked into the matter and as far as I have found out, after studying the Grain Act very carefully, they will come under the control of that board. That will be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FREIGHT RATES TO BE CHARGED ON EASTERN LINES

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (for the Minister of Railways) moved the third reading of Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian National Railways and the tariffs of tolls to be charged on eastern lines.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 61, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I would ask the minister what the scope of these amendments is.

Mr. FORKE: One of the Senate amendments provides that an appeal shall be had to the Exchequer court from the decision arrived at by the board. I think I explained when I first introduced the bill that the Exchequer court has the power to delegate the appraisement or revaluation of the land to a county court judge or to such an officer as it may see fit. If the Exchequer court appointed a county court judge to make the revaluation, that judge would most probably call in a member of the board and the soldier settler affected. Then you will have exactly the same court as you would have had under this bill as introduced into this House, except that when the county court judge makes his decision, he will report to the Exchequer court instead of making a judgment, the Exchequer court, of course, making the final judgment. I recommend concurrence in the amendments.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume that the Exchequer court will make these appointments; there is no question about that?

Mr. FORKE: There is no question about that.

Mr. GARDINER: Are there any further amendments?

Mr. FORKE: No.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize a loan to the harbour commissioners of Chicoutimi in an amount not exceeding $500,000, to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. CARDIN: This resolution provides for a loan of $500,000 to the Chicoutimi harbour commission, which is being organized under the legislation passed by the last parliament. This amount is required to cover the cost of the extension of the wharves that already exist in the harbour at Chicoutimi. It is expected that an enormous traffic will develop in the very near future in this port, for as hon. members know, it is of growing importance on account of the developments being made by the aluminum company which is established there, as well as several pulp and paper mills which have been constructed in the vicinity. We have calculated that the amount of this loan, together with interest and sinking fund, will be entirely taken care of by the revenue we expect to derive from this port during the course of the next year. This proposal is along the same lines as the legislation relating to the harbour commissions of Vancouver and Montreal. If we had not followed that line, we would have been compelled to come to parliament for a vote under the Public Works department.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the first vote of money for this harbour?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: What is it proposed to spend this money on?

Mr. CARDIN: On the extension of wharves.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 272, to provide for a loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, and reported.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 225, respecting the Halifax harbour commissioners.

Hon. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): In connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the situation in connection with Halifax harbour is somewhat different from that of any other port perhaps in the Dominion, inasmuch as the property there, outside of that owned by the railways and other departments of the government, is all private property. The government and railway property, that is, the elevator coming under Trade and Commerce, and the wharves coming under the Department of Railways, are at the present time very well managed, economically managed, I think I can say. It is these properties, as I understand this bill, that will be taken over by the commission. Different departments of the government will be paid for these properties by money raised, I suppose, on debentures guaranteed by the government, and the private property will remain as it is. In Montreal I think all the harbour is under the control of the board, and that all the property is owned by the board. Comparing these two bills, the city of St. John is interested to an amount beyond $2,000,000 which will be returned to them by the commission there, and practically the whole of the harbour in St. John will be under the harbour commission. Such is not the case in Halifax. As I understand the proposal, the only transfer of property will be that now owned by the government and managed by the government. The transfer to the harbour commission in Halifax means, that in order to pay the interest on the moneys paid for these properties, to pay the commissioners and to pay the management of the whole organization, goods will be taxed an amount per ton. I do not know how much—which somebody has to pay, whether it is the ships carrying those goods or whether it is the goods themselves—and that tax will have to be paid in order to keep up the harbour commission. At the present time charges such as will be introduced by the harbour commissioners are borne, rightly I think, by the railways. They are included in the through freight rate, and there is no further tax on those goods. That tax on these goods for the upkeep of the harbour and of the commission will be a tax placed upon the traffic of the port to which the port is not now subject, and to that extent it will be a disadvantage to the port as an outlet and an inlet for Canadian trade. I may say that in that connection I received a telegram from Halifax as follows:

> Joint committee of city council and board of trade have wired Colonel Ralston approving of the harbour commission bill but wish to only have it put in force by order in council, giving time for a conference with the government to work out details before any appointment commissioners. Also adding a clause giving commission power to use funds to canvass trade for the port.

The latter suggestion with regard to funds to canvass for trade would be in line I think with the Duncan report, because it suggested that a commission would be able to advertise the port, and possibly through that advertising bring trade there. The request seems to be a fairly reasonable one, and perhaps the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) may see his way clear to meet the wishes of our Halifax friends, the board of trade and city council, by adding a clause such as they suggest, and also giving permission, if such is necessary, that the expense in connection with the advertising of the port be borne by the commissioners. Apparently, if the details can be worked out satisfactorily in connection with the change of management down there, there will be no difficulty at all with regard to putting the bill in force. But the request on the part of Halifax seems reasonable, and I hope that the minister may see his way clear to deal with the bill in such a way that the wishes of our Halifax friends can be fully considered. I can assure hon. members that it is a very important matter. In looking over the bill I find that it requires a good deal of study. There is a good deal of detail that should be worked out in connection with the city of Halifax, which is an exceptional port in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot see any difference between the situation in Halifax and the situation in St. John. I think the argument of my hon. friend is rather an argument against one of the recommendations of the Duncan report, because there is no alternative and there is nothing indefinite in the recommendation of the Duncan report. What they want is the organization of a harbour commission. We are complying exactly with the recommendation of the Duncan report with regard to the incorporation of a harbour commission, and I feel that I cannot accept the suggestion of my hon. friend to add a clause that the bill become law only by proclamation.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister permit me to make a suggestion which I think will meet the idea of my hon. friend, which he may not have thought of? Section 5 states that the board shall consist of three commissioners to be appointed by the governor in council. The commission does not come into existence until the governor in council appoints it. If the minister would give to my hon. friend, and through him to the board of trade of Halifax, the assurance that the commissioners would not be appointed until there was an opportunity of hearing the board of trade, it would accomplish exactly what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): That would be satisfactory.

Mr. CARDIN: I think I can accept the suggestion, and if in the meantime it is desired to drop the recommendation of the Duncan report, if we are requested to do so by the people interested, I have no objection. As far as the matter of advertising is concerned, I think we need have no fear in that regard. The commission will be quite capable of making all the advertisement necessary in connection with the revenues of the port. They are authorized to do that and are able to do it.

Mr. STEVENS: Just as they do in Vancouver.

Mr. RALSTON: I have before me the telegram which the hon. member for Halifax referred to, and I took it upon myself to confer with him and to let him know the matter was coming up. I feel under the circumstances it would not be likely that the government could concur in the suggestion which was made, namely, to make an amendment to the bill providing that it should not come into force except by proclamation. I suggested to him, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), that before the appointment of the commission, as far as I was concerned as minister from Nova Scotia—and I am sure my colleagues would join with me in that regard—I would be glad to give the board of trade and city council an opportunity to make any recommendations in connection with details such as are suggested in the telegram. I may say that I felt that I would be taking on myself a responsiblty which I did not think I should assume if power were retained on the part of the government to make this legislation entirely ineffective by the addition of such a clause as is suggested, and I assume the senior member for Halifax will accept the assurance of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in connection with the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries seems to have misapprehended the attitude of the senior member for Halifax. He does not desire in any way to interfere with the bill which is brought before this House pursuant to the Duncan report, but merely suggests a conference between the officials at Halifax, the board of trade and the city council, before the act is put into operation. I think he stated his case quite clearly, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries seemed to think in some way that the hon. senior member for Halifax desired to abandon this part of the report. I am sure my hon. friend had no such desire or intention.

[Mr. W. A. Black.]

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): That was not my intention at all.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

MARINE AND FISHERIES DEPARTMENT

DIVISION INTO TWO BRANCHES WITH SEPARATE DEPUTY MINISTERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 258, to amend the act respecting the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On clause 1—Constitution of department with two branches.

Mr. SPENCER: Can we have a short explanation of this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is simply to provide a Deputy Minister of Fisheries as distinct from a Deputy Minister of Marine, so that there will be two deputy heads in that department.

Mr. JELLIFF: What are the salaries of the two deputies?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know offhand what salary the present deputy minister is getting, but I think it is $6,000 a year. Whoever is appointed to this position will receive the salary which the present deputy is gettting.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the purpose of the bill to give assistance to the present deputy minister? Is the present deputy overloaded with work?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is in order to carry out the recommendation in the Duncan report that there should be a separate deputy for the Department of Fisheries as distinct from the Department of Marine.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. GARDINER: How many deputy ministers have we at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry, speaking offhand, I cannot tell my hon. friend, but I shall be glad to give him that information when we get into supply on some department.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason why I ask the question is this. It seems to me we are getting top heavy in our civil government in this country. The time has come when some rearrangement should be made whereby we can cut down many of the deputy heads that, in my judgment, are not necessary. Let us have a little more business injected into the carrying on of the public service in order to save money and get better results. This proposition of creating new deputy ministers is getting far beyond the needs of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is an exceptional case. It is carrying out the recommendation of the Duncan report.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): If I can get the unanimous consent of the House I beg to move that the House revert to motions.

I am presenting this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), chairman of the private bills committee.

Motion agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. JACOBS: I beg to move that Senate Bills Nos. 261 to 268, both inclusive, be now read a second time.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Fourth and fifth reports of the select standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr Hay.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

* INTERPROVINCIAL CONFERENCE, 1926

Mr. LOVIE:

1. Were any requests or representations by correspondence or otherwise made to the government of Canada by any of the provincial premiers, previous to the Interprovincial conference of 1926, asking to have the said conference called?

2. If so, what are the names of the premiers who made such request?

3. What reasons were given by each for having such conference called?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer this question verbally. As far as I have been able to discover, there is nothing on the files of any of the departments of the government in the nature of correspondence requesting such a conference. There were verbal conversations passed between some of the provincial premiers and myself regarding the possibility of the provinces holding an interprovincial conference. I cannot at this time recall what the representations or the replies were, beyond saying that I am sure that the position I took was that an interprovincial conference was a matter for the provinces themselves to arrange, and not a matter in which the Dominion was primarily concerned.

INCOME TAX DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. SPENCER:

When the Income Tax department is incorporated into that of National Revenue will the employees come under Civil Service Commission?

Hon. Mr. EULER: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Under the Calder Act were the "prevailing rate" men, permanently employed by the Public Works department or other departments, eligible for retirement with pension?

2. Are these men eligible for retirement with pensions under the Superannuation Act?

3. If not, what provision does the government plan to make to provide for this class of employees?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Under the Public Service Retirement Act (Calder Act) hourly rate employees of the Department of Public Works and other departments, were made eligible for retirement with retiring allowance provided by an act from June 1922 when the amendment (chapter 12-13 Geo. V) was passed to chapter 67, 10-11 Geo. V.

2. No.

3. The employees referred to will be eligible for benefits under the Superannuation Act when they comply with the provisions of section 2 of the act.

*VALIDITY OF INSURANCE ACT, 1917

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast):

1. Has the minister given instructions to appeal the decision of the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, delivered the 19th February, 1926 (re Insurance Contracts, 58, O.L.R. 404) which held the licensing and other sections (11, 12 (1), 71, 71 (a), 134 and 134 (a)) of the Insurance Act, 1917, ultra vires the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada?

2. If not, why?

3. What effect, if any, does the government propose to give to the following resolution unanimously adopted at the interprovincial conference in Ottawa in June, 1926, when six provincial premiers and ministers of the crown from every province except Alberta, convened to discuss matters of mutual concern:

"This conference is of opinion that the Dominion should repeal its legislation regulating contracts of insurance and the business of insurance as ultra vires the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada, or, in the alternative, take immediate steps to appeal the decision of the Ontario courts to the judicial committee of the Privy Council."

Hon. Mr. ROBB: This question is to be answered orally. The answer to No. 1 is: No. The answer to Nos. 2 and 3, is: So far as the minister is aware none of the resolutions of the interprovincial conference said to be held in June last has ever been submitted by the conference to the government.

4. Has any contract for the conveyance of mails between St. Peters and Lower L'Ardoise been made, if so, what is amount of such contract, and if not, what arrangement now exists for such work?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Alex Cameron of Grand River.

2. 15 December, 1926—$500 per annum.

3. 3—$500, $500 and $633 per annum.

4. Yes:—$950 per annum.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTIONS TO EXPEDITE PRIVATE BILLS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Might I ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to return to motions with respect to certain private bills in order to help expedite their passage, if thought desirable. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Robb:

That private bills, Nos. 118, 148 and 179 to 213, both inclusive, and 216 to 223, both inclusive, and No. 165, being unopposed divorce bills which have been reported from the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, be now read a third time; and that rule 28 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: On division, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That said bills do now pass and that their titles be as on the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in order to facilitate the passing of similar measures for the balance of the session, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Robb:

That for the remainder of the session all private bills from the Senate when received from that House be read a first and second time and referred forthwith; and that rule 103 respecting the posting of bills be suspended in reference thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the House.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the motion passes I should like to make a few remarks in reference to it. Again and again private members have protested against this way of passing divorce bills. As a member of the private bills committee I know the practice there is simply to receive the bills as they come from the Senate. The evidence is submitted to us in pamphlet form, but it is rarely read, and the bills go through the committee and the House without any consideration whatever. Occasionally bills that are controversial in character are held up, but that is very seldom. This session we have between 100 and 150 divorce bills going through all the stages of parliamentary procedure without any real consideration from this House. I understand that a bill has come to us from the Senate and has passed first reading in this House that would go a long way towards obviating the present method of conducting business—which is little less than a public scandal. The purpose of the Senate bill is to take away very largely from parliament the granting of divorces and transfer this to the courts, where it belongs. I would urgently press upon the government that, instead of setting aside the rules of this House, in order to get over this difficulty they should afford facilities for passing this measure, and thus put an end to this scandalous condition that for many years has prevailed.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister that there are some other private bills in which some of us are interested and would like to see expedited. I have particular reference to Bill No. 177 to incorporate the Free Methodist Church in Canada. This bill has been reported from the private bills committee, but under the ordinary procedure it will not come before the House until Friday between eight and nine o'clock, and if then we should have a recurrence of what happened last night there is little hope of the bill being considered. Is there any possibility of having this bill placed in such a position that it may be disposed of by this House in the very near future, so that the Senate may have time to consider it before prorogation?

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. gentleman is aware that the bill to which he has reference was reported last night, and following the ordinary course of business it should become law before the end of the session. Everything is being done to expedite the passage of this and other bills.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I understand that quite well. But the point I make is this: Can any special consideration be given to this bill as well as to a number of divorce bills, so that instead of having it blocked again on Friday night, thus having it held over until next week and failing to be enacted, something can be done to take care of it.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, last night a report was brought in by general consent of the House, and there is no doubt that arrangements could be made in order to expedite bills which are not considered to be contentious. Last night business was held up, I understand, on a bill which in the opinion of some members is contentious. I have been following the business of the private bills committee carefully, and I can assure my hon. friend that I will do my very best to help along the consideration of his bill.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, will all the bills which have been reported by the committee be passed in this House if they are approved by the Senate and so become law before the session ends, or will divorce bills only get this consideration?

Mr. CANNON: All bills.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I introduced Bill No. 107, which came before the committee of the whole House last evening, and was talked out. If that bill comes to a vote I have no doubt that it will meet with the approval and support of a majority of the members of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, let us vote on it.

Mr. CAHAN: I think there is no doubt about that. Now, when a private bill is obstructed the only safeguard which a private member has with respect to his bill is to insist that all private bills must be held up in like manner. I have no objection at all to Bill No. 107 going to a vote, but I do not think it fair and equitable that other private bills should be given precedence. As a matter of fact, I at once withdraw all objections to giving precedence to Senate bills, dealing with divorce, for I think we should help the orderly progress of the work of the House towards the close of the session; but with respect to any other private bills, I think they should keep their place on the order paper so that we may have some opportunity of securing a vote of the House on the private bill in which I am interested.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. COOTE: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on division.

TARIFF ADVISORY BOARD

QUESTION OF A PRINTED OFFICIAL REPORT OF EVIDENCE AND PROCEEDINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Is it the intention of the government to prepare a "Hansard" of the evidence taken before the Tariff Advisory Board and to supply every member of the House with a copy thereof?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): That question has been discussed by various people, and we have been urged to have a "Hansard" prepared. As my hon. friend knows, however, there has been given in the press fairly complete publicity to the inquiry—

Mr. COOTE: No.

Mr. ROBB: —and at the moment we are not convinced that any good purpose could be served by printing the evidence which is taken from time to time. That is one reason why the evidence has not been printed. Another reason is the considerable expense it would mean to the country. I trust my hon. friend will not urge his request this year. Let us try the present method for another year so that we may ascertain in the meantime whether it is really necessary to have the evidence printed. If there are any cases in which hon. gentlemen are particularly interested we shall be glad to supply them with typewritten copies of the evidence, but I know that lobbying is going on to have this printing done for the benefit of persons who are interested in translating and in the obtaining of printing contracts.

NATURAL RESOURCES—WESTERN PROVINCES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): The question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) whether judgment had been rendered by the Supreme Court in the Alberta school reference. I may inform my hon. friend that judgment has not yet been given.

CONFEDERATION BILINGUAL STAMPS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I would direct the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to a statement in an article in the Montreal Gazette of the second instant, copied from the French press; to the effect that it had been decided to issue bilingual postage stamps in connection with the sixtieth anniversary of confederation. Has the government decided to issue bilingual postage stamps and if so, is such an issue to be confined to the year 1927 in commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation, or is to be permanent?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): In consequence of representations made to the committee in charge of arrangements in connection with the forthcoming celebration, a resolution was unanimously adopted by that committee in favour of the issuing of bilingual stamps for the occasion. The Postmaster General has decided to meet the wishes expressed in the resolution and to authorize the issue. So far as the future is concerned that must remain a matter for consideration.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether the government has any intention in further commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation of appointing a special committee to design a bilingual flag for the country?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I may say to the Postmaster General—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I want an answer to my question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): "Bilingual flag" is a contradiction in terms.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I knew that my right hon. friend would appreciate that point.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I understood the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to say that the resolution to which he has referred was unanimously adopted by the Jubilee committee. As I remember the discussion we had on the subject, the general opinion was that the stamps to be issued might take some special form for this year, the words to be used being such as were common to both French and English—"Confederation—Canada", for example. That is the way I understood the resolution.

Mr. VENIOT: Had I known that this question would come up to-day I would have had the resolution with me. As I recollect it, the resolution does suggest, as my hon. friend says, that these words should, as far as possible, be common to both languages.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Not "as far as possible" but actually.

Mr. VENIOT: No, the resolution does not say that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the Postmaster General get the resolution?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to see it.

EMPLOYMENT OF DISABLED VETERANS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): On Monday last the Postmaster General informed the House that he was preparing a statement in answer to the accusation that amputation cases had not been justly dealt with. In this regard I have on the order paper some questions which have not yet been answered and I should like to know when the information will be given to the House.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): The statement may possibly be ready to-day. I may inform the House, pending the return of the answer, that the situation has been wrongly stated in the press. I will give the complete details later, but at the moment I may observe that the question arose out of the fact that certain vacant positions in the postal service were advertised for which it would be impossible to engage returned men, who were amputation cases, to fill. The statement was made by the Civil Service Commission to that effect respecting this particular class of employment, and in that way the rumour got out that the postal service had decided that in the future it would not take on amputation cases. That is not so; it is not the policy of the department. The policy is, so far as possible, to meet the wishes of the Canadian Legion who I understand represent the returned men, and wherever it can be done to accommodate amputation cases. There are instances in which this is impossible, but that is the general policy of the department, and we are not departing from it. In the case of vacancies occurring in positions held by amputated men the appointment will certainly be given to soldiers who have undergone amputation.

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Is this the statement which the Postmaster General intended giving the House, or may we expect a further statement in regard to amputation cases?

Mr. VENIOT: It will be supplemented.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston City): It is hardly fair to treat all amputation cases alike.

Mr. VENIOT: That is right.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): There has arisen a serious situation which it is my duty to call to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) in the hope that he will give an answer. I am informed that when the amended grain bill, which passed through this House recently, came before the Senate, that honourable body or some members of it took it upon themselves to suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not in favour of the amendment and in support of that assertion stated that a letter had been written by him to the Board of Grain Commissioners for a suggestion as to a modified amendment. I understand that such an amendment was submitted to the minister, and I now desire to give him an opportunity of putting himself, as I suggest it is his duty to do, in keeping with the policy of the government in this matter. I would ask him whether he was opposed to the amendment which was introduced and passed in this House. He should dissipate these rumours.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member is correct in saying that I wrote to the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners asking him for suggestions as to the proposed amendments to the Grain Act. It is true he submitted certain amendments to the act and it is also true that representations were made to me by the producers. The Grain Act is a producers measure, and after hearing the representation of the producers, of the board and of the trade, I considered, and this was the opinion of the government, that it was wiser to introduce such amendments to the act as we submitted. No one has any right to offer any further comments.

TYPHOID EPIDEMIC IN MONTREAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I would like to ask the Minister of Health (Mr. King) whether the Dominion Medical Health Council has been called together to consider the epidemic in Montreal and the conditions which made that epidemic possible. If that has not been done, why not?

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): The Dominion Medical Health Council has not been called together. The epidemic in Montreal is being dealt with by the local board of health in coöperation with the provincial board of health. The Department of Health at Ottawa have been in touch with the local organization and with the provincial board, but outside of that we have not taken any action, as it is not within our province so to do.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $500,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 272, to provide for a loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to ask the minister if this bill has been printed; it does not appear to be on file.

Mr. CARDIN: It is true that the bill is not on file, but it was put through last night. This bill is in absolutely the same form as those bills which provide for advances to the harbour commissioners of Montreal and Vancouver; it provides for an advance of $500,000 to the new harbour commissioners of Chicoutimi, and the terms of the advance are the same as those which apply to the advances made to the harbour commissioners of Vancouver and Montreal.

Mr. COOTE: Is it not printed yet?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that it is printed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DEBTS DUE THE CROWN

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 122, respecting certain debts due the crown.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister please explain?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The amendment simply provides that the records of these transactions shall be brought down in a report to this parliament annually, as other reports are brought down.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, AMENDMENT

The House resumed from Friday, April 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 230, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915—Hon. Mr. Robb—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: All the sections of this bill have been adopted in committee with the exception of section 8.

Section 8 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $4,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 215, to provide for a loan to the Vancouver harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Loan of $4,000,000 to harbour commissioners for terminal facilities.

Mr. COOTE: I do not want to express any opposition to this bill, but at this time I would like to draw the attention of the minister to certain operations of the Vancouver harbour commissioners and to suggest that the result of those operations would lead the House to believe that we should have some different system of auditing the accounts of our harbour commissioners. Of course I will have to confine myself to those matters relating to the Vancouver harbour commission. I think that a year ago the minister advised the committee of this House that there was no item in the estimates under which the operations of the Vancouver harbour board, or in fact any harbour board, could be discussed here, and that as a matter of fact the only time when we could review the expenditures of harbour commissions was when these bodies came before parliament asking for a grant of money to carry on or to extend their operations. I have here a report brought down a couple of years ago showing the earnings and expenditures of elevator No. 1, operated by the Vancouver harbour commission, for the crop year ending July 31, 1923. This return shows that the harbour commissioners received a revenue from the operations of the elevator of $203,477.96, whilst the expenditure was $106,329.10, disclosing a net operating revenue in that year of $97,148.86. Notwithstanding their large net revenue that year, the commissioners advanced the handling charge from one-half cent a bushel to one cent a bushel for the following year. I have here the auditor's report of the operations of the elevator for the crop year ending July 31, 1924, which shows an operating revenue of $791,186.65, and overages for the year valued at $191,006.31. I may remark here that these overages are not shown in the balance sheet made up by the auditor but they appear under separate items. That makes total receipts of $981,-192.96 for this elevator in that year, or almost a million dollars. The operating expenditure is given as $481,295.51. The total investment made by the commission in this elevator is given as $1,327,787.22, showing the operating surplus to be 36 per cent on the investment. The handling charge this year, as I said before, was one cent per bushel. There was an amount set aside for sinking fund of $71,985, leaving a net surplus of $409,310.51. Notwithstanding this very large surplus the board, in the fall of 1924, increased the harbour dues on grain from one cent to ten cents per ton. The only inference I think which can be drawn from this is that the Vancouver harbour commissioners have been using the elevator to collect from the shippers of grain a toll which is not justified by the necessities of the elevator, and, as will be shown probably later on, the harbour commissioners have used a large percentage of the revenue for capital expenditures in the harbour, amounting, I believe, to $1,800,000.

Now, I want to refer again to the auditor's statement which I have here and which I may say was procured from the department last year. On the expenditure side there is an amount of $71,284.11 for water front charge on grain handling. I hope the minister will give us an explanation of what this charge is for. There are no details given for the amount of $55,544, except to say that it is for miscellaneous expenses including administration. This seems to be rather a large amount. Then we have miscellaneous expenses, including administration and office salaries, totalling $37,674. It seems as though "administration" is included in both these items. The operating expenses are shown as $213,064, but there are no details given for this amount in the auditor's report. It appears to me, therefore, that the auditor's report cannot be considered to be complete if such a large amount is given without any details. I have been told that there were no les than three audits made of the operation of this elevator during that year, that is the crop year ending July 31, 1924, in an endeavour to show the revenue from the elevator as small as possible. Then I should like to remind the minister that in the financial statement for that year the overages, estimated at $191,006.31, were not included. The total is simply shown on the statement as "placed in reserve." Then from the operating surplus, exclusive of overages amounting to $290,000, $120,000 is shown as "transferred to reserve fund." I should also like to know now what this reserve fund amounts to. I may say that this is the only auditor's report which I have ever seen concerning the operations of the board of commissioners of the Vancouver harbour, and I should like to emphasize again the necessity of having the operations of the board audited each year, and have the auditor's report available to members of parliament. This matter has been urged upon the minister upon previous occasions, but he has always refused to comply with our request that the operations of harbour commissions should be audited. But if parliament is going to make money grants to any of these boards we surely must have the privilege each year of scrutinizing their expenditures. Certainly as far as the Vancouver harbour board is concerned we are quite justified in requesting that their operations be considered by our public accounts committee.

Another item I would draw to the attention of the minister in connection with this audit is the $20,000 set aside out of the revenue for the crop year ending July 31, 1924, to provide for overhauling and repairing the elevator for the next season's operations, although the amount of $50,000 was included in the expenditure for preparing the elevator for the season's operations in the year ending July 31, 1924. It would appear as though the commissioners were including this charge for two years instead of one. Then no explanation is given as to the waterfront charge, amounting to $71,284, except to say that it was authorized by the board at the rate of one-quarter of a cent per bushel.

The auditors also state that they have examined the various insurance policies as to amounts only and not as to wordings. Surely the auditors should have carefully examined the wording of these policies. If not, I do not see how the audit can be considered to be a complete one. The auditors also state that in the grain shipped out there were included screenings to the extent of 25,762,990 pounds, and they estimate this at 268,255 bushels. This would show the weight per bushel of screenings to be about 90 pounds. As a matter of fact screenings weigh more nearly 30 pounds than 90 pounds to the bushel; but even if we take the weight at 60 pounds to the bushel, this would show a difference of 143,000 bushels.

The auditors' report shows that the grain handled represented an operating revenue per bushel of 1.488 cents; the operating cost per bushel was .941 cents, showing an operating surplus per bushel of .547 cents. In the face of these figures it is not difficult to see that a handsome surplus would be earned for the commission by the operation of this elevator.

I am dealing with the report to this extent in an endeavour to persuade the minister that he should include in this bill some provision for an audit by the Auditor General, or if he prefers, even by the audit board, but that the result of that audit should be included in the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries or in some parliamentary report, so that we would have a right to examine and discuss the report on the estimates of the department.

I feel that the people of Alberta have almost as great an interest in this harbour as have the people of Vancouver. We are furnishing all the grain traffic for the port of Vancouver, and I notice that in one year, I think 1923, the quantity of grain shipped through that port was about 40 per cent of the total tonnage which was exported through it. If we had all the auditors' reports, I think we could show that more than 50 per cent of the net earnings of the port have been made from grain shipped from Alberta. I am only guessing at these figures, but at any rate a large amount of the earnings of the Vancouver harbour board have been made through the handling of Alberta grain. There has been considerable dissatisfaction in Alberta for several years over the operations of the board. More than a year ago an agitation was commenced in Alberta to have an Alberta man appointed on the Vancouver harbour board and we asked that a representative of the grain producers should be appointed to that position. There was a vacancy on the board at the time and so there was a splendid opportunity to give Alberta a representative on it. However, we were unable to persuade the government that that should be done. I do not want to blame the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for that; I do not believe he had much to say about the matter. I presume the Liberal association in Vancouver was really the body that stood in the way of such an appointment being made.

I think it was in the year 1923 that I was invited to go to Vancouver to be present at the opening of the Ballantyne pier. At that time we could not ship any grain to Vancouver from any point on the prairies because the elevators at Vancouver were choked and the Canadian Pacific could not furnish us with cars. I went there with the intention of urging upon the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), that he should recommend to the government the granting of, say, $10,000,000 to the Vancouver harbour commission in order that more storage elevators might be erected at that point. After spending two or three days in Vancouver and looking over the operations of the then harbour board, I did not feel like taking that responsibility upon myself. I did not feel that the men who were handling that board should be entrusted with the spending of $10,000,000 in order to provide that accommodation.

I do not think we have had a satisfactory harbour commission in Vancouver since that time, and I regret that when the present board was appointed a few months ago, the government in the light of past experience did not see fit to recognize the claims of the grain producers in Alberta and to allow them to have a representative on the board. It would have been a good thing for the port of Vancouver if the Alberta grain producers had been allowed a representative on that board; it would have given the producers confidence that their interests in Vancouver were being properly looked after, and they would be much more anxious than they are at present to ship their grain through that port. Seeing that the board has been appointed I do not know that anything can be gained by urging it again upon the government at this stage; but before this bill goes through, I hope the minister will agree with us that some yearly audit should be made of the operations of this board and that these reports should be made available to parliament each year. I shall be pleased if the minister in his remarks will indicate his willingness to have this done, and as a matter of fact I would rather see him include in this bill some provision under which such an audit would be furnished to parliament each year.

Mr. CARDIN: Dealing first with the revenues coming out of the grain which is shipped through the harbour of Vancouver, I may say that for 1926 those revenues amounted to $769,815.99. The total revenue of the harbour was $2,193,670, so that the revenue from handling grain through Vancouver formed about one-third of the total revenues of that harbour. I mention this, not with any intention of minimizing the importance of the grain shipped through Vancouver, but only to illustrate that the other receipts are also somewhat important.

I have no objection to agreeing to a very large extent with the request of the hon. member for Macleod in regard to an audit of the operations of the Vancouver harbour commission. I may remind him that at present the business of the harbour commission is looked into in three ways. First of all the harbour commission have their own firm of auditors looking into their business every month during the year.

Mr. COOTE: Is that Wilson and Wilson?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. This audit is of course for the information of the harbour commissioners themselves so that they may know exactly in what position they are, but the report of those auditors may be made available to all parties interested. Second, there is an audit made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries itself. The officers of the department have been getting information throughout the year in regard to the operations of the harbour commission. Third, we have the authority of the audit board which can be directed to make an extensive audit of all the business of the harbour commission and the report of the audit board must be tabled as soon as the session opens. Over and above that, under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act we have the authority of the Auditor General to go into the affairs of the harbour commission and to make all investigations which he thinks fit to make. So that practically we have at our disposal all facilities for an audit of the affairs of all the harbour commissions. It is true there is nothing in the law to make it compulsory to have an audit every year, but it is within the power of the government to have a special audit of the affairs of the board whenever it thinks it proper to have it, and I can assure my hon. friend that if a request were made to the government by any member of the House interested that the audit board be directed to make an audit of any of our harbour commissions the government would be pleased to grant it.

The suggestion that the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries should contain information relative to these harbour commissions which could be made the basis of discussion by a member of the House who desired to discuss the affairs of a particular harbour is worth considering. The harbours that we have all over the country are developing and the government is making large loans to harbour commissioners. I can see that there is a great deal in the request of my hon. friend and I am quite ready to consider it and to try to convince my colleagues—I do not think I will have very much trouble in that respect—that we ought to make a reference in the report of the department to the affairs of the harbour commissioners. I believe this request can be acceded to.

As far as the charges are concerned, certain criticisms have been made in regard to the increase in the rates last year. I may say that the harbour commission of Vancouver is not entirely responsible for the increase in the rates. The increase from one cent to one cent and a quarter was made by those operating private elevators. The request for an increase was made to the grain commission which agreed to it, the rate was increased in the private elevators, and this having been done, the harbour commissioners thought it only proper to have their rate placed at the same figure as that which had been agreed to by the grain commission.

With reference to supplying information to members of the House, I think the harbour commissions are issuing every year a very complete report covering all their operations during the previous year, and this report is available to all the members of the House. It is a public document issued by the harbour commission with a view to giving information and a certain amount of advertisement in regard to the harbour. I can assure my hon. friend that the department, and the government are absolutely serious in the effort to check as much as possible the expenditures of these harbour commissions. We shall do everything possible to protect the interests of the public in relation to the operation of these harbours.

Mr. COOTE: It was just a little difficult for me to follow the minister when he was speaking on the audit. I was not sure whether he said there was now a yearly auditors' report made to the government.

Mr. CARDIN: No, there is no yearly audit made by the audit board, but it is within the power of the government to have that audit made by the audit board. What I said was that there is an audit made by the auditors of the commission, and secondly, there is the departmental audit which is made by the officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. All the information we have is available to every member of the House, and there is the power which is given to the audit board by the legislation of 1925. This audit board can be directed by the treasury board to make a yearly audit, or to make one whenever they think proper to do it. We have that power at present, if we think it good policy on the part of the government to ask the audit board to make an investigation or an audit every year. I said that if any request for an audit were made by any member interested in the affairs of these harbours, the government would be disposed to ask the audit board to make it. But my hon. friend will realize that to have an audit every year of all the harbour commissions in Canada would mean the establishment of a very costly staff, and probably with no practical result or advantage. It would mean large expense on the part of the government to keep the audit board working during the year, and it would take practically all the year to cover all the harbour commissioners we have at present, only to show what has been shown in most cases by the audit made by the auditors of the harbour, or to supplement the information that is already in the hands of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I think it is better to continue as at present; leave the power in the hands of the government to have a special audit whenever they think proper to have it; because otherwise I am afraid the Minister of Finance, who is always very strong on economy, will be opposed to the appointment of a permanent audit board working all year and practically covering the audit which would have been made by the officers of the board and the officers of the department. I think we have all the safeguards required in the power now given to the government. If a request for an audit is made and not granted the government will be open to criticism especially if there is ground for believing there is something wrong with the administration of any of the harbours. I think the public is absolutely protected. Suppose we ask the audit board to make an audit every year, it will be an audit made after the expense has been incurred and it will be only in the form of a criticism passed upon the operations of the commission, although no doubt it would serve as a deterrent to prevent a recurrence of anything that might be called in question. But this audit will not help the administration in checking up the expenses of the harbour. This is done by the regular audit firm and by the officers of the department.

Mr. COOTE: I am anxious to know if there will be a detailed statement available to members of the House each year. I understood the minister to say there was an audit by the officers of the Marine department. That would be quite sufficient for our purpose, and of course if we were not satisfied we could ask for an audit by the audit board. But if the officers of his own department make any kind of an audit of the operations of these boards I would like the minister to assure us that that would be available to the public each year and to members of parliament. Then we would have the details before us to show how the operations of the commission are being carried on and whether any changes should be recommended. At present we have nothing, unless we ask for some report. We sometimes get the auditor's report. On the only occasion that I ever asked for an auditor's report—well, perhaps I should not say it, but I think the information was given to me with great reluctance by the officers of the department, and I naturally feel that we should place it beyond the power of the department to say that this report shall be furnished to you or it shall not. As parliament is granting the money under which the board is operating, surely we should have a detailed report of their operations. That is what I am asking for.

Mr. CARDIN: I see no objection to my hon. friend's request that the reports in the department should be made available to hon. members.

Mr. COOTE: The minister gave us the revenue from the elevators last year compared with the total receipts of the harbour. Could he give us the amount of grain handled by the government elevators and by the private elevators?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I should also like to have the net revenue from the operations of the elevators.

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid that I am not in a position to give my hon. friend the information separately; I have only the totals. The total receipts from the elevators amounted to $638,705.33. Of course, in the statement given to me there are certain charges incident to the handling of grain. The total revenues, as I said, on the handling of grain amounted to $769,815.99. During 1926 elevator No. 1, with a capacity of 2,050,000 bushels, shipped 9,220,037 bushels; elevator No. 2, with a capacity of 1,625,000 bushels, shipped 6,037,028 bushels; Spillers' elevator with a capacity of 2,000,000 bushels, shipped 20,012,152 bushels; elevator No. 3 with a capacity of 650,000 bushels, shipped 7,936,027 bushels. So for the calendar year 1926 the total shipments amounted to 43,205,244 bushels.

Mr. COOTE: How would that compare with the two previous years' operations?

Mr. CARDIN: I have not the details for last year, but I think there is an increase.

Mr. COOTE: But there would be a decrease in the amount handled by the harbour commissioners' own elevators?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but there is an increase in the shipments from the other elevators. I may repeat that the business of the harbour commissioners for 1926 was rather good.

Mr. COOTE: I take it that only No. 1 and No. 2 elevators were operated by the commission last year?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Have agreements been entered into for the leasing of these two elevators?

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that the parties are practically agreed.

Mr. COOTE: Is either lease completed?

Mr. CARDIN: No, the leases have not been completed yet, but I am informed an understanding has been reached in regard to the terms.

Mr. COOTE: Does the government admit that it would be good policy to lease the elevators? I ask the question because I am advised that one of the privately owned elevators, Spillers handled last year twenty million bushels, while the commission's own elevators handled only about fifteen million bushels. Personally, I think the commission made a great mistake when in the first place they decided to lease what is called the old Woodward elevator. I think they should have pursued the policy laid down at Montreal of having all the elevators owned by the commission. As it is now, with certain elevators privately owned, these get all the grain when it is coming forward slowly, and the commission's elevators are used only when the privately owned elevators cannot take care of the business. The harbour commission made a mistake in leasing the Woodward elevator, and they made a further mistake in granting a lease for the property on which Spillers' elevator was erected at a rental so low that it does not cover the interest on the money invested in the property. I think this shows the necessity of having all matters of expenditure and policy—for instance, in granting leases—subject to the approval of the minister, so that he may justify the expenditure and the policy before parliament. The Vancouver harbour commission I think have been very unwise in their elevator policy. They constructed their elevators at too great a cost. It has been discussed in past years and I do not want to go into it again now, but that cost alone is a handicap. The granting of favourable terms to private companies to come in and operate elevators of their own was another mistake. But now there are two elevators, one privately owned and one under lease to the United Grain Growers, and I think it is a good policy on the part of the department to consider the leasing of one of the other two. I have no hesitation in saying that the government should give every possible consideration to the Alberta Wheat Producers' Association, which is seeking to lease an elevator in that city. Both major political parties have stated through their leaders that they are willing and anxious to grant assistance to the farmers in coöperative marketing. We have in Alberta the first coöperative effort among wheat producers on a large scale to market their own product. I regret that a year ago the government were not able to see their way clear to lease to the coöperative Wheat Prdoucers' Association one of the elevators at Vancouver. I wish to commend them for their action in leasing the elevator at Prince Rupert. I think that has been good business for the government, for Prince Rupert and for the producers' association, and I hope they will give the producers' association just as favourable consideration in connection with the leasing of an elevator at Vancouver, which I know the association are very anxious to secure. Seeing that the Alberta producers are not to get representation on the board, I think it is the next best way of assisting them in the handling of their own product and the marketing of wheat at Vancouver. Will the minister be good enough to give us information with regard to the purchase of the Hastings mill site? Who were the former owners, what amount was paid for the site, and what use has been made of it since it was purchased?

Mr. BENNETT: The problem of marketing the wheat products of Alberta through Vancouver is one which it was endeavoured to solve in the first instance by the creation of the harbour commission and the construction of a large number of elevators. There is nothing that so concerns a great many people as the facilities provided at Vancouver for the shipping of grain from Alberta. While many matters are of importance to a great many people in Canada there is nothing that concerns so many people as the facilities at Vancouver—that is, people in Alberta and part of Saskatchewan. And to the extent to which excessive charges are made at these elevators for the service rendered, to that extent is there a direct injury to the farmers of those provinces. I say direct, because if they pay more than they should they suffer that much. The theory on which these facilities were provided is a simple one; the country guaranteed or practically put up its money to the harbour commission to enable it to provide facilities at cost—not at profit, but at cost. After providing for interest and proper allowance for depreciation and management, these facilities were to be available at cost to the people of the country, and just to the extent to which more than necessary was expended in the construction of facilities, to that extent the service rendered costs more than it should to those who use it. I think the minister is fully aware of the intense interest which the farming population of those provinces take in these facilities. I will not enter into a discussion regarding the cost of the elevators, because that is past. But I will say this with respect to the increase that took place in the rate a year ago, that the government as such should have pressed the grain commission not to make that increase. It is true that there was no increase in the charge by the government's facilities until after the grain commission had granted an increased rate to privately-owned enterprises. Thereafter the rate was increased. That meant an excessive charge on the farmers for the handling of grain. It is said that the charge was not greater than that imposed at Fort William, and that is true. Vancouver, however, is a port open all the year round and the very facilities that are provided there by the harbour commission were provided on the assumption that, the port being available every month of the year, the cost of operation and the incidental cost of rental and interest on investment would be less than at Fort William. That is true. But what happened? We have the government acquiring the Woodward elevator, so called. That was offered to many private interests who declined to accept it, and the Board of Grain Commissioners were induced after much effort to take it over. They leased it. I want to ask the minister now whether or not that $100,000 odd which we discussed the other day is to be paid out of this $4,000,000? The bill says that the money is to be available:

> —as may be required to enable the corporation to complete the construction of terminal facilities in the harbour of Vancouver, for which the plans, specifications and estimates have been approved by the governor in council before the passing of this act; and to construct such additional terminal facilities as may be likewise approved as necessary, further to properly equip the said port.

There is nothing in that language which contemplates the payment of money for any claim that might be made by a private enterprise against the harbour commission. The minister was good enough to say the other day that he would advise me as a result of inquiry just how the matter stood. I protest against the money being used in that way. I protest against any claim being paid until it is made good in a court of law, because the company that put forward the claim never had any legal existence. It had a capital of $1,000,000 and, according to the grain commission, $20,000 of that sum has been paid up, whereas the law requires that before the company may function 10 per cent of its capital shall have been paid up.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: The company was legally incorporated and capitalized at $250,000.

Mr. COOTE: How much was paid up?

Mr. BENNETT: The report says $20,000 was paid up.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I know, my dear sir, but that was before the company thought of operating. The elevator was not running until two years after that.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is one of the directors.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNETT: And therefore can speak with authority. In some tribunals he would not speak at all, but I am content that he should proceed.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: The minister intimated some time ago that it was the policy of the department to do everything possible to develop our harbours, and in my opinion any money invested in this work in Canada is well spent. An enormous amount has been voted for the Vancouver board during the past three or four years. The sum of $10,000,000 has already been voted and this bill provides for another $4,000,000, making $14,000,000 in all. Large sums have also been voted for the port of Montreal and Toronto harbour. There was voted $5,000,000 for the port of Quebec to inaugurate a considerable scheme of development, and I may tell the minister that the Quebec harbour commission will soon come before this House for more money to continue operations. I hope that when our request is made it will be favourably considered.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I want to make a few corrections in view of the fact that I am a member of the company. It seems to me that the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) should retract the statement he made regarding the financial position of the company. The report of the Turgeon grain inquiry commission gives the facts in connection with the incorporation of the company.

Mr. BENNETT: What page is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Page 25. According to the report of the commission, under date February 2, 1924, the company was incorporated under Dominion charter with a capital of $250,000, with myself as president. As to capital stock, $40,000 was issued, $20,000 being actually paid up. I feel somewhat embarrassed addressing the Chair for the first time and, in so doing, defending myself and my associates in this matter. But I am not ashamed to make that defence. It was suggested the other day that these gentlemen were political friends of the party. Let me cite their names and tell the committee who they are so that hon. members may judge for themselves. The first member of the company I may mention is Mr. S. G. Tobin, for twenty-five years a business man and farmer in the district of Edmonton, Alberta. He was a member of the Alberta legislature.

Mr. BENNETT: And a member of this House last session.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: He was a member of the Alberta legislature for twelve years and two years after becoming a director of the corporation he was elected to this House. You cannot blame him for that, can you? Another director of the company is Colonel James K. Cornwall, known as the apostle of the north. He has blazed trails into the north country for thirty years, and has done more to open up northern Alberta than any ten men on the prairies. He was a Conservative member of the legislature ten years ago, and today operates a line of steam boats and trading posts in the far north, the arctic.

Mr. BENNETT: He was never a Conservative.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Another member of the organization is Senator P. E. Lessard, one of the oldest and best known and most respected business men in the west, a member of the Alberta legislature for years; he was made a senator long after this company was incorporated. So far as I am concerned, I was elected to the House of Commons this year, and the company was incorporated three years ago.

Mr. KELLNER: Is Mr. Walker on the directorate?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: He is not, and I would ask the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) to withdraw that statement, because I see by Hansard that there was a mistake made in that connection when the hon. member was discussing the question.

The early history of the Woodward elevator is as follows: A man by the name of Mr. Woodward went to Vancouver and started to build an elevator. He failed financially and the elevator was considered a white elephant on Burrard inlet. The people of Vancouver insisted that the harbour commissioners complete the elevator and put it into operation to handle grain from Alberta, because they had handled 54,000,000 bushels of grain through elevator No. 1 that year and there was a blockade; the permit system was put into effect, embargoes were placed up and down the railway line, and grain could not be moved. We needed more elevators. They made overtures to different grain companies—including the Alberta Pacific, the company of which the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is a director, and here is what the report says:

> Woodward and Company, Limited, were unable to finance to its completion the building of the elevator, and work was stopped with the completion of a working house but without the provision of any storage accommodation. Later the building was looked over by James Richardson and Sons, the United Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited, and the Alberta Pacific Elevator Company, with a view to taking over Woodward's lease.

They turned down the proposition. Then overtures were made to other people on the prairies who might be able to handle this matter. I was asked to form a company and take it over, which I did. The commissioners were to have the plant completed for operation, grain to be handled by a lighter system in sixty days. We then bought a boat from the United States government and equipped it with the most modern machinery for transferring and handling grain, with oil burning engines and all modern equipment, at a cost of over $80,000 capable of handling 20,000 bushels per hour, with a capacity of 100,000 bushels, and that boat is still lying idle on the Pacific coast. Then I was notified two years later—after making thirty trips to Vancouver in attempts to have the plans agreed upon—that the building would be ready on June 29, and that I could take possession on June 30. This I could not agree to; the shipping season was over and the plant was yet unfinished. That agreement originally provided that the plant would cost $660,000 with the storage capacity, the pier, and the belt conveyors to handle grain, and we were to pay a rental of 9 per cent. When the building was completed the cost was just $10,000 less than $1,000,000 which meant that our rent jumped from about $58,000 to about $90,000, and I refused to pay it. I told them I could not function under those conditions, so they gave me forty-eight hours in which to accept the proposition or they would cancel the agreement, which they did. Immediately they closed with the United Grain Growers', for $45,000 per year, the same people who had turned it down in the first place, and who had made overtures to me before the lease was cancelled. We were left with all the cost of incorporating the company, of defending our case before the royal grain commission, of equipping the lighter and many other incidentals, but when we asked for our money back there was strong objection. Not a nickel of the settlement money will be left after the bills are paid. We took the matter to our legal advisers, who advised us to enter suit and accordingly we sued for $250,000. The harbour commissioners consulted their solicitors, who advised them to settle; they went to an independent solicitor, Mr. Davis, who also advised them to settle; they brought the matter before the Minister of Justice, and he advised them to settle also. I want to make it clear that I have never lobbied nor have I ever spoken to a single member of this government or of this House in connection with this bill. I met the Minister of Marine and Fisheries once when I went to see his deputy; I asked him if he intended to pay or if they wanted to fight, and the Minister said he would refer it to the Minister of Justice and let me know, and this is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. CLARK: Will the hon. member say whether he has the opinion of Mr. Davis under his hand?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: No, I have not his opinion. It was asked for by the harbour board.

Mr. CLARK: Can my friend state which Mr. Davis it was, what his initials are?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: E. P. Davis.

Mr. CLARK: And he advised a settlement?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Does the hon. member know whether that settlement will be paid out of the vote now before the House?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I cannot answer that. We have a claim against the harbour board which we intend to take to court unless a settlement is made.

Mr. CLARK: I understand that the hon. member is presenting to the House reasons why the claim of his company should be settled?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: No, I am not. I am stating how the trouble came about, and I am answering the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) who was mistaken in his statements.

Mr. CLARK: I am afraid I misunderstood; I thought the hon. member was giving the facts to this House to justify us in voting for the second reading of this bill and for the payment of that claim.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: No, I am not asking you to vote for it; use your own judgment. I am simply laying the cards on the table.

Mr. CLARK: But the hon. member has stated that he is the president of this company, and that if a settlement is made his company will be reimbursed. Is that correct?

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Naturally we expect to be paid for our trouble and for the money we spent.

Mr. CLARK: And he as a shareholder in this company, will receive a portion of the proceeds.

Mr. VENIOT: Is a cross-examination of this kind quite proper, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CLARK: I think it is very vital, because I think this is violating all the rules of procedure. I think it is quite clear that the hon. member is deeply interested in that settlement and in the receipt of money coming from a vote of parliament.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I am simply explaining the case to the hon. member for West Calgary.

Mr. BENNETT: He knows more about it than you do, apparently.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): He does about everything.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) has mistaken himself for myself. I do not arrogate to myself the knowledge of everything, as he does; I know something about a few things, which is different. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat is quite right in drawing attention to the fact that I spoke of the capital as being $1,000,000. That is wrong; the alleged expenditure was what I meant. The capital was $250,000, of which $20,000 was paid up. Under the Companies Act it is required that 10 per cent, or in this case $25,000, be paid up before the company may exist, so this company had no right to function.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: The company never functioned; we never operated under the lease. The company was incorporated and it is still incorporated and still in good legal standing.

Mr. BENNETT: That is very delightful. The company never functioned; it had no legal existence since $20,000 was paid up while the law requires $25,000. Therefore it cannot maintain an action in a court of law.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: We never handled one dollar's worth of grain, because we never took over the plant.

Mr. BENNETT: Nearly everyone except my hon. friend understands the facts. There never was a legal company.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Certainly there was.

Mr. BENNETT: The royal commission found that only $20,000 of the capital stock had been paid up, while the law requires that $25,000, in this case, be paid. Therefore there was no legal entity entitled to function and to enter into a lease, so any lease thereby secured would be void. The company never was a company; it never existed as such; it had no identity as such and could not maintain an action in a court of law. Therefore this claim against the harbour commissioners is quite in accord with the opinion generally held by the public. That is, a few gentlemen favourable to the administration of the day have been able to make the arrangement in question. The hon. gentleman has made perfectly clear that the company never had a legal existence. It does not exist in law, only $20,000 being paid up whereas the Companies Act says that 10 per cent must be paid up before a company can function as such. Therefore there has never been a company. It can maintain no action, no claim; and any money paid by the harbour commission to a company that has no existence should be recovered by those who paid it. That is the story.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: The hon. gentleman is not correct. There was $40,000 subscribed and the cheque was in the treasury. Only $20,000 was being used for the simple reason that everything was tied up and the company was unable to operate in view of the fact that the elevator was not completed.

Mr. BENNETT: The royal commission reported that $20,000 was paid up.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I have the particulars right here.

Mr. BENNETT: Twenty thousand dollars paid up was what the commission reported. They discovered that a company with a nominal capital of $250,000 was endeavouring, with a paid up capital of $20,000, to lease a property which under the law it could not do as it did not exist. There could be no such company as the Pacific & Oriental Company until such time as at least $25,000 had been paid up. I do not care anything about the $40,000 cheque.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I am basing my statement on the evidence given before the royal grain commission. I probably should have said there was $40,000 paid up.

Mr. BENNETT: The commission said $20,000.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: The money was in the treasury. We only had certain expenditures to meet and we were functioning accordingly.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You said you never functioned a minute ago.

Mr. BENNETT: The commission found that $20,000 was paid up. Does the hon. gentleman from Moose Jaw understand that? Twenty thousand only was paid up according to the finding of the commission.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I did not say anything about it. The hon. gentleman asserted that I knew everything about the matter. I do not. I do not know anything about this, and I am not getting into the argument at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Ah! It is so delightful; the hon. gentleman has a modesty that is really bewildering. The commission found that $20,000 was paid up. The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Blatchford) now declares he should have said that $40,000 was the amount. Which statement are you to take? What he says here, or what the commission found after examining him under oath? He gave evidence, he was examined under oath; and this little coterie that tried to get this lease now say they want $100,000 although the company never functioned. They said they had $20,000 in the bank but they never took a lease, never functioned the hon. gentleman says now, and now they want this government to pay them $100,000. That is the story.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I took my cue to enter the grain handling business from Mr. Bennett's successful operations in the same line—the Alberta Pacific—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Bennett is not the owner of a single share in the Alberta Pacific Grain Company.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: —when that company was formed.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me. Mr. Bennett has not a single dollar of investment in the Alberta Pacific Grain Company. Mr. Bennett sold out.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Quite recently for $15,000,000.

Mr. PERRAS: Which Mr. Bennett?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. R. B. Bennett. Mr. Bennett sold his interest long ago. Mr. Bennett realized that unless the government was going to bonus him he could hardly expect to succeed longer in that industry, in view of the formation of the pool.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: The Alberta Pacific Grain Company was formed through a trust company known as the Alliance Company, and I find according to the record, from the high cost of living investigation of 1919, they had $24,500 in cash.

Mr. BENNETT: That is wrong. They had a million in cash. That is on record. Just read the record.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Later on they started to do business. Mr. Bennett put in $300,000 of English money, and let me show you the profits they made.

The CHAIRMAN: I really cannot allow this discussion to proceed.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: The hon. member for West Calgary has made the charge that the company to which he refers was not functioning, that the capital was not sufficiently paid up.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: In the case of the Alberta Pacific Company the record shows that only $24,500 was paid up, and that they made millions during the war while Canada was fighting for her life.

Mr. BENNETT: But your company never functioned.

The CHAIRMAN: This discussion, which has gone on for some considerable time, is irrelevant to the particular matter before the committee, and I must ask hon. gentlemen to confine themselves more strictly to the question under consideration.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to ask the minister whether or not the claim of the company of which my hon. friend for East Edmonton is president will be paid out of this vote?

Mr. CARDIN: I stated, when we discussed the resolution upon which the bill is based, that this amount was provided for in the $4,000,000. The observation was made that it might have been taken out of the revenue of the harbour commission instead of making it a capital payment. I quite admit that the payment might have been made through the revenue account but, as I said, if this course had been followed parliament would not have been given the opportunity of passing judgment upon it, and we would have been deprived of the views which have been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite. The fact that we come here and mention this very amount shows that we are quite ready to place all the facts before the House. We were not afraid of throwing complete light upon this transaction, and the position in which the harbour commission finds itself. It is all very well for the hon. member for West Calgary to say that there is no company. I would hesitate to pass judgment as to the effect of the federal law in the case of companies, but according to the laws of my own province, the fact that the whole capital amount has not been subscribed, or that the required percentage of capital has not been paid, does not mean that the company is not legally organized; the directors become personally responsible for the indebtedness of the company. I believe the situation is the same under the federal Companies Act. Under that law the company is obliged to have a certain amount of capital paid up before it starts to do business. If that is not done the directors become responsible personally, but the company exists just the same. I submit that this company was capable of entering into a lease with the Vancouver harbour commission. In cases of losses the creditors of the company would have had their recourse against the directors personally because they started to do business before a certain percentage of capital stock had been paid up.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would the minister inform me—I do not know very much about the case—if litigation actually took place? Was an action entered in the court to recover the amount?

Mr. CARDIN: I will be very frank in saying that I have no personal information that an action had been entered in the courts. The hon. member from East Edmonton said that action had been taken for $250,000, and it was following those proceedings that the harbour commissioners consulted their counsel. They received from counsel the opinion that it would be advisable for the commission to try and make a settlement of the claim.

Mr. CLARK: I do not wish to interrupt in any way but I wonder if the minister could read the opinion given by Mr. E. P. Davis.

Mr. CARDIN : It is a very long document, but the substance of it is what I have stated. Counsel advised settlement. The first advice was given by the firm of Farris, Farris, Stultz and Sloan, and after having the advice of these counsel the harbour commissioners went to the office of a private counsel, Mr. E. P. Davis.

Mr. CLARK: That is the one I want. I should like to have the gist of his advice.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. E. P. Davis advised that it would be proper to make a settlement of that case. He did not say that the harbour commission had no case; but he expressed some doubt as to the position of the commission, and in view of that he advised that a settlement should be made.

Mr. CLARK: May I have an opportunity of perusing that opinion?

Mr. CARDIN: I will hand it to my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understood from the discussion that in some way or another the Justice department had been consulted?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have they given an opinion on that matter and, if so, what is it?

Mr. CARDIN: They have given an opinion along the same lines. They advise a settlement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was any amount mentioned?

Mr. CARDIN: The Department of Justice say that they are not in a position to fix an amount. They give advice only on the question of a settlement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would it not clear up the matter if the action were allowed to proceed and we had the judgment of the court before going any further in the matter? There seems to be some serious contention about liability in this case, and it would satisfy the committee if the minister gave some assurance that this amount would not be paid out of this $4,000,000 which it is now proposed to appropriate for the Vancouver harbour commission, but that the action taken at law would be allowed to proceed. Then if the company is entitled to an award by way of damages or otherwise, by all means let the harbour commission pay it, but a provision should be made that no money shall be paid out until judgment has been obtained. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) takes very strong legal grounds. I do not know enough of the facts in regard to the matter to pronounce upon it, but there is evidently a serious contention.

I am not in favour of settlement of actions out of court in cases in which the government is directly or indirectly involved. It is a great safeguard to the government to have a judgment of a court before it pays out the money of the people of Canada or allows a harbour board to do so. We may by a settlement get off a little cheaper; but the propriety of these settlements is always questioned, and it is charged that political influence has brought about such settlements. I could tell a story of some settlements that have been made during the last five years of claims that have been pending for ten or fifteen years in the Justice department. After I think every court had been tried in the matter and no judgment obtained, finally in order that the matter might be got rid of, a very large amount of money was paid. These settlements are always open to a good deal of criticism, and it is far more satisfactory for the government, the harbour commissioners and the members of this House that we have a judgment on which we may rely. If my hon. friend's company has a valid claim in law, by all means let it be paid; but I would suggest to the minister the propriety of inserting in the bill some provision, or giving to this House some assurance, that no settlement will be made until we get a judgment and that this money will not be used for the purpose of settling this claim.

The minister said, in regard to the question of the hon. member for Macleod respecting an audit, that there was a departmental audit which would be available to hon. members. There is also an audit made at the instance of the Board of Harbour Commissioners themselves, and the auditors in that case are the firm of Wilson and Wilson. I think the minister said that their audit would be available to hon. members who desired to examine it. In what way will it be made available? Can any hon. member merely make a request to see the audit of Messrs. Wilson and Wilson, because some are anxious to see it? If the minister will explain how that report may be obtained, the committee will be satisfied.

Mr. CARDIN: It may be obtained upon the request of an hon. member interested in the operations of the board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Shall we make the request through the minister?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And he will see that we get the report?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. As regards the other point, if we can proceed with the bill, I have no objection in saying that, in view of the discussion which has been held here, I will take the necessary steps to see that this amount of $112,000 is not paid out of the $4,000,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Nor out of any other moneys until we receive the judgment of the court.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but I would not like to make an amendment to the bill to that effect. There is much in the argument of the hon. member for West Calgary that under the section the amount cannot be taken out of the $4,000,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As long as we have a clear understanding that the harbour commissioners are not authorized in any way to settle this claim until a judgment of the court be had in regard to it, that will clear the matter up.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no objection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That will be more satisfacory to the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Blatchford) and his company, the department and the Board of Harbour Commissioners themselves. If we have that understanding clearly and distinctly, I do not see that we need take up the time of the House any longer in discussing the matter.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. COOTE: I asked the minister before recess to give the committee some particulars in regard to the purchase of the Hastings mill site. I would be glad if he would give us that information and also terms of the present lease of the property.

Mr. CARDIN: The Hastings mill site was the property of the British Columbia Mills Timber & Trading Company. The harbour commission had bought these properties for the sum of $2,450,000. A cash payment of $500,000 has been made, and the balance is covered by an issue of debentures by the harbour commission, bearing interest at the rate of five per cent per annum for five years. Only a portion of that property was urgently required for developing the trackage facilities in the vicinity of the Ballantyne pier. When the pier was built the erection of an elevator was not contemplated. Owing to the construction of the elevator the trackage facilities of the pier were interfered with. It was considered necessary to extend the trackage facilities and it was proposed to expropriate part of the Hastings mill property for that purpose. But, instead of expropriating a part of that property, it was considered advisable to buy the whole property and the harbour commission have taken for their own use the part of the property that was to be expropriated. The remaining portion has been leased to the British Columbia Mills Timber & Trading Company for a period of five years. The rental paid by this company for the balance of this property is sufficient to take care of the interest on the bonds issued by the harbour commission. Disbursements have been made to the extent of $500,000 and the balance is covered by an issue of debentures which are being taken care of by the rent received from that company. It is well known to everyone familiar with the conditions that this property, by reason of its central location, is one of the most valuable in the harbour. It will be required in the very near future, and the companies which are somewhat interested in the development of the harbour at Vancouver, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railways both suggested to the harbour commission that they should acquire that property. The amount has been fixed by arbitration.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister tell us just what work is proposed to be done on that property?

Mr. CARDIN: The commission has proposed to make developments there in the way of the construction of a coastwise pier and warehouse and quay wall. They propose to spend $385,000 in building the coastwise pier and warehouse there.

Mr. COOTE: Practically $2,000,000 of debentures are outstanding against this property?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: That will be in addition to the bonds which the Dominion government hold for the harbour commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, exactly. With reference to the elevators, it is proposed to lease No. 1 elevator to what is called the Stewart interests for twenty years at a rental of $165,000, and in addition one-tenth of a cent a bushel in excess of ten million bushels handled for the first five years, subject to a revision of rental every five years. Elevator No. 2 is to be leased for one year at a rental of $100,000 a year with an option of a further lease for four years at a price of $120,000. I was informed this morning that the parties interested have agreed on that. The lease of No. 3 elevator is to be renewed by the Grain Growers. The harbour commissioners are going to spend a substantial amount of money to increase the capacity of this elevator to about one million bushels. They will have to acquire certain property and undertake additional construction. The Grain Growers are going to pay five per cent on the price of the properties to be acquired. All the land will not be required and part of it is going to be used for some other purpose. I understand that some firm is going to erect a building there which will cost $75,000. There is no provision for sinking fund or depreciation, because there is not supposed to be any depreciation of the land. The Grain Growers are going to pay 7.60 per cent on the cost of the new construction. These are the terms which have been practically agreed to by the parties concerned. The harbour commission is ready to sign the lease on these conditions.

Mr. GARDINER: Does that 7.60 per cent include the old building as well?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: How will that provide for the sinking fund? I suppose the interest will be five per cent?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; 2.60 is to provide for the sinking fund.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that sufficient?

Mr. CARDIN: It is sufficient to meet the whole obligation in twenty years.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister stated that the rental for elevator No. 1 would be $165,000. What is the total capital investment in the elevator, and what rate of interest thereon does the rental represent?

Mr. CARDIN: The calculation is made on the same basis for all the elevators.

Mr. GARDINER: Then in addition to that you get one-tenth of a cent per bushel for handling charges?

Mr. CARDIN: On anything over ten million bushels.

Mr. GARDINER: You do not get paid that percentage on every bushel?

Mr. CARDIN: No, only over ten million bushels.

Mr. COOTE: What development is to be undertaken with the $500,000 on the waterfront of North Vancouver?

Mr. CARDIN: The statement given to me is that this amount is for further development at North Vancouver. The commissioners have expended a large sum of money in extending the terminal railway along the north shore and filling in certain waterfront property. In order to provide revenue for the railway and property it will be necessary that certain dockage facilities be provided, and it is estimated that $500,000 will be sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. COOTE: Are there any facilities on the north shore at the present time?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but they are not adequate.

Mr. COOTE: There are items of $1,308,000 and $200,000. I suppose these represent the total amount for development on the north shore?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: An elevator was built on the Ballantyne pier. What elevator is that?

Mr. CARDIN: No. 1.

Mr. STEVENS: No. No. 1 is the original elevator at what is now called the Lapointe pier. No. 2 is the new elevator constructed on the Ballantyne pier.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. 1. is the old government elevator?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Interest during construction to be charged to capital account.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, this morning I asked the minister if he would be good enough to lay on the table the opinion of Mr. E. P. Davis, or at least let me have an opportunity of perusing it. I have sent the page across the floor to the minister, but I have not yet secured the opinion.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Plans, etc. to be approved before work commenced.

Mr COOTE: This morning we discussed the $112,000 to be paid to the company that had a lease of the old Woodward property. I understood the minister to say that he agreed to the proposal of the member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) that this money should not be paid until the case was decided in the courts. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. CARDIN: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this House disagrees to their amendments to section 12 of Bill No. 119 to amend the Excise Act, for the following reasons:

That the said amendments make conviction of the bootlegger or the seizure of illicitly manufactured spirits very difficult and practically impossible.

And that the Clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,—That it is expedient to bring in a measure,—

1. To provide for a Federal District Commission and to repeal the acts respecting the Ottawa Improvement Commission;

2. To authorize the payment to the commission of the sum of $250,000 a year for a period not exceeding sixteen years from the first day of April, 1927, and to make provision for borrowing powers, the issue of debentures and the repayment thereof.

32649—125½

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My purpose at the moment is simply to have the bill introduced so that hon. members may read its provisions before time is taken up with detailed discussion. The purpose of the bill to be founded on the resolution is to extend somewhat the powers of the present Ottawa Improvement Commission by enlarging the area over which it will be authorized to carry on its work, increasing the amount of money at its disposal, and changing its name to conform more accurately with the intent and purpose of the commission. The Ottawa Improvement Commission was established in the year 1899 in order to undertake the beautification of the capital of Canada. From time to time its membership has been increased, as has been also the sum placed at its disposal. This increase has been made for the reason that with the development of the work of the commission there goes inevitably an extra obligation of maintenance, and I am advised that at the present time the amount voted by parliament to the commission is used very largely for the maintenance of the parks and driveways which have already been constructed.

The country is fortunate in having at the moment at the head of the commission an exceptionally able business executive in the person of Mr. Thomas Ahearn, and the commission have been laying their plans for the further improvement of the capital. They believe they can make better headway with their work if an opportunity is given them to plan operations over a number of years, and for that reason the bill proposes to confer upon the commission that additional power. The amount at present at the disposal of the commission is $150,000 per annum. It is proposed in this bill to increase that sum by $100,000. It is not so much the city of Ottawa as it is the capital of Canada that is being considered. It is a national obligation to make the capital of our Dominion as attractive as possible, and, as hon. members know, for years past the government has felt in that regard, a special responsibility. The use of the term "Ottawa" as applied to the commission is somewhat misleading inasmuch as the environs, the immediate surroundings, are quite as important, from the standpoint of beautification of the capital, as is the city proper. Indeed, it is with the outlying parts of the city including the opposite side of the river that much of the work of improvement will be carried on.

I might add this further feature, as pointed out to me by the chairman of the commission.

The capital has grown materially since some of the existing improvements were effected, and many of the driveways are to-day much too small in view of the increased motor traffic. As a matter of fact they are too small to be safe, and they will have to be considerably enlarged. This work cannot be undertaken by the commission until some additional appropriation is made for the purpose. The other features deserving of consideration will, I think, be apparent once the bill is introduced.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How much, roughly speaking, has been expended by the government of Canada in the past in this connection? How much have we contributed toward the beautification of Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the details with me but I will endeavour to have a statement prepared and will give my hon. friend the figures when the bill is being discussed.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): For myself, I am heartily in accord with the proposal contained in the resolution. I have watched the development that has taken place in the city of Ottawa for over a quarter of a century, and my great regret is that the improvement has gone on so slowly. I had the privilege some days ago, of discussing this matter for a few minutes with the chairman of the Ottawa Improvement Commission, and I told him that in my view his request was entirely inadequate for the purpose. I believe the sum now suggested is too small. We should start on a larger scale extended over a longer term of years, and should let it be definitely understood that a certain substantial sum annually shall be set aside to make the capital of the country what it should be and what nature intended it to be. I doubt whether there is a capital in the world so splendidly endowed by nature as is the capital of Canada; and by capital I do not mean the immediate surroundings, but the adjacent country as well. I believe we shall be doing something of which we ourselves shall be proud, and which people of the country will approve, if we adopt even a more extended scale than that submitted by the government. If $150,000 is required for the annual upkeep, the extra $100,000 will not do a great deal in the sixteen years which is fixed in the resolution as the time limit. I hope to live to see this capital something like the capital visualized by Sir Wilfrid Laurier over twenty-seven years ago when he said that he would like to see Ottawa made the Washington of the North. Washington entered upon a scheme involving a twenty-five year program with a financial obligation amounting to about $20,000,000 per annum. We of course will not attempt anything like that, but it seems to me that now we are dealing with the matter we might extend the proposal somewhat.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): As I live in the city of Ottawa and always have done so, although I represent a constituency in Quebec, I want to say a few words just to show that I am in accord with the suggestion put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and with the appropriate words which have come from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). All of us are, I think, agreed that the natural surroundings of Ottawa are as beautiful as those of any city in the world. I have travelled a good deal and I have yet to see a more beautiful city.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): What about Halifax?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Halifax too is beautiful, but I would not put it above Ottawa. And that is high praise indeed. In my opinion, with one exception, Ottawa is as fine a place to live in as any I know of in the world. I will not enter into all the details now, but there is one regard in which this city can be improved, apart from any question of beautification. We have drinking water secured from the Ottawa river and made potable by artificial means, but it seems to me that with so many lakes close by we surely ought to have in this city a natural supply of water obtained from the beautiful lakes north in the Gatineau country. Most of the people in Ottawa who can afford to do so buy Tally-Ho or other waters instead of drinking the Ottawa water, and that is hardly fair to the poor, who should have a constant supply of pure water. I know of nothing more conducive to the health of the citizens than an abundant supply of absolutely pure water. I do not desire to criticize this resolution or to suggest any changes, but I do say to the Prime Minister that in the very influential position which he occupies and from the fact that he is now bringing in a resolution to provide more money to be used by this commission in doing this service to the city and to the government, he might impress upon the authorities of the city of Ottawa that as the government is assisting in this way and is prepared to go perhaps further in years to come, it is the duty of the city to see that a proper water supply is secured from the northern hills.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): The unanimity of opinion expressed so far from both sides of the House makes me somewhat doubtful as to the wisdom of accepting this proposition without some criticism, because it is always an unhealthy sign to me when I see both sides of the House in such complete agreement as they appear to be with regard to this resolution. The city of Ottawa is the capital city of Canada, and I agree with all that has been said with regard to its beautiful situation, its natural attractions and so on. But, though I may be the only one in the House who takes this position, I am not altogether prepared to give my assent to the spending of millions of dollars in beautifying this city of Ottawa while there are public works in various parts of the country which are absolutely neglected, and to which no consideration whatever is given. If in connection with the proposition to make this city the Washington of the North in a country of 9,000,000 people as compared with a country of 120,000,000 people it is proposed to carry out those ideas by tearing down such a building as the post office, for instance, which I think is a part of the plan, while people in my constituency must receive their mail in a place not much better than a box car or a packing case, and while I can get no consideration from the government in that regard, then I say that for one I am not prepared to give my whole-hearted support to a proposition of this kind even though it meets with the approval of most of the members on both sides of this House.

We are placed alongside the United States, which is a very large country with a great population and great wealth; we are a small country so far as population is concerned, and I do not think we should forget the fact that we have passed through a war which has left a heavy burden of debt on this Dominion. I know that when members of this House apply, as they have the right to apply in the interests of those parts of the country which they represent, for much needed public works, they are met each time with the figures of the national debt we are carrying and the responsibilities which we have to meet in that connection. But when it comes to providing wider streets for the larger population of Ottawa, to improving the water supply or doing things of that nature to the interest and benefit of those who live in Ottawa, I say it is up to the members of this House to take into consideration other parts of the country which are being forced to wait for matters which are more justly entitled to consideration than the tearing down of splendid buildings here in Ottawa, which are now serving their purposes and would continue to serve their purposes admirably for many years to come.

Before this bill goes through I will have an opportunity of discussing it, in common with other members, more fully. I do not wish to be understood as opposing a reasonable expenditure in connection with the beautifying of this city; we have certain responsibilities in that regard, but I do say that we should not feel it incumbent upon us to keep in mind these particular responsibilities and utterly ignore those other matters which have been long waiting for consideration.

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting for the two Ottawa members to speak on this resolution; they have not done so, but since some 15,000 people in the west end of the city are included in my riding, perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words.

In the first place I must disagree with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). We must not forget that while this amount of money is spent in beautifying this city, in return the city gives free fire protection, exemption from taxes and so on. I quite believe that to-day the city would be further ahead if it collected these taxes from the government, as it would from any private individual, and paid for its own improvements. I desire to support this resolution to the utmost of my ability, and I agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that the amount should not be $250,000 but $500,000. To increase the amount by only $100,000 is a mere bagatelle. The driveways in the west end and the bridges which will be constructed to the province of Quebec will take up a great deal of that money, and very little will be left for other things during the next few years. The amount is not nearly what it should be, and I would be very glad if the Prime Minister could see his way clear to double it.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I would like to ask whether before this bill passes we will have a comprehensive idea as to the way in which this money is to be spent. Have the commissioners any plan in mind, or are we just voting the money to the commission to be expended as they may see fit in the beautification of this city? I am rather inclined to agree in many respects with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). We do not begrudge the city of Ottawa anything; we would like to see Ottawa made a worthy capital of this Dominion, but there is a limit to the distance we may go and to the amount of money we may vote without knowing how it is going to be expended. I happen to know that the matter of a pure water supply would be very expensive, but is no doubt very justifiable, and some of this money might well be expended in purifying the air of this city as well. One has only to walk down the streets of this city to come to the conclusion that the first thing we should get away from is the smell of brimstone which is always in the air.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask the Prime Minister why it is proposed to give the commission power to issue bonds? I do not suppose that they will be constructing anything which will bring in revenue, so it would seem to me that the money should be provided directly by parliament each year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are certain works of construction to be carried on, the commission can plan ahead for a few years, if they have power to issue debentures. The bill provides that any obligations arising out of the issue of securities become a first charge on the moneys appropriated. This simply enables the commission to plan ahead with a greater degree of certainty than if they were dependent upon annual appropriations. The total appropriation by parliament will not as a consequence be increased.

Mr. COOTE: If the bill simply provides for an annual grant of so much to the commission—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all.

Mr. COOTE: —I was wondering why this procedure was adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It simply allows the commission to use a part of the grant as the years go by toward meeting payments due on securities they may issue. They will not issue securities unless they gain some substantial advantage by so doing.

Mr. KENNEDY: I understood the Prime Minister to say that it was the intention to enlarge the area over which the commission would have control. How large an area is the commission to be given control of under this proposal?

An hon. MEMBER: Peace River.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the commission will attempt to deal with Peace River. The purpose is not to confine the work of the commission to the city of Ottawa but to include the suburbs of the city and the city of Hull across the way. Before the commission can extend the area, they will have to submit their proposals to the governor in council and those proposals will have to be approved. I assume that the commission has no thought of going beyond the immediate suburbs of the city. I have seen some mention in the press that this bill would include provision for a national park. That is an idea entirely separate; it has nothing to do with the present measure at all. I want to make that clear. I should like to say, however, that I do think a national park in the vicinity of Ottawa is something that is very much in the public interest, and that provision should be made for it at once, but that has nothing to do with this particular measure.

Mr. COOTE: I do not want to oppose this resolution in any way. I should like to say, however, that every time I walk down from the parliament buildings I cannot help but feel that Canada has not been very well served by her politicians in years past so far as beautifying the national capital is concerned. There is not a street in Ottawa from which the main entrance to the parliament buildings can be seen until you reach Wellington street.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me that our legislators and our governments for the past twenty years have been very remiss in their duties in that they did not, before Sparks street was built up with such expensive buildings, expropriate the property for about three blocks between Wellington street and Sparks street, and open a wide thoroughfare immediately opposite the main entrance to the parliament buildings. The rest of that property could have been used for government buildings in which to house the different public departments—buildings of a character which would beautify the capital and would be in harmony with the architectural design of the parliament buildings themselves. I do not know whether it is too late to do anything of that nature. I suppose those who come twenty years after will say that we might have done it. Possibly the state of the public finances to-day would not permit the necessary expenditure, but I think it is something that the commission might very well consider. The commission have done a lot to beautify the city of Ottawa, but I sometimes think they have not taken advantage of the improvements they have made in the capital. They have constructed miles of beautiful driveways, but they have never secured control of the property along those driveways. Once a driveway is completed the property adjacent to it becomes very valuable residential property, and the value which is created by the construction of the driveway has gone to benefit private individuals. Most of the people who bought that property and constructed homes are benefiting from the unearned increment accruing from the increase in the value of the land. I think if the improvement commission are going to construct other driveways they should secure control of the property along those driveways. If that is done they will secure some revenue from the increase in the value of the property. I do not want to indulge in any destructive remarks with respect to this proposal. I would prefer to make suggestions of a constructive nature. I hope the commission, with the approval of the government, will go so far at least as to secure control of the property along any new driveway they may construct, and thus secure some revenue from these improvements.

Mr. PETTIT: I would ask if a comprehensive scheme has been adopted by the commission looking to the future, when this city will have a population of 500,000 or more? Failure to do that on the part of large cities to-day, both in Canada and the United States, has resulted in the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars, yes millions, to the municipalities concerned. No doubt the eminent business men on the commission have looked into this matter, but it is just as well to point out the situation to them, and sound a note of warning as to what is likely to happen if a comprehensive scheme is not adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The commission have taken the very course which my hon. friend has indicated should be taken. I have in my hand, submitted to me by the chairman of the commission, some of the plans the commission wish to be free to carry out. I do not think it would be in the public interest to disclose these proposals at present, but they do reveal exactly what my hon. friend has in mind, namely, foresight on the part of the commission in laying out constructive plans for future developments.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask the Prime Minister if he considers it proper to give us an idea of how far afield that foresight goes? He intimated it might carry us to Hull. There is the town of Aylmer, Quebec, where I think some improvements might be made. There is also the town of Cornwall, and other places within a hundred miles of Ottawa. I wonder how far the environs spoken of are supposed to extend? Perhaps they will take in Sydenham, where I hope the Minister of Finance will see his way clear to provide a decent post office, when he is providing money for this scheme to beautify the city of Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON: Will the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us what the capital expenditure will be in connection with this proposal? I have a good deal of sympathy with the desire to beautify the city of Ottawa, but it would be a good thing if my right hon. friend would visit some of the back communities in this country who have been trying to get rural mail delivery, or some improvement in their postal facilities, in order to keep people on the land, something they are trying to do in every province in Canada. I tell my right hon. friend that these people deserve sympathy and consideration from the public treasury first, before the city of Ottawa. I think we ought to do something for them. If we are going into a huge capital expenditure, and this grant is to be mortgaged for the future to pay interest for twenty-five or thirty years, I think we ought to go pretty slowly, or know at all events what we are going to do.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. HANSON: No; I think we ought to know what the capital expenditure will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that the commission is expected to keep within the amount that is appropriated by parliament. Before bringing the proposal to the House, I asked for a statement as to how it was proposed the moneys would be used, and the proposals of the commission relate and are confined to the grant which parliament is putting at their disposal.

Mr. HANSON: What are the proposals with respect to capital expenditure and how much are they going to mortgage the future of the country for?

Mr. CANNON: The bill provides for $4,000,000 and it states that this $4,000,000 will be paid within a period of sixteen years at the rate of $250,000 a year. The advantage of this is that the commission know beforehand exactly how much they will receive and thus they can finance more easily. Last week I had the pleasure of meeting Sir George Garneau who is at the head of the Battlefields Memorials Commission. He was suggesting that we should adopt for his commission the same system and that, instead of voting yearly the sum of $100,000, we should once for all make it statutory so that the banks and other financial institutions might know exactly how much the commission received and how much they could expect to get. This bill will cover that in this case.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think the government is going far enough. What should be done now is to declare Ottawa and such part of its suburbs as might be thought desirable, a federal district, to appoint a commission to govern the city of Ottawa, and to treat the people of the city as the people of Washington are treated. If we are going to make the city of Ottawa a great capital, attractive in all its physical features, the way to go about the matter is to appoint a commission now to take over the city. Let this government manage and govern it. We have a splendid precedent for that across the border and that precedent could be followed with great advantage to the country.

What is proposed, as I understand this legislation, is to make a grant of $4,000,000 covering sixteen years. That looks to me as though the creation of a federal district in Ottawa will be postponed for at least sixteen years. If there were as much foresight in the government as there seems to be in the commission that is about to be appointed, what I am proposing should be done. Instead of appointing a new commission now and making new conditions for the commission to act upon, we should at this time decide the question: Shall Ottawa be a federal district? If the answer is in the affirmative, then we should proceed to appoint a commission, take over the government of the city and direct its affairs in the same way as is done in Washington.

Mr. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): I entirely differ, Sir, from the opinion of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) who suggests creating a federal district. On the other hand, it is with pleasure that I support the resolution of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by which it is proposed to spend in Ottawa, Hull and their surroundings a sum of $4,000,000 in the course of the next sixteen years.

[Mr. Cannon.]

On behalf of my constituents I am absolutely opposed to the city of Hull becoming part of a federal district, because it would despoil us of our most cherished rights. We are perfectly content with our fate and we wish to remain a part of the province of Quebec. The resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister to establish a commission having very extensive authority and empowered to spend money over the whole district, is approved by all, but I do not think it in any way necessary to create a federal district which would include Hull, this would, I again state, deprive us of the rights which we have enjoyed ever since confederation.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 280, respecting the Federal District Commission.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 260, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment and salary of Chief Electoral Officer.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Acting Minister of Justice): As I explained when the resolution was before the House, the object of the bill is to provide for the appointment of a successor to Colonel Biggar, who at present is the Chief Electoral Officer. Colonel Biggar has intimated his wish to relinquish the office. Section 1 provides that the Chief Electoral Officer in future shall be appointed by a resolution of the House of Commons and that his salary will be $6,000 a year. When discussing the resolution the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) raised the question as to tenure of office of the Chief Electoral Officer, and upon examining the bill as it is drafted I discovered that provision has not been made for that. I have placed an amendment in the hands of the Chairman. I move to add the words "per annum" to the second paragraph of section 1, so that it will read:

> The Chief Electoral Officer shall be appointed by resolution of the House of Commons and shall be paid a salary of $6,000 per annum.

That is the section as it stands in the bill, plus the words "per annum." I also propose to add the words:

> He shall hold office on the same tenure and shall be removable only for cause and in the same manner as a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Adding these words removes any possibility of the post of Chief Electoral Officer becoming somewhat of a political position and the holder being removed by resolution of the House, without any of the guarantees that should surround such an office.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Will the minister tell me: When the chief electoral officer was appointed, at what salary, and if he vacates the office will he receive a pension, and if so how much?

Mr. CANNON: Colonel Biggar was the first Chief Electoral Officer under the new electoral law passed in 1920. I will give the House the reason for the amending act. By consulting the Dominion Elections Act hon. members will see that the name of Colonel Biggar was inserted in the clause when the bill was originally passed, so that Colonel Biggar was appointed in 1920. The salary which he is receiving is $12,000 a year. He was performing, in addition to the functions of Chief Electoral Officer, the duties of counsel for the government. When he retires Colonel Biggar will be entitled, in common with every officer or official who retires, to a certain leave of absence. We provide in this bill that the vacancy shall occur on June 30. He will receive no pension after his retirement.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am very glad to hear that, not that I have anything against the Chief Electoral Officer, but I think that principle might have been adopted more generally than it has been in times past. I have sometimes been led to think that we have almost as many pensioned civil servants as we have active civil servants in the country. In spite of the fact that I may arouse the indignation of some members of the legal profession, I say that I have felt, whether rightly or wrongly, that they have certainly looked after men of the legal profession when it came to the fixing of salaries for judges and looking after the retirement of these judges. They leave the bench very often, because, as they tell us their health would not stand the strain of the work on the bench, and they have actually left the bench with good big pensions. I might name the former Minister of Justice the Hon. C. J. Doherty, who left the bench under these conditions.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend would not be so ready with his "hear, hear", if I named someone on his own side. But these men have left the bench because they could not stand the strain of the hard work on the bench, and have gone into the very mild occupation of politics—off the bench into politics. When they could not stand the strain of politics they retired and again took judgeships, and if they continue that procedure in time they will be drawing three or four pensions, if they live long enough. As soon as the provinces pass the necessary legislation with reference to old age pensions they will also come in under that act and will be drawing a little more. I say that we have gone to a ridiculous extreme in providing salaries, specially for men on the bench, and providing big superannuation when they retire, probably, in just as good health as any of us in this chamber to-day. I say that it would be a good general principle to adopt if we paid a man on the bench whatever he was worth as is done in other occupations, and let him provide for his old age out of the salary he got, just as other people do. It is ridiculous to give a man ten or twelve thousand dollars a year and then make provision for his old age. If he has not sense enough to provide for his old age out of ten thousand a year he has not sense enough to be on the bench. This system of superannuation of officers and judges has been carried on in this country, all because we have a lot of men in this House who are of the legal profession, and are looking ahead to the day when they will step out of politics, drop into a fat job on the bench and then retire on a pension which will keep them for the rest of their days. This thing has been carried to a ridiculous extreme. We have carried this system to the matter of appointments to commissions. Is there a man or woman in Canada, outside of the immediate people concerned, who believes that Newton Wesley Rowell is worth a fee of $200 a day, $20 a day for living allowance and his travelling expenses, while working on that commission? He could not earn that money if he were not working on a commission. Millions of dollars are being spent in that way.

I do not propose to let this matter drop, I will bring it up on future occasions, so that the government will not forget it. I will protest against these expenditures, just as long as there are public works throughout the country which are thrown to one side, absolutely disregarded and nothing done to meet the public needs in that respect, when we have millions to spend for the purpose of beautifying Ottawa and millions to spend providing judges with good fat jobs, millions to spend on them when they get too old or too lazy to sit on the bench, and large amounts to spend on political pets who are appointed to this or that commission, because these men have not provided themselves with a sufficient sum to enable them to retire when they get a little older. That is the state of affairs in this country and it is a crime.

Mr. HOCKEN: Who is the appointee?

Mr. CANNON: The House will appoint him by resolution.

Mr. HOCKEN: Who is it to be? You will not accept his nomination from this side?

Mr. CANNON: The Prime Minister stated on Monday that before introducing a resolution providing for the appointment of Colonel Biggar's successor he would confer with the leader of the opposition in order that, if possible, all parties might agree on a man who would give satisfaction.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is all right.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Duties as counsel for the crown.

Mr. CANNON: Colonel Biggar besides being Chief Electoral Officer has acted as counsel for the government. We are amending the act so that the Chief Electoral Officer to be appointed under this bill will confine himself to his duties as such. This is the reason for reducing the salary of $12,000 to $6,000. I am quite sure my hon. friend from Frontenac will rejoice in the reduction.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He has gone out.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—When office vacant.

Mr. CANNON: I move to amend clause 3 by inserting in the two blanks the words "thirtieth" and "June".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another clause.

Mr. CANNON: I propose to add another clause, for this reason. The bill provides for the selection of the Chief Electoral Officer by resolution of the House. But the bill can be put into effect only when it is sanctioned, and it will not be sanctioned before the end of this session. Colonel Biggar will not vacate his position as Chief Electoral Officer before June 30. In order to meet this situation I move that the following section be added as number 4:

> The successor to the said Oliver Mowat Biggar as Chief Electoral Officer shall be the person who has been designated as such during the present session of parliament by a resolution of the House of Commons, and shall take office on July 1, 1927.

Colonel Biggar will vacate his position on June 30. There is this further paragraph:

> In the meantime subsection 5 of section 19 of the Dominion Elections Act, chapter 46 of the statutes of 1920, shall apply to such person as if he were actually filling the office of Chief Electoral Officer.

This is necessitated because the Dominion Elections Act provides that if the Chief Electoral Officer dies or becomes unable to fill the position the Chief Justice of the Supreme court may appoint a substitute. But hon. members will realize that after a resolution of this House shall have been passed designating a successor to Colonel Biggar who is to vacate office on June 30, in the event of that person dying before July 1, after June 30, there would be no Chief Electoral Officer. In order to meet that eventuality I have introduced this paragraph. In case the person so designated should be unable to take office on July 1, he will be considered as having filled the office, and it will be possible to appoint a substitute, so that there will be no break in the continuity of the office.

New section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

NATURALIZATION OF CANADIAN WOMEN MARRIED TO ALIENS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee of supply.

Miss A. C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, there are many Canadian women who resent the injustice which women who are British subjects, but married to aliens, suffer in regard to naturalization. A woman may be a Canadian, she may be the grandchild of Canadians, but if she marries an alien she ceases to be a British subject. She may not resume her British nationality until her husband chooses to become naturalized; and if he dies or the marriage is dissolved the woman remains an alien until she makes a declaration and obtains a certificate from the Secretary of State. It would seem that such treatment makes naturalization of small account. It must be of little importance if adults can be naturalized without satisfying the condition as to desirability and without being required to take the oath of allegiance, and it certainly is insulting to women to assume that their allegiance can be transferred without their own consent.

Under the present law marriage and citizenship are very much mixed up. I don't think the two should be so closely related, if related at all. There are scores of British women resident in Canada who, having married aliens, find themselves citizens of no country, unable to claim the protection of any government, unable to vote, unable to teach or to accept any civil position should the need arise, and, in the event of their husbands' death, unable to participate in the mother's allowance for the benefit of their children. Because of their statelessness they find it almost impossible to obtain a passport. I have a letter from a woman in Ontario received when the resolution in regard to this subject appeared on the order paper. She lives in Prince Edward county and pays taxes, but at the last election on December 1 not only herself but twenty-five other women in the county were prevented from voting. She tells that her great grandfather was an officer in the Revolutionary war and a British subject and she describes how loyal they had always been; yet after marriage to an American, although they live in Canada and she owns large property and pays taxes, she finds herself unable to vote in any election in this country. She writes protesting against such treatment.

Last year I tried to get a passport for an Ontario girl who was married to an alien. I could not obtain the passport and she had to cancel her trip. Many other members of this House could tell similar stories. I have heard them in private conversation and if they had the opportunity to speak I am sure they could tell of experiences such as I have described. When it is considered that, in western Canada particularly, we are receiving from many shores aliens who are marrying women of British nationality, this is a matter of vital concern to Canada.

The right of women to retain their British nationality although married to aliens was enjoyed until the year 1870. Previous to that time the common law of England contained two principles: first, that a British woman who married an alien should retain her British nationality, and, secondly, that an alien woman who married a British subject remained an alien. Women were regarded as chattels; after marriage they had no right to their property, which passed into the control of their husbands. They did not possess the franchise and generally they were in a humiliating and subordinate position as compared to the status of women to-day. Yet until 1870 they had the right to retain their nationality. In that year the law was changed to provide that a married woman should be deemed to be the subject of the state of which her husband for the time being was a subject. When this change was made the women of Great Britain—for this is British law—were not consulted at all, and the subject received very little debate in the House of Commons, through which it passed very hurriedly. The law was amended in 1914 to read:

> That the wife of a British subject shall be deemed to be a British subject and the wife of an alien shall be deemed to be an alien.

In the amending act of 1914, however, women did make certain gains. In the British nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, women gained the principle, excluded since 1870, that a woman might be of different nationality from her husband's. If her British husband should change his nationality, she might under the act declare that she would remain British; and a British-born woman with a foreign husband may now apply, on the dissolution of her marriage by death or divorce, for readmission to British nationality without complying with the requirements as to residence.

In 1922 Lord Danesfort brought forward a bill, which passed its second reading, containing two important principles: first, British women should have the right to retain their nationality when they married aliens; and, second, that an alien woman should not by the mere act of marriage with a British subject become a British subject. Dissolution of parliament prevented anything further being done, but in 1923 a select committee of the Lords and Commons was appointed to consider the subject. This committee, comprising five commoners and five lords, agreed that a change was necessary. But, one of the lords dissenting, no recommendations were made when the report was presented. The objection advanced by this dissenting lord was that the change would result in trouble in the home. Men and women, it was urged, were one. We all know that, but the thing I want to know is, which one? If it is going to disturb the harmony of the home to have any change of nationality on the part of either husband or wife, let the husband take the nationality of the wife. It is as fair that way as the other. I have no great fear that the home will be disrupted if women are given the vote, or if they go to work, or if they retain their nationality. Every advance made by woman has been frowned upon because of this very fear of the home being disrupted. Men are always worried about this consequence, but it does not happen, for the simple reason that the real home is a community of interests so strong that it will take more than any change of nationality, more than the vote or any of these things to disrupt it. We need not worry about the home on that account.

The matter was brought forward again in the British House of Commons in 1925, when Major Harvey introduced a resolution, which was carried, to the following effect:

> That in the opinion of this House a British woman should not lose or be deemed to lose her nationality by mere act of marriage with an alien, but that it should be open to her to make declaration of alienage.

[Miss Macphail.]

During the course of the debate on that resolution the Under Secretary of State informed the House that after the meeting of the joint committee of the Lords and Commons to which I have referred, no agreement having been reached, the matter had been raised at the imperial conference of 1923. It was referred to a sub-committee of the conference, as will be found at page 1213 of that conference. The suggestions of the sub-committee of the conference as well as those of the joint committee of the Lords and Commons were submitted to the dominions in the autumn of 1924, but up to the time when Major Harvey was taking part in the debate on the resolution I have quoted, only one of the dominions had expressed itself on the subject. I wonder why Canada did not reply. I believe that public opinion in this country favours a change. I have no doubt it is the desire of the people of this Dominion that a British woman married to an alien shall have the right to retain her British nationality. Mr. Hurst, speaking to Major Harvey's resolution in 1925, said:

> I do not believe we ought to wait until the principle adopted in this resolution has been accepted by all self-governing dominions. On July 14, 1921, I put a question to the then Prime Minister on this subject and I was told that no decision could be arrived at until the dominions had been consulted with. That is four years ago and we are not one inch further along the road to legislation than we were then.

From the beginning we can conclude that the British House of Commons on various occasions has wanted to do something about the matter. As I have pointed out, they referred the question of the dominions, from only one of which they received any reply. I cannot see why they did not hear from our Dominion, and I think it is time the parliament of this country took whatever steps are necessary to make it possible for British women married to aliens to retain their own nationality.

The United States tried the law which we now have for the period from 1907 to 1922 when, by the Cable act, the law was changed to read:

> A woman citizen of the United States shall not cease to be a citizen by reason of her marriage unless she makes a formal renunciation of her citizenship before a court having jurisdiction over naturalization of aliens.

It was further enacted that:

> Any woman who marries a citizen of the United States shall not become a citizen by reason of such marriage.

By this law an American girl who marries a Canadian becomes a British subject while still remaining a citizen of the United States, but a Canadian girl who marries an American ceases to be a British subject and does not become a citizen of the United States, and is therefore a citizen of no country. There are many practical examples of this, and I am sure every member of this House is aware of some of them. The republics of Argentine, Brazil and Chile have similar naturalization laws to those of the United States. Belgium in 1922 gave women the right to retain their nationality after marriage if they so desired. In 1924 Sweden gave women the same right, so long as they remained in Sweden, and other Scandinavian countries have followed the same procedure.

Resolutions asking for this change have been passed by women's organizations in Canada for many years past, among those outstanding being the National Council of Women, who have time and again asked that women be naturalized of their own right, and that marriage to an alien should not affect them in any way. The Canadian Council of Agriculture have presented this question to the cabinet almost times without number. The Womens' Institutes of Canada have taken a firm stand upon it, together with the Social Service Council of Canada. The Alberta legislature on two occasions adopted resolutions dealing with this problem, one of which was introduced last session by Hon. Irene Parlby and seconded by Mrs. Nellie McClung, but no action was taken in this House. As I have already pointed out, Great Britain adopted Major Harvey's resolution in 1924, and I do not see why the parliament of Canada has not taken some stand on this question.

I realize that this is an international matter, but after all it will not be dealt with in an international way until all the countries affected deal with it first, and I appeal to the members of this House in the name of the womanhood of this country to see that this injustice is removed and that women have the same right of citizenship accorded to men. I think women love their country as much as men, and since women are not to-day property as they were thought to be in days gone by, but thinking individuals, I appeal to this House of Commons to take the first opportunity to do all that can be done in this matter. Let it be taken up by the League of Nations or the next Imperial conference; let us do anything that can be done in order to remove this injustice.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I did not do so before because I thought it would not be very gallant.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I was just about to remark that on looking at the order paper I found the resolution touching this subject appearing under the name of the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail). Upon inquiry of the Clerk of the House I found that the hon. member called yesterday at the office of the Clerk and asked that the notice be dropped, in order to enable her to bring up the matter. The order was given, but the printer neglected to make the change.

Mr. STEVENS: I merely rise for this purpose. I did not desire to interfere in any way, or to prevent the hon. member from bringing her case before the House, which is the reason I remained in my seat while she was speaking. I do think, however, that the House should take note of the fact that this discussion is out of order and is a violation of the rules, in order that in future this incident may not be taken as a warranty for another evasion of the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: I noticed the fact as the hon. member was rising, but I did not interrupt her. I sent for the Clerk, however, who told me that it was a mistake on the part of the printer and that the hon. member called in at the Clerk's office yesterday to request that the order be dropped.

Mr. IRVINE: Might we not expect a statement from the Prime Minister in connection with this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was assuming that the Speaker had ruled to some extent that the discussion was out of order, and I did not wish to add to it. If the House gives its consent, however, I have no doubt the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) will be only too pleased to add a few words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot declare the remarks made by the hon. member out of order, because the fault lies with one of the employees of the House. The notice is considered dropped, because the hon. member asked that it be dropped yesterday, as she had a right to do.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to press my right to speak because I have had occasion to ask the chair to uphold the rules of the House, and I think it is very important that we do so. While the hon. member was speaking I also thought that the whole procedure was not in order but, wishing to be as gallant as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has been, I did not wish to press the point until I arose myself. It was my intention to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the discussion was not in order so long as the motion of the hon. member still appeared on the order paper. Having given some study to this very interesting question I am only too sorry that the hon. member did not have an opportunity to bring it before the House in another way, but I quite realize that private members days were practically blocked by one private bill during much of the time of the session, and that was the main reason why this particular motion was never reached. The House will also understand that at this stage of the session, and considering also the way in which this motion has been taken up, it is not my intention to go fully into the question, but rather to state very briefly the policy of the government in this regard.

I wish to make a distinction between the principle involved in the question brought forward by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the practicability of making any amendment to the Naturalization Act at the present time. As to the principle entailed in this question, I am quite willing to state that the government is fully in accord with the attitude of the hon. member. We believe that it would be desirable that women of British nationality should be entitled to retain British nationality after marriage to an alien, if they so desire. At the same time the House will appreciate the fact that the Naturalization Act in Canada is based upon the imperial act and that it would not be wise to amend it in any way of our own accord, without taking into consideration the effects of such an amendment within the empire. The existing act in Canada is the result of what may be called a contract entered into between Great Britain and the dominions at the Imperial conference of 1911. I will not give the full agreement, but will mention only the most important points, one being that imperial nationality should be world-wide and uniform, and the other that the imperial act should be so framed as to enable the self-governing dominions to adopt it. Inasmuch as the act in Canada is based upon the imperial act it may be interesting to note the evolution of the latter statute. My hon. friend (Miss Macphail), in the course of her very interesting remarks, has referred to some phases of that evolution. It is noteworthy that in early days the situation in England approached more closely to what my hon. friend now desires than what it does to-day. By the common law of England, prior to 1844, the nationality of a woman was not affected by her mariage. If a British woman subject married an alien, she remained British.

If an alien woman married a British subject, she remained an alien. It was not until 1844 and 1870 that the act in Great Britain was amended. The amendment brought forward in 1844 was to the effect "that any woman married or who shall be married to a natural-born subject or person naturalized shall be deemed and taken to be herself naturalized and have all the rights and privileges of a natural-born subject." This did alter one phase of the situation in this respect, that an alien woman marrying a British subject by that fact became herself a British subject. In 1870 the other side of the question was taken up and this amendment was enacted in Great Britain that a "married woman shall be deemed to be a subject of the state of which her husband is for the time being a subject". That is to say, by these two amendments in 1844 and 1870 the British parliament had departed altogether from the original common law. In 1914, as my hon. friend has pointed out, the law was reenacted in simpler and clearer form, and it was stated that "the wife of a British subject shall be deemed a British subject, and the wife of an alien be deemed to be an alien". But from that date until now the whole trend of opinion in the British parliament has been to depart from the act of 1914 by making a number of exceptions to this ironclad rule.

I do not think I should go into the matter very fully to-day except to state that in 1923 a select committee in England took evidence on the matter. They were not unanimous in their report, but the majority of the committee were in favour of amending the law according to the principle invoked by my hon. friend to-day, and according to the motion that she placed on the order paper. In 1925 Major Harvey moved a resolution in the British House of Commons to the effect that a British woman should not lose or be deemed to lose her nationality by the mere act of marriage with an alien, but it was to be open to her to make a declaration of allegiance. That resolution was adopted. In the following year, in 1926, a similar motion was moved and adopted by the Australian parliament. Therefore it will be seen that the trend of opinion in the empire is against the iron-clad provision that was enacted in the British parliament in 1914, due no doubt to the situation created by the war at that time. I would, however, point out that in both the British parliament and the commonwealth of Australia it was made very clear that the whole question should not be decided separately by either parliament, but that it should be decided unanimously by all the parliaments within the empire, it being desirable that unanimity should be observed in the framing of naturalization acts throughout the empire. The reason for that is very plain. We could, even within the agreement of 1911 to which I alluded at the beginning of my remarks, frame our act separately and according to our own views, but the effect would be to grant naturalization only within our own borders, and would create a confusing situation which I think my hon. friend himself will admit is not at all desirable. It is for that reason that the whole question was submitted to the Imperial conference in 1926 with the hope of arriving at a common solution. I regret to say that the hope was not realized, although I am informed that during the discussion the Canadian repesentatives not only took a stand favourable to the principle we are discussing to-day but they advanced the situation somewhat towards a solution. I refer my hon. friend to the report of the Imperial conference of 1926, page 32, which contains the conclusion of the conference on that matter:

> The committee also considered the question of the nationality of married women. On this matter some divergence of view was disclosed and the committee were unable to arrive at a unanimous conclusion. Since, however, they attached great importance to the maintenance of uniformity throughout the various parts of the empire in the law relating to British nationality, they decided to recommend to the conference that further consideration of the question should be postponed pending the report of the committee of experts referred to in the report of the Inter-imperial Relations Committee which, it is proposed, should deal with various matters connected with the operation of Dominion legislation, and in view of the possibility of an attempt being made to regulate the problem of dual nationality and no nationality by international agreement. The conference adopted this recommendation.

That is where the matter stands, and I think I might well conclude my remarks now, by stating that the government is fully in accord with the hon. member for Southeast Grey as to the principle of her motion, but we believe that no attempt to amend the Naturalization Act should be made now. It would be better merely to proclaim that principle, and make it known to the imperial authorities and to other parliaments within the empire that on this matter Canada stands with the British and Australian parliaments. But we desire uniformity in the matter of this law, and we think that no specific amendment should be considered at present.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I say just a few words in support of the proposal of the hon. member for Southeast Grey. I quite realize that there are many complicated questions arising with respect to naturalization. No question is in fact more difficult. But may I suggest that if we insist that we can do nothing in Canada until there be uniform action all over the British Empire it may mean that a very great hardship may be worked on a great many of our own Canadian citizens. The hon. member for Southeast Grey called attention to the situation in which some of our own people find themselves. I have had letters on the subject. I think of one in particular from a woman in British Columbia who was married to an American. Her husband deserted her and she was left in a most awkward position. She has no standing as an American citizen under the American law. Under the Canadian law she is not a British subject although she is British-born. Short of the death of her husband, which apparently is not likely to take place for some time, there seems to be no way by which she can regain her Canadian citizenship. One case of that kind is sufficient to point out the need of some action on our part. I can understand that in Great Britain where social distinctions between England and Europe are considerable, they may not have such practical difficulties as we have in Canada. But in this country, when we have 3,000 miles of an international boundary with two peoples of the same race and the same language living along this border, when hundreds of thousands of United States citizens are coming to Canada and hundreds of thousands of Canadians are going over to the United States, our problem is a somewhat peculiar one. I received from one organization in the west a resolution urging that if no step could be taken to give relief by means of the Imperial conference, we should develop some sort of distinctive Canadian citizenship which would enable us to safeguard the interests of our Canadian citizens.

As a matter of fact we have developed a distinction between British citizenship and Canadian citizenship, in that, according to the United States laws, native-born Canadians may cross the international boundary without any difficulty, whereas citizens who are not Canadian-born must submit to the quota law prevailing in the United States. Hence in practice we are developing somewhat of a distinction between those two classes of our citizens. In passing I may say that if we had any national self respect in Canada, we would not allow such a distinction to continue. I would urge that on this American continent, with the proximity of two great races so similar in their characteristics, we ought not to allow purely imperial considerations, however good they may be in their place—and those of us who travel abroad recognize the value of imperial citizenship—to prevent us from meeting the practical needs that exist in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Trade and Commerce—The Copper Bounties Act, 1923, administration of, $500.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this for copper refining?

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is for the copper bounty.

Item agreed to.

The Hemp Bounties Act, 1923, administration of, $500.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is anyone earning anything under this bounty?

Mr. MALCOLM: The amount is very small. Last year the amount earned was less than $100.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Who receives these bounties?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am sorry I have not the names of the claimants.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Is it the manufacturers alone or the growers?

Mr. MALCOLM: The manufacturers.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Does the minister not think this bounty should go further than that and the growers should be considered?

Mr. MALCOLM: The bounty was paid to assist in the manufacture of twine from Canadian hemp, but so far advantage has not been taken of it to any great extent.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Why has advantage not been taken of it? Is it because hemp is not produced here from which the manufacturers can make these twines? It may be that the bounty is not going to the right people.

Mr. WHITE (London): It would be of interest to the committee to have some statement from the minister as to what is being done in the way of growing hemp and the manufacture of twine.

Mr. MALCOLM: The only statement that I can make to my hon. friend is that the act was passed in 1923 to encourage the growing of hemp in Canada by giving a bounty to manufacturers who would use that hemp. The bounty was on a sliding scale, the first year one and one-half cents per pound, dropping one-eighth of a cent each year and expiring in 1933. But so far the bounty has not apparently induced the growing of hemp for twine purposes to any great extent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is it not true that at the time we granted this bounty we had before us manufacturers who were willing and who told the minister of the day that they were prepared to go ahead and manufacture twine from Canadian hemp?

Mr. MALCOLM: I cannot say that. I do not know.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That was my understanding of the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the inception of this bounty was an effort near Portage la Prairie to grow hemp and they grew some hundreds of acres successfully. They asked for assistance of this kind, namely an encouragement to the manufacturers and then, so far as I can learn, they grew no more hemp.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): If no advantage is being taken of this particular bounty, why is it included in the estimates?

Mr. MALCOLM: The act did not come into force until 1925 and this is only the second year in which it has been in operation. It has not been thought advisable to drop the item, because the act providing for the bounty is still in force, if any one likes to take advantage of it during the period that it remains in force.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Was any amount paid last year?

Mr. MALCOLM: $60.15.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): To whom?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am sorry I cannot give the names of those to whom payments were made. They were so few.

Mr. LUCAS: Has any amount been paid out in bounties?

Mr. MALCOLM: In 1925-26 there was paid out $248.33, and last year $60.15.

Item agreed to.

British and Foreign News Service, $32,000.

Mr. RYERSON: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. MALCOLM: This is a vote to Reuters News Service for giving publicity abroad to Canada by sending despatches to all their correspondents. I have under my hand a list of journals including a whole page of foreign publications. The number of despatches of Canadian interest was as follows:

1923-24	3,904
1924-25	11,984
1925-26	9,334
1926-27	11,481

That is up to December 31, for the year.

Item agreed to.

The Canadian Grain Act, administration of, $1,504,600.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why the increase of $74,000?

Mr. MALCOLM: I may inform the House that what appears here is rather misleading. The main estimates for 1926-1927 were $1,430,000 and the supplementary estimates $350,000, the total requirement being $1,780,000. The Board of Grain Commissioners asked for $1,654,000. Council reduced their request by $150,000, so that the actual decrease in the main and supplementaries as against last year is $275,000.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): This is quite a large sum for the administration of the act, even if it is the Grain Act. What is the explanation of the large amount?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is a very large and a very profitable business for the Dominion of Canada. The Grain Act is administered by the board, and I can explain in a few words what hon. members often refer to, namely the very large surpluses. The surpluses appear to be larger than they really are, because no account is taken of the cost of public buildings, which is provided for by the Public Works department. No provision is made for depreciation in respect of these buildings, and no interest is charged. It was estimated by the board last year that, taking account of all these things, the government earned four per cent on all its investments as well as all its expenditures. There was a surplus during the last year of which we have a record of $492,935 in the administration of the act. It is a branch which not only gives service but produces some revenue on the capital invested.

Mr. LUCAS: The committee on agriculture is at present sitting and some members have given attention to this matter and would like to discuss this vote. Perhaps the minister would let this item stand.

Mr. STEVENS: Let the next item stand.

Item stands.

Management, operation and maintenance of elevators, $593,000.

Mr. LUCAS: This is an important item. Would the minister let it stand?

Mr. MALCOLM: I would like my hon. friend to be reasonable. Any discussion that members of the committee on agriculture wish to make on the Canada Grain Act would be pretty much the same as they would make on the elevator item. I would prefer that this item be passed. I am leaving one vote which would give hon. members the privilege of speaking on all of them.

Item agreed to.

Commercial intelligence service, including miscellaneous expenditure in connection with the development and extension of Canada's trade, $425,000.

Mr. JELLIFF: Will the minister explain the increase of $50,000?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is brought about largely by the opening of new offices and the general enlargement of the commercial intelligence staff, the statutory increases in the salaries of our trade commissioners, and the increase in staff in order to provide service for the growing export business of Canada. The commercial intelligence vote is a vote that is liable to increase as the trade of the country increases, and I can give no further explanation. It is a gradual increase all along the line of the services rendered.

Mr. HARRIS: Where are the new offices?

Mr. MALCOLM: There is one new office opened in Dublin.

Mr. COOTE: Are there any trade agents, and if so, how many in the United States? Does that come under the item?

Mr. MALCOLM: Mr. Hudd is our trade commissioner in New York.

Mr. COOTE: Just the one.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, sole agent for Canada in the United States, and there is a commercial intelligence agent at Washington.

Mr. COOTE: How many trade agents are there altogether?

Mr. MALCOLM: Twenty-four.

Mr. COOTE: The minister might very well consider this year increasing the number of trade agents in the United States. The United States is the largest customer we have and one of the wealthiest nations of the world. It seems to me that we should have more trade agents in the United States if we are maintaining twenty-four altogether. Possibly we are overlooking the increase of trade with our nearest neighbour who should be our best customer.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister a representative in this service in China, and what is he doing at the present time?

Mr. MALCOLM: One man in Shanghai.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In view of the increase of one in the number of agents, does the minister not think he could make a decrease of one in the case of China?

Mr. MALCOLM: We just heard from our agent in Shanghai telling us to go ahead and ship all the merchandise we like.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to express the opposite view from that expressed by the hon. member for Kingston. Those of us in western Canada are looking towards China as the place where we will find greater markets for our agricultural produce, and I would suggest to the minister that instead of removing the representative from China he should do all he can to find new markets for us in that country and do everything possible looking to the development of our market there. Our governments, whether Liberal or Conservative, have insisted on one thing, and that is that they must bring in a large number of people to exploit the vacant lands in Canada and increase production, but they do very little towards finding a market for that increased production, and naturally it becomes a problem for the producers. If the government are going to spend any money on trade commissioners they might very well endeavour to increase trade between this country and China.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, including 1926 census, $250,000.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the explanation for the decrease?

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. MALCOLM: The quinquennial census work of course necessitated a larger vote last year. There is less money required during the coming year for this work.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the expenditure on the census?

Mr. MALCOLM: From April 1, 1921, to March 31, 1925, the total cost was $2,122,000. For the last census the expenditure to date is $429,000, but there is still work to be done in compiling and publishing the returns.

Mr. COOTE: I do not know whether the question should be raised on this item, but I should like the minister to enlighten the committee in regard to it. The census enumerators as a rule will not accept the answer that a person is a Canadian; they say he must be described as Scotch, Irish, English, German, Ruthenian, and so on. Is it necessary that a Canadian should trace back his ancestry until he finds from what particular country his forebears came?

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend is quite correct, and he would assist the Bureau of Statistics by furnishing a definition of what constitutes a Canadian. The statistical department is trying to compile its information on racial lines. It is a difficult question, and I think the committee would be willing to hear suggestions at the right time.

Mr. WARD: Why should there be any difficulty? Are we not proud of our country? Are we not satisfied to call it Canada?

Mr. MALCOLM: Is a Chinaman born in Vancouver a Canadian?

Mr. COOTE: I am a little doubtful myself about this. I understand, although of course I could not verify it personally, that my great-grandfather was born in Ireland. I do not know whether anyone would ever suspect it.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. COOTE: On the other hand, my mother was born in the Orkney islands. Now, should I insist on telling the census enumerator that I am a Canadian, or should I say that my origin is Scotch or Irish? I would suggest to the minister that at any rate a person born in this country, one of whose parents was also born here, should be entitled to describe himself as a Canadian.

Mr. HARRIS: I should like again to draw the attention of the minister to a point that has been raised on several occasions since 1921 in regard to our manufacturing institutions filing all manner of returns with the government which are more or less a duplication. For instance, the census of industry asks for a report as to the conduct of business, the hours of labour, the number of employees, the rates of pay, and so on. A month later the Department of Labour will ask for similar information. Then a subdivision dealing with chemical and metallurgical industry will ask for practically the same particulars as have been already supplied to the census of industry. It was urged in this House in 1922, and again in 1923 and 1924 that this work should be consolidated so that business institutions would not be bothered with this duplication of returns. In 1923 it was suggested that an attempt be made to coöperate with the provincial governments, which in most cases require similar information from business institutions in connection with the Workmen's Compensation Act and similar legislation. I would also point out to the minister that in the income tax returns a good deal of information has to be given that has already been furnished to the census of industry. Is any effort being made to coördinate this work and so save our business and manufacturing institutions a lot of unnecessary labour?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am glad to be able to tell my hon. friend that a good deal of progress has been made towards eliminating the duplication of statistics. That was primarily the idea in creating the bureau. More and more the various departments of government are centralizing their work. Not only so, but the Dominion Statistician is endeavouring to coöperate still more with the provincial governments in order to avoid the necessity of making two sets of vital statistics. I agree with my hon. friend as to the character of the returns required from manufacturing concerns —some of the statistics required by the bureau are very difficult of compilation. I took the matter up with the Dominion Statistician, and he told me that he had very little trouble in administering the act. Where he has found it work a hardship on smaller business people he has not made himself at all objectionable.

Mr. ARTHURS: What about other departments?

Mr. HARRIS: Has there been any coördination with other departments?

Mr. MALCOLM: We are working on Labour statistics at the present time in order to get them all under one bureau. The Fisheries statistics have been taken into the bureau, also all the trade statistics and the Customs and Excise statistics.

Mr. HARRIS: As a matter of fact, more statistics are asked for to-day by the Department of Labour than by all the other departments. Would the minister tell us the cost of operating the department which has to do do with securing returns from chemical and metallurgical industries? And why the necessity for this branch when the census of industry covers the same ground?

Mr. MALCOLM: We have never attempted to segregate the cost of any particular branch of work of a general staff.

Mr. HARRIS: Is it not a fact that the census of industry branch has one head and one staff carrying on a line of investigation similar to that conducted by the chemical and metallurgical branch of the Bureau of Statistics which also has a head and a staff? Are they not accumulating the same information and is it not true that one of these branches was established within the last five years?

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not think that is correct but I shall be glad to look into the matter to see whether there is any overlapping. We have been endeavouring to eliminate any duplication. There are not two staffs engaged in metallurgical work.

Mr. HARRIS: I do not want to be misunderstood. I did not suggest that there were two staffs in the metallurgical branch but I do say that the census of industry obtained the same line of information as is secured by the chemical and metallurgical branch of the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the hon. member not referring to the Mines branch?

Mr. HARRIS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Very often two departments set up offices to obtain the same information. For example, the Customs department very largely duplicates the report of the Trade and Commerce department. I was wondering whether my hon. friend referred to the metallurgical branch of the Mines department.

Mr. HARRIS: No. They are both under the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. STEVENS: That should not be.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is it intended to provide the Bureau of Statistics with a decent building in the near future? The building in which the bureau is now housed is pretty much of a box car.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the Minister of Public Works will provide a better building, no one will be more pleased than myself.

Mr. WARD: I represent what may be called an extremely cosmopolitan district and the enumerators in taking the census two months ago met with a great deal of difficulty in eliciting from Ukrainians any admission that they were Ukrainians. They insisted that they were Canadians. They said, "You teach us Canadian ways and you insist on our becoming Canadians, and yet you want us to admit that we are Ukrainians." We are making ourselves most ridiculous in the eyes of these people; we are not fair with them and I see no reason in the wide world why, during all these years, we should have continued the present anomaly. Simply because our forebears may have come from parts of the universe where we may be utterly unknown we are bound to describe ourselves as of this and that nationality. The time has come when, as a duty to these new Canadians, we should establish a distinctly Canadian nationality.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): This question is one that concerns not only the newer parts of Canada but the oldest organized sections as well. No father or mother in Ontario, or any other province, though Canadian-born, can register a child as a Canadian; it does not matter whether the parentage is Canadian for two or three generations back, unless some change is made the name "Canadian" means nothing.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): During the last census this summer the Bureau of Statistics did endeavour to do some work along this line, and I believe a new definition of Canadian citizenship is now fixed. There is a regulation in this regard. The idea, I believe, is to define as a Canadian anyone born of the third generation of natives.

Mr. KAISER: Last year on two or three occasions I interviewed the Bureau of Statistics on this question, which is one I have had under consideration for some time. We should be able to define precisely what a Canadian is. It is a lamentable fact that those of us who have to write out birth and death certificates are unable to say that a man who dies or a child who is born is a Canadian; the certificate must give this or that nationality. It would be well to decide that anyone born in Canada should be regarded as a Canadian, and in our statistical tables there might be a special column to show that, with another column indicating racial origin. Certainly we should start at some point and say what constitutes a Canadian.

Mr. MALCOLM: I agree with my hon. friend. In a general way there is no reason why those of us of English extraction, those of us of the white races at least, should not be called Canadians if born in Canada. When I looked into the matter, however, I appreciated the difficulties with which it bristled and with which the Census bureau must cope. It is our desire, just as it is the desire in the United States, to have some record of the number of people from foreign countries who have become Canadians. We want, for instance, to keep track of the number of Chinese in Canada, and there are Chinese and Japanese on the Pacific coast, born of the third generation in this country.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many?

Mr. MALCOLM: I have not the figures. I think it is just as well for us to retain this information. I have no doubt the whole subject will be found quite interesting, if any hon. member cares to look into it. It has been given a good deal of consideration and I can assure the committee that I will take the matter up with the bureau before the next census is taken in 1931.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister refers to Chinese and Japanese, but he fails to appreciate the difficulty in which Canadians find themselves.

Mr. MALCOLM: I appreciate it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In recording the birth of a child there is only one comprehensive definition possible, and that is Nordic. You may use that term and be perfectly safe, but you cannot call the child Irish unless both parents are full-blooded Irish. The same thing applies to Scottish people, and yet for the sake of a few Chinese and Japanese all our records are wrong. I do not know of any classification under which you would put a Canadian other than Nordic.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would suggest that this subject should be discussed under a resolution. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) is quite right; he knows the difficulties of the medical profession, but that is a matter of provincial record, where the same difficulty arises as in the census record.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think the main difficulty in the past has been that we had a few Indians in Canada and they would be naturally the first Canadians. At present they are all on the other side, so that we do not need to worry about them. As far as true Chinamen of the second and third generation go, I do not think that is any argument. I do think something should be done whereby a man born in Canada, one or both of whose parents were also born in Canada, should be classified as a Canadian.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): I see that the reduction amounts to $375,000, and I would like to know if that is wholly accounted for by the census which was taken?

Mr. MALCOLM: That was by far the largest item.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): The work of the bureau is not being impaired?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, it is being slightly increased. I think if the general vote were treated by itself there would be a slight increase.

Item agreed to.

Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, administration of (export of electrical energy), $1,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister be good enough to state the amount of electrical energy exported last year; whether any new contracts were made, and if so, where?

Mr. MALCOLM: I can inform the committee there were no new contracts entered into last year, although there is one contract being held up at present at the request of the Premier of New Brunswick. The revenue has not changed much; it was $288,000 for 1925-26, and $270,000 for 1926-27.

Mr. STEVENS: How much energy is exported?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am sorry I have not the total. I have the list but it is not totalled.

Mr. STEVENS: While those figures are being compiled would the minister say whether it is increasing or decreasing?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is decreasing. There may be a slight increase in the export by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, however. In the renewal of their contract they requested that they be allowed to export 100 per cent of their off-peak power, and the department granted that request. Their old contract only allowed them to export 75 per cent of that power, but there was no advantage in keeping them from selling the other 25 per cent, so there may be a slight increase. I can now inform my hon. friend that the export last year amounted to 289,000 kilowatts.

Item agreed to.

Gold and Silver Marking Act, $6,000.

Mr. STEVENS: There was a recommendation made last year by the special committee investigating the customs department which I think would come under this act, and I was wondering whether that recommendation has been observed?

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not remember the recommendation, and I do not believe it has been called to my attention since I came into the department.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I recall it. Certain seizures have been made of jewellery, gold and silver stamped goods, and I think the suggestion was that these goods should be turned over to the mint to be melted down into bullion rather than be sold on the market in competition with bona fide goods. Would that come under this vote?

Mr. MALCOLM: I am informed that that would not come under this act.

Item agreed to.

Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research, $170,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I desire to say a word in connection with this item. I see that this vote has been slightly increased, but I want to express my opinion to the minister that after a good deal of sympathetic study of this question I believe the amount is altogether too small. I think the time has arrived when Canada should take a definite stand on the question of establishing a bureau of standards and a fully equipped research laboratory. Members of the House will recall that about 1918 a committee of this House made a very complete report on this subject and recommended the establishment of such plants here, similar to the Mellon Institute in the United States, in order that this great country with its remarkable opportunities and vast quantities of raw materials may bring science and industry together, as I heard one of the leading scientists of the country put it last week, and in order to derive the fullest possible advantage of the application of science to industry. It is too late to do anything this session of course, but I would like to appeal to the minister—and I know I am appealing to sympathetic ears—that during the coming recess a definite scheme should be worked out and if necessary a special bill introduced into this House—some time early in next session, in order that it may be given full consideration—providing for the establishment of such a bureau of standards and research laboratory in Canada. In this country we turn out some of the best educated young men in the world, hundreds of whom go to the United States when they finish their schooling here. They each cost us perhaps from $10,000 to $20,000 for their education, then they go to the United States where they enter the big industries and where they are giving wonderful service. I am told that approximately 60 per cent of the honour graduates of one university—the very cream of Canadian young manhood, and I suppose the same thing would apply to almost all our universities—find positions south of the line after they have received their schooling in this country. At the same time we have waiting for solution in this country problems which are not exceeded by those of any other country in the world. I am not offering this suggestion in a spirit of criticism at all, but rather as a wholly non-partisan matter, something which is not political but which is national in its importance. I am offering the suggestion so that next year parliament may be in possession of some definite suggestion by the government for the establishment of such a bureau here. I have in mind this: that Canada ought to vote forthwith—not this session, I presume that is impossible; when I say forthwith I mean at the earliest opportunity —say a million dollars for the establishment of a first-class, highly equipped plant here, and then give the committee a grant of say $250,000 or $300,000 a year for its operation. Of course, a moderate fee should be charged those who use the plant in any proposition which they bring to the institute for solution. Some revenue will be received, although not enough, of course, to pay the cost. I urge the minister, if he will take the suggestion from me, that perhaps the greatest service that could be rendered to Canada during the next decade would be the erection of such a plant in Ottawa, or whatever suitable place may be chosen, and I hope that next year we may have in the estimates, or in the form of a special bill, provision for such an establishment.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I ask the minister if he will leave this item over until after recess? It is one of the most important items in the whole estimate. I spoke a year ago on this work of a bureau of standards, and what it actually means to the manufacturer and to the consumer—more to the consumer than to the manufacturer. I should like to take the matter up in connection with the report of the research committee to-night.

Mr. MALCOLM: I can assure my hon. friend that I shall be pleased to leave the item over if he wishes to make any comments in line with the comments made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I know the committee will appreciate the difficulty that I as a new minister necessarily experienced in taking up any comprehensive scheme in the first few months I was in charge of the department.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite.

Mr. MALCOLM: May I say that I am entirely sympathetic towards the idea. I do not believe that we have expended in Canada anything like the amount of money we might on industrial research, or even on agricultural research. There is a slight increase in the vote this year, and there will likely be an increase in the supplementaries for some work that is being arranged for. I shall be delighted indeed to hear and to consider any comments favourable to the work that hon. members wish to make in committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps this would be the proper place to announce what is being done in Montreal. So important has this matter become to the pulp and paper men that the present quarters at McGill university having proved inadequate they have subscribed $350,000 of their own money to provide more suitable quarters which they will turn over to the university at the end of twenty years. The officials who are engaged in scientific research work in connection with pulp and paper will be established in these quarters, and we hope that possibly some arrangement may be made in connection with the wood industries generally. I wish to add my testimony to what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has said, that no one can overestimate the value of scientific research. I think we have delayed long enough in the establishment of a central bureau here. Not only should we do that, but we should utilize the services of every university in Canada, as is done now under the scientific research bureau, and thus bring into play all those activities that will mean so much for the development of science and industry in this country and will perhaps, as my hon. friend has said, provide employment for a great many more of our young men who take this special training.

Mr. TOLMIE: I wish to say a word in support of this proposal to increase our research facilities in Canada, having in mind particularly that phase of the question which has reference to the contagious diseases of animals and the necessity of pathological research along these lines, so as to obviate the great loss from which we suffer in this country from these diseases, and effect a large saving in the compensation which has to be paid. I wish to commend the government for the construction of a large pathological laboratory near Hull, which is a step in the right direction. A few years ago we had an outbreak of disease amongst horses in the province of Saskatchewan, and in one year we paid $47,000 in compensation. The gentleman in charge out there at that time, having his headquarters at Lethbridge, was Dr. Watson, now the head of the pathological laboratory across the river. Dr. Watson was able to discover a blood test which he applied to these horses so as to diagnose the disease before the ordinary symptoms appeared. In about six years, by carrying on work along this line, he reduced the amount of compensation paid from $47,000 to $300, and the next year to $70. Since then nothing at all has been paid. Thus this work resulted in a complete saving to the country and it is only a little illustration of what it is possible to do along this line. I think that everyone who has the good of Canada at heart, and realizes to anything like a full extent the wonderful opportunities for research work in this country, will stand strongly behind any policy brought down by the government which has that object in view.

Mr. EVANS: What research work is being done in connection with the various grades of wheat?

Mr. MALCOLM: I understand that the facilities at the Winnipeg laboratory are being increased. New equipment is being added, and I hope to ask for an increase in the supplementary estimates to continue the work on an even larger scale than we anticipated when the main estimates were brought down.

Item stands.

Motion picture bureau, $35,000.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister would explain what work this bureau is carrying on?

Mr. MALCOLM: The vote is to meet the salaries of employees and the travelling expenses of officials, and provide facilities for the production of motion pictures, lantern slides and photographic enlargements. The expert technical knowledge of the staff of the bureau is now available to any branch or department of the federal government desirous of making use of its services. A great saving is effected by having all the photographic work of the department in the one building. I may say that the service to the other departments is on a cost basis. The motion picture bureau has taken a great many films which are used to advertise Canada, and which are sold under contract to exhibitors in various parts of United States and in other countries. There is of course some revenue received from the bureau. The revenue for 1925-26 amounted to $22,000. The revenue for the first half of 1926-27 was $10,500. We anticipate that by reason of some new contracts we have been able to make—our director having returned from Hollywood with certain contracts in his pocket—we shall have a largely increased revenue from the motion picture bureau this year as compared with the previous year.

Mr. STEVENS: It will be practically self-sustaining.

Mr. MALCOLM: As the hon. member says, it will be practically self-sustaining and will probably show a profit.

Mr. COOTE: Do they take only Canadian pictures?

Mr. MALCOLM: Altogether Canadian pictures.

Mr. COOTE: Have they charge of motion picture work for the Parks branch, or is that separate?

Mr. MALCOLM: The motion picture bureau does the work for the Parks branch.

Item agreed to.

Weights and measures inspection, including International Bureau of Weights and Measures, $315,000.

Mr. COOTE: What is the revenue in connection with this branch?

Mr. MALCOLM: This is another self-sustaining branch. The excess last year of receipts over expenditures amounted to $14,864. The branch has been on a revenue basis for the last few years.

Item agreed to.

Halifax elevator, towards construction of, $185,000.

Mr. KENNEDY: I thought this elevator was completed.

Mr. MALCOLM: This amount is required to provide for installation of new grain conveyors, fees for the engineer for supervision of same, and to provide for the balance due on the conveyors being installed in 1926-27, also for the engineer's commission for supervision and for any contingencies which might arise. The total amount of $185,000 completes the elevator, putting it into condition so that three boats can load at one time. The problem with the elevator was to get enough conveyors to load the boats quickly, and new conveyors had to be installed after the elevator was equipped, taken over and operated.

Mr. KENNEDY: How much grain went through the elevator last year?

Mr. MALCOLM: I have not the exact figures, but if my memory serves me rightly about 5,000,000 bushels went through it last year and the loading was very slow.

Mr. COOTE: I understand that a harbour commission has been established in Halifax. Is the elevator to be turned over to that commission for operation, or will it be operated separately by the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. MALCOLM: At present the Department of Trade and Commerce is operating the elevator. Whether it will be turned over to the newly formed Halifax harbour commission or not is a question of future policy and discussion. It has not been considered as yet.

Mr. COOTE: What is the cost of this elevator, including this last amount, and what is its capacity?

Mr. MALCOLM: The cost of the elevator to date is $808,000, including these extra conveyors. The superstructure cost practically $600,000, the foundation practically $20,000, and the balance was for equipment and conveyors. It has a storage capacity of 1,000,000 bushels, a cleaning capacity of 40,000 bushels per day, a loading capacity on cars of 60 cars per day and an unloading capacity of the same quantity. It has a boat-loading capacity of 300,000 bushels per day. Its bagging plant takes care of 24,000 bushels per day.

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Civil government—Immigration and Colonization—salaries, $265,850; contingencies, $45,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What are the increases in the staff?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The details will be found on page 79 of the estimates. There is an increase of four.

Mr. GARDINER: I notice that the minister has in the department a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister, a commissioner of immigration and a commissioner of colonization. Will he explain the different duties of those four officials?

Mr. FORKE: I do not suppose it is necessary to give the duties of the deputy minister. There is an assistant deputy minister and a pretty large staff. The activities of the department are very wide. The deputy minister, of course, at times has to go away on different duties in connection with the department, and it has been found necessary to have an assistant deputy minister.

Mr. STEVENS: What is his name?

Mr. FORKE: F. C. Blair. There are three divisions, eastern, middle and western, and the commissioner of immigration has charge of the different divisions. The commissioner of colonization is in charge of the different activities of his department.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We know the definition of colonization. What are the commissioner's duties?

Mr. FORKE: He has charge of the work of placing farm labourers in positions and locating farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume he would act between immigrants guaranteed positions and applicants for farm help.

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Where does the work of the commissioner of immigration end and that of the commissioner of colonization begin?

Mr. FORKE: The commissioner of immigration is directly interested in attracting immigrants, which necessitates his keeping in touch with all the overseas offices of his department. The commissioner of colonization is more particularly interested in immigrants after their arrival here.

Mr. COOTE: Is not the Soldier Settlement Board now really a colonization board? And does this item include the staff of that board?

Mr. FORKE: There is a separate estimate for the Soldier Settlement Board.

Mr. COOTE: The colonization branch?

Mr. FORKE: There is a land settlement branch in connection with the Soldier Settlement Board, which is a distinct branch, although the two work in unison.

Mr. COOTE: Is there a division of work, the land settlement board looking after certain settlers and the commissioner of colonization looking after others? To an outsider there seems to be a good deal of overlapping in this department.

Mr. FORKE: There is no overlapping, although of course they may be brought in touch with each other occasionally in the course of their work. The land settlement board is more particularly concerned with the three thousand family scheme for the settling of British farmers, and other schemes. The officials are really connected with the Soldier Settlement Board.

Mr. COOTE: Could not all the work of the land settlement board and the Soldier Settlement Board be handled to much better advantage under the one department?

Mr. FORKE: They are under the Department of Immigration and Colonization, although at the present time there are three commissioners of the Soldier Settlement Board. Ultimately I hope to bring them all directly under the control of my department. I have no complaints on the score of efficiency, but I do think it would be better to have these two branches of the service under one control.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me that probably for the past three years the Soldier Settlement Board has been engaged in straight colonization work. I know a great many people are asking why we need that board to carry on virtually the same work as the department of colonization. One department ought to be sufficient.

Mr. FORKE: I would point out to the hon. member that the land settlement board and the Soldier Settlement Board have practically the same officials. The supervisors of the Soldier Settlement Board look after soldier settlers and also after farmers who have come to us under the three thousand family scheme; in fact they supervise all the activities in connection with colonization. There is no overlapping, for the Department of Immigration has no officials doing that particular kind of work. Undoubtedly those officials are very helpful in placing settlers on farms and looking after them for a few years.

Mr. COOTE: Is it too much to expect that in the next year or two we shall be able to get along with fewer commissioners? The minister said there were three in the Soldier Settlement Board, and two are mentioned in this list. To an outsider five commissioners to look after our colonization work is suggestive of overstaffing.

Mr. FORKE: I should not like to say that. Of course, when we come to the Soldier Settlement Board it will be a matter of legitimate criticism as to whether it is the best possible organization for the work it handles. It must be borne in mind that I have not yet had time to become thoroughly familiar with the ramifications of my department, which extend not only throughout the Dominion but all over the United States and in many of the countries of Europe. In fact, we are in touch with every civilized country in the world. So far I see no reason to believe that these officials are not absolutely necessary. We have a commissioner for the eastern division who certainly has to cover a very large field, and the same remark applies to the commissioner of the central and western divisions. In fact, these and other men have a great deal more work to attend to than those outside the department would imagine.

Mr. GARDINER: Does this item refer only to the Ottawa officials?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Has the minister the information as to the number of juvenile immigrants brought in during the past year? Or would he rather deal with this under another item?

Mr. FORKE: There were 975 brought to Ontario.

Mr. COOTE: All from Britain?

Mr. FORKE: Yes. The department gives after-care to a great many of the boys brought out, and it is a part of the duties of the commissioner to see to that.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is impossible for us over here to hear what is being said. This seems to be a private conversation.

Mr. FORKE: There were brought out to the country last year in all 1470 boys, 975 of whom came to Ontario.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In connection with juvenile work the minister seems to have come into collision with the Salvation Army. Will he explain why he has taken such a stand against the work of the Salvation Army?

Mr. FORKE: I cannot very well answer that question because I deny having taken any such stand. If hon. gentlemen cannot hear me perhaps it is because of my Scotch accent.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There is no need to laugh. This is an interesting question and I have a right to hear what the minister says.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no need to insult the minister.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If the Minister of Railways will come and sit over here he will see how difficult it is for us to hear.

Mr. FORKE: I will do my best to make myself heard.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask hon. members to keep better order.

Mr. FORKE: I am anxious to give any information I can regarding the subject. I can assure my hon. friends that it is no laughing matter to me. I am quite serious at this moment. I think all hon. gentlemen will appreciate the statement that I have no inclination just now to be facetious or to indulge in humour. I do not agree with the suggestion that I have shown any antagonism towards the Salvation Army.

Mr. CANTLEY: The public press discloses beyond any possibility of doubt that there is a serious difference of opinion between the minister or his department and the officers of the Salvation Army. We want to know what are the causes of difference and what the minister has done to meet the situation satisfactorily.

Mr. ROBB: Every hon. member knows that when a minister is putting through his estimates he has prepared an outline of the work which he follows consecutively. I think we should get along much better and my colleague (Mr. Forke) would be in a more advantageous position to answer questions if we were to dispose of civil government first and then, in connection with the votes for the various societies, discuss questions in relation thereto.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): A question was raised regarding juvenile work and in all seriousness I have asked for information. It seemed to me as though the minister were regarding the matter as a joke.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Immediately I ask for information hon. gentlemen opposite take me up. I am here for information and I am prepared to stay until I get it. What I want to know is quite relevant to the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If not under this item, will the minister indicate where we may discuss the general immigration policy of the department?

Mr. FORKE: It may be discussed under "immigration contingencies," which covers the whole field. But I have no objection to giving now any information in regard to juvenile work. I have here a long explanation which I do not consider it necessary to read. Coming into the department a few months ago, I was not very well acquainted with the various activities of the Salvation Army, but so far as I am concerned the first friction with that organization arose out of the fact that the Salvation Army was collecting a part of the transportation fees which had already been paid by the imperial and the federal governments. Hon. gentlemen have no doubt seen the explanations given by Commissioner Lamb regarding that statement. The Salvation Army received a grant of $25,000 for carrying on immigration work, and that seemed reasonable so long as no other organization was engaged in the same field. I found however, that there were ten or fifteen or more organizations, all anxious to assist in immigration work and all seeking grants from the Dominion government. It was impossible to give grants to all these organizations, who are doing bona fide work in furthering immigration, and the only thing for it was to cut out direct grants to any immigration association. The Salvation Army felt hurt but this decision, I can assure the committee, was dictated by no antagonism whatever to the organization in question. It was purely a matter of policy, and I do not think that either the Salvation Army or any other association can possibly find fault with the department for taking such a step.

With regard to juvenile immigration, I may observe that boys under seventeen are brought over free of charge, whether they come out to institutions devoted to the welfare of boys, or to any of the provincial organizations. The Dominion government pays fifty per cent and the imperial government the other fifty. More than that, the federal government makes a grant to the farm—such as the Vimy farm in Ontario—of $20 for each boy while the provincial government contributes a like sum. The imperial government makes a grant of $40.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): To whom?

Mr. FORKE: Either to the Ontario government or to the particular organization under whose control the boys may be. We are trying to establish farms in all the provinces, and the work is being taken up. The Salvation Army has exactly the some opportunities as any other organization. Apart from the withdrawal of the grant, the first trouble that arose in connection with the army was due to the fact that, although the transportation fees were being paid by the imperial and federal governments, the Salvation Army was collecting money from the boys after they had come to Canada. Their statement was that before leaving Great Britain the boys agreed to pay a certain sum to the Army in order that other boys should have the same advantages, while quite a number of boys came here and they said that when they signed the document they were under the impression that they were repaying the Salvation Army for their passage money. I am not making any charge against the Salvation Army, but I do say the boys were under a misapprehension, and in speaking to Commissioner Lamb I think I told him that I knew something of what it meant for a boy to come out here and work for a farmer for $10 a month Commissioner Lamb said the boy would get $20 a month, but I wonder where boys fifteen and sixteen years of age are being paid $20 a month on farms? They get about $10 a month, and when the Salvation Army collected some of that money, and perhaps most of it, there was not much left. The arrangement was that the farmer would pay the money direct to the Salvation Army, that the boy would not get it at all, and I still think this gave the boy a bad start; in many cases it might cause him to lose heart and become a failure without having had a fair chance. I know that Commissioner Lamb will not agree with what I am saying, but I have had some practical experience in dealing with boys, perhaps more than he has had. That was the whole trouble, and I do not know of anything other than that. The Salvation Army has the same opportunities and the same privileges accorded other organizations, and we are willing to cooperate with them in just the same way. I am sorry Commissioner Lamb got into the newspapers, because I do not think it did either the department or the Salvation Army any good. I have tried to make the situation as plain as I can and I think roughly that covers the whole case.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would like to ask the minister a question in that connection. I understand that he objects to the Salvation Army having any private arrangement with the boy who comes out under their auspices, to the effect that he will pay back a certain sum to the army in the course of a certain length of time. My understanding is that this is an arrangement or agreement between the Salvation Army officials and the immigrant boy, and I cannot look upon it as the minister does. I do not think it is a handicap to the boy; to the contrary, I think it makes him feel that he is doing something worth while in assisting to bring another boy to the country where he has found employment.

Let us consider the statement of the minister. He says it is wrong for the Salvation Army to make an arrangement with a boy immigrant whereby that boy agrees to pay a certain sum of money to the Salvation Army to assist in bringing out another boy. Let us take the case of a man coming to Canada from Italy, let us say, or some other part of continental Europe. It is a fact, as the minister must know, that there are organizations in this country which put up money for that immigrant to show when he lands here, in order to prove that he is not a pauper. That money is turned back to that organization when he lands here within a certain period of time, by arrangement; then the money is used to bring out another person. What about that principle?

Mr. FORKE: I have no knowledge of any such thing.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend can say that he has only been in the department a short time, and we will accept that excuse for his want of knowledge. But let me tell him something further. There is a well-established organization in New York with a branch right in Ottawa which brings immigrants to this country. Supposing I make a representation, or some other member of this House makes a representation, to the minister to allow a certain immigrant to enter this country to work on a farm. I get my permit and go to the agent of this New York company in Ottawa and say, "Here is a permit for an immigrant." He will give me a cheque on the bank in Ottawa for $50 for each immigrant I get in in that way. Does the minister not know of that fact, that there are people in this country who are simply taking the voters' list or the telephone directory, writing out a list of names and getting permits from the department to bring immigrants into this country, which permits are turned into cash by presenting them to the agent of this New York organization? Does he not know that there is a well-established underground channel for conveying into the United States those immigrants who, for obvious reasons, do not want to stay in Canada? There is a systematized organization at work getting men into Canada under these false representations and then smuggling them across the line. It is all very well to say that this does not happen often, but will the minister tell me that he is not aware of the fact that there are firms right here in Canada—one in the city of Toronto whose name just escapes me for the moment—which put up the money and which have banking arrangements in Europe, so that the immigrant from that continent can say he is not a pauper? The company makes an arrangement with him and he not only pays back the amount they put up for him to make good in entering this country, but he has to pay as well a mighty good commission. Then that money is used again to bring in other immigrants in the same way; they have a complete organization, with a banking system on the continent of Europe and with agents here in Canada. That is going on now and has been going on for some time. The minister says that is all right; he does not object to that, but if the Salvation Army sees fit to enter into a private arrangement with a boy whom they bring to this country, in order that he may assist them in the work they are carrying on by paying back to the Salvation Army a certain amount of money in a certain time, the minister finds that objectionable.

Mr. FORKE: When I said I did not know anything about this, perhaps I did not exactly state the case, although I was speaking truthfully in one respect. I can assure the hon. member that this has been one of the great sources of trouble to me since I took over this department; it came upon me like a clap of thunder, because I never assumed that any such operations were being carried on. I have no doubt that it is being done, but every attempt of which I become aware will receive no favour and no consideration from me as Minister of Immigration. I think perhaps it is nothing like as bad as the hon. member seems to think, but I do not intend to do anything in my position as Minister of Immigration which will not stand investigation, and I hope to be able to face this House at any time and say I have done what I thought was right, and face any criticism which may result. I will make mistakes and blunders, but I want the House to know that no hon. member will ever find me entering into any arrangements of any kind which are not upright and honourable in every way.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Lest the minister and other members of the House should be under a misapprehension, I want to say here and now that I do not doubt his sincerity or integrity for one moment. I did not question the integrity of the minister, I had no such idea in my mind, but I think that I am perhaps pretty near the mark when I say this: He has just confessed that he is new in the department. It is a very exacting department, one which requires a lot of study and a lot of work, and as time goes on the minister will appreciate that even more perhaps than he does now. Necessarily, as a new minister, he has to be more or less dependent upon his deputy. That is the case with all ministers. But I want to say right here that I have not as much faith in his deputy as perhaps he has. I did not think it was a good selection at the time the deputy was appointed. He had had no previous knowledge in regard to this department and I think, having regard to the importance of that department, the government would have been well advised to have selected a man of wider experience. The deputy is necessarily first adviser to the minister in regard to these matters. I do not believe the deputy knows anything more about them than the minister does himself. He has not had the experience, and I think that in the case of a department as important as the Department of Immigration and Colonization the minister should have been provided with a man who has had experience, more experience than his deputy has had, who could give him advice with respect to these questions.

Personally I do not think that the position assumed by the minister or the department in regard to the Salvation Army is well taken. The minister will not question the fact that the immigrant boys brought out by the Salvation Army are a good class of boys who will make good citizens. Then why should we bother our heads about any private arrangement that is made between the immigrants and the Salvation Army? We want immigrants of the proper type who will make good citizens brought to this country. At all events the class of boys that the Salvation Army is bringing out are boys who will, so far as their education has gone, have the same ideals of government as we have. They are boys who can be moulded into good citizens very easily, and I would go quite a long way in encouraging immigrants of that class rather than a class from foreign countries whose ideals of citizenship and of government are vastly different from our own, and who may be moulded into Canadian citizens only after the lapse of some time. I would discriminate in favour of, and give every possible encouragement to, the class of immigrants who can easily be made into Canadian citizens, rather than open the door wide to immigrants whose ideals of government and institutions are very different from ours, and whom it will take years and years to turn into thorough Canadian citizens. There is rather too much of a tendency to open the door to immigrants from the south and east of Europe and to close it to immigrants from the motherland, or at least to make it difficult for them to enter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would my hon. friend explain how the door is closed against immigrants from the old land?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I did not say that the door was closed against them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): At any rate you said it was made difficult for them to enter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, it is made difficult for them to enter. Here is an instance in regard to the Salvation Army where I think the government have been too strict, where they have drawn the line rather tight, in shutting out immigrants who are admittedly of the class we want to get in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not shutting out Britishers.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think we have been too strict in regard to the immigrant boys brought out by the Salvation Army.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They were not shut out.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I did not say they were shut out. I said the immigration of these boys was restricted and discouraged.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If you do not call it discouragement, what do you call it—encouragement?

Mr. FORKE: The Salvation Army boys are getting exactly the same chance as any other immigrants. At the present moment they are under no disabilities whatever. May I explain that the Salvation Army was getting a grant of $25,000 a year for its immigration and colonization work? As I tried to explain at the outset we were giving all the after-care that was necessary in regard to the immigrants that were coming in because I take this position—that no matter what organization is engaged in immigration work the department is responsible, in the final analysis, for the immigrants that come to this country. I say frankly that I do not want to transfer my responsibility to any organization. Now the Salvation Army boys are getting the same chance as others. In the matter of transportation they come across free, the federal and imperial governments still pay the passage money, but now we give no $25,000 a year grant. We give the same treatment to the Salvation Army that is accorded, for example, to the Vimy Ridge organization. I am very sorry indeed that this matter with respect to the Salvation Army ever got into the newspapers. But for that there would have been no talk whatever about any antagonism between the department and the Salvation Army. I have a great admiration for the Salvation Army, and if I may be permitted to say so I have contributed every year out of my small resources toward the work that the Army is carrying on. This matter need never have been ventilated as it has been. Personally I think the Salvation Army made a mistake in getting into the newspapers and making a noise about a matter as to which they really have no grievance.

Mr. STEVENS: Did the minister cut off the grant of $25,000 a year?

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the grant continued to the Salvation Army?

Mr. FORKE: It is finished now.

Mr. STEVENS: I see, you have cut off the grant.

Mr. FORKE: I endeavoured to explain that there are church organizations, societies of all kinds, entering into immigration work. They all want some assistance. It may have been a mistake, I do not know—

Mr. CHAPLIN: How long have the Salvation Army been getting this special grant of $25,000?

Mr. FORKE: I could not tell you.

Mr. STEVENS: Your deputy can tell you in a moment.

Mr. FORKE: My deputy informs me that they have been getting a grant of a certain amount for about thirty years, but it never assumed any large proportion until five years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: Now it is cut off.

Mr. FORKE: It is cut off, yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have a deep appreciation of the situation in which the minister finds himself, and I am not inclined to be hypercritical about his course but rather in the greatest degree friendly. My understanding of the case is that the Salvation Army spend a good deal of money upon these boys before they ever leave the old country. The Army maintain training farms or stations which cost them a great deal of money. Now what they do, as I am informed, is this: they collect from the boys a certain sum, but that is not equal to the amount they spend on them before they start for this country. It is not the passage money that the boys repay; it is the money that is expended in preparing them to be citizens in Canada. I hope the minister will reconsider his decision, and that he will restore the grant to the Salvation Army.

Mr. FORKE: I want to explain before going any further that the $25,000 was not a grant made in connection with the boys; it was a grant for the general immigration work of the organization.

Mr. HOCKEN: No matter how the grant may be viewed by the department, if one studies broadly the work of the Salvation Army I think he will admit that there is no organization engaged in immigration work, trying to get good British citizens into Canada, that is quite as efficient as the Salvation Army. Needing population as we do and the Salvation Army being chiefly concerned in bringing out younger people, the very kind of people we want,—and I remember receiving applause from this side of the House one session when I suggested that boys rather than mature people should be brought out—I think the work which the Salvation Army are doing and endeavouring to do is the best that can be done. Why not encourage them to do that work? If there is any other organization that will undertake the same responsibilities and bring us the same class of citizens, why not give them a grant? If any other organization in England has a training depot to prepare boys for life in Canada, that work entails a heavy expense and it should be encouraged. Giving assistance in that way is much better than picking up boys in this or that town or some other part of Great Britain and bringing them out to Canada without any sorting out and without any training. My information is that many boys who are taken in hand by the Salvation Army for immigration to Canada are not sent out to this country because, during the period of training, the army discover that this or that boy is not likely to make good and so they do not send him out to us. They send out only those boys who, during the period of training, have shown that they are likely to become good citizens of Canada. I hope the minister will reconsider this matter and that this policy which he has adopted will be, to say the least, somewhat modified. Let him give the Salvation Army a liberal grant, and let him give a proportionate grant to any other organization that is doing work of the same character. Surely that is the best thing that can be done for the promotion of immigration of good quality to this country. Will the minister change his policy?

Mr. FORKE: I would not like at the present time to make any promise, because I want to reiterate that the Salvation Army is receiving exactly the same treatment as that accorded to other organizations which are dealing with boys. The department is giving them the $10 grant for every boy they train on their farm in England, and we are willing to pay, along with the Imperial government, one-half of the transportation charges. That involves a large amount of money when you figure it out for every boy coming to this country.

Mr. VENIOT: How much does the Army pay?

Mr. FORKE: The Army pays nothing for transportation. We are willing to give them the $10 grant for training the boy on the other side.

Mr. HOCKEN: That will not pay the cost of training.

Mr. FORKE: No. The British government is paying $20.

Mr. HOCKEN: That will buy only a suit of clothes.

Mr. FORKE: We are willing to pay them the $10 and we give the boys free transportation across the ocean. It is easy for hon. members to talk, but if you figure what the cost to the Dominion is, for all these boys you will find that you are not going to have many $25,000 grants to give to organizations throughout the country. There seems to be an impression that the Salvation Army is being discriminated against. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre speaks of the importance of their work. I have nothing to say against the Salvation Army, but there are other organizations doing just as good work.

Mr. HOCKEN: And maintaining training depots in the old country?

Mr. FORKE: That have training depots in the old country.

Mr. HOCKEN: What other organization is doing that?

Mr. FORKE: They do not have training farms, but they are doing training work. We have the Ontario government entering into this work on the Vimy ridge farm in connection with the Dominion government. The Manitoba government, the New Brunswick government and the Nova Scotia government are going to go into this work and we are making the same grants to all these boys. The total amount of money paid out in assisting immigration of this character will be considerable. This is not being done in a spirit of antagonism to the Salvation Army. I criticized their collection of money from these boys; as a practical farmer I did not think it was a wise policy to adopt. But that is only a matter of opinion; I am not condemning the Army for doing that.

Mr. HANSON: Did the department not issue a statement to the press that if the Army continued that practice the grant would be discontinued? I recall seeing in the press some time ago an apparently inspired statement to that effect. That is what has created the protest against the special treatment meted out to the Salvation Army. I am inclined to think the training which the New Brunswick government proposes to give to these boys is on this side of the water and not on the other.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a good deal of misconception about the position that is now taken as against that formerly taken by the department. Prior to the inception of the assisted passage scheme, grants were given to societies which engaged in this work. I increased the Salvation Army grant from $15,000 to $25,000, believing that the Army was a fair medium for this class of work. But the Barnardo home has been bringing boys to Canada for years and a number of patriotic associations have been doing the same thing.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the Barnardo home still doing that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. There are various organizations bringing out boys. My hon. friends will remember when in 1923, I think, we began the assisted passage scheme for boys from fourteen to seventeen years of age. Part of the passage was paid by the Imperial government and part by this government, and their transportation was absolutely free. There was no charge to any of these organizations for bringing the boys over. It was felt then that we might very well cut off the grants that were being earned by these various organizations which were engaged in this business of bringing in juvenile immigrants. The reason for that was that they were receiving from the two governments, under the assisted passage scheme, assistance which they never received before.

I am not familiar with the controversy that may have arisen over the Salvation Army; but if we are to give in a larger way than any $25,000 grant in assisting the Salvation Army to bring boys to this country, I do not see much necessity for continuing these grants. I am much interested in the attempt to work in harmony with the provincial government because this will prevent overlapping in organizations. Let the provincial government assume the responsibility of placing all immigrants, not only the juveniles but the adults as well. I tried that when I first became minister of the department. I went right across Canada, interviewed every provincial government, and said to them that if they would undertake the colonization of the immigrants who came into their province, we would be willing to pay our fair proportion of the cost of those immigrants, believing that the provincial government would have the best knowledge of and facilities for doing this work. I was however unable at the time to get the provinces to agree to that. They said: This is the business of the federal government; they ought not only to recruit immigrants, but to place them when they come into this country. I was unable to make that arrangement but I still think it is the ideal one.

Let the federal government provide an organization for the recruiting of those—children as well as adults—who may be required by the various provinces; let the federal government meet the expense of colonization; but let the work be assumed by the provincial government. My colleague is doing that in connection with juvenile immigration as far as it can be done, in an attempt to get away from these organizations some of which have been engaged in this work and some of which want to go into it. I realize the difficulty in dealing with these organizations. This is no sinecure for any minister. I am still convinced that I was right in 1922, and if we are going to have a real immigration policy in Canada, it is the only one that will work out successfully and the one that will cost the least.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is not the policy which the minister followed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The reason was that with the exception of making arrangements with the provinces for juveniles, I was unable to arrive at an agreement.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister under the grant gave assisted passages to those brought out by the Salvation Army and he raised no objection in connection with the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not when I raised the grant to the Salvation Army.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understand the Minister of the Interior to say that the Barnardo home is bringing out children now. Will he confirm that?

Mr. FORKE: They are not bringing very many.

An hon. MEMBER: Any at all?

Mr. FORKE: Oh, yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is there no regulation forbidding the bringing out of these children?

Mr. FORKE: Under fourteen years of age. There was an investigation made into the circumstances connected with the immigration of boys under fourteen years of age. After that investigation Margaret Bondfield came to Canada; her verdict was against boys of that age coming to Canada, and the immigration of boys of that age has been largely stopped. Very few are coming out unless to some special home.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think it is peculiar—and I am not referring to the present minister now, because this was done before he took office—that the Department of Immigration should take the word of Miss Bondfield—

Mr. FORKE: Oh, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is what the minister said.

Mr. FORKE: Almost every child welfare society in the country was objecting to the immigration of children under fourteen years of age.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. HOCKEN: The experience in this country will prove that we have had no better immigration to Canada than the immigration from the Barnardo home. Here and there it has been discovered that a boy did not make good, but taking the matter by and large the Barnardo home has done more good work for Canada in proportion to its opportunities and funds than any organization I know of. I am not blaming the minister, but the department does not believe that children under that age should come out. I disagree entirely with that view, and I disagree entirely with the argument that was used that a child should not come to Canada until he has received a public school education in England. If a child of five or six comes to Canada and is educated here he has a better chance of making good than if he is brought out at the age of fourteen or fifteen. I think no greater mistake has ever been made in the administration of this department than the prohibiting of the Barnardo home from carrying on the work it had performed for about fourteen years. Thousands of men who hold good positions in this country came out under the auspices of that organization. They have made good; some of them are wealthy men and are now contributing their funds to assist the organization which brought them out here. I think the department should cancel that regulation and permit the Barnardo home to use the same judgment that they have used for so many years in bringing children to this country.

The Salvation Army are bringing out a lot of immigrants. They get their passage money and are given, I think, $30 by the federal government and the Imperial government. That $30 does not pay for their training in the old country. An organization such as the Salvation Army, with its little groups and stations in practically every community in Canada, is in a better position to do good work in the matter of immigration than any other body. I see no reason why the Salvation Army should be forced to spend the money it has collected from other sources and for other purposes in the work of assisting immigration to Canada. I do not believe the $25,000 grant they have been receiving would by any means pay for what they spend upon the emigrants before they leave the other side. It is not fair to ask the Salvation Army to use their funds to advance immigration. They have given us the benefit of their widespread organizations, and they keep track of every immigrant who comes out under their auspices. It is a splendid organization and I think it would be a reasonable thing for the government to pay this $25,000. If there is any other organization doing the same kind of work and doing it as well as the Salvation Army why not pay that organization as well? Each society or organization which is concerned in immigration should be dealt with on its merits; there should not be a blanket regulation placed over all. Some are doing well and some not so well, but each should be tested by its accomplishment and treated with some degree of sympathy, not merely to show that we recognize their good work but also to encourage them in future.

Mr. ROWE: What other organizations have received grants of this kind, and how much in each case?

Mr. COOTE: While the minister is finding the answer to that question, I want to back him up in the cutting off of grants to different societies. If we are going to carry on the work of immigration let us do it ourselves. Let us spend the money on the people we want, and not hand it over to these societies.

Mr. PRICE: What amount is appropriated for the maritime provinces? We all know that in the past the maritime provinces have suffered in this respect; they have not received the amount of assistance which they deserve. In 1923 the railway department amalgamated the various amounts spent in the various provinces under the colonization scheme, and it is practically impossible to determine what is spent in each province. What does the minister propose to do in connection with the expenditure by his department in the maritime provinces? Judging by the legislation which has been brought down as a result of the Duncan report, it has become very apparent that in Canada to-day we need a broad east and west policy, not only for immigration and for railways, but for other departments. The time has arrived for the government to recognize this important matter and in determining their various expenditures throughout Canada to size up the situation from the east to the west and from the north to the south. It is time for the government to realize that the people of Canada expect something which will bring about a real consciousness of nationalization in this country. We want something which will tend to bring about a better feeling among the people from coast to coast. Let the Minister of Immigration tell us what he proposes to do in regard to expenditures in the maritime provinces.

Mr. FORKE: During the few months that I have been in the department I have recognized that, if colonization and immigration are to be successful, the coöperation of the people of the whole country must be had. I look upon immigrants as wards of this department. It is our duty to see that they get a fair chance. This can only be done effectively by individuals and communities and the provincial governments entering into coöperation with the Dominion authorities. We have in the west what are known as community building clubs, and they are of inestimable benefit in helping new immigrants. They meet the new arrivals, encourage them, give them advice and make them feel at home. I say again to the maritime provinces: You too have got to help; the Immigration department cannot do it alone. I am anxious that something shall be done for the maritime provinces not only as recommended by the Duncan report but in the way of immigration and colonization.

Mr. HANSON: Something of real value.

Mr. FORKE: Yes. We are ready to enter into negotiations with the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick governments. I was in error in saying that we have an arrangement with New Brunswick for boy immigrants; the arrangement is in relation to the three thousand family scheme. We have an arrangement with Nova Scotia for boy immigrants. They are taking one hundred boys this year as a start, working in coöperation with my department. We are willing to enter into the same arrangement with New Brunswick—in fact, as I said before, with all the provinces.

As to settling immigrants on some of the vacant lands in the maritime provinces, I find it rather a difficult proposition. Out of surplus funds in connection with the three thousand family scheme, the government has tried to get options on some vacant farms. Wherever we can get British families assisted by a loan of three hundred pounds from the Imperial government to settle on farms in the maritime provinces we are ready to proceed. But let me say again, we must have provincial coöperation if our efforts are to be successful. I do not want to see those people lose heart at the outset by being told that they cannot make a living on farms in the maritime provinces. I have seen some of those farms, and as a farmer I say that I would not be afraid to go down there and make a living. I do not see why British farmers could not do the same. I am willing and anxious to do all I can to help the maritime provinces secure immigrants, but I ask for coöperation by the provincial governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. So far I have found them willing to help me in this work.

Mr. HANSON: Then I understand the minister has not yet made any actual arrangement with the governments of the maritime provinces; he simply expresses his willingness to do so.

Mr. FORKE: Oh yes.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that Mr. Murray, the gentleman in charge of immigration work in New Brunswick, has gone to the old country. Has he made any arrangement with the minister's department with respect to this work? If so, what is it? We can only assimilate a certain number of people in my province at the beginning, but there should be no difficulty, if the organization is perfected, in making it possible to bring out families under the British government scheme and place them on small holdings in New Brunswick. They should be able to make a living there very easily from the beginning if they have had any training at all. I rather sympathize with the view of the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that the provinces ought to help in this immigration work, because at very little expense they can create the necessary machinery to place farmers on the land, and especially boys. There ought to be coöperation and coördination not only between the federal and provincial departments, but between the railways and the provincial and Dominion governments. I believe there is some such working arrangement already in effect. I think the minister will find the present government in New Brunswick sympathetic towards any scheme of immigration that he may propose to them. The scope of their ability to place men on the land at the beginning may be limited, but they want immigrants, and the minister will find the premier willing and ready to cooperate in any scheme that his deputy minister may propose, to a limited degree at the beginning, but gradually growing, as we all hope, to larger proportions.

While I am on my feet I should like to know if there is any contractual arrangement between the Department of Immigration and Dr. Cossar. I have known him for several years, and I believe him to be a real philanthropist. He came out to New Brunswick, bought one of the best farms at Gagetown, and placed in charge a competent man to train boys to become farmers. So far as I am aware only one boy of the large number that he has brought out has failed, and I have kept pretty close tab on the work done there. It has been a real success, but only on a very small scale. Dr. Cossar is not making any money out of the scheme; he is simply assisting boys in the old country to become farmers, and I would bespeak for him the most favourable consideration of the officials of the department. I understand the minister is going to the old country this summer, and I would suggest that before he embarks he take an opportunity of calling on Dr. Cossar to see if he cannot continue the arrangement made some years ago whereby the doctor brought out boys and trained them on his farm at his own expense with little or no assistance except from other philanthropic persons in the old country.

Mr. FORKE: Dr. Cossar brought out seventy-eight boys last year, and I am informed by the department that he is doing splendid work. We have a working arrangement with the New Brunswick government. We are in negotiation with them for a sort of three-way arrangement between the Imperial government, the federal Department of Immigration and the provincial government, but it is not in such shape that I can give it to the House. I think it is a good arrangement.

Mr. HANSON: Does Dr. Cossar get any assistance in his work?

Mr. FORKE: The boys get the regular grant for transportation.

Mr. COOTE: I would ask the member for York-Sunbury or the minister, or both of them, to tell us how they expect farmers from England to make a success of farming in New Brunswick if the New Brunswick people themselves cannot do so.

Mr. HANSON: Anybody with any gumption in New Brunswick is doing something. If the hon. gentleman will come down to the province I will show him in the county of York the most contented people on the face of the earth.

Mr. PRICE: Mr. Chairman, people in the maritime provinces are so busy filling various offices in western and central Canada that possibly they have not had time to attend to their duties at home. Farmers in the maritime provinces are doing fairly well, but I would point out that we have been handicapped down there, we have not enjoyed the opportunities of the other portions of the Dominion. For instance, the railway department is very anxious indeed to sell a long route ticket from the old country to a point in the Dominion as far west as possible. No attempt is made to detain these people or to give them an opportunity of looking over the possibilities of the maritime provinces. If immigrants from the old country after spending some time in the prairie provinces become dissatisfied and want to come east, the railways do not give them the benefit of excursion rates such as are extended to people going west from central Canada. The Minister of Railways will bear me out when I say that from Winnipeg and points further west the rate in the summer months to the coast is reduced by something like $21.50; but if immigrants who have spent some time in the west want to come east to explore our territory they are given the munificent reduction of $1.05. This class of immigrants, the shore farmers who could make a success of shore farming in the maritime provinces, are not allowed to explore the possibilities of that section of Canada. That I think is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman who asked the question.

Members from the maritime provinces are practically silent just now. Let me assure the committee that we are waiting to see what will be done in connection with the Duncan report. We want to see what is to be given us. We are reserving our criticism and when the time comes we shall be quite capable of replying to hon. gentlemen in the far corner of the chamber who are just now so critical of the terms of the Duncan report. What was laid down by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen as the remedy for conditions in the maritime provinces—the extension of the Intercolonial railway into Montreal, and development in the Atlantic region, that section of the road going to Portland—has not been taken notice of. That policy has not been carried out.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PRICE: I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. SPENCER: I rise to a point of order

Mr. PRICE: I have the floor and I do not wish to be interrupted at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has risen to a point of order.

Mr. SPENCER: I submit that we are discussing immigration estimates and not maritime rights.

Mr. HANSON: The point is ridiculous.

Mr. PRICE: I have not bored this House with such lengthy criticisms as some of those who at this moment would like to interrupt me have indulged in. I say that the policy laid down by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen —and I am not getting away from the immigration question—with regard to conditions in the maritime provinces, has not been carried out. So far as the maritime legislation introduced by the government at this session is concerned, we are willing, at least I am, to give the government credit for having to some extent complied with the recommendations of the Duncan report. If we have been successful in getting from the government some concessions the Duncan report has been very largely responsible for it, because the government of the day was committed to the recommendations of that commission, and the Prime Minister was committed to it. And the report gives only a faint idea of what we would have received had the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen been returned to power.

Mr. CANTLEY: Some time ago I asked the minister for information regarding a matter which has been the subject of considerable discussion in the newspapers. He dealt with it, at some length, but I submit that he has hardly been fair with the House. From the correspondence that appeared in the press the public was led to understand that the Salvation Army, under their working agreement with the Immigration department had not played quite squarely, and were asking boys to pledge themselves to return after they had come out to this country or as soon as they were able to do so, certain sums which it was represented in the press had been advanced by the government. The public were also given to understand that the minister had taken the attitude that the Salvation Army could not enter into agreements of that kind with the boys and that in consequence of that opinion the army were forced to withdraw from immigration work in coöperation with the government. I understand from the reply given by Commissioner Lamb that the Salvation Army, in addition to the amount they received from this government by way of assistance to immigration work, have spent large sums of money in the aggregate on boys coming into this country. That money has been devoted to the education of the boys in various ways and particularly to the procuring of their outfit. The boys before coming to Canada were asked to sign an agreement to return to the Salvation Army, when and as they were able to do so, such moneys as had been spent on their outfit and possibly part of their upkeep prior to their arrival here. The minister did not make that clear. I ask him now whether he considers that a fair statement of the situation, on the part of Commissioner Lamb, and, if it is, whether he thinks there is anything wrong in the Salvation Army taking such a course? The minister gave the House to understand that it was a matter of opinion. Well, if it is only a matter of opinion that is hardly good enough ground on which to base such an order as was made in this matter. I know of no better way in which you can help boys to become independent men later on than by enabling them to pay their way. Let us make it possible for every one of these boys later on to say, "I paid back all that was spent on me prior to coming to Canada. I am independent of any man. I paid my way, I am not a pauper owing any organization in the world. I stand on my own feet." If the minister persists in the course he has taken I think he is making a mistake. I ask him now for a clear declaration of policy in this matter. So far he has not given it.

Mr. FORKE: I thought I had explained the matter as fully as I could. I did not think that any statement had been made which I had not tried to answer. The Salvation Army takes the boys to its farm in England and gives them probably six weeks' training. They get a grant from the imperial government of $20.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is not that a bonus?

Mr. FORKE: It is a straight grant for training. This department is willing to give $10 also for every one of these boys. That is a standing offer. This $30 is to look after these boys for six weeks. There is no doubt that many of these people are doing voluntary work which exceeds that $30 and for which they should be given credit.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister allow me a question? He says that is all, but is it? Is it not a fact, as Commissioner Lamb asserted, that they outfit the boys at a cost of between £12 and £15, in addition?

Mr. FORKE: My deputy informs me that the British government also makes a contribution.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. FORKE: I am trying to answer it. The British government also makes a contribution towards outfitting the boys. I do not want to do any double twisting at all; I want to answer every question as fairly as I can. The Imperial government and the federal government pay the cost of the passage of these boys across the ocean, and there is no discrimination against the Salvation Army in any way that I can see. We are ready to put up a lot of money if the Salvation Army take advantage of the offers made in regard to these boys. A great deal has been said about the statements that were issued in this matter and I would like to read the only statement put out by the department.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was this statement issued prior to the statement of Commissioner Lamb?

Mr. FORKE: Commissioner Lamb made a statement purporting to be a letter issued from the office in Montreal, if I remember rightly, and that is the first time the matter got into the papers. We made no statement until Commissioner Lamb issued that letter.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I want to make it clear, because I have some remarks to make later. Did the department make their statement first?

Mr. FORKE: Not in the public press; there was a private arrangement made and negotiations were carried on in my office, but no statement appeared in the public press until Commissioner Lamb made that statement by releasing a letter from Montreal. I was sorry Commissioner Lamb released that statement, because he placed the matter before the public when there was no need for it. I have no hard feelings against the Salvation Army—I feel that I would be on the most friendly terms with Commissioner Lamb if he were here—but I think the public are making the most of it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What was the substance of that letter released to the press? Will the minister read it?

Mr. FORKE: It was a statement of their side of the case, that they were doing a splendid work and were taking care of these boys for a number of years after they came to Canada. It was his explanation in regard to the money being collected from the boys. I do not recall all that was in that letter but I believe that pretty well covers it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was it not a simple statement that the arrangements between the department and the Salvation Army were broken? Then the department issued a statement which was followed by another statement by Commissioner Lamb in detail, to which the minister now objects.

Mr. FORKE: I do not recall that; I think what I have stated to the House covers the whole question just as fairly as I can possibly give it from memory. I have a statement here contained in a letter written to Commissioner Lamb just before he went away, with regard to the negotiations which were being carried on. I will read the paragraph which deals with these boys.

The department will not consent to your making collections from boys of this class for reasons which have been fully explained. We have found that these boys almost without exception, believe they are refunding transportation loans provided by the Salvation Army. It makes no difference whether the collection is regarded as a refund of a loan or as a contribution to the cost of the Army's immigration machinery in Canada. No other society bringing boys to Canada requires either refund or contribution and the practice of collecting is unsettling to the boys and means that those who migrate through the Salvation Army are under a financial handicap of from $70 upwards.

That is just a plain statement of fact; it is not antagonistic, but it is the statement of the view taken by the department of the arrangement made between the Salvation Army and these boys. It is simply a matter of business; it may have been good policy or bad, but it was not done in any spirit of antagonism. We carried on negotiations with Commissioner Lamb without bitterness and I think I am giving the House all the information I have from memory.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I asked the minister a question, and I think he has been given sufficient time in which to consider it. My question was what other organizations and societies have had similar grants cut off, and the amounts of those grants.

Mr. FORKE: The British Immigration and Colonization Association, of Montreal, and the Scottish Immigrant Aid Society. They have been getting these grants but they will be cut off this year.

Mr. HANSON: Is that Father MacDonnell's society?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. ROWE: What society was that?

Mr. FORKE: That is the Scottish Immigrant Aid Society, which brought out some Hebrideans and others.

Mr. ROWE: A short time ago the minister said that all societies similar to the Salvation Army, which have been doing similar work in Canada with similar grants, had been cut off. I asked him for a list of those different societies and organizations and the amount in each case.

Mr. FORKE: There were the two societies, the British Immigration and Colonization Association and the association of Father MacDonnell, the Scottish Immigrant Aid Society. These two societies have been getting grants until this year, but they will be cut off, and there are no other societies getting grants.

Mr. ROWE: Are these not commercial organizations?

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. ROWE: What was the amount?

Mr. FORKE: Rev. Dr. Smythe is the head of the one organization and Father MacDonnell is the head of the other. They are both doing purely immigration work.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What salary does Rev. Dr. Smythe get?

Mr. FORKE: My deputy informs me that he does not get anything from the department.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What salary does the other reverend gentleman get?

Mr. FORKE: I do not know exactly.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Shall I tell the hon. gentleman? He gets $1,800.

Mr. ROWE: I do not feel satisfied that I have an answer to my question yet. I asked for the amount in each case.

Mr. FORKE: The one society received a grant of $5,000, while the other was paid $5,000 a year for the past four years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since the discussion on this item has broadened out into a consideration of some of the policies connected with immigration, there are a few points to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister and the House. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) expressed himself a few moments ago as very strongly of the opinion that the department should reverse its policy with regard to child immigration. May I point out that the Canadian Council on Child Welfare has issued a memorandum in which it states:

Might we point out that Canadian child welfare opinion is as unanimous in opposing unaccompanied immigration to Canada of juveniles under fourteen years of age, as it is in opposing the continuous or the permanent employment of children, below this age, in any of the production enterprises of the Dominion.

And after quoting the Bondfield report the memorandum says:

The Canadian Association of Child Protection Officers, comprising the governmental officials engaged in child welfare work throughout the Dominion, the Council for Social Service of the Church of England in Canada, the National Council of Women in Canada, the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Social Service Council of Canada and the Canadian Council on Child Welfare, have all devoted special attention to the subject of juvenile immigration in the last five years and have issued special findings thereon. We would draw your ateention to the fact that they will be found in agreement in their attitude to this present regulation.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the department is to be highly commended for the stand that it has taken in this matter.

Further, with regard to the Salvation Army I take it that it is not a question as to whether or not the Salvation Army may be doing good religious work. It is a question as to whether or not the government should continue to give special privileges to one particular religious organization. The Army has been receiving certain special privileges, and I would say, as one who has been fairly closely identified with immigration work for the past twenty years, that although some very fine people have undoubtedly come out under the auspices of the Salvation Army, on the other hand there are very large numbers who have been quite unfitted for positions in this country and some of these have become a perpetual load upon Canada. It seems to me, therefore, that the department is to be condemned not so much for the action it has now taken, but rather for not earlier having taken action along this line. The sooner we come to the position indicated by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), cut off the grants to these various religious and private organizations and devote whatever money we are spending in that way to our own immigration service the better it will be for all concerned. Otherwise we are apt to have friction as between one and the other of these various private agencies. Anyone who has read the correspondence and the memoranda exchanged between the Salvation Army and the department will, I am inclined to think, be on the side of the department in this matter.

Again I should like to emphasize, that the department still seems to be content with bringing immigrants to this country without going into the question of thoroughly rooting them in Canada. I know the officials claim to place them, but the immigrants do not stay placed, partly because many of them are quite unfitted for the positions to which they come. In my own city of Winnipeg we have had within the last few months a very strong protest from the Social Welfare Commission of the city in which they indicate the very large numbers of recent immigrants that are being supported by the city. I have under my hand scores of protests of this character which would take me an hour to read. They are from almost every labour organization in the country, because these quickly feel the effect of immigrants in an already congested labour market. I have also protests from a large number of other organizations. I think perhaps I might give this, from the Edmonton Board of Public Welfare, as very typical of a large number that have come to hand:

> We find that the immigrants come to the west with the idea of farming, and all those brought out and assisted in passage come on this understanding. The fact that these men have drifted into town and are asking assistance from this municipality is prima facie evidence of their failure on the land. We have been unable to place these men in almost every instance in anything but temporary unskilled labouring jobs.

It would seem to me that the existence of a large number of cases of this kind is the best evidence we have that the policy of the Immigration department has not gone far enough, and I take it that whatever may be said with regard to the welfare of the immigrants, we in Canada must stand for the preservation of our own standards of living. There is not the slightest doubt that the dumping of a large number of immigrants into this country has very much accentuated the problem of unemployment in Canada.

Now the next point—and I am going to be just as brief as I can in bringing these matters to the attention of the department—is the prevalence of misrepresentation on the part of immigration agents on the other side of the water. Again and again I have asked questions of the minister with regard to these matters, and have received rather evasive replies. Here is a typical advertisement, from an old country paper:

> 14,000 Single Men Wanted
> For Farm Work in Canada
>
> With and without experience. Assured employment and good wages.
>
> Also families, domestics and boys.
>
> Apply,
>
> Chas. R. Compston and Son,
> 65, Church Street, Lancaster.

The advertisement goes on to state that a Canadian Pacific representative will be in attendance to select suitable applicants at reduced rates. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is not fair to the intending immigrant to suggest that if he comes to this country without experience he is going to get anything like steady work on the farm. Even the man with experience is not going to get work the year round on the farm, the inexperienced man is certain not to get it. The result is that thousands of these men come into our large distributing centres in the west just as soon as the harvest is over. The good wages offered do not convey any idea as to the real conditions here in Canada. The minister when I asked him a question along this line a few weeks ago said, "Oh, we cannot become responsible for all that the agents might say over in England." I urge that the minister in this country ought to be responsible. I am glad to say that as the result of questions asked on the floor of this House the authorities in the British parliament undertook to discipline some of the agents in England, and that can be readily done if the department here is alert. These advertisements inserted in the old country papers undoubtedly are misleading, and a great many people are induced to come to this country who, before they have been here very long, find themselves out of work and soon become dependent upon charity.

As to the character of the men who come to Canada, here, for example, is one out of a score of clippings I have from old country papers. I note that some hon. gentlemen seek to interrupt me. I think, Mr. Chairman, I gave place three or four times to some of these gentlemen in the corner to my right. Surely it is not necessary that desks should be banged during my remarks at this time. If the gentlemen cannot give any better reply than the banging of desks they could do that much more suitably outside rather than in a chamber that is supposed to devote itself to deliberative work. As to the character of the men employed I should like to refer to one or two statements given in the old country papers as affording some idea of how this problem of immigration is regarded in the old country. Here is one paragraph:

> Forty-five young men, all of whom have been on the "dole", left London to-day in charge of the Canadian National railways en route for Canada, the first-fruits of the Ministry of Labour's farm training scheme, by which it is hoped to transform groups of unemployed single men into successful settlers overseas.

And again:

> The men of this party all come from cities and towns, and are without previous agricultural experience. Before being accepted for this scheme they were carefully selected by the Ministry of Labour, and were approved by the Canadian Department of Immigration both before and after training. Some who on going to Claydon were under weight from lack of nourishment, have gained nearly a stone of solid flesh.

I have every sympathy with those who have been on the dole and others in the old country who are so reduced that a few weeks of help in a training colony will put them into better condition; but I would urge that men who are picked up on the streets of the big cities in the old country are not likely to make the most successful farmers out on our western prairies.

Mr. COOTE: Maybe they would be all right in New Brunswick.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is suggested that they might be all right in New Brunswick. I sometimes wish that the government would dump into the eastern provinces as many people and of the same class as they have dumped into the west. It would not be long before we had some decided protest from the east with regard to the immigration policy of the government. It is all very well for men in England to think of immigration as a means of getting rid of those whom they do not know what to do with there. Let me read a paragraph from the speech of Mr. Amery as given in the House of Commons as far back as the 27th July, 1925. Discussing the immigration problem he said:

> I am tempted to read a few homely sentences from one west countryman's letter:
> "I have quite a good farm. I have a real good cow and a calf, 18 chickens and one cock."
>
> All these supplied to them.
>
> "I bought one pig which is due to have little ones next month.
> I see the papers in England say one cannot get work in Canada. I have five farmers after me to work for them. In any case I am downright pleased with my place and can make money out of it".

That is given as an example of a successfully placed farmer. He may make good; but I would suggest to any one who knows the prairie farms of the west, that one cow, a calf, eighteen chickens, a cock, and a brood sow, are not quite enough to start in on with any hopes of making a success. We ought to be practical in this matter. I can understand that kind of thing might appeal to people who are accustomed to allotment gardens in England and who have other ways of supplementing what they make out of those gardens, but we must recognize the actualities of life in the west.

Moreover I would point out that a very large number who are coming to this country not only were mechanics in the old country, but are rapidly finding themselves pushed into the industrial field in this country. Only a few days ago I had a letter from the mining district in the Crowsnest pass stating that already the newly arrived immigrants of this year were crowding into the mining areas where already there existed very serious unemployment. About a year ago I noticed in a paper called Canada published in Great Britain a report of certain speeches made by one Lieutenant-Colonel Robins. Among other things he said:

> Ontario's industries, as well as its agriculture grow steadily, and we can find room for good artisans or mechanics as well as for trained farm hands who have been forced by home conditions to become dole drawers.

The purpose evidently is to bring out not merely farmers but mechanics, whether or not there is room for them in this country. Let me urge that notwithstanding what many boards of trade and railways may state, the immigration of large numbers of people to Canada is not the economic solution of our problems. It is frequently said that if we only have more people, we shall have more consumers in this country. Simply by multiplying the population of Canada by two or three, without altering the fundamental factors existing at any given time, does not offer any real solution of our economic difficulties. It is quite true that the railroads may be able to profit by the fares of these people; it is quite true that if the immigrants have capital, certain real estate or land colonization firms may profit, but that is not a real solution so far as the people at large are concerned. If we are to have immigrants, I would urge that we remember that we ought to be willing to assume the social responsibilities which their coming involves. We in the west have had a heavy load to carry in endeavouring to assimilate the newly arrived immigrants. We have again and again petitioned, for example, that we should have help with regard to the upkeep of unemployed immigrants. We have also urged that we should have help with regard to sick immigrants. I have under my hand a letter from the superintendent of the hospital at Winnipeg, but I will not read it, because some hon. members may think it is only western propaganda. I will read instead an editorial from the Montreal Gazette in the hope that it may appeal to some of the eastern men more than protests which we might bring from the west. In an editorial under date of February 6, 1926, this statement is made with regard to immigrants and hospitals:

> If the city is not responsible for the care extended to its immigrant population by the hospitals, then the obligation falls back upon the department of the government which brings these people to this country. . . . The immigrant, until he is able to take care of himself, or can assert some right of citizenship, is morally, at least a ward of the department which brings him into the country; certainly that department has no right to disclaim responsibility and remain inactive when the immigrant, in sickness and penury applies to Montreal hospitals for treatment,

That is the way some in Montreal feel about the question. We in the west have felt that way for a long time. I would simply repeat, without elaborating this point at all, that if we are going to bring in immigrants and believe they are an economic asset to this country, the least we can do is to assume the social responsibilities which their coming involves.

I want to emphasize that contention particularly with regard to the foreign-born immigrant. I am informed by some of the outstanding officials connected with immigration that we cannot hope for any large numbers of farm immigrants from Great Britain. I am further informed that we have already largely exhausted the sources of supply in northern Europe, and that in the future we must more and more look to southeastern Europe for our immigrants. I have no particular quarrel with immigrants from southeastern Europe. Many of them are going to make good Canadian citizens; but it will take a generation before they can be thoroughly absorbed into our Canadian life, and it is cruel to bring them here and then denounce them because their religion, social life and political ideals are different from those of the Canadian people. Let us remember that if we insist on bringing in European immigrants, especially immigrants from southeastern Europe, we must be fully prepared to accommodate ourselves to the different social customs, religious practices and political aspirations which they bring with them.

There is only one further point that I venture to urge upon the government, and that is the more careful selection by the government of those who come to this country. If I understand aright, an agreement has been made with the railways by which, to all intents and purposes, the selection of immigrants is left in the hands of the railway authorities. I hope that when I sit down the minister will clear up this question. If I am correctly informed, within the last year or two an arrangement has been made with the railroads by which they undertake, almost entirely, to make the selection of the immigrants whom they think fit and have guaranteed that these immigrants will be safely placed in this country. In my opinion that is an authority that ought not to be given up by the Dominion government. The Dominion government ieself ought to examine every immigrant and ought to be held responsible for the care of every immigrant brought to this country. I would say that the Dominion government cannot hope effectively to avoid the responsibility for the placing of the immigrant in Canada. It is all very well to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway has made a careful selection and has guaranteed employment. What does that mean? It very often means that the railway company has secured the fare of the immigrant to this country, and afterwards, if they have found him a position, it has been done by ousting somebody else from that position. Thus the problem of unemployment is no nearer a solution than before; it is indeed increased. I ask the Minister of Immigration to give us in some detail the arrangement that exists between the department and the railways, both with regard to the selection and the placing of the immigrant.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member states that he wants an answer to that question. Which one? The last one?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My last question. I began with some general observations, but I closed by asking the minister to give me in some detail the arrangement that exists between the department and the railways both with regard to the selection of the immigrants on the other side of the water and the placing of them in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: There is an agreement between the department and the two big railway corporations—there is no use in trying to say anything different—but I think we have the agreement in such shape that the department will control the inflow of immigrants and their character. I may say that they are doing a certain amount of recruiting in some of the countries in Europe. We have made an agreement with them that none of their recruiting agents will have any connection with the shipping agents, that no commissions will be paid to any of those men who are doing the recruiting, that they will be paid a stated adequate salary, that they will have no inducement whatever to get immigrants so far as remuneration is concerned; and they undertake to bring no immigrants in Canada who are not of the agricultural class. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre found fault because some of those immigrants did not stay on the farm after they were placed there. I think it would be pretty difficult to make any man stay on the farm if he did not want to. The most we could ask from any association would be that they place those people on the farms to begin with.

I am going to make a statement with reference to the lack of employment, because I think I know about as much in regard to this question as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have never seen a spring or summer in Manitoba, my own province, where we had a surplus of agricultural labour—always a shortage. There will be a shortage next month. The farmer members of this House realize that fact. Instead of a surplus of agricultural labour there will be a shortage. Then in regard to other classes of labour, an immense amount of work is going to be carried on in Canada during next summer. Some of us are optimistic—we are not all pessimists—and I think within six weeks from the present we will see the whole question of unemployment in Canada solved.

An hon. MEMBER: For how long?

Mr. FORKE: I am no prophet and I cannot tell that. I know that when we had in Canada one-half the population that we have to-day there was a much larger percentage of unemployment than there is at present, and I claim that if we had twice the population the percentage of unemployment would be still less. Therefore an increase in population does not necesarily mean unemployment. I sympathize with the views of the Labour people, but they are afraid that if a labourer comes into this country he will put out of employment some other labourer in Canada. It does not work out that way. I have had some experience in regard to employment outside of farming. If we get the right class of people in Canada, people who are physically fit and are not afraid to work, the whole question of unemployment will solve itself. There will be some trouble next winter. Did hon. members ever see a winter which was entirely free from it? It is a concomitant of winter conditions in this country. We will have a certain amount of flotsam and jetsam; there is pathos and tragedy, and also humour, in this matter of immigration. I know that some things happen that are deplorable, but they will happen in connection with any immigration policy you like to adopt. There will be always a certain number of misfits, but is that any reason why we should not want people in our great wide open country, which indeed is waiting for people to take advantage of the opportunities offered to them when they come here? I would not have accepted the position of Minister of Immigration had I not great faith in the country and did I not believe that we could prosper with a much larger population than we have. We need a greater population. I am attempting, with the little ability that I have, to carry on a policy of colonization that will, as far as is humanly possible, fit the immigrants into the places available for them. I cannot satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He takes a different point of view, looks at it from a different angle. But I believe I have as sane a view of the whole situation as my hon. friend has, looking at it from his angle. I do not say this with any bitterness, because I believe the hon. member is sincere. He lives in Winnipeg, and what he sees of the drift of some of the immigration gives him a view of the matter which perhaps he would not have did he live where I live and did he see conditions as I have seen them.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not intend at this time to attack or criticize the minister or the administration of his department. As a matter of fact I have found that there were some difficulties involved owing to the regulations. However, in the few cases that have come under my notice, if the department were approached and the matter argued out one would be apt to see the situation from the point of view of the department, and at the same time take what comfort one could out of a sane administration of the regulations. But it is against the regulations that I have a serious grievance. I know that some people who would make the very best immigrants are kept out of this country. I want the regulations changed. I want, as the minister says, a business administration of the immigration policy of Canada. One case I have in mind was that of three brothers and one sister who had established themselves in Canada and were prosperous. They wanted to bring out their brother. He was earning his own living and was quite competent to do so in Canada, but owing to the fact that he had a maimed arm, and someone did not wish him to enter the Dominion, obstacle after obstacle was placed in his way. He is here now, is a respectable citizen, and will never become a charge upon the country. But the difficulty arises that when the immigrant starts on his journey to this country he must be routed through to destination. I wonder how many of us in early life would like to have been "routed through" in some country where we wanted to establish ourselves. I do not want to labour the point, but will read what is a sad commentary upon our immigration regulations. It is a letter written by a maidservant to a former employer, the head of a very large manufacturing concern well-known throughout Canada. Under date of February 24, 1927, the girl writes:

Dear Mr. BLANK,

Do you remember Lily, who stayed with you last year for a few weeks while Eunice was having her holidays? May I ask you a favour?

I intend to bring my brother out here this spring. It would be easy for him to get the immigration permission, as he is of Swiss nationality, skilled, in good health, and would bring about $1,000 with him—but the Canadian condition is, that he has a position in view or at least that he can prove he has relations which would help him to find work.

Knowing nobody else who could do anything for him in that respect I bring the matter up to you and would be very grateful for your kind advice.

My brother is twenty-one years of age—a competent electrician, radio man, mechanic and car driver. We had a little factory (with about fifty labourers) of that kind in Basle, Switzerland, and my father was very keen that my brother should learn everything, practically and theoretically, concerning "appareillages electriques".

The great service you could do for him would be to let me have just a few lines, saying that you are interested in my brother and you would assist him to find work when he comes to Canada.

I realize that I ask much—perhaps too much—but I stress the fact that it would be merely "pro forma" and that you would not be under any obligation whatever. You would help a young man who certainly deserves it, who is earnest, industrious and does not come with erroneous illusions, but who has the firm will to set to work and to do any work if necessary. As a further asset he has a fairly good knowledge of the English language.

Thanking you in advance in my brother's and my own name for your great kindness I remain,

Respectfully yours,

LILLIE RITTER.

Imagine a man with those qualifications not being allowed to enter Canada! Or if he does come in with $1,000 in his pocket, the idea is abroad that he must be projected towards some definite spot to do some definite thing, although we are crying for immigrants. When the regulations are such that a personal entreaty of this kind is thought necessary to a man who is not in any sense interested other than from having been for a short time the employer of the girl who writes the letter, I say it is time that they were changed. Therefore I ask the minister to assure the committee that a man well educated, with money in his pocket, anxious to grow up with this country and become a good citizen, shall not be denied entrance because he cannot say: I am definitely going to be employed by A. B., and I am going to do thus and so. I know a man who, having said that he had a job as a shoemaker in a certain town, was told that there were already a sufficient number of shoemakers in that locality. I am sure the view of our people is that anyone of good morals, well-to-do and well trained should be allowed to come in as an immigrant. In a word, we want a sane administration of sane regulations.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the hon. member, but the girl was mistaken. Of course the boy came all right. Having $1,000 in his pocket and being a Swiss, there was nothing in the regulations to keep him out.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This letter was written on February 24 last. All these difficulties in the way of entrance are well known, that you must be routed to a definite spot—

Mr. STEVENS: With a through ticket from the place of origin.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —and you must be definitely placed. Is it not wrong?

Mr. FORKE: I think there has been a mistake on the part of the writer. Some of these things we do not like to speak of too plainly in parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. FORKE: When you discriminate between countries you create an international situation that sometimes is not very pleasant. Any man from Switzerland in good health and with a reasonable amount of money in his pocket has no difficulty as an immigrant to Canada. Just now we have opposite opinions from each end of the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is almost afraid to see anybody coming in because he may put someone out of employment—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is the minister satisfied that mine is the correct view?

Mr. FORKE: I admit that right away. With regard to people of various trades, some of them from southern and eastern Europe we do not look upon very favourably sometimes, although I have no prejudice against them myself. A good many of them come out as farmers, but they are handy as blacksmiths, carpenters, cobblers and so on, and some of them drift away from farming and engage in those trades. In western Canada to-day we are looking for people who will take up carpentry work, mend implements, and repair boots and shoes. Immigrants of the type I have mentioned can do that sort of work, and we are glad to get them. Of course, the regulations must be administered with decency and good sense, but you have to have regulations all the same, especially when it is realized that in Europe to-day there are hundreds of thousands of people on the dole, and I am afraid some municipalities are not above capitalizing the dole and paying the passage of those drawing such relief in order to get them out of the country. I do not like to speak disrespectfully of any class of people, but those who have been receiving the dole are not in my opinion the most desirable type to come to Canada. I have great sympathy with the old countries in their trials in connection with unemployment and surplus population and I think there should be a little latitude in Canada where we have so much room, even if we experience a little trouble in placing immigrants. I am willing to interpret the regulations as broadly as possible, and if the committee thinks they ought to be amended I am prepared to have this done. If I had no other course to follow than to adhere strictly to the regulations I should know exactly what to do, but unfortunately after the House has passed acts and regulations it provides for the minister to issue permits. And that is my trouble.

Mr. EVANS: How many concerns, industrial, religious or of any other description, have agreements with the government; what bounties do they receive; and in what fields in Europe do they operate?

Mr. FORKE: The only agreement I know of exists between the two railway companies and the government, but there is no such thing as a bounty. The province of Alberta has a commisisoner of its own in London, and he is doing the best he can to secure immigrants. There are also other organizations at work but, I repeat, no bounties are paid.

Mr. EVANS: What organizations are they?

Mr. FORKE: There is for example the Salvation Army. I cannot mention offhand the other organizations, but the churches are engaged in very good work. They are bringing in people of the right type and are helping to look after them. There is also the empire settlement scheme.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How many immigration agents, reverend gentlemen, are engaged in Canada and the United States?

Mr. FORKE: There are twenty-nine, some of whom receive a small salary and others only expenses.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do they represent various religious denominations?

Mr. FORKE: They are the repatriation fathers who are working largely on behalf of Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then these reverend gentlemen, receiving pay from the government and recognized by the department, are all of one denomination. Am I right?

Mr. FORKE: You are right in a way.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): In what way am I not right?

Mr. FORKE: They are not engaged in immigration work in the wider sense of the term. They are interested in getting French Canadians to return to Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): A very good work, a worthy object. But am I not right in stating that the only persons in the employ of the government, reverend gentlemen engaged in immigration work in Canada and the United States, are of one religious denomination?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): And in connection with immigration work carried on by religious denominations there are in Great Britain two reverend gentlemen, the Reverend Father MacDonnell and the Reverend Mr. Windefeld. Is that right?

Mr. FORKE: We all know of course that Father MacDonnell has been engaged in that work, and there is one gentlemen in Europe in connection with the Lutheran immigration activities.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There is one in Europe, a Lutheran, and Father MacDonnell, who receives a salary of $1,800 and expenses and who operates in Great Britain and Ireland. So that the only immigration agent in the employment of the government there belongs also to the one religious denomination which is represented in Canada and the United States. I have no criticism to offer; the facts are there for any man to draw from them whatever conclusion he sees fit. But I may make an observation with reference to the Salvation Army. The minister takes the ground that the boys who come into Canada under an agreement with the Army to pay back to them a loan are under a handicap. That is the word he used; it is the expression which others have also employed. They consider that such boys are under a handicap by reason of having entered into an agreement to pay back to the Salvation Army a loan they have received. I understood the minister to say that the British government advances two or three hundred pounds to immigrants coming into Canada by assisted passage and going upon farms in this country. Is that right?

Mr. FORKE: The £300 is for farm settlement.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is a loan.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, to be paid back in twenty-five years.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then, following out the logic of the minister, these men, inasmuch as they have agreed to pay back a loan to the British government, are under a handicap and should not be permitted to enter the country. Just as the boy brought out by the Salvation Army is under a handicap because he has to pay back a loan, to that organization, so the farmer coming to Canada under an agreement to pay back a loan to the British government is equally handicapped.

Mr. FORKE: The cases are not parallel.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The one is a boy and the other a grown man.

Mr. FORKE: The boy pays back something which he will not receive again; it is gone. In the case of immigrants coming into this country with a £300 loan, they are able to purchase horses, cattle and implements. There is a little difference, I think.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): When he pays it back he will never see it again; I do not know how he is going to eat his cake and have it. He is under agreement to pay back a certain amount of money he has received; therefore he is under a handicap, but the minister says it is not the policy of the government to permit people to come to this country under such a handicap. They will not let boys come in here under any such agreement with the Salvation Army, but if men come out under a similar agreement to pay back a loan on a farm they will be accepted. I think it is fairly sound logic that what applies in the one case should apply in the other.

Mr. FORKE: I want to read another clause from the same letter to which I referred before:

> The department has no objection to any boy whose passage was provided by the British and Canadian governments out of the $80 grant, making a voluntary contribution to your work—

But, Mr. Chairman, this thing has come up on the floor of the House in a way I did not want it to come up.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. FORKE: Because we have perhaps twenty letters at the office from some of these boys brought out by the Salvation Army in which they distinctly state that they had no idea they were paying anything but their passage money, and stating that this money was secured from them under false pretences.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. FORKE: These are the facts of the case. I did not want to mention this, but I have been compelled to bring it out.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is what we are here for, to compel you to state the real facts of the case and let the people judge. It is a funny thing that the department never received letters of that kind until they took action to show that they did not approve of it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not fair.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is absolutely fair and the only way you can controvert it is to show the contrary. Boys were brought out here by the Salvation Army as stated by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) a short time ago; even after assisted passage was given they were brought out and were allowed to have their private agreement with the Salvation Army. That was the case when the department was administered by the present Minister of the Interior; he thought it was all right.

Mr. FORKE: You are mistaken.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If that was not so the Minister of the Interior is mistaken, because he said that this agreement was not cancelled or abrogated until that action was taken by the present minister. Surely that is correct. I have due deference for the opinion of the minister; he is as entitled to that opinion as I am entitled to mine. I believe this is a mistake; I do not think that in the wider sense the boy is under a handicap even though he has an agreement under which he is to pay back to the parties responsible for taking charge of him, for giving him a certain amount of agricultural education and for outfitting him, a certain amount of money. When that boy enters into an agreement to pay back a small sum as he makes the money in Canada, I do not believe he is under any handicap, especially when the money is used to permit the Salvation Army to carry on the same kind of work and bring another boy to this country. That is my view; the minister may take the opposite view, and he is certainly entitled to his opinion. I believe the Salvation Army did splendid work for Canada in bringing out boys who will make the very best class of citizen, and I repeat what I have already said, that a great deal of latitude might well be given to any scheme intended to bring out that class of immigrants. If restrictions are to be placed in the work of immigration and if organizations are to be discouraged from doing this work, those restrictions might well be directed to those nationalities which we find it difficult to assimilate and Canadianize.

Mr. ROBINSON: I would like to ask the minister if, under the immigration laws of Canada, it is a criminal offence for an American aviator to make a forced landing in Canada at a place other than one specified by the department?

Mr. FORKE: You are away beyond me.

Mr. ROBINSON: I did not think that was the case, but I wish to read a letter to the House having to do with a case at Detroit, in order to show the House how the American immigration officials treat British aviation officers. This letter is from Doctor Trenholm, a gentleman whom I have known in Windsor for the past four years. His son was a lieutenant in the air force overseas, and the circumstances of the case will be explained by the letter which is under date of March 27, 1927:

> I am writing to you in relation to Lieutenant Robert Trenholm a member of the Canadian air force, also with a certificate "air engineer" from the air board, and holding a license to operate an aeroplane for commercial purposes. This officer, having discovered his rear controls dragging, due to defective tail skid, made a forced landing on Packard aviation field, January 25, the same day the United States planes flew to Ottawa, and before landing asked permission from an officer to get off the landing field and go to the repair shop for his skid. This request was not refused him, and as his engine was still in motion he added a shot of naphtha and hit into a Ford car belonging to said officer, it having been secretly brought up under the radiator and obscured from the vision of the aviator. Thinking his engine was going to pieces he jumped from his machine and was immediately arrested. Charges under first, section 8, United States immigration law, was preferred "for smuggling aliens", and verdict of "not guilty" rendered March 12, 1926; second, section 10 of the United States immigration act, "for landing at a place, Packard aviation field, a place other than one designated by the Immigration Department of the United States", a verdict of "guilty" and one year and $1,000 fine given as sentence.

Then Doctor Trenholm asks that the department take up the matter and see that he has his plane and his clothes returned to him. I also have a column which appeared in the Border Cities Star having to do with this matter, complaining bitterly of the treatment given this officer, which says:

After hearing the evidence the jury, headed by Miss Ripple, foreman, retired at 11.30 a.m., returning four hours later. They had heard character evidence from several prominent border cities residents, who spoke highly of Bob and Judge Simons, in his charge, said that this evidence was acceptable. On the jury's return, after four hours' deliberation, Judge Simons said that they should have been able to reach their decision in fifteen minutes. . . .

Commenting on the verdict this morning, Mr. Frick. . . .

Who is the high officer in the Immigration department at Detroit.

—said he believed it to be inconsistent and expressed confidence that the sentence would be set aside if a new trial, which he is requesting, is granted.

Since that time the court has refused leave to appeal, and I understand that in that case the government could take the matter up directly with Washington.

Mr. FORKE: I think that it a matter for our minister plenipotentiary at Washington.

Mr. ROBINSON: I agree with that, but the point I wanted to bring out was that this was done under the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to say a word or two with regard to the question of appointing the railways of Canada as our immigration solicitors. I have no doubt they are very good at soliciting immigrants—

Mr. FORKE: Before my hon. friend goes any further I will give him a fair start and remind him that these immigrants must pass the immigration officer at the port of embarkation.

Mr. COOTE: I am glad to be informed of that, but I did want to point out that the heads of these railways never miss an opportunity of stressing the fact that what Canada needs is more immigrants. I was rather struck last year to see in the Canadian Railway Employees' Monthly the statement that the number of railway employees in Canada in the year 1913 was 178,652, and in 1923 it was 178,052. In other words, there were 600 fewer railway employees in Canada in 1923 than in 1913, and they were able to handle 34,000,000,000 tons of railway freight one mile in 1923 as compared with only 23,000,000,000 tons in 1913. Now this is the question I want to put, through the minister, to the railways that stress the need of immigrants: If the railways themselves employed 600 less men in 1923 than they did in 1913, how do they expect we are going to handle all the immigrants they want to attract to Canada in a period of ten years?

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me to answer his question? The hon. gentleman gives his own answer in the increased tonnage. Somebody produced it.

Mr. COOTE: We are bringing in immigrants annually at the rate of 135,000, according to the figures for last year. I think these figures are fairly indicative of other industries. For instance the same article goes on to say that in 1910 the manufacturing establishments of Canada were employing 515,203 men, and in 1921 they were employing 517,141, an increase of about 2,000 in ten years. Apparently the railways think that agriculture can furnish a living to immigrants without number. May I also quote something on that point? This is taken from a bulletin published by the Canadian Pacific Railway, entitled, Agricultural and Industrial Progress in Canada. It says:

Agriculture the world over has developed through the crude, ruthless directive agency of the law of supply and demand. The farmers have, in obedience to this law, for several decades, suffered through demoralized prices due to an over-supply of agricultural products.

Now there we have the admission, from what I think may be the greatest authority on immigration, that over-supply of agricultural products has demoralized the farmers' prices. And yet these railways persist in trying to get the people and the government of Canada to bring in more farmers. They persist in trying to persuade our government to spend money in placing more farmers on vacant land to increase the supply of products.

May I quote again from another authority, Mr. Irving Fisher, Professor of Economics in Yale university. He is speaking of the condition of the farmers in the United States and he says:

Just at present the farmers will help themselves better by asking the bankers to discourage the colonization zeal of the railroads, and to check the activities of local immigration bureaus and commerce boards in rural communities. They should seek means to regulate acreage to the necessities of supply and demand. To this end they should get all needed help to organize the farmers on a national scale.

At Washington it would be in order to review the government policy of encouraging increased production on the farm.

I am only reading a few sentences because I do not want to delay the committee. Professor Fisher winds up this article by saying:

More than anything else, price stabilization, disarmament and a lowered tariff will help the farmer.

Now I want to quote a few lines from the greatest authority, outside the Canadian Pacific Railway, which exists in Canada. That is the Farm and Ranch Review, of Calgary. They say:

> The opening up of vast areas of virgin wheat lands in Canada and the United States during the past seventy-five years demoralized world prices temporarily.

Then they go on to say:

> This condition is, however, being overtaken at a rapid rate and cannot, of course, ever arise again.

I should like to know why it cannot arise again if we, by our immigration efforts, open up vast areas of land in northwestern Canada? I know that we cannot prevent some of these areas from being opened up, but I say that the sensible thing for the government to do would be to let the situation alone. Let it take care of itself in a natural manner and do not try to force immigration into one particular channel. I think it is unfair to agriculture that at this time, when agricultural prices, largely owing to the efforts of the farmers themselves, are beginning to get into a little better position, the government should carry on a propaganda to bring vacant lands under cultivation, thus increasing the supply of agricultural products and, as the Canadian Pacific Railway bulletin clearly points out, making it more difficult for the farmer to market his products at a price that will give him a reasonable return. I do not want to delay the committee; I have tried to make my remarks brief, but I must say that I think the farmers of Canada are entitled to the same treatment that all other classes in this country are entitled to.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think from what we have heard to-night that the minister is quite a bit to blame for the situation which has been the subject of discussion. Personally I have no fault to find with the department. The officials have always treated me very courteously, and in presenting a case to them accompanied by the necessary information—which I have done only on four or five occasions—I have received satisfaction. But in regard to the treatment of the Salvation Army I think the committee will come to the conclusion that the minister has got himself into trouble. This agreement between the Salvation Army and their clients has been in operation for years, and no person has found any fault with it—in fact the immediate predecessor of the minister informed us that he was so well satisfied with the work of the Salvation Army that he increased the grant to them. The present minister now comes in and finds fault with the Army. In this connection I do not make use of the word "antagonism." The minister, however, used the word four or five times. Perhaps it would be right to say that he was in a collision and that a misunderstanding took place. The Salvation Army officials came out with a strong protest after the minister had made a statement. Now the minister finds fault with them for ventilating the matter in the press.

Mr. FORKE: No; they made the first statement. The Salvation Army published the first letter, which appeared in the Montreal Star.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We can take up the question later; we can discuss it on the minister's main estimates—I am only after information to-night. But I should like to get the minister into a friendly state of mind again with respect to the Salvation Army and have their work go on. I am going to ask him in a few minutes for information which I think will prove that the Salvation Army has been one of the very strongest and best factors we have in carrying on our regular immigration and colonization work . How could the Salvation Army do otherwise in relation to this dispute than they did? They could not have the matter ventilated here, except through some member. The press was the only medium through which they could give expression to their views. Personally I have no antagonism towards the minister, but I think, he alone has been the cause of the present situation. When he leaves the department there will be another minister of immigration, and I will guarantee that one of the first things the new minister will do will be to try to restore friendly relations with the Salvation Army. I should like to see this work go on, and I am going to ask the minister now for certain information—if he has not the information at present he will have it when we come to deal with the main estimates. I should like a comparison of the number of boys or juvenile immigrants brought to this country by the Salvation Army with those brought in by any other institution or association and with all institutions or associations which have operated at any time in connection with this work. I think those facts will indicate to the House the importance of the work done by the Salvation Army. They have done a work too with which I do not think anyone can find any fault. The class of immigrants which they have sent out from the old country has been as far as possible a selective one, and as they are in a position to know thoroughly the characteristics of these boys, they bring out to this country the proper ones.

Mr. FORKE: I have that information with me but I would prefer to give it in fuller detail later. I would like to make this statement, because there have been so many references to the unfriendly relations between myself and the Salvation Army: If Commissioner Lamb comes back to Canada, I hope the hon. member will interview him and find out whether there are any bitter relations between Commissioner Lamb and myself. I have no unfriendly relations with the Salvation Army. I admit of course there is a difference of opinion. Perhaps I have been wrong and perhaps I have been right. I shall be glad to give in full detail the information which the hon. gentleman asks for, but I should like to say that if I have done anything since I have become Minister of Immigration, it has been to speed up immigration work, and I am only making a beginning.

Mr. CANTLEY: I understand the minister is still of opinion that the Salvation Army to some extent misled these boys. That may be so or it may not. I presume the Salvation Army are now under suspension and being disciplined. How long is the minister going to continue the suspension? Is he prepared to enter into a new agreement with the Salvation Army a year from now or at any other time? I have not yet joined the Salvation Army. This parliament or agencies under its control have attempted to change my religious persuasions twice within a few years, once very recently. My anxiety in regard to this matter to-night is not due to any intention on my part to make a change and to become a member of the organization which we have been discussing. But I would like to know if the minister is likely to reconsider his decision.

Mr. FORKE: I cannot say what I will do in the future, but I would like the impression removed that the Salvation Army are under any discrimination. They are not in as favourable a position as they were in regard to a straight money grant, but they are in exactly the same position as any other organization bringing boys out to this country. We will leave the future alone in the meantime. I would like to point out also that there is a difference between the Salvation Army and the immigration society of the Salvation Army. The one is a branch of the other, but they are being carried on as entirely different organizations. The immigration society of the Salvation Army enter into the shipping business and they receive commissions on passages which they are able to book. That is something altogether outside of Salvation Army work.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): As somebody always gets those commissions, why not the Salvation Army?

Mr. FORKE: The Salvation Army—and I say this without any discourtesy—is doing a great deal of what is known as uplift work; but when we come to immigration work we want to deal with them as an immigration society, forgetting for the time being that they are engaged in a very laudable and praiseworthy attempt from their point of view. I hope the committee will let this item pass to-night, because there will be further opportunity to discuss the matter. I do not want to hide anything; I will bring it all out into the open and give all the information I possibly can.

Mr. CANTLEY: I want this made perfectly clear. I understand the Salvation Army's relations with the department are to-day different from what they were a year ago. Is that correct?

Mr. FORKE: Not as regards friendship, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not discussing the minister's friendships; I am discussing dollars and cents.

Mr. FORKE: They are not getting the $25,000 grant which they received before.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is it the intention of the minister to change that and to return to the old arrangement?

Mr. FORKE: I shall have to take into consideration the matter of giving to all associations doing the same kind of work the same pro rata grants, and I am doubtful about doing that. If we figure up what we are spending on assisted passages and on immigration work generally, we shall find we are running up a pretty heavy bill at present for the Dominion of Canada, and I would hesitate to make a promise in regard to that.

Mr CANTLEY: The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) made some remarks in regard to the deputy minister. I would like to dissociate myself from those remarks because I consider the deputy is one of the finest deputies we have in the whole service. I would congratulate the Minister of Immigration on having such a deputy if I cannot congratulate him on anything else. In fact I would not be averse to changing the position of the two, the Deputy and the Minister.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What are the functions of the director of publicity?

Mr. FORKE: The director of publicity looks after the publicity work, advertising. Most hon. members know Mr. Stead, who carries on the publicity work of the department.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has he any supervision of the publicity work which is carried on by other agents and which has been referred to as misrepresentation of conditions in Canada?

Mr. FORKE: Those agents are really the agents of some of the steamship companies. They may paint matters a little too rosily, but I do not know what we can do to supervise such advertising.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The director of publicity might oversee the advertisements and the publicity matter before it is put out as representative of Canada.

Mr. FORKE: We have asked for coöperation between some of the steamship companies and the department. Some coöperate and some do not. I went over to Great Britain some twenty years ago on immigration work, and at that time I found that the Department of Immigration was employing steamship agents as Canadian agents in the old country. I found a great deal of fault with that. I found issued by steamship agents in regard to Canada pamphlets and other literature which was altogether too rosy and something which I did not like at all. Advertisements of that character are still being issued to some extent by steamship agents, not by us.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The department must assume the responsibility. There could not be any objection to the department making this publicity agent an overseer of the publicity campaign carried on in the old country.

Mr. FORKE: Some shipping companies under British registry who want to get immigrants to come to Canada in order to benefit by their fares may make statements that are not altogether true, statements that are a little too rosy and that perhaps convey a false impression, but I do not know what the department can do in regard to suppressing them. If those companies were willing to accept advertisements prepared by the department, the matter would be different.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What are the functions and duties of the immigration investigating officer?

Mr. FORKE: If I have to answer all questions in regard to every officer of the department I am up against a difficult task. I think we have just one thousand employees in the Immigration department, in Canada, overseas, and in the United States. My deputy informs me that this investigation officer is largely engaged in taking care of the boundary line between United States and Canada, investigating complaints regarding people passing backwards and forwards.

Mr. SPENCER: I intend to go into the immigration policy of the government at a later date, on item 56, which I believe will be the proper item. I may say now that I am very glad indeed that the government have centralized their immigration agencies between the department and the two railways. Are the agencies overlapping in any way on the continent, in England or in the United States, or are they using in any of those places the same agencies or the same officers? It does not matter which of these agencies spends money in bringing out immigrants, because if we do not pay it in taxation we pay it in freight rates.

Mr. FORKE: No, there is no overlapping in that regard, because we have practically no other immigration agents on the continent of Europe than the government immigration agent at the point of embarkation. Of course there is a different arrangement in Great Britain.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister referred to the immigration agent that the Alberta government has in London. That province has suffered in years past through having immigrants dumped on them, and I believe the official in London is placed there by the Alberta government more to direct colonization than to obtain immigrants.

Mr. GARDINER: During the early part of the debate to-night some reference was made to a system of permits. Can the minister tell us how many were issued last year, how many the year before, and under whose authority they were issued?

Mr. FORKE: Some time ago I laid on the table of the House a statement showing the number of permits that were issued.

Mr. GARDINER: That will be all right. A great deal has been said to-night with regard to the Salvation Army and the different associations interested in this subject. I would like some information on one point with regard to the Salvation Army, because I could not hear what the minister said. I should like to know the amount of money they secured from these boys. I understand that it costs the Salvation Army from $60 to $80 to outfit them, apart from the transportation. Has the minister made any inquiry from any of the boys as to whether the money was for transportation or for outfitting?

Mr. FORKE: I did not intend to read any of these letters to-night, but I will have to read another letter now. This letter says:

I signed a document agreeing to pay to the Salvation Army the sum of $100 with the understanding that it was for my transportation to Canada and not as a contribution to Army funds. This document is in England. I think other boys are repaying the money with the same idea. Those who enter farther into Canada have more than $100 to pay, therefore, it must appear to be the cost of passage. I was on a training farm for three months, but this was termed to be free.

I have several of those letters.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the date?

Mr. FORKE: I have not got it.

Mr. GARDINER: What would be the cost of transportation?

Mr. FORKE: We make a grant of $80 for the passage money, but I do not think it costs that much.

Mr. GARDINER: This country pays so much passage money for the boys and the Imperial government pays so much. What is the actual cost of the passage? We would like to know whether the Salvation Army is asking for more than the cost of transportation.

Mr. FORKE: It is $55. I think all societies engaged in immigration work are getting the same grant. They receive more than it really costs them, and they have a surplus in case of immigrants going to places east of Winnipeg. If an immigrant goes to Winnipeg it will take about the amount of the grant.

Mr. STEVENS: They have to eat on the way.

Mr. FORKE: In the case of boys going west of Winnipeg, the combined grant of the Imperial and Dominion governments is $100.

Mr. GARDINER: If you are making a grant of a certain sum you surely know what it costs to bring them over. If you do not know what it costs you are not in a position to say whether the Salvation Army is charging for the passage or for the outfit of the boys.

Mr. FORKE: It averages $55—about £11.

Mr. GARDINER: What does it cost to bring a boy to Toronto or Winnipeg?

Mr. FORKE: They get a reduced rate.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: If the minister has not the figure before him he can furnish it later. If we know the actual cost of bringing the boys over then we will be in a position to separate the transportation cost from the outfit cost and we will know exactly what the Salvation Army has been doing with these boys.

Mr. FORKE: All right.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that it is about time for the committee to rise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the minister would let one item stand on which we could discuss the immigration policy generally, I think we might pass all the other items.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But I must ask that one item stand as my hon. friend from West Calgary could not be here to-night.

Mr. FORKE: Suppose we leave the last item on the list.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On condition that the whole department is open for discussion.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that we leave item 56, covering contingencies, on which anything can be taken into account.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Item 56 stands.

Mr. FORKE: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Edmonton), the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Thursday, April 7, 1927

The House met at eleven o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) I might explain to the House that this bill is simply for the purpose of restoring part of a previous act that was unintentionally repealed through having been inadvertently omitted from the bill creating the Department of National Revenue, when portions of former statutes were being retained.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, April 9th instant, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning and that in addition to the intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission from one to three o'clock and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): No. I desire to protest against this motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is only a notice.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not suppose my protest will do any good, nevertheless I wish to make it. I think that the House at the present time is working to the limit of the endurance of hon. members, and in view of the importance of the legislation that has been recently introduced, I think we should have at least one day in the week during which we may have an opportunity of scrutinizing this legislation. In the past there has frequently been introduced into the House, just a few days prior to prorogation, privilege legislation which has proved detrimental to the interests of the people, and the motion now before us may possibly be the means of such legislation going through on this occasion. Last Friday night there came before the House a measure in which the farmers of western Canada are very much interested. I refer to the Grain Act Amendment. The government has contemplated this legislation all session, and only now has it gone through. It has for its object the restoration to the farmers of very important property rights which had been taken away from them. We appreciate the fact that the government was anxious to see these rights restored to the farmers, but what I am pointing out is that the legislation went through the House on Friday night without protest. It is now before the Senate, and I am afraid it will not receive there that consideration which it deserves unless reasonable time is given in which to study it. At all events, if this resolution carries, I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that when we do sit on Saturday we rise at six o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me first say to my hon. friend, in regard to legislation at present under consideration in the other chamber, that the government certainly has no intention of pressing its program in such a manner as to endanger the enactment of any measures that have gone from this House to the Senate. If we have to sit for a considerable time longer than most of us expect to be obliged to, we will see that every opportunity is given the other house to deal in a perfectly satisfactory manner with the legislation before it. As to the motion itself, my hon. friend knows, the purpose is, if possible, to have prorogation take place before the Easter vacation. If we sit on Saturday morning, afternoon and evening we shall make considerable progress and be in a position then definitely to determine whether or not we can arrange for prorogation early next week. I would ask my hon. friend to let the motion pass, and if we find during the afternoon on Saturday that we are all exhausted we can then move that the House rise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Otherwise we might continue to sit in the evening.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I wish to register my protest against sitting on Saturday, even if we have to sit here other days until one or two in the morning, as we have done before. I am in entire accord with the hon. member who leads the Progressive group (Mr. Gardiner) in what he has said and in the reasons he has advanced. They are reasons which should receive every consideration. It is not in the interests of good business that this House should sit on Saturday.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why not? I will give you one reason why I do not think it is desirable for the House to sit on Saturday. I can see the possibility—I will not say the probability, but certainly the possibility—of millions of estimates being rushed through on Saturday night when there is a very slim attendance. I am just as anxious as anyone else to see the session come to a close next week, but merely for the sake of attaining that end I will not agree to something that may result in passing hastily through the House millions of dollars of estimates. It would be better to sit until next summer than do that.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). At the moment there is a most important bill before the railway committee. Many of us would like to attend that committee but we desire to be in the House at the same time, and this frantic endeavour to clean up business at any cost, in order to get away at a certain fixed date, is not conducive to sound legislation or to the proper conservation of the interests of the people. We should not allow ourselves to be stampeded into rushing through legislation and passing estimates without adequate consideration merely because we desire to prorogue at a given date. There is, I know, a strong desire on the part of everyone to get away as soon as possible; we all share that feeling. Nevertheless, it is a ridiculous spectacle for this country to witness this House, after a session of but two months conducted in an easy manner, passing legislation hurriedly and disposing of the business without full consideration because suddenly, a few days before prorogation, we decide to clean up everything. The House and the committees are meeting simultaneously and hon. members are anxious to be in both places, but this is impossible. If we desired to do so, we might clean up all the business of the House in a couple of days, and I do not know why the country should not conclude that parliament ought to be able to convene at the first of any month, have its committees and the House meet at eleven o'clock each day, sitting simultaneously, adjourning at two o'clock in the morning and thus dispose of the business of the country at the end of the same month.

An hon. MEMBER: So we could.

Mr. GEARY: An hon. gentleman says, so we could, but that is not my idea of how the business of the country should be considered.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): The suggestion for Saturday sittings originally came from me. It would meet my convenience either to sit or not to sit on Saturday, but I leave myself in the hands of the House. Hon. members who protest against the motion must remember that in every session for fifty years Saturday has been appropriated during the last week or two, and I think the same thing is true of morning sittings.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That does not make it right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think it has been any great inconvenience in the past to sit in the morning and have the committees meeting at the same time. As I say, however, it will suit my convenience either to sit or not to sit on Saturday, and if the House desires to continue for a week, two weeks, three or four, I shall be content. I do not believe that we should rush business through at the end of the session; we should fully consider every measure that comes before us. But the bills which have gone through the House this year with little or no debate are bills which were discussed to the fullest extent last session, and there would be little use in repeating those debates on this occasion. There is, I admit, some change in the personnel of the House, but not a very great change, and it has been the consensus of opinion that measures which were passed last year and which failed to receive the royal assent should not occupy too much time this year. We have therefore economized time in that respect. Having made the suggestion originally for Saturday sittings, I rise now merely to say that either arrangement will suit me admirably.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of what my hon. friend has said I suggest that we allow the motion to stand until to-morrow and in the meantime see if an agreement cannot be reached among all parties.

Motion stands.

DRUMHELLER MINE WORKERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to direct the attention of the administration and in particular, of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan)—possibly the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) will be interested also—to the following telegram I have received:

E. J. GARLAND, M.P.,

There are about two thousand mine workers out of work at present in the Drumheller valley. This has caused great distress and we would urge upon you the necessity for parliament taking immediate action to relieve the suffering of these men and their families which is growing more intense each passing week in any possible way you may determine.

A. PARKER, President,
H. SMITH,
Secretary Local No. 59 United Mine Workers of America.

I refer this telegram to the Minister of Labour in the hope that he may be able to find some means of assisting these men in their distressful circumstances.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): The department has a man on the job right now investigating conditions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In Drumheller?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND: (Bow River): What is the object of the investigation? Has it any relation to this distress?

Mr. HEENAN: When we get an application we always send a man to investigate the conditions.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

OBJECTION TO PROPOSED EXCEPTIONS TO APPLICATION OF INCREASE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): At page 1767 of Hansard the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) made a statement with regard to civil service salaries. I have had a communication by telegraph from people interested in this matter outside of Ottawa, who state that the exceptions to the proposed increase practically destroy the benefit of that raise, and I would be very glad if the Secretary of State could tell me if he has anything in mind with regard to the point raised by this message.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I am sorry, but I was speaking to the Clerk of the House when my hon. friend began his question. Do I understand that it relates to the postal clerks?

Mr. GEARY: In the statement of my hon. friend with regard to civil service salaries a number of exceptions were made.

Mr. RINFRET: To which exception does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. GEARY: The point is that interested persons outside Ottawa have communicated with me, stating that the exceptions practically destroy the benefits of the proposed raise and that so many people are affected by the exceptions that the increase is by no means general throughout the service.

Mr. RINFRET: When we take up the amount in the estimates to cover this increase we will have a full discussion, but I may say to-day that the underlying principle of the revision is to grant an increase to every civil servant in either the inside or outside service, both temporary and permanent, with the general exception that those classes which have received some increase since 1924 would get only the difference between the increase now granted and that which they have been receiving since that date.

Mr. GEARY: Then has the minister anything in mind in regard to a change in the proposed basis of revision, or does what he stated previously stand with no possibility of a change?

Mr. RINFRET: That is the proposal made to the House, but when in committee we deal with the revision of salaries I will very cheerfully consider any suggestions which may be made.

Mr. TOLMIE: Does that include railway mail clerks?

Mr. RINFRET: The suggestion will have to come from someone else.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I am in the same position as the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary). I have received a number of telegrams and letters with respect to this matter, and my understanding was that the whole question of salaries might be discussed when the House went into committee on the supplementary estimates which would deal with this matter, and that there would be no restrictions imposed on any discussion which might then take place.

Mr. RINFRET: That is exactly the case.

RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): I would like to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken twice on the orders of the day.

Mr. GEARY: These are matters which have been referred to me, Mr. Speaker; I do not ask them of my own accord. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he will give an answer to a question which comes from London and which arises by reason of an accident which occurred the other day in which certain railway mail clerks were injured. My correspondents desire to know if the fact that railway mail clerks are engaged in a hazardous occupation will have any effect upon the civil service salary revision as it affects their class. I would also ask when the new schedule will be presented to the House.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I will read the question in Hansard and prepare an answer to-morrow.

EMPLOYMENT OF DISABLED VETERANS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): I would like to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) if he has anything further to communicate to the House with regard to the question I raised yesterday concerning the right of amputation cases to take certain civil service examinations?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I may say to the hon. gentleman that yesterday I asked for a conference between representatives of the Canadian Legion and several of the officials of the department. They had a very lengthy discussion yesterday afternoon and a statement of the result is now being prepared. I have here merely a synopsis of what occurred, which I would not like to give to the House until I have the full notes prepared together with the result, in order that I may lay them before the House. If I gave these few notes now they might lead people astray.

Mr. WHITE (London): Will that statement be given out within a day or two?

Mr. VENIOT: I hope to be able to give it out between now and tomorrow.

FIRST NARROWS BRIDGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) to a telegram I have received from a public body in the city of Vancouver, asking for information as to the position of the government with regard to the First Narrows bridge. What decision has been arrived at with regard to its location, its plans and construction, and are any contracts likely to be made?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): The matter is under consideration, and nothing definite has been settled.

Mr. CLARK: Is an early decision likely to be arived at?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; I think I can say that much.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister make a statement before prorogation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid that may be impossible.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—MANITOBA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) if he has received from the provincial government of Manitoba any request to grant unemployment relief on the basis on which that relief was granted last year?

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the intention of the government in that regard?

Mr. HEENAN: The government has not had time to consider it; the request was only received last night.

PILOTAGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA WATERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (South Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) to a despatch appearing in a Victoria paper having to do with a matter affecting the ex-service men of this country. It reads as follows:

> Rebuff to Canadian Pilot is Resented
> Asked to get United States navigator to bring ship to Canadian waters.
> Urgent need of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League to look after the interests of ex-service men is indicated by an instance which the Britannia Post of the British Empire Service League was recently requested to protest to Ottawa, says a statement from the secretary.
> "A United States vessel was taken into quarantine by a local pilot, an ex-Royal Naval Reserve officer. On being cleared the said pilot was asked to take the ship on to Port Angeles where a United States pilot was taken aboard to continue to navigate the ship into a Canadian port.
> "British Columbia is a long way from Ottawa and we are very curious to know what would have happened had such an instance occurred in Quebec waters where feeling runs high regarding the rights of Canadian citizens."

These are not my words; I am simply quoting the article. I would like to ask the minister if he has any information on this matter, and if so, why this pilot was changed for an American pilot?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I have no information in regard to this matter, but I will inquire and give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

[Mr. Elliott.]

COLD STORAGE PLANT AT HALIFAX

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. SHORT (Digby-Annapolis): The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is not in his seat, but perhaps one of the other ministers can give me some information with reference to an article which appears in the Halifax papers regarding an agreement entered into between the government and some other parties with reference to the construction of a cold storage plant at Halifax. Can any of the members of the government give us any information in that regard?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members seem to forget that they have an opportunity of presenting any of these questions to the government by having them appear on the order paper. They have only to write them out and hand them to the Clerk. A question such as the one just asked may be answered satisfactorily in that way. The ministry cannot be expected to answer offhand innumerable questions with regard to messages which have just been received by hon. members of the House, and I submit that the House should sustain you, Mr. Speaker, in your endeavour to restrict unnecessary and innumerable questions being put on the orders of the day. Let them be placed on the order paper and they will be answered in the regular way.

Mr. SHORT: But, Mr. Speaker, this is a question—

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

INSURANCE ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 50, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Power to invest funds in stock of other Canadian insurance companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think that desirable?

Mr. ROBB: The opinion of the department is that there is a very strong tendency at the present time towards the absorption of Canadian fire and casualty insurance companies. The Canadian life insurance companies carry about 65 per cent of the total life insurance business in Canada. The Canadian fire insurance companies carry about 13 per cent of the total fire insurance business in Canada, and of this 13 per cent less than one-third is carried by companies under Canadian control. The balance is carried by companies nominally Canadian, but controlled through stock ownership by British and United States companies. The result is that of the total fire insurance business in Canada about four per cent is carried by purely Canadian companies. The tendency in this respect is shown by the figures for the years 1905, 1915 and 1925. I think this legislation, after very careful consideration, was considered necessary by the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: It is like the investment by banks in the stocks of another bank. That is what it gets down to. It is really doubtful as to whether or not life insurance companies should own shares in another life insurance company. It has been held always to be a bad policy for banks to own shares in a competing bank. I only mention the matter because I was not able to be in the committee when the bill was being considered. I think this involves a matter of extremely doubtful policy.

Mr. CAHAN: An explanation was given before the committee which seemed to me fairly satisfactory. That was that it enabled Canadian companies to take an interest in the shares of a British company, for instance, and thereby secure business through that British company in which they owned shares.

Mr. BENNETT: This applies not only to British companies but to foreign companies.

Mr. CAHAN: If it were a British or United States company I do not think the same objection would apply. Perhaps "foreign" is too broad, but it must be a foreign company which is licensed to do business in Canada. In the committee I listened to the discussion and to the arguments which were brought forward by the representatives of the insurance companies, and it seemed to me that they were at present labouring under a disability which this legislation might help to remove. That was my impression from listening to the long discussion.

Mr. ROBB: It is pointed out that in Great Britain fire insurance companies are permitted to invest in, or carry as assets in their statements, the stock of other fire insurance companies. In the United States this practice has, as a rule, not been permitted, but in some states of the union such an investment is allowed. I think the committee considered this provision very carefully and we might well allow it to pass.

Mr. RYCKMAN: On this point the committee, I think, was unanimous. The situation is that a British or a foreign company has, with respect to Canadian business, an advantage over the position that a Canadian company has in the reverse case, and the committee was inclined, therefore, to put a Canadian company on the same basis as a British or foreign company. I may say that the legislation was asked for especially by two of the oldest Canadian companies—one, the British American, operating, I think, for ninety-three years, and the other, the Western, operating for something like seventy-eight. It was pointed out to the committee that if either the British or the Western companies desired to exercise the privileges that British and foreign companies have it would be difficult for them to do so. They were required to wind up any company which they might acquire by control and to do business in roundabout ways through an underwriters' agency. The committee, in a word, thought that all companies licensed to do business in Canada should be on the same basis.

Mr. BENNETT: I listened with a very great deal of interest to what the minister said and I do not at all agree with him because this permits a Canadian company to do, not what the hon. member from St. Lawrence-St. George and my hon. friend from Toronto have said, but to hold shares in any other Canadian company. Now that means just what has been condemned so strongly heretofore in this House—one insurance company acquiring shares in another company. The result is that you have all the evils that have been denounced from time to time with respect to control and directorate. If it were limited to British or foreign companies I could quite understand the point made by the hon. gentleman, and I am familiar with the cases referred to; but when you empower Canadian companies to acquire shares in other Canadian companies you open the door to a condition which should not prevail with respect to insurance even though it be limited to fire insurance.

Mr. CAHAN: When the bill was in committee before, attention was drawn particularly to the words underlined:

> Or of any British or foreign company licensed under this act to transact such business in Canada.

I did not hear any discussion with regard to the authority of a Canadian company to invest in the fully paid shares of any other Canadian company.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not 15 per cent of its capital; it is 15 per cent of its assets, which is a different matter.

Mr. ROBB: I will have the matter looked into in the other chamber.

Mr. BENNETT: The clause will be carried on division because I am wholly opposed to it.

Section agreed to on division.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Minimum amount of assets.

Mr. BENNETT: This touches the question of investment of insurance companies.

Mr. ROBB: It meets in a measure the objection raised by my hon. friend in regard to clause 9.

Section agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the bill is reported, a question was put on the order paper yesterday by the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Young) with respect to a decision of the Supreme Court of Ontario holding ultra vires of this parliament certain sections of the Insurance Act. This decision more or less follows the view expressed by the Privy Council in the reciprocal insurance case and allied cases. There is another question which I conceive to be of great importance. Has this parliament the right legally to authorize a life insurance company to appropriate to its shareholders any part of the profits derived from the investment of premiums on policies belonging to policyholders? Is this not a matter, being one of property and civil rights, purely within provincial jurisdiction? Is not the section which has been in force for such a long time, by which earnings from the investment of premiums on policies shall in part be made applicable to dividends to shareholders, wholly beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament? This is a matter which requires the closest consideration in view of the exception that, by legislation now before the House, is being made to the general rule.

Mr. ROBB: I will direct the attention of the Department of Justice to the observations of my hon. friend. Of course the best lawyer in Canada does not expect that I am going to enter into a controversy with him on such purely legal questions.

Mr. BENNETT: Such flattery as that does not answer the question. I would disclaim that at once.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ROBB moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

POSTAGE RATES ON NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

The House resumed from April 1 consideration in committee of Bill No. 259, to amend the Post Office Act—Hon. Mr. Veniot. —Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the Postmaster General received protests against this?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister be good enough to indicate the intention of the administration with respect to them?

Mr. VENIOT: When this bill was in committee before, I gave an explanation of it. Since then I understand that many telegrams have been received from what is known as the smaller daily newspaper associations in several parts of Canada. There are about twenty-five interested in sending out these telegrams. They are not opposing a reduction of the rate, but they are asking that the reduction be deferred until they have an opportunity of laying before the government their claim for the establishment of what is known as a zone system, that is basing the rates on newspapers on the distances of their circulation. They further state:

> We favour a zone system whereby a great saving would be effected to the Post Office Department. It is fairest all round.

In 1920 when this act was being amended increasing the rate to one and one-half cents per pound in regard to certain classes of printed matter, the same delegation appeared and asked that the zone system be considered. It was very fully considered in 1920, and the decision reached was that such a system would not be practical in Canada owing to our sparse population. Since receiving this telegram and knowing that a number had been sent to other hon. members, I went fully into the matter with officials of my department and we still stand by the result of the decision reached in 1920.

These gentlemen who are protesting state that they are to meet in convention on the 4th and 5th of May. If when they meet at that time they will present any stronger reasons for the establishment of a zone system than they presented in 1920, the department will take their representations into consideration, and if their claim is a just one and if we can put it into force without affecting too much the revenues of the department, we will prepare something in the form of an amendment to this legislation and bring it before parliament next session. I see no reason why the bill as it is now before the House should not pass because it will not affect adversely the parties who are objecting. No matter what investigation may be made at the present time along the line of establishing a zone system, it would be absolutely impracticable in Canada. They have no such zone system generally throughout the United States. They have a zone system in the congested districts, but there are no sections of Canada so greatly congested in population that the zone system would work advantageously here.

I may say further that I have received a letter approving of this action that the Postmaster General is about to take. It is addressed to the hon. Minister of Finance from the Canadian National Newspapers and Periodicals Association, affiliated with the Canadian Press Association, and says:

> On behalf of the members of the Agricultural Press Association of Canada, the Magazine Publishers' Association of Canada, and the Business Newspapers' Association of Canada, all of which are affiliated with this association, I wish to express our appreciation of this proposed legislation, which presages a welcome measure of financial relief and leads us to hope that when the whole case of the periodical publishers has been dealt with by the government, we will have reached a parity of production costs with our foreign competitors.

Since they refer to their foreign competitors, let me say for the information of the House that I am of the opinion that something should be done to—shall I say—protect our publishers in Canada—

Mr. BENNETT: That is a good word.

Mr. VENIOT: —to protect our publishers from the influx of American newspapers and American periodicals which are to-day flooding the whole country. Since this bill was introduced, I have taken up this very matter with the various officials in the different branches concerned with newspaper postage and circulation, and during the recess a thorough investigation will be made with a view to devising some scheme by which we can give greater protection to our newspapers and periodicals in competition with American publications.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it not a fact that the bulk of American publications do not come into Canada through the mails, but by express, over which the Post Office Department has no control at all?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not in a position to say yes or no in answer to that question, because I have only begun an investigation into this matter, but should they come into the country in that way, of course, it might be difficult for us to regulate them. I do know, however, that a very, very large quantity comes through the mails.

Mr. MARCIL: I have mentioned this matter before, but I think the opportunity is good again to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that these Sunday and Saturday papers published in the United States and coming in here are largely advertising mediums, and not newspapers at all in the real sense of the word. For instance, a newspaper with fifty pages will probably carry about forty pages of nothing but advertising matter. Why should not the government of Canada receive a revenue from that advertising? If you do not want to penalize the literature that comes into this country, why not put a tax on the advertising carried by these newspapers, because for the most part they carry nothing else but advertising matter, which is circulated throughout this country to the detriment of Canadian manufacturers and Canadian industries, and helps to foster American ideas throughout the country in the households and wherever these newspapers go. If we cannot prevent the introduction of this literature, we ought at least to tax this advertising scheme, because three-fourths, if not seven-eighths of the whole thing is advertising pure and simple. This matter has been brought up several times before, and I hope the Minister of Finance in conjunction with the Postmaster General will see that a revenue is brought into the exchequer by placing a tax on the advertising columns of these papers.

A movement is on foot in the United States at the present time to reduce the size of these papers, because it is well known that the advertisers do not get the benefit from this advertising that they think they should get, for the ordinary man when he picks up a newspaper of forty or fifty or sixty pages has not the courage or the time to scan through the whole business, and he will simply look at the sporting or literary section or any other section in which he is interested, and throw the rest away. It is a waste of paper and a waste of time, and so far as we here are concerned it is a waste of revenue. I think in this sixtieth year of confederation the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General would be well advised to get a revenue at least from this influx of American publications, if we can get nothing else. It would be another step in fostering a Canadian spirit in Canada, because we would not then be flooded by the ideas and ideals which come in here from another country, some of them very acceptable to this country, but a great part of them, I am sorry to say, should not be accepted by us.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to take the time of the committee but I would suggest that the Minister of Customs at the present time has it entirely within his discretion, by giving a proper definition to certain items of the tariff, to place a tax on all magazines which bring advertising matter into this country. I think if he will look carefully into that and take the legal advice of his officers, he will find that the matter is entirely in his discretion at the present time.

Mr. JENKINS: In common with other members of parliament I have received several telegrams in connection with this bill, one from Mr. J. R. Burnett, of the Charlottetown Guardian, on behalf of about thirty newspapers.

Mr. VENIOT: Twenty-five.

Mr. JENKINS: I thought it was more; twenty-five, or whatever the number may be. This seems to be a rather important matter when we find such a number of newspapers throughout the country interested in it. I will take the liberty of reading just a short extract from this telegram:

> The present bill is an attempt by some big daily to steal a march on the others. Nothing will be lost by delaying till the dailies have an opportunity of expressing their opinion, and we would urge you and all members to oppose its passage this session.

I can see no reason why there should be any hurry about this particular bill, and I was glad to hear the minister say that if the bill does pass, he will hear the representations of these men who will be gathered together in Toronto on that particular date mentioned. I merely take up time at this moment to present the case of the smaller dailies who appear to think they are going to be oppressed by this legislation.

Mr. VENIOT: Proportionately most of those small dailies mentioned in the telegram will benefit more than the larger newspapers because the circulation of some of them is so small and they now come within the forty-mile zone provision—

[Mr. Marcil.]

Mr. BENNETT: And they will not get any benefit from a change because they go free in the forty-mile zone.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, so they really have no reason to complain, and they ought to know it. They are not paying to-day, some of them, and they will only pay provided their subscription runs to 2,500, and circulates beyond the forty-mile zone. They have that forty-mile zone now, but they want us to establish zones all over the Dominion. It cannot be done, according to the information I have from our experts, and therefore they should not ask to delay this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: But the dailies are not within the forty-mile zone provision.

Mr. VENIOT: Some of them are and some of them are not. I do not want to mention names, but I have a case right here with which I am quite familiar. This daily has only 750 subscribers, and the paper does not go outside of a 20-mile zone. They are given everything free, and yet they are complaining.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to suggest to the minister that perhaps he might do this. He might provide that this section shall come into force on proclamation so that he could have an opportunity—because he would have power under the Postal Act to regulate the matter; I do not know whether he could do that reasonably or not—but it would give him the opportunity of hearing the representations by those interested on the 1st of May, and the act could be brought into force by the beginning of July in any event.

Mr. VENIOT: Supposing we did that.

Mr. BENNETT: Then they get nothing. But if you did agree, under the regulations of the department, I think you would have power to make those provisions afterwards.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I looked into that very carefully.

Mr. BENNETT: Then that answers it. The only other alternative would be to let the matter go over for a whole year.

There is another point that I think the right hon. Prime Minister might consider in connection with this matter. The formation of national sentiment is influenced by factors which are sometimes conscious and sometimes unconscious to the people themselves. When my friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) made his observations with respect to advertisements, I thought it might afford me an opportunity to say something that has been in my mind for a long time. Take a magazine such as that mentioned by my friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) the other evening, it costs at least nine cents and is sold for five cents on the street. It is perfectly clear that the advertising it contains is so very lucrative that its publishers can afford to sell their production at a half of what the white paper costs. Let us look at it. It advertises goods manufactured in the United States at much lower retail prices than we can even produce them. That is, with a population of 110,000,000 their mass production enables them to advertise various goods that the Canadian housewife uses every day at a retail price less than they can be manufactured in Canada, much less sold.

This brings about a certain amount of distrust of our whole economic system and of the conduct of national affairs. It also does much to form a public opinion antagonistic to the very country in which we live. The effect of reading those advertisements of motor cars, washing machines, canned goods and various other commodities—I give only two or three illustrations, others will occur to hon. gentlemen as I proceed—the effect of reading those advertisements—and everybody reads them—especially on the minds of young people, is to make them ask: What is wrong with Canada that I should have to pay so much more for these things than the price at which they are sold in the United States? The result is that public opinion is being formed unconsciously and the whole national sentiment of the country is being more or less wrongly influenced, and this in turn injuriously affects the creation of that strong feeling of Canadianism that we are all so anxious to encourage.

I do urge that it is within the power of the Minister of Customs, as my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) says, to deal with the matter, and I am confident that the co-operation of the Minister of Customs and the Postmaster General, with the Minister of Finance strongly aiding them, would bring about such results as in my judgment would have a beneficial effect not only on the revenue—I am not thinking of that so much at the moment—but, more important still, on the body politic by preventing the circulation of such magazines containing advertisements which are detrimental to Canadian sentiment, for they reflect upon the ability of Canadians with our limited population and vast area to produce goods on terms to compete successfully with those produced in the United States having the advantage of mass production and an enormous consuming market. We have talked about this for so many years that I suggest the time has come for action, and this action will, I think, commend itself to every hon. gentleman, especially after having listened to the very able statement made the other day by my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is exceedingly gratifying, Mr. Chairman to find that at last we have one minister who appreciates the serious handicaps under which this great industry is suffering in this country.

Mr. VENIOT: I am a newspaper man, although I am not in the business now.

Mr. BENNETT: The owner of that paper with 750 circulation?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I got sold on that.

Mr. HOCKEN: What the minister proposes, although not all that is necessary in view of the competition from the other side, will be some slight relief for the publishers of this country; and since he has found it good policy to make this proposal I submit there should be no objection to it from any part of the House. Our tariff at the present time is 15 cents a pound on advertising matter. We allow magazines to be imported containing 240 pages, 150 pages being advertising matter on which no duty whatever is paid. Those magazines are not in the real sense of the word literary productions. If they depended upon their literary contents for profit they could not live at all. They are primarily advertising sheets. Those 150 pages of advertising are just 150 pages of printed matter that is admitted under the tariff of 15 cents a pound.

Now, it has been contended by the officials of the Customs department that they would find it very difficult, if not impossible, to separate the advertising from the reading matter and impose the tax. Of course, that is an entirely superficial view because in the United States they do separate the two; the postal rates there are higher for advertising than for literary pages. So what is done there ought to be done here. But let us get down to the two items of the tariff that are applicable. Item 184 provides for a duty of 25 per cent on just such publications as are coming in here. Another item imposes a duty on any literature of this kind that is unbound. Now, I should like the House to pay attention to this. By an arbitrary ruling of the Customs department made many years ago these magazines are said to be unbound. During the debate on the budget I produced one such magazine of sixteen different sections. How it can be argued that that is unbound is beyond my comprehension. Such an argument could not be maintained before any tribunal. If the items now in the tariff schedule were fairly interpreted according to their language, and properly applied, there would be a tariff of 25 per cent on all these foreign publications. I submit that that is not enough, but at least it would be something worth while and would have this effect: it would discourage certain publishers who have undertaken extensive subscription campaigns in Canada. The publishers of one particular magazine have set themselves an objective of 500,000 copies a week in this country, and have engaged some of our best canvassers to assist them. Since they started the campaign they have increased their circulation 50 per cent. Now, even if the tariff were only 25 per cent, it would discourage those enterprises, and it would be a warning to their promoters that the time may come—as I hope it will—when they will have to bear a heavier impost.

I have argued with the Finance minister now for four or five years to get a little relief, and I am delighted this morning to discover that at least one minister, and a minister in a position to do something, is seized of the urgent necessity and the undoubted justice of giving this much consideration to the publishing interests of the Dominion. I have in mind the publisher of a certain daily newspaper which does not go into the mail to the extent of more than a few thousand, but all of whose circulation, which is a large one, is distributed by carrier in the city of publication. I find that particular publisher very active in trying to prevent this bill going through. The telegram read by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island cites a number of other papers which are practically in the same position. They are not paying anything, and they do not want anyone else to get relief, simply because they are not personally interested. That is a very narrow and selfish attitude for them to take. On broad, national grounds this bill ought to go through, and there should be no objection from any quarter.

Mr. VENIOT: As regards the suggestion that there is an attempt on the part of some big dailies to steal a march, let me say that there is no big daily newspaper in Canada that has ever approached me in this matter. I have been a newspaper man myself for more than thirty years, although I am out of the business now, and I know from experience the burden that is being carried by the newspaper fraternity of Canada to-day. That burden I am attempting to some extent to relieve. When I laid the matter before the government they accepted the policy which I am now submitting to the committee, and I want to assure hon. gentlemen that so far as I am concerned absolutely no influence has been brought to bear on the part of any big dailies. What I am doing now I am doing on my own initiative because, from an experience of some thirty-five years in the newspaper business, I feel that this measure of relief is due at the present time.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): What does the minister think of the zone system asked for in the telegram?

Mr. VENIOT: It is impracticable in Canada, and I might as well make the statement now for the benefit of our friends so that when they meet in convention they may advance the strongest arguments possible to convince the department that they are right and we are wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not a party question, and I may therefore venture to remind the committee that at one time I was Postmaster-General and consequently am very much interested in the whole subject. I will not refer to the number of newspapers and reviews published in the United States which are daily and weekly invading Canada with their mass of advertising matter that comes in practically free to the disadvantage of Canadian publications. That is not the phase of the situation to which I desire to direct the attention of hon. members.

I want to refer the Postmaster-General (Mr. Veniot)—and I am in earnest in this, for I speak the mind of a large number of good citizens of Canada—to the very strong exception which is being taken to the large number of pornographic papers, magazines and other periodicals sold in our large cities, such as Montreal and Toronto. I do not know so much about Toronto where I visit two or three times a year. Certainly, however, Montreal and even Ottawa are being disgraced to-day by the sale of these pornographic papers, which are being read by our young men and women and even children. These newspapers are on sale at every street corner in our principal cities, and while I know that the Postmaster-General is not primarily responsible for their obnoxious presence I do think that he and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) might get together and devise some drastic means of stemming the flood into Canada of this mass of deleterious reading matter. Every police magistrate in the city of Montreal, in the light of investigations that have been held, has declared that convictions, especially of juvenile delinquents, can invariably be traced to the reading in the first instance of newspapers and other publications carrying pornographic news and pictures. Even in France, which as everybody knows is as free as any country can be, there is at the present time a decided movement against the purveying of literature of this sort. The other day I was interested to read that a member of the clergy in the city of Paris had passed from one street to another there, destroying as he went along all the pornographic advertising matter which came to his notice. He was brought to the court and I admired his speech in defence of what he had done. "Could I", he asked, "allow poisonous matter to find its way into the hands of children, young boys and girls, and refrain from destroying it in the interests of their morals and for the good of society?" The judge in pronouncing sentence upon the accused practically admitted that he was right, but unfortunately the purist could not take the law into his hands and so he was obliged to convict him. He fined the priest one franc. With the franc at its present value, the fine was purely nominal.

I hope the Postmaster General and the Minister of Customs will deal with this matter in a drastic way. We must protect our youth and prevent this literature from invading our cities and finding its way into our homes. Some years ago, when Postmaster General, I negotiated with the authorities at Washington a modest treaty which to a certain degree kept this literature out of Canada, and concurrently with that treaty I made arrangements with the British Postmaster General to the same end. A preference was given to papers and reviews published in Great Britain; this was known as the British intellectual preference. I followed very closely the effect of that legislation, not only in Washington and London but in Canada as well, and I was agreeably surprised after a little while to observe that in the large centres newspapers and reviews of high moral character were being sold to the people. Just before the war, however, this arrangement with Great Britain was discontinued for financial reasons. I would ask the Postmaster General to study the question to see whether it may not be possible to restore that arrangement, which I can assure him was quite beneficial.

A large number of immigrants from the British Isles are settling in western Canada. They are far away from neighbours, and of course they like to read the news from home. Shall we allow cheap dime novels and pornographic papers, published in some of the western United States cities like Chicago, to cross the boundary and become the principal reading matter of these new settlers? I think these settlers would appreciate news from home, which would help keep sacred the ideals to which they were born and bred. I am only offering these remarks to the House, Mr. Chairman, in order to facilitate the task of the Postmaster General, who I hope will become a great reformer at least in the matter of Canadian literature and the ideals of the Canadian press. It is a sad spectacle to see, even here in this good city of Ottawa which is to become a great capital, tabloid papers being sold at every corner.

Mr. IRVINE: There seems to be general agreement with respect to this bill, and I think we are all aware of the difficulties with which our publishers have to contend in order to compete with the publishers of the United States. We are also aware of the tremendous effect of literature on the public mind, and I think we all agree that there should be developed a real Canadian spirit, sentiment and outlook, and that in the creation of these national sentiments literature plays a part equal to that of any other influence. Personally I am glad that some recognition is being given to the difficulties of our publishers. There have been several suggestions made as to how they might be assisted; one is that a tariff might be placed upon American publications, while the other suggestion is that a tariff reduction should be made on the machinery, accessories and so forth used in the publishing business. I have no solution of my own; I do not know which of those two ways would be the better, but the present proposal does not raise the question of tariffs. This bill will bring about a slight reduction in postal rates, which I feel sure will be appreciated by the publishing business generally in Canada. I do not quite appreciate the point raised with respect to smaller publications; while they may not receive any direct benefit from this bill, I fail to see where they will receive any injury and I think the bill should pass.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am not opposed to the bill, but there seems to be a disposition to inject into the discussion the question of the tariff and the question of customs duties. The whole matter of the tariff on magazines is at present before the Tariff Advisory Board, which I presume to be the proper place for the consideration of such a question. I have no objection to the board considering it, but I would object to the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Robb) raising the tariff on magazines until such time as the case had been heard by the tariff board, and the report and evidence submitted to the House.

With regard to salacious matter in our magazines, I have no doubt that it is very objectionable, but the only way to deal with that matter is by police regulations. If these regulations are not sufficiently strict, make them so, and in that way eliminate these magazines from our street corners. That is a much better way than putting a tariff on these publications, or excluding them. If they have a criminally immoral tendency let the police deal with them. There is a section in the Criminal Code by means of which magazines of this kind may be dealt with, and if the law does not cover this matter amend the law in that respect.

With regard to the influence of American magazines upon the families of our country, I rather think we are hedging our Canadian boys and girls about with so much paternalism that they will not be allowed to choose for themselves; I do not see why our young people should not read a good many of these magazines without having their ideals affected. I have raised several boys and I have never tried to exclude American magazines from their reading matter; I think perhaps they have even gone a little too far in their ideas of Canadian independence. If we attempt to restrict their reading matter in this way, I think we will be going too far, because I believe our Canadian boys and girls come of a stock which shows a great deal of initiative, and they should be allowed to exercise their own discretion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to call the attention of the committee to an incident which has just occurred and which I think should be noted. The presiding officer of this House has seen fit to address a few remarks to this committee and I think we should take note of the innovation. I do not know that I draw attention to the fact by way of protest at all, because the remarks made by His Honour were very useful to the discussion and very elevating in their tendency, but the question is whether the Speaker of this House has the right to discuss any matters before the House. If His Honour has that right in this case, I do not see why he should not have the right to discuss any matter which comes before parliament. I noticed in his remarks that he expressed the desire to facilitate the efforts of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). No doubt that is a very laudable desire, but there are members of this House who do not think this measure is proper, and I doubt if it is within the right of the Speaker to express an opinion upon any matter before the House. His Honour the Speaker on more than one occasion has laid down the doctrine pronounced by a celebrated Speaker in England in these words:

> May it please Your Majesty, I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place but as the House is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here—

I think we should note the innovation, and I do not say this by way of protest against anything His Honour said, because no one has a higher respect for the Speaker of this House than I have. While a Deputy Speaker is allowed to take part in debates in the House on non-controversial matters, I have never in my experience heard a Speaker of the House take part in any proceeding except when the estimates of the House of Commons were before the committee. I think we should take note of this proceeding, because in the future it may become a precedent and I think the Speaker in his own interest should be prevented from taking part in the debates of this House. The rule says he shall not take part in the debates of the House, but whether or not that applies to committee I am not going to say at the moment.

Mr. MARCIL: Having been at one time Speaker of this House I am somewhat familiar with the practice as to the restrictions upon the occupant of the chair. We are all at one on the point involved that the Speaker should never take part in any debate in the House except for the purpose of explaining his own estimates. That is a well known rule of parliament. But I know that the House is disposed this morning to overlook the course pursued by His Honour in view of the motives which animated him. Mr. Speaker spoke for the youth of the country on high moral grounds, and to further the development of that sound Canadian sentiment which we are all striving to see realized in this golden jubilee year of the Dominion. I am sure that the leader of the opposition, as he himself has said, has no intention of blaming the Speaker, and I quite agree with him that it would be out of place for His Honour to take part in our discussions having reference to matters of ordinary, everyday occurrence. In the present case, however, His Honour spoke from his experience as Postmaster General, and with the laudable purpose of promoting the circulation in Canada of a larger number of British periodicals. Because, after all, we are part and parcel of the British Empire. We have greater interest in promoting the circulation of British periodicals in Canada than we have in promoting the circulation of periodicals from the adjoining republic. I am responsible, to a certain extent, for having initiated the discussion upon this particular phase of the matter. But my purpose in doing so was not to prevent the entrance into Canada of American publications as such but to try and stem the flooding of this country with American advertising, which is purely a business matter. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has pointed out, the Minister of Customs has power to exact from the publishers duties on the advertising matter in American newspapers that come into Canada. In this connection may I say that I was a commissioner for the city of Montreal for a number of years, and in that city a medical man or professional man of any kind cannot hang out his shingle. nor can a business man exhibit a trading sign, without obtaining permission from the municipality and paying a fee therefor. Now why should this Dominion be flooded, not through the mails but through the railway service, with huge piles of American periodicals which are nothing less than vehicles for advertising—advertising which does not appear in our own newspapers, which is not of a character congenial to us, and which is not favourable to the maintenance of Canadian ideals. It was on that ground that I spoke at an earlier stage of the proceedings, and I am sure that if His Honour went a step further than he should have done, he was influenced by the motive that we should further, on moral ground, and to the greatest extent in our power, the creation of a sound, virile Canadian sentiment, particularly among the youth of this country. We have only to look around us to see what is happening in this country. Those hon. members who are interested in the subject may read a speech, delivered in another place this session, by the chairman of the divorce committee, in which he alludes to certain ominous signs of the times. Over 1,200 divorces, for example, granted in one year. In this matter, I am afraid, we are imitating the example of the United States, where one marriage out of seven was dissolved last year. We must be on our guard as to the effect upon our young people of certain kinds of moving pictures and illustrated books, some of which are denounced even in the United States and by churches and religious organizations of all kinds. Over there these organizations have been quite free in condemnation of papers and periodicals that should not be allowed to circulate in a decent, respectable country. Some of these publications are a disgrace, they should not be allowed to enter a respectable home, and we should be on our guard lest they contaminate the morals of our boys and girls, the future citizens of our country. I feel that it is the bounden duty of the government of Canada to act in this matter, and that in any action they may take along this line they will be backed up by public opinion. We had a sad experience in Montreal in the opening days of the present year. I allude to what happened at the Laurier Palace theatre when, owing to a violation of the law, seventy-eight young children became victims of exploitation through the medium of a moving picture show. It was an event which attracted the attention of the whole world, and even His Majesty the King sent his condolences to the city of Montreal. It is true this is largely a provincial matter. But the films which are introduced into these moving pictures come through the customs and for that reason it is possible for the Minister of Customs to take some remedial action. I am sure there is no greater work we can do for this country than to purify its atmosphere, maintain a high standard of morals, and protect our young people, so that we may be able to build up in Canada a great, a prosperous and a moral nation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in agreement with the contention that the Speaker should take no part in the ordinary debates of the House. But this morning we are in committee, and the committee is discussing an important matter, and it was on purely moral grounds that I raised my voice against the sale of pornographic literature or newspapers on the streets of our cities. But what is really the law on the subject? The hon. gentleman has quoted from Beauchesne. May I be permitted to refer him to Beauchesne under rule 33, paragraph 159. In May's Parliamentary Practice, page 333, I find the following:

> Although the Speaker is restrained by usage while he is in the chair in the exercise of his independent judgment, he is entitled in a committee of the whole House to speak and vote like any other member.

I would not vote even in committee, and I take no part whatever in debate. I never speak except on an occasion like the present when I was able to offer a contribution, from the experience I had had, to the discussion of a purely moral question. May I resume the quotation:

> Of late years, however, he has generally abstained from the exercise of this right. Among the earliest examples are those of Mr. Speaker Glanville, on the 4th May 1640, upon the granting of twelve subsidies to the king; and of Mr.

Speaker Lenthall, on the 22nd January, 1641, against the "brotherly gift" to the Scottish nation. Sir Fletcher Norton spoke strongly on the influence of the crown, on the 6th April, 1780; and Mr. Speaker Grenville, on the regency question, on the 16th January, 1789. On the 17th December, 1790, Mr. Speaker argued at length the question of the abatement of an impeachment by a dissolution of parliament and cited a long list of precedents. On the 4th December, 1797, Mr. Speaker Addington addressed the committee on the assessed taxes from the gallery. The same Speaker also addressed a committee on the union with Ireland in 1799.

Then follows a long list of precedents, but coming nearer to our own time there are the following cases:

On the 4th August, 1843, Mr. Speaker Shaw Lefevre spoke in committee of supply on a point of order, and on the 21st April, 1856, in the same committee, the management and patronage of the British Museum—

Not a party question—

—by the principal trustees having been called in question, he spoke in defence of himself and his colleagues with great applause. On the 9th June, 1870, Mr. Speaker Denison—

One of the great Speakers in the British parliament—

—spoke and voted in committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, in support of a clause exempting horses kept for husbandry from license duty, if used in drawing materials for the repair of roads.

I repeat that I quite agree with the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman and by all authorities that the Speaker from the chair must not take part in the debate; that he must not vote unless there is a tie; but in committee he has a right to speak and to vote. I never speak unless on an exceptional occasion like this morning, on a non-party matter, on a purely moral issue, and I would not even vote. I quote these precedents to show the leader of the opposition that this morning, the 7th day of April, 1927, no revolution took place in the Canadian House.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like the minister in charge of the bill to inform the committee as to the total weight of newspapers and periodicals moved in any given year.

Mr. VENIOT: The total weight of newspapers and periodicals going through the mails in a year is 90,000,000 pounds.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the total revenue?

Mr. VENIOT: $1,500,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the total cost of the service?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. VENIOT: $8,500,000, or a deficit of $7,000,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): One is compelled now to approach this bill from an altogether new angle. We have been discussing it on rather high, abstract, academic grounds, if you like. Let us come down now to practical matters. According to the minister's statement, the total weight moved is 90,000,000 pounds, the total revenue, $1,500,000, the total cost of the service, $8,500,000, or a net loss of $7,000,000. That is bad enough and it has taken place under existing rates. The minister now proposes a reduction so that the rates may be fixed at one cent instead of one and one-half cents a pound. The obvious result of that would be an additional loss of about $500,000, and for whose benefit? Do the minister and other members of the House suggest that purchasers of these newspapers are going to have this reduction passed on to them? Not a cent of it will go to them; you cannot reduce the regular price of a newspaper by a fraction of a cent. The result is that great publishing houses like that of Lord Atholstan and newspapers handling large quantities daily are going to be the gainers, and they are going to gain at the expense of taxpayers of this country.

Mr. VENIOT: They will not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope the minister will elucidate that denial of his in a minute. My allegation is that the rate is being reduced to a point that will entail a further loss of between $400,000 and $500,000. That loss will come out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country and the benefits will go to big publishers like Lord Atholstan, owner of the Montreal Star. In the United States where the service is somewhat similar to ours the news rates paid by publishers are fixed at one and one-half cents per pound regardless of the distance; the advertising rates vary from two to nine cents per pound, depending on distance. I submit that this country is not in such an extraordinarily flourishing financial position that we can afford to throw away a revenue of this kind in order to benefit great newspapers like the Montreal Star that seem to be doing well enough now.

Mr. HOCKEN: And the Grain Growers' Guide.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no hesitation in agreeing to have that included as a beneficiary under the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: And the immense circulation in Canada of all farmers' periodicals?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly. But when the loss is already $7,000,000 per annum it is hard to justify a measure that will have the effect of increasing the loss by half a million.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to take up much of the time of the committee because it is approaching one o'clock and I would like to facilitate the passage of this bill, but I would not like to see it pass under any misapprehension. While there is a deficit of the amount that I have stated, it has not been brought about by the carrying of the daily newspapers. It has been brought about principally by the free newspaper postage that has been given to many of the newspaper fraternity in the Dominion of Canada. While this reduction in rate will entail a reduction in revenue in the vicinity of $400,000, I hope, and I feel satisfied that I have every ground for hoping, that the increased volume of business which we are losing now from the large dailies on account of the extra amount we are charging, the heavy cost of the rate we are charging for shorter distances, because they have no forty mile zone at all, will make up for this deficit, and that at the end of the coming fiscal year, the deficit will be no greater than it is now. At the same time we shall be granting to the newspaper fraternity justice which they have a right to obtain to-day from the government of Canada. I have gone into this very carefully with officials of my department, and I have no hesitation in stating to the committee that this reduction will not entail the deficit of which my hon. friend speaks, because the volume of business will be such that we shall meet that increase in the deficit and the deficit will be no greater than it is to-day.

Mr. HOCKEN: You will have a full mail car instead of a half full one.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This matter came before this House a number of years ago.

Mr. VENIOT: In 1920.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The rates in force then showed a loss to the public revenues of a very considerable amount of money and the rates were increased by the House. This reduction in my judgment is intended for the benefit of a very few people and the general consuming public will receive no benefit from it whatever. The people who are suffering from these low rates are the small newspaper publishers throughout the country. They are the people who have been hammered to death by rates because this government carries mail matter practically free. Does the committee know that under these rates mail matter can be carried from, say Montreal or Toronto to Regina more cheaply than the paper out of which a local newspaper is printed. If you ship paper from Ottawa or Montreal to Regina or Saskatoon, the freight on the paper itself is more than the express charges upon these printed newspapers. Is that fair to the local people who are trying to run newspapers? What has been the result throughout this country during the last five or six years? The country newspaper has been going out of business simply because the government is building up the larger newspapers elsewhere. Is that good business for the country? I submit it is not. These rates are neither just nor fair and I object strongly to them.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 280, respecting the Federal District Commission.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING : Mr. Chairman, yesterday my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) asked how much money had been paid out by the government to the Ottawa Improvement Commission. I find the total from 1900 to the present year is $2,665,000; in other words, an average of $100,000 a year over a period of twenty-six years.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand there is some idea of enlarging the scope of territory to include the district outside Ottawa. If that is contemplated can the Prime Minister give us any detailed information?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The commission has in mind the immediate suburbs—what might be described as territory more or less visible from the capital itself.

Mr. GARDINER: Does that involve going across the river?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, possibly improvements on the other side of the river, the city of Hull.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions—"Commission," "Minister."

Mr. BENNETT: The word "the" in paragraph (a) should have a capital "T".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Federal district commission—Number of commissioners, etc.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I note, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this clause that it is proposed to appoint a commission of ten members, of whom nine shall be appointed by the governor in council, one of them to be a resident of the city of Hull and the other to be appointed by the city of Ottawa. My only comment is that in the appointment of such a commission care will have to be exercised by the government that the commission is in no way political. There must be a disregard of party politics in appointing a commission of this kind. I realize, of course, that the government will in all probability appoint a majority of its political friends; I would expect that, and would not object to it; but at the same time there should be on a board of ten a fair representation of all political parties if the commission is to work harmoniously and produce the results which we anticipate.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, I should like a little further information as to the scope of the territory to be covered by the commission, having regard to the object in view of beautifying Ottawa. I may be lacking in appreciation, but I do not just see the necessity of spending money in the city of Hull for the beautification of Ottawa. Is any information available as to how far the driveway will go along the river?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As far as I have been able to gather from the chairman of the commission, the intention is to complete certain driveways that start on this side of the river, cross the bridge to the other side, and then connect with the roadways that run by the side of the Gatineau river and out towards Aylmer to the different clubhouses which, as my hon. friend knows, are situated on the other side. So far as I understand, this is not intended to be for the beautification of the city of Hull; it is rather to make in the immediate environs of the capital a system of driveways and parks which will be interlinked.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not wish to inject anything of a controversial character, but I may say I have heard that certain persons are interested in the other side of the river through having summer homes there. Is it the idea to make beautiful driveways up to the homes of these persons, some of whom sit in this House and have summer residences on the other side of the river? If so, I think it is extending the scheme a little too far to spend the money of the country in that direction. Of course, I quite understand that it is very pleasant to have fine driveways in and around Ottawa, and a good deal of money has already been spent for that purpose. But there does not seem to be anything of a very definite character as to how many miles these driveways are to extend from Ottawa across the river. It is always very attractive naturally on the other side, and magnificent driveways could be made there, but for my part I must repeat what I said yesterday, and I feel like protesting for the reason that I then advanced. I appreciate that we have certain responsibilities in connection with this city, but I do not feel inclined to be silent when I find money is to be expended miles away from Ottawa in connection with these improvements, while, as I said yesterday, there are public works in other parts of the country that are receiving no consideration whatever.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of any member of the House who has a summer residence on the other side of the river except myself. I have a summer home at Kingsmere, twelve miles from here. I say to my hon. friend that if the commission were to attempt to spend any money out of this appropriation for improving any part of a driveway approaching my residence, I would strongly oppose the attempt. The commission itself made the suggestion of a federal district including Hull. I had no thought of the other side of the river being included when I was approached by the commission to allow its work to be given this larger scope. I hardly thought an insinuation such as the hon. member has made would be voiced, and if he has in mind any other member than myself perhaps he would name him and so give him an opportunity of replying. The plan of the commission, as developed over a number of years, has had in contemplation the building of a bridge over the Ottawa river, not in the direction in which Kingsmere lies but in an opposite direction, for the purpose of allowing motors going out to the Golf Club, the Country Club, the Chaudiere Club and other places along the banks of the Ottawa river, to travel through a district which would form a part of the park system. There is also a roadway up the Gatineau river where thousands of summer tourists go. That, except as far as Chelsea, is not in the direction of my residence but in another direction altogether. Let me assure the committee that I would certainly not have thought of introducing this bill or even of countenancing it had I dreamed that any hon. member could suppose that I was personally interested in the matter one way or the other, apart from seeing the capital and its immediate environs improved as far as possible.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am glad to hear that statement from the Prime Minister. He will appreciate, no one more readily than he, that where there is a difference of opinion, as is likely to exist regarding this or any other expenditure, a wrong impression might easily be conveyed. I welcome his statement so far as he is concerned in relation to the approach of the roads to his summer residence. I think he has taken the proper stand; it is one which I certainly appreciate and which I believe the country will approve. I say I am glad that he has taken that position because, whatever we may think of the advisability of carrying on this work on the other side of the river, I think it is wise, as the Prime Minister will agree with me, that no false impression should be created that the work is being done with any ulterior motive or that any particular person shall benefit thereby and, most of all, the Prime Minister of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Above everyone else, in connection with an expenditure of this kind, he should be free from any possible imputation that the money was being used for the express benefit of the property which belongs to him. I am glad therefore to have this assurance from him.

I realize that I am not very much of a diplomat; I am not built along diplomatic lines. My method of diplomacy is to go straight at a thing and not around a corner. That is the only kind of diplomacy I understand. I make my own statements direct, and I want equally direct statements from others. By following that course we can arrive at the truth of matters and act accordingly. Now for my own part I do not like spending money across the river; it is going far afield. However, I may be wrong in that and the judgment of the House will prevail.

Mr. COOTE: It is a little out of place for the Ottawa Improvement Commission to go across the river to build driveways or create parks. I understand the park is not contemplated in this bill. It seems to me that where the money should be spent is close to the parliament buildings. There are thousands of Canadians coming to Ottawa who will never see the driveways, for during six months of the year the driveways cannot be used. The money should be spent in beautifying Ottawa and especially in the vicinity of these buildings. The buildings along Wellington street are certainly not an agreeable sight. First of all, Wellington street should be improved, and I hope the Minister of Finance, or whoever will have charge of the matter, will see to it that most of the money will be spent in improvements of this description and not in the construction of driveways outside the capital. We might also have a little bit spent in cleaning up the streets at this time of year. Some of the streets of Ottawa are a disgrace to any capital. Sand and dirt are allowed to accumulate on the top of snowbanks, and after the snow in the country has been gone for a month you can find great piles of ice and mud in the city. This condition exists about this time of year along the streets within a block of the parliament buildings and it is a disgrace to the capital. The improvement commission should do something to beautify that part of the city close to the parliament buildings.

Mr. BROWN: I was not in the House yesterday when the matter was discussed but to me it seems fitting that the parliament of Canada should set aside an amount yearly for beautifying the district around the capital. As regards cleaning the streets of Ottawa, surely the city council should attend to that. It should form no part of a great comprehensive scheme of this kind. With reference to the driveways, I am heartily in sympathy with the proposal. The federal district of Ottawa will not end at the Ottawa river. Ottawa is approached from the other side of the river as well as from this side, and if we are going into the scheme we should have long vision and enter upon it with a comprehensive plan. As regards the suggestion of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, it would be most unfortunate if, because the Prime Minister happened to be interested in that particular section, the Ottawa Improvement Commision should be deterred from making a driveway even past Kingsmere should they determine this to be the best course. It would be most unfortunate, I say, for us to allow any such petty prejudice to interfere with the work of the commission. I hope that the suggestion of the leader of the opposition regarding the commission will be accepted, and that when the work is undertaken it will be done in such a manner as will produce something that will arouse the pride of all the people of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have been in this House long enough to see hon. gentlemen change their views with a change of geographical position in the chamber. The hon. gentleman from Lisgar is one of them. He was severe in his criticisms when he occupied a place in the southeast corner of the House, but now he is on the other side his views have been wonderfully modified. He is now willing to build roads, from Halifax to Vancouver almost, if it meets with the approval of his present leader, the Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman speaks very learnedly, with his head in the clouds, about long vision. Well, it seems to me that we shall require something more than that before we get through with this proposition: we shall require some of the long green to meet incidental expenses. The hon. member is perfectly justified in taking the position he does if he wants to beautify Ottawa all the way from this point to the city of Montreal—

Mr. BROWN: Oh no.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): —and westerly some sixty or seventy miles, or to any extent the government may consider within the environs of Ottawa. It all depends upon what the Prime Minister and the government say. If the Prime Minister says that the radius of the environs shall be ten or twelve miles to take in Kingsmere, very well; if the Prime Minister shifts his residence fifty miles away and says that the environs extend that distance, the hon. member says, "All right; make your roads long enough to take in whatever place you want to improve. We must beautify Ottawa, and Ottawa is to extend one hundred miles if necessary." I commend the hon. gentleman on his very marked change of attitude since he sat on this side of the House.

Mr. BROWN: No change whatever.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): He is becoming very tractable indeed.

Mr. BROWN: No change whatever.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There is no need for any party whip where the hon. member for Lisgar is; there is no need for even a handle to the whip. All they need do is hold it up and the hon. member for Lisgar will respond; every time they whistle they will not need a whip at all, yet he poses as a Liberal Progressive. Where does the Progressive come in? Once it was Progressive; now it is Liberal Progressive, but the Progressive is gradually dwindling away and he may as well drop it altogether.

Mr. BROWN: I will soon have the same honour as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr Bourassa).

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You can put yourself in that class if you want to, but I hope to God I never will.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the United Grain Growers are the only subjects on which the hon. member can make a speech.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman has changed so often that I would not be surprised if he put himself in the same class with the hon. member for Labelle; changes come very easily to him.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we have a certain amount of responsibility in connection with beautifying Ottawa, but in this as in other cases which I mentioned yesterday there is a disposition to spend money wholesale which in my judgment should be guarded against. What are the obligations of Ottawa in connection with this matter? Ottawa has no obligations at all. Do they receive any benefit through the fact that the seat of government is here? Look at the beautiful drives in Ottawa south; a few years ago, before the government began to spend money in beautifying the city, these drives were a series of frog ponds. What did the city get out of those beautiful drives? There are a number of splendid residences which never would have been there at all if it had not been for this expenditure. I think Ottawa is having it pretty easy; I think every government we have had has treated Ottawa pretty generously. I do not expect anyone from Ottawa to agree with that statement, because it would not be human nature; they will take all they can get and look for more; you can depend upon that every time. I do think, however, that the time has arrived when we should adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) and create a federal district to take in the city of Ottawa, as is the case at Washington. If we are going to keep up the whole city, let us make it a federal district, and the sooner the better.

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) referred to the streets of Ottawa. The condition of the streets depends entirely upon the civic administration, and I agree with him that in the spring the streets of this city are in a deplorable condition. During the rest of the year and especially in the summer Ottawa is one of the cleanest cities on the North American continent, but they do not seem to have a proper appreciation of the removal of snow. If we are going to undertake to keep the streets of Ottawa clean in the spring there is only one way to do it; declare this a federal district taking in Hull, if you will, and appoint a commission to govern the city. I cannot help repeating that that seems to me the logical thing to do now, instead of waiting for sixteen years, over which period it is proposed to stretch this expenditure. That might and should, in my judgment, disfranchise the citizens of Ottawa and prevent them from voting in the federal elections, and to my mind that would be one of the best things that could happen any government. The way the Amalgamated Civil Servants hold the gun to the head of every federal government is well known to every member of this House; if a member does not know that, he has not been here very long. Let us do what they have done in the United States, create this a federal district and appoint a commission to govern the city. The citizens should pay a reasonable municipal tax, and this parliament would then undertake all responsibility for the beautification and improvement of the city. I submit to my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) that he should get up and advocate such a commission, and the immediate creation of a federal district.

Mr. COOTE: It is too late in the session.

Mr. HOCKEN: Will my hon. friend do it next session?

Mr. EDWARDS (Ottawa): I am sorry I cannot agree with my namesake, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). We must always remember that in beautifying this city we are beautifying the capital of Canada. We are proud of Ottawa; no city in Canada is more beautifully located, surrounded as this city is on all sides by scenic beauty. This bill provides that the drives for a short distance out of the city may be improved. But some hon. gentlemen think it is unnecessary to spend money anywhere except in Ottawa. We know that hundreds and thousands of people from other countries visit Canada every year, and since Ottawa is the capital city, naturally it is the place everyone wants to visit. We want these visitors to leave Ottawa with a favourable impression because if they are pleased with this city they will be pleased with the country as well.

I do not think this bill needs any defence; this improvement commission was conceived by Sir Wilfrid Laurier many years ago, and after years of residence in Ottawa I can now say as a representative of the city that the commission has accomplished wonders. Today we are asked to support a bill increasing the scope of its activities and creating a new federal commission with an increased number of commissioners and an increased grant. I think everyone on both sides of the House should agree that it is of the utmost importance that this money should be spent in beautifying not only Ottawa but the country surrounding it as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, there are just two suggestions I would like to offer the Prime Minister with respect to this matter, which has been discussed so frequently that I have no intention of taking up much of the time of the House. I desire to point out the deep interest of all citizens of Canada in beautifying the capital, but on the other hand it seems to me there should be a fixed radius within which the operations of the commission would be carried on, say within ten miles or fifteen miles of the city. I think it is an invitation to bring pressure to bear upon the commission from time to time, if the radius is not defined, and it would be greatly to the advantage of the commission if they had a fixed limit within which their operations should be carried on. It seems to me that that would relieve them from unnecessary pressure from many quarters.

My next suggestion is merely that which was made by the leader of the opposition and approved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I think the Prime Minister might well assure the House that in the selection of this commission partisan politics would be forgotten and an effort would be made as indeed has been the case in the past to secure the services of public spirited, high minded gentlemen, of whom there are so many in this community, desirous of rendering public service to the community and to the Dominion by serving upon that commission. They should not be altogether men of one political faith, although probably from necessity, having regard to the frailty of human nature, the chairman would be a supporter of the administration of the day. I think an assurance of that character would make it easier for the country to accept these proposals as being in the interests of the country rather than intended to be a political move in any way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I be permitted to reply to my hon. friend's last point first. He mentioned that the chairman would be of the politics of the party in power. I may say that when the previous Liberal administration came into office we found that the position of chairman of the commission was held by a very strong Conservative. I took the view, and it was shared by my colleagues, that as he was a public spirited, high-minded gentleman who was serving the city well, we would make no change in the chairmanship, and during the whole time that my administration remained in office, Mr. Fraser, a well known Conservative, remained the chairman of the commission. It was not until Mr. Fraser resigned that a new appointment was made. I think that in the meantime hon. gentlemen opposite had been in office. When we came into office again the position became vacant, through Mr. Fraser's resignation, and we were very fortunate in being able to secure Mr. Thomas Ahearn as chairman of the commission, a gentleman who I am sure everyone in this House and in this country recognizes as second to none as an able business executive and a very public spirited citizen, a gentleman who will give to the capital great service in that position, a service it should be remembered that he is rendering gratuitously. On the present commission there are a number of Conservatives. The intention is to continue the present personnel in that regard, to make no change, and I can assure the House that when additional appointments are made the greatest care will be taken to select gentlemen who will be recognized as well qualified for the position and meriting recognition because of the place which they hold in the community as public spirited citizens.

As to fixing a limit of radius, I would have no hesitancy myself in doing that. But I understand from the chairman, Mr. Ahearn, that the commission has plans which relate to certain of the suburbs of Ottawa. Whether they come within the ten-mile radius or not I cannot say. I would hesitate, therefore, in this bill to fix a limit. I would point out, however, that whatever is done by the commission is each year subject to the review of parliament and parliament will at any time have opportunity of saying whether a particular extension is made in a direction that would not wholly meet with its approval.

May I make further reference to a point which has been brought into this discussion with respect to my own little place in the country. It lies in the Laurentian hills over in the province of Quebec. To reach it one is obliged to travel by way of Chelsea. Now no suggestions that I have seen made with reference to improvements in Hull relate to the Chelsea direction at all. They relate to the road to Aylmer, which is an entirely different road from the one taken to go out to my country residence. So far as I am concerned, I hope that I have enough appreciation of the position of prime minister to be more than scrupulous in seeing that none of this money is apportioned in a way, that, either directly or indirectly, could be said to relate to any place in the community in which at the present time I happen to reside.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman misunderstood me in reference to one question. I did not intend to suggest that an appointment immediately made to the office of chairman would necessarily be of a particular political faith, bnt that if necessary appointments were made they would be expected obviously to reflect, to some extent, the mind of the government that made the appointments. It was not suggested that the present appointee was selected for reasons of that character.

Mr. MARCIL: I had the opportunity on many occasions of hearing this matter discussed, and I am familiar with the inception of the project. There was a double purpose in view when it was inaugurated. The first was to recognize the services and obligations we owed to the city of Ottawa for the protection accorded through its police force, its fire service, and its various municipal organizations of one kind or another. And as the government services were enlarged and increased, and as we took over property for those services the city lost the benefit of the taxation of the property so brought under government control. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government recognized that they had obligations towards the city of Ottawa in that respect, and to compensate Ottawa for the loss of revenue referred to and the services rendered the federal authorities, it was finally agreed, after a great deal of conference, to make a grant of $100,000, and to create a commission upon which the city would be fairly represented. These commissioners are not remunerated, and we have the assurance therefore that they are high-minded, public spirited citizens.

But there was another purpose in mind. Sir Wilfrid Laurier wanted to make of Ottawa a capital that would be worthy of the country, and he thought that by embellishing it, and improving it in every respect he would meet with popular approval. There was no dissenting voice raised against the project at that time in this House, and those who came here in 1899, twenty-eight years ago, and saw the approaches to Ottawa and the approaches to the parliament buildings would not have recognized the surroundings so greatly had they been transformed from what they were before the project was undertaken.

I am glad of the opportunity to be able to say that I approve of the government's stand in not giving any political aspect to this project. The citizens on the other side of the river, whose views have been voiced by the hon. member (Mr. Fontaine), who is not in the chamber at the moment, strongly object to being drafted into a federal district. They wish to remain part and parcel of the province of Quebec, and to continue to have the privileges that they now enjoy. They are prepared, of course, to receive their share of the embellishments which will be carried out in Ottawa and its suburbs, and will be glad that an elaborate scheme has been undertaken by the commission to construct another bridge across the Ottawa river, west of this city, in order to reach the Aylmer road, one of the finest districts in the neighbourhood of Ottawa. Some very fine clubs are located in that district, and a number of our leading citizens go there for a bit of fresh air when they want to get out of the city. In this respect I am sure that the government is well advised in taking advantage of the services of Mr. Thomas Ahearn. This gentleman is one of the most popular and most highly respected citizens in the city of Ottawa, and he enjoys the support of both political parties. I have no doubt that Mr. Ahearn, who has on many occasions declined the honour of representing the city of Ottawa in this House, to which he could easily have been returned, will find a congenial occupation in helping to embellish the capital and its surroundings. I am glad to know also that the leader of the opposition, and I am sure all those who take a pride in the city of Ottawa, will support the government in its undertaking.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): An impression seems to have been created that the government is paying the city of Ottawa a large amount of money and that the city is not giving anything in return. We as citizens of Ottawa, are pleased to have this money spent in beautifying the capital, and we are also pleased that Mr. Ahearn has been appointed chairman of the improvement commission. There has been a demand that the area in which the commission should carry out improvements should be defined. I understand that we have in the city of Ottawa a town planning commission having supervision over an area of ten miles from the parliament buildings in all directions. I do not know whether the town planning commission is working in conjunction with the improvement commission or not, but I am quite sure that the members of that body would be glad to associate themselves with the improvement commission in working out plans for the benefit of the city and the surrounding country.

There are some figures that I would like to bring to the attention of the committee. If the municipality as a private taxpayer, owned the amount of property that the government possesses and was assessed therefor, that assessment would represent a sum of $34,068,425. And if it owned the driveways, parks, and other properties belonging to the improvement commission, the assessment would represent a sum of $2,101,750. The amount which would be paid in taxes on these properties, if they were owned by a private taxpayer, would be no less a sum than $1,140,000 a year, exclusive of water rates. Bearing these figures in mind, I think the city is really getting the worst of the bargain. Nevertheless, the people of Ottawa are pleased that their city should be the seat of government, and that the numerous federal buildings and employees are located here. The amount of $150,000 which the improvement commission receives now is practically all taken up in maintenance and such like, so that with this increased grant there is only an additional $100,000 that can be expended. I claim that this is not enough; that the $250,000 should at least be doubled, if not trebled, if we desire to see far enough ahead. If we held the opinion that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) holds, this amount would be $1,000,000 instead of $250,000. The city of Ottawa receives from the government in connection with fire protection and other services, $100,000; for water the government pays to the city thirteen cents per thousand gallons up to 200,000,000 gallons, and after that it pays ten cents per thousand gallons.

When any property is taken over by the government and used for government purposes, immediately the city loses the taxes on that property. For instance, nearly half a mile of property on Wellington street to the extreme west of us is a loss in taxes to the city and not of much benefit at the present time to the government. The former buildings on Sussex street gave to the city a revenue of a little over $2,000 in taxes, but when this property was taken over by the government, the city lost that amount of taxes.

I feel as a citizen of Ottawa that we have the cleanest city in the Dominion of Canada. Reflections have been made in this chamber as to this city being dirty in the spring. I have been in some other cities, Toronto, for instance, and I have found the streets much dirtier than those of Ottawa. We who live in Ottawa know that at certain times it is very hard to keep the streets clean. When you get snow one day and frost at night, you cannot clean the streets as they are able to do in Toronto which has not such a severe winter as we have in Ottawa. We have a splendid situation and everything necessary to make the capital what it should be. Tourists are visiting this city all the time. Any hon. member who is here in the recess and who comes up to these buildings will find forty or fifty cars all with United States licenses on them. It has been said that they do not travel over the driveways, but as a matter of fact they do. There is no doubt that this amount is not enough and I only wish the Prime Minister would make it at least twice as much.

Sections 4 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 7—Powers.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think the Prime Minister and members of the committee will appreciate from the wording of this clause why I was endeavouring to have the area somewhat more strictly defined. The clause reads:

Within such area or district.

The same thing occurs in several places throughout the bill, referring to the area or district. This in my judgment ought to be definite but it is absolutely indefinite. The term "area or district" means nothing. We do not know whether it is a five mile or ten mile or twenty-five mile area.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the former bill it read, "In Ottawa or in the vicinity of Ottawa" which was quite as indefinite, but under this bill it is only in such area or district as may from time to time be designated by the governor in council.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9.—Borrowing powers of commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The chairman of the commission has suggested that it might prove advantageous to them in the matter of debentures they may issue, if the rate of interest were not fixed definitely at 4 per cent, but made a rate not to exceed what the governor in council might approve. Inasmuch as the Minister of Finance would be the one to express approval, I am inclined to think the suggestion is a wise one, and if the committee approves, I would move to amend this section by changing in the third line the words "not exceeding 4 per cent per annum" to read "to be approved by the governor in council." There might be occasions where a lesser rate could be obtained and there might be occasions where it would be advantageous to give a little higher rate in order to get certain work done within a given time.

Sections 10 to 12, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 13—Acquisition of property.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Can the Prime Minister under this clause give us any information as to the buildings in the block in which the post office is situated? Have the commission determined to tear down that block and make a park of that section? There was a rumour to that effect; I have nothing more definite than a rumour. I would like to know whether that has been decided upon by the commission or whether it is in contemplation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has asked this question because yesterday I heard him say that he understood the post office building was to be torn down. That is a mistake. There is no thought of tearing down the post office building.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I understood the whole block was to be torn down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. The post office building will remain where it is, but the property between the post office and Elgin street and between Sparks and Wellington streets will be torn down. Parliament has appropriated a sum for the purpose and that space will become an open park just in front of the east block of the parliament buildings.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is it known what it will cost to expropriate that property or what is the estimated cost?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That has been gone into but I cannot at the moment give my hon. friend the figures.

Sections 14 and 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Annual report to parliament.

Mr. HARRIS: When this report comes before parliament I hope it will show a spirit of coöperation between the city officials and this commission. It is all important that the city officials of Ottawa should work harmoniously with the commission because the commission is to beautify the city of Ottawa, its first duty, as I see it, is to start right at home and clean up the situation we have closely around the buildings themselves. On Wellington street we have buildings owned by the government, and the conditions on the street and the approach to these buildings, especially in the winter months, is something of which one can not be proud. As the hon. member for Macleod has said, the condition of the streets of Ottawa, particularly during the winter months, is really deplorable. I would suggest to the hon. member for Carleton, if he wants to see how a city can be kept clean, particularly in the winter months, to come down to the city of Toronto and look it over. I am quite sure he was not serious in his remarks with reference to Toronto, because hon. gentlemen in this chamber will bear me out when I say that Toronto is one of the finest and cleanest cities in the Dominion of Canada.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved the second reading of Bill No. 234, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): It is with considerable hesitation that I rise at this stage of the session, Mr. Speaker, to make extended remarks upon any subject, and particularly to make a criticism of the administration of a department. This subject is one which has been before parliament every year since the war. For the past two years there have been serious problems confronting the returned men which have not been dealt with, despite the fact that representations have been made by the soldier organizations from one end of the country to the other that serious injustices are being suffered mainly because, in their view, the Pension Act requires amendment. So far as I am concerned, I may say that I share their view that the Pension Act requires amendment, and I say further, and I emphasize this, I believe that many pensions are being denied to applicants because of an improper administration of the Pension Act. Regarding amendments, the Canadian Legion met during the present year at Winnipeg, presided over by General Sir Percy Lake, and they made certain recommendations, which were in turn placed before the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. There has been a very considerable period of time within which to consider those recommendations, but there has been no action taken, and in view of those recommendations I must say that I was astonished to read in Hansard an answer to this effect by the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment in reply to a question asked by the member for Westmorland:

> Present pension legislation provides pensions for all disabilities "attributable to or incurred during military service" and for "disabilities resulting from injury or disease or the aggravation thereof incurred during military service." No ex-soldier who is so disabled is denied pension.

If that is a correct statement of the facts, Mr. Speaker, I would ask why did we in 1924, for instance, introduce and pass amendments to the Pension Act—amendments which have not yet become law? Did not the government and parliament consider in that year that those amendments were necessary to do justice to the situation that existed then, and which still exists? Otherwise, why did parliament unanimously pass those amendments? If the minister has not had time to give proper consideration to the recommendations of the Canadian Legion, why is it not possible for him to reintroduce at this session of parliament the amendments to the Pension Act which the government has considered, and which this parliament actually passed unanimously, but which have not yet become law?

I propose now to leave the question of legislation to other speakers, and to devote myself to a statement in regard to the administration of this act by the present Board of Pension Commissioners. This I may say is a very distasteful task. I think all members of the House will agree with me when I say that I have been most moderate in any observations I have passed, either in committee or in the House of Commons, in regard to the Board of Pension Commissioners, or in fact in regard to any civil servants, because I have a great sympathy for their position. It has taken me considerably over one year to make up my mind that the only course which I can honestly follow is to bring to the attention of parliament the present situation which exists in this department. I might add that the task is doubly distasteful to me for another reason, and that is because members of that commission served in the war, the chairman indeed serving in the same division of the Canadian corps with me, and it is therefore doubly distasteful to me to approach this subject.

In order that I may illustrate the situation that exists, I find it necessary to deal with a specific case. I have always hesitated to do that in the past, because we are concerned here with principles rather than the particulars of an isolated case. At the same time I do not think I can do better or bring more conclusive proof as to the state of the administration than by dealing with a specific case with which I have been personally familiar since the fall of 1915, and the facts of which will illustrate my point. This is the case of private Stanley Aylett, No. 129497, who enlisted in the 72nd battalion in Vancouver on September 20, 1915. He was killed in action on September 4, 1916. Immediately after enlistment he with his wife and his mother came before me for the purpose of having determined who was to receive separation allowance. After due investigation by myself, as commanding officer of that battalion, and by Captain J. B. Pattullo, a very eminent king's counsel, we came to the conclusion that the only course to pursue was to report to the Department of National Defence—which we did on October 12, 1915—to the effect that private Aylett and his wife were separated by a separation agreement, under which private Aylett covenanted to pay his wife $500—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The amendment before the House deals specifically with the Federal Appeal Board. It was understood that when this amendment came before the House there would be full opportunity for discussion, but I think my hon. friend is following a most unusual course, which is rather amazing to me, in attacking a body that has been looked upon by this House as being removed from the political field—a board that would adjudicate these cases, and on their findings the moneys voted by parliament would be paid. If we are to have a review of the various cases that have failed to secure compensation from the pension commissioners, this parliament will have to take over the board's functions. It seems to me that the line which my hon. friend is taking will be detrimental to the whole administration of the Pension Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not a point of order; it is a speech, and is very improper under the rules of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. minister risen to a point of order?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is not proper that the commissioners should be discussed and their action on a particular case reviewed at this time.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, at various times the minister has distinctly stated in this House that matters relating to pensions might be brought up when Bill No. 234 was under discussion. There is no question that you cannot dissociate the Board of Pension Commissioners from the appeal board. If the Board of Pension Commissioners are doing their work satisfactorily to the soldiers and to the publice, then why under heaven do we establish an appeal board at all?

Mr. RALSTON: Why have an appellate court of law?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a point of order.

Mr. ARTHURS: This is a point of order, and the question before the House, strictly speaking, is a change in the federal appeal board. I cannot see any reason, Mr. Speaker, why the acts of the pension board cannot be referred to so far as the appeal board is concerned, for necessarily what the Federal Appeal Board does is dependent entirely upon the course taken by the pension board.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon member desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the hon. member for Burrard is urging on the House the necessity for further pension legislation, and is citing this case to illustrate his point.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the Pension Act. Surely on the second reading the principle of pensions generally can be discussed—whether or not the Pension Act is effective, whether or not under it pensions are being granted which by law were intended to be granted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member desire to speak on the point of order?

The bill before the House is to amend the Pension Act by the appointment of a federal appeal board. I have listened to the hon. member for Burrard and so far have not observed that he was speaking beside the issue. I have only to remind him of the point that has already been raised in the House in regard to references to the Board of Railway Commissioners. The pension commissioners are not only an administrative body, they are a judicial body, as he will see in the act creating the pension board. They have the powers of a court of record, that is, they have judicial powers, and therefore the hon. gentleman must be very careful not to criticize their judgments, for he is then attacking them as judges, and of course he knows the rule that applies in such a case. If what he intends to bring before the House concerns only the administrative powers of the board, he may proceed.

Mr. CLARK: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, I desire to state in moderate language the facts of a particular case in order to illustrate a principle that is before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Supplementing what I have already said, I find that by section 9 of the act incorporating the Board of Pension Commissioners they are vested with the powers and authority of commissioners appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 104 of the revised statutes of Canada. Section 5 of that act declares that such commissioners shall have the same power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, at this point I might observe that in an effort to bring about an improvement in the administration of this department I proposed to the minister that he should attend a meeting of the full Board of Pension Commissioners and permit me to present the facts of this case in his hearing, so that he might judge whether or not there is necessity for amendments to the act or for a change in the administration. Unfortunately the minister has not seen fit to grant that request.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am sure my hon. friend is not really serious. It would be a most improper procedure for the minister to take.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister say that it is an improper thing for anyone to go and listen to the deliberations of a court? Have you, Mr. Speaker, ever heard of any court where it was improper for a spectator to listen to the presentation of a case, much less the presiding officer of a department of government? What is the use of a minister if he cannot do that? Why not do away with the office?

This man enlisted in September 1915, and the question came up then as to whether his wife or his mother was entitled to the separation allowance. After due investigation the Department of Defence ruled that the mother was entitled to the allowance and not the wife, inasmuch as there had been a separation under a legal agreement. That agreement called for the payment of $500 at the rate of $30 a month from January, 1915. Some difficulty arose as to the amount and it was determined by the Department of Defence that, though the mother was entitled to separation allowance as the soldier's dependent, the wife should be given assigned pay of $20 per month; and at the time of the death of the man the wife had received all but $40 of the total amount due under the separation agreement. The agreement, by law, ceased at the time of his death. There was no longer any legal liability to the wife, because the agreement ended either by payment in full or by death. That is clearly the law. At the time of the man's death the question arose as to the person to whom the pension should be paid. The man left a will bequeathing everything to his mother, and this will was recognized by the Department of Defence. His medals, the cross of sacrifice, his personal effects were all delivered to the mother. The wife appealed to the department but was refused consideration except on the ground of assigned pay to satisfy the debt. The pension board however awarded the pension to the wife, declining to give it to the mother, though certainly by the amendment of 1920 they had the power to pay the pension to the mother and to withhold it from the wife. The mother made representations to the effect that she was entitled to the pension inasmuch as the wife had not been living with her husband, having been separated from him by legal agreement which was binding and could be enforced in the courts. She made a claim to the pension. Within ten months of the death of the man the widow remarried, and thereupon the pension ceased automatically, so far as she was concerned. So that from that time on the pension could be paid only to the mother. The pension board met in January, 1920, and awarded the full pension to the mother, and it was paid until 1924 when, so far as I can see from the file, in the absence of any representations the board cancelled it. Now she is receiving $15 a month which the board have decided she is entitled to by reason of the fact that, as they have admitted, she was dependent for her support upon her son. Since that time fresh representations have been made to the board to have the pension paid in full to the mother. This has been refused on the ground that there had been a reconciliation between the wife and her deceased husband. Regarding that point we have on this file from a solicitor evidence which is purely hearsay. There is the following declaration on file:

I was consulted by Mrs. Harriet Aylett, the wife of the late Stanley Aylett with reference to separation allowance from her husband, a private in the said battalion in or about the month of December 1915 and had occasion to meet both herself and her said husband and go into matters pertaining to their married life.

That they produced to me the separation agreement of January 13, 1915, and both of them advised me that subsequent to the said separation they had been living together again and that the payments had not been kept up thereunder nor was it their intention to adhere to the said agreement.

That is practically the only evidence on file against the application of the mother. As opposed to that we have the conclusive proof that the payments were made and that there was no reconciliation. There is on record a contradiction of that by another solicitor in Vancouver who makes the statement, which he underlines in red ink, that it——is absolutely incorrect in that it states Aylett returned to his wife and the two lived happily until the time when he enlisted.

That is the only evidence on file that the separation agreement became null and void by reason of reconciliation and cohabitation. But, as I say, there is also on file evidence which proves conclusively that there was no such reconciliation. We have letters from the man to his mother written less than two months before he died, stating that there was only $40 left to be paid to the wife and that thereafter the assigned pay would be paid to the mother. We have on file, in addition to that evidence showing that according to the Vancouver city directory the wife was living in another part of the city with her mother while the man was residing with his mother. We have also sworn evidence which I will not take the trouble to read. I do not wish to detain the House at any length, but we have approximately ten sworn affidavits on this file. I will read extracts from some of them:

I, Charles R. Goodwin, of 133 Hastings street west, city of Vancouver, province of British Columbia, manager of the Goodwin Shoe Company, make oath and say:

That the late Stanley Aylett lived with his mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Aylett, at 4612 John street, next door to my home, for some time previous to his going overseas in 1916. The said Stanley Aylett had no wife living with him at the said 4612 John street.

And so on. Here is another one from a fellow employee:

I, Henry James Holton, of the city of Vancouver, province of British Columbia, employee of the Vancouver Club, make oath and say:

That I was well acquainted with the late Stanley Aylett as I worked with him and was a personal friend of his.

To my personal knowledge the said Stanley Aylett lived with his mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Aylett, at 4612 John street in the municipality of South Vancouver, province of British Columbia, from January 1915, until September 1915. After that time he lived with his mother at 1004 Nicola street, Vancouver, British Columbia.

The said Stanley Aylett worked with me at the Vancouver Club and went home to his mother's house every night after work. To my knowledge he never lived with his wife after his separation in January 1915.

In addition to those there are numerous affidavits on the same point, and the reason I stress it is that the Board of Pension Commissioners state that the only point in question is whether or not there was subsequent cohabitation between this soldier and his wife. I point out that there are on file here about ten affidavits to the effect that there never was cohabitation after the agreement; that there is the evidence of the Vancouver city directory, and that in addition an effort was made by the commanding officer and another officer of his battalion to effect a reconciliation, without avail. The man himself at all times denied that he had ever cohabited with her after the separation agreement, and in addition there is the evidence that the payments were made under that agreement and that there was complete satisfaction.

I made representations first in this matter in 1924, and I think the first letter was written by me in September of that year. From that time until the present I have been active in placing before the pension commissioners additional evidence in relation to this claim, and I would like to quote some of these letters. On October 3, 1925, I wrote a letter in which I stated:

Apparently, it is the intention of the Board of Pension Commissioners to flatly refuse my request to analyze the evidence which I have placed before them. My desire is that this evidence be fully analyzed so that I will have an opportunity of supplementing the evidence which is not full and conclusive in the case. As the matter now stands I am completely ignorant of the ground upon which the board has arrived at its decision. I shall be obliged if you will let me have a reply to this letter as soon as you have had an opportunity of laying the matter before a meeting of the full board.

That letter was written to the secretary, from whom I received a reply dated October 20, 1925, as follows:

In reply I am instructed to repeat that in the opinion of the board Mrs. Aylett (widow) was entitled to pension. In consequence Mrs. Aylett (widowed mother) was not at any time, in accordance with the provisions of the statute, entitled to pension in a greater amount than fifteen dollars a month.

Then on January 11, 1926, I wrote the secretary of the pension board as follows:

I would like to examine this file at your earliest convenience.

No answer was received to that letter, and on January 20, 1926, I wrote again as follows:

I wrote you some time ago requesting an appointment to examine various files in your department, but have had no acknowledgement. As some of these cases are urgent I would appreciate it if you would give this matter your early attention.

There is a memo written on this letter as follows:

At interview to-day informed General Clark that while the board was glad to offer any information that was on file, not of a confidential nature, it could not accede to his request to examine the file. I further informed General Clark that in this matter the board was supported in its views by the Department of Justice.

Then about the middle of May I filed additional affidavits corroborating those already on file to the effect that there had been no cohabitation after the separation agreement was entered into, and in a letter under date of May 13, 1926, to the secretary of the board, I said:

As previously stated, I am anxious to present this whole matter to the commissioners at a full board meeting, but before doing so I would like an opportunity to examine the evidence contained in the file in your possession, so as to prepare myself.

No answer was received to that letter, and on May 25, I wrote again as follows:

With further reference to my request of the 13th, may I now have a definite reply thereto?

On May 31, this reply was written:

In reply to your communications of the 13th and 25th instant I am instructed to inform you that the board will be glad to hear you regarding the case of the mother marginally noted on Monday, June 7, at 11.15 a.m.

While it is glad to afford you any information in its possession which is not of a confidential nature, the board regrets that it cannot accede to your request to examine all the evidence on file. I may add that the board has the support of the Department of Justice in its policy regarding the confidential nature of information on files.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that left me in the predicament of appearing before the board with no evidence whatever in my possession, and I repeated my request verbally. When I found that it was impossible for me to secure the file for examination I had an interview with the then minister, now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott), who secured this file for me. I had the file in my room on the morning I was to appear before the board; it is somewhat voluminous, as you see, and I was not there quite at 11.15 o'clock, arriving shortly afterwards. I found two of the commissioners present; the chairman, although in the city, was not there. I asked the two commissioners how they expected me to present the merits of this case without access to the files; I asked them further whether the soldiers' adviser, who is provided for in the Pension Act, was entitled to examine the file before presenting a case on behalf of an applicant, to which they answered yes. I then asked whether a solicitor for an applicant might examine the file before presenting his case, to which they also answered yes. I explained that I was acting as a representative of the soldiers' adviser at his request; they knew that, because the soldiers' adviser had sent some of the material which appears on this file and which I had secured and handed to him. Furthermore it would be quite obvious to them that as a solicitor I would be acting more or less voluntarily in that capacity on behalf of the applicant. In addition to that I was interested, as a member of parliament, in seeing that full justice was done to any applicant, and that the administration of this department was on an efficient basis. Therefore I think that in my case there was every reason why I should have had the file in order properly to present the merits of the matter.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did you not ask them if you were entitled to see the file?

Mr. CLARK: They said I was. I had had files from them in many instances in the past. I have no doubt that every member of parliament who has taken up cases has examined files without opposition. Well, when I returned from that interview I wrote this letter, dated June 7th, 1926:

Colonel John Thompson.

My Dear Colonel Thompson:

This morning I appeared before your colleagues and presented my views on the above case. They undertook to reopen the case. I regret your inability to be present, and hope that when the new precis is ready for presentation to the commissioners I may have an opportunity of perusing the same, and expressing my views thereon to the full board.

I feel satisfied that the correct and full facts in this case have never been before the commissioners, and that, if the case is properly understood by the commissioners, there will be no question but that the previous decision will be reversed and a pension awarded to the widowed mother.

May I ask you to give this matter your personal attention so that the case can be finally considered at some convenient time during the present week as the session is coming to a close and I am anxious to secure a final decision at the earliest possible moment.

There appears to be no answer on the file to that letter, but my recollection is that I received a telephone request asking me to prepare a memorandum of the views expressed by me before the two commissioners. It took me some days to prepare the memorandum and an opinion on the law for them. That was sent to them on June 24, 1926, marked "urgent", and then in my handwriting is the postscript:

I would ask that this case be considered by the board to-morrow (the 25th), if at all possible.

I asked further:

If, after consideration of the above, the commissioners are in any doubt on this matter I would crave leave to discuss the matter further with them personally at a full meeting of the board.

I then secured an appointment to meet the chairman of the board. I found that the chairman of the board—I am not holding it against him—had not read my memorandum and was not familiar with its contents. It may be that pressure of other business made that impossible. It was a very troublesome case because of the fact that it had been before the commissioners for so many years. I then proceeded to place before the chairman of the board my views on this question, and in speaking about the delay I remarked that there had been difficulties placed in my way. On that observation he said, "That is not true", got up and left the room, leaving me there. Of course I followed him out. On the same day, June 28, 1926, I wrote this letter:

Colonel John Thompson.

Board of Pension Commissioners.

Dear Sir,

I was just about to recount the difficulties I had experienced in this case when you flatly contradicted me and unceremoniously left your office. I did not call on you for the purpose of having a personal argument but simply to impress upon you the aspects of this case, which are favourable to the applicant, and to render you any assistance I could by reference to certain legal authorities and, at the same time, to emphasize the urgency of the case in view of my early departure from Ottawa and the many years that have elapsed since same was first brought to the notice of your board.

On the 11th of January last I wrote the secretary of your board requesting permission to examine the file herein. On May 13th, I forwarded two additional affidavits herein, and, also, stated that I was anxious to present the case to the commissioners at a full board meeting, but before doing so desired the opportunity to examine the evidence contained in the file so as to prepare myself.

In a letter from your secretary dated May 31st the 7th June was fixed for hearing. At the same time the board refused to permit me to examine the evidence on file. Subsequent to the receipt of that letter I advised the secretary of the impossibility of proceeding with my presentation unless permitted to see the evidence on the file, and more particularly the evidence which I had placed there myself. I was advised that the board refused to alter its decision, and I, therefore, placed the matter before the minister, who produced the file for me about one hour before my appointment with the full board on June 7th. I attended the meeting of the board on that date, and presented my views fully to two of the commissioners, yourself being absent, though in the city.

I might add that I have had no explanation of your failure to keep that appointment. On the same day, and subsequent to the interview, I wrote you personally and requested that the case might be finally considered during that week. To date I have had no akcnowledgment from you of that letter.

Recently I was requested by a representative of your board to prepare a summary of my views on the case for further consideration. Although I had already spent approximately three hours with the board on the 7th instant, explaining my views, I undertook the preparation of this summary and have spent several days analyzing the facts and investigating the law, and on the 24th instant I forwarded this summary to the board marked "urgent", and requested the earliest possible consideration.

In my interview with you to-day I found you had not yet given any consideration to the summary and advised me that it would be impossible to do so either to-day or to-morrow. I again emphasized my strong desire that the matter be finally settled before the House prorogued.

I do not propose to go into further details at the moment, but I once more request that this matter be given prompt consideration, and that if my conclusions are not understood or agreed with I be given opportunity of appearing before the full board for the purpose of elaborating thereon.

I have had no acknowledgment of that letter. I have here a letter dated June 30th, 1926, from the secretary of the board, reading in part as follows:

> In the opinion of the board the question of whether the widow of the deceased soldier was or was not entitled to pension depends upon whether they lived together as man and wife subsequent to the execution of the agreement.

Now on June 30th I took this same question up with the Acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and requested him as minister of that department to arrange a hearing at which he should be present. Unfortunately it was impossible to have such a thing at that stage of the session. He did, however, secure an assurance that this matter would be reinvestigated and in a sympathetic spirit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw your attention to what has been done. I have heard nothing in reference to this matter. If a decision has been reached it has not been communicated to me, neither has it been communicated to the applicant. I found for the first time yesterday that an investigation was conducted, and I will recount the nature of that investigation.

There is on the file a letter dated July 12, 1926, written to the director of the administration of the Department of Soliders' Civil Re-establishment in Vancouver, with specific instructions contained in it to interview certain people and to make a report. Although I live in Vancouver and was vitally interested in securing any information for the board and in coöperating with them in securing the true facts from 1915 to date, I never heard that the investigation was being carried on. I was not communicated with.

One of the people whom the director was instructed to interview was the widow's solicitor who has placed on file a letter and a hearsay declaration, a declaration in which he states that they told him they had lived together. That was not direct evidence at all and they were to interview him only because of this fact:

> Mr. Lucas should be interviewed and informed that General Clark has quoted him to the board as stating that he, Mr. Lucas, does not remember anything about the case. A signed statement should be obtained from him as to whether or not he now has reason to doubt the accuracy of his affidavit and, if so, the grounds upon which such reason is based.

I did interview the solicitor and he did tell me that he remembered nothing about the case. I see nothing extraordinary about that because his declaration is dated in 1917 and my interview with him was in 1924, or seven years afterwards. If he did not refresh his memory by looking up the files and taking considerable time over the matter, he certainly would not be likely to remember much about it. There is nothing extraordinary about that. He did so tell me and I so stated to the board. I will however accept his evidence at its face value. It is hearsay evidence; even if everything that he states is true, it is not evidence at all.

The other people to be interviewed were the mother of the widow and the wife of a contractor. This latter woman, by the way, had made the statement that the widow had lived in her apartment house and that she always thought she was a widow; that she had never seen any man with her there. But her husband apparently had made a statement to the investigator of this department that Aylett, the deceased, had frequently or at some time visited the widow there. So far as I can see there is no confirmation of that by sworn testimony.

These were the three who were to be interviewed, but there were no instructions given to investigate the accuracy of the other affidavits which are on this file and which are probably ten in number, although I have not counted them. No instructions were given to interview those who indicated that they were favourable to the case of the mother. Apparently only those who had given unfavourable evidence previously were to be interviewed. Let me quote one or two paragraphs from these statements. This is a letter by Nellie M. Wood, dated 7th August, 1926, in which she stated:

> I explained to Mrs. Aylett that the only knowledge I had respecting Mrs. Harriet Aylett—

That is the widow.

> —was that at one time she did reside with her mother at Irving court, and that as I never saw her husband or any man about the premises at any time, I naturally presumed she was a widow, to which statement I still adhere.

Then this declaration is filed:

> I, Sarah A. Cusack, of the city of Vancouver, ... do solemnly declare that I have been the manageress of Shaughnessy lodge, Vancouver, B.C., since May, 1914.

This was one of the places where this man was supposed to have resided with his wife after the separation agreement. She continues:

> I have a very clear recollection of Mrs. Harriet Aylett, residing in this apartment house, together with her mother and sister. I am only too pleased to verify the fact that there is no question whatever, that Mrs. Harriet Aylett was at all times a strictly moral woman and her character was always above reproach. She was at all times a perfect lady, but always very sad and quiet.

There is no suggestion there that the husband was ever around. I notice that in several of the reports of the investigators this man is referred to as a weak character, and it is stated that probably because he was a weak character he would be likely to write just as affectionate letters to his mother as to his wife. The facts are that no evidence has been produced from the widow that she ever received a letter from her husband while he was in France, but there are copies of very affectionate letters to his mother and these suggestions from the investigators that this man whom they had never seen was a weak character are entirely uncalled for. Before this man proceeded to France, he was one of one hundred chosen out of eighteen thousand as a guard of honour for His Majesty the King. He paid the supreme sacrifice, being killed in action in France while serving his country. He made a will in favour of his mother, a will recognized by the Department of National Defence. He wrote to his mother and apparently did not write to his wife. With this evidence as it appears on the file, I am forced to the conclusion that these facts have never been properly presented to the Board of Pension Commissioners, or they could not have arrived at the conclusion that:

There appears to be no doubt that the agreement of separation was rendered null and void by the subsequent cohabitation of the soldier and his wife.

We are surely all determined to see that justice is done, and if there are cases that we as members of parliament or as private citizens are prepared to present to the Board of Pension Commissioners, we should be given an opportunity to do so. By the way a proper presentation in detail in this case would in all probability take some hours, but I am satisfied it would disclose that the summaries of evidence prepared for the Board of Pension Commissioners to pass judgment upon were prepared by men who do not understand the analyzing of facts for presentation to a judicial body.

This file discloses to me a situation which in my opinion calls for a very careful investigation. I was prepared to coöperate with the minister and carry out that investigation, with the minister alone present, so that he could hear my presentation of this case in detail, and thereby avoid the publicity involved by bringing before this House the situation which exists, and which is in my opinion extremely serious from the point of view of applicants for pensions in this country. I shall at all times be prepared, Mr. Speaker, and I think this file will bear me out in that, to give any amount of time to elaborate on this case, or to go out and collect additional evidence for the pensions board, so that the board will have before them the full evidence. I urge as strongly as I can that the time has come for a full investigation into this department, and if an investigation is not made between now and next session I would suggest that an investigation might be made before a parliamentary committee both on questions of administration and as regards the amendments that are required to this act.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) has given only one of the many cases which gave rise to the appointment of the Federal Appeal Board. If the public and the returned soldiers and would-be pensioners had been satisfied with the decisions of the pension board there would have been no necessity for the appointment of the appeal board. The minister himself apparently in this act recognizes the advisability of continuing that appeal board. He has already stated to the House that he would be prepared to give us certain figures as to the number of appeals, and so forth.

There can be no question that many of the decisions of the pension board have not been satisfactory from the ordinary point of view, and the fact that the appeal board has been constituted, and has acted, and acted well, and is to be continued, is simply evidence that just such cases as those illustrated by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard do occur, and have occurred.

I would ask the minister, before this bill passes, to carry out the undertaking which I think he has given the House and let us know how many appeals have been made to the Federal Appeal Board, how many of them have been successful, and how many otherwise. I think that information is essential, because such cases as have been brought before the House this afternoon surely illustrate how necessary it was to appoint a federal appeal board. I believe with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that the pension board have in many cases acted only on a certain amount of evidence that came into their possession and did not look for the other side of the case, and it was therefore absolutely necessary that an appeal board should be appointed. I would also ask the minister to tell us, either after six o'clock or before, as I asked the other night, how many cases have been acted on under the meritorious clause contained in the act of 1925, and how many of these cases have been successful. My information is that there has been very little done under that clause.

I do not wish to delay the House now, but I could bring before it cases that might appeal even more sympathetically than the one brought forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard—a case, for instance, where under the Pension Act itself it was impossible for the pension board to grant a pension. I am willing to admit that, but surely under the meritorious clause something should be done in these very deserving cases.

Before taking my seat I would again ask the minister to tell the House the number of cases that have been before the appeal board, and the number successful and otherwise, as well as the number of cases coming under the meritorious clause and how many have been successful and otherwise.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say some words with reference to this bill, and particularly with reference to the general question of administration of the Pension Act. To me it is a great disappointment that in this the first session of a new parliament steps have not been taken by the government to bring down early in the session legislation for which there is the most pressing need, not only in regard to the actual cases of extreme hardship which are known to the department, but also in regard to the many cases which are not before the department and the details of which are little known. The present Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King) has only lately taken that post, and in my experience with him he has done everything possible to facilitate the meritorious and deserving cases, but the government generally seems to be very lethargic or indifferent in the matter of grappling with this question and taking hold of the problems which confront the returned soldiers. I myself in 1923 introduced legislation concerning amendments to the Pension Act, embodying ideas that were common throughout the country at that time and have been emphasized time and again since. During the last two years we have had no legislation of any consequence relating to pension matters. In 1925 there were some minor amendments only, and in 1926 there were none. Now we find the returned soldier organizations presenting a memorandum containing in the most complete manner their suggestions based on actual experience. If the government could not have presented the proposed amendments to the House this year, I think they could at least have carried on an investigation which would have advanced a solution of these problems. Just to indicate how widespread is this demand on the part of the soldiers for action I might mention that only a couple of hours ago I received a wire from the Collingwood branch of the Canadian Legion in these words:

> Have wired Dr. King registering protest against postponement of pensions and insurance legislation.

I stated on the orders of the day the other day, and I wish to repeat now, that in my judgment it would be a great mistake for this parliament to hurry the business of the session to a close at an early date and neglect to attend to these vital matters which should receive attention. I wish to repeat the assertion I made then, and I think I can properly do so because this is practically the first occasion on which I have addressed the House this session. I wish to repeat what I said the other day, that the men who are suffering from the ills of war, who spent their time in France in the service of the citizenship of this country and of its institutions, can now properly call upon members of parliament to spend a few days or a few weeks, or months if necessary, to deal with these urgent questions which so vitally affected them, and it is to be regretted that the apathetic and unsympathetic attitude which in my judgment is characteristic of the pension board seems to have permeated government circles.

Some of these matters which the Canadian Legion have brought forward—I will not go over them in detail—are of urgent importance. They relate to the soldier himself, to the widow, to the children, to the orphan, and to the other dependents of the soldier. They cover technicalities in the Pension Act which have made its administration contrary both to the will of parliament and the people of Canada and I do not think it would require such elaborate consideration as the minister suggests to take care of some of these more urgent matters under the present bill. I say this because these questions have to my knowledge been considered for the last four years, evidence with respect to them has been presented to parliamentary committees by soldier institutions, and there are men in the department who thoroughly understand them and realize there are technical defects which require no consideration to correct.

Let me refer for a moment to a particular case which the minister has been kind enough to offer to take care of under the existing law. It is the case of James Frew. James Frew is entitled to a pension, and is now an inmate of a military hospital. The pension board, as so frequently happens, turned down his application. Under the statute he must make his appeal through the soldiers' advocate within thirty days of the pension board's judgment, and James Frew accordingly instructed that official to proceed with his appeal within a few days after receiving notice from the pension board of their refusal of his application. Through an error in the office of the soldiers' advocate, not due to the official himself, the statutory period of thirty days passed by and no appeal was made. The error was discovered and the appeal proceeded with. The Federal Appeal Board decided, as it so often does, upon the inherent merits of the claim and awarded a pension to James Frew. The pension board thereupon exalted itself to the position of a court of appeal over the Federal Appeal Board and maintained that as the appeal was not proceeded with within the statutory period, therefore the Federal Appeal Board was wrong in its decision and the pension should not be paid. The poor man is in a serious state of health in the hospital, and he is very seriously handicapped by the lack of a pension.

I took the case up with the department, and in this respect I want to commend the minister for his kind offer to remedy the situation. Personally he is not to blame at all. I outlined all the facts to the deputy minister last year and proposed to him that there be put in the Pension Act a provision such as is to be found in the Supreme Court Act, vesting authority in the court to extend the statutory period of time in order that justice may be done. There is no discretion granted to the Board of Pension Commissioners and they are very dogmatic and dictatorial in administering the act. It would have been very simple for the department to advise the minister of this defect in the act and that the necessary power should be given to the federal appeal board to grant an extension of time for appealing or taking other steps where good cause could be shown for the delay. But what happened? The pension board and the deputy minister refused categorically to make any suggestions for such an amendment. Then I proposed that if they would intimate to me when amendments to the Pension Act were under consideration I would bring in my amendment as a private member, but they said they did not think any amendments would be considered. There is an example of sticking fixedly by a decision irrespective of its injustice to the man who by the will of parliament and the Canadian people should receive a pension.

These and other cases in the administration of the act are evidences to me of a most unsympathetic attitude and confirm the charge which I have long made, and which I repeat now, that whenever there is a question in doubt the pension board, although they have all the necessary evidence to establish the applicant's claim, throw the burden of proof upon the applicant—the very person who is without evidence. Against these things the soldier bodies of this country object. Indeed, if they were not law-abiding citizens in some cases they would be incited almost to revolt because of the flagrant injustice of which they are the victims.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are some other matters which should have been dealt with this session. The information is already in the department to enable the minister to come to a conclusion. Let us take, for example, the allowance to orphan children of thirty dollars per month. I refer to this because I have been asked by women's organizations connected with soldier bodies to bring it to the attention of parliament. To-day this allowance is quite inadequate for orphans reaching their teen age, because they then are more expensive to maintain than a grown person. It is suggested that the allowance should be increased to forty-five dollars per month. This of course means an increase in the pension allowance, but not to such an extent as to make it unreasonable for parliament to grant.

Let me refer to another point of administration. Under section 1 of the act dealing with the age limit on pension to children it is provided:

> No pension shall be paid to or in respect of a child who, if a boy, is over the age of sixteen years or, if a girl, is over the age of seventeen years, except when such child and those responsible for its maintenance are without resources and the child is unable, owing to physical or mental deformity, to provide for its own maintenance, or where such child is following and is making satisfactory progress in a course of instruction approved by the commission, in which case the pension may be continued until such child has attained the age of twenty-one years.

I ask the House to bear with me for a moment because the interpretation of this section shows conclusively the unsympathetic attitude on the part of the officials in administering the act. The point to which I wish to direct attention is the extension of time in the advanced stages of a child's education. I have under my hand what I believe is authoritative information that approximately 98 per cent of the applicants for extended pensions under this section are refused. If the father who provided for these children had not been killed overseas, if he had not made the supreme sacrifice, he would have been here to give them the necessary education. The department's refusal was based upon a ruling which differs from the interpretation which most of us would give to the law. According to them "satisfactory progress" does not mean what it naturally would to us; it refers to those who "show exceptional ability." In other words, there is a constant effort to limit and narrow the field within which claims may be made for pensions by those who are entitled to them.

There is another question, the facts regarding which are all in the department, which it would not take the government half an hour to make up their minds upon. I refer to the matter of burial, medical and hospital services to children and other dependents. The present pensions to dependents and orphans make no provision for grave emergencies and serious illness, hospital and burial expenses. Apparently the provision is designed to take care of the minimum normal requirements, but it seems to me that it should include such expenses as I have referred to. I mention these as some of the matters that ought to be considered.

I was not present if the minister made any statement in reply to a question I asked on the orders of the day a short while ago as to whether or not the time would be extended for returned soldiers' insurance. Was an answer given to that question?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, on March 30, I think.

Mr. LADNER: Was it a refusal?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes; it could not be considered this year.

Mr. LADNER: I do not approve of the minister's decision, but that I suppose is a matter of difference in policy. I do commend the minister in coming to a definite decision instead of being altogether indifferent and leaving the matter in a more or less unsettled state as some of us have reason to know is done in regard to other things.

I want now to refer to two or three cases to illustrate the point I am making, that the department is unsympathetic and that their effort appears to be to avoid paying pensions rather than to favour the applicant in doubtful cases and thereby do justice. I refer first to the case of R. E. Worthington, which can best be stated by reference to a letter I have on file from this man. I quote:

> To make a long drawn out story short, I was finally taken very seriously ill with an hemorrhage, gastric ulcer not a duodenal ulcer, as Ottawa thinks. The doctor was called in at 5 a.m. on November 17, 1924, and inside of half an hour I was in the operating table for a major operation at St. Paul's hospital, about six blocks away from where I live. I may say that I was not expected to live the day. However I ultimately recovered and asked for payment of the hospital account and the doctors' fees, including two special nurses. The account runs approximately $600 (only for hospital bills and M.D.'s.). I did not ask for pay and allowances of my rank (which is captain).
> You will read from the enclosed letter that I should have applied for permission to the nearest military hospital. Now, Mr. Ladner, how in the world could I have had time to make such application when the whole thing was done in half and hour and in the middle of the night almost. Indeed, the attending physician said I would not reach the hospital alive, which was only a short distance away. It was a question of life and death which I think should be recognized by the medical authorities.
> Now then supposing I had died on the way. It has been recognized and admitted in the enclosed letter that my illness was occasioned by military service. In that case my wife would have claimed a pension for the rank of captain. Don't you think, that in such a crisis, coming on in a moment, one could not think of asking to be admitted to Shaughnessy hospital which is at least four miles from my home? Then again it is a question of getting a dying man to the nearest institution.

I communicated with the department in reference to this case and received the reply that the man ought to have applied to the nearest pension authority. If that had been done the pension authority would undoubtedly have agreed to allow this doctor to do the operation, and the expenses would have been paid. I would point out however that the exigencies of the case were such as made it absolutely impossible for him to communicate with a pension authority. I want to be absolutely fair in these matters, especially as I know the officials experience great difficulty in administering their department. But I do not think that such treatment is fair, and the suggestion, conveyed in a letter to me, that the man knew a night or two before he was taken to hospital that there was something wrong with him, is not warranted. In the space of half an hour he was seized with this illness—this can be confirmed—and in a dying state he was rushed to the hospital. He had no time to think of formalities and technicalities. An hon. member suggests that he would not know the formalities. That is more than likely, but at any rate it is certain that he had no time to consider such things. Yet the department refuses to consider his case and reimburse him. That in my opinion, only confirms the statement that the department is unsympathetic, one might almost say heartless, in its attitude towards many of these splendid men who have suffered disabilities and illnesses in consequence of service overseas.

I want the minister to understand that in making these statements I have no intention whatever of indulging in a political speech. We are five years from an election, and in any case this matter is of great importance and far transcends the narrowness of partisan politics.

Mr. POWER: It may be to fulfil a political promise.

Mr. LADNER: There is no reason why the hon. gentleman should suspect me of following his own practice.

Mr. POWER: That is not my practice.

Mr. LADNER: I live at another end of the continent.

Mr. POWER: Too bad for you.

Mr. LADNER: No, on the contrary it is a good thing, in view of my hon. friend's idea of political morality.

I have two or three files full of cases such as the one I have cited. There are instances in which there is merely a misunderstanding of the intent of the law, but in a large number of cases there is revealed an indifference to the condition of these men and a desire to get out of paying the money to which they are entitled. Here is the case of John S. Hunter. The record number is 505,378, the pensioner's number being 136,439. This man was injured in the foot overseas and on discharge he claimed a pension and received it. He was in receipt of the pension for four or five years but one day he got a letter informing him that it would no longer be paid. The pension was finally reduced by half. However, the man made complaint, and the reply came that no remedy was forthcoming, for the reason that at the time of his enlistment, to quote the words of the letter, "there was a tendency to flat feet." On behalf of this man I wrote pointing out that when the pension was first granted all the evidence, including his hospital sheet, was before the pension authorities just as it was when the pension was discontinued. Not a single change had taken place, either in fact or in evidence, to cause the pension board to withhold the pension or to reduce it. Why did they change their minds? Did it arise from a deliberate policy to cut down on pensions? Why did they pay this man and then, on the same evidence, with the same facts and the same medical sheet, suddenly decide he was not entitled to pension? That is exactly what happened, and I have never yet received an explanation except when one of the officials stated that they may have made a mistake in the first place in granting the pension. That is a typical case, and I appeal to hon. members whether or not the representative citizen of this country would not have decided that the pension board should have given the poor fellow the benefit of the doubt rather than take away his pension after he had received it under the same law and facts for four or five years.

I mention that as another indication of the lack of sympathy on the part of those administering the Pension Act; I had intended to refer to other cases, but I wish to expedite the business before the House. There is the case of Sarah Louisa Atkinson, which is equally meritorius; there is the case of James Parker Fee, whose disability was attributable to war service and was so established by the medical board, but whose pension was refused; there was the case of Charles Edward Bower, and as a matter of fact I suppose most hon. members have had a number of cases of people who claim pensions. I have endeavoured to select those cases which from my knowledge of the facts and my knowledge of the law have the weight of evidence in their favour, and in which the pension board had no right to refuse pensions.

The charge I make against the board is the same as that made in three previous years, and I find that a great many other hon. members now have the same viewpoint. It is my conviction that the board have been in office so long and are so tied up with red tape that they have become unsympathetic to these unfortunate claimants and narrow in their interpretation of the law; and that they have tended to put the onus of proof more upon the applicants. The board seem to have an unwarranted desire to save as much money in pensions as it is possible to save. I realize that those are strong words, but if hon. members could read the heart-rending letters which I have received and could visualize the homes upset and lives distressingly disturbed; if hon. gentlemen could picture the little children who, instead of being educated as their fathers would have done had a kind Providence led them safely home, must now go to work at an early age, I think it would be found that the language is not too strong. I have had widows and wives ill in health, broken in spirit and without work, come to my office in Vancouver for assistance in their claims but who have been refused pensions on the slightest and most unworthy technicalities. Many hon. members have had the same experience I am sure.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member was in his seat a few moments ago when I stated that in speaking of the Board of Pension Commissioners one must bear in mind that they have a double function; they are administrators in some respects and judges in others. The hon. gentleman is attributing unworthy motives to awards made by that board, and in so doing is reflecting upon the character of those judges, because that is what they are in certain respects.

Mr. LADNER: I wish to conform to the rules of the House, but I am merely stating true facts of which I have personal knowledge. I do not wish to reflect upon the commission—

Mr. SPEAKER: Or their motives?

Mr. LADNER: I do not think I referred to their motives.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman stated that they had refused pensions on most unworthy pretexts.

Mr. LADNER: If I may repeat it, what I did say was that in the decisions given it has appeared as though the board were endeavouring to save money and to force the onus of proof upon the applicant more than was formerly done. I think that is a fair statement to be made by a member who is seeking to do his duty. I have no doubt there are many members who take the opposite view, and if so they are entitled to state their opinions as well. My real purpose in these remarks is this: I would like to see the government seriously take hold of the question of policy, and seriously consider the representations which have been made by the various soldier organizations. Let them consider the facts and suggestions, by which any reasonable man would be convinced. The case of James Frew, which I pointed out a few moments ago, is typical. Under the act there is no provision by which appeals can be made after thirty days, and there is no authority such as is given to courts to allow an extension of time where good reasons are shown. These are things for which there can be no excuse while one man rests under a disability and an injustice as is the case with hundreds at present.

I have nothing further to say on the question, but I do earnestly urge the government and the minister to take time between now and the next session of parliament to consider thoroughly all these questions and to have legislation ready at the beginning of the next session which will correct these clear defects and offer a solution to those other problems which may be a little more complicated. There may be some questions for which it is difficult to find a solution, but there are many on which a few minutes' reflection or a glance of the eye will warrant decision and action. The government have a responsibility for not attending to this important matter this session, and they have a duty to look after it next session and make those changes the necessity for which is apparent to any reasonable and sensible government desiring to apply the pension as was intended and is now desired by the people of Canada.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): It was not my intention to take any part in this debate until I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), who I am sorry to see is not in his seat. His remarks, generally speaking, had reference to one particular case, and before this high court of parliament he tried a case which has been already tried by a tribunal duly appointed by this House. In French we say, "Un plaideur malchanceux a vingt-quatre heures pour maudire son juge." The hon. member for Burrard, instead of taking twenty-four hours in which to curse his judge, brought the whole case before this House. I listened to it very attentively, and it seems to be a very complicated matter. The Board of Pension Commissioners in their wisdom, having at their disposal investigating officers; having heard from the eloquent lips of the hon. member on several occasions, and having read from the even more eloquent pen of the hon. member the whole facts of the case, have decided against him. After listening to his remarks for some time it semed to me, though I have every sympathy for the widowed mother of the deceased soldier, that the hon. member for Burrard was rather more interested in the fact that his feelings were hurt than that the pension was withheld from the person to whom he makes reference; it seems to me to be more of a case of lese majeste than a case of a really deserving character.

After having listened to him for some time I heard him say that he was very much offended because, forsooth, Colonel Thompson after listening to him—

Mr. CLARK: I rise to a point of order. That is an absolutely incorrect statement. I did not say that I was offended because Colonel Thompson did nothing. Furthermore, if I may make myself perfectly clear on the question on the point of privilege, I wish to say that my personal feelings have not been hurt at all. So far as I personally am concerned that phase of the matter has never entered into this case, and the record will show it. The record will show great forbearance on my part, a forbearance for over three years; and the only reason I have made the statement now is in the hope that I may bring this situation to the attention of the government and influence them to deal with it.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to my hon. friend interrupting me for the purpose of making a correction, but he must not deliver a speech. Of course I accept the hon. gentleman's word, but I listened to the reading of a letter which he had addressed to the Board of Pension Commissioners on the day following, or some days following, this remarkable interview in which Colonel Thompson walked out—

Mr. CLARK: The interview was only an incident.

Mr. POWER: —and I gathered from listening to the letter that at the time my hon. friend wrote it he considered he had been offended.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And you concluded you would have been offended under like circumstances.

Mr. POWER: I think I would have been. I do not blame my hon. friend. I have been offended and by the very same persons, but I did not think it was necessary on that account to take the whole of the cases I had brought before the board and submit them to the House of Commons. The law enacted by my hon. friends opposite was brought into force for the specific purpose of taking the whole question of pensions out of politics. For that reason we have, I think, since the war, and even during the war, treated the question of pensions for returned soldiers almost as a non-political one. The Board of Pension Commissioners was formed, practically by common consent, into a judicial body. Their tenure of office was fixed at ten years, they were not to be removable except on the same grounds as those for which a judge is impeached, and it is for that very reason I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you refuse to allow us to impute evil or improper motives to members of the board. I have thought on many occasions that it was my duty to rise in the House and declaim against certain members of the board. I have thought sometimes that their judgments were not sound. I might go even further in my characterization but Mr. Speaker, perhaps would correct me. I have thought their judgments were not sound, not based on common sense, but I do not think that this is the place in which to try cases wherein, in my judgment, they err.

Now let me follow my hon. friend from Burrard still further in his remarks. He says, undoubtedly without political bias, that my hon. friend the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King) should be at his disposal to go and meet the Board of Pension Commissioners. He says that when he has business with the board he has a right, in the name of the returned soldiers, to say to the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, "You come with me".

Mr. CLARK: Not at all.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. gentleman did not say that I do not know what he meant.

Mr. CLARK: Not at all.

Mr. POWER: He said it was the duty of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to be present when claims were made.

Mr. CLARK: Once more, Mr. Speaker, I absolutely contradict the hon. gentleman. That is an incorrect statement. I did not say anything of the sort. I said that I appealed to the minister on the ground of a certain condition existing in the administration of his department.

Mr. POWER: That he should go.

Mr. CLARK: That he should go and hear one particular case as it would clearly illustrate, as regards administration, the situation in all cases. I would not ask the minister to go in all cases, but simply in this particular case to illustrate the situation in regard to administration. That is all.

Mr. POWER: He asks the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to go with him before the board. It was not right, it was wrong, it was unjust, when my hon. friend the present minister did not go, but it was a very different matter when the acting minister, belonging to the party of my hon. friend himself, last June was not able to go, saying that he was too busy.

Mr. CLARK: I did not criticize either.

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend did not criticize I do not know what he means.

Mr. CLARK: I simply stated the facts.

Mr. POWER: I remember my hon. friend waxing quite indignant and saying it was the duty of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to appear before that board.

Mr. CLARK: His duty to do what?

Mr. POWER: Saying that it was the duty of the Minister of Soldiers' Re-establishment to go with him before the board.

Mr. CLARK: In all cases.

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman did not say in all cases, he was talking of this particular case. Now if the failure to do that aroused indignation in my hon. friend's mind because the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment now sitting here did not go, surely it should have aroused far more indignation in the mind of my hon. friend when he was wounded in the house of his friends. Let me go further. The object of this law, as I said, was to take the matter of pensions out of politics. If you are to permit the minister, the man who controls this department, to appear and to assist at the sittings of this body you will cause the impression to go out—by implication, either directly or indirectly—that the minister is influencing the decisions of the board. To that I object. I think it has been decided by this parliament in its judgment that the minister should not interfere with pensions. Many a time my own constituents have written to me to say: You have influence with the minister, you support him, you are on his side of the House, ask him to go before the Board of Pension Commissioners with you, ask him to write to the pension board. Never since I have been a member of this House have I asked the minister to influence the Board of Pension Commissioners in any way, but let me say that many a time it would have done some good if they had been influenced in the right direction.

There was another remark made by my hon. friend to which I think we have a right to take exception. He accused the government of shameful neglect because they had not put into force certain recommendations of the pensions committee of 1924. Surely my hon. friend would remember that the bill passed by parliament on the recommendation of the pensions committee of 1924 was defeated not in the House of Commons but in another house.

Mr. CLARK: I said it was passed unanimously by this House.

Mr. POWER: I have here a copy of the Veteran of July 26, 1924, containing a table showing the disposition of the legislation affecting ex-service men and their dependents in the session of parliament for that year. That table is as follows:

Can my hon. friend then justly claim that we on this side of the House have not been sympathetic to the returned soldier? Is it fair, just or reasonable to endeavour to make political capital out of a matter of this kind when it is his own friends who have displayed a lack of sympathy towards the soldiers? It was not the Minister of National Defence, who was chairman of the special commission which investigated the grievances of the soldiers, who was unsympathetic to them.

Mr. CLARK: He did good work.

Mr. POWER: I thank my hon. friend for saying that. The minister is a great influence in this government. Does my hon. friend think he will not continue to work for the returned soldiers?

Mr. CLARK: I think he will.

Mr. POWER: Does he think the minister will not continue to work for those for whom he fought not only while he was in France but after he returned to Canada? It is unjust, unfair and highly improper, at this stage of the game when the war has been over for ten years, when for ten years we have allowed this matter to be dealt with outside of politics, for my hon. friends opposite to try to make political capital out of a few petty grievances.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): I fail to understand why the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has taken the stand which he has in this debate. I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), and it was not my impression derived from anything he said that a partisan spirit actuated his remarks in any respect. He had a case which, to anyone who heard it, conveyed the impression that perhaps an injustice had been done. He used it as an example to call to the attention of this House and of the government the fact that it might be well for the government and the minister responsible to look into the workings of the pension board. I have no complaints of a specific nature to make; but one cannot be a representative of the people without hearing of cases in which, rightly or wrongly, the soldier or his dependent thinks the pension board has not done justice. These cases are so numerous that one is sometimes compelled to think there may be a general principle underlying them, and that the pension board, in the very patriotic desire to avoid any imposition upon the government, has perhaps stood so straight that it has leaned backwards.

I do not think the hon. member for Burrard was making any imputation of wrongdoing on the part of the pension board. He was saying that the impression gathered generally from many instances in which soldiers had communicated with him—and I can assent to that from my experience—was that the pension board's mind was more directed to saving the money of the government than to taking care sympathetically of the soldiers who came before it.

The hon. member for Burrard instanced a case which comes down to a very narrow point. There were two claimants for a pension, a widow and a mother who was dependent and with whom the soldier lived. There was a question of fact to be decided. The board decided in favour of the widow and against the mother. The widow has since died. I think it would be the part of generosity and sympathy for the soldier when there is no longer any dispute, not to cut off at the death of the widow, the pension as it had been awarded, but to continue it to the mother, there being then only one applicant involved. That would have been a sympathetic way rightly or wrongly, of dealing with the matter. I am not prepared to say if that might have been done.

The hon. member for Burrard is pointing out to the minister that the feeling exists—and I think he pointed out as kindly as he could—that the minister should keep more closely in touch with the operations of the board and the disposition of the many cases which come before it. In that I think the hon. member for Burrard was quite right. This is not a judicial board in the sense that it is dealing with litigants who are at arm's length. It is a body which is dealing with the claims of men who are prima facie entitled to recognition of their claims.

We have found men who were bad soldiers in the army; we have had poor men when they went into the army and poor men after they left. I am not saying that they are all perfect; but the great bulk of the men who served overseas and who make claims for pensions, are to be relied upon. They are men who should be treated with a great deal of consideration and sympathy and with the feeling that they are not out in the first place to get from the government anything to which they are not entitled. Rather they believe thoroughly in the claim they are making and they should be entitled to careful and sympathetic consideration. Therefore I hope the minister and the hon. member for Quebec South will not take from the remarks of the hon. member for Burrard the impression which the hon. member for Quebec South seems to think is the correct one. The hon. member for Burrard has spoken for himself. As one who is interested in the matter I may speak for many on this side of the House who are in the same position as myself. We do not speak from any partisan spirit; the time has gone by for that. The Pension Act is the result of careful investigation. The Minister of National Defence is responsible for a good deal of it and entitled to a great deal of credit for what has been done. At the time he was not actively engaged in politics; he was an independent chairman of the commission; he put his heart into the work, and we think a good job was done. The work is not yet completed. The object, as I take it, of the hon. member for Burrard, as it is my object in making these remarks, is to point out to the minister that this judicial body, so called, which is not judicial in the sense that it is dealing with litigants who are at arm's length, is one that might be supervised by the minister, and that interest taken by the minister in the specific cases or in the general conduct of the board would be amply repaid by what he could learn from so doing.

In regard to the bill itself there is disappointment amongst the soldiers of this country over the action of the government in quite another direction. The Pension Act is a mass of almost unintelligible amendments. I mean that those who read the act, those who are concerned in it and are to benefit under it, are men who have not the capacity for disentangling from a mass of documents the points which may or may not affect them. It is so difficult, Mr. Speaker, to follow that act that I myself have given it up in despair many times. Through the kindness of the government last year I was given a complete copy of all amendments, but that did not make it much better. The time for consolidation, as I said last year, has more than arrived, and I had hoped that the act would have been consolidated by now. Added to that, the soldier organizations to-day are on a far better footing than they have ever been before. Previously there were conflicting groups and associations with conflicting interests, but these bodies have been welded more or less now into a smooth-working and harmonious association called the Legion, which represents properly the sentiments of the returned soldiers in this country. That Legion has a service bureau. It has men qualified to look into the questions which affect the returned soldiers, and that bureau, after looking very carefully into these different questions, made certain recommendations which in turn were submitted to and passed by the various provincial commands and at last reached the general convention of the legion which was held, I believe, last summer.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In January of this year.

Mr. GEARY: In January, then; and these recommendations were referred to a committee of the Legion, with a representative of the department present, I believe, and probably taking part in the discussion—no doubt sympathetically, because I do not ascribe to any official of the department, least of all to the minister, any lack of sympathy towards the returned soldiers. Before this committee the various recommendations were sifted out, and their work finally resulted in some thirty-eight or thirty-nine recommendations being codified into suggestions for the department to act upon. Those suggestions have been in the hands of the department for I should say one month now, but the Pension Act has not been consolidated, and none of those amendments has been embodied in amendments to the act now under discussion. I regret very much indeed, and regret in common with many of the commands, many members of the Legion, many posts of the Legion and many individual soldiers, that we are left without any action being taken this session in regard to these carefully thought out recommendations. That is a matter of great disappointment. I do not know that it would do any good to propose any of these recommendations by way of amendment. It would probably not pass the House, but it does seem to me that many of these amendments, vital in their intention and necessary to the proper and smooth working of the act, could be arranged and carried into the bill we have before us. I object strenuously to the interests of the soldiers in this matter of pensions being sacrificed to any desire on our part to close the business of the House at an early date. This matter should receive the attention of the House this session, and as far as the department can go in deciding what amendments are proper and should be made within the next day or two or within the next week, these amendments should be presented to us and embodied in this bill. I protest against the delay in looking after the suggestions of the returned soldiers, officially made and carefully thought out, and undoubtedly, in the main, suggestions which would be of great service to the department and of great help and assistance to the soldiers who are entitled to a pension.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I would like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, in support of the contention of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). He related some instances of hardship amongst the returned soldiers who are seeking a pension, and I have several in mind of the same kind. I have often thought that there was an unsympathetic attitude on the part of the department towards these men. Whether the law or the regulations are at fault, or whether the thing is general, I do not know, but I do know myself of quite a number of cases of soldiers who should be on the pension list but who cannot get on. I think a more sympathetic attitude is due these men who have once offered their lives to save this country. I have in mind one young man who took his discharge as physically fit. He had some slight ailment at the time, simply a nodding of the head, and when he was advised to get on the pension list if possible, he said, "Oh no, I can make my way. I will get well as I go along." But instead of getting better he got steadily worse, and for the last year he has been in hospital, at the mercy of friends. He cannot get on the pension list. I have had his case before the board, and it is now before the soldiers' representative in Saskatchewan, but there is very little hope that under the present laws and regulations he will be able to get on the pension list.

I know of another man who, with one leg missing, is still trying to make a living. He failed for over four years to get any help from the pension board. He has an artificial limb, but it does not fit very well and cannot be made to fit, and he cannot use it.

I do hope that the minister will take into consideration all these cases that are brought before him. I really think that a more sympathetic attitude is due to these men; in fact I have always contended that once a man has taken his life in his hands and faced death for his country, if he is incapacitated in any way his country owes him a living. I shall be glad to give the minister the names and numbers of these men if he desires them.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to unduly delay the House in the brief remarks I propose to make touching this very important question of soldiers' pension legislation. I should like to associate myself with those who have already spoken in the debate in their deep regret that the government has not seen fit to bring down this session amendments to returned soldiers' legislation. I understand that representations were made to the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment in March last by the Canadian Legion officials and that a promise by implication, if not a definite promise, was certainly given at the time that the recommendations for amending the Pension Act then made to the government by the returned soldiers' organizations would be dealt with this session.

We often hear the remark made in this House: We want legislation with teeth in it—something that will be effective to cope with a situation requiring drastic treatment. The other evening when amendments to the Customs Act were before the House the government withdrew a clause that had teeth in it. Now with respect to pension legislation we have on the statute books an act with so many teeth in it that it is altogether too vicious in its operation. In certain of the provinces liquor legislation has been enacted under which the accused must prove his innocence, and he has no right of appeal from a conviction. Under the administration of the Pension Act practically the same result follows. A man goes before the pension board or the federal appeal board and must establish beyond all question that he is entitled to a pension. He is not given the benefit of any doubt—that is not characteristic of British jurisprudence in ordinary cases, and we certainly should be more lenient in dealing with returned soldiers who sacrificed so much for this country than to any other class of citizens.

The Pension Act has not been amended since 1924.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): 1925.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes, I beg your pardon, 1925. The administration of the act has aroused general dissatisfaction on the part of the returned soldiers. When you have complaints from all over the country, those complaints must be based on something fundamental, and it has been conclusively established that the returned soldier organizations have good ground for urging that the act is not interpreted in the spirit in which it was framed. As an instance of this, Mr. Speaker, let me show how the act has been applied in Nova Scotia. There are eighteen returned soldier tubercular cases to-day in the sanatarium at Kentville. They are returned soldiers who have been unable to secure a pension, and they are being kept there by their comrades at an expense of $8,000 a year. There have been as many as twenty-two tubercular ex-service men in that sanatarium at one time and if it were not for the generosity of those who fought with them side by side in the trenches they would be allowed to die in the gutters, because there is no organization in the province to look after such cases. To neglect these men in this way is to my mind utterly unfair and ungrateful on the part of the country for which they sacrificed so much. The Pension Act is strictly interpreted and rigidly applied, although in order to be fair to the ex-service men it should be administered with a certain degree of elasticity.

As showing the injustice that ensues from a too narrow interpretation of the act, I beg to draw to the attention of the House an outstanding case in Nova Scotia. I refer to Sergeant Angus MacGillivray of Antigonish. He enlisted in 1914, went all through the war, and was discharged in 1919. Before discharge he suffered from a hemorrhage. Besides being a splendid soldier this man was an outstanding athlete and represented Canada at the Marathon games in the city of Paris. He applied for a pension and was turned down by the Board of Pension Commissioners and Federal Appeal Board. He is now in the sanatarium at Kentville and is being maintained there by his comrades. After the sergeant's admission to the sanatarium the superintendent, Dr. Miller, wrote a long letter to the Board of Pension Commissioners stating that the patient's condition disclosed evidence of his having had tuberculosis for a long period, and that he must certainly have been affected before he was discharged from the army. In fairness to the Board of Pension Commissioners I should say that the man's case had been closed before this letter was sent to them. Under the act as it stands the returned man has no right to have his case reopened and in the most deserving instances no relief is given. This is something that certainly requires the most drastic action. It calls for an immediate consideration by the government. It is unthinkable that deserving cases such as I have described should be allowed to fall on the shoulders of those comrades who fought with these men in the Great war.

With respect to the Federal Appeal Board, I understand that the present legislation empowers that body to say whether a man is entitled to a pension or not, but does not give them the right to assess the pension. If a man applies to the Board of Pension Commissioners and is refused, he may appeal to the Federal Appeal Board. The case goes before the board and they decide whether or not the pension should be paid, but the actual assessing of the pension is a matter that is referred back again to the Board of Pension Commissioners, who can fix the allowance as low as they like. There is no legislation that compels them to extend more generous treatment to the appellant. The Federal Appeal Board, I understand, includes three medical men who not only act as judges but give testimony in the capacity of expert medical witnesses. The Federal Appeal Board, as I say, can do no more than establish eligibility; their scope is limited to that extent I am told however, that they can go further than that in the case of imperial veterans residing in the Dominion. In those cases besides being able to establish eligibility they can also assess the amount to be allowed. If the British government, through suggestions which no doubt they must have made to the Canadian government in this regard, can be as generous as this to their ex-service men living in Canada, surely we can be equally generous to those of our own living in our own land.

In the case of Angus MacGillivray to which I have referred, apart from the fact that the man was supported by the ex-service men of Nova Scotia, he had to undergo what I believe in medical terminology is known as a pleuroplastic operation. It was a serious operation which cost the returned soldiers organization of Nova Scotia $500. It seems to me that the act as it stands does a grave injustice to the returned man. It would be much preferable that a large number of undeserving cases should receive consideration rather than have a few or even one really deserving case turned down. And that is what we are witnessing all over Canada to-day. A good many deserving cases under de Pension Act as it stands are being rejected without any justification.

Speaking of the necessity for immediate amendments to the Pension Act, I may observe that in Nova Scotia there are sixty cases alone of men who are unable, because of the seven-year clause in the act, to apply for pensions.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is to be amended.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): This year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I have so indicated.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): There is to be an amendment this session?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I am glad to hear it. It disposes of that point. There are however a good many other cases similar to this where injustices to the returned soldiers demand immediate amendments to the Pension Act. These amendments should not be delayed. They do not involve anything intricate and the necessity for them is well known to the government. Surely they can be introduced this year. The minister ought to make some definite statement suggesting some concrete changes, so that we might know exactly the position of the government. Such a statement from him would be highly appreciated by the ex-service men's associations in Canada. Legislation along these lines is urgently needed and we are asking the government to reconsider their decision not to bring down any amendments other than the one just referred to by the minister.

With regard to appeals to the Federal Appeal Board, I would point out to the minister that in the first instance the appeal is heard, not so much on the merits of his case as on what appears in his file. If there is anything detrimental in the file it looms up larger than anything else. This trial on files has a tendency to work a grave injustice to the man appealing and there should be some regulation to dispense with that procedure, if not altogether, at least to such an extent as would minimize the injustice which the returned men now suffer on that account.

There is another point worth touching upon and that is with regard to cases of misconduct. No appeal is allowed in such cases. I am also informed that of all the cases that have been appealed from the Board of Pension Commissioners to the Federal Appeal Board only 28 per cent have been allowed. I should like to have the minister make some more definite statement than we have so far had with regard to what the government intends doing with reference to the Pension Act and to returned soldiers legislation generally. This subject is certainly of far-reaching importance. The present conditions are a source of hardship and uneasiness throughout the Dominion to returned soldiers and their dependents and to returned soldiers organizations, and the matter is one that calls for immediate attention on the part of this parliament. Comprehensive amendments should be brought in during the present session, and I would urge the minister once more to make a clear cut statement on the subject.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) before the House rose at six o'clock, as well as to the remarks of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) and I agree with both hon. gentlemen, one on this side and one on the other. I am firmly convinced that a revision of the Pension Act with proper amendments is long overdue. It is true that certain amendments were made in 1925 but there is room for amendments this year. I very much regret that the minister has not seen fit to bring in some amendment to the act.

This question has many ramifications, and could be debated in this House at great length. Every hon. member of this House has had a great many claims put in his hands from returned soldiers and their dependents, and if I may say so I think perhaps the great difficulties the pension board have had to deal with have resulted from several causes. When the war was over and the troops were sent home and discharged from the different military districts, many of the returning soldiers were discharged without a medical examination of any kind. I do not altogether think that the military authorities were to blame for discharging these soldiers with no medical examination, because in many cases the men themselves were to blame; they wanted to get out of the army and resume civil life, but they should not have been permitted to take their discharge without a medical examination. At any rate, many of them were discharged without such an examination; they have gone back into civil life and many of them, together with some who were discharged after a thorough examination, have been seized with certain diseases, or certain defects have become apparent, which can be traced directly back to the effects of the war, and it is a very difficult matter to establish this after a few years have elapsed.

I do not want to take up very much of the time of the House, but I would like to mention one or two cases which have come under my observation in my own riding. The first case is that of a man who was a medical officer overseas; he returned from the war and was discharged as medically fit. He went back to his profession and tried to carry on, but after a lapse of a few months pernicious anaemia settled in his system and he became seriously ill. I am not a medical man and I do not know very much about that disease, but I do know that he applied to the board for a pension and was absolutely turned down, because the pension board said his physical condition could not be traced back to his war service. He protested that that was not so, and some of his friends took up his cause and went back with it to the pension board

Perhaps I am a little ahead of my story; in the interval this officer had to go to the expense and trouble of taking special treatment in the Toronto General Hospital. His earning power was gone and he was not in condition to practise his profession; he was left with very little money and was virtually fighting for his life at the time representations were made to the pension board that at least he should be put under observation and should receive a pension if entitled to one. He went not only to the Toronto General Hospital but also to the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, where a specialist looked him over. The specialist, I should say, was one of the most eminent doctors on this disease in the United States, and he certified after learning the history of the case that the condition could be traced back to the first inoculation the man had received when he entered the army. Several medical men in Toronto who examined him agreed in that view. It took us months and months to convince the pension board at Ottawa that this officer was entitled to a pension, and if it had not been for his friends who rallied to his support and gave freely of their time in placing his case before the authorities, that man would not be receiving a pension at all, simply because the Board of Pension Commissioners said his condition was not due to his war service. That was their first decision, but when further proof was offered that decision was reversed, and they said his condition could be traced back to the first inoculation he received when he entered the army.

That is one case, and I have another which came under my observation, that of a boy from my home town who enlisted and went overseas with my battalion. I know the history of that boy and the history of his parents and his family for years back. When he returned from overseas he was discharged from military district No. 2, which was the first mistake; he should have been discharged from military district No. 1, from which he had enlisted. For some reason or other, in the shuffle coming across from overseas, he landed in Toronto and was discharged without a medical examination. He returned to his home town and started in civil life, but in six months was stricken down with tuberculosis. After a long fight we had him sent to London for observation, where he died two weeks later. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if he had received the care he should have when he was discharged from military district No. 2, he would have been taken for treatment, with the result that he would have been alive to-day. I will say, however, that after he died we brought the matter before the Board of Pension Commissioners, who granted a pension to his father and mother, whose sole support he had been. My contention is that that boy should have been examined prior to his discharge; if that had been done he would have been under observation, and probably his life would have been saved.

I have still another case which I would like to mention, and I have in addition some letters which I received only a day or two ago. This is the case of a young married man who owned a farm in the riding which I have the honour to represent. He went overseas and was both gassed and wounded, receiving treatment first in France and later in England. Finally he came back and received his discharge. He went back to the farm and worked for a year or so and was then taken down with heart trouble. His case was so serious that the local doctor recommended that he sell his farm and give up farming, as he could no longer carry on. He has done that, and I am glad to say that now he is under observation in London.

I only mention these cases to illustrate the fact that thousands of Canadian boys were discharged from the army as medically fit, and perhaps were medically fit at that time, but through their war service and through the hardships they endured overseas their systems were so undermined that certain diseases have afflicted them which can be traced back directly to their war service. I claim that these men should get fair, generous treatment from the pension board, and that there should be no hesitancy when their cases are brought up; they should get prompt and careful attention. I have not very much criticism to offer with regard to the Board of Pension Commissioners other than to say that the trouble with the staffs of the pension board and of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is that there is still too much military red tape and discipline, and not enough careful consideration. I know that many cases have been brought up where no claim exists. I do say, however, that every claim should receive prompt, favourable and careful consideration, and that there should be no red tape at all in this connection. Their claims should receive more consideration than any appeal or request that is made to any other department of this government.

There is just one other matter I want to speak of. I gathered from the remarks of my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) that an hon. member opposite had stated that sometimes politics have crept in in connection with some of these claims. If I am wrong in that understanding I am open to correction.

Mr. LADNER: If I may rise to a point of order I would say this: at that time only the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) and myself had spoken, and neither of us, directly or indirectly, referred to or indicated that there was such a thing. The hon. member is entirely mistaken. We tried to keep politics out of the question.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not referring to my hon. friend at all. I did not hear anything that he said, and I did not hear the hon. member for Quebec South even refer to him. But I did hear the hon. member for Quebec South refer to the hon. member for Burrard. I want to say that long before I entered political life I did what little I could for the returned men, irrespective of their politics, and am still doing it. I never saw anything in the shape of politics obtrude itself into the administration of the Pension Act at Ottawa here, either under the Union government, the Conservative government or the Liberal government. But now the question has been raised I want the minister please to pay attention to what I am going to say and to take it into his serious consideration. I do not lay any charge myself because I have not the proof, and I would be loath to prefer any charge against any official unless I had absolute proof. But if one-half the stories that have been told to me, and told to other hon. members from western Ontario on this side, are true, politics did creep into the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment in the city of London, and military district No. 1, during the elections last September. If half the stories told about the manipulations of some of the officers and some of the nurses on the staff there are true, then the minister should make an investigation and find out whether there is any foundation for these rumours. I do not know that they have been brought directly to his attention, but I am bringing them to his notice now and suggesting that in military district No. 1 there is room for investigation with respect to charges of partisanship on the part of officers and nurses in that area.

Let me say again, Mr. Speaker, that I would have been much more pleased if the minister had brought in his amendments to the Pension Act this session, and if necessary prolonged the session by two, three or four days, or even a week, in order to deal with them, because I think there are thousands of cases in Canada that deserve and demand prompt attention from the minister in charge of the department. The trouble is that as the years go on we are forgetting a lot of things about the war. We are forgetting the claims of the dependents of the men who went overseas and were killed, or the claims of the men who came back maimed for life. These are claims which should receive careful attention and be given just consideration at all times.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer just a word or two upon the second reading of this very important bill. May I say in regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) that he somewhat spoiled a very estimable speech with an insinuation against a body of very worthy men and women in the military district of London when he stated that while he knew nothing about the matter he had heard rumours for which he could not vouch, and at the same time insinuated that these officers and nurses were guilty of improper actions and improper conduct in the month of September last. Up till that point in his address—

Mr. SANDERSON: As a point of order I should like to state to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that I did not make charges, but that rumours were so serious and so grave as to merit investigation. Doubtless the hon. member has heard these rumours also.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I will not be interrupted in this irregular way. I said, and I repeat it, that my hon. friend did not make charges. What he said was that he had no knowledge of these rumours. In that case he should not have made his insinuation. That is my point. Letting it go at that, I say that in my judgment, he spoiled what otherwise would have been a very estimable speech upon this important question.

Now I think the minister to-night and during the course of this afternoon has had it very forcibly brought to his attention that the time is ripe for action in regard to the present Pension Act. Almost annually since the war this House has deemed it necessary to amend the pension law. We in this country, happily for Canada, had little experience in pension legislation prior to the war. But since the Great war we have had an abundant experience, and in the judgment of this House it has been necessary almost every year to appoint committees to consider the whole situation and amend the law where amendments were proper. The last occasion upon which a committee considered the pension legislation of this country and brought in amendments was 1925, I believe. Nothing was done in that respect during the last session. Now we have come to the closing days of the session of 1927, and at this very late period the government brings down a proposal to amend the pension law only by way of appointing two additional members to the appeal board. I think the only other clause in the bill provides for a quorum of that board. Since this session opened it has been drawn to the attention of the government and of the minister week after week that the present pension law is unsatisfactory in some respects and inadequate in others. Notwithstanding all the amendments of previous sessions and all the investigations of committees of this House which have inquired into the question, there are still loopholes in our legislation; it does not cover all the cases which require attention. These facts, I say, have been brought to the notice of the minister and of the government week after week during the present session. The minister himself has informed the House that he has had requests from soldiers' organizations, I think he said to the number of over thirty, asking for remedial legislation in regard to pension matters. I think he said that his time was too fully occupied to take the matter up, or he had not time to consider these various applications.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, that was not the statement I made.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Some excuse of that kind—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No excuse.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister can put me right when he speaks on this question later. At all events the fact remains that here, in the dying days of the session, the only thing which the government brings forward is a proposal to increase the number of officials; they offer no remedy whatever for the grievances of those soldiers who have been denied pensions under the law as it exists to-day. I do not propose to give instances, although I could, many of them in my own riding; and I do not lay any blame upon the pension board or upon the appeal board. What I blame is the inadequacy of our present law. I do not intend to cite cases, because sufficient have been cited to-night to show the necessity of doing something in regard to the Pension Act, and doing it this session. I do not think the government can successfully plead any excuse in this matter, because it has been brought to their attention too often during the present session. But here we are in the last days of the session with no relief offered to the sufferers and no remedy proposed. One trouble with the present bill is that it is too strict in its language and too circumscribed in its application. It is almost in the nature of penal legislation. The board says that the language of the act must be construed strictly—and they may as a matter of law be right in that decision—and that they are unable to deal with many cases with which they would like to deal.

The Pension Act is in the nature of remedial legislation if ever remedial legislation was passed in this House. It should be elastic. Discretion should be given to the board. All legitimate applications should be permitted. The board in its inquiries should be given a liberty which it has not now. These matters have been drawn to the attention of the goverment time and time again by soldiers' organizations in Canada. The Canadian legion has passed resolutions on the subject; every member in this House, I assume, has, like myself, received copies of these recommendations, and yet the government has not moved a hand this session to relieve the situation.

We have an intimation from the minister at this late date—the first I heard of it was to-night—that the time for considering applications or appeals is to be extended. We are grateful for that information. Why a clause to that effect was not included in the present pension bill, I do not know. It may be added yet; but notwithstanding the fact that we are just about at the end of the present session of parliament, many more clauses might be added. We can hold this House in session; if the minister is prepared with his amendments, let us consider them now. To my mind it is a disgrace to allow parliament to prorogue without passing something in the nature of a remedial pension bill that will take care of a class of cases just such as those which have been pointed out so well in this House this afternoon and evening, and I am sure that the manner in which they have been pointed out must have impressed the minister with the seriousness of the situation.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, naturally I have listened with the greatest interest to the discussion which has taken place in this chamber this afternoon and evening. Perhaps the House will permit me to say that I have had a little experience in connection with pension matters and ex-service men's problems. At the outset let me say that at least three-quarters and perhaps ninety-five per cent of the cases which I have heard cited here this afternoon and to-night could be dealt with and, if they are legitimate, should be dealt with, as matters not of legislation but of administration.

I have gone through the amendments which have been suggested at the present session by representatives of that splendid organization, the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, and in the forty amendments which have been suggested I do not think there is a single one which will cover one of the cases that have been cited here to-day. Primarily it is not more legislation that we need in connection with pension matters. There are only two things required: first, a tribunal which, as has been suggested, will view in a sympathetic way the legislation which it administers and the cases which come before it, and second, reasonable evidence to connect the disability, whatever it may be, with the service period.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has suggested that the Pension Act is much too circumscribed. I do not know very much about pension acts of other nations, but I may remind the House that the only thing which is required in order to entitle a man to a pension is that the disability from which he is suffering has been not caused by service, but incurred during service. In other words if it had its inception during service, if a man were on leave in London, England, or Canada and contracted some disease, automatically under our Pension Act he is entitled to pension.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): For any disease?

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Kingston possibly has regard to immoral cases. My hon. friend knows that the tribunal has discretion to allow pensions in such cases. The real things required are a sympathetic tribunal and the securing of reasonable evidence. I happen to belong to the legal profession. There are in this House some members belonging to the medical profession. When a member of the medical profession says that by no possibility could the disability in a certain case have been incurred during service, it is difficult under the act for a board of pension commissioners, sympathetic as they may be, or for this House or for any other tribunal, to make a different finding, unless you have some sort of act which states that regardless of when the diesase or disability was incurred, the man is entitled to pension just the same.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask a question just on that point? because the minister is an authority on this subject and we are all keenly interested in it. Has he not found that the pension board always take the stand that the question is not one of sympathy; that they are interpreting strictly the law as written in the statute? They say: We are not a sympathetic body; we want to find out what the law is, and we are applying the law. Let parliament attend to the sympathetic side of the question.

Mr. RALSTON: As I have said, that is the act which they administer, and I am not standing here in any way defending the Board of Pension Commissioners or the Federal Appeal Board. I am stating what are the proper requisites to the administration of the Pension Act, and that the important thing is not so much legislation as administration. I have also pointed out that the amendments which have been suggested are not amendments which cover the cases that have been cited here to-day.

We must have machinery to carry out the Pension Act. Somebody must decide these questions. It is out of the question for this high court of parliament, even possessing the ample jurisdiction which it does, to attempt to consider and to pass upon all these cases. That would not be fair to the country or to the ex-service men. Neither is it possible for a committee of this House to do this. Some machinery must be set up whereby there can be a reasonable and proper adjudication of these claims. The Board of Pension Commissioners was established in 1917, before this government took office, and when a commission, which has been referred to to-day, came to consider the matter, it was found that three men sitting in the city of Ottawa could determine the rights of people who had been injured during the war, their widows or other dependents, and could commit the country to millions of dollars of expenditure, and that their decision was final. It was felt that that was neither right nor fair to the country or to the ex-service men.

The suggestion has been made that this government has done nothing. I am not going to make a political speech, but I feel that statement should not be broadcast without the history of the legislation being understood. What was done? An act was passed in 1923 providing for a federal appeal board. I want to tell my hon. friends who have spoken that there is no appeal in connection with the widow in the case cited by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) this afternoon. Under the legislation which passed this House in 1923—and I have the bill under my hand—there was an appeal in those cases

There was an appeal in every case as recommended by the commission. It was not in this House that that appeal was refused, but when the bill came back to this House it was found that the only case in which an appeal was allowed was when it had been decided that the disability had not been incurred during service.

Mr. CLARK I would like my hon. friend to make it quite clear that there is no appeal in the case I cited this afternoon. It is purely discretionary.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly, that is what I am saying, and I am pointing out that that was not the fault of this House of Commons As the legislation passed this House, an appeal was given in every case, as to the amount of pension, as to whether a widowed father or mother was in dependent circumstances, meaning such circumstances that they had not sufficient to provide themselves with a living, and also in the many cases which arise in connection with collateral questions. But all these appeals were cut out in the other House, and the only appeal allowed was when the decision was given on the ground that the disease or disability was not incurred during service. That was one thing that was done.

What else was done? It was found that complaint was made also that a man had a pretty stiff road to travel in connection with proving his claim for pension. He did not understand very much about pension law. All he knew was that he was sick, and he felt the war was the cause, and so the suggestion was made, and was put in the statutes of this country, that in every district there should be a man, nominated by the ex-service men's organizations and paid by the government of this country, whose job it would be to present the case of any man who went to him in connection with appeals under this act. I think that was a step in the right direction. It improved the machinery for helping the ex-service man to get his claim properly adjudicated upon.

But still there is always the question of evidence. I think I can say that there come to my desk as many cases with regard to pensions as to the desk of any member of this House except the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King, Kootenay). The first thing I do is not to blame the pension board or the appeal board, but to get the record of the case and look at it myself to try and find where the hole is, to see what evidence is wanting and whether there is any possibility of getting it. Then I immediately write the man or his doctor to see if evidence cannot be given to show that during some particular period after his discharge and before his disability seems to have been recognized, the man was ailing, in order to show that the disability he now has can be related more or less continuously back to the time of his service. That is always the difficulty, and it is growing as the years go on. We are now ten years from the war, and there is no doubt that every year—and I do not blame the members of the medical profession—it is harder every year for them to certify that the particular disease or disability which now exists was incurred away back there. My theory is—and this is where the matter of administration comes in mostly—that if, taking all the evidence, it is shown to have been reasonably possible that the disability which is now being suffered could have been incurred during service, that constitutes a reasonable doubt in favour of the man and the pension should be awarded. Let me put it in other words, and I know my words are not binding on any judicial tribunal: Suppose I were on the pension board and with respect to a given case, having read the files and heard the evidence both ways, had said: "No pension." Then if when I went home at night and put on my slippers, as we all do these days having so much time on our hands, and sat before the fire and thought over that case and was seriously troubled as to whether after all that fellow was not entitled to a pension; if I had made a mistake, if I had a reasonable doubt that I had not done the right thing, that man it seems to me is entitled to a pension. I say you cannot put that in a statute—never; it is a matter for the tribunal which is administering the act. So I say that when we speak of the pressing need for legislation I am not so sure that any amendments will be found to be a cure for the cases which have been cited. But the commission said: "The board may err; they are only human, and the man ought to have a second chance," and so a federal appeal board was set up. The idea of that appeal board was this: We felt that the men sitting at Ottawa were too far away from the individuals concerned, that they did not get the personal touch. Many men, and perhaps some doctors, have not the ability to give a word picture of a case as it would be presented to the pension board if they saw the man face to face. There are some things in connection with pension evidence which depend almost wholly on the word of the man; he may be unable to give any corroboration; he may give a history of having been blown up by a shell when nobody was around at all. The board has then to put the test that is generally put by any jury: Does he look like a man who is telling the truth? Look him over and see how he is giving his evidence. What do his neighbours say about his reputation for telling the truth? Do not lay down a rule that there must be corroboration in every case, but decide it on the ordinary principles on which a jury decide a case. If you approach it in that spirit a great many of the difficulties may be solved. And so we said: We will provide appeal boards, and the form of appeal boards which passed this House was not the appeal board in the form in which it now appears in the statute. The appeal board this House approved was a series of district review boards; that is, the Dominion was divided into districts, and it was provided that these review boards would travel up and down and see the men face to face; the district review board would make its decision, and the case could then go to the federal board if the Board of Pension Commissioners or the applicant felt that the decision was wrong, the Federal Appeal Board could review it. A provision was inserted in the statute to the effect that the Federal Appeal Board could not reverse a favourable decision of the district review board unless they actually saw the man, unless he waived that privilege. But as I say, the legislation was not adopted in that form. Instead, a federal appeal board was set up, and that federal appeal board, which is the subject of the bill now before the House, has been travelling up and down this country and has given considerable relief in a large number of cases which were thought at least by the citizens at large to be meritorious, decisions being made which are favourable to the pensioner. That is an advance. That is an attempt to provide machinery which may take care of these things. If we sit here till doomsday we cannot decide these individual cases; we must entrust them to some machinery. My view of the subject, therefore, is that our efforts should be directed to making the machinery as complete and as smooth-working and as expeditious as possible.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I would ask the minister if the present pension legislation will permit through administrative means without statutory amendment, of the reopening of a man's case in the event of the discovery of new evidence?

Mr. RALSTON: No. My hon. friend will find in the bill of 1923, to which I have referred, that the legislation which passed this House on the recommendation of the commission provided that when new evidence was discovered sufficiently convincing in the opinion of the district review board a fresh appeal might be made, but that also did not become law. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House when the announcement was made that the minister has under his hand now, in connection with amendments to the procedure, an amendment which permits the very thing to which my hon. friend refers, and I understand that the minister will propose that amendment as soon as we get into committee. As I have said, in my humble opinion, that our efforts should be primarily devoted to making as efficient as possible the machinery for hearing these cases. While we may bring individual cases before the House by way of illustration, we cannot get very much further with them here.

I want to remind hon. gentlemen opposite that in past years a good deal of pension legislation has been enacted and many amendments have been made to the act. The amendments that are now being proposed, and others that may be put forward in the future, will not, I anticipate, affect the principle on which pensions are being awarded—the principle that the disability must be incurred during service in order to entitle a man to a pension. I will deal in a moment with cases where disability is not incurred during service and the soldier is sick and needs assistance.

Mr. McGIBBON: Before the minister leaves that point, does he not know that right in the country to-day there are thousands of cases that without a shadow of doubt are attributable to war service, but the disease cannot be attached to that service sufficiently to secure a pension?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend I hope, will not think I am coming back at him, but he belongs to the profession to which I refer, and I can only say that if there is not a shadow of doubt in those cases, and if the doctors will say so, that is all that is necessary to entitle the men to pensions.

Mr. McGIBBON: I beg to differ with the hon. minister. That is not the practice.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not mean my hon. friend or any individual doctor. The hypothetical case he put was that in which there was not a shadow of doubt that the disability was incurred during service. Then the pension board's medical advisers or any doctor who has the honour of his profession at heart will so certify.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not like to interrupt the minister but what I have in mind is this. There are to-day right in this country hundreds of cases of nervous breakdown, insanity, borderline cases, that every medical man who has had any experience at all is convinced are primarily due to war service; but you cannot get sufficient evidence to attach those cases to war service in order to entitle the men to pensions.

Mr. RALSTON: I am only saying that the evidence lies in the hands of the medical man. He has to decide, not the lawyers. If the medical man on his professional responsibility says that the disease, whatever it may be, is connected with war service, and traces it back there, I do not see why a pension is not granted. But my hon. friend gives me an opportunity that I was going to take later of dealing with the class of cases in which, let us say, there is a reasonable doubt, they cannot be proved beyond a shadow of doubt to be due to war service. I refer to the ex-soldier who has a breakdown. I am not saying what the policy of the government may be, but I anticipate that in this country there will be established soldier homes to take care of that sort of case. It is the only way you can deal with it. You cannot bring it under any pension legislation unless you can produce the certificate of the medical men or the evidence to which I referred.

Mr. McGIBBON: The medical men do not give the pensions; the pension board decide.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows that three out of the four members of the pension board are medical men.

Mr. McGIBBON: But they are not always guided by medical certificates.

Mr. RALSTON: I would not make a remark of that kind—

Mr. McGIBBON: I make it.

Mr. RALSTON: —about medical men. I know the chief medical adviser of the board very well, and I think he would be guided by the certificates of medical men. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that if he were sitting on a case as judge he would insist on some reasonable connection of the disability with war service. He would not be satisfied simply by a letter stating, "I certify John Jones' disability to-day is due to war service," without the medical man showing that at the time of discharge he had been ailing or had what was a continuous condition. My friend says "attributable to service". May I make this clear? I think hon. gentlemen understand it. I would say, let us get this "attributable to service" out of our minds. There is no necessity under the Pension Act to-day to prove that the disease is attributable to service. Service may not have had anything to do with it, but if the trouble began during service that is enough under the Pension Act.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in practice they put it the other way. I know many such cases.

Mr. HANSON: I am sure of it. That is my experience.

Mr. RALSTON: I can only speak out of my own experience, and I assure my friend and other hon. members that I have had many, many cases in which I could not show in any possible way or make any suggestion that the disability was due to service; it was sufficient so long as I proved that the trouble began before discharge.

Mr. BENNETT: That was attributable to service.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Sir EUGENE FISET: You must have received preferential treatment.

Mr. RALSTON: Now, in regard to legislation. It seems to me that 1923 was the beginning of pretty constructive pension legislation. In that year the appeal board was established and the soldier advisers appointed. It was suggested this afternoon that we had not had very much pension legislation. I want to remind the House that the case which was regarded by us as entitled to sympathetic treatment, namely, the widow who had received commutation of pension on remarriage, but had lost her second husband, was provided with a pension under the bill passed in 1924, and under the same measure payments to parents were readjusted on a more liberal basis. And this somewhat unusual provision was made. A man receiving 25 per cent for some disability might die, and his death might be due to something totally outside that disability. The provision I refer to is to the effect that payment is to be made to the widow pending investigation of that case to ascertain whether the death was the result of the service disability or not, because if so the widow would be entitled to a pension for life. In the same year a retroactive pension was provided when a reversal of the decision of the board had been made. Last, but not least, the meritorious clause, so-called, was passed. It was regarded by ex-service men generally as being a very important step. That clause was supposed to make the act more elastic, to use the words of the hon. leader of the opposition, to make it possible to consider cases which would not otherwise be entertained under the act. I understand that a small number of cases have been considered. As hon. gentlemen know, the meritorious clause has to be administered by a joint board consisting of the pension commissioners and the appeal board. I think in connection with that some consideration might be given to a matter of procedure which I have in mind in order to make it more effective.

Mr. LADNER: Has the minister the figures of that relief?

Mr. RALSTON: I understand there have been thirteen cases.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, eleven.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend from Vancouver thought that 1925 was a blank year in regard to pension legislation. He is wrong. During that year a good deal of pension legislation was enacted. For instance, there was an extension of the 80 per cent clause. It was provided that when a man has 80 per cent disability it does not make any difference what causes his death; whether he be killed by a street car or in any other accidental way, his dependents are entitled to a pension providing the death takes place ten years after discharge. Previously the period had been five years. Tuberculosis cases, which everyone has at heart, were dealt with. There are no cases which are more sympathetically viewed by the country than those of the tubercular men, and I think the Tubercular Veterans Association will agree that a long step forward was taken when it was provided that any man with tuberculosis, moderately advanced and clinically active, when discharged from the sanatarium, even though the tuberculosis might be arrested, should be entitled to 100 per cent pension to be continued for two years. That, I say, was a long step in advance. In the case of tubercular men who saw no service in a theatre of war the pension is 90 per cent. At the same session at which this provision was made another amendment was passed providing for the reopening of final payments. Provision was made for wear and tear allowance for clothing of amputation cases, namely an allowance of $54 for these men. Under that provision a good deal of money was paid out and was warmly welcomed by the returned soldiers. Pensions in connection with misconduct cases, particularly in relation to widows, received sympathetic consideration. Altogether, therefore, considerable progress was made in the session of 1925.

Hon. gentlemen will, I think, realize that some attempt has been made by the government and by this parliament to effect improvements in our pensions legislation. The proposals made at the present time, some of which are included in the memorandum submitted by the British Empire Service League, are largely of two classes: they extend the class of those to whom pensions are to be granted or they increase in some respect the amount of pensions to be paid. They do not change the principle upon which, generally speaking, pensions are given. I do not want to delay the House, but perhaps I may be permitted to refer very briefly to one or two matters as to which proposals have been made. For instance, a man may be receiving a pension on account of what is described as aggravation of disability due to service. Cases of aggravation apply generally only to such men as have not served in any theatre of war, except in one or two instances which I need not refer to. That is to say, any man who has served in a theatre of war is entitled to pension for the total degree of disability which he suffered at the time of discharge, notwithstanding the fact that some part of that disability may have existed before he enlisted. The theory is that if he was fit enough to be taken overseas for service he should be regarded as having been fit in every way, so that the pension should be granted for the full amount of disability from which he suffered on discharge. The provision contained in the proposals of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League is this, that where a man dies who has been pensioned for aggravation alone—where he has not served in any theatre of war—if it can be established that the aggravation of his disability in any way contributed to his death his widow is to be entitled to full pension.

It is also proposed that there should be no suspension of a man's pension without notice to the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. I do not think there is any need for legislation in that respect, because the department will be only too glad, I feel sure, to notify some service bureau in order that the necessary steps might be taken to present the man's case afresh before suspension of pension finally takes place.

Another matter is the consideration of the pension as part of the ex-soldier's estate. The proposal was made that any portion of a pension unpaid was to form part of the pensioner's estate if he made a will. The suggestion of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League is that, even where there is no will, such unpaid portion of pension should be regarded as part of the estate to be administered by the Board of Pension Commissioners. A further subject of interest relates to children who are suffering from physical infirmity and who receive an allowance. According to the act the only children who may receive any allowance by reason of physical infirmity are those whose infirmity was incurred before the age of twenty-one. The proposal is, as I understand it, that if the son of a soldier killed overseas becomes infirm and is incapacitated from earning a living, even though he may be over twenty-one, he shall be entitled to a pension on account of his father's death. Still another proposal is to make the pension more retroactive; it is thought that the payments should be extended further back.

A vexed question which has been discussed in the House on two or three occasions is the position of the widow of the soldier who dies after discharge from the service, and who was married "after the appearance" of disability, to quote the words of the act. A great deal of difficulty arises in connection with the consideration of these words "after the appearance of disability." On two or three occasions an amendment has been passed here, but it has never become law.

I might mention now what is perhaps a peculiar case. As hon. members may probably know, a woman who has been cohabiting with a man as his common law wife is entitled to a pension; but strangely enough, under the act, if the union was subsequently made legal there may be a danger, in the event of her husband's death, of the pension being disallowed. To remove that anomaly a proposal has been submitted.

All these cases I have cited, it will be realized, are but samples, so to speak; they do not touch the cases brought forward in this chamber to-day. Upon some of them the House has expressed its opinion before, while many of them are new. Now, the question to be considered by the government or by anyone responsible for the administration of affairs is, what are meritorious cases and what are not? For example, my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) to-day suggested that this country should assume the responsbility for the burial and medical attendance expenses of the wives and dependents of ex-soldiers. That is a pretty large responsibility. To me it is altogether new. The question in this instance is: would it be better to make such a provision as the hon. member suggests, and leave other cases unprovided for; or, on the other hand, endeavour to make a wider distribution of the benefits to be conferred? These are questions to be carefully considered. The minister has altogether about 200 suggestions looking to the improvement of our pensions legislation and the administration of the act, and I feel, speaking frankly as an ex-service man, that I may safely say that the government is trying its utmost to do justice by the returned soldiers. I do not think I need to express my sympathy with the returned soldiers or tell the House that I am endeavouring in every way I can to see to it that the honourable obligations of the country to the ex-service men are carried out. It is in the interests of the returned men and of the country as well that just and proper consideration should be given to all these proposals regarding the consolidation of the Pension Act, so that next year they may be submitted to a special committee of the House and thoroughly investigated with the result as suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), of a revised Pension act being enacted if need be. I think, however, it will be found that the Pension Act as we have it is drafted along the proper lines. It may be encumbered with amendments and possibly can be simplified, but it seems to me that we should study these proposals and in the light of mature consideration see just what new principles should be embodied in the act.

Mr. MILLAR: Is there any remedy or relief possible through the administration of the present act, or will there be any relief under the proposed amendments, to such a typical case as the one I am about to cite? I have on my desk several letters, but I may refer to this one in particular because, as I say, the case is typical. I want to read three or four lines from this letter. This is from a returned soldier who has a 25 per cent disability. He says:

> It's up to the government to help me out. . . if I can't get government help, I must grin and bear it.

He then refers to the cost of their relief to some one, the municipality or the government, in any case, and goes on to say:

> I alone cost the government $100 every winter in relief. That's why I'm fighting for a job. I don't want it—

That is, the relief.

> I want work.

Further down in the same letter he says:

I can in summer keep my head up, but in winter it drops. What a glorification in fighting for one's country.

Perhaps we should not blame him for being bitter.

I lost my money in the Home bank, still have $320 to come. . . Robbed of what I had, discharged a 25 per cent disability man. . . .

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman might better wait until the bill is in committee before putting such a long question.

Mr. MILLAR: I was almost finished. This man being in receipt of a very small pension, is there any provision under the present act or the proposed legislation for the relief of such cases?

Mr. RALSTON: The only relief would be by way of administration in connection with the provision of employment; that is all I can see in the case. As my hon. friend knows, a superpreference has been given to wounded ex-service men and a preference to ex-service men not wounded, under the Civil Service Act. I might also say that in connection with the employment, and as his correspondent suggests in connection with relief, a man who has a pension and who is partly disabled is entitled to consideration. These are cases we all come in contact with; they are not unusual at all. They are the cases which, if the country had plenty of work, would occupy jobs running elevators and doing things of that kind. In that way these men could be absorbed, but that is not the case in Canada at present. We always have the difficulty of men who, having the amonut of their disability theoretically at least made up by the contribution of the country, still find themselves because of their handicap not in a good position to compete in the labour market.

I do not want to detain the House any longer; I only wish to repeat that I do feel this to be in the interest of ex-service men, whom I know to be very reasonable. I have met them from the Atlantic to the Pacific in the closest possible way, and I have found that when you meet them face to face and deal with their cases straightforwardly you can get the most frank expression from them, and can give them the same kind of consideration. They were and are as reasonable as anyone could expect, and the difficulty about this thing is the mystery sometimes thrown around it, as I have said, by reason of the fact that they are so far away from the tribunal which decides their cases. Naturally this is a matter in which I have an intense personal interest and it is hardly necessary for me to say as a member of this government that I know my colleagues are in hearty sympathy with the object we all have in view, and that every endeavour will be made to put this matter in the best possible shape for further action. That will apply to these proposals and others which have been made by different people; they will be given the most careful and thorough study, and the close attention which the importance of the subjects demands.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John-Albert): The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has made a very clear statement, and I am disposed to agree with a great deal of what he has said. There are two factors in the matter of pensions, the provisions of the act on the one hand and its interpretation and administration on the other, and I believe much misapprehension has arisen through the failure fully to appreciate the importance of both these elements. The Pension Act requires amendment, which is only natural; there is no finality to an act of this character. Pension matters are of great difficulty, and contain many abstruse points; an act of this kind naturally lacks the precision of others, because of the fact that it has to do with human disability. Therefore we must expect amendments from time to time, but however near we approach perfection the act will materially fail unless its interpretation and administration are as efficient as we can hope for.

It is a matter of common experience that a man will make an application time and time again, but his pension will be refused; finally, after a very considerable time, and after much perseverance, he is allowed a pension. Why is that? In the meantime there has been no change in the act or in the requirements, and there may be little or no new evidence presented. I think that is a point which requires the attention of the minister; he should look carefully into the administration of the act, because it will not succeed until it receives the support and proper interpretation of the pension commissioners. I have many times seen the results of the excellent work done by the Canadian Legion; they have assisted men in obtaining their pensions after long periods and after much laborious effort, but I would ask the minister why that should be necessary. I think the attitude of the pension board should be to assist men to put a claim through, rather than to make them fight for it, to decline their applications on a number of occasions and finally grant them on practically the same evidence. Again I suggest to the minister that he might well study the administration of this act and see if great improvement cannot be effected there. I cannot understand why men should go on being refused for many months, and finally receive their pensions. I recognize the difficulties; I realize that there may be some additional evidence presented, but in many cases I fail to see where any further evidence has been brought forward; apparently there has simply been a change of opinion on the part of the board. I do not think this is fair to the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King, Kootenay) and to this House, and that is the attitude we should take with regard to pensions. I think it the only correct view, because so far as this House can do so it has paid due attention to the subject of pensions and has made proper provision for the returned men.

We have had this act gone over both by special committees of the House and by a royal commission. We have had prolonged debates in this House and we have not succeeded in satisfying the many claims presented. No doubt the act has been imperfect. We should have a more perfect act, but unless there is a more reasonable attitude on the part of those who have to deal with pensions we can hardly make the progress that we otherwise would.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): The address of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) was listened to with a great deal of interest by all members identified with this very important matter, and I am satisfied that if the spirit and sympathy which he exhibited had been behind the attitude of the present pension commissioners there would have been no need of a federal appeal board such as we have to-day. But the minister evidently failed to grasp the question that was raised this afternoon. The claim was made very specifically that the question was one of administration, and the specific cases cited bore out the claim. For that reason the matter was brought up here. In raising the question we naturally incur the charge of criticizing the present Board of Pension Commissioners. Now for years, at any rate as long as I have been a member of this House, we have had criticism of the board and of the administration of the act from year to year. The address delivered by the minister to-night proves the usefulness of the work of the committees which were appointed from year to year. Those committees went through all the suggestions brought forward and winnowed out those which would be of the greatest importance to the ex-service man and at the same time satisfactory to the country which was granting him relief. The prevailing dissatisfaction, I believe, is due to the fact that this procedure has not been followed during the last year or two; and if there is no criticism offered on the floor of the House how can complaints come before this administrative body, before the minister, or before those interested? The putting the Board of Pension Commissioners on a high level elevates them above the gods of mythology who lived on Olympus. Even they, gifted with wings, came down from time to time to look after the affairs of men, to mix and mingle with them and to help them, but to-day it would seem that these gods on Olympus, in the persons of the pension commissioners, cannot and will not come down from their height and we cannot get near them. I do not think the House or the country or the ex-service men will accept that position. Therefore we must persist in a certain amount of criticism which will give the minister some idea as to how matters stand, regardless of what he receives from the departmental officials or from communications addressed to him. I hold, therefore, that the House is functioning in a proper way if hon. members deal critically with this matter, taking care always to give due consideration to the country's side of the case. I make that contention for several reasons. Every court, as far as I know, recognizes the right of appeal, and only a few years ago the ex-service men were given such a right. Before I conclude, however, I hope to show that the soldiers' right of appeal has been interfered with considerably. Every citizen has the right to petition this House and have his case considered regardless of whether or not there is a commission dealing with the matter. This House is the highest court to which any person in Canada can appeal. It is the creator of any commission that may be functioning, and as such is surely in a position to rectify or reconstruct where such a course is necessary. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) this afternoon took the opposite view. He claimed that what I am contending for is not proper; that although he had been approached by a great many people with grievances, he had not indulged in criticism of the board. I think he censured them more severely than any member who has yet spoken on this question because he charged them with a lack of common sense in some instances of which he knew, and as far as I am aware no other member went to that extent. Nevertheless, in spite of the grounds for complaint which the hon. member had, he refused to criticize the board. I consider that the interests of the returned men are far more important, and should be to all members of this House, than any question of criticism of any commission, no matter how lofty the Olympus may be upon which it resides.

Now what did the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) do this afternoon? I should like to return to that point because it is a subject of this discussion. What crime has he committed for which he should be censured as the hon. member for Quebec South censured him this afternoon? He simply brought to the attention of the minister and of the members of the House the treatment extended in a certain case. I desire to take up, point by point, his presentation of the case. He claimed the right as a representative of the ex-service men to plead the case of such applicants before the board. Surely no member of this House would refuse that right, or would say that the ex-soldier, in addition to the official representative, should not come before the board. In the next place he claimed the right, as representing the citizen in this House, to plead a deserving case before the body body appointed by this parliament to consider it. Does any member of this House refuse that right to him? Further, as a representative of the citizen he claimed the right to make use of the file which constitutes the applicant's record, a right which he claimed was denied him. That is a matter of administration, as the hon. member himself argued, and not of legislation. He claimed here that at first he had not been granted access to that particular file; that it was refused to him. I cannot understand why that was done, because I have had dealings with three or four ministers and with the officials of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and in every instance I have been given the use of the file to present the applicant's case or to get the necessary facts from it. That file is not so sacred or so secret as is claimed. It deals with the man's military service and he has to depend upon it for a statement of his case. I do not know why a file should be refused to any member of this House who is endeavouring to assist the ex-service man.

The hon. member for Burrard further claimed that the minister should take a personal interest in this particular case. I do not know why the minister would refuse to do that. No minister refused to do it in any case I was identified with, and I have secured pensions for men by insisting that the minister should see the man, with a representative of the department, in my presence. If I could not prove that the man had a disability I would have paid his expenses. In every case in which I took that stand I must say that I received satisfaction. Now these are the four claims that the hon. member for Burrard brought forward, and every one of them is a claim that any member should have the right to take up.

Coming to the question which precipitated the discussion, that of the claims of the ex-service men, the minister knows as well as I do that the legislation placed upon the statute books does not meet all the cases calling for treatment. In two instances at least recommendations made by the pensions committee were not, so far as I could find, given effect to by legislation. Moreover, the minister or the department should know that there were accepted by that committee and by representatives of the ex-service men certain recommendations which for a year at least were not placed in the regulations and which, when they were placed there, were inserted in a different form from that which the committee had recommended. That should not be done; the recommendations of the committee should have been accepted or rejected. Every member of that committee left thinking that these recommendations had been accepted by representatives of the pension board and of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and by the ex-service men or their organizations.

The minister knows further that there are in the act to-day sections which are seriously interfering with the rights of ex-service men. I base my strong criticism of the department in their administration of this act on the fact that they know there are certain sections which are interfering with the man in his claim. Let me give one instance. The department has had inserted in the act a section which deprives the man of any right to a disability if, during his treatment or hospitalization, he has suffered a disability. If that man undergoes an operation, he cannot claim a disability. There are two or three striking things that I think the minister knows or his department or the board know. They know that operations have been performed where the men have suffered as a result of them and yet have not been allowed a disability. If the department want to do the fair thing, they should withdraw that section. The Board of Pension Commissioners have at the present time more than one case where a man has suffered as a result of an operation.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Was the operation for a war disability?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Yes. When an operation is performed for something, such as appendicitis, that is not a war disability, I do not think the department should at this time assume responsibility for it. There is no reason for retaining that section. The particular case to which I refer is where a man was being hospitalized for varicose veins and I believe by mistake they operated on his feet. As a result the man has not walked since. It is quite true that they say they found out later that the man had a venereal disease. The board had all the evidence before them at the time and they were the only ones who knew he had it, but in spite of that they operated on him. I believe that section should be struck out of the act and that in such a case the man should be given a fair show.

The Minister of National Defence stated that at the time the appeal board was created it was not an appeal board that was first suggested. We know that, but at the same time we know that the appeal board to-day, which has done some good work, is being hindered in its activities by one or two things. The Federal Appeal Board cannot change the diagnosis as set down by the Board of Pension Commissioners. In one case we forced them to withdraw that diagnosis. It is a serious mistake that the appeal board has not the power to change the diagnosis, because upon that diagnosis will often depend the question whether or not a man is eligible for pension. The Federal Appeal Board cannot act in that case and it cannot change the percentage. These are matters of legislation which can be remedied.

Mention has been made to-night of the tuberculosis condition. The department are aware that they have advisers who have no sympathy as regards the effect of gas upon the ex-service man. Dozens and dozens of these cases have come under my observation, and in bringing these cases to the attention of parliament I want to be a little personal. After the conclusion of the war I was offered a position on the pension board. I refused because I believe that after my four years' service and experience in charge of medical work at the front I could be of more use to the returned man off the board than on it. I have done my best to show this House that the cases which come up for consideration will be with us until the last days of the last man who served in the war. There seems to be an idea that these cases should be wiped out. The war was a most peculiar one. The weapons employed in it had effects upon the human system that the medical profession had not had to deal with before, and the result is that there are going to arise in men conditions that would not be considered in former wars but which must be considered in connection with this war. For years I have pointed out that there must be a sympathetic attitude, a new relation of the medical man to the ex-service man, and that only those who have had service at the front can be in a sympathetic relation towards the returned soldier because they have the knowledge and experience in regard to these cases.

There is no question that gas has left effects upon the men. Those who were at the second battle of Ypres will remember that when men who came back affected by gas attempted to return to the front, they dropped dead on the way owing to the condition of their hearts and lungs. I have found all over this country men suffering from the effects of gas. If you have a medical adviser who has never seen the effects of gas and who is constantly non-sympathetic in regard to it, the ex-service man is going to suffer. The board have advisers of that character and on that account the men cannot get sympathetic treatment. I feel that my experience and relations with the ex-service men at the front have put me into a better position than that of others who have not the same experience to deal with some of these cases. I believe, as the Minister of National Defence has said, that the whole secret of this act lies in administration and sympathy. The sections of the act and the regulations must, of course, be followed, but unless you have that sympathy you will not make much headway.

The minister and several other members this evening have referred to the sections that have been struck out of the act or changed in the other chamber. Why can we not reinsert these and send them up to the other House every year until we get satisfaction along these lines? The Minister of National Defence referred to the fact that it was easy to connect disability with service. He took the stand to-day—and I think if that were accepted it would help a great deal—that if the disability occurred during service the man was entitled to a pension. I would refer him to the case already mentioned where a hemorrhage occurred on service, and yet the man was not granted any pension or consideration. I believe that the minister is giving perhaps a little more attention now to what is being said; at one time he was paying very little attention. The matters I have brought before him, I think he will agree are all of a constructive nature, and if the old system of having the committee appointed every year is renewed it will relieve the minister of responsibility. If every year is too often, let it meet once in two years. That would enable the members to bring before the proper tribunal cases which they feel are deserving. As to any legislative changes that I have suggested, all the minister has to do is to bring them before the House, and I can assure him that they will be readily accepted by this House in the interests of the ex-service men.

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take just a few moments, not because I do not think this subject is worthy of a longer time, but because everything has been well said already.

I would like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) for the very clear way in which he has presented this question, on which he is an expert. I must confess to being a little bit sorry that perhaps from both sides of the House things have been said which seem to have a little partisan ring to them. I have no sympathy with any partisanship in this House, no matter on which side it is, on a question of this kind. This is too vital a matter for partisanship.

I want to say another thing. When it comes to a question of the soldier or the treasury, my sympathy is entirely with the soldier. I believe that the Minister of National Defence has given us the real reason for the difficulty in this whole matter. I believe that if we had a little more sympathetic consideration by the board, a great many of these difficulties would be removed. I had occasion a few days ago to visit the board, and I made this statement, that I did not believe there was one member in the House on either side who wanted the board to interpret this act in any other than a broad and generous spirit, and not in a technical way at all. I want to state in that connection something which may reflect on the pension board or on the board of appeal, or on both; I am not concerned which.

There was a man in my riding who had a difficulty prior to enlistment. That difficulty was the occasion of an operation after enlistment during the time he was on service. Now he applies for a pension. I may say that his condition was hammer toes, one on either foot. His toes, I suppose, are all right, but on the bottom of each foot he has very large callouses, so large and bad that he gets around with very great difficulty. The pension board refused him a pension. He then went to the board of appeal, and they decided his case favourably. The case then went back to the pension board for action, and they took the position that because there was no medical category to which the board of appeal could refer that case, they could not act. It seemed to me the difference was the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. I do not believe the man knows really what is the cause of his trouble. All he knows is that he has trouble with his feet, that it is very difficult for him to walk, and while these two boards are arguing where the authority really lies, this man is suffering. I said to them this: In a case of that character you should, in my humble judgment, give the benefit of the doubt to the returned man and see that he gets relief. If we interpret the act in that way, we would not have as much difficulty as we have.

I want to be fair to the board. I have taken many cases before them, and I have received a great deal of sympathetic consideration. We must recognize this fact, that there are many applications for pension, there are two sides to every question, and when a man is turned down he naturally feels aggrieved.

This is not the place to cite cases, but there is one other I might mention. It is that of a farmer—I am not talking for political friends—a well, strong, husky man, a farmer before he went overseas. During his service some rash broke out on his body. I believe they call it eczema, and although I am a medical man I am not quite sure yet just what eczema is. This rash breaks out from time to time. Unfortunately the man does on occasion take a little alcoholic beverage, and he is worse after that. Apparently the pension board is going to insist that this man become a prohibitionist to see if the disease will not clear up under that cure. I do not believe that we should go to the extent of requiring a man to become a prohibitionist, no matter how good that might be. This man is suffering very much; he is a charge upon his friends, yet in spite of all he can do and all his friends can do, he cannot get a pension.

I want to compliment the Minister of National Defence on the very sane and logical viewpoint that he took. If the board will take every case into their sympathetic consideration and interpret the act in a broad and generous spirit rather than concern themselves with technicalities, many of our difficulties will be removed.

I am glad that the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King, Kootenay) is moving some amendments. In some cases that have come before me the difficulty seems to be the length of time provided in the statute during which the soldier may apply for pension. I understand the minister is going to extend the time for two years. May I say to him that if he chooses to do away with the time limit altogether so that a man suffering from a disability due to war service will get a pension, I would be very happy to support him and go the whole limit. It may have been a good thing, up to the present, to have some time limit but I think the time has now arrived when we can give fair and just consideration to all cases irrespective of time limits.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): I shall speak for but a moment, but I wish to refer to certain observations which fell from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I thank the minister for his knowledge of the subject and for the information which he imparted to the House. I think, however, that when he reads in Hansard what he has stated he will find that he has left us with a contradiction, and it is this: He said: I find no fault with the pension board; I find no fault with the Federal Appeal Board; the law is there; they administer it. Later on he said: The difficulty is not one of legislation so much as of administration. Now if the pension board are required to administer the law as they find it, and if there is no fault to be found with their administration, we are driven irresistibly to the conclusion that the real fault is in the legislation.

The minister went on to say, in effect, that you could not legislate sympathy into this act. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that that is just what can be done. I think that discretion can be left to the pension board. You can have regulations, if you like, not cast-iron regulations which they are bound to follow, but well-defined regulations which they will be at liberty to break through if they feel the case warrants it.

Living as I do in a populous district where there are many ex-service men, numerous complaints reach me. Every member no doubt is approached by many returned soldiers who have a real grievance, and the human heart goes out to these men, especially when convinced in his own mind that the justice of the case is with them. In several cases I have been firmly of the opinion that pensions should have been granted. Suppose the man did not get it, there would be hearing after hearing of his application, but no relief would be forthcoming. If the applicant persevered, as happened in several cases, the board yielded and a pension was granted. Then the idea would go abroad: Oh, it is easy for one man to get relief upon his application, but the other man must fight his way through the woods until finally he takes this fortress as he took positions against the enemy. That should not be the case. I support my leader in this respect. I do think that the act should be generously amended, and I suggest that the Minister of Solders' Civil Re-establishment and the Minister of National Defence retire, and although the time is short before to-morrow, I am confident the two of them could bring in amendments which would satisfy the ex-service men and the country, and would give us at this session the best workable act possible. I conclude from the statement of the minister that we are to have amendments. That notice came late; but better late than never.

Now, with this notice before us, that in committee we are going to consider amendments to this act, I request the government to make those amendments generous so that they will meet every real case that the Minister of National Defence thinks exists at the present time. I am confident if that is done the returned soldiers will be satisfied and the country will be satisfied. There is a duty resting upon us to be absolutely fair to these men. I believe the one thought that animates every member of this House is to be sure that we do not fail to recognize any claim that can possibly be adjusted.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I only rise to second what the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) has just said, in urging upon the government the necessity of making these very much needed amendments to the Pension Act before the close of the session. There is still time enough to do so. I am sure that anyone listening to the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to-night could not but be impressed with his wide knowledge of the subject under discussion and be forced to the conclusion that in his opinion, as in the opinion of many members of this House, in fact of all members who have studied the question at all, the Pension Act needs amendment, and needs it immediately; and further, that there might be an improvement in the administration of the Pension Act.

The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) began the discussion this afternoon. I have acted with him on all the committees for the past seven years that have had to do with legislation relating to returned soldiers, and I know that he has been ready and willing to give every consideration to the findings and administration of the pension board. That has been his attitude in opposition to a very strong feeling on the part of some members of those successive committees, which amounted in fact to animosity and open antagonism to the personnel of the board. Feeling as I know he has felt all along towards the pension board, I can only conclude that he is fully seized of the justice of the case that he presented to the House this afternoon, and that it must have been under great provocation that he felt bound to present that individual case to the House. I would urge the minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Board of Pension Commissioners to give that case further consideration and not to let any mere personal difference, if any exists, between the hon. member for Burrard and any member of the Board of Pension Commissioners to stand in the way of doing justice in that and other cases. I think the Board of Pension Commissioners would do well to take a hint from the remarks made to-night by the Minister of National Defence in regard to their administration of the act. It is surely an intimation to them of how the government wishes them to administer the act and to consider the various cases that come before them.

I am bound to say that my experience in bringing cases to the notice of the board has not been just what some other members have detailed to-night. I have not always agreed with the board, we have had many differences of opinion, but I have always found them ready to give fair consideration to every case. True, it has taken years in several cases to get them to grant the prayer of the petitioner, but their change of attitude in every case has been due to my adducing some additional evidence which brought the case within the four walls of the Pension Act. One case had gone to the board of appeal and I was asked by the petitioner to present it there. In going through the record and on questioning the petitioner I discovered some very important evidence had not been brought to the attention of the pension commissioners at all. Without pressing the appeal I applied to the pension commissioners to reopen the case and let in this further evidence. They did so immediately and upon that evidence granted the prayer of the petitioner and awarded pension.

I do not propose to cite individual and personal cases. I agree with the Minister of National Defence that to some extent what is required is a broader administration of the act, but I also think that the act should be amended in certain particulars.

Mr. RALSTON: Does not the hon. gentleman think that the amendments which the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment has announced, and to which I referred, providing for a second appeal in cases of newly discovered evidence, will take care of a great number of cases? Does he not think that that perhaps is the most vital legislation outside of removing the bar to extending the time of application?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Perhaps it is, but so far as the application for a pension is concerned I think there should be no time limit. I think the right to a pension is a continuing right. That right may not be established for ten years when the limit is nine. I do not think the applicant should be shut out by any time limit. In my view every case should be dealt with by the board on its merits as it arises and should not be hampered by any time limit. As a matter of fact I think the government last session and again this session should have appointed a committee of the House to deal with pension legislation affecting returned soldiers and their dependents, and having failed to do so, it being their policy apparently, the government should have prepared the necessary legislation without the assistance of a committee of the House. They are well equipped to prepare that legislation without any assistance from private members, for they have the Board of Pension Commissioners, they have the appeal board, they have the Department of National Defence, they have the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment with all their experienced and well-qualified staff to advise them, and I am sure that every member of the staff would be willing to devote his best abilities to that work.

Now, in addition to any suggestions that private members might make as to legislation, the government has before it, as has every member of the House, no less than thirty-eight amendments suggested by the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. These amendments have been put forward after careful consideration and discussion by men well qualified to deal with such matters. Following the suggestion made by the hon. member for East Toronto, I would suggest that the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and a small select committee take the matter under consideration even at this late stage of the session and endeavour to bring in additional legislation to alleviate the hardships now being suffered by some of our ex-service men. I do not think any member of this House would begrudge the time necessary to enact such legislation, even though it should necessitate the continuation of this session for a number of days.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (West Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a word more directly in connection with the amendment proposed in Bill No. 234. It is to be regretted that there is not a single amendment offered as a result of the Winnipeg convention and the suggestions placed before the minister. What he offers is merely for the purpose of changing the numerical complexion of the appeal board. It seems to me that at least one of the several amendments suggested by the service bureau of the Canadian Legion might be considered in connection with the amendments to this bill. Take for instance the Soldiers Insurance Act. There is not a member of this House who has not received telegrams and letters urging that the Soldiers Insurance Act be continued. It would not require a new administrative staff inasmuch as that division of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is already functioning. The staff is at present engaged in the payment of claims and the collection of premiums. It would seem from the reports that during the past year the soldiers' insurance division of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment paid 221 claims and collected premiums amounting to about $1,000,000. It has about $4,250,000 on hand, it has 26,000 policies in force and about $59,000,000 worth of insurance. All that is required is an amendment to the bill to continue that insurance machinery in operation.

I want to say a word about this amendment, the purpose of which it is difficult to understand. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in the statement that the act provides that the board shall be composed of not fewer than five and not more than seven members. The minister by his amendment asks for authority to reduce that number; he wants to provide for a board consisting of not fewer than three and not more than seven. One wonders just what this appeal board does. Take the report submitted by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. It contains sixty pages and there is not a full line in the whole document relating to the activities of the Federal Appeal Board. Every branch of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is dealt with in detail; all the accounts of the innumerable activities of the department are set forth; but when it comes to the Federal Appeal Board mention is made of it in only three instances. In one case there is mention of $150,000 for the purpose of the board; in another case there is a reference to $31,000 for salaries for the appeal board; and there is another mention of $6,000 also for salaries. But there is not one solitary reference to anything the appeal board has done or where it has held its sittings; no mention is made of its activities. There are two pages in the report giving a table of contents, and you cannot find in that table any reference to the Federal Appeal Board. One wonders therefore, I say, what the board has accomplished. This board is supposed to conduct its activities in every part of the Dominion and in order to facilitate the work the Dominion is divided into eight units. There is one for Quebec, one for the maritimes, one for eastern Ontario, one for central and western Ontario, and there are four for the four western provinces. I should like to have the minister make it clear what his object is in wishing to reduce the membership of the Federal Appeal Board. Certainly it cannot be for the purpose of facilitating the disposal of the applications of men who have not had their pensions granted by the pensions board. We must naturally assume that when an appeal is taken to the Federal Appeal Board the case is a deserving one. Now what is the situation? There are eight units in which this appeal board is supposed to carry on its investigations, and in every one of these units the appeals to-day are precisely one year behind. I can cite one unit in which last year there were 1,400 appeals, of which number fifty were disposed of. If therefore there are no new appeals to be added to the list, it will take just twenty-seven years to dispose of the appeals that are before that one unit.

Mr. RALSTON: What unit is that?

Mr. ESLING: Montreal. In view of that fact is there any common sense in the minister presenting such an amendment as this? When the bill comes before the committee I intend to offer an amendment to provide that the Federal Appeal Board shall consist of nine members so that it may function in quorums of three each and in that way carry on its operations throughout the Dominion with some hope of disposing of some of the applications before the poor fellows pass away.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise to put on record some statements in answer to the observations of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). There is no finality to this question, nor will there be any, and the sooner parliament and the country realize that fact the sooner we shall get some legislation passed which will be satisfactory to returned soldiers. According to the answer the minister made me, it is easy for anyone to get a pension. All that is necessary is for some doctor to certify to the ex-soldier's disability having been caused by the war, and the pension is granted.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not say "some doctor"; I said the medical adviser to the pensions board.

Mr. McGIBBON: That restricts it very much. It leaves it to one or two men who happen to be on the board.

Mr. RALSTON: I assume that they are honest men. If they are not they should be removed and replaced by others in whom the country can have confidence.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not referring to the medical men on the pensions board; I am not discussing them. I am referring to the difficulty ex-soldiers experience in getting pensions. It has been the experience of every medical man after presenting evidence to the board to have it turned down without due consideration. The minister was right in the statement that the whole thing resolved itself largely into a question of administration and sympathy. Sympathy is the thing which is largely wanting. I know that the members of the board are first-rate men, but like everyone else who has spoken, I think they consider themselves a body which should protect the treasury of Canada. That seems to be the outstanding consideration to them, rather than that of seeing that justice is done the men who have served overseas.

As I said a few moments ago, there is no getting away from the fact that we have arising to-day upon the medical horizon diseases and conditions which were never known before. For example, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) referred to the gas attacks. We have to-day, arising in the lungs, and the minister will bear me out in this, conditions of primary carcinoma which was practically unknown before, and nearly all of such cases which have come under my knowledge have been cases of soldiers who went through gas attacks. The plain assumption is that the irritation of the gas—because irritation is one of the great causes of cancer—has been the primary cause of the later developing carcinoma. We cannot prove it; we would not expect a medical man on any board to say that we could prove it, but it is common sense to make that deduction. Every man is more or less gifted with that quality, and when he sees certain conditions following certain causes, common sense connects them up. For instance, if you see a wreck on the shore you naturally conclude that there has been a storm. We have other diseases of the lungs which we did not know before; we have mental diseases and nervous diseases which we can hardly classify. I think the best diagnosis I ever heard made was given by a witness before the pension committee, when he said the patient was like a battery which was discharged. It is hard to put a name to a condition of that kind; you cannot do it, but at the same time every medical man and every other man will admit that there are a lot of those men who have had something taken out of them through their service which cannot be put back; they are like batteries which cannot be recharged. Then you go on to the border line of diseases of insanity. Look at the wave of crime sweeping over the country, and see how often the criminals are ex-service men. Go a little further, and see how our asylums are being filled up; see how men eight or ten years after the war are breaking down and going insane when there has never before been any evidence of insanity in their family history. These are new conditions which I claim are attributable to war service; I admit that you cannot connect them up and you cannot say they are absolutely due to war service, as the minister asks. You cannot prove it because it is something new in the realm of medicine, but the day is coming when it will be recognized as a fact. There is a whole list of new diseases and conditions which are rising on the medical horizon which are no doubt due to war service. These people are not getting pensions; they are disabled; something has been taken out of them which cannot be replaced, and the day is coming when that fact will be recognized. That is the reason I say there is no finality to questions of this kind. These questions are not easy; I sympathize with the minister and with the Board of Pension Commissioners, because it is a very difficult matter and I believe it will become more difficult to administer this law with justice to the applicants and justice to the state as the years go by.

Before I leave that point, let me remind the minister about his appeal board. I have no objection to his reducing it and I would have no objection if he wiped it out, as I think it has been useless. It has had no power, and any court without power is certainly quite useless. The appeal board, for instance, cannot change the diagnosis of any case in which appeal is taken from the judgment of the Board of Pension Commissioners. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) made a statement which I could hardly believe to be correct; I have asked him since, and he tells me he knows it to be right. I refer to his remark that the appeal board has no power to increase a pension. Is that correct?

Mr. RALSTON: They have no power to increase a pension.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then what power have they? The two main functions of the pension commissioners are to find out what is wrong with the man and his percentage of disability, but the appeal board can do nothing with either question. For heaven's sake what can they do; what were they supposed to do?

Mr. RALSTON: Ask the people who restricted their powers.

Mr. McGIBBON: What I am pleading for, as I pleaded the other night, is that the minister should remove those restrictions in order to make this board function and be of some use to the country and to the soldiers. I think that is a vital point; we have a board which can neither determine the diagnosis nor the amount of pension to be paid, so it would seem to be useless.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend uses the word "determine"; he does not mean that. I think he means "change", as he said before.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is the same thing. They might be convinced that the primary board were wrong in their diagnosis and that the man had something else wrong, but they cannot change the diagnosis. They might determine that the man was receiving a pension that was too small, but they cannot increase it. For heaven's sake, what good are they? I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, what good a board of that kind is; I would wipe it out if I could not remove those restrictions, because it is only deceiving applicants for a pension.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think my hon. friend would wipe it out.

Mr. McGIBBON: No; I would wipe out those restrictions and make it alive and part of the institution so that it could function.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

I would like to say just one word about the insurance question, because I think perhaps I did more to bring that act into force than any other member of that parliament. I claim that that act is supplementary to the Pension Act. Supposing a man comes back from the war crippled, and contracts some disease; he cannot pass a medical examination but is anxious to protect his family. What are you going to do with that man; how is he going to provide for his wife and children? I would be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to see that act cease to function, because I think it is complementary to the Pension Act, and is an absolute necessity if we would do justice to these pensioners. I seriously hope that the minister will not allow that act to die, and I also hope he will remove the restrictions which prevent the appeal board from being useful.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, we all listened with a great deal of interest and sympathy to the remarks made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston); I think we all realize that probably no man in this House gave as much consideration, attention and constructive effort to the act as did the minister. He said that he thought the failure was more administrative than legislative; well, hardship has occurred somewhere, and it may be that the administration has broken down. If so, that should be changed.

I fancy my experience does not differ very much from that of other members of this House. More than half the correspondence I receive from my constituents has to do with cases of this kind, and there is a feeling in the country—I am not blaming the government, I am not blaming the minister—that the situation is one that should be dealt with by parliament. Unfortunately it is not being dealt with, or if it is, only to a very limited extent. Now I think that is regrettable, and parliament should not prorogue without some effort being made by constructive legislation to meet a situation which is causing a very great deal of disquiet in the country. That there is disquiet there can be no possible doubt. The fact is brought home to me daily, or at least weekly, by the correspondence I receive; and on occasions when I have returned home I have been approached time and again, in the country and in the towns by men and by their relations seeking to have grievances redressed. I tell the minister, as well as the government and parliament, that a feeling is being aroused which should not exist in this country, and something effective should be done at once to allay that feeling.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): In common with most members of the House, I suppose, I have received telegrams from the Canadian Legion suggesting that I remain in my place here long enough to enable the government to deal with those amendments to the Pension Act which in the opinion of the service men are so essential to their well-being; and the suggestion I have to make, after listening to the very luminous observations of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is that he and the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King, Kootenay) take a day and frame such amendments as they think may reasonably meet the situation for the year, and put them in as amendments to the present bill. I do not think that is asking too much, and it would do a great deal to calm—I will not use quite as strong a word as agitation—to calm the feelings of those who have considered this matter with much care, namely, the men themselves and their representatives at Winnipeg.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence upon the very interesting statement he made upon the subject. It was characterized by moderation and clarity, and I am sure was a very important contribution to the literature upon the subject so far as this House is concerned. My experience—and I am bound to say it has been very considerable, because one is constantly being interviewed by those who are affected—leads me to conclude that the commissioners have hardened in their interpretation of the act. That is, in the early days of its administration they placed upon it a more sympathetic and broader interpretation than they now do, and there has been a steady hardening, if I may use that word, with respect to the interpretation of the act itself. That has been brought about by many causes. One has been a desire to save the exchequer from the insistent demands upon it. Another has been the feeling that at times the commissioners have been imposed upon. I know of my own knowledge cases in which, under the earlier interpretation of the act, pensions have been awarded that should not have been awarded. The Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment has seen the list that was prepared at one time in this respect, and it has caused a very great deal of feeling in the community. You see A receiving a pension and B, who feels that his claim is quite as strong, not receiving one because the claim for it was made years after the pension had been awarded to A, and there is a consequent feeling throughout the community that an unfairness has been done to B.

Now, as I see it you have two classes: first, the soldier himself, and secondly the dependents. Among the dependents I include the wife, the widow, the mother and the children. With respect to the soldier himself there is one branch of the matter that I have not heard mentioned to-night, in connection with which there has been a very serious hardship upon the applicants. For instance, a soldier applies for a pension. Almost from superficial observation his condition is apparent to the layman. The doctor certifies as to his medical condition. He is told that he cannot receive a pension because his condition is attributable to his pre-war state of health. I have many of these cases. They say: We cannot give you a pension because upon analysis of your record of health we find that the disability of which you speak could not have been incurred during service but must be attributable to your pre-war condition. I doubt not the Minister of Health remembers some of these cases and every member of this House has heard of them. Now think of the unfairness of that. The Minister of National Defence will tell you as a lawyer that a man in private life who carried on his business in that way would be estopped absolutely from setting that up as a defence. Yet the pension board has set up that defence times without number, and has said that the applicant shall not receive a pension because his condition was not attributable and they use these words—to "war service but to his condition of health prior to his enlistment." Now my contention is that if the man's health was such that he could pass an examination and be certified as a fit and proper person to serve his country overseas it should not lie in the mouth of the department to say that his condition is a pre-war condition. I regret to say there are a great many of these cases and they have given me a good deal of worry. Not long since I discussed this matter with an imperial officer—perhaps he will object to my mentioning his name—who gave me some information with respect to conditions in England. Now as I understand it, in England parliament set up a committee of appeal composed of members of the House of Lords and they heard ten thousand cases, and if his records are correct not less than six thousand cases were favourably considered. The minister will tell you whether or not that is a fair statement of the matter because he has given a great deal of attention to it. It indicates the frailty of humanity, the weakness of human judgment, the possibilities of error. Surely we can lay down this principle—that any man who has been accepted by the nation as being in fit health to serve the state cannot have it urged against him that the condition in which he finds himself after the war is attributable to pre-enlistment days.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend's case, if he will permit me, must be the case of a man who has not served in an actual theatre of war, because section 11 of the Pension Act says exactly what my hon. friend claims should be the law. I will read it:

(b) No deduction shall be made from the degree of actual disability of any member of the forces who has served in a theatre of actual war on account of any disability or disabling condition which existed in him at the time at which he became a member of the forces; provided that no pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which at such time was wilfully concealed, was obvious, was not of a nature to cause rejection from service, or was a congenital defect.

Mr. BENNETT: I would have thought, as the minister has said, that that clause was broad enough. I quite agree with what the minister says. I am not going to give names and multiply cases because it is quite obvious that we must rest on generalities if possible and leave particular cases to be dealt with as they arise. I would have thought that the law was broad enough if it were not for the cases that have come under my own observation. I have been unable to have them successfully dealt with because it could not be said that the condition of the men was attributable to the cause alleged, but that the condition complained of was attributable to a pre-enlistment cause, and therefore the pension was not payable. That is the position taken, but it would not be open to very much discussion in a court of law. But they go a step further. They draw a sharp distinction between those who served in a theatre of war and those who did not. The minister has stated to-night, and I took down his words, "that the right of claim arises out of service during the war." Those were his words—"service during the war".

Mr. RALSTON: Incurred during service, was it not?

Mr. BENNETT: Incurred during service, the word "service" meaning the length of time that had elapsed from the date of enlistment until discharge. Under the statute that is the definition of service. Therefore if the injury complained of occurred during service, whether in the theatre of war or not, the minister and myself would say that undoubtedly the right to pension arose.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I regret to say—and there must be other hon. members who have had the same experience—that numbers of men have been unable to obtain pensions. It was only a few days before I came to Ottawa that a man came into my office and pointed out to me his condition and circumstances. He could not get a pension because they said: The condition of which you complain to-day was a condition present when you enlisted, and your present condition is entirely due to your pre-enlistment condition of health. That is a wrong attitude for this country to take. I would suggest that during Saturday my hon. friend could make the statute clearer so as to make it apparent to anyone who desires to read it that this state will not set up, against the man who has been accepted to serve—whether in a theatre of war or somewhere else, but at least in the service of the country overseas—a condition which is not in accordance with that of the medical officer who examined him for service.

During the last year or two I have seen some cases of singular hardship. One wonders why it is that a condition was allowed to continue which made it possible for pensions to be awarded in cases where one could not understand why they were awarded, while in other cases pensions were refused where it was difficult to understand why the refusal should be made.

Mr. RALSTON: The board are apparently not trying to save money then?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in those cases. That is the point I desire to make. The time has come when something should be done to remove these anomalies. Is it not a fact that in England they found it necessary in the House of Lords to set up this tribunal? The minister has given the matter so much attention that I am sure he will remember that. I thought at one time a small committee of this House, sitting in camera in the early days of a session, might reconsider and deal with many of these pensions in the light of the added knowledge that has come by reason of our having more complete records than we had when the pensions were awarded. But that would not meet the case. What must be done is to make this act so clear in its meaning that, however desirous those who administer it may be to place upon it a hard and technical interpretation, they can not and will not be permitted to do so.

What the minister has said about sympathetic administration comes down after all to this. Men who conceive it to be their duty to interpret a statute may well be within their rights in narrowly construing it and barring out numbers of deserving cases. Other men actuated by different considerations may place upon the same words a wider and more generous and sympathetic interpretation. We know how in statutes of this character various interpretations have arisen. I suggest with some deference to the minister or ministers that the real fact is that the Pension Act to-day is being construed as a criminal statute—and I do not use the word offensively—whereas in the early days it was construed in accordance with the general principle of civil jurisprudence. We say in criminal law that the onus of proof rests upon the crown and that the crown must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. As the Pension Act is now being interpreted by the board, they have placed upon the applicant the onus of proving his case beyond a reasonable doubt just as the crown must do against the accused in a criminal case.

In a civil case the plaintiff must establish his contention by preponderance of testimony, the distinction between criminal and civil matters being "beyond a reasonable doubt" on the part of the crown in the crimnal case and "preponderance of testimony" with respect to civil matters. In the early days I think it is quite clear that the pension law of the country was administered on the principle of preponderance of evidence. There being no evidence against the case set up by the applicant, he got his pension or his dependent got it as the case might be. If I were compelled to do so, I could cite cases in which it seemed to be reasonably clear that pensions should not be awarded. But there was no counter case set up; the preponderance of evidence was that of the applicant, and that was the end of the matter. In later days, however, by the hardening of the board in the interpretation of the act, they have now compelled the applicant to establish his case beyond a reasonable doubt. I have had numerous cases brought to my notice—and this is part of the gratuitous service, the only service a man can do for those who have served in the war—in which I have found that hardening and that the attitude of the board was to compel the applicant to establish his case beyond a reasonable doubt.

In an action for negligence, as the Minister of National Defence would say, the onus is upon the plaintiff to establish the negligence and then he has to connect the negligence with the injury complained of. But the judge will always instruct the jury that, if there is any evidence from which they may infer a disregard of duty that brought about the injury complained of, the verdict must be for the plaintiff. Should some such principle as that not govern in these cases? If there is any evidence from which it might be reasonably inferred that the condition complained of is referable to the service as a cause, the pension should be awarded. Would that be an unfair proposition? I regret to say that is not the attitude with which the matter has been recently approached.

This House owes a great debt to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark). I noticed in the earlier remarks this afternoon a tendency to refer to the matter as being somewhat political in its nature, but I know there is no intention on the part of any hon. member to treat it as a political matter. Some might make remarks that might be thus construed, but none of us has a thought of partisanship or party politics in dealing with the matter. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard brought this subject to the attention of the House this afternoon I was a little surprised and hurt that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who is usually generously inclined, should have for a moment alleged unworthy motives against the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. That hon. member was not in the least concerned about his private or personal feelings. What he felt was that there had been a hardening of mind, of interpretation by the board, which brought about a condition which he thought should be dealt with by this parliament. Who is here to-night who does not think it was well worthy of being brought to our attention in order that we might focus our minds on the injury done in a deserving case and on the methods necessary to remedy that wrong?

Mr. POWER: Would the hon. member suggest to the minister or the House what remedy there is against this hardening of heart or of mind? These members of the board are appointed for ten years. What can we do? We cannot dismiss them. Why criticize them if we cannot do anything with them?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Quebec South has not exhibited the usual resourcefulness of his very fertile mind. He knows far better than I that all we have to do is to add to the Pension Act a single paragraph stating that, in determining whether a pension should or should not be granted, the principle that applies in an ordinary action for negligence might well be applied. Something of that sort is all that is necessary. In other words, the members of the board might be instructed by the statute itself that they were to apply those broad and generous rules of interpretation to which the minister so properly referred this evening, rather than those hard and fast technical rules that make for what you might call regard for high precedent, but work a very great hardship on the soldier.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member would give the board greater discretion than they now have? I would refuse to do that.

Mr. BENNETT: I would respectfully differ from my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power). I do not usually differ from him. But it is not a question of discretion; it is a question of imposing upon the board by statute a rule of interpretation.

Mr. POWER: Which they may or may not follow.

Mr. BENNETT: Which they must follow or be impeached.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. gentleman will move the impeachment of any member of the board, I will gladly support him.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not yet before me any such evidence as would warrant me in concluding that the judgment which my hon. friend has just expressed represents his very mature consideration of the subject.

Mr. POWER: I have thought of it for the last five years, ever since Colonel Thompson has been chairman of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that I believe Colonel Thompson to be an exceedingly fair-minded man, and I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard so believes, as well as my hon. friend from Quebec South.

Mr. POWER: He is fair-minded.

Mr. BENNETT: But if in any statute placed before Colonel Thompson there is a provision that a rule of interpretation is to be followed, I know that he is a good enough citizen and also a good enough lawyer to follow it, and therefore this parliament can easily deal with that matter.

One word with respect to the appeal board. The minister pointed out, very properly, the various stages through which the legislation has passed. We were a new country to war when we went into the conflict; we were unaccustomed to its effects and its disasters, and we placed on the statute books in the first instance a pension law that represented the best views we could obtain from other countries. We have amended and supplemented that law as a result of our own experience, largely through the painstaking and persevering efforts of the gentleman who now presides over the Department of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) when he was chairman of the commission appointed to do that work. We provided for an appeal board. Another house of parliament concluded that the provisions in the draft act were not such as to commend themselves to their judgment. I am bound to say that I was rather inclined to think they were right, for this reason: It is important that there should be uniformity of administration, and if you have four or five boards scattered throughout Canada. each one approaching the problem from a different standpoint and giving out different judgments, depending on the intellectual capacity and general attitude of mind of the members of those boards, you would have chaos; for the man in the east would say: "Look at the generous way in which the board has treated me," while the man on the Pacific slope might say; "Look at the technical way in which they have treated me." It was to overcome that difficulty that when the bill came down from the other House it contained a provision for the appointment of a permanent appeal board to travel throughout Canada and hear these cases, thereby ensuring a measure of uniformity of administration. I do regard uniformity of administration as of the utmost importance in order to satisfy the claims of those who are most concerned. I think the minister will see that there is much warrant for and much merit in that contention.

Mr. RALSTON: That is exactly what was stated in the report, that there was necessity for uniformity. The suggestion of a central board was made in order to see to it that there should be uniformity of decision, so that the pension board itself could in a case in the west, for instance, correct a decision which was not in accord with the principles under which the act was interpreted generally. The advantage of the district boards was that they would see the man at first-hand, decide quickly, and be able to dispose of seventy-five per cent of the cases without reference to the central board.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difficulty being that it set up two forms of machinery, the central board in addition to the pension board, and the district boards in the military districts; in other words, the district board heard the case first and reported to the board of appeal here, and they made a judgment. Now the essence of a court of appeal is that it should be of at least equal knowledge we will say, and of equal intellectual capacity and power as the court from which the appeals are taken. I am sure the minister will agree that it was intended in the first instance that the appeal board should not be of a permanent character—we all realize that the pension board has come to stay for many years—but was in essence a temporary tribunal created for the purpose of bringing about the determination of the granting or refusing of pension upon evidence which they would take on the ground, as distinguished from evidence that might be presented to the pension board sitting in Ottawa. That is the general principle.

Mr. RALSTON: That was why the provision was made in the recommendation that this board at Ottawa should not reverse a decision of the district board without actually hearing the man.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. That, you see, involved again two movements of the board. The district board take the evidence, and then they report here, and a reversal of the board's judgment would necessitate their also seeing the man.

Mr. RALSTON: No, they did not report at all unless the Board of Pension Commissioners appealed the case.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: It stood unless appealed.

Mr. BENNETT: It involved three sets of machinery—the district board, the Board of Pension Commissioners, and the board of appeal. The other House, for reasons that I have always thought were fairly sound, concluded that if we had a pension board and a board of appeal, which board of appeal was a moving court, something like going out on assizes and actually seeing the men and hearing the cases, that would be far better than the other method. Here is a difficulty and a very practical one. You can see how difficult it is for a pension board, after it feels that it has given mature consideration to a case and arrived at a right conclusion, to change its mind merely because some other tribunal which they think is not so well equipped in any way has arrived at a different conclusion.

Mr. RALSTON: That is what happens in England.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, and my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) has just made observations with respect to what took place in the appeal board as compared with the pension board. Let me put this case which my hon. friends from Quebec have seen in the press lately. The appeal board decided that A was entitled to a pension. They so reported; the pension board refused to award pension, and that unfortunate soldier has gone to the courts of this country to secure a mandamus to compel the pension board to do what the board of appeal says the soldier is entitled to have done. Now that is all wrong, and it must be undone by some method. I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was dealing with the case before he went away, and I doubt not that the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is now giving it his attention because it is a public scandal that a tribunal set up for the purpose of rectifying a grievance done to a returned soldier should, after a report has been made entitling him to a pension, refuse him a pension because the board did not have sufficient confidence in the court of appeal to carry out its awards. Of course the action was improperly taken, and it has given rise to a good deal of discussion. All that is wrong, and I am sure the minister will say so.

My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario also had in mind a case which he mentioned to me just after he sat down. He endeavoured to secure a pension for a nurse who had been refused a pension by the pension board. The hon. member went to the court of appeal on her behalf, and the appeal board said that the woman was entitled to a pension. Did she get it? She did not. Now I put this to my hon. friend. Will anything but legislation cure that evil? All the broad comprehensive rules of interpretation and the most sympathetic administration will not change the vital fact that to-day the pension board refuses to pay a pension which the appeal board set up by this parliament has said the applicant is entitled to receive. Surely we must undo that this session. Surely we must not wait until next session for it. Surely my hon. friend between now and Monday will devise a short amendment that will cover that, knowing as I do the ability and facility of expression of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence.

I have spoken much longer than I intended, but I do press on the government, first of all, this consideration: that in providing for pensions on a broad and liberal basis they but express the general attitude of mind of all the Canadian people. Secondly, that under our institutions any measures involving expenditure of public money must originate with the government; therefore when we press these matters on them we do so not as a party, but rather as individual members of parliament who look to them to give effect to what we conceive to be the will and the wish of the people. Thirdly, that in view of the promises made and the way in which last session ended, it is not too much to suggest that between now and Monday the hon. ministers may be able to prepare such amendments as will relieve the most pressing of the grievances indicated by the soldiers themselves. I say the most pressing. I am not unfair enough to suggest that the two hon. gentlemen could meet all the various conditions in the short time at their disposal; quite the opposite, and I know they have given this matter perhaps much more consideration than any of us. I also know of the pressure of public business and the difficulty of concentrating on many problems to the exclusion of all others that they have to deal with in the public interest. I do not say that many of these recommendations cannot be met by a moderate, well-tempered and sympathetic interpretation of the present statute. I agree with the minister in that, but I do say that one or two, if not three, of the matters to which I have ventured to refer to-night cannot be dealt with in that way.

Mr. RALSTON: Not one of them is dealt with in these proposals.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will agree that the suggestions are certainly such as in practice we have all come up against. I am only speaking out of the fulness of my heart. I only know what I have seen. It reminds me of the story of an unfortunate claimant for a pension. Not getting it at the first attempt, after a long time he tried again, but with no better success, and he was told that his ill health was attributable to pre-war conditions. He was a man who read his Bible much, and his temper still had not been frayed. So he told me he was like the man who in Scripture had been cured of his blindness, and on being asked about how it happened said, "I only know that whereas I was blind now I see." Said this poor unfortunate soldier, "All I can say is this, that whereas before I went to the war I was sound, I now know I am a broken derelict." I thought it was an excellent answer.

These matters to which I have referred, perhaps at greater length than necessary, are matters that cannot be dealt with by any wide interpretation of existing legislation, and I do venture to suggest—not in any party spirit, for I know hon. gentlemen opposite have just as warm a desire as any other hon. members to help the returned soldier—that it is not asking too much to expect that between now and Monday, say during Saturday—when of course ministers have nothing to do but attend council where they can write these recommendations—they may be able to prepare the necessary amendments in order to give effect to the most pressing demands of the moment. With respect to this particular measure dealing with the appeal board, if in practice it has been found desirable I think the House will be the first to say the bill should be passed. As to insurance, if it can be extended it does not seem to me that from an actuarial standpoint the country is running any very great risk. The cost of management has not involved us in any very great monetary risks because there has been a fair regard for actuarial considerations in the preparation of the tables. The losses have not been greater than were anticipated, and the accumulated funds are as substantial as might be hoped for under the circumstances. In view of these considerations I join in suggesting to my hon. friends that in the short interval between now and Monday they prepare such legislation as will give effect to the most pressing of these grievances.

Mr. O. B. PRICE (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. King, Kootenay), to two very important telegrams which I have received. I will not detain the House by reading all the telegrams which I have under my hand with regard to the Pension Act. The first telegram is from Moncton and is addressed to myself:

> Amendments to Pension Act urgently required this session in order to assist in relieving distress among sick and disabled. Your kind coöperation will be greatly appreciated.
> E. L. MORRIS,
> Secretary Riverglade tuberculous branch Canadian Legion.

I wish to point out that these boys were gassed at the front, and I am sure if the hon. minister would visit the sanatarium at Riverglade he would appreciate their sufferings. I would ask his particular consideration of these cases. The second telegram is also from Moncton and reads:

> Advice received here government do not intend to consider legislation re pensions and insurance for returned men this session as proposed to them by headquarters of the Canadian Legion. Please press all possible for government's reconsideration of this decision.
> L. T. TINGLEY, Secretary Treasurer.

In view of what the hon. minister said in reply to the question which I placed on the order paper as to whether legislation would be introduced this session to relieve these men who are not now covered by existing legislation, I would ask him if it is his intention yet to introduce such legislation, or does he desire to have the government stand before the people declaring that it has refused to give consideration to these really deserving cases, especially in view of the fact that millions of dollars are being spent to-day throughout Canada for purposes not of such import as those which have been brought to the attention of the government during this debate? The hon. minister will no doubt recognize that thousands of people throughout the Dominion are watching to see what the government intends to do. It is up to the government to look after the returned men. They have not been properly looked after in the past. Therefore before this session closes the government should show some consideration for the boys who went to the front and for their relatives and their dependents who are in distressed circumstances.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): The discussion to-day has, I think, been advantageous and will serve a useful purpose. It must be evident to those on both sides of the House who have listened to what has been said to-day that certain conclusions can be drawn. In the first place, the principle on which our present pension legislation is based is sound; pensions will be paid on account of disability due to war service. That is the primary principle. From the discussion this afternoon there seems to be a feeling among the members of this House that the pension authorities who administer the act are, if anything, too circumscribed within the scope of the legislation. It is difficult to make that statement and it is one that should not be made without fairly mature consideration. It is true that all of us have been interested in cases such as have been mentioned to-day. Before I became minister, as well as since, I have had brought to my attention cases in which I had personal knowledge and I felt that consideration should be given them. Some of these cases have gone to the pension board and on appeal have been rejected. I do not know whether it would be within my right or the right of any member of this House, because he happened to fail in his presentation of a case, to suggest that the machinery of the pensions board had fallen down or that the act was not being properly administered; for I think it is generally conceded, not only in Canada but universally, that the Canadian pension laws are as liberal as, if not more liberal than those of any of the allied nations except possibly the United States. Three or four years ago a similar feeling prevailed in this House, that the pensions board was not dealing as it should with certain cases. As a result of that impression the appeal board was established and it has served a useful purpose.

There has been brought forward to-day a question, which I might as well consider now as later on, regarding the activities of the board. The appeal board came into being on October 1, 1924. There were entered 10,154 appeals of which 5,122 were disposed of without hearing, there being no jurisdiction. That left a total of 5,032 bona fide appeals, of which 691 have been allowed. There have been disallowed 2,047 while 352 are pending judgment. That makes a total of 3,090 cases considered, leaving still to be heard 1,942. These are the figures submitted to me by the department. The hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) made the statement that there were 1,400 appeals in Montreal still to be heard. What are the facts? In Montreal 236 cases have been disposed of, while cases awaiting disposal number 4, plus 269 which are not yet ready, that is to say, in which the soldier adviser has not sufficient ground on which to proceed with the appeal. So that throughout the country, from Halifax to Vancouver, appeals have been heard and adjustments made to the number of 3,090, while there are 1,942 cases still to be considered.

Regarding legislation which might be brought down this year as suggested, a week or ten days ago I thought it would be fair to the soldier organizations as well as to the House to indicate the line of action the government would be able to take with reference to the matters that had been submitted by the Canadian Legion and other soldier organizations throughout Canada. It is true that representations were made by various bodies and comprehensive memoranda prepared and submitted; it is also true that we had the honour of meeting various officers of these associations in consultation. At that meeting I requested the presence of the chairman of the pension board, the deputy minister of the department, the assistant deputy minister, the medical director and other officers so that they might hear what the returned men had to say. We found, as we considered the various amendments, that many of them were intended to relieve individual cases or small groups; and it was pointed out by the officers who are familiar with the law that many of these cases could be dealt with by administrative means without the necessity for legislative action.

With regard to tubercular veterans, whom we have heard discussed, I am sure we are all sympathetic in our attitude to these particular returned men. They not only made representations, as was set out in the memorandum to which reference has been made, but they also suggested to me as minister that if it were not possible for legislation to be introduced at this session I should undertake during the recess to convene a meeting of tubercular specialists to give the veterans an opportunity of stating their case to these experts. Since that interview I have instructed the officials of the department to arrange for a convention of that nature and it will be possible for the tubercular veterans, through their representatives, to appear before the specialists this season and make a full statement of their case. Tuberculosis is one of the diseases which after the war filled our sanataria, but to-day we find these cases dwindling in number. There are some new cases developing, and the difficulty in connection with these, eight or ten years after the war, is to establish their connection with military service.

As I stated a few moments ago, it has generally been considered that our pension legislation is generous. We know at any rate that there has not been that hardening which the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has referred to, because in the last five years our pension bill has grown from $30,000,000 to $37,000,000, showing that the bill is being extended from year to year. Now the question is whether we should hastily consider amendments to meet certain representations which have been made at this session, or whether we should deliberately sit down and in close conference develop amendments which could be incorporated into our Pension Act next session, when a proper consolidation of that act may be made.

I propose to move two amendments which are basic and primary in their character, which are of great importance to the returned soldiers and which I think will be very acceptable to them. The first amendment extends the period in which an application for pension may be filed from seven to nine years, the seven year period expiring this year. This will give two years more in which to file these applications, and from the representations which have been made to us I am satisfied that this is one of the things the men most desire. On account of the seven year period expiring this year, I thought it desirable that we should deal with it at this session.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

The other amendment has to do with the re-hearing of applications upon the presentation of new evidence, and will be of advantage to a large number of men, although it is difficult to say how many. We know that from day to day representations are being made to us in which it is claimed that the individual, although he has gone to the pension board and the appeal board and failed in both cases, has been able to find new evidence since, but has been prevented from filing another application. Upon new evidence being submitted which in the opinion of a majority of the pension board is sufficient, under this amendment a re-hearing will be granted and an appeal from that re-hearing will be permitted if the decision is adverse to the applicant.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I ask the minister a question just there? Since he has found the seven year limit to be a failure, why make it nine? Why put any limit on it at all?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I desire to extend that period for two years in order that that situation may be met while we are re-drafting the act next year. The veterans have laid down the principle that a soldier who has a pensionable condition due to war service should have the opportunity to make his representations at any time, which goes much further than anything we have yet considered. There is something to be said for it, however. In order that that situation may be covered for the present, I am suggesting this extension for two years—which has another advantage as well. Those returned men who have failed to file their claim will now have it brought to their attention that they are permitted another two years in which to do so, and they will be more apt to get busy and hand in their claims at once in order that they will have more chance of being considered. The longer these claims run and the older they become, the more difficult it will be for the applicant to prove his case.

I do not think it is necessary for me to continue at greater length. I believe the adoption of the amendments I have suggested and the undertaking of a consolidation of the act next year after thorough consideration and study, when the government will be prepared to bring down further amendments, will meet the situation. The matter to my mind should be then referred to a special committee of this House early in the session, in order that all the details may be properly surveyed and scrutinized from various angles.

It is easy to say, "amend the Pension Act and reinstate the insurance act." This plan of insurance was adopted right at the close of the war in order to take care of a group of men who were not pensionable; they were given an opportunity of taking insurance and I think that continued until 1922. Some $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 of insurance was written, some of which has lapsed, and from that time until quite recently there has not been any great demand to open up this insurance scheme. We must remember that it is ten years since the close of the war; men who were thirty years of age then are forty today, and the insurance risk is not so good as it then was. Although it might be serviceable to some I am satisfied that it would not be fair for the government to bring in an amendment which would open up the insurance act for another period of years, with the little knowledge they now possess.

Mr. PRICE: I would like to ask the minister a question. Why not deal with that matter at this session?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think I have concluded the remarks I have to offer, Mr. Speaker. I am satisfied that if these two amendments become law the ex-service men will have been satisfied on two important items.

Motion agreed, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, I beg to move the following amendment:

Subsection (4) of section 11 of chapter 62 of the statutes of 1923 is amended by the addition of the following proviso:

"Provided that if within one year after a decision by the Federal Appeal Board upholding a refusal of pension by the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada or one year after the passing of this act, whichever is the later, the applicant submits new evidence which, in the opinion of a majority of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, establishes a reasonable doubt as to the correctness of the previous decision, the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada shall reconsider such case, and if refusal of pension be confirmed, the applicant shall have the right of a second appeal to the Federal Appeal Board and its decision thereon shall be final and shall be binding upon the applicant and upon the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada."

The CHAIRMAN: This amendment becomes section 2 of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have another amendment to propose, as follows:

Section 13 of chapter 43 of the statutes of 1919, as amended by chapter 60 of the statutes of 1924 and by chapter 49 of the statutes of 1925 is further amended by repealing paragraph (c) and substituting therefor the following:

(c) within nine years after the date upon which the applicant was retired or discharged from the forces, or—

The CHAIRMAN: This amendment becomes section 3 of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: At the next sitting of the House.

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): With the unanimous consent of the House, if I can obtain it, I should like to present the eleventh report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the report is read, by leave of the House, Mr. Johnston (Last Mountain) moves, seconded by Mr. Totzke, that the bills just enumerated be now read a first, second and third time, and that rule 28 be suspended in relation thereto. I may explain to the House that these bills will not go to committee; I am informed they are unopposed.

Mr. GARDINER: Are those all divorce bills?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. The resolution is carried by unanimous consent.

Mr. PARENT: Carried on division as far as the divorce bills are concerned.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL BILL

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I beg leave to present the tenth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, as follows:

Your committee have considered Bill No. 78, an act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and have agreed to report the preamble thereof not proven for the reason that it would be contrary to the public interest to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

Your committee recommend that the fees and charges paid on said Bill No. 78 be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendation contained in the tenth report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the fees and charges paid on Bill No. 78, an act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company be refunded less the cost of printing and translation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried by unanimous consent.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 239, to amend the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

[Mr. Speaker.]

On section 2—Section 138 re-enacted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is this clause?

Mr. CANNON: This is to re-insert in the Criminal Code section 138, which had been repealed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The same clause?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg to move that the clause which I am about to read be added to the amendments to the Criminal Code submitted by the Solicitor General:

1. Subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (a) of section one thousand one hundred and forty of the Criminal Code, chapter one hundred and forty-six of the revised statutes of Canada, 1906, as enacted by section twenty of chapter twenty-five of the statutes of 1921, is hereby repealed.

2. Any one who commits or has at any time heretofore committed any offence relating to or arising out of the location of land which was paid for on whole or in part by scrip or was granted upon certificates issued to half-breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian title, shall, with respect thereto, be liable to prosecution or to an action for penalties or forfeiture in the same manner and to the same extent as if said subparagraph (iv) had never been enacted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order. The amendment moved by the Minister of the Interior is really Bill No. 146, to amend the Criminal Code (scrip frauds), which has been standing on the order paper since March 14 as a private bill, in the name of a member of this House.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not a private bill

Mr. GUTHRIE: A public bill moved by a private member. As long as it remains on the order paper, it cannot be taken up by way of amendment or discussed. I raise that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any hon. gentleman wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend presses the point, I think it is well taken.

Mr. STEVENS: It is obvious that this amendment cannot be moved. Bill 146 appears on page 12 of the order paper as order No. 31.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the minister who moved the amendment wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I have to say is that there is a strong probability that Bill No. 146 will not be reached. A similar bill has at least on two occasions been passed by this House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a point of order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not going to argue the point of order raised by my hon. friend, except to say this: Of course we could have the hon. gentleman drop his bill and then move it as an amendment. I do not want to take that procedure, leaving the amendments to the Criminal Code standing in the meantime. I can scarcely understand my hon. friend's objection to this, inasmuch as parliament on two previous occasions has passed this bill. I admit it has been thrown out by the Senate. I know I cannot press this amendment if my hon. friend insists on his point of order. Of course he must assume the responsibility for blocking this legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN: This is rather an intricate point of order, and I think I shall have to ask for a little time to consider it before giving a ruling.

Mr. BENNETT: The Solicitor General has stated that the point of order is well taken. It is the same point of order as was taken last year on the question of natural resources.

The CHAIRMAN: In Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, section 423, under rule 42, states:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the House, such as the subject matter of a bill on the order paper.

In accordance with that rule, I would rule that the amendment moved by the Minister of the Interior is out of order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friends insist on their point of order, I quite realize that my amendment is out of order. This is a very important matter to some of my constituents, and I had hoped that the point of order would not be raised, particularly in view of the fact that in all probability Bill 146 will not reach a stage where the consideration of this House can be given to it.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (for the Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of Bill No. 269, to amend the Immigration Act.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this bill should not be proceeded with. It is a single clause bill, but it is one of great importance. Section 1 states:

> Section 41 of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1910, as enacted by chapter 26 of the statutes of 1919, is repealed.

It deals with the power of deportation. It is said that the section will never be put in operation, and therefore it should be repealed. But it is always desirable to have upon the statute books legislation to which an appeal may be made in the event of necessity arising, and the non-use of legislation is sometimes the best reason why it should remain. Not long since in England they had recourse to legislation that was more than one hundred years old, and this statute providing for summary deportation without trial at a time of great stress and strain will not be used except where the conditions obtain to which it has reference. These conditions, let us hope, will very rarely arise in this country, but when they do arise no harm can be done in having here the machinery upon which we can rely and which we may use. Unless some good reason is given why this section should be repealed, it should remain; the fact that it is drastic legislation is not a good reason for its repeal. Legislation which it is said takes away the right of a man to trial by jury and matters of that kind is legislation that sometimes has to be used in all countries for the preservation of law and order, and that is far more important than the possible chance of its application to individuals perhaps once in a hundred years. What harm is being done by having the legislation there? There may arise a condition when it would be profoundly useful to this country. If when that condition arises the legislation is not there, we have no power to deal with the situation. Until it is shown to the House that the legislation will work an injustice in the ordinary course of events it should remain on the statute books. I submit that no reason has been given why it should be dropped at this time, and therefore, and in view of the fact that it is midnight, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend knows that on two former occasions this very amendment has been passed by parliament.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a motion before the House to adjourn the debate. Does the minister not think it is late enough?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am perfectly willing.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Friday, April 8, 1927

The House met at eleven o'clock.

REPORT

Fourth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Kay.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. W. T. GOODISON (West Lambton): presented the third and final report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping as follows:

The select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, beg leave to present the following as their third and final report.

Your committee to which was referred for consideration and for report to the House the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, held five meetings, in the course of which it examined sundry witnesses, including;

Sir Henry Thornton, K.B.E., President and Chairman of the Boards, Canadian National Railways.

S. J. Hungerford, Vice President, Operation and Construction Departments, C.N.R.

W. D. Robb, Vice President, Departments of Land, Colonization, Development, Insurance and General Matters, C.N.R.

R. A. C. Henry, Director, Bureau of Economics, C.N.R.

T. H. Cooper, General Auditor, C.N.R.

R. B. Teakle, General Manager, Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited.

J. P. Doherty, Traffic Manager, Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited.

F. Davidson, Auditor, Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited.

Canadian National Railways

Your committee has had under consideration item 408 of the estimates, which provides for loans or guarantees of $22,500,000 of the Canadian National Railway Company for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1928, and has in the course of its deliberations, examined the operating statements of the company for the year ending December 31st, 1926.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Your committee notes that the results of the operations of the Canadian National Railway System, which includes for the first time the operations of the Central Vermont Railway, show a substantial improvement in the volume of business handled and a continued improvement in operating methods, resulting in an increase of $21,861,000 in operating revenue accompanied by an increase of only $7,079,000 in operating expenses.

While not providing for interest charges due the government on capital advances your committee notes with considerable satisfaction that for the first time, the net earnings of the railway for the year are more than sufficient to pay all fixed charges due to the public.

Your committee is lead to believe that the properties embraced in the system have been maintained to a standard commensurate with the traffic requirements.

Your committee agrees that the estimate of $22,500,000 (being a reduction of $8,500,000 from the amount asked for last year) is necessary for the purpose of the company during the coming year, and should be voted by the House.

Canadian Government Merchant Marine

Your committee has also had under consideration item 409 of the estimates, which provides for a loan of $18,500 to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, and has in the course of its deliberations examined the operating statements of the company for the year ending December 31st, 1926. Your committee notes with considerable satisfaction that the operating deficit has been reduced to $90,159, an improvement over the previous year of $858,893, and it is recalled that the improvement in 1925 in comparison with 1924 was $492,826.

From the evidence given, it appears that there has been an improvement in the earnings on the business handled in the case of practically all the routes operated and that this improvement has been accomplished at a relatively small expense. The increase in operating revenue was $1,114,735, while the operating expenses only increased $256,841.

Your committee draws attention to the fact that the amount of the appropriation for last year on account of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, was $600,000, whereas for the coming year, the sum of $18,500 is asked. Your committee is of the opinion that this amount is necessary for the purposes of the company during the coming year and should be voted by the House.

Your committee notes with satisfaction that the Canadian National Railways continues to hold the confidence and goodwill of the public through the excellence of the service rendered and the courtesy extended to patrons.

Your committee further desires to express its appreciation of the manner in which the President of the Canadian National Railways and the officers assisting him gave their evidence to the committee.

A copy is attached hereto of the minutes of the proceedings and evidence of the attending officers.

Your committee further recommends that its proceedings and the evidence adduced before the committee be printed as an appendix to the Journals of the House and that rule 74 in respect hereto be suspended.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. Goodison moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES—WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present further petitions asking for the transfer to the prairie provinces of their natural resources, without restricting their right to complete control of their educational and other local affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that bills Nos. 240 to 252 inclusive, and bills Nos. 262 to 268 inclusive, being unopposed divorce bills which have been reported by the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, be now read a third time, and that rule 28 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Are these all divorce bills?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Do I understand that none but divorce bills are in that list?

Mr. SPEAKER: Unopposed divorce bills.

Motion agreed to on division, and bills read a third time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been given a list of private bills which are also I understand, unopposed, and about which the whips of the three parties have conferred. I am prepared to make a motion that these unopposed private bills be now considered if it is agreeable to the House, but if there is any objection I will not present the motion.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): What are the bills and what are they about?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will read the numbers: 254, 144, 177, 116, 154, 175, 214, 237, 238, 261, 253.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we can hardly be asked to pass these bills in this way. Some of us have not been consulted in regard to the matter.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): If my hon. friend will allow me I will give the titles of the bills in a moment.

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): Bill No. 177 will likely be opposed.

Mr. LADNER: It is difficult to know just which bills might be subject to contention and which might not. There are other bills of importance on the list, and for my part I must oppose this motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the circumstances I will not present the motion.

THREE RIVERS HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 302, to amend the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners' Act, 1923.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Explain.

Mr. CARDIN: This bill is not contentious; it is only designed to change the limits of the harbour of Three Rivers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 303, to amend the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners' Act, 1926.

He said: The object of this bill is also to change the limits of the harbour of Chicoutimi.

Motion agreed and bill read the first time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 304, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: The object of this bill is to enable the owners of ships to stop the practice, which has become prevalent in the short haul passenger business, of objectionable touts and runners for lodging houses and so on soliciting business for their houses, some of which are of questionable character, while the ship is en route. We want to have the law amended so that no one can go on a ship and advertise or solicit business for any hotel or boarding house without having a permit from the company operating the boat.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, April 9th instant, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the House shall sit from 11 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the afternoon, and that there shall be an intermission from one to three o'clock, and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

He said: I may explain that there has been a conference between the whips of the parties and this resolution, I understand, is agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have just received the following letter from the Association of postal employees of Montreal:

Montreal, April 7, 1927.

Dr. J. A. Denis, M.P.,
Member for St. Denis, Room 489,
Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ont.

My Dear Doctor:

The postal employees of Montreal who, for a long time, were under the impression that they would receive $120 as an increase in salary, dating from April 1st last, were naturally somewhat disappointed, although acknowledging a deep feeling of gratitude towards the government of this country for the generous measure which they have just carried out, and they would be very grateful, Sir, if you would draw the immediate attention of the House to this matter in order to ascertain whether the present revision of salaries is final or whether we may get the assurance that a readjustment of salaries, for certain classes of postal employees, will be carried out in the near future.

Trusting, Dear Mr. Denis, that you will be kind enough to look after our interests as usual,

We remain,

Yours respectfully,

MOUSSEAU DRAPEAU,
President.
ROSAIRO BERGERON,
Secretary.

Will the hon. Secretary of State have the kindness to inform the House as to what are the government's intentions on the subject?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for St. Denis, I wish to state that representations have been made to the government in the nature of this letter.

It is the intention of the government to grant an increase to all civil servants, however we must equally take under consideration the amounts which have already been granted to certain classes since 1924 as I have already explained to the House.

At all events, this question is receiving our earnest consideration and may be discussed more fully when the supplementary estimates covering this increase is submitted to the House.

SITUATION IN CHINA

ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT TOWARDS BRITISH POLICY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I desire to ask the Prime Minister if the Canadian government has been consulted about the recently announced policy of Great Britain in China, and further, does the Canadian government endorse the policy of the present British administration?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With respect to the situation in China and the communications that have passed between the Canadian government and the British government on the subject, I would say that this government has been kept informed by the British government of the progress of events. The information which we have received has been very much that which has appeared in the public press. We have not been asked for our advice, and we have not tendered any.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

OBJECTIONS TO PROPOSED EXCEPTIONS TO APPLICATION OF INCREASE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I desire to bring to the attention of the government two telegrams which have been placed in my hands, the subject matter of which is of sufficient importance to justify taking that course at the present stage of the proceedings of the House. One telegram is signed by the secretary of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, Vancouver Local Council. It is addressed to me and reads as follows:

Six hundred civil servants at mass meeting here passed following resolution without one dissenting vote:

"That we most strongly protest the offer of from forty-two to sixty dollars per annum increase in most cases publicly advertised as hundred and twenty dollars flat rate increase for all civil servants after waiting patiently for five years for some measure of justice. We emphatically condemn the assumption that we received an increase in pay in nineteen hundred and twenty-four and protest against using such imaginary increase in order to deprive us of the full benefit of the recent revision. We reiterate our request for a flat increase of three hundred dollars per annum for all with a minimum of hundred dollars for all full time adult occupations and respectfully solicit your support on the floor of the House of Commons so that salaries in the Canadian civil service may be raised to the level of respectability. This for your Vancouver colleagues also."

I also have a wire from the railway mail clerks in which they declare that in some cases the change has actually resulted in a decrease. The point I wish to bring to the attention of the government is this: It was officially announced by the government, I think through the lips of the Secretary of State, that a flat increase of $120 a year was given to all civil servants. In the working out of the salary revision it appears that in some cases there has been a decrease; in other cases the increase is only from $42 to $60 a year and not $120. I would ask from the government that some statement should be made explaining the apparent discrepancy between the first announcement that there was a flat increase of $120 and what appears to be the actual result.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): This subject is becoming a matter of daily interrogation. I have stated many times, and it seemed to have been agreed upon by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the whole question might be explained when we reached the supplementary estimates dealing with this matter. I desire to state now that the announcement made to the House was very plain. It was to the effect that we were giving a flat increase to the whole service, but the statement was immediately qualified by reservations as to some classes who have received increases since 1924.

Mr. STEVENS: Which they deny.

Mr. RINFRET: Well, the whole point seems to rest on the fact that those civil servants who had received increases previously do not consider those increases any more, but are thinking of the amount it is possible to receive under the present revision. I am willing to give consideration to all these representations, to my department since my declaration, which have been very numerous, but it would be better, I think, if we were to discuss the whole matter when we come to consider the supplementary estimates.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): I have a question along the same line. I was going to ask the Secretary of State if he had received messages protesting against the character of the increase.

Mr. RINFRET: I believe every hon. member of the House has received such telegrams. It would be better, I think, if they were read in proper sequence.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I received this morning a telegram from Branch No. 5 of the Federated Association of Letter Carriers of Quebec, in which they complain of the same discrimination as mentioned just now by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis). The telegram reads as follows:

H. E. LAVIGUEUR,
Ottawa, Ont.

At a mass meeting of members of Branch No. 5 Quebec of the Federated Association of Letter Carriers it was unanimously resolved to protest energetically against the miserable increase of seventy eight cents per week in salary for the letter carriers we sincerely hope that this matter will be reconsidered.

JOS. M. CÔTÉ,
President Branch No. 5
the F.A.L.C., Quebec.

I understand that the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) stated that another increase will be granted to these employees, over and above the 78 cents per week increase, and that this question is under consideration. In view of these facts I think that the employees of the Post Office Department at Quebec will be satisfied with the hon. minister's answer.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Postmaster General state if he is ready to deal with the question I put to him yesterday, which he said he would read when Hansard came before him and prepare an answer for to-day.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): That answer is being prepared on the basis of the memorandum that I have tabled. I will have it ready this afternoon or to-morrow.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE DEBATE

DENIAL OF NEWSPAPER STATEMENT IMPLYING ACCEPTANCE OF REPORT

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to a report with respect to the debate on the Imperial conference which appeared in the Manitoba Free Press of Wednesday, April 6th. In that report the following declaration occurs:

Imperial conference policy is endorsed by a majority of 44.

As that statement is so far from the fact, I thought it advisable to call it to the attention of the Prime Minister in order that he may have an opportunity of denying it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think what my hon. friend has reference to is a newspaper heading. I am sure he will recognize that it is impossible for the government to control the press in the matter of the headings which it gives to its despatches. However, with reference to what the heading purports to assert, I would say to my hon. friend that I think the House understands that the motion the other day was a motion to go into supply, and the support given to it defeated the amendment which was moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). The amendment had reference to Imperial conference matters, but its defeat did not in any way imply the approval by this House of the report.

EMPLOYMENT OF DISABLED VETERANS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I promised to give to the House a statement with respect to the employment of amputation cases in city post offices. The following is a memorandum of the conference held on Thursday, to which I then made reference:

Employment of Amputation Cases in City Post Offices

The above matter was discussed with representatives of the Civil Service Commission and a representative of the Great War Veterans' Association. The following were present:

P. T. Coolican, General Superintendent of Postal Service; E. J. Underwood, Chief Superintendent of Post Office Service; C. H. Bland, Assistant Secretary, Civil Service Commission; Mr. Bouchard, Examination Branch, Civil Service Commission; Mr. Herwig, Great War Veterans' Association.

The department's views were expressed as follows:

The department has no objection to the employment of amputation cases in those positions where their physical handicap does not prevent their giving the department satisfactory service.

The department at the present time has so many employees who are not 100 per cent physically fit in the operating branches of the service, including a large number of men of advanced years who have entered under the returned soldiers' preference, that to further load down these staffs with amputation cases would simply mean that the department could not give an efficient service.

It was pointed out at the interview that the department had no objection to the employment of amputation cases in such positions as mechanical operators in the Money Order branch, telephone operators, stenographers and other similar clerical positions.

It was further stated that the department would assist in every way possible in obtaining properly qualified amputation cases for such positions. This attitude was satisfactory to both the commission and Mr. Herwig of the Great War Veterans' Association and it was agreed that the department would, as far as possible, when suitable vacancies occurred, to which amputation cases could be assigned, to specially draw such cases to the attention of the Civil Service Commission when asking for vacancies to be filled.

I beg to lay the memorandum on the table.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved the second reading of Bill No. 281 to amend an act of the present session intituled: "An act respecting the Department of National Revenue."

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

REPEAL OF PROVISION FOR DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN CLASSES

The House resumed from Thursday, April 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) for the second reading of Bill No. 269 to amend the Immigration Act.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, when I adjourned the debate last evening I was endeavouring to point out that no harm can be done by permitting this statute to remain as part of the law of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us look at the statute and see if there is any reason why it should be repealed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Louder, please.

Mr. BENNETT: I am asking the simple question as to what reason there is for repealing this provision of the law. This is the section that is to be repealed:

41. Every person who by word or Act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the Government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or Canada, or any of the provinces of Canada, or the government of any other of His Majesty's Dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada, by force or by threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undersirable classes, and shall be liable to deportation in the manner provided by this Act, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof and of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein any such person may be, forthwith to send a written complaint to the Minister, giving full particulars: Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Then follows a subsection as to what is prima facie evidence. I do say, Sir, that the maintaining of that section upon our statute books was never more necessary than it is to-day. Having regard to what is going on to-day in China, having regard to the deliberate concerted effort that is being made to destroy the British Empire, openly vaunted by a certain class of people in the world who are teaching sedition in the worst form and endeavouring in every way possible to bring about the destruction of the empire, this statute should remain just where it is in order that if the occasion necessitates we may use it, and use it effectively.

What does the section say? It merely provides that a certain class of people who are not British subjects—it does not touch British subjects at all, British either by birth or naturalization—when they come to this country and are guilty of those offences may be deported as undesirable citizens of this country. Is there anything wrong about that? Wherein does the injury lie to any person? It merely provides for the deportation of these aliens who are found guilty of carrying on an agitation such as is being carried on in various parts of the British Empire, in India, and partly in our own country, because anybody who has seen the reports of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police knows that in Canada, and more particularly in months gone by, a deliberate propaganda has been carried on by a certain class along the very lines of that section. If we repeal the section, we have no longer power to deport these people. All that this section does, despite all that has been said about it, is to enable the immigration authorities to deport from Canada any class of persons who come within the provision of the section.

Now I ask those who support this repeal, and there are two in this House in particular —I know they do not favour retaining in Canada people who carry on a deliberate agitation against the government of Great Britain and against the government of this country, people who desire to set up a Soviet form of government—I ask them why should these people who are not British subjects at all be permitted to carry on an agitation of that kind in this country. It is true that last year the Prime Minister gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) a letter in which he said he would repeal this section. He said in that letter:

> With respect to amendments to (a) the Immigration Act, (b) the Naturalization Act, and (c) the Criminal Code, which were referred to at the time of our interview, I would say that having since taken up the proposed amendments with the ministers concerned, I feel I am in a position to assure you that legislation on these matters will also be introduced in the course of the present session.

And that was done, and therefore the government has discharged its obligation so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, and the government is released from any obligation to further introduce legislation of this character. I know that there are members on the other side of the House who take exactly the same view as I do, and who feel quite as strongly as I do about it. The principle I laid down last evening, Mr. Speaker, is a principle which I think can be fairly adopted by this House. Whenever legislation is upon the statute book that in time of extreme peril may prove useful, there is no reason why in time of calm and peace it should be repealed. That is the principle. No one is being injured by this statute being retained on the statute book; no one is being hurt by it, but it does enable us, if the propagandist comes from Russia and carries on his nefarious operations, say, on the Pacific slope in secret against our institutions and against our government, against the throne of Great Britain, and endeavours to set up in this country another form of government, to send him back to the country he came from—but not if he is a British subject. This does not apply to British subjects, but only to those who are not British subjects. Since when was it the policy of the people and government of Canada to place a premium on alien agitators being permitted to rave against the crown of Britain, against the crown of Canada, and against the government in Canada? Since when did we desire to place our imprimatur upon favouring agitators of that character? All we are doing outside of the Criminal Code now is simply to say that we are not going to the trouble of having a long trial and all the accompanying agitation in the public press, magnifying these men into heroes. No, we are merely going to send them back to the country they came from; that is all.

Take the United States of America. They talk of liberty and freedom, and practise it, they say, more than any other people in the world. Would they permit the repeal of a section such as that? Look at the deportations from that country now. Look at the Canadians they have sent back. Look at England refusing to visé passports for certain persons wanting to enter the United States. Look at the action of the United States with respect to undesirables at Ellis Island and at other points.

Why repeal this section now when the effect of it is simply to enable us at a moment of great peril, when we are sure of our facts, to send these undesirable persons back to the country they came from? I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the time to repeal it. I can see no reason why the government having discharged its duty, as I understand it, to the hon. gentleman, having promised to do something and having done it, should any longer press this legislation in 1927 upon the attention of this House in the closing days of the session, for I know hon. gentlemen opposite are quite as desirous as I am of maintaining law and order in Canada, and are quite as desirous as I am of maintaining our institutions and our form of government, quite as desirous as anyone on this side of the House that there should be orderly and regulated conduct of the business of this country. Then why remove from the Immigration Act this provision.

My friend from Winnipeg, I suppose, would say that the Criminal Code gives us ample opportunity to deal with these men, but that is the very thing we do not want to use. The United States has found that out by experience, and she simply deports them, instead of exalting these people into heroes, with all the talk about freedom of speech and deporting people without giving them the opportunity of a trial by a jury of their countrymen. That is not the principle of the law at all. Deportation is not punishment. The criminal law is in operation for the punishment of the offender, and for deterring others; it is to punish those who violate our laws. But deportation is to send out of our country undesirable citizens, and when this House votes to repeal a section such as that, indirectly it says that it is satisfied that that class of person is not an undesirable person. To retain the section cannot do harm: it may do good. It cannot interfere with liberty, because it does not deal with British subjects, and since when did an alien have any right to protection in this country other than to be protected in his life and property, and be sent out of the country if he proved undesirable? How many people are sent out of the United States as undersirable? How many are sent out of Russia and other countries? Why should Canada repeal this section which enables us to deal with these people? That is a question I leave with the minister, and I cannot think for a single moment that he is serious in asking us to repeal a section such as this which gives us this protection—a protection that can be put into operation without recourse to the courts of law, with all the costs that go with criminal trials, and all the effort that is made to magnify into heroes these people who would destroy our institutions, and all the talk about the poor stranger and the foreigner within our gates. It is not that. This is merely the exercise of the high right of sovereignty with respect to the citizenship of Canada. It is merely saying that we as a people will keep without our borders undesirable persons who are promulgating these doctrines; that is all, and I do submit that the bill should not pass.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has seen fit to make an appeal to me in this matter, although I cannot quite see why he should do so, seeing that this is a government bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the letter was addressed to you.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, a letter was addressed to me last year with regard to this matter, but I would point out to the hon. member that legislation of this character was introduced by the government in preceding years. I have no doubt whatever that the government itself has received from every section of this country, protests against this legislation which was placed on the statute books in 1919. The hon. member for West Calgary has held up the United States as a model for us in this regard. Some of us would prefer to take Great Britain rather than the United States as a model. In England they have maintained a very considerable degree of freedom of speech, and the liberty of the subject has been a good deal more carefully guarded than in the United States. In fact, usually it has been our boast that justice is better served in England than in the United States. I do not quite see why the hon. member should hold up the United States as our model in this regard.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does this bill apply to British subjects?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and I am coming to that. I had not thought, after the debates of the three or four years past, that it would be necessary for us to say very much in regard to this measure, but I would point out to my hon. friend from West Calgary that, with regard to the legal aspects of this question, we could not do better than read the presentation which Senator Dandurand made last year in the Senate. I think that nowhere can a more carefully worded legal case be found than that which was presented last year. I desire to point out a few particulars incorporated into the bill with their bearings upon the right of freedom in this country. Here is one phrase that is used in the bill:

Anyone who assumes any powers of government in Canada—

That is a very broad phrase and has been interpreted in a very broad fashion. If, for example, a company should maintain its own police force it is thereby assuming what is in reality a governmental function. Of course as a matter of fact nobody would prosecute a huge corporation, even though its officials had assumed governmental functions. In the case however of an industrial dispute, when certain labour people attempt to exercise discipline over their membership, it may be interpreted as the assumption of powers of government. Another phrase in the act reads:

Anyone who by common repute belongs to, or is suspected of belonging to—

I submit that is going altogether too far, even with the word "criminal". There are many people who, by common repute, are desperate characters. I see the hon. member for Labelle smiling. I am quite sure that in certain sections of the country, by common repute, he is far from being a worthy citizen of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: He is a British subject.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will come to that later. That clause as drawn reads:

Any man who by common repute belongs to, or is suspected of belonging to, any secret organization.

When did suspicion on the part of the general public become a ground for condemnation?

An hon. MEMBER: A subject for deportation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will come to that later. When did suspicion become a ground for condemnation? Then further than that, such allegations or suspicions with regard to any citizen mean that he may be classed among the prohibited or undesirable class.

I have a good deal of sympathy with hon. members of this House who have given no particular attention to the act. It is very complicated and perhaps skilfully drawn. I am not quite sure—to give credit to those who are responsible for the drawing of the act—that those who drew the act quite recognized how far-reaching it was. In another part of the act there is a clause which says that anyone who belongs to the prohibited classes cannot establish domicile in Canada. That means that it makes no difference whether a man has been here, one, five or twenty-five years; so long as he belongs to the prohibited class, it is impossible for him to establish what is technically known as domicile in Canada.

Mr. SMOKE: Prima facie.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He cannot establish domicile in Canada. That is the serious part. He may be deported. Even although he has been a resident of Canada for a great number of years, he becomes liable to deportation. In the second section we read:

2. Proof that any person belonged to or was within the description of any of the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of this section at any time since the fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, shall, for all the purposes of this act be deemed to establish prima facie that he still belongs to such prohibited or undesirable class or classes.

If in the past a man had belonged to an undesirable organization or secret society, or any other prohibited class, he may have migrated to this country and completely changed his whole manner of life, but if he is accused by anyone or even suspected of belonging to these classes, the very fact that he once belonged to such a class is considered prima facie evidence. I do not think that is a fair provision. The onus of proof ought not to be upon the accused man. The burden of proof ought to rest with the authorities or those who accuse him.

I come now to the important part which has been stressed by the hon. member for West Calgary. I believe he has made the objection because he has not carefully read the act. He claims that a British subject is not liable under this clause. I affirm—and again I would refer him to the presentation of Senator Dandurand—that a man born in England, a British subject is liable under this act.

Mr. BOURASSA: Born anywhere outside of Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. The fact is however that this applies particularly to the British subject. A foreign-born man may become naturalized in this country.

Mr. STEVENS: I am certainly interested in the point. Will my hon. friend, when he makes that assertion, demonstrate how he harmonizes the statement with these two matters:

Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The very question of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre I think reveals the fact that a great many of the hon. members of this House have been quite in the dark with regard to the meaning of the act, and perhaps that has led them to mistrust the motives of some of us who have tried to have the act repealed. The hon. member for West Calgary referred to the words in the section:

Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

That refers to either one of two groups. The first is:

By reason of birth in Canada.

That exempts native-born Canadians.

—or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

That exempts foreign-born Canadians. Foreigners may be naturalized in Canada. They are frequently naturalized in Canada, and in such case they come under the exemption in this clause.

It is quite true that in their case naturalization certificates may be cancelled. The provision is contained in another law that dovetails into this. But in the case of British born citizens it is not necessary for them to become naturalized. I have never yet come across a British born citizen who has been naturalized in Canada, nor do I see why it should be necessary for such naturalization to take place. Indeed, I do not know that a British born citizen can be naturalized in Canada. Be that as it may, the point that I want to emphasize is that the British born Canadian is not naturalized in this country and, not being naturalized in Canada, he does not come under the exemption provided in this act.

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate the explanation. I see the point my hon. friend is making, and I have a suggestion to make presently.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may suggest that my hon. friend himself would come under this act.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right—if I committed all the offences enumerated in it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Or if the hon. gentleman should be suspected or by common repute be regarded as having committed any of the offences named.

Mr. STEVENS: I leave that to my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is a very serious situation. My colleague from East Calgary (Mr. Adshead), born in Manchester, comes under this act, as does also my other colleague born in Leeds.

Mr. STEVENS: They do not come under the act unless they commit these offences.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but the point is that they are not exempted. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) observed that British citizens did not come under the act, but he is misinformed on that point; the act does apply to British citizens. That is the question at issue. Why, the Minister of Immigration, Mr. Forke, who comes from Scotland, himself comes under this section and is liable to deportation without trial by his own department. Surely a reductio ad absurdum!

Mr. BENNETT: Has he been guilty of any of these offences?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He need not commit any of the offences enumerated to come under the act; he need only be suspected of having committed any of them. Or, if by common repute he belongs to any organization of the kind defined in the act he comes under the section I am discussing. The hon. member for West Calgary made an impassioned speech to the House and was emphatic on the point that the law did not apply to people of British birth. I say that it does apply to them and so his argument falls by the way. I go further and say that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), who I understand was born in Ireland, is also subject to deportation under the act. I do not wonder that he wants to have this law abolished, because seeing that he came from Ireland he may be suspected at any time belonging to one of the groups mentioned.

Mr. McGIBBON: If any of these gentlemen should be guilty of any of the offences mentioned why should they not come under the law?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will come to that point in a moment. I need not refer to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), another member of the cabinet. He was born in England and this law applies to him quite definitely. Not only in theory does this law apply to British born citizens but in actual fact it has been invoked against such people. It is therefore not a matter of mere academic interest, and that is why some of us feel so strongly about it. I dislike very much referring to the matter inasmuch as it has been discussed time and again; but I must allude, in passing, to the trouble we had in Winnipeg in 1919, when a number of Britishers, men born in England and Scotland, were arrested under this section and were liable to deportation. It was definitely decided by the department that they were to be deported within a few hours without trial, and it was only because of the protest made, not only by the labour people but by thoughtful citizens in all walks of life throughout the country, that this action was stayed. I repeat therefore that the matter is not one simply of academic interest. The law was actually invoked against this class of citizens and it may be used again.

I come now to another important consideration. Some of us in this House have been accused again and again of a desire to foster crime simply because we want to get rid of this act. We are charged with wanting to encourage offences of this description and to help people tear down the constitution. I am not advocating any of the things that are legislated against in this act. Not at all. I do say however, and say most emphatically, that the worst man in this country ought to have a fair trial by jury. Far from that being the case under this act, all that is necessary to make anyone liable to deportation is that he be suspected of any of these offences or that he should by common repute, belong to any of the organizations mentioned. Any man suspected of any of these things may be reported to the immigration department and they, without anything further than a mere departmental investigation, can send him out of the country. That is too great a power to confer upon any department. If any one is suspected or is even guilty of any such offence the very least we can do is to give him a fair trial and not decide his fate by a departmental investigation. That is what we plead for. As a British citizen I claim for all British born citizens in Canada the right to fair trial by jury. But I would extend that plea in the case of those of foreign birth. I do not see why, simply because a man happens to have been born outside Canada, he should after coming to this country be shipped out again upon a report to the department that he belongs to some undesirable organization. I do not see why he should be deported without, at any rate, a fair trial. Is that the way we are going to teach our newer Canadians to respect British institutions?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend does not suggest that there is any country in the world which enters into a criminal trial before deciding upon the deportation of undesirables? It is a matter purely of departmental investigation to decide who shall be permitted to stay in the country. In any event the right of habeas corpus is always available to the citizen under sentence of deportation.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend reads the immigration law he will find that the ight of habeas corpus is taken away.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any rights in that regard are removed.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has studied the act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Those who are most strenuously objecting to this proposal have evidently neglected to look into the act as carefully as they should or they would not make the statements we have been hearing. The law as it stands virtually creates the Immigration department a judicial body. It seems that citizens are to be punished by deportation without any preliminary trial.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not punishment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The ostensible purpose of the law is to enable the department to get rid of undesirables who come to our shores. The real effect, however, is, not to keep people from coming into the country, but, after they have been here one, five, ten, or even fifty years, to punish them by deportation, and that not for acts committed before they came to the country but for acts which they have committed or which they are alleged to have committed, or are even suspected of having committed in this country. I can understand the purpose of the Immigration Act to free this country from undesirables as they arrive here.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he be conent with the Immigration Act as it stood in 1910?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is two years since I have read these acts, and I am afraid I cannot recall the wording of the act of 1910.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand it is the only power under which deportation can be carried cut. If you pass this bill you take away all powers of deportation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The leader of the opposition is mistaken, and I would call to his attention the fact that it was the hon. member for West Calgary who last year suggested an amendment to the bill by which he thought to perfect it, which went further than the original draft act as presented by the minister. In the original bill there was some provision for deportation after trial for crimes of this character, but owing to the amendment introduced by the hon. member for West Calgary, that was modified and it was suggested that the whole clause should be eliminated; anyone who was present at the debate last year will recall the change.

My plea, Mr. Speaker, is that the Immigration Act quite rightly undertakes to stand guard at our gates and to say who may be admitted into Canada. If by any chance some get inside our gates who are undesirable I claim that the right still exists under the Immigration Act to deport them. It is perhaps quite in place that the department should have some act on the statute books to permit of such deportation. But so far as I have any influence, I refuse to allow an act to remain on the statute books which will use the departmental machinery for trying a man, and then deporting him without a fair jury trial; I think that is against all our best traditions. Personally I would not object to the country deporting a man who is undesirable; I will go that far with the hon. member for West Calgary. If a man is convicted of belonging to the undesirable classes; if he is convicted of acting against the best interests of Canada, I do not know that I would have any objection to deporting him.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

It is not the deportation I object to, and I want to make that quite clear. What I do object to is the deportation without any other trial than that afforded by a departmental investigation.

Mr. HANSON: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he know that under the law of the United States on this very point it is always a departmental matter, and that it is the same in England and in every other civilized country? Where does he get the trial by jury on this particular point?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think the American laws provide for the deportation of American citizens. Our law goes much beyond that; the United States will deport people who are not American citizens, but we undertake to deport Canadian citizens of other than Canadian birth, even those born in Great Britain. I happened to be born in Canada and am not liable under this act; the hon. member who asked the question (Mr. Hanson) is not liable under it, but there are some twenty or thirty men in this House who would come under it, and simply because I happened to be born in Canada I would not insist upon the right of trial by jury for myself and refuse that right to my fellow Canadian citizens who were so unfortunate as to have been born in the motherland. It seems to me that the least we can claim is the same rights for the British-born in this country as we claim for our own Canadian-born. We have heard much of equal status. This is equal status, if you like. It seems to me that the House has been labouring for several years under a misapprehension as to the real purposes for which the amendments have been sought. I confess that the bill is a very tricky one, and that it is only by carefully comparing the different sections that one can understand all its bearings. The outstanding feature before us, however, is whether or not British born and foreign born Canadian citizens will have the right to trial by the regular courts before they may be subject to deportation.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire—

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, with regard to this act there is a great deal to be said with respect to—

Mr. SPEAKER: I saw the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) first.

Mr. CAHAN: He gave way to me for a few moments, since I am leaving the city shortly. There is a great deal to be said against deportation merely on suspicion. As it now stands, the act might very well be reconsidered, but to repeal it would leave this country in a very precarious condition.

In 1918 I happened to be Director of Public Safety for Canada, and I saw the entire workings of the American, British and Canadian secret services. In that year there were hundreds and thousands of dollars, and I would say up to a million and more, of Russian money brought into this country for the purpose of carrying on an agitation advocating assassination and everything else against which this act purports to enact measures for the protection of the country. I personally sent for the Russians, the communistic emissaries, and had several personal conversations with them, in which I told them very plainly that any remedial measures which could be adopted by means of order in council at that time would be enacted to prevent their efforts from being carried to the treasonable extent to which they proposed to go. In a measure, by such intimidation we prevented them from carrying out certain measures which they were endeavouring to accomplish by the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars in this country.

The act as it then stood did not go far enough to protect the interests of Canada at that time. I believe this act was drawn up the year after the close of the war; possibly it goes a little too far, but it should not be abrogated, because the same measures are being taken by soviet propaganda in this country to-day. We who know the inside of things are all aware of it; the Department of Justice of Canada must be well advised with regard to it. The efforts which were made in 1918 were successful to a certain extent, but following the close of the war similar efforts have been carried on and are being carried on throughout the length and breadth of this country. If I remember rightly in 1918 there were two secret printing presses in Montreal, one in Toronto, one in Hamilton, one in Port Arthur, one in Winnipeg and one in Vancouver.

Mr. HEAPS: Secret printing presses?

Mr. CAHAN: Secret printing presses.

Mr. HEAPS: I can hardly credit that.

Mr. CAHAN: I am giving the facts as I knew them. When I left the Department of Justice I left there a pile of reports a yard high of the material they were printing, in every known language in this country with the exception of French; I did not find any propaganda of that kind being printed in the French language.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the hon. gentleman aware that one was arrested for having printed a cook book in Ukrainian?

Mr. CAHAN: I don't know why he was arrested. I may say that during the time I was in the Department of Justice very few were arrested except for proper cause. As a matter of fact very few were arrested, because I found that an effective measure was to send for these men and talk to them, threaten them with deportation immediately if they did not stop their efforts. This country must protect itself against the advocacy of assassination or violence to the officials of the government of Canada. There must be some law whereby those foreigners who come in here—even if they come from Great Britain because of having been born there—sent in by the Soviet for the purpose of advocating such measures—can be prevented from carrying out their designs. This country must be in a position to protect itself. There is no doubt about that in my mind. If the present enactment goes too far or if it is unjust let us consider some amendment or modification of it. There are criticisms made made by the hon. member who preceded me which have effective force with regard to "suspicion" and "general repute", and that sort of thing, but there must be a measure on the statute book of this country for the protection of government in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: We have other safeguards under the law.

Mr. CAHAN: Without that section, and under the law as it stood before, you could not take effective measures to expel these people from the country. That was my experience. We tried every expedient possible and we were unable to take effective action under the law as it then stood. Why, Mr. Speaker, I had men come into my office in the Department of Justice and threaten—unless we carried out certain measures which they proposed—to put a sufficient number of men into the city of Ottawa to take possession of it within forty-eight hours, and they had behind them organizations which would have enabled them—in spite of the police force available here at that time—to take effective possession of this city and of the very seat of government.

Mr. BENNETT: As they did in Winnipeg.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman really believe that?

Mr. CAHAN: I do because I came into personal contact with them and I know whereof I am speaking. I say that we had not then on the statute book—apart from the orders in council which were passed under the War Measures Act—any effective measure for preventing the execution of their threats. Now in view of that—and I am stating what I know to be the truth—I say that we should have on the statute book a measure enacted by this parliament which would prevent the successful carrying out of any such scheme as that. Therefore I think this bill should be held over; that the government should, through its legal experts, inquire into the whole matter in the light of the information which they have in the Department of Justice and its branches. Then let them bring down a measure to modify this language in certain particulars so as to meet the complaint that injustice may be wrought to persons who may be merely the objects of suspicion. The whole matter must and should be gone into by the government and a proper measure formulated, modifying somewhat certain provisions of the existing act, the whole of which it is sought here to repeal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat I would ask him if he does not think that even men of the kind he has described ought to have a fair trial.

Mr. CAHAN: So far as citizens of this country are concerned, yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: British born citizens.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly so far as British born citizens are concerned I would make the same reply. But when men come in from Moscow, or certain other places that I might mention—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Italy.

Mr. CAHAN: —come in under passports granted by their own governments and viséd by ours, or under a mere temporary permit, or when they come in under the guise of immigrants, they are assumed, so long as they remain here, to be subject to every law of this country and they must abide by the provisions of those laws. But as to those men who violate the understanding which exists between nations, under which the citizens of one nationality are allowed to make their way freely in the country of another nationality, those men who come for the purpose of assassination, for the purpose of committing crime, for the purpose of blowing up our bridges, for the purpose of destroying our arsenals, for the purpose of carrying on propaganda which would induce others to commit crime, I would issue an edict expelling them from the country, and they ought to thank God that they were allowed to go. Because of my experience in this matter I feel strongly about it. Nevertheless, I would not do the injustice of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre complained.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You would give them a trial first.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. CAHAN: I would not give the foreigner a trial if it was clear to the Department of Justice that he had violated the understanding under which he had come into this country —either as an immigrant or on a passport fraudulently granted to him—and had come here with the intention of committing crime. I would give a trial to every British subject, whether he be of Canadian nationality or whether he be of Australian nationality, to every man who has come in and been naturalized and thereby become a Canadian citizen, but in the case of such aliens as I met personally—who admitted to me in my office the objects for which they had come into this country, who admitted they had come here for the purpose of committing crime themselves and instigating Canadian citizens to commit crime—I would deal with them in the most peremptory manner possible under the immigration laws.

Mr. BENNETT: Rising to a question of privilege, I have to thank my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) for having drawn my attention to the fact that I used the words "British subject" erroneously. I was speaking very rapidly and should have employed the expression "Canadian citizen" instead of which I erroneously used the term "British citizen or subject" and did so quite frequently.

Mr. FORKE: You used the term "British subject" several times.

Mr. BENNETT: I know I did, but I did so erroneously, and I now desire to make a correction.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I might take this immediate opportunity of replying to the interjection of the Minister of Immigration, and pointing out to him that the explanation my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) made a few moments ago is quite opportune, because the old act of 1910, which I now have under my hand, uses the term "Canadian citizen," and it was quite innocently that the hon. gentleman made the error referred to. Now if the minister would do me the honour of following me for a few minutes I think I can show to him and his colleagues, and to the House as well, some very strong reasons why we should pause before passing this bill. I also invite the attention of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who has taken a very deep interest in this matter. Before passing to that phase of the question I should like to say that I find some response in my own mind to a part of the appeal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and that is in regard to the words in the act "reputed to belong" or "suspected to belong." I have no hesitation in saying that is open to abuse, although I doubt if any very definite cases of abuse can be shown. I know there is a dispute with respect to a certain period in the Winnipeg general strike where it is claimed that provision was taken advantage of. Outside of that I do not know of any case. But I would remind my hon. friend, while I go to meet him in that respect, that the act of 1910, which was passed in perhaps one of the most peaceful periods of our history by the government of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, contains these words:

—or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control, any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail.

Precisely the same words as are in the act my hon. friend now complains of.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the word "money" in both acts?

Mr. STEVENS: I will read again the exact words from the 1910 act:

—any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control, any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail.

So I want my hon. friend at least to concede that these objectionable words were not interjected into the act of 1919; they were already in the act of 1910. The right hon. Prime Minister of to-day was at that time Minister of Labour, and no one, I think, will accuse him of having at that period or since any prejudice against those who are fairly radical in their views on labour or sociological questions.

I wish the Prime Minister were in his seat. But let me appeal to the Solicitor General, who perhaps has charge of this bill from the legal standpoint, as to what will happen if the bill passes. By section 1, it is provided:

Section 41 of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1910, as enacted by chapter 26 of the statutes of 1919, is repealed.

That means that you also repeal the original clause of the act of 1910, leaving the country without the protection that it had even at that time. I do not know whether that is the intent of the bill, but it will be the result of passing it.

In order that we may have before us the type that we deem to be undesirable citizens, I am going to read sections 40 and 41 of the act of 1910, dealing with the deportation of prohibited and undesirable classes. This is section 40:

Whenever any person, other than a Canadian citizen,—

I want my hon. friends to note those words, "other than a Canadian citizen".

Mr. HEAPS: Does not a British born citizen automatically become a Canadian citizen?

Mr. STEVENS: No. If my hon. friend will follow me he will see that I am correct in my interpretation.

Whenever a person, other than a Canadian citizen, within three years after landing in Canada,—

I direct the attention of hon. members to those words 'within three years after landing in Canada."

—has been convicted of a criminal offence in Canada, or has become a prostitute or an inmate of a house of ill-fame, or by common repute has become a procurer or pimp or person living on the avails of prostitution, or has become a professional beggar or a public charge, or an inmate of a penitentiary, jail, reformatory, prison, hospital, insane asylum or public charitable institution, or enters or remains in Canada contrary to any provision of this act, it shall be the duty of any officer cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the Minister or Superintendent of Immigration, giving full particulars.

There you have the section describing certain classes of people that may be deported wthout trial after investigation by a board of inquiry, which I will come to in a moment. Their conviction of any of these criminal offences within three years after entry into Canada is considered sufficient to warrant their deportation, that is, to declare them undesirable for Canada and to send them back whence they came.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me? He has just stated that a person would be subject to deportation if convicted of any of the offences referred to within three years of arrival in this country. If I read the Immigration Act correctly, such a person would be deported if convicted of any criminal offence within five years after landing in Canada. The three years has been changed to five and the section now applies accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS: I am reading section 40 of the 1910 act. The amendment my hon. friend refers to was made subsequently.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I think I am right in saying that under this act it becomes impossible for a person who belongs to the undesirable classes to secure Canadian domicile even after residing here for fifty years.

Mr. STEVENS: We will come to that in a moment. I am trying to show the House what was thought necessary to protect this country against undesirable persons even in times of peace and rest. Now I come to section 41 of the 1910 act, and if hon. gentlemen will follow the clause we are repealing they will see that it agrees pretty completely with this section:

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen—

The House will note the phrase "other than a Canadian citizen."

—advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or the assassination of any official of the government of Great Britain or Canada or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or of any foreign government, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control, any resident of Canada by force, or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail; such person for the purposes of this act shall be considered and classed as an undersirable immigrant, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the Minister or Superintendent of Immigration, giving full particulars.

Mr. NEILL: What happens then?

Mr. STEVENS: I am building up the background for this act and for my argument and the argument of my hon. friends from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in support of the maintenance of this act. In 1910, I repeat, when the world was at peace perhaps as it had not been for many years, Canada felt it necessary to protect herself against agitators of this character who were other than Canadian citizens—I want the House to get that point particularly, because it has been stressed—from finding a sojourning place in Canada.

Mr. FORKE: May I ask the hon. member a question for information? He is building up his argument on Canadian citizenship. Is he keeping in mind that section 41 expressly exempts British subjects born in Britain from being described as Canadian citizens?

Mr. STEVENS: Precisely. Will my hon. friend let me point this out, and I will leave it to the judgment of the House; I am not going to labour the point. In the two sections of the act of 1910 which I have quoted the words are "other than a Canadian citizen."

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend has not caught the point.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister will follow me, I will try and elucidate. There is no question, I think, in our minds that the intention of this act was that a person who was not a Canadian citizen—I was going to use an Irishism and say, who was not a Canadian citizen before he came here, but let me put it this way—a Canadian citizen by birth, because a person coming from another part of the empire would undoubtedly come under these two sections, but it was called in question whether that applied or not, and then it was made clear in the act of 1919.

Now I pass on, if the Minister of Immigration will permit me to this point, which has been very much stressed by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre: What are the conditions or terms under which these people are deported? My hon. friend says: Surely you would not deport a person, no matter who he is, or what his crime may be, without giving him a jury trial in the courts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Any proper judicial trial.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, a trial in the courts of the country. Now what does the act of 1910 say? It contains a provision for handling these cases to which I have referred, different classes of persons who within five years may have offended against the laws of Canada. Section 42 of the act of 1910 says:

Upon receiving a complaint—

Let me interject that the act imposes upon the municipal authorities the necessity of reporting if being cognizant of it:

Upon receiving a complaint from any officer, or from any clerk or secretary or other official of a municipality, whether directly or through the Superintendent of Immigration, against any person alleged to belong to any prohibited or undesirable class, the minister may order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigrant station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a board of inquiry or by an officer acting as such.

That is the provision made in the act, that the case shall be inquired into by a board of inquiry. That is the practice in connection with all these subjects of deportation. It is the practice I believe in every civilized country in the world.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member did not emphasize the fact that one officer acting alone could deport the man.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not complaining about that.

Mr. FORKE: I am pointing it out.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not see the point. I hope the minister does not think I am trying to trick the House.

Mr. FORKE: There does not necessarily have to be a board. One officer can do it.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us try and get it clear. Section 42 says that upon receiving a complaint:

—the minister may order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigrant station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a board of inquiry or by an officer acting as such.

Mr. FORKE: One officer can do it.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to be fair, and I want to be intelligible. Will the minister say—

Mr. FORKE: I simply want to point out the fact that the hon. member emphasized that it was a board, composed of three probably.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He did not say how many.

Mr. FORKE: I am only pointing out that where a board was not convenient, one officer could decide the case.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that what is in the minister's mind is this, that one of the reasons why this bill is before the House now is that one officer may act as a board of inquiry. But I am reading the act of 1910. I am trying to show the House that these drastic measures were in the act in 1910, in days of peace and quietude. How much more reason is there that we should have these provisions now, when there is agitation and disturbance? That is the point I am trying to make. Let me continue with section 42:

Such board of inquiry—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there not a difference between a man who has been in gaol or has been a subject of charity and is held subject to deportation,—a situation clearly recognized by the whole community, and the case of a man who is accused of a political crime?

Mr. STEVENS: My answer is, first, that I am reading the old act which included both classes; and secondly—and I invite the House to consider this—a man who is living off the proceeds of prostitution, or a man who has been in the penitentiary or gaol or reformatory or in an insane asylum or public charitable institution, is he guilty of a greater degree of moral turpitude and more offensive to a country than the man who advocates the assassination of a public official, or who suggests the unlawful destruction of property, or who without lawful authority assumes the powers of government in this country, or by force or by threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, seeks to extort money and so forth?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do not skip; read it all.

Mr. STEVENS: I am just citing these classes, and I ask are these classes last described less objectionable than the others to whom I have referred coming under section 40.

Mr. CANNON: In order to have a fair discussion, which I know my hon. friend wishes, I would point out that section 40 does not confine itself simply to the classes mentioned by my hon. friend. If my hon. friend reads further he will find in clause 40 these words, "or any person who enters or remains in Canada contrary to any provision of this act." If my hon. friend will revert to section 3 of the act, he will see that every individual against whom we may have any reason whatever for deportation falls under section 40.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so.

Mr. CANNON: It does not deal only with prostitutes.

Mr. STEVENS: No, certainly not. I will read some more. Under section 3 we have mentioned idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons.

I had a letter the other day from three persons living in Vancouver, a man and his two daughters. The man's wife and another crippled daughter are now in Warsaw. The father and the two daughters have been in Canada for I believe eight years. They are all earning their own living here, and are all doing well. One of the daughters is a stenographer in an office and is a very, very desirable citizen indeed. But for eight years the father and his two daughters in Canada have been separated from the mother and the crippled daughter in Russia. Why? Because under section 3 you will not allow into this country a person who is crippled. I am not seeking to hide anything in this act; not at all, but again I ask, is this daughter who is crippled and whom we keep out of this country as much guilty of an offence and as undesirable as the person who advocates the assassination of an official of this country or the overthrow of our government and institutions.

Mr. HEAPS: Does my hon. friend say that the act of 1910 covers all these cases?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not claim that.

Mr. HEAPS: Then why is the act of 1919 necessary?

Mr. STEVENS: I will tell my hon. friend why.

Mr. NEILL: I understand my hon. friend's argument is that the act of 1910 is quite as drastic as the act of 1919?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. NEILL: Or nearly so?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. NEILL: Will my hon. friend explain to what extent the provisions of the act of 1919 exceeded the provisions of the act of 1910?

Mr. STEVENS: The exact words have not been underlined in the bill before me. I only took the matter up since the debate opened, and I am not fully prepared to discuss it. I did invite the House to follow me while I was reading the old section so that they might note the exact difference, but I think the point arises in the latter portion of the act. I was led into a bit of a trap in asking a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) The words of the section are:

—who is a British subject either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

[Mr. Stevens.]

I think the act of 1919 was designed to make it clear that the words "Canadian citizen" did not include a person coming from Great Britain.

Mr. NEILL: Is that the only provision?

Mr. STEVENS: There are some words added in the clause which they have not underlined, and it is difficult to pick them out. I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre will agree with me that the act of 1919 was designed to make clear that those who might come to Canada, even though they came from Great Britain, counselling the various offences enumerated there should be subject to deportation. My point is that the principle of that provision was in the act of 1910 and that was not by any means disturbed. Therefore we should keep it in the act at the present time. I would suggest that the House might consider modifying the harshness of the act, but I certainly am opposed to the repeal of the section which repeals the original section with it.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 305 (from the Senate) to incorporate the Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville).

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

REPEAL OF PROVISION FOR DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN CLASSES

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) for the second reading of Bill No. 269, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad that the Prime Minister is in his seat because I desire to appeal to him to restore the act of 1910. That act was passed when he, I think, was Minister of Labour in the government of that day, and its terms will I presume be satisfactory to him. In what I now say I am speaking for myself and not for all those who sit on this side of the House. I have not consulted with my colleagues, except a few, and my leader agrees with me that it is a reasonable request to ask for the restoration of the act of 1910. I want to acknowledge the Solicitor General's courtesy in calling my attention to a matter which I overlooked this morning, and I want to give full weight to what he pointed out to me subsequently to the rising of the House at one o'clock. He pointed out that a part of this section is covered in section 3 of the act as it now stands. I will read these two parts so that the House may know the extent to which this general subject is now covered. I refer to paragraphs (n) and (o) of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1919. I had considerable difficulty in getting this from the library but I have succeeded in securing a copy. The first one sent me was not up to date. These two paragraphs read:

(n) Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada or of constituted law and authority, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property;

(o) Persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching in or opposition to organized government, or advocating or teaching the duty, necessity or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the government of Canada, or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property.

Those paragraphs appear in the act of 1919 and to that extent they offset my argument of this morning. They do not however go as far as we should like. I want to thank the Solicitor General for bringing the matter to my attention.

Now I wish to read the existing provisions which will be repealed should this bill go through, having made allowance for the two sections I have read which will remain in the act. This is what will be repealed:

Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or. . . . . the government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies . . . . or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada, by force or by threat of bodily harm or by blackmail. . . . .

The foregoing words will pass out of our legislation. I want to impress upon the Prime Minister and the government the fact that in the act of 1910, which will cease to operate if this bill is adopted, the following words appear:

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada or other British Dominion, colony, possession or dependency. . . . or of any foreign government, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm or by blackmail.

These words are in the act of 1910, and they will be repealed if this bill goes through. I am personally willing to agree to the dropping of the amended section 41, now before the House for repeal, and to the restoration of section 41 which I have just read, only a very small part of which is now included in the act in section 3 paragraphs (n) and (o). It will be noted that certain words would seem to be merely repetition; for instance, the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada, and so on. The present act provides against that in Canada, but it does not provide against persons advocating the overthrow by violence of the government of Great Britain or other British possessions.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. member allow a question? Paragraph (n) reads as follows:

Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada, or of constituted law and authority—

I call my hon. friend's attention to the following words:

—or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government—

If that does not cover every case I would like to know what words are necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to split hairs, but the fact is that the words—

Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada, or of constituted law and authority—are one sentence in the act, and it is limited to Canada.

Mr. CANNON: I will admit that.

Mr. STEVENS: It is one sentence, and it must mean that you have no recourse against a person advocating the overthrow of other governments.

Mr. CANNON: Unless the rest of the paragraph covers it.

Mr. STEVENS: I should think it does not, and my point is this: Let us go back to the statute as it was in 1910. This morning, when the Prime Minister was not in his seat, I pointed out that the statute of 1910 was conceived, drafted and passed during a period of time when this country in common with the rest of the world was enjoying perhaps the greatest era of peace and freedom from disorder which occurred during the last century, and of course my right hon. friend was minister at the time. I think if it was thought wise then, we should retain it in our statutes now, and I suggest to the government that instead of repealing this act now they either let it stand as it is until next session or between now and Monday repeal the present section 41 and reinstate the old section which was in the statute of 1910. I may point out to hon. gentlemen who have been advocating very strongly the repeal of this section on the ground that it refers to British subjects who are not Canadian-born, that the statute as it stands refers to British subjects who are not Canadian-born. For instance, paragraphs (n) and (o) refer to "persons who believe," which includes anyone from any part of the empire. It does not include Canadians, because a Canadian is subject to our own courts. Any person coming into Canada or who is here advocating these things which are now in the act is covered by these paragraphs, so that the argument that we are doing a grievous injury by not excluding British subjects generally is a mistake.

Let me give a practical illustration of that. A few years ago one of the officers of this very department, Mr. Hopkinson, was shot and killed in the court room of the court house in Vancouver by a British subject; that is, a British subject from India. Of course that man was apprehended and later suffered the extreme penalty, but I point out that it is absurd to say that a person who comes from some other part of the empire should be immune from the provisions of this act, advocating as they so often do these very things. This man who shot Hopkinson was one of a group of individuals who were anarchistic in their beliefs, and who were against all governments. My right hon. friend will remember some of them, I am sure; I have forgotten the names for the moment, but they were certain Hindus of the extreme type who advocated assassination and went so far as to practise it in Canada. My point is that we should certainly have a law with some power behind it and some definiteness to it whereby we could deport such people, and in so far as the present law meets that situation I am entirely in accord with it.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Let me close my remarks, because I do not wish to weary the House, with another appeal to the Prime Minister to restore section 41, which was placed in the act at a time when coolness and deliberation characterized our proceedings, and when there was no reason whatever for agitation. Let him eliminate the amendment of 1919 which, with some measure of reason perhaps, is complained of because it was carried out at a time of great excitement and unusual stress.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I desire to say only a few words with reference to the subject now before the House. I believe the sting in section 41 is really at the end of the clause, where it says:

> Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

It seems a very harmless sort of statement, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not seem to think it casts any reflection upon Canadian citizens who were born in Great Britain. I do not agree with him; I think it does cast such a reflection.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is referring to me; fix the crime upon the right person.

Mr. FORKE: I do not count it a crime. I think there is a reflection cast in one way. A man who came here from Great Britain forty or fifty years ago, who married a Canadian citizen and has reared a family of Canadians, occupies a position of inferiority to Canadian citizens during his whole lifetime because he has not the privileges they enjoy. I do not think there is any necessity for a law of this description and I do not think the people of this country want such a law.

Mr. STEVENS: The only privilege he has is to commit a crime.

Mr. FORKE: If he commits a crime the law of the country will deal with him, and if there is any cause for deportation the court will deport him. A great deal has been said to the effect that these people would not be deported for these crimes. There is nothing in the act against that, but we want to give every Canadian citizen in this country a fair trial by our ordinary constituted courts, and I think if anyone studies the Immigration Act carefully he will realize that it is stringent enough.

I accept the explanation made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), when he said that he meant British citizens all the time he was saying Canadian citizens, yet if you look up Hansard I think you will find that his whole argument was built up on the fact that Canadian citizens in the wider sense of the word were exempted from section 41, and it seems strange to me that he should have repeated the words "Canadian citizens" when he meant "British citizens." A great deal of argument has arisen because of the understanding that Canadian citizens in the ordinary sense of the word would come under section 41 and would be liable to deportation without trial in the ordinary course of events. It has been pointed out also that one immigration officer can try a man on the suspicion that he is preaching sedition, which seems to be almost absurd on the face of it. Canadian immigration officers as a whole are not in a position, nor have they the education and training, to try any man in the case of such a serious thing as deportation, and deportation is a very serious thing. One argument I have heard made—

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend permit me? Referring to section 3 of the act it will be seen that with respect to all deportation cases without exception power rests with the board of inquiry or one officer at the present time, and that the provision is applicable to British subjects other than Canadian citizens.

Mr. FORKE: It is if the person is guilty of any of these crimes.

Mr. STEVENS: No, if he is found guilty by one officer.

Mr. FORKE: After being admitted to the country.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes and within five years after being admitted in the case of all these offences, every one of them.

Mr. FORKE: Well, I will not argue the point because I have not looked into it particularly, but if it is so then I claim there should be an ordinary judicial trial.

Mr. STEVENS: Please do not advocate that. You had better consult your colleagues first.

Mr. FORKE: One of the arguments advanced has been: Why change this law? Although it has never been found to be of any service, or any use, why change it? Well, if the provision is all right it should be left there, and if it is wrong it ought to be removed. I do not want to take up the time of the House unduly but I claim that there are ample provisions in the Immigration Act, and in the Criminal Code to take care of every conceivable case, without having section 41 in the Immigration Act. If the law of 1910 met all requirements why was this clause inserted in the act of 1919?

Mr. STEVENS: I ask the minister—I have already asked him—to drop this offensive one and restore the act as it was in 1910.

Mr. FORKE: I shall have to leave that to the Solicitor General to say because I do not know what was in the act of 1910.

Mr. STEVENS: I will send a copy of the act over to my hon. friend.

Mr. FORKE: The Solicitor General has it at hand. If he has had time carefully to consider the act and thinks it covers the requirements, I may be inclined to agree to my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. STEVENS: Thank you.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is it not a fact that every order for deportation has to be signed by the minister?

Mr. FORKE: Not necessarily. Under section 41 the man has the right of appeal to the minister, and I think I am correct in saying that the Hon. Mr. Calder, when he was the Minister of Immigration, said he would not assume the responsibility in such matters, but that was a matter of discretion on his own part. At any rate those to be deported would have the right of appeal to the Minister of Immigration.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I regret that the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has precipitated the present discussion on this bill. I think it would have been much better to have avoided stirring up feelings and friction that ought to have been allowed to sink into oblivion. But seeing that he has raised the issue it becomes the duty of those of us who believe in the bill to support it. The hon. member for West Calgary charged the government with bringing this bill down in the closing days of the session, but in that he differs from the attitude taken, very properly I think, by his leader the other day, when he said that there was small need to debate these bills now coming before the House because they had already been debated last year, and no good object would be served by rehashing the arguments then presented. That is particularly true of the present bill which, if my memory is not wrong, has been passed by this House three times, certainly twice, and has been fully debated on previous occasions.

Now I propose to vote for and support this bill to the utmost of my power, for two reasons. First of all I told my constituents during the election that I had supported the bill in the past, and promised to support it in the future. Apart from that—apart from any sense of loyalty to promises made at election time—I would be in hearty accord with the principle of the bill for my own sake because it affects me personally. I happen to be one of that not inconsiderable body of people in Canada who were somewhat sneeringly alluded to by an hon. gentleman opposite as an "imported Canadian". I have spent thirty-six or thirty-seven years in Canada, and so far have avoided any particularly violent contact with the law, but I had to come to this house of parliament to be told that I occupy a position of inferiority to that of my own children or my grandchildren. I support this bill for two reasons. First, because I do not approve of deportation without trial. That is the crux of the whole thing. What is the use of wondering whether a person is a bolshevist, or encouraging this or the other kind of propaganda? I would certainly make the deportation of anybody, more particularly myself, impossible without trial. In the second place I object to the discrimination imposed upon those who were born in Britain, or in any part of the British Empire other than in Canada. It is possible at the mere whim of the Minister of Immigration to order my deportation to-morrow. It is impossible for him to deport by the same method a Russian who may have come to this country years ago, been naturalized in due course, and may be inoculating the community, for all we know, with bolshevistic ideas, or kindred doctrines. Notwithstanding that particular man may be pursuing such a course he cannot be interfered with, whereas I can be deported. That is a very substantial reason, to my mind, why I should support this bill. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) will pardon me if I am taking a wrong view of his argument, but I took that argument, to be this: We passed a similar act or a practically similar act in 1910, which is seventeen years ago. That is not a very strong argument as to any course we should pursue today, but in any case the acts are not identically the same. There was a very substantial difference in connection with the definition of a British subject in the act of 1910. I could have wriggled out of the meshes of the law by saying that I was a Canadian citizen, because there is no very closely defined definition of what a Canadian citizen is. A British born subject could have said "I am a Canadian citizen", citizenship not being particularly defined under the act of 1910. But in the act of 1919 there was a distinct and specific line of demarcation, between a Canadian born or naturalized man or woman and a man or woman born in the British Isles.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit me, I know he desires to be quite fair. The interpretation clause of the act of 1910 says:

"Canadian citizen" means a person born in Canada who has not become an alien.

That limits the definition to Canadian born citizens.

Mr. NEILL: It is limited to Canadian born citizens?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Then what reason was there for passing the act of 1919? The hon. gentleman himself says the difference is primarily that of definition.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will admit that I have offered, as far as I am concerned, to agree to the repeal of the objectionable part of that act and to restore the act of 1910.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me. I am quite sure he did not want to mislead the House, but I have here the act of 1910.

Mr. STEVENS: So have I.

Mr. CANNON: In that act "Canadian citizen" is defined as meaning:

i. A person born in Canada who has not become an alien.

That is what my hon. friend read. I continue quoting:

ii. A British subject who has Canadian domicile.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. CANNON: That knocks out all my friend's argument.

Mr. STEVENS: I admit to my hon. friend that I noted only the first clause. I did not do so with any intent to deceive the House. The Solicitor General has scored in part, and I frankly admit it.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, when lawyers differ honest men come into their own, it is said.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but I am not a lawyer

Mr. NEILL: I apologize.

Mr. STEVENS: Thank you.

Mr. NEILL: Dealing for a moment with the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), he made a rather specious appeal to our emotions by presenting the very serious conditions that obtained during the war, and that came, he said, under his personal knowledge. But this very obvious fact ran through his appeal, that what he alluded to were crimes, and therefore the persons guilty of them would be subject to conviction if found guilty. He said there were secret printing presses throughout Canada printing literature seditious, of course. Otherwise they would not need to be secret. But does the hon. member recall that a couple of years ago I introduced and succeeded in getting through this House a very simple bill that would have prevented or at least checked that condition of affairs? It made every printer responsible for placing on the document he printed his name and address; but his friends in another chamber defeated that measure. Let me again emphasize that all the actions the hon. gentleman alluded to in an attempt to excite our sympathy were crimes, and if a man commits a crime here he can upon conviction be deported. That is what we ask for. We do not want to encourage criminals to remain here. The hon. member said that he dealt with that condition by taking the man into his office and reasoning with him. That is not the method I advocate in dealing with people of that type.

Mr. STEVENS: If I may interrupt my hon. friend, I find that I am still right. Let me quote from the act:

> Canadian domicile can be acquired for the purpose of this act by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada.

So I was not far wrong in my first statement.

Mr. CANNON: That is one way out, but very narrow.

Mr. NEILL: Let me give another illustration which I think will come home to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, because it is connected with British Columbia, and I think it meets exactly the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. We know there is a very sad and serious and disgraceful condition of affairs in British Columbia in the selling of what is known as dope, especially to children and young people, so much so that this House was moved, on the representations of hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and others from that province, to pass an act declaring that all those caught selling or dealing in dope would be not only punishable by heavy imprisonment but after conviction would be subject to deportation. I have never heard anyone say there was anything wrong with deportation under those circumstances, because it was preceded by a conviction for a serious offence. It is the very procedure that we seek to apply in these cases of sedition, or alleged sedition, or suspected sedition—try them, convict them if they have committed the crime they are charged with, and then by all means deport them. But give them a trial by a jury of their peers. Both the members for Vancouver Centre and the member for St. Lawrence-St. George, while they uphold the present act to a certain extent, I think suggest some modification. Even the latter admitted that he was willing to make some concession along the lines I have indicated.

The hon. member for West Calgary with that facility so characteristic of him, drew a word picture of an alien agitator: What should we do with him? Get rid of him without trial or trouble. What is the use of making a hero of him in the courts? But I would remind the hon. member that we do not make heroes of our criminals, although that may be done elsewhere. It does not put much of a halo around a man if he is committed to the penitentiary for two years and is then deported. You cannot right an injustice by another injustice. I recall the case of a ruler in Turkey who, discovering that one of his subjects, a baker, was selling bread underweight, had him put into his oven and baked with his bread. The potentate boasted that this drastic remedy sufficed to stop the practice! But that is not the way civilized nations enforce their laws. Let us be logical. Let us go back along the lines advocated on the floor of this House to-day, because once you start on a course, whether forward or backward, there is always an ultimate conclusion, if you can arrive at it. Let us go back towards this line of feudalism and medievalism, and where will we land? Before very long we will reach the situation that obtained in France before the revolution, when lettres de cachet were common—I was almost going to say, were saleable; at least they were easily obtained. A royal mistress or other court favourite would get the king or some high official to issue a lettre de cachet, which simply meant a blank warrant of commitment to the Bastile. Very often these blank warrants were issued at night under the influence of passion or liquor, and by the morning the official forgot that he had ever issued them. Being issued in blank it was open to the political favourite or mistress who had a grudge against some person to fill in that person's name, and the wretched victim was consigned to the Bastile without the formality of a trial. I emphasize that—without the formality of a trial. When the Bastile was taken by the revolutionists it was found that a large number of those immured there did not themselves know why they had been imprisoned. The parties who had obtained the lettres de cachet had died, their poor victims were forgotten, and remained entombed. That is only carrying the principle suggested to-day a little further backward.

It is a truism in political history that those who seek to forward the cause of progress and to uplift the status of the common people have to be ever on the watch against those who desire to turn the clock of progress back to the days which they fondly hope may yet return, and to revive the principles of reaction. This might be called perhaps an absurd comparison, but a few days ago this House lent itself to the restriction of free speech, and now we are being invited to restrict the liberty of free trial. It simply means going a few more steps backward. Why was not this question brought up last year and debated, why were not the arguments now advanced used then? Because, Mr. Speaker, an election was in sight, and those opposing this bill had to answer to the common people, so they did not think it advisable to take their present stand. But now an election is far away and it is hoped perhaps to make a few steps backward. It is natural for hon. members of a certain profession to take a retrograde step. They are proverbially the slaves of precedent; they are always looking behind them rather than forward.

I propose to vote for this bill, not because it encourages bolshevism. It does not. It is a bulwark against bolshevism, for you cannot right one wrong with another. I believe the best protection against bolshevism is to give freedom—certainly freedom of trial. I object to these clauses of the Immigration Act, not because of the deportation feature —deport everyone you like—but I do firmly and consistently object to the system of deportation without trial. That is the crux of my argument. Our forebears obtained the right of free trial by our peers on the field of Runnymede from King John. That is a long time ago. And it ill behooves us to take any steps, however slight, to deprive Canadian citizens of that right.

[Mr. Neill.]

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief, but I think before the House is called upon to vote on this bill we should examine it in its true light. It is not my intention to answer the appeals, very eloquent, it is true, that have been made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), but I shall try and explain in a few sentences just what this bill means, and what its effect will be if it is adopted.

When an immigrant comes to Canada, according to our existing laws he is examined when he is seeking entry. He is either passed as a desirable citizen, or else the officials of the department refuse him entry, and that ends his case. But if he enters Canada, the immigration authorities still maintain control over him after he has entered, and that control can be exercised in two ways. It may be exercised in exceptional cases by way of direct deportation after a board has given a decision on the case. I may say that that method should not be used unless the circumstances warrant it, and those circumstances must be of a most abnormal character. The second way of dealing with the immigrant who has already entered Canada, and who has become after his entry an undesirable citizen, is to convict him in court of a criminal offence, and after conviction deport him.

Mr. KAISER: Was that always necessary?

Mr. CANNON: I am giving the general lines of the law; I am not going into details. Last year this bill was introduced. It was fully discussed, and finally passed this House. This year it is again introduced, and we hear three main opponents of the bill—the hon. member for West Calgary, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). First of all I might call the attention of the House to the law as it exists, not a law that I might build up with a view to making a good argument, but the law as it is in our statutes to-day.
