Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

DEATH OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS EMPLOYEE, SAIGON

Question No. 29—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did an employee of the external affairs department die recently in Saigon?
2. If so, what was his name, career position, and original home address?
3. Where, when, and under what circumstances did the death take place?
4. Is the case completely closed? If not, what steps is the Canadian government taking to clear it up?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question relates to an event that is supposed to have happened recently. I am not quite sure how one can interpret the word "recently" but I presume it refers to an event that happened in April of 1957. The answers to the questions are as follows:

(1) Yes, in April, 1957.

(2) A. E. L. Cannon, foreign service officer 4, Quebec city.

(3) Saigon, April 12, 1957. Murder.

(4) A thorough investigation was, of course, made but failed to establish responsibility. There is a possibility that further evidence may come to light and the case cannot, therefore, be considered as completely closed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): May I ask a supplementary question following the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to this starred question. I should like to request that more information be given to me personally, rather than in the house, concerning part 3. Under all the circumstances I feel there was not sufficient detail supplied in the answer, and I would ask him if he would give me the details personally.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I would be ready to discuss that with the hon. member.

WALTER MITCHELL

Question No. 30—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Was Walter Mitchell, of the city of Montreal, an employee of the Department of Agriculture at the port of Montreal?
2. If so, in what capacity and for how long?
3. Was he dismissed from his employment?
4. If so, for what reason and on whose recommendation?

He said: Mr. Speaker, is the acting minister in a position to answer this question?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not. I would ask that the question stand.

Mr. Chevrier: It has stood twice now.

Question stands.

HIGHWAY BRIDGE, CHATHAM-FERRY ROAD, N.B.

Question No. 31—Mr. McWilliam:

Does the federal government assume any responsibility, in whole or in part, in connection with the proposed construction of a highway bridge across the Miramichi river between Chatham and Ferry Road, New Brunswick?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is that this would depend on whether the federal government had any responsibility for the highway of which such a bridge would form part.

Orders for Returns

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

KENORA-RAINY RIVER ROAD CONSTRUCTION—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 146—Mr. Benidickson:

1. To what road construction projects (except trans-Canada highway) in the Kenora and Rainy river districts in Ontario has the government been asked by the government of Ontario, since February 1, 1957, to make a financial contribution?

2. To which projects has a contribution been made and how much was paid in each case?

AGE GROUP, 65-70

Question No. 150—Mr. Benidickson:

1. How many persons are there over 65 years and under 70 years in each province?

2. How many persons in each province are receiving payment under the Old Age Assistance Act?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CONSULTATION OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS MINISTERS AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister indicate whether the report is accurate that the British foreign minister is flying to Washington to see the United States Secretary of State? If so, can he throw any light on the purpose of this mission?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the only light that I can throw on the question is that Right Hon. Selwyn Lloyd is going to Washington, there to consult with the Secretary of State of the United States, and the consultation will have to do with the gravity of the situation in the Middle East. Because of this fact I feel that the house generally will give support to the desire of the government to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs leave for Washington and be there tomorrow so that he may consult with the foreign minister of the United Kingdom and with Mr. Dulles.

If that is acceptable to members as a whole, then I would suggest that the debate on external affairs, which was to come up tomorrow and would have come up otherwise, be postponed for a few days. Necessarily, the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have to be present. I feel it is very necessary, having regard to conditions generally throughout the world, that the responsible minister in this very important field should be in Washington at this time to consult and also to be consulted with.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances we on this side are quite agreeable to the postponing of the debate that was to have taken place tomorrow, because it is obviously important to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs here at the time of that debate. I would merely express my hope that perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs will find it possible not only to visit Washington on this trip and consult there with his two opposite numbers but might find it also possible to participate in the work of the security council at this very difficult time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group are very pleased to agree with the suggestion of the Prime Minister that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should make this trip to Washington to discuss the very grave matters that are in the minds of all of us. I would certainly agree with the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that he might also visit the United Nations to use the prestige that Canada has in that world body in the interests of peace.

MIDDLE EAST—INQUIRY AS TO PROTECTION OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, if I might at this time I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister anything further to add to his statement regarding the safety of Canadian nationals in the Middle East; in particular, has the minister any information regarding the whereabouts and safety of a former member of this house, the former minister of labour, Hon. Milton Gregg?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. As I endeavoured to indicate yesterday, in a foreign country in which Canada has no diplomatic representation it has been the practice for the United Kingdom diplomatic representative, the minister or ambassador, to look after Canadian interests. In Iraq—and I am repeating what I said yesterday because I desire to have the record clear—the British ambassador is normally responsible for the acceptance of registrations of Canadians resident in Iraq and for the extension to them of whatever protection is possible in times of emergency. Canadian citizens are thus accorded exactly the same treatment other British subjects would be given by the British embassy.

However, in countries where we have no representation and where it is not possible to work through the British embassy, we have had long-standing arrangements with the United States authorities whereby they will give assistance in such a case as this. As I stated in the house yesterday, we cannot now rely on the embassy of the United Kingdom, but we have had reconfirmation of the arrangement with the United States in the past few hours; indeed, the direct statement from the department of state of the United States government that that government will assume responsibility for the protection and evacuation of Canadians from Iraq if that becomes necessary. The picture today, I am very happy to report, is much clearer than it was yesterday.

With respect to the second part of the hon. member's question, according to what information we have available, there has been no report of any molestation of Canadian nationals during the present crisis in Iraq. A report received this morning from the United Nations secretariat states that it has received a report from Mr. Milton Gregg to the effect that all personnel of the United Nations and its specialized agencies in Iraq, including their dependents, are safe. This group includes one other Canadian, Mr. L. W. Reiman.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position now to report whether or not any word has been received from our mission in Beirut as to the situation confronting some 147 Canadians in that country?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I have nothing further to add to the reply to a somewhat similar question yesterday.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs clarify the statement he made last night on television to the effect—and I quote from the text of the statement as issued by his department—that:

> We have instructed our representative at the United Nations to support every constructive measure that is put before the United Nations for the attainment of the objectives of the United States for the Middle East.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to reply to that question. I feel sure that the context of that statement will indicate that it is related to the statement I made in the house yesterday that our representative at the security council was instructed to support any constructive measure. The United States has put before the security council a resolution which is being discussed today by the council to the effect that the security council be requested to take such measures to stabilize adequately, in the opinion of the United Nations, the situation in Lebanon to the end that the military forces of the United States will be withdrawn. That is what I was referring to.

ALASKA—PROPOSED HIGHWAY FROM U.S. VIA ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report in the Financial Post of July 12 to the effect that Alberta highways minister Taylor flew to Washington some time ago to encourage Washington to build a link to Alaska from the United States via Alberta and the Alaska highway, and in view of the fact that this proposal is in opposition to the proposals being made by the government of British Columbia, would the minister inform the house if these proposals by the representative of a province are being made after consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Is this procedure regular, according to protocol?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I received notice of this question after coming into the house. I shall take it as notice.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): My question is in the same vein but not exactly the same as that of my deskmate. I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would care to comment on a report in the Financial Post that a bill has been presented to the United States Senate providing for the sharing between Canada and the United States of the $125 million that would be involved in the paving of the Alaska highway. Has the Canadian government made any commitment that it would share in this very large venture?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, Bill S4097 was introduced recently in the United States Senate by an individual senator on his own behalf, not on behalf of the United States administration. The Canadian government was not consulted.

As to the substance of the proposal contained in the bill, careful examination will have to be given to it before any comment is made. However, hon. members may be interested in knowing that some discussions have taken place between a Canadian interdepartmental committee and the United States Alaska international rail and highway commission concerning improved transportation facilities between the Pacific northwest of the United States and Alaska. I should like to emphasize that these discussions are merely exploratory at this time.

In view of what I have just said, the last part of the hon. member's question becomes inapplicable. However, I should point out that there can be found in the estimates of my colleague the Minister of National Defence an item relating to a start on the paving of the Alaska highway.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED INTERFERENCE WITH PHOTOGRAPHERS DURING NAVAL REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Acting Minister of National Defence or to the Prime Minister. I wonder if they would undertake to have an investigation made into the report that 13 newspaper photographers were locked in a small room aboard a naval vessel for 3½ hours during yesterday's naval review by Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret, near Victoria, B.C., and were not allowed to report on the review as were the C.B.C. photographers.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of National Defence): The minister of National Defence will be back tomorrow, I expect, and I shall bring this question to his attention. I am sure he will give an answer at the earliest possible moment.

NORAD—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF DIRECTIONS TO CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask whether he has any statement to make to the house concerning the press report of the directions purported to be given by General Partridge to the Canadian forces forming part of the NORAD forces.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to answer that question from our department.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Possibly that question might have been directed to me, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it concerns more than one department. In connection with the press report may I say this. During the past week of deep tension in the Middle East and generally throughout the world the United States has throughout kept the Canadian government informed of the steps being taken and the consequential action which their authorities considered appropriate both in that area and in general. Throughout the week there has been the closest consultation on the highest governmental level as well as between the chiefs of staffs of the two countries.

The nature of our defence program and problem is such that, when a period of international tension arises, it is most essential that the military authorities, particularly those concerned with air defence, shall act prudently so that the forces will be in such a position that should grave eventualities take place that are not anticipated, none the less the defensive and deterrent quality of those defences will be in readiness.

Those in charge of NORAD came to the conclusion that it would be proper to increase the state of readiness of the air defence forces under its operational control. This increased readiness of air defence involves increasing the number of aircraft ready to take off on short notice as well as increasing the number that are available for use at various times in the future.

The commander in chief of NORAD informed both the Canadian and United States chiefs of staffs in this regard yesterday. The decision that was made was the type of decision which our own air defence authorities would have made under all the circumstances had they been operating our defence forces purely as Canadian forces and not as part of an integrated system. However much one regrets the disturbed conditions in the world today and hopes that the tension will be relieved, there are periods from time to time—and this is one of them—when calm judgment and cool deliberation are necesary, and when as a normal practice the defence forces must be brought up to various states of readiness which the circumstances of the moment demand. To take this course is the course of prudence, caution and common sense.

The course that was taken is not intended in any way to be of an alarmist or provocative nature. It is not to be interpreted as such. The course taken is one that was determined on the basis that every potential eventuality in defence must be assured at all times; and I think on the basis of what I have said that while in no way desiring or feeling that what I have said may extend the fears of our Canadian people, at the same time due caution, having regard to the circumstances, will I hope be accepted as the reason for this course which, as I said earlier, would have been taken regardless of whether our air defences were joined or entirely separate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure members on this side of the house would consider this a normal precautionary measure in the circumstances, and not to be regarded as alarmist in any shape or form. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government, as such, is informed when a decision of this kind by the NORAD commander is taken, and if so through what channel?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Information comes to the chiefs of staffs committee, and through the Canadian chiefs of staffs to the government, in this case to the Acting Minister of National Defence and to the Prime Minister.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or in his absence to the acting minister. Has he any announcement to make to the house in view of the statement attributed to the premier of Manitoba in a report appearing in the Montreal Gazette of July 11, that he expects the federal government will immediately make several changes in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to bring it more into line with Manitoba conditions?

Mr. Speaker: I would advise the hon. member that we discussed that matter or similar matters for some time last night. As I understand it, the question relates to the policy of the federal government being in line with something said by the premier of Manitoba; is that it?

Mr. Boulanger: We did not discuss the Prairie Farm Assistance Act last night, but the question of deficiency payments. My question concerns an announcement by the premier of Manitoba to the effect that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will be amended to bring it into line with Manitoba conditions.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Agriculture): I have not seen the article in question, Mr. Speaker, but I shall bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. I believe he will be back on Friday.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORT ON PRODUCTION AND SALE OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Justice. I hope notice of it reached him in sufficient time. Would the minister inform us when it is expected that the report of the commission on restrictive trade practices regarding the production, purchase and sale of fish in the province of British Columbia will be made public?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I regret that I received notice of this question too late to enable me to have more than a very quick check made in the department, but that check so far indicates that we have not yet received this report, though I understand that the inquiry is being proceeded with as expeditiously as possible. I am not able to say, and will not be able to say until I receive the report, when it will be made public, because the nature of the report itself will have a bearing on that matter.

POWER

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—STATUS OF AGREEMENT RESPECTING THERMAL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of recent press reports that tenders are being called for the thermal plant at Saint John, New Brunswick, can the minister tell us if an agreement has yet been reached between the federal government and the provincial government?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The actual agreement for the Saint John plant between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick has not yet been signed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister know whether it is true that tenders are being called?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the report is correct, it is my first awareness of it.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—INTEREST RATES ON LOANS FOR DOWN PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In the light of the fact that legislation ties National Housing Act interest rates to rates paid on government securities, and in view of the recent rise in interest rates on government securities as announced by the Minister of Finance, is the minister in a position to assure the house and the country that no further increase is going to be permitted in interest rates on National Housing Act loans for the next several months? I am asking this so there may not be any withholding of the regular flow of mortgage money on the part of private lenders.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention of raising the interest rate. Mind you, a certain category of loans do go up and down, as the hon. member knows; but on the ordinary insured loans under the National Housing Act and those under the small house loan plan there will be no raising of these interest rates.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR SEASONAL BENEFIT PAYMENT FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on June 28 and again on July 3 the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked a question regarding the number of persons receiving seasonal benefits at the time seasonal benefits expired, that is, the end of June. The figures which are now available relate to active claims on June 28 and are as follows:

Atlantic region	24,383
Quebec region	44,426
Ontario region	36,970
Prairie region	12,437
Pacific region	13,662
Total, all Canada	131,878

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONCLUSIONS OF CURRENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the Minister of Labour would care to give the house a report on any conclusions that were reached at the conference held in Ottawa on winter unemployment and whether, as a result of that conference, steps will be taken shortly requiring legislation to be placed before parliament.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that report has not yet been presented in final form. The resolutions were submitted in first draft form to the chairmen of the various committees who will prepare them in final form. They will be submitted to me when completed, and I in turn will bring them to the attention of the government for a decision to be made on what action should be taken on these recommendations.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. I wonder if the minister will say whether any conclusion has been reached regarding the provision of financial incentives for the construction industry during the winter months.

Mr. Starr: No decisions have as yet been made with regard to what has transpired during the last two days, and what I said in answer to the previous question applies.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether as a result of yesterday's conference he feels disposed to recommend to his colleagues the desirability of the dominion-provincial conference being convened at an early date?

Mr. Starr: I will present to the government for consideration the ideas and recommendations that were made in the last two days.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BORROWING AND LOANING OF MONEY, APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIALS, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-35, to amend the Yukon Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of a bill to amend the Yukon Act I should like to refer the house to the remarks I made a week ago today in dealing with this matter, on which occasion I outlined the five amendments in the bill, four dealing with administrative matters and one with territorial boundaries. There is not a great deal I can add at this stage to what I said a week ago today, so I shall confine my remarks more or less to the content of the amendments.

The first amendment deals with section 19 in which we broaden the purposes for which the governor in council may borrow and lend money in the territory. Under the existing act the right of borrowing money is limited to borrowing for territorial expenditures and lending money to municipalities. The new amendments make it possible to lend money for territorial purposes, municipal purposes or local purposes. The words "local purposes" in this amendment refer to school boards, hospital boards and similar organizations in the territory. At the present time there are no school districts in the Yukon, but it is hoped that as the districts and communities of this new territory accept the responsibility of self-government, school boards will be formed. This amendment, therefore makes it possible for the commissioner on behalf of the territory to borrow money which may be loaned to a school district. The bill contains two new clauses, (b) and (c) which read as follows:

(b) for the lending of money by the commissioner to municipalities and school districts, in the territory, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the minister would find it possible to discuss the bill without detailed consideration of the clauses at this stage, because it goes from here to committee, and if there is a principle which runs through the bill perhaps it would be well to confine the debate at this stage to that principle. If it is a series of isolated amendments then, of course, there is no other way in which the hon. gentleman could proceed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it would assist me a great deal if I could merely review again the main principles of the bill. The first four amendments are administrative. The first deals with the power of the commissioner in council to borrow and lend money and extends the freedom of the territorial government to take action in this very necessary part of a provincial government's activities. The next amendment is in connection with police magistrates and is designed to give the Yukon territory the same provisions that apply in the Northwest Territories with respect to the appointment of deputy police magistrates.

The third amendment gives to the governor in council the right to appoint judicial and other officers for the due administration of justice in the territory. The fourth amendment deals with the importation of liquor into the territory, and simply gives the right to the commissioner to appoint another person to authorize such importation of liquor.

The fifth amendment deals with the precise description of the territorial boundaries.

With those remarks I can conclude by saying that these are moves to increase the efficiency of the administration of the Yukon territorial government and broaden its powers, as part of the transitional procedure of giving to this area increasing authority over its own affairs in the ultimate hope that some day it will be a province of this dominion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Borrowing and lending.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, we in this group read the bill and listened to the minister's remarks with keen interest. The necessity for the introduction of the bill to improve the efficiency of the administration of the Yukon Territory clearly indicates the growth and expansion of that area, and the broadening of the powers of the commission is, we hope, another step in the evolution toward the development of a provincial administration in the Yukon Territory.

With respect to clause 1, would the minister give the committee some further information as to how the funds are borrowed and how the financing is done; to what account borrowings are charged and things of that nature so we can better understand the relationship between financing in the Yukon Territory and in the provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Kootenay West, what I could do is give him a statement of the revenues and expenditures of the territory, which will illustrate the proportion of income from federal and local sources.

Mr. Herridge: Yes; that is what I wanted.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Using the 1956-57 figures, the total revenues of the Yukon Territory were $2.1 million. These were broken down, in round figures, as shown in the following tabulation:

Revenues—1956-57	Amount
Tax revenue	$400,000
Licence revenue	140,000
Fees	9,000
Road Tolls	33,000
Fines	8,000
Miscellaneous	59,000
Expenditures recovered	24,000
Federal subsidy and grant	588,000
School fees	84,000
Equipment and rentals	25,000
Liquor profits	731,000
Total	$2.1 million

In simple terms, Mr. Chairman, the big revenue sources are first, liquor profits; second, ordinary tax revenue; and third, the subsidy from the federal government, which is similar to the dominion-provincial subsidy.

The expenditures are illustrated by the following tabulation:

Expenditures—1956-57	Amount
Administration	$159,000
Municipal and town administration	106,000
Education	454,000
Health and welfare	330,000
Roads, bridges and public works	628,000
Sub-total	$1.6 million
Capital expenditures	$876,000
Grand total	$2.5 million

In the year 1956-57 there was an excess of expenditure over revenue of $439,000. It should be pointed out that capital expenditures are included in the statement. This section actually gives power to the territorial government to borrow money rather than paying everything out of the annual revenue.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister give the committee some idea of the amount of money that may be borrowed under the authority of this section, how the money is to be borrowed, what the terms are and generally just how this power may be used?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In answer to the first question about the extent of the borrowing, I do not think anyone could answer that precisely. The hon. member will notice that subsection 3 reads:

> No money shall be borrowed or invested under the authority of this section without the approval of the governor in council.

We have maintained that control in order to keep an eye on the extent of their borrowings in relation to their income, and even though we do not know the exact amount they will be borrowing, as no one could be expected to know, we do have control on the extent of their borrowing, something the same as obtains under the powers of a local government in a province.

The type of borrowing we have done to date has required coming to the House of Commons under the Appropriation Act. The two loans that we have agreed to so far are for a sewer and water system in the city of Whitehorse and a hospital in the city of Whitehorse. These are the two loans they requested before, but I think the procedure is under discussion with the territorial government and the local councils, in this case the city of Whitehorse. If they come up with a capital expenditure they are not able to cope with within their own finances they request us to participate. In the past we have had to bring an amendment to an act before the house before we could lend them that extra money for capital expenditure. This simply empowers the territorial government to borrow without coming to this house and asking for legislative amendments to an existing act, but we do control the limit or the extent of the borrowing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister mentioned an expenditure of $300,000 for a hospital at Whitehorse.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The loan was $750,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does that take into account grants given by the federal government under the national health program with respect to available funds for hospital construction, or is the $750,000 in addition to moneys paid out for hospital construction?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have not the full records here in this particular file of the loan or of the affairs of the hospital at Whitehorse in the Yukon; but my memory is —and I am fairly sure I am right—that the total cost was just short of $4 million. This was broken down into several parts. The city of Whitehorse had to contribute, I think, $1 million. This is purely from memory. In connection with the hospital in the city of Whitehorse they had to put up a certain amount, which I think was $750,000, and they had to come to us to borrow the $750,000. Then the Department of National Health and Welfare put a sizeable amount into it as well.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They made an outright grant of $2 million, I think.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have forgotten the exact amount, but I think it was a major item. Then the Department of National Defence made a contribution. Therefore we have the territorial government, the city of Whitehorse, the Department of National Defence and the Department of National Health and Welfare all contributing to this hospital. Since Whitehorse did not have the money we had to bring in an amendment to the Appropriation Act to make it possible for us to allow the commissioner in council to borrow this amount on behalf of the city of Whitehorse.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I recall it, the grant to the hospital by the Department of National Health and Welfare was an ad hoc grant. I was wrong in attributing to it the authority of the national health program. When was the request made for the loan that is now requested of the federal government for the hospital? Was it within the last three months?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I have not the information here as to the date when the request for that money was made. I certainly know it was before the time I came to the department. I can look for the information and have it available for the hon. member. I made one mistake when I spoke of the loan of $750,000. The loan was not for the city of Whitehorse; it was for the territorial government, which was borrowing the money for its participation in the hospital cost.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The reason I asked the question is this. If the federal government thought it desirable to make an outright grant of $2 million, which may or may not be accurate, what I cannot understand is why the remaining moneys are given by way of a loan and not by way of an outright grant.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The understanding I have of the responsibility here is that, putting it under our local situation, when you build a hospital there are certain government grants that go to that hospital, as to all hospitals, but in the case of the Whitehorse hospital the Department of National Defence have a responsibility because they have people in the community who want hospital beds. The territorial government has a responsibility because they are responsible for the health of the people in the territory, and they had to make this contribution. The share was worked out among the parties interested so they contributed according to their relative responsibilities; but with respect to the territorial share of $750,000, they did not have the money in their annual revenue and they had to come to the government for permission to borrow the amount.

Mr. Nielsen: If I might make an observation to augment the observation made by the hon. member for Essex East, I would say that these contributions were worked out by the last administration, to my knowledge. They have not been changed at all since that time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not the $750,000.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, I believe that is so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It would be unusual if I were wrong.

Mr. Thomas: Does the territorial government of the Yukon receive assistance for their roads and other public works according to a formula, or is each grant dealt with individually?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The question of the hon. member for Middlesex West is a very wide one, because we have several classifications of assistance that we give to the Yukon. In the general situation at the present time the territorial government is responsible for roads in the territory, but in practice the division of responsibility as between the federal government and the territorial government is roughly along this line. We are responsible for the natural resources of this area. Therefore when a development road goes in we would pay for the development road, and if the road is used by the people of the Yukon when they are responsible for 15 per cent of the maintenance and we are responsible for 85 per cent; that is, allowing for the use of the road by the Yukon people.

The second part of the question dealt with public buildings. These are dealt with by the territorial government. If the building is a territorial building they erect it; but there are occasions, and there will possibly be occasions in the future, where the capital expenditures they wish to undertake will be beyond their means if they have to use the annual income each year. That is the reason for asking for this broadened power, to give them the right to borrow.

Mr. Herridge: While we are on this clause, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question just to satisfy my insatiable curiosity about many matters in life, including the Yukon. I may say that I became interested in the Yukon in the early days because as a boy I met a famous woman of the Yukon called Yukon Iola. That was my first interest in the Yukon. Anyway, I wanted to ask about the constitutional basis for the municipalities in the Yukon and their financial relationships with the federal government.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member is not alone in that. Everything is in a state of transition there but you do have municipalities. I think there are three cities. There are other areas which are not even organized into municipalities and therefore the territorial government has direct dealings with a large proportion of the people of the Yukon. It is only in Whitehorse, Dawson and Mayo that you have any form of municipal or local government at the present time. There are other areas where people live that have no organized government whatsoever. Therefore the situation is in a state of transition. We are hoping that step by step the communities will form themselves into local self-governing bodies with all the rights and responsibilities of municipal governments. We are also hoping that they will move into the field of education, form local school boards and accept their responsibility. At the present time these responsibilities are looked after by the territorial government where there is no organization into municipalities. We are hoping that the formation of local governments will spread in the territories and that they will assume their full share of governmental responsibility.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his explanation but what I am not clear about concerns the municipalities within the Yukon. Are their financial relationships somewhat parallel to the relationships that exist between a municipality and a province? Do they get grants for their schools, hospitals, certain street improvements and things of that sort?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer is roughly yes. There is a municipal ordinance but they do not exercice in full the responsibilities that are exercised in a normal community in the provinces. At one time, for instance, a debate had been going on in the city of Whitehorse with respect to how far they should go in accepting responsibility for providing sewer and water services. The same situation applies to other improvements. They have worked out ways of handling things which are not orthodox in ordinary municipalities in the provinces. Fire protection is one example where they have worked out their own arrangements. Fire protection is provided partly by the local army unit in Whitehorse and the city of Whitehorse partly assumes the responsibility. The municipalities are gradually moving more toward accepting full responsibility for running their own communities.

Mr. Nielsen: With respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West may I say that I have a certain amount of intimate knowledge of the area to which the bill will apply and perhaps the minister will allow me to say that while there is the power under the municipalities and taxation ordinance to create incorporated cities in three areas, namely Dawson, Whitehorse and Mayo, only Dawson and Whitehorse have taken advantage of the provision to create themselves municipalities within the provincial meaning of that term. The area of Mayo is still not governed by what is known provincially as a municipal council. The authority for the creation of municipalities comes initially from the powers contained in the Yukon Act which the bill purports to amend. The Yukon Act as it now stands may be compared almost in every respect with the relevant provisions of the British North America Act which delineate powers as between the provinces and the federal authority. That is where the constitutional power comes from for the creation of municipalities in the Yukon.

Mr. Caron: When a municipality wants to obtain a loan for public works does it have to ask the permission of the territorial authorities? If a municipality wants to borrow money for a municipal public works does it have to seek permission or authority from the territorial authorities?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is correct. The municipal governments and school boards when created are creatures of the territorial government. They go to the territorial government to borrow money and if the territorial government cannot provide them with sufficient money to meet their needs the territorial government then comes to us and sees what can be done.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Deputy police magistrates.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, as the minister knows, in the provinces appointments of magistrates are made by the provincial government. What is the reason behind the decision that has been taken to make appointments of deputy police magistrates in the Yukon by governor in council rather than by action of the territorial council?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that under the Yukon Act the territorial government does not have jurisdiction in relation to natural resources and justice, which are left under federal control.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister or his parliamentary assistant would tell me whether it is contemplated that any action will be taken under this section with regard to these appointments?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This same provision was placed in the Northwest Territories Act last year and at that time I promised the house that I would bring in a similar amendment to the Yukon Act. We have not given any consideration to the matter yet.

Mr. Caron: Clause 2 reads as follows:

> The governor in council may appoint one or more persons who are barristers or advocates of at least three years' standing at the bar of any of the provinces of Canada to be deputy police magistrates—

Under this provision it would seem that a barrister who had been disbarred in a province would be eligible for the position. Would it not be wiser to say "lawyers, barristers or advocates in good standing at the bar of any of the provinces of Canada"? Otherwise you are liable to have a man who has been disbarred in one of the provinces because there is nothing to prevent it there.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If any person has been admitted to the bar and has three years' standing I think the inference is that he would be considered to be in good standing. If a lawyer is not in good standing I understand he is disbarred. There is one thing I should like to mention while I am on my feet. Hon. members may have noticed that the word "provinces" is used which would seem to bar barristers or advocates from the territory. That does not hold. In Whitehorse there are several barristers resident there and they are not ineligible under this section because the definition of the word "province" in the Interpretation Act includes the territories.

Mr. Cardin: Can the minister tell me why provision is being made to appoint deputy police magistrates having the same power as police magistrates rather than increasing the number of police magistrates? Why do you have deputy police magistrates?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): At the present time I understand there is no necessity for additional magistrates. The purpose of the clause is simply to have the power to appoint a deputy police magistrate if the magistrate is not available. If you have just one magistrate in a big area and that is all that is needed it is fine if he is there 24 hours a day 365 days a year. You have to have the amendment, so if he is away or incapacitated you can move in another person to take over.

Mr. Caron: Does the minister intend to change the words "any of the provinces of Canada"? This wording excludes the Northwest Territories. If the words "Northwest Territories", were included, then a person in that area could take the position.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am trying to understand the hon. member's question. Is he suggesting that we should limit this to people within the territories?

Mr. Caron: No, but by adding those words to the definition, as it is now, this area would be included. It says "any of the provinces of Canada", but the Yukon Territory is not a province of Canada as yet. This would clarify the interpretation and make it clear that those living in the Yukon Territory would be eligible for the position.

Mr. Winch: They are, under the Interpretation Act.

Mr. Caron: It would be much clearer if it were written in this section.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I raised the same matter, but my friends in justice informed me that the word "province" is used continually throughout our legislation to mean, under the Interpretation Act, the provinces and territories. The addition of the word "territories" would make this phrase superfluous.

On clause 4—Manufacture and importation of intoxicants.

Mr. Herridge: There has been a sort of fable in existence throughout Canada for many years to the effect that the content of alcohol in spirits sold in the Yukon and Northwest Territories greatly exceeds that usually obtainable in the other provinces of Canada. Can the minister inform the house if that is correct, and by what extent the alcohol content of the spirits exceeds that of other provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This rumour is true. Transportation into the north country is very expensive, and it seems such a waste to spend money for the transportation of water. I understand the liquor known as rum is particularly potent, but I believe the other liquors are more or less average and in line with those sold in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Before this clause carries does the expression "a person authorized by him", mean that the appointment can be made of any person? Can there be any number of persons appointed or just one person?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I took this matter up with justice, and their ruling is the word "a" does mean any, in the full sense of the word. You can appoint one or more.

Mr. Pearson: Any number of persons?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

NATIONAL PARKS

CAPE BRETON—PROVISION FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN LANDS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-36, to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands national park.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Lands withdrawn from Cape Breton Highlands national park.

Mr. Winch: Could we have an explanation in detail because this concerns the withdrawal of certain lands from a park area?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): A week ago, Mr. Chairman, I outlined the reasons for the withdrawal of this area from the park. I shall repeat briefly, if I may, the situation that exists. The purpose of withdrawing these 10 square miles from the Cape Breton national park is to provide for the Wreck Cove hydro development of the Nova Scotia power commission. As I said a week ago, the National Parks Act does not allow the exploitation of the resources of that area when they are inside the park. If it is decided, however, that the national interest requires the development of these resources within that area, then that area has to be removed from the park. There are precedents for this.

In this particular case a request came in November, 1956, for the use of these headwaters for the development of hydro at the Wreck Cove plant. It was contended that the use of these waters within these 10 square miles could boost the capacity of the plant considerably. The two governments of Nova Scotia and Canada undertook a joint survey to ascertain the facts from an engineering and economic point of view. The report recommended that these approximately 10 square miles would provide sufficient water to increase the output of the plant and make the provision of hydro power in the Wreck Cove plant much cheaper and much more satisfactory.

I did mention a week ago that I was very sorry that we had to withdraw this land from the park. It is true that the lands are not too valuable from a scenic point of view because there was much of the same type of land in the park, that is in this south-central part of the park. The provision of this additional power would help the provincial program and improve their economic position by providing excess power for peaking. We did try to obtain additional lands from the province of Nova Scotia. I believe this was referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria last week. We looked at the lands to the north and west of the park, and as I stated at that time, those lands were similar to areas already in the park. The situation was further complicated by the fact that there were fishing villages along the shore which would add many complexities to our already difficult problem of administering parks.

Now, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria mentioned that the fishing villages would be an asset to the park. I agree with him that they would be a great tourist asset.

But the task of administering a park with private land within that park is extremely difficult. So for these reasons we decided not at this time to take on these difficulties but to look around for something else that we could get in compensation. So we asked the Nova Scotia government if they would make available to us those five acres of land close to the Champlain Habitation which would make this national historic park a much better place from a scenic and general attractiveness point of view. They assented to that proposal and we have now made arrangements with the province to get the five acres on the Champlain Habitation in exchange for the ten square miles in the park.

Mr. Winch: Five acres or five square miles?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Five acres. The Champlain Habitation is a very small area. By acreage there is no comparison but many people who have been down there visiting have expressed approval. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made mention of this matter a week ago, by expressing his gratitude or appreciation that we had been able to get this land for the national historic parks. I think that is the summary of what I said a week ago as to why we are withdrawing this land from the park.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Herridge: We in this group and, I think, a good many other members in the house are interested in the maintenance of our parks and their extension wherever possible and wise. But in view of the explanation given by the minister as to the need for the withdrawal of this land and also his reference to the commendation from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate we in this group, without any further knowledge of the situation, support the bill because, while it is unfortunate to withdraw land from our parks, we think it is in the public interest at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: What will the area of this park be after the ten square miles are withdrawn?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): About 400 square miles. I will pass the map across the floor of the house if the hon. member would like to look at it and see the size of the area that is being withdrawn.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL TO $6 MILLION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to increase the authorized capital of the Canadian farm loan board from $4 million to $6 million.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair .

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the committee is simple and clear in its terms and urgent in its nature. The bill to be founded on the resolution is likewise simple and very clear in its terms. The bill increases the capital stock of the Canadian farm loan board from $4 million to $6 million, and that is all the bill does. That is the sum total of the extent of the bill.

The Canadian Farm Loan Act provides that the farm loan board may borrow money from the Minister of Finance for re-lending to farmers but that the total amount of such borrowings may not exceed 20 times the par value of its outstanding capital stock. At present the outstanding capital stock is $4 million which fact therefore limits the board's borrowing capacity and consequently its re-lending capacity to $80 million. At the beginning of this fiscal year, April 1, 1958, the board had loans outstanding in excess of $61 million and nearly $6 million of approved loans awaiting distribution. Loan applications on hand at that date exceeded $5 million and indications at that date were that at least $20 million of approved loans would be processed this year. But in the nearly four months that have passed since then, it is quite clear that the lending business of the board is greatly expanding beyond those expectations.

I may say that the board's actual lending in this fiscal year has accelerated considerably in excess of the increase estimated at April 1. Loan approvals at the end of June this year are 70 per cent ahead of those at the same date in 1957. Loans placed with the board's solicitors for disbursement at the end of June this year are 106 per cent ahead of those at the same date last year. Loans actually disbursed up to July 15—that is yesterday—this year equal those of last year to October 1. The best estimate at this time is that loan commitments by the board, unless the present measure is adopted, must cease by about August 15 and available money for commitments made will be exhausted by about October 31. There is therefore urgency in this present resolution, Mr. Chairman.

By increasing the capital stock which the Minister of Finance is authorized to purchase from $4 million to $6 million, the proposed amendment will increase the board's lending capacity from the present $80 million to $120 million. As all hon. members know, the government is keenly aware of the importance of agricultural credit and finance for the prosperity of our farming community. There are on the statute books three important acts which deal with the capital needs of farmers, namely the Canadian Farm Loan Act; the Farm Improvement Loans Act which deals with intermediate credit, particularly for financing the purchase of farm equipment; and the Veterans' Land Act administered by my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs. At the present time the government is engaged in a comprehensive study and review of all three acts with a view to determining where enlargement of scope, expansion in function or improvement in the methods of operation may be required.

I think I should say a word about the procedure that is proposed. I have stressed the fact that the resolution relates to this one feature, namely the total amount of permissible borrowing and with it re-lending. The bill to be founded upon the resolution has precisely that effect. If it meets with the approval of the house I propose, after the bill has been given second reading, to move that it be referred to the standing committee on agriculture, so that that committee will be in a position to undertake whatever review or study it wishes of the broader aspect of the subject. Indeed, because the bill is so very short and its provisions so clearly within the simple terms of the resolution, if it meets with the approval of the house I would ask the house, in order to expedite the measure and move it to the standing committee on agriculture as quickly as possible, to allow the bill to be introduced and be given second reading today, and then, presumably, the committee on agriculture can meet soon and the officials of the Canadian farm loan board, the commissioner, Mr. Chester, and other officials of the department or of other departments will be available to assist members of the committee in studying all questions that may arise out of the bill.

It is hoped by the government that in this way whatever ideas hon. members may have in relation to this subject may be put before the committee, and also that the Canadian farm loan board may have an opportunity of acquainting members with the very greatly extended operations of the board.

In my experience as Minister of Finance for the past year, I have found that much of the criticism that one has heard about the operations under the Canadian Farm Loan Act relates to the period antecedent to the 1956 amendments. During the 1956 session the act was substantially revised, enlarging the permissible loan in any individual case and also the percentage of value of the farm against which the farm loan board was authorized to make loans. I think I can say that the tone and attitude of the administration has undergone a good deal of change in recent times and that the board takes a much more generous and benevolent view of its responsibilities in this regard than it used to prior to the 1956 amendments. I think this is a matter which brings pleasure to all hon. members of the house, and in the committee on agriculture there will be every opportunity hon. members may wish to inform themselves with respect to the operations of the board and to obtain whatever information they may require relevant to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the statement of the Minister of Finance that there has been some change in the attitude of the Canadian Farm Loan Board since 1956 is certainly a correct one, and is borne out by the results of the applications made to the board for loans. I think that if anyone goes over the evidence of the committee of that day he will learn the value of having on that committee —and I am sure the Minister of Finance will appreciate this—members of all parties and members in the opposition of that day who took their duties very seriously and prevented a move by the government to hurry the thing through on such pretexts that unless it got through right away applications before the board could not be dealt with and the loans would not be provided. Because we were able to keep the board before the committee for a number of sessions and because we were able to get the opinion of highly qualified witnesses, particularly the late Dr. E. C. Hope of the Canadian federation of agriculture, we were able not only to get some improvement in the terms of the bill which was before the committee at that time but, and probably this was of even greater importance, to change the attitude of the board itself and perhaps of the government, too, because I imagine the board was reflecting the government's attitude towards applications placed before the board.

There is no field of government policy in which farm organizations have been more critical in recent years than the field of farm credit. Brief after brief has been presented to the previous government and to this government asking for an extension of farm credit and for improvements in this respect, and this government, in its election campaigns in both recent elections, made a very strong point with regard to the improvement of farm credit facilities. I express the hope that a study which is now being made in various fields of farm credit will result in a complete overhaul of the farm credit machinery.

Even if one attaches every importance to the change in attitude of the Canadian Farm Loan Board, the fact still remains that in this field the very terms under which farmers have to obtain credit are most unsatisfactory, and this is from the standpoint of the farm organizations themselves, based upon their submissions over the years. The bill presented to the agriculture committee in 1956 provided an amendment to extend the terms of loans up to 25 years. We were able to get a subsequent amendment providing for a maximum period of 30 years. The farm organizations have now asked for an extension to 40 years, and they have not been merely taking whatever provision the government had placed in legislation and adding another five or ten year period to it so that the government could never catch up with their demands. Their attitude has been to relate that figure to conditions in agriculture and to state that in view of these conditions farmers need a period of 40 years in which to repay their loans. I think this very long period of time emphasizes very vividly the difficulties which farmers experience in making a living and repaying the loans they have borrowed. The history of farming in this country and in most countries of the world is that a young man acquires a farm, and acquires with it a sizeable debt—

Mr. Speakman: May I rise on a point of order? Cannot the hon. member for Assiniboia discuss the resolution which is before us?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think I am discussing this resolution. I think I am following the example set by the minister. It seems to me that some of these new members are far too sensitive, and far too impatient of any member who stands up in the house and suggests that there should be some improvement. I suggest to the hon. member that he contain himself and not be so impatient. If he desires to rise in his place and make whatever contribution he wishes to this debate, let him do so instead of interrupting by raising points of order.

There are other improvements which have been suggested. One is a change in the interest rate itself, and I think that is most important because at present interest rates it takes a farmer, very often, a whole lifetime—40 years—to repay his obligation. Studies made by the federation of agriculture and the farmers union reveal that agriculture has not been able to pay over just 2 per cent on the capital employed in the industry, and so the interest rate of even 5 per cent being charged by the Canadian Farm Loan Board is a high rate of interest and is a very onerous burden upon agriculture.

We in this group would suggest with the farm organizations that there should be a substantial lowering of the interest rate to at least 3 per cent. We further suggest that the maximum loan that could be obtained under the act should be increased. The maximum that can be obtained is $15,000. We suggest that the maximum should be increased to $20,000. Sixty-five per cent is the maximum of the assessed value that can be obtained by way of loans at this time. The farm organizations have not complained about that figure itself in some aspects and particularly with regard to the larger loans but they have requested a change in the act so that loans of up to at least 80 per cent of the assessed value could be made, with a maximum loan of $10,000.

I am pleased that a study is being made in this field and I hope that every consideration is being given to the provision of what one might term managed credit or supervised credit in the field of agriculture. A great deal of useful information, as the minister well knows, can be obtained from examining the experience in the United States. The farm credit administration in that country makes loans on a production basis. Canada has had some experience in this field as well with regard to the Veterans' Land Act under which legislation loans are supervised. I think every one will agree that the experience in regard to loans under that act has been excellent and there is much that could be learned about this method of providing loans from examining the experience under the Veterans' Land Act.

I express the hope to the minister that his major announcement the other day as to issues of long term government bonds at higher rates of interest will not so affect the cost of money being made available to the Canadian farm loan board as to necessitate any increase in the interest rate that the board presently charges.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not expect that to happen at all.

Mr. Argue: I am very pleased to have that assurance from the minister. I remember that we discussed this question in the committee a couple of years ago and at that time we were not able to pin down the minister of that day to a definite assurance in this respect. He merely expressed the hope that it would not happen. I thank the minister for his statement and his assurance that the interest rate will not go beyond 5 per cent.

I hope that we may be able to have witnesses appear before the committee on agriculture who are authorities in this field and that we may be able to make a study of the broader field of agricultural credit. In spite of all I have said about the importance of agricultural credit and the importance of making very substantial changes in this field, I would not want it assumed or deduced that I am of the view that agricultural credit of itself is in large part a solution of the present agricultural problems. As far as grain producers are concerned today, I think you could give them any amount of credit, they could be farming the very best land they could locate, they could choose the size of farm and the type of machinery necessary to give them the most highly efficient unit, and I still believe it would not be possible for them to make sufficient money to pay depreciation, provide themselves and their families with an ordinary Canadian standard of living and have enough left over to restore or replace the equipment after it had worn out. In other words, regardless of the amount of credit or the kind of terms on which it was given, this would not solve the problems of those engaged in the production of grain.

I believe I heard some one in the Liberal group saying something about going to California.

Mr. Robichaud: That is not correct.

Mr. Argue: I will accept that as a correction of my interpretation of the rumblings I heard back there. I might remind the hon. member that it has already been said during this session by a very prominent and outstanding member of his party who is considered the agricultural spokesman that farmers on the prairies are in a much superior position to farmers in other parts of Canada.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Argue: Someone says it is true. To those who think that in the winter a farmer can move to town or go to California, I can reply that it "just ain't so". The farmers on the prairies as in any other part of this country are working very hard. They obtain very little for their efforts. If you think that a good farmer is able to take a holiday, much less go to California, I take pleasure in informing you—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that this resolution does not include reference to a trip to California. May I request that the hon. gentleman direct his remarks to the subject of the resolution.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate what you have said, Mr. Chairman. Your remarks are certainly well taken. Even in his most generous moments I do not think the Minister of Finance will be providing any loans for trips to California and if any farmers are taking loans under this act and subsequently making a trip to California, I suggest that their chances of repaying the loans will be greatly reduced.

When hon. members speak on a question like this they should agree first of all that farmers in all parts of Canada have very serious problems one of which is to obtain adequate credit on reasonable terms. It does not assist the position of farmers in any one part of the country to make ill-founded remarks about agricultural producers in other parts of the country.

I conclude by expressing the hope to the minister that further legislation in this field will be forthcoming along the lines I have suggested and designed to meet the requests of the farm organizations.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, as I intend to make this my first English speech in this house, I beg the indulgence and consideration of all hon. members present. I listened with interest to the remarks made by the Minister of Finance and by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I do not know whether or not I should make any statement concerning what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia concerning trips by farmers to California or to the southern part of the United States but I think I shall wait for another occasion to comment upon this.

I want to tell the Minister of Finance that I will vote for the resolution. However, I also wish to tell him that it falls far short of being the improvement to the Canadian Farm Loan Act that was promised by the Minister of Agriculture. The only advantage of this measure is that it provides additional funds to the board. This means that the borrower under this legislation will not enjoy any improvement over the conditions available to them today.

If we look at the statutes since this law was first passed in 1927 we note that several amendments have been made to it throughout the years. These changes have always been made in the sense of improving it and adapting it to new conditions. The last changes were those made in 1956, which increased the percentage evaluation of property from 60 per cent to 65 per cent of its value, increased the maximum loan from $12,000 to $15,000 and extended the repayment period from 25 years to 30 years.

This law, initiated and improved by the Liberal administrations over the years, has been of great service to our farmers but it has become somewhat outdated with the evolution of farming methods and the need for greater capital. The resolution that we are discussing today should include the amendments promised by our Conservative friends during the last election campaigns. Let me remind the committee of the promise made by the Minister of Agriculture at Mont Tremblant on September 18, 1957. He said:

> A more generous farm credit policy and the diversification of production may improve Canada's depressed farm economy, Agriculture Minister Harkness said today. He suggested the type of credit policy similar to loans accorded under the Veterans' Land Act may be used to help farmers.

[Mr. Argue.]

And on March 11 of this year the Prime Minister is quoted in the Hamilton Spectator as having said:

> ...long-term credit will be extended to help farmers plan for the future. I cannot bring about these changes unless the farmers across this nation get behind our candidates, he said. If we are not returned to power this legislation will not receive the benefit of favourable consideration.

In a Canadian Press dispatch, contained in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 15, the Minister of Agriculture is quoted as saying that he:

> —recognizes the need of providing farmers with a more flexible system of long-term loans including the possibility of lowering the present 5 per cent interest rate.

I ask the Prime Minister whether there were not enough of his candidates elected to carry out his promises and has the Minister of Agriculture not enough qualified persons to study the matters he wanted to look into?

The farmers of my constituency and all over Canada are waiting for action. The most important question that is being discussed in agricultural circles today is that of financing. The farmer, unlike the industrialist, cannot count on selling shares in order to finance his operations because he cannot pay the dividends. The period for repayment of capital is too long. That is why he must call on the state for assistance. That is what the Liberal party advocated through its distinguished leader during the last election campaign, an up-to-date agricultural credit policy. We realize that it is important to make available to the farmer the necessary capital to enable him to organize his farm well and to obtain the largest possible revenue in order to attain something like the same level of benefits as is enjoyed by the other classes of society.

In addition to the monetary advantage of a well organized system of farm credit, there is the other aspect of maintaining the family farm that is part of our tradition. The family farm, said the deputy minister of agriculture, S. J. Chagnon, in a press conference given to the members of the Canadian association of producers of chemical fertilizers, "assures the solidity and stability of our social and economic institutions, not only in Canada but in all North America. It is this family type of agriculture that is still best suited to a country that treasures its democratic ideals and institutions."

In recent years several agricultural organizations have submitted briefs to the government and they have all requested improvements in our agricultural legislation which, while differing in detail, agree in general principles. Thus, the interprovincial farm union council recommends the creation of a federal agency which would be responsible to the Department of Agriculture rather than to the Department of Finance. This agency would include a loan department similar to that authorized under the Veterans' Land Act. This is also one of the recommendations of the Canadian federation of agriculture. This would mean that the borrower would have the advice of specialists in agricultural questions until 25 per cent of his debt has been repaid. Only at that time will the inspections cease. Both of these organizations requested lower interest rates. The interprovincial farm union council maintains that the interest rates should be from 3 per cent to 3½ per cent. The Canadian federation of agriculture asks that the rate of interest be reduced to the same level as the government borrowing rate, plus a small margin. But it recognizes that the administration of the loan system should be the responsibility of the government.

Another point on which there is general agreement is on the amount of the maximum loan and the percentage of valuation of property. They agree that the maximum loan should be $20,000 and the Canadian federation of agriculture recommends the percentage of evaluation of 80 per cent for loans up to $8,000, with a gradual reduction to 65 per cent for loans from $16,000 to $20,000. All loans between 70 per cent and 80 per cent should be subject to inspection of government specialists. Those are the general improvements that should be included in this resolution.

The Liberal party has some views on the organization of a modern farm loan policy. I do not intend to speak on these views at length during the discussion of this resolution since I have a motion on the order paper proposing that, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements. When that resolution comes forward for discussion I will have an opportunity to outline the Liberal party's views on this subject.

I should like to remind the minister that it is more important than ever for him to outline the agricultural policy of the government by which they propose to make it possible for farmers and fishermen to share in the riches of our country in the same manner and to the same extent as other groups in our society. During the last two election campaigns all Conservative candidates bewailed the conditions of the farmers and even went as far in some cases as to sound their "last post". All this great misery, they claimed, was caused by the Liberal administration. Yet we do not see one single Conservative member of parliament, not even from the province of Quebec or the maritimes, insisting on the rights that they promised to defend a few brief months ago.

All that these members have done during this session, and all they will likely do after I have spoken, is to sing the praises of the minister for increasing the capital of the farm loan board from $4 million to $6 million. We intend to vote for this measure because it makes more credit available to the farmers but we feel that it is not the improvement the farmers were led to expect during the election campaign and we hope that the government will bring in legislation to help our farmers and other working classes.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that Canadian farmers will welcome the action envisaged in the resolution and will also welcome the improved attitude on the part of the officials of the Canadian farm loan board. As we will have a further opportunity to discuss the details at a later date I will not say anything further in that regard until that time.

Something has been said about farmers going to California, Miami or other places in the winter. I want to tell the house something about that because there are a number of farmers in the prairie grain growing areas who do that. They do so to save money because taking into account the cost of fuel over the winter the amount of money involved will pay their fare there and back and it does not cost any more to live there than it does to live in Canada. Most of the farmers who do that have been at the job for 30, 40 or 50 years. I know one farmer 84 years old who has gone to California on a number of occasions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to take his seat while the chairman is standing. I want to remind him, as I said before, that we are not discussing trips to California. We are dealing with the resolution before us increasing the authorized capital of the Canadian farm loan board and I will have to ask the hon. member to confine his remarks strictly to the resolution before us.

Mr. Nasserden: I am very glad to comply, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure that all hon. members will realize that those who do go to California have a good, sound reason for doing so.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, there are three brief points I should like to make on the resolution. In the first place, I should like to indicate my support for the measure which will make available an additional $2 million to the Canadian farm loan board for loans to farmers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, $40 million.

Mr. Carter: Yes. $2 million additional capital will provide $40 million for loans. In the second place, I should like to ask the minister, if it would not be too inconvenient to do so, to provide the house with information indicating the extent to which Newfoundland farmers have been able to benefit from this legislation. I should like the figure for the last fiscal year and if figures can be provided for previous years that will be so much the better. It is true that Newfoundland is not primarily an agricultural province but we have considerable farm land and there are good possibilities for the development of the farm industry. Hon. members may not realize it but the prices we pay for milk, so essential for the health of children, and other local farm products are perhaps higher than in any other part of Canada. It is necessary to assist the farmers to modernize their farms so that wherever possible the cost of local farm products may be reduced.

In the third place, I should like to ask the minister if it is possible for fishermen to benefit under this legislation. I ask that because there is a sentence on page 4 of the report of the Canadian farm loan board for the year ending March 31, 1957, which reads as follows:

> The amendment also made provision for the winding up of financial arrangements between the board and the Minister of Finance respecting the assets, capital and loans of the board outstanding under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act.

I should be grateful if the minister would explain what these arrangements were and what is the present relationship between the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act and the Canadian Farm Loan Act. If Newfoundland farmers have not availed themselves to any degree of this legislation and if Newfoundland fishermen have not availed themselves of the benefits under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act it is not because the need does not exist. There must be some other reason for it and it is quite possible that the reason has to do with the conditions under which these loans are made available. I can understand that this legislation would have been drafted perhaps long before Newfoundland became a province, and it would be drafted with conditions in mind which would not obtain in our province.

However, there is a great need for loans of this type to be made available to both fishermen and farmers, particularly the fishermen of the Atlantic provinces. There is a great similarity between the farming and fishing industries. Both these industries are important to the national economy; both produce primary wealth which provides a basis for secondary industries; both produce food which is essential to the maintenance of human life and for the health and well-being of mankind. These fishermen and farmers wage a continuous struggle with nature and receive a very meagre return for their efforts and for their investment, as well as the long hours of work, the hardships and risks which they undertake. This is particularly true in comparison with the returns from other industries.

In addition, both have to face problems resulting from factors over which they have no control, factors such as wind, storms, drought, hail and in the case of fishermen the scarcity of bait. Of course, marketing conditions apply to both, but perhaps to an even greater degree to fishermen. There is, therefore, a great need for this kind of legislation for the fishermen as well as the farmers. If the Canadian Fishermen's Loan Act has been wound up, then I should like to suggest that the scope of this act be enlarged to include loans to fishermen. Perhaps the provisions might be amended so as to make it easier for both farmers and fishermen to obtain credit under this legislation.

Mr. MacEwan: My remarks on this matter will be very brief. I congratulate the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska upon his speech in English. I must say that it will be necessary for me to disappoint him because I am going to say that we greatly appreciate the increase in funds made available through this resolution but there are also one or two other matters which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, and I hope I shall not be guilty of repetition. I did mention this matter during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but I believe it will bear repetition.

The province of Nova Scotia established a royal commission to study agriculture. One of the recommendations of this commission was to the effect that the Canadian Farm Loan Act should be changed. According to the submission of the Nova Scotia federation of agriculture to this royal commission, this act provided more or less for the larger farms and for the farmers in other parts of Canada, but was not framed in such a way as to be of much help in extending credit to young farmers in Nova Scotia. As was stated by this royal commission on agriculture, many loans were obtained from the Nova Scotia land settlement board, many more, I might say, than through the Canadian farm loan board. I would urge the minister that this matter be looked into with a view to drafting further amendments in order to give young farmers in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces a chance to make application for loans under the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Another matter which was dealt with by the commission was the suggestion that a joint federal-provincial board could be established which would be a combination of the Canadian farm loan board and the Nova Scotia board. Perhaps this suggestion could be borne in mind by the minister so that the proper amendments in that connection could be made. I believe that at the moment we have a very forward looking and very sympathetic federation of agriculture in Nova Scotia.

If I am not straying too far from the subject matter, I should like to point out that arrangements have been made between the federation, private citizens and the province of Nova Scotia to set up an abattoir in the province in order to help our farmers, especially the cattle raisers. I believe this is going ahead.

It is necessary today, because of the type of farming that is conducted, for our younger farmers to have credit available. The number of vacant farms in my own area, and in the maritimes generally, is a most important matter. I do not know too much about the practical aspects of farming because my experience has been limited to helping put in the hay on my grandfather's farm or taking the horses to water. However, I do know something about the Canadian Farm Loan Act and its operations. Another thing which I might submit to the minister is that since farmers are not living near the capital cities of the provinces and it is sometimes difficult for them to obtain information about the Canadian Farm Loan Act, more publicity should be given to the regulations and application forms should be more readily available. The farmer should be informed just what is available under this important legislation.

I believe that is all I have to say on the matter, Mr. Chairman. It is a most important subject in so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, especially having regard to the encouragement of agriculture in that province.

Mr. Peters: I should like to thank the Minister of Finance for having increased by $2 million the amount available under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. However, if the farmers can go to California on the $4 million, I hope that there are more who will be able to go on the $6 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, let me clear up one thing. The amount he is talking about, in the sense of $4 million and $6 million, is the authorized capital of the Canadian farm loan board. This is not its lending capacity. Its lending capacity is measured in terms of 20 times its capital. What we are talking about now is raising the limit on its borrowing or its lending capacity of $80 million, which this measure now proposes should be increased to $120 million.

Mr. Peters: I thank the minister for his statement. I believe that more people will be able to travel now than were able to do with the small amount that was in the act before.

However, I believe the whole matter of farm credit should be given an overhauling. In agricultural areas we have found that the price of operating a farm has increased, just as everything else has. Credit is necessary now, not only to buy farm machinery necessary to operate the farm and the stock, but to take care of the buildings on the property. Many farmers are faced with problems because of the fact they cannot borrow to the limit of the total value of the lands to help them with the expansion that is necessary. As farm organizations have suggested, the amount a farmer can borrow should be increased from 65 per cent of the appraised value of the farm to 80 per cent of the value of his property.

One of the problems that faces the farmer is the knowledge that if he were to expand his operation, if he were to buy the farm next door or a couple of farms close by, if he were to go into a more diversified type of farming where the expenses will be much greater for machinery and for milking facilities, he is faced with a problem of being unable to obtain credit under the present legislation as we have it in effect.

It seems to me that one of the problems we are finding and the reason why so many farmers are leaving is the fact that they are now facing the proposition of borrowing mortgage money from trust companies which are very much opposed to lending the money, particularly in my area where an organization like the Canada Permanent Trust Company will not lend farm mortgage money at all. Where other types of farm credit are no longer available such as bank credit, they are faced with a proposition of either having to borrow the credit at a rate at which it is impossible for them to pay back or to leave the farm and in many cases that is what they are doing. They are leaving the farm every day.

Having regard to this problem of mortgage money in general and particularly mortgage money for those who are just starting in industry and want to increase their holdings and operations, we feel that they are faced with a problem where they should have supervised credit, credit which may even look to them to be more than they are able to carry but which could be introduced in a much more satisfactory manner than is now taking place.

I think the government should take a close look at the situation with regard to agricultural credit. In order to do this they should examine the situation in the light of the experience the government has had with the Veterans Land Act. Under the Veterans Land Act the situation has been handled a little bit differently from that in which it has been handled in other government boards in so far as they are willing and deem it necessary to supervise credit. I know of cases where the veterans land agents have come to a farmer and said: If you increase your holdings, if you buy the farm across the road, if you go into this type of operation rather than the one you are in, if you will expand your buildings, we will give you this amount of money. They are willing to assist the farmer in a repayment program. They will supervise his purchases. They will supervise the type of crop that he grows. In the majority of cases they are successful. In fact, the record as to the number of failures under this supervised credit that is being extended by this branch of government has been more than satisfactory in the cases that I have known of. I understand that the loss is almost negligible.

While we are in agreement that this legislation is advantageous to the farmers, I personally know of many young farmers today who would go into farming if they were given some supervision in the operation of their farms. This is nothing revolutionary. It is the type of program that the banks have used for many years where they have said: You show us your receipts; we give you the money on a graduated scale and you bring your receipts into us and pay your expenses out of that, and the rest of the money that is left over goes into paying off the loan. In many cases the farmer is faced with the proposition of having on his own to make a decision that he is not too sure is going to be a successful one. I think the government should offer him a much more comprehensive type of supervision than has been offered by the Canadian farm loan board.

We agree with the Canadian federation of agriculture also in the expansion of this credit. We think that 30 years is not long enough. We think that farm stability is such that 40 years would be a satisfactory period of time. Because these loans are so stable and because these loans in the past have had such a high repayment rate and there have been so few cases of inability to pay, we think that the interest rate on agricultural loans must be not more than 3 per cent and possibly, if the matter is under supervision, it could be lower than that.

Also in my own area—and I think this is true in general—while you could start farming on a farm that you could purchase, that would carry an average family; you could purchase that property equipped for $10,000, ten, fifteen or twenty years ago. It is no longer possible to do that. I think many of the members must realize just what proposition is faced by a young farmer if he wants to go on a farm. In my own area on an average farm that will maintain a family, the land will cost $8,000 to $10,000; the buildings will run upwards of $15,000. This includes a home that would be comparable to the homes that they would have if they were living in the city and working in an industry. The machinery to operate a farm in Timiskaming—and I refer to a mixed farm—would cost $5,000. To operate that farm in order to return to the family a standard of living to which they should be entitled, the stock will cost another $10,000. Hence we have an outlay of $45,000.

I think that even a limit of $20,000 for a mortgage is an unreasonable amount of money because in Timiskaming if you bought a farm for $20,000, equipped and ready to operate, the contracts that you would have even in the milk producing industry would not be sufficient to pay for that farm in 30 years and keep the family. It is all right if the wife is going to run it and the man is going to go out and work. But I do not think that is the method of agriculture that the minister contemplates when he suggests raising these loans.

So that while we are in agreement and appreciate on behalf of the farmers in Ontario these increases in the capitalization of the Canadian farm loan board, we think that a great deal of consideration in committee must be given to a much more satisfactory way of supervising credit than we are going to be extending to agricultural people and the agricultural communities of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: As a member who loves hogs, Mr. Chairman, and as one who has raised a good many of them and who represents a large number of small farmers and fruit growers may I say that to date I have never seen any of them down south of the line on winter holidays. They do not go to Florida or California. However, I am under the impression that the member from the prairie constituency who mentioned that matter represented a small minority of prairie farmers with possibly large acreages and under very favourable conditions. I do not think for a moment those are typical conditions. In any event, I just rose to express my support of the proposals put forward by previous speakers in this group with respect to the limitations of the present Canada Farm Loan Act, and the possibility for the improvement of this legislation. However, in order to facilitate the passage of this bill this afternoon so that it can be referred to the committee on agriculture for study and recommendations, I am going to leave my further remarks on this legislation to an appropriate time during a later debate.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to ask the minister a question. I wonder whether he could elaborate on the method of the proposal and up to what percentage is money lent on loans? I understand that the appraisal value is different in different districts. For the information of the members of the house I think I should say a few words on this trip to California. I would suggest that no more farmers take trips to California than those from any other industry in Canada and maybe not as many.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-38, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now, by leave. I move the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

ESTATE TAX ACT

NEW BASIS FOR ASSESSMENT OF SUCCESSION DUTIES

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-37, respecting the taxation of estates.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I made some remarks on the resolution stage concerning the new principles involved in the taxation of estates, and I do not propose to repeat them on this occasion.

I realize that the bill will be given very careful study by the banking and commerce committee. It is a very long bill—almost 50 pages—and it only came into our hands yesterday. Hon. members will also be aware that the minister tabled a return to the house giving us copies of the briefs which were submitted from national organizations concerning this bill in response to the invitation that he made when he introduced an initial bill last session—Bill No. 248 of the 1957-58 session.

I regret to find that many of the administrative features which I felt were somewhat exorbitant so far as administrative powers are concerned continue in the new bill. I notice that this aspect has received criticism in a number of the briefs which have been presented to the minister. I have no doubt that members of the banking and commerce committee will hear from many of these national associations, and I hope that some of these more exorbitant administrative and collection powers will be somewhat reduced as a result of the discussions.

Mr. F. C. Stinson (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate for just a few moments in this debate, may I offer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) my congratulations on the introduction of this bill which, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and the minister himself have pointed out, introduces a new principle of taxation with respect to taxation of estates, that is, the principle of taxing the aggregate estate instead of levying taxation on the interests taken by successors.

While I am speaking of the Minister of Finance, may I also say a word of congratulation to him on the excellent work he has done both in respect to the recent budget presentation and in respect of the addresses he has recently made in this house and elsewhere with respect to the borrowings to be carried out by the government over the next few months.

It is proposed that this bill should go to the banking and commerce committee for detailed consideration, and I do not propose at this stage to make comments which might be more appropriately made in that committee. However, I think I should say, as I indicated earlier, that a new basis for taxation is proposed in this bill, a basis on which the tax levied relates to the size of the estate without reference to the relationship of the beneficiary to the deceased or the size of a gift made to a beneficiary. However, the previous concessions made under the present act to close relatives have been preserved by increasing the exemptions in favour of such relatives.

It seems to me that the administration of the proposed statute will be much simpler than the administration of the act which it will probably replace, and with this greater simplicity it is likely to be less costly to administer.

Another advantage would appear to be that it should be much easier under this legislation than under the previous act to calculate within a reasonable length of time after the death of the deceased the precise tax to be paid in respect of the estate. For instance, under the present legislation, if a man dies leaving a life interest in his estate to his widow, with the executor having power to encroach on the capital for the benefit of the widow during her lifetime and the remainder of the estate to be divided among the children, it is most difficult for the revenue authorities to establish precisely, at an early date after the death of the deceased, what the tax should be with respect to the life interest to be enjoyed by the widow, having regard to the fact that it is extremely difficult to calculate to what extent the executor may encroach on the capital of the estate for the widow's benefit. Then, of course, another difficulty arises in that one cannot calculate with any certainty in a case such as I have described the size of the interest to be taken by the children.

Under the proposed estate tax it will be possible within a very short time after the passing of the deceased to determine the tax which is payable, and advantages will accrue to the Department of National Revenue, to the executors and trustees charged with the administration of the estate and, of course, most important of all, to those people who will be liable to pay the tax.

I do not think it would be proper to go into the clauses of this proposed statute in detail at this time but perhaps one or two further comments would be appropriate. It would seem to me that under the old Succession Duty Act the proceeds of policies of life insurance were subject to tax only in proportion to the premiums paid by the deceased or his personal corporation. In the new legislation this concept of contribution has been eliminated and I believe there will be advantages gained as a result of that change. No longer will it be necessary, as I understand it, for exhaustive searches to be made into the files and financial records of individual taxpayers with a view to ascertaining where in fact the money came from which was used for the purchase of life insurance on the life of a deceased person. There are also substantial differences between those sections of this statute having to do with joint interests and the sections of the present Succession Duty Act which tax such an interest in a joint holding of a person on his death.

In my view this legislation is progressive. As I said earlier in my remarks, it will make for administrative simplicity. It will be a less difficult statute to administer. The problems of executors and trustees in the matter of the settlement of death duties will be diminished and I believe we can look forward to other advantages also when this bill is finally approved by parliament.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the other day I had the advantage of making a few remarks on this subject and I will try not to make these subsequent remarks too long. There is no doubt in my mind that the basic simplicity of this bill is a recommendation of sorts and I understand that many of its provisions are similar to those provisions which we find in the internal revenue code of the United States. The proposed act, of course, taxes the net value of the estate after certain exemptions have been applied but it seems to me that these exemptions in Canada under the proposed act are vastly different from the exemptions which are allowed in the United States under the internal revenue code.

Because of this and for other reasons I find the present bill disappointing. For example, it does not recognize the husband and wife partnership in the building up of an estate nor are the exemptions which are allowed under the proposed act sufficiently large in extent. It is true that the smaller the estate, the greater the exemption, and that is only right; but in so far as the exemptions on larger estates are concerned they are almost negligible. To my way of thinking there are certain sections of this act which should be amended and perhaps they will be when we discuss the bill later on.

If I am right in my reference, I referred the other day to part I, section (b), paragraph 4 referring to certain other property and mentioned the fact that where a person—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if I may interrupt the hon. member, I would rise on a point of order. I think it is not proper and it has been ruled many times that in a debate on second reading of a bill one must not refer to particular provisions, sections or clauses of the bill. The debate on second reading is confined under the rules of the house to a discussion of the principle of the bill and any reference to provisions, sections or clauses of the bill is out of order. I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend because he said he was going to be brief but I think the point must be adhered to on the part of all hon. members.

Mr. Macnaughton: I was about to refer to the tax on insurance that a controlled company might pay but that can be discussed later.

There is one suggestion I should like to make to the minister at this time under the section relating to appeals. Under this bill appeals are referred to the income tax appeal board. It seems to me that a great majority of the cases under the proposed act will be estate tax cases, of course, requiring to a large degree the use of experts on a question of valuation of the estate. I suggest to the minister that the income tax appeal board may be swamped with a tremendous number of cases and that he should consider the setting up of a separate estate tax appeal board for the hearing of these estate tax cases. If we do not do that the present income tax appeal board may be simply swamped with hearings and we will incur long delays. That is all I have to say at the present time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this very interesting—and I am sure all hon. members will agree somewhat complicated—measure now before the house for second reading is one that requires considerable study. We in this group were very pleased when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) during the last parliament brought the bill forward for first reading in order that people throughout the country could give it that study. It is not a problem that could be studied satisfactorily in a short time. Without a doubt this bill is one of those that should go to a committee in order that the committee can hear representations, study the measure in the light of those representations and report to this house.

There is an extremely interesting feature to this bill. Although it is one of those dry as dust matters that are related to finance —a subject on which I am most incompetent to speak beyond the necessity of totalling up figures to about 500 and things of that sort—there has been a great deal of interest taken in it by women's organizations throughout the country. I am sure all hon. members have received representations from various national women's groups. I have received representations even from small women's institutes, women's clubs and local organizations. They have not simply forwarded to me a draft made by the national organization of which they are a part but have given some local flavour to their representations as a result of their experience and so on.

Before taking my seat I want to mention one of the excellent briefs which I received and which I understand has been forwarded to the Minister of Finance. I refer to the brief prepared by the Canadian committee on the status of women whose chairman is Mrs. G. D. Finlayson of Ottawa. I have read this through several times and I feel it reveals a careful analysis of the problems connected with this bill from their point of view. Looking back not many years I think it is interesting to note that this house seldom received representations from national women's organizations and received particularly few with respect to measures of this type. I think it does indicate that the women of Canada are beginning to take a greater interest in the governing of this country and in the legislation that comes before this house and its affect on Canadians and particularly on women themselves.

As usual, Mr. Speaker, I am quite brief and that is all I am going to say at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INCOME TAX

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND BELGIUM FOR THE AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-28, to implement a convention between Canada and Belgium for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Mr. Macnaughton: Does the minister intend to make a statement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think an extended statement is required. As my hon. friend knows, the bill is in the same form and the convention which it supports to ratify is in the same form as many which have been before the house in recent years. The purpose of the bill is to implement a convention between Canada and Belgium for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, and the establishment of rules for reciprocal fiscal assistance in the matter of income taxes.

The agreement or convention follows the pattern established in recent income tax agreements which Canada has made with the United States, the United Kingdom, Sweden, New Zealand, Ireland, Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, South Africa, the Netherlands and Australia.

Double taxation is avoided chiefly by a reciprocal system of tax credits in which the country of residence gives credit for the taxes imposed by the country where the income has its source.

The agreement contains the usual provisions limiting the taxing of trading profits to the permanent establishment rule. In addition, there are some specific provisions which are like those which have appeared in the other agreements to which I have made reference.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that any agreement which will help us avoid double taxation will certainly receive sympathetic consideration from this side of the house. I wonder whether at this stage the minister will tell us, either now or later, why the subject of succession duties was not included in this general bill. It has been included in previous bills in the past, as the minister well knows, and it seems to have been left out of this particular bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I can endeavour now to answer the question of the hon. member for Mount Royal. With respect, I do not think it is relevant to the present measure, but I might give my hon. friend what information I have. I think he will recall that in most cases where succession duty has been dealt with it has been dealt with in a separate convention from that relating to income tax. In the present case my information is that when the negotiations were embarked upon first in 1955, the indication on the part of the representatives of Belgium was that they wished to negotiate a convention in respect of income tax.

Mr. Macnaughton: Can the minister tell us also if the list of taxes which are mentioned here is comparable as between those taxes in Canada and those taxes in Belgium? Is the basis more or less similar?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The basis of what?

Mr. Macnaughton: Is it a comparable list of taxes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, they were considered comparable by those who were negotiating and those who had responsibility for instructing the negotiators. There is no precise identification in almost all of these cases between the taxes of the one country and the taxes of the other. Different countries do not always have exactly the same type of taxes with respect to income, but for this purpose it was considered that the taxes on the one hand with respect to Canada and the taxes on the other hand with respect to Belgium are comparable taxes in the income tax field.

On clause 2—Convention approved.

Mr. Macnaughton: May I suggest to the minister that we revert to the schedule now because clause 2, as the minister well knows, carries approval of the schedule. That has been the custom followed in previous years at the request of the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask my friend whether he has questions about the schedule?

Mr. Macnaughton: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall we revert to the schedule?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On the schedule.

Mr. Macnaughton: Will the minister tell us why he has particularly mentioned "including surtaxes and the old age security tax on income"? Would he also refer to article 1, section (b) which mentions tax on real property. I understand that real property tax in Canada is provincial. I should like to know what he means by the word "surtaxes" in referring to Canada and why old age security tax on income was included?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have surtaxes in the sense of the surtax on investment income; in other words, a tax in addition to the ordinary income tax. As to 1(b), this happens to be the type of income tax that has been applied in Belgium.

Mr. Macnaughton: Referring to article 1, paragraph 2, are there any other taxes of a substantially similar character? Will these words now cover the national contributory scheme to national health or even, as the Prime Minister mentioned some time ago, the national contributory retirement plan scheme? If we bring these schemes into force would they be included under the heading, "any other taxes of a substantially similar character"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision is one which has appeared in a number of those agreements. It is by no means a new provision. I think my hon. friend, as all other hon. members, will realize that while one is glad to answer questions as he may be able to with respect to the convention, the convention itself does not admit of amendment. We are dealing with a bill which includes five clauses, one of which provides for ratification of the agreement as it stands.

My friend has, with respect to this clause which is quite standard in form, asked a specific question which I think is somewhat hypothetical at this moment. Therefore I would not wish to be invited to attempt a positive answer to a question which is largely hypothetical. At the moment I do not see how the imposition of a premium with respect to a form of hospital insurance would be regarded as an income tax but I would not wish to say that in no case could such an impost be an income tax. It will depend entirely upon the form, I should think, in which the impost is levied.

The Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Mr. Macnaughton: There are a few more short questions. With respect to article III of the schedule. In the tax agreement with Ireland only the word "profits" was used. In the agreement with Denmark the words "industrial profits and commercial profits" were used. I presume the word "profits" is wide enough to cover investment profits too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The provision the article makes that Belgian enterprises will be taxed in Canada only with respect to industrial or commercial profits applies to the extent that they are attributable to their permanent establishment in Canada. I may say that the same rule applies reciprocally with respect to the industrial and commercial profits of Canadian enterprises in Belgium.

This point was raised with regard to another of these international conventions a couple of years ago and the answer which I was given at the time and which I take to be correct now was that the expression "industrial or commercial profits" is wide enough to include profits from investment if they are yielded in the course of the ordinary commercial activities of the company.

Mr. Macnaughton: Under article VI I believe that the rate of tax on a Belgian receiving dividends, etc. from Canada is 15 per cent. If you look at article VI, paragraph 3, it speaks of the Belgian tax on royalties. Can the minister give us any indication as to what the rate of tax is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The rate of tax to which Belgium binds itself in paragraph 3 of this article is 18 per cent of the net royalties which will in most cases be less than the 15 per cent of the gross royalties imposed under our law.

Mr. Macnaughton: In article IX, paragraph 2 (b) the sum of $3,000 is mentioned. I notice that is a reduction from the amount of $5,000 in the agreements we have with Germany and Ireland. Is there any reason for the reduction from $5,000 to $3,000?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My understanding is that was the amount that both parties desired.

Mr. Macnaughton: With regard to paragraph 4 of the same article, I understand that an artist or athlete performing in Belgium pays no tax if he is there on a temporary basis.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is my hon. friend speaking about the Belgian tax?

Mr. Macnaughton: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not wish to speak positively on that point.

Mr. Macnaughton: With regard to article XVII I note that when the minister was on this side of the house he had certain objections to the provision that the two contracting states may prescribe regulations. He wanted the regulations spelled out. Has he now changed his mind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid that the minister has been obliged to accept a practice that has become largely standardized and has been approved by parliament before. The minister, being always obedient and respectful towards parliament, has accepted the practice that parliament has well established now.

Mr. Macnaughton: Article XIV speaks of the exchange of information between the contracting states. Would the minister care to give a short explanation of that? It seems to me that we should limit it to a certain degree.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Quite so. Article XIV provides that the exchange of information is restricted to that which is necessary for the carrying out of the convention or for the prevention of fraud or avoidance of taxation. No information is to be exchanged which will disclose any trade secrets or trade process or which is deemed to be against public policy.

Mr. Macnaughton: The words "professional secret" are used in the same article. What would that refer to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my friend and I would have no difficulty in determining what are professional secrets with respect to professions. There are so many things that are professional secrets.

Mr. Macnaughton: I understand that this would not necessarily refer to legal professional secrets but in effect to trade secrets.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the explanation I gave I said that the information to be exchanged would not include trade secrets or trade processes.

Mr. Macnaughton: With regard to article XX, if the instruments of ratification are exchanged this year will deductions at the source start on January 1 next year and in the case of any other taxes will they begin as soon as the agreement comes into force?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would be my understanding.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND BELGIUM FOR THE AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION IN BELGIAN CONGO AND RUANDA-URUNDI

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-29, to implement a convention between Canada and Belgium for the purpose of extending to the Belgian Congo and the territory of Ruanda-Urundi under trusteeship the convention between Canada and Belgium for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income taxes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Macnaughton: Would the minister care to make any further statement on this measure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said, Mr. Chairman, that I thought any remarks which might be required on the other measure would be very short, and certainly any statement on this one should be very much shorter. This is a bill in the same form, and simply provides for the ratification of a convention that was signed at the same time as the one just now approved by the house. It applies to the Belgian Congo and to the Belgian trustee territory of Ruanda-Urundi, the provisions of a similar convention.

Indeed, the convention which is a schedule to the present bill is based upon the schedule of the former bill consisting of the convention between Canada and Belgium. This separate convention is required because the Belgian constitution requires a separate agreement with respect to these territories rather than an extension by means of an exchange of notes. As hon. members who have read the bill will realize, the schedule simply follows the form of the schedule in the former bill, namely the agreement with Belgium, and makes certain changes in some of the articles in order to provide specifically for the Belgian Congo and the trustee territory of Ruanda-Urundi.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Macnaughton: May I suggest that we consider the schedule and then revert to clause 2?

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we now consider the schedule?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On the schedule.

Mr. Macnaughton: In the schedule, article 1, paragraph 2, there is a slight variation in the wording from the previous bill. It says:

The present convention shall also apply to any other tax of a substantially analogous nature—

Is there anything to be read into the difference in wording between the two bills?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Chairman. Article 1 in this bill contains a definition of the taxes to which the convention applies. As my hon. friend has said, it makes provision that it shall also apply to any other tax of a substantially analogous nature which may be imposed in the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi or in Canada after the signing of the convention.

The article then contains a specific reference to the taxes to which the extended convention applies. In Canada it applies to income taxes, including surtaxes and the old age security tax on income. In the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi the convention applies to the tax on rental income, the movable capital tax, the professional tax, the complementary tax on profits realized by companies and other taxpayers, which are now imposed by the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi and are in the nature of income taxes.

The article also states that the extended convention will apply to any substantially analogous tax which may be imposed by either government during the time the convention is in force. I may say that the act of June 21, 1927, referred to in paragraph (b) of article I, deals with an act passed which affected corporations that have their head offices in Belgium and carry on their operations in the Belgian Congo. They are subject to special tax provisions.

I cannot, at the moment, refer to any existing tax which might offer a test of the meaning of the words "substantially analogous". Obviously, the intention of the parties in writing that provision into this act was to leave open the possibility that either of the parties by their lawfully constituted authorities might impose additional taxes which would be analogous or similar in nature to the existing taxes specifically embraced in the definition in article I.

Mr. Macnaughton: Would the minister explain the second sentence in article XIII which reads:

The amount to be deducted may not exceed that portion of the Canadian tax which corresponds to the proportion between the income of Congolese origin subject to the Congolese tax and the total income subject to the Canadian tax.

Could he tell us what the tax is today?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The clause to which my friend is referring is the second part of the paragraph, and is actually paragraph 2 of article XIII?

Mr. Macnaughton: That is right, yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the meaning here is clear, Mr. Chairman. Article XIII takes us back to the other convention, the convention between Canada and Belgium, because article XIII applies in the case of the second convention, except so far as it is expressly varied by the terms of the convention between Canada on the one hand and the Congo and Ruanda-Urundi on the other. We have to have reference here to the first clause in article XIII of the main convention, and that is quite an extended clause because it has parts (a), (b) and (c) to it.

In the main convention with Belgium, we have a provision in the second clause which reads as follows:

Except in the case of a non-resident-owned investment corporation, Canada shall deduct from the Canadian tax on income from sources situated in Belgium the amount of Belgian tax payable on such income. The amount to be deducted may not exceed that portion of the Canadian tax which corresponds to the proportion between the income of Belgian origin subject to Belgian tax and the total income subject to Canadian tax.

In place of that, this second convention provides as follows:

Except in the case of a non-resident-owned investment corporation, Canada shall deduct from the Canadian tax on income derived from sources situated in the Belgian Congo or Ruanda-Urundi the amount of Congolese tax payable on such income. The amount to be deducted may not exceed that portion of the Canadian tax which corresponds to the proportion between the income of Congolese origin subject to the Congolese tax and the total income subject to the Canadian tax.

We have approved the convention with Belgium which contains the clause I have read. The only difference between this clause and the clause in the main convention is that this, when referring to the tax from the country opposite to Canada, has reference to the income derived from sources in the Congo or Ruanda-Urundi and the tax referred to is always the Congolese tax. The clause about which my friend is asking obviously has the same meaning as in the main convention just approved, but the reference here to the tax is to the Congolese tax rather than the Belgian tax. There is no difference in principle or substance.

Mr. Macnaughton: In article XX it says:

This convention shall also be terminated outright should the convention referred to in the preamble between Canada and Belgium be terminated.

What would happen to the treaty in case the territory of Ruanda-Urundi becomes independent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would depend entirely on the terms and on the nature of the change of status of the Congo or the territory. I do not believe one can anticipate every situation that might arise in that respect. If, for instance, the change that took place were to take the form of the incorporation of the Belgian Congo into the metropolitan territory of the kingdom of Belgium, then the convention applicable to the kingdom of Belgium would also apply in due course to any further territories that would be included within the metropolitan territory of the kingdom of Belgium.

But again that must yield to the terms of the legislation under which that transition in status would take place. In the convention there is provision for extension by understanding of the parties by exchange of notes in that behalf. If a major change of that kind occurred, in order to remove any doubts and to clarify the situation I should think it is likely that resort would be had to an exchange of notes covering the point.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DELIVERY OF SEED GRAIN, MALTING BARLEY, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-31, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-31 is introduced at this time to make certain amendments to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act which appear necessary in the light of the experience gained during the last eight months.

In general the act has worked very well. Its purpose has been to provide for prairie farmers a cash advance on grain which, for reasons beyond the farmers' control, could not be delivered immediately to the elevators.

During the eight months in which the act has been in operation its value has been clearly demonstrated. Under this legislation 50,411 producers have secured cash advances. The total sum advanced is $35,203,217. As of July 11, producers have refunded $32,094,438 or 91.1 per cent of the money advanced. By provinces the figures are as follows. For Manitoba, 11,724 producers made application for loans; total amount advanced, $7,112,441, of which they have refunded $6,655,993 or 93.5 per cent. For Saskatchewan 28,792 producers made application for loans, total amount advanced, $21,822,114; paid back, $20,156,022 or 92.3 per cent. For Alberta, 9,895 producers made application for loans; total amount advanced $6,268,662; total amount refunded $5,282,423 or 84.2 per cent. As deliveries of grain continue during July the outstanding amount will be still further reduced and by July 31 it may be that all the advance will have been repaid.

That possibility has come about owing to increased exports and therefore increased marketings from the farms. Marketings are reflected in the quota position which is as follows: For Ontario there are two stations to which grain may be delivered; one is on the 7-bushel quota and one is closed. For Manitoba there are 376 stations; 202 are on the 7-bushel quota, 173 on the 6-bushel quota and one closed. In Saskatchewan, 1,101 stations; 277 on the 7-bushel quota, 774 on the 6-bushel quota, 42 on the 5-bushel quota and 8 closed. For Alberta, there are 588 stations; 179 on the 7-bushel quota, 383 on the 6-bushel quota, 4 on the 5-bushel quota and 22 closed. For British Columbia there are four stations which are on the 6-bushel quota. For all provinces there are 2,071 stations; 659 are on the 7-bushel quota, 1,334 on the 6-bushel quota, 46 on the 5-bushel quota and 32 closed. By July 31, the end of the crop year, there will be very few farms not on the 6-bushel delivery quota and more will be on the 7-bushel quota.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the minister a question at that point. Does the minister feel that any other type of policy adopted by the government might have resulted in an equalization of quotas rather than some points at the end of the crop year being on a higher quota than others? I appreciate the good deliveries that are being made. This is not a criticism of the deliveries or the movement of grain.

Mr. Churchill: No. The matter was considered. Once you advance to a 7-bushel quota, then this question of equalization comes into the picture. But under the circumstances we thought that it would be wise to extend the quota position in order that those who could do so might benefit from it, particularly in view of the fact that the disparity is not very great. The number of stations still on the 5-bushel quota is only 46. Within the next few days they will either be on the 6-bushel or 7-bushel quota right across the prairies.

I have a few more statements to make, Mr. Speaker, which would take several minutes. Perhaps I should now move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: Six o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Churchill the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the government leader what the business is for tomorrow? Perhaps he would also tell the house what we will do on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall take estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, followed by estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what we will do on Friday and Saturday?

Mr. Green: I hardly expect to get both those departments through tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. However, during the evening I will think of something else to keep us busy on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Chevrier: You have a good deal of legislation there that you might get through.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LATEST DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to make a statement on the new and serious developments of the last 24 hours in and around the Middle East, and whether in view of those developments the government will give strong support at the United Nations, as a matter of extreme urgency, to the immediate formation and dispatch to Lebanon and Jordan of an emergency police force to help preserve order, stability and independence in those territories. This, Mr. Speaker, is the declared purpose of the United Kingdom and United States forces which have been sent to these countries until, so their governments state, a United Nations force is able to take over these peace and freedom-preserving functions.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the proper way to answer that question might be to outline in general what has taken place and then in my concluding words make particular reference to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. members already will be aware of the further grave turn of events in the Middle East which has led to the dispatch of United Kingdom airborne forces to that area "to protect the government of Jordan from a military coup", to quote the words used today by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in the British House of Commons. I was notified in the early hours of this morning of the United Kingdom government's decision to take this step and will, of course, remain in constant and continuing touch with that government in regard to events as they occur.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom told the House of Commons that the decision to air-lift forces to Jordan had been made in response to an urgent appeal which King Hussein had addressed to both the United States and the United Kingdom for military assistance to forestall a plot to overthrow by force the legitimate government of Jordan. The conspiracy against the king, he said, was external in origin and threatened the independence and territorial integrity of Jordan. The United Kingdom government, fully conscious of the gravity of the decision they were taking, concluded that if law and order were not to collapse entirely throughout the Middle East the appeal of Jordan's king had to be met and the position held until the United Nations could devise some alternative system of security for that area. I am sure that members of the house will fully appreciate that in the circumstances the United Kingdom government had no alternative but to act as it has done, and in that connection it had the full support of the United States government.

With respect to the question asked by the hon. gentleman, I have been assured that the security council will be informed at the earliest opportunity of the interim steps the United Kingdom has found itself obliged to take in the interests of Middle East stability, and that the United Kingdom troops will remain only until the security council has itself taken the measures necessary to maintain peace and security in the area.

It is clear, therefore, that in responding to the appeal of King Hussein the United Kingdom has acted, as did the United States government a few days ago in respect of Lebanon, with due regard to the ultimate authority and responsibility of the United Nations. Mr. Macmillan said:

> We are making it clear that if arrangements can be made by the security council to protect the lawful government of Jordan from external threat, the action which we have taken will be brought to an end.

This question will doubtless come before the security council later today. As in the case of the discussions on Lebanon, the Canadian representative to the United Nations is being instructed to consult urgently with the United States and United Kingdom representatives and other members of the security council with the object of devising some formula for United Nations action which will achieve stability in the Middle East, which objective the United States and United Kingdom are seeking to uphold. On being notified of the action the United Kingdom government had taken I gave an assurance of Canada's support in the security council for any resolution which would meet those United Nations aspects which, from the outset, have been an important element in the United Kingdom decision to intervene in Jordan.

With respect to the question as to the urgency of action to be taken on the part of the United Nations to send a force to that area, the stand taken by the government will be that every encouragement and assistance to the council to arrive at a favourable decision in this regard will be advanced by our representative at the United Nations council. Of course, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, there are difficulties in the way. It is not quite as simple as it would appear on its face. There is the possibility, if not the probability, of a veto in the security council. Then when the matter is turned over to the United Nations assembly the decision on the question will depend on whether or not a two-thirds majority can be secured in support of a United Nations force or other direct action being taken by the United Nations.

I might add that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is now on his way to Washington, there to consult with the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom and the Secretary of State of the United States. On Saturday, he will proceed to the United Nations to meet briefly with Mr. Hammarskjold, the secretary general, with a view to further discussing that matter. I need hardly add that everything that Canada can do as a member of the United Nations will be done to assure early action at the United Nations on this matter, to the end that the forces of the United Kingdom, in accordance with the expressed will of the United Kingdom, will be withdrawn as soon as action is taken by the United Nations.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): If I might, with the permission of the house, be allowed to make a very brief comment, I would say that we in this group are exceedingly disturbed by the action that has been taken to which the Prime Minister has referred. As we are aware of the very grave events occurring in the world today, we express the hope that all countries, particularly those with atomic weapons, will consider the future of the world and will at the United Nations, by discussion amongst themselves, resolve all their differences.

I think intervention by any country in the affairs of any other country, even at the request in some instances of the established government, is a very grave step which must, of course, be taken only after the most serious consideration.

We again express the hope that Canada will use its prestige and good offices at the United Nations to support a settlement through that organization. We acknowledge that the United States and the United Kingdom, in the action it has taken, said that it is interim or temporary action until such time as the United Nations may deal with the situation. We express the hope that United Nations action will be forthcoming soon and that there may be a United Nations police force, which I know is the method that all members of this house would support wholeheartedly as the means of solving this very difficult situation and preventing bloodshed in that area.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether any consideration is being given or has been given to making available a unit of the Canadian navy, a ship, if necessary under circumstances best known to hon. gentlemen opposite, for the purpose of providing for the safe return to Canada of those Canadians in this troubled area?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No request has been made for such a ship to date.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was whether any consideration has been or is being given to the dispatch of such a ship.

Mr. Pearkes: Ships of the Royal Canadian Navy are available at all times for emergency purposes.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the matter which was discussed earlier and ask the Prime Minister if he or the government were informed in advance of the decision of the United Kingdom government to send forces to Jordan?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government was informed, and that brings me to something on which I secured some information this morning with reference to the attitude that should be taken by the United Kingdom government with respect to matters affecting the commonwealth.

In 1946 Mr. Attlee defined the arrangements which apparently were satisfactory to the then prime ministers of the various dominions in these words:

> It is our practice and our duty as members of the British commonwealth to keep other members of the commonwealth fully and continuously informed of all matters which we are called upon to decide but which may affect commonwealth interests. The object is to give them an opportunity of expressing their views in confidence if they so desire. These views are taken fully into account but the decision must be ours and the other governments are not asked and would not wish to share the responsibility for it. Dominion governments follow the same practice.

I mention this because that statement was made in the British House of Commons during the commonwealth prime ministers' conference of 1946, but I would also add that it was made before the arrival there of the late prime minister Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question, if I may. Could I ask the Prime Minister whether there has been any exchange of views between Canada and the other nations of the commonwealth on these matters?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was, in so far as Canada is concerned, nothing in the nature of an exchange of views.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTED PROTESTS OVER MODIFICATION OF REGULATION OF NON-SCHEDULED SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister taken cognizance of the protests from small plane operators with respect to the announcement he made in this house the other day allowing wide open competition in the granting of class "C" licences? Will he comment on the statement of a top air line executive who, according to the Financial Post of today, said that "this plan will mean a return to the dirty thirties when almost every company went bankrupt in the price war, and safety standards were thrown to the four winds"?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part of the question is no.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister given any consideration to the possibility, as outlined by these operators, that because of this easing of licences the insurance rates will be increased substantially?

Mr. Hees: This whole matter was very carefully considered by the government before the decision was made, and I believe it was the proper decision.

FEDERAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there have been any recent developments with respect to the proposed conference with the municipalities, and particularly whether the government now contemplates having representation at that conference from the provincial governments.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a group of representatives of the association of municipalities again called on me with a view to ascertaining when it was considered by the government appropriate and convenient to call together an informal conference of municipal authorities. I then pointed out the fact that the president and other representatives fully realized that it was to be an informal conference and that having regard to the commonwealth trade and economic conference and also considering the rate at which the legislative program of parliament was being implemented, I felt there was no possibility of such a gathering before October 6. That is as far as we were able to go.

With respect to the latter part of the question, this being an informal conference for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the municipalities it is in no way to be considered as a dominion-provincial conference, and there will not be representatives of the provincial governments, as such, present on this informal occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask as a supplementary question if the Prime Minister could say whether the government has advanced its plan for the resumption of the formal federal-provincial conference?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible to answer that question. When we are in a position to advise the house with respect to that matter hon. members will immediately be made aware of the date fixed.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. At this informal conference will the federal government be presenting any briefs or any research material having to do with this general problem? I am asking this question on the basis that this would be material different from concrete proposals but nevertheless, I am sure, would be helpful at such a conference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the hon. member must have misunderstood the request made on the part of the municipalities association. The request which was accepted by myself in February was that the municipalities should have the opportunity of presenting their ideas and their conceptions of the problems and, having received the benefit of their advice, whatever steps should be taken thereafter would be for future consideration.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN INTEREST CHARGES ON CONVERSION LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I was unable to give him satisfactory notice. Would the minister advise the house of the approximate increase in interest charges to the taxpayers which is likely to result from the reconversion of victory loan bonds?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): That would depend entirely on how many of the present outstanding victory loan bonds are turned in for new bonds of the conversion loan, and also which of the four maturities of the Canada conversion loan of 1958 are selected. I am afraid it is not possible, therefore, to give my hon. friend anything more definite than that.

Mr. Garland: Would it not be fair to assume that the government, before making a move of this kind, would have estimated what it was expected to cost the Canadian taxpayers? Surely in a project of that size—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course we could figure out, as could my hon. friend, what the increase will be in any particular maturity which is chosen among the four new ones, but we do not know what is going to be the proportion of conversion applied to each of the four maturities that are offered.

Mr. Garland: Am I correct in assuming that there was no estimate made of what this would cost the Canadian people?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is not correct in his assumption, Mr. Speaker.

HIGHWAYS

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF CERTAIN ROADS IN ACCESS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Could the minister advise the house if, in the allocation of $11,700,000 to New Brunswick for its roads to resources program, consideration has been given by the federal government and the government of the province of New Brunswick to the construction of a highway to provide a direct road link between Saint John and Fundy national park, and also for the long advocated Plaster Rock link-up across the central stretch of New Brunswick to connect the north shore and the potato growing Saint John river valley by direct highway route?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will follow the practice I have laid down in the house with respect to these matters. I shall look into the question, ascertaining the location of the roads; and if any of the roads mentioned by the hon. member have been agreed upon by the two governments I shall give a yes or no answer.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asked this question, as reported at page 2289 of Hansard:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or in his absence to the acting minister. Has he any announcement to make to the house in view of the statement attributed to the premier of Manitoba in a report appearing in the Montreal Gazette of July 11, that he expects the federal government will immediately make several changes in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to bring it more into line with Manitoba conditions?

I should like to point out to the hon. member that on many occasions in speeches during the last six or seven months I have stated that at this session of parliament we would bring in amendments to the Prairie Farm

Assistance Act in order to remove as far as possible the inequities and anomalies that have been complained of for years as far as that act is concerned, and particularly as far as damage from hail and flooding are concerned.

I would point out to the hon. member that there is a resolution appearing as item No. 9 on today's order paper which reads as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to extend the benefits of the act and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration thereof.

I presume the premier of Manitoba, knowing these facts, has stated that the type of damage they have sustained in some parts of Manitoba this year is likely to be covered after the amendments which this resolution precedes have been put through.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF WESTERN REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I believe to be a question of privilege affecting this house. On Thursday of last week, July 10, in reply to questions of mine about deficiency payments and crop conditions in western Canada, the Prime Minister made the statement that discussions were going on with the western provinces as to how a working program could be arrived at, and he had this to say, as reported at page 2093 of Hansard of that date:

When a decision is finally arrived at the Minister of Agriculture will place before this house the nature of those agreements to meet the immediate situation.

I have in my hand a newspaper clipping taken from the Regina Leader-Post of Saturday, July 12, in which a statement by Mr. Errick Willis, agriculture minister of the province of Manitoba, is reported as follows:

Mr. Willis said the assistance will be given under a federal-provincial agreement signed this week in Ottawa. The agreement is effective from June 23 to March 15, 1959.

The report goes on to spell out in exact detail how certain costs will be divided, and I do not intend to refer in detail to that part of the newspaper report.

It would seem to me that the Minister of Agriculture owes it to this house to make a statement in the house as to any agreement that may have been signed, if such an agreement has in fact been signed, in the normal course of events, but more particularly because of the Prime Minister's statement to the effect that as soon as an agreement was signed an announcement would be made in the house. I wonder if the minister would tell us if such an agreement has been signed, and whether the report is accurate?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think that Mr. Willis must have been misquoted in this article, because no agreement has been signed.

[Later:]

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Agriculture has now seen this report, I wonder whether I could ask him if there is any substance whatever to it, and whether the federal government has made any offer to the provincial governments to share the cost of freight on moving fodder to the prairies at this time on a 50-50 basis, and so on, as detailed in this report?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the report to which the hon. member refers actually is a summary, as nearly as I can make out, of an offer which the Manitoba government, I think, has already made to the farmers in Manitoba. In regard to assistance in moving fodder, cattle and so on, Mr. Willis and I discussed this matter and consideration is being given to it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—CANADIAN USE OF ABANDONED U.S. AIR BASE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware of the intention of the United States air force to deactivate the Pepperrell air force base at St. John's, Newfoundland, and, if so, has the government or the R.C.A.F. considered the possibility of having any of these facilities used by the R.C.A.F.?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the personnel of the United States air force who have been stationed at Pepperrell are being transferred to other United States air force stations in Newfoundland. The Royal Canadian Air Force have no immediate requirement for the accommodation at Pepperrell, but they do know of the facilities that exist there and these are constantly being reviewed.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED INTERFERENCE WITH PHOTOGRAPHERS DURING NAVAL REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question which was directed to the acting minister of national defence yesterday by the hon.

member for Skeena, as reported at page 2288 of Hansard, who asked if an investigation might be made respecting a report that 13 newspaper photographers were locked in a small room aboard a naval vessel for three and a half hours on July 15 during the naval review near Victoria, British Columbia.

I have made inquiries, and I find that there was a party of 13 press photographers who were granted facilities to see the naval review on H.M.C.S. Crescent, which was the reviewing ship upon which Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret was travelling. At no time during that tour was any member of the press locked in any room. On the contrary, these gentlemen were accommodated in the mess of the chief petty officers of H.M.C.S. Crescent. All had been advised previously of the limited facilities which would be available because the Crescent is an operational ship, a destroyer escort, and there are only limited facilities.

During the period of the cruise all the press photographers were given ample opportunity to take pictures of Her Royal Highness, and were also granted two periods of seven minutes each when they could take photographs of the ships which the Crescent was passing in review. Unfortunately, those periods had to be taken in turn owing to the limited accommodation, and three photographers at a time were given the opportunity.

LEBANON—CANADIAN TROOPS AT LEAVE CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Egan Chambers (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether there are any of our troops in the United Nations emergency force at leave camp in Lebanon? If so, how are they affected by the present situation?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is a United Nations leave camp established in Lebanon. When the situation deteriorated about two weeks ago instructions were given that no more Canadians were to be sent to that leave centre until the situation stabilized. To the best of my knowledge there are no men on leave at the centre at the present time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour which arises out of the reported interest and dissatisfaction in many quarters regarding the stoppage of service by the C.P.R. steamships on the west coast. Can the minister indicate whether any additional steps are being taken in an attempt to resolve this dispute?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at the moment no definite steps are being taken to resolve this dispute, but the matter is under very serious consideration in order to arrive at some definite action.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

391. Departmental administration, $739,086.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The house in committee of supply, Department of Trade and Commerce, vote No. 391; this item will be found on page 73 of the blue book, with details on page 512. Shall this vote carry?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, I propose giving on this occasion a fairly lengthy review of our trade position and our commercial relations with various countries, with some comments on the work done by the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is impossible to cover every detail, but any omissions in the general statement may be filled in at the appropriate stage as the estimates are considered.

The most important feature of our trade at the present moment is the over-all strength shown in our commodity exports, despite weaknesses in some particular items. For the year 1957 a new record total was established in our commodity exports, amounting to almost $5 billion, or about 2 per cent above 1956, which in turn had been a peak year. Preliminary figures for the first five months of 1958 confirm a further improvement in our foreign trade, with total commodity exports for this period amounting to almost $2 billion, or about 1 per cent ahead of the corresponding period last year.

Some of the reasons for this good showing have been increased exports of wheat to overseas countries and uranium ore and beef cattle shipments to the United States. On the import side there has been a decrease, and the deficit on commodity account in 1956 of $842 million was reduced in 1957 to $689 million, or by 18 per cent. This trend has continued in 1958, with the rate being more rapid. During the first five months of 1958 Canada's trade deficit on commodity account was further reduced to $174 million, or about one-third of the deficit it incurred in the corresponding period of 1957.

Foreign trade is vital to Canada. One out of every five Canadians derives his livelihood from international trade, and Canadians in fact are more dependent on export trade than are the people of any other industrialized nation. Indeed, there can be no prosperity here without a high level of exports, nor can we enjoy continued development without expanding world opportunities for multilateral trade.

Over the years periods of prosperity have been associated with high levels of export trade. At one time agricultural and fishery products were of overwhelming importance, and Canadian prosperity was geared closely to overseas demands for our foodstuffs. Exports of foodstuffs are still of great importance, but with industrialization and discovery of new resources many new export items have emerged. Today forest products lead and comprise about one third of our export trade. Next come minerals, metals and bulk chemicals, which account for close to two fifths of our sales abroad, and then agricultural and fishery products which are one fifth of our total exports. Our leading exports, ranking in order of importance, are as follows, and the values indicated are those for the year 1957: newsprint, $715 million; wheat, $380 million; wood pulp, $292 million; planks and boards, $282 million; nickel and products, $248 million; aluminum and products, $230 million; copper and products, $169 million; iron ore, $152 million; crude petroleum, $141 million; fish and fish products, $130 million.

Canadian exporters, with the assistance of our trade commissioners and other officials, are constantly on the lookout for new markets for established export items or for new outlets for new products. Under present competitive world trading conditions we must seize every opportunity to develop new sales, and Canadian exporters are on the whole facing up to their great responsibility with vigour and imagination. More of them are travelling abroad to meet prospective customers and to follow up trade leads personally. Our trade commissioners last year received over 4,000 visits from Canadian businessmen, and many millions of dollars worth of new export business has been obtained directly as a result of these visits.

We have been encouraging greater exports of fully manufactured goods and more processing of raw materials in Canada. Exports of machinery and other highly manufactured products last year amounted to over $500 million, and this figure does not include the increased value added to materials exports by the further processing which has been undertaken at home. Canadian farm machinery, industrial machinery, motor vehicles, aircraft, ships, locomotives and railway cars, to take only a few examples, are well known in many countries. Our foreign sales of manufactured goods can be maintained and increased provided, of course, that costs here can be kept within reasonable levels and that our businessmen take advantage of every sales opportunity.

Our pattern of trade has undergone some changes. In the more recent period we have been selling more to the United Kingdom and the commonwealth countries and somewhat less to the United States and some other foreign countries. For example, commodity exports to Great Britain in the January to May 1958 period rose from $285 million to $291 million or by 2 per cent, and to other commonwealth countries from $94 million to $130 million or by 38 per cent. Sales to the United States declined only moderately to $1.1 billion or by 2 per cent.

In the same period imports from Great Britain rose to $222 million or by 2 per cent, and imports from the United States amounting to $1.5 billion fell by 17 per cent. Declines also showed up in imports from the rest of the world.

The trade figures that I have given are indicative of three developments. First, Canada's foreign trade with the world as a whole has been maintained at a high level notwithstanding the recessionary influences prevailing in North America. Second, a certain measure of diversification and expansion of trade has taken place leading to a better balance in our trade pattern. Third, Canadian industry has been able to supply a greater share of domestic requirements, thus assisting in reducing our deficit, that is the excess of imports over exports. These developments are in line with the government's trade policy.

Our main objective is to expand our level of trade with all the nations of the world, because we believe that the greatest economic benefits for Canada can be derived from the efficient use of our abundant resources based on multilateral trade relations. Through diversification of our trade a better balance may be achieved. The basic premise of our commercial policy is that the continued prosperity of our major export industries, forestry, mining, agriculture and fisheries, is essential for Canadian well-being and growth.

At the same time our secondary manufacturing industries also require expanding foreign sales if they are to use modern production techniques to the fullest extent. The relatively small size of our domestic market, serving 17 million people, is not a broad enough base for our manufacturing industry, which is efficient and capable of great expansion. Consequently we aim at the expansion of foreign trade and the opening up of markets for Canadian raw materials and manufactured products everywhere in the world.

We are ready to co-operate with all other trading nations and to seek world-wide solutions for problems that are international in character. We are prepared to support all efforts to remove discrimination and restrictions in trade. For this reason we continue to support the general agreement on tariffs and trade. This international trade treaty receives the support of over 40 countries which together are responsible for 90 per cent of world trade. It provides an effective instrument for international co-operation and the most appropriate forum where current issues of commercial policy can be considered and dealt with on a world-wide basis in a practical manner.

For the same reason we are intensely interested in our commonwealth trading relations. We are looking forward to the commonwealth trade and economic conference in September in the hope that there will be a further expansion of markets within the commonwealth, a removal of trade restrictions and the development of a new approach to some of the major trade and economic problems facing the world today.

The commonwealth is the most important and influential group in the world trading community. Trade by commonwealth countries, including Canada, accounts for about one-third of total world trade, and sterling finances an even greater percentage of all transactions. Our exports to commonwealth countries in 1957 were valued at close to $1 billion, and represented 20 per cent of our total sales abroad. Shipments to the United Kingdom were primarily basic materials and foodstuffs such as wheat, flour, lumber, metals and minerals. Our sales to other commonwealth countries also included these materials to some extent, but manufactured goods were much more important relatively than in our trade with Britain. Canadian exporters of manufactured products are now finding new markets within the commonwealth.

Our trade relations with the United States are of paramount importance. We were privileged to have with us just recently the President of the United States accompanied by the Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles. Trade and economic matters were among the main issues discussed in our talk, and a broad basis of understanding and mutual appreciation of each other's problems was established. There are a number of fields in which our views differ from those of the United States government, but we did discuss our problems frankly and freely and we are determined on both sides to reach satisfactory solutions. We have welcomed the clear indication given to us by the President of the United States of the importance attached by the United States to sound and amicable trade relations with Canada.

The United States is by far our largest trading partner, supplying over 70 per cent of our imports and taking about 60 per cent of our exports. Last year Canadians sold goods to the United States worth $2.9 billion and imported in return almost $4 billion worth of United States products. Our trade deficit of $1.1 billion was, however, somewhat smaller than during the previous year. The United States economy will continue to be in growing need of many of the goods and materials which we can produce efficiently and sell on a world competitive basis. It is in the interests of the United States itself that nothing should be done to impair the access of our exports to their markets. Indeed, in the light of the substantial deficits in Canada's trade with that country it is particularly important that the United States should ensure continuing opportunities for the expansion and development of Canadian export trade.

There is some evidence that the government and public in the United States are becoming more keenly aware of the importance of good relations with Canada. It has been a common and frequent complaint among Canadian exporters that too often the United States has failed to give due recognition to Canadian trade interests, and we feel that it is in the national interests of both countries that this situation be corrected. Quite apart from the importance of the United States in Canada's trade, we all recognize that the United States is the world's major creditor and trading nation and as such has special responsibilities in giving positive leadership and providing initiative in world trade. This is particularly the case today when the world faces so many uncertainties and dangers. We have reason to believe that the United States is increasingly conscious of the urgent need for forward-looking policies in trade and economic relations. We were gratified to hear the declaration by the United States President in this house reaffirming the fundamental United States policy of fostering trade through the trade agreements program. Strong, constructive leadership by the United States in the field of world trade is indeed essential.

Our trade with Europe continues to develop to the satisfaction of both Canadian and European businessmen. Exports during 1957 rose 4 per cent to a new record of $549 million, and imports by 5 per cent to $313 million. Wheat sales worth $158 million accounted for close to half of our total exports to Europe, and were mainly responsible for the over-all percentage increase in this trade. Other important commodities shipped were nickel, flaxseed, asbestos, copper and aluminum.

Our principal imports from Europe were industrial machinery, rolling mill products, automobiles and electrical apparatus. The largest percentage increase in our purchases occurred in the iron and steel category, with some items being up as much as 40 per cent to 60 per cent.

Important developments have been taking place in Europe which undoubtedly will affect our trade. My colleague the Minister of Finance has already indicated some of the government's views with respect to the European common market. Canada enjoys friendly and mutually beneficial trading relationships with each of the six countries of the common market. We will make every effort to continue them. We have every sympathy with the broad objectives of these European plans. We are hopeful that our trade with the countries concerned will greatly benefit. However, we know that this depends basically on the character and direction of the trade policies which will be followed by the six countries, and on the nature of the detailed arrangements which will be made under the common market.

We are concerned about many features of these arrangements as presently envisaged and will continue our efforts to obtain firm assurances and safeguards for Canadian export trade. The European common market is still in the process of developing its policies and its institutions, and much remains to be done to establish full co-operation between that group and the rest of the trading world. In this connection, some encouraging progress has recently been made in the detailed discussion of this step being conducted by GATT. Agreement has been reached between the six countries of the common market and their other trading partners that the multilateral procedures and arrangements of GATT should be used for joint consultation between them, and for the solution of practical trade problems that may arise.

As for the proposed European free trade area, it is our understanding that the negotiating countries are expecting to reach some concrete agreement by the end of this year. We have welcomed the firm undertaking given by the United Kingdom that commonwealth agricultural interests in the United Kingdom market will be fully safeguarded. The government will continue to give constant attention to the current negotiations in Europe.

No review of Canada's trade relations would be complete without a special reference to Japan. Japan is one of Canada's major export markets and trading partners. Last year the Japanese purchased $139 million worth of Canadian goods, principally bulk foodstuffs. The most important commodities were wheat, $54 million; barley, $14 million; flaxseed, $11 million; and wood pulp, $11 million. The total purchases were 9 per cent greater than in 1956.

On the import side, Canada's purchases from Japan were worth $62 million, only slightly greater than in 1956. Clothing, pipes, tubes and fittings, canned fish and cotton fabrics were the leading items. Under our commercial agreement with Japan a number of our most important exports are granted non-discriminatory treatment with respect to import licencing. This means that while many of our other exports still face dollar restrictions in Japan, these products which form the bulk of our trade are assured an equality of access on a competitive basis in the Japanese market.

Like Canada, Japan must export to live. We know that Japanese authorities and exporters are keenly conscious of the need to develop their sales in our market on an orderly and mutually acceptable basis. We are appreciative of the efforts they have been making in this regard. We are very much aware of the importance of our trade with Japan, and have every intention of continuing to develop our cordial relations with that country.

Another area where we have important trade interests is Latin America. Many of the countries in that area are in the process of rapid economic development and are in need of the kinds of products and materials with which we can supply them. In common with other countries in the same stage of economic development, including many of the new commonwealth nations, they are anxious to see greater stability in world commodity markets. We are sympathetic toward these desires and are conscious of the serious problems raised.

I would add that our trade relations with Latin American countries are close and friendly, and are based on mutual confidence and good will. Latin America is a market of great promise. Our exports to the area last year increased by 27 per cent, more than to any other major trading area. The total export sales amounted to $225 million and included a high percentage of partially or fully manufactured items. The leading exports were newsprint, $27 million; ships, $27 million; industrial machinery, $15 million; synthetic plastic materials, $11 million; wheat flour, $10 million; and locomotives, $10 million. Our imports from Latin America are mainly crude petroleum and were valued at $242 million last year. Other sizeable imports were coffee, bananas and unrefined sugar. The total imports of all products were valued at $380 million, leaving us once again in the position of purchasing substantially more from our Latin American friends than we sell to them.

Our trade relations with the West Indies are also very important. These relationships are especially close, and they have grown out of a long tradition of trade which was important to Canada even before our confederation. Recently the establishment of the Federation of the West Indies, and the opening of their parliament in April marked the most important step which has been taken so far in the progress of these islands toward fully responsible nationhood. It was an important event also in the political evolution of the commonwealth. This progress of the West Indies is welcomed by the Canadian people. Many of the initial problems of the West Indies bear a close similarity to those which confronted our own country; problems of transportation and communication between the units, the rights of local governments, as well as providing for continued economic development.

I think these common problems of nation-building give us a special appreciation of the circumstances of the West Indies. The importance of the West Indies to this country as a trading partner is sometimes not fully appreciated in Canada. Taking the British Caribbean as a whole these territories are Canada's second commonwealth market, tenth world market, third market for manufactured products and, on the import side, Canada's fifth supplier. In 1957 exports to the whole area amounted to $51 million. Traditional imports such as fish and flour are important in this trade, but in more recent years manufactured products have increased rapidly. The West Indies is a valuable market for Canadian exporters of manufactured goods. Canadian imports from the British Caribbean in 1957 amounted to $80 million. In this trade traditional products such as sugar, rum and molasses are important, but newer products have entered the trade in very considerable quantity in recent years, notably bauxite, alumina and petroleum.

The West Indies federation consists at present of Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados and the Leeward and Windward islands. The federation has not as yet established a customs union within its own territory or a common external tariff. It is, however, one of the major economic objectives of the federation to achieve such a union. A commission has been studying the problems involved in establishing a customs union, and we understand its report will be ready during the next few months.

As the West Indies makes progress toward the establishment of a customs union and decides upon the nature of its future economic relations with other countries, it will be possible to review the trade relations between that country and Canada. Canadian trade relations with the area are governed by the Canada-West Indies trade agreement which was entered into in 1927. This agreement provides for the exchange of preferential tariff treatment between the two countries. Through this agreement Canada extends preferential tariff treatment on sugar and the West Indies extends bound preferences to Canada on a wide range of products.

I believe there are important opportunities for the future development of Canada-West Indies trade. The expansion of Canadian exports to the area depends in part on the progress in economic development the federation will be making in the next few years, and in part on liberalizing dollar import restrictions. We are hopeful that it will be possible for the West Indies to introduce over a period of years additional measures aimed at further liberalization of trade between our two countries.

I now come to Canada's trade with China. Last year we bought a good deal more from China than we sold to that country, with imports amounting to $5.3 million and exports to $1.4 million. However, in the last few months we have been able to improve our balance of trade with China. Since March alone sales of wheat to this area involve close to 3½ million bushels of wheat valued at $5½ million. Following the visit of the Canadian government trade commissioner in Hong Kong to China in November, 1957 we learned that the Chinese were interested in a wide range of Canadian commodities including pulp and paper, wheat, fertilizer, aluminum, chemicals, plastic raw materials, synthetic fibres and non-ferrous metals. Canadian suppliers were asked to submit prices and specifications on such commodities available for export to China. We obtained a good deal of information as to the best method of dealing with the Chinese market, and we made this information available to Canadian business in the form of a report entitled "How to Trade with the Mainland of China" published in our departmental publication Foreign Trade on February 1, 1958.

Hon. members are interested in our trade with China, and particularly in United States foreign assets control regulations affecting Canadian subsidiaries of United States firms. Every effort is being made to find an appropriate solution to the difficulties in this field. The Canadian government has attached such importance to this question that it was raised at the recent meetings with President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles, and we expect to have continuing consultation with the United States authorities on these matters. We will continue to encourage Canadian businessmen to do business with China provided, of course, that the commodities in question are of a non-strategic nature. It is our objective to ensure that Canadian firms, regardless of ownership, be placed in a position to handle these export inquiries on a purely commercial basis.

To a large extent export control problems with China come down to reaching an agreed definition with the United States government and the governments of other free countries—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the house to permit the hon. member to continue?

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Churchill: As I was saying, to a large extent the export control problems with China come down to reaching an agreed definition with the United States government and the governments of other free countries as to what is strategic and what is non-strategic. These problems have arisen before in respect of our trade with iron curtain countries, and we have been able to work out satisfactory solutions with our allies. I expect that our exporters will take a renewed interest in the China market in the months ahead. There will undoubtedly be more visits to China, and we look forward to building up our trade there substantially.

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with two specific aspects of our external trade, namely fisheries and wheat. Exports of fishery products last year were valued at $132.5 million, a figure which was very close to the record $133.7 million attained in 1956. Fishery exports during the first five months of this year were up 10 per cent over the corresponding period of 1957, and it would appear that the over-all market outlook for the remainder of the year is fairly promising.

Demand for fresh and frozen fish in Canada and the United States remains strong. The United Kingdom, which is our most important export market for canned salmon, has recently allocated £4.5 million for imports from the dollar area. This is an increase of £1 million over last year. Prospects for exports of canned sardines are also encouraging.

Some problems have been encountered in the salt fish trade recently, principally because of continuing controls in several of our important markets. Puerto Rico and Jamaica are still maintaining retail ceiling prices, and in Brazil a currency auction system tends to favour imports from soft currency sources. These restrictions are a matter of serious concern to the government, and we are continuing our efforts to have them removed. In the case of Brazil the currency auction system is being considered under the auspices of GATT.

Last November Icelandic exporters were able to offer lower prices than Canada, and were successful in securing the Jamaican tender for salt cod for the period July to December, 1958. I am informed, however, that if our prices become competitive with those offered by Iceland we have every possibility of selling again in the Jamaican market. Recently my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and I met with delegations from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and had full discussions concerning the marketing of salt cod. The various briefs which were submitted are now under careful study, and I am hopeful that satisfactory solutions to our marketing problems can be worked out in the very near future.

I now come to the subject of wheat, which is one of the major responsibilities of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The crop year 1956-57 was a disappointing year from the standpoint of the movement of wheat. The export movement of wheat amounted to 262 million bushels as compared with 309 million bushels in 1955-56. At July 31, 1957, stocks of grain in country and terminal elevators were 536 million bushels, an increase of some 44 million bushels over the same date of the previous crop year. In fact elevators were full to capacity. There was an estimated surplus in Canada of 732 million bushels, with a new crop coming in.

Under the circumstances the government had to formulate a very broad approach to the grain marketing problem. From the standpoint of producers, and the country as a whole, efforts had to be made to speed up the movement of wheat. Because of the increased wheat production in Europe it was obvious that world trade in wheat in 1957-58 would be considerably smaller than in the previous crop year. Therefore the task to which the government and the Canadian wheat board applied themselves was the securing for Canada of a larger share of a smaller world market for wheat. We were assisted by the improvement in the protein quality of the wheat crop harvested in the prairie provinces in 1957.

We appreciated that in the early months of the crop year the bumper European harvest would reduce wheat imports into that area as compared with the previous year. However, during this difficult period we maintained a satisfactory level of wheat exports, and by December had moved slightly ahead of the level of exports for the same period in the previous crop year, and since that time we have increased our lead. As at July 9, 1958 our exports of wheat and flour amounted to 297.6 million bushels as compared with 246.7 million bushels during the same period in the previous year. It is now obvious that we will reach and exceed our export target of 300 million bushels.

Our sales this year included wheat for Australia, the U.S.S.R. and China. There are countries in the commonwealth which from time to time need wheat or flour and which for reasons of finance cannot obtain on a strictly commercial basis the quantities they require. At the request of India and Pakistan, Colombo plan funds for the year 1957 were made available for the purchase of Canadian wheat—in the case of India, $7 million; in the case of Pakistan, $2 million, and for Ceylon $1 million.

The application of these funds provided for the shipment of about 6.1 million bushels of wheat or flour this year. This was a start. The government then offered to make available to Colombo plan countries $35 million in the form of a long-term loan to finance the purchase of Canadian wheat. India looked with favour upon this plan and contracted with the Canadian government for a loan of $25 million for the purchase of Canadian wheat. This loan will be repaid in seven equal annual instalments commencing March, 1961 and bears interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent; the interest is payable annually commencing on March 31, 1959. From the proceeds of this loan India has acquired or will acquire nearly 15 million bushels of Canadian wheat during the present crop year.

These developments were important in themselves but the government went a step further; it made available $15 million to finance gifts of wheat and flour to India, Pakistan and Ceylon. This gift was in recognition of the urgent need for foodstuffs in these countries, and from these funds India, Pakistan and Ceylon will receive about 10 million bushels of wheat and flour during the present crop year. We also made available $1.5 million to the United Nations relief and works agency in the Near East whereby this agency might purchase a quantity of Canadian flour for Arab relief.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister permit a question? Is the $15 million which he just mentioned to be taken out of the Colombo plan funds or is it in addition to the appropriation for the Colombo plan?

Mr. Churchill: I am glad the hon. member raised this question. It is in addition to the normal allotment for the development program under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Pearson: It is in addition to the appropriation made for the Colombo plan?

Mr. Churchill: That is right. There is a $35 million loan under the Colombo plan and $15 million as an outright gift.

Mr. Pearson: In addition to the $35 million?

Mr. Churchill: In addition to the $35 million for normal Colombo plan operations.

The government has accomplished other things of importance in the field of wheat marketing. At the last session of parliament the Export Credits Insurance Act was amended to increase the limit under this legislation from $100 million to $200 million. At the same time a reduction was effected in the cost of financing wheat the sale of which was insured under the Export Credits Insurance Act. The government has been ready at all times to utilize the facilities of this legislation in effecting wheat sales on insured credits up to a period of three years.

Before leaving the export side of the wheat situation I would like to say a few words about port activities during the present crop year in the handling of grain. The Pacific seaboard is having a very good year. From August 1 to July 9 shipments of wheat and other grains from Pacific coast ports amounted to 163 million bushels, compared with 132 million bushels during the same period in the previous year.

The port of Churchill in northern Manitoba had a good season in 1957. In the comparatively short shipping season out of Churchill a total of 46 cargoes of wheat were loaded. The bushelage shipped through Churchill was 16.7 million bushels, a new record for the port. The outlook for the 1958 shipping season at Churchill is just as good.

In the first half of the crop year Pacific coast ports and Churchill received a relatively high percentage of export shipments of grain. The movement through St. Lawrence ports last fall was substantially lower than in the previous year. However, the situation as far as St. Lawrence ports are concerned improved with the opening of navigation this spring, and the St. Lawrence movement is now slightly ahead of last year. Our Atlantic seaboard ports have had an active year, and our shipments to the United States are considerably higher. By the end of the crop year, that is July 31, I feel that all our shipping routes will have given a good account of themselves as far as the movement of grain is concerned.

I would now like to deal with the activities of the department in so far as trade promotion and related objectives are concerned. One of the major functions of the Department of Trade and Commerce is the promotion of Canadian trade on a world-wide basis. Although almost all the branches in the department share in this promotional activity, some are more directly concerned than others. The activities of the department have been covered in the annual report for the year 1957 which was tabled in the House of Commons on May 22 last. I shall not now go over the ground covered in this report, but I shall single out a few activities of the department which are of particular interest to hon. members and to the Canadian business community.

One of these activities is the work performed by our trade commissioner service. The major job of a trade commissioner is to direct trade promotion, and in this field he acts as a valuable link between Canada's exporting community and the markets in his local territory. From modest beginnings over 60 years ago the service has extended the size and scope of its operations to its present strength of 127 officers. A small number of these are stationed in Ottawa, but over 100 officers are serving in 58 posts located in 45 countries.

The trade publicity branch was set up to perform a wide range of promotional activities. Chief among these are the publication of the periodicals Foreign Trade and Commerce Exterieur, the promotion of trade fairs, publicity in local and foreign media, advertising, supplying trade commissioners with literature and producing a multitude of general publications of a trade promotional nature.

The work of these organizations is largely made possible by the members of the commodities branch who provide a liaison with industry and the business community in Canada. This involves the collection and exchange of information about trading opportunities brought to light by the department's activities at home and abroad. As part of their trade promotion work commodity officers are called upon to visit plants, to attend meetings of business associations, to prepare trade studies and market surveys, and to arrange for the display of Canadian goods abroad. Similar work is carried on by the agricultural and fisheries branch in its field of operation.

Another developing activity in trade promotion is through trade fairs or exhibitions abroad. Participation in foreign trade fairs is regarded by Canadian manufacturers, as well as by this department, as one of the more effective and inexpensive ways of advertising Canada and Canadian products abroad. Trade fairs play a significant role in our export trade promotion activities. They enable us to exhibit Canadian goods in the very markets we want to reach, directly before interested buyers and traders who have assembled purposely to view, compare and consider offerings in their particular merchandise fields. In many markets, particularly in western Europe, trade fairs are an accepted part of international business activity, and accordingly we are virtually compelled to take cognizance of their significance.

Through trade fairs we can accomplish initial promotion of Canadian goods not sold in a particular market heretofore, or we can strengthen the market coverage of lines already introduced. We can assist the Canadian trade commissioner in his special duties. Both the department and Canadian firms participating acquire further knowledge about export prospects and market requirements, including what foreign competitors are doing; and where the public is admitted to the fair we perform an effective information job for Canada under advantageous conditions.

For many Canadian firms our trade fair program bridges the gap between no participation by that firm at all, and the time when the firm will be able to exhibit by itself. There is evidence that our efforts to assist exporters in the use of the trade fair technique are bearing fruit. Certainly the majority of firms that we have introduced to this sales method are enthusiastic about its value.

Our participation in trade fairs is a growing program. Our activities definitely have the endorsement and support of Canadian exporters and those interested trade associations with whom we maintain liaison for advisory purposes. There is no doubt that Canadian industry appreciates our assistance in this method of export trade development. In 1957 a total of 255 Canadian companies participated in the 16 Canadian exhibits abroad sponsored by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Early in 1959 we will see the culmination of work now on foot to stage a practical businessman's trade show of Canadian products in Jamaica and Trinidad, to mark the first year of the Federation of the West Indies. These particular shows may have special significance to our future operations where trade fairs are concerned as they involve a sharing of costs between the government and private firms. Later in the spring we hope to stage a Canadian trade show and a Canada Week in Boston, Massachusetts. On present indications the West Indies effort and the Boston trade fair will have the keen support of the Canadian export community and we anticipate their success accordingly. In themselves they will provide an effective demonstration of the value that Canadian business places upon trade fairs.

During the balance of 1959 we propose to take part in a number of international trade fairs of both general and specialized nature in the commonwealth, Europe, the United States of America, the Far East and in Latin America. In fact we are being pressed by Canadian manufacturers to go into fairs new to our post-war experience, for example, Sweden, Iraq, Australia and Rhodesia, and have also been asked to participate in more of the specialized shows concerned with individual industries such as the food trade and the building trade in important markets like the United Kingdom, United States, Germany and The Netherlands. This program is being worked out in co-operation and partnership with interested industries and trade associations.

The department is convinced that participation in trade fairs becomes more and more effective as we gain experience. We are gratified at the evidence of increasing support that we get from Canadian firms. Based on past results and the expressed interest of businessmen, we are convinced that this activity is an extremely valuable one.

And now a word about export financing. Another effort which facilitates Canadian export trade is the operations of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, which protects Canadian exporters on certain types of foreign sales against non-payment by foreign buyers and against certain other contingencies. Canadian exporters have represented to us that in some respects export financing facilities available in Canada are not sufficiently broad and flexible to permit them to compete against some other countries which offer more far-reaching and longer term credits. The point is being made that in some instances Canadian exporters have been competitive in respect of price, quality and delivery but have been unable to get the business because they were not competitive in respect of credit. The department has been looking into these reports and in co-operation with other governmental departments we are examining thoroughly all suggestions for additional export financing facilities.

A note with regard to trade missions, Mr. Chairman. We believe in the principle that if Canadians want to sell more abroad they have to go to foreign lands and negotiate and, where possible, do business there. Early last fall I accompanied representatives of the wheat board to western Europe on a get-acquainted visit with a number of important grain buyers in several countries. Then on October 7 and 8, I attended a meeting of the joint United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic affairs in Washington. We discussed a number of our common trade problems and we found the exchange of views useful. Later in the month, I attended meetings of the 12th session of GATT in Geneva. In November 1957, a group of 50 outstanding Canadian businessmen visited the United Kingdom on an extended trade mission under government auspices. More recently, I participated in the inaugural proceedings on the occasion of the founding of the Federation of the West Indies. This visit provided me with an opportunity to discuss a number of trade matters with the appropriate officials of the new federation.

Our trade visits abroad have been reciprocated in kind, and we have had an increasing number of visits of both officials and businessmen from other countries to explore ways and means of increasing trade. Foremost among them has been the British trade mission which came to Canada under the distinguished leadership of Sir William Rootes on April 24 spending a month touring our country from coast to coast. We are confident that these various trade missions—a Canadian mission going abroad and foreign visitors coming to Canada—cannot help but create a favourable climate conducive to the expansion of Canada's trade.

Mr. Chairman, that concludes a summary of the business of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have endeavoured to outline the policy of the government, our trade relations with various countries and areas with some comments on particular matters and on trade promotion. Canada's export trade is of major importance to our entire economy and the Department of Trade and Commerce exists for the purpose of promoting that trade.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make my very first words on this occasion words of congratulation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having at long last given this house a comprehensive statement of the government's attitude and policy concerning trade. I am one of those who are very critical of the fact that in respect to this very important matter which the minister himself described as being vital to Canada the government has made no statement of policy since it took office on June 21, 1957. I believe that omission was an improper way of treating the public business of this country particularly when we remember that trade is so highly vital to Canada and has such a direct and immediate effect on employment. I was particularly pleased, therefore, to hear the minister today, as I said, at long last come forward with a comprehensive statement on this subject.

The minister spoke about the many aspects of trade. As a matter of fact I thought he was slightly apologetic at the opening for the length of his remarks. I must say he has no need whatever to apologize for the length of his speech on a subject as important as this. We have been waiting for this statement for some 13 months and we welcome it. The minister is to be congratulated for having come forward with it at long last.

Trade is a wide ranging subject and perhaps in making a statement on the first item of the Departmental estimates it is necessary to approach it in a general way and at times be guilty of some generalities in which one would not always wish to engage. Last evening I was interested in examining what was done last year with respect to this subject. The estimates were introduced but there was only some brief discussion on item No. 1 and nothing further was done about the estimates prior to dissolution of the house and therefore, unfortunately, the house was denied the opportunity to examine this subject.

The minister in his brief statement on that occasion did not deal with the subject of trade at all other than to make a very short reference to Canada's excellent foreign trade service. I am very happy to join with him in those congratulatory remarks to the foreign trade service of this country. I believe we have a splendid foreign trade service serving Canada. One has only to deal with commercial matters and attend conferences on trade or finance matters with other governments to appreciate what a highly efficient and fine foreign trade service Canada has. My hope is that during his term of office the minister will support that trade service and continue to treat it in such a way as to enable it to occupy the prominent position it now occupies in our public service.

In looking at the figures it is interesting to see the expansion of our trade in those postwar years. In 1946, our imports were some $1,927 million, and our exports some $2,339 million, making a total trade of $4,266 million. By 1956 the trade had increased so that those figures for the year 1956 were: imports, $5,711,700,000; exports, $4,862,900,000; or a total trade of $10,574,600,000, a tremendous expansion, placing us in the fourth position among the traders of the world.

I think the minister will agree with me that when he took over the portfolio our trade, as a trading nation, was indeed in a very healthy state. There were problems, some serious problems, but generally speaking it was in a very healthy state. There had been a tremendous expansion of trade. I think he will also agree that when he took over his department it was a well-staffed, well-managed department, and it had a degree of esprit de corps and efficiency that would commend it to him.

He spoke about the trade pattern as we now see it, and I should like to make some comment on his remarks. There is undoubtedly a good deal of uneasiness about international trade at this time owing to several world forces which will be readily apparent to hon. members, some of which should be mentioned in particular here. But before doing that I would like to make some reference to some parts of the minister's speech.

I noted with interest his reference to the wheat exports for this year, 1958, being an increase over the year 1957. I think he will see, if he will check his own speeches in Hansard, where he referred to some of the factors entering into that, in the last session of parliament and he did not mention them today at all. He did mention one factor entering into it, namely the higher protein content of Canadian wheat, and he did mention something about European wheat production. But he did not tell us anything about the Australian crop failure last year and the sharp reduction in the Argentine production last year. It seems to me that if the House of Commons is to discuss a matter as vital as this to our economy, all these factors should be put forward by the responsible minister. We all realize and we are glad that wheat exports are up, but no useful purpose is being served in discussing the subject if we omit all the relative data and the reasons for the increase.

Then, there is the matter of beef and meat exports, particularly to the United States.

Mr. McIntosh: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. McIntosh: Will he touch on the question why Canada had 40 per cent of the wheat market prior to world war I and has only 25 per cent of the world market now?

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry; I did not get the question. I will come back to the question and deal with it when I can get the point; I am sorry, I did not get it.

As to beef, the farmers of this country particularly will rejoice—some of the consumers may regret the price increase—in the fact that our cattle exports to the United States have been very heavy indeed. The reason for that is the drought in the southern states for several years until they had to sell off their cattle and get rid of them. I hope a good part of that market can be retained. It is only confusing the issue however if you lead farmers of the country to believe that that was just a new market readily obtained in competition with cattle production in the United States.

In his discussion of his estimates the other night the Minister of Agriculture completely omitted to deal with that aspect of it and I think to that extent he was doing a disservice to the country's farmers. I do not want to refer to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture on that subject but I noticed that in dealing with this particular aspect of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not deal with that subject at all.

Then there were some other remarks about commodities that were of interest. Exports of uranium are up pretty sharply over the last year. The story of uranium exports is rather interesting. It is due to the very far-sighted policy adopted some years ago by the minister's predecessor. The policy to which I refer was the policy of the atomic energy authorities in this country announcing a fixed price for uranium ore concentrate so that prospectors could go out and prospect for uranium and develop that natural resource. When I hear my hon. friend talking about the development of natural resources I do not know of any better example of what has been done in that field than that far-sighted policy, because of which our present Minister of Trade and Commerce is now able to come into committee of supply and show the results in increased export figures. That policy, of course, was followed up by the firm contracts for the sale of the concentrates as the mines were ready to go into production and that export will, as I understand it, continue and increase until 1962 or 1963.

There is some uncertainty about the market after that and at this stage it is perhaps not useful to crystal-gaze on it. But I wonder whether the minister would give us any information he can on the subject of uranium exports, if he is in a position to do so. He may not be in a position to give much information that is of a firm nature but if he is I would appreciate very much if he would do so.

It is interesting that these three circumstances which I have pointed out in relation to wheat, beef cattle and uranium have rather tended to conceal a situation in our export trade that would cause genuine concern to careful thinkers on the subject. For instance, there is a decline in the exports of base metals and aluminum which I think must concern the minister greatly. It is quite true that so far as the total figures are concerned the increase in uranium exports has done much to offset that but I think that we should discuss these matters.

Then there is the question of the export of oil. I think we are all genuinely concerned about the voluntary 15 per cent restriction on the import of oil into the United States applicable to Canada as well as to other countries. There is another aspect of that situation, of course. I for one am of the view that it is highly essential for defence reasons that we develop all the oil resources we can on this continent and I am quite unable to understand why, if one accepts this viewpoint, it is desirable that the oil wells should be on the United States side of the line. If they have the strategic military significance I believe them to have, then surely oil wells in Canada are in as urgent need of development as are oil wells in the United States. I would hope that the government would continue to make every effort to remove this obstacle.

I am also a little critical of the government with regard to another aspect of the matter. Oil wells cannot always be developed without dealing with gas as well because it is just not possible to shut the gas in and take the oil out. I hold the view that damage has been done with regard to development in the whole field of oil and gas production, both from the point of view of export as well as internally, by reason of the failure of the government to announce any policy since it took office in June, 1957. As many of the government supporters, particularly the new ones, were speaking in the throne speech and budget debates they seemed to indicate that all history began on June 10, 1957 and I could not help but wish that they would say something about matters affecting the welfare of the country and that they would analyse, as they undoubtedly could and would if they had thought about it, the damage done to the economy by the failure of the government to enunciate and put forward a policy.

The appointment of the royal commission on energy was announced very early in the last parliament but the commission did not begin its sittings then and I for one was never able to understand how the government could not have known of the expected absence of the chairman from the country until December and the long delay that would be involved. I can only hope that the government will formulate and announce its policy soon before more damage is done through delay. The effect of the setting up of the commission, of the lack of any statement of policy by the government and the uncertainty regarding its policy has been to prevent and delay expenditures necessary for the development of that industry.

It was rather interesting to hear the minister speak today. I recall very well watching television in 1957 and seeing and hearing that wonderful announcement by the Prime Minister about the 15 per cent trade diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom. The government was going to divert imports from the United States to the United Kingdom. It was interesting to note the attention that announcement received at that time and it is very interesting today to find the minister making no direct reference to that great mission in his speech. I think the reason is obvious. It is up to the minister, of course, to exercise his judgment whether or not he should mention it but I think he had political judgment in mind when he failed to do so. That policy was completely in error, unworkable and damaging to the country.

Mr. Chevrier: It fell flat on its face.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it fell flat on its face.

Mr. Churchill: Like the Liberal party on June 10, 1957.

Mr. McIlraith: If I understood the minister correctly, he said in his remarks that he was ready to co-operate with all countries in removing restrictions and seeking to expand trade. As he was saying that I wondered whether he was thinking about the statement made at Mont Tremblant last year by the British chancellor when he put forward a proposal of free trade with Canada.

Mr. Pallett: What would your answer be to that proposal?

Mr. Pearson: We have answered it half a dozen times.

Mr. McIlraith: It was a rather startling proposal, something very new involving far-reaching changes. The minister spoke very correctly today about the trade with that country and claimed improvement of the United Kingdom and commonwealth markets but when this most definite proposal was made by a responsible minister of the United Kingdom government our trade minister never came into this house to discuss it at all. He never submitted his policy with regard to it. He never brought the matter forward. What is his attitude to it? He does not say and he will not say.

I respectfully submit that a proposition of that sort requires responsible treatment, consideration, attention and the establishment of a policy on the part of the government. A commonwealth conference is to be held in September of this year but the minister does not tell the house what the attitude of the government is going to be on that very important proposal put forward by the United Kingdom authorities. Surely if we believe in the parliamentary system at all parliament is entitled to know the policy of the government on this important aspect of our foreign trade. That is particularly so in view of the fact that the present government took office, as they are so fond of saying, for the first time after 22 years in opposition.

Mr. Pallett: Twenty-two years of no policy.

Mr. McIlraith: Twenty-two years that is exactly what I was seeking to say. After 22 years with no policy on the subject the opposition came into power and they now decline to deal with the matter.

Mr. Pallett: You had better check your answer on that.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Peel has the advantage of sitting very close to the Hansard reporter and he puts interjections on Hansard which it is not always possible to hear. That one I did hear.

I was glad to hear the minister make reference today to the European common market. I hope he will develop that subject a little more because there are many people in this country who fear the direction it may take and who are anxious that the government should co-operate closely in that development to see that it does not take a trend that will be harmful or restrictive so far as the trade of the area with Canada is concerned.

I think probably the aim with respect to it is not objectionable. I am not speaking about the aim or criticizing the minister at the moment, but I wish he would inform us more fully on that subject, just what information he has as to the factors that might affect us favourably and adversely, and the attitude and actions of the government with respect to them.

Then at long last we got a statement from the minister about trade with China. I was particularly interested in that because of the many statements made by the Prime Minister, particularly during the recent election campaign, as well as other supporters of the present government. The Prime Minister's language seemed to indicate an expectation of sharply increased trade with China. I should like to ask the minister if he would clear up in a precise way the exact situation concerning the export to China of materials that might not be considered strategic, in view of the apparent confusion arising out of the attempt to get this information by a process of questions and answers on orders of the day. This subject is too large, perhaps, to be dealt with properly on orders of the day. There is a great desire to obtain that information.

I would ask him if he would consider working out a precise statement on this subject and putting it on the record during the consideration of these estimates, so we could have it as an authoritative statement as of this date. In this statement I would hope he would clarify the confusion that now exists in connection with Canadian subsidiaries of United States owned companies. The apparent conflict arises because these subsidiaries are subject to Canadian law, but at the same time the United States owners may be subject to United States law. I am aware of the fact it is a subject of some difficulty, but I believe it is a subject on which we should have a precise statement.

On the subject of trade with China, I read with some interest Mr. Forsyth-Smith's article in the publication Foreign Trade. It was a very good article, as far as it went. In view of the minister's statement today about the willingness of Canadian exporters to go abroad in an effort to sell products, and his own interest and statements along that line, would he say whether or not he has in immediate prospect any trade trip to China? There was a small item about that in the newspaper the other day, with which I think he is familiar, indicating that he was going. However, it seemed to me to be one of those vague items that left one in considerable doubt as to whether he was or was not going. I hope he will clear up that point.

I was not quite clear as to the position of our trade commissioners in China. Have we a trade commissioner now in China?

Mr. Churchill: Just in Hong Kong.

Mr. Pearson: Does he cover China?

Mr. McIlraith: What is his exact position?

Mr. Churchill: We have a trade commissioner stationed in Hong Kong, Mr. Forsyth-Smith. He spent two weeks in China last fall on invitation of the Chinese government.

Mr. McIlraith: Does his territory cover Hong Kong?

Mr. Churchill: His territory covers Hong Kong and adjacent countries.

Mr. McIlraith: Does it include China?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: As the minister correctly expected, I have a considerable interest in the subject of trade with the West Indies. As he will have noticed, there is a resolution on the order paper standing in my name which deals with the subject of trade with the West Indies. It is not my purpose to elaborate it here, particularly, because I expect that on Monday, or one of the Mondays very shortly, we shall have an opportunity of debating that subject in a specific way. While this will not give an opportunity to ask questions, my remarks could probably be more properly left until that stage.

There is one aspect of this matter, however, arising out of the minister's statement, with which I should like to deal now. He spoke about the importance of this market and the growth of the trade with the West Indies over the last number of years. It has a historic background, and it has a tremendous importance to an area of this country, which I think I can say with propriety needs help in its development at this time to a degree that is equal to or greater than the need of any other part of this country. I refer, of course, to the maritimes.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Herridge: I listened with great interest to the minister's recitation of the activities of his department, the first he has made since he has taken office. While a great deal of what he had to say was informative, I must frankly say it was not inspiring. You know, Mr. Chairman, the minister does not talk like a salesman. I could not imagine anyone selling very much with the minister's approach to this question. He reminded me of the old-fashioned storekeeper who used to sit on an apple box and say, "Come and get it." I was reminded also of an early schoolmaster of mine, nearly 60 years ago, who used to lecture on history. I thought the minister gave us a good lecture on history this afternoon, but I do not think there was very much insight into the future. He did not sound much like a prophet.

I was interested in his reference to trade with the United Kingdom, the European common market, trade with Japan, Latin America and the possibility of developing further trade in the British West Indies. I was interested, too, in his brief and somewhat noncommittal statement with respect to China. The minister stated the trade commissioner learned last fall that the Chinese people were interested in trading with Canada, and in purchasing some of the commodities we have for sale in the export market. I was amazed to hear him say that. You know, Mr. Chairman, we in this group have been trying to tell governments that for five years. The minister has sent a trade commissioner into China surreptitiously, up the backstairs as it were so they could disown him if he did get into trouble, and he comes back and informs us that there are possibilities of trade. Well, you know, it does me good to repeatedly be able to get up in this house and finally find that the things this group have been saying for years previously have been proven to be correct and have been accepted by the government in power.

Then, coming to British Columbia, I am particularly interested in the problems of trade which affect that province and, more particularly, those which affect my constituency. I do not usually enter into local and parochial matters and things of that sort. However, this is such an important subject that I must deal with one or two matters that concern employers and employees in my constituency. However, I must turn to some capitalist sources to support my arguments on behalf of this group and with respect to surplus commodities we have for sale in Canada. There is no doubt that we have a great deal of surplus commodities in this country at this time. At the same time we have hundreds of thousands of unemployed. I want to deal briefly with some of the things we have in surplus based on information from capitalist sources, strong supporters of free enterprise. Then I want to deal briefly with some of the support for trade with China and the attitude of prominent industrialists and organizations in British Columbia. I am going to deal with this question particularly because while we are all for the development of trade with the other countries that have been mentioned, there are limitations to the possibility of that development. We are moving in that respect into fairly well harrowed fields. We in this group may believe that the greatest possibility for the cultivation of a market in Asia is to a great extent in China. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, on that account I am going to confine my remarks this afternoon to that country.

Before doing so, however, I want to put on the record a few facts which indicate the things we have in surplus in Canada at the present time and the situation with respect to the mining, lumbering and smelting industries and with respect to agriculture. However, I am going to leave the question of dealing with the problems of the lumber industry to another colleague of mine who is also greatly interested in this question, and the problems of the wheat producers and their requirements with respect to the sale of wheat to another colleague of mine, namely the hon. member for Assiniboia who on occasion has been known to rise in his place in this house and have a few words to say on the marketing of wheat. I now want to quote from the Financial Post of February 15, 1958. That paper has this to say with respect to copper:

> It becomes increasingly evident that the copper industry needs an increase in consumption, particularly in North America.
> Copper producers are fighting hard to build up demand. Now that they have cut back output by about 10 per cent on a world basis (excluding Russia), they want to improve their markets . . .
> Canadian producers are in a difficult position, depending on both the United States and United Kingdom markets since domestic use isn't a vital factor.

They have got to find some other markets than the United Kingdom and the United States before their problems are going to be solved. Then the Financial Post of March 8, 1958, commenting on the copper situation, states:

> Canadian copper is largely produced in conjunction with other metals like nickel, lead, zinc and gold. It is difficult to reduce production of copper since often the "other" metal is the one sought and copper is the byproduct.

That is the situation that exists in British Columbia in a number of mines.

> Thus Canadian mines—ranking fourth as suppliers—so far have largely been forced to ride along the bumps of the confused world copper picture. They could not readily reduce production, conserve ore and generally pull in their belts.
> Instead they have had to go on producing the metal . . . at substantially reduced prices.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal briefly with the comments of the Financial Post with respect to the situation concerning the marketing of lead and zinc. The Financial Post of March 8, 1958 comments as follows on the lead and zinc situation, and this is an extremely important question to the mining fraternity, both employers and employees in British Columbia:

> Lead and zinc are among Canada's troubled minerals. They are riding out the storm of falling prices that also hit copper, and the general slump in lead and zinc business occurred for the same basic reason as in the case of copper—an oversupply of metal in relation to the market . . .
> The world squeeze out in the two metals resulted in some casualties in Canada. In British Columbia, giant Consolidated Mining and Smelting closed down two mines. Galkeno Mines in the Mayo district in the Yukon suspended operations. Consolidated Sudbury Basin, a potential supplier of lead and zinc, cancelled its plans to get into production.

The same Financial Post notes as follows:

> It is estimated that some 68 per cent of Canada's zinc production is sold in the United States and some 25 per cent of lead.

Then the Financial Post deals with the wheat situation and gives an analysis of it but I am going to leave that question to the hon. member for Assiniboia. Then we come to the question of lumber and fertilizers. This is what Canadian Business Week of October, 1957 has to say:

Canada, again remembers its best pre-war Asian customer. In the late twenties, this country shipped as much as $29 million worth of B.C. lumber annually to China. This is a market which the depression, World War II and post-war ideological divisions have completely dried up. Today, with the B.C. coast lumber industry in the worst slump since the depression-bound thirties, the cry has gone up from several senior west coast lumber company executives that China should no longer be excluded as a trading partner of Canada.

The article goes on to say this:

During the last 18 months, senior Canadian and American businessmen, including Henry Ford II, Canadian-born multi-millionaire Cyrus Eaton, H. R. MacMillan, chairman of the board of Vancouver's MacMillan and Bloedel Ltd., and James S. Duncan, OBE, former president of world-selling Massey-Harris-Ferguson Ltd., have all come out for a realistic Red China trading policy. Last January, Ford called for a 'realistic decision' where China is concerned and Eaton warned the western powers to 'stop goading Red China'—

Then the article goes on further to say this:

The largest market on earth, perhaps already overcommitted to the Russian economy for industrial heavy equipment and to a limited degree for consumer goods, is virtually closed to the products of the west in any volume. Before it's too late and before it forgets what it once could buy from us, China's traditional consumer goods trade with us must be restored, say western businessmen and manufacturers.

Then in my few brief remarks I want to quote some statements favouring trade with China which now rise on every hand. Mr. W. C. Mainwaring, vice president, British Columbia Electric Co., Vancouver, B.C., had this to say:

Canada's exports to China dropped from $37 million in 1947 to $1 million in 1954 . . . there is every indication that China has dollars to pay for increased trade with Canada—

Mr. C. M. Forsyth-Smith, Canadian trade commissioner in Hong Kong had this to say:

There is a "promising market" in Red China for Canadian goods—

Hon. Earle Westwood, British Columbia provincial minister of trade and industry Victoria, had this to say:

The Chinese demand for fertilizer is so great that the annual requirements for the Shanghai area alone would absorb the total production of the Trail plant of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

Yet here we are having to cut back production and men are being laid off while we have this large potential market for fertilizer and that fertilizer is badly needed in the Asiatic countries and in China.

Then again, Mr. Chairman, there is another statement I wish to quote. I may say that I am just summarizing and more or less taking statements from here and there so as not to take up the time of the committee unduly in quoting these capitalist authorities to support the arguments we have made in this house for a period of five years. I have here in my hand a page from the Montreal Gazette of June 28. In it there is an article which is headed "Canada Losing 'Legitimate' Trade; Muir Finds Others Grab China Market". I just want to quote Mr. Muir briefly. In this article Mr. Muir is quoted as saying this:

"It was galling to meet (in China) and to talk with the selling forces of other Western powers, not only obviously getting business but enthusiastic about it, while our people seem to sit back and wait for a silver platter deal,"—

By our people he means the exporters of Canada and this government. He goes on to say:

The Canadian government should see to it that, "if any Canadian enterprise should be induced by outside influence to deviate from its responsibility to the Canadian worker and the Canadian economy by declining legitimate and clean business, drastic and immediate steps should be taken to discipline it"—

The minister sent a trade commissioner to China last fall and he informs the house this morning very briefly and in modest and mild tones and terms that there are "some possibilities" with respect to a market in China. I think it is obvious, however, that the leading industrialists in this country and the organizations to which they belong are not satisfied that this government is moving fast enough in this direction in order to take advantage of this great potential market. In concluding my references to these persons I wish to quote a resolution passed by the British Columbia chamber of commerce at its recent meeting in Vancouver which clearly indicates that this chamber of commerce was not satisfied with the government's policies in this respect, otherwise they would not have passed a resolution in these terms. This resolution was, I am informed, adopted unanimously and reads as follows:

Whereas Canada's volume of international trade is of vital concern to the economic welfare of all Canadians; and

Whereas the diversified product of its natural resource industries requires that trade should be conducted on a multilateral basis; and

Whereas exchange of trade and closer personal relationships are an essential factor for the development of international understanding and goodwill;

Therefore be it resolved that the British Columbia Chamber of Commerce urge upon the federal government the need for establishing trade relations with communist China, subject to the imposition of such conditions as would safeguard the movement of strategic materials.

It is obvious from that resolution that the British Columbia chamber of commerce is not satisfied with the actions taken by the government to date with respect to the development of trade with red China. Why did they take that view? Because that convention would have been attended by a large number of men interested in the primary industries of British Columbia and would have surpluses to sell.

Another thing to which I wish to draw the attention of the minister is the fact that in that resolution are the words "closer personal relationships". It is quite obvious from those words that they do not consider the sending of a trade commissioner to Hong Kong a close enough personal relationship. As I and others in this group have said before, we believe that such a close personal relationship can only be realized by the recognition by this government of red China. In doing so we do not recognize a system; we do not agree with their policies, but we cannot expect a great nation like that, with a population of over 600 million, to carry on a satisfactory trade relationship unless we recognize the government of that country. We do hope, therefore, that the Canadian government will cease riding on the coat tails of Mr. Dulles and will show a little courage and do what the majority of the Canadian people want them to do, that is, first to recognize China and, secondly, to take a much more positive approach to the development of this great market which would, without doubt, provide an immense outlet for our surplus commodities and employment for many persons who are now unemployed in this country.

It is quite obvious that the, shall I say, snail's pace which the government is adopting with respect to this matter at the present time is unsatisfactory to the industrialists and to their employees both capital and labour in British Columbia having expressed their discontent and their opinions in various ways. I do urge the minister to recognize the feeling in the country. I think the government and possibly the minister himself are somewhat out of touch, particularly with the feeling in British Columbia, with respect to the development of trade in Asia, recognition of red China and the development of trade with this great country.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few moments to address the house. It is rather unfortunate that I should follow the hon. member for Kootenay West because my subject is very much the same as his. I do not agree with his contention that the government is out of step with public thinking on this matter; I believe the government has moved faster and with more effect than any other government has done, and in this respect I would like to quote a few figures.

Canadian exports to China in the first five months of this year totalled $2.75 million, whereas in previous years Canadian exports, firstly in 1954, totalled $70,000, while in 1955 they totalled approximately $1 million, in 1956 $2,400,000 and in 1957 about $1,400,000. So that if the rate of exports is kept up during the balance of the year we will export to China this year as much as we have exported in the preceding four years. In addition to this, the government has sent a trade commissioner to China and has taken action in consultation with the United States with a view to freeing trade with China. During the consultations which the minister and the Prime Minister had with the President of the United States, as we have been advised through press reports and in other ways, steps were agreed upon so that this trade can be made open to us on the same basis as it is available to other NATO countries. I think that is a pretty good record and, coming from British Columbia, I do not minimize the value of trade with China. I know how important it is not only to British Columbia but to all of western Canada.

I would like to refer to the trade pattern in the United Kingdom since that country recognized China. The U.K. recognized red China on January 6, 1950, and in that year trade with China totalled approximately $10 million; it dropped by over a quarter in 1951, came back to $12 million in 1952 and from that point on it has steadily risen to a total export trade of $34 million approximately in 1957. United Kingdom imports from China have followed pretty much the same pattern and stand at close to $40 million in 1957.

This is a sizeable trade picture but we should not inflate the importance of it in regard to United Kingdom trade or trade with other countries. The value of trade with China is in its future potential, in that this is a pattern of increasing trade which will rise at a very fast rate from year to year with the development of that country through industrialization and through the measures which its government has been taking to increase living standards which, even now, are fantastically low compared with our own.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has quoted rather extensively from the report of Mr. James Muir, the chairman and president of the Royal Bank of Canada, and I must say that the statement of a leading businessman such as Mr. Muir must not be ignored. I believe that Mr. Muir has helped to correct some of the misconceptions we perhaps have had as a result of previous reports of activity in red China. I do think, however, in respect of his remarks about the exporting fraternity who, he says, should shake themselves, should get busy and should visit China either individually or as a group and keep at this job in order to develop trade, what the government has done and is doing had to be done first. Hon. members know that there is an embargo on certain goods and that CONCOM, a subcommittee of NATO, has been sitting in Europe and has brought the strategic control lists in regard to the U.S.S.R. and China into a state of conformity. A great many articles and commodities which were formerly embargoed have now been freed from that list.

The trouble with our industrial setup is that the United States has taken the stand that it will not trade with red China and that that decision of the United States government will apply to the operations of United States plants in other countries. Because approximately 60 per cent of the industrial capacity of Canada is controlled from the United States we cannot establish free channels through Hong Kong for material and commodities for sale to red China. This does not assist us in respect to those industries which are in the main under United States control or ownership. That is the reason why the recent meeting between the President of the United States and the government of Canada is of such importance because it frees these channels of trade so we can participate in trade with China on somewhat the same basis as the United Kingdom. If it works out as it is supposed to we should see an increase in trade with China.

There are a couple of questions I should like to ask the minister in regard to the new trade pattern and they relate to how the setup will work. Will a China trade section be established in the Department of Trade and Commerce? It would seem inconceivable to me that a Canadian company subject to United States regulations because of ownership should have to go through the U.S. state department for a permit or relaxation of regulations allowing it to make shipments to China. I would think the way it should be handled would be for the company to go to some section of the Department of Trade and Commerce which would have clear lines of communication with the proper officials in Washington so that an answer could be given in a relatively short time. I can see businessmen going grey with frustration if they have to wade through the intricacies of the United States state department in order to secure a permit to make a shipment. If a China trade section is established in our own Department of Trade and Commerce the headquarters should be located at Vancouver and this should work out very well.

I have been told that within the past few weeks agents have tried to buy quantities of bleached sulphite pulp for shipment to China but have not been successful. This commodity is produced only in mills on the coast that are United States-owned. The question I have is this. To whom should the agent go if he wished to get clearance to make a deal with Rayonier or Crown Zellerbach, subsidiaries or whatever company it might be, to get that trade moving?

In conclusion I simply wish to reiterate that it is easy enough to criticize in these matters. In working out relationships such as these, and particularly with the United States, and in setting up a Canadian agency in Hong Kong to make contacts with a government which at the present time we cannot recognize, a considerable amount of work and planning is involved. To my way of thinking the record speaks for itself and indicates that the government is working along lines which will give us a fair share of the China market in the future.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could direct a question to the hon. member who has just spoken? If I understood him correctly, the hon. gentleman said that we cannot at the present time recognize China. Would the hon. member care to elaborate and say why we cannot?

Mr. Broome: No.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a moment or two of the committee's time in order to complete two points that I had not concluded when my allowance of time expired earlier in this debate this afternoon.

I was speaking near the conclusion of my remarks about the minister's statement with respect to West Indies trade. I agreed with him about the importance of that subject and made reference to the fact that I have a notice of motion standing in my name on the order paper dealing with this subject and that I proposed to make my main remarks pertaining to it on that occasion.

I did, however, want to say something about the minister's remarks in this connection which were important for two reasons. He outlined the historical development of that trade, told of its growth and stressed its importance but he did not elaborate on the policy with respect to the development of our trade with that area. I had hoped he would do so not only because of the general importance of the subject but because of its particular importance to the maritime region.

The one point I want to make clear is the significance of his omission to deal with Canada's part in that trade. We have a trade agreement dating back to the twenties and have participated in the West Indies trade liberalization program. The minister mentioned those things but did not mention the one really significant step we have taken since the government of which he is a member took office and that is the withdrawal of the tremendous aid we have been giving that area through providing shipping for the major part of the trade between Canada and that country. It did not apply to bauxite and certain items of that nature. I refer specifically to the Canadian National Steamships vessels which operated for years.

It is perfectly true that they were not operating at a profit and had to be subsidized. If I remember correctly the Minister of Transport said that the subsidy we were paying was $200,000 a year and that it would rise to double that amount this year. I have not checked that figure today and stand to be corrected by the minister if I have misquoted the facts. But the real crux of the matter is this. As was stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Federation of the West Indies has just come into being. They are encountering all the difficulties inherent in a country achieving a new status and entering a new period of development. At that strategic moment in the development of that area Canada discontinued the one form of aid it had been giving the West Indies. No satisfactory explanation was given in this house for the discontinuance of the aid when the Minister of Transport discussed the withdrawal of the Canadian National Steamships service and no reference was made to it whatever today by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I respectfully suggest that it is of such importance to the trade to warrant better treatment than that. Many people in this country hold the view that this action was taken without mature and careful consideration.

It may well have been that as time went on something different would have had to be done about the arrangements than was being done but surely the time to take the decision to discontinue that service and sell the ships was not at this period in the history of the development of that area. Canada is providing a new ship which is now under construction, I believe, for trade within that area but while it is needed and represents a good gesture it is as nothing compared with the foreign trade aspect of shipping being serviced by the Canadian National Steamships lines.

In the relationship to trade this is not a subject that should be brushed aside. I have the strongest condemnation of the government for their arbitrary action. When the Minister of Transport was dealing with this—and I wish he were here now so that he could answer these remarks—I rather got the impression that he lost his patience rather quickly because of some labour difficulties that management of the steamship company were having at the time and he took precipitate action which the facts did not warrant. I rather got the impression, due to his characteristics in answering the questions that were put to him, that he did not adequately consider the question of disposal of those ships and the method of disposal, to what area they would be sent, and so on. I do not know whether he considered the question of disposal of them to the West Indies federation, or to any of the component parts of the federation, or even the gift of one of them to the federation or to one of the component parts of the federation.

The other point I wanted to deal with very briefly was the minister's remarks pertaining to the balance of trade and the figures he quoted with apparent satisfaction. He gave the figures of exports to the United States. Our exports to the United States were down in May a bit. He spoke about that subject. There is a problem of imbalance of payments between Canada and the United States. He dealt with the imbalance of commodity figures—trade—between Canada and the United States. But one very significant factor in what he quoted is the apparent improvement, in that he said there was a lessening of the deficit, and that is this. If he will analyse figures he will find that one of the reasons for that apparent improvement, or what I took from his remarks on trade as an improvement, is the sharp decline in the import of heavy capital goods to develop this country. The reason for that sharp decline in the imports of heavy capital goods is that we in this country, unfortunately, are suffering a business recession and the development that we would all wish to see going on, requiring heavy industrial machinery and the like, is not going on. To quote figures, to refer to that fact in a way that would indicate approval is to do something that is regrettable or, should I say, not to quote the figures, to omit to quote them, is to do something that is unfortunate.

Then there was another aspect of the matter of balance of trade that concerned me. The minister, when he spoke, made reference to the exports to the United Kingdom and to the commonwealth, and so on. There was the question of the exports to Asia and to India in particular. The regular exports of wheat, and the exports of wheat under the Colombo plan and the exports under that special agreement where there was a loan providing for repayment over a seven-year period were a substantial factor but it is quite wrong, Mr. Chairman, to mix up the problem the country faces concerning balance of payments with the difference in exports and imports in commodity trade figures and use the two terms as if they were synonymous because the Colombo plan figures show in the wheat aspect as exports but there is no payment in cash. That is a contribution properly made by the taxpayers of this country for a very laudable purpose and objective. It should not be lost sight of when one is speaking about the difficulties we have in the balance of payments, and the same thing goes, to a lesser extent, with these figures where the trade is financed by long-term loans.

Incidentally, there was another matter in using the wheat figures and I wish the minister had gone a little farther and completed the subject. There was the matter of the export of wheat to Russia, which was reflected in this year's figures. As I understand it, the export of wheat to Russia was under a 3-year agreement. I believe that the 1957 portion was not taken but is in the 1958 figures. If we are to discuss wheat exports intelligently those factors have to be acknowledged and dealt with. Wheat export is of tremendous significance to the economy of this country and I would hope that in its discussion those aspects could be brought forward fully and completely. Because shipments are made at a certain time under a certain laudable aid program and show in the export figures, that figure should not be used as an argument in dealing with the balance of payments problem which is another very real problem we have to face.

I will not encroach on the time of the committee further at this time. I am grateful to the committee for hearing me so soon after my earlier remarks, but I did want to complete that portion of my remarks at an early stage because they related directly to the minister's statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I want to talk about the trade in one particular commodity, but before doing so I should like to say how heartily I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West in welcoming the omission in the statement of the minister of any reference to trade diversion. I hope we have heard the last of that fallacy and I believe it will be remembered in history as the great diversion which became the great deception.

The commodity that I want to talk about is fish, and particularly salt codfish. In his statement the minister passed rather lightly over the difficulties being experienced by the salt codfish industry at the present time. I want to be quite fair. The minister did say difficulties were being experienced but he expressed the hope—which he has expressed before during this session—that those difficulties would be overcome. However, the minister gave us no information as to any plans he had for overcoming them, nor did he give any real appreciation of the vital importance of this particular export which is, of course, the oldest of all our exports and which I believe is still, so far as the proportion of the total production which has to be exported if there is to be found any market for it at all, one of those which enters most largely into world trade.

I do remember being somewhat surprised about 20 years ago when I first came to Ottawa from Manitoba and first began to hear about salt codfish when someone from the maritime provinces pointed out that in the old Canada before 1949 the proportion of salt codfish exported to the total production was exactly the same as it was of wheat. Of course, now that Newfoundland is a part of Canada the proportion of salt codfish which has to find a market abroad if it is to find any market at all is much higher than the proportion of wheat. Salt codfish to many parts of the Atlantic provinces is every bit as important as wheat is to western Canada, and I am sure the minister will agree with that view.

But we have had very little evidence so far in the house that the government has taken action consonant with the importance of the codfish industry to a very considerable section of the country. I remember I read with some surprise in the St. John's News of July 8, 1957, just over a year ago, the first statement about the famous diversion policy that the Prime Minister made when he came from his aircraft to the press gallery without previously consulting his colleagues on his return from the United Kingdom, a statement which I think will rank in history as one of the most foolish statements ever made by a Canadian prime minister.

In the course of that interview, as reported in the Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the St. John's News, the Prime Minister was being asked some questions about the proposed British adhesion to a free trade area which would surround the European common market which had, at that time, just been agreed upon by six European nations. I quote part of the article as it appeared in the paper:

> Discussing Britain's participation in the proposed European free market, Mr. Diefenbaker said Canada would take a "benevolent" view of this so long as commonwealth farm products were not included. He added that Britain also is inclined this way, though some of the continental countries are not, and that the U.K. realizes such inclusion would be serious not only for Canada but also for Australia and New Zealand. He was asked whether he would include fish in the commodities that should be excluded. "I don't think that's a very serious matter," he said.

I know that the Prime Minister did not mean, and I do not want to misrepresent him by suggesting he meant that he did not think fish was a very serious matter. What he meant was that he did not think fish was a very serious matter in relation to the proposed European free trade area. That is a view with which I cannot agree and I certainly hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell us before the debate closes on his estimates that he does not agree with it either.

The common market, as the minister very well knows, includes France and Italy and, as the minister also knows, France has a base for its salt codfish production in North America in the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. Now that there is to be a common market between France and Italy and certain other European countries there will, of course, be a common tariff and the difficulties we have experienced over the years in disposing in Italy of a proportion of our Newfoundland salt fish production are likely to be increased if the greatest care, forethought and attention are not given to every aspect of this problem by the government at all times. That is why—I do not intend to transgress the rules by debating this now; I merely point it out—we on this side of the house were so shocked when the Minister of Finance announced the other day in his budget that he was hoping to negotiate with GATT to increase the most favoured nation tariff on woollen cloth.

Woollen cloth has become one of the increasingly important exports from Italy which is, of course, one of our best customers not only for fish but also for wheat, flour and a considerable number of other products. It is also a country where we sell a great deal more than we buy. We do not feel, particularly at this time, when, because of the common market, the Italian market for fish needs to be safeguarded more jealously and carefully than ever, that anything should be done by the government to affect the exports of Italy to Canada which might invite retaliation or the possibility of retaliation. I can assure the minister that all of us who represent fishing constituencies in eastern Canada will feel very apprehensive about this aspect of that particular situation.

I read yesterday in the St. John's Telegram of July 9 that NAFEL, the sales agency for Newfoundland salt fish, had signed a contract for the sale of 40,000 quintals of salt codfish to Italy this year which is the same quantity as was sold last year. The article goes on to point out that it is very important that fishermen should deliver fish of Italian quality and in sufficient quantity early enough to make possible a shipment to Italy in August. There were certain unfortunate events, of which I am sure the minister is aware, in connection with our shipments to Italy last year which no one wants to see repeated this year.

It is true, because the fishermen are no longer making fish themselves in the quantities they used to make it and more and more of it is being sold to fish plants that the amount of fish of the quality required in the Italian market has been decreasing. The more it decreases and the more fish of a quality which has to be sold in the Caribbean market is produced in its stead the greater are the difficulties of selling our fish and the greater is the possibility of having overhanging the market a surplus of the kind of fish that can be sold in the West Indies but cannot be sold in Europe, together with a shortage of fish to satisfy the European market.

I know it is not directly the problem of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because of the peculiar division of responsibilities we have in this field, to provide incentives for the production of the kind of article we have to sell. That is his responsibility in the case of wheat; it is not in the case of fish. But I would urge the minister, and I intend on an appropriate occasion to urge the Minister of Fisheries too, to urge his colleagues to consider very carefully whether it would not be in the over-all interests of our fish exports to consider for a few years at least incentive payments for the kind of fish which will satisfy the Italian and Spanish markets until such time as that quality of fish can be produced efficiently and economically in the fish plants so that we will not lose these markets, so that we will tide ourselves over this period of transition with which I am sure the minister is familiar.

There was another very serious blow to our fish exports this year of which, of course, the minister is thoroughly aware. As long ago as November 8 in the last parliament the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo asked the minister about this matter and at that time the minister expressed the hope that something could be done to avert the loss of the Jamaican market. Unhappily the minister was not successful in his efforts and we have lost that market completely for the six months which began on July 1 of this year. We have lost it because the Icelanders have underbid us in that market.

I am not sure whether or not the minister is familiar with the degree to which the Icelandic production is subsidized. It is subsidized at a rate which it is hard to believe a country as small and as lacking in material wealth as Iceland is, could possibly carry on for any considerable length of time. But the fact remains that the loss of the Jamaican market, which has been one of the best and most stable markets for Newfoundland fish since time immemorial, is a very serious blow to the whole industry. The loss of this market is the result of non-economic competition of a character at least as objectionable as the competition from another country in the wheat market, to which hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have taken such strong exception in times past.

I do suggest to the minister that, if it is necessary to do so, extraordinary means should be adopted by the government to recover this market. If it is not recovered, if the Canadian producers of salt codfish have to try to find a market in the remaining Caribbean areas, then the results will be serious because we are having to meet subsidized competition from France and Norway in particular in those markets. As the minister knows, for many years we have not been able, because of currency restrictions and exchange controls that he mentioned, to sell fish in Brazil or the other places. The minister indicated another effort was being made to get back into that market. I wish him every success in this effort.

The fact of the matter is that in this salt fish industry, because of the current high levels of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces and because also of the action of the previous administration in inaugurating unemployment insurance for fishermen, we have had a considerable number of men return to the fishing industry. It is estimated that in Newfoundland perhaps 2,000 additional fishermen are engaged in this industry this year. It is of the utmost importance, if the industry is not to face a very serious condition with a very large surplus overhanging the market, that something be done not merely to hold the markets we have but to recover the market in Jamaica and to get back, if we possibly can, into the market in Brazil. Above all, everything should be done to hold and expand the more lucrative European market.

It is for the purpose of drawing to the attention not merely of the minister and the government but of all hon. members, the plight of this industry, the oldest industry in our country, that I speak at this time.

This industry does not rank as high as many others in total monetary value of exports, but it is fair to say that for every thousand dollars of exports more employment is probably created by this industry than any other industry that we have in the country.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

A special effort should be made to meet the big problems which this industry faces. One of those problems, as the minister knows, is that the price which is received for fish is set in a world market. There is no way in which the fishermen can get any protection, and yet for most of the things our fishermen have to buy, they not only have to pay the price of goods produced in a protected market but in many cases the price of goods that are produced in the central part of Canada which, in many cases, is higher than the price of those goods in the markets in central Canada. I am sure the minister is very familiar with this argument, coming as he does from the part of the country in which he and I lived for so long.

The minister said he hoped we could get back into the Jamaican market if we could meet the prices which our competitors might be willing to quote in that market. It may be that we will not be able to meet those prices any better on the 1st of January than we were on the 1st of July, not because our fishermen are not producing as efficiently as they could, not because we are not trying to cut costs wherever we can, but because the government of another country is subsidizing the exports, as is certainly the case now with Icelandic exports to Jamaica. As the minister knows, we in Canada are a very considerable customer of Jamaica. I should be very surprised indeed if the people of Iceland provide a very large market for Jamaica. It does seem to me, and I am not suggesting any kind of threat or anything of that sort, that this is a rather powerful argument for the minister's officials to use in any discussions of this subject in the West Indies.

I think some of us, on this side of the house at least, will have something more to say about this subject when the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West comes up for debate, we hope next Monday. In the meantime, I wanted to bring the minister's attention to this problem as forcibly as I could. This minister said, quite correctly, that the market was very good at the moment for fresh and frozen fish. Experience tells us this condition will be influenced by the price of meat generally, but the price of beef particularly. I am told by people with long experience in the fish trade that when the price of beef goes up, the market for fish rises. If the price of beef falls, the market for fish generally falls too, in areas like the United States where consumers can readily shift from one product to another. I think all of us, not only the members from the Atlantic provinces and the minister himself, but from the greater part of Canada, are very apprehensive about that question, the shortage of fodder in western Canada; the danger of mass sellings and mass slaughterings of cattle, and the danger to our cattle trade. I would add thereby also to our fresh fish exporters. Then again, if the quantity of fresh and frozen fish we could export declined, there would be that much more pressure on the salt fish market.

All of these things are tied together. I do hope the minister will use his influence with his colleagues, and I am sure he will in this case, to take every precaution, including if necessary increasing our imports from the United States, in order to assure an adequate supply of fodder so we can maintain our cattle, maintain orderly markets for cattle in the United States which are important, not only to the farmers who produce cattle but also to the fishermen who sell fish in the United States.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, living as I do almost 1,000 miles from the sea, I could certainly not claim to be a salt water fisherman or know too much about codfish in general. However, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and listened to him point out the danger to the fishing industry on the east coast of Canada. It so happens that the other day I did receive a little bit of detailed information on the trade between this country and Italy and it seems to fit right in now. I think it might be interesting to consider that the deficit of Italy in her trading balance with Canada appears to be steadily growing and that certainly is not what we desire if we wish to increase our trade with all nations, as the minister so ably outlined this afternoon.

But there is great concern, I know from the correspondence I have received, in Italy at this steadily growing imbalance of trade between Italy and Canada. For example, it has increased from $9.1 million in 1955 to $12.8 million in 1956 to $16.1 million in the first half of 1957 and I suppose that as of the present the imbalance of trade between the two countries is even greater. This growing imbalance of trade between the two countries is causing a great deal of concern in Italy itself. In fact, my correspondence indicates to me that they are considerably disturbed about the protectionist tendencies that this present government seems to be formulating in its general trade policies. This is being given considerable display in the trade papers in Italy itself. I am advised that it would hardly be surprising if this did not lead to a reappraisal of Italian policy concerning Canadian imports, especially with respect to the import of codfish. That is all I want to say on that point at the moment.

What I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is a subject which he, for one reason or another, did not include in his speech. I am very glad that at long last he has decided to make a report to parliament. I believe this is the first one since the present government took office some time ago. In any event, if you will refer to the throne speech given on May 12 of this year, you will see that in one paragraph it refers to small business and states as follows:

> In order to assist small business, there will be established a small business section within the administrative machinery of government. The functions of this organization will be to provide liaison between the government and small businesses, to study the problems of small business and to advise on measures necessary to meet them.

The Minister of Justice on June 11 of this year was speaking to the retail merchants association of Canada at Vancouver and a report published in the Toronto Telegram of June 11 reads:

> Justice Minister Fulton has outlined to retailers federal plans to help small businessmen solve their problems.

Then it goes on further to say he was speaking to the Retail Merchants Association of Canada and that he said:

> —the government is proceeding "at once" to set up a small business section in government.

And so on and so forth.

> Mr. Fulton said the government's new section will provide a liaison between government and business and recommend measures to help small businesses including the terms of a loan fund.

If we go back to some of the promises that were made by the Prime Minister in the recent campaign—and I am dealing only with the recent campaign, not the first so-called campaign—we find that according to a Canadian Press dispatch in the Montreal Star of March 18, 1958, the Prime Minister speaking at Selkirk, Manitoba, on March 17 last said the government would set up a special branch to help small business obtain a fair share of government contracts and financial aid to expand.

There was no mention of any particular measure which the present government proposes to take with regard to assisting small business and certainly not with regard to giving any financial assistance. Yet that was one of their major points; and certainly according to the evidence that we have, and according to the minister's own statements on various occasions, I believe that small business accounts for about 50 per cent of domestic trade in this country. If that is true, it seems to me that now is the time for the government to live up to its promises with regard not only to acting as a liaison between small business and government—I am not suggesting that the government indulge in wholesale handing out of contracts except by tender—but to advancing some proposal as it promised to assist financially small business.

As we well know, the previous government set up a small business department. I believe it was started under the department of reconstruction many years ago and it has been of material assistance to small business throughout Canada by the providing of information, by bringing people together and by assisting generally small businessmen who wanted to make an approach to government and who wanted to get certain research facilities without being obliged to go to the considerable expense of doing the research themselves. So I ask the minister what about this pledge given to the people of this country in the throne speech. What does his department propose to do with regard to assisting small business in his country? There will be ample opportunity, I hope, to ask various leading questions of the minister in an effort to try to get some information which is not necessarily political in character but is with regard to trade itself.

We have heard ad nauseam this proposal to divert 15 per cent of Canada's trade from the United States to the United Kingdom and it has been expanded into an expansion of or increase in export trade for this country; but the basic fact remains that the statement was made that this government proposes to divert 15 per cent of our trade with the United States to the United Kingdom or in other words $650 million per year. That is a disturbing statement or a disturbing fact, if it is true. If it is not true, I think the time has come to deny it once for all. Certainly the minister's words were these, as I took them down today, when he said that what we want is diversification—of course we do—because it will mean a better balance of trade—of course it will. He says we want expansion of foreign trade, that we want to co-operate with all, and that we want to remove discrimination. Yet at the same time when we hear rumours throughout of a proposed imposition of a dumping proposal, needless to say traders and businessmen in this country are considerably disturbed.

We have dealt with the question of trade with Canada and the United States at some length on other occasions; 70 per cent of our imports from the United States, 60 per cent of our exports to the United States with a deficit of $1,001,000,000. But the minister in a statement given to the Boston Post, I think it was, said that in spite of our desire to diversify our trade, we must do nothing to lessen the over-all total. As I say, this ridiculous suggestion of diverting trade from one country to another, when we as the fourth trading nation in the world should be bending every effort to expand our trade, should be scotched once for all.

Frequently in this house we have heard the suggestion advanced by the present government that trade should be decentralized from the central provinces to the west and to the east. Has the minister anything to say with regard to that proposal? Has he any policy to advocate in that regard? We also heard a great deal about the trade mission to Britain and all of us wish to increase trade with Great Britain. I hope no one will misunderstand me on that score.

We have, however, received no report from the minister himself in this particular respect. We have had a mission sent over to England, which mission has submitted its report, and that report is very interesting. Under heading No. 6 of the conclusions of the report, "factors affecting British trade in Canada" it refers to the proposal of protection. This is in the last paragraph, namely No. 24, and it says that undoubtedly a number of United Kingdom manufacturers are uneasy about dumping regulations and fair market value and that some do not entirely appreciate the procedures involved.

What we want to know is how the minister is able to get on his feet in this house and propose that we must take every possible step to increase trade with other countries, and at the same time talk about diverting trade from the United States to the United Kingdom, and also at the same time imply that there may be levied subsequently certain dumping duties which, as anyone knows, will only bring about a measure of restriction to trade and will do nothing to increase trade with other countries. We think we should have an explanation of the present government's policy from the minister at this time.

The minister himself referred to the necessity for exhibitions and how they have brought Canadian goods to the attention of foreign purchasers. I am assuming the minister has already visited the Canadian exhibition at the current Brussels trade fair and I think the time has come for him to tell us something about his impressions of our exhibit at that fair. My own opinion is that we ought to go into the fair business on a much larger scale, that it is a measure used by European traders to display their goods and to procure contracts for trade between themselves and other countries. I believe we are lagging in this respect and, as I say, I would like to hear the minister's impressions of our exhibit at Brussels.

There are many other things which I propose to raise in due course but at the present time I wish to thank the minister for having, at long last, brought down a report on his department and I wish to state that I hope before long he will outline his policy so that the businessmen of our country may know in which direction we are going.

Mr. Eudes: There is just one question I would like to raise in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West. I would like the minister to comment on articles which have appeared recently in Montreal newspapers to the effect that oil refineries established in Montreal for some years, having spent millions of dollars to expand the industry in that area, are being forced to go west in order to gain supplies of crude oil. Would the minister also explain how this movement of the oil refineries from the city of Montreal and area will help to solve the acute unemployment problem which exists in that metropolis and will improve the declining economic situation?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member, this is not a subject which is of immediate concern to the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are dealing with estimates and I have no supervision over the oil refineries or where they are situated in this country.

Mr. Peters: There is only one small point which I would like to raise which has been raised by other members of this group in previous years, particularly the hon. member for Kindersley. This concerns the standardization of weights and measures and sizes of products manufactured in Canada.

I am quite sure that every hon. member has gone downtown and has purchased or has intended to purchase a pair of shoes or a shirt or particularly children's clothing. When they walk into a store they expect that if they buy a child's shirt size six it is going to fit a child aged six but when they get it home it will fit a child three years of age or a child of eight or nine. This has, for a number of years, caused a good deal of concern to every housewife and, I am quite sure, to other people. When you enter a store to buy a pair of shoes, for example, and you recall that the last time you bought a pair of size nine it was a good fit, you expect that that size will still fit. If it does not, it does not necessarily mean that your feet have grown bigger, it simply means that the manufacturer did not use a standard measurement for his product. This has been a big problem in respect to our trade, particularly in connection with items of wearing apparel, and also in relation to imported goods. I am quite sure that the people of Canada would appreciate something being done to standardize many commodities.

There is another aspect of standardization to which I would like to draw the attention of the minister and that is with respect to Canadian produced goods. Shirts, for instance, are sometimes labelled 100 per cent wool while in many cases they are made of fabricated material and have no connection with sheep. Similarly, when a product is labelled washable or unshrinkable the Canadian people, in my opinion, have the right to assume that that product will meet with the standards implied by its label. We all know that this is not always so.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to make any formal comments about the general question of trade, I should like to express my thanks to the hon. member for Vancouver South for the rather timid endorsation he made of C.C.F. policy a while ago, and also express my appreciation for the few statistics he placed on the record regarding the total amount of trade with China in terms of dollars. It is most unfortunate, however, that he used only figures relating to the last few years for if he had gone back farther than just a few years we would have had a much clearer picture of the trading relationship between Canada and China in terms of dollar value.

One important statement the hon. gentleman made which I believe requires a great deal of amplification or explanation was to the effect that we cannot now recognize in a diplomatic way the government of red China. Hon. members will recall that I asked him if he would care to elaborate on why we cannot and he declined my invitation. If there was any reason behind his making the definite statement that we cannot now undertake to recognize China in a formal and diplomatic fashion I would appreciate it very much if at some future time in this particular vote the minister would undertake to explain whether or not the attitude expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South represents the policy of the government, and I make that request being fully cognizant of the fact that this is not a debate on external affairs nor a discussion of the estimates of that department.

If it is the policy of the government that we cannot recognize China diplomatically I believe this country is entitled to a clear explanation of this position. Although this is not the time for a discussion on external affairs, as I have said, I think we should be allowed a bit of leeway in discussing the question of the diplomatic recognition of a country because it has a direct bearing on our trade relationship with the countries of the world and in this case with China. I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will allow us to pursue the question of diplomatic recognition to the extent of permitting the minister to explain the position of the government and the reason for its taking that position with respect to expanded trade with red China.

The general tenor of the minister's opening remarks was that Canada is a trading nation and depends on export markets for a great deal of its economic stability—or instability, whichever it happens to be at a given moment—and I believe he said that one out of five persons employed in Canada was employed because of export trade, or if you prefer having it expressed in this fashion, 20 per cent of our economy is dependent upon our export markets.

I intend to confine my remarks on this vote to the attitude of the government—as hon. members may have expected—as it relates to our trading relations with red China. I do so for a number of reasons, probably the most important of which is that China embraces 25 or 30 per cent of the world's population and if the birth rate continues at its present level it will constitute an even greater percentage of the world's population in years to come.

Another important reason for confining my remarks to our relationship with red China is that coming from British Columbia and having some familiarity with the lumber industry—having worked in and around it for eight or ten years—it naturally has a strong personal appeal for me. Lumber, as many hon. gentlemen know, accounts for 35 to 40 per cent of the total economy of the province of British Columbia. That percentage is an indefinite figure. I do not know if anybody can come up with an absolute figure to represent the percentage of the economy of British Columbia that is dependent on the lumber industry because of its extensive ramifications but I believe that 35 to 40 per cent is a generally accepted estimate of the relationship of the lumber industry to the balance of the economy of the province of British Columbia.

One of the best known persons in the lumber industry in British Columbia is Mr. H. R. MacMillan who was head of MacMillan and Bloedel a lumber firm which is one of the largest integrated lumber concerns in the world, I believe second only to the Weyerhauser interests in the United States. For a number of years we in the C.C.F. have been insisting upon formal recognition being given by Canada of the Peoples' Republic of China and secondly upon the expansion of our trade with that country. We were ridiculed on many occasions for having taken that stand. We were accused of being fellow travellers and merely wanting to support the communist ideology which is an accusation, I think, very few people would make today. Nevertheless that was the accusation that was made against us some years ago.

Mr. MacMillan would not, I think, be one who would have such an accusation directed against him. He made a visit to China not too long ago and upon his return one of his statements was that China is in need of lumber, that we can sell lumber to China and that we should expand our trade to China in terms of lumber. By confining my remarks in this context to lumber I do not want it to be construed that I am implying that wheat and other commodities should not be sold to that country or that the same amount of effort should not be put into selling other products there.

Reference has been made to Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, who recently returned from a tour of China. His remarks and opinions have become well known throughout the nation and have been mentioned in this house on a number of occasions. I do not believe it is necessary for me to reiterate them or point out the great emphasis he placed on the necessity of expanding trade with that country and I shall refrain from doing so with the exception of re-emphasizing Mr. Muir's comments to the effect that it was galling to see other western nations drumming up business in China while we sat back and were not participating in this. It is significant to note that Mr. Muir made no mention of who these other western nations were but I think we can take it that one of them naturally would be the United Kingdom who extended the diplomatic courtesy to China some years ago and as a result of that has been increasing its total amount of trade with that country almost ever since it first extended diplomatic recognition. These figures were put on the record today by my friend from Vancouver South. I wish that he had undertaken to make some reference to the dollar trade that existed between Canada and China prior to the war.

An article in Canadian Business of October, 1957, plumped for two things: one, extended trade; and, two, the question of diplomatic recognition. It pointed out that prior to the war Canada's trade with China, only as it related to lumber and lumber products, averaged $29 million a year. That was the average of our exports to China prior to the war compared with a figure of $1,700,000 for the total of all products, most of which I understand was ammonium sulphate. This figure was mentioned this afternoon. It gives some indication to the committee of the great need which exists in China for lumber. I should like to refer to some figures which I have prepared and some figures which have been quoted. China's minister of forestry, whose name is Liang Hsi, commented upon China's needs for timber. This is the statement:

By the end of the second five-year plan China will need 47 million cubic metres of timber a year.

To convert cubic metres into understandable terms so far as we apply them in British Columbia or in Canada, and thinking in terms of a thousand feet board measure, we can use two methods to turn the 47 million cubic metres into Canadian measurement units. It depends on whether he was talking about ordinary log measurement or about processed, finished lumber measurement. If he was referring to the requirement of 47 million cubic metres in terms of whole log measurements and if we convert that to board feet we find that their annual requirements would be 10,340 million board feet per year; that is, in whole log requirements. Incidentally, that is twice as much as the total average annual cut for the entire province of British Columbia in any one year over the past four or five years. If he was talking in terms of finished lumber, then we have to use another conversion factor and we come up with approximately 19½ billion board feet requirement a year for China. In China they have a bit more accessible forest acreage than we have in British Columbia but they certainly have far less than Canada has in terms of accessible forest acreage, and their total production is far less also, even if they were fully exploiting their timber resources, which they are not, they would not come anywhere near filling the requirements of that nation.

Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, the minister is still missing the boat in promoting the sale of goods—not only lumber but other goods as well—to China. I merely mention lumber because of its proximity and its value to the province from which I come.

Today a delegation from the united electrical workers met the cabinet and presented a brief suggesting a number of ways to overcome what they can foresee to be a more serious slump than exists now in the electrical goods manufacturing industry. Part of their suggestion related to expanding trade, and China was one of the countries mentioned by the united electrical workers in their brief to the government.

In his comments upon returning from China Mr. Muir mentioned the tremendous hydro electric projects which are taking place in that country in the gradual electrification of that nation. I asked the officials of the united electrical workers whether they had made any surveys or studies from a statistical point of view of the requirements of China in as much as they suggested we should trade with that country. They said yes, they had made such a survey and that there was a tremendous market in China for goods made and produced in Canada by their members; that is, electrical goods in the heavy electrical field and in the smaller electrical field. They pointed out that China had on its own—and this is an anomalous situation—been able to produce some types of electrical equipment required in their electrification program to the point that they were now exporting those things themselves, but there was still a vast amount of electrical commodities that could be sold to China if we would only attempt to do so.

During the throne speech debate reference was made to the necessity of trading with China, not only by myself but by some other hon. members in this house and they all do not sit with the C.C.F. It was pointed out that unless Canada stepped into the field of attempting to trade with China, unless we break our ties in this regard with the United States, unless we follow the lead that was shown a number of years ago by the United Kingdom in extending formal diplomatic recognition to that country's government, unless we embark on an extensive trading relationship program with them, we are going to be left behind the eight ball when the United States government and industry get ready to move on the question of recognition and on the question of trade. Many people may laugh and say that they have laws down there that prevent trading with China; they cannot sell anything over there. In fact those laws are so fierce that they even extend beyond the boundaries of the United States and affect Canadian companies as well so that those Canadian companies cannot trade with or sell goods to China. But a number of very interesting things have happened in recent years. The attitude of the federal government of the United States has begun to soften from its previously unalterable stand of not recognizing China. John Foster Dulles, their secretary of state, has backwatered a little bit.

This would bear some pretty extensive investigation by the Department of Trade and Commerce which I am sure the minister would instigate to see just what steps are being taken in the United States to expand their trade with China. Not too long ago a corporation was established there called The

Two Continents Commodities Corporation of New York. I do not know whether "of New York" merely means where it is located or whether "of New York" is a part of its incorporated name, but this New York firm was formed in the hope of being able eventually to participate in import and export trade with China. It is of the opinion that at present China is very short of lumber. It points out that the United States was formerly China's main source of supply but that no lumber has gone to that country from the job-short west coast ports since the state department imposed its embargo. They are talking about the west coast of the United States and that part of that country produces precisely the same type of lumber that we in Canada produce on our west coast in the douglas fir, hemlock and spruce belt.

There is a move afoot among businessmen and trading people in the United States to expand trade with China. We know that to a great degree the United States is dependent upon its export markets for the stability of its economy. We know that we are also. I say to the minister with all the sincerity I can possibly show that this is not just a question of attempting to blow some ideological horn but simply a straight question of economic facts and in our opinion we have got to extend diplomatic recognition to that country first so that we will be in a position to capitalize on our great need to expand our export trade with that country.

If we do not take these steps the United States will and when they do we will find ourselves in the usual position of then complaining about some action of the United States as we have been complaining about actions of that country in other fields recently only to find that it is too late. I hope that if and when the minister rises to reply to the general remarks that have been made he will undertake particularly to explain the position of the government as it relates to the definite statement by the hon. member for Vancouver South that the government cannot recognize red China. I hope he will explain why it cannot when he rises to reply to these comments.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the other members who have congratulated the Minister of Trade and Commerce on giving us a long awaited statement on the trade policy of the government. I want to go even a little farther and thank him for his assurance that the present policy of the government is to expand trade with all parts of the world in contrast to the diversionist policy about which we heard so much in the past two elections. If there is one tenet of political faith that has distinguished the Liberal party from all other political parties it certainly has been our stand on world trade. The Liberal party has always stood for the expansion of world trade in all directions and to all parts of the world so as to build up as far as possible a great world trading community. The statement of the minister this afternoon in which he gave us the assurance that this was now the policy of the government has gladdened not only the hearts of my colleagues on this side of the house but I am sure of all the people of Canada.

The minister emphasized quite rightly the importance of trade in the economy of our country and its impact on the employment situation. If trade is important to Canada as a whole it is doubly so to the maritime provinces which had to sacrifice their trading position in the markets of the world in order to make Canada a nation. What is true of the maritime provinces is even more true of the province of Newfoundland which since 1949 has become a captive market.

Prior to 1949 we were able to trade in the world markets and take advantage of the best bargains that we could obtain but since 1949 we have been compelled to make the bulk of our purchases from mainland Canada. If the trade of Newfoundland were to be compared with our trade with foreign countries I think it would be shown that Newfoundland would be the equivalent of Canada's second or third best trading customer because the value of our trade as a province with mainland Canada must run somewhere around $200 million or more a year.

In Newfoundland we have some small industries we are trying to develop and which, as in other parts of Canada, we must develop if we are going to provide jobs for the increase in our population. But the development of those industries depends almost entirely upon our ability to sell our products either on the mainland or in world markets. In that respect we are very greatly handicapped because of our geographical position and the terrific transportation costs which are a greater handicap to us than to any other part of Canada. At other times in the house I have stressed the importance of helping these local industries where possible by making defence purchases locally and by granting them defence contracts in products which we are able to supply.

I have pointed out on earlier occasions how we are not able to compete on tenders because our transportation costs more than offset our lower factory prices. I brought up this matter in the defence committee and asked if some special preference could not be given to local industries in the maritimes and Newfoundland. I was told that if this were done it would be as much a handicap as an advantage. I then discussed the problem with Mr. Donald Gordon in the railway committee and he pointed out that his hands were tied by certain laws which prevented him from discriminating between one part of Canada and another. Whatever rate he made for Newfoundland would have to apply to the same commodity everywhere in Canada.

We seem to be getting up a blind alley but nevertheless there is a definite need for some form of preference if our local industries are to thrive and develop. I know that the minister is a very ingenious person. I hope he will bring his ingenuity to bear on the problem and try to find some way of according preferential treatment to our small local industries in the maritime provinces and Newfoundland.

Since nearly all my constituents are fishermen, Mr. Chairman, like my colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I shall confine my remarks mainly to the marketing of fish. Last year Canada produced 1.9 billion pounds of fish. I should like to emphasize that that figure is the landed weight because obviously the processed weight would be very different. That figure was slightly lower than the 2 billion pounds landed weight for the previous year. This volume of fish had a landed value of $93 million. I should like to draw hon. members' attention to the fact that this is the landed value as compared with the $132.5 million which the minister mentioned in his speech this afternoon which, of course, would be the market value of that fish.

Now, of that 1.9 billion pounds of fish landed, 548 million pounds or 28 per cent represented the production of Newfoundland and had a landed value of around $13 million or roughly 14 per cent of the total value. When we compare these figures, even when allowance is made for the different market values of the different species, I think the figures prove that the Newfoundland fisherman is still getting far less than the average landed value of the product he produces.

Of that 548 million pounds, 52.6 million pounds were processed and sold as frozen fillets. This figure represents a decline of 16 per cent from the 62.8 million pounds of frozen fillets which were produced in the previous year. All of these 52.6 million pounds of fish were sold in the United States market. Hon. members will, therefore, appreciate our delight at the minister's statement this afternoon when he stressed that trade relations with the United States were of paramount importance. If they are of paramount importance to the whole of Canada, then that statement is doubly true in so far as Newfoundland is concerned. Any worsening of these trade relations which would motivate reprisals in the United States market, such as the establishment of quotas or setting up tariffs against our fish, would be a tragedy to the fishermen of Newfoundland.

The remainder of that fish was processed with salt and sold in the salt fish markets of the world, either as dried salted fish, wet salted fish or pickled fish. About 100 years ago Newfoundland produced 1.5 million quintals of dried fish. For the benefit of hon. members who might not be familiar with this term, I should explain that a quintal is a hundredweight, 112 pounds of dried fish. From 1930 to 1949 our production of dried salted fish hovered around the one million quintal mark. Some years it went a little above, and some years slightly below. If one averaged it, it would average out at a little more than one million quintals a year.

Since confederation in 1949 that figure has steadily declined until today our production of salt fish is a little over 600,000 quintals, which represents a reduction of about 40 per cent. This reduction has taken place in the face of an increase in world production, and an increase in world consumption of salted fish. The decline has been caused by two factors. One factor was the Marshall plan which came into effect after the war and enabled our customers in the European markets to build modern fishing boats and to produce part of their own consumption. Part of the decline was the result of the impact of confederation on our trading position. Prior to confederation Newfoundland enjoyed the advantage of the best of two possible worlds. We had a dollar currency of our own, we had a surplus of dollars and we had a sterling deficit. Consequently it was possible for us to sell our fish in the sterling markets, use the proceeds to reduce our sterling debt and take the equivalent of that out of our surplus dollars to pay the fishermen.

The marketing machinery which the government had set up made it possible for the fishermen to know exactly how much they were going to get for their catch before they even produced it. After confederation that set of conditions was changed entirely. As a result our salt fish market has steadily worsened, and the position of our fishermen of being able to tell just what the prospects of the fishing industry might be has steadily deteriorated. When we produced a million and a half quintals of dried fish we were able to sell half a million quintals of dried salted fish in the Brazilian market. Last year we sold 27,560 quintals in that market. If we go back to 1953 we see that the market has fluctuated from 17,000 quintals in 1953 to 59,000 in 1954; down to 681 quintals in 1955; down even lower to 446 quintals in 1956 and up to 27,500 quintals last year. That is a long way from the large market that we used to enjoy in Brazil. We know, as the minister pointed out today, that a large part of this decline was caused by the currency problem from which Brazil is suffering now. But surely, it should be possible for us to do something to help Brazil purchase more of this fish because it is an old and established market. I am not satisfied that we are making any special effort to regain this market which could be of tremendous value so far as Newfoundland is concerned.

Our best market last year was the Caribbean. It took about 48 per cent of our production of salted fish, I think it was about 325,000 quintals. However, we have lost, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out today, the valuable market of Jamaica.

Mr. Churchill: Just temporarily.

Mr. Carter: I hope it is temporary, but it will be permanent unless some special measures are taken to safeguard this market and to ensure its recovery. This afternoon, the minister said nothing at all about that.

Mr. Bigg: What are your suggestions?

Mr. McIlraith: Has the government no policy?

Mr. Carter: You make me Minister of Trade and Commerce and I will give you plenty of suggestions.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is doing very well now.

Mr. Carter: The Mediterranean market which used to be one of our greatest markets has now dwindled because of the factors which I mentioned a few minutes ago down to about 15 per cent of our catch. Last year we marketed only 120,000 quintals in the whole Mediterrannean area. Of that amount 7½ per cent or 50,000 quintals went to Italy. That fact points up again the necessity of watching our tariff policy so that we do not do anything by way of tariffs to prevent that market in Italy from expanding. As to Portugal, in 1953 we sold there 34,000 quintals of dried fish. In 1954 the amount was down to 25,000 quintals and in 1955 it was 40,000; but in 1956 and 1957 we sold nothing, not a pound.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is not right.

Mr. Carter: Those are the figures.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Those figures are not right.

Mr. Carter: The minister can give the correct figures. What we sold to the Portuguese in the last two years is negligible and that in spite of the fact that Portugal would not be able to compete with Newfoundland if we did not provide them with harbour facilities, bait facilities and many other advantages which we give to them. I think we have a bargaining point that we could use with Portugal to better advantage than we are doing at the present time. Thirty-three per cent of our fish was sold in North America, and most of that went to mainland buyers who bought the fish wet salted or in salt bulk condition, reprocessed it and resold it again mainly to the Cuban market.

But here in Canada we have another opportunity of expanding our market for fish. I should like to see a great joint advertising program conducted by the government and the fish trades—possibly the provincial government may come in also but certainly the industry and the federal government—directed towards making this product better known across Canada. Salted fish can be a great delicacy if it is properly cooked. However, I will say that very few Canadians know how to cook it. Nevertheless there are people who are specialists. You can find them in Brazil and in Portugal. I think it would be worth while to bring a few of them over here and to have them travel around Canada cooking a bit of salted fish for our Canadian brothers and getting them to develop a taste for this delicacy.

Mr. Baskin: Where is your apron?

Mr. Carter: I am not a cook, I am a connoisseur. I think that winds up what I wanted to say about salted fish, Mr. Chairman, but there is much more that could be said because there are many factors to be taken into consideration when one comes to discuss the trading policy of a country like Canada. I refer to such factors as exchange rates and problems in connection with conversion of currency. I might say that the premium on the Canadian dollar at this present time is an additional hardship for the fresh fish processors who are obliged to sell their fish wholly in the United States market. There is the problem of stability of currency, of transportation costs to which I have referred and subsidies, indirect and direct, which my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate dealt with this afternoon.

Before I sit down I should like to say one word about trade with China. I do not know whether or not we should trade with China and I do not think any one here tonight has enough wisdom to know whether or not we should do so. Certainly if there is one point on which we need divine guidance, this is it. A very good case can be made out for trading with China and a very good case can be made out for not trading with China. As Macaulay once said, I wish I could be as cocksure about one thing as my hon. friends to my right are about everything.

When we come to consider a matter of this kind I think it really boils down to a question of motive: Why do we want to do it? The rightness or the wrongness or the ultimate good cannot be divorced from our motives, no matter what our action is. I know we have a very popular doctrine which is called enlightened self-interest; and self-interest, as it implies, is based on some selfish purpose, some selfish benefit. If it is selfish, if an action is based solely on something that we are going to get out of it for ourselves, then in the long run it is not in our best interests; and if it is not in our best interests, it is not enlightened. Hence enlightened self-interest is, in my opinion, a term that is contradictory. But whether we do so or whether we do not, I should like to point out this fact. Our friends the red Chinese and our friends the Russians do not act on the motive of self-interest. They are not one bit concerned whether it is going to increase the prosperity of their country, increase their volume of trade, reduce a surplus or anything else. That matter does not count at all with them. Only one thing counts and it is this: Will it further their objective of winning the cold war? Will it further their goals of spreading their philosophy all over the world and enslaving the peoples of the world? We should be equally anxious not only to frustrate that objective but to see to it that we on our part are motivated in the direction that is going to support the way of life to which we all subscribe.

Mr. Nasserden: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government generally for their efforts to correct this tendency with regard to trade which has reached such great proportions in recent years as to cause the Canadian people in the space of approximately ten months twice to endorse the policy of this government and to turn a house of about 170 Liberals into a house of approximately 200 Conservative members. This political upheaval in the history of our country is significant, particularly when you consult the record in respect of trade in agricultural products.

Something has been said in this house during this debate about wheat marketings and the wheat marketing policies of this government. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West tried to a certain extent to take some of the credit away from this government for the magnificent job it has done in increasing marketings of grain from this country in world markets. I would like to say a few things in that regard. One thing this government did was to appoint a wheat committee to study this situation and endeavour to take those steps necessary to increase the marketing of grain in the world markets.

During the election campaign I had the pleasure of a visit to my constituency by no less a person than the Leader of the Opposition in this House of Commons. In speaking in one of the towns there he dealt with the problems of trade and agriculture. Among the things he said, as outlined in a press report given wide distribution, was the following:

> I want to mention, finally, one other specific measure that would be of direct and immediate benefit to farmers in western Canada. Liberal governments in the past did their best to ensure the maximum possible sales of Canadian grain, but large surpluses accumulated despite all our efforts —and nobody has been able to show that his efforts would be, or are, any better than ours were,

In this connection I would point out that in 1956-57, 260 million bushels of wheat were marketed and in 1957-58—that is to say, to July 9—296.7 million bushels of wheat were marketed and there still remain 21 days of the marketing season to be taken into account. When he was in my constituency the Leader of the Opposition had other things to say on this subject and I would like to give a further quotation as follows:

> In terms of over-all measures which will aid farmers, next to maintaining a strong domestic economy, is an aggressive sales policy for wheat. While there has been much difficulty in maintaining and increasing farm exports, we assert that Liberal policies of reciprocal removal of trade barriers and of international co-operation hold the greatest promise—and are indispensable in expanding export markets for wheat, other grains, for apples and potatoes, and for livestock products. Because of the present and potential opportunity of our farmers in the great American market, we would propose to encourage and develop that market—and not destroy it by hostility to the United States. Every livestock producer in Canada knows what damage can be done to his sales and prices if he is cut off from the American market and that danger is increased by some of the policies of the present government—

All I can say in that regard is that when this government took office, the sales of livestock to the American market were practically nil. The fact is, if you take a close look at the statistics you cannot help but realize that about the only kind of cattle going into the United States market were purebred cattle at that time, and in regard to his allegation that we were stirring up hostilities I would like to point out that sales to the great United States market have reached proportions unmatched and at prices unmatched in many years.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo also had something to say in regard to trade, particularly with respect to China. He did not know whether we should trade with China or not, but his leader knew what he wanted to do. During the election campaign at Cudworth he had this to say:

> We should also press hard to develop more markets—in Asia for instance—including China.

The interesting thing about that, so far as I am concerned, is that I believe he thought we could not sell wheat to China, but hardly had he left the hall before it was announced that wheat sales were being effected to China.

There are a number of things which could be said in this regard but all I wish to say at this time is that with respect to free trade, and I believe every member in this house believes in free trade although the Liberal party thinks that they are the only ones who do. The Liberal party was in power for 22 years and we must remember that when they left office the Canadian government was receiving more revenue from tariffs through the treasury of this country than at any time in this history.

Mr. Pearson: That is true.

Mr. Pickersgill: Because of the volume of our trade.

Mr. Nasserden: This is something we should consider. If I have a cow for sale and you want to buy that cow, free trade ends right there. This is because I am going to try to get as much for that cow as I can and you are going to try to pay as little for it as you can. All we could ever hope for is the freest possible exchange of goods as between nations willing and able to trade with each other. I believe this government will endeavour to formulate plans and put into practice patterns of trade which will bring about the freest possible exchange of goods with those nations willing and able to trade with us. Proof of this can be found in the fact that we are going to have a commonwealth trade conference in Canada this fall. This is something which is very much overdue and which, not only in the realm of trade but also in the realm of discussion with a view to seeking out peaceful solutions for world problems, will be of the utmost value.

Among the remarks made this afternoon was one to the effect that the Liberal party is a party which will work with all nations in respect of their trade programs. In this connection I would recall to the house the United Kingdom wheat agreement, which seems to me to have been an agreement which excluded some of the other countries in the world and which left Canada in rather a bad position with many of those other countries.

I will conclude my remarks at this time although many other things will come up during the estimates on which I may wish to say a word or two. I just want to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the wheat committee and to assure them that the farmers of western Canada appreciate what they have done and what they are trying to do at the present time.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the hon. member permit a question? Are we to understand the hon. member has just announced that he and his party are in favour of free trade?

Mr. Nasserden: I will be very glad to answer the question, Mr. Chairman, and if the hon. member will look very carefully at what I have said he will see that the words I used were "the freest possible exchange of goods with nations willing and able to trade with us". No party can do better than that.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I readily agreed with the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he said this afternoon that international trade was of vital importance to the Canadian economy and it is because I feel this is so and because I feel that the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are also so important that I believe it is all the more regrettable that the leader of the house and the government did not deem it necessary to give the house adequate advance notice of the fact that these estimates were to be brought forward today. This practice of not giving sufficient notice is becoming more and more frequent and I think it is an unfair practice. As a matter of fact we might consider it as a sneaky form of closure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardin: International trade, of course, has played in the past and is now playing an extremely important part in our economy. And because, of course, Canada will always have a greater capacity for production than for absorption we can expect that exports of Canadian products will continue to play an increasingly important role in our economy in the future. The maintenance and increase of our international trade will not be any easier for this government than it was for the previous government.

The field of international trade is now occupied by all the nations of the world who feel more keenly than at any other time in their history the importance and the necessity of international trade, and because of the differences in the standard of living of the different countries of the world and because of the low costs of production and transportation of, I would say, the majority of our competitors, markets willing to pay Canadian prices for Canadian products will be more and more difficult to find in the future.

There is a factor, of course, that will also make our trade more difficult in the future and that is that in the evolution of trade we have seen the creation of economic blocs such as the European customs union and the proposed European free trade area. I believe we can expect to see more of these economic blocs in the future in different areas of the world and I do not doubt that a day may come when Canada will have to be part of one of these blocs.

The fourth reason why international trade for Canada may be more and more difficult is the fact that the U.S.S.R. and the satellites have now engaged in an economic war against the western world. There is no doubt in my mind that in the military field the western world is really capable of defending itself. There is a question in my mind, though, of the ability of the western world to defend itself in the economic field. I sincerely hope we do have all the requisites to adequately defend ourselves in the economic war that Russia is now waging and as a result of which Canada may find it still more difficult to find an increasingly prosperous share of the international trade field.

There is no question of the importance of international trade for Canada nor is there, I believe, any difference of opinion about the difficulty that exists in our being able to achieve for Canada this increasingly important economic factor. We were all very interested to hear the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon. We all listened very attentively but I am afraid it was impossible to detect in the words the minister spoke any indication of what the government's trade policy might conceivably be. Listening to the minister one gets the impression that the Conservatives still labour under the illusion that they can talk their way into the markets of the commonwealth, of Europe and of the world. The Conservatives have indeed done a lot of talking and have succeeded in confusing every one concerned. They have also contradicted by their actions all the talk in which they had previously engaged.

For example, in the short space of one year we saw the government enter into a 15 per cent diversion policy under which 15 per cent of Canada's trade was going to be diverted from the United States to the United Kingdom and that, of course, certainly did not please the people of the United States. Later during that year the government decided to send a trade mission to Europe and there the government of Canada assured the British traders that it would indeed buy a great deal more from Britain than from the United States. Finally, just a short time ago, the government decided to raise the British preferential tariff on wool and that, of course, did not please the British traders. Indeed, it confused them and caused them a good deal of concern. In the brief period of one year it would appear that the government has succeeded in antagonizing its two very best customers. That, as a policy of international trade, could not possibly be worse.

The Conservatives have frequently accused the Liberals of having lost Canada's markets overseas. Many speeches were made by hon. gentlemen opposite on that subject but not once did any speaker say what markets in Europe were lost, how they were lost or why they were lost. It is only when we read the budget speech that we begin to realize that the Conservatives have begun to appreciate some of the problems affecting our overseas markets. In his budget speech, as recorded at page 1250 of Hansard of June 17, 1958, the Minister of Finance is reported as saying:

> Moreover, I confess my concern over costs of production and prices in Canada. Only by keeping our costs of production in line with those of our competitors can we hope to achieve expanding employment and progressive improvement in our standard of living.
> We are in danger of becoming a high-cost economy. Such a prospect is particularly perilous in the case of a country like Canada which must sell so much of its production in markets abroad. Moreover, Canadian producers are encountering increasing difficulty in retaining their domestic market in the face of keen competition from abroad. Many of them under these circumstances turn to the government for a solution of their cost problem.

One would get the impression that the minister has come to the conclusion that these problems suddenly arose since the time the Conservative government came to power. That is, of course, not true. This high-cost economy has existed in our country since world war II. It is one of the reasons why markets may have been lost in that period just as in this period under the present government they are still continuing to be lost.

However at no time during the Liberal regime did the Liberals either by their policies, their words or their actions ever jeopardize foreign markets let alone the markets of our two very best customers as the Prime Minister did by engaging in the 15 per cent trade diversion in his never-ending quest for sensational legislation.

I think it is ridiculous, if it were not so pathetic, to hear the Prime Minister trying now to deny his trade diversion policy of a year ago. This afternoon in his speech, the Minister of Trade and Commerce also appeared to be seeking to deny it when he stated that trade with the United States was of paramount importance. That is a very strange statement coming from one who not so long ago was so very sold on the 15 per cent diversion concept. This international trade policy based on sensationalism or on half-thought-out ideas can be extremely dangerous. In his budget speech, as recorded at page 1237 of Hansard of June 17, the Minister of Finance said:

> Perhaps most troublesome of all are the uncertainties arising from the many escape clauses in United States legislation and administrative practices. Hon. members do not need to be reminded of the recent restrictions imposed against Canadian oil and the continuing threat to our exports of lead, zinc and copper—notwithstanding firm trade agreement obligations.

A little farther on he said:

> We find it difficult to understand why the United States should treat its best customer and friendly neighbour in this way.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I got the impression on reading those words that the minister was engaging in his own brand of arrogant whining after he himself had thrown the first stone.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is not referring to me?

Mr. Cardin: No, to the Minister of Finance who had spoken so highly of the 15 per cent diversion. Of course, the government has tried to justify this 15 per cent diversion policy because of the very unfortunate and formidable trade deficit between Canada and the United States. Neither the previous government nor any Canadian was indifferent to the Canadian trade deficit with the United States. It was certainly not considered by anyone on this side of the house to be an ideal situation at any time, but it seems to me that the whole foreign trade problem was at that time and still is so vital to our Canadian economy that it would have been foolish indeed, as it has been proven to be, to try to change a natural trade pattern which the prevailing world trends, competition, prices and standards of living have now forced on our economy.

I respectfully submit that this increased competition in world markets today is a sufficient challenge to our economy without having the government embark on a half-baked, half-thought-out policy of repudiating existing markets no matter where those markets may be.

Mr. Bigg: There is nothing more half-baked than that.

Mr. Cardin: Perhaps not. It is very difficult indeed to understand the logic or the lack of logic behind the government's action on the question of trade, but it is absolutely impossible to find any definite government trade policy. It is also difficult, Mr. Chairman, to understand the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I really do not know of anyone whose personality has changed so rapidly in the short space of one year. From a very genial, very loquacious, very affable member, he has indeed, I am afraid, turned into a more or less taciturn and even at times a cynical member of this house. One has only to read or, better still, to listen to the Minister of Trade and Commerce answering questions on trade to get the impression that the minister greatly resents being queried as to what is actually going on in his own particular ivory tower.

I had the temerity to ask the minister a question on trade and I as the rest of my colleagues, also received the minister's usual supercilious and evasively empty answers. On June 11, as reported at page 1033 of Hansard, I reworded a question that I had asked the minister previously. The question read:

> 1. What was the total amount of Canadian dollars paid to the United States in 1956 for imports of farm tractors manufactured in the United Kingdom and assembled in the United States?
> 2. Was this amount taken into consideration by the dominion bureau of statistics when compiling its figures regarding the Canadian trade deficit with the United States?
> 3. Are other products manufactured in the United Kingdom and imported into Canada from the United States? If so, what items?
> 4. Has the government taken any steps to encourage British companies to assemble farm tractors and other British products in Canada rather than in the United States? If so, with what results?

I received the following answer, as recorded at page 1034 of Hansard:

> Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This question, Mr. Speaker, is a refurbished edition of the one asked by the hon. gentleman last session on January 29, 1958. My answer on that occasion will be the one I give now. It is as follows:
> "Mr. Speaker, no records such as are asked for by the hon. member are kept, and the information is not easily obtainable as it involves tracing the country of origin of components in manufactured articles coming from the United States."

I can hardly conceive the very brilliant, very efficient and alert Minister of Trade and Commerce not being aware of an article that appeared in the Gazette concerning the trade mission in Britain about which we have heard unfortunately far too little since its return to this country. I am quite sure this article had been given to the minister by the very efficient officers of his department and I cannot understand why the minister was so evasive. I should like to quote the article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of November 29, 1957:

> Coventry, England, November 28—(CP)—Members of Canada's trade mission learned with surprise today that Britain's trade deficit with Canada is not as large as officially reported.

Officials of the Massey-Harris-Ferguson tractor firm said that a large portion of the $150 million Canadians spent last year for so-called United States tractors and parts actually flowed back to Britain.

Many of the component parts of the Massey-Harris tractors sold in Canada were assembled at Detroit but produced in the big Standard Motor Car Company in Coventry.

William Perlin of St. John's, Newfoundland, a mission member, observed that if this is the case the mission has been labouring under a misconception. The Canadian bureau of statistics had reported that last year, for example Britain had a deficit of some $330 million in Canadian trade. Canada was reported to have a deficit in United States trade of some $1,300 million.

If a proportion of the money Canadians have spent on Massey-Harris tractors imported from the United States actually came back to Britain, then it apeared that Britain's deficit with Canada and Canada's deficit with the United States were not as large as were reported.

James Patterson of Winnipeg, president of the interprovincial farm union council, said he would like to see steps taken to have the Canadian statistics corrected.

The 50-man mission was split up to visit the various motor car companies in this area. Some went to Standard, others to the Rolls-Royce, Jaguar, Rootes and Rover plants.

Ian Wallace, a director of Massey-Harris-Ferguson, joined Alick S. Dick, managing director of Standard, to show some of the members the motor car and tractor production there. Standard produces the Massey-Harris tractor under contract in what was described as the biggest tractor plant in the world.

Wallace explained that the reason why Britain ships tractors to Canada by way of the United States is because Americans are not fond of buying foreign-made goods. If the tractors, for example, were assembled in Canada and sold in the United States, there might be some American sales resistance.

On the other hand, Canada allows tractors in duty free. Tractors could be assembled conveniently in the United States to supply both the Canadian and American market. The parent company of Massey-Harris-Ferguson is in Canada. Subsidiaries are located in the United States, Britain and other countries.

Dick, whose company produces the Vanguard and Triumph motor vehicles, said vehicle production runs about 350 units a day. Tractor production, running at 380 units daily, now is being boosted to 415 with expansion concentrated on a new model of some 50 horsepower. The well-laid-out $50 million plant employs 10,500 workers.

At a luncheon of lobster, steak and wine, Dick urged Canadians to buy more Massey-Harris tractors "for the good of British trade".

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is one for the book. British industrialists are encouraging members of the Canadian trade commission in Britain to buy more tractors from the United States for the good of British trade. I am beginning to see why the Prime Minister is backing away from his 15 per cent trade diversion and why his Minister of Trade and Commerce is now feeling that trade with the United States is of paramount importance. I must say that we on this side of the house have certainly no objection in helping British trade and in trying to promote more British trade. But I also feel that if we are going to do that the British would also be willing to help us when we are in a very difficult economic situation.

There are two items at least in this article which I think should be noted. First of all, the trade deficit between the United Kingdom and Canada and between Canada and the United States was less by at least $150 million for 1956 and, of course, there may be other items imported from the United States which are manufactured in Great Britain. I understand the minister's point of view when he says it is difficult to obtain information as to the origin of some of the machinery or parts of machinery that are brought in from the United States but surely it would be in keeping with the tradition of the dominion bureau of statistics not to allow a $150 million error to slip into its figures as to the real trade deficit.

Like Mr. James Patterson of Winnipeg, the president of the interprovincial farm union council, I too should like to see steps taken in order that the dominion bureau of statistics figures may be changed with respect to this matter. I also think it might be well worth while, if at all possible, to check to see just how much material coming into Canada from the United States is being manufactured in Great Britain.

There is another point I should like to make. A while ago I said I felt sure that Great Britain would be willing to help us while we were in a difficult economic situation because of the good will we show Great Britain and, of course, to me, aid is always a two-way affair. It is mutual. I see no reason why the $150 million worth of tractors bought for Canadian consumption in 1956 from the United States could not have been assembled in Canadian plants where there is far more unemployment at the present time than is usual at this time of year. I do not see why this could not be done now. I feel that by doing so we would still be helping Great Britain. The money would go directly to Great Britain but we would be employing our own people. If the minister is embarrassed about trying to find a suitable plant for the assembling of such tractors, may I remind him that in my own town we have Sorel Industries where if no work is given to the company within a relatively short time it will have to close its doors and let out a substantial number of employees.

Before taking my seat may I say that I should very much like the minister to give the house a clear briefing on the results achieved by the trade mission to England. I agree with the minister that international trade is of the utmost importance to Canada, and if we are to take our part in the very difficult international picture it is equally important that the government should have a very definite trade policy, particularly if the government does not want to repeat at the trade conference to be held in September the fiasco of the last trade conference.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I have a number of questions I want to put to the minister that could be answered later when we get into the details of the estimates but because of their general nature I think it might be fairer to ask them now. The first one could be answered tonight. A few weeks ago a magnificent criticism was presented in the house of the fair at Brussels and the Canadian exhibit and I wondered whether the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska had been dispatched to Brussels again to improve the whole tone of the Canadian part in the exhibition.

One of the questions I want to ask reaches ahead to 1961 and the next census. As the minister is aware, I am interested in the problem of redistribution. The census will be taken in 1961 and I understand that normally the results as to population for use in redistribution are available in March of the following year. With its experience in the census of 1956 I should like to know whether the bureau of statistics will be in a position to give us an answer more quickly this time so far as these figures are concerned because I think it might be quite important if the political situation is projected four years ahead. If we do not get these results in March and if redistribution is to be carried out by parliament it could be very rushed should the Prime Minister in his wisdom decide to have a summer election. By pushing the thing ahead six weeks or two months we could conceivably save ourselves from fighting the 1962 or 1963 election on the basis of the 1951 census. I suggest to the minister and to other members of the house that that would be very unfair to a great many voters of the country although it might also, if there are changes, be a little unfair to some of the present members.

Mr. Churchill: Would you like another March election?

Mr. Fisher: I think March is a splendid time to have an election—the ides of March. I also wanted to ask the minister for a bit more detail on the small business set-up foreshadowed supposedly by the appointment of the new associate deputy minister of trade. Perhaps at some point later in the discussion of the estimates the minister might be able to spell out for us a bit more of the framework of that organization and what its scope is going to be.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether I might reply to that immediately. No decision has been reached yet as to which department will have the responsibility for the proposed small business section. It may be the Department of Trade and Commerce but it is a bit premature to discuss the matter at the moment because a decision has not yet been reached.

Mr. Fisher: It would seem to appear then that my question was very hypothetical, as must have been much of the press speculation on this matter. Another question which I think the minister could deal with more fully before we leave this part of his estimates is the campaign that such distinguished gentlemen as Stuart Armour are trying to get under way to buy Canadian. I think we should have a fuller explanation of the part the minister's department might play in that regard and, if we are going to go out to persuade people to buy Canadian, especially what ramifications that may have upon our external trade policies. I think the "buy Canadian" theme is something that our people should literally buy at the present time.

In the remarks of opposition members so far in the debate today it has been noticeable that there has been quite a bit of jollying the government with respect to its reaction to the Thorneycroft proposals and even more jollying on its reneging as to the absolute clearness of the 15 per cent trade diversion suggestion. From what I have read and have been able to learn about the matter I actually think the government was quite smart to give the Thorneycroft proposals the brush-off and I also think they were very clever in going slow on the 15 per cent diversion plan.

I wonder whether or not the minister is conversant at all with a report that has been put out in the United States by the Rockefeller Brothers fund, entitled "Economic Policy for the Twentieth Century". This particular report has received a great deal of analysis in the United States periodical press, much of it favourable. The report, of course, concentrates upon the communist threat to free world trade.

One of the suggestions made in the report is that we build up regional groups of trading nations. One gathers from the reactions to the report one finds in the Congressional Record that it has been favourably received. Another suggestion is to establish an inter-American trade authority. The report contains some reference to Canada, and says:

> The United States should participate in calling as soon as possible an inter-American economic conference in which Canada would be invited.

The conference should be called for the joint consideration of an action to—

Find workable procedures for moderating extreme price fluctuations in commodity trades.

Devise ways for the co-operative promotion of general economic growth and development, including consideration of an inter-American development authority.

Work toward international agreement to set up a common market of hemisphere wide scope or of regional common markets with merger as an eventual goal.

Of course, we would have to understand that any idea of merger would be a long-range development.

Establish an inter-American payments union to provide for the full convertibility of currencies among all nations subscribing to a common market arrangement.

Facilitate other inter-American arrangements for co-operation upon common purposes and social objectives in such fields as education, low-cost housing, health and technical assistance.

Assure that such arrangements shall be so conceived and executed as to promote high levels of multilateral world trade and the general economic growth of the entire free world.

The idea of a number of regional trading groups in the free world it seems to me, so far as Canada is concerned, is quite as sensible as Canada trying to place itself within a commonwealth trade group. It almost seems to me that we are allowing sentiment and patriotism, of the kind that I am sure most of us feel, to confuse what are our real interests so far as trade is concerned. While the government and all the rest of us are associated with, and stuck with the problems of United States investment in our economy, I do not think we can shy away from the fact that it is the United States economy, the inter-American economy, within which our destiny largely lies. This suggestion put forward in the Rockefeller Brothers fund report seems to me to be a good one. I should like to see the minister take some action to follow it up after what I am sure will be a dearth of results from the commonwealth conference that we are having later this year. I would suggest to him that, now that the election is out of the way and we do not have to worry about it for three or four years, we get away from these favourite slogans that pop up in elections and become much more realistic in our attitude towards United States trade.

There is one thing in the Rockefeller report that may give the minister a bit of a lever. It relates to the amount of United States foreign trade and its effect upon the United States economy. I quote:

Within the free-world trading system, United States exports account for 20 per cent of all exports, and its imports for 14 per cent of total imports. But in terms of our domestic economy, combined imports and exports represent only about eight per cent of annual output. This relatively small proportion often leads us to underestimate the importance of that trade to other nations. What is a small item on our import list may be a major source of revenue for an exporting nation, for example our imports of Swiss watches, Scotch whiskey, or Latin American coffee and copper.

The report goes on to say that between nine and ten per cent of all the durable goods produced in the United States is sold abroad. Significantly enough, these sales provide the margin between profit and loss for a large segment of American industries. About 4,500,000 workers, or seven per cent of the entire United States labour force, are directly dependent upon foreign trade for their livelihoods. Foreign trade provides more direct employment in the United States than the automobile, steel, chemical and textile industries combined.

This picture of the powerful role that that portion of foreign trade plays within the United States economy should give the minister, with his idea of the Canadian nation's trade with the United States, a powerful lever to use in future meetings he might have with United States authorities.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a word or two to what has already been said, and deal specifically with the dollar balance of payments between countries in relation to our international trade. If we are to analyse the position of Canada in world markets, and also tackle the job of analysing Canada's foreign trade, we must know something about the dollar exchange balances as they exist between Canada and the countries to whom we wish to sell our products. If we do this, then we have within reach a very good measure of the effective demand of that particular country in relation to the products which we have in Canada and wish to sell.

I say, Mr. Chairman, it is only to the effective demand that we can look at this time in our analysis. In other words, if a country to which we wish to sell products has not the dollar exchange with which to buy our goods, you may have all the demand that you wish in that country but it still will not be effective demand. A proper analysis of foreign trade connotes a study of the dollar exchange balances of the various countries around the world in relation to that of Canada. This enables the demand of a country to be effective. Anything else is non-effective demand. In other words non-effective demand means that the country has not got the dollars with which to buy our products. This further means we either have to lend that country money, give them the goods or take their currency and write off whatever loss that may entail. It is by means of their dollar exchange balances that they are able to buy, and we must look to their exchange balances to understand if they are in position to buy the goods and services which they desire from us and other countries.

This desire to purchase may cover wheat or other products. Our position, of course, would be to try to sell as much wheat and other Canadian products as possible. But I submit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce no doubt has at his elbow an analysis of the dollar exchange balances between this and other countries. With this information he is in a position to arrive at a close approximation of the trade possibilities of any foreign country.

I do not wish to extend my discussion in this debate except to point out that if we were to come directly to the point and to a discussion of those factors which will add to the exchange balances of those countries and to the expanding of those balances, we would have the most rational approach to an understanding of the present trade position of Canada.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering why the earlier portion of this debate centred so much around fish or the export of fish. I was wondering whether it was not because the government's trade policy or the minister is all at sea fishing for a firm trade policy for Canada. Like all other members of the house, I was most interested in the fine dissertation or thesis presented to the house by the minister which consisted of wishful thinking as to what a trade policy for Canada might be. But for all that wishful thinking in that splendid thesis that he laid down, we did not learn from him precisely what the Canadian trade policy is.

After he had spoken for 30 minutes, and we were certainly expecting some firm statement, we heard nothing from the minister and we allowed him almost 30 minutes additional beyond his regular time hoping and waiting for an announcement from him as to what that trade policy is. As far as we are concerned I have found nothing that could tell me with any degree of precision that: this is our trade policy on this subject or on that subject. We heard a great deal of what we should like to see or what we are hoping it might be but we heard from the minister not a word as to what the policy actually is. I interpret his efforts as that of one genuinely and honestly searching, groping and even stumbling along from one inconsistency in our trade policy to another.

[Mr. Kindt.]

Let us take, for example, the reference that has so frequently been made to the trade mission to the United Kingdom. The minister speaks so ardently, so seriously and so hopefully about our export trade and of the urgency and the importance of increasing it. Yet with great pride he comes into the chamber and presents the story of the United Kingdom trade mission not to increase our export trade but, peculiarly enough, to increase our import trade from Great Britain. We are in favour of it. We support it. But I should have liked to see the reverse also take place, namely a reciprocal arrangement with the United Kingdom that there should be on their part an obligation to take 15 per cent more or at least to increase by 15 per cent their imports into the United Kingdom from Canada.

Then you have the minister's very sanguine hopes and his expression of his dreams about our export trade to Europe. The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres has already quoted the Minister of Finance. The house knows how increasingly difficult our export to Europe is becoming. We certainly cannot burn the candle at both ends.

The Minister of Finance has told us that we are pricing ourselves practically out of the European market. Our cost of production is high. We know that the European cost of production is low. Russian slave labour production, Japanese low-cost labour and other forms of production are now flooding all the markets to which we made appeals during the past number of years. Therefore how can we on the one hand maintain a high-price policy for production in Canada and with that high cost of production expect to get into the markets of Europe where the cost of production is so low? We find there a definite inconsistency.

Then also the Minister of Finance makes an extremely important statement to which I should now like to refer. It is to be found at page 1231 of Hansard of June 17 and is as follows:

> Population growth of itself does not ensure progress, but in a country such as ours it has a special significance. It provides a greater market for our agricultural produce and for the products of our factories—

Here we have a situation where the government accepts the fact that if our export markets are dwindling and possibly largely disappearing, the only remedy for our production in Canada is to increase at least our home consumers' market; and with the increase of the home consumers' market certainly we might be able to keep our people more employed. Instead, what do we find?

We find that factories are closing and people are being thrown out of jobs only because of the fact that we have no market for the products we make in Canada. We do not have them abroad and along comes the government with an immigration policy that certainly does not encourage immigration into this country in order to help us to grow and to develop a home consumers' market.

I therefore suggest, Mr. Chairman, that all this groping and uncertainty with regard to a trade policy for Canada is perhaps something that should be expected. The government, perhaps somewhat new in this business, is searching as far as it can but it is focusing most of its attention on its desire to do those things which will enable it to keep election promises. I should like to see the government more courageously take the position of fixing a trade policy irrespective of whether it meets election promises or whether it does not do so. I think the government should take its eye off keeping election promises made last year and this year. I think the government should place the interests of the country far ahead of its interests in hoping to keep election promises which might support its own political party.

I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to quote to the house what new industries have been brought to Canada in the last year or two or what new factories have opened up? I think the minister should concentrate all his attention on the expansion of industry. We have heard, for example, in previous years of new industries. With great pride the minister would report to the house from time to time that a new industry had opened up giving employment to so many people. I have not heard—certainly during the past year—of a single new substantial industry that has opened up in order to expand our production and our work in Canada.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the needle trades industry. This industry, which employs perhaps close to 200,000 people across the country, is steadily on the decline. I do not know whether it is the result of tariffs or whether it is the result of other difficulties which exist in the industry. However, one thing is certain. The complaint we hear is that they are having difficulty. There are no new markets.

At one time our country enjoyed a fine export market for clothing, including sports and ladies' clothing, in the British West Indies, but today we do not hear of a dollar's worth of the products of the needle trades being exported to that area. Markets are declining and, what is more, the speed of production is being accelerated so that the same volume of work is now being produced in half the time. We must build up markets to keep our people at work, but we can readily see that only 50 per cent of the needle trades are required to produce what it took 100 per cent to produce in prior years.

I therefore want to impress upon the minister the fact that the government should present to the house at the first opportunity a courageous trade policy; one that will be consistent and one with which the country can wrestle; something that will enable Canada to go forward, extend its trade and provide employment for our people.

I appeal to the minister especially, following the question raised earlier by the hon. gentlemen who spoke before me, to enlighten this house either during the course of this debate or at a later time with respect to the position of the small businessman. We were hopeful that some relief would be given to small business, but I think we have had a setback in the minister's answer —at least it gave me that impression—when he said that while there may have been some talk about it and while an assistant deputy minister may have been appointed, the government does not yet have a plan ready to be announced. I think the government should at least confirm that the plan previously announced to this house with respect to relief for small tradesmen will be a firm policy and not a wavering policy which fluctuates with the times or swings with the wind, as necessary. I think the country is completely at a loss and will remain at a loss until such time as the minister will make a firm announcement on the trade policy of this government.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this opportunity pass without correcting my hon. friend with respect to the statement I made on the setting up of the small business section. There has been no withdrawal from the plan to give such assistance as may be possible to small business in Canada. All I said was that a final decision had not been reached as to whether or not the Department of Trade and Commerce would have that responsibility and I hope within a very short time an announcement will be made to this house as to the setting up of a small business section.

Mr. McIlraith: Just on that point, could the minister indicate on what departmental estimates we might ask about this question of small business, if not on the estimates of his department? What I am getting at is with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Cartier about the needle trades and about small business, or many small businesses in that industry. Most of such small businesses would be directly related to the foreign trade of Canada. I do not see, therefore, how we could rule out small business from the trade and commerce estimates if they are related to the foreign trade of the country.

Mr. Churchill: That is all right, but what I was objecting to was dealing with something in anticipation of the supplementary estimates and with items which would concern the setting up of a small business section.

Mr. McIlraith: But there is more to it than that, Mr. Chairman. The small businesses being talked about are directly related to the external trade of the country. Surely from that aspect at least they are properly before the committee on this item.

Mr. Churchill: I have sat long enough on the opposition side to know the value of debate and I am not suggesting any restriction of debate whatsoever.

The Chairman: Shall item 391 carry?

Mr. McIlraith: There are many many questions to be answered and I presume the minister intends to answer them on this item. With only a minute or two to go I assume he does not want to open up his answering speech at this time. I do not think therefore that the item can carry.

Mr. Churchill: I have no objection at all to answering questions discussed this afternoon but obviously time does not permit of that tonight. I might, however, take 30 seconds to thank the hon. members who have participated in the debate on the first item. They have shown their interest in the activities of the department and in the expansion of Canada's trade and their comments generally have been very worth-while. I am even grateful to the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres for depicting me in the light in which I now appear in this House of Commons. It reminds me of the Burns' line, "Oh wad some power the giftie gie us to see oursels as others see us!" I take full note of the alteration that has taken place with my passage from the opposition benches to the government side and I wish the other type of alteration had transpired with my hon. friends who passed from the government benches to the opposition ranks. I wish I could say of them as my hon. friend said of me that when I was sitting there I was congenial, easy to get along with and very good natured.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow and Saturday?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, then we will take those of the Department of Agriculture, followed by the estimates of the Post Office Department and the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Monday will be private members' day and on Tuesday we plan to commence with item No. 3 on today's order paper, which is the second reading of an act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and then item No. 9, which is a resolution concerning the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and then take the budget resolutions.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDRESS TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF GHANA

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that Hon. Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, Prime Minister of Ghana, will address both houses of parliament in this chamber on Monday morning next at eleven a.m., and immediately following the addresses there will be a reception in the railway committee room at approximately 11.45 to give hon. senators, members of the House of Commons and the parliamentary press gallery an opportunity to meet our distinguished visitor.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Third report of standing committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Dinsdale.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STRIKE ON BLACK BALL LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the strike of the employees of Black Ball Ferries Limited, which now leaves Vancouver island completely isolated from the mainland except for air transport, does the government intend to take any prompt action to ease the hardship and inconvenience being caused by this strike and that on the Canadian Pacific ships?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we heard of this strike approximately half an hour ago. The deck officers and engineers of Black Ball Ferries have gone on strike, tying up this essential service. We are making an on the spot investigation today, and on the basis of the report an announcement will be made in the house tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the government give consideration to organizing an airlift of R.C.A.F. and commercial aircraft to assure that vital supplies reach the island?

Mr. Starr: No discussion on this question has yet been held by the government.

FINANCE

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE VALUE FOR DUTY ON IMPORTED GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of his recent statement in the house to the effect that any recommendations of the tariff board in regard to cotton textiles would not be considered this session, would the minister confirm his intention, as indicated in his budget speech, that section 35 of the Customs Act will be amended this session to provide that the value for duty on imported goods shall not be less than the cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the statement I made in the house on Tuesday in tabling the report of the tariff board on woollen yarns has no bearing whatever on the announcement I made in the budget speech on June 17 as to the intention of the government to introduce at this session an amendment to section 35 of the Customs Act for the purpose of introducing as a basis for value, as the hon. gentleman said in his question, cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit.

The announcement I made on Tuesday was by way of indicating the position of the tariff board with respect to the progress it has made with the very large reference to it of all the items in the textile tariff. The board has now made two reports, one on woollen fabrics and the one which was tabled on Tuesday on woollen yarns.

With regard to its inquiry into the tariff items in respect of cottons, the board has completed its hearings but I think it will be some time yet before the report is received and I was indicating in my statement that under these circumstances nothing by way of legislative action could possibly be expected at this session of parliament in relation to cottons, let alone other textiles, synthetics in particular, to which the board will be addressing itself in the remaining studies.

The amendment to section 35 of the Customs Act, as I indicated in the budget speech, will be introduced at the present session by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONVERSION LOAN—EFFECT ON INTEREST RATE ON OTHER BORROWINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I do so in the light of several newspaper reports yesterday concerning the effect of his bond conversion plan. Is the minister able and willing to inform the house as to the additional amount of interest the Canadian people will have to pay on private, corporate, municipal and provincial borrowings as a result of the increases announced for the federal conversion bonds?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I was asked a question yesterday, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. member for Nipissing about what might be expected to be the increase in interest charges on the outstanding debt that is now represented by the five outstanding victory loan bonds and will after the conversion loans we hope be largely, if not almost entirely, represented by the Canadian conversion bond issue of 1958. It is not now possible to indicate what that might be.

I do wish to take advantage of the question of my hon. friend to point out what I think is a fallacy. My hon. friend suggests that this conversion loan is raising interest rates. I do want to make it quite clear that this is not the fact at all. The conversion loan takes account of the existing situation in the bond market and of the desire of the government, in the interests of all borrowers in Canada and not simply the federal government—all borrowers, provincial governments, municipal governments and others—to grasp the advantage that will accrue to them from the extension into the future of the present debt represented by the outstanding five victory loans. The rate that has been set in each case, whether 3, 3¾, 4¼ or 4½ per cent, represents a realistic assessment of the cost of money in the market today in relation to borrowings with such maturities as have been set in the new conversion loan.

I point out to my hon. friend that in the bond markets of this continent, starting in the United States, there has been a weakness evident, a weakness that preceded the budget and had nothing to do with the budget.

The terms of the new conversion loan have been recognized right across this country as realistic and fair under all the conditions. I am happy to be able to report to the house that the response to the loan already has been not simply encouraging but has indeed been almost overwhelming. We have had a response from provincial governments indicating that they are converting their holdings of victory loan bonds into the conversion loan bonds, and a statement was issued yesterday by the Bank of Canada indicating that already we have commitments of over a billion dollars from the holders of these outstanding victory loan bonds.

There is every indication, Mr. Speaker, that with the kind of widespread support we are receiving on every hand this major undertaking is going to be a great success, and that the benefits that will flow therefrom will accrue not simply to the federal government in its future borrowing operations, but will accrue as well to provincial governments, municipal governments and other borrowers in this country in the days to come.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Is it not true that the interest rate on this 25-year loan is higher than anything ever authorized by the previous administration, at which time the minister himself was complaining about high interest rates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought my hon. friend was aware that there is no precedent for an undertaking of this size in Canada. There have been previous conversion loans, but there were—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I directed a question to the Minister of Finance, and he is not answering the question but is making a speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question itself was probably not in order, because it was asking for information that is readily available to all hon. members of the house.

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT ON FLUORSPAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he can give us any further information as to when the report of the tariff board investigation on fluorspar is expected or may be tabled?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in the information I gave to the house in the budget speech on June 17 on that subject.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED READINESS OF CANADIAN TROOPS FOR UN SECURITY FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the Minister of National Defence would care to comment on a statement made on the front page of this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the Canadian government has a brigade of troops in readiness as a contribution to any security force which might be established by the United Nations in the Middle East. If so, has any such offer been made to the Secretary General of the United Nations?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No offer has been made, nor has any request been received so far as I know from the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister say whether the government has done anything to warrant the statement that Canada has in a state of readiness a brigade of troops that might be used in this quarter?

Mr. Pearkes: I have announced in this house on several occasions that Canada keeps one battalion in a more advanced state of readiness than the rest of the troops of the regular army of Canada. There has been no change in that situation.

NOVA SCOTIA—INVESTIGATION INTO ADMINISTRATION OF BEDFORD NAVAL MAGAZINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence if his department has recently made an investigation into the administration of the Bedford naval magazine in Nova Scotia?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, I do not think there is any such investigation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister inquire?

REQUEST FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the leader of the house last evening in indicating the business of the house for the first two days of next week made no provision for a debate on foreign affairs, would the Prime Minister inform the house whether it will not be possible to have such a debate in the early part of next week?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that by Thursday next the situation would be such that a debate could be held. I do not want to see it postponed unnecessarily, not only because I know the government wants the benefit of the views of members in all parts of the house but also because it is not possible to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs considered until such time as we have this debate, at which time the estimates will be referred to the committee.

Mr. Pearson: I have a supplementary question. If developments made necessary a debate earlier than next Thursday, would the Prime Minister keep that matter in mind?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If events do make necessary or desirable an earlier debate, then I hope consent can be secured from all parts of the house to have such a debate take place.

FISHERIES

LOBSTERS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF CANADIAN MARKET IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is any action being taken to protect the market in the United States for Canadian lobsters as a result of the bill now before the United States Senate to restrict lobster imports to the United States?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I just received notice of this question a few moments ago. I should like to point out that it is one that more properly should be directed to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Perhaps he would take it as notice.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I accept it with thanks, and I will take it as notice.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks the government would be in a position on Monday to table the report of the royal commission on the revision of the terms of union with Newfoundland. The 10 days he anticipated will have elapsed by then. If the printed report in French is not available will the government consider doing what has been done in many other cases, namely tabling a manuscript copy of the report in French in order to facilitate the work of the government of Newfoundland?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as the first part of the question is concerned may I say that I have had no report in the last day or two from the printing bureau as to the progress being made in the printing of the French copy of the report. As to the second portion of the question may I say this. While consideration will be given to the suggestion made, I think in general the usual course should be followed in the tabling of this report and that it should be tabled in both languages. However, I will have the question looked into.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question. Perhaps I could ask the Minister of Defence Production how soon he expects to be able to table the French copy of the report of his department?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I will get the information and report as soon as possible.

POTATOES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—APPLICATION OF PRICE STABILIZATION LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. My question is based on a press report in the Charlottetown Guardian of July 12 concerning price supports for potatoes, to the effect that all hope of receiving aid had vanished in so far as island growers were concerned. What factors have prevented the application of the provisions of the agricultural prices stabilization legislation to this important class of agricultural producer?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Nothing has prevented it. As a matter of fact an offer was made by the stabilization board, which was approved by the cabinet, to the Prince Edward Island potato producers to give them support on the same basis as it has been given in New Brunswick as far as potatoes which are diverted to starch in that province are concerned. The potato association there accepted the offer but subsequently discovered that the potatoes had sprouted to some extent and therefore there was difficulty in so far as determining the grade was concerned. We are carrying on further discussions at the present time to try to overcome this difficulty.

Mr. Robichaud: May I ask as a supplementary question whether the delay of the government in applying this measure is not an example of the weakness of the agricultural stabilization program?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows he is really advancing an argument in putting forward that question.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, since this statement has been made I think I should have the opportunity of answering it. Any delays which have taken place in regard to the potato situation in Prince Edward Island have been due to the provincial government and/or the potato association in that province not being able to make up their minds, not accepting the offer when it was made to them, and not putting the plan which was offered to them into operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION BY NATO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister—and perhaps he may wish to take this question as notice—whether the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, through its permanent council, has been considering developments in the Middle East and, if so, will he be in a position to make a statement on the results of such consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that the council has been giving this matter consideration and, in putting it that way, I think my hon. friend will understand exactly what is the position.

As to making a report with respect to the consideration being given by the North Atlantic council, that of course is a question which will have to be taken under advisement. My experience has been that when the hon. gentleman who has asked the question occupied the position of secretary of state for external affairs his general reaction to similar questions was that there were obvious limitations on the information to be given respecting the actions of the council.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the Prime Minister that the only reason I asked the question was because of newspaper reports from Paris on these discussions, quoting members of the council, including a Canadian member.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SOREL, QUE.—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour based on a telegram I received this morning to the effect that 20 per cent of the labour force in Sorel is still unemployed. In view of the Prime Minister's promise that this government would not rest while one Canadian remained out of work and that no one would be allowed to suffer, would the Minister of Labour reconsider extending unemployment benefits in Sorel, if the government is incapable of providing work in that area?

Mr. Pallett: What is the source of the information? Who sent the telegram?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. gentleman will recognize that that question has been asked and answered on at least one occasion recently.

Mr. Cardin: But the problem still remains, sir.

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter for argument in debate.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH EDITION OF PAMPHLET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Recently a very good pamphlet was issued by his department and I wrote for a French copy of it. My answer was as follows, and this is my translation:

I will exercise the greatest care in the choice of the person to whom the redaction would be given, in case there would be a sufficient demand for a French pamphlet.

Does the minister not believe that it would be hard to ask for something which is non-existent?

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I will have to take that question as notice.

(Translation):

TRADE

WAR SURPLUS EQUIPMENT—INQUIRY AS TO IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Defence Production.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister read the telegram sent to me by the Maase Equipment Company, which I forwarded to him yesterday?

If so, and since the government has allowed the sale of American war surplus goods in Canada, what action is the government considering to protect the distributors of construction machinery against the competition of United States surplus war assets in Canadian territory?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): In answer to the question just put by the member for Dollard, I may say that the government has received representations from manufacturers and dealers in heavy equipment, but I must inform the hon. member that, on the other hand, we have also received requests from contractors who wish to purchase this heavy equipment.

I must, moreover, make it clear that we received a number of telegrams from individuals who protest against the importation of heavy materials and equipment from the Pacific islands or Japan. I must say that these importations were not made through a crown corporation coming under my department.

I might add that this matter is still under consideration. The ministers have taken notice of requests made by parties on both sides, but so far no decision has been taken which would be contrary to the policy followed in the past.

HIGHWAYS

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATEMENT ON INCLUSION OF CERTAIN ROADS IN ACCESS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester asked whether the construction of a highway to provide a direct road link between Saint John and Fundy national park and the Plaster Rock link-up across the central stretch of New Brunswick were included in the proposed roads to resources program for New Brunswick.

As I have already indicated, I have given approval in principle to certain projects in New Brunswick on which construction is already under way and which will be eligible for federal assistance, subject to the execution of a formal agreement between the province and the federal government.

As to the remainder of New Brunswick's program, I have just received a letter from Premier Flemming, dated July 9, in which he has proposed very substantial changes in the program originally put forward by the province. These new proposals are now under study by my technical advisers and I have written to the premier of New Brunswick for additional information. In the circumstances it would be premature for me to say more at this time.

LIVESTOCK

RABIES—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION TO COVER LOSSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the very serious rabies epidemic in Stormont and other parts of this province, has the minister considered the desirability of extending the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to cover compensation for the loss of domestic animals owing to rabies, as has been done in the case of brucellosis, tuberculosis and, I believe, in the case of foot and mouth disease?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Animal Contagious Diseases Act provides authority for the payment of compensation only with respect to animals which are ordered slaughtered as a disease control measure to prevent the spread of the disease. This is the authority under which compensation is paid for animals ordered slaughtered if they are found, in the course of official testing, to be infected with brucellosis or tuberculosis. It is also the authority under which compensation would be paid for animals ordered slaughtered if they were infected with or exposed to such serious diseases as foot and mouth disease.

There is no authority in the act, and it is not the intent of the act, to provide compensation to owners of animals which may die normally from rabies or from any other disease.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS AND MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can get an answer this time from the Minister of Finance. When does the minister expect to be able to report to the house on the results of the active studies that he said are being made on the pensions paid to retired civil servants and members of the R.C.M.P., and do such studies also include the pensions being paid to railway employees?

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have answered such a question a number of times during this session. I can only give the same answer today, that this important subject is under very active study. Whenever the time is appropriate to make any announcement to the house my hon. friend may be sure that it will be made.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

391. Departmental administration, $739,086.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this item, of course, gives members of the house an opportunity to speak generally on questions within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I wish to take advantage of that opportunity. Before doing so, Mr. Chairman, in a substantive way I should like to express my regret and the regret of members of our party over the resignation of the deputy minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Mitchell Sharp, and to express our gratitude—and I am sure all members of the house will join with me in this—for the magnificent, effective and unselfish service which he gave to the government through the civil service over so many years. I had the pleasure and privilege of being his colleague during part of that time, and therefore I am in a position to testify to the value of his unselfish service. I know he must have regretted leaving the civil service as much as we regretted seeing him go.

If Mr. Sharp had to leave, Mr. Chairman, he could not have been replaced by a better official than Mr. John English, who is now the deputy minister of the department and with whom I also have had the pleasure and privilege of working for many years as a member of the civil service. On my own behalf and on behalf of our party I would like to wish him well as he presides over the department in the capacity of deputy minister.

This item, Mr. Chairman, is related to the work generally of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and in preparation for the observations I want to make on that work I have been studying the annual report of the department. I have been looking at the report of the economics branch of this department. In the previous report for 1956 under this section "economics branch" there is this sentence:

During the past year, general economic conditions in Canada have been kept under review, and a number of reports on various aspects of Canada's economic development have been prepared for official use.

This is the branch of the department, Mr. Chairman, which is responsible for the preparation of reports such as that famous so-called hidden report about which we heard last autumn and this spring; but in 1956 the reports of this branch were prepared for official use and official use only. For some reason or other, in the section of the 1957 report at page 53 dealing with the work of the economics branch there has been a slight change in reference to the duties of this branch, and this year the paragraph reads:

During 1957 general economic conditions in Canada were kept under review and a number of reports—

Including reports such as the famous hidden report.

—on various aspects of Canada's economic development were prepared—

And this is the change:

—mainly for official use.

I suppose it was necessary for the author of this report to include the word "mainly" to cover the practice of the Prime Minister in introducing to public attention some selected passages from a report of the economics branch that the branch said in the past was prepared for official use only.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that in his review of the work of the department the minister might have given us the benefit of some information about the report for 1958, prepared by this branch on economic conditions in the country. It would have been very interesting to have received that information—perhaps more interesting, as it would have been more valuable, to have received it than it was last January and in the spring to have received selected passages from the previous report. If it was appropriate to have selected passages of that report made public in 1957, without any request from the house, perhaps it would have been even more appropriate to have had the information in the report for 1958 made public when it was requested by the house.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, it would have been helpful to have had an analysis of the economic situation as it was seen by the Department of Trade and Commerce, so that it might have been related to what the Minister of Finance had to say about it in his budget speech. However, that was not done.

In his review yesterday the minister emphasized, and quite rightly, the importance of foreign trade in our economy. Indeed, the magnitude and importance of our external trade are shown, as he pointed out, by the fact that the figures have now reached well over $10 billion. That development of our external trade over the years until it reached this unprecedented figure in 1957, which as the minister pointed out was 2 per cent above the figure for 1956, and owing largely to the increase in the early part of 1957, must bring us all a great deal of satisfaction.

It must also bring some shadow of anxiety because of the realization of what it means in our dependence on markets outside of this country for not only our prosperity but our economic stability. In a sense it emphasizes that we are—I do not want to be misunderstood in the way I am putting this—hostages of other people's fortunes.

That is shown by the fact that about one third of our gross national product is now derived from our foreign trade, which reached a per capita figure in 1957 of $625, I think, a figure not exceeded in any country in the world except New Zealand, a country which is hardly comparable so far as industrialization is concerned.

It is also interesting to remark, and the minister mentioned it yesterday, that $7 billion of our $10 billion plus foreign trade comes from our trade with the United States of America. There is no difference of opinion among members of the house as to the desirability of diversifying, in so far as it can be done by natural, wise and economic methods, our foreign trade and broadening and deepening the bases of that trade. In 1958, in a time of recession, we are all very happy to know that our external trade is holding up so well. The minister pointed out—I think he used these figures—that in the first five months of this year our exports were about 1 per cent ahead of the same period in 1957, and that our imports were down something over 16 per cent from the comparable period of last year. Our imports from the United Kingdom are up 2 per cent, I believe, but our imports from the rest of the commonwealth are down about 11 per cent. Our imports from the United States are down even more than that. Because of that fact in the first five months of this year the deficit, as the minister pointed out, has been reduced from $514 million to $173 million, about one-third of what it was last year, and the deficit with the United States has been reduced from $660 million to $374 million.

But any satisfaction we can derive from the reduction of the unfavourable trade balance with the United States must be sensibly modified by a realization of the causes that have brought about the decrease in the deficit, because it is due not to an increase in our exports but to a decrease in our imports and it is not due to government policy. It is not due to any shift from imports from the United States or other countries to Canadian production and purchases but is due primarily to the reduction in business investment in Canada, especially in machinery and equipment, a very important part of the import trade. That in its turn is due to the recession and the fact that our economy has slowed up so far as investment is concerned. There is less need for the capital goods that we had to import, particularly from the United States, when we were in a period of expansion and boom.

It is also true, as the minister pointed out yesterday, that this decline has been accompanied by a shift in the geographical distribution of our import trade. In 1957 the United Kingdom took about 8.8 per cent and in 1958 that figure increased to 10.4 per cent, whereas the United States share declined from 74.1 per cent in 1957 to 70.9 per cent in 1958. But again, while we may take some satisfaction from that shift, and I think we should, it is not due to government policy but to the recession and to the nature of the imports from the United States compared with the imports from the United Kingdom. The minister knows that our imports from the United Kingdom are mainly consumer goods. The level of imports of consumer goods is determined largely by personal income in Canada; and personal income, consumption and expenditure in Canada have, fortunately, been holding up very well in recent months.

On the other hand, our imports from the United States have been mainly capital goods and consumer durables and, as I have just said, the volume of their import is determined largely by the nature of investment in Canada. That has been declining as the demand for these goods in Canada and other countries is very sensitive to a change in business conditions, which change has taken place.

I have been talking about our import trade. There is also a shift in the geographical distribution of our export trade. The United Kingdom and the commonwealth are gaining relative to the United States but, as I am sure the minister will admit, that again is largely due to the increased assistance we have been giving to the Asian countries of the commonwealth under the Colombo plan; and while we may welcome that increase, we should not blind ourselves as to the reasons for it. The dominant factor, however, in our foreign trade remains our trade with the United States of America, and if conditions do not improve in the United States not only will our trade with that country decline but our trade with other countries will also decline, because those countries will feel the impact of any recession in the United States and that in its turn will affect their ability to buy from us.

The present situation may then be summed up by the following proposition. While it is true to say, as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce expressed the same sentiment yesterday, that, to quote the Minister of Finance, "our trade deficit with the United States was reduced and our trade with the United Kingdom, the commonwealth and the rest of the world moved in the direction of more balanced relationships", it must be borne in mind that these changes and shifts in our trade picture have not been brought about by any systematic government policy but are the direct consequence of the current economic recession both in our own country and in the United States, and of the traditional nature of our trade relationships with the world but more particularly with the United States and the United Kingdom.

If our exports are holding up reasonably well, which is true and we all take satisfaction from it, it is important to analyse the reasons for that. The analysis made last night by the hon. member for Rosthern was a very simple one. He said that it was due to government policy and that disposed of the matter. Well, if he will study the export figures carefully he will discover, as perhaps he has already discovered, that our export trade is holding up largely because of the increase in three commodities, uranium, cattle and wheat. So far as uranium is concerned there has been a tremendous increase in our exports. This year they will perhaps be between $200 million and $300 million, whereas a year or so ago they were a very few millions and a few years ago they were almost nothing at all.

That increase is due not to the policy of the government but to the fact that the previous government managed to make an arrangement with the United States for the purchase of practically all the uranium we could produce at terms pretty satisfactory to the producers, and we are now reaping the benefit of that agreement. The agreement runs until 1962, and the minister must know that it is of the greatest importance to find markets for our uranium in other parts of the world. We are beginning that process, and it is very important to maintain it and expand the use of Canadian uranium for peaceful purposes.

So far as the cattle trade is concerned, I suggest to the hon. member for Rosthern that the government had about as much to do with the increase in cattle exports to the United States in the last year as the sultan of Zanzibar, and I mean no disrespect to the sultan of Zanzibar. That increase, and it was a very formidable and desirable one, was due to a strengthened demand in the United States which in its turn was due first to the shortage of cattle because of the drought in that country and the need for cattle to restock United States ranges and ranches and, second, to the tremendous corn crop across the line which persuaded farmers and ranchers there to convert a lot of that corn into meat, for which purpose they were glad to have some Canadian cattle. While the government may have had very little responsibility for the increase in this cattle trade across the line, the government certainly has some responsibility for maintaining it. I am not so sure that that is going to be easy.

Mr. Nasserden: Would the hon. member permit an observation?

Mr. Pearson: I might, but I do not think you would, Mr. Chairman. A question would be something else.

Mr. Nasserden: What I tried to establish yesterday—

Mr. Chevrier: No; order.

The Chairman: I regret the necessity for informing the hon. member that his remark must be in the nature of a question which the Leader of the Opposition permits.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if the hon. member would tell us how we have been able to take advantage of this United States market if the policy of the government was so hostile that it turned the United States away from our market here?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I shall try to deal with that and explain why we were able when we were in power to lay the basis for this cattle trade across the border which, up until June 28 of this year, has resulted, the figures tell us, in 171,333 head moving across the border. To explain this you have to go back to 1947, when the Canadian tariff on fresh fruits and vegetables was bound under GATT. This was a very considerable concession to the United States, in return for which the United States had to make some concessions to Canada. One of those concessions, and perhaps as it turned out almost the most important of those concessions, was that the quota on Canadian cattle exported to the United States was raised to 400,000 a year. It was on the basis of that agreement that last year we were able to take advantage of this situation by increasing our cattle exports to the United States.

I would point out, too, that to preserve that concession, and it is a very important one and becoming so important that there are a great many rumblings of dissatisfaction amongst the producers in the United States, we have to maintain the concession we have given to the United States on fruits and vegetables. I believe the government is now negotiating with the United States—I will be informed if I am wrong—about an increase in the duties on fruits and vegetables. If an increase is made then the United States is entitled, in its turn, to concessions. Demands are being made already in Washington for such concessions in return for this concession on fruits and vegetables which is being requested by the Canadian government. One of the demands which is being most persistently made is for an increased duty and a reduced quota on Canadian livestock, and this at a time when livestock producers in Canada need all the markets they can get and when the United States, because of interest in the development of these markets, is clamouring now with greater force than previously to keep the cattle out. There is the problem.

The third main reason for our increased exports is our exports of wheat and flour. As was pointed out by my hon. friend last night and by the minister before him, last year we exported 282 million bushels.

Mr. Churchill: No, 262 million.

Mr. Pearson: Well, 262 million, and this year we are about to reach 300 million. By the end of the year I believe we may very well be over the 300 million bushel mark. This is a very substantial and very satisfactory increase indeed. But let us see how that was brought about. Perhaps a clue to it, in addition to what the minister no doubt would refer to as the aggressive sales policy of the Canadian wheat board—it was not so aggressive last autumn when we aked him about the desirability of taking steps to sell wheat to Australia—is given in United States figures. Last year their exports were 546 million bushels, and this year that figure has dropped to 400 million bushels. The reasons for our increase within that comparative figure are, first, the gifts and long-term credits we have made available to Colombo plan countries. The minister mentioned this yesterday, and I am not criticizing or quarrelling with that for one minute. Another reason is easier credit terms generally, whereas when we were in power we were able to sell our wheat for cash or commercial credit, except when we gave it away for relief or for Colombo plan consumption.

When we talk about increasing our wheat exports under the Colombo plan, as part of the Colombo plan arrangements we must not forget that the Colombo plan was established and operated for capital and technical assistance, not on the basis of supplying consumer goods. When we had responsibility for operating the Colombo plan we found the Asian countries hesitant indeed about accepting consumer goods rather than capital goods.

Then another reason for the increase, as the minister pointed out yesterday, was the sales of wheat to Russia. He knows, of course, who made the agreement that made those sales possible. Then for the first time for a good many years there were some sales to China, and I shall have a word to say about that later. Another reason for the increased sales was the higher quality protein wheat in 1957.

Another very important reason, which is illustrated by the United States figures, is that the United States barter program, which was that aspect of their surplus disposal program which, perhaps along with tied sales, was causing us the most damage and about which we complained most, was modified. This modification began in April, 1957, as a result of assurances which we received from the United States government. At that time the United States government said they would not operate barter sales in such a way as to interfere with normal purchases of wheat by the importing country; that is one reason why the United States has not sold so much wheat in the current year.

While we all may take satisfaction, therefore, out of this increase in our export trade, perhaps it is just as well to analyse the reasons which brought it about. We still have, and will have for some time, surplus disposal problems. I suggest that the government should, if it has not already, give consideration to a co-operative arrangement with the United States for a joint approach, a continental approach if you like, to the problems of surplus disposal, especially of wheat. The government should give consideration also to international schemes for the utilization of surplus wheat and other foods, something about which they talked a good deal when they were in opposition and which, when we were in power, we had taken up at international conferences but with which we did not, in those days, make very much progress. Perhaps circumstances are such that now it will be easier to make effective progress.

There is also the proposal which might be very important for our wheat producers, for a NATO strategic food reserve. This is a matter which was brought up in the NATO council in previous years and in which other members of NATO did not show very much interest. At the end of last year the Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence—I am not sure whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned it but certainly the Prime Minister, Minister of National Defence and Secretary of State for External Affairs—told the country that they had taken up at the December meeting of the North Atlantic council the feasibility—I am referring to page 2936 of Hansard for January 7, 1958—of implementing that proposal of creating a food bank, and that it would be studied, we were told, by the NATO council. In April, when the Minister of National Defence came back from the NATO defence ministers' meeting in Paris, he said that he also had advanced the proposal on strategic grounds of a food bank, a stockpile of wheat and that kind of thing; and he also said in April it was being studied.

I was very much interested in this proposal and the assurance we were given that it was being studied by NATO, because this might turn out to be a very important thing in the long run with regard to our wheat exports. So I was very much interested and somewhat disappointed to read the testimony of the United States ambassador to Canada before the senate foreign relations committee on May 16 last when, in answer to a question about this NATO food bank matter by a United States senator, he had this to say:

> As far as the department is aware—

That is the United States state department.

> —the Canadian government has made no detailed proposal in NATO or to the United States government that such a bank be established nor has any exploration of its possibilities taken place in NATO or the United States government.

Then he went on to say this:

> Without receiving further details regarding the Canadian proposal it is impossible to tell how it might fit into NATO planning which has already been done, but this government will of course be glad to consider any detailed proposals which may be made in NATO by our Canadian friends.

We were told last December that it had been done. We were told in April that it had been done. I suggest that it is time the government begin it and make detailed proposals to NATO for this purpose, which they have talked about now for six months but which the United States government says has never been received at all in Washington or NATO.

I now want to say a few words about trade with China. The minister has been stimulating our curiosity in recent weeks on this subject, as indeed he and some of his colleagues stimulated our interest in a somewhat more ambiguous way during the election. It is true that wheat sales have been made to China, but I suggest that perhaps the government may have had very little to do with this matter. If the government wish to take active steps to encourage wheat sales to China or sales of any other commodity to China—and perhaps over the years though not immediately there may be quite a market there for Canadian products—I suggest they will never make any progress if the Prime Minister talks in public as he did in this house on November 1, when he related the question of diplomatic recognition to the question of sales, and with regard to diplomatic recognition said this as reported at page 654 of Hansard of that date:

> The attitude of this government is unchanged in that direction, and until such time as the people's government, the communist government of China, expiates its wrongdoing under international law there certainly will be no justification for the granting of recognition, as we see it.

That may be the policy of the government, and it is not in question at the moment in this particular debate. But to talk like that about a country to which you are hoping to sell goods does not seem to me to be very intelligent diplomacy. During the election campaign our position was stated very clearly, namely that we should do what we could as a government to develop our trade with China in respect of all goods which were not on the strategic list, and that for that purpose it would be desirable to send not merely a trade commissioner from Hong Kong to China but a governmental mission headed by a minister.

I ask the minister—and perhaps he will clear this matter up when he replies—what actually is the situation with regard to the strategic list for communist China. As he knows, over the years through a committee that meets in Paris—COCOM—lists have been agreed on with other NATO countries of goods which should not be exported to Russia and which should not be exported to China because of their strategic character. But there was a difference between the Chinese list and the Russian list. The Chinese list was more extensive than was the Russian list.

I have been trying for a good many months to find out whether that differential has been removed and, if so, whether the list of prohibited goods to China is now the same as the list of prohibited goods to Russia and whether that change, that co-ordination, has been agreed to by all the members of NATO. Until that change is made and until that differential is removed, it is going to be extremely difficult indeed for us to develop our exports to that country.

While over the years we may be able to build up an export trade to China, especially in agricultural products and in timber which were our two main exports in earlier years, we must not deceive ourselves that even under the most favourable conditions, this is something which will take place overnight. Perhaps within the next two or three years this may not be the market which will be the solution for an expanding export trade but it is certainly worth developing. Far more important, as I have said, and the dominant factor in our trade, remains our trade with the United States.

I should like to say something about our United States trade relationships, more particularly in the light of the very happy visit we have just had from the President of the United States, who talked about these relationships. In this vital matter of relationships with the United States, whether political, economic or cultural, I think frank talk helps. If it is given in the right spirit it will not hurt; it will help to bring about an understanding of our mutual problems. It will help to clear away the cobwebs of some of the after dinner sentiments to which we are all exposed on occasion and which do not seem to me to be a very substantial basis for a sound Canadian-United States relationship.

So far as I am concerned, I have tried over the years to speak perfectly frankly but in as friendly a way as possible about our relationship with the United States. I have a very vivid memory of a speech I made in Toronto as far back as 1951, for which I was criticized very strongly by some people in this country who since that time have directed to the United States far more vigorous criticism that I was giving then. At that time in 1951 I ventured to say that the days of relatively easy and automatic relationships between our two countries were over especially, as I tried to point out, in the realm of economic affairs, and that our mutual problems in the future were going to be more complicated, more difficult and more numerous.

Nothing that has happened since 1951 has caused me to change my mind as to the validity of that forecast. In the years after 1951 I do not think anything I have said departed from that position in talks that I made in the United States or in Canada. I recall very well that in those days my hon. friend and some of his colleagues when on this side in the opposition used words which went further in criticizing the United States than we went on the other side. I remember some of them agreeing in those days, as perhaps they agree today, although I am not so sure now, when I said more than once in public that defence co-operation between our countries, which is not only desirable but is essential, and economic conflict are not reconcilable. I still think that is true.

The Prime Minister now does not like that sentiment. In this house he has charged me with using threats by talking like that and of wrongly trying to relate defence and economic relationships. I think defence is an important part of our economic and trade relationships with the United States of America, and I do not mind him putting on the record again what I did say, so I can confirm that I stand by what I said. One of the things to which the Prime Minister has taken exception was a remark I made with respect to economic and trade matters while in San Francisco during the summer of 1957. So there will be no departure from my statement, and to show that I still stand by it, I will read what I said. I was talking about the demands of the United States for further tariff protection against Canadian imports and the resentment this was causing in Canada because of the already great imbalance in our trade with that country. I said:

> The resentment caused in Canada by this process is increased when attempts are made to justify these demands for more protection on the ground that the requirements of defence make national self-sufficiency in certain commodities essential. This argument may well be valid in respect of certain vulnerable areas which might be closed to you as a source of supply in time of crisis or war. Surely it does not apply to Canada. We are the less impressed by the argument because on many other occasions we are told by other American authorities that defence can only be considered as a continental problem and dealt with on a continental basis. It is, I think, a simple, though significant, fact that any further restrictions on Canadian imports into the United States would make further defence co-operation more difficult. At least that is how I feel about it, and I am sure you would wish me to express my feeling in plain language as is customary when Americans and Canadians speak to each other.

That is what I said to the American Society of Newspaper Editors, and that is the way I feel about it. On July 10 the Prime Minister accused me in the House of Commons of trying to relate these two things in a wrong way and I would like to quote, as he did, what I said in this house on this matter in the debate on the reply to the speech from the throne. Just to prove that I stand by my remarks, I will quote not only the part of my speech which he quoted but I will add another sentence which he did not quote, as recorded at page 25 of Hansard for May 13, 1958:

> We must naturally protect our interests when they are prejudiced by United States policy. We must, for instance, make it quite clear that the United States cannot expect full and complete co-operation in continental defence, which is desirable, if she treats us unfairly in her tariff and trade policies.

I also added the following sentence, which the Prime Minister did not quote:

> But at the same time we must do everything we possibly and honourably can, to avoid economic conflict with the United States, which conflict would be bad for both countries and certainly disastrous for us.

That is exactly how I feel. Surely it is a good thing for the United States to know that in our view in this country the kind of defence co-operation which we would like to have—full and complete—is not possible, as it should be possible when there is economic conflict. We will co-operate with the United States with respect to defence, irrespective of economic policy, because we must in our own interests, for our own safety and for our own security; but that co-operation will not be as complete as it should be if there is economic conflict alongside it. That is what I said, that is what I mean, and that is what I still stand by. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he next gets up to speak whether he disagrees with that particular doctrine.

On July 9 last, when the President of the United States spoke in this house he honoured us, he complimented us, by speaking frankly, as I think we should speak to each other but without recrimination on either side. He said, and he was right, that frankness is the measure of friendship, and in his speech he said some things which were true and valid. I think he put some of the differences, especially the economic differences, between us in perspective and perhaps in a little better balance than had existed previously. But he was stating the United States case just as our Prime Minister when he goes to the United States states—and I hope he will continue to state—the Canadian case.

While we must respect what the President said and I think we must be complimented by his frankness, we do not need to agree with everything he said any more than we have to agree with the United States policy all the time. He did state the United States case with respect to their agricultural surplus disposal policy in a way which perhaps helped us more than we have previously been helped to appreciate the United States side of the picture, but I am afraid he did not remove all our doubts as to the wisdom of United States policy in this matter in so far as its relationship to Canada is concerned.

He raised the question of base metals, about which we are pretty anxious because the exports of these metals are so important to this country. Here I think we should pay tribute to the efforts of the administration in Washington to maintain the position in that respect by preventing action which would keep out our base metals and by endeavouring to fall back on stockpiling, something which will help their own producers without, we hope, hurting ours.

I suggest, however, it is not a tolerable position in Canadian-United States economic relationships when in time of crisis—and I am thinking back to the world war and to Korea—we are asked to bend all our efforts in this country to develop our natural resources and to produce strategic materials and make them available for the common good, particularly for that of the United States. Then when we do this and the crisis is past these considerations seem to be, if not forgotten, at least diminished in the minds of those who previously persuaded us and we are told that only economic considerations, particularly the considerations of local producers, really govern domestic policy. If we are to develop resources of this kind for the common good in time of crisis, surely we cannot be left high and dry with respect to that development and that production when the crisis is over.

During the war we faced this problem and we tried to solve it. We solved it very successfully in wartime by setting up joint boards in Washington. I particularly have in mind a board covering base metals and materials called the combined materials board; and perhaps the time has come—and I have mentioned this before in the last two or three months—for the government to explore the possibility of once again establishing a joint raw materials board with the United States for the consideration of these questions. Perhaps this would be a very good subcommittee of the joint cabinet committee, either on economic matters or on defence matters, because this is certainly an important aspect of defence.

The President also dealt with the United States action in regard to oil imports. He tried to remove some of our worries on that score, and emphasized that in the action they were taking they hoped to cause a minimum of damage to Canadian producers. Then he had this to say, and I quote from page 2085 of Hansard:

> We believe that to ensure adequate supplies of oil in an emergency, it is necessary that exploration to develop oil reserves be carried forward with vigour. This means a healthy oil industry throughout the continent and a healthy domestic oil-producing industry is vital to our national security.

Well, that is true; but I should like to substitute for that word "domestic" in the United States statement the phrase that a healthy "continental" oil industry is vital to our security. As I said in my speech in San Francisco, while it may be desirable for consideration of security not to be dependent on overseas sources of oil, you cannot use that argument in connection with continental production in North America. If defence is to be considered on a continental basis, then resources and material for continental defence must also be considered on a continental basis. Perhaps we are more aware of that necessity today than we were a week ago; because the events of this week must surely have driven home to people in Washington, London, Paris and Ottawa that in placing reliance on overseas sources, especially in the Middle East, for vital oil supplies one is resting on a very unstable foundation.

There was one other matter which the President talked about and which was probably also talked about a good deal more in private discussions. This was United States policy in regard to the exports by Canadian subsidiaries of United States firms to countries which are on the prohibited list as far as United States exports are concerned. As my hon. friend from Ottawa West pointed out yesterday, in spite of everything that has been said, we over here, at least, are still in some confusion as to the situation with regard to this very important matter, a matter which is not only of practical importance but of political importance, too, and which involves questions of principle and of national sovereignty.

I suggest the sooner we can get this matter cleared up the better it will be for relations between our two countries. Is it not an intolerable position that the United States should pass laws of extraterritorial application of the kind covered by this particular law, administered in such a way as to ignore the interests of Canada in her own trade? If in fact, as we have more or less been led to believe, the application of this law so far as Canadian exporters are concerned can be set aside by administrative action, I should hope that the United States administration would announce that they were going to adopt that policy with regard to such administration rather than merely suggest that every time there is a special Canadian case under this law consultations will take place.

There are a good many other things about which the minister talked. I am not going to deal with them all, because we will have a chance when the individual items of the estimates come up for consideration. I should however like to mention some of the omissions from his statement. There was, first, one very important omission. Perhaps this may not have been the right occasion for him to talk about the matter, but I hope he will rectify the omission before long. I refer to the menace of Soviet trade and economic policy to our own trade and export policy, and the ways in which we should meet it in concert with our friends, which is the only way in which it can be done. Perhaps a week ago we should have said that this menace was greater than the threat of military action.

There is no doubt whatever that in the last year or two a decision must have been made in Moscow to push ahead with an offensive on this particular front. We know the strides the Soviet union has been making in export trade during the last two years and also with regard to aid, particularly to African and Asian countries. That aid in the last couple of years has amounted, I have been told—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—to the figure of about $2 billion. This constitutes a real problem for Canada and the other free countries. It is something we will have to do something about.

Then there was another notable omission, an omission which was noted by my hon. friend from Ottawa West, namely the way in which commonwealth economic questions were dealt with, or rather were not dealt with. We did not hear very much about the results of the trade mission of last autumn to the United Kingdom. By this time I should have thought it would have been possible for the minister to be able to say something in concrete terms about the result of that mission, more particularly whether the government itself has increased any of its purchases over which it has control and diverted any of them from the United States to the United Kingdom. We heard very little at all about diversion. Perhaps diversion has now disappeared as an element of government policy.

We heard nothing—and it was a very important omission—with regard to the United Kingdom offer of free trade. The hon. member for Rosthern had something to say about this last night, and it was a very interesting observation indeed that we were all free traders. Then he went on to explain what he meant. I wish the spokesmen for the government would say the same thing in the same terms on the eve of the commonwealth economic conference.

Whenever we bring this up in the house we are always asked what our own policy is, and that is a fair enough question. The hon. member for Peel is not here today to ask it of me or it would have been asked before now. Our policy in this matter, as a party, has been stated more than once. It is that immediately that this offer was received we should have told the United Kingdom government that we would give it immediate, sympathetic and full consideration, and we would start discussions with the United Kingdom government in respect of it on the governmental level to explore the possibility of working something out. Whether or not the government has done that I do not know; they have never given us any reason to believe they have had any talks of any kind in respect of this very important offer.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? With regard to the statement of the policy of his party concerning this offer, which he has mentioned several times and which he has now put on the record, he has based that on a resolution passed at the conference of the Liberal party last January. Would the hon. member put that resolution on the record in full, including the last two sentences in which I am particularly interested?

Mr. Pearson: We will be glad to do that. We will put it on the record in the interests of the discussion.

Mr. Churchill: In full?

Mr. Pearson: Of course. Our resolutions are published, unlike the resolutions of the last Conservative party conference. They are there for everybody to read, and we will stand on them.

Mr. Pickersgill: They hid their resolutions.

Mr. Pearson: I thought the minister was going to ask me what I meant when I said we would start discussions with the United Kingdom government. That would have been a good and reasonable question. I have in mind exactly the kind of discussions which the United Kingdom government is holding with European countries in working out a free trade area with the continental European countries. The move to work out a customs union on the continent was a very important development, and other European countries who were not included in this union had to make up their minds whether they would associate themselves with it in some form of free trade area or whether they would stand aloof.

The Scandinavian countries, Ireland and the United Kingdom and others were concerned with this. The United Kingdom took the stand that they must try to associate themselves with the customs union by working out a free trade area. They have been discussing this matter for a couple of years now, and that, I suggest, is what we should be doing at this time about the United Kingdom free trade offer.

In these European discussions there should be no delusion in anybody's mind about the difficulties in the way of working this out, and I think it is yet too early to say whether or not they are going to be successful. But they are trying to meet the objections to the establishment of a European free trade area by laying down provisions which would ensure that as the area is built up over the years—because they are going to take their time over it—the position of particular industries inside the free trade area would be considered, and the impact on them would be cushioned over 15 or 20 years.

That kind of approach would, of course, have to be made by any Canadian government in talking to the United Kingdom government about a free trade offer. I suggest however to the minister that there is nothing which is of more importance in the economic problems facing this country or this government than arrangements which would have to be made for Canadian association with this European free trade area.

When I say that if we had been in power we would have begun discussions with the United Kingdom over these free trade proposals, I do not for a moment believe that any bilateral arrangement between the United Kingdom and Canada would be enough.

Even this kind of bilateralism is inadequate. Therefore we would have to do our best with the United Kingdom and with our friends to expand those arrangements over the whole of the Atlantic area. This means trying to bring in the United States.

Now, I have no illusions about the difficulty of this, or about the obstacles in the way of solving those problems of Atlantic freer trade. But, Mr. Chairman, this is the day of vision, and I do not know any more important or any greater vision, apart from building up our own country, than trying to build up the Atlantic area as a free trade, politically co-operating and defence area. Surely there could be no more important Canadian policy at this time, political or economical, than to take the initiative in that regard.

Here again I know something about the difficulties in trying to convert NATO, for instance, into something other than a defence organization. I have attended a good many NATO meetings, and at every NATO council meeting I ever attended we brought up the question of implementing article II. I confess we did not make much progress, very little indeed.

I also sat on the committee of NATO which was charged with the duty of working out recommendations which would convert NATO from a defence organization into a political and economic co-operative organization through consultation in non-military matters. We produced a report on this which is a pretty good report, but it is much easier to produce reports than to implement them, as indeed we pointed out in our own report. However, circumstances have now changed. During the last two years since that report was prepared the Europeans themselves have begun to build up their own political and economic area.

One of these days they will perhaps—I hope this is true—have completed that process. If they do, I hope they will do it in a way which will not shut out North America because, as the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have pointed out, it is absolutely essential that that European area be a low-tariff area, if we can make it so. Any other kind of European free trade area bodes no good for us. Therefore we should make, and I am quite sure we are making, our influence felt in Europe to ensure this does not happen. But our influence in this matter would be far greater if we could also take a lead expanding the proposed European free trade area into Atlantic freer trade.

I do not know anything more important, as I have said, than a Canadian government initiative along these lines. I do not know any more important vision before us—except the vision of building up our own country, and the two are related—than that of developing a great Atlantic free trade area, especially at this time when the free world countries, especially the Atlantic countries, must get closer together economically or politically or they are going to fall apart.

NATO has been the sheet anchor of our defence and our security in the last 10 years, but NATO is not going to survive, I am afraid, merely as a military alliance. Now that the Europeans have begun the process, now that the Russians are emphasizing the necessity of continuing that process—they very often are the people who make us aware of things like this—I hope the government will take very seriously indeed the desirability of not only discussing with the British a free trade area, but of broadening the basis of this discussion to include all the NATO countries and perhaps even as many commonwealth countries as would come into such an association. If we can do that, not only will we have laid a better and stronger foundation for our trade and economic policies in the future, but we may have laid a stronger foundation for peace and security in the world.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I wonder whether I might ask the Leader of the Opposition a question purely for information. He made an interesting reference to a form of continental plan for the development of resources of oil and gas, or oil in particular. I wonder whether he was referring to the often mentioned plan of considering the resources as a unit? If so, would he not feel that conceivably, based on the small percentage that Canadian crude represents in such a continental plan, our resources of oil might represent even a smaller unit or proportion than it does today?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. If I may deal with that point, I appreciate that particular danger and I did not have that particular device or procedure in mind when I talked about the joint materials board. I had in mind the mechanism we developed during the war when it was necessary to produce raw materials on a continental basis for war purposes, quickly and efficiently, and when it was necessary to allocate that production over the whole of the continent, indeed, not only the whole of the continent but over the whole of the anti-Nazi world at that time. What I had in mind—and I go no farther than this at the present time because it requires a good deal of thought and study in working it out—is the kind of joint materials board such as the one we had in Washington at that time so that those problems, especially concerning base metals, oil and supplies of strategic materials, could at least be considered by both governments through their representatives on a continental basis. When one government felt that is was being unfairly treated, or that some development taking place in the other country was prejudicing a development in Canada, there would be this kind of mechanism to which to appeal.

That can be done now through governments, and of course it is being done, but perhaps it would be of some use to have a permanent committee. I know we talk a lot about boards these days, and sometimes boards are excuses for inaction rather than mechanisms for action, but perhaps it would be useful to have that kind of board, if you like, as a joint subcommittee of governments which would be meeting almost continuously, as it used to meet in Washington during the war, where those problems could be threshed out. But I did not have in mind the detail which my hon. friend mentioned in regard to oil.

As far as the second part of his question is concerned, I have only this to say. Perhaps he will agree with me, but perhaps he will not, that surely the economic way to develop our oil resources in western Canada would be to exploit the northwestern and western United States markets. That is the way it would be done in a rational world and we would get our oil supplies in the east where we could import them most economically, from overseas or from Venezuela, or from any other country. Perhaps that is the way it should be done in a rational world; but if this world, indeed if this continent, is not to be rational and if Canadian producers are prevented from access to that United States market and thereby prevented from developing their production, then I suggest that any Canadian government would have no alternative but to see what it could do to market our oil in eastern Canada. That is not anything that a government would want to do on economic grounds, but it is something a government might have to do on national development grounds especially if we are excluded from an economic market across the border.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister would like me to put on the record this Liberal resolution.

Mr. Churchill: Yes; I have lost my copy of it.

Mr. McIlraith: Ours was printed and is available.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to send you 50 copies for distribution to your members.

Mr. Churchill: I have a large wastepaper basket, but go ahead.

Mr. Pearson: The resolution reads:

In that perspective—

Perhaps I should read the whole thing.

Mr. Churchill: Don't read the whole booklet.

Mr. Pearson: I will not read the whole book but I will read the resolution on trade, and I hope my hon. friends will be able to refrain from cheering as I read:

Mr. Brooks: Cheering or jeering?

Mr. Pearson: No, I said "cheering". I read:

The Liberal party has always favoured policies which promoted the expansion of trade on a multilateral basis, and under Liberal administration Canada's trade attained unprecedented volume. From a total of only slightly more than a $1 billion in 1934, our trade increased to more than $10 billion in 1956.

In view of the success of these policies—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Well, an increase from $1 billion to $10 billion may be considered as evidence of some success.

An hon. Member: Normal growth.

Mr. Pearson: Normal growth because of intelligent government policy. I continue:

1. The Liberal party believes that the prime object of Canadian trade policy should be to continue to increase exports as much as possible and to widen the geographical basis of our external trade. This expansion, not diversion of trade, is the only policy compatible with sound, rapid economic development and with increasing productivity and living standards.

2. The Liberal party believes that Canada should continue, within the framework of international agreement, to seek the reciprocal removal of trade restrictions in the world and to prevent economic isolationism.

3. The Liberal party also believes that to assure the security of the free countries we must work toward a close interdependence of our economies to gain greater opportunities for trade, full employment, greater productivity and higher living standards.

4. In that perspective, a Liberal government would give immediate, sympathetic and detailed consideration to the British proposal for the gradual establishment of a free trade area between the United Kingdom and Canada and would take into account both the new opportunities that might be opened for Canadian industry and the importance of maintaining existing industries and living standards in Canada.

That is perfectly reasonable, and that is exactly what is happening in the development of the European free trade area today. That is exactly the way they are proceeding, because these transitions cannot be made overnight and they cannot be made without cushioning the shock in respect of industries which in the long run might benefit but which in the immediate future might be hurt.

Mr. McIntosh: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Yesterday I asked a question of the hon. member for Ottawa West which, by the way, was not recorded correctly in Hansard. I was referring to world war II, not world war I. I said that prior to world war II Canada had 40 per cent of the wheat market and in 1956 Canada had 25 per cent of the wheat market, and I asked why there was this decline in view of the Liberal government's trade policies.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa West is jealous of his right to answer that question asked by the hon. member yesterday. He has been doing some research work, and he will answer it immediately I sit down. The last paragraph of this very progressive and important resolution reads:

In the same spirit, a Liberal government would also consider the possibility of a co-ordinated program for the reduction over a period of years of trade barriers within the commonwealth and Atlantic communities.

We are very glad today, Mr Chairman, in July, 1958, to stand on that policy.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): May I ask a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Now that we have had the resolution passed at the Liberal leadership convention of 1958 put on the records of the House of Commons, I wonder whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce would now place on the record the resolution on the subject of trade passed by the Conservative leadership convention in December, 1955.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to ask a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to ask the Leader of the Opposition a question. In his speech he dealt with the export trade to the United States, including livestock. Then he read the Liberal policy and stated that the Liberals have always worked toward freer trade. I should like to ask him why they did not obtain the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle in 1946, when we could not ship our cattle to the United States and the price in that market was 30 cents a pound?

Mr. Pearson: I tried to point out that in 1947 we did take action in that regard and made an agreement under GATT which made it possible to get into the United States market.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You could have done it two years earlier.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I should answer the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I did not understand the question when he asked it yesterday but I saw it this morning at the opening of the house when I got Hansard. I find that as reported on page 2329 of Hansard the hon. member asked this question:

Will he touch on the question why Canada had 40 per cent of the wheat market prior to world war I and has only 25 per cent of the world market now?

This morning he says that he meant world war II. In any event, the very short and simple answer is that there are three reasons. If he relates it to world war I he will have to recognize the development programs in Europe, particularly the extremely high protection put on wheat.

Mr. McIntosh: Before we get an unnecessary explanation, may I say that my question had to do with world war II.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, it is still the same thing.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): For you people.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know what the hon. member for Saint John-Albert means by that.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You are living in the past.

Mr. McIlraith: From the hon. member's technique in the house I would assume that he has no appreciation of the problem of marketing wheat and its significance in the economy of this country. Perhaps he might refrain from interrupting until we deal with what I am sure the hon. member who asked the question will appreciate is a very important and serious matter to this country. I think the hon. member who asked the question asked it in a serious way and intended it to be treated seriously.

There is the whole question of the development of production in the European area. We recall the tremendous tariff protection, indeed the virtual embargo, with respect to Canadian wheat imposed by certain governments in the immediate pre-war period in order to develop their production. We recall the development in Russia whereby Russia increased its production of wheat and used the weapon of trading wheat with certain countries in adjacent areas for heavy equipment which was needed, and by that device increasing her own wheat production.

In this morning's Montreal Gazette there is a Reuters dispatch from Moscow dated July 17 which is headed, "Red Wheat Hike". It reads.

> The area under wheat in the Soviet union increased by 34 million acres between 1954 and 1956 and now is one and a half times as big as the area under wheat in Canada, the Soviet news agency Tass announced today.

The third and most important factor is the tremendous increase in the production for export in the United States of America. I think the hon. member will agree that that is the most important of the three factors. The subject is one that is worthy of a full length speech. There are two very short documents containing some interesting data on the subject and treating it in a more historical way. There is a little booklet published by the Canadian institute of international affairs entitled, "What's Happening to Wheat" by M. Western and R. Hedlin. It is a very small pamphlet. Then there is another rather thorough treatise on the subject. It is a thesis submitted by Mr. M. W. Menzies, who I believe is now an economic adviser in the Department of Finance. The thesis was written in 1956 for the University of London, and it deals with the Canadian wheat board and the international wheat trade. It is a very comprehensive and thorough document and contains all the historical developments.

Mr. Churchill: It is a masterpiece.

Mr. McIlraith: I hope I have answered the question.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: I think the house will agree that we have all been very patient and lenient about the number of questions that have been asked the previous speaker. I think he and his colleagues have been very generous in giving full answers to those questions. I listened with a good deal of interest yesterday to the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was pleased to have this comprehensive review of the government's attitude toward trade with various countries.

It was a review of our experience and something of the outlook for the future.

The minister made a statement of which we were all aware, that during the current crop year there have been substantial increases in our exports of wheat. In this regard I am not going to follow the impression I received from the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition when he was speaking about it, that he wished to take away a substantial part, if not all, of the credit that might be due to the government for this improvement. I am quite prepared to give the government whatever credit may be due to them, and I think there is credit due them for having adopted policies which, if not entirely new, were certainly expansions of other policies and which have resulted in this improvement.

I hope the minister's statement that the coming crop year should equal the past one or perhaps even exceed it will be borne out by experience. I believe that if we can get our exports up from, let us say, the present 300 million to 350 million bushels as an annual target figure, even if we have larger wheat crops in the future than we have had in the past we will be able to liquidate the surplus we now have. I hasten to add, as I see the minister smiling when I ask for a further increase in exports, that I feel it is my job to keep setting a target for him so we will keep on improving. If crops are of average size or even less than that, according to the history of this country exports at the annual rate of 300 million bushels are enough to clear the crop.

There is another aspect of this matter which I believe should receive the attention of the minister immediately, and that is the whole question of the price the producer receives for the commodity. There are two important aspects of this subject, one sales and the other price. The minister has shown that there has been a substantial improvement in sales, but the same improvement does not apply to sales of barley or flax. In fact I believe there is no improvement, and that they are running at about the same figures as last year. There has been some improvement with regard to wheat.

I am wondering if the minister could inform the house, when he speaks, whether or not there is an application now before the board of grain commissioners by elevator companies for a further increase in their handling charges for grain. He will appreciate that any increase in the handling charges that might be allowed will come out of the producers' payment for wheat and reduce any subsequent interim or final payment.

I should like him to comment also on this aspect of the government's program, which was started by the previous administration, namely the payment of storage costs on that quantity of wheat in excess of 178 million bushels in storage on July 31. Would he say whether, in the grain picture as it is now developing, the amount of storage the government will pay into the wheat board fund on account of this policy is likely to be reduced? I think that will follow as the surplus is moved to the markets of the world. When the government's payments into this fund are reduced, that will result in the wheat producers receiving an even smaller payment in the years ahead.

I noticed the other day a report in the press that the government's bond issue may result, and is likely to result, in an increase in the premium on the Canadian dollar. This would be another factor which would result in further deterioration in the price of grain. I am asking the minister, therefore, whether he can give us, when he speaks, the price picture and the price outlook so far as these important commodities are concerned.

I noticed with interest the minister's statement that exports increased in 1957 over 1956 by some 2 per cent. The minister seemed to me to be rather satisfied with what had been accomplished and with the general outlook. I believe that an improvement of 2 per cent in 1957 over 1956, in the light of all the circumstances, in the light of the needs of this economy, is in fact a rather dismal showing.

Mr. Churchill: It is a record.

Mr. Argue: I know it is a record, and I am going to have something to say about that. If we should keep on having a record every year of adding 2 per cent to our exports it means that we are falling down in the export field, because to increase our exports by 2 per cent, coupled with the statement of the Minister of Finance on previous occasions that the gross national product would probably go up by the same 2 per cent this year, means a continuing recession in this country. It is not good enough to have a 2 per cent increase, even though in dollar value this may be a record. Unless we are able to increase our exports by a much higher rate than 2 per cent we are going to have continuing trouble in our industries which depend on export markets.

The government has had some very nasty things to say about the previous administration. I always sit back and listen with a great deal of enjoyment when I hear government members tearing into the official opposition on the basis of their record. I think if the Minister of Trade and Commerce will look at the record of exports for the previous two years, as compared to the same time a year previous in each case, he will see that in times of prosperity in this country our exports were increasing by a figure much in excess of 2 per cent.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand some figures on the increase in total merchandise exports in recent years. I find that the Bank of Canada statistical summary shows that merchandise exports for 1957 stood at $4,935 million, an increase of $72 million over the previous year or 1.5 per cent. The merchandise exports in 1956 increased by $512 million over the previous year, or some 11.8 per cent. In 1955 merchandise exports increased over the previous year by $404 million or 12.4 per cent.

The point I am making is that while there was an increase of between 1 per cent and 2 per cent in 1957 over 1956 in commodity exports or merchandise exports, this was just a small part of the much larger increase that had prevailed in the two preceding years. I think there is a definite correlation between the very small increase in merchandise exports in 1957 and the very substantial unemployment this country has been facing.

The increase in the physical volume of exports which adjusts exports to a change in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, shows exactly the same trend. In 1954 the index for the physical volume of exports, based on 1948 equalling 100, was 109.6. In 1955 the index had gone up to 118.3 or an increase of 8.7. In 1956 the physical volume of exports was up to 128.3 or an increase of 10. In 1957 the index was up to 129.8 or an increase of only 1.5. Hence while there has been a moderate increase in 1957 it is a rather inadequate showing in comparison with that in previous years.

To me the disturbing part of the minister's statement is that he seemed rather satisfied with the 1957 volume of Canadian exports, and he seemed quite satisfied with the showing in 1958. He did not say to the house what is a fact, namely that our 1957 exports should have been higher and that the 1958 exports should be much higher than they are now. If the minister had been in the same frame of mind as his party was a year ago I think he would have had important plans that would result in a large increase in our exports. Instead, he was content all through his speech to take what seemed to be general satisfaction in the trade picture as it now exists. In his opening remarks, as reported at page 2320 of Hansard, he said:

> For the year 1957 a new record total was established in our commodity exports, amounting to almost $5 billion, or about 2 per cent above 1956, which in turn had been a peak year. Preliminary figures for the first five months of 1958 confirm a further improvement in our foreign trade, with total commodity exports for this period amounting to almost $2 billion, or about 1 per cent ahead of the corresponding period last year.

Then he went on to say:

> Some of the reasons for this good showing—

He terms a 1 per cent increase a good showing. I would suggest that a 1 per cent increase is an inadequate showing and that very serious economic conditions will result in this country if we cannot get it above 1 per cent in the days ahead.

About a year ago now the government was making statements as to the effects which would flow from a commonwealth trade conference. When the commonwealth trade conference last year was concluded statements were issued on the wonderful results of this conference. From the statements that were issued at that time we thought a new era was dawning, but in the minister's statement today I see little attention given to the coming commonwealth trade and economic conference. He seems to take a rather conservative view, I would say, of what the results of that conference may be. As reported at page 2323 of Hansard he said:

> We are looking forward to the commonwealth trade and economic conference in September in the hope that there will be a further expansion of markets within the commonwealth, a removal of trade restrictions and the development of a new approach to some of the major trade and economic problems facing the world today.

We find there very little in the way of a definite policy and certainly, to me, no indication that the government really expects this conference to do a great deal for Canada. I do not know how the government can expect the conference to have any great success when, in advance of the conference, the government has announced that it would increase tariffs on certain goods coming into Canada from the United Kingdom. It would seem to me that the government announced in advance that it was putting roadblocks in the way of this coming commonwealth trade conference.

Mr. Bigg: You hope.

Mr. Argue: What was that statement?

Mr. Bigg: You hope.

Mr. Argue: That is not true, and the hon. member should not be making a statement like that.

Mr. Bigg: Then why all the gloom?

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: In his remarks the minister has said—and his colleagues have indicated it also—that these tariff increases are going to take place. When it was announced in Canada that this government was increasing tariffs the press reports in Great Britain, as far as the conference was concerned, were very disturbing indeed. Some of the most influential publications in the United Kingdom questioned what would come of this conference in the light of the restrictive trade practices which this government had indicated it would follow.

The minister also, in my opinion, seemed to brush over rather lightly, though he spent some time on the subject, the common market being set up in Europe. I think this common market, if Canada is not associated either with it or with the free trade area, could have some very bad effects for Canada; and I do not make that statement on my own, for it has been made by some of the most prominent farm organizations in this country. They say it is clear to them that the common market which is to be set up in Europe might be disastrous as far as exports of wheat from Canada to Europe are concerned.

I hope the government will some day tell us what is its policy as far as the United Kingdom free trade offer made last year to Canada is concerned, and I think the government should now be considering, with the United Kingdom and other European countries, how Canada can associate itself with the free trade area and the common market in order to increase the volume of Canadian trade and raise economic standards in this country.

Something has already been said during this debate as to the United States action in limiting the flow of Canadian oil to that country. The export of Canadian oil to the United States and the development of the eastern Canadian market are most important to the people of western Canada. Recent events in the Middle East might suggest that some of the imports of oil normally coming to Canada from that area may be cut off, and I am wondering if the minister would agree to make a comment as to how any decrease in the flow of oil from Arabia and Iran into Canada would affect the Canadian market for our domestic oil.

The hon. member for Kootenay West in his speech yesterday emphasized the importance of developing the China market. The minister has told us that Canada has increased its trade with China and, in all fairness, this government seems to be interested in developing the market in China. But it seems to me that the government has two policies with regard to China, and that they are inconsistent policies. The government puts its head in the sand as far as recognizing China is concerned and seems to pretend that the new government of that country does not exist. It tags along with John Foster Dulles and company, refusing to recognize the government of China; but, as if to attempt to gain for Canada the benefits of recognition, the government follows another policy of endeavouring to promote trade.

I am in the main interested in developing the second policy, but I say that if we are to take consistent steps to improve our trade with China then we should recognize the government of that country, and I hope the minister will use his influence within the government to see that such recognition is brought about at an early date. I am certain that such recognition would make easier our relations with China and would of itself lead to a substantial increase in trade with that country.

There is, I believe, one very serious omission from the minister's statement. I could scarcely believe that he had omitted any reference to the growing threat of the U.S.S.R. in the economic field. I do not believe the minister made any reference at all to that matter in his speech. As I read the reports of economists, newspaper writers and, yes, the speeches of heads of states, this would seem to be the major economic development in the world during recent months. There are growing reports that the U.S.S.R. is entering into very serious competition in the field of steel and that United States and Canadian steel prices and production may be seriously affected by such competition from Russia. The Financial Post of June 14, 1958 contained an article headed "Is Russia Gearing Itself for Pulp and Paper Push?", which reads in part as follows:

> Foreign observers bring back word from Russia that forest-based industries there are expanding quickly, both in size and efficiency.
> For instance there are estimates that Russia is spending $3 billion yearly to hike forest output and efficency.

The minister apparently does not think there is any threat in this regard. Growing trade and competition from the Soviet union did not warrant a reference by him at all, yet in the Montreal Gazette of June 5, 1958 there is a report headed "Red Trade 'Grab' Thrust on C.M.A.", which in part reads as follows:

> The price war being waged by the Soviet union in its increasing invasion of world export markets, including those for a number of Canadian products, was bluntly thrust upon delegates' attention early in the proceedings.
> This cut-price bid for business at the expense of Canada and other western countries was rated by H. V. Lush, of Toronto, C.M.A. president, as "just as dangerous as the military 'cold war' of recent years."

Those are the words of the president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and the article goes on to say:

> Russia, said Mr. Lush, is "pinching our toes" and preparing to "hurt us in the future" with deliberate efforts to "under-cut sensitive markets" at a time of North American economic slowdown.

There seems to be throughout the minister's statement a complete lack of policy and a complete lack of new thinking which the government referred to as being necessary and is thought to be necessary in other countries; and I suggest the only way Canada will be able to increase its share of trade in the world is for the Canadian government itself to take a more active part in promoting such trade.

The one feature of Canadian trade to which the minister was able to refer with pleasure and pride was the increase in Canadian exports of wheat, and this increase was brought about precisely because the government, in this instance, adopted new and far-reaching policies to move a product in surplus supply. The day has now arrived, I suggest, when in terms of trade we need a greater degree of government management and government promotion, and we say again that to deal with the increased threat of Soviet trade the government should be considering the establishment of such a policy, the providing of export and import boards, providing for the sale of Canadian products on a long-term contract basis and also the purchasing of Canadian imports on a long-term contract basis.

The government can pooh-pooh the idea; it can say "this is socialism, we do not have anything to do with it"; but the only product which has shown an increase, namely wheat, is sold by a government board that has complete control over the buying and selling of that product in respect to interprovincial and export trade, and also because the government had adopted new policies to promote the sale of that product.

The day of looking to convertibility of currency, the day when you can expect all the so-called free enterprisers who are engaged in the production and sale of various commodities consistently to expand Canadian trade year after year, is over; and these people and these industries, in the very words of some of their officers and some of their authorities, will not be able to meet the increased competition from the Soviet union which, they have been saying in recent days, is more dangerous to our way of life than the cold war itself.

I suggest that when the minister makes his statement he should give the house concrete proposals which he thinks will result in increasing Canadian trade, and I express the hope that he can give us some assurance that in the year ahead our exports can increase by a volume very substantially higher than the 2 per cent increase of last year.

The Chairman: Shall item 391 carry?

Mr. Argue: The minister has been asked a number of questions, and I think it is customary about this time for him to make something of a general reply to the many questions that have been put to him.

Mr. Churchill: I am quite prepared to do so, but the hon. member sat down somewhat more hurriedly than I had expected.

Mr. Argue: Just two minutes short of my full time.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate that the house would like to proceed as rapidly as possible with the estimates of this department, recognizing at the same time that in view of the importance of the department there should be no undue haste. But with the summer getting rather warm and the end of the session, perhaps, not too far away, I feel quite certain that hon. members would like to proceed as rapidly as possible with this department so they can deal with the others.

Mr. Argue: The haste is all on your side.

Mr. Churchill: No, I am quite patient about this. I appreciate the attention which has been paid to this subject of trade, and I am grateful for the kind remarks which most of the members participating have made with regard to the efforts the government is making toward increasing trade. I appreciate very much the suggestions which have been made for further improvements, even if I do not accept them all.

The speeches we have heard so far are typical of speeches from the opposition. One of the great advantages of spending several years in the opposition and transferring to the government side is that one knows precisely the type of speech that may emerge from opposition ranks. When I sat over there I used to examine the speeches made by the minister introducing the estimates of whatever department it was, and if I could find no fault with his speech—which is very much what has happened in the course of this debate so far—I would then look for omissions, things which had not been mentioned.

Members of the opposition have assisted me in this respect and pointed out all my sins of omission. And then I would go on to examine very carefully the policy as set out by the minister, or lack of policy, depending upon the point of view. All of that is perfectly right for an opposition, and I understand the attitude of hon. members and think their contribution to the debate has been constructive.

It will not be possible for me to answer every question that has been asked. If I omit answering something that should be answered I hope hon. members will draw my attention to it, because it will not have been done intentionally. I recall that some years ago when I was then critical of the then minister of national defence on his estimates, he would answer all the other opposition members who had spoken and leave me out entirely, which is not the type of treatment I propose to offer on this occasion. So if I do omit something please draw my attention to it. However, I will try to deal with some of the questions that have been raised, and in view of the contribution made this morning by the Leader of the Opposition perhaps I may begin by making a few comments on that.

I think in his usual fashion, as he got near the end of his speech and began dealing with the realm of external affairs, the hon. gentleman waxed eloquent—he is always more at home in this field than with regard to certain other matters—and drew our attention to what he called a broader vision of a western world more closely tied together economically. He spoke about freer Atlantic trade.

I fully appreciate his views in this regard, and draw his attention to the fact that in the spring of 1952 when I was seated in approximately the place now occupied by the hon. member for St. Boniface, and when my speeches in the House of Commons did not receive the attention which they perhaps deserved, I spoke on the subject of closer union of the Atlantic community and expressed sentiments somewhat similar to those expressed by the Leader of the Opposition today.

That is, I had what he calls a vision of a more closely linked Atlantic community; and in those days—and I hold the same opinion today—I thought it would be wise for us as western democracies to come more closely together than we were at that time, or are at this very moment, if we were to protect ourselves against the growing threat of nations which hold a different view on political matters. Part of that unity can be achieved, just as the Leader of the Opposition said, through closer links by way of trade. To that extent we are together in our thinking.

The hon. member was led into a final discussion of the European common market and the European free trade area, subjects which have been touched upon by the hon. member for Assiniboia and others. May I say that we are well aware of the problems that may arise if the European common market countries erect restrictive barriers against trade with Canada. But as I pointed out in my speech yesterday, we have received assurances from them that that is not the intention. Moreover, they are all members of GATT and will negotiate with us under the terms of the GATT agreement.

I do not hold the views that some people do with regard to what may happen to our trade if the common market countries proceed with their plans. I think the six nations joining together and having free trade within their borders will lead to a higher standard of living in those countries, which in turn will result in greater buying power; and forecasts made of the six-nation common market development in Europe indicate that there will be an increase in population and an increase in productivity, just as happened on the North American continent, leading to an increase ability to purchase commodities from abroad. Thus it is not with alarm that I view the development of the arrangement among the six nations of Europe. At the same time we are keeping in contact with them in order that Canada's interests may not be overlooked.

The European free trade area is similarly being watched, and we have had adequate assurances from the United Kingdom that agricultural imports from Canada will not suffer any restriction if and when the United Kingdom enters into the free trade area with other nations of Europe. We are well aware of these problems and are keeping closely in contact with them.

Well, it was from a discussion of this that the Leader of the Opposition went on to his rather splendid climax, but earlier he was worrying himself about the co-called United Kingdom offer of free trade with Canada. I asked him to put on record the Liberal party's statement of policy in so far as that was concerned, and I indicated that the concluding phrases or sentences of that policy hedged it about so that it is almost if not entirely meaningless.

Then the Leader of the Opposition elaborated. He said, "Had this offer been made to us when we were in power we would have said, 'we will examine it; we will give sympathetic consideration to it, but we will go a step further, we will say now this is fine for the United Kingdom and for Canada, but let us not forget the United States; let us bring the United States in as well, and then we must not forget the commonwealth, and the commonwealth countries must be considered' ". So this sets the stage a little more broadly and extends the conversation.

Then I suppose he would have carried it a little further and said there are nations outside the commonwealth, not on the North American continent, that should be brought into this idea of freer trade among the nations. And I am sure that before the deliberations would have gone very far my hon. friend, had he been in office, would have said, in view of the probability of interplanetary communication, perhaps no further steps should be taken until the attitude of the residents of Mars had been considered. That is the way you consider, that is the way you take into account—

Mr. Pearson: That is an excuse for doing nothing.

Mr. Churchill: —the so-called free trade offer from the United Kingdom to Canada.

We are quite prepared to consider any suggestion with regard to expanding trade, but my hon. friend knows that suggestion was put forward as an objective, just as the suggestion of a closer link among the Atlantic community is an objective that can be worked for. It cannot be accomplished overnight and our United Kingdom friends said that this cannot be done in a day, a month or a year, and it might take 12 or 15 years to bring to fruition. Why are my hon. friends so alarmed about this matter? Let them produce some ideas themselves as to what might be done. We do not differ from them in being desirous of expanding trade, lowering the restrictions that now exist with regard to trade, and generally bringing nations closer together through the medium of trade.

Quite a number of references were made to China. I think we should keep the discussion with regard to China in proportion. There is theoretically a very large market there, 600 million people. If they all wanted television sets and refrigerators, why you would be kept busy for the next six generations supplying them. But it just does not follow that you can immediately expand Canada's trade with a country like China. Our policy is to make some attempt along that line, and that is precisely what we have been doing.

Canada's trade with China has been going on for years. It did not just start when we came into office or when our friends were in office; it has been going on for years. Since the war and the revolution in China that trade has been curtailed; nevertheless certain articles have been exchanged between our two countries over the years. During this year we were fortunate to re-establish a trade in wheat with China which 20-odd years ago was substantial. I think we are justified in taking some pride in the fact that several cargoes of wheat have been sold to China. That trade, if it can be maintained and expanded, might very well reach the proportions in the future that it was years ago, and surplus wheat production in Canada might be utilized in the Far East. Therefore I think we are on the right ground there.

With regard to restrictions on trade with China, the Leader of the Opposition was asking about the strategic list and I think someone else questioned me as to what articles might not be sold to China. I have here a publication issued by the queen's printer, a reprint of the Canada Gazette, part II, volume 91, dated January 9, 1957, when my hon. friends were in office. It is called the Export and Import Permits Act, export control list. It gives the list of materials which are under control, and at the present moment negotiations are going on at the so-called COCON conference to see whether or not the list may be modified, but there is nothing concealed about it. Anyone may have a copy of it if they wish to get it and see what articles are under prohibition.

I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition had something to say with regard to our increased exports, particularly in wheat; and, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia, he tried to make it appear that nothing we had done as a government had brought about the increase in the sale of wheat this year; that it was the short crop in Australia, the smaller crop in the Argentine, the higher protein value of the Canadian wheat, and so on.

These factors have their place in world trade in wheat. On the other hand he might have pointed out that there was a very large surplus of wheat in the United States which has its effect on the Canadian market in international trade, and that there was a very large European crop of wheat, which balanced out any loss in world production in the Argentine or in Australia. Although we cannot take credit for everything that happened with regard to trade in wheat, nevertheless as a government we did take some new measures and showed considerable activity in supporting the wheat board in suggestions they made with regard to increasing our sales of wheat abroad.

My first act after being sworn in on June 21, 1957, was to go out to Winnipeg and meet the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners for two days rather than asking them to come to Ottawa. That was the start of our developing a policy with regard to the sale of our surplus grains. Subsequently I met the wheat board again, journeyed with members of that wheat board to Europe in September, spent 10 days there calling upon and meeting over 200 representatives of the grain trade in Europe and assuring them that Canada would not enter into any sharp price-cutting war and was not going to upset the market in wheat.

Subsequently it was the policy of the government to make available wheat and flour to Pakistan, India and Ceylon under either a long-term loan or an outright gift to the extent of supplying $35 million for loan purposes and $15 million for outright gift purposes. Then for the Palestinian refugees, who have been in desperate straits for many years in the area of the border between Palestine and Egypt, we made an outright gift of $1½ million worth of flour.

All this was in addition to and without interfering with the normal development program under the Colombo plan to which a grant of $35 million has been made annually for several years. That was a forward looking policy with regard to the disposal of surplus food, and it was a policy devised and put into operation by this government. It resulted in moving a substantial quantity of wheat from the prairies, and I think the Canadian people as a whole approve of it. The more wheat we move from the prairies and from the elevators, the less we eventually pay for storage and the greater the advantage to the people of the world who require food.

That was the program during last winter. These things taken together made up our policy with regard to wheat and have resulted, when you take all factors into account, in a very good year with regard to the sale of wheat. We will exceed last year's record by 40 million or 50 million bushels, and the record of two years ago of 309 million bushels exported will be exceeded as well.

My only difficulty at the moment is that if we set too high a record in the export of wheat this year we will be under the grave difficulty of matching it a year from now. If we reach 320 million bushels this year the hon. member for Assiniboia, who wants our export of wheat now to be 350 million bushels, will raise that figure to 380 million. I am always at a disadvantage with my hon. friend who likes to be just one jump ahead of whatever anyone else proposes or whatever is being done. That is the record of the government and the wheat board with regard to our wheat sales, and it has all resulted not from an aggressive sales program as some people have called it—I have never used that term—but from an active policy directed toward moving our wheat into international trade.

I was very grateful to the Leader of the Opposition for drawing my attention to a word in the annual report of the department which, of course, I had not seen before and was not aware of. He referred to the sentence in the report of a year ago, "Various reports were prepared for official use", and pointed out that in the report this year the word

"mainly" had crept in so the sentence read, "Various reports were prepared mainly for official use."

Mr. Pearson: It crept in?

Mr. Churchill: I know how it got there, but I am not going to make any accusations. Of course I did not see the report until it was in published form and I did not compare it with that of the previous year. The burden the Leader of the Opposition has now placed on deputy ministers is that they will have to produce the preceding year's report and indicate to the minister the changes from the normal sentences which will appear in the new report, so it is an added burden on the civil service in the future. I am very grateful to the Leader of the Opposition for drawing my attention to that.

Mr. Pickersgill: In well run departments it was always done that way.

Mr. Churchill: Sometimes these reports are published during the course of an election campaign when it is not possible to see everything that is coming out. There has been some talk about uranium. Exports of uranium certainly have added to our total export position this year, and we are very grateful that the world needs uranium and that Canada has the supplies. As a matter of fact uranium exports for the first five months of this year reached a total of $89.9 million compared with $35.7 million the year before, and we expect that these exports will continue to add greatly to our export position certainly for several more years. It is rather difficult to see too far ahead but we are blessed with a bountiful supply of uranium and it may well be that as atomic energy is put to use more widely throughout the world, even after 1962 there will be an enlarged demand for uranium. Canada will be in a position to supply the world with the uranium that will be required for the various power plants that are now beginning to appear in different countries in the world.

I make no excuses for presenting the picture of our external trade in the best light. I have not intentionally concealed any facts. I pointed out in my speech that it is due to greater sales of wheat, uranium and cattle that the picture looks as favourable as it does at the present moment. There were reductions in the sales of other commodities. I did not list them in the course of my speech, but I mentioned the fact that there were reductions here and there.

The hon. member for Assiniboia thinks I was very complacent with regard to the trade picture. I had no intention of indicating any complacency, but I think it is a matter of pride for Canada that with a recession prevailing on the North American continent, we nevertheless had a larger export trade than a year ago. My hon. friend wants our export trade to be higher than it is at the moment, but he takes that position on everything that comes before the house. If I had said that our export position was 5 per cent or 10 per cent greater than a year ago he would have said that it should have been 20, 25 or 30 per cent greater. Once again it is impossible to satisfy that type of criticism of the facts of the case.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: There is no complacency at all.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister satisfied with the 1 per cent increase in the first few months of this year over last year?

Mr. Churchill: I would have been terribly disturbed if the figure had been 1 per cent below the exports of last year, but we are holding our own and are doing better than some other countries. This is partly due to the policy of the government, the activity of the trade commissioners representing us throughout the world, and the excellent work being done by Canadian businessmen who are pushing their products in so many countries of the world. I think full credit should go to them for maintaining our exports at their present high level.

I used to be very good at listing omissions in speeches in days gone by, and my hon. friends opposite are doing quite well at it. The list of omissions includes one mentioned by both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia. They said I had paid no attention in my speech to the growing threat of the economic warfare being conducted by the U.S.S.R. I could have included everything in my speech if I had continued for two hours. Many years ago speeches in the house used to run from two to five and a half or seven hours, but the modern practice has been to reduce the length of speeches.

So there were omissions; but the only reason I omitted a reference to that economic threat was that it had been mentioned so frequently either in the house in answer to questions or in public statements made by the Prime Minister in addresses elsewhere in the country. It was only a few days ago that the Prime Minister, speaking on the occasion of the visit of the President of the United States, and the President himself, made reference to this situation. On page

2801 of Hansard for July 9, 1958 we find the words of the Prime Minister of Canada:

> The communist world is waging an intensive economic global offensive of "aid and trade", an offensive which is not designed to secure profits in a bookkeeping sense in order to secure the ordinary values of trade for its peoples, but an offensive whose success will be measured by the degree to which the souls and hearts and the freedoms and aspirations of the recipients will be subverted under communist tyranny.

On other occasions he has mentioned this economic warfare, and in his statement the President mentioned it as well. I thought it was well understood by all hon. members, and that everybody in Canada was aware of that threat. We are well aware of it. There is the threat with regard to aluminum. We have looked into that. We have made representations to the United Kingdom, one of the great buyers of our aluminum, asking them to continue to purchase the Canadian product despite offers that might be made by the Russians at a much lower figure. We are fully conscious of the threat posed by the economic warfare of communist countries.

I received some advice and some comments, Mr. Chairman, from the member for Ottawa West yesterday with regard to which I might make some answer. Apparently I have dealt with quite a number of the things he brought to my attention. He did deal at some length with our trade with the West Indies and thought I had not made any elaboration of our policy with regard to those countries. That is quite right; I did not elaborate—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I must advise the Minister of Trade and Commerce that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent to continue

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: I held out the suggestion of a 5-hour speech, and I think hon. members have agreed to that. I did not elaborate with regard to the West Indies for this reason. They are in the process of forming their federation. They have to effect a customs union amongst the islands that make up the federation before they will be in a position to deal on a government to government basis with other countries with regard to general trade matters. We have a sympathetic interest in the West Indies. We want to promote our trade with those islands, and our trade is complementary. We have the industrial base here and the manufactured goods to exchange with them for the tropical products which they can produce. Our trade with the West Indies has been going on for several generations, and I think can be extended.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Of course the hon. member for Ottawa West used this topic as a club to belabour me with regard to the decrease in shipping lines to the West Indies. This is not an immediate problem of mine, and he perhaps should save his remarks for some other occasion. On the other hand we have gone this far, that we have offered to construct and give to the West Indies a ship for their inter-island trade capable of travelling from Jamaica to Trinidad, a distance of something over 1,000 miles. There are ships from Canada engaged in the West Indies, though certain boats have been withdrawn from that trade. There is no evidence that the general trade with the West Indies has been seriously curtailed on that account.

I should like to mention two very helpful speeches which were made yesterday by representatives from Newfoundland, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. They gave some very helpful suggestions with regard to the fisheries industry in Newfoundland. I have read the speeches over again because of my interest in the subject. As I think I have mentioned, we have had six conferences with representatives from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia on the subject of Atlantic fisheries, and the speeches of my hon. friends have added some information to that supplied by those who have visited here.

I confess that like my hon. friend the member for Bonavista-Twillingate, coming as we both do from Manitoba, neither of us was as knowledgable with regard to the fishing industry of Newfoundland as we are becoming. My hon. friend, of course, has a greater knowledge of it than I have because he has a constituency there to represent. I note a similarity between the problems of the fishermen in the Atlantic coastal regions and the prairie farmers. There may be a need to take some new and different action with regard to the fisheries problems on the Atlantic coast. What that action should be I cannot say at the moment, but I am open to suggestions from hon. members who have had vast experience with regard to the Atlantic fisheries.

The government can only play a certain part with regard to the export of fish from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. There are other voluntary organizations playing a part in that situation. With regard to Brazil, Jamaica and the other countries that are consumers of Canadian fish, naturally the government can make representations and endeavour through trade agreements or other means to maintain our markets there. The government cannot take some steps which appear to me to be necessary—and these were not mentioned by my hon. friends—perhaps to raise the quality of the product that is now being marketed.

I recall some conversations with representatives of the fishing industry in the Atlantic region—I hope someone will correct me if I am not right in this statement—and I understand that we are not producing the types of graded fish that some of our customers would like to have. Whether or not my colleague the Minister of Fisheries will be able to produce some solution to that I do not know. But from the standpoint of the Department of Trade and Commerce we are doing what we can to stimulate the sale of fish from the Atlantic coast.

I think I can safely assure my hon. friends that our market in Jamaica has just been lost temporarily. The information I have had is that we will be back into that market. I hope that as we continue our negotiations, and as the Federation of the West Indies is more fully developed, we will establish very firmly our trade in fish with the West Indies so we will not run the hazard again of being undersold by subsidized fish products from other countries.

Other members made suggestions of one sort or another which perhaps we could take up as we come to the various items that are scattered through the estimates.

I presume I could go on at some length just in a debating sense countering arguments that were raised. On the other hand, it might be better if we got down to the specific items. If I have omitted things that I should have commented on, I will gladly take them up. I have not mentioned the contribution made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres except jocularly last night, the hon. member for Cartier and the hon. member for Mount Royal. We heard from the hon. member for Kootenay West, the hon. member for Timiskaming, the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Port Arthur. I was grateful to the hon. member for Vancouver South for his comments on our trade with China and to the hon. member for Rosthern for his suggestions.

I think the hon. member for Macleod put his finger on the trouble that affects trade, wherein we fail sometimes to analyse the picture accurately and determine the dollar exchange balance because, as he pointed out, there can be no effective trade with another country unless they have dollars with which to buy our products. Basically that is one of the problems affecting world trade. The whole question of the price of primary products throughout the world is one which is before the nations now for consideration and I hope it will be considered at the commonwealth conference. If the price of primary products is depressed, the countries producing those primary products cannot earn the dollars necessary to buy the manufactured articles that they require.

One of the reasons for our emphasis on trade throughout the world is that we may, by buying or in some way getting imports from abroad, make it possible for those countries in their turn to take the products that we have for sale such as our forest products, the products of our mines and our agricultural products. If they have not earned the dollars, how can they purchase our products? That is why we want to diversify our trade and buy many things from other countries of the world. If we buy from the West Indies bauxite and alumina, citrus fruits and so on they will buy our fish. If we buy from the United Kingdom in quantity, we can sustain our market there for 100 million bushels of wheat each year. These aspects of our trade are constantly in our mind. That is why we want to broaden it out so that it is not too greatly concentrated in any one place.

That, Mr. Chairman, constitutes my reply to those who have spoken thus far. I hope that I shall be able to give answers to any who feel that they have been overlooked in the interval.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder whether I could ask the minister a question. I do not want to hold up this item. He has dealt with the subject matter of trade and commerce at some length. But from time to time during the question period last session and, I believe, once during the question period this session I asked him whether he could tell the house what had been the result in dollars or pounds sterling of the trade mission to the United Kingdom and what amount of trade had been thus diverted? I remember that at one time he or someone announced that the hydro electric power commission of Ontario had given a large order for the purchase of electrical equipment for the main powerhouse at Cornwall. I believe there was also some question of the purchase of tin-plate by certain manufacturers in this country. I think the gist of the minister's answer from time to time was that in due course it would be possible for him to give a reply to the house as to the amount of purchases in dollars or pounds sterling. I wondered whether this could be done at this time.

Mr. Churchill: There has been considerable interest in the trade mission that visited England last fall and a certain amount of understandable curiosity on the part of my hon. friends opposite as to the exact dollars and cents return from that mission. I may at some time have said that in due course I would be able to provide the figures for which my hon. friend is now asking. I have not those figures here today. I do not think they can be obtained very readily. I always considered that, as the months went by, the effect of that trade mission would become clearly evident. It is not a question of deciding this week or this month what purchases were made in the United Kingdom as a direct result of the trade mission. The only way in which I could get that information would be from members of the trade mission reporting directly to me as to the purchases which they made and which on other occasions they might have made elsewhere. Two or three members of the trade mission have indicated to me that they were considering very large orders with the United Kingdom as a result of their visit there.

It is all a matter of private business, and until these orders are placed and the goods are shipped it would be just impossible to get an answer that would satisfy my hon. friend. Perhaps later on towards the end of this year, as companies compile their returns and as the bureau of statistics reports on imports from abroad, we might be able to segregate some of these items and determine that these were directly the result of that trade mission. I am positive that we are getting results from that trade mission because of the statements that members of that mission have made to me, from the inquiries that have come from British industry, from the visit of British industrialists here some time ago. There is more to it than just the purchase of some goods from England at this particular moment. We look to see the establishment in this country of more branch plants from England. We are looking forward to a larger capital investment on the part of the people of the United Kingdom. We are looking forward to an increase in our imports from the United Kingdom with respect to goods that are not now manufactured in Canada. Those are, broadly, the purposes of that mission; and so far I have had no evidence that those purposes are not being fulfilled.

While I am on that topic may I say that someone was asking—it was the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres—about component parts of articles shipped into this country from the United States, and he thought that I gave a rather abrupt answer last winter, something which was not intended. I will give him a better answer now, or at least I hope it is a better answer. In the case of imports of manufactured goods from the United States such as tractors, these imports are attributed to the United States where the finished article is fabricated or assembled and subsequently consigned to Canada. Likewise imports of textiles manufactured in the United Kingdom are attributed to the United Kingdom even though the materials from which the textiles are made may originate in the United States or some other country. Canadian exports—for example automobiles—may contain materials or components which have originated in the United States or other countries but to trace the ultimate origin of materials or components of commodities imported or exported would be a formidable task involving extensive and expensive investigation. The information required is not now available to the government and would have to be sought from the business firms involved in particular trading transactions not only in Canada but also abroad.

That just indicates the difficulty in answering what is, I am prepared to admit, a question which arises in the minds of many people. In fact, the six nation common market group over in Europe are taking into consideration a problem allied to this one as to imports where the country of origin may have to be shown. However, in so far as we are concerned, no statistics are compiled and it is very very difficult to give the hon. member a better answer than I have done.

Mr. Chevrier: May I thank the minister for the time he has taken to deal with my question. It is a most incomplete answer; but as he says, it takes some time in order to ascertain what the effects of a trade mission of this nature would be. I would draw his attention to the fact, however, that when I asked my question it was over ten months ago and I have received no answer but I will still be willing to wait patiently in the hope that at a later date there will be some positive results to be reported.

It seems to me that when the mission departed it was in conjunction with the proposed diversion of 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to the United Kingdom —that seemed to be the objective of the trade mission—and the other question I would like to ask the minister is, has the idea of diverting that 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to the United Kingdom now been abandoned?

Mr. Churchill: I have never understood that any policy was announced framed in the terms of a 15 per cent diversion of trade from the United States to the United Kingdom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Churchill: I said policy—

Mr. Bourget: Was it a vision?

Mr. Churchill: I have always understood that the phrase was used as an indication of what would happen—

Mr. Chevrier: I used the word objective.

Mr. Churchill: As an objective. The objective of the mission to the United Kingdom was not based on any percentage. Our objective was definitely based on obtaining from the United Kingdom materials and supplies which are now coming from foreign countries and which are not now obtainable or manufactured in Canada and it was part of a program to re-establish a better balance in our trading relations.

I pointed out in my speech yesterday that our trade with the United States of America was of paramount importance—it has been so for generations and will continue to be so—but on the other hand over the last 15 years we have felt that that trade has got out of balance. We are buying from the United States over $1 billion more each year than we sell to them. We are not asking them to balance our trade out to the last degree but if they would take more of our products we would not be under this disability. We do, of course, produce things which the United States does not require—for example, Canadian wheat. There is no market for Canadian wheat in the United States and so we have to sell it to the United Kingdom, the European markets, Japan, China, Africa and so on, and our flour made from Canadian wheat goes around the world. The United States does not require flour at all. As I said earlier, the countries which do require and might use Canadian wheat and flour have to have the purchasing dollars to buy those products; they have to have something to exchange with us and so we have to trade with nations throughout the world.

If our trade is funnelled into one channel, namely the United States, how do we make it possible for these other countries to trade with us? We simply say it is wiser and safer to have our trade spread out among many countries and with respect to the $1 billion which we spend as an excess figure in relation to our imports from the United States each year, some of that money might be spent in Europe or in Japan or in Africa or in Latin America to buy products from those countries. They in their turn would buy manufactured goods from Canada or Canadian wheat or Canadian lumber.

That is the situation. Fifteen years ago Britain's share in the Canadian market was much higher than it is today and we suggested to them that here was an opportunity for them to re-establish their position in Canada's import market and get back to what was considered years ago to be a good pattern of trade—the triangular trade of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. The United Kingdom industrial component is now in such a condition, having recovered from the war, that it can produce many of the things Canada now gets from the United States and does not herself manufacture, indeed, which we might more wisely buy from the United Kingdom.

That is our policy. The Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Ottawa West were today lamenting the fact that our imports had declined; they said nothing about the fact that some of those articles formerly imported are now being manufactured in Canada. It is not dire ruin if your import figure goes down if, at the same time, your manufacturing figure goes up. Last year we imported less pipe for pipe lines than we would have done because of the fact that in Canada we can now produce the type of pipe in the size and quality desired. With respect to the pipe lines across this country, compressor stations are required to boost up the pressure, forcing the gas or oil along the line, and during the past 12 months a Canadian firm has been able to manufacture and supply compressors for one of those lines. This has reduced the import figure from the United States because those compressors would have come from that country had they not been manufactured here. So although we are trying to get our general trading pattern into better balance, we are not overlooking the fact that those who want to speak in terms of diversion of trade might get equal results by stimulating manufacturing in Canada, thereby reducing imports from the United States.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the minister has mentioned one or two points with which I had attempted to deal, and in order to make sure there will be no misunderstanding with respect to what I said or intended to say, I wish to state that I was not opposed to a decrease in the amount of imports into this country if this was done as a result of the replacement of those imports by Canadian goods manufactured at reasonable cost and on an economic basis. Of course that is all to the good and such a diminution of imports is helpful. Furthermore, when we can diminish our imports by diversion—I am not afraid to use the word—to countries which have need of dollars to purchase Canadian goods and where we can get similar materials from those countries at a reasonable and competitive price, this is also desirable.

The main reasons, however, for the diminution of imports from the United States in recent months have not, surely, been the increase of Canadian production, although that no doubt has had some effect, nor has it been because these imports have been diverted to the United Kingdom. Imports have diminished from the United States because of the fact that our investment situation and our trading picture in this country are such that we did not need to import capital goods such as we required a few years ago for our great development program. That surely is the major reason why imports have gone down. It is not the only reason but it must be the major one. When the minister talks about the desirability of restoring the pattern of trade to that of the old days—the triangular pattern—we must of course all agree with him. He must, however, know that no country and no government could have done much more to restore that pattern than the Canadian government has done since 1945.

That pattern cannot be restored until the pound is made convertible. You cannot have a triangular pattern of the old kind without convertibility of the pound, and when the British were unable to make the pound convertible after world war II because of the financial circumstances at that time arising out of the sacrifices they had made, the Canadian government made a great many dollars available to them—$2 billion—to help them get in a position where they could make the pound convertible and restore the triangular pattern of trade which was previously our salvation, if that is not too strong a word, and which we all hope will be restored before long. But this is something which the government of the United Kingdom has to decide. I hope the government of Canada, and the minister, will do their best at the forthcoming commonwealth economic conference to see that every possible progress is made in this direction.

Mr. Churchill: That is one of our objectives. I hope I did not give the wrong impression when I was speaking about the question of imports. I did not want to misinterpret the Leader of the Opposition in any way. I was just pointing out one of the omissions in his speech.

Mr. Chevrier: I have just one other question to ask if I may. The minister in his remarks did not deal at any length with the commonwealth conference to be held at Montreal in September. He made some reference to it in a general way, but I am wondering if he could not go a little further and give us an indication of the subjects likely to come up for discussion. After all, the conference is to take place in barely two months time and there must be a great deal of preparation going on in his department as well as in other departments which are concerned with it. Perhaps the minister could tell us whether or not the British trade proposals are likely to be considered, and I think the committee would appreciate any other information he might care to give at this time.

Mr. Churchill: I did not deal with this matter at any length because my recollection is that in the budget speech my colleague the Minister of Finance devoted some time to the question of the trade and economic conference which is to be held in September and, in fact, on page 1239 of Hansard I find his reference to that conference occupies virtually an entire page in both English and French in dealing with this. I have no elaboration to offer at the moment.

Mr. Argue: I think the minister made some reference to the possibility of Canadian subsidiaries of United States firms trading with China. I believe the question of the 1,000 automobile offer to purchase was first disclosed in February or March, but certainly it was long before the federal election, and at that time a statement was made that a thorough investigation would be carried out with regard to this particular offer and especially with regard to the alleged impossibility of Canadian automobile manufacturers supplying these automobiles. We all know that this question was further discussed when President Eisenhower was in Ottawa, and I wonder if the minister could give us some idea of the steps that were taken to make it a thorough inquiry, just what the inquiry involved, and whether he now feels with certainty that any such offers in the future could be accepted and filled by any Canadian company provided it could produce the product at a competitive price. I wonder, now, whether Canadian grain companies which are subsidiaries of United States companies are completely free to develop Chinese markets.

When this question has been raised before in this house the minister has maintained that while a certain number of companies may not be able to undertake this business we were fortunate that there were distinctively Canadian companies which were quite prepared to develop this market and which had been successful to some extent. My question now is: is it completely clear that all grain companies in Canada are free to develop the Chinese market, and is the minister completely confident—I am not sure that this was in his statement—that it is the intention of the United States administration to allow Canadian firms to compete in the non-strategic field in the Chinese market or in the markets of other communist nations.

Mr. Churchill: I have no evidence to indicate that there was a firm offer and acceptance in regard to the alleged intended purchase of 1,000 automobiles some time ago. However, instances have been brought to my attention of trading deals with China which might have been impeded by the restrictive law of the United States. As the hon. member has mentioned, we did discuss this problem with Mr. Dulles when he was here a few days ago. We received an assurance that the matter would be taken under consideration and we are pursuing the matter further. Although I cannot answer the hon. member's question definitely at this particular moment, I have every confidence that the way is going to be cleared so that we shall not be faced with this problem in the future. That, I hope, will free the hands, if they are tied, of any flour mill operating in this country whose parent is in the United States. But only a few days have elapsed since we had this conversation, and we have not had time to tidy the matter up. However, I have no reason to doubt that we will reach a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Argue: I was under the distinct impression from the statement the Prime Minister made following the president's visit that it had been tidied up. I am not endeavouring to misinterpret what the Prime Minister said; in thinking he said that, I was apparently in error. Since the matter has not been tidied up and since this process is still going on, can the minister say when he hopes to be in a position to give the Canadian people an unqualified assurance that in the field of non-strategic goods companies operating within the Canadian borders will be free to take any business that is not barred by Canadian law.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member asks me to give an assurance when this may happen, or if I am hopeful that this may happen. I live in daily hope that all my problems will be solved within 24 hours. It does not work out that way, but I do have hopes that this particular problem will be solved very shortly.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to follow this up, because the secretary of commerce of the United States is reported to have stated in Washington while the president was visiting this country that exemption from this particular United States law, which has extraterritorial effect, in that it applies to United States citizens and United States corporations and subsidiaries of the United States corporations outside the United States, can be granted by administrative action on the part, presumably, of the president or some member of the executive. He gave the impression in his statement, as reported from Washington, that that would be done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it were a matter of amending the law, that would be a very complicated question indeed and I can understand why the president, or indeed any other member of the administration, could not give the Canadian government the assurances which they might have requested, though this matter has been before the United States government presumably for a good many months. But if it is a matter of administrative action to exempt a corporation, or a person, from the operation of a law, then surely there is no reason why there should not be a statement from the administration in Washington confirming what the secretary of commerce is reported to have said to the effect that when this law operates to interfere with business from Canada of a kind which is proper and legal under Canadian law, that administrative action exempting the Canadian subsidiary from the law will be taken. Surely, the government could press the United States government to give the assurance that that administrative action would be taken in every suitable Canadian case, and then the problem would have been disposed of.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the matter is being actively pursued. If it can be done in the way the Leader of the Opposition suggests, by administrative action, that will be the easy way out. I saw a very brief report along the lines that he mentioned but I have not had any confirmation of it.

Mr. Argue: I am rather disappointed that we have this kind of explanation now, in the light of the Prime Minister's former statement, because I was under the distinct impression from his statement that the matter had been cleared up at that time to Canada's satisfaction, in that Canada expected that from the moment President Eisenhower made his statement it was being cleared up from that time on and Canadian companies were free to undertake this kind of business.

There is some doubt as to whether a company can or cannot undertake that business because it seems to be waiting on some future action. The minister said it might happen in 24 hours. Now it depends on some future action by the United States administration.

Mr. Churchill: I think what is required is a specific instance where there has been an offer made and they are on the point of acceptance. Then we shall know the actual facts of the case and what may happen. My hon. friend is expecting a little too much too quickly but we are not inactive in this matter. As the Leader of the Opposition understands from his long experience, you have to move along certain channels and make certain representations. You have to get all the i's dotted and the t's crossed. Governments do not just make those blanket statements without very careful consideration. Therefore, if my hon. friend will be patient I think this will turn out all right. We could not have done more than what has been done at the present time. We made the representations to the people who have the authority to act.

Mr. Argue: When?

Mr. Churchill: When our distinguished visitors were here. Now it is just a matter of following the thing up.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we on this side really have been pretty patient in this matter. On March 27 I think the Prime Minister said that this question would be taken up immediately with the United States, and he gave the country every reason to believe that not only was it to be taken up but that action would be secured and that United States policy was an infringement of Canadian sovereignty. When we asked the Prime Minister questions in the house a couple of weeks ago as to what action had been taken the minister will remember that he informed us that representations had been made to the United States some time in July, I think it was early in July. But on further examination, the representations turned out to be not governmental, not even diplomatic representations but that an official of his department went over to the United States embassy and talked over the matter with somebody in the embassy, perhaps with the commercial consul.

Mr. Churchill: That is the way you used to do it.

Mr. Pearson: No, that is not the way we used to do it.

Mr. Churchill: That is the way you used to start.

Mr. Pearson: I hope in our day we never waited two months before we made that kind of start.

Mr. Pickersgill: After the Prime Minister had promised action.

Mr. Pearson: After all this promised action two months ago we had this rather niggling initiative and then the President came. I agree that when the government had the President here they could take it up with him, and that was probably the right procedure to follow then. But it would have been much better if this arrangement had been made through diplomatic discussions before the President got here so that he would have known all about the problem, he would have been briefed, Mr. Dulles would have been briefed, and all they would have had to do—and this is what you really should do at a summit conference—would be to sign on the dotted line. It would have all been worked out before.

Now, we do not know really what has been worked out, whether the agreement had been merely to consult in the appropriate instances. Whether action can be taken by administrative action. If the latter, as the secretary of commerce of the United States has indicated, I hope the minister will not wait until a concrete case comes up but that he will press the United States government to make a formal statement to the effect that in every such case, if it can be done by administrative action, Canadian corporations will be exempted from the operation of this law, which is the only thing that really we can expect as vindication of our sovereign rights in regard to the control of our exports.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend understands that we can ask the administration of any country to do certain things but then action itself rests in their hands.

On the subject of impatience to get an answer to this particular problem, may I point out that the United States law and the regulations governing the authority of United States subsidiaries in a foreign country have been on the statute books of the United States for many years during the period in which my hon. friends were in office here, and the alleged purchase of the 1,000 motor cars from Windsor occurred before my hon. friends were retired from office and they did nothing about it. We were the ones who were impatiently waiting for action from a government that had been in office 22 years.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps my hon. friend will tell me the date on which the law in question was passed in Washington.

Mr. Churchill: Certainly before June 10, 1957.

Mr. Pearson: Indeed it was, Mr. Chairman, but not very long before June 10, 1957, and on no occasion while we were in power was that law in any way, shape or form used against any Canadian exporter to any country of the world and we had no reason to complain at all.

Mr. Argue: The minister said we cannot do anything concerning a matter within the sovereignty of another country. Surely, the conduct of business organizations within Canada is something which should be within the sovereignty of this nation and of this parliament. If the United States refuses to grant this very fair request, the minister and the government should consider what I suggested they do a few days ago, namely introduce in parliament a Canadian law requiring Canadian corporations to act in a business way to the advantage of this country and to make it a penalty for them to carry out the law of another foreign country if such a law is detrimental to our nation. I think the statement of the minister that they are still working on the case and we cannot expect to hurry too much is a most disappointing answer.

There seems to have been a great change in the tempo of the government since March 31. Before that time, if something had to be done, it was done forthwith, action was taken quickly. Four months have gone by now and for all we know it may take another four months before the people of this country can be given the full assurance that the welfare of Canada in the selling of its commodities is not to be interfered with by another country.

In his response to a statement that the U.S.S.R. was continuing an all-out trade effort, the minister referred to increased competition from that nation in the field of aluminum. Can he say whether the new, dynamic trade policy of the U.S.S.R. has interfered in any way with the volume of export and conditions of sale of any other Canadian commodities?

Mr. Churchill: I missed one or two words there.

Mr. Argue: The minister said it was quite apparent that the U.S.S.R. had been very aggressive in the sale of aluminum to European nations and had been cutting prices. Are there other commodities with regard to which we see the effect of this new, aggressive trade policy and, if so, what are the other commodities that are affected? As the minister has said, the Prime Minister has pointed out the very serious aspects for the western world of this new trade policy and trade drive. My general question is: How is it affecting Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister answers, if the hon. member would permit me I should like to clear up one factual point with regard to what was being discussed before. Did I understand the minister correctly to say that this incident about the 1,000 cars arose when the previous administration was in office? The minister nods indicating that is so. In that case, the minister admits this took place before June 21, 1957, and that the Prime Minister did nothing whatever about it until March 27, 1958, four days before the election, at which time he only talked about it. Then it took two more months before any action whatsoever was taken and then by a civil servant going down to the embassy here in Ottawa.

Mr. Churchill: Let us get the record straight.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what I was trying to do.

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend is very ingenious—

Mr. Pickersgill: I was reciting the facts.

Mr. Churchill: —at establishing records. My information is that the alleged transaction was initiated when my hon. friends were in office. It did not come to our attention until just before the election in 1958.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister know whether it was ever brought to the attention of anybody in Ottawa before March 27, 1958?

Mr. Churchill: I always assumed that you people knew everything down here.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister going to answer my question?

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry. I do not have information available as to specific items in which Canada's trade has been interfered with seriously. I have mentioned aluminum with regard to which I have some accurate knowledge. I believe that our lumber exports have suffered quite a bit from Russian competition.

Mr. Argue: What about wheat? I know that eastern countries have been buying some wheat from us. I refer specifically to the increase of 34 million acres in wheat production that it is said the Soviet union has accomplished in the last two or three years. Has the minister any comments to make on whether there is any appearance of increased competition from the U.S.S.R. in this field at this time and whether the production from this new 34 million acres, which is one and half times the acreage of Canadian wheat production, is likely to be serious?

Mr. Churchill: I was not aware of that very large increase in the acreage devoted to wheat in Russia but from time to time Russia has had wheat for export. We have never been sure whether this was due to a surplus quantity of wheat or whether it was being exported for some other reason. As my hon. friend knows from his experience as a farmer, crop conditions vary from year to year and although increased acreage may pose a threat weather conditions can remove it.

Mr. Argue: The minister must have seen press reports in the last three or four years, as all of us have, to the effect that Russia was endeavouring, if I remember correctly, to bring about 70 million new acres of virgin land into the production of grain crops, most of it in Siberia. While I think reports will show that they have not reached that goal, I do think the report of 34 million acres additional land in grain production in this morning's press is very likely to be correct. It would seem to me that Canada should at all times be studying the situation and be aware of any great drive to increase grain production in a country like the Soviet union because the new drive in the export field that country is now undertaking may have very serious consequences for the Canadian agricultural industry. I hope it will not and I do not know that it is now but it would seem to me that this is part and parcel of the Soviet union's economic drive to step up the production of aluminum, steel, pulp and now wheat.

Mr. Cardiff: May I ask the hon. member whether he is sure about the figure of 34 million acres?

Mr. Argue: That is why I am asking the minister. It would seem to me that with the many trade commissioners and embassy and other officials and his intimate knowledge himself he is the man to give us the correct figures. I was merely saying that on the basis of press reports I have seen over a number of years and in the absence of any statement by the minister to the contrary it would seem to me that the figure of 34 million acres might well prove to be correct.

Mr. Churchill: I am not sure that it is possible to get information with regard to matters in Russia that is completely accurate or satisfying. I think there has always been some difficulty along that line. However, we do attempt to keep informed with regard to wheat production throughout the world and we do not look with too great favour on countries which are subsidizing the production of wheat on a high cost basis when we have here in Canada the best wheat producing land in the world and can produce wheat at a lower cost than almost any other country. Were it not for the long freight haul we would be in an even better position competitively. But I do not think we need to become too alarmed with regard to an unknown number of acres put into wheat in Russia. Suppose this has happened. Suppose that an additional 34 million acres of wheat are grown in Russia and a tremendous surplus of wheat becomes available in that country. I presume at that stage my hon. friend will ask what the policy of the Canadian government is, but I would prefer to wait and see before we are pushed into that position.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to revert to another matter discussed earlier having to do with trade with the West Indies. The minister said earlier that that was not an immediate problem of his.

Mr. Churchill: No, the ships.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree that from an administrative standpoint it is not. The ships are owned by Canadian National Steamships and the person who speaks on their behalf in the House of Commons is the Minister of Transport. But I am sure that in the over-all aspect and having in mind the field of trade the minister considers and realizes that it is a matter of deep concern to his department. I raise the problem because, as the minister knows, one of his predecessors in office, the late Hon. Mr. MacKinnon, spent a great deal of time in activating trade between Canada and the West Indies. Indeed, he made several trips and I think he had a lot to do with enhancing the atmosphere of friendship that already existed between Canada and the various islands of the West Indies.

The problem that arises and gives me some concern, notwithstanding what the minister has said, is that the government has stood by while these eight ships were being withdrawn from service. He said here that he did not consider the trade between the islands and Canada had been seriously curtailed because of this withdrawal. Of course, I cannot challenge that statement other than to say I doubt very much the accuracy of it. After all, there was a considerable amount of trade carried by these eight vessels. The fact a new ship is going to be furnished by the federal government is not going to have any effect at all on the trade because that ship is going to operate between the various islands of the West Indies. It will, I am sure, create good will for Canada, but it is not going to help the actual trade between Canada and the West Indies.

The question I am prompted to ask now is this. Does the minister not think that a serious attempt ought to have been made by the government to keep these ships in operation? Failing that, if a sale has to be made as seems to have been the decision now, would it not have been better to sell them to some agency in the West Indies in order to maintain the trade between the two countries?

Mr. Churchill: As the hon. member was asking these questions my mind went back a few years and I found myself regretting that I had not paid more attention to the Department of Transport when I was in the opposition instead of paying so much attention to the Department of National Defence.

Then I would have been able to put to the then minister some of the difficult questions which he is now putting to me. In those days I directed my attention to other departments. I did not want to get involved in a discussion of the ships that my hon. friend has mentioned, because I thought this was a topic he would prefer to discuss with the Minister of Transport.

With regard to whether or not our trade with the West Indies has been curtailed, the hon. member says my statement may not be correct. That question was asked in the house some time ago and the information I received at that time was that other shipping interests had taken up the trade formerly carried by these Canadian National vessels. Whether or not the information I received was accurate, at any rate I was informed there had been no curtailment of trade between Canada and the West Indies. I am quite prepared to have another look at it, and if it develops that the trade between our countries has been adversely affected by the discontinuance of this particular line of ships, then of course we might have to review the matter. But I have no knowledge at the moment that any of the trade between Canada and the West Indies is less today than it was earlier because these ships are no longer in service.

Mr. Tucker: Some time ago the Minister of Fisheries, and I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce, held a meeting with representatives of the Newfoundland salt fish trade association, the Newfoundland department of fisheries, the Newfoundland federation of fishermen, and representatives of the Nova Scotia salt fish exporters association to study the many and varied problems of the salt fish industry. I should be grateful if the minister would advise this house if he is prepared to make a statement on the outcome of this meeting.

Mr. Churchill: I believe I made a statement with regard to meeting these various organizations the other day in answer to a question in the house. My hon. friend is now asking, what was the outcome of this meeting. This meeting was very informative. I am very grateful to the people who came to Ottawa to give us the information that they had. These men had years of experience, either as fishermen themselves or in endeavouring to sell the products of the fisheries. Quite a number of suggestions were put forward with a view to the improvement of the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast.

The decision I came to, after listening to these representations along with my colleagues the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of National Revenue, was that on the official level discussions should continue, and plans would be formulated, if at all possible, aimed at improving the fishing industry of the Atlantic provinces along the lines suggested by those people who came to see us. Some of the things they mentioned had to do with the processing of the fish; the packaging of the fish; methods of shipping or warehousing; overseas shipments; general sales promotion; things of that nature. The officials have been instructed to continue negotiations and evolve a plan, and to put that plan before us as soon as that can be conveniently done.

I was impressed by the fact that the fishing industry does require something in the nature of assistance, whether it is through advice as to how best it should operate or the assistance of departmental officials in organizational plans, something along that line, I do not know. Apparently something has to be done to assist the fishing industry of the Atlantic coast. Whether the plan evolved will come from those actively engaged in fishing, from the Newfoundland provincial government, from the Department of Trade and Commerce, from the Department of Fisheries or from a combination of all four, I am not sure. However, this combination of four has been instructed to get to work to see if some plan cannot be formulated.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to follow that up for a moment, if I may. I do not want to press the minister about what he said about Jamaica. I was very much encouraged by his confident expression that we would be back in the Jamaican salt fish market at the end of this six-month period. I hope his optimism is well founded. I realize it might be awkward to pursue this matter at this time when negotiations are presumably taking place.

I should like, however, to be assured by the minister that active steps are being taken, rather more active steps than seem to have been taken about this motor car trade with China, to get back into the Brazilian market. At one time this was a very big market and it was lost because of currency restrictions, through no fault of the Canadian government. I could not be too critical of the present administration if they were not able to get back there. But I would be very critical of them, and I am sure everybody on the Atlantic coast would be very critical, if they were not trying very hard, using every possible device they can think of in negotiations to that end.

The minister said a few words about the European market, and he was kind enough to make a rather flattering reference to a speech I made, as well as to the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo who knows far more about the fishing industry than I do.

There is one brief suggestion I made yesterday that I should like to repeat to the minister today. I imagine this suggestion would actually require to be implemented through the Department of Fisheries. The minister talked about the shortage of fish for the European market. It is quite true that the quality of fish required for the Spanish and the Italian markets, which pay a better price than does any other market for salt fish, has been short the last two or three years, since Mr. Winters made his visit to Europe and negotiated the increased market there. I urged upon my colleagues in the previous administration,—without success, I admit—I urge upon the minister, and I intend to urge upon the Minister of Fisheries, that we should adopt a system of premiums for this high quality fish for a few years in the hope of having the production kept up and possibly expanded until such time as the technical and economic problem of making that improved fish in fish plants is completely solved.

The minister will perhaps recall that before the war, when we were seeking to get into the market in the United Kingdom—I know my leader knows a great deal about this matter—for bacon and cheese premiums were used very successfully to expand the Canadian production rapidly in order to get that larger fraction of United Kingdom markets which we had in those days and about which the minister spoke earlier. It seems to me that that device, which we know through experience worked very well in the case of bacon and cheese, would probably work well also in the case of this high quality fish.

Mr. Howard: A moment ago the minister made a comment I believe in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The reference was first to aluminum and whether there were any other commodities with regard to which Russia had been able to underprice us and undersell us and thus affect what may have been traditional Canadian markets. He mentioned lumber particularly as having suffered because of lower prices being offered by the Soviet union in what were traditionally our markets. I wonder first whether the minister could expand that statement that our lumber exports have suffered by mentioning the markets which we have lost or in which our sales have dropped as a result of Russian sales of lumber.

Mr. Churchill: I have not that information readily available. I would have to have it looked up and perhaps give a report to the hon. member at a later time.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make one other comment in that regard. It arises not only out of the answer just given by the minister to this specific question but out of other answers of a similar type. Would the minister not consider that it would probably be more advisable to follow the lead of his colleagues and arrange to have departmental officials here to advise him on some of these detailed questions which may arise.

Mr. Churchill: Yes; but I am waiting until we get past this first item and I am hoping now that the hon. member is suggesting that we move on,—

Mr. Howard: It is not a suggestion to move on, it is a suggestion to get some information.

Mr. Churchill: —that we may move on past the first item. The procedure is to have officials here in order to provide answers to the specific questions which are asked, not on the first item on which there is general discussion but when hon. members start asking specific questions on lumber or something like that. I think the hon. member is suggesting the officials should be here.

Mr. Howard: I should like to point out that the minister himself raised the question of lumber in the first place.

Mr. Churchill: But I did not ask a question about it.

Mr. Pearson: This is I think a general question. In rising I should like to bring the minister back to the West Indies and to his trip there in May when he was attending the ceremony on the birthday of the West Indies federation and when at a press conference he is reported as being asked by a correspondent of the London Times whether Canada regarded the West Indies as their protege rather than Britain's. The report goes on to say that the Hon. Gordon Churchill gave an answer that added up to the view that Canada did regard the West Indies as its protege rather than Britain's. Would the minister like to comment on that very important statement?

Mr. Churchill: It is a very important statement, Mr. Chairman; and my friend the Leader of the Opposition, with his fine experience of press conferences, knows perfectly well that this is a fabricated answer because it says that my answer added up to such and such. It did not say that I said it directly, and of course I did not say it at all.

Mr. McIlraith: There are one or two general matters with which I want to deal before we move on from item No. 1. They arise out of the minister's remarks this afternoon. The first one has to do with the discussion about the proposal of the chancellor of the exchequer of the United Kingdom for free trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. In dealing with all that had been said about that matter yesterday and this morning by hon. members on the opposition side of the house, the minister disposed of it rather quickly; and as I understood his remarks and tried to note them down, he tried to liken that proposal to a suggestion put forward in the same way by the Leader of the Opposition about the Atlantic area trade, and he left the whole matter there. I think it should be pointed out to hon. members that the proposal for free trade between the United Kingdom and Canada was put forward by the chancellor of the exchequer of the United Kingdom at a conference called by the Canadian government to decide whether or not a commonwealth trade conference should be held. At that conference I think all the commonwealth countries were represented by their ministers, or nearly all of them; and it is quite a different matter than a suggestion made in a speech in the house here. It is something that I do not think he should brush aside quite so lightly as he has done.

The second point I want to deal with is this. Yesterday and again today the minister dealt with the balance of trade between certain areas; that is between Canada and the United States and between Canada and the sterling bloc or the United Kingdom. In both his speech yesterday and again today he made a rather flattering reference—and I think properly so—to a speech made by the hon. member who spoke last night on balance of payments.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, the hon. member for Macleod. I want to draw to the attention of the minister one omission in his speech yesterday in relation to this subject and to find out whether there is any significance in it. I noted it yesterday when he was delivering it but I did not refer to it earlier. As reported at page 2321 of Hansard, the second column, the minister, in talking about the pattern of trade, goes on to give, for example, the commodity exports to Great Britain, the commodity exports to other commonwealth countries and to the United States. Then in the next paragraph he refers to imports from Great Britain rising by two per cent and imports from the United States falling. Then in the next paragraph he went on to say this:

> The trade figures that I have given are indicative of three developments. First, Canada's foreign trade with the world as a whole has been maintained—

And so on. Then he says this:

> Second, a certain measure of diversification and expansion of trade has taken place leading to a better balance in our trade pattern.

What concerns me is that the minister in dealing with the item gave the exports to three areas, namely the United Kingdom, the remainder of the commonwealth and the United States. He then gave the imports from two of those areas, the United States and the United Kingdom. Imports from the U.S. have of course dropped and that would make an apparent improvement in the balance of commodity trade with that area. Exports to the U.K. have risen, which would also make an apparent improvement in the blance with that country. But the minister omitted to deal with the second part of the problem. He failed completely to refer to imports from the remainder of the commonwealth, and I would respectfully suggest to the minister that if he is going to make a distinction between the rest of the commonwealth and the United Kingdom he should have elaborated a little further. If the minister will refer to the weekly bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics dated Friday, July 11, 1958 he will find in the second last paragraph on page 9 these words:

> Imports from the United Kingdom reached $116,200,000 in the first quarter of 1958, some 2 per cent higher than in the first quarter of 1957.

Then the first sentence of the last paragraph reads:

> Canadian imports from the commonwealth fell about $36 million in the first three months of 1958, some 14 per cent below their 1957 level.

What I would like to know from the minister is the reason why he dealt with the three areas in respect of export figures and only two of them in respect of import figures. Is it because he is seeking to balance the trade with each country individually or what was the reason for the rather noticeable omission?

The third matter which I wish to deal with arises out of the discussion this afternoon about the 15 per cent diversion of imports from the U.S. to the U.K., which was brushed aside rather hastily by the minister. I think it is well to place on record some of the newspaper references to this matter which are rather interesting. It will be seen that these Canadian newspapers are important ones. I think one or two of the many such references will serve to illustrate why I believe the Canadian, British and other people are entitled to believe that the Prime Minister and the government meant what they apparently said on the occasions when they advocated a policy of diverting 15 per cent of our imports from the U.S. to the U.K. Firstly, the London Times of July 8, 1957, carried an article, part of which I will quote as follows:

> Mr. Diefenbaker, the Canadian Prime Minister, told a press conference yesterday on his return from the commonwealth conference in London that Canada has as a planned objective the diversion of 15 per cent of her present imports from the United States to imports from the United Kingdom.

Then the Ottawa Journal of the same date had this to say:

> The diversion of 15 per cent of Canadian buying to the British market would make "a substantial improvement" in trade with the United Kingdom without damaging business relations with the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have mentioned this on more than one occasion, but I do not mind the repetition over and over again of a song that was sung throughout the election campaign. However, the first statement mentioning an objective, is a statement that was not made and any of these other quotations will have the same effect on this house as they had on the country when they were quoted during the election campaign.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know if the Prime Minister is now repudiating his policy.

An hon. Member: He is not.

Mr. McIlraith: But will the Prime Minister kindly extend the courtesies to other persons in this house which are extended to him?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: He holds a very high office—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Chevrier: There is no privilege.

The Chairman: The hon. the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not mind anybody misinterpreting me when I am here but when I say that a statement was not made excepting that our objective was to bring about an improvement—that was the statement—if my hon. friend wants to go on and misinterpret me and to utilize the time of the house for the repetition—

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Diefenbaker: To repeat a statement that is untrue, I will say no more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, with respect to your dealing with a question of privilege, there is none, as you will have seen. I was reading quotations from various newspapers and I propose to continue to do so in answer to something said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house this afternoon —a very important matter—when the Prime Minister of Canada was not in this house. I have no criticism of him for that—he was undoubtedly on proper and urgent business requiring his attention—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was on government business.

Mr. McIlraith: But I say we as members of this house have the right to expect one holding the very high and honourable office of Prime Minister—

Mr. Ricard: Don't get excited.

Mr. McIlraith: —to extend to hon. members who rise to speak the kind of courtesy he receives in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: And we are entitled to have you, Mr. Chairman, apply the rules to us when we speak in this house.

An hon. Member: You are whining, you are not speaking.

Mr. McIlraith: I propose to continue my remarks on the subject of item No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the remarks of the minister on that item when we were discussing the question of trade diversion from the U.S. to the U.K.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As long as you don't falsify the record.

Mr. McIlraith: If the Prime Minister will just possess his soul and have the courtesy and patience to read my remarks in Hansard he will see that when he was talking to the Minister of Trade and Commerce my remarks were in order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but in making a ruling there was no intent of discourtesy in the present debate and it would be appreciated if the hon. member would adhere to the discussion of the resolution now being considered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: You, Mr. Chairman, have no right to an opinion on whether it is discourtesy or not.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: I regret to tell the hon. member that he told me he expected me to have courtesy in this house—you yourself—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. McIlraith: I did not say that.

Mr. Chevrier: He directed his remark to the Prime Minister.

The Chairman: That was the way in which the Chair interpreted it, and it would be appreciated by the Chair if the hon. member would speak about the resolution being discussed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I made no reference to discourtesy from the chair at all.

Some hon. Members: You did.

Other hon. Members: No, he did not.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to make it very clear, Mr. Chairman, that there was nothing of that nature intended. In any event, to show how this was regarded in the country I want to read some more of these press clippings.

In the Kingston Whig-Standard of July 9, 1957, the following appears:

> Mr. Diefenbaker has returned from the commonwealth conference in London. What he proposed there came as no surprise since the new Prime Minister has long advocated more trade with Britain. He has also long been concerned about Canada's unfavourable trade balance with the United States and now proposes that 15 per cent of our purchases from that country should be diverted to Great Britain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those are observations from the press instead of quotations.

Mr. McIlraith: I am well aware of the rule but I am entitled to proceed unless I am out of order.

Then the Financial Post of October 12, 1957 had this to say:

> Mr. Diefenbaker, who started it all with his declaration that he wanted to switch 15 per cent of Canadian trade from the United States to the United Kingdom, took personal charge.

And another from the Winnipeg Tribune of October 18, 1957:

> The mission is a development that followed the suggestion of Prime Minister Diefenbaker last July that Canada switch 15 per cent of her imports from the United States to Britain. Such a move would double Canadian imports from Britain to some $1 billion a year.

The Montreal Gazette of November 22 had this to say:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker said here yesterday that he has every confidence that the Canadian trade mission to the United Kingdom will achieve its objective of diverting 15 per cent of Canadian imports from the United States to Britain and thus save this country from "ultimate economic danger."

Then, the Globe and Mail of January 24, 1958, said this:

> A preliminary but significant shift in Canadian trade has developed a trend toward the 15 per cent target suggested by Prime Minister Diefenbaker for diversion of Canadian purchases in the United States to Britain.

There are a great many more of these excerpts but there is one which is, I think, of particular interest. I refer to a comment by Sir David Eccles, reported in the Montreal Star of April 28, 1958. Sir David Eccles, who is president of the United Kingdom Board of Trade, is not an inconsequential person, as I think the Prime Minister will readily agree. He, apparently, was in some degree of uncertainty about this policy, with reference to which he had this to say:

> I think the proposed 15 per cent shift in Canadian import habits will take a few years to really get under way.
> The switch of 15 per cent will create a beneficial situation for all three countries. It will strengthen the economy of Canada and Britain and give Britain more dollars to spend on the North American market. But once again this is a long-term proposition.

The point I wanted to make was that in the light of this kind of newspaper comment in very responsible newspapers all over the country, and indeed in some outside the country, it should not be a matter of surprise, surely, that hon. members should have asked, on the estimates of the department concerned, what this policy really is, how it is working and so on. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had something to say on this subject, too, by the way. It is interesting to see what the minister had to say as reported in the Windsor Star of November 19, 1957:

> Prime Minister John G. Diefenbaker suggested last July that Canada might divert as much as 15 per cent worth of its imports from the United States to the United Kingdom.
> "Over a period of years that is not impossible," Mr. Churchill maintained.

That latter part purports to be a quotation from the minister.

Mr. Churchill: Is it in quotation marks?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that latter remark is in quotes—"Over a period of years that is not impossible." When that kind of story goes out throughout the country, surely there is some reason for believing that people concerned with trade should ask what is the policy of the government with regard to this matter. I am sure that if the Prime Minister were to read what has been said on this subject yesterday and today he would see that what has been asked have been perfectly proper inquiries in relation to the subject matter, and he would himself wish that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had taken a minute or two longer this afternoon in order to deal a little more fully with the subject than he did. I am aware of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had a great many questions to answer and that it is not always possible in one speech to gather up answers to so many questions, but when the Prime Minister looks into this he will see exactly what the problem is and, I am sure, he will share with us, though he may not care to admit it, a desire that the position should be clarified and that any impression, right or wrong, which had been created on the subject should be put right for all time.

Mr. Jones: Would the hon. member permit a question arising out of the remarks he has just made? Is he not aware that earlier this afternoon the leader of his own party said he was in favour of a return to the triangular trade pattern and claimed that the Liberal party had sought to re-establish that pattern, which would be the result achieved by the very thing which the hon. member has been criticizing.

Mr. McIlraith: I will answer the question and then have some comments to make on it. This is not a simple proposition as the hon. member seems to imply. This is a far deeper and far wider-ranging thing, involving taking away $600 million worth of business from our best customer. I would point out—and this is a very interesting thing—that in the last two days almost all the questions which have been asked by private members on the government side have been directed to hon. members on this side of the house instead of to the ministerial benches.

An hon. Member: We cannot understand you, that's why.

Mr. McIlraith: It shows the need for the government to explain its policy on these matters, and the absence of policy by the government, and the absence of explanations—

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: There being a number of divorce bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole, is it agreed that all be referred to the committee of the whole in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Taylor for the second reading of Bill No. S-4, respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Regier.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that I had just taken the floor in the debate on this bill on Friday, July 4, before six o'clock. I hope that I will be able to clear up in a few moments some of the misconceptions that were apparently held by some hon. members at that time.

To refresh our memories I might state briefly that the bill deals with a toll bridge which runs between the cities of Vancouver and North Vancouver and the purpose of the bill is to make provision for the payment of remuneration to the directors of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company and reimbursing them for their expenses in the performance of their services as directors. The shares of the company are held by the municipalities concerned and the city of Vancouver. Since that time I have taken a look at other bridge companies. There are about 250 tunnel and bridge companies in Canada incorporated under dominion charter since confederation and I cannot find one other instance in all of those bridge companies where no provision is made for the directors to be paid. That in itself is a pretty good indication that this is a reasonable and straightforward request.

The second point I wish to deal with is that some of the members brought up the interest of the taxpayers, in as much as this bridge and its shares are held by the municipalities concerned. I think that is one of the very good reasons why we should pass this bill, because we are not deciding here that these directors are going to be paid. The municipalities as shareholders will actually have the right to authorize payment. We are not saying that they are going to receive so much pay. They are setting a very low limit as to what they can be paid and that is contained in the bill. The maximum is $500 a year for a director and a slightly higher amount for the chairman of the board. Also, some other hon. members felt that this board should be compared with some of the other boards of city councils. For instance, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) had this to say as reported at page 1946 of Hansard:

> Being elected members they are in the same position as others with similar responsibilities.

He was referring to the fact that all of the members of the board of directors are also members of the city and municipal councils which are involved. He continued:

> If you are a member of a city council, a municipal council or a rural municipal council your work is designated by the council. You may be called upon to serve on a library board, a sewer board and undertake all the various responsibilities that go with election to office. Quite bluntly, I cannot see why there should be any differentiation between the responsibilities of a member of a council serving on a library board or sewer board and those of a director of a bridge company engaged in rendering a service.

Since that time I have received from one of the aldermen of the city of Vancouver certain information in this respect in which he states that he has sat on the greater Vancouver water board and also on the greater Vancouver sewerage board and for that service he has received $15 a meeting, and those meetings often take place more than once a month, which would mean perhaps that he would be receiving $30 a month or some $360 a year in remuneration on that basis. He also states that he has put in considerably more time on the bridge board than he has ever put in on the other boards involved. Therefore, it becomes apparent that even if the maximum rate were put into effect the men would not be overpaid.

I hope that this will clear up some of the misconceptions, because members of those other boards are paid and also, as I have pointed out, all of the other bridge authorities from one end of Canada to the other pay their directors. I did not look over the entire 250 but I did look through 50 or 60 of them and in many instances it was stated in the charter that provision was made for the municipalities to take them over. There was the understanding that some of them might be municipally owned but still there was provision for the directors to be paid. In the light of the new facts that we have to go on, it will be seen that there is no need for the amendment that is before us and this bill could be properly passed.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the house for more than two or three minutes. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) moved his amendment in good faith in order to protect the taxpayers of the municipalities. Since this bill was first discussed—I do wish that when it was brought up more information had been available to hon. members—I have received more information and other Vancouver members have also received information which should make it quite clear that this is not asking for anything to which we should not agree.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) has said, other municipal boards, the Vancouver sewerage board and the water board, pay the members of the board on an honorarium basis. School boards on which I have served are quite free to pay themselves if they so wish. The criterion in this bill is that the municipalities themselves own all the shares in the bridge and they would have to authorize payment. All that we are being asked to do is to make it possible for the municipalities if they so wish to do so. They are free to pay the directors within the limit stipulated within the bill. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment should be withdrawn but if the hon. member is not willing to withdraw it we should defeat it, pass the bill and leave to the municipalities concerned the right to run their own affairs instead of our trying to tell them what they can or cannot do.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have just one comment or two. The last two hon. members who have participated in this debate, especially the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), indicated that some additional information had been received which would warrant the withdrawal of the amendment to refer it to a committee first. But with no indication as to what this additional information is, where it emanated from, what effect it would have on clearing up our lack of understanding and that expressed by members of the Conservative party when the bill was being debated on another day; with no clear indication from the councils of the municipalities owning practically all the shares in the bridge and tunnel company, we cannot properly be expected to agree to withdraw the motion for referral to a committee first. If the bill is put before a committee in the manner we have suggested there will then be ample opportunity to determine the actual position of the municipal councils which to date, so far as I am aware and from the information given to the house, has not been indicated in any shape or form.

Without such an indication I do not see how hon. members can properly expect that we could consider not pressing our amendment and insisting that the bill not now receive second reading until such time as this lack of information is cleared up and we definitely know what the position of the municipal councils is and not just that of one or two selected individuals.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Regier) which was negatived on the following division:

CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF TIMISKAMING

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry-Prescott) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-5, respecting the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to change the name of the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming to the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of the Diocese of Timmins, to modernize its charter, which has not been revised since 1910, and to bring its objects, purposes and powers in line with its present requirements. The revised and added clauses are similar to those now usually included in private acts incorporating religious bodies.

In 1910, the diocese was known for ecclesiastical purposes as the Vicariate Apostolic of Timiskaming: it is now known for such purposes as the Diocese of Timmins. Clause 1 of the present bill gives statutory recognition to the new designation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-7, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company and certain wholly owned subsidiaries.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to outline just briefly the purpose of this bill. The Canadian Pacific railway over a period of years have assumed control over a number of subsidiaries which have been embodied in the C.P.R. system. In order to simplify the corporate organization of the C.P.R., they wish to dissolve these companies as subsidiaries and to take over the assets and the liabilities of the companies as outlined in the bill. This is the third project. They have already done this with respect to two other groups, in 1956 when 13 were dissolved and in 1957 when 14 were dissolved. I may make it quite clear that they are still maintaining the same services, they are employing their own men on these railways and there will be no change in the employment of the people concerned. It is a matter of reorganization for administrative purposes. I also want to state to the house that when this bill is referred to the committee the officials of the company will be present to answer any questions that any hon. members might have in respect of these companies. Of the nine companies mentioned here, seven are dominion companies and will be dissolved by this act. The other companies are provincial companies and would have to be dealt with by the provincial jurisdiction. This act deals with the assets and liabilities of these companies in so far as the dominion jurisdiction extends to them.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, while we in this group fully appreciate the explanation given by the hon. member with respect to the purpose of this bill which, according to the explanatory note, is to simplify the corporate organization of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on behalf of this group I want to say a word or two.

These bills coming before the house to cancel the charters of various subsidiaries and to bring them within the terms of the parent company indicate the number of charters that were granted years ago to these railway companies throughout Canada. Only two sessions ago, I think it was, we had a number of bills with the same purpose with respect to a number of railways in British Columbia. I occasionally look up the grants these various railway companies have received in the way of land, money and things of that sort. Anyone who reads the history of railway development in Canada realizes that the Canadian Pacific railway and all the subsidiaries that are now being incorporated or brought within the fold of the company did very well in the early days with respect to grants of land or cash from the federal government or, in some cases, from the provincial government.

I think these bills to simplify the corporate organization of the C.P.R. clearly indicate a certain trend in this country. We are not going to oppose this bill because we realize that under these circumstances this is the common sense thing to do. However, we are taking this opportunity to bring a few things to the attention of the house. I think it was two sessions ago that we had another bill that provided for the abandonment of a certain portion of the C.P.R. between Kaslo and New Denver and at that time as a sort of carrot held out to local people was the fact that the government of British Columbia was going to take over the right of way and use it as a standard highway and so on. To date there has been no action in that respect. Consequently that portion of the district has been completely without rail services or highway services satisfactory for the hauling out of mining commodities since that time.

Not only these bills to simplify the corporate organization of the C.P.R. but those to abandon certain sections of the railway in certain parts of Canada and also to reduce services as has been done on the Kettle Valley railway in recent months—a situation which we tried to correct by introducing in this house a bill which was unfortunately defeated—we presume are efforts to lower costs because of changing circumstances in Canada. As far as we are concerned, they all indicate a fluid and uncertain situation in Canada with respect to railway transportation.

From the point of view of this group, we think that all these measures to simplify the corporate organization of the C.P.R., to abandon certain sections of the line entirely and to reduce service on other sections of the line indicate the necessity for a national transportation policy which we in this group have urged for many years. We consider that railways are a very important utility—possibly the most important one—linking all regions in Canada, and certainly very necessary for the transportation of goods produced in this country from one point to another. It is for that reason that the C.C.F. believe in the necessity for an over-all national transportation policy as a result of action by the government of Canada which will integrate our rail, water, air and road transportation to the end that we may have some logical development of our transportation services so that we are able to provide the people of Canada with adequate and necessary transportation services at the lowest cost possible having regard to the national needs of Canada, and the people of Canada first. Second, we in the C.C.F. believe that a national transportation policy would be to the advantage of the employees of the railway companies of this country and to the employees of the other transportation agencies.

In that connection, before resuming my seat, I also wish to illustrate the need for some sort of over-all transportation policy and control so far as developments, extensions, roads and pensions are concerned. We all know that the pensioners of the C.P.R. who retired prior to January 1, 1953, have been asking for amendment of their pensions. These long service railroaders are being denied justice at the present time because they are pensioned at a very much lower rate than are those who were pensioned after January 1, 1953. I am sure all members of this house have from time to time received briefs from railroad organizations and from the men concerned—

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member intends to be very brief, but he is wandering rather far afield from the purpose of this bill.

Mr. Herridge: I am just winding up, Mr. Speaker. In one sentence I want to say that something should be done to remedy this situation because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the United States has granted a 49 per cent increase to the same category of worker while here in Canada our men are still denied this very much warranted increase in their pensions.

Coming back to the purpose of the bill, in accordance with your wishes, Mr. Speaker, I do want to emphasize this need for a transportation policy, and also to say that I took this opportunity to make these few remarks because we have so little opportunity to express our credo on transportation matters.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I only have a word or so to say with regard to the bill just introduced by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton).

This bill is a very important one to us because, if I remember rightly, something along this line has already been done with regard to the operations of the Canadian National Railways.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the explanations given by the hon. member, and I will tell him at once that we, in the opposition, have no objection at all to that bill especially as regards the principle involved. I hope it will be referred to a committee, probably the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

In principle, Mr. Speaker, we support any step which is not designed to centralize government in Ottawa, but to centralize railway operation of a series of companies, such as Canadian Pacific Railways subsidiaries mentioned here. This will not only make the administration of that corporation easier, but also simplify its organization.

I said a moment ago that when I was with the Department of Transport a few years ago, the Canadian National Railways felt it wise to take this same course. I believe that in that instance the Canadian National Railways had placed a series of corporations—there were several—under the control of a single company. I believe that all these operations had to do with the Canadian National Railways hotels and that the purpose of incorporation was to simplify the management of the hotels of the Canadian National Railways.

Along with my colleagues on this side of the house, I feel that, from an administrative point of view, this bill is an excellent thing for the Canadian Pacific Railways. Not only will its implementation make organization and administration of that company easier, but it will be extremely useful in the matter of accounting, which is very important.

That is why we support that motion and hope that it will be referred for further study to the committee of railways, canals and telegraph lines.

(Text):

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): May I make one observation with respect to the comments of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). He seemed to imply—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Mr. Morton: The hon. member seemed to imply that the services of the companies mentioned were being abandoned. I think that would be an unfair implication to be drawn because that is not the intention of the company.

Mr. Herridge: I quite understand the hon. member's explanation but I was taking the opportunity to refer to some other services which had been abandoned which had cut us to the quick.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member not comment on my remarks also?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

TRANS MOUNTAIN OIL PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, July 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Broome for the second reading of Bill No. S-6, respecting Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it appears that the fates are not operating very kindly for me, for upon reflection it seems to me that last week when I made a few comments on this matter it was at about this time and I did not get the opportunity to conclude my remarks. I hope I will be able to do so today.

Last week at about six o'clock the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), the sponsor of this bill, directed a question to me which I was unable to grasp at the time. Upon looking at Hansard for July 11 and reading the question, I hope I am now in a position to answer. The question asked as recorded at page 2183 of Hansard for that date was as follows:

> Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware that not one cent was made in promotion fees in the promotion of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company?

Then, I expect in explanation he continued:

> In reading the prospectus I tried to point out that every cent raised went into the treasury of the company and was used for the development of the company.

I suppose the hon. member's question arose out of my remarks just preceding his question, which were with reference to the fact that the oil and gas pipe line industry in general was a most lucrative one, with which I am sure he will not disagree. At that time I had no specific reference to the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company. It was a general reference to the industry and the profitable state in which that industry had been for many years, both here in Canada and particularly in the United States.

Following those remarks as to the lucrative state of the industry both with respect to oil and gas pipe lines and the public services which such pipe lines provide, I was leading up to the opinions expressed by other members of the C.C.F., both verbally and in formal form by motion in the year 1951 when the company was originally incorporated. For the benefit of hon. members who have not read the history of this company, we offered the suggestion that this particular pipe line company, inasmuch as it did provide a public service, should be operated under public ownership, the same solution as we suggested should be applied to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in the years later than 1951. At that time, in 1951, with respect to this company, and in later years with respect to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company, we in the C.C.F. could foresee the present state of events, and while there have been tremendous earnings and tremendous profits in this particular company there has probably not been the type of stock market manipulation which has taken place with respect to the gas pipe lines industry where, probably, the reasons for public ownership are even more pronounced than they are here. That was the trend of my remarks which occasioned the hon. member for Vancouver South to ask his question, and I am sure that if he will read in Hansard what I said he will realize that there was no need to have directed that question to me, and that the matter does not require any more extended answer than I gave in my explanatory remarks.

An idea of the resources and the profit making capacity of this company has already been placed on the record, together with the number of shares placed on the market. At one time I understand they cost in the neighbourhood of $140 a share compared with $10 when they were originally put on the market and at the time these shares were being sold on the market for $140 this company approached parliament with the selfsame bill asking for the same thing that they are asking now, that is, in effect a stock split of five to one by an increase in the number of shares which they might issue. Apparently the reasons advanced last year in favour of this proposal do not differ too greatly from those which the officials of the company are putting forward at this time, namely that the price of the shares on the market when they were at $140 a share was too high and that if additional shares were put on the market for sale the company would have a difficult time selling them to the general public because few people would care to pay $140 for a share in Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company when there was every possibility that the price of the shares might decline and that they could be bought later on at a lower price. By splitting five to one, or by increasing the number of shares that the company may issue, the $140 divided by five would equal $28—this was one year ago—and the shares then, if this bill had been proceeded with a year ago, would have been reduced to $28 a share on the market.

We find, now, that if that same reasoning of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company were to be applied to the request for a change in their capital structure this year, they should properly not have asked for a five to one split but only for a two to one split. I do not know what the actual price of these shares is today, but it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50 to $60. If the reasoning was that the company wanted these shares to get down to, say, $28 when they were selling at $140, then, surely, when they are selling at between $50 and $60, to get them down on the market to a share price in the area of $28 we can reasonably assume that they should have asked for a two to one stock split.

I wonder why the company still requires a five to one division now. If their reasoning was valid a year ago they should either have asked for a greater increase in the stock split ratio before or for a lesser increase now in order to keep their thoughts now in tune with what they were a year ago. Now when the officials of this company undertook to meet with those of us in the C.C.F. party who had expressed some interest in this particular bill, they answered a number of questions and made a number of general comments, and if my memory serves me right the figure I jotted down indicated that they had put on the market on their original capitalization—and if I am incorrect I am sure I will be corrected—1,500,000 shares, or something in that neighbourhood, as of 1956, and as of today that same amount is out and the company has not issued any more shares from its treasury.

We asked the officials at that time whether, if they had put more shares on the market out of the original five million shares which the company issued that would not have had some effect on holding down the number of the shares.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. Shall item No. 391 carry?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries may I say that when we left it at five o'clock we had been subjected by the Prime Minister to some interesting observations concerning the 15 per cent diversion proposal, a matter about which he seems to be exceedingly sensitive. All I want to say about that is, as was said by the hon. member for Ottawa West, that everybody in Canada who read about it in the newspapers, everybody in the United States or in the United Kingdom who read about it in the newspapers, thought there was such a proposal and referred to it as such. It was allowed to be considered as a proposal during the election campaign and it accomplished its purpose presumably at that time and now it is to be forgotten and we are not supposed to mention it. Apparently the election decided that diversion should die. The first obituary notice that I discovered was in a United States magazine, the U. S. News and World Report. As a matter of fact, I think I have come across not only the obituary notice of this proposal but its birth notice. It lived from 1953 until 1958, because on July 10, 1953, speaking in Red Deer Hill, Alberta, the Prime Minister is reported by the Prince Albert Herald as having said, and I quote from this newspaper account of the statement he made at that time:

> Britain could buy Canadian products if she had the dollars—15 per cent of Canada's present defence needs are being purchased in the United States, but should be bought in the United Kingdom, as well as heavy machinery.

This was in 1953. There is the birth of the 15 per cent proposal, which has now apparently died.

There is one other matter, though, Mr. Chairman, that I want to bring up before we leave this item because I am not clear in my own mind as to what is the situation actually, although the minister did his best this afternoon to explain it. It is in connection with the list of prohibited exports to China. The minister said this afternoon that that list had been made public in January, 1957, and that if any member of the committee wants to find out what goods are on that prohibited list and, therefore, not eligible for export to communist China under present conditions all he has to do is read the list. But it was my impression—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong about this and I think it is a matter of some importance—that at that time there was a list of prohibited goods for China which was more extensive than the list of prohibited goods for Russia and that international discussions began to remove that differential in 1957.

What I should like to ask the minister is, are these discussions still going on? Are we obliged to take no action in regard to the reduction of that list of prohibited goods until we get agreement with all the members of the commission in Paris. Are any other members of that group—most of them are NATO countries—and particularly is the United Kingdom, observing the same list of prohibited exports to China as we are, or is our list the same as that of the United States but not the same as that of some other countries? What is the exact position in regard to that matter? If the minister is not in a position to give me details of that matter at the present moment perhaps he might be able to do it later when he has his officials before him.

Mr. Churchill: Just a comment, Mr. Chairman; my understanding is that the prohibited China list was much more extensive at one time than the list in so far as other communist countries were concerned, but that within recent months, or within the last year, there was no dissimilarity between the two lists. Then, we moved a step farther and conferences that are now taking place are aimed at reducing the items on the list still farther.

Mr. McIlraith: In view of the rather lengthy discussion about trade with China yesterday and today, I wonder whether the minister would care to give the committee any information that he feels he can about the Chinese group who are in Canada at the present time apparently on a buying or selling mission. In this morning's Montreal Gazette I found a story headed up: "Red China winds up city tour." The article refers to their presence in Montreal. There have been other similar types of stories in the papers in the last few days.

Mr. Churchill: I have been informed that two representatives from China have been in Canada for some time and are here for the purposes of trade, representing some, if not all, of the state trading corporations in China, of which there are 16, and that these gentlemen have visited various cities in Canada. I think they were in Ottawa about two weeks ago and are in Montreal at the present time and are engaged in a buying and selling mission. I have heard that they were interested in the subject of wheat and my hope is that perhaps they will find it possible to make arrangements for the purchase of another cargo of Canadian wheat. That is all I know with regard to them. I think there are two of them. Are there more than two mentioned in the article?

Mr. McIlraith: No, just the two.

Mr. Churchill: That is all I know about these two gentlemen who are in Canada at the present time.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Again on China, the minister said last evening that the jurisdiction of the trade commissioner in Hong Kong—if "jurisdiction" is the right word—extends to continental China—that is communist China—as well as to certain other territories, including Taiwan. I should like to ask the minister whether it is contemplated that the trade commissioner in Hong Kong will make, as part of his routine duties, periodic trips to continental China as is normally the case with trade commissioners in respect of territories which they cover and whether the Chinese government in Peking accepts our trade commissioner's trade credentials, not diplomatic but trade credentials, over the territory in question of the communist government of China.

Mr. Churchill: I think that as a result of his visit there last fall and arising from the contacts he made with the heads and representatives of the trading corporations in the four cities he visited Mr. Forsyth-Smith will go back to China, continue his investigations and continue to maintain close relations with those who are so actively engaged in trade. I do not know what his plans are at the moment but it would appear to me to be quite worth while that he should do so. In his messages back home he has repeatedly urged that Canadian businessmen visit Hong Kong and China and get acquainted with the representatives of these trading corporations. They have offices in Hong Kong in addition to their headquarters in Peking, Canton, Shanghai and so on. He feels that by making personal contacts our Canadian businessmen might be able to enlarge our business in China and that this would be best done in that manner. I suppose the point of contact for our Canadian businessmen would first be in Hong Kong with Mr. Forsyth-Smith who could then advise them as to what course of action to follow after that.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, may I first of all thank the minister for answering, in the course of his remarks this afternoon, a question which has been bothering me for quite some time relative to the importation into Canada of tractors from the United States which are originally made in Great Britain. Has the minister given any consideration to the suggestion I made that the government, through the high commissioner in London, might conceivably encourage the Massey-Harris-Ferguson Company in Great Britain to have the tractors that are used in the Canadian market assembled in Canada rather than Canada purchasing such tractors from the United States?

The amount of money spent on the tractors imported from the United States is considerable, something like $150 million, and the financial situation would not be changed in any way. Great Britain would get the same amount of return and I believe it would create employment in Canada if these tractors were assembled in this country rather than in the United States. I wonder whether the minister might, through the high commissioner in London encourage Massey-Harris-Ferguson to make use of its subsidiaries in Canada for the assembling of these tractors in this country.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to thank the hon. gentleman for what appears to be a very useful suggestion and I will see that the matter is taken up with the appropriate officials in London.

Mr. Cardin: Thank you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he recalls the approximate date—I do not mean the exact date—he first saw one of the documents prepared in his department for official use and for the use of the minister entitled, "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1957?"

Mr. Churchill: I find it very difficult to recall the date. I was rather busily engaged last fall in certain travels but I think it was perhaps late in the fall that it came to my attention. I could not take my oath on the date at all. Whether it was November, December or January I am not in a position to state.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then the minister did not see this document before preparations were made for the Mont Tremblant conference? One would have thought that this would be the kind of document that the minister would use in preparation for that conference and I wondered whether that might perhaps assist him in recalling.

Mr. Churchill: The difficulty there is that the Mont Tremblant conference took place just at the end of September. In the early part of September I was out west for two or three days making a speech at the annual meeting of the dairy council. That was followed by two or three days inspecting the northern Ontario gas pipe line. On my return to Ottawa I left after a very short interval for a ten-day trip to England and Europe. I recall getting back here on a Friday at noon and leaving by plane for Mont Tremblant at 2.30 with a brief case filled with documents. That document may have been in the brief case but I had very little opportunity to make the type of preparation for the Mont Tremblant conference that it required. Under those circumstances my memory fails me whether or not the document was there or whether I had time to read it if it was there.

Mr. Pickersgill: What prompted my query was not just idle curiosity. Some hon. members who were here in the last parliament will doubtless recall that during the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, a consideration which was interrupted by a rather dramatic event that some of us will remember for a long time, the Minister of Justice told us, in response to a question of mine, what kind of economic and other information was available to the government and to him at the time the decision was made by the government virtually to stop immigration. As found on page 4068 of Hansard for January 30, 1958, the Minister of Justice said:

> Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has asked me to acquaint the committee in general terms with the considerations that were placed before me at the end of June on the basis of which we issued the order to implement the winter immigration program for the winter months of 1957-58. In answer I can tell him that in the department with which we are now dealing I was acquainted early by the officials with the economic forecasts that had come to their attention—

I know of my personal knowledge that this was one of those documents.

> —and which placed upon economic conditions and the prospects for the future a very different interpretation from that which we had been given by the previous government in the budget in March and in the election campaign during May and June.

At that point, Mr. Marler very properly interposed the word "nonsense". Mr. Fulton went on:

> There should be no hesitation about admitting that. I suspect that the forecasts that were laid before me then and which have been laid before me since bear out the economic forecast tabled in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister the other day.

That was the document to which I had reference a moment ago. Now, sir, I have always assumed, and I think in fact I could demonstrate that we were told in the last parliament, that that decision to restrict immigration was not a decision made on his own by the acting minister of citizenship and immigration as he then was but that the decision was made by the cabinet in the light of all the information then available to all the ministers who would have participated in that decision.

The Minister of Justice admitted, in the most categorical language, that this information was available to him at the end of June, 1957. It does seem rather strange to me, if that information was available to him and discussions based on that information were carried on in the cabinet—I am not attempting to penetrate the secrets of the cabinet at all—it would have been very logical, and perhaps very obvious, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to have received that documentation in his department. A decision of this importance, particularly a decision made by a government which had campaigned throughout the country on the basis of doubling the modest immigration program we had up to that time, I can only assume was a very serious and grave decision, and that all the possible information that might be brought to bear upon it was brought to bear upon it.

I do feel, therefore, it would be of some interest to know at what date the minister considered that document, and at what date he had begun the planning of the administration of his department in relation to the information contained in that document which we were told, on an occasion last January, was a document of transcendent importance and which revealed all that was going to happen in the economy of Canada for the rest of the year. It does, I think, cast a rather curious reflection upon the minister's administration of his department in the first five or six months he was minister that he is unable to recollect when he first saw this document which contained this startling information that the Prime Minister revealed to us in such dramatic fashion in January.

Another reason, of course, for my curiosity about this matter is that we were assured—perhaps it would hardly be in order for me to go this far afield—by the Prime Minister at the time of the federal-provincial conference in November, and we were assured by the Minister of Labour as late as December 10, 1957 in most categorical fashion, that all was rosy with the Canadian economy. There does seem to be a good deal of evidence, to which the minister has contributed a little more this evening, that the government, apart from the Minister of Justice who admitted quite frankly he had the information, seems to have been extraordinarily unaware of the situation which burst upon them with such dramatic suddenness in January. I do not know whether, in the light of what I have recalled to the minister's mind, I have assisted him at all in his recollections.

Mr. Pearson: Following up this matter a little bit, Mr. Chairman, the minister will remember, as we remember, how bitterly we on this side were attacked last January by the Prime Minister because we kept secret the contents of this report in 1957, to which my hon. friend has referred. We hid it, and that was a dastardly crime to parliament and to the public. It became the hidden report. We refused to make it public at that time, and that was our sin and our crime.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Justice compounded the felony.

Mr. Pearson: I am very anxious to free the minister from the possibility of any such accusation in respect of the report for 1958, the report which has now been completed and is in the possession of the government, and on the conclusions of which no doubt the Minister of Finance based, in part at least, his economic and financial calculations for his budget. So that the minister may not be subject to this accusation of hiding a report from parliament, I wonder whether he would take advantage of this opportunity to give us some information about the conclusions of the report which is now in the possession of the government and which deals with the present fiscal year?

Mr. Churchill: I am very grateful, Mr. Chairman, for the solicitude shown by the Leader of the Opposition for my integrity, and the care he takes about my future in regard to this report. My recollection is, however, that the Prime Minister, in response to a question asked in the house several weeks ago, gave the appropriate answer concerning this report and other reports of a confidential nature which circulate within the departments of government.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, the Prime Minister said it would not be proper to table this report or make it public until January, 1959. But, the Prime Minister attacked us very bitterly and vehemently because we did not make public the report for 1957 in the spring and summer of 1957. If we were wrong in concealing that report at that time, is the government not wrong in concealing at this time this report for the next year?

Mr. Churchill: I thought that the accusation levelled at the former administration was that, having the knowledge contained in that celebrated report, they failed to act upon it and misled the people.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend will read the record of that debate he will find that the charge was that we kept that report hidden. We heard about it not only in the House of Commons but all over the country during the election campaign. It was a crime against the public interest to have kept that report hidden; that is how it got the name "hidden report". So what about the report for this year?

Mr. Baskin: You told the Canadian people the opposite.

Mr. Pearson: What about the report for this year? Is it in a different category?

Mr. Habel: Are you not misleading the people of Canada now?

Mr. Churchill: The economic survey for 1958 will be studied very carefully, and has been studied very carefully, and the government, in its judgment, will act in accordance with that report, as we thought the former government should have done.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, I convict the minister out of the mouth of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice admitted quite unequivocally in the passage I read from Hansard, that one of the senior members of the government—I do not believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce would deny his influence as a member of the government—not only had but acted upon that information in July. In other words, if there was anything wrong about our attitude to that report before June, surely it was much more wrong for the government and for the Minister of Justice to have kept it hidden after it was discovered in late June, and for the Minister of Justice to have failed to tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce what was in it or to tell the Minister of Labour what was in it, instead of letting him go on giving these rosy pictures of the economy which were given by the Prime Minister to the premiers of the provinces when they were here in November, and which were given in public utterances by the Minister of Labour, the member of the government having the special responsibility for unemployment.

So if there is any kind of charge that when we received this report in March we did not act upon it, a charge which is totally false, incidentally—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, anyone who will make an honest and careful comparison of that document with Mr. Harris' budget speech will see that Mr. Harris very faithfully reproduced in his budget speech the conclusions of that document. What the Prime Minister did do, in the most shocking piece of misrepresentation this parliament has ever seen, was to take bits and pieces out of that document to deceive the public for political purposes.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. McGee: There are two matters that I should like the hon. member to confirm, he having been so close to the administration at the time. Did that report state or did it not that heavy unemployment was anticipated? The second question is this. Did not the election pamphlets of 1957 say "Vote St. Laurent for More Jobs"?

Mr. Pickersgill: I could look the matter up very quickly for the hon. member. It forecast exactly what happened. It stated that it was expected that employment would increase all through 1957 and employment did increase all through 1957.

Mr. Baskin: Because there was a change in government.

Mr. Pickersgill: If hon. gentlemen who are making these unintelligent noises will look at the statistics they will find that all during 1957 employment did increase.

The Chairman: Order. We are possibly straying a little bit away from the present resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Will the hon. gentleman take his seat while the chairman is standing?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

The Chairman: As I was saying, we are straying a bit away, I believe, from the present resolution. At the present time we are discussing a resolution that deals with departmental administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are not really discussing the resolution when we are discussing the record of the Liberal administration of years past.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all, Mr. Chairman. What I was discussing was a document issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce and introduced into this parliament by the Prime Minister. I was attempting to find out when the minister, the present incumbent of that office, took cognizance of that document which the Prime Minister himself said was the most important economic document prepared for the previous government and available to them when they came into office. Surely nothing could be more relevant to the discussion of the estimates and the administration of the department by the minister than the question as to whether the minister, after he took office, spent his time travelling around the country, getting off one plane and getting into another, or whether he spent some time familiarizing himself with the duties of his office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. I believe there are too many speakers in this room tonight. There is no reason to interrupt the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and it would be appreciated if hon. members would listen to what he has to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may continue my reply to the hon. member for York-Scarborough, I was saying that this was a forecast. That is all this document was, a sort of economic weather forecast. The gentleman who prepared this document was well trained. I have no doubt about that. But he did not know what was going to happen all through 1957 any more than did anybody else except the Creator.

Mr. Baskin: Who trained him?

Mr. Pickersgill: Judging from the faith that the Prime Minister had in every word in that document, he evidently had a high opinion of his capacity.

Mr. Baskin: What about Harris?

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may continue, Mr. Chairman, to answer the hon. member for York-Scarborough, may I say that what that document forecast was that employment would continue to rise throughout 1957 but that the rate of increase might be slower than it had been in 1956. That is precisely what happened.

Mr. McGee: That is not how you described it last January.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not catch that remark.

Mr. McGee: That is not how you described it last January.

Mr. Pickersgill: How I described what last January?

Mr. McGee: The unemployment situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: The unemployment situation last January was, as the Prime Minister himself admitted, becoming very serious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for York-Scarborough apparently was not listening as attentively as he usually does because I was talking about employment. I was not talking about unemployment. There is no doubt that unemployment did increase much more rapidly than there was any ground for expecting it to increase on the basis of that so-called hidden report. There are some of us who feel that part of the reason why it increased more rapidly than was expected was because of a certain event that happened last June.

Mr. Pearson: Leaving that report and returning to the current report which is certainly in order because it deals with the work of the department this year, I wonder whether the minister would give us some indication of the conclusions of this economic report from his department and more particularly tell us whether it agrees with the Minister of Finance's budgetary statement that our gross national product will increase by 2 per cent while our price level will remain constant during the year, and, in general, the economic trends that it forecasts. I am sure that information would be very interesting to the house and perhaps very important.

Mr. Churchill: If the Leader of the Opposition has reached the conclusion that the Minister of Finance based some of his budget remarks on the report to which reference has been made, I think the question now put should be put before the Minister of Finance. I do not think I am called upon to explain the connection, if any, between one report and another. I would hope that the ancient report of 1957, allegedly twice lost or hidden, might now be buried, that the 1958 report might be safely left where it is, and that perhaps we could get on with questions dealing with trade and commerce.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I want to get back to the Soviet trade offensive for a moment or two, if I can, and get away from the hidden sins of both the Liberal party and the Conservative party. I do not see any difference between hiding a report in 1957 and hiding it in 1958. Sometime ago we learned of a letter that was sent by the Soviet premier, Nikita Khrushchev, to the President of the United States proposing a tremendous increase in trade between the United States and Russia. According to Premier Krushchev's letter he envisaged trade of several billion dollars. I should like to know whether there has been any consultation or exchange of notes between the government of Canada and the Soviet union as to increasing trade between our two countries. What study is the government making on improving or increasing the amount of trade between Canada and Russia? Has a similar proposal been made to Canada? I think we will all agree—and certainly the Americans agreed, although they turned it down—that it was a very important and far-reaching proposal and that it was another indication of the all-out Soviet trade offensive. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that we in this group believe that the government should do everything possible to increase trade with all nations of the world in non-strategic goods. I would hope that the minister would be able to give the committee a fairly comprehensive report on just what Canada is doing to increase trade with this very large and important nation?

Mr. Churchill: There has been no exchange of notes of a nature similar to the one to which my hon. friend refers, so far as I know, between Canada and Russia. We are actively interested in expanding our trade everywhere in the world, as I have stated on so many occasions. We have had conversations with the Russian representatives here in Ottawa with regard to expanding trade between our two countries. We have had from time to time reports from businessmen who have visited Russia with regard to the possibility of enlarging Canada's trade with that country.

I think we have been quite active so far as Russia is concerned and we are quite prepared to trade with that country. We have in fact had a fairly satisfactory deal with Russia in respect to wheat during the last two or three years.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could say whether any substantial official trade delegation to the Soviet union has been considered. There was some discussion some time ago as to whether the minister himself might make a trip to China this fall, and I believe the Prime Minister was rather noncommital in this respect. I wonder if the government has given this matter any consideration, and I would hope it has, with respect to the sending of a trade delegation to Asia, particularly to China and the Soviet union. I would think if Canada received an offer in somewhat similar terms to that made by Premier Khrushchev to the United States it would be advisable for Canada to consider such an offer as a serious one and to negotiate with the Soviet union on the basis of such an offer because at the present time with the widespread unemployment in this country, any very large increase in Canada's exports would help to restore full employment. I hope the government, and the minister in particular, are giving consideration to this idea.

Mr. Churchill: The second part of my hon. friend's question was hypothetical. It had something to do with "if a similar note came, would we do something about it".

The first part of his question was whether or not I was contemplating a visit or was arranging for an official trade mission to Russia and the answer to that is no, not at the present time. We have in mind and are considering various visits but have not yet reached a decision as to where such visits should be made. The important thing to consider in undertaking trade missions or visits on the part of the officials and the minister of this department is as to where we can get the greatest advantage, tradewise from those visits. Now it sounds interesting to talk about China or Russia but there are other parts of the world where our trading relations have been closer and where our trade is greater and where trade expansion might be more easily achieved. All these factors will be taken into account before any decision is reached as to where missions from Canada may be sent.

Mr. Argue: I would hope, Mr. Chairman, in the light of the world situation at this time and in view of the great need for expanded markets the minister himself would very seriously consider heading up an official Canadian delegation to China and the Soviet union in order to discuss the possibilities of a vast expansion of trade between Canada and those countries. I would now like to ask the minister to comment on a report in tonight's Citizen by Bruce Phillips which in part states as follows:

> U.S. officials in Ottawa will ask their government to lift import quotas against Canadian oil.
> Diplomatic sources say U.S. embassy staff here have undergone a change of outlook on the subject of import controls, and will make their views known in Washington.
> They have, apparently, accepted the Canadian government's contention that Canada's oil represents a vital source of supply in terms of continental defence, and should therefore be exempt from import barriers.

Could the minister say whether the government is making progress in this regard and does he hold forth hopes of the so-called voluntary restrictions possibly being lifted soon?

Mr. Churchill: It is obvious from the article that the government has been making great progress and I do hold out great hopes.

Mr. Robichaud: In the course of his remarks this afternoon the minister said that our lumber exports have suffered from Soviet competition. I would like the minister to answer this question, and I am sure he can do so without the assistance of his officials because it has nothing to do with statistics. The economy of the Atlantic provinces is closely related to the export of pulpwood and pit props. We all realize that in recent months, especially in the last 12 months, the export of pit props to the European market has dropped considerably and we are told that even Great Britain, with whom we are anxious to increase our trade, is buying its pulpwood and pit props from Russia and from countries under Russian domination.

Mr. Churchill: And from Finland.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell us what action is being taken by the government with respect to instructing his department to try to bring back to normal the export of pulpwood and pit props from the maritime provinces.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I took a very active interest in the question of pit props which were exported in considerable quantity from the maritime provinces and last fall, when the president of the board of trade from the United Kingdom was in this country with his officials, we discussed this matter. Subsequently when I was in England later that fall we again discussed it and exchanged correspondence about it. We communicated with the appropriate government officials in the maritime provinces and there was some difference of opinion with regard to price of pit props from the maritimes. The market had in part been lost to Russia or Finland but we did everything in our power to re-open it. I do not know the situation at the present moment.

Mr. Robichaud: What about pulpwood?

Mr. Churchill: Well I have no answer with regard to pulpwood. That was not discussed at the time and here is a case where statistics would be helpful as to exports of that commodity.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister must surely know that in past years we had a considerable market for pulpwood in France and in Great Britain. We have apparently completely lost these markets and the same would apply to long lumber. Considerable quantities of long lumber were exported from the maritime provinces, particularly eastern New Brunswick, to Great Britain and Ireland. I do not have the statistics so I am in the same position as the minister at this time, but I am given to understand that the exports of long lumber to the European market have been practically nil since the first of this year.

Mr. Churchill: I will have to look into the matter and will give an answer to my hon. friend on some other occasion.

Mr. Pearson: I quite agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia. We should do whatever we can, and I am sure the minister agrees with this, to develop our trade in all markets, including our trade in non-strategic goods with communist countries such as China and Russia. It is true that the development of such trade is now being affected by the Soviet economic policy of forcing goods on world markets, perhaps in some cases for other than economic reasons. Experience in Europe during recent months has shown that with respect to commodities such as lumber, pulp, aluminum, oil and rails, they are putting these goods into European markets at a price with which we on this side cannot compete. It is also true that recent experience has shown, on the other hand, that they are asking too high a price for some of their exports to European markets and are not getting those markets, all of which indicates—and of course this is not new to any member of the house—that the impetus behind their trading offensive, if you can call it that, is political rather than economic. As a matter of fact, Mr. Khrushchev himself, in 1955, talking to a group of United States congressmen visiting Moscow, said: "We value trade least for economic reasons and most for political purposes". Mr. Khrushchev has a habit, very often, of blurting out the truth.

Perhaps at the present moment, more important than the development of our trade with communist countries are the steps that might be taken to increase our trade with those countries that cannot trade with us now because of what the economists call insufficient international liquidity, which is a horrendous phrase meaning that these countries have not got enough foreign exchange to buy from us what they would like. There has been a good deal of discussion in the United States and in the United Kingdom as to what could be done to remove the consequences of this insufficiency of liquidity and help these countries get foreign exchange. Mr. Macmillan, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, has been making proposals to Washington and, perhaps, to Ottawa, also with this in mind, and the minister will recall that Dean Acheson and Adlai Stevenson both put forward some every imaginative proposals in the United States about the way in which that government could make a contribution to this end, and without United States participation it would, of course, be difficult to make progress.

Whether this can be done through existing institutions such as the international monetary fund or whether some new agency should be set up, I do not know, but I am sure the minister would agree that nothing in this field is of greater importance than to join with other countries in a new move designed to increase the purchasing capacity of these countries. I wonder whether the minister could report on any developments that may have taken place in this field since the visit of President Eisenhower or of Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am not able to make any report with regard to these matters, but the subjects raised now by the Leader of the Opposition quite naturally are being considered.

The Leader of the Opposition has correctly assessed the situation as I see it, and I hope that the international monetary fund may be strengthened, or some new organization created to strengthen this aspect of world trade. The Leader of the Opposition will fully appreciate that it is no more possible for me to make a report at this stage of the proceedings than it frequently was for him in the past on negotiations being carried on with various countries.

Mr. Pearson: I was wondering whether there had been any specific proposal made either to the United States government or to the United Kingdom government, or both.

Mr. Churchill: Not at this stage. It will be interesting if someone does come forward with some definite proposal.

Mr. Regier: While we are on the subject of imports and exports, yesterday the minister, as quoted on page 2322 of Hansard, said that last year our imports from the United States were valued at approximately $4 billion. I wonder if the minister could give us any indication what it is expected that our imports in 1958 may be. I know he has stated there is going to be a decline.

Mr. Churchill: I welcome the hon. member to the discussion of the trade and commerce estimates. He is coming fresh to the fray. I hope he is not too vigorous, because we have been going on a long time. I think the information he requires is contained in publications. Reports are published which give the information with regard to exports and imports, and they are available to all members. By a process of elimination I have found my copy among the other papers in front of me. I have one dealing with exports, published by the dominion bureau of statistics, and there is a companion volume headed "Imports" which gives all the relevant information from January to the end of April. That, I think, is the answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Regier: I also have these reports. May I point out to the minister that the reports are always based on what has taken place, and my question to him was whether he can give to the country any indication—and after all he does have these forecasters in his department—of the kind of decline in imports we may be expecting this year. Last year we bought goods worth $4,000 million. Is he able to say that this year the figure is likely to be 25 per cent less, or $1,000 million less?

I have a further question to ask the minister at this time. Is he able to indicate which areas are affected by the decline? Is it likely to be a decline in capital goods, or is it more likely to be a decline in our imports of consumer goods? I have particular reasons for asking this question, and I hope the minister will indicate both the expected size of the decline and the field in which it will occur.

Mr. Churchill: In answer to the first part of the hon. member's question, I am not in a position to forecast as he would like me to do. Forecasts are sometimes accurate, sometimes inaccurate. Economists all across the country make them from time to time, and their forecasts appear in the papers. If the hon. member wants a longer distance forecast he might refer to the reports given to the Canadian royal commission on economic prospects with regard to imports and exports. The crystal ball has been examined there and the vista extended over a great many years.

With regard to the second part of the question, the fields in which there is a decline, here again I have to refer to these booklets and statistics which indicate Canada's import and export figures. As I pointed out yesterday, and as hon. members opposite pointed out, the decline has been to a certain extent in capital goods, and the decline in our exports has been in our primary and semi-processed metals, in some minerals and things of that nature.

There are certain downs in some things and ups in others. I have a list in front of me indicating our exports divided into half a dozen different main headings showing the general situation, but without going into very great detail I could not answer the hon. member's question. It would require reading out a great number of headings and providing statistical tables.

Mr. Regier: In that case I have to explain to the minister my reason for asking for the information. All of us were very pleased to hear of the determination of the government to do something about eliminating our adverse trade balance with the United States. Some of us were a little alarmed at some of the methods that were proposed. Now we are indeed bringing about a closer equilibrium between our imports and our exports. However, if the reduction in our imports is as a result of a reduction in imports of capital goods, well it merely means that the expansion and the rapid industrialization that I sometimes thought was rather excessive in some years gone by is declining, and as long as we have apparent surpluses here I do not think that that alone ought to worry us overly much.

My concern is that very much of this heavy reduction in our imports may be in the field of consumer goods, and if the reduction is in the field of consumer goods then this adjusting of our adverse trade balance is happening in a manner that the Canadian people do not like and did not expect. I am asking the minister whether the plight of our unemployed who are unable to buy many of the consumer goods they would like to buy and the low income of our farmers and fishermen in Canada are the factors primarily responsible for the great decline in imports, because if that is the case then I feel we have very little that we can brag about when we say that our former adverse trade balance is not as great as it was.

Mr. Churchill: I think the hon. member was otherwise engaged this afternoon when I was discussing the decline in our imports.

I pointed out that that might very well be balanced off by an increase in manufacturing in Canada. Consequently it is not necessarily a bad thing that imports should fall off if at the same time you are able to provide in Canada those materials which formerly you were importing. But I note here in some notes that I have in front of me that the decline in imports has been concentrated primarily in iron and steel and industrial machinery purchases, so that I think my hon. friend is unduly alarmed if he thinks it is just in consumer goods. I doubt very much whether he could relate the decline in those imports to any decrease in the purchasing power of the Canadian people.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, prior to June 10, 1957 and, more so, prior to March 31 of this year we heard a lot about the great decentralization program of the present government. In view of the events that are taking place in the maritime provinces, such as the announcement that a sugar plant in Saint John may be moved to central Canada and that a candy manufacturer in St. Stephen would like to follow suit and that base metal mines in northern New Brunswick are closed down completely and the coal mines have curtailed their operations at least for a period of five weeks at the present time and our pulp mills have cut down their operations from five days to three days a week, can the minister give us some clarification of the decentralization policy of this government?

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend has been painting a picture of gloom—

Mr. Robichaud: Actual facts.

Mr. Churchill: —and has not mentioned some of the constructive policies of this government to put those mines back into production and to keep the coal mines functioning. Why must the hon. member just give one side of the picture?

With regard to decentralization of industry, this is something which has been advocated by this party over many years. In so far as it is possible steps will be taken to make each sector of our country prosperous and if that can be done through decentralization of industry, why steps along that line of course will be taken.

The very fact that support is being given to the coal mining industry in the maritimes is an indication of the desire of this government to maintain economic strength in that part of our country and that, of course, is part of decentralization. If they were permitted to close down and industries based on coal then shifted to central Canada you would have much greater centralization of industry than would be advantageous for Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the hon. member for Gloucester, the minister perhaps did not pay as much attention, as did the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and some other hon. members, to the famous Moncton manifesto of the Conservative party which was issued some time before the election of June 10 and which indicated that the government would set up a special agency for the promotion, not the preservation at the last minute and after a five-weeks layoff in the existing coal mines, but of new industries in the maritime provinces.

The other day I asked the leader of the house to which minister one should address questions to about this matter, and he just looked confused, and I addressed the question to the Prime Minister who was not able to give a very satisfactory answer. I wondered whether the prime responsibility for the promotion of new industries in the Atlantic provinces rested with the Department of Trade and Commerce or, if it did not, to what department's estimates it would be appropriate for us to make our inquiries.

Mr. Churchill: So far as I know, Mr. Chairman, all inquiries may be made on these estimates. If, as sometimes happens, an inquiry runs over two or three departments, I think I heard the Prime Minister say the other day that it would be quite appropriate to inquire of him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister did not quite comprehend my question. It was our understanding—I think it was the understanding of the people in the Atlantic provinces and perhaps part of the reason why the government got as much support as it did—that the government was going to set up some special agency in some particular department to take special charge of this function and I wondered whether that department was the Department of Trade and Commerce or whether it was some other department.

Mr. Churchill: I have not been notified to that effect yet.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I want to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question which has nothing to do with what we have been discussing. At the present time there is a royal commission on patents which is studying the Patent Act and the effects of the Patent Act. I was wondering whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce, through his economic adviser, has been in touch with this commission and has made representations to it? The point is this. The origin of the things which we buy is governed in many instances by the owner of the patent which this country grants and, as the minister probably knows, about 85 per cent of the patents issued in any year are issued to foreign countries. Now, of course, there is no provision in the act to manufacture in Canada and patents generally, as the minister knows, create a monopoly and, of course, control prices. Without going into the question in detail, I was wondering whether the minister should not have his economic advisers get in touch with this commission immediately and study the effect of patents on the economy of Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: Was that in the order of reference?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): It has not been done.

Mrs. Fairclough: It was not in the order of reference and your government set up the commission.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I appreciate this interjection by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration but she was also secretary of state for a while and had an opportunity to do these things. I am not reproaching her or anybody else. I am not here to reproach anybody. I am trying to do something for the citizens of this country. If there is one member of the house who has been very mild in criticism at all times in the past it is myself. At no time have I ever tried to interject anything that could be taken as a reproach upon anybody in the house. I am just requesting very nicely that the Minister of Trade and Commerce have his economic advisors consult with this commission to find out what is the effect of patents on trade and commerce in this country.

Mrs. Fairclough: If I may, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has been interested in this question for a long time. This commission was set up at a time when his party formed the government. If my memory serves me well, the hon. member made repeated representations to his own government and to his own minister in charge of that department. I would suggest that the time when he should have made his heated criticisms was when his own minister sat on this side of the house and not now—

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Well—

Mrs. Fairclough: Now, sit down and take it—at a time when as he well knows, if he knows his law as I think he does—

Mr. Caron: Who is in power now?

Mrs. Fairclough: —the order of reference cannot well be changed with respect to a commission that has been operating for three years.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I forgive the dear lady for all she has said. I am sure she does not understand. I did not start my remarks in that manner and I am just asking the minister to do something now. I am not reproaching anybody. This is a very important matter and as the commission is still functioning and has not submitted its report there is still time to do this. I think it would be to the glory of the government, if it wants glory, if it would listen to this suggestion. What is the effect of patents on trade and commerce in this country? The commission is still sitting. It has listened to many people and I suppose it is going to listen to others unless it has closed its sittings. When the report is completed the government will no doubt look at it. Nobody has criticized anybody. This is a most innocent suggestion but probably one of the most constructive that has been made in relation to patents for some time.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member has asked me if I will refer the matter to the economists in the Department of Trade and Commerce to see if there is anything that may be done with regard to patents in so far as they affect trade and commerce in this country. The Department of Trade and Commerce has very competent economists. I will put the problem to them and see what the answer is.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Thank you.

Mr. Peters: Before the item carries I should like to ask the minister if he would care to comment on reports we have heard in the last few weeks throughout northern Ontario about a proposal to sell the crown corporation section of the trans-Canada pipe line. The people of northern Ontario are appreciative of the fact that this is a crown corporation. While there may have been many faults the people know that some control has been exercised because of the fact that the minister through his officials controls this particular section of the line and therefore exercises some control over the whole pipe line and possibly the distribution of gas through it. We have heard reports recently that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is now in a position to make an offer, ten years prematurely, to buy out the section of the line for the construction of which the Canadian people of necessity had to set up a crown corporation. I certainly would appreciate a report from the minister on this very important part of his department.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member because I realize he is keenly interested in this problem, but although I have a responsibility to report to parliament with regard to the activities of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation that report would not normally be given under the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Peters: I looked through the estimates and could not find any item but as this matter comes under the minister's department I presume from what he has said that a report will be made later. I should like to ask when and under what item.

Mr. Churchill: Unless there is an item in the estimates with regard to that particular matter, obviously members are precluded from asking questions on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is not this item at all. The corporation is not a part of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I just happen to be responsible to parliament for it.

Mr. Pearson: Well, this is parliament.

Mr. Churchill: But not on this occasion.

Mr. Argue: You are responsible but you will not talk.

Mr. Churchill: I also have the responsibility to report for the national research council and for atomic energy. Do you propose to ask questions on them tonight or shall we continue our useful discussion of trade and commerce and deal with the estimates that are listed in this book under that heading?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on the point of order raised by the minister. My recollection is that it is not the Hon. Gordon Churchill who answers to parliament, as is the case with the C.B.C. and the Minister of National Revenue, but that it is the minister of trade and commerce, whoever he may happen to be. Therefore if there is no specific item for something surely on the administration item of the department we can ask questions about anything that comes within the ambit of the administration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That has always been the practice in the house in the past and the point raised by the minister is a very extraordinary and restrictive one.

Mr. McPhillips: Your minister never made any answer.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether we could have a ruling, Mr. Chairman. I would take it that the attitude expressed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate opens the door to questions with regard to this crown corporation. First I should like to ask the minister whether reports in the press that the present head of Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation is leaving to join Rio Tinto are true, whether the minister has the resignation in his hands and, if so, whether he would care to comment upon it?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: In the first instance I am not accepting a conclusion reached by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Second, I do not propose on this occasion to answer questions concerning the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. I think such questions could be asked on the orders of the day—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Churchill: —just as effectively as now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this the kind of accounting we are going to get?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the crown corporation section of the trans-Canada pipe line is, as I understand it, administered by a deputy minister. Therefore I would assume that there are certain departmental expenses connected with the performance of his duties and on that basis I think there is a responsibility for the minister to report.

Mr. McPhillips: Find it in the estimates.

Mr. Pearson: On this point of order, Mr. Chairman, we have this item No. 1, which is the general item of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We have also the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and surely anything in that report is pertinent. If hon. members will turn to page 118 of the report they will find this, "Directory of boards, crown companies and agencies, reporting to parliament through the Minister of Trade and Commerce." Amongst those agencies is the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. If we cannot ask questions in respect of those matters dealt with in this report under this item of trade and commerce, when can we ask questions in the House of Commons about them?

Mr. Churchill: It is quite possible to ask questions like this every day on the orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: We are shut off on orders of the day.

Mr. Churchill: There is no item in the estimates referring to this. I think on this occasion when we are dealing with trade and commerce we should complete the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Caron: Why not admit you are ignorant about the matter?

Mr. Pearson: This is a very important matter, and the stand taken by the minister is quite unprecedented to my knowledge in the House of Commons.

The Chairman: I believe that since the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce it is quite in order to discuss that on this item 1 of the estimates of this particular department.

Mr. Peters: The attempt tonight, Mr. Chairman, to shut off discussion would appear to be in keeping with the actions that have been taken in connection with this gas transmission line over the years. I appreciate your support, Mr. Chairman, but this crown company must obviously come under this department. The president, Mr. Golden, is, I understand, a top official of a department.

In so far as the pipe line being built through northern Ontario is concerned, there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction from the point of view of the municipalities which are to be served by the secondary trunk line. On numerous occasions there have been requests from the municipalities that the trans-Canada pipe line be put under public ownership. Recently, the heads of the municipalities throughout Ontario met and unanimously endorsed this position.

I think it is generally conceded by the people in northern Ontario living in the section through which the crown-controlled corporation has been operating that the crown-controlled operation has been advantageous. The farmers in that area have received much more satisfaction than those who live in the sections through which the privately owned pipe line is passing. The advantages of the crown corporation operation have been reflected in better terms for labour and better terms of expropriation.

One clause in the agreement between the crown corporation and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines gives the latter the opportunity of purchasing this line, and gives to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines the right to transmit gas through the crown corporation section of the line, and to receive any moneys that accrue from that for a period of 10 years. At the end of 10 years the private corporation has the option of buying this section at cost. At the end of that time, the crown corporation may go out of existence if the government is foolish enough to allow that to happen. Then we will find that rates will have been established for the distributing lines throughout Ontario.

The federal government could exert a great deal of influence and could assist greatly in the maintenance of fair and reasonable prices for the transmission of this gas. Unfortunately, in areas like Timmins the rates that are being quoted are $1 higher than they are 500 miles farther along that line. The people of northern Ontario are of the opinion that the fact that the part of this line with which they are concerned is crown-controlled has been advantageous. We wish the crown control to be continued. Certainly the fact that the federal government did get involved in the construction of this most difficult section of the line—a fact which resulted in the line being built in Canada—has shown the Canadian people that governments can build these lines. Certainly some control is going to have to be exercised over the private operators in this public utility field.

It has been suggested in the Ontario legislature that legislation must be introduced to exercise some control over the price of the product in these distribution lines. Certainly if that is true in the provincial field, it must also be true in the federal field. There has been considerable talk about starting a new line alongside of the present line, and before long there will probably even be a third line carrying a variety of products. Before this happens we should give consideration to the introduction of legislation that will provide for a more equitable situation in so far as expropriation is concerned. We have seen, particularly in the sections of the line not controlled by the crown, intimidation used in connection with expropriation. Farmers have been told that if they do not sell the land the company will take them to court and expropriate it. Farmer has been set against farmer, and very little care has been exercised to ensure that a farmer knows what kind of contract he is signing. Some legislation should be introduced which would be much more acceptable to the people of the rural communities when it comes to this matter of obtaining land which the farmer may not be too happy to sell at the price which is being offered.

It would appear to me that the old Railway Act or the sections of the Pipe Lines Act which provide for expropriation are cumbersome, expensive and of a type that works in favour of the company rather than the farmer who is trying to get a fair and reasonable price for the land he has to sell.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he is straying away from the subject of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. He is talking now about pipe lines in general. I believe he should limit his remarks to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

Mr. Peters: The people who have received the benefits from the pipe line going through Northern Ontario have been satisfied and are satisfied, in my opinion. Yes, there have been some problems. The Minister of Labour has been very helpful on a number of occasions in settling them. He has been able to do this without serious difficulty because it comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government. Certainly the people in those areas want to see this pipe line extended under federal jurisdiction rather than limited. We should be very happy to hear the minister reaffirm that the government intend to maintain this line at least for the ten years that they have the right to do so and to extend that further if he sees fit to do so.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: Is this on the same topic?

Mr. Fisher: Yes; it is on the same topic. I am a little bit surprised that the minister does not want to carry out his role as the heir of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe in connection with this particular organization at this particular time.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon gentleman a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Suppose you wanted to express the will of the house. What action can you take with regard to this particular matter? On other matters you could move to have the appropriation reduced and you could have a vote on it. What can you do here? If the hon. member wishes to express himself on the subject, of course he can go ahead. But I just wondered what action he would propose.

Mr. Fisher: The minister is aware of the fact that I spoke to him about this matter previously and asked him about it. I was quite prepared to wait. But if it is going to be the ruling that it can be touched on at this time, I feel that I have every right to ask questions.

Mr. Churchill: The ruling was given. I was just asking a question myself. It was my turn to ask a question.

Mr. Fisher: In connection with the crown corporation, may I say that I think a great many people are unaware that the corporation has only five employees. If, as my friend the hon. member for Timiskaming suggests, the fact that five spreads on the line have been under the crown corporation and have accomplished better work than that which has been accomplished in the spreads that are directly under the Trans-Canada company, I suggest that these five employees deserve a tremendous accolade. It is interesting to note that Mr. Golden, the gentleman at the head of Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation receives less than $1,000 per year for his work in that particular regard, a fact which indicates that the government is very careful in how it rewards gentlemen who are at the head of what was last year fairly close to being a $64 million business. I think it is a matter for comment that a man should be at the head of an organization handling a business of over $60 million and received from it $960 in return.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, could we suspend the committee for a few minutes in order to let the minister get some information? He may be unable to answer.

Mr. Fisher: I should like the minister to comment on the small size of this organization and just how effectively it can carry out its duties in building the line. One of my complaints is in connection with troubles in the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Whatever the backbenchers and the frontbenchers may feel, this has been the biggest problem in our whole area because it has stirred up a hornet's nest as far as Canadian-United States relations are concerned. If you went through the news columns of the newspapers and listened to the chit-chat around the twin cities and down the line, you would realize that the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, in the work of the United States contractors along the line, has been the biggest single issue in our area.

I should like to suggest to the minister that this phase is passing. We know that the crown corporation will be going out of existence very shortly. The government has indicated that it has no intention of making this a permanent affair. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has announced that it intends to take advantage of what was created by the previous government. I should like to suggest to the minister that, out of the experience we have had in that area the government could learn some lessons. If, for example, we get into any crown corporation that is going to build an oil pipe line to Montreal from the west, if that should develop, I think one of the things that we can learn is that if there is going to be any crown corporation handling something that is many miles from Ottawa it needs to have offices in the field rather than having five people settled at Ottawa and trying to oversee, in some degree at least, the operations of a project as big as this one.

I would remind the minister that one of the difficulties that has cropped up repeatedly has been the whole question of United States labour in the various parts of the job. It drags in the Minister of Labour. It drags in the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the respective officials. I do not want to go off into the realm of whether we should go after the government to have public ownership in this particular regard. I feel that there have been and will be in the future opportunities for that action. But I should like the minister to consider the problems that have cropped up locally out of the building of this line and out of the broad status that the crown corporation has had and I should like him just to give us his assessment of it and how well it has worked. I have a feeling that it has not worked very well at all. If he wants to lay the blame for the poor working upon the previous administration, I should like to hear about it. I hope he can give us an answer with regard to the gentleman who for $960 has looked after the crown corporation for a year. Aside from any personal sentiments one may have, I believe that he is an exceptionally able civil servant. I think it would be regrettable if he pulled out of the government service for private industry. I should like to hear whether the minister is doing anything to keep him in it or whether or not the reports are true.

Mr. Churchill: I heard that rumour to which my friend the hon. member for Port Arthur refers but I have not seen Mr. Golden in order to ask him whether or not it is true. I hope he will find it possible—if there is anything in the rumour—to remain with us until the completion of this northern Ontario pipe line. I appreciate my hon. friend's interest in this pipe line construction. I know that he has seen the line under construction, as have I and as I hope to do within the next two or three weeks if these estimates get through the house.

I know the hon. gentleman has been interested in the problems in connection with the labour force working on that pipe line. However, I think things have gone very well despite the control exercised from Ottawa. Nevertheless, my hon. friend realizes that the line which is presently under construction and which will be completed this year has been let out to the various contractors. It is divided into five spreads and those contractors are responsible for the work that is done and for the completion of the work according to the contract. This was the same operation as that which was carried on last year. I think there were five spreads on the line from the Manitoba border to Port Arthur. The work was completed according to schedule under rather difficult conditions because they made a late start. They started in June. But nevertheless it was done and gas was ready to flow through the line to Port Arthur by the end of December. However, the distribution system in the city of Port Arthur was not ready to receive it.

This year, on the remaining portion of the line from Port Arthur to Kapuskasing, work is much further advanced. We instituted a policy last winter of clearing the right of way during the winter months. It provided a great deal of employment and it turned out to be a very good policy to have that work done during the winter. The result is that an earlier start was made on the second section of the line. The work is very well advanced, the pipe has been delivered and is in position. The chart that was shown to me a week ago indicated great progress on the completion of the five spreads which are under construction, so that I think early in the fall the line will be completed. Despite my hon. friend's fears as to the way this has been controlled here is an indication that the work has gone ahead very well and I hope to be actually in the field to see the contractors and the progress of the work early in August. I believe there is no doubt at all that it will completed early in the fall and that the gas will be available for distribution.

My hon. friend said something about labour conditions in respect of the employment of Americans and Canadians. Had I known he was going to raise this question tonight I would have had available a report on that very question which is in my office and which indicates that the percentage of Canadians employed is very high. In the early stages of gas pipe line construction in Canada it is true that a large number of Americans had to be employed because of the inexperience of Canadians in this type of operation but this situation no longer prevails. We now have in Canada very many competent native born Canadians able to do the specialized work in connection with pipe lines and in fact on the present northern Ontario section which is being completed the vast majority of the people employed are Canadians. Only certain specialized groups have been brought in from across the border and this year there has been no evidence of some of the dissatisfaction which appeared last year, although it was not very marked, with reference to this particular question. I think, therefore, things are going very well and that credit is due to the president of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation and his associates for keeping this work going and for their having arranged amicable settlements of the disputes as they have occurred from time to time and generally in respect of their whole supervision of the operation.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps this is not the time to go back in retrospect as to the development in this matter, but if the minister will recall, last December I told him and the Minister of Labour that there was going to be a strike on the clearing of the way and the step which he took in regard to the clearing of the right of way was very much appreciated. At least three times before the strike did break out, however, I passed on word that it was developing and about to break, yet we did not get an investigator to the area to see what was the problem until the very day the strike broke out. The Minister of Labour and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are aware that on that line there was what one might call a most regrettable kind of labour agreement involving workers who were not even on the job and who did not even know they were going to be on the job. The labour agreement between the pipe line contractors and these four unions has been standing in the way of a closer liaison between various government departments and a quicker solution of all the problems which have arisen.

The point I wanted to make was that if the government early in this development had put an investigator in the area through the crown corporation which, after all, is the body in charge of this whole business, we would have had much less of this shilly-shallying back and forth and the three government departments working on the problems. The Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, the pipe line contractors and the four unions, and a host of municipal authorities who were all mixed up in it would not have needed to become so involved. I just suggest that perhaps this experience contains a lesson for the minister and, for that matter, the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Peters: I notice that on page 721 of Hansard of May 30, a starred question was asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The minister, in answering the question, mentioned in part 4 of his answer the remuneration for certain employees of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation in the amount of $960, and I would like to ask the minister where in the estimates that sum of money appears which, after all, is an amount expended by parliament?

Mr. Churchill: I would be very pleased to give that information to my hon. friend when my officials are here and when they will be able to turn directly to it.

Mr. Peters: I am not too familiar with these matters but I notice there are a number of crown companies and agencies which report to parliament. I refer to page 118 of the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for 1957 which includes the names of the chief commissioner of the board of grain commissioners, Mr. R. W. Milner; the chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board, Mr. G. H. McIvor; the chief statistician of the bureau of statistics, Mr. W. E. Duffett; the president and general manager of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, Mr. H. T. Aiken and the president of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. D. A. Golden. Could the minister indicate where the salaries and expenses which must be paid in this connection are to be found in the estimates?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member has the same advantage of myself if he has the book of estimates before him. He can refer to this book and he will find there are items in the estimates dealing with the headings he has read out with the exception of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Argue: I wonder—

Mr. Valade: Obstruction.

Mr. Argue: Did I hear someone say "obstruction"?

Mr. Valade: I said it is obstruction.

Mr. Argue: That is a nice thing, Mr. Chairman, that is a fine democratic remark.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: From a member of the party—

Mr. Valade: Can I not pass a remark?

Mr. Argue: —which had to wait for two or three weeks to debate another issue in this house under a previous administration and then that administration accused his party of obstruction. We have been on one item of the trade and commerce estimates and this is only the second day. Yet if we take two days to debate the items of this department, what do we have hurled at us? The word "obstruction" from a new member of the Conservative party. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that interjection is contempt of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: And that the older members on the government side, when they were over here, would have picked up a remark like that and would have spent a long time damning the party to which the hon. member who made it belonged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Valade: May I make a remark on this matter, Mr. Chairman, because I feel it is a question of privilege. When the previous government was in power and when we were in opposition we did not have one-tenth of the chance we are giving the hon. member to argue tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: There, Mr. Chairman, is a further slur.

The Chairman: Order. I believe we are getting a little away from the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce and it would be better if we kept our discussion to the item under consideration. The hon. member for Assiniboia at present has the floor.

Mr. Argue: A remark to the effect that the government backbenchers are allowing members of the opposition or of the C.C.F. group a certain latitude is, in itself, in contempt of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: Those members are not allowing members of the C.C.F. group or any other group in this house to speak and, secondly, a member of this house is entitled to stand up in his place on any item of the estimates and speak for 30 minutes and then if another speaker intervenes he is entitled after that to stand up again and speak for another 30 minutes. That is what the rule says. Yet these people want to get away and have some holidays, they say. They did not say that before the election.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Assiniboia, but his latest remarks are out of order. We are at present discussing the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the remark of the hon. member should be withdrawn.

What I rose to say, Mr. Chairman—and I am listening now for further comments—was that I was interested to know whether one of the boards which reports to the minister, namely the Canadian wheat board, will have its annual report referred to the committee on agriculture during this session and whether that board and its officials will be in Ottawa to report to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member asked that question only a few days ago on the orders of the day. My answer then was that I thought it was within the competence of the agriculture committee to ask for that report and I am sure that if that is done and if the report is to be studied by the agriculture committee, the officials of the wheat board will be only too pleased to appear.

Mr. Argue: I have never yet known the agriculture committee to meet and make a formal request of the minister that a certain report be referred to it. I know that it has been said in the past that members of the opposition can have a committee called together, but I know that hon. members have tried and tried unsuccessfully. If the report of the Canadian wheat board is to go to the agriculture committee for review, the way it is brought to that committee is for the minister to stand up in the house and say that he has received the report and is prepared to have it sent to that committee and to move to that effect. If the minister would do this the report would be referred to the committee and the wheat board officials would come to Ottawa and appear before the committee.

It is now two years since the Canadian wheat board and its officials appeared before the committee on agriculture to give a report of its operations. No one, I think, would complain that the board did not come last year, or earlier this year, because it was almost impossible, but since it has become a regular procedure for the Canadian wheat board to appear before the committee and answer questions I think the minister should tell us now that he is himself prepared to move that the annual report be sent to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Churchill: I am prepared to accept the hon. member's suggestion and give it consideration. If this is the procedure which has been followed in order to have the report considered by the committee and in order to have the representatives of the wheat board present I will look into the matter. I was not clear that this was the way in which it has been done in the past. I accept the hon. member's advice.

Mr. Argue: I want to ask the minister a straightforward question. Is he prepared to move in this house that the annual report of the Canadian wheat board be referred to the agriculture committee? If the answer is "yes", that is it.

Mr. Churchill: I thought I gave a straightforward answer. I said that if this is the procedure that has been used in the past I would be prepared to do it.

Mr. Argue: I just want it to be as categorical as that. And then I would like to know if it could be done as quickly as possible—the week after next, I would suggest—so that the wheat board could be here for that date.

An hon. Member: The day before yesterday.

Mr. McIlraith: May I say that the practice as far as this report is concerned, as I recall it, has been, for the minister, when he has tabled the document, to say whether or not he intends to refer it to the committee, and very often if he did not make that reference he was asked about it and then, as I recall, the minister always made that motion referring it to the committee, indicating at the time when the officials would be available.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the hon. member for his suggestion, and as a great respecter of parliamentary procedure and practice I will look into the matter and if that is how it has been done in the past, I am quite prepared to do that.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that the minister's department is responsible for the export of power and the granting of licences therefor. There is, I take it, a branch of his department which deals with this question. I should like to ask if there has been an increase in the export of electricity to the United States in 1957, because I presume that is the only year of which the minister would have any record. The next question is: has there been any export of electricity from the Beechwood project?

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. gentleman be satisfied if he received an answer to those two questions tomorrow?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: One more question. I wonder if the minister would look at the notice of motion for the production of papers I have on the order paper to see if the correspondence I asked for passing between the minister and the students working at the trade fair in Brussels could be tabled tomorrow morning? If that could be done, conveniently, it might save some time.

Mr. Churchill: That has not been passed by the house yet.

Mr. McIlraith: It is not passed. It is on the order paper.

Mr. Churchill: It is on Votes and Proceedings. I will take the hon. gentleman's request into consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a third question regarding the export of power? There was at one time a quantity of electricity exported at Massena, New York, and I am wondering if following the development that is to take place at the international section if any additional power will be exported to New York state?

Mr. Churchill: I have not heard anything about that yet, and I do not know anything about a request for that export.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister please check with his department and try to ascertain where the $960 appears in the estimates because I have checked again and cannot find it.

Mr. Churchill: We will do everything in our power to assist the hon. member and inform him with regard to this estimate.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No. Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: We will continue, with I hope greater speed, the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, followed by the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and then the estimates of the post office and the Department of Veterans Affairs.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on July 14.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, July 19, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

GRAIN

REFERENCE OF WHEAT BOARD AND GRAIN COMMISSION REPORTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the annual report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year ended July 31, 1957, which was tabled on May 12, 1958, together with the report of the board of grain commissioners for 1957 which was tabled on the same date, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to inform the house about the results of the discussions held in Washington by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and more particularly whether he can confirm the report in the press that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that one of the objectives of Canadian policy was to persuade those nations concerned, in this case the United States and the United Kingdom, that there should be no movement from Jordan against Iraq.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): There is really nothing I can tell the house at this time that would be of any assistance. Yesterday, as everyone knows, the Secretary of State for External Affairs discussed the situation at great length with both the British foreign secretary, Mr. Lloyd, and the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Dulles. In consequence, following those discussions, he is meeting this morning —I think the meeting is under way now— with Mr. Hammarskjold. What passed yesterday will be brought to Mr. Hammarskjold's attention, to the end that every effort will be made to bring about the amelioration of the very grave situation that prevails at the moment.

So far as the United Nations is concerned, as you know the present position is that all three resolutions failed of adoption, that is those submitted by the United States, the U.S.S.R. and Sweden. At the conclusion of the sitting the delegate for the United States moved that an emergency session of the United Nations general assembly be called. However, that has not yet been decided upon finally, and the United Nations security council will meet again on Monday.

I think I might add that the endeavour of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of Canada is to assure that while the matter is still in a state of flux, no step be taken whatsoever which would extend any possible action by any nation beyond the boundaries of Jordan or Lebanon. I think that is as far as I would like to go at this time. I can tell the house that every effort is being made by the Canadian government to make its contribution to the end that the serious situation may be, if not solved, at least greatly diminished in its danger and peril.

Mr. Pearson: I have a supplementary question. I know the government is in close touch with the government of the United Kingdom on this matter. Would it not be desirable to have a full exchange of views, if that has not already been done, with other members of the commonwealth with regard to this crisis?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as other members of the commonwealth are concerned, there are available to the Department of External Affairs and to the government the views of several of the nations making up the commonwealth. Their views are known to this government, and they are also known to the other members of the commonwealth.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STRIKE ON BLACK BALL LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is he in a position this morning to report on the strike of the Black Ball ferries linking the mainland of British Columbia and the island of Vancouver?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I had hoped to have a report this morning to give to the house. However, I regret that I am not in a position to do so except to say that very active consideration is being given to this matter. I hope to have something to say about it on Monday and to make a report to the house.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Is any consideration being given to additional air facilities from the mainland to the island, as I suggested yesterday?

Mr. Starr: I have checked into that situation and find that at the moment the facilities are adequate in that respect.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS UNDER TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether there has been any revision in the payments made to the provinces under the tax-sharing arrangement as a result of the new population estimates that were published the other day. If so, would the minister be willing to give the amount of the instalment paid to each province in July in the same manner as it was given for the first three months of the current fiscal year?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend had indicated that he was going to ask this question I could have brought the figures with me. I will bring them to the house the first of the week.

Mr. Pickersgill: That will be very satisfactory.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I now have the figures for which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked in regard to the scale of fiscal payments to the provinces. May I say that the payments to the provinces under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act have been recalculated for July on the basis of the budget estimates for 1958-59 and the new population estimates issued by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, as these are rather extended figures it might meet the wishes of hon. members if they were placed on Hansard without my reading them now. I have indicated in three columns first of all the final estimate for 1957-58, the preliminary estimate for 1958-59, which was used, and now the revised estimate for 1958-59.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Pickersgill: That would be quite satisfactory as far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to ask the minister whether these figures include payments under the Atlantic provinces grants, or are they the tax-sharing figures only?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, these embrace the payments under the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant and are the total payments being made under the provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that this table be incorporated in the minister's answer in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For figures above referred to, see appendix "A" to Hansard for Monday, July 21, 1958, page 2513.]

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CANADIAN ARSENALS-CROWN ASSETS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORTS IN FRENCH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Defence Production when he expects that copies in French will be available of the report of Canadian Arsenals Limited which was tabled on June 27, and that of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation which was tabled the same day?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, we expect to have the French report about the middle of the week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NOVA SCOTIA—INVESTIGATION INTO ADMINISTRATION OF BEDFORD NAVAL MAGAZINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me if my department had made an investigation into the administration of the Bedford naval magazine in Nova Scotia. No such investigation has been made, nor do I know of any reason why an investigation should be made. Perhaps the hon. member might like to suggest what he wants investigated.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I was not suggesting that I wanted any investigation. I was just expressing curiosity and asking the question for information.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONCLUSIONS OF CURRENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister say whether he has yet received the final report as a result of the conference held in Ottawa this week on winter unemployment? If so, can he tell the house the recommendations in the report, and what the government contemplates in that regard?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not received all the reports. I have received three reports in preliminary form but not in final form. One of the committees has not submitted any report as yet.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he could tell the house whether or not a record of the proceedings of the recent conference of management, labour and the provincial governments will be made available to this house? I understand there was a verbatim account taken of the discussions and that there is some question as to whether or not the record of proceedings will be made available to the public. Could the minister inform the house whether we will be able to have the record of the full discussions which took place at the conference, particularly with respect to unemployment?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I say that the conference was participated in not only by the federal and provincial governments and by labour, but there were other groups involved. However, I will take the hon. member's question into consideration and investigate the possibility of complying with his request.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had hoped you could deal with this matter now.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LETTER TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION FROM TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could he tell me whether the generally well-informed officers of his department are not aware of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition is my colleague, Hon. Lester B. Pearson, and not Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, as this letter emanating from his department, and which I will send over to him, would indicate?

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN ELEVATOR SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture and several other hon. members to ask whoever is the Acting Minister of Public Works if, in the absence of the minister himself, he would see if something could be done to improve the mechanical efficiency of one of the elevators in this building.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

391. Departmental administration, $739,086.

The Chairman: Vote 391, page 73 of the blue book, details at page 512. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pearson: There was a question I asked the minister yesterday to which he has not replied. Perhaps he would care to answer it now. It was in connection with the proposal reported to have been made in December at the NATO council meeting and again at the defence ministers' meeting in April in regard to a NATO food pact, and the reference by the United States ambassador when he was before the congressional committee in Washington to the effect that the Canadian government had made no detailed proposals of any kind and that they were waiting to hear from the Canadian government before they could express their views.

Mr. Churchill: A proposal for establishing a food bank has been made on several occasions during the last 12 years. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power they had this matter under consideration. If there is general agreement among the NATO nations that a food bank should be established, Canada is quite prepared to play her part in that type of development.

Mr. Pearson: That does not quite deal with my question. Would the minister comment on the statement of the United States government that the Canadian government has made no detailed proposal in NATO, and that without receiving further details regarding the Canadian proposal it is impossible to tell how it might fit into NATO planning. I mention this because so much was made of it in the house last autumn after the council meeting in Paris, and also because the Minister of National Defence made a public statement about it after he got back in April.

Supply—Trade and Commerce

Mr. Churchill: If the Leader of the Opposition is referring to something in the nature of a formal presentation to the NATO organization, which I presume he has in mind, my understanding has been that it was discussed informally at that meeting in Paris. Responsibility rests also with other nations in the NATO group, not solely with Canada. The proposal was put forward; if it is not acceptable to other NATO countries it is a little difficult to proceed in the matter. My own understanding is that the matter is still under review, and that ways and means are being considered for the establishment of a food bank which in times of crisis and emergency would certainly be of great assistance to countries that may be in danger.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the fact that Canada has more to gain from this proposal than perhaps any other NATO country, will the government take the initiative in putting this proposal formally before the NATO council as was suggested by the United States ambassador when he was in Washington in the testimony before the committee which I have just mentioned? It is one thing to have informal conversations, as the hon. gentleman knows; it is quite something else to put a formal proposal before the NATO council for inclusion on the agenda of the council for consideration and possible action.

Mr. Argue: We in this group are exceedingly interested in the whole question of a food bank for NATO countries, or for that matter in an international world food pool as has been suggested in this house from time to time. I think the whole question of a food bank in Europe is one that should be given full support in this house. I remember Lieutenant General Guy Simonds making the statement that if we had a food bank of wheat in Europe instead of the CF-105 the expenditure in his opinion, would have been more worth while.

I am wondering if there has been any discussion among the NATO countries as to whether some of the money Canada now spends on armaments might be transferred to an account for the establishment of such an emergency reserve of food, in the belief that by doing so we would be making a contribution to defence even more adequate than the contribution we are now making.

Certainly we support wholeheartedly the idea of a food reserve for NATO countries. We go one step further and say there should be an international food pool so that people in deficit food producing areas may be saved from the pangs of starvation by getting surpluses from the surplus producing countries where those surpluses, incidentally, cause a great strain on food prices.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps I could throw a little light on the subject, as I attended the defence ministers' conference in Paris in April, where I made on behalf of the government of Canada the offer and proposal that a food pool should be established in Europe in order that there might be held certain stocks of flour, wheat and other commodities which could be used in the event of an outbreak of hostilities. At that meeting the whole matter was referred to the permanent council. Various questions have been asked since regarding the cost and the method of storing and packaging this material. The whole subject is now being investigated by the permanent group of the NATO.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could say when the discussions may reach a point where a decision is likely to be made. I am sure that with such important discussions in progress the minister has some general idea as to when the discussions may terminate, a conclusion be arrived at, and the conclusion either accepted or rejected.

Mr. Pearkes: I could not possibly forecast as to when other people will arrive at a decision in this matter.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence has given us rather different information than that which we secured from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I suggest it might be well for the government, then, to take the matter up with the United States government because of the wrong impression which must have been given—inadvertently, of course—by the United States ambassador to Canada in the hearings before the foreign relations committee of the United States Senate. I quote from those hearings, as I quoted from them yesterday. The ambassador said:

> —the Canadian government has made no detailed proposal in NATO or to the United States government that such a bank be established—

He went on to say that the government of the United States—

> —will of course be glad to consider any detailed proposals which may be made in NATO by our Canadian friends.

The Minister of National Defence said that such a detailed proposal has been made, and perhaps it would be desirable to clear this matter up with the United States government and get that government to consider it, because of this indication of its willingness to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, possibly I could say a word in this connection. I brought this matter before the NATO council in the month of December as a proposition that deserved the attention of the nations joined together on behalf of freedom. In so far as an international food bank is concerned, or a food pool, it is obvious that the achievement of such an organization is impossible. It has been considered over and over again at FAO meetings. One who has made a very detailed study of the subject and has made the strongest representations to the FAO is Mr. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I received from him the detailed study he had made of the subject, and presented it in a general way to the NATO council in Paris in December.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was this a formal proposal made to the NATO council by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am coming to that. In the light of subsequent events, I think the stand I took at that time was a reasonable and necessary one to take. I pointed out the fact that the U.S.S.R., while pretending at all times to have no aggressive purposes, was building up a very large submarine fleet. Submarine fleets are not built up for defence. The U.S.S.R. has some 570 submarines whose purpose—this is more than inference on the basis of previous experience with nations which went in for submarine activity—would be in large measure to paralyse food reserves and by bringing about a state of famine achieve indirectly or psychologically what it might not be able to attain militarily.

The suggestion was made knowing that there was no possibility of attaining an international organization and having regard to the fact that FAO, with the tension of the international situation in the last several years and being composed of others in addition to the freedom-loving nations, could not hope to attain any success in this direction. It was brought up on that occasion not in a formal way but as one of those things that deserved consideration and discussion. Nothing was presented in a formal way at that meeting of the 15 heads of the various NATO countries. The discussions were informal, the purpose being an exchange of ideas and ultimately, in consequence of the discussions, the making of fuller representations.

The Minister of National Defence did so, as he has already stated, and it is not for me to enter into any discussion of statements made by ambassadors of friendly countries. But I can say that the matter is under consideration, and I think the events of the last two weeks underline the necessity of action in this regard.

When I brought the matter to the attention of the NATO meeting I pointed out that the establishment of such a food bank was possible, was in my opinion necessary and was one of those things that might be done under article 2 which for so long received so little attention by the NATO organization. It would achieve two purposes. First, it would remove the overhanging surpluses that today have a detrimental effect on agriculture in general. Second, it would bring about a degree of security in defence in that it would make food supplies available to the countries in Europe which, if left to themselves, would have difficulty in increasing their output of agricultural products to the degree necessary to provide reasonable and proper sustenance in those countries.

Now that most realize that NATO preserved the peace in the last several years and that its defences have been such as to make the countries represented in NATO reasonably secure against the danger of aggression, in my opinion a further step is necessary. Certainly what is happening now gives added emphasis to the need that we do something to assure that if conditions change and defence measures become necessary for survival, a food bank will be available. If war breaks out one can only hope that the merchant fleets will be able to operate. Beyond that one cannot go. Because of that I think what is happening today in the Middle East and the gravity of the world situation will give added emphasis to the need of action in this connection.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I believe the Prime Minister has made an important statement, and we hope that every effort he makes toward the establishment of a food bank among the NATO countries in Europe will meet with success. In addition to having made certain general comments at the meeting of the NATO heads of state as well as the more detailed discussion by the defence minister, I think the Canadian government should consider making a concrete offer to the NATO countries, since without question we are one of the countries that would be called upon to supply a very large part of the food going into any such food bank. Interested as we are in moving surpluses from this country and putting purchasing power into the economy, as well as providing this kind of reserve in case of an emergency whether brought about by conflict of arms or by very bad crops such as France had some time ago, we think this is a good idea.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that it would be an imaginative step on his part, the kind of step that might result in concrete action, if Canada would say to the NATO countries something like this. We have 100 million bushels of wheat that we will put into a NATO food pool now. We are prepared to supply it, and if necessary we are prepared to pay the cost of it now. In addition, I think Canada should put a price tag on the wheat at a level that would give our wheat producers a reasonable return.

In my opinion that is a very sensible idea. It is time something was done through food pools and other actions to increase the price of wheat or the whole wheat economy of western Canada will suffer further deterioration. Therefore I suggest that the Prime Minister should offer the NATO countries 100 million bushels of wheat at a price of $2 a bushel.

Now, there may be snickers from the occupants of the benches behind the Prime Minister, but I do not believe the $200 million involved is an expenditure we should immediately reject because of its size as being something entirely impossible. There is another way this amount may be provided, and that is to say to the NATO countries: If you feel that such a food pool is important perhaps part of our defence expenditures now made for the purchase of other items could be used for the purchase of such a quantity of grain.

When we are discussing a regional food bank for emergency purposes. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that there are even stronger reasons for providing a food bank for the Colombo plan countries. That is an area where starvation is always close at hand. That is an area where people require the surplus food we have in this country. I feel that Canada should go even farther than she has gone in providing such assistance to Colombo plan countries.

I do not believe the economic strain on the Canadian nation would be on a level that might suggest itself at first sight to people who are not conversant with the grain industry. The Prime Minister knows that many millions of bushels of wheat have been held in storage in this country for four, five or perhaps even six years. The government is now paying very substantial sums towards the cost of storage of this grain, and in these estimates there is over $40 million for that purpose. The worst thing you can do with wheat is to keep it on hand for five or six years. The storage or carrying charges eat up most of the value of the wheat and you have lost it in an economic sense, though you still have the wheat on hand. It would have been much more economic for this country if the former administration had provided by way of gifts, paid for out of the national treasury, substantial quantities of wheat. The cost to the Canadian economy would not have been any greater.

I would suggest to the Prime Minister that in addition to these general discussions, Canada should make some concrete offer, and we should endeavour to have established in the Colombo plan countries a food pool where it will be needed in the years ahead to combat famine.

Mr. Pearson: I agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia. The house will have heard with great interest and satisfaction, I think, the statement that has been made by the Prime Minister on this matter. He quite rightly divided this subject, the establishment of a food bank, between its international and its NATO aspects. The subject of an international food bank has been before the United Nations food and agriculture organization for many years. The purpose behind this proposal, which has not been carried into effect, has been both economic and humanitarian. In that sense that kind of food bank would serve the purpose which my hon. friend has just mentioned in connection with the Colombo plan countries.

The Colombo plan itself, as my hon. friend knows, was not established as a mechanism for consumer goods assistance but rather for capital and technical assistance. The NATO food bank has both economic and defence aspects. It has economic aspects in that it would strengthen the economies of the North American members of NATO if surplus wheat could be disposed of in part in this way. It would even strengthen the economic position of the European members of NATO by sterilizing, in a financial and economic sense, some of these surpluses so they would not be overhanging the market.

Perhaps more important so far as NATO is concerned is the defence aspect. When I say that I am thinking of defence in its 1958 aspect and not in its 1914 aspect, because in the light of the kind of war to which we would be subjected if war were ever allowed to break out, food would be not only a necessity for defence but a necessity for survival in Europe. We would be deceiving ourselves if we ever thought that, in terms of an atomic war, the Atlantic shipping lanes would be kept open. The only chance the European countries would have of getting food for survival would be the food that would be on the spot at the time.

While this proposal may have been a desirable thing five or ten years ago, it is far more necessary now. It is for that reason we should hope that this proposal, which in some form or other has been made by the Canadian representative to NATO, by the Prime Minister last December and apparently in more detail by the Minister of National Defence in April, will be followed up. This would seem to be the time to do it. I am certain it will get a more constructive and favourable reaction from some of the European members of NATO now than it received in the earlier days of NATO, when the necessity may not have seemed so great.

I would hope, therefore, that this proposal which has been made will be followed up vigorously. I also hope that perhaps the minister concerned would be able to make a report to this house on the consideration that has been given to it by the permanent council, because the Minister of National Defence said it had been before the permanent council. He went into some detail as to how it could be worked out. There are problems of storage, problems of turnover and other technical problems. If the permanent council has been discussing this subject it will be interesting for the house to have a report on that matter.

Finally, it surely is important, because we cannot do this without the co-operation of the United States and that applies to so many things these days, to remove any impression in Washington which seems to exist in the minds of some members of the executive, and which must have been created in the minds of members of congress by this testimony of May 13, that the Canadian government has not made such a proposal and is not anxious to see the proposal carried into effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I find greater support in this house than I did last December at the NATO meeting for the suggestion which I made then for the first time. It was the first occasion that this had been brought to the attention of the NATO organization. As the Leader of the Opposition says, the proposal has two elements in it, that of need and also that of defence. Placing them in reverse order, I am sure the government will be very gratified with the views expressed by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Assiniboia in reference to this matter.

I do not want to make any reference to the evidence given or the testimony furnished to the committee by the ambassador. I might add that recently there was a press report to the effect that the commander of the Atlantic NATO forces felt this plan had merit, and that on the basis of the hypotheses that have been advanced now by the Leader of the Opposition, if war came it would be very difficult to keep open the lanes of commerce, there was a greatly increased and intensified need for action in this direction.

In so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia are concerned in connection with extending this beyond the NATO countries and giving to it a Colombo plan connotation, may I say this. While all of us agree that food is of primary interest, a transcendent necessity if those who oppose communism in the east are to be able to maintain their stand, I have not at any time since I became Prime Minister had any evidence that the nations within the commonwealth in Asia have that same desire he has expressed to have available to them wheat and other food products in bulk and in large measure. They have made their requests. As a matter of fact, while this government has increased the amount of food available under the Colombo plan it has always found that the viewpoint of the brother nations in Asia is generally that the assistance should be, as was said by the Leader of the Opposition, in technologicial or machine assistance and not food assistance and the like.

Food was accepted in Ceylon. Food was needed because of famine conditions there last fall and in the early winter. With that exception the attitude of the Asiatic nations of the commonwealth has certainly been far removed from that of the hon. member for Assiniboia, who appeared to think that these nations are reaching out and demanding additional food assistance beyond the comparatively small amounts needed to meet immediate and emergency conditions.

However, I want to thank both hon. members for their contributions to this matter. My friend the hon. member for Assiniboia spoke of an imaginative plan. He certainly produced one which was in no way limited by financial considerations. On occasion, Mr. Speaker, I have heard criticism to the effect that we should be extremely careful that we do not overexpend. While I do not take second place to anyone in my desire to achieve some degree of economic assistance to those countries, I realize the limitations imposed not only by financial needs and requirements but also by the wishes of the countries in question.

I sometimes think that if we had given greater attention to economic assistance we might, in the light of events that have taken place since 1943 or 1944, have been able to preserve a higher degree of resistance among certain nations, and in particular China, of which it has been said by Mr. Hoffman that if in 1944 the nations of the free world—then the allied nations—had contributed $400 million by way of economic assistance the events of history might have been otherwise than they have been. However, all of us have far better capacity to judge in the light of events after they have taken place than to say with certainty what is going to take place in the future.

At this particular time when everywhere in the world—and I am speaking of the present moment—there is a tremendously intensified psychological propaganda campaign on the part of the Soviet and other communist nations, all of us in the free world will have to make a new reassessment of matters such as this. But again I say that it is on occasions such as this that the House of Commons when it gives its undivided attention to a matter for the benefit of the nation, touches its highest point and achieves its greatest opportunity for the people. I thank both hon. gentlemen for their contributions, the Leader of the Opposition for what he has said in the light of his wide and extensive experience in the field of foreign affairs and my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia for his continued interest in this subject.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the comments of the Prime Minister. As to the cost of the 100 million bushels of wheat that I suggested, I do not think we can say offhand or can say immediately that a $200-million expenditure is one that we would reject outright because of any drain it might make on the national treasury. If the proposal for a food pool in Europe means anything in concrete terms, as I am sure it does, I am certain that it will have to be paid for. I am sure that when Canada made such a suggestion the government must have had in mind—I would expect this to be so—bearing part of the financial burden of such a food pool. If that is the case, any suggestion that it might have been in the neighbourhood of $200 million I think is not at all out of the way.

I was rather disturbed, though, at the minister's remarks on my suggestion of a food pool for Colombo plan nations. We realize that a food pool for Europe is a good deal different from a food pool for Colombo plan countries. A food pool for Europe is not something that is likely to be needed immediately, at least we certainly hope not. Certainly the people in that area do not need the addition of bread grains to their diet. But in the Colombo plan countries I think the situation is entirely different. When the Prime Minister says those countries have never suggested that they should have additional food instead of technological and machine assistance, I think he is right; in fact I know he is right. Even though millions of people in Colombo plan countries are next door to starvation almost every day of their lives, their governments take the attitude that if there is ever to be an improvement in their standard of living they must industrialize; and they will industrialize, if necessary, on the basis of an even lower food intake for their people. It is a question of improving their standard of living for the future no matter what the sacrifice to the present generation.

That is not what I had in mind when I suggested a food pool for Colombo plan countries. I did not have in mind saying to them: We are going to give you $35 million, but we hope that instead of taking it all in technological and machine assistance, you will take $10 million of it in wheat. That is not what I had in mind at all. What I had in mind was something over and beyond what we are now doing; a food pool, a reserve of food which would be available to those countries in time of need.

Another reason those countries are reluctant to take these gifts of food at a given time, which gifts they sometimes feel are more on the basis of getting rid of a surplus by the country making the donation than with a view to meeting their long-term needs, is that it is no solution to the problem of feeding their people who are hungry today if they are going to be allowed to starve tomorrow. In such a way one is just postponing the end. They are interested in establishing some kind of plan whereby they can get regular supplies of food so there might be a general improvement in their diet on a long-term basis.

When I put forward the suggestion of a food pool for Colombo plan countries I am thinking of something in addition to technological and machine assistance. I am thinking in terms of long-range planning which would add to the calorie intake of the people of these areas; and if that kind of proposition were to be put to the governments of the Colombo plan countries I am firmly convinced that they would accept it without reservation or objection.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to say just a brief word before the item carries with respect to a subject introduced yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West and referred to later by the hon. member for Laurier. I have in mind the matter of the Canadian National Steamships and trade with the West Indies.

I think we on this side of the house were all gratified by what the minister said with respect to the government's intention to provide a ship for interisland trade in the West Indies. That idea, of course, originated when we were in office, and we are naturally flattered that the government should carry it out. The minister, in referring to Canadian National West Indies ships said, I think quite correctly, that at the present time the traffic was being adequately carried by other ships. While we believe that to be true we do know that although the population of Canada increased by 3 per cent last year our export trade increased by only 1 per cent. Our trade is therefore falling behind our rate of development, and we have high hopes that the Federation of the West Indies will result in a vastly expanded trade, not next year but over the years, between that federation and Canada.

This shipping service of the Canadian National Steamships was, of course, originally undertaken pursuant to the Canada West Indies trade agreement of 1926. The service has been in operation since 1927; and if the government find it quite impossible, as they seem to have decided it is, to get these ships operating under the aegis of the Canadian National Railways—I gather the Minister of Transport has given up hope of doing that—I hope that before the government sell these ships outright so they would have no further connection with Canada, consideration might be given to the possibility of transferring the ships themselves under some mutual aid or lend-lease or some analogy with the Colombo plan to the West Indies. At the same time the West Indies might be given a measure of technical assistance so the service might be operated as it has been operated for 30 years between Canada and the West Indies.

My hon. friend from Gloucester reminded the minister last night about the situation in Saint John, New Brunswick, where there is a threat that the sugar refinery may be closed down and its operations moved to central Canada. I do not know whether it is a valid reason, but one of the reasons given in a public speech by the head of this enterprise for this prospective was that the freight cost to Saint John from the West Indies is almost as high as it is from the West Indies to Montreal, and that sugar shipped from Saint John to central Canada had, of course, to pay in addition the rail freight or an extra ocean freight.

It may be that these ships could continue to be operated on a somewhat different basis, and it may be that the government would even consider it worthwhile to give some financial assistance to their operation. It might be that by operating to Saint John and Halifax and then from either of those ports to St. John's Newfoundland and then direct from St. John's to the West Indies, cargoes could be provided on a triangular basis which would make it possible to cut the freight costs somewhat.

It has, of course, been a grievance for a long time in Newfoundland that the bulk of our fish had to be shipped to Halifax and then transshipped, and as a result the freight on Newfoundland fish is considerably higher than it is on exactly the same fish shipped from Nova Scotia. It happens that from a geographical point of view St. John's is nearer to the West Indies than Halifax, but I would not suggest for one moment that the rate from Newfoundland should be lower than the rate from Nova Scotia. It is, however, the desire of everyone in Newfoundland to find some way in which these rates can be equated; and if it were possible, by operating this service from the West Indies on a lend-lease or mutual aid arrangement so that the ultimate title to the ships would remain with Canada although they were completely operated by the West Indies people under their own conditions and by their own arrangements, it might be possible to retain this industry in New Brunswick and to equalize the freight rates on our fisheries products as between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland to the West Indies. It is always possible, of course, to pick up in Halifax or Saint John cargoes of package freight of one kind or another shipped from central Canada to Newfoundland.

I think the Minister of Transport would agree with me that at almost all times there is hanging over the Canadian National a surplus of freight which has to get across Cabot strait; and to have this additional service available to carry freight between Saint John or Halifax and St. John's would ensure cargoes in all three directions. Of course I am not an expert and this is a project which would require a good deal of study. I do not expect the minister to make any comment about it, at this time unless he wishes to do so, but I feel that although the Minister of Transport had the prime responsibility for its operation, since this service was originally instituted for the promotion of trade with the West Indies, and since we are very anxious in the Atlantic provinces to expand that trade as rapidly as possible, that the government should take one more look at this alternative suggestion before we get rid of those ships in such a manner that they will be altogether lost to that service and to Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister found out where this $960 is provided for with respect to the crown pipe line company, what vote it is under?

Mr. Churchill: It was an expense account, to pay travelling expenses.

Mr. Benidickson: But what item; is it trade and commerce administration?

Mr. Churchill: It is under the general item with regard to expenses, and we will refer to it when the officials are here.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one or two detailed questions to ask concerning the expenditures on departmental administration. I am telling the minister this in case he wishes to bring his officials before him. The first has to do with the personnel of the department.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I could interrupt the hon. member so the officials could come down to the floor of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that was my suggestion. Now that the minister has his officials before him, I think most hon. members in the house will appreciate the fact that it is the new deputy minister of the department who is now on the floor assisting the minister with his estimates, and I think generally speaking those who have followed the trade relations of this country over the years will be very pleased with that appointment and particularly pleased with the fact that the new deputy minister is one who had a long record in the trade commissioner service of the country before his promotion.

Mr. Harkness: He also has the advantage f coming from Calgary.

Mr. Pearson: Then he has to bow twice.

Mr. McIlraith: If we say much more we may embarrass the official, but I should think all hon. members would wish me to acknowledge his presence here this morning and say how very much the department is to be congratulated on his appointment. I hope the minister will see fit to give us a little information about the new associate deputy minister to be appointed, and whether or not that appointment involves any change in the organization of the department or any reorganization in the duties of the deputy minister.

Mr. Churchill: On behalf of the deputy minister, who has not the privilege of speaking in this house, I think I should thank the hon. member for his kind remarks. The process of reorganization is going on, and the deputy minister is now engaged in drafting suggestions with regard to changes in the administrative set-up of the department which, he tells me, have been under consideration for a number of years, though it has been a little difficult to make the changes until now. In due course the house will be informed of the administrative alterations within the department. It is a growing department, and the importance of trade as a major factor as far as Canada is concerned is becoming increasingly realized. With a developing department some realignment of the divisions within the department is necessary. That is the type of reorganization which is being considered.

Mr. McIlraith: On the question of the numbers of personnel in the department, as I read the figures there was an increase in 1957 and I take it that a further increase is being projected for 1958. Can the minister tell us in a general way what the proposed increase in personnel will amount to, and the reasons for the increase?

Mr. Churchill: Are you asking with regard to the department as a whole?

Mr. McIlraith: The department as a whole; the department proper, at this stage. It starts on page 413 of the estimates, and it seems that there is an increase throughout the department as a whole starting with the item concerning departmental administration.

Mr. Churchill: Departmental administration—this is a very modest increase of only six people. The trade commissioner service shows, again, a modest increase of 15. The largest increase occurs in the bureau of statistics, where the increase is 24. There is a slight increase in the inspection service, which comes under the standards branch, and another seven on the board of grain commissioners. There has not been a very large increase in the numbers of employees considered as a whole.

Mr. McIlraith: In his annual report to parliament at page 89 the minister, in his figures, shows 1,367 employees for the department proper in 1957 excluding the board of grain commissioners, the Canadian government elevators and the dominion bureau of statistics, or 4,087 including those latter three. That represented an increase over 1956. There was a further increase in 1957-58. Is the minister in a position to give me the totals projected for this fiscal year?

Mr. Churchill: We will assemble those totals. The actual figure for 1957-58 as shown in the report was 4,087 and the employees for 1958-59, as shown in the summary, number 4,159. That is inclusive of the dominion bureau of statistics and the board of grain commissioners.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it, as I read the estimates and the figures just given by the minister, that there does not seem to be any evidence of wasteful extravagance about which we heard so much in past years, and I should like to ask the minister directly if he has found any waste and extravagance in the administration of the department.

Mr. Churchill: During the last year to my knowledge there has been no waste and extravagance. If there was any in years gone by my hon. friend perhaps has more knowledge of that than I have.

Mr. McIlraith: That was not my question, Mr. Chairman. When the minister comes before the house this year with slightly increased estimates and a slightly increased number of personnel in the department, it seems to me that we are entitled to a reply to this question. There were many charges made when the former government was in office that there had been waste and extravagance in the department. I do not think this was true, and I believe the estimates the minister is now submitting to the house for its approval indicate that there has been none. However, I should like him to say directly whether or not he has found any evidence of waste and extravagance and, if so, just what waste and extravagance he did find.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am reporting for the last 12 months. I said that during the last 12 months I had not discovered any evidence of waste and extravagance. My hon. friend is talking about years prior to that. I have not looked back to discover whether or not there was waste and extravagance in the preceding years.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I take it then that we can assume, that, as the minister is spending more money and has a somewhat larger staff, that he does not consider that any waste and extravagance took place last year and that therefore there was not any waste and extravagance before?

Mr. Churchill: I do not know if that would hold up under logic or not.

Mr. McIlraith: I think it will, Mr. Chairman. I regard this as an extremely important department in the government service. I have a high opinion of its personnel and the general organization of the department. I do not believe that any charge to the effect that there was waste and extravagance in its administration should be allowed to hang over it if the minister has not found any evidence to support that charge. That is as far as I seek to go. That was my purpose in asking the question.

I have another question I want to ask. On page 513 in the details of the departmental item there appears at about the middle of the page a reference to trade promotion at home and abroad. The vote for this year is $30,000. Last year it was $105,000. I wonder if the minister would explain to the house what that item covers, and explain the difference in the amount of the expenditure?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the difference between $30,000 and $105,000, which is $75,000, represents the sum which was put in the estimates for 1957-58 to cover the cost of the Canadian trade mission to the United Kingdom. That entire amount was not used up. The mission cost in the neighbourhood of $63,000.

Mr. McIlraith: That, then, is the cost of the trade mission to the United Kingdom last fall; is that correct?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: What was the total expenditure for that trade mission to England?

Mr. Churchill: As I have just stated, $63,000.

Mr. McIlraith: And what is the proposed expenditure for this fiscal year?

Mr. Churchill: On trade promotion?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: $30,000.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the particular promotion projected for the present fiscal year?

Mr. Churchill: That covers any trade missions which might be going abroad or official entertainment of visiting trade missions to this country.

Mr. McIlraith: As there is a substantial reduction it means there are no substantial missions projected for this fiscal year; is that correct?

Mr. Churchill: We are not thinking in terms of any missions during the coming year of the size of the one which visited the United Kingdom, although there may be smaller missions going abroad. As a matter of fact the expenditure of $105,000 shown there was enlarged by virtue of a supplementary estimate which came up later in the course of last year.

Mr. McIlraith: What I am getting at is this. Is there a projected reduction in these trade promotion missions abroad, leaving out the particular one to the United Kingdom last year? Is there a reduction in number? Is it the same? Is there an increase in number? Just what is the situation?

Mr. Churchill: In actual expenditure the $30,000 represents an increase of $7,000 over the actual expenditure in 1956-57. This has been a useful objective of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It was for that reason that we thought it wise to include the figure of $30,000 in order that we would have some freedom of manoeuvre with regard to sending missions abroad.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the item is a very important one, and I regard it as a very proper expenditure. I take it that there is no increase proposed in the number of trade missions going abroad?

Mr. Churchill: There will be certain missions going abroad, but at the moment we have nothing in mind of the size of the one that went to the United Kingdom which was, of course, unusual in its magnitude and representation.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, would this item then cover a trade mission that might go to China? Is that one of the projected missions the minister has in mind?

Mr. Churchill: I think I said the other day that I had no definite plan to go to China myself or to send a trade mission there. There may be other parts of the world to which it would be better to send trade missions. But if something were done in regard to China by way of a trade mission it would come under that particular item.

Mr. Caron: Does the minister not think that in these days of recession the figures are a little too low? He should have missions going all over the world to try to promote trade. We in Canada produce much more than we can consume, and we are in need of external trade. The $30,000 does not appear to be enough to permit us to promote trade all over the world. I do not think we can trade only with the United Kingdom, but rather we should seek to promote trade with all the countries of the world.

Mr. Churchill: I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend. I have been discussing with the officials of the department a program of more active promotion abroad. Of course this item deals just with official delegations that might travel from Canada, but the trade commissioner service which is operating in so many countries of the world carries on from day to day an intensive campaign to promote Canada's trade. On the other hand, from experience in the past, from the experience I had last fall with the members of the wheat board and then with the trade mission to the United Kingdom, I see the immense value of making personal contacts of that nature, and I hope we will be able to arrange for several active trade missions to go to various parts of the world.

Mr. Caron: This is the year when we need it most. Winter will be coming along again, and if we do not do anything to try to sell our surpluses not only of wheat but of all commodities I think we will have a bad winter. We should do something right away, and if it is not in the main estimates or supplementary estimates where will it be?

Mr. Churchill: Supplementary estimates are presented normally during the course of the fiscal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps this would be the right moment for me to ask the minister if he could give a specific answer to my question about the effort to get back into the fish market in Brazil.

Mr. Churchill: I was very much interested in the hon. member's remarks with regard to that matter yesterday. As he pointed out, Brazil has been our most important market for salt fish in the past. Through our trade commissioner in Brazil negotiations have been and are being carried on in an endeavour to re-establish Canada in that market. Following the hon. member's remarks, I intend to pursue the matter further. In fact it was raised in the course of the conversations we had with the representative groups who came to Ottawa some time ago to discuss all the problems of the Atlantic fisheries.

Mr. Pearson: There is an item on page 513 entitled "Publication of reports and materials" of $3,000 as opposed to $2,300 last year. Does this appropriation cover the publication of the "Economic Outlook for 1958"?

Mr. Churchill: This is to cover the publication of the annual report of the department.

Mr. Pearson: And no other reports?

Mr. Churchill: Just the annual report, of which 1,000 copies were produced in English and in French.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the French copy available?

Mr. Churchill: It is in the hands of the queen's printer but has not yet come from the printing presses.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister what the policy of the department is with regard to purchases by the government of Canada through other departments of government and from other countries? I presume the Department of Trade and Commerce is interested in the proper balancing of imports and exports, and to that extent it would seem to me that theoretically the department would have a responsibility in overseeing purchases by government departments from other countries. Is the minister in a position to give me a statement of policy? I have a matter that I believe is of some importance which I wish to deal with, but I want to make sure that I am not unfairly attaching it to the minister at this stage.

Mr. Churchill: This department, of course, is not a large purchasing department. If I understood the hon. member correctly he was asking whether or not the Department of Trade and Commerce had some liaison with other departments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I make myself clear? I was not referring to purchases by this department. The Department of Defence Production, in answer to a question I asked some time ago, made a return showing large purchases of automobiles from Germany. It seems to me, and I know it does to many thousands of other people, that it is most unusual for a department of government to buy automobiles made in Germany at a time when there is so much unemployment in the automobile industry in Canada. Does the minister regard it as within his functions to co-ordinate activities of that kind and suggest to government departments that they ought to see whether or not the same article could not be purchased just as economically in Canada; and even if not as economically in Canada, having in mind the economic situation and our unemployment problem, whether it should not be purchased in Canada in any event? In other words, does the minister regard it as within his functions to deal with that kind of problem?

Mr. Churchill: It is certainly not a primary responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I can assure my hon. friend of my intense interest in the problem he has raised. From time to time I have mentioned to my colleagues that it is advisable to buy in Canada when that can be done. At the same time, the Department of Trade and Commerce keeps in mind the fact that our exports are dependent upon the purchasing power of importing countries. Trade is a two-way street. But my own feeling in the matter, of course, is that Canadian industry, if on a competitive basis with other industry, should receive first consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for indicating his interest in the problem. At a later date I propose to deal with this particular matter, but I suggest to him and to the government that at a time when there are thousands of men out of work in the automobile industry it would be very difficult for any government department to justify the purchase of automobiles for official use in Canada from manufacturing establishments in any other country.

Item agreed to.

392. Commodities services, including fees as detailed in the estimates, the expenditure for these not to exceed the amounts shown unless otherwise approved by Treasury Board, $862,368.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister explain exactly what this item covers, with particular reference to the second item listed in the details on page 513, "director, industrial development branch"? What are the duties of that branch? I would also refer to the discussion in the committee in the last two days on the general question of small business assistance.

Mr. Churchill: The industrial development branch is described on pages 55 and 56 of the annual report. I might mention at this point that the hon. member for Cartier indicated the other evening that nothing had been said with regard to firms that had established themselves in this country. On page 56 he and other members will be interested to note that a large number of firms, totalling 136, established manufacturing plants in Canada. The names of the more important ones are listed on that page. That is the type of activity, among other things, engaged in by the industrial development branch. That branch naturally comes into contact with business establishments throughout this country, both small and large. Is the hon. member now asking for a discussion of small businesses generally?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I was not. I note what is said about this branch in the annual report of the department. I have the impression that actually the branch does really more work than is outlined there, and has rendered some very useful service to business in the country, particularly to the smaller type businesses which do not have their own resources for dealing as they might wish with foreign corporations. The aspect of the branch's activities dealing with inquiries from foreign countries is quite good and quite accurately outlined in the report. However, I believe the branch has further activities which it performs very well in providing information to the smaller businesses in this country.

Mr. Churchill: This branch is active, as the hon. member says, and you will note that the report states that the number of Canadian businessmen seeking advice concerning present or proposed manufacturing operations has averaged over 600 yearly. Foreign business visitors during the same period have averaged 450 a year. The branch does publish a small pamphlet dealing with small businesses.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, the "Small Business Manual". It is very good. Actually what I was seeking to obtain from the minister is this. For many years now this branch has done a great deal of useful work on behalf of small businesses in Canada. There is some reference, and I think you find it on page 57 of the report, to the "Small Business Manual", which is published. There are certain other activities that are carried on which I wanted to bring out for the benefit of the committee, because there seemed to be an impression in the house that there had been no administrative services rendered to small businesses through the department, whereas in fact there has been a very good service rendered over the years.

Item agreed to.

393. Trade commissioner service—administration and operation, $3,469,927.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the minister would tell us, since we had no opportunity of discussing the estimates in detail last year, what increases or decreases took place in the trade commissioner service last year, where those changes took place, and then the same information for this fiscal year. What changes have been made or are projected?

Mr. Churchill: Does the hon. member mean changes in personnel?

Mr. McIlraith: No; the number of countries in which we have trade commissioner service, the number of personnel in both the last fiscal year and this year, and any projected changes.

Mr. Churchill: The annual report, of course, on pages 106, 107, 108, 109 and 110, and so on, indicates the various trade services abroad and gives hon. members a picture of the general activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce in countries around the world. The following offices were opened during the year 1957-58: Accra, December 22, 1957; Colombo, April 8, 1957; Los Angeles, October 8, 1957; Vienna, April 20, 1957.

Mr. McIlraith: What was the last one?

Mr. Churchill: Vienna. No offices were closed during the year.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister could tell us which trade commissioner's office covers the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Churchill: We have had no trade commissioner in Moscow. We have been working through the Department of External Affairs, through the officials attached to the embassy there. However, we are considering very seriously the appointment of a trade commissioner to that post because of the importance of trade relations with Russia. This matter is under consideration and in due course, when a decision has been reached, an announcement will be made.

Mr. Pearson: I notice that the trade commissioner's office in Sweden covers Finland as well as Sweden, and has for a good many years. I was just wondering whether, as a provisional measure, the government might not simply extend the territory of the trade commissioner in Sweden to cover the U.S.S.R. Pending a decision on making a permanent appointment to Moscow, if that is decided, he could make periodic visits to the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Churchill: This appears to be a useful suggestion which will be looked into immediately.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he feels that the arrangements for co-operation and co-ordination between the trade commissioner service and the external affairs service abroad are now satisfactory?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Churchill: My own observations during visits to various countries abroad have been that the present arrangements are excellent. There is a very close liaison between the two departments and a very co-operative spirit shown. I am informed that this also prevails elsewhere than the countries which I visited. Generally the arrangements have been satisfactory.

Mr. Pearson: I am very glad to hear that, because it is of great importance that they should work together. The trade commissioner service is really just as much a branch of the foreign service as is the external affairs service and it is essential that they co-ordinate their activities. It is also useful to have, when it is feasible and desirable, an interchange between the two services. As the minister knows, over the years it has been possible to take officers from the trade commissioner service and transfer them to the external affairs service. Indeed, we have several former trade commissioners as the heads of diplomatic missions, who are doing as good work in those posts as they did as trade commissioners.

Mr. McIlraith: Has the minister readily available the number of countries in which we have trade commissioners, and the number of posts?

Mr. Churchill: Trade commissioners on duty abroad number 47; on duty in Canada, 16; assistant trade commissioners on duty abroad, 28; assistant trade commissioners in training, 7. Then the number of posts; trade commissioners and assistant trade commissioners attached to diplomatic missions in 40 posts; trade commissioners and assistant trade commissioners at independent trade commissioner posts abroad, 18. This makes a total of 58 posts.

Mr. McIlraith: How many countries?

Mr. Churchill: I think it is 45 countries.

Item agreed to.

394. Acquisition or improvement of buildings, land, equipment and furnishings, $146,000.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps this would be a good opportunity for me to ask a question which is of some interest to me but which is not immediately related to the item. I hope Mr. Chairman, that you will not notice that fact for the moment. It is simply this. Can the minister tell us when he expects to get into the new Trade and Commerce building?

Mr. Churchill: The earlier the better. October 1 is now the date which has been set.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the minister will look forward with great pleasure to that event.

Mr. Churchill: I surely will.

Mr. McIlraith: I had some small participation in laying the cornerstone of the building, and I know we were very much pleased with the idea of getting a good substantial permanent building for the department.

Mr. Brooks: As his landlord, I will welcome the minister in the building.

Item agreed to.

396. Economics Branch, $274,021.

Mr. McIlraith: I have some questions that I want to ask on this item with respect to matters about which I am not quite clear. It will be noted that the item appears here to be substantially the same, but in the annual report of the department there is a reference to an energy studies branch which appears to be a separate branch taken out of the economics branch. In other words, work on energy studies had been done in the economics branch in the past and now a new branch has been set up. It was created during the last year. However, in the estimates of the economics branch there does not seem to be any reduction that would naturally be expected to flow from that change. I wonder whether the minister could just clarify for us exactly what has been done as to the economics branch and this new energy studies branch, or what change is involved in making the energy studies branch a separate branch instead of part of the economics branch as it was previously.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Fraser of the economics branch was detached with eight assistants to set up this energy studies branch. It is a small branch within the department, but it seemed advisable, in view of the importance now being attached to energy studies, to have this smaller branch set up separate from the economics branch.

Mr. McIlraith: In the estimates as they stand there is just the item "economics branch". Where is the estimate for the energy studies branch?

Mr. Churchill: The energy studies branch has not been separated in so far as the estimates are concerned. It is still included under the expenditure for the economics branch.

Mr. McIlraith: Is there any substantial change in the work of the energy studies branch from that which was done when it was in the other branch? They did very good work years ago.

Mr. Churchill: I think the same type of work is being carried on, but it is now concentrated in a small group which is working together.

Mr. Pearson: Is the energy studies branch making any examination into the possibility of the setting up of a national energy board and how it would be done?

Mr. Churchill: I think we are waiting for the report of the royal commission before dealing with that particular topic.

Mr. Benidickson: I notice that this branch is in charge of export permits for natural gas. Does it similarly advise the minister with respect to export permits for electricity and other types of energy? I note that the hon. member for Laurier is not here at the moment. He asked last night some questions with respect to the export permit for electricity. I did not know whether or not this was the appropriate item under which to deal with the matter.

Mr. Churchill: The standards branch issues the export licences. Perhaps I might give the answer to the questions asked by the hon. member for Laurier. He was inquiring as to any increase in the export of electrical power. The answer is that there has been an increase as between the year 1956-57 and the year 1957-58 of 6,500 kilowatts supplied by the Fraser Companies of Edmundston, New Brunswick by way of an interchange with its American subsidiary at Madawaska, Maine. Then there has been an increase of 19,970 kilowatts supplied by the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission on interchange with the Maine Public Service Commission. The power exported from the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission's grid is generated at Musquash, Tobique Narrow, Beechwood, Milltown, Grand Lake, Chatham and Saint John. With regard to the same power commission, there has been an increase requested of 700 kilowatts. The reason I gave the commission's grid is that the question was asked as to whether there had been an increase in the export of power from Beechwood, but Beechwood is combined with the entire grid.

Mr. Benidickson: What was the increase over the year from the grid?

Mr. Churchill: The increase was 19,970 kilowatts and recently an additional increase of 700 kilowatts. Then finally there has been an increase in the export of electrical power by the British Columbia Power Commission, Victoria, British Columbia of 10,000 kilowatts, on interchange with the Bonneville power administration.

I think the hon. member asked another question as to Massena. Massena export is licensed to Cedar Rapids Transmission Company at a rate of 75,000 kilowatts. The original licence was authorized in 1912. No application has been received to date from the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission for any power generated on the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the export from New Brunswick on interchange, as are the others, or is this a net export?

Mr. Churchill: On interchange with the Maine Public Service Commission.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the minister could clear up the matter a little more for the record. The minister said the export increase was on an interchange basis. Does he mean that a corresponding amount of electricity was imported and that there is a corresponding import item?

Mr. Churchill: The terms of the agreement are that it is interchangeable. It does not necessarily follow that there was a corresponding exchange. However, the agreement provides for that.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to be a little clearer than that. Perhaps I am not understanding the minister as clearly as I should. Does this mean that there is a net increase in our export of electricity by the amount indicated by the minister?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, a net increase.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does this mean that, through Beechwood, we are now subsidizing exports to the United States?

Mr. Churchill: This is disposal of surplus power, and is interruptible.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Van Horne: I should like to take this opportunity to tell the minister how pleased I am to see that these positive steps have been and are being taken to bring about an increase in trade. Certainly trade missions are steps in the right direction and the results obtained should do much to encourage further missions of this nature, not only to England but to other parts of the world. Trade has taken on a very significant aspect in the world since the Soviet union has launched its economic offensive against the west three years ago. Russia has been determined to capture and hold world markets by whatever means necessary and this is, in short, a formidable offensive against the west. Its success thus far, as sure as I am standing here, is one of the main underlying causes of the present recession—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but we are at present discussing item No. 396 which deals with the economics branch and I believe the hon. member is straying a little way from that item.

Mr. Van Horne: I was coming to that, Mr. Chairman, and my words were by way of introductory remarks. I shall refrain from saying anything further at this time.

Mr. Pearson: Could I ask the minister whether this is the appropriation which would cover the publication of the economic study for 1958?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is right.

Mr. McIlraith: I would like to be clear on just one point. Is the minister now willing to table the report prepared on the Canadian economic outlook for the year 1958?

Mr. Churchill: No, that was not in my mind.

Mr. McIlraith: Then I would like to draw to the attention of the minister what was said on this subject by the Prime Minister when he was making a very strong attack upon the opposition as recorded on page 3527 of Hansard for January 20, 1958.

Mr. Churchill: That was during the last parliament?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. The minister will see that the Prime Minister, among other things, was making accusations against the former administration. It will be recalled that the house rose on April 12, 1957, and the Prime Minister accused the opposition of not having tabled this document—presumably before April 12—and of not having published it before June 10, 1957. This is the kind of language he used in his accusation:

> —for political purposes, having concealed this document—

And:

> —have the effrontery to pretend—

And so on. I just want to draw to the attention of the minister the strength and violence of the language used by the Prime Minister in his criticism of the former government for not having published a document prepared in March 1957 prior to June 10. The minister will appreciate that we have now reached July 19 but have still not had this year's document tabled, and I would like to ask him if he does not consider the government should be consistent in this matter?

Mr. Churchill: I do not think the hon. member should look for consistency as between one government and another.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: I think my question is quite fair. The Prime Minister outlined the policy with respect to the publishing of these documents and he did so in a rather forceful manner. I would think that since we are dealing with the same government the minister should follow the same policy in order to be consistent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have some remarks to make, Mr. Chairman, but if the minister wishes to comment on the comment of the hon. member for Ottawa West I would be very glad to wait.

Mr. Churchill: I would be very glad if the hon. gentleman would continue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the same point, Mr. Chairman, the minister has made an observation which is rather difficult to understand. He inferred that the hon. member for Ottawa West was speaking of consistency between this government and the preceding government.

Mr. Churchill: The Liberal government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, and the Liberal government. That clearly shows that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, quite understandably on a Saturday afternoon, has not followed the observations of the hon. member for Ottawa West because that hon. gentleman was not referring to any act which might be considered consistent or inconsistent as between two governments of different political complexions. What he was referring to was the statement made by the man who is now the head of the present government and who was also the head of the government in the month of January last, and the question is as to the inconsistency between the observations of members of two governments of which the same right hon. gentleman was and is the head. That is the question before the Minister of Trade and Commerce and no furrowing of the eyebrows of the minister should suggest that it is a difficult one to follow, because it is not. The fact is, as the hon. member for Ottawa West pointed out, that rising in his place in the month of January last, the present Prime Minister in the course of a speech he was making in answer to a question put by the present Leader of the Opposition accused the previous administration of withholding a report which he later identified as one marked "Private and Confidential". This report, he implied, had it been revealed to the Canadian public would have been responsible for the previous administration receiving at the hands of the people a much more severe form of censure than was, the Prime Minister said, administered to it in the month of June 1957. The previous government, it was said, had failed to reveal to the Canadian people important facts which they were entitled to have, facts which revealed the state of the economy and developing situation.

We all remember that day in the house when the Prime Minister rose and attacked the Leader of the Opposition and those of us on this side of the house for having withheld this document. He spoke about it for almost an hour. Then he went all over the country stating that the previous administration had withheld from the people of Canada and from parliament a document whose contents they were entitled to know. The Minister of Trade and Commerce well remembers that.

The question now is: why is this present parliament not given the opportunity of knowing the contents of the same report for the present year? If it was right for the present Prime Minister to criticize the previous administration for withholding that document, is it not right for those of us on this side of the house to ask the Prime Minister to treat that document in 1958 in exactly the same way as, in the month of January, he thought the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament should have been treated with regard to it in 1957?

That is the point, and either the Prime Minister was entirely wrong in what he said in January with regard to the economic survey of 1957, or the position now taken by the government is inconsistent with the position the Prime Minister took in regard to that document in January last. Why should the economic survey prepared in the minister's department and paid for out of his estimates not be given to this house now? Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Churchill: I thought that yesterday the Leader of the Opposition and I had buried this report, but apparently not. The Prime Minister will read Hansard with interest with regard to the comments which have been made, and I will convey to him personally some of the emphasis, vigour and emotional fervour that has been put into those comments by hon. gentlemen opposite.

In order to be consistent, I think that in view of the fact that the 1957 report was not made available to the opposition of that time, the 1958 report should, similarly, not be produced at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Churchill: If hon. gentlemen opposite are asking for consistency, the practice followed by the Liberal administration was not to make this report public, and since the opposition is now asking for consistency we take exactly the same stand. In fact, this question has been answered in the house on several occasions by the Prime Minister as well as by myself. This document, and other documents of a similar nature, are confidential departmental paper for the use of officials and ministers in departments. The practice of the former Liberal administration—

Mr. Benidickson: Was correct, then.

Mr. Churchill: —was not to make this public, and we are simply following along those lines.

Mr. Pearson: I must not let pass the suggestion of the minister that he and I had agreed last evening that this matter should be buried. He buried it, and I was not able to disinter it at that time. But we have another opportunity, because this is the item in the estimates which covers the publication of reports of this kind. As my hon. friend from Essex East has said, we remember so well that scene on January 20 when the Prime Minister, his voice shaking with party indignation and quivering with contrived emotion, attacked us because we did not produce this report in the spring of 1957. Therefore the remarks the minister has just made are extremely interesting because he has repudiated the attack made by his leader, the Prime Minister. He has accepted our position and agreed that this kind of report should not be made public. He does not intend to make it public in 1958, as we did not make it public in 1957.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there is no repudiation whatsoever of the speech of the Prime Minister. I think he was right. I listened with interest to his remarks last January, and the quivering was all on the other side of the house. I am not at this stage saying that the report will not see the light of day, but I do say it will not be published at this particular moment.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister now says that the Prime Minister was correct when he attacked us last January for not making this report public in the spring of 1957, and if he accepts the Prime Minister's position, then he is wrong in refusing to make this report public at this time. He must be consistent in this matter or repudiate the statement made by his Prime Minister, and I wish he would let us know which line he really intends to follow.

Mr. Churchill: I will clarify the hon. gentleman's mind with regard to the matter. I will continue to support the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Chairman, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, far from being buried this question is now being projected forward in proper perspective. The Leader of the Opposition has asked a perfectly legitimate question in the face of the statements made and the position taken by the Prime Minister in January of this year with regard to the economic survey for 1957. The Minister of Trade and Commerce for whom this report was prepared must tell the house by implication or by words whether the position now taken by the government is the correct position to take or whether the position taken by the Prime Minister in January is the correct position for the government to adopt in this matter. The minister must remember that this economic survey reached him first. It reached him as Minister of Trade and Commerce before it reached any of his colleagues. Presumably he saw this report before the Prime Minister or any other member of the present administration. Did he, when he saw it, or later, bear in mind the words of the present Prime Minister, who is reported at page 3528 of Hansard for 1957-58, volume 4, as having said:

> Why did hon. members opposite, in the idealistic vein of the Leader of the Opposition, not reveal these facts?

He was referring to facts which had been gleaned from the report.

> Why did they not act on them, even if they did not think fit to reveal them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad hon. members on the government side are applauding that statement.

> Why did hon. gentlemen, opposite in the idealistic voice of the Leader of the Opposition not reveal these facts—

An hon. Member: And act on them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Renfrew South said: "Hear, hear". He is one of those who along with so many others heard the present Prime Minister in the election of this very year tell the people that one of the reasons why our party should not be returned was because it had concealed facts to which they were entitled as Canadian citizens.

And now hon. gentlemen reaffirm this. The hon. member for Renfrew South nods his head. Apparently he agrees with me. If that is the case why does he not rise in his place now and ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to do exactly what the Prime Minister asked us to do, reveal these facts?

Mr. Baskin: You did not do it.

Mr. Benidickson: They are trained seals now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the Minister of Trade and Commerce fails to lay on the table the economic survey of 1958 that is a clear vindication of the position taken by the previous administration. It shows the extent to which the right hon. gentleman and hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to go during the course of an election in urging on the people the acceptance of certain positions which within three months of that election they reverse.

Mr. Benidickson: Shame.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the situation. The Prime Minister was speaking in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick when he said there that as far as the government of which he is the head is concerned it would take the Canadian people into its confidence on every measure in which it felt it was prudent at the time so to do and that this kind of information was the kind of information about which the previous administration should have advised the Canadian people.

Mr. Benidickson: Somersaulting.

Mr. Montgomery: Tell the truth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "Tell the truth". Let the truth come out now with respect to this same document. Let us know if there is going to be a continued state of unemployment. Let us know what are the prognostications of the government's advisers for the future. Hon. gentlemen opposite who made a great point on the eve of the last general election in the attack made on my leader will find that in the judgment of the Canadian people the attack was not justified. They will discover that in the minds of the Canadian people the attack was not a fair and valid one in the face of the reluctant and anaemic reply to which this committee has been treated by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Benidickson: You said that.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to say one word at this time. I was one of those who took part in the last election and I happen to be one of those who was elected.

Mr. Gour: That is too bad.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend who just sat down is misconstruing the argument used by at least some of us in the last election. I should like to make it clear that what we condemn was not that the report was not revealed, but the report was made to the cabinet and the cabinet should have acted upon it—at least, I am speaking for myself—

Mr. Habel: You had better.

Mr. Montgomery: I cannot say what may have been said in other places by other hon. members. But I do not want to be accused by the hon. member for Essex East of being one of those who in the last election condemned the previous government for failing to reveal the report because in my opinion—and it always has been my opinion—it was a report to the cabinet.

Mr. Benidickson: You called it a hidden report.

Mr. Montgomery: What we condemn is the fact that the previous administration did not act on the facts and information contained in that report and they did not use the right judgment when they did act on the information. I think the hon. member is trying to twist that argument. I do not know if he intended to do that or not. He may have some justification for saying what he did on the basis of comments that were reported to have been made in some places but not by me in my territory.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we need pay very much attention to the singularly unimpressive argument which has just been made because the Prime Minister himself answered that argument in the statement he made in this house, excerpts from which have already been read. He also answered it by going around the country calling this a hidden report—

An hon. Member: It was.

Mr. Pearson: If he gave it that name he was criticizing the government of that time because it did not produce it publicly; otherwise, why call it a hidden report? There is no point to the argument raised by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton and his argument has been met by the Prime Minister in the words that he used.

The report for 1958 has now been printed. Presumably it deals with the economic situation that obtains at the present time. Presumably it also deals with highly important matters such as employment and unemployment trends, the cost of living, gross national product estimates and questions of that nature. We are asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make this report public because of its importance and interest to this house and to the country. We have the right to do that because the Prime Minister himself attacked us so bitterly in accusing us of not making a similar report public a year ago. At that time he said—certainly by inference if not in words—that he would take a different course if he were in power. Well, he is now in power. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he is prepared to follow the course advocated by the Prime Minister, that he does not disagree with the stand taken by the Prime Minister. All right, let him follow that course and either make the report public or else publicly repudiate the argument of the Prime Minister at this time.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in replying to a question on this subject some time ago I believe the Prime Minister said that the report for 1958 would be made available in 1959.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think we must express some amazement at hearing the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton so neatly repudiate the Prime Minister. I want to recall to the committee that the Prime Minister's accusation against the former administration was that for political purposes it concealed the document. I want to bring out the dates. The date of the document is March 1957. They are prepared in March of each year. The date of the election, as the supporters of the government are so wont to remind us, was June 10, 1957. The former government went out of office on June 21, 1957. The attack of the Prime Minister was that the Liberal administration prior to June 21, 1957, had not published that document in the same year as that of its publication.

Mr. Benidickson: Hidden, hidden.

Mr. McIlraith: If that is so, how can the Minister of Trade and Commerce claim to be consistent and do other than repudiate his Prime Minister if he now takes the position that on July 19, 1958, he is unwilling to table the corresponding report prepared in March of 1958? Surely his position is that he must either table the document in accordance with the policy announced by his Prime Minister or repudiate and change that policy. Of course, a change in the policy involves the repudiation of the stand taken by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I read Hansard for the date in question, January 20, 1958, last evening and again today. I suggest that what was said on that occasion is open to no other reasonable interpretation than that it was in substance a charge that the previous government having full knowledge of certain facts failed to act upon them. The use of the words "hidden" or "concealed" was simply the use of these words as adjectives and the charge contained no suggestion that the report should have been made public.

Mr. Robichaud: You had better read it again.

Mr. Baldwin: I am just about to do that.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Deschatelets: You are in a jam and you know it.

Mr. Baldwin: On page 3527 of Hansard for January 20, 1958, there is the following:

> What action did the government take with regard to any of these matters? Parliament was sitting. But they did nothing during the session to bring about changes in legislation to meet the situation of which they had been warned.

That was the pith and substance of the entire speech made at that time. To carry on, on page 3528—

Mr. McIlraith: Just before the hon. member leaves that page—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Baldwin: I am just about finished.

Mr. McIlraith: —would the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Peace River has the floor. Will he permit a question by the hon. member for Ottawa West?

Mr. Baldwin: I am just about finished and after that I will permit a question. On page 3528 carrying on from where the hon. member for Essex East left off, there is the following:

> Why did they not act on them, even if they did not think fit to reveal them?

And again:

> Why did they not act when the house was sitting in January, February, March and April?

This, Mr. Chairman, is the essence of the charges that were the subject of that speech.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member now permit my question? He quoted from page 3527 and I would ask him to tell me what meaning he gives to these words of the Prime Minister who was referring to the opposition: "And now, for political purposes, having concealed this document." The hon. member will remember that the Prime Minister was doing a great deal of waving of the document in his hand at the time. Would he explain to us what the Prime Minister meant by those words?

Mr. Baldwin: A number of accusations had been made against the previous government but the major one was the failure to act on this information. The other was subsidiary. I imagine that is probably the explanation.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. We cannot let the impression stand which has been created by the hon. member who has just spoken and, if I may say so, spoken very well. He has proved to be an excellent advocate. I understand that he is a lawyer and I am sure he has had considerable training in the advocacy of bad causes. The case for which he has now taken a brief is obviously in that category. But in the very words my hon. friend has quoted therein lies the judgment we are making against the administration—"which the government of the day did not see fit to reveal." Those words, in addition to the words quoted by the hon. member for Ottawa West a few moments ago, clearly indicate that the Prime Minister was seeking to impart to the Canadian people that the previous administration had failed to reveal certain facts notwithstanding, as he himself said, that they were in a report marked "secret" and "confidential" and which he characterized as a hidden report. If that is not enough, if the words which my hon. friend himself has quoted are not sufficient, let me remind him again of the words referred to by the hon. member of Ottawa West.

> We were on the slide, really on the slide, when they left power on June 21, and now, for political purposes, having concealed this document, they have the effrontery to pretend to the Canadian people—

And so on. "Having concealed this document"—those words, applying the ordinary rules of interpretation, clearly mean, as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken knows, but one thing, that is, that the previous administration had deliberately withheld from the Canadian people certain information. That is the charge. That was the charge made by the Prime Minister on January 20 last and we are saying now that no method of advocacy by anyone sitting opposite can change the implication of the literal meaning of those words. We are now charging that those who laid this indictment against the former administration stand condemned by their own very words, and we are asking them now to live up to the indictment they made against us—

Mr. Benidickson: They were not sincere.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and to establish clearly to the Canadian people that in the making of that charge they were sincere. If the government today, through the Minister of Trade and Commerce, refuses to accede to the request made on this side, then the judgment of the house can only be one thing, that the Prime Minister and his colleagues were not sincere when they made this charge on January 20 last.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think it is essential at this point to put the record straight.

An hon. Member: You cannot.

Mr. Churchill: On June 18, 1958 a motion appeared on the order paper for the production of a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The motion was proposed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The Prime Minister replied, as found at page 1391 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the government finds it necessary to oppose this motion on the ground that "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" is a confidential document.

He went on to say later:

> —we will produce it immediately after this year ends. It is a current report, publication of which would be detrimental until January, 1959.

In the course of the discussion on that occasion the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in accordance with the rule which permits same, asked that his motion be set down as a notice of motion for debate. In routine proceedings and orders of the day for Saturday, July 19 you will find listed on page 16 under "Notices of Motion" No. 46 which is in these words:

> June 18—Mr. Pickersgill—That an order of the house to issue for a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Obviously the house is seized of a notice of motion providing for a debate on this subject. I submit, sir, that we are out of order now—

Mr. Benidickson: Closure.

Mr. Churchill: —in discussing the production of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", to which in any case a sufficient answer was given by the Prime Minister on June 18 of this year.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, of course we are not out of order in discussing this report in connection with the appropriation for the economic branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce on these estimates. It is obvious that we can discuss this on the estimates irrespective of what may be on the order paper in some other capacity. There is no doubt about that. The minister's remarks have been extremely interesting. The action taken by the Prime Minister last year has accomplished its purpose. Let us forget about it. The minister has said that the Prime Minister has already replied to this point in connection with the economic report for 1958 by saying that it should not be produced until January, 1959. If this is the right stand to take with regard to the economic report for 1958, I ask the minister if he will not agree that the right stand for any government to have taken with regard to the economic report for 1957 would have been to produce it in January, 1958. If that is true, what justification of any kind is there for the attack of the Prime Minister on the previous government because, as the Prime Minister said, they concealed it in the spring of 1957?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to relate these statements and this suggestion for a decision on my part as to what was said a year ago to the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the present year.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we can help the minister a little bit. If he means that he cannot relate the things that were said by the Prime Minister before the election to those said on June 18 after the election, then there will be many people in this country who will have sufficient regard for our system to regret that he takes that stand.

Mr. Churchill: I cannot relate it to the estimates of this year.

Mr. McIlraith: We will relate it directly to the estimates of this year. What is before us now is a vote to provide, among other things, for the publishing of an economic report for the benefit of the government by this department. Last session, on January 20, the Prime Minister took a stand on the issue in very sharp terms, and in very picturesque speech. There are some other adjectives I could use—

Mr. Churchill: One of the best speeches ever made in the house.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Trade and Commerce describes it as the best speech the Prime Minister ever made in the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: Hon. members opposite applaud that. It was a very theatrical speech. The Prime Minister had a document in his hand which he waved about a great deal during the course of his speech, and that document was the report about which we are now speaking, the report for the year 1957.

As a matter of fact it may be rather interesting to hon. members opposite, who may not know, that when the Prime Minister spoke about the document, at that time, it had a substantial part of the blue cover still on it. The cover was torn off before it was brought into the house. At what point it was torn off, I do not know. However, I noted at the time the part of the blue cover, which he seemed to know nothing about, was there while he was waving the document with such a theatrical wave.

Mr. Cardiff: Did the hon. gentleman say it was torn off by him?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I was very careful not to say that. I could not prove that. I leave it to the hon. member for Huron to draw his own conclusions. The Prime Minister is now coming in, so for his benefit I shall repeat what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. He said the Prime Minister had made the best speech he has ever made in the house. I was referring to this document, and I said he waved it about a good deal. I have described the piece of blue cover that was on it while he was waving it. He took the position, and was severely critical—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are these straw men?

Mr. McIlraith: He says now, what are these straw men? I do not regard this as a straw man.

He accused the opposition, for political purposes, of having concealed this document, of having failed to publish it before June 21, 1957. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says this year's report cannot be tabled; that it is not proper to table it now. He is now changing the policy as announced by his Prime Minister in refusing to table it now. I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is of very real interest if the Prime Minister can take that stand, and then follow it up by making references across this country to what he called the hidden report. Then having received the acclaim of the voters of this country, and their support in a very large measure which I must admit, having taken that position, his Minister of Trade and Commerce now takes a directly opposite position about the publishing of this year's report. It is a matter of some significance that the voters of this country should be treated in that way by the government. It is not a straw man, as the Prime Minister would lead us to believe. I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, therefore, if he does not agree that this is a change in policy on the part of the government a repudiation of the policy as announced by his Prime Minister on January 20, 1958.

Mr. Churchill: I reiterate. I am not repudiating the stand taken by the Prime Minister. In fact, I set the record straight by reading out what the Prime Minister said on June 18 of this year. I subscribed to that stand with regard to the economic report for 1958.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister, then, just explain to us how he reconciles the difference between the stand taken on June 18, and the stand taken on January 20?

Mr. Bigg: The circumstances are not the same.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could deal with the interjection.

Mr. Bigg: I say the circumstances are not the same.

Mr. Robichaud: No election.

Mr. Bigg: No, that is not the point.

The Chairman: Order; the hon. member for Ottawa West has the floor.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Athabasca says that the circumstances are not the same, and that is quite right. The whole point is that the circumstances are not the same. The Prime Minister was speaking on January 20 before an election on March 31. The election was held, and then on June 18 he was in office and the election was over so he was repudiating the position taken on January 20.

Mr. Herridge: Recently I have been wondering why the Prime Minister arrives in the house so often at the appropriate time. I have just discovered the reason. I had to send to the reading room for today's issue of the Journal because there were none in circulation, and I have just read an article by Richard Jackson entitled "Hill Talk". It says:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker has had his centre block office wired for sound.
> House of Commons sound.
> He's done what every parliamentarian has dreamed of doing since electronics were invented . . . arranged things so that he may work in his office and still keep up-to-the-last word track of what is going on in the commons.

I can scarcely credit that being done with consent of the house, Mr. Chairman, but I should like the Prime Minister to inform the house if this report is correct.

The Chairman: The question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West might be very interesting, but it is not relevant to the item under discussion.

Mr. Pearson: Surely the hon. member has raised a very important question of privilege. He has quoted a newspaper article to the effect that, in some way, without the knowledge of the house or without consultation with or consent of the house or any of its officers, somebody has done something to wire the house to the Prime Minister's office so that the Prime Minister can follow what is going on here by an electronic method. This is the first I have heard about it, but it is a very important question of privilege which should be decided.

The Chairman: I must bring to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition that the member for Kootenay West did not raise this matter as a question of privilege. I believe also that this question should be taken up when the Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. Herridge: I shall turn it into a question of privilege, and ask the Prime Minister if this report is correct.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, it is a rather serious matter if the equipment recording the proceedings in this house have been tapped without the consent of the house. I am in some doubt as to whether the chairman can deal with it, but it is a very serious matter.

The Chairman: I must remind hon. members that at the moment the only item that can be discussed is vote 396, which deals with matters about which hon. members know.

Mr. Caron: A question of privilege can be raised at any time in the committee.

The Chairman: Yes, a question of privilege can be raised in the committee. But the hon. member for Kootenay West did not bring it forward as a question of privilege.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when I found out I had not brought it forward in the proper manner I changed it to a question of privilege and I think that stands.

Mr. McIlraith: If it is a question of privilege, it is a rather serious thing and I would hope that the Prime Minister would see fit to deal with it because—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McIlraith: I have the floor.

Mr. Habel: The rights of parliament!

Mr. Caron: Hitler.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member who is speaking—

Mr. Habel: We have not got dictatorship yet.

Mr. Harkness: You have no question of privilege.

The Chairman: Order. I will ask hon. members kindly to permit the hon. member who has the floor to carry on with his remarks. It is quite difficult to understand what the hon. member has to say with people all yelling at once. At the present time the hon. member for Ottawa West has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, if I could have the floor—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Ottawa West has the floor.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member for Ottawa West relinquish the floor to the Prime Minister?

Mr. McIlraith: As soon as I have finished my remarks I will do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That indicates how serious the matter is.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that if this report is true, it is a serious matter affecting this house and the proceedings of this house.

Mr. Harkness: You have said that three times now. Don't be so repetitious.

Mr. McIlraith: It means that it is possible, once the wire is taken outside in that way, to have it wired or sent by long distance phone anywhere in the world, and to have anyone brought in for the purpose of listening. Where does the thing stop? Are our caucus rooms wired? Are our private telephones tapped or where does the matter stop?

The Chairman: I must once again remind hon. members—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly I could speak to this matter now, Mr. Chairman. I realize that hon. gentlemen opposite have very little to talk about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Habel: That is why you are always out of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You do your best thinking when you are in the seated position, I would say to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Habel: You are very kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Much has been made of this matter. The hon. gentleman who raised it did so very properly, may I say immediately, knowing the country whence he came and his regard for parliamentary institutions there. This is the course followed in the United Kingdom in order to permit the prime minister to have available to him, so that there will not be any loss of time through missing a portion of debate, what is happening in the house. This installation was made with the authority of the department in order to make available to myself in the last few days, in view of the serious nature of what is taking place, an opportunity that would otherwise be denied me because I cannot be in the house all the time. There is available, in my office—and there is no concealment whatever—whenever the debate is on a private loudspeaker which enables me to follow the debate to the end that I can be back at any moment that I am required. That is the practice that is followed in the United Kingdom—I do not know whether or not it has been followed by successive prime ministers but it is the practice there—in order to enable the prime minister to discharge two of his responsibilities, namely to carry out his responsibility to be in the house when required and at the same time to maintain the very serious duties that fall on him. In spite of all the agitated—I almost said synthetic—exaggeration on the part of those opposite, there is nothing whatsoever in the nature of disregard of parliament. It is a desire fully to regard parliament.

Some prime ministers have stayed in the house at all times and others have not done so. As I remember Mr. King, he used to leave the house quite regularly because of the impossibility of being here on all occasions. Realizing that I did not want to miss what was going on but wanted to have a realization of the debates, to the end that the contribution being made is always available to me, I have that device available in my office. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I may say that it was installed just a couple of days ago in order to permit and enable me to carry on the two responsibilities, one the very heavy one at this time of being required to meet an international situation that those who have had the responsibility know of and at the same time not to disregard my duty to the House of Commons.

Mr. Pearson: Now that we are on this point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that it is quite obvious that something has happened—whatever the reasons may be for it—that is unprecedented in parliamentary history, something that has never happened before and something which I think is extremely important. Whatever the reasons may be for it, the result is that the proceedings of this house, as they are taking place, can now be heard outside of this house. That is a new development in our parliamentary traditions and in our parliamentary history; and I suggest that what has happened in the United Kingdom or in any other place has no particular bearing on the matter. I know, of course, that the Prime Minister has great responsibilities and that he cannot be in this house all the time. I know that this is a particularly difficult time for him. But I also know that his predecessor, Mr. St. Laurent, had great responsibilities. He was the head of a government in times of crisis and at that time there was no suggestion that in order to make the work a little bit easier and so that he could cover both the house and his office this should be done. I am also perfectly certain that if Mr. St. Laurent had wished it to be done, he would have taken this matter up in the House of Commons and informed the House of Commons of what was happening and perhaps have secured permission of the House of Commons so members would not be put in a position where they would read about such a change in the columns of a local newspaper. I suggest also, Mr. Chairman, that that is the way we should have been treated in this matter.

I remember very well indeed—and the Prime Minister must remember it also—that in one of the committees of this house a few years ago—it happened to be the committee on external affairs—in order to facilitate our work and in order to make it a little bit easier for the reporters and for the record of the committee to be circulated quickly, for one experimental meeting of the committee we introduced some electronic device into that room which would record what was said for reproduction and circulation. I remember that the leader of the Conservative party at that time rose in his place in this house and attacked the government of the day very vigorously indeed because of this breach of parliamentary privilege. As a result of the stand that he took at that time we ceased to use this electronic device.

If the Prime Minister feels that the time has come that he needs this kind of assistance in order to keep in touch with the house—and I am not expressing myself on that matter one way or the other at the present time—I think it would have been consistent with the privileges of this house for the Prime Minister who brought the matter up to have consulted the house and obtained permission of the house for himself and perhaps for some others who might also benefit by this kind of device.

Item agreed to.

397. International Trade Relations Branch, including a fee of $6,000 to the International Customs Tariffs Bureau, $204,248.

Mr. Van Horne: World trade relations have taken on a very significant aspect since the Soviet union launched its economic offensive against the west some three years ago. Russian determination to capture and hold world markets, by whatever means necessary, is nothing short of a formidable offensive against the west and its success thus far, as surely as I stand here, is one of the main underlying causes for the recession through which we are passing and from which we will have difficulty in emerging unless we do more than we are doing now.

While in Paris last fall I took the time to visit, for instance, two of the largest buyers of pulpwood in France to see if they could not resume the purchases of pulpwood from Canada which they had been making for many, many years. In each case I interviewed the president of the company and in each case I was accompanied by Mr. Robert Campbell Smith, our commercial attache in Paris. In each case the pattern was the same—these companies had in the past bought their pulpwood from Canada but had lately shifted their source of supply to Russia. Why? In each case the reason was because they got a better deal from Russia. Both presidents mentioned that the quality of the Russian wood was good, the contracts with Russia were carried out to the letter and no complaints arose about the quality or quantity involved, even though the French company did not send scalers to Russia to inspect the wood before shipment. Moreover, shipping dates were met on time, on the dates agreed upon, but in spite of all these things both company presidents expressed the desire to buy from Canada. For one thing Canadian pulpwood is less expensive but the haul being longer costs a little more; I understand our shippers get something like $39 a cord for pulpwood on the dock in Canada, while the cost in Russia runs around $48 a cord on the dock. Shipping costs tend to equalize the landed costs but Russian pulpwood landed in France costs a little more than Canadian pulpwood.

Hon. members might ask why these companies insist on buying from Russia if it is cheaper for them to buy Canadian pulpwood? The answer is simple; they get a better deal from that country than they can get from Canada. Russia will accept their currency while we sit back and insist on dollars. Russia does business how and where it can be done and as long as we do not realize that these countries simply cannot buy from us in the currency we insist upon, as long as we stick to our policies of "Take it on our terms or leave it", let me assure the house it is being left.

Furthermore, Russia has more aggressive and more expert selling agents and the impression they give to buying countries is this: "We want the business and we will do what we have to do to get it." In particular with reference to Canadian aluminum they say flatly, "We will undersell Canada regardless of how low Canadian prices are or may become." In other words, they are better horse traders, bargainers, they are better dealers and they get the business while we are losing our markets.

From Paris I went to London and with the help of our high commissioner, Mr. George Drew, I saw and talked to several of the main buyers of lumber from Canada, men like Sir Edward Monkhouse, who know our industries and who know Canada almost as well as we know it and have been buying our lumber for generations, men who are attached to Canada and have feelings of regard for the Canadian people. The story here is the same, Russia is supplying their lumber. Russia has captured our long-established lumber market and the Soviet union will do anything it has to do to get and keep the business.

They will, for instance, take pounds sterling in payment and will accept the buyer's note for several months, in some cases without interest. As I say they will tell you point-blank, "We have come here to get the lumber market and we will do whatever we have to do to get it." This is what the lumber buyers in England tell us—with the Soviet union it is just as simple as that.

What is the reaction of the English lumber buyer? It is simply that he is forced to buy from Russia rather than from Canada, despite his feeling for a commonwealth nation. Our trade policies place him in the position where he cannot turn down the advantages of dealing with the Soviet union as opposed to Canada. Therefore, in an area such as my own, where our people depend on the sale of lumber and pulpwood for a living, things are rough. One of the provincial ministers of labour said the other day that the conditions in my riding were worse than any other riding in this country and that is, I have no doubt, correct. Already we see in visible and touching form the results of the loss of our markets to Russia and to a certain extent to Sweden and Finland. I am speaking of pulpwood and lumber which, after all, is what we have to sell in order to survive.

Of course Russia's trade offensive is not the only reason for the unprecedented extent of unemployment and suffering in my riding, but it is one of the main causes. Tight money in particular and our monetary policies in general, in addition to our trade policies, have all played an active part—

An hon. Member: And your administration.

Mr. Van Horne: —in bringing about this situation.

In visiting my riding recently I found a family where the children had to leave for school without breakfast in the morning and another family which had six potatoes left without a cent with which to buy anything else. These conditions are general in several villages and naturally these people are very concerned. Some of them almost caused an insurrection at St. Quentin the other day because they had nothing to eat and nothing to do. Some of these people blame the government and some of their criticism is not warranted—like that of the man in my riding who said the other day, "Fishing is poor, the weather is bad, times are hard and you Conservatives are in."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Van Horne: But much of the criticism is warranted but it behooves this government to sit up and take notice. In many fields the government has shown bold initiative and has done what could be done to create employment; for instance, in the field of public works this government has done more for my riding in seven months than all other governments put together have done since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Van Horne: This is the only government in the history of Canada which has listened to us and has recognized and acted upon our problems, but this government in some other fields, unfortunately, has not implemented its policies fast enough to permit effective results and has not taken the even drastic means necessary to create conditions conducive to full employment, thus removing suffering and hardship which weigh heavily upon our people.

I have dealt on many other occasions with other factors involved but, speaking now only in regard to trade, I would like to suggest, request and may even demand a more aggressive and effective trade policy with respect to foreign trade. Let us face it, we are living in times when the Soviet trade offensive is not only taking away our markets, and is eminently successful in doing so, but their planned trade offensive will intensify as time goes on.

We must take steps to compete and compete successfully and to do this, in my mind, there are three fundamental requirements with respect to changes in the attitude on the part of federal governments, and this applies to all governments. In the first instance we must sell. I have always felt and I still feel that what Canada most needs is a battalion of live-wire agents, of good bargainers—horse traders if you want to call them that—going from country to country and buyer to buyer, selling Canada and Canada's products. Such agents should have specific instructions on how and what to promote and sell. Many countries simply do not know what we have to sell. We missed the boat at the world fair.

Secondly, we must take measures which will permit us to sell, which will require a complete re-evaluation of our monetary policies, among other things, to enable us to accept soft currencies or any currency of value. It is nothing short of national snobbishness to refuse to accept the pound sterling. In other words, we must adopt the means to sell. President Eisenhower underlined our problem in this house the other day when he went out of his way to emphasize the battle between the west and the Soviet union for world trade, and which might well be the most important problem facing the west today. I believe it is, and I also believe we are not doing enough in Canada to play our part in that struggle.

Whether Russia wins by beating us with arms or starves us out by cornering and capturing our markets, the consequences will be the same. We must adopt the attitude that we will succeed, and be prepared to take all honest means at our command. Thus, barter and all that this term involves; currency, in whatever usable form it comes; credit, in whatever acceptable form it is offered, must become part of our trade policies. Time is running against us. We have lost the momentum. We are dragging our feet.

Coming to the third point, may I say that however great the need for agents is, and important as the need for changes in our monetary system is, let us not forget that the product speaks for itself. One of the complaints I heard often in England is that Russian lumber is better cut than Canadian lumber. We here depend on portable mills where it is next to impossible to maintain exact dimensions, while in Russia the mills are fixed, and fastened down and equipped in a way which allows for practically no variations in dimensions. In England, people build their houses with rough lumber, and unless the widths are rigidly maintained it is hard to put floor covering, for example, over the lumber.

The need for a better Canadian product—and this applies to all manufactured goods—is of primary importance if we are to recapture our markets and create new ones. This is one reason why I very much appreciate the steps being taken by the government to set up an organization to help small industry. Of course, this proposed organization, at least as I understand it now, does not go far enough. I hope the scope will be enlarged to include capital assistance, product perfection and selling techniques. We have a selling job to do. We have not been doing it in the past. Let us buckle down and begin doing it now.

Mr. Caron: Would the minister tell the house what steps are being taken to improve trade relations within the different countries of the western hemisphere?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, this branch is engaged in that activity at all times. Through our trade commissioners, and through talks between officials of this department and representatives of foreign governments we keep constantly in touch with the situation with respect to trade relations between Canada and other countries of the western hemisphere.

Mr. Robichaud: The member for Restigouche-Madawaska has just brought up a question which is very important in northern New Brunswick. I asked the minister two questions on this same matter last evening. Can he tell us, now that he has his officials with him, what the Department of Trade and Commerce is doing to bring back to normal our exports of pulpwood to the European market? The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska has cited figures and said he is aware from his personal contacts with dealers in France and Britain that our prices are no higher than the prices paid for Russian pulp. In fact, they are even lower.

Mr. Churchill: One thing that must be borne in mind is that the demand for pulpwood all over the world is down at the present moment. The government, in so far as it has trade commissioners stationed abroad, keeps in touch with the process of trade, but the government is not involved actively and directly in selling pulpwood or any other article with the exception of wheat where we have a crown corporation to deal with its disposal. Private industry has representatives abroad who push these sales of pulpwood as is done with regard to other products.

Mr. Caron: I really believe this is a question which should be dealt with. The minister says the government does not try to sell, that it is not a salesman to sell goods manufactured in Canada. We should have an organization of salesmen around the world able to sell the products which we manufacture here. We manufacture much more than we can consume, and unless these goods are sold on the markets of the world we are due to have a recession which will last not only for a year or two but for a long time. I believe the Department of Trade and Commerce should organize salesmen around the world to sell these products.

Mr. Churchill: We are not engaged in state trading. We have our trade commissioner service in these 45 countries round the world whose business it is—and they are very active in this—to call upon businessmen in the countries in which they are located, to communicate with Canadian businessmen who visit those countries or to write to them. Information is constantly furnished to these officials who in turn pass it on to the government and to Canadian businessmen here. A great deal has been published in that magnificent booklet of ours called "Foreign Trade". So every possible step is taken by the officials of this department to keep Canadian business informed of opportunities abroad. But we have not yet reached the stage where we employ salesmen under government auspices to sell goods produced in Canada by private industry.

Canadian businessmen are themselves very active. As I mentioned on Thursday, 4,000 visits to the various countries of the world abroad have been paid by Canadian businessmen, and that is the way in which our Canadian trade is advanced. It is by the means I mentioned that business is kept informed of what is going on.

Mr. Caron: I have listened to what the minister has had to say, but I listened earlier to what was said by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. He said a while ago that while he was in France and in England he learned that we were losing the pulpwood trade to Russia. On account of what? If we have commissioners over there looking after trade, and if they have not reported, as they should have reported, that for some reason or another we are losing this trade, there is something wrong somewhere and this should be corrected by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

We are facing the same situation with regard to newsprint. We are losing our world trade to Norway, Sweden and Finland. How is it that we are losing our trade with the United States with respect to a product which otherwise has to be imported from so far away? We want to know what is wrong, in order that we may be able to change this situation, and that is why we are asking the minister to make the changes necessary for us to be able to sell our products.

Mr. Churchill: As I have said, in some respects trade has fallen off. Nevertheless, Canada is the greatest supplier of lumber and pulpwood, and our agents abroad are very active in promoting those sales by getting the information that is required. It is a matter of economics. If the Russians offer products below the price of Canadian products they sometimes get the business. I spoke about this the other day when we were dealing with aluminum.

Here is an example of a sale of lumber and lumber products amounting to $889,000 which came about through the activities of one of our trade commissioners in the United States. He made an extensive survey of lumber outlets in Michigan and Ohio during 1956 which, extended in 1957, formed the basis of many inquiries which resulted in a substantial volume of new business. Canadian lumber lists and special offerings were made available to local firms while, conversely, the names and interests of local firms were circulated to the industry in Canada. Items of new business to the amount I have mentioned—$889,000—were reported in 1957 as being due to this phase of the trade commissioner's activity.

I have here a list covering at least a dozen pages indicating various items of all types where the activity of trade commissioners resulted in business for Canadian firms. Here is another item coming from Mexico City. The commercial counsellor there, our trade commissioner, brought a Mexico City firm in touch with a Canadian company as a result of which seven orders for newsprint to the value of $65,000 were placed. Here is another from New Orleans. The names of various British Columbia and Ontario suppliers were furnished to firms in South Carolina, Oklahoma, California, Texas, Alabama and Florida by the trade commissioner as a result of which sales of lumber and other products were made to the extent of $813,000. And so it goes all the way through this book covering anything from diesel locomotives to codfish, aluminum, brewer's malt and durum wheat and so on. It is a very active branch of the government.

Mr. Gour: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Instead of sending 50 people on a trade mission to Great Britain, all expenses paid, would it not be just as reasonable to spend some money in sending representatives from various manufacturing and industrial concerns as well as representatives of the minister's department to various countries of the world to stimulate Canadian trade abroad? What is the point of sending 50 men to Great Britain to say, "Please, manufacturers of the United Kingdom, sell us some goods". Most of these things are already produced in this country. I think it would be advisable to spend $100,000 or more in sending someone from the minister's department together with representatives of those industries whose goods are in a surplus position in Canada to make some sales abroad and elsewhere. I do not think it is useful to send 50 men on a mission at the same time so they can have a nice pleasure trip. It is not necessary for them to have such a happy time and they could have accomplished more than merely saying to the British manufacturers, "Please, for God's sake, sell us some goods. We are not able to manufacture our own goods or buy and sell them". I believe the suggestion I have advanced is far more reasonable.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, a while ago the minister said we have an organization which seeks to sell Canadian goods in foreign markets. Despite this fact we have lost a great deal of our trade in pulpwood as the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska proved with the figures he had on the subject. He was on the spot and he asked a question.

In addition to the loss of pulpwood sales we have lost some sales of aluminum to Russia. I believe something is wrong somewhere. If it is not with our economy then it must be with our system of distribution. There should be an organization in the department to study what is wrong with us so we can recuperate the trade we lost. That is what I am asking the minister at this time. Is there any organization in the Department of Trade and Commerce to try to ascertain what is wrong with our system so we can recuperate our losses?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I will repeat what I have said. The trade commissioner's branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce is one of the most efficient branches of the government. Hon. members on all sides of the house have paid tribute to the work that is being done by these men of ours abroad. They are all carefully selected and trained. After serving abroad for a period they return to Canada and make contacts with Canadian industry and then take up their posts abroad. Every week letters come to me or to the department from businessmen who have been abroad and in contact with our trade commissioners and they report that they have received excellent cooperation and benefited greatly by the advice and counsel given by the trade commissioners.

Had it not been for the work of these men abroad Canada's export trade would not be higher at this time than it was a year ago and, as I pointed out yesterday, it has been rising.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I admit that we have a very good staff in the department and I wish to join with those hon. members who have spoken in praise of the work that has been done by this personnel. However, aside from that, we are losing some trade. We should not be losing trade because we certainly cannot furnish France or England with the pulp they need through lack of orders. There must be a reason for this. If a special study were made concerning pulpwood, newsprint and aluminum it might be possible to discover this reason. We are losing trade at the present time and we should be in a position to know why we are losing it so we can correct the difficulty. If we do not study the matter we will not know where we stand. Canada continues to suffer from over-production which creates a condition of recession and everybody wants to get rid of that.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the hon member's suggestion will be given very careful study by the officials of the department and myself. I gave an example the other day of the difficulties we face and the commodity I chose for the purpose of illustration was aluminum. We are the world's great supplier of aluminum and yet Russian competition has interfered with our sales of aluminum abroad. The hon. member said we should do something about it. We have done all that we could do about it but if the Russians are prepared, as they have stated, to quote a price that is under our price regardless of at what level we set it, then we are really in difficulty.

We have communicated with the United Kingdom asking them to continue to purchase Canadian aluminum and resist the sale of aluminum from Russia. That is the type of action we take. The various branches of this department are constantly in touch with trends of business all across the world. Reports come in all the time with regard to what is happening in respect of one commodity or another. The businessmen of this country secure that information from our department. We maintain close touch with world economic conditions.

Item 398 agreed to.

399. Canadian participation in the Brussels universal and international exhibition 1958, $709,628.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, the minister will probably recall that I asked him some questions a few weeks ago about the situation with respect to the Brussels universal and international exhibition. I do not know whether or not he has had occasion to personally visit the exhibition but he will recall there were some articles published in the newspapers in criticism of it, and there was also some criticism made by one member of his own party who was there some weeks ago. Under the circumstances and due to the fact that this exhibition is costing the country $3 million I believe we are entitled to expect some comment from the minister concerning the exhibition. I should also like to have him give us a little more information about the circumstances surrounding the resignation of Mrs. Bienvenue. We have little information at the present time to use as the basis of a discussion of this subject. We have received only the information the minister gave us and have had tabled the letter of resignation and the minister's reply. I would appreciate very much if the minister would be kind enough to give us more information so we will have a clearer picture of the situation at the Brussels universal and international exhibition.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the plans for the Canadian exhibit at the Brussels universal and international exhibition were made by the former Liberal administration several years ago and the money was allocated very largely during the lifetime of that administration.

When we came into the picture at the end of June, 1957, the plans were very far advanced and most of the money had then been voted for this purpose. We were presented with a fait accompli in the type of building which had been designed, the exhibits that were going to be shown in the building, the beautification of the grounds surrounding the building and the selection of the site on which the building would rest. Virtually all the appointments with regard to the management of the exhibition had been made, including the appointment of Madame Bienvenue as chaperone. That was done by order in council in that period of interregnum between June 10 and June 21.

Some people have been very critical of the Canadian exhibit at Brussels and a much larger number have been very complimentary of it. For a long time I kept a record from week to week of the letters coming in and the comments made. For quite a while they were about 50-50, 50 per cent condemning the Canadian exhibit and 50 per cent praising it. Latterly I have received no letters finding fault with the Canadian exhibit but an increasing number of comments praising it. Some of these comments are now coming from visitors to the exhibition living overseas in Belgium, Holland, France and elsewhere in Europe. They are very much impressed with the Canadian exhibit. Thousands of them have been through our pavilion and the number is steadily increasing.

It is important to recall what was the purpose of the world exhibition. The original invitation which came from the authorities at Brussels to the Canadian government was expressed in the following words:

> We want it to be possible for any one nation to be able to explain to all other nations how it lives, what are its religious and philosophic conceptions, its economic and social achievements. If to govern means an attempt to give a people happiness then let the nations tell each other just how they visualize that happiness and how they would assure the required material and moral conditions.

It will be seen from that that this is not a trade fair or an industrial exhibition, and people have become confused in their minds with regard to that. It is intended to depict the Canadian way of life and I think that is being done by our exhibit in Brussels. There is an industrial section. Art is shown and various other aspects of life in Canada are depicted.

One must also remember that although the amount of money, $3 million, seems sufficiently large for such an enterprise it is dwarfed by the amount of money spent by the United States, Russia and some other countries who have very large exhibits adjacent to the Canadian pavilion. But, as I have stated on another occasion, Canada in spending $3 million on this exhibit has played a part comparable to that of other nations of similar size. We have not seen fit to enlarge the amount of money available for the Canadian exhibit. We took it for granted that the former administration had given very careful consideration to the planning and that within the financial limit set satisfactory results could be achieved. I think that satisfactory results have been achieved.

There were complaints earlier about the food in the restaurant. You hear complaints about the food in the restaurant upstairs here and I have been around these parts now for over eight years. The cost of the meals in the Canadian restaurant at Brussels was under question and the cost was subsequently lowered. Canadian restaurant people were given an opportunity to tender on providing meals over there but did not take up the offer. A Belgian restaurant keeper undertook to provide meals. He had the impression that visitors to the exhibition from Canada and North America generally would like to have food that is common to Europe. Some of our Canadian visitors apparently did not want that. They wanted, I suppose, ham and egs, hamburgs, hot dogs and things of that nature.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope codfish.

Mr. Churchill: Others who are interested in seeing how other people live have not objected to the type of meals served in the restaurant. Complaints about the restaurant, although they were fairly numerous in the early stages, have declined. I have not heard any complaint about the restaurant recently. In any case, a visitor to the Brussels exhibition is not compelled to eat in the Canadian restaurant. Every other exhibit there has its restaurant and there are other public eating places in Brussels. I think we do not need to magnify too much complaints of individuals with regard to this or that. You cannot satisfy people with regard to art, architecture, food and a long list of other things where opinions differ depending upon people's tastes, background, training and so on.

A staff of 48 students has been over there since early in April acting as guides, 24 young women and 24 young men selected carefully from the universities of this country by university authorities on the basis of their academic standing and on the basis of their knowledge of languages. These carefully selected students were given the privilege of spending six months in Europe, earning a salary during that period, getting free lodging and free board and accumulating leave so that they would be able to do a little travelling in Europe. They are the most fortunate university students in Canada. There are hundreds of university students who would gladly have made the trip and acted as guides at the Brussels exhibition. It is the type of opportunity that comes about once in a lifetime and by and large I think our students have been excellent representatives of Canada and have done a first-class piece of work over there.

A little trouble arose over the retirement of the chaperone but it was at her own request and I accepted her resignation. I took it for granted that if a person went to the trouble of carefully writing out a resignation and presenting it to me I had no alternative but to accept, and I accepted it as I would under any other circumstances. Resignations are not lightly written and I simply assumed that the matter had been very carefully considered. There was a little disturbance among some of the students at the time who thought that the chaperone's resignation should not have been accepted and there was some disturbance over whether or not her place would be taken by someone else. Her place was, of course, immediately taken over by another lady who has served as chaperone in the interval.

As of this week Madame Boisvert of Quebec city has been appointed to be chaperone at the Canadian exhibit at Brussels and will be leaving in a very few days to take up her new position. While she is en route and for a while after she arrives Miss Armstrong will continue to act in the capacity of chaperone.

Mr. Caron: Is that the wife of the sergeant of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Churchill: No. Miss Armstrong is from our London office.

Miss Armstrong will stay there until Madame Boisvert becomes thoroughly familiar with the situation and with her duties.

This constitutes a report, Mr. Chairman, on the exhibition at Brussels. From what I can gather from reports from newspapers published on the continent, from letters written by newspapermen who have been over there and businessmen who have visited the place, it appears that the Canadian exhibit is a credit to Canada; that it is depicting Canadian life in acceptable fashion; that it compares very favourably with the exhibits of other nations. I think we can be proud of the Canadian exhibit. I think we can give a word of praise to those who conceived, planned it and put it into operation; a word of praise to the students and others who are assisting in giving a good Canadian welcome to the visitors to the Brussels world fair.

Mr. Bourget: I should like, first of all, to thank the minister for the information he has just given to us. However, coming back to the case of Madame Bienvenue, I could read from her letter to the minister in which she said:

> I am having imposed on me obligations which go far beyond the terms of my contract.

May I ask the minister if he tried to ascertain whether or not what she alleges is true? Have new obligations been imposed upon Mrs. Bienvenue beyond the terms of her contract or agreement with the department?

Mr. Churchill: Not to my knowledge. I had a report given to me with regard to this, and there was a thorough understanding concerning the terms of employment, salary and things of that nature. In the course of operation some misunderstanding must have arisen as to what should be done, and that is understandable in the operation of a world's fair. Madame Bienvenue considered she was being asked to do things that she had not expected to do, and was not being reimbursed to the extent she thought she should be. She indicated that she required an additional salary of $200 a month, and she said, and I quote her exact words:

> Failing this, I resign my appointment 30 days from this date.

Mr. Bourget: I understand that, according to the agreement, Madame Bienvenue was supposed to be the social counsellor and chaperone of the women students. According to information I have received, as well as newspaper reports, she was also called upon to act as concierge, housekeeper and sometimes charwoman. Surely if she was called upon to do more she was right in asking for more pay.

Mr. Churchill: I do not believe for one minute that she was called upon to do the other duties to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Bourget: I do not know if you would call it a hotel where the students lived in Brussels, but I understand this was a four-storey house. There was no caretaker and there was no nurse. According to the information I have received, some of the students were sick and she had to take care of them. If she acted as nurse, charwoman and housekeeper, how could the minister blame her for asking for more money?

As a matter of fact, the letter she sent to the minister was not a letter of resignation. She mentioned to the minister she would resign if the conditions were not changed and if her salary was not increased because she was doing more work. I think she was quite right in asking for more pay. It is only logical to ask for more pay if her duties and obligations had been increased.

Mr. Churchill: I have the greatest respect for Madame Bienvenue, Mr. Chairman. I think she performed her duties in admirable fashion. I took her resignation at face value. I saw no reason why I should not accept it because we had no funds voted for this particular purpose. Had she indicated in her letter she wished to confer with regard to duties or confer with me regarding salary matters, that would have been different. But it was a letter of resignation, and I assumed that it had been carefully considered before it was written and signed.

Mr. Bourget: Before the minister accepted the resignation of Madame Bienvenue did he try to ascertain from sources other than the reports he received from officials in Brussels what the exact situation was? I think we have a right to assume that something is not going too well out there because even the members of parliament have made complaints, not members of the opposition but members of the government. I believe the minister would have been justified in asking for a complete investigation in the situation. After all, when the Canadian people are spending $3 million they are entitled to get some benefit from it.

Mr. Churchill: The complaints my hon. friend mentions made by members of parliament to my knowledge were complaints with regard to the nature of the exhibit, the size of the building, the type of food that was being served in the restaurant. I did not hear from any member of parliament about the duties of the chaperone. I heard commendatory remarks concerning Madame Bienvenue. Prior to her departure, I was assured she was the type of person who would fill this job admirably, and I believe she did. I did not feel justified in making any extra expenditures to conduct an investigation under the circumstances. If people are not happy in the work that they are doing, it is their privilege to offer their resignation. In this case, that was done and I accepted it.

Mr. Pearson: I quite understand the minister's difficulty about assessing public opinion on the character and value of our exhibit in Brussels. It is quite impossible, of course, to participate in an exhibition of this kind and satisfy everybody. I, myself, am in no position to judge about the success of Canadian participation in this exhibit. Reports I have had would lead me to believe the effort was creditable, in view of the amount of money available, and that the exhibits are a reasonably attractive reflection of life in this country.

I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. Has there been any change in the plans for participation in the exhibit? I am thinking of the appearance, for instance, of the National Ballet or the Théâtre du Nouveau Monde. Has it been found necessary to cut down on some aspects of our participation and, if so, why was that required? The minister has touched upon the question of morale amongst the staff, and stated in the house that morale amongst the students was very high. Some of us have had letters from students which indicated that morale, in respect of some of them, was not too high.

However, there is something else that has been stated and I think this is a matter of some seriousness, namely that reports have been sent back by R.C.M.P. officers who are there on the conduct of the members of the staff. I should like to know from the minister whether, in fact, that has happened; whether the R.C.M.P. have taken it upon themselves to report to the government on the members of the Canadian staff at the exhibition.

Mr. Churchill: I have no knowledge of any report by the R.C.M.P. with regard to the people engaged in activities at the Canadian pavilion. In any case, that matter does not come under my jurisdiction. The Minister of Justice would have to deal with that particular matter. On the earlier question of the Leader of the Opposition may I say this. I do not think there has been any reduction whatsoever in any of the programs planned for the Canadian exhibition at the Brussels fair.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has just said that any reports that might be made by the R.C.M.P. would not be made to him and therefore he would perhaps not be aware of them. But the Canadian participation in the exhibition is, of course, under his jurisdiction. This matter has already been taken up in the house. On June 26 a question was addressed to the Minister of Justice on this point. He said that he would make inquiries to ascertain whether or not reports have been received. We have received information that such reports have been made. I think it would be well to clear this matter up. We had hoped that the Minister of Justice might have informed the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, in fact, there is any basis to this kind of talk. We asked a question in the house. He said that he would make inquiries about it on June 26 but we have not heard anything since then.

Mr. Churchill: As far as the Department of Trade and Commerce is concerned I can say that we have asked for no reports from the R.C.M.P.; we have received no reports from the R.C.M.P.; and we know of no reports sent back from the R.C.M.P. except, I am informed, that they complained about the food that they were receiving.

Mr. Cardin: I think this question of the difficulty that is now taking place at the Brussels fair is most regrettable. I think it is most regrettable from the point of view of the students who had looked forward to this experience with a good deal of anticipation. I think it is unfortunate for them that there should have been this misunderstanding, as I would call it, as to the relationship between the members of the personnel at the Brussels fair. I know Mrs. Bienvenue and I also know that she is a person who would take on these responsibilities with a great deal of compunction and certainly would not take these duties lightly. I think she may not have entered in her letters all the reasons that may have provoked her resignation. I feel that there is a great deal more left unsaid than is said in the letter. Under these circumstances it would seem to me that the minister might well have utilized, for instance, our representatives in Belgium who were on the spot to make a very thorough inquiry as to the reasons why Mrs. Bienvenue tendered her resignation. I think there is a great deal more being left unsaid than is being said. I rather feel that it would not be asking too much of the department to ask it to make a thorough investigation as to exactly what is going on in the Brussels fair among our Canadian personnel. I wonder whether the minister would not perhaps tell us exactly who has been chosen to replace Mrs. Bienvenue. I understood him to say that it was a Mrs. Boisvert who was to replace Mrs. Bienvenue. But as the hon. member knows, there are a great number of families bearing the name of Boisvert. I wonder whether he could be more specific.

Mr. Churchill: In reply to the earlier part of the hon. member's remarks may I say that I know of no dissatisfaction now prevailing among the staff at the Canadian pavilion at Brussels. As I said earlier, there was some dissatisfaction at the time of the resignation of Mrs. Bienvenue. As to her successor, in order to identify her a little bit more carefully may I say that she is Mrs. Claire Paquette Boisvert of Quebec city.

Mr. Van Horne: One of the things that impressed me greatly was the choice of the building, having regard to where the building was located. It was a very unfortunate choice that was made in taking that particular building. It was a building without very many services. One of the things that stands out is the fact that the R.C.M.P. and the staff were made to inhabit the same building. According to the information received from the R.C.M.P. this is against their regulations which demand that they be housed separately from the staff. Mrs. Bienvenue took the trouble to call me into her office when I visited that building. Of course, she was very specific in her complaints. There is no question about it that the former government got this thing off to a bad start. I presume this government is doing everything it can to straighten the matter out. In the light of the more favourable opinions that are now being received, I also presume that this government has done quite a bit to ameliorate conditions at the fair. From speaking with people visiting our exhibition, talking with the guides and, what I personally could find out from simply going through it, looking around and asking questions, the fair is not a success. Canada is not doing a proper job as far as our participation in that fair is concerned. It is unfortunate that I am obliged to say that but, as far as I am concerned, that is what I have found.

Mr. Chevrier: May I pursue the matter that was originated by my friend the hon. member for Levis. A moment ago the minister said, if I understood him rightly, that he had received no reports from the R.C.M.P. While I am not challenging the accuracy of that statement I refer him to sessional paper No. 203, dated Wednesday, July 9, 1958 which is a report on the whole matter. Paragraph 4 of it reads as follows:

> 4. I have learned that three reports concerning the personnel of the Canadian residence (the Royal Canadian Mounted Police excepted) have been sent to Ottawa without my knowledge. The first is said to incorporate a grave rumour which libels the reputations of the 24 young women. The second, based on a minor incident, suggests that our young people use alcohol excessively. The third concerns me.

In the light of that statement, which seems to be in contradiction to what the minister has said, I wonder whether he will not comment on the situation anew?

Mr. Churchill: I understand that these are charges made by Mrs. Bienvenue herself. You are reading from her letter?

Mr. Chevrier: I was reading from the sessional paper which I take it is a letter from Mrs. Bienvenue to the minister.

Mr. Churchill: Just in case a stranger might not know what a sessional paper is, let it be clear that this sessional paper is the original letter from Mrs. Bienvenue and addressed to me. It is not a government publication. These are the statements that were made. But I have already given my answer with regard to communications from the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the minister ever asked the Minister of Justice if there were reports such as those that are mentioned in that paragraph 4 of the letter?

Mr. Churchill: No, I have not made that inquiry of him.

Mr. Pearson: Does not the minister think he should do that? This is a fairly serious charge made by the signer of this letter to the effect that reports of this kind have been sent back by the R.C.M.P. to Ottawa. If that charge has no foundation in fact, that should be made clear; and presumably the only way in which it can be made clear, if the minister or his department has not received such a report, is to ask the Minister of Justice whether there is any foundation to it. That is why we brought this matter up nearly a month ago. At that time the Minister of Justice said he would look into it. That is why we should like to have a report at this time.

Mr. Churchill: I will draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice the interest of the hon. gentleman in this matter.

Mr. Bourget: Does the minister mean he has not received any reports, not one of the reports mentioned in the letter from Madame Bienvenue to himself, no report at all? I do not mean reports sent by the R.C.M.P. only because in her letter Madame Bienvenue mentions that those reports were not sent by the R.C.M.P. We may take this inference from the fact that she says, "The Royal Canadian Mounted Police excepted". I am just asking the minister if he has received the three reports on this subject mentioned three or four lines down in the fourth paragraph of the letter?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Chairman, I have not received the reports such as are indicated in the letter of Madame Bienvenue.

Mr. Caron: The minister received a letter signed Mrs. Bienvenue. When he read the letter, or should have read it, in the fourth paragraph he would have seen she says she has learned that three reports concerning the personnel of the Canadian residence—the Royal Canadian Mounted Police excepted—were sent to Ottawa without her knowledge.

I am asking the minister why he does not refer to these alleged reports? He just accepts the resignation—oh, with a few kind words, "I wish to thank you very much for your contribution"—without making an inquiry to see if there is any truth in the letter. I think it is very strange to receive a letter of that kind and not to inquire at all as to such a report, whether it was received in his department by someone, but just to accept the resignation.

Mr. Churchill: It did not occur to me, Mr. Chairman, that paragraph 4 had any relationship to the actual resignation incorporated in the balance of the letter under the heading "Conclusions".

Mr. Caron: The whole letter is part of the resignation. Firstly, Mrs. Bienvenue declaims the reason why she is not satisfied and then in the final paragraph she claims that there are reports made without her knowledge. So this is one of the reasons for her resignation; there are more reasons contained in the conclusions which state:

> 2. Our residence has not been organized as it should have been.
> (a) The young men have no lounge of their own.
> (b) The manning staff is unreasonably crowded by reason of the fact that three members of the R.C.M.P. have their wives with them in the building.
> (c) There is a woman, Mrs. Eckert on the storey which was to be reserved for the young men.

These are all the reasons given for the resignation. The minister is required to see if it is true or not. I know if I received a letter of that kind I would inquire before deciding to accept or refuse a resignation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I suggest, as there seems to be a good deal of interest in this item, that the minister could inquire of his colleague the Minister of Justice as to whether there were any reports such as alleged in paragraph 4 of the letter and of the sessional paper and the item might perhaps stand until the minister reports to the house. I am sure if he does that he will see that there will not be too serious objection to the item going through.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item passes or is allowed to stand, Mr. Chairman, I should like to express the feeling of shock which I am sure must have been shared by other hon. members that the minister, having received this letter, accepted this resignation. The minister has, since he became minister, accepted more resignations than all the other members of the government put together, and yet he makes the statement that when he received this resignation he merely accepted it without investigating the circumstances which led up to it. Considering the importance of the positions held by many of the officials who have resigned since the minister took up his present office, it does seem to me the most extraordinary confession for the minister to make.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. gentleman is not always accurate in his statements and on this occasion he is inaccurate. I said that I read the resignation and decided it had been made in good faith. I accepted it, but at no time did I say I had made no investigation, as the hon. member has now stated. In that respect his remarks are totally inaccurate and his gratuitous references to other resignations deserve to be received with the contempt which one feels for that type of political remark.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Churchill: The resignation of Mr. McIvor from the Canadian wheat board was contemplated for many years, and was based upon personal reasons. The resignation of Mr. Bennett from the atomic energy commission had been placed before my predecessor at least one year before I assumed office and was very kindly postponed by Mr. Bennett at my request. So let us have no more of these snide remarks about resignations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. members assume that my observations should be treated with contempt I wish to say I have listened very carefully to the remarks of the minister. I certainly got the impression, as I believe did all members on this side of the house, that the minister had made no investigation of the case of Mrs. Bienvenue. If he made such an investigation would he tell us the results of it, which surely parliament is entitled to know.

Mr. Churchill: I accept no responsibility for the impressions formed in the mind of my hon. friend.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has said he made an investigation and that is a very pertinent statement in regard to the letter of Madame Bienvenue. As stated in this letter, and it must have been an important factor in the decision to resign, three reports were made, I rather assumed by the R.C.M.P. to the Minister of Justice from the reference to the R.C.M.P. in that paragraph. But perhaps that is wrong and perhaps the reports were made by someone else to the minister or to someone in his department. Now if the minister has made any investigation we would like to know whether as the result of such an investigation there was any foundation whatever for these serious charges that reports were made which reflected upon the character of Canadian personnel. If the minister is not in a position to give us the results of the investigation at this moment would he let this item stand until he is able to secure these results which he should be able to do quite shortly?

Mr. Churchill: I think, Mr. Chairman, we are magnifying this item out of all reasonable proportion in asking for it to stand dependent upon a report from the Minister of Justice who was previously asked a question with regard to these reports. I have no knowledge of reports which Madame Bienvenue claims are libellous or damaging to someone's reputation. This has not come to my attention in any way whatsoever and I have already stated the circumstances under which I have accepted the resignation.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, there is a very simple way out of this difficulty. The minister can ask an official of his department or someone else to phone the Minister of Justice to find out if he has any such reports. He could do that in a few minutes; he could discover whether any such reports have been received. He say he has no knowledge of them and he could not possibly have knowledge of all reports received in his department, but he could clear up the mystery very quickly and easily.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Nielsen): As I understand the rules of the committee, the committee can with unanimous consent have an item stand. Does the committee give that unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. Pearson: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: I think the item should pass. I think this is just a ridiculous request based on an alleged report said by Madame Bienvenue to be libellous. She does not say she saw the report; she simply says she heard of some report, but she does not tell us who was the author or to whom it was sent.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman, it says she has learned of the reports.

Mr. Churchill: From whom?

Mr. Pearson: Presumably in her capacity as the woman responsible for looking after the staff in Brussels. She has learned the reports were made and as a result of this and other things she felt it necessary to submit her resignation. So it is not a trifling matter; if these reports are involved all the minister has to do is to see if they were received by either the Minister of Justice or his department or by the minister's own department. We asked this question of the Minister of Justice nearly a month ago and we have heard nothing further. We now ask the minister to find out whether any such reports were received by his department. He has just said he made an investigation of the matter.

Mr. Churchill: There were certainly no reports such as are referred to here, received by my department. The Minister of Justice may be asked to reply to the question which has already been placed on the order paper, and surely that will satisfy the committee. There is no curtailment of information; no loss of time. These questions can be repeated —hon. members opposite are very good at that—and I am sure the Minister of Justice will be quite able to give a reply on Monday.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has now said that there were no such reports received by his department. I accept that statement. He did not make it earlier. I do not want to hold up the minister's estimates. At the proper time we will ask the Minister of Justice. In the meantime we accept the statement the minister has just made that no such reports as those referred to paragraph 4 of this letter were received by his department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item carries, I should like to say this: the minister made a charge that I had misrepresented a statement he had made and in support of his contention that I had misrepresented him he went on to say that he had made an investigation. He has told us absolutely nothing about the kind of investigation he made or the results of his investigation, and I think that as representatives of the taxpayers we are entitled to that information before this item passes.

Mr. Bourget: Before the item carries, I should like to ask the minister if he would be good enough to table the letters sent to him by the students, copies of which have, I think, also been sent to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Churchill: There is a notice of motion on the order paper for a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the students who are acting as guides at the Canadian pavilion of the Brussels universal and international exhibition, 1958. That will come up in due course on Monday. The notice of motion refers to both the Prime Minister and myself. I have not had an opportunity of speaking to the Prime Minister about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister refuse to tell us what kind of investigation he carried out and what the results of his investigation were?

Mr. Churchill: I see no purpose in attempting to satisfy the irrepressible curiosity of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Robichaud: The charges made are public. They are public charges, and the documents have been tabled in this house. The minister says he has made an investigation. Can he not tell this committee what were the results of his investigation, what were his findings? Are the charges true or false?

Mr. Churchill: Is the hon. member asking whether or not I investigated these charges made by Madame Bienvenue in paragraph 4 of her letter? I have already stated I have no knowledge of this whatsoever. If it were sent by the R.C.M.P., or to the Minister of Justice that is an entirely different proposition. In any case, her resignation is not founded on that statement in her letter but on considerations which do not even mention these alleged libelous charges.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask one more question. Could the minister say what he investigated in the investigation he carried out?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, any reasonable person would understand what type of investigation would be carried out on receipt of a letter of resignation. I naturally asked my officials to let me know the state of affairs at Brussels.

Mr. Pickersgill: And what did your officials report?

Mr. Churchill: My officials reported that Madame Bienvenue, in accordance with her letter, was offering her resignation, that she was being asked to perform duties which were beyond her and was requesting more money, and they thought that this additional money was not available as it was not available within the estimate and no course was left other than to accept her resignation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to press this matter any further. I merely want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that is was not so long ago since the minister and his friends were sitting over here and complaining about the denial of information to parliament by occupants of the treasury benches, and I cannot recall in all the time I have observed this parliament anything to compare with the refusal of the minister to answer perfectly simple questions that we have witnessed this afternoon.

401. Electricity and gas inspection services, $976,301.

Mr. Chevrier: On item 401, Mr. Chairman, the minister was good enough to answer the questions that I asked him earlier about the export of power, and in his reply he indicated that the New Brunswick electric power commission holds a licence for the export of power of 20,730 kilowatt hours, and that the power exported through the grid is developed in part at Beechwood. The question I desire to ask the minister is this: is the power under development there not for transmission to the province itself, and was not that the intention when parliament approved this project? So I ask the minister why, in view of that understanding, was the licence granted for the export of a portion of the power developed at Beechwood.

Mr. Churchill: The licence was granted because we were informed that they had a surplus of power, and the licence was granted on the basis that the power may be interrupted if required.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister say how much power is generated at Beechwood?

Mr. Churchill: We gave the figures, I think, for the grid as a whole. I do not know how much is generated at Beechwood itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the answer given would not cover the question I have just asked. Let me put it in another way: can the minister state whether this is off-peak power, and what proportion of the power developed at Beechwood is covered by the export licence?

Mr. Churchill: I judge that this is off-peak power. Whether it comes directly from Beechwood or is drawn from the grid as a whole would be very difficult to determine.

Mr. Chevrier: I know that perhaps some of these questions are technical, but could the minister say, nevertheless, what are the bases upon which a licence is granted by his department for the export of power?

Mr. Churchill: I think always on the basis that it is in excess of local requirements, and always on an interruptible basis.

Mr. Chevrier: Can this power be recaptured? Is there a provision in the licence to this effect? What I mean is this: power is a natural resource and I am sure there must be conditions and terms upon which the licence is issued. Does the licence state that this power can be returned at any time and interrupted even though it may affect the development of communities in another country?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, I believe so, because it is surplus power on our side and it is interruptible, and the communities receiving this on the other side do so on the understanding that they cannot count on it as a permanent thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, is there not a difference—and I speak subject to correction—between interruptible power and surplus power in the sense of power that is surplus to the immediate demands and which is provided on a more or less permanent basis? If this is interruptible power it could be interrupted at any time and if at the present moment there is no particular need for it in the province of New Brunswick there would not be much dispute about it on this side of the house. On the other hand, if it is power which is assumed to be in excess of any immediately foreseeable requirement in New Brunswick and is being exported to the state of Maine on a regular basis we would be very worried on this side of the house because in the last parliament, as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will probably recall, we were asked to support a loan of $30 million from the federal treasury to provide additional power for the province of New Brunswick and that measure received the support of both sides of the house. I do not think it would have received the support of both sides or indeed the support of a great many hon. members of the house if there had been any thought that in doing so we were making a loan to provide power for export to the United States.

That is a question, of course, that has been a great political question in Canada all through the twentieth century. On one occasion, as the minister may perhaps recall, it occasioned differences of opinion in the ranks of the Liberal party which perhaps we have not yet heard the end of and the question of the maintenance of our power resources in Canada is something of which parliaments have always been very jealous. We would want the most categorical kind of assurance from the minister that this is genuinely interruptible power and that there is no question whatever that it can be instantly retrieved if it is required.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think I can say it is genuinely interruptible power. It is making use of surplus power which is available at the present time but in the future it may well be that this surplus power will become essential for use within the province of New Brunswick itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could get a more comprehensive answer to the question I asked earlier about the basis upon which these licences are granted. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to the debate that had taken place in this house many years ago on this question. I remember that debate quite well. I believe that there was general agreement between all parties about the desire to keep this power in our own country and on no occasion to export it other than in extraordinary circumstances and except when it was off-peak power and, as has already been stated, clearly and genuinely interruptible power.

The question I asked and upon which I should like some further enlightenment if the minister would be kind enough to give it to me is this. What are the terms or conditions in the grant of the licence authorizing the export of this power whether it be at Beechwood or at any other point on the border between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Churchill: Before the export permit is granted the standards branch of our department gives me information to show that this is surplus power beyond domestic needs and that information in turn has to be disclosed to the government before the order in council is issued. There has been no deviation in policy from what has prevailed in the past. We are simply granting these export permits in circumstances where surplus power is available and it is on an interruptible basis.

Mr. Chevrier: I know that the licences are granted in exceptional cases. I appreciate that they are not the general rule. What is required in order to recapture the power? Does notice have to be given to the industry or the power commission in the other state?

Mr. Churchill: I feel sure that is part of the agreement that is made. In the first instance it is surplus and in the second instance it is interruptible because it has to be utilized in Canada and therefore is not available to the importing state.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister have a copy of the licence? Could I obtain a copy?

Mr. Churchill: I shall gladly furnish the hon. member with one but we do not have a copy here at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: If I secure a copy I think that will be sufficient. Could the minister or one of his officials state whether the licence says that the power is for a certain period, for instance for two hours or a terminable period within a day?

Mr. Churchill: No, I doubt very much if it sets out that detail.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister also tell the committee if in such a permit there is a clause which determines the cost of power? In other words, is the power sold to the United States consumer at the same price that is paid for Canadian consumption by the residents of New Brunswick?

Mr. Churchill: That is not stated in the export licence which we issue.

Mr. Pearson: What we are trying to establish, and perhaps we can sum it up in these words, is this: the power in question which is exported from this country is genuinely interruptible as the minister has said, that it can be recaptured for Canadian consumption and that the purchaser of the power in the United States knows that fact.

Mr. Churchill: That, I think, is a very good summary of our position.

402. Weights and measures inspection services, $1,063,212.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister say whether there has been an increase in the personnel of this branch of his department?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there has been an increase of 13.

Mr. Chevrier: Could he give the reason?

Mr. Churchill: This branch carries out the inspection of weights and measures and of weighing and measuring machines used in trade throughout Canada, scales of any capacity, and measures the accuracy of gasoline pumps and trucks and other weighing or measuring equipment that is imported and weighing and measuring machines manufactured in Canada prior to being released for sale. With the increase of population in this country and the expansion of business operations, we have found it necessary to increase the inspection staff.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics—
403. Administration, $218,443.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to make an issue of anything and it may have been that way since the beginning of the world but when we were in another committee the other day I discovered that in terms of area the cities of Hull and Ottawa are linked together. The situation in the two cities is vastly different. Ottawa is the capital city where most persons are government employees. Hull is a manufacturing city where the employment is completely different. With respect to Quebec, Hull is similar to Three Rivers and Sherbrooke. It is generally called the metropolis of western Quebec. I would ask the minister to request the dominion bureau of statistics in future to designate Ottawa and Hull as separate areas.

The two cities are too different to classify them together. You can find that on page 6 and page 24 of the report of the government bureau. When I wanted figures for Hull the other day the only thing they could give me was Hull-Ottawa. This is not satisfactory with respect to our population because there is not the same type of employment. Would it be possible for the minister to ask them to separate Ottawa and Hull as Sherbrooke and Three Rivers are separate areas in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Churchill: I will be glad to look into the problem raised by the hon. member and see if his suggestion can be carried out.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether there has been any change in the title of the bureau?

Mr. Churchill: It is known as the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Chevrier: I know but has there been any change in the title?

Mr. Churchill: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in view of the very great interest in the compilation of unemployment statistics and, indeed, in view of the importance of these statistics at the present time, would the minister give the committee a fairly detailed report as to how this is done so that we may be in a position perhaps to appreciate more accurately than we have in the past the exact meaning and significance of the bureau of statistic's figures on unemployment compared with the figures collected by the Department of Labour.

Mr. Churchill: An official from the bureau is coming down.

Mr. Pearson: The reason I ask, and it should be obvious, is that there are two sets of figures as we all know and over the years there has been confusion inside and outside the house as to the relationship between the two and what they stand for, the registrations for unemployment assistance of the Department of Labour and the bureau of statistics sort of random sample compilation. Perhaps this would be a good opportunity to clear up any confusion that may exist as to the relation between the two.

Mr. Churchill: The Leader of the Opposition has raised a question of very considerable importance because over the years some people have been a bit confused by the two sets of figures produced dealing with employment or unemployment. The head of the dominion bureau of statistics has studied this problem with painstaking care and has prepared a report which I think he has now attempted to bring to the attention of one government or another on three different occasions. I believe that before my hon. friends altered their position this report was on the verge of being considered. It was brought to my attention last winter and because of other circumstances we did not have the opportunity then to give it the attention that it deserved. I have been considering asking Mr. Duffett, the head of the bureau, to bring the report forward again. I think that this report, based on his experience and that of his assistants might, if it meets with approval, solve this rather difficult problem. If my hon. friend will leave the matter there, I hope before very long to be able to report to him that we are making some progress along that line.

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate what the minister has said and also the desirability, if it can be done, of consolidating the methods and procedures and results of the efforts to clarify the situation with regard to unemployment and, indeed, employment statistics. If anything can be done in that regard, if a consolidation of that kind can be made, I am sure it will be very helpful. But in the meantime, as this is not likely to be accomplished for some time and two sets of reports will be coming out within the next few weeks, can the minister give the committee some indication of the basis of establishment that the bureau of statistics uses? It would surely be of value at this time if he could do that.

Mr. Churchill: About 600 enumerators canvass 30,000 households every month and base their calculations upon their findings as they interview these households.

Mr. Pearson: Then the basis is about 30,000 households in Canada. They are used as samples and on the basis of the information received from these 30,000 sample households across the country the figures that we get from the bureau of statistics on unemployment and employment are established?

Mr. Churchill: I might add that it is based on the most modern scientific methods of making calculations from sampling.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has now occupied his present post for a year and during that year there has been a good deal of discussion of the question of employment and unemployment in various contexts. I assume he has satisfied himself that this is the best way to calculate employment and unemployment and that this is the most accurate reflection possible of the degree of employment and unemployment that we have in the country at this time.

Mr. Churchill: This method of calculating employment has been in use for the last 13 years. It is the method available at the moment. I am not prepared to say that it is the best or that it might not be subject to improvement.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may pursue the matter for a moment, the minister will recall that when he and his friends were on this side of the house they disparaged these figures at all times and always used as unemployment figures the figures compiled by the unemployment insurance commission of the number of persons registered as looking for jobs. I take it from what the minister has said now that, since he moved across the house, he has changed his view and he now regards these figures as the proper figures to be used to reflect employment and unemployment.

Mr. Churchill: And the members opposite may in their turn adopt the other set of figures and, of course, the hon. member for Essex East has his own compilation which he gives to the house from time to time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might say that I have always been very scrupulous in using the figures given by the bureau of statistics in any public statements I have ever made, but I was anxious to find out whether the minister, who, with his friends, including his leader, was very critical of these figures when he sat over here, disparaged them at all times and suggested that they were more or less political figures, now has a different view of them.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister explain the difference between the manner in which these figures are prepared or compiled and the manner in which the figures are prepared or compiled by the Department of Labour through the unemployment insurance commission?

Mr. Churchill: They measure two different things. I think I answered a question along this line in the last parliament.

The second figure is based on our people who are registering for unemployment insurance. It is quite a different type of calculation.

Mr. Chevrier: Nonetheless, the bureau of statistics comes out with both sets of figures, does it not?

Mr. Churchill: It appears in a joint release from the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Chevrier: When are the figures released for each month? Is there a check date either at the beginning, the middle or end of the month on which this release is made?

Mr. Churchill: Approximately in the third week of the month.

Mr. Chevrier: Following that up, why is it that in the course of the last several months, in a period of five or six months within the last twelve months, the figures were not available to members of parliament? I know that on several occasions questions were asked on orders of the day as to the reason for the delay. I am referring not only to the figures that are published by the minister's department but also to those that are compiled by unemployment insurance. I wondered why the delay did take place because I know that sometimes my release did not arrive in the third week of the month.

Mr. Churchill: I know of no delay in the publication of these statistics by the dominion bureau of statistics. My hon. friend is referring also to those which come out from the Department of Labour, and for which I have not any responsibility.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I know the minister has no responsibility for them, but he said earlier that the bureau of statistics publishes both sets of figures in a joint statement. My complaint was that there had been delays in recent months.

Mr. Churchill: Just to make it clear, when I said there had been no delay in the publication of this document by the dominion bureau of statistics I should have indicated quite clearly that was the joint release dealing with the two sets of figures.

Mr. Chevrier: This is the third week of the month of July, and we have not yet received the figures for this month.

Mr. Churchill: According to my book, the third week starts on the 21st, which is next week.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the minister means the fourth week; three weeks have elapsed by the 21st. If you divide seven into 21, you get three.

Mr. Churchill: The 1st of July was on a Tuesday, so I presume it will be out on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister know whether it will be out? Can an officer of the department say whether it will be out on Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. Churchill: There is no fixed day or date and variations occur because of holidays and unforeseen events. But by and large, this report comes out sometime during the third week of each month.

404. Statistics, including contributions as detailed in the estimates, the expenditure for these not to exceed the amounts shown unless otherwise approved by treasury board, $6,953,099.

Mr. McGee: I wonder if I might ask the minister to comment on a statement attributed to Mr. Gilbert Jackson in the Globe and Mail during last winter. I do not have the date, but I shall read a part of the statement:

I represented the 101,000 persons, in the first of these three categories—

That is the category he denotes as frictionally unemployed.

—as an almost irreducible minimum, even in the busiest season of the most prosperous year.

I want to know if, in fact, 100,000 is the figure of the irreducible minimum in that category as confirmed by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Churchill: This question is a bit difficult because the 100,000—could that be related to a percentage of the total figure being considered—in relation to 500,000 would be quite different from relating it to a million or more.

Mr. McGee: The statement is that the figure of 100,000 represents an irreducible minimum even in the busiest season of the most prosperous year. There will be this number of persons between jobs or what is termed "frictionally unemployed".

Mr. Churchill: There will be a number of people unemployed at certain times, people changing jobs or for other reasons. Whether or not you could categorically set that number of 100,000, is not information that we have available at this moment. I shall refer my hon. friend's question to the dominion bureau of statistics because it happens to be a very important inquiry into statistical surveys.

Board of grain commissioners—
406. Administration, $174,016.

Mr. Argue: Under the item for the board of grain commissioners I want to raise with the minister the question of an increase in the handling charges on grain being granted this year. The chairman of the board of grain commissioners, Mr. Roy Milner, has stated publicly that he expects a drive by the elevator companies to have the handling charges on grain increased. He says that one of the contributing factors is the likelihood of a light crop in certain areas. I rise to express the strongest possible objection to any increase in handling charges on grain being allowed this year.

I believe this is the most appropriate place to raise this question because, not only is the matter of handling charges within the jurisdiction of the board of grain commissioners, but following a judgment of the board of grain commissioners the government has the power to alter that decision. As a matter of fact, I think it goes even farther. I think the government has to approve the decision before it becomes effective. I base my objection to any increase in handling charges mainly on the ground that the prices to producers of wheat, oats, barley and other grains are already too low. It would be a very bad thing, therefore, for wheat producers if there were to be any further reduction in the prices at this time. I am not convinced that, from the standpoint of the elevator companies, they need an increase in rates or that they are justified in asking for an increase in handling charges. In travelling about western Canada one sees at the present time a whole rash of brand new elevators being constructed. When the country was opened up, elevators used to hold 25,000 bushels or 35,000 bushels of grain. Now the capacity has been doubled or tripled in comparison with that of the small elevators. These elevators, of course, are the property of the elevator companies but they are paid for either by the producers out of the proceeds that the producers would otherwise receive or directly from the national treasury through an item that is to be discussed a little later. This very rapid increase in elevator facilities, a very expensive expansion, is in my judgment an indication that the elevator companies are already making a sufficient profit at the current handling rate.

Mr. Chown: It helps unemployment.

Mr. Argue: I am all for helping unemployment. If you would pay some deficiency payments to the farmers, you would go even further in helping unemployment. I am going to deal with that matter a little later on. I hope the government will oppose an increase on tariffs on grain as it opposed the increase in freight rates in recent months. I hope the government will use the power it has to veto any increase that might be recommended; I hope the present chairman of the Canadian wheat board, Mr. W. C. McNamara, will follow the excellent precedent set for him by the former chairman of the wheat board Mr. George McIvor who himself intervened, when an application was before the board of grain commissioners, to recommend against such an application being granted. I think the wheat board was wise, being the sole marketing agency for wheat and other grains, in the interests of producers to appear before the board of grain commissioners and to recommend against any increase in handling charges. I ask the minister what information he can give the committee on this point. From his appearance when I was making my remarks, I took it that he is opposed to an increase in handling charges. I am not endeavouring to misinterpret him at all. He has not said anything yet. We have to be careful these days.

Mr. Churchill: I am in agreement with you for once.

Mr. Argue: I am glad to hear the minister say that. If he can now expand that a little and give us, and in particular the grain producers, the assurance that there will be no increase in handling charges, I am sure they will all thank him for his statement.

Mr. Churchill: I am not going to go that far at this time until I receive a communication from the board of grain commissioners setting out all the facts in the case. But I am in agreement with the hon. member as to using every possible measure at our disposal within reason to keep costs down in so far as our grain carrying charges are concerned and at the same time to increase the return to our producers.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for that statement. Knowing his usual frankness, I am quite sure that is ample assurance that there will be no increase in handling charges or that, if there is, the increase will not be taken from the pockets of the very hard-pressed grain producers.

I now come to the question of box car distribution which is a matter concurrently, I believe, in a legal way under the jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board. The Canadian wheat board, by means of shipping orders and by its contact with the railways, now allocates box cars amongst the elevator companies at the various railway points. The board of grain commissioners also has some jurisdiction in this field since the car order book provision is in the Canada Grain Act.

We have all been interested in the sittings of the Bracken royal commission on box car distribution and allocation. There was a report some weeks ago—which we were all sorry to read—that Mr. Bracken was not in the best of health and that he might be obliged to suspend for some time some of his activities in connection with this royal commisson. I am wonderng whether the minister can tell us at what stage the royal commission is now and when a report is likely to be received.

Before he does that, I want to say that the producers of western Canada have taken a tremendous interest in this royal commission. Whenever the royal commission has held public hearings at various places across western Canada there have been dozens of submissions and at most places where hearings were held hundreds of people appeared at those hearings. When the commission appeared at the city of Weyburn in my own constituency over 900 people came to the hearings. A few of them, of course, represented private elevator companies but by far the great majority of people at those hearings were producers themselves.

The producers are completely fed up with the system that now and for a number of years has forced them to deliver grain to any elevator that had space, whether or not they wished to patronize that elevator as a first choice. Another reason why so many people appeared before the royal commission, in my opinion, is the fact that grain producers are very much disturbed about the grain situation and are taking a more active interest in government policy in this regard than they have taken in many years. I think it is almost fantastic that, in a small city like Weyburn, at one of these public hearings you would have many hundreds of grain producers appearing to suggest to the royal commission a fair system of box car allocation. I wonder whether the minister can say when the report is likely to be received and whether any action is likely to be taken on such report during the present session.

Mr. Churchill: The inquiry being made into box cars and being conducted by Mr. Bracken has gone along very well indeed. I should like to reassure my hon. friend that Mr. Bracken is in good and vigorous health and has been pursuing his duties with that intense interest and attention that he always shows on matters of this kind on which he is particularly competent because he has conducted so many inquiries and investigations over the course of a long and active political career. It was at his suggestion that public hearings were held in the three prairie provinces so that farmers would have an opportunity of expressing their opinions concerning box car distribution. As has been pointed out, those meetings have been well attended and I think have proved to be very satisfactory. In other words, it meant that we were not doing something without the knowledge of the farmers as a whole and they have appreciated that fact very much. The inquiry is reaching a conclusion and Mr. Bracken informed me some days ago that he hoped to be able to report to me before the end of July.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his statement. I am pleased to learn that Mr. Bracken is in good health and that his report will be made available to the minister by the end of July. I wonder whether the minister has any knowledge at this moment as to Mr. Bracken's recommendations even in a general way. I am wondering if he could tell the house whether or not action by parliament will be required during the current session on the assumption that his report is received by the end of this month.

Mr. Churchill: I have no knowledge of what the report will contain. If action by parliament is required we will endeavour of course to take action immediately.

Item 406 agreed to.

407. Inspection and weighing of grain, and related services, $4,303,362.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of interest in the matter of measuring and weighing grain. As the minister well knows, grain is now weighed on a bushel basis, the weight for wheat being 60 pounds to the bushel, and there is a growing belief that the unit should be changed to a hundredweight. I am wondering if any action is contemplated in this regard at an early date. I may be conservative in this respect—

Some hon. Members: Hurrah.

Mr. Argue: —as I have not yet been sold on the advantage of such a change but I quite frankly admit I may be wrong because many people in the grain trade seem to think there would be many advantages in adopting the hundredweight as the unit. I am sure that producers generally would be very interested to know what is the government thinking in this regard and particularly what the board of grain commissioners are likely to recommend.

Mr. Churchill: I have had no word from the board of grain commissioners along this particular line, but in view of the fact that the report was referred to the committee on agriculture today in accordance with the request of my hon. friend, as well as the report of the Canadian wheat board, perhaps these subjects could more properly be dealt with when the representatives of the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners appear before that committee. I presume that will be arranged in about two weeks' time, which I hope will accommodate my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

410. International economic and technical co-operation branch, including the administration of the Colombo plan and of certain United Nations co-operation plans, $399,017.

Mr. Argue: I am interested in the special item in connection with the payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves which in 1957-58 were listed as having been $33 million while this year the cost is listed as likely to be $40,080,000.

I would like an explanation from the minister as for the reason for the increase which undoubtedly means there will be a greater surplus on July 31 than there was in the previous July in the hands of the elevator companies themselves.

While on this particular item, since it is an item from the treasury, could the minister add anything to his statement of Tuesday evening last having to do with deficiency payments when he said he hoped there would be an answer before many days. I will not read all the remarks of the minister unless he insists but he did say he hoped the answer would be given before many more days had passed.

I wonder if the minister could now say whether the government has now made a decision on deficiency payments or, if such a decision has not yet been made, when the producers can look for a decision.

I am sure the minister will accept my word when I say I am not sponsoring or promoting a mass delegation to Ottawa but I cannot help reading the newspapers and I have seen reports that farm organizations have scheduled August 1 as the last day until which they will wait for a reply from the government before taking action with respect to their mass delegation. As I say, I cannot be held responsible for such statements but I would like to know from the minister whether an announcement will soon be made, because the producers are very anxious to know the government policy.

I am hoping the answer will be favourable in spite of the many arguments raised even by the minister himself against deficiency payments, one of which was that it is difficult in Canada to provide deficiency payments since we are an exporting country and since most of the countries or all of the countries—I am not sure which way he put it—making deficiency payments are importers of wheat.

The minister knows that the United States is one of the major exporters of wheat and in some recent years when it has been the world's leading exporter of wheat it has paid from its national treasury a very substantial subsidy to grain producers. The figure as to the United States price for wheat contained in the Saskatchewan wheat pool brochure, which was printed in June of this year and which the minister has received, shows the United States set price to producers at $2.10 per bushel. It lists the various prices for wheat paid by many other countries, including the United Kingdom at $1.83, Austria at $2.50, Australia at $1.53, Belgium $2.50 and so on.

Canadian wheat producers received the lowest price paid to any wheat producers in a major wheat-producing country while, as the minister well knows, they operate in a very high-cost economy. Month by month their position steadily worsens and I am hoping the minister will announce a favourable decision by the government to make deficiency payments in line with the requests of farm organizations.

Some money is being paid from the national treasury into the wheat board account which in turn results in the price for wheat being maintained at a figure higher than would otherwise be the case. I know the producers are very grateful for the $4 million contained in the estimates, but I am sure if the government decided upon a deficiency payment it would have no trouble at all in selling it to other parts of Canada. I am quite certain that if the government announced such a deficiency payment on western grain there would not be a single member on the government side who would voice any objection whatsoever. I am sure of that, although I am not too sure that the official opposition might not have one or two mavericks on this point because we know they had some in the past. I am positive, however, that the official position of the Liberal party would be in support and that that position would be supported by nearly all its members.

We in this group very strongly believe that agricultural producers, as all others, should be able to earn a living in keeping with the general Canadian standard, and I would ask the minister when he expects the government will arrive at this long-awaited decision. I can tell from the correspondence I am receiving and from people I have visited in recent weeks that there is great expectation in this regard in the three prairie provinces.

They are anxiously awaiting a government decision and I hope the minister can inform the house that a decision will be reached very shortly.

Mr. Churchill: We had an exchange of opinion the other day on the subject of deficiency payments and I stated then that I hoped to be able to make an announcement in the course of a few days. At that time I inaccurately assumed the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce would be completed on Friday. I have lost, perhaps, a day and a half which might have been spent in grappling with this problem which loomed so large in the minds of a great many people.

I hope the threat of a mass movement on Ottawa scheduled for August 1 is nothing more than newspaper speculation, and I hope the responsible people in the prairie provinces in this period of grave international tension will not contemplate any such descent on Ottawa and the government. As I said the other night, we are dealing with this problem—it has a priority rating—and I suggested in the course of my remarks that a comprehensive farm program aimed at raising the income of western agriculturists might be of greater value than a large deficiency payment. However, I can assure the hon. member that it will not be many days before some announcement is made in accordance with the desire of so many people.

Now with regard to the item in the estimates dealing with wheat reserves, and the suggested $40 million put aside for that purpose, that, of course, is an estimate which might not be reached. It represents an increase over last year, and the increase results from an 11 million bushel storage beyond the previous year because of new storage capacities and a shift in the proportion of oats and barley to wheat. It is also caused partly by increased carrying charges. The storage rate was raised to 1/30 of a cent per day, an increase of 12 per cent over the previous figure, and in the calculations which have been made it seemed wise to estimate for $40 million rather than $33 million. Of course, the carrying charges are paid on the excess quantity of wheat that the board has in storage beyond the 178 million bushels set out in the statute.

[Mr. Argue.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Nielsen): The item under discussion is item 410—a special item, "international economic and technical co-operation branch, including the administration of the Colombo Plan and of certain United Nations co-operation plans."

The item that has been under discussion—wrongly, I feel—by both the hon. member for Assiniboia and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is listed on page 74 of the estimates as a statutory item. This item is there as information, being an item passed under the provisions of chapter 2 of the statutes of 1956, and in my opinion it should not be discussed but, rather, item 410 as I read it at the beginning of my remarks should have been the item under discussion.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, with your permission and the permission of the committee I should like to correct an impression left by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Nielsen): I have already ruled on this matter, and the item that should be under discussion now is item No. 410.

Mr. McIlraith: On item 410 I wish to ask one or two brief questions. First, is the minister able to give me information as to the details of the proposed expenditure for this Colombo plan, or is that more properly discussed under the estimates of the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Churchill: That comes under external affairs.

Mr. McIlraith: Then I wish to direct one or two questions on details of vote 410. If the minister will look at page 533 where the details of the estimates are set out, he will find a new item this year under the heading "professional and special services" amounting to $108,000. Then, a little further down, there is a new item under the heading "Acquisition and maintenance of furniture for residences abroad" amounting to $4,000. Would the minister give us a brief explanation of what those items are?

Mr. Churchill: The amount of $108,000 under "professional and special services" is to provide for technical advice, supervisory and administrative services provided for by Defence Construction Limited in connection with the Colombo plan operations as authorized by treasury board minute No. 51837 of July 5, 1957. This expense was previously borne by Defence Construction Limited as part of its budgeting costs but it has been transferred to this particular section.

Mr. McIlraith: Would it be fair to assume that it does not represent a new activity?

Mr. Churchill: No, it is for inspection and administrative services under the Colombo plan supervisory service which formerly appeared under that other heading, Defence Construction Limited. The second part of the question had to do with the acquisition and maintenance of furniture for residences abroad. This is in anticipation of the possibility of sending three field officers abroad in connection with Colombo plan administration, and the difficulty that always faces people living abroad is the problem of residences and the acquisition of furniture, its maintenance and so on, and this vote has been provided for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

General administration—

622. Departmental administration—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question with respect to an answer he recently gave to the hon. member for Assiniboia to ascertain exactly what he meant. When referring to deficiency payments the minister said an announcement would be made in a few days in accordance with the desires of so many people. That statement can be taken two ways. Does he mean an announcement will be made according to the desires of many people or does he mean that according to the desire of so many people for deficiency payments? I was not quite clear on that.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is completely out of order, of course, because he is dealing with an item which the chairman declared should have not been discussed. I believe that the hon. member's ingenious brain working on that problem over the weekend will find a satisfactory solution.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

625. Statistics—further amount required, $559,965.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, may I make a correction here. When we were speaking about the publication of statistics dealing with unemployment and so on we spoke about these reports coming out in the third week of every month. I believe I repeated that statement two or three times. I have now been informed by message that we should have said the reports appear in the fourth week of each month.

Mr. McIlraith: This item refers to the expenses in connection with the 1958 survey of farm income and expenditure. I wonder if the minister would explain a little more fully about this supplementary estimate of $559-odd thousand? How frequently is the survey of farm income taken?

Mr. Churchill: This is a new expenditure based on the demand for more accurate information concerning farm operating expenses and farm family income in order that the bureau may use that as a basis for improving the index numbers of prices paid to farmers and the estimates of net income of farm operators and their families. This is one field in which it was felt that the statistics were not as accurately assembled or assembled in the quantity desired in order to provide information concerning agricultural problems. Consequently this survey is now being undertaken by the bureau. I believe it will meet a very great need because we are always encountering the problem of cost and income in so far as agriculture is concerned.

Item agreed to.

Board of grain commissioners—
(Canada Grain Act)—

626. Inspection and weighing of grain and related services—further amount required, $45,000.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I have a question on this item and my remarks are also applicable to item No. 627. I understand that we are in no way restricted in our discussion in the committees by the fact that these estimates relating to the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners have been passed. I wonder if the minister would merely confirm that?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, I will be pleased to confirm that.

Item agreed to.

Special—

627. To reimburse the Canadian wheat board for the loss incurred by it on its operations under the Canadian Wheat Board Act in respect of oats for the crop year that commenced on the 1st day of August, 1956, and ended on the 31st day of July, 1957, $2,145,000.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, this item is a special one to reimburse the Canadian wheat board for the loss incurred by it on its operations under the act in respect of oats for the crop year which commenced August 1, 1956 and ended on July 31, 1957. I wonder if the minister could tell the committee what the loss was per bushel on oats handled in that crop year? I also wonder if he could tell us whether the current selling prices for oats and barley would indicate that another deficit might occur during this crop year. If there is a deficit, of course, then there will have to be a further supplementary estimate next year. Most estimates are for an expenditure that is likely to occur. There is no item in the estimates for a loss in the oats or barley pools this year but as the minister knows the selling prices are near the set prices, particularly for feed grains. I am sure that producers would like to have some comment from the minister as to whether there are likely to be payments out of these pools another year or whether parliament is likely to be called on to compensate for a deficit?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be discouraging indeed to the producers if I said that we were anticipating a deficit next year. I take a much more optimistic approach than that which I commend to my hon. friend. We are not anticipating any deficit at all next year for either wheat, oats or barley.

As I reported from time to time during the course of the last crop year the oats pool was in some difficulty. Barley was, too, for a while but recovered and, of course, we have done well with wheat. This item covers the deficit which was incurred in the oats pool and is another instance of governmental action in supporting prices. I believe that further consideration of this and the standing of various pools and the prospects for the future might be discussed when the members of the wheat board are here in two week's time.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say how much it is per bushel?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to correct the impression left by the hon. member for Assiniboia. During the four days the representatives of the farmers' unions were in Ottawa it was my privilege and pleasure to have lengthy discussions with many responsible members of that delegation. At no time in any way did they indicate that a march upon Ottawa was to occur and those to whom I spoke were, I believe, some of the more cool headed members of that delegation.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the minister who is leading the house at the moment about the business for Monday and Tuesday of next week. It was indicated by the government leader on Thursday evening. Is it unchanged from that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is unchanged, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did notice in Hansard what I think is a misprint which occurs in the last line on page 2358. It is indicated there that it is the intention to take the budget resolution and I presume the word "resolution" should be plural?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there is more than one yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: And is it intended to go on with as many as possible of them on Tuesday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I hope we can clean them all up in a hurry.

Mr. Speaker: Before announcing the adjournment of the house until 2.30 on Monday may I remind hon. members again that the address by the Prime Minister of Ghana will be at 11.00 a.m. on Monday in this chamber.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on July 14.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 21, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to make a statement with regard to the international situation.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to proceed with the statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I said in the house on Saturday, the United Nations security council failed at its last meeting to adopt any of the three resolutions which were before it concerning the situation in Lebanon and Jordan. The Secretary of State for External Affairs returned to Ottawa on Saturday evening and over the week end he reported on his discussions with the British foreign secretary, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd; the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Dulles; Mr. Hammarskjold and others.

I know that members of the house will appreciate the fact that it would not be fitting or helpful at this very anxious time to disclose the views expressed in those discussions. I should add, relative to the answer I gave on Saturday last to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs made known in his discussions the opinion of the Canadian government that no military activity should be undertaken by any nation in any place beyond Jordan and Lebanon.

In addition, the week end has witnessed the publication of a Soviet proposal on the Middle East, namely a proposal for a meeting of the heads of government of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, India and the U.S.S.R., with the participation of the Secretary General of the United Nations. This initiative came against the background of Soviet and Bulgarian troop manœuvres on their southern borders.

I need hardly tell the house that, the situation having already reached critical proportions, such a proposal is bound to have a considerable impact on the thinking of people everywhere.

Much of the language in which the Soviet invitation is couched is so provocative in tone that it tends to add yet another complicating factor at an already very serious moment in world affairs by tempting the rejection of the invitation on the ground of its not being genuine. Tensions have, however, reached such a stage that every opportunity should be explored to discuss the causes of tension in the interests of heading off the possibility of war.

President Eisenhower has said more than once that he is ready to meet with the Soviet leaders if a meeting would contribute to the cause of peace. As I stated in this house last November, I still believe that no nation should or dare shut the door on any matter that offers the prospect of any solution or even a diminution of international tensions. In view of the recent developments in the Middle East I believe that the problem of that region should be discussed at the highest level, and that such talks should be held as soon as possible because of the present perilous situation, the urgency of which has been so greatly intensified by the developments of the last few days.

In this very explosive situation, in the interests of assuring that the international temperature be not increased, the Canadian government would expect that the status quo be maintained in the region of the Middle East, and would welcome from all the countries concerned assurances such as those which were given by Prime Minister Macmillan in respect of Iraq in the House of Commons at Westminster on July 17, in particular that all members of NATO will exercise the greatest caution in national action which might involve the alliance as a whole. In the meantime we should all continue to co-operate in the discussions now being carried on at the United Nations, having as their objective the solution of those problems of which the United Nations is now completely seized.

The council meets again today to consider a compromise Japanese proposal on Lebanon, and for the purpose of the record I think I should refer to that motion, which is as follows:

1. The security council, having heard the charges of the representative of Lebanon concerning the interference of the U.A.R. in the internal affairs of Lebanon and the reply of the U.A.R., invites the UNOGIL to continue to develop its activities pursuant to the security council resolution of June 11, 1958;

2. Requests the secretary general to make arrangements forthwith for such measures in addition to those envisaged in the resolution of June 11, 1958, as he may consider necessary in the light of the present crisis with a view to enabling the United Nations to fulfil the general purposes established in that resolution and which will, in accordance with the charter, serve to ensure the territorial integrity and political independence of Lebanon so as to make possible the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Lebanon;

3. Requests the secretary general to report to the security council on the arrangements made;

4. Calls upon the governments concerned to co-operate fully in the implementation of this resolution.

I think Canadians will all agree that during the last few days the Secretary of State for External Affairs, both in Washington and New York, has earned for this country the tribute of representatives of other countries as a result of the skill and ability he has shown during the discussions in both those cities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After discussing the whole situation with him at great length yesterday I suggested that, while he has responsibilities in the house, it might be well for him to go to New York to take personal charge of the Canadian delegation during the debate before the security council.

With regard to the present I would like to go further than I am able to go, but I would like to tell the house and the country that this government, I feel with the approval of the Canadian people as a whole, is doing everything it possibly can to bring about an agreement between the nations of the free world whereby constructive action may be taken promptly. I do not want to overemphasize the gravity of the situation, but at the same time I do not want to understate it. For that reason I want the house and the country to know that there are no hours today in so far as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, myself and other members of the cabinet are concerned. We are trying to do our part, as a country which has no direct interest, to bring about a solution which is reasonable, in accordance with the principles laid down in the United Nations charter and within the ambit of that charter.

Over the week end I personally addressed urgent messages to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, to the Prime Minister of India and to President Eisenhower, suggesting that there be a positive and immediate response to the Khrushchev message. The suggestions made are now being considered in the various capitals as well as, I hope, in the NATO council in New York.

It would be less than proper to spell out those suggestions, but I can say this: that in the light of what I said earlier we believe that a meeting is necessary at top level, and I feel, too, that the United Nations security council in session offers possibilities on which I will not elaborate at this time.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will have heard with great interest and, I think, understanding, the statement of the Prime Minister on a situation which in the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs —and I do not think it was an overstatement—is grave, though not, as he put it, critical.

I can speak only for hon. members of my own party, but we certainly hope to give the Prime Minister, the government and particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, full support in all the efforts they are making for peace and stability in the Middle East on behalf of a country which is a member of the United Nations, because as signatories to the United Nations charter we have all of us obligations for furthering peace and stability in the world.

I can appreciate the pressure both physical and mental under which the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and their colleagues are working at this time, having had some experience with that kind of pressure myself. I entirely agree with the Prime Minister in the statement he has made and the suggestion, which I understand the government has made to other governments perhaps even more directly concerned, that no action should be taken by the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States in present circumstances beyond the borders of Lebanon and Jordan; that they should do what they can to discourage action of that kind from any other quarter, and that they should lend their weight to any policy which would establish the status quo for the time being in this area.

A new development occurred over the week end in the invitation by the head of the Soviet government to the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and India for a summit conference to deal with this particular matter and, as I understand it, to deal only with this particular matter. We have heard at this time with satisfaction that the Prime Minister has already indicated to three of these governments that, in the view of the Canadian government, they should adopt a positive approach to this invitation. He did not mention whether he had sent a message of the kind which he had suggested to London, Washington and New Delhi, to Paris as well, but I assume that has also been done.

In common with other hon. members of parliament I have been asked questions on this subject, and in reply to some of those questions I have said that in my own view

I think it would be most unwise for the three western powers to take a negative stand on Mr. Khrushchev's invitation to a conference. I added that I hoped the Canadian government was urging them not to give this invitation an unqualified refusal, and therefore I heard with pleasure, as I am sure other hon. members heard with pleasure, of the stand taken by the government.

There remains the question of how this invitation can be most effectively dealt with if it is not to be given an unqualified refusal. The Prime Minister was good enough this morning to give me some confidential information on developments, and I appreciate that very much. I indicated to him at that time that I hoped to be in a position this afternoon to ask him a question on this matter, and I confess that in that question I would have expressed my own view as to how this invitation might be dealt with. There will be no opportunity for such a question because orders of the day will not be reached, but perhaps because the Prime Minister has quite rightly brought up the matter I might indicate my own view as to how this particular matter could be treated in the present circumstances and at the present time, as it has to be dealt with quickly.

In view of the Soviet government's invitation for an immediate summit conference on the Middle East crisis, and in view of the reports we have observed in the press that the United Kingdom and United States governments might not find it possible to accept this invitation in the form in which it was extended—and I can certainly understand that in view of the language of the invitation —but in view also of the desirability of not turning down this invitation in any unconditional way, would it not be desirable for the Canadian member at the security council which is meeting at this moment to make a proposal to the effect that the security council should appoint a subcommittee of representatives of the United Kingdom, United States, France and the Soviet union, and by special invitation India, under the chairmanship of the Secretary General of the United Nations to consider ways and means of resolving the current Middle East crisis? This subcommittee could meet, and I hope would meet, immediately at a place to be determined by its chairman, the secretary general, and it could be suggested that the countries appointed to it be represented by their heads of government. That would ensure that the meeting in question would be at the top level of governmental representation, and it would also ensure that the meeting in question would be held under the auspices of the United Nations and indeed under the chairmanship of the Secretary General of the United Nations.

In putting forward this proposal, Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Prime Minister has a great deal of information available to him which is not available to everyone, and he may have considerations in mind and there may be factors he knows about that bear on this proposal. But I should like to put it forward to him for the consideration of the government and possibly for consideration at the United Nations security council, in the hope that this might be a way of dealing with the invitation which would underline that our approach to these matters in the west is not negative, and which indeed might have some kind of constructive result which would assist in removing the shadow of fear and war that hangs over the world at the moment.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we in this group are glad to note that the government is opposed to extending the political bonanza handed the Soviet union by certain actions taken outside the United Nations. We are also glad to hear of the government's support for summit talks, and the Prime Minister's request for an immediate and positive response to the Khrushchev invitation to those summit talks. We go right along with him; we think it is a most constructive approach to this most serious situation.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I want to express our opposition to unilateral action and our continued support of work toward United Nations mediation. Our sincere hope is that mediation will soon result, in the near days ahead, in the announcement by the governments of Great Britain and the United States that they have withdrawn their troops from Lebanon and Jordan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, first I do want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for the unity displayed at this very important phase of international difficulties. I welcome, and this government welcomes, any suggestions that come from him because of his experience, from which none of us will try at any time to detract.

This is a time when we must act positively. This is no time for stagnant thinking based on forms that may have been applicable in the past. It is equally no time for side issues and the making of generalizations that cannot have any effect other than not contributing to a solution of an immediate problem.

Proposed Legislation

The proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition is—and I do not want to spell out, as I said a while ago, the representations made in the personal messages I referred to earlier—very close to a suggestion I made and suggestions that are in mind and are now under consideration. I can assure not only the hon. gentleman but members of the house that every constructive proposal that any hon. member has to offer will be given the most careful and continuing examination.

There is a strength in our democracy and our parliamentary system, and that strength is that in times of difficulty we do not allow partisanship to separate us. We may have differing opinions on the means but never on the objectives. Again I emphasize the assurance that at this time, when a community of counsel is so necessary, the expression of viewpoints by hon. gentlemen will at all times receive the most complete examination, and out of a variety of suggestions one can often bring forth the epitome that will bring about a solution. I shall go no further than that at this time, but again I thank the house for the courtesy shown in making possible this short explanation this afternoon.

TRADE

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF FREE TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND THE WEST INDIES

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of establishing free trade between Canada and the Federation of the West Indies.

He said: In rising to present this motion for the approval of the house Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but feel that it is in some respects most appropriate that it should come forward for discussion today, because we have just concluded three days of discussion in committee of the whole on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In addition, we just this morning had the honour of having before us in an unofficial way in this chamber the Prime Minister of the new member of the commonwealth, Ghana. I feel, therefore, it is appropriate in the light of those circumstances that this motion should come forward for debate, and I hope approval, today.

It will be seen from the order paper that this is the second appointed Monday for the discussion of private members' motions. I hope that at the conclusion of this day hon. members will feel that the discussion of this motion has been such as to be indicative of the real worth of private members' days, and that they will feel this is a useful contribution and a very proper use of that right of private members to bring matters before this house for debate.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I must confess to some difficulty in wording the motion. My concern is with the subject of trade, increasing our trade with the West Indies, but I wanted to get the motion forward in a way that would result not in a mere academic discussion of free trade, but rather in an effort to free trade to the greatest possible extent with this particular area. When I say "free trade to the greatest possible extent", I refer to not only matters like the customs tariff, which seems to be the traditional thing to discuss, but the matter of currency exchange restrictions, shipping and all the other restrictions that may be imposed on the exchange of goods between two countries.

At the outset of my remarks I might also express my own appreciation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having given this subject the attention he did in his remarks during the consideration of the estimates of trade and commerce. I was greatly pleased to hear him recognize the importance of the subject and deal with it in full recognition of that importance.

There is such a great abundance of material written about this subject within this last year or two that it seems difficult to narrow it down to what to present to the house in the space of 40 minutes. Perhaps it is well for us to be specific and recognize that in our statistics on trade it is difficult to separate the trade figures of the Federation of the West Indies from the figures of the British Caribbean area. It is well if we recall to our minds that the federation about which I wish to speak includes specifically Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados, the Leeward islands and the Windward Islands but excludes British Honduras, British Guiana and the Bahamas of the British Caribbean group.

It is well also to recall that the federated area is really responsible for approximately —and this is only a rough approximation— three quarters of our trade with the whole area. It is well also to recall that their constitution came into effect only on January 3 of this year and that they held their federal election on March 25 of this year. I think some hon. members will not find it difficult to recall that date because of its close proximity to a certain other event which took place in Canada a few days later. Then there was the inauguration of the federal legislature on April 22, 1958. I am sure the government indicated the significance they attached to that event by the team which they sent to represent Canada on that occasion.

In dealing with the subject in a more specific way, it can be said at once to me, if the motion is read in a strict and narrow way: Oh, you do not recognize the fact that the federation does not have legislative control over its foreign trade; they do not yet have a customs union. That is perfectly true, Mr. Speaker. The federation does not yet have a customs union, though there seems to be every indication that they are moving toward it. In any event a commission is examining that subject at the present time, and the best information I can get is that the report of that commission will be available within a matter of a few weeks or months, much in advance of the time that it was expected to be ready when the commission was set up.

It could also be said, on a narrow reading of the motion: Oh, you cannot deal with free trade between Canada and the Federation of the West Indies because they do not have control of their own foreign exchange. I am quite aware of that fact. I am aware of the fact that the United Kingdom still has control of the foreign exchange for the area, but I respectfully submit that that is only one more reason why we should be discussing this matter and examining it rather than withholding discussion of it.

The trade figures are rather interesting. The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his remarks indicated the importance of the trade of that area and I do not intend to elaborate very much on that point; but it is interesting to note that in 1936 our exports to the West Indies federated area amounted to $8,629,000 and our imports to some $13,305,000. In 1957 they had risen so that our commodity exports to that area amounted to $40,276,000 in value and our commodity imports amounted to some $58,430,000 in value. Of course, in addition there are other factors that would enter into an exchange of currency or balance of payments like the vast tourist business in the area from Canada and things like the presence of West Indies students in our universities in Canada.

Those figures will illustrate the importance of the trade in that area. But more particularly the products involved serve to indicate its importance to Canada, imports, as I assess the order of dollar importance, were sugar, bauxite and alumina, petroleum, molasses, rum, cocoa, coffee, spices and citrus fruits. Our exports were wheat flour, fish, textiles and manufactures, meat, tobacco, lumber, motor vehicles, milk, mixed feeds, boots and shoes, potatoes and a variety of manufactured articles.

From these products and the nature of the commodities exchanged it will be seen that the area is, I venture to suggest, complementary with respect to those products; that is, the products it has for export to us are as complementary to the products we have for export to that area as are those of any other area in the world. I do not know of any better example one could get of two areas where the commodities sought to be exchanged are more complementary to each other than are those of this area of the Federation of the West Indies and Canada.

That situation, of course, is easy to understand when one recalls the great differences in climate. It seems to me that this whole area is one in which we should naturally have a high interest for many reasons, among others the fact that for some 200 years now we have shared the same association with the British empire, now known as the commonwealth or the commonwealth and its antecedent form, whatever the terminology was, depending on what date you were talking about. This historical association has gone on in common between us for the order of 200 years, which is quite a long time in our history.

There is the naturally complementary nature of their production and our production. Then there is this new matter we have in common, namely the gradual enlargement of their control of their own political destiny as indicated by the federation this year. Anyone who has regard to the development of political freedom within Canada and our own history in that respect I think must share a feeling of rejoicing and good will that the West Indies have now come together in their federation, in somewhat different form than we but none the less a distinctive step in their development and evolution.

Now I wish to deal with the trade itself. It is interesting that in this relatively small area which I consider to be of great importance we maintain at the present time two trade commissioners, one in Jamaica and one in Trinidad. It is also interesting that we have seen fit to take part in organizing two trade fairs, somewhat new in form, to take place in these two parts of the federation. These trade fairs of 1959 are rather significant, because so far as I know they are developing along a somewhat new pattern for Canada in that they are in the nature of joint enterprises between Canadian business and the government. I think the minister would agree with that description.

I have spoken about trade and I am aware of the usual difficulties with respect to this subject, but it seems to me there are some aspects of it which we could and should usefully discuss in this house. One of the suggestions I am going to make is with respect to the matter of substantially enlarging our activities in respect of trade in spite of the difficulties involved. There are two views abroad, one that there is a little too much optimism and the other that there is not sufficient optimism with regard to trade possibilities, but I believe with the optimists that a great deal can be done to enlarge our trade. I believe this involves imaginative and constructive steps on the part of the government, and that imaginative and constructive suggestions in this house are required in order to achieve this end.

In any discussion of a general nature in this house it is difficult to deal with the matter in detail, commodity by commodity, and I have been avoiding doing so because I think the proper way for the details to be dealt with is by the working groups in the Department of Trade and Commerce, who are thoroughly competent and have all the data readily available for that kind of consideration which is conducive to the best results. I believe, furthermore, that our function here is to indicate the political objective, and that what we are seeking to do is to set up the machinery so that the details can be worked out by the departmental officials.

There are one or two particular matters which I would like to mention at this time. We could make a useful contribution to the enlargement of this trade by organizing and marshalling studies on the whole question of grading and presenting products of the federation to be sold in this country. It seems to me that they produce a large number of items which we do not have and which we require, and that these items could be presented to this country as exports which would be of benefit not only to the West Indies but to Canada.

I am quite prepared to admit that we have not been able to create a system of grading and handling such items as those requiring refrigeration, packaging and so on, and that this facet of trade must be studied. I believe, however, that one activity which could be undertaken by this government is a study, primarily through its own personnel but which would rapidly be supported by the traders of Canada, with a view to offering assistance to the federation in the methods of standardizing, grading and handling products which could be exported from the West Indies to Canada.

This naturally brings me to another facet of the subject, which is the question of shipping. I am aware that this matter has been discussed on the estimates during the last three days, and I therefore will not extend my remarks on shipping, as I would rather like to do. My purpose is not to be critical of the government with respect to this matter of trade with the West Indies, although I must admit that I am critical of the government with respect to the discontinuance of the Canadian National Steamships service to the West Indies. I expressed myself on this subject at some length on Friday last, and I can only say that in the light of the historical association between Canada and the British Carribean area, in the light of the profitable trade we have had with that area over the years and in the light of the new political development which has taken place in that area, I cannot alter my position from that of the sharpest criticism of the government for having discontinued in such a precipitous way the service to the area in 1957.

Indeed, upon checking into the background of this subject I was interested to note the consideration given to this matter by the former government, and in particular the announcement made to this House of Commons in, I believe, March of 1956 by the then minister of transport that the shipping service would continue for another five years. That was the policy announced which was supported in a rather fine paragraph or two of a speech by the present Minister of National Revenue on this subject in March of 1957 when, as I read his remarks, he spoke very strongly in favour of the service being continued. Only a few months after this, however, the government of which he became a member after the 1957 election abruptly discontinued the service without a proper explanation to the house, and I respectfully submit without a proper consideration of the factors involved.

It is interesting to note that this service had operated at a profit in the year 1956, though I admit there were some problems concerning it, but in 1957 a strike occurred which was a very difficult strike to settle involving a difficult labour problem, and the minister abruptly announced the discontinuance of the service. I have never been aware that a labour situation or a strike made necessary that kind of precipitate action. That was followed by the decision to sell these ships, although I do not know whether or not they are actually sold as yet. The suggestion was put forward by some of us in the opposition that consideration be given to the possibility of giving one of these ships to the federation so that our mutual trade might be continued.

I hold the view that in the light of all this there must of necessity be a note of sharp criticism in my remarks on that respect of the matter having to do with the shipping service to the federation, particularly at this time and particularly in the light of the announcement by the former government that the service would be continued for about five years.

The other matter for consideration is the question of the kind of action which should be taken, and I would respectfully put forward to the house at this time the suggestion that the kind of action we require is action on the political level direct from the government of Canada to the government of the West Indies. That becomes necessary for this reason. On Friday, when the estimates of the department were before the committee of the whole for discussion, I was very critical of the government for not having taken any action to follow up or consider the proposal for free trade put forward at Mont Tremblant last year by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I will not rehash those arguments, but I want to point out today in the context of the resolution now before the house that had that proposal received the kind of consideration from the Canadian government which it was entitled to receive, and had the Canadian government taken appropriate action with respect to it, discussions would have taken place on the subject to find out precisely what was in the mind of the United Kingdom authorities; there would have been an opportunity to put forward what the Canadians had in mind by way of liberalizing or freeing trade in the areas under the control of the United Kingdom, and this would have brought up directly the matter of currency exchange control in the area we are discussing.

I can only suggest that this debate today and the bringing forward of this subject shows in a practical and real way the consequences of the government's failure to give consideration to this new and, one could almost say, startling proposal by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer. Had the government treated this suggestion properly there would already be under way the kind of detailed study which is required with respect to this area of the Federation of the West Indies.

Now, on this question of the exchange and currency difficulties in the area, I wish to recall to the house a short paragraph of a speech made by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) on January 7, 1958. He was discussing the larger matter of trade with this area, and I should like to read a sentence or two of his speech in the house. It will be found on page 2970 of Hansard:

> Perhaps it would be worth considering whether we cannot tie that new part of the commonwealth, as it soon will become, more closely economically and financially to our own country, Canada, by exploring the possibility of free trade between the West Indies and Canada, or a freer trade area, and by tying up our two currencies which would encourage trade and transport between us.

It seems to me that approval of the resolution as it is presented to the house would give the government the kind of support it requires and, indeed, more than giving them this support it might incite them to the kind of action which the country requires to get on with discussions with the West Indies so that steps could be taken to increase trade with each of the component parts of the federation, and if and when the federation does have jurisdiction over its own customs regulations, to deal with the federation on that basis and also to go forward now with the United Kingdom in whatever steps may be taken to relax the exchange controls which now govern that area.

It seems to me that because of the political history of the area, its geographical location and other reasons I have mentioned, we require, and are justified in taking, very imaginative and bold steps with regard to this matter, steps going further than perhaps we might be inclined to take with regard to other countries in the world at this time. And the right time to act is now. I do not know Mr. Speaker, whether one can correctly use the phrase "politically perfect timing", but to the extent to which one can use such a phrase it seems to me that the timing is politically perfect for this to be done in the light of the arguments I have just advanced.

There are a great many publications to which I could make reference, but perhaps I should not be serving a useful purpose in doing so. There is a great deal I could say by way of appreciation of the work done by the former government.

Mr. Cardiff: Don't forget to tell us that.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, I think it is a very proper thing to do when speaking on the subject, for reasons which I will indicate to the hon. member for Huron. There was the agreement in 1898, the 1912 agreement, then the 1920 agreement, and again in 1925 the agreement which was worked out in that year and which came into force in 1927 but which, curiously enough, is properly referred to as the West Indian Trade Agreement Act of 1926. That 1926 trade agreement act is the agreement under which we have operated in connection with this area for all these years. It was in its time a very bold and imaginative act, and it produced very good results both for this country and for the Caribbean area.

I will not elaborate on the details, but we were granted a sharply reduced tariff on our goods going into that area, the actual rates depending on the island concerned, because they varied with the various parts of the area. However, the reduction was of the order of 50 or 75 per cent of the current tariff granted under the British preferential rate. It was a very successful piece of legislation, and I think the hon. member for Huron, if he studies the problem, would agree that it was an excellent agreement; and I do not know how one could discuss this subject adequately without referring to the West Indian Trade Agreement Act of 1926.

I do not propose to extend my remarks further, but I should like to quote two sentences from a speech made by Sir Grantley Adams, the prime minister of the federation, made at Mount Allison University at the 1957 summer institute when the subject under discussion was "Canada and the West Indies federation". It will be found on page 36 of the publication put out by the university. The first sentence I wish to quote is this:

> But we are profoundly convinced that our whole future depends on the closest possible relationship with the Dominion of Canada.

Then a little further on he had this to say:

> I am not flattering you. I am not saying it because I am addressing a Canadian audience. What I do say is that we consider our future success will lie with the closest possible understanding between the West Indies and Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that seems to me to present to us both a challenge and a promise. It is a promise which I am sure all hon. members on both sides of this chamber without regard to political affiliation will welcome. I can think of speeches made by the hon. member for St. John Albert (Mr. Bell) on this subject in the past which lead me to believe that this proposal would win his support. Far be it from me to speak for him, but I am sure that he and hon. members of this house in all political parties will welcome the promise inherent in those remarks of the prime minister of the federation. It presents a challenge to us, as I said, and it is in connection with that challenge that I wish to relate my remarks today.

I present this motion to the house today as the kind of answer to the challenge that private hon. members of this house in their capacity as private hon. members can give; and I ask that the Prime Minister of Canada accept that challenge and follow up in acceptance of the challenge with the kind of action that only the government has the power and authority to take. That is action to put in motion immediately in a specific way the political and technical measures on the part of the trade officers that will make our response to the challenge become something of which we will be proud. By that action we will have done a great deal to develop trade with the area, I would hope that the action taken by hon. members will be such as to bring pride to the hearts of all Canadians. I hope they will feel that they have taken the proper action with respect to a member state of the commonwealth at this time.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and in conclusion I want to thank all hon. members for the patience and courtesy with which they have listened to my remarks on this important subject today, all too inadequate though they may have been.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I rise with a feeling of great pleasure at being given an opportunity to take part in this discussion on an extremely important matter. I should like to congratulate most heartily the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) for his splendid presentation. Indeed, his presentation was so exhaustive and complete that in fear of being redundant I shall be forced, to an even greater degree than usual, to bring to my remarks the laconic brevity which I have sought to achieve over the years. I congratulate him, too, on the generally non-political tone of his remarks, and I shall also endeavour to follow that pattern. I shall not engage in a detailed discussion of the development of shipping and the merchant marine in Canada lest I fall into the tendency of criticizing the party to which the hon. member belongs for some of its actions and omissions in years not too far past.

I believe the hon. member is quite right in referring to private members' days as one of the great privileges of a democratic parliamentary system, when we function more as members of a national parliament than as adherents of a political party. I noted that the hon. member was so mellow in his broad attitude that he even referred with apparent equanimity to a certain Canadian event in the month of March.

Coming as I do from the maritimes, a region which has long had intimate and highly satisfactory relations with the West Indies, I am particularly happy to have the opportunity of speaking on this subject at this time. Perhaps there is something appropriate in my so doing, in that I am a member from an island province and we are speaking today about our relations with an archipelago, a group of islands. Not only are Prince Edward Islanders and the people of the maritimes interested in this subject, but I believe it is one in which all Canadians are deeply interested.

I am of the opinion that the terms of the resolution before us are so broad that we must consider more than the economic factors. In considering a proposal for free trade with another political entity we must take into consideration a great many political factors. Therefore I intend to be somewhat general and probably historical—I hope never hysterical—in some of the remarks I propose to make.

It is interesting that we now look upon the development of the second British federation on the North American continent. There are many problems involved in a federation. Some of the scholars in the pristine purity of their analysis have declared that Canada is not a federation but a quasi-federation. However, this is not the time for such constitutional hairsplitting. I think it can be said that there is much in common in the development of Canada from 1867 on and the new federation to the south. Indeed, our population was somewhat similar in 1867, about three million. We have perhaps not advanced as much as many of our earlier statesmen had hoped, but we have advanced magnificently.

We look forward to the political advancement of the British West Indies federation and we look forward to welcoming them as a member of the commonwealth. It was my great pleasure to be present at the United Nations last year when the newest member of the commonwealth entered that body. I refer, of course, to the federation of Malaya. A monarchy entering the commonwealth is in itself a new development. This morning we had the pleasure of listening to the address of the outstanding leader of another great sister member of the commonwealth, Ghana.

I had proposed at this time dealing with the attitude of the West Indians to relations between Canada and the islands, and I proposed quoting the words of Sir Grantley Adams which were just cited. I suppose that relations between Canada, or British North America, and the West Indies form one of the more romantic parts of our history. The area is very old, of course. We can go back in history to the days of Christopher Columbus. We all read and talked much about the days of the Spanish Main, the English seadogs and the Bluenose captains, especially when we were young.

In Prince Edward Island we can look back to the golden days of wooden ships and iron men, as they say. We had ships and captains who traded with the West Indies and carried goods from that area throughout the seven seas. The hon. member for Ottawa West referred to certain achievements under the Liberal party in terms of trade between Canada and the West Indies, but an examination of the historical record of the development of trade between the two areas reveals no monopoly so far as any political party is concerned. As far back as 1855, which indeed was before confederation, a Canadian trade delegation went to the British West Indies in the hope of stimulating and fostering trade. This, of course, was opposed by the colonial office because it was in contradiction to the free trade policies which then prevailed in the British empire.

One of the first things that Sir John A. Macdonald did was to appoint to his staff, or to his body of advisers, Sir Francis Hincks, who was an expert on West Indian affairs. In the 1880's there were significant and serious overtures from various parts of the West Indies islands offering and suggesting not only free trade and not only economic union, but political union between their area and Canada. And of course there were gradual developments of private industry, and a branch of the Canadian bank was opened there in 1889. Today there are many.

Under the government of Sir Robert Borden the first British West Indies—Canada trade agreement was entered into in 1912. In those days there were some who looked on this as a not very important or significant development. An opposition member, not from the maritimes, declared that this amounted to very little. He said:

> An arrangement has been made which at the very best can represent but a petty cash business for Canada.

There were those who thought that the vegetation was so rich in the West Indies that the people had merely to open their mouths under the trees and they would be fed. That was not a very perceptive view of the matter. Sir Robert Borden declared:

> I not only hope but believe that our trade with the West Indies will in the near future develop very greatly indeed.

This was in 1912. His words, as were so many of his utterances, of course, have been proven correct. In 1920 the old agreement was replaced with something which was a little broader, giving greater tariff preference to the British West Indies. Then, as the hon. member said, in 1925 agreements were negotiated and went into effect in 1927 which form the basis of our present trade relations with the British West Indies. These trading relations have developed with certain ups and downs, but the general pattern has been very satisfactory indeed.

In the year 1957 our exports to the area were valued at $40 million and our imports from there at $58,500,000. It is at present the second largest market in the commonwealth and our tenth world market.

I quite agree with the hon. member that now is the time to consider carefully the future prospects of this important part of our trading relationship. I hope he will not accuse me of being a pessimist if I attempt to be a realist. The relationship among members of the commonwealth should give an opportunity for all kinds of idealism. I do not think we should ever be afraid of idealism, though we Canadians seem sometimes to eschew that sort of attitude. There are difficulties in the way of immediate establishment of the important thing which the hon. member suggests.

Within the existing federation there are great difficulties. As the chief minister of Jamaica described it, it is one of "the most improbable historical adventures that one could imagine". The people in those areas are attempting to form a political entity. The distances involved are great. Indeed, Jamaica and Barbados are a thousand miles apart. Like Canada, they must overcome the isolation of geography. Unlike us, of course, they must bridge the seas, whereas we had to bridge the land. How much Canadian political history is told in our efforts to do that. Railways, economics and politics form a big part of our political development. We fought geography and we won. Indeed, Canada was created in defiance of geography.

The geographic isolation of units within the federation is something which their government is trying manfully to overcome.

External trade is, of course, always important, but in a healthy economy the internal trade generally forms by far the greater bulk of the trade. In the West Indies federation only one-tenth of their total trade is internal. They have other problems which Canada never had. One of these, of course, is overpopulation. In some places the density of population is as high as 700 per square mile. In Barbados it is even twice as high. Whereas in our country there are fewer than four people per square mile. As yet there is no provision for freedom of movement of people within the federal area.

As with all federations, they must strive to build something greater than the sectional loyalty and subnationalism of the various contributing groups. Like most federations, also, they have variety and inequality. The budget of Jamaica, for instance, is three times that of the whole federation. Here I think the West Indies would like to profit, and I know they will, from the experience of the Canadian federation. Herein they may take warning; that is, to watch for the unequal development of regions within that federation. We in Canada have seen through the years how the once-prosperous maritimes have gradually been surpassed by other parts of the federation as the centre of economic and political power moved ever away from that old region whose inclusion in the federation was essential to its very being. Therefore I say that the West Indies would do well to remember the maritimes when they plan in the future for the over-all development of their new state which we welcome so much.

There is a lack of resources and capital. As the hon. member mentioned, there is as yet no customs union. Canada experienced great difficulties, of course, in the financial and fiscal readjustments of the various provinces, but we did not start off without a customs union. Also in the federation there is the low national income. There is also a very tight, a very close link with the economy of the United Kingdom. While, of course, that in itself is not an insurmountable barrier to the kind of thing the hon. member suggests it is something which must be very carefully considered in the planning of the United Kingdom which has done so much through its colonial development policy for this particular region. There are other difficulties. None of them, of course, is insurmountable. The eternal optimists would regard none of them as that.

We have some competition with the United States. We have the aforementioned difficulty with crops which are guaranteed for sale to the United Kingdom. Then at times we find a fixed price on certain commodities such as codfish. I know my friends from Newfoundland have some feeling on this particular subject.

Then again, while in Canada we rushed to build railways and railway terminals, in the West Indies inadequate port services represent a very significant problem. If the mover of this motion believes that I am opposed to it, may I say that the contrary is true. As in all these things we must consider, if we would propose to enter into such intimate relations, more than the purely economic side. Roughly speaking, of course, our commodities are complementary. There are many of the commodities from that area which will continue to be basic to the purchases of the Canadian people. Some of these will be used in an increasing amount. I think perhaps that bauxite would be one of those.

Confederations are usually based again on certain economic considerations, and one of the most important is the establishment of a larger basis of taxation. We had that very much in mind in 1867. The new federation will increase purchasing power of the component parts and it should, of course, increase the investment attractiveness of the area. The West Indians certainly have both of these things in mind. They are working towards a greater diversification of their economy. For a long time many of the islands have had a one-commodity economy. Like many others, such as the coffee producers of South America, they are at the mercy of world markets and very often suffer thereby. Technological advance will assist, as it has in other parts of the world, the development of cold storage plants, and all the rest.

All in all, the West Indians I believe are fully aware of their problems and quite capable of dealing with them. Since my hon. friend anticipated me in the quotation he gave from Sir Grantley Adams, I shall at least have the pleasure of referring to one from the Hon. Norman Manley, the chief minister of Jamaica. I think he expressed a point of view in which we all concur. It is found in the publication which Mount Allison University gave to the Canadian public. He said:

> And then again we aim, hard as the task is, to attempt to create civilized, modern conditions for our people. We have to break out of the limitations of the old colonial economy. We have to modernize our economy. We have to learn new methods in this world of industry. We have to so build upon the larger opportunity of our unity that we can create a society that can provide for its people the basic elements of a decent life.

I am sure we all rejoice, and are convinced that we must co-operate in every possible way, as this new nation which is so close to us in many ways seeks to face the challange of its destiny. I believe that, going beyond the economic, we can develop closer cultural and political ties with this part of the world.

I am glad my hon. friend mentioned the Mount Allison summer institute because at Mount Allison, and many other universities, it was my pleasure to have in my classes so many young men from this part of the world. Generally speaking, they were very impressive. Today some of the leaders of the new state are graduates of Canadian universities. I believe that there are more students from this area in Canadian universities now than at any previous time. At Mount Allison, too, something was done which I thought was very fitting and that was when, for the first time, a Canadian university conferred honorary degrees upon West Indians, Sir Grantley Adams and Mr. Moosa Mahoraj, both of whom received doctor of law degrees.

Then, of course, the tourist trade is one of those which will certainly serve to benefit the West Indies. I think it will promote mutual understanding which, perhaps, is more important in that it underlies the kind of thing we have in mind in this resolution. My friend speaks of an imaginative program. I think there is room for that from private industry and from business concerns interested in that area. Sometimes I hear from British West Indian friends that Canadians are often inattentive in pursuing their business activities in this area.

Perhaps a more aggressive selling policy and the encouragement of greater consumer preference for certain goods would be altogether beneficial. I am sure too that there are opportunities wherein the government could assist in that regard. There are, of course, some things over which the government has no control. In the maritime provinces we are a very unsophisticated people. We used to make use of a commodity that was very important in the West Indian economy, and that was molasses. We never hesitated to put molasses on our bread. However, tastes change, and a most interesting development has been that the consumption of molasses in Canada has gone down, until a recent event which had to do, I think, in prolonging one's life and improving one's figure. It was found that molasses was a tremendously valuable food. Now we see the imports of this commodity have increased from 7.8 million gallons to 8.1 million gallons in one year. This is one matter over which the government has no control, since it is a matter of consumer preference.

There are commodities in Canada which when the West Indians have an opportunity of making use of them will find increasing favour in that area. I refer to one, the potato. In Prince Edward Island we grow the finest potatoes in the world. We have always been interested in the West Indian market. I am glad to see that over the years there has been improvement in our sales to that market we sold $418,000 worth last year. This market—could be improved and I think it should be improved.

Now while I believe that this is the time to think of these things, I have a feeling it would be a bit unrealistic to expect that a customs union would come about immediately. The history of customs unions has generally been that they are rather slow in their evolution. You will recall that after the second world war there were a great many prospects for customs unions amongst countries which had a good deal in common politically and which had a common goal, their own economic betterment. However, they are still a long way from the fruition of their plans for customs unions.

I am not one of those who say that a customs union or free trade area, to be more precise in the terms of the resolution, could not and might not come about between these two parts of North America, so closely bound by tradition. But I do think that no matter how vigorously the government might move in this direction it is not something which can come about quickly. I will agree that we should draw closer to this area. We, the oldest commonwealth member, rejoice in the development on this hemisphere of another potential member of that wonderful association. I believe, too, we can be helpful. I like the idea that was put forward that perhaps we should develop a Caribbean plan somewhat similar to the Colombo Plan. Some steps have been taken in that direction. The United States, too, has given some technical assistance, but it is only the beginning; the West Indians feel it is only the beginning. I believe we should look upon ourselves as just beginning.

But there is something even broader, and that is that our relations with the West Indies will tax, and test in good measure, Canadian political maturity. It took quite a long time for us to recognize our position in the world. For many years we were much involved in penetration of our own frontiers. But then we moved across and took our place in the world, especially in that north Atlantic triangle which has become so much a part of our history. But we are a member and a part of this hemisphere. As a power with world responsibilities, we cannot look only as far south as Washington and only to the western European world. We have a place of leadership here on this part of the globe.

In close union with this great multi-racial community I think we can go forward to give great leadership in this part of the world. I would envisage that some day—and of course this is only my personal opinion and hope—we might take our place along with a fully independent West Indies federation and member of the commonwealth in the Organization of American states often called the Pan-American union and that that would be the full measure of our continental solidarity and brotherhood with this new and very interesting young nation that we now see before our eyes taking its place in this troubled, difficult yet altogether interesting and challenging world.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from a province which basically depends on exports for its well-being, I am naturally always greatly interested when there is before the house a motion which deals with either the expansion of trade or a policy of extension of free trade. That is the type of motion with which we are dealing at the present time and which was introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith).

I cannot say that I completely agree with all the remarks of the previous speaker. I am inclined to believe that he was a little bit too much on the pessimistic side and could not see advances in the field of trade between the Federation of the West Indies and Canada in as rapid a time as I am certain the sponsor of the motion and I believe is possible. It is not very often when we find a country with which we have had expanding business over the years coming to our country, as has been done in recent weeks and in recent months, telling us that they would like to buy more from us and asking why we do not do something to assist them in buying more from Canada.

In more than one important publication it has been pointed out in recent weeks that we in this country are not accepting the challenge of the opportunity for greater exports to the Federation of the West Indies. It was only in recent weeks that I was reading an interesting issue of the commercial letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I refer to their issue No. 2 in March of this year. From it I should like to quote two paragraphs. On page 8 we find this:

> The problem of overcoming United Kingdom-oriented buying habits in the West Indies and that of maintaining a competitive price position are primarily sales and production considerations. On a long-term basis, however, the situation offers something more of a challenge to Canada, and at the same time provides an opportunity for this country to take a constructive part in building a prosperous economy in the West Indies.
> The market for certain Canadian goods in the next few years is promising. The need for fertilizers is expected to grow as agriculture develops, and the market for capital goods and for certain manufactured goods should also expand.

In the same commercial letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce we find this:

> The West Indies, in seeking to build an economy which will raise the level of prosperity, will need the friendly co-operation of many other countries. The outstanding needs of the new federation are stability in the markets for its produce, an inflow of investment capital, and some financial and technical assistance. The country that joins in an attempt to supply these needs will, in the long run, confer considerable benefits upon itself, as far-sighted private interests have already realized.

I believe that this commercial letter, which was issued only in March of this year, is pointing out both to the government and to the industries of this country that there is a challenge that our country can meet as put to us by the Federation of the West Indies and that there is at least the indication that we are perhaps not taking full advantage of the opportunities being presented to us.

As a matter of fact, I am most happy at the increase in the export and import trade in the past few years between what is now the Federation of the West Indies and our own country of Canada. I did not make a study of the same years as those mentioned by the two previous speakers but I note that in 1953 Canada had exports to what is now known as the Federation of the West Indies of some $29,578,000 and that only four years later, in 1957, that figure had increased to $40,276,000. On the other side of the picture, in 1953 we imported in the amount of $23,408,000 and four years later, in 1957, we imported $58,430,000 worth of goods.

It is most interesting to make a study of what are the major imports that we receive from the Federation of the West Indies. If we make a study of what are our major imports, we can then come to a rather full realization as to why our fellow citizens in that part of the commonwealth are most anxious that they should do a greater business with Canada and buy more from our country. Just on the basis of 1957 I find that here in this country we took as much as one-third of our requirements in unrefined sugar from the Federation of the West Indies, one-half of our requirements of molasses and syrups and two-thirds of our requirements of bauxite alumina. Of course I suppose the story would not be complete if I did not mention that we also import from the Federation of the West Indies one-third of our rum. Canadian importation of two-thirds of our requirements in bauxite alumina and one third of our requirements in unrefined sugar means a great deal to Jamaica, especially as regards their market for sugar.

We have not, however, taken advantage of their requests and desires. They not only sent over a most powerful delegation this year to see if they could not buy more from Canada, but they pointed out that they have the dollars with which to buy, something which so many countries do not have. They have all the dollars they require.

Why are they so anxious that we should sell more to them? It is, of course, to use the words of the delegation, because they are worried about the situation whereby on six months' notice Canada could cut off the $1 per hundred pounds preferential. The amazing feature of the trade situation is that Canada gives the Federation of the West Indies $1 preferential per hundred pounds on our imports of unrefined sugar, while the United States gives no preferential whatsoever. Yet in the past the majority of imports which have been going into the Federation of the West Indies have been from the United States and not from Canada. In a one-year period when there was a differential of $3.8 million in Canada there was a differential of $53 million in the United States, so I think we can all very easily realize the fears felt by the people of the federation lest Canada should ever decide to change its mind with respect to the differential. I would like to read very briefly from a most interesting article in the Financial Post of January 18, 1958, written by a Mr. Robert W. McRae, headed "Jamaica's Trade Slogan 'If You've Got It, We'll Buy It' ". This is a most unusual situation, and the article reads as follows:

> Jamaican leaders are coming north next week for trade talks.
> They want to step up buying in Canada to keep the vital sugar preference.
> As it is now, $56 million goes from Jamaica to the U.S. annually, trade which could be diverted to Canada.
> This is available to Canada. And the Jamaican slogan will be: If you've Got It, we'll Buy It.

The article goes on to make it very, very clear that they have all the dollars required in the Federation of the West Indies and that they feel because of their relationship with Canada in respect of the commonwealth and because of the assistance that Canada has been able to give them in respect of economic development and in trade preference that they have an obligation to Canada.

So we have these people almost pleading that we should export more in order that they may import less from the United States and so that we can see the kind of friends they are to us. Yet we have one hon. member who says, "Go slow—go slow, it is going to take a long while." On the other hand, the businessmen and the parliamentarians of Jamaica, according to the newspapers, are in a state of anxiety about trade with this country and we have such information as is given to us in commercial letters and publications from financial organizations which I imagine are most stable, such as the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

When we view the entire picture, therefore, we must agree that this is the most appropriate time for the hon. member for Ottawa West to have introduced this motion for the expansion of trade with the Federation of the West Indies, and so far as this group is concerned we are most certainly heartily in agreement with its basic principles. Whether or not it is accepted by this House of Commons, we do suggest that something should be done to expand trade with the federation for which expansion the federation has been pleading and has outlined on more than one occasion.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the bold and courageous decision of the ten British colonies of the Caribbean, Jamaica, Trinidad, Tobago, Barbados, the Leeward and Windward islands to form together a political federation was certainly an act of faith in themselves, in their land and in the commonwealth. It was a demonstration of faith in their ability to work together to develop their resources, to improve their living standards and to raise their level of prosperity; it was a demonstration of faith in the commonwealth because they knew their experiment could not hope to succeed without outside aid and that faith in the commonwealth was a demonstration of faith in Canada particularly because of all commonwealth countries Canada is the member in the best position to be able to give them the kind of assistance they need.

Following as they do a path similar to that followed by the Canadian provinces 90 years ago, they have every right to look to Canada for a large measure of assistance, not only because they subscribe to the same kind of parliamentary institutions and values as those to which we subscribe and because we are geographical neighbours, being part of the same hemisphere, not only because of Canada's tradition of assistance granted under the Colombo Plan, but most of all because, as the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) pointed out this afternoon, more than any other country in the world the economy of Canada supplements that of the British West Indies.

As the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) pointed out this afternoon, this federation faces tremendous difficulties, difficulties far more formidable than those faced by the Canadian provinces 90 years ago. These islands which have decided to federate extend over a range of some 1,800 miles and are separated by water; they have the disadvantages of a small population with, in some areas, overcrowding. They have some cases of extreme poverty which did not obtain in Canada and to cope with all this they have less natural wealth to develop and upon which to draw.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has announced that a refrigerated ship will be built by Canada and given to the Federation of the West Indies as a gift for use in their inter-island trade, but more than that is required. They certainly require large amounts of capital investment and donations of capital goods; they need port and harbour facilities for loading and unloading cargoes; they need refrigeration facilities and technical know-how.

Above all, they will need ships to carry on trade between the British West Indies and Canada. These ships should be specially built for that purpose. We in Canada know the handicaps of having a small domestic market, and we can appreciate, therefore, that with a population of only around three million the British West Indies federation, if it is to develop and prosper, must rely mainly on the development of its external trade. Without the improvement and expansion of trade all our gifts of capital and equipment and other assistance will be of no use.

Canada has enjoyed trade relations with the British West Indies for over 200 years, and trade with the province of Newfoundland has probably extended over a longer period than that. This trade had its beginning with the maritime provinces and there are still great opportunities for its expansion to the mutual advantage of all Canada and particularly of the Atlantic region. We in Newfoundland have bought our supplies of rum—as the hon. member for Queens pointed out—from the West Indies, but we depend on them for other products too—staple products for our fishermen such as molasses and salt. Our manufacturing industries depend to a large extent on their bauxite, and the islands in turn depend upon Canada for dairy products, vegetables and manufactured goods.

Since 1912 there have been preferential trade agreements between Canada and the British West Indies federation. The original agreement of 1912 was revised in 1920 and again in 1926. In considering this resolution, which states that the government should consider the advisability of establishing free trade between Canada and the Federation of the West Indies, it would be worth while to take a look at the agreement which is already in existence. The present agreement grants prescribed margins of tariff preferences to most Canadian goods. The agreement provides that duties on Canadian goods may not exceed a certain percentage of most-favoured-nation rates of duties. For example, in the Barbados and Trinidad it must not exceed 50 per cent of the most-favoured-nation rate; in Jamaica it must not exceed 75 per cent of that rate. To work out a practical example, if we suppose that in Trinidad the most-favoured-nation rate is 10 per cent, then the preferential tariff would not exceed 5 per cent. Similarly, in Jamaica it would not exceed 7½ per cent. In addition, the agreement sets forth a specified margin of preference on Canadian flour, dairy products, meat, fish and apples.

Canada, under the agreement, grants free entry to most British West Indies products other than sugar, tobacco and spirits and bound margins of preference on all dutiable goods, including sugar. The most important preference is, of course, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) pointed out this afternoon, on raw sugar which is imported for refining in Canada and which forms the basis of manufacturing industries in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The preference on 96 per cent sugar is $1 per 100 pounds. Canada gave preferences also on bananas, cocoa beans, rum, coffee and spices and, in addition, gave a general undertaking that in respect of all goods not specifically mentioned in the agreement the duty on imports from the British West Indies would at no time exceed 50 per cent of the general tariff of Canada.

Notwithstanding the discriminatory dollar control restrictions, this agreement has greatly encouraged the growth of trade. If we look at the figures we find that for the three years immediately before the agreement was signed imports averaged $19 million a year; if we take the average for 1954, 1955 and 1956 we find that the average imports amounted to $58 million annually.

Now that the islands of the West Indies federation are working out their customs union it will be necessary for this trade agreement to be revised, and this appears to be a very opportune time for the government to give consideration to replacing this agreement by a free trade agreement. The present rates are so small as to have no significance as far as revenue is concerned, and the growth in trade which has already taken place indicates that an even greater expansion would result from a removal of restrictions altogether.

If we look at the year 1955 we find that Jamaica exported more to Canada than to the United States, and double what it exported to Europe. In the same year Trinidad exported to Canada twice as much as to the United States. On the other hand, the British West Indies have become Canada's third market for fully manufactured goods. Trade between Canada and the British West Indies must be a natural development, because the two economies supplement each other to a great degree; they produce things that we cannot produce and we produce products which they cannot produce. We need their products and they need ours, and trade under these conditions must necessarily be to our mutual advantage and certainly should be conducted as freely as possible.

As one who comes from Newfoundland I am particularly interested, naturally, in the expansion of the British West Indies market for our fish. This market has been one of our traditional salt fish markets for centuries. It is a necessary product because it provides these people with the essential protein and salt which are necessary to health in the kind of climate in which they live.

I wish to place some figures on the record to give some idea of the importance of this market for salt fish. We find that the exports to the Caribbean area for the years 1953 to 1957 inclusive represented 48 per cent of our total salt fish exports. Of that amount nearly half, or 21 per cent, went to the three larger islands which make up the British West Indies federation. Jamaica took an annual average of 113,000 quintals, Barbados an average of 23,000 quintals and Trinidad an average of 24,000 quintals making an average annual total of nearly 160,000 quintals of dried fish for each of the years between 1953 and 1957 inclusive.

With a growing population this market is bound to expand. It has been estimated that by 1970 the population of the British West Indies will have increased from 3,500,000 to 7 million. The best way to expand the market in that area not only for fish but for all Canadian products is to increase the prosperity of the people who consume. The implementation of this resolution will do a great deal more to make the British West Indies strong and prosperous and at the same time will benefit all Canada and particularly the Atlantic provinces. As far as the exportation of Newfoundland salt fish is concerned it would be more beneficial than a subsidy. The growth and prosperity of the British West Indies will strengthen not only the commonwealth but the whole free world. For that reason I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I commend him for bringing it forward at this time and I trust it will receive the support of all hon. members.

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in rising to participate in this debate. Since I represent an agricultural constituency in the province of Saskatchewan I am naturally interested in any increase in trade since the area from which I come is also a surplus producing area. Although the West Indies federation has not yet come into being I feel that everything should be done within the present bounds of our trade agreements in order to increase the channels of two-way trade between Canada and this area.

According to the dominion bureau of statistics report of Canadian exports for March 1958, we are now exporting to the islands comprising the federation agricultural products of a wide variety. The exports represent practically all phases of agriculture in Canada. It has been said today that the agricultural industries of both areas are complementary.

Representing a western constituency I am particularly interested in the volume of cereal grains and other field crops exported to the West Indies whether in the form of whole grain, flour or processed products such as macaroni, oil cake, poultry and stock concentrates. For years past the area comprising the West Indies federation has been a large and traditional market for Canadian wheat flour. Canadian flour has been sold and recognized as one of the economic links between the two members of the commonwealth. For the past few years the trend has been away from Canadian flour to United States flour due entirely to the subsidy being paid to United States mills enabling them to quote at prices Canadian mills cannot meet.

To illustrate this, in 1955 Canada exported 2,147,047 bags of flour, while in 1957 Canada exported 1,789,452 bags. To emphasize the fact that this change is due solely to United States subsidized flour, I quote from the report of the Canada flour export committee dated March 26 and prepared after a visit to Jamaica:

> There is a great deal of good will towards Canadian flour, and a desire to purchase counter grades if Canada could compete on price. Canadian baker's flour predominates, although there is evidence of American flour making inroads. American baking flour is selling at $4.62 to $4.82, with Canadian flour 40 cents to 50 cents a bag higher. The larger bakers point out the importance of high protein flour. Smaller bakers are mixing Canadian and American flour. The price differential on the American flour lowers their over-all cost and, unless steps are taken to remedy this condition, it is our feeling more and more American baker's flour will be used.

From the same source, with respect to Trinidad, I quote the following paragraph:

> Flour from the United States of America mills has gained a strong position—so much so that one particular brand has become a criterion for all other brands. It was suggested by some importers that a new brand name common to all Canadian mills and at a discount of 20 cents below the popular United States flour brand might be the answer. Flour is being offered by Canadian brokers as low as $4.25. This flour, however, is of a very indifferent quality, and is not giving Canadian flour a very good name. Canadian good quality flour would have to be sold at from 50 cents to 60 cents a bag below present offerings to create any interest. The bakers want a better grade of flour from Canada at a price of $4.40 c.i.f.

The two main classes of flour imported into the West Indies are baking flour and counter flour. Counter flour is imported almost 100 per cent from the United States because they are able to supply from that country a second clear flour of maximum 1 per cent ash—protein does not matter—at a price which would be equivalent to about $3.40 Canadian per 100 pounds, c.i.f. Kingston, Jamaica. Although flour milled straight from Canadian No. 5 wheat was shipped to the West Indies a few years ago in large quantities and was found suitable for counter flour purposes, the present subsidy of the United States makes it impossible for any flour to be shipped from Canada at this price. Canada has maintained her position as a major exporter of flour through the years, not by selling cheap flour, but by selling quality. In commercial relationships with the West Indies, I feel sure that the Canadian milling companies stand well ahead of United States milling companies, yet we are losing business year after year. This is solely a matter of price. In 1957, Canada imported $58.4 million worth of goods from the British West Indies federation and exported to the islands $40.3 million worth of goods.

The solution of our flour export difficulties lies with our private enterprise people, with help from our trade commissioners. Already steps are being taken by the millers and the primary producers to introduce into the West Indies flour of a standard and at a price that will compete with United States subsidized flour. Wheat and flour exports to the West Indies are only part of the picture. To increase our exports we shall have to, and we can, take more of the West Indian agricultural products. The problem lies partly with the new federation and partly with ourselves. An exchange of ideas and of technical knowledge between the two countries is necessary. As the West Indian farmer learns to supply standard products to the market we shall see the West Indies seeking wider markets.

Another phase of their development is taken from the agricultural survey made by Dr. A. L. Jolly for the Caribbean commission. In discussing methods needed to improve agriculture, besides the one I mentioned, such as standardization of production to make available to exporters a standard product which would be acceptable, he has another interesting comment to make. He mentions a difficulty which I think Canada can help to solve. In discussing the relationship of Caribbean agriculture and its industrial growth he states that Caribbean agriculture is inefficient, and to say that it is as efficient as any other tropical area is not good enough. He said:

—Caribbean agriculture is strikingly inefficient. Its inefficiencies are due primarily to lack of management. It is the function of management to organize the other economic factors of production in the most efficient combination. The characteristic of too much labour working with inefficient capital equipment, so typical of much Caribbean agriculture is due to the fact that management has not yet invented ways of righting this unbalance profitably. The lack of management is not due to lack of intelligence or lack of energy among managers but to their inadequate numbers. The problem in the Caribbean is not how a surplus of young trained men can find land and money to start farming, but who will replace the small number of existing managers when they retire.

There we have the problem facing the Caribbean agriculture which governments, private exporting companies and our universities can assist to solve by encouraging the training of young men and supplying and training the managers needed in this new area.

The West Indies federation, with a population of three million and with a very high birth rate, will never be able to produce sufficient food to feed its growing population. It is a population which will have a continuously rising standard of living. In this area we have at our door a market which should be ours. The great bulk of agricultural products from the British West Indies which will be seeking markets do not in any way conflict with our Canadian agriculture. On the other hand, as the British West Indies federation raises the standard and quantity of its products the United States will be forced by pressure groups within their economy to control the amount of those competing agricultural products entering the United States. This leaves Canada in a favoured position and gives us an opportunity to start to develop now a reciprocal trade in agricultural products, and we should take advantage of a situation which is so favourable to us.

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on this resolution will be brief because, since the outset of the debate, I have had the unhappy experience of sitting here and finding all the statistics which I have so long and laboriously sought after presented by previous speakers.

In his remarks, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) presented the problems of trade with the West Indies, particularly as they apply to the province of Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces of Canada. It is interesting to note, that the salt fish industry, which is at present undergoing somewhat of a crisis, is accounted for by the most part by the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and one of the chief remaining customers of Canada's salt fish has been the British West Indies. We hope that the difficulties being encountered at present by the fish trades of the Atlantic provinces and the authorities of Jamaica and the other islands of the West Indies will soon be overcome so that we can settle back to our traditional happy trade relations with one of our best salt fish customers.

As was outlined by previous speakers, Canada and particularly the Atlantic provinces of Canada noted with interest the inaugural ceremonies last March founding what we hope will be one of the members of the commonwealth, the West Indies federation.

We in eastern Canada particularly were very much concerned with this development because, as I said previously, the West Indies are in fact one of our best customers. Perhaps it is ironic that we in the province of Newfoundland have had so many things in common with our neighbours in the new federation. For many years we have known the consequences, hardships and difficulties which flow from a single industry economy. We are also not unlike our neighbours in the West Indies in that much of our trade results from our geographical location.

I could not help but be impressed with the statistics that I encountered in my research, and particularly those statistics relating to salt fish. For example, of all the fish exported from Canada in 1957, 3.4 per cent went to the island of Jamaica which, incidently, comprises more than half the population of the new federation. The other nine islands are, by population and by size, small in comparison. My figures, therefore, for the most part deal with the island of Jamaica. Of the total fish exported in 1957—I believe this figure has already been cited on several occasions—6 per cent went to the British West Indies. I would venture to say that this 6 per cent came primarily from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

The resolution before us is an interesting one in that it advocates that the government consider the advisability of establishing a free trade area between Canada and the West Indies. This is most important to the Atlantic provinces of Canada, those provinces which have been struggling for so many years under many heavy problems. I noted with interest the remarks of the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) and his suggestion that perhaps consideration might be given to a Caribbean Colombo plan. This would seem to make sense in many ways, in so far as my limited experience goes. I hope it is a suggestion that will merit some consideration in the future. It is perhaps because the salt fish industry is of such importance that we on this side of the house have viewed with concern the problems of this industry which represents such an important part of the economy of the Atlantic provinces, particularly Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

I would suggest that this resolution merits the serious consideration of the members of the house. I would hope that in the debate which will follow the speakers will not be influenced by partisan politics, so that we may receive the utmost benefit from this very worthy suggestion.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my first word in this debate must be to assess, in general, the picture that each country has of the other, that is the new Federation of the British West Indies as seen by Canadians and the reverse. I think that we each tend, in certain times of the year, to view the other as a paradise, especially when winter has cast its spell over our country and we tend to think of the sunny climate of the south and I think that they, with their fine weather, tend to think of Canada as the place to which they would like to come.

As the hon. member who preceded me has remarked, one of the disadvantages in participating in this debate is that everyone seems to have read that excellent publication called "Canada and the West Indies Federation", which was put out by Mount Allison University publications, at Sackville, New Brunswick, following an institute on Canada and the West Indies federation held last August. Actually, the full title is "Mount Allison 1957 Summer Institute, Canada and the West Indies Federation". To my horror I found that the mover of the resolution, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) began with a quotation from Sir Grantley Adams, then prime minister of the Barbados and now prime minister of the federation. When he stated, I am quoting from page 36, I started to say to myself, "But we are profoundly convinced—", and the hon. member for Ottawa West said, "But we are profoundly convinced—" and so on. He did neglect to give all the quotation, and I think it might be of interest to the house, so I have no hesitation in reading about 75 or 100 words from it.

> But we are profoundly convinced that our whole future depends on the closest possible relationship with the Dominion of Canada. We have already passed appropriate resolutions at some of our federal meetings, and we intend in a short time to send delegations up to Ottawa. We are already determined to explore the possibilities for increased trade and for increased immigration. Of course, we shall continue the cultural ties which have existed so long with Canada. When I was comparatively young, I think there were more McGill graduates among our doctors than from any other part of the world. Our youth comes to Canadian colleges and Canadian universities, and we want those ties to be strengthened and increased. I'm not flattering you, I'm not saying it because I'm addressing a Canadian audience, but I do say it; we consider our future success will lie with the closest possible understanding between the West Indies and Canada. We will do our best to make our contribution for mutual benefit as great as possible, and we confidently expect that this great dominion will do the same for the West Indies.

Those remarks, as I have indicated, were made by Sir Grantley Adams in his position as prime minister of the Barbados last August during the Mount Allison University summer institute. I was interested in the very thoughtful remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West, and the remarks of the other speakers who have followed him in this debate, concerning the general appreciation of the goods that are involved in trade between the federation and this country. I wonder if these speakers appreciate some of the grave problems that exist before trade can be opened up and expanded between Canada and the British West Indies federation. With that consideration in mind I should like to detail some of these problems as I go along in these brief remarks of this afternoon. Mainly they concern the problem of sterling.

The West Indies federation is a member of the sterling area. When I have concluded I should like to cast my remarks in such a way as to suggest to Canada that five years from now this whole matter of the federation down there will be surveyed by the component countries. They will decide whether they have been able to make this multilateral marriage work; whether the contract should be altered in any way; or perhaps even whether they should give up the idea altogether. Hence the developments over the next five years, Mr. Speaker, I think will be extremely important. It may yet be found that within that period of time we shall see the growth in Canada of a thought that here, far to the south of us, south of Halifax and Newfoundland, lies a country that could very nicely become the eleventh province of Canada.

I should now like to say a word about the traditional ties between our two countries. In 1892 the Department of Trade and Commerce came into being in the federal service. In that year 1892 Canadian commercial agents were appointed in Jamaica, Trinidad, Montserrat, St. Kitts, British Guiana and Barbados. In 1907 a Canadian trade commissioner was appointed at Bridgetown, Barbados and today there are two Canadian government trade commissioners in the West Indies, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). I might point out that the office in Kingston covers the northern part of the federation, Jamaica, Bahamas and British Honduras, and included in the territory of the Port of Spain office is Barbados, Tobago, Trinidad, Windward and Leeward islands, British Guiana, French Guiana, Surinam, Guadeloupe and Martinique. Some of these, of course, are not particularly in the federation but that is the area served.

Last year the total Canadian trade with the West Indies amounted to about $99 million and last year the West Indies constituted the fourth largest market in the commonwealth for Canada. If we add these other places that I have mentioned, namely British Guiana, British Honduras, Bahamas and Bermuda, you will find that in 1957 this was the second largest market in the commonwealth for Canada, and our tenth market in the world.

These very elementary figures tend, I believe, to illustrate qualitatively the importance of this area in Canadian trade. Last year we sold $40 million worth of goods to the West Indies. In the past years about 85 per cent of Canada's exports to the West Indies has been in the class of manufactured or semi-manufactured goods. This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the highest ratios for any of our export markets, a point about which I intend to speak subsequently in my address this afternoon. We can compare this with our trade with the United Kingdom where only some 15 per cent to 20 per cent of our exports there are classed as manufactured or semi-manufactured.

In recent years there have been trade missions back and forth between Ottawa and the West Indies and probably there will be more. As you will recall, Sir Grantley, in his remarks at Mount Allison institute, said that trade delegations would be sent to this country. In recent years there has been the signing of the Canada-British West Indies trade agreement. We have seen the flow of British West Indies students to Canadian universities and nursing schools and of Canadian tourists to the West Indies, though I believe the tourist trade to the West Indies is primarily United States. Eighty-five per cent of the tourists there come from that country. Our realization of the importance of this federation is seen in the announcement of the gift of a new ship, which gift is contrasted with the strike on the Canadian National Steamships ships, and which gift cannot be construed as political because the Liberals thought of it and we are doing it.

But despite the trade which I have mentioned, the Canadian trade with this nation is not as large as it should be owing to several limiting factors. I think the consideration of these factors is important, for even if this house passes the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa West—and I hope we do—we must still remember that much remains to be done before that fine dream of free trade becomes the reality of free trade. I am also afraid that much of that cure will have to be found elsewhere than in Canada, and that it must be found within the unique trade structure of the federation itself.

As for the limiting factors in the amount of trade we can do, I think these points should be considered. The population is about 2.8 million. Their national income is low. Their productivity is low. The range of goods and services they offer for export is limited to the items that have been mentioned this afternoon including sugar, and its by-products, lumber, bauxite, oil and of course the various tourist facilities. Another factor is the competition which results for our trade in the West Indies. By tradition the United Kingdom has been the principal supplier. In recent years the West Indies, like other countries in the sterling area, have maintained restrictions on the import of dollar goods. As far as dollar exports are concerned, we must remember that the United States are closer and that they have the advantage owing to speed and the frequency of shipping, although the United States is at a disadvantage as compared with Canada because they do not receive the British preferential treatment.

Canadians also face competition from within the commonwealth and some of these countries are in the sterling bloc. New Zealand has built up a large market for cheese and butter which cuts into the prospects of this country and those of other suppliers. Australian flour has appeared on the market, and it seems rather odd when you think of bauxite going all the way from Jamaica to British Columbia and yet the reverse trip does not seem to pick up any of this western wheat about which there is so much debate in this house. Rather, they go to Australia for their flour; again, I imagine, because of the sterling factor. Many manufactured goods from European countries, from India, Japan and Hong Kong, are being sold in the West Indies federation and the Netherlands has increased its sales of canned beets and milk products.

Canadian goods are allowed into the West Indies under several categories. Those products under the world open general licence include onions, potatoes, split peas, fish except fresh and frozen fish, meat, cheese, kraft paper, newsprint, powdered and canned milk, animal feeding stuffs and lumber and in 1956 leaf tobacco, fresh apples, fertilizers and calcium carbide were added to the list of goods which might be imported into the West Indies under the world open general licence. The West Indies trade liberalization plan embraces a second group designed to maintain traditional markets of exports to this area and the way it works is that Canadian exporters of products listed under the plan are entitled to apply for allocations on the basis of their exports to that area between the years 1946 and 1948.

The annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for 1957 contains at page 52 several paragraphs on the operations of the British West Indies trade liberalization plan and perhaps I can take some brief excerpts from this report. The number of firms participating in the plan last year was 722; individual allocations processed and issued by this section during the year were 8,005, or an increase of about 35 per cent over 1956. That, of course, is an indication of the intense interest in Canada in this market to our south.

Some new products, of course, have been manufactured since this period 1946 to 1948, and the department has over the years made some provision to grant special allocations to firms which were not in business during that period and to grant them special allocations under special circumstances. Imports of products other than those in the two classifications I have mentioned, the first being the world open general licence and the second the West Indies trade liberalization plan, are subject to individual licensing. The component colonies each have a dollar program under which they grant licences for dollar goods considered essential to the development of the country and some of these colonies operate special dollar import schemes whereby dollar import quotas are distributed among local importers, thus enabling them to import Canadian or United States goods of their own choosing.

Mention has been made of the Canadian goods supplied to the West Indies, which perhaps might be broken down regionally as follows; from the west coast, lumber, apples and canned salmon; from the prairie provinces, flour; from Ontario and Quebec, motor vehicles, milk products, flour and feeds, paint, pharmaceuticals, footwear, paper, textiles, beer, rubber goods and general manufactured goods; and from the maritime provinces—and in these I include our latest acquisition, Newfoundland—salt, pickled and canned fish, potatoes, grocery items, shoes and other consumer goods.

Mention was also made this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and I believe by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) of some of the problems of fish exporting trade to the West Indies. This matter is again covered in the excellent little book to which I referred earlier, entitled "Canada and the West Indies Federation". At page 72 of this publication the author of the article "The Fish Trade", Mr. R. F. Johnson, secretary of the Canadian Atlantic fish exporters association, remarks:

> There is good reason to believe that past preferential tariff treatment of B.W.I. products by Canada, has led to curtailment in sales of our salt and pickled fish to some non-commonwealth Caribbean countries without resulting in compensatory increases in our sales of fish to the B.W.I.

He goes on to explain what is going on as follows:

> The largest salt fish market in the B.W.I., Jamaica, maintains a consumer price ceiling on salt cod notwithstanding that within recent weeks a government minister of Jamaica is reported to have said publicly that "the Canadian sugar market is vital to our existence". This ceiling price, which applies to all five sizes of both choice and standard grades of salt cod, indirectly determines the prices that our Canadian fishermen receive for their salt cod production—and which price we have already shown is inadequate. In December 1953, this ceiling price in Jamaica was reduced from 1s. 7½d. to 1s. 6d, and it was further reduced in June 1955, to 1s. 5d. Only following repeated representations, including a delegation from the Canadian industry travelling to Jamaica to discuss the matter with government officials, was the ceiling price increased in September, 1956, to the current 1s. 6½d. per pound, still 1d. below the pre-December, 1953, level.

And so on and so on.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member would say from what he is reading—I am afraid I did not catch that.

Mr. McCleave: I will be very glad to give that information to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I have mentioned I think three times that I was reading from a publication entitled "Canada and the West Indies Federation" published by the Mount Allison University dealing with the summer institute last August and that the particular reference was to an article entitled "The Fish Trade" by Mr. R. F. Johnson, secretary of the Canadian Atlantic fish exporters association, commencing at page 72.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a further question? I wonder if he has seen the Halifax Chronicle-Herald for July 12 last, where the most recent statement of Mr. Zwicker, head of that association, and Mr. Johnson, the secretary, bring a lot of that information up to date.

Mr. McCleave: I was trying to illustrate my point that we are going to run into some difficulty when Canadians and members of the British West Indies federation get together to discuss ways and means of increasing trade between the two countries. I did not intend to get into a discussion which would be esoteric to me regarding the problems of the fishing industry and I hope this answer will reassure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I am not trying to horn in on the speciality of those who come from fish producing communities.

I mentioned earlier the fact that we supplied the West Indies with an astonishingly high percentage of manufactured goods in our exports to them—some 80 or 85 per cent—which is most unusual in ordinary trade dealings. This brings me to a most vital point, and I will illustrate it by the aluminum development in Canada and the bauxite development in the British West Indies. It should be noted that it has been Canadian investment in bauxite mining which has made possible a large export of this mineral to Canada. Trinidad's exports of petroleum products can be traced back to the first commercial discovery of oil in that colony by a Canadian syndicate at the turn of the century. Today Canadian interests are looking at copper and other mineral possibilities in Jamaica, and Canadian capital is moving into the hotel industry on Jamaica's north coast with a view to attracting more Canadian tourists.

The magazine called Commonwealth Development at page 27 of its March-April issue, volume 5, No. 2 makes an interesting point in an article called "Economic Outlook for the Federation", and I quote:

> It will be the policy of the federation to assist the islands to increase the variety of their crops and also to hasten the development of secondary industries. It is in the secondary industries, assisted by a tax relief scheme, that there is the greatest scope for joint capital ventures and co-production with British firms, as is happening, for example in soap and in paint manufacture. Other secondary industries include the manufacture of margarine, matches, shoes, garments, leather and fancy goods and fruit canning.

The magazine Commonwealth Development is a British publication, and hon. members will note, in the quotation I have just read, that great emphasis was laid on the possibility for British investment in the Federation of the West Indies. I think we can substitute the word "Canadian" in that context for "British". Perhaps as partners with them there is ample room to develop this sprawling area which has now become a federation, and I think this is something that should definitely be kept in mind, knowing that in the past our investments in petroleum and bauxite have led to the development of mutually profitable industries.

I said earlier that at the end of five years the Federation of the West Indies will take stock of how this multi-lateral marriage of the various islands has worked out. What the assessment will be, time alone can tell. I think Canada should keep a close eye on the developments there, and give these people the most sympathetic consideration and all the help we possibly can; and I think, too, that some day we should even consider asking them to become one of our own provinces.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to comment on the remarks which have been made earlier in this debate, before I come to my own contribution which will be made on behalf of the industrial areas of Canada, particularly the most noted, outstanding and progressive area of Canada, the Toronto area —whether the future of trade with the British West Indies federation follows the pattern suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) or not.

It has occurred to me several times during this debate that the ideas and contributions which have been made to it are certainly varied in their sources. As I was waiting my turn to speak, that great paper the Ottawa Journal came to my desk and I noticed an article there headed: "Labour party urges Colombo plan type commonwealth aid". The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) will be surprised to find himself in the company of such political bedfellows. I should like to read briefly from this short article:

> The British Labor Party Saturday night proposed the establishment of organizations similar to those of the Colombo Plan to aid underdeveloped areas of the commonwealth.
> It said the Colombo Plan, devised to boost food production and provide educational facilities in underprivileged Asian countries, could be used as a model for similar work in Africa and the West Indies.
> The party's policy pamphlet said Canada and the United States—both members of the Colombo Plan —would be invited to take part in the new project if a Labor government is returned in the next British elections.

I hope, incidentally, that developments along these lines will not have to wait for anything such as that, an event, which, I am confident, is far in the distant future.

To get back to comments concerning other contributions to this debate, I must say that when I was advised that this resolution was to come up today, and took my seat here, I began to wonder if, in fact, the resolution had come up after listening to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa West. He spoke of pessimism abroad as far as Canada's future trade developments are concerned, and I find it hard to justify that remark or agree with it in any measure. Perhaps it was just the labouring of other political remarks he made. The hon. member also suggested that the great Liberal party had been responsible for everything—I suppose as part of the process commonly emanating from those benches—an attempt to rewrite the history of Canada and leave notable periods out.

Fortunately, the present political situation in Canada has corrected a good deal of that way of thinking. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) spoke of the need for capital goods, in particular, and I expected him to go on and mention the concessions that have been made and the encouragement provided in the West Indies with respect to the types of industry guaranteed to promote employment in that area, and certainly here is a field in which Toronto manufacturers and particularly producers of capital goods are finding interesting new prospects. Another thing which struck me about the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East is that he used what has hitherto been a nasty word in that quarter of the house, the word "diversion".

He spoke of it in a most favourable way. I notice that the hon. member is looking rather puzzled. He will recall his quotation from the Financial Post in which it was proposed to divert purchases from the United States to Canada.

Mr. Winch: I was quoting from the Financial Post.

Mr. McGee: But you seemed pleased about it. The remarks of the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) were, I thought, most appropriate and fitting as most of his contributions to the debates of this house during my experience have been. The suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) concerning the eleventh province I find very attractive. A very good friend and sometimes a political companion of mine at the university referred to presented to the federation on behalf of Canada a chair which had once been the property of Sir John A. Macdonald, which greatly added to the spirit of that occasion. I refer, of course, to the gesture by Professor Ian L. Campbell.

One aspect of the relationship of Canada to the West Indies which was not touched upon and which I expected would be raised —and I anticipate it will be dealt with by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, he having had it within his purview over the years—is the question of immigration and immigration quotas from that area. Overpopulation has been mentioned by one or two speakers thus far in this debate. I would suggest to the government that it review the question of immigration quotas from that area. I think this would do far more than many other friendly gestures made to the federation to promote a feeling of good will, and the promise of future good relations between Canada and the West Indies.

Referring again to Toronto, the hon. member for Ottawa West implied that nothing was being done concerning trade with the West Indies and that the situation was static. I should like to point out that certainly in my experience that is not the case. The volume of correspondence I have had from businessmen in Toronto inquiring about trade possibilities in the West Indies certainly gives the lie to that statement. I suppose that my friends in the corner, the lonesome eight, will be a little chagrined to know that the spirit of free business enterprise is stepping into the gap and providing its own incentive in this matter without the benefit of government boards and similar bodies. There have been a number of businessmen in the Toronto area making investigations of the possibilities as far as exports to the West Indies are concerned.

The quotation I should like to place on the record in concluding my remarks is taken from the publication entitled "Foreign Trade", October 26, 1957 issue. It deals with business conditions in the Caribbean. I should like in particular to refer to a paragraph entitled, "Investment Opportunities Worth Study" which reads as follows:

> The most pressing need for these islands is capital for development and know-how and there are a number of opportunities for investment that might appeal to Canadian businessmen. Among them are building and running hotels or other types of accommodation for tourists in all of the islands; small industries processing local produce into jams, preserves, chutney and sauces, canned fruits and fruit juices; leather tanning; cocoa and chocolate manufacture; poultry farming to supply eggs and dressed fowl, and fibre processing.

This is the key paragraph:

> Canadians with money to invest should take a pleasure-cum-business trip down to appraise the situation at first hand.

This is the type of thing which I mentioned as having been greatly activated during the last year. I continue:

> The various governments welcome such visits and provide all the pertinent information on income tax concessions to pioneer industries and on the co-operation they are prepared to give. Included in this is the duty-free entry of capital equipment necessary to get the projects started.
> Canadians who wish to establish a business in an area with a year-round summer climate should turn their attention to the British West Indies. They will find great good will towards Canadians, the result of a long and mutually profitable association.

In looking to the future of the British West Indies, particularly in light of the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway which will so soon be upon us, I see every indication of tremendously increased development in exports from Canada consistent with the policies of this government in matters of trade.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a few observations I should like to make about this motion. This is the second private members' day of the session and I felt it would perhaps be inappropriate for one who had once occupied the treasury benches to put himself forward while there were new members who wished to take part in the debate. I have therefore been waiting in the hope that perhaps by listening to the new members my own speech would be greatly shortened and I think it will be because there seems to be agreement, at least among all those who have spoken, about the desirability of supporting the motion which the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) introduced so effectively this afternoon.

I have no thought or intention of introducing a note of controversy in this matter. I hope that before this sitting day is over the house will register approval of this motion. I do not mean to suggest that we should have a division and indeed I would hope that would not be necessary. It is my hope that we will formally adopt the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa West.

The motion merely asks us to say:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of establishing free trade between Canada and the Federation of the West Indies.

If we were all to approve formally of this motion I do not believe it would impose any obligation upon the government to do anything forthwith except to give active consideration to this question which I hope and am inclined to believe the government is doing already. I have some hope in that respect from what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) himself in presenting his estimates. One section of the presentation given by the minister which I found very sympathetic was what he said about West Indian trade, and I should like him to know that.

I think it might be a good idea for this house to pronounce itself in favour of this proposition at this particular time in this particular session since we know there is to be a conference in Montreal in September of the commonwealth countries at which the Federation of the West Indies is to be represented, I understand, by observers, but where there will be presumably the leading figures from the West Indian federation present who will be not only taking part in those deliberations but will be having an opportunity to meet and talk once more with leading members of the government and our officials.

We know, of course, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) was one of the three members of the government who represented this country at the inauguration of the parliament of the federation only a very short time ago, and I am sure that most of those in the Federation of the West Indies who have the responsibilities, which are as the hon. member for Ottawa West and I think every subsequent speaker pointed out, still diffused through the federation and not concentrated in the federal government or federal parliament, for trade matters, will be present.

I of course agree with what the hon. member for Ottawa West said about the trade agreement of 1926, which is still the agreement which governs our trade relations with the West Indies federation. While I agree that it was a great step forward at that time, I think nearly all of us who have had any familiarity with the problems of trade with that area in recent years, particularly in the last year or two, have reached the conclusion that that agreement is out of date; that it no longer covers the kind of trading conditions that have to be met in this world in which we are faced with an increasing trade war between the communist world and the free world, and with an increased tendency toward the formation of trade blocs even in the free world.

Preferences alone are obviously not good enough. That does not mean to say for a moment I am suggesting that the historic preferences should be done away with; far from it. What I feel is, if we are to increase our trade with the West Indian federation, which is already a considerable part of the total trade of Canada—as has been pointed out several times they are our second best customer in the commonwealth and the tenth best customer in the world—if we are to increase that trade substantially and as rapidly as we would like and to meet the kind of competition which, as I pointed out the other day on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has already done us out of the market for fish in Jamaica, we will obviously have to take other steps more in line with the modern conditions. I am sure the government is giving consideration to those steps.

There is one note of warning that I had rather expected and had rather thought the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), who spoke a little while ago, might have sounded himself when he was speaking. He quoted an earlier statement by Mr. Johnson, the secretary of the Canadian Atlantic salt fish exporters association. I interrupted him and drew attention to the statement which was made by Mr. Zwicker, the president, and Mr. Johnson, the secretary, of that association which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on July 12. I am not going to take the time of the house by reading it, but there is one point in it that does deserve careful consideration. We have a very big market for salt fish in the Caribbean area outside the British West Indies, in Cuba, in Puerto Rico and in the Dominican Republic and I believe now to some degree in Panama. We value that market. Over the years it has been a very good market and, by taking steps that might seem to be of an unfair or discriminatory nature, we do not want to take any risk of losing it. It is something that I know the government would keep very much in mind in any arrangements it might make for the increase of trade with the British West Indies; but we do want also to maintain and to expand our trade with those other Caribbean areas and particularly to maintain a fish market without which, of course, the fishing industry would be in a very depressed state indeed.

I think, too, that most of us—and the hon. member for Ottawa West made this pretty clear in what he said—would agree that it is not by tariff action mainly that we would achieve the kind of results we would hope to see achieved. That, I imagine, is why the hon. member for Ottawa West phrased his motion the way he did that the government should consider the advisability of establishing free trade rather than establishing a free trade area. If he had used the phrase a "free trade area", which has a certain technical connotation, it might have seemed rather more restrictive and exclusive than I think or hope he had in mind. What I think he had in mind was that he would like to see at any rate as an ultimate goal the removal of all tariffs between Canada and the British West Indies but that he would like also to see—and certainly speaking for myself I would like to see—us take other and more positive measures for the promotion of a greater flow of trade and a freer flow of trade between Canada and that area.

Now, I did make a suggestion on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which I believe it would be trespassing on the time of the house now to repeat in any detail today. I would just remind hon. members that what I suggested was that the Canadian National West Indies Steamships, if the government had reached a firm conclusion—as they say they have—not to attempt to have them operated under Canadian registry by Canadian National Railways any longer; if that decision cannot be changed—of course, we would like to see it changed; we would like to see them operate under the Canadian flag, as we intended to operate them if we had remained in office—but if the Canadian government's decision—I do not want to be controversial about this—seems to be that it is irrevocable, then I suggest they give very serious consideration to retaining the ownership of those ships but transferring them under some mutual aid arrangement to the Federation of the West Indies, to be operated on the same service, or at least over the same area, from the West Indies to Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was recalling the suggestion I made to the government on Saturday that they give consideration to the possibility of maintaining title to these Canadian National (West Indies) ships, and transferring them under some kind of mutual aid or other similar arrangement to the West Indies federation, in order that these shipping services might be preserved between Canada and the West Indies. I know that there might be some difficulties about the operation for the first year or two under this arrangement, but looking to the steadily rising population both there, and we hope in Canada, and to the expansion of trade we could reasonably anticipate over the years it should not be very long, if they could be reasonably efficiently operated, before these ships would be carrying a considerably increased volume of goods between the two areas. Of course, there is no real use in talking about the expansion of trade between these two areas which are geographically a long way apart across the water, unless there is reliable and efficient and reasonably cheap transport.

I did mention the other day the speech that was made by the head of the Atlantic Acadia sugar refinery at Saint John, New Brunswick, in which he pointed out, I assume correctly, that the freight rate from Jamaica to Saint John was 46 cents and to the St. Lawrence 50 cents. This, in itself, was a very considerable factor that had to be weighed by this company in deciding whether it could continue its operations in Saint John. It does seem to me, that anything we can do to prevent the removal of this historic industry from Saint John would be, if it could be justified at all in relation to the cost, well worth doing. We know that there are a number of industries in the maritime provinces which depend upon the refining of sugar in those provinces for their raw materials in their own fabrication. I am thinking of such a firm as Ganong's, for example.

It did occur to me that it might be possible, if these ships were operated from the West Indies to Saint John, from Saint John to Halifax, and from Halifax to St. John's, then directly back to the West Indies, this would be the shortest route they could take to cover all those areas. It would be the route in which, so far as one can see now, there would be the maximum amount of traffic. It may very well be that with this new piggy-back development in the railways, and with reasonable refrigeration in these ships, some new developments in the transportation of fruit and vegetable from the West Indies would make them more competitive. Commodities of that sort, which depend on a reasonable degree of speed in getting to the market, logically would be shipped to Saint John and transported by rail to central Canada from there, thus reversing some of the trends that have been all too prevalent in our transportation in the past.

I cannot forbear, mentioning again the feeling that is quite universal in Newfoundland, that some means should be found to equalize the freight on salt fish between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland on the one hand and the West Indies on the other. Unhappily today most of the Newfoundland fish has to be shipped to Halifax and transshipped there, thus adding very considerable to the cost of transporting Newfoundland fish and reducing the return to the producer of the fish. It had been the hope of many of us that the West Indies steamships, if they had continued to operate, would have operated out of St. John's, Newfoundland. Of course on the route between Halifax and Saint John and St. John's, Newfoundland, there is always lots of freight in the form of, manufactured goods of one kind and another, going to the Newfoundland market.

I want to turn next to what after all has been, in the years since the war, the principal obstacle to the expansion of our trade to the degree we would like to have seen it expand with the West Indies. I refer to the exchange controls and the dollar shortage in the sterling area. This problem has resulted in the restriction particularly of the exports of manufactured goods from Canada to the West Indies. I was rather surprised to hear what the hon. member for Vancouver East

(Mr. Winch) said this afternoon in his otherwise admirable speech. I cannot believe that he could have been correctly informed when he said the Jamaicans and other British West Indians were clamouring for things to buy in Canada. Although there has been some considerable easing in those restrictions, thanks to repeated representations made by the previous government and the present government, there is still, as I understand it, a good deal of difficulty about the free entry of our goods into this area because of exchange controls.

It has seemed to me that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) put his finger on this problem in a speech he made in the house on January 7, 1958, as reported at page 2970 of Hansard. These sentences were quoted by the hon. member for Ottawa West in introducing this motion, but I should like to quote them again because I want to speak particularly about one aspect of the matter. What the Leader of the Opposition said was:

> Perhaps it would be worth considering whether we cannot tie that new part of the commonwealth—

He was referring to the West Indies.

> —as it soon will become, more closely economically and financially, to our own country, Canada, by exploring the possibility of free trade between the West Indies and Canada, or a freer trade area, and by tying up our two currencies—

It is this I want to emphasize at the moment.

> —which would encourage trade and transport between us.

We all know, of course, that the fact that Newfoundland, for many years before confederation, was within the Canadian monetary system did have an enormous effect in maximizing the trade between Newfoundland and Canada. We also know that when, because of the completion of confederation in 1949, Newfoundland came within the Canadian customs area, that trade increased at least fourfold in a very few years. Since Newfoundland was, before confederation, one of Canada's largest and most valuable customers, we can see clearly how the removal of barriers of this sort does, in fact, promote trade.

I will admit it would be difficult to contemplate bringing the West Indies within the Canadian monetary system without our accepting some responsibility at the same time for the governmental deficits which are likely to exist in that area during the first few years of the federation. But I would remind hon. members that if we do not bear the burdens of these deficits, the British will have to bear them. As long as the British government and the British taxpayers are expected to bear that burden, it is not unreasonable for them to claim, in compensation for it, that they should have the kind of control they now exercise over the external trade of that area.

While I should not like to express a categorical view about this matter, it seems to me that it would be worth the while of the government and particularly of the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—the minister who has charge of maximizing our external trade—to make a careful study of what would be likely to be accomplished by bringing this area within the Canadian monetary system and at the same time accepting some of the responsibility that the British government is now accepting for the potential deficit of the government of that area.

We all know, of course, that for years Canadian banks have been operating in the British West Indies, and doing so very well. The fact that this area represents a tenth of our customers is in no small part owing to the initiative taken by the Canadian banks in going into this area. We also know that undoubtedly the greatest need of the West Indies area, like that of every other undeveloped area in the world, is the need for additional capital.

I must say that I was particularly pleased to hear the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) this afternoon join with other members who have spoken and with other members from Newfoundland in supporting the proposal which I believe was first made by the premier of Newfoundland at the time the Gordon commission was sitting in that province namely that we should have in Canada a little Colombo plan or something of that sort for the West Indies. It seems to me that there is no other area in the world from which Canada could gain so much, directly and indirectly, as it could from this area with a plan of that sort.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) this afternoon raised the very thorny question of the overpopulation of this area. It is true, of course, that the population in the West Indies has grown by leaps and bounds. There are over 3 million within the federation at the present time. The fact that there is not enough industrial development means that there is in this area a lack of opportunity for employment for that number of people. However, I think the only effective and helpful way of finding employment for those people in that area is from greater capital development. It seems to me that if Canada could take the lead in this field we could, directly and indirectly, secure a great return for any investment that was made, either publicly or privately, as long as it was wisely done.

This is one vision which I would commend to the government and particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is a vision that has always attracted the Canadians in the Atlantic provinces. I should like to remind the house of these facts. The West Indian market is vital to the fish producers of Canada. Though the West Indian market is extremely important to other producers of raw materials such as lumber, wheat and potatoes; the biggest of our exports to the West Indies, when trade is relatively free, is in manufactures. Hence it would not be just for the Atlantic provinces or for Saskatchewan that this market, if it could be expanded, would be a good thing; it would also be good for the great manufacturing area of central Canada, as was rightly pointed out by the hon. member for York-Scarborough when he made his contribution to the debate.

It seems to me that there is, of course, another area in that same region that we must take into account in any proper long range plans for the development of the British West Indies. I refer, of course, to Demerara or British Guiana. This area is certainly not overpopulated. It has a great area with vast resources barely tapped. When I was minister of citizenship and immigration, in discussion with one of the ministers from Demerara, I learned that the authorities there do not feel that they are overpopulated. What they feel is that they are starved for capital. They look upon that great country—and it is a great country with a huge area many times that of all the British West Indies—as a potential field for a marriage between capital from North America and settlers from the West Indies. In any large long range plans for the development of this area and for the development of freer trade, I feel that our relations with Demerara and the relations of Demerara with the federation would require to be taken into account. In Demerara there is a vast hinterland and in the West Indies there are people who are nearest to it and who are already adapted to living in that part of the world.

I feel that in the whole field of external trade there is perhaps no more imaginative conception than that of bringing this whole area not merely within the trade orbit but within the financial and economic orbit of Canada. As has been pointed out over and over again in this debate on both sides of the house, in all quarters of the house, there is hardly a commodity produced in this area that is competitive with anything produced in Canada. They need our products and we need theirs. It is one of those rare things, an almost perfect combination. Moreover, there is a long tradition going back at least a couple of centuries and perhaps more; although perhaps when we go back beyond two centuries we would not want to revive some of the trade that existed at that time; but for two centuries there has been the kind of trade that we should like to see extended. There have been personal relationships between Canadians, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, and the people of the West Indies which play a large part in the development of trade.

There is, of course, the banking system of Canada already there. There is a long and excellent record of work done by the trade commissioner service of our own government. There are the constant visits back and forth. There are the thousands—and I am sure I do not exaggerate in using that word—of students who over the years have come from that area to attend our universities, some of whom, of course, get a taste for living in Canada when they come here and do not want to go back. None of us can blame them for that. But if we could do something to make the economic climate in that region such that these people would want to go back to develop a great new country for their own people, it seems to me that we would have there a conception of something that would be mutually fruitful both to us and to them.

These are some of the reasons. As I said when I began, I do not want to take an undue amount of time in repeating things that have been said just as well, if not better, by other members, some of them newcomers in the house. Once again may I say this. Perhaps it will not make much difference one way or another to the government of Canada whether or not we pass this resolution because the members of the government are, I believe, considering this problem anyway. It is inevitable that they are considering it and I think from the hints given to us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce they are seriously considering it, but it does seem to me that it would not have much effect one way or the other, so far as the government is concerned, if we pass this motion. But its effect on the country, particularly on the Atlantic provinces, in offering new hope to our people would infuse new vigour into the old search for mutual trade. It would also offer great hopes to the people of the Federation of the West Indies. This would be particularly so if the parliament of Canada unanimously adopted a resolution of this character. I am sure this would greatly strengthen the arm of the minister when he meets these people face to face in September, true, it will be in a rather unofficial capacity, but still he will meet them face to face. I have reference, of course, to the conference in Montreal at which time he would be able to say to them, "I can talk to you frankly and freely because I know from the sentiments expressed on both sides of our parliament that we really want to do everything we can to develop closer economic ties and freer trade and we are willing to do everything necessary to realize this objective."

I think, having said this, that I should now take my seat in the hope that the debate will not be prolonged beyond the end of the present sitting and that we may unanimously register our approval of this proposition, which I am happy to say has so far found no dissenter in the house.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wonder if I might ask the hon. member a question. May I say that I agree he has made some very good points in regard to the sugar situation but I would particularly like to know in reference to his comments on the difference in the rates for water transportation between the West Indies and Saint John and the West Indies and Montreal on raw sugar, if he will not admit that the federal government really has little, if any, responsibility in this matter at the present time?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not want to get into any kind of argument with the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) on this subject because, to be quite honest about it, I do not know the answer to his question. I suspect, of course, that the rates set on the Canadian National ships, would be within the control of the Canadian government but the rates about which Mr. Hill the head of this company, was talking were probably not on Canadian National ships. I do not know who set them or upon what basis they were set. As I made quite clear both on Saturday and today, I do not even know for sure whether Mr. Hill's facts were correct and I do not pretend to have verified them. I suspect they are correct and I suspect they are probably set to be, in some degree, competitive but it would not be the first time that things had been done in a positive way by the Canadian government in order to overcome some of our disadvantages in the realm of transportation in the Atlantic provinces. Even if the government were to intervene—at least for a time—to set a rate which would be competitive, I am not sure that I would not perhaps be inclined to vote for that subsidy with perhaps a little more enthusiasm than with respect to others which from time to time we are called upon to approve in this house in order to keep the balance of the Canadian economy.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I ask the hon. member how the federal government could intervene in respect to private shipping rates?

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I might remind the hon. member for Saint John-Albert that the federal government intervenes very effectively in private shipping rates through the Maritime Freight Rates Act. That analogy is not, in my opinion, very wide of the mark.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): But this is water shipping.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know that there is any real difference in principle between having a subsidy on shipping on water rather than on land. Indeed I would have thought there were many and hoarier precedents for subsidies on water transportation than there were on land transportation.

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, in making this, my maiden contribution in this house, I hope you will permit me to extend to you my congratulations on the unanimous election to your position of first commoner. I do not want to have this remark on the record as a mere formality because, from my own observation since the opening of the session on May 12 last, I know that you fill your position with evidence of great character, with great tact, with ability to understand and to speak fluently in both languages used in this house and in a manner which brings confidence to a new and trembling member rising for the first time in this chamber. I know, sir, from my own observations that I shall receive from you guidance and, when necessary, discipline, which I will willingly accept. I would also at this time like to congratulate the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Sevigny) and the Deputy Chairman (Mr. Rea).

I do not intend to refer to all the things I have ferreted out in the library and from information obtained from the Department of Trade and Commerce, from the many periodicals at which I have looked and from the information already placed on the record. I do not think it is necessary to be on one's feet all the time permitted in order to accomplish one's objective and in so far as the facts which have been placed on the record with respect to this particular resolution are concerned, I am hoping that those facts will reduce the length of time during which I shall have to burden the house.

Coming from Regina, however, I was excited by this resolution because it had to do with trade, and I think it goes without saying that whether one is a Tory, a Liberal or a member of the C.C.F. trade is of paramount interest to all western members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. More: Our economy in the west demands that we be a trading nation and for many years the symbol of that economy has been the grain elevator. The horizons of western Canada today, I am glad to say, are changing because we now have in company with these grain elevators oil derricks and to that extent our economy has been diversified and further stabilized.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the contributions with respect to this resolution. I wish to say quite frankly that when I first read the resolution and I realized that its sponsor came from a party which had been in power for 22 years I was very suspicious of it, suspicious as to the reason why it had been placed on the order paper at this time, and of the language in which it had been placed there. This was because for years I have not heard of Liberal members speaking in support of free trade but now that the Liberal party is out of office and sitting in the opposition benches its members are, one might say, taking their first opportunity to speak in support of free trade. This is when they have no responsibility as a government and when they can hit the press with big headlines and endeavour to maintain that old bogey that the Tory party is the party of high tariffs and the Liberal party is the party of free trade. That is something with which I completely disagree and I have been doing some research on this subject—

Mr. Pickersgill: You will need it.

Mr. More: I do not need perhaps to do too much more research work, and I hope to have an opportunity in the not too distant future to put on record the facts in connection with tariffs in Canada, the facts as to which party is the party of high tariffs and which is the party of low tariffs. To me it seems to be just common sense that tariffs should neither constitute a merit to one party or a demerit to another. All parties who have held power in this parliament of Canada have at times imposed tariffs, and over the years the tariff structure has grown; it is not, of course, just because we have had a Liberal government for these last 22 years. But I will not take up the time of the house now by going into this question. If I did go into detail I think I could put on record a story very different from the one we hear from time to time.

The part of this resolution which excited me, as I said, was the part dealing with trade, and that is what I want to speak about because I come from a city which is a great trading centre of the prairies, the queen city of the prairies. I do not see the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) in his place, but I think it is the fastest growing city, percentage-wise of population, and it depends for its economic well-being on agriculture and on trade. In my researches I found that wheat flour plays a considerable part in the trade between Canada and the West Indies. It was hard to get exact figures. Certainly I do not pretend that my figures are correct as applied to the West Indian federation as it exists today. I found, while I was doing research, that many others were doing research too and that material which I needed was in the hands of others, and probably material which others needed was in my hands. But in regard to wheat flour, I found that in 1953 Canada exported 2,183,872 bags to the islands of the West Indies, while in the same year the United States exported 413,833 bags. In 1955, 2,147,047 bags entered from Canada and 1,195,000 from the United States. In 1957, 1,504,250 were exported from Canada and 1,760,969 from the United States.

It is easy to talk about this being a traditional market. In many instances, over the years, the tastes and requirements of the West Indies have changed, and that in turn has brought about changes in the amounts and values of some of these goods which they import from Canada. But as against a diminishing desire for some products there has been an increasing desire for wheat flour. In 1955, the market, according to the figures of exports from Canada and the United States alone, increased by 744,342 bags. The Canadian share of this market dropped by 36,825 bags and the United States share increased by 781,167 bags. In 1957, according to the figures I found, there was a decrease in the market, compared with 1955, of 76,828 bags. Canadian sales decreased 642,798 bags. United States sales in that same year increased by 565,969 bags despite the decrease in the overall market. Inasmuch as the figures indicate there is still a desire among the people of the West Indies for wheat flour, I would point out that we still have wheat in great surplus; we want to dispose of it to any market that requires it, provided we can trade honourably. Even though small quantities are concerned, we cannot afford to lose this opportunity.

I thought the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) made a very fine contribution to this debate. It seemed to me, in the course of his remarks, that it was notable that he probably does not agree with the precise wording of the resolution, because he seldom—perhaps only once or twice—spoke about free trade. In the main he used the phrase "freer trade". It seems to me it is impossible, by any unilateral action, to have free trade. It is probably impossible for bilateral action to ensure it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question? Did he fail to hear me when I said I should like to see tariffs between us wiped out.

Mr. More: Yes, but I gathered from all your contributory remarks that you figured it was quite impossible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am much more hopeful than that.

Mr. More: The hon. gentleman served in a government which was in power for many years, and he has witnessed the decline in Canadian flour exports, and I thought he was being more realistic. And now he is trying to disturb my remarks and draw me off the track.

I say in all seriousness that this is one instance where the agricultural people of the prairies can come here with a sound case and ask for co-operation and consideration from all people in Canada. We need this market for this flour, and, as I understand it, with one exception we have always shipped the very best grade of flour to this market. In the first instance the market demand was a demand for baking flour which was used by the industry there. Then the people began to buy what is called counter flour, and used it for making bannocks or whatever they might call them. Now, the United States is, I understand, supplying to that market a grade which they do not even offer on their own market, and they do it on a subsidized basis.

I wish to commend this government for standing up and tackling the problem which the United States disposal policy has presented in the traditional markets of Canada, and I do not know any more pointed example than this putting forward of a special grade of flour on a subsidized basis, as is done in this market. The loss of sales to Canada is certainly something to be alarmed about. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) quoted from a Canadian Bank of Commerce letter dated March 2, 1958. I think it is interesting that the hon. member should have quoted from that bank letter, because in my research I found—though it is possible that I may not be correct—that the first Canadian branch bank to be opened in the West Indies was established by the Canadian Bank of Commerce in 1889. I have quoted figures which show a decrease in Canadian participation in the wheat flour market of the West Indies. But statistics also show that Canada still continues to be a better customer of the West Indies than the United States. It has been mentioned in the course of this debate that we give a preference of $1 on sugar, whereas I understand the United States does all it can to keep that sugar out. I point out to hon. gentlemen opposite, that good intentions alone will not give us this market. If it did, then I say we would have a bigger proportion of the Canadian wheat flour market because, according to my figures, we have maintained a better and larger ratio of imports from the West Indies than has the United States.

I have been disappointed in the debate on this point. The debate has been brought forward in a rather mild form of generalization by the hon. member who presented the resolution. Nowhere in the debate has any indication been given as to what would be the attitude of the West Indies toward a proposal of free trade with Canada. Surely to goodness if this resolution means all that it says it does it should be based on the benefits that accrue which would be mutually shared by both parties. Nowhere in the debate has this been mentioned.

There was much meat in the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. We have a new federation within the commonwealth bestirring itself, seeking to be established and coming to the fore. This opens a great vista in the opinion of those of us who believe in trade. I am sure that is the view of all hon. members without regard to political affiliation and I am sure it is the desire of all of us to take the greatest possible advantage of it. I am sure this cannot be done by this government alone nor can it be done by any government alone. To take the fullest advantage of it will require the complete co-operation of government, business, and indeed all individuals and producers alike.

I do not wish to prolong the debate and I have no further information to place on the record but before winding up my short presentation I wish to comment on one thing that was said by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) who proposed the resolution which rather struck my fancy. I do not know if in fact anything can be perfect but the hon. gentleman said that this resolution is politically perfectly timed. We are about to witness the birth of a new federation within the commonwealth and if the hon. member had gone a little further I would say that I completely agree with his remark that the resolution is politically perfectly timed because today we have in power on the treasury benches a government which is dedicated to expanding trade. We have a Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) who is ever watchful and eager to seize any proper opportunity to expand Canada's trade. I know that we can depend on him to bring forward a policy that will benefit not only Canada but the Federation of the West Indies, soon to be a new member of the commonwealth.

To that degree and with that qualification I agree fully with the proposer of this resolution and it would have my support if he had phrased it a little differently. But I am suspicious of this resolution being proposed on the subject of free trade by a member of the party to which the hon. member for Ottawa West belongs. If he had proposed that this government be alert and use its efforts for expanding trade between Canada and the West Indies I could support the resolution 100 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, you cannot expect miracles.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the hon. member a question before he takes his seat. He made a certain reference with respect to the growth of Canadian cities. I wonder if he would be kind enough to give us the source of that information?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is wholly out of order.

An hon. Member: How do you spell "wholly"?

(Translation):

Mr. Rodrigue Bourdages (Laval): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to tell you that it is with some misgivings that I rise to speak in this house. Having been elected for the first time on March 31st last, I know that I am necessarily lacking in experience but the wish to serve the voters of my riding of Laval, who put their trust in me, is giving me the confidence any representative of the people has to feel to remain worthy of the name.

Mr. Speaker, the matter now before us must be of interest to all Canadians. Indeed, trade with another country is considered an important part of our economy, and I believe it is not too soon to say to hon. members that I am in favour of free trade with that country, if we take essential precautions for the protection of both nations.

However, before proceeding any further, I should like, if I may, recall briefly the historical background of the trade agreements between Canada and the West Indies. I read this from an article which appeared in Foreign Trade, a fortnightly publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In this issue of January 4, 1958, Miss M. V. McCormick, of the international trades relation branch writes as follows:

Canada has a long history of trade with the West Indies, stretching back well over 200 years. We have sold them principally flour, fish, other foodstuffs, and lumber; they have sold us sugar, molasses, lumber, spices and tropical fruits. In recent years the trade has taken on a more varied complexion: bauxite, alumina and petroleum have been coming to us from the West Indies and we have been sending them a wide variety of manufactured goods.

In the last twenty years this trade has grown in size as well as in scope. Just before the Second World War the total trade with the West Indies, both imports and exports, reached $33 million. By 1956, it had increased to $113 million, with our exports to the West Indies totalling $49 million and our imports from the islands $64 million. Figures for the first nine months of 1957 show exports to the West Indies at $35 million and imports from the West Indies for the first six months of 1957 at $40 million, a substantial rise over the 1956 figure.

The close trading relations between Canada and the British West Indies over the years are the result of several factors. The economies of the two areas are largely complementary and the areas themselves are not far apart, geographically speaking. In addition, three successive trade agreements have provided a framework for the building-up of this trade.

At the turn of the century, the British West Indies lost its sugar market in the United States and became interested in the possibility of selling sugar in Canada instead. At that time, total Canada-B.W.I. trade had an annual value of less than $5 million and both sides wanted to increase it. This feeling, plus the desire for Empire solidarity within the Imperial Preferential Tariff system, paved the way for the first Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement of 1912.

The 1912 agreement gave Canada preferential rates of duty of four-fifths of the general tariff on specified goods and provided that some British West Indian products, notably sugar, would receive corresponding preferential treatment in Canada. In 1920, this agreement was replaced by a broader one under which preferences applied to all dutiable goods on both sides, with a few exceptions. Canada gave the British West Indies a tariff preference of 50 per cent on all dutiable articles other than tobacco, cigars, cigarettes and spirituous or alcoholic liquors.

A third and more extensive trade agreement, the one now in force, was signed on July 6, 1925, and came into operation on April 30, 1927. This agreement broadened the exchange of preferences still further and made various special provisions for individual products and for individual colonies. It provided that import duties on Canadian products may not exceed certain percentages of the most-favoured-nation rates. These percentages vary in different colonies: for example, they may not exceed 50 per cent in Barbados, British Guiana and Trinidad, or 75 per cent in Jamaica. For a few other products—notably flour, dairy products, meat, fish, apples, potatoes and alcoholic beverages—specified margins of preference that were set forth in the agreement were granted to imports from Canada. In fact, virtually every product imported from Canada received some tariff preference.

For its part, Canada granted free entry to a number of British West Indian products and consolidated margins of preference on most dutiable imports, including sugar. The most important preference was that on raw sugar when imported by refiners for refining in Canada. The bound margin of preference on 96-degree sugar was increased to $1.00 per 100 pounds under the 1927 agreement, and other raw sugar imported by refiners received equivalent preferential treatment. Other important products on which Canada granted preferences were bananas, cocoa beans, rum, coffee and spices. In addition, Canada gave a general undertaking that the duty on all goods imported from the West Indies but not specifically enumerated in the agreement would at no time exceed 50 per cent of the general tariff of Canada.

This agreement was to remain in force for twelve years. However, because of the war it was renewed in 1939 for an indefinite period. It may be terminated on six months' notice.

As we can see, Mr. Speaker, the trade situation between Canada and the British West Indies is not too bad. On the other hand, I say that there is room for improvement and that Canada could find profit in intensifying this trade.

In the same publication, Mr. Rex Stollmeyer, trade commissioner for the British West Indies, British Guiana and British Honduras, in Montreal, writes this:

The hope that Canadians will avail themselves of investment opportunities and incentives in the British West Indies is based on three factors. In the first place, Canadian investment will contribute to Caribbean development and this in turn will increase trade and West Indian purchases of Canadian exports. Second, investment in the West Indies has particular advantages for Canadians. Hitherto investment in the small, fragmentary markets has not been attractive. Under customs union and free trade conditions in the next few years a British Caribbean market of three million will emerge, a circumstance which is already stimulating investment interest. Branch plants in the Carribbean could serve as bases for distribution within the area and to the adjacent Latin American countries. More important, plants established in these soft currency territories could serve other commonwealth areas without encountering the currency problems faced by home-based Canadian exporters. Another approach would be for semi-finished products to be sent to plants in the area for the final stages of manufacture.

Secondly, the tourist potentialities of the area are far from fully developed and in some territories are almost completely unexploited.

Finally, there is a persistent and considerable amount of Canadian interest in the British West Indies which has always lent grace to the trading relationship. The West Indies hopes soon to be the second Dominion in the New World, a development which ought to lead to a maturing of this long-established and reciprocated sentiment. Much has been said about the complementary nature of the two economies from the point of view of both trade and investment. Nothing could be more conducive to Canada-West Indies solidarity than that trade between the two areas should grow. This will require greater West Indian purchasing power through development. And Canada could contribute to that development through sustained imports from the area, an inflow of tourists, and the injection of investment capital in industrial development and the tourist trade.

However, before explaining the part played by Canadian capital in trade with the British West Indies, Mr. Stollmeyer had carefully recommended the following encouragement to investments:

Over-riding requirements for a viable West Indian economy (itself a prerequisite for autonomy) are capital and know-how. Currently the territories are making efforts of varying degrees of intensity to improve their agriculture, to encourage industrial development, and to stimulate the tourist trade. In the two latter fields, greater attention is being given to attracting capital from overseas. Several inducements are being offered to investors in industry. All the territories allow new or underdeveloped industries periods of freedom from income tax ranging from five to seven years, with duty-free import of plant, equipment and machinery for such "pioneer industries". In addition, some territories, notably Trinidad, offer special rates of depreciation following the "tax holiday"; these are calculated to ease the impact of income tax. Jamaica goes farther, with an Export Industry Encouragement Law which affords duty-free entry of raw materials in addition to the usual income tax and duty concessions to companies manufacturing solely for export. An International Business Companies Law provides perpetual freedom from income tax for business companies not trading in the British West Indies, British Guiana and British Honduras.

The tourist industry has become a major source of revenue, and particularly of dollars, for the British West Indies as a result of the great number of Canadians and Americans visiting the islands. Prospects for expansion are excellent. Promotion programs are constantly under way to increase the flow of tourists throughout the year. The tourist interests of all the territories are represented by the office of the trade commissioner in Montreal —with the exception of British Guiana, which has separate representation, and Jamaica, which maintains a tourist bureau in Toronto.

Recent years have brought great pressure on resort facilities in the British West Indies. Local investment in tourist accommodation has increased and considerable overseas capital has come into Jamaica and, to a somewhat lesser degree, into Barbados and Trinidad. The pace of investment in the area as a whole, however, has not been quick enough and some of the territories have passed incentive legislation aimed at encouraging it. Generally speaking, this legislation offers freedom from income tax during initial stages of operation, plus freedom from import duty on capital equipment. Three territories—British Guiana, Jamaica and Trinidad—publish attractive booklets describing development conditions and outlining inducements for investment in industry and the tourist trade.

Mr. Speaker, those are a few opinions I have gathered from authorities on the matter we are considering. I feel that if we read this material it will help us give better and fuller consideration to the matter of trade with the British West Indies in order that the greatest possible number of Canadians may benefit from this market which, in the long run, will prove very interesting for the whole of Canada.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): In rising on this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I am mindful, as have been the other members who spoke here this afternoon, of how important is our trade with the West Indies. In 1957 it provided the second largest market Canada had in the British commonwealth of nations, surpassed only by our exports to the United Kingdom. In 1956 we sold $49 million worth of products in the West Indies. In 1957 our export trade totalled over $61 million. This market is all the more important when it is recalled that about 85 per cent of the goods that Canada sells in the West Indies can be classed as manufactured or semi-manufactured. By comparison only 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the goods we sell to the United Kingdom are manufactured or semi-manufactured. As an example, we sell wheat to the United Kingdom, whereas we sell flour to the West Indies. About 10 per cent of all Canadian flour finds a market there. Other manufactured goods that we sell to the federation consist of boots and shoes, paint, small furniture, machinery, rubber goods, steel pipes and tubes, fittings and other similar products.

Many of our products which we find it more difficult to sell in the more highly developed parts of the world are able to find a market in the British West Indies because these islands are not yet industrialized and they are not attempting, so much as other countries, to protect home industries. Our trade with the West Indies is very important to every part of Canada. The west coast sells lumber and canned salmon; the prairies sell flour; Ontario and Quebec sell a large variety of manufactured goods. But the participation of so many maritime members in this debate today, is evidence of how important the Atlantic provinces regard this market. We, in the eastern provinces, think it holds a special attraction for us. At the moment we sell a large quantity of fish in the West Indies. Our sales have increased from about $900,000 in 1937, to $3.5 million in 1947 and to $6.1 million in 1955. We also find a market there for apples, potatoes and other foodstuffs, and for some manufactured products such as boots and shoes. We hope to be able to increase our sales and our present exports to the West Indies of these non-manufactured goods.

However, the great prospect so far as we are concerned of this West Indian market is a sale for manufactured goods as maritime industry expands. As hon. members all know, the chief problem that faces the Atlantic provinces today is the problem of industrialization. We must manufacture goods in our provinces, to provide employment there and to increase the gross product of our provinces. Before confederation, the Atlantic provinces could sell in two directions. They could sell to the people in the West Indies and to the cities of the United States; and, they could sell up the St. Lawrence to Ontario and Quebec. Indeed, prior to confederation we enjoyed a very favourable geographical position astride the main shipping lanes and water routes from Montreal and Quebec, to eastern United States cities and to the ports of the West Indies. The ports of Halifax and Saint John and Louisburg were midway ports where sailing ships could stop to be refitted and supplied. This was a very important trade in the early days of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Then, suddenly the east-west traffic that developed as a result of confederation cut off the advantage of the maritimes in this traffic between eastern United States and West Indian ports and Ontario and Quebec. When manufacturing capital came into Canada it came into the central provinces for the very simple reason that the more central location made it possible for factories there to sell east and west. At the same time the factories in the maritimes could not compete with the factories on the scene in Ontario and Quebec. Of course, the transportation edge that the central provinces had, meant the decline of industries that flourished in the maritimes before confederation, and an ever increasing lack of opportunity.

Any manufacturer who wishes to establish an industry, must first of all look to his local and domestic market to build up primary sales which are his "bread and butter". If he has a good local market where he is sheltered his primary profits at home will build up his capital and establish him. Then after his industry has had a chance to root he can look for wider markets in other areas to increase his profits. Our problem in the Atlantic provinces has been that we do not have a sufficient local market to allow our infant industries to root. They must, from the first, enter into the highly competitive Ontario-Quebec market.

In terms of this geographical situation the possibility of a market in the West Indies is a very interesting prospect for the Atlantic provinces. We are 1,000 miles closer to the West Indies markets than are the factories in the Montreal area; about 1,200 miles closer than the factories in eastern Ontario. We should be able to manufacture and sell goods to the 3.5 million people who live in the British West Indies cheaper than similar goods can be sold by other Canadian factories. We should be able also to bring goods to this market cheaper than they can be brought from the United Kingdom. It is true that the annual income of the people in the West Indies is not high. This market can absorb only a limited quantity of Canadian goods from any area. Nevertheless, added to the population of the Atlantic provinces, the 3.5 million people in this federation will greatly increase our chance of a sufficiently sheltered primary market to give industries in the eastern provinces an opportunity to develop.

It is certainly to the advantage of our Atlantic provinces in particular that Canada should develop trade with the West Indies federation, and that these islands should prosper and increase in wealth. It is obvious that Canada would be unable to compete in this West Indian market at all if it were not for the preferential tariff that we enjoy. United States factories can produce cheaper. They are closer, and without the preferential tariff assistance we could not place goods to any considerable degree in this West Indian market. Even now the value of the goods we sell there does not approximate what is being sold by United States industries. Every year the United States sells the islands considerably more manufactured goods than we do, despite our preferential tariff.

Our goods do find a market in the West Indies, because we have this preferential agreement and simply because we buy more goods from the West Indies than does the United States. Nearly 80 per cent of the exports of Barbados and 40 per cent of the exports of Jamaica consist of sugar and molasses. About 70 per cent of these products is purchased by the United Kingdom, and a large amount of the remaining 30 per cent is purchased by Canada.

Since 1903 the United States has given special tariff preference to Cuba, the Phillipines, Puerto Rico and Hawaii. When the West Indies were denied an American sugar market, they turned to Canada. Our trade with the Caribbean countries has stemmed from the fact that we have purchased their sugar. In recent years, of course, the discovery of bauxite deposits in British Guiana and later in Jamaica, from which most or a large part of the aluminum that is produced in Canada is made, greatly increased our trade with the West Indies.

There can be no question that we can greatly increase our exports to the British West Indies if we give proper care and attention to this market. In 1947 we sold $61 million worth of products in the British West Indies. By 1950 the value of our exports had fallen sharply to $21 million. The figure has been improving steadily since then but still at $51 million, it is far from the amount that we sold to the British West Indies in 1947. We should be able to improve our export position in the British West Indies very substantially yet.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree, as is proposed by the resolution, that we should eliminate or at least decrease our tariff with the British West Indies as a method of expanding our trade in that area. While I support the resolution, I am aware that there are great obstacles to its fulfilment. One of the difficulties, as has been mentioned, is the fact that the federation has not yet achieved a tariff agreement or a customs union and each of the islands still has its own customs system. To do business with the federation on that basis would be very difficult. The commission on trade and tariffs set up under the chairmanship of Sir William Croft has not yet submitted its findings as a result of its inquiry into the tariff and customs problems of the area. No doubt any move towards free trade with these islands would have to await the adoption of that report and the accomplishment of a customs union among the islands.

I also realize, Mr. Speaker, that it is doubtful that the islands or the British West Indies federation could remove all tariffs. As we all know these islands, like many other undeveloped areas, do not have the same tax sources to rely upon as we have. There is no substantial income tax possibility in the British West Indies and an important part of the revenue of each of the governments that administrates these islands is from tariffs and customs. It is very doubtful if they or even the federation could agree to eliminate all tariffs since such a large part of the revenue of the federation, as formerly to the governments of the islands, comes from tariffs and customs duties.

There is another very serious consideration as far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, that I recognize will have to be faced if this resolution were adopted. I refer to the fact that further or more complete free trade or a more complete trade union with the British West Indies federation could imperil other important markets we have in the Caribbean area. We have in Cuba and in other countries in that area important markets which we could possibly lose if we entered into an agreement with the British West Indies which made it too difficult for these other countries to sell to us. These markets, have to some extent been much more important to us than the British West Indies market. For example, while our fish exports to the British West Indies are important, we cannot afford to have our markets in the other islands there cut off.

In the three years from 1954 to 1956 our average fish sales in the Caribbean area totalled $14,096,000. Of this amount 62 per cent found markets in non-British Caribbean countries, while only 38 per cent was sold to the British West Indies. It can easily be seen that the 62 per cent we sell to non-British countries is too important a market as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned for us to take any risk of losing it or impeding it. Furthermore, our market in the non-British West Indies is oftentimes more lucrative than is our market in the British West Indies. As hon. members all know, over the last few years our sales of salt fish in the British West Indies have not been as lucrative as they could be or as they have been in non-British countries. The whole matter will have to receive serious study. I say, of course, that I support the resolution and that the matter of freer trade with the British West Indies is important not only to the Atlantic provinces but to all of Canada.

There is another thing that we must face with regard to trade with the West Indies. It is not simply a matter of our reducing or eliminating tariffs to see our trade suddenly increased tenfold with the British West Indies. The simple fact is that if we are going to have a larger trade with these islands we must be prepared to buy more from them. At the moment the chief disadvantage to trading with the islands is not so much tariffs as it is quotas limiting our sales to them. The islands' purchases of our products must be limited by our purchases from them. Despite the preferential tariff that we have, Canadian goods going into the West Indies meet a quota system that puts an arbitrary limit on the amount of goods that we can sell there. The only way in which we can conquer that difficulty is to assist the West Indies to find a larger market for goods in Canada.

In the case of molasses, ginger, nutmegs, lime juice and arrowroot, the colonies now sell to about half the Canadian market. They have half the market in regard to these products. But they supply only 10 per cent of our cocoa and less than 1 per cent of our coffee. We could greatly increase our purchases of coffee and cocoa, and of course we could greatly increase our purchases of bananas and citrus fruits. Prior to 1939 we bought half of our bananas from the British West Indies. The war, hurricanes and plant disease brought this trade to an end. Since the war, producers in Central America have captured the market here and efforts to reintroduce Jamaican bananas have been unsuccessful. The simple fact is that the large banana market that the West Indies once had in Canada was lost and the producers of bananas in that area do not now have the funds or the ability with which to build up in Canada a distribution system that could sell their bananas here. No matter how much we should like to help them in that regard, their products have to be warehoused and sold to the wholesaler and of course ultimately to the consumers. At the moment the banana market in Canada is tied up by a large United States complex that produces this product in Central America, and it would be quite a problem for the West Indies federation to increase its market in Canada for this very important product of the islands.

Mr. Speaker, over the last 200 years our trade and our relations with the British West Indies have been very important to Canada. We in the Atlantic provinces in particular are tied to them with friendly memories that are as old as the settlement of the Atlantic provinces and as old as the cities of the east. Our economies are not competitive. The products that they grow, such as citrus fruits and fruits of the tropical variety, are not products that we can grow here. We can provide a market here, if we wish to do so, for the products of the West Indies. At the same time the products that we grow in this temperate climate in Canada are not such as can be grown in the British West Indies. We should be able to find a greatly increased market there for products which they do not grow well and which are not indigenous to that climate. We should be able to increase our sales of potatoes, beef and many other similar products in the Caribbean area but it is most important that we should not think the only thing we need to do in order to increase our sales to the West Indies federation is to decrease or eliminate our tariffs.

The tariff is only a very small part of the problem. Before we can enter into a free trade relationship or greatly increase our trade with the federation it must have a chance to settle down, to form its customs union and to gain strength as a nation. A federation formed this year can hardly be expected all at once to achieve a solution to all the internal problems which it faces, many of which are an impediment to its trade with the outside world, particularly with Canada. We must wait, therefore, for many of these problems to be overcome.

The trade carried on between the West Indies and Britain is very vital to the federation. The grants and aid of the United Kingdom over the years have kept the island governments in revenue. We cannot expect to cut too sharply into the extensive trade between the islands and the United Kingdom until the federation has reached a point where it is more self-sufficient. Certainly I support this resolution and I feel it is greatly in the interests of Canada generally and in the interests of my part of the country in particular to see trade fostered and increased in that area. We should assist the new federation in any way we can and by so doing I believe we will be making a great investment for Canada.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the taller member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) has already taken part in this debate and I have no wish therefore, on the short end of the Tory ticket, to defer the consideration by the house of the resolution before us. There are, however, two observations I wish to make which I will illustrate with some factual material from one industry which I know has captivated the attention of many hon. members today. I have in mind the fisheries industry.

It seems to me that while the resolution in its present wording is attractive, here is a field in which we should make haste slowly. The institution of free trade cannot, alas, be brought about by resolutions and as the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan) has just pointed out, there are sizeable obstacles in the way of this particular resolution, primarily having to do with matters of currency but also with respect to the present negotiations within the West Indies for its own customs union. Without any finality in this respect we cannot anticipate an early or an agreeable settlement of the trade problems which exist between this country and the West Indies.

There are also important problems concerning the several branches of Canadian industry which are not supplementary to West Indies industry and which should be carefully considered before we advance too hasitly into something which may look at the moment and may in time prove to be attractive, but which at present has in its way many difficulties.

We on this side of the house are mindful of the fact that one of the surest tests of friendship—as we were reminded the other day in this very house by the President of the United States—is the capacity to speak frankly. While free trade between Canada and the West Indies may be desirable as a goal it ought not to be overlooked that there are problems to solve and if we intend to provide for the people of the West Indies that comradeship in the British tradition which they seek in a divided world and for which they have looked in the first instance to Canada, then we ought to be able to deal frankly and candidly with them in respect of our present trading problems.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in a very informative speech this evening mentioned many other matters including the desirability of a federal subsidy—if I understood him correctly—which would equalize the shipping costs on Newfoundland salt fish with that of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me. I did not suggest a subsidy for that purpose at all; I did suggest that if Canadian National steamships could be operated from Halifax and St. John's as well then presumably the rate would be equalized.

Mr. Morris: I am very sorry, I did misunderstand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the question of a subsidy came up in connection with the rate on sugar to Saint John in New Brunswick.

Mr. Morris: Yes, of course it did. I am sorry and I understand the clarification now made. However, the hon. member will agree that this matter of subsidies has been presented before, indeed recently in the other place, and I would like to refer to the St. John's Telegram of July 2, a newspaper with which I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is fully familiar, which quoted a political friend of his as having said in the other place that a federal subsidy is, in effect, desirable in order to equalize shipping costs. It is upon that point, in any event, which I wish to dwell at this moment.

I do not think it is widely understood that the matter of federal subsidies came up several times while the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships were operating. The equalization of freight rates from St. John's and Halifax to the Caribbean market might be a serious blow to Nova Scotia fish exporters and we would like to have this borne in mind with respect to consideration of future trade relationships between the two areas. It is, for instance, true that about 75 per cent, or perhaps more, of the salt fish we now process in Nova Scotia and export to the Caribbean actually originates in Newfoundland in its salt bulk state. This fish is brought into Nova Scotia as salt bulk fish at a very substantial freight cost to our exporters and, what is more, freight is required to be paid on each 165 pounds of wet produce which ultimately comes down to 100 pounds of dried fish. This great cost is an additional expenditure borne by the Nova Scotia salt fish dealer, so that we have a higher freight rate than Newfoundland has in respect of shipments of dried salt cod to the Caribbean, that is, higher via Halifax. Therefore equalization of freight rates such as suggested in the other place would, we think, put our Nova Scotia exporters or could put them at a very serious disadvantage in competing on fish sales to the Caribbean.

I do not think it is widely understood, furthermore, that the people of the West Indies are not the largest importers of Canadian fish in the Caribbean area. Perhaps the erroneous impression has been given this afternoon that the West Indies are Canada's most important salt and pickled fish market. The British West Indies are not Canada's most important salt and pickled fish market. That is, not in the Caribbean. In all, the non-British West Indies market takes about 60 per cent of Canada's salt and pickled dried fish.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman means "non-British" does he not?

Mr. Morris: I was just coming to that point. The non-British takes 60 per cent and the British portion takes only 40 per cent. That is, the percentage of our exports going to the British West Indies territories in the Caribbean is 40 per cent. Without taking into account the higher per capita earnings of the consumers and the higher standard of living in the various countries of the British West Indies or, if you wish, the entire Caribbean area, the combined population of the British West Indies is between three million and three and a half million. But the combined population of Cuba, Haiti, Puerto Rico, Panama and the Dominican Republic is over 15 million, and in advocating free trade with the British West Indies we should have regard to the fact that the total consumer population there is only one-fifth of the population of the non-British part of the Caribbean. Jamaica has traditionally been the largest of the British West Indian markets, with imports in the area of 17 million pounds of salt cod annually, and it is upon this point that I wish to dwell for a moment.

This Jamaican market involves a consumer price ceiling at the present time; a consumer price ceiling which, as far as the Canadian fisherman is concerned, prevents the normal laws of supply and demand from functioning. For instance, at this moment, while we are debating here, mackerel is in short supply on the Canadian east coast. Yet the Jamaican market, by imposing a consumer price ceiling, prevents the normal play of the law of supply and demand, and, in effect, deprives Canadian fishermen of the price increase which they would normally expect to result from the short supply reaching the market. This consumer price ceiling on the Canadian salt cod is a hand-down, a carry-over from the second world war, but it still exists; the price ceiling in Jamaica, has in fact, in recent months been lower than it was four or five years ago, so the law of supply and demand does not operate fully, and for years Canadian fishermen have not been able, when exporting to this consumer price ceiling market, to take normal advantage of short supplies. In addition, there was a single price for all five sizes of the product which we export.

Mr. Speaker, in assessing the desirability of moving toward a free trade complex with the West Indies I should like to suggest to the government that consideration be given to the fact that some hon. members feel that the maintenance of these price ceilings is not entirely compatible with the present preferential trade advantage which we give to such countries as Jamaica, for instance. We find, for example, that under the Canada-British West Indies trade agreement the Canadian import duty on raw sugar imported from Jamaica is now 28 cents per 100 pounds as compared with $1.28 per hundred pounds on sugar exported to Canada from such countries as Cuba and the Dominican Republic. I suggest that hon. members from Nova Scotia representing fishing groups such as exist in my own large constituency may well feel that granting this preferential trade, which I am sure is a desirable thing in the eyes of the mover of this resolution, to the British West Indies producers has in fact led to the curtailment of the sales of our Canadian salt and pickled fish in the Jamaican market. In 1926, before the Canada-British West Indies treaty was proclaimed, Canadian fish entered Cuba, for instance, at a duty of $1.30 per 100 kilos. In 1930, I find, Cuba raised the duty to $3 and increased it again two years later to $5.50. The rate of duty today is $4 per 100 kilos.

I should like to suggest to the government and to the minister who will be most concerned with this resolution before us that in considering what has been said here today he should take into account that if there is to be a continuation of preferential trade, or an expansion of it; if there is to be a continuation of the present tariff preferences by Canada to the West Indies, that these tariff preferences be bargained against the elimination of or the reduction in the number of consumer price ceilings on the product which we try to export. We think that there are discriminatory restrictive controls on the import into Jamaica of certain Canadian products. I have in mind, especially, the Jamaican ceiling on salt cod. And I believe it is true that instead of there being any widespread indication of a change in the attitude of the Jamaican government in regard to this matter, the government of Jamaica did in fact negotiate this year, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate well knows, for the purchase of 3,000 tons of salt cod from Iceland, and this after years of preferential treatment in our markets. This is a considerable amount, more than one-third of the normal importation of salt cod in Jamaica.

Some of us feel that it is not unreasonable to ask the government to consider, in extending preferential trade agreements or in continuing them in their present form, and having regard to the traditions of British fair play and British friendship and candour, to consider the fact that sometimes these preferential trade arrangements as steps along the way to free trade sometimes do not work out in practice as the words in the resolution suggest they will.

The association of fish dealers in Nova Scotia has computed that in 1956, the last year for which comparable statistics in all fields of trade were available, the total dollar value of all the salt and pickled fish that we Canadians sold in the Jamaican market alone ran to about $3,250,000. By virtue of the sugar preference alone, the Jamaican sugar industry received in preferential treatment what amounts to a figure over $2,500,000. That is more than would have been realized if, for instance, the $1 per 100 pounds preference had not existed; that is, if it had been eliminated entirely. One could say, expressing it another way,—although this probably suffers some of the exaggeration of brevity—that the Canadian government would have been worse off only to the extent of about $350,000 in that full calendar year 1956 if it had donated the salted and pickled fish that Jamaica purchased from Canada instead of giving the sugar preference at all. So that preferential trade has not always worked to the full advantage of the Canadian industry.

Nothing that I have said in giving this as one illustration is intended in any way to diminish the placidity with which this debate has been conducted today. It has been free of partisan rancour. We have all tried to give expression to what is foremost in our minds and that is the good of the people whom we were sent here to represent in the first place, and the good of all Canadians, in the second. If I have made any point at all it is the simple one of using the argument of the impact of trading relationships upon the industry in my area; indeed the desirability in these matters of making haste slowly.

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) that at some future time when he is considering the complex of trade delegations to markets as important to hon. members on all sides of the house as is Jamaica—which I understand according to the press a trade delegation may visit next February—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Has he seen the statement that was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce during the course of the discussion of his estimates when he offered us very great hope that the Jamaican situation was going to be cleared up? I am sure we all share that hope and none of us would want to say anything here that would make the minister's task more difficult.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of what the minister said here about the desirability and the imminence of an early improvement in the Jamaican relationship but surely the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does not suggest for one moment that this improvement in that relationship be achieved in the manner in which his group used to achieve satisfactory relations in the front benches by the imposition of censorship upon the back benches. I have made certain statements in the interests of my constituents. They are offered in the best of good faith. Since I am not a member of the treasury benches, nothing I could say could possibly do other than contribute to the fair and frank exchange of opinions. I am even prepared to suggest that what I said tonight may very well be wrong but it was not said with the intention of misleading the house nor in the belief that it was wrong. I have merely explained one transitory condition along the way to a desirable goal. This is of importance to me because it is of importance to my constituency—

Mr. Pickersgill: And also to mine.

Mr. Morris: —and to fishermen all along the coast. It is also important to Newfoundland fishermen—

Mr. Pickersgill: It certainly is.

Mr. Morris: —who have lost a goodly part of their market. By way of final comment I wanted to make a point which I believe the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made for me by his interjection and that is that the problem of international trade, like many other problems, cannot be solved satisfactorily by the glossing over of words. What is required is that in moving toward a more desirable and prosperous trade for our people and for all peoples we should have in mind that there are problems along the way, and that the satisfactory way to solve these problems between mutual and trusting friends is to do so frankly and in the open light of day.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, today we have heard speakers mostly from the eastern regions of Canada and perhaps hon. members would wonder why a member from western Canada should rise to speak on this particular subject. In reply to that question I would say that coming from a surplus producing region of this country—like hon. members from various other sections of western Canada—we have an inclination toward free trade or trade that is as free as possible because we fully realize that if we are to dispose of our surplus products we would prefer having not to contend with any artificial barriers, or as few as possible of these.

The resolution before us this evening strikes me as being rather premature and while I perhaps fully apprehend the motives of the hon. member who proposed the resolution I am wondering whether he has achieved his true intention, whether he wanted free trade with the Federation of the West Indies. I would have thought that the hon. member would have recognized that in the foreseeable future and until world economic and sociological conditions change such a goal would be unattainable.

There are certainly some very practical obstacles to free trade with the Federation of the West Indies and indeed with many other countries although we would perhaps be governed by the particular trading position we were in when deciding about the desirability of free trade of this kind. First of all there is the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Since we are tied in with many other Carribean countries—as is the United States which in particular has extensive interests in Central America and the Caribbean region—we could not possibly enter a free trade agreement without very wide and sweeping amendments to the GATT. I would suggest that at this time the obstacles would be insurmountable.

Then, too, the matter of free trade is not something that can be imposed by one country on another. Perhaps we would be prepared to consider free trade but we must first know what is the position of the Federation of the West Indies in this connection. They are possibly the newest entity in the commonwealth but so new are they that they have not even worked out a free trade arrangement among themselves. Before free trade between Canada and the West Indies would be possible, I suggest that they would require to have their domestic situation sorted out. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that their own problems will not be solved tomorrow.

I agree that there is a field in which Canadian trade can be developed to a considerable extent in the future, but until they are prepared to deal with us how can we be in a position to enter into such an agreement as is proposed by this resolution? They would have to work out a customs union amongst themselves or do as we do here in Canada where we have at least nominally free trade among the provinces. I would suggest that there may be some obstacles to interprovincial trade but our constitution says that there should not be. However, that is not too apparent in some cases.

Then, there is another difficulty. The West Indies federation operates within the sterling bloc, and that presents an immediate problem. The federation is not the master of its own ship in matters of its currency convertibility. We are dealing at the present time, in so far as the West Indies are concerned, with quantity restrictions. Imports from Canada are limited by quantity restrictions.

However, it is interesting to look at the trade statistics for 1957. We find that those colonies within the commonwealth, which now make up the Federation of the West Indies, sold goods to Canada to the total value of a little over $58 million in 1957, but we sold to them only $40 million worth. Since we are considering this matter, I would say that a number of members and quite a few of the Canadian public, along with myself, were rather surprised at those figures. They would have believed—I certainly assumed it before I made my investigation—that we had sold a great deal more to the federation than we imported from them, but such was not the case. Our greatest single import, of course, is aluminum bauxite from Jamaica. Then we have sugar and sugar products, particularly raw sugar.

To get back to what benefit would result in greater trade with the West Indies, or what benefit could be derived from greater trade with the Federation of the West Indies, in addition to the untold quantities of fish of which we have heard a good deal this afternoon and this evening, they could absorb agricultural products from western Canada in the form of flour particularly and perhaps meats. With the advent of the St. Lawrence seaway and a lower cost on the transportation of wheat I believe that we could certainly compete advantageously in the West Indies market with our flour. However, there we have certain competition from our friends across the line who in latter years have shown that they too consider this to be an opportune market and they are prepared to be very competitive about it.

We in western Canada find ourselves at the greatest possible distance from the source of citrus fruits. I had always wondered why it was necessary to buy most of our citrus fruits from California, Texas, Louisiana and Florida, and why we did not see any from the West Indies. I am told—and here I am merely going on hearsay—that there is a question of quality control; that naturally as far as western Canada is concerned the cost of transportation of certain types of citrus fruits would be high. However, with the improvement in refrigeration and the possibilities of bringing in cargoes of fresh fruit under refrigerated conditions to the lakehead and then by rail to the various markets of western Canada, I think there is an opportunity there. However, that is to come in the future.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, what I suspect is that the aim of the hon. member who proposed this resolution is not so much free trade with the Federation of the West Indies as the expansion of trade with that federation. I believe all hon. members and the Canadian public would be prepared to go along with him, but the question of free trade, as I have indicated, is entirely something that is so far away as to be completely impracticable. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Morris) pointed out a few minutes ago, the small proportion of the population of the federation compared to the whole Caribbean area would, I suggest, create very grave problems in our trade relations with other areas such as the countries of South America which border on the Caribbean, and the Central America states to whom we sell and from whom we buy a lot.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Lambert: Therefore, I think that at the present time this whole question is entirely premature.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McGee): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired and I see it is ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the acting house leader what the business will be for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. Following the outline given by the house leader last Thursday, we will start with the adjourned debate on the second reading of Bill No. C-31, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, which is No. 57 on today's order paper; followed by the resolution to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, and being No. 64 on today's order paper; and then take up the budget resolutions. If we complete that business we shall proceed with the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture dealing with the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which is No. 63 on today's order paper, and then we shall resume the debate on the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Transport amending the Department of Transport Act, which is No. 60 on today's order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: May I inform the minister that I understand from the Minister of Transport it is his intention to abandon this resolution.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, I see. If there is any change in this order, it will be announced at the opening of the house tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the house proceed on Wednesday with the unfinished business?

Mr. Churchill: That will be announced tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ADDRESS

DR. KWAME NKRUMAH

Prime Minister of Ghana

to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA, ON MONDAY, JULY 21, 1958, AT 11 A.M.

Dr. Nkrumah was welcomed by the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Hon. Mark Robert Drouin, Speaker of the Senate, and the Hon. Roland Michener, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, and members of the parliament of Canada: Dr. Nkrumah, on behalf of the parliament and people of Canada I extend a warm welcome to you and your ministers who are associated with you on this occasion, Hon. Mr. Botsio and Hon. Mr. Baako. I welcome you as the prime minister of the first truly African state to attain dominion status within the commonwealth.

I first met Dr. Nkrumah at the prime ministers' conference in London last June, a few short months after his country had become an independent nation within the commonwealth. I think the emergence of Ghana to equal status within the commonwealth is symbolic of the commonwealth concept as it develops to meet change and changing conditions. Canadians have pride in the role that Canada has played in the evolution of this commonwealth. In this commonwealth, nations, equal and independent, join together in their dedication to freedom through the practice of parliamentary democracy in the tradition of the mother of parliaments at Westminster, thereby bringing peace, progress and prosperity to peoples everywhere in the world.

It was Sir Robert Borden who in 1919, following the sacrifices of the first world war, secured for Canada recognition of her sovereign status as a signatory of the peace treaty and as a member of the league of nations; further steps along that pathway have been taken by succeeding prime ministers of Canada. The commonwealth to me represents an institution which, in its inherent greatness, gives hope to mankind. A world organization of many races, beliefs and religions, we have no political uniformity without law or by law; its unity is in the dedication of its peoples to freedom; its glory is that all share in a common heritage; its purpose, peace for all mankind; the bonds of its unity maintained by the good sense, good will and good faith of its diverse peoples.

Because of this principle it does not stagnate in formalism. It is ever growing; it is living. From time to time in the years ahead other nations will join its ranks and two confederations, that of Nigeria and that of the West Indies, have not long to wait for membership.

If I might I should like to say a word as to the constitution of Ghana, for it illustrates what I have placed before you, namely that there is no uniformity in the political systems of the various portions of this commonwealth. Ghana has a unicameral legislature. Five regions comprise the state which came about through the uniting of the Gold Coast with Togoland. Each region has an assembly with powers which are not unlike those of our provinces. Each region has a House of Chiefs with power to consider any matter referred to it by a minister or the national assembly.

Mr. Prime Minister, the achievement of full self-governing membership in the commonwealth to which you led your people was a swift, orderly and constitutional march, a tribute to your devotion and a credit to the United Kingdom, which in its finest and best traditions paved the way for the emergence of your nation as a new nation within this commonwealth. Indeed, in little over half a century the commonwealth concept, adapted to the needs of your country, has brought about the transition of a land of diverse peoples with traditional African culture into a modern state with a new and energetic economic life, whose purpose it is to raise the standards of its people and to develop its resources and the talents of its people.

I betray no state secret, Mr. Prime Minister, when I say that last June and July I was deeply impressed by your ability and by your personal character, and we became friends. I say that as a foundation necessary to the relationships which prevail as between those of us who have responsibilities in all parts of the commonwealth. We have something in common. We were both born on September 18, though you were born a little bit later than I was.

Your life, sir, is an Alger story. Born in a humble home, educated in your own country, you went abroad in order to widen that education in the United States of America, were graduated from Lincoln University and the University of Pennsylvania, and later attended the London School of Economics. I know your philosophy of life from personal conversation with you. However, I prefer to quote your own words on one occasion when you said this: In truth the burden of my life can be summarized in "The Memoriam" quoted by Cecil Rhodes—"So much to do, so little done".

You have done much. You have much still to do in order to bring about that unity among peoples, without regard to colour or race, which has been your life work. It is thus my pleasure to welcome you to Canada, and as a representative of an older partner of the commonwealth to welcome your country as one of the latest in the family of nations within the commonwealth.

I introduce to you the Prime Minister of Ghana, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah.

Dr. Kwame Nkrumah (Prime Minister of Ghana): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Prime Minister, and hon. members of the parliament of Canada: It is a great pleasure for me to address this august assembly today. I wish to express the gratitude of the people of Ghana and my own appreciation for the honour your Prime Minister and his government have done our country by inviting me to pay this visit to Canada. I wish to thank you very sincerely, Mr. Prime Minister, for the kind words with which you have just welcomed me.

We in Ghana have a strong feeling of pride in our commonwealth membership. I had the privilege of attending the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London last year, when for the first time in history the first African state entered that great and free association of states stretching across the world. The meeting provided an invaluable opportunity for establishing personal relationships with other prime ministers and political leaders, and I am particularly happy that I have been able to renew my friendship with your distinguished Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, for whom I have had great admiration since my first meeting with him.

On attaining our independence we in Ghana chose to become a member of the commonwealth of our own free will. We enjoy the same institutions of parliamentary democracy and the same climate of politics and public morality as the other members. We have the same respect for tradition and the same regard for ceremonial. We place the same value on the human individual and appreciate the dignity of restraint. We accept the sovereignty of law and the sanctity of the pledged word.

The family relationship between members of the commonwealth which we have already experienced and which brings together countries widely differing in race, religion and social background, is an example of international association which we shall always support so long as it continues to be based on sound democratic principles and respect for the sovereignty of the member nations.

Canada is in a sense the founder of the commonwealth, for it was in the conception of a free association between Canada and the mother country that the foundations of the commonwealth were laid. Canada has made a great contribution to the world by the successful working of her institutions, her government, the spectacular development of her national resources, and the constructive initiative taken in international affairs. The spirit of tolerance and mutual confidence among peoples of different racial groups that has evolved in this community is an achievement which is a shining example to all of us. Canada also serves as an invaluable link between the great North American continent and its people and the rest of the world.

We believe that Ghana, as the first truly African state to join the commonwealth, also has a contribution to make to the enrichment of the life of the world community. Just as you in Canada have given the world the benefit of your experience and views arising out of your position on this great continent, so we in Africa hope that we will also be able to contribute our views for the common benefit of the community of nations. We feel that through us and through other African nations a general understanding between the African continent and the various members of the commonwealth will be developed. We realize the great responsibilities that this position imposes on us, but we are ready and prepared to take up the challenge.

Recently we took the initiative in convening a conference of independent African states, a conference which proved to be most successful. I myself have recently returned from a tour of the capitals of the other states which participated in the conference. We are endeavouring to establish among ourselves in Africa a fundamental unity on domestic and foreign policy which is, I think, of special significance to the role of the African nations in world affairs. We are determined to work together in the economic and cultural fields, with the object of raising the standard of life of our peoples and making a distinctive African contribution to international discussions and the achievement of world peace. We are determined that through mutual co-operation and collective leadership we free and independent African states shall not only safeguard our hard-won independence but also use all the means available to us to emancipate those of our brethren who are still under colonial rule.

I find nothing incompatible with our effectiveness as a member of the United Nations and the commonwealth in pursuing an African objective and projecting an African personality. On the contrary, I see in it great possibilities for good, because we should be able to bring to our deliberations in the United Nations and the commonwealth a better understanding of the African point of view, and make a distinctive contribution toward reaching acceptable solutions to our many problems.

I should like to take this opportunity to comment on certain aspects of our foreign policy. Basically the policy of our government is one of non-alignment and positive neutrality. I have emphasized on several occasions, however, that this should not be interpreted as a purely negative neutralism. On the contrary, we will always adopt whatever positive policy will do most to safeguard our independence. We have a vested interest in peace, and we will do everything in our power to support the United Nations.

Like many other small countries we have appealed to the great powers to suspend nuclear bomb tests. We pray that progress can be made in achieving some degree of disarmament, thus permitting part of the vast resources now applied to the barren task of producing still more terrible weapons of destruction to be transferred to the constructive and hopeful task of assisting the peoples in the less developed countries to eliminate disease and poverty from their lives.

I have come to Canada at a time when great international tension has been generated by recent developments in the Middle East. The attitude of my government to this situation was made clear in the statement issued on July 16, just before I left. We believe that any attempt to pass judgment on what has happened would at this stage simply heighten tension, and the task now is to secure a workable solution for the future. This, we suggest, could be based on three principles: the substitution of a United Nations force for the American troops now in Lebanon; the holding of free elections in that country under United Nations supervision, and the subsequent establishment of Lebanon as a free and independent state with a status of neutrality, internationally guaranteed on the analogy of Austria. As to the immediate situation, I am confident that I express the views of the leaders of the other independent African states when I say that all of us pray that the leaders of the great powers will come to an understanding which will spare us, who are not parties to their disputes, and the rest of mankind from the unbelievable horrors of modern war. Today, so it seems to me, the fate of mankind rests in the hands of a few men. I pray that they are fully aware of their vast responsibilities.

May I say how greatly we in Ghana have been impressed and inspired by Canada's record in the field of international affairs in recent years. We feel that common sense, decency and reasonableness have invariably reinforced the admirable attitudes you have taken in the United Nations and the wise counsel which you have contributed to the commonwealth.

One other aspect of our international relations on which I wish to touch is that of economic development. Like any other less developed country, we wish to banish disease, ignorance and poverty from our land. We realize that we can only do this in co-operation with other countries and governments. We are the world's greatest producer of cocoa, but like other one-crop countries we are at the mercy of world prices. As you know, the recession of the last year has already had disastrous political consequences quite apart from its economic effects for several of the governments of those less developed areas.

In our own case I attach the highest importance to increasing the productivity of our agriculture, and to starting the industrialization of our country. The cornerstone of our future development is the successful implementation of our great Volta river project for the production of aluminum. Here again the recession has affected our basic plans most profoundly for aluminum producers are now naturally reluctant to increase capacity. Like everyone else, I trust that this recession ends very quickly and that the expansion of the North American economy, which can so decisively affect our own hopes for the future and the hopes of all less developed countries, will soon be resumed.

It is this situation which to me most vividly illustrates the community of interest and common purpose which should exist between the dollar and sterling areas on the one hand and the less developed countries on the other. The sustained development of the resources of the less developed countries would not only reduce their economic vulnerability and thus consolidate their vitally important political independence, but at the same time raw materials would continue to be produced for the more advanced industrial nations, thus ensuring the maintenance of high levels of employment and the expansion of world trade, a process which of itself is essential for the survival of the western economies.

In recent years I believe that the common interest and identity of purpose between the wealthier nations and the less developed areas has not been adequately recognized. I hope the forthcoming commonwealth economic conference will give adequate consideration to this basic truth, and in particular pay far greater attention than in the past to the political implications of economic development.

All of us in our separate ways, both as individuals and as nations, desperately seek for a world of peace where men and women may bring up their children in security and with confidence in the future. I believe that apart from general disarmament and the abolition of nuclear tests nothing could do more to achieve this hope than that all like-minded countries should gather together and co-operate in achieving sustained and balanced economic development among themselves, thus expanding world trade and improving the common welfare of all people.

Before I conclude I should like to express the appreciation of my government and the people of Ghana to this great country of Canada for the many manifestations of interest which you have already demonstrated in our affairs since independence, and for the very welcome assistance in a number of fields, economic, social and cultural, which we have received from you. We can best show our appreciation of this assistance by ensuring that it is used for the maximum benefit of all people.

May I thank you once again for the honour and privilege of addressing this great assembly. I pray that this occasion will always be remembered as the beginning of an enduring friendship between Canada and Ghana, a friendship based on a common belief in the dignity of all mankind and in the right of all peoples to control their own affairs, dedicated to the pursuit of peace. Thank you.

(Translation):

Hon. Mark Robert Drouin (Speaker of the Senate): It is on behalf of the Canadian Senate, Mr. Prime Minister, that I have the great honour of welcoming you to this house which, in your country as in ours, symbolizes the respect of our two peoples, Ghana and Canada, for parliamentary democratic institutions, those pillars upon which, notwithstanding differences in culture and tradition, rests the close unity of commonwealth nations.

This union of different peoples under the banner of parliamentary democracy is no mere gesture. The Canadian people which, as you have seen, are made up of various racial communities, have managed, through democratic institutions in their federal form, to fashion and pursue a common ideal and to respect each other's essential characteristics. It is with an equal respect for their diversity and an unshakable faith in their common ideal that Canada looks upon the nations of the commonwealth, whether they be African, like yours, Mr. Prime Minister, Asiatic or Anglo-Saxon.

You are the head of a new African nation, independent within the commonwealth and called to a high destiny, not only on your own continent, but in the whole democratic world as well. Heir to the traditions of ancient Africa's civilization and to British parliamentary institutions and conscious of the responsibility implied by that privilege, your country has already undertaken to give them dynamic and positive expression. Since your recent accession to independence, your government, with astonishing courage, has already started to develop the natural resources of your beautiful country.

Apart from your great love for Africa and your deep understanding of that country, you yourself, Mr. Prime Minister, have brought to your role of nation builder, an extensive knowledge of the North American continent gained during your studies in the United States. It is therefore with very special interest and understanding that Canadians look upon the unfolding of Ghana's destiny. Just as each of the two racial groups who inhabit both our countries are equal partners, enjoying the same rights and privileges, so each and every one of the nations of the commonwealth are equal partners jointly and severally pursuing objectives of peace and happiness.

Straight away and by right your country has become a full member of this great and noble commonwealth family. You are welcome into it and, beyond the Atlantic and the African continent, we extend a friendly hand to all the citizens of Ghana whose beloved Sovereign, it seems only fitting to point out, is also ours.

The people of Canada appreciate your having made us this visit in spite of your pressing responsibilities. On my own behalf and on behalf of the Senate of Canada, I ask you to accept our thanks for your kind words and to convey to your compatriots the expression of our sincere admiration and faithful friendship.

Visit of Dr. Nkrumah

(Text):

Hon. Roland Michener (Speaker of the House of Commons): Prime Minister Nkrumah, in bringing this memorable session to a conclusion may I add a word of thanks on behalf of the House of Commons. I assure you, sir, that our meeting today has been all too short, having regard to the significance of your visit and the interest you have inspired in us, and in all Canadians, in our brother country of Ghana. We should gladly have given you the unlimited time which is accorded in this chamber to a prime minister or a leader of the opposition, as against the few minutes which you have taken. It would have been a pleasure, too, to hear from the distinguished members of your government who accompany you, and whom we are so happy to welcome. May I express a personal regret that we are not able to meet that remarkable man, Sir Emmanuel Quist, the former Speaker of your legislative assembly, whose contribution to the establishment of parliamentary methods in your new legislature must have been indispensable.

Your visit, in your capacity as representative of the youngest member of the great and growing family of nations which make up the commonwealth, is not only appropriate but it is a touching recognition and furtherance of our fraternal relations. It gives to your older Canadian brother another opportunity to inspect and dote upon the new baby. I hope the metaphor will not be offensive. As Sir Winston Churchill might have said, "Some baby". In fact your phenomenal growth in political stature from the cradle to majority and independence in the last ten years is in contrast to our own unhurried but steady evolution over a century from colony to independence.

From 1791 to 1867 we had three constitutional advances to self-government, and took another 50 years to exercise independence in external affairs. In your case, if we leave out of account the Burns constitution of 1946, which within 18 months was described as outmoded at birth, you rapidly outgrew two new constitutions, those of 1951 and 1954, and reached full stature on March 6, 1957. Then you donned the constitutional garment which you now wear with so much apparent comfort and sophistication.

Apart from this contrast in the rate of our political growth there are many similarities in our history in the commonwealth family. As has been said, we gave the lead to the original four British dominions which, with the United Kingdom, made up the British commonwealth. You have given the lead to the African states. Your democracy, like ours, is modelled on that remarkable British invention of responsible parliamentary government. As I have said on other occasions, this common use of parliamentary institutions which runs throughout the nations of the commonwealth today gives us all an understanding and a confidence in each other's policies and politics which is a solid basis for future friendship and co-operation.

From what I read, you in Ghana have already mastered the parliamentary art. Your great speech in the independence debate, with its understanding of British policy and African needs, its eloquence and its sincerity, its apt quotations from Burke, Aristotle and Tennyson, was in the highest tradition. I am told, too, that if you had any notes on that occasion they were not the copious notes the Speaker hears about in some other houses.

Some other of your new parliamentary practices will endear you to our members. For example, you are reported once to have advised an exasperating member to go have a drink of orange juice. Your ministers, too, seem to follow familiar patterns in dealing with questions before the orders of the day. This example comes from John Gunther:

> Mr. Kusi asked the Minister of Agriculture and Natural Resources—
> (a) What is the estimated population of the tsetse fly?
> (b) Is there any evidence that the number is increasing?
>
> Mr. Casely-Hayford: (a) There is no available record of tsetse fly population.
> (b) In view of the answer to part (a) of the question, the answer is no.

We thank you, sir, for your visit and your message. It has been said that the darkest thing about Africa has been our ignorance of it. You are doing much to dispel this ignorance. We honour you for the outstanding leadership which you are giving in Ghana. We honour your country for its assumption of the responsibilities of self-government. So much depends in West Africa on its success and its example. Please bear with you when you return to Ghana the heartfelt good wishes of the Canadian parliament and people for all your high endeavours.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 22, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Third report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Fraser.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—FURTHER STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a further statement with respect to the Middle East situation, particularly in connection with the United Nations security council and the discussions which are taking place there at this time.

Yesterday I was not in a position to reveal to the house the manner in which it was proposed to arrange a meeting at the heads of government level while preserving the primary responsibility of the United Nations security council. Everything that has been done in the last two or three days—and I am not restricting my remarks to that period—has been designed to ensure that this matter shall be considered by the United Nations and that action outside of the United Nations shall not be taken.

Hon. members will have learned that Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, United Kingdom foreign secretary, announced in the House of Commons at Westminster this morning that if an extraordinary special session of the security council were convened in order to discuss Middle East questions, Prime Minister Macmillan would be willing to attend if other heads of government concerned were prepared to do likewise. As Mr. Lloyd pointed out, certain questions concerning the Middle East are already under consideration in the security council and it is only appropriate that the higher level talks now envisaged should take place in the same forum to provide for continuity.

The basis for such a meeting would, however, differ from the normal proceedings in the security council in that it would proceed by consultation rather than by resolution and would attempt to formulate binding conclusions only on the basis of mutual agreement. This would provide a flexible procedure which would permit the consultation at heads of government level to be a continuous process in which countries not members of the security council could be invited to participate as might be appropriate. Such a special meeting could meet publicly or in restricted session. It could make its own arrangements for future meetings and would adhere to no fixed timetable or agenda.

The initiative that has been taken is, I think, the kind of novel and I trust effective proposal which the present grave situation requires, and I hope it will receive the immediate support of all the states directly concerned with the pressing problem of the Middle East.

I am gratified to note that a statement has been released by the White House agreeing that a United Nations security council meeting of the character referred to by foreign minister Lloyd is clearly within the contemplation of the United Nations charter, and that if such a meeting were generally desired the United States would join in following this orderly procedure.

Yesterday I was able to say only that I was in personal and continuous consultation with Prime Minister Macmillan and President Eisenhower concerning this matter. The house will understand, too, that my guarded reference yesterday to the fact that the United Nations security council in session seemed to offer possibilities indicated at the same time that I was in full accord with both the purpose and the manner in which this initiative was being developed by the heads of government concerned. If we display that realism which is so necessary at this time I am confident that the way will be opened to these high level talks which the urgency of the matter demands.

While these negotiations leading to high level discussions have been going on, the security council's deliberations on Lebanon and Jordan have continued. At the meeting this morning the Soviet delegate proposed amendments to the Japanese draft resolution. I placed the terms of that resolution before the house yesterday, and I will not give any portion of it on this occasion. The amendments moved by the U.S.S.R. clearly changed the character of that resolution by calling for the condemnation of the United States action in regard to Lebanon and demanding an immediate withdrawal of United States forces.

In view of the stand taken this morning by the Soviet representative I am led to believe—and I hope that my prophecy in this regard is not borne out by events—that the security council's efforts to bring about a solution to the immediate problem in Lebanon and Jordan will fail.

It is unfortunate that the position taken by the Soviet union, if it is to be expected that the attitude of the U.S.S.R. will follow the speech made by its representative, will have the result of frustrating the efforts of the security council to take additional effective action in Lebanon.

However, under the terms of the existing security council resolution of June 11 there is some hope of action which can be taken immediately regardless of the outcome today of the deliberations of the security council on the Japanese resolution. On June 11, as hon. members know, a United Nations body—UNOGIL—was provided for and is still functioning in Lebanon. The latest reports from UNOGIL make it clear that the group is now able to expand its activities as the result of increasing access to the border areas.

I think this house realizes that this government has been co-operating actively in the development of UNOGIL, and has also given its firm support to the proposal to expand the activities of UNOGIL as contemplated under the terms of the Japanese resolution.

The secretary general informed the security council last week that 65 additional observers are required for the implementation of the existing resolution. I wish now to inform the house that, as requested by the secretary general, Canada will supply immediately three of the additional observers, of course giving every attention to any further requirement of UNOGIL as events transpire. If additional action in this regard is requested, not unfavourable consideration will be given to such requests.

As I see the situation at the moment, in view of the stand now taken by the United Kingdom and the United States of America on this matter, supported by Canada, the necessity of determining what further course will be taken now rests firmly with Mr. Khrushchev. Every opportunity has been provided to discuss immediately—providing the other nations agree—in the security council and within the ambit of the United Nations and under its auspices every problem connected with the Middle East, to the end that if there is agreement a solution can be found. I think the people of Canada as a whole will wholeheartedly support the stand this government is taking in this connection, which I believe carries with it the support of the members of the opposition in this house as well as the country as a whole.

One can but express the hope that at this time Mr. Khrushchev, if sincere in his suggestions and the ideas he advanced in his several letters, will join with the nations of the free world in that institution to which he has given his support in those letters, in which letters he has warned mankind that there must be nothing done outside of the United Nations. He now definitely has the opportunity, providing that he is sincerely desirous to act, to react favourably to the initiative of the United Kingdom and the United States to bring about discussions which everyone hopes will lead to a solution.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house do indeed support the steps that have been taken and the progress that has been made as indicated by the Prime Minister to ensure—and it is important that it should be ensured—that there will not be a wholly negative reply given to the invitation of the head of the Soviet union government addressed to the four governments and the Secretary General of the United Nations to discuss the crisis in the Middle East.

If that can be done as has been suggested, by a special meeting of the security council attended by the heads of government, that I should think would be a satisfactory and welcome development. The charter of the United Nations does make provision for that kind of meeting, and in the past the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Trygve Lie, worked quite hard to bring about a procedure by which foreign ministers and heads of government would attend security council meetings on important occasions. So this would be a fortunate development to meet a critical situation.

But, Mr. Speaker, if that particular form, a full council, were not considered to be satisfactory—and there are possible difficulties in regard to representation at the larger meeting, difficulties which I am sure occur to us at once—and if those difficulties were such that a meeting in the full council of the heads of government could not be arranged, I would certainly hope that this particular difficulty of representation would not be permitted to prevent a meeting of a somewhat different kind. Perhaps another way of doing it would be by a committee of the security council along the lines which I ventured to mention yesterday and which would certainly avoid that particular difficulty. It would retain the kind of representation which was advocated in the first proposal of the head of the Soviet government, and for that purpose would include India.

The important thing, Mr. Speaker, is not the mechanism; the important thing is to get the heads of the governments most concerned together to talk over the situation in the hope that by such discussion they might do something constructive to remove the cloud which hangs over international relations at the present time.

I speak for our party when I tell the Prime Minister that we welcome the support the government has given to this move. We shall also support them in any move they make which will strengthen the position of the United Nations in Lebanon at the present time through strengthening the observer group there.

I was a little discouraged to read in the press this morning that the foreign minister of Lebanon had said that notwithstanding the presence of the United Nations observer group there and notwithstanding the intervention of the United States forces, intervention was still continuing undiminished across the border in the form of assistance to the rebels of that country. All this merely underlines that the sooner the powers most concerned can get together and do something to restore the political situation there the better it will be for peace not only in that area but in the whole world.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, members of this group are always very interested in reports the Prime Minister gives to the house with respect to this serious Middle East situation, and hope that his efforts to bring about a discussion will meet with the success for which we all wish.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STRIKE ON BLACK BALL LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has anything to report on the strike of the Black Ball ferry line between Vancouver island and the mainland of British Columbia?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I regret to advise the house that I have no statement to make at this time, nor am I in a position to make a further report on the situation on the west coast except to say that the government still has this matter under very serious consideration.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SUGGESTED OPERATION OF FACILITIES BY CROWN CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the lack of shipping facilities between the mainland of British Columbia and Vancouver island is perpetrating a hardship on a substantial portion of the population of the province of British Columbia as well as its economy, will the Minister of Labour undertake to recommend to his colleagues in the cabinet that they consider the possibility of bringing such shipping facilities under the operation of a crown corporation in order that such corporation may operate the shipping facilities as a public service and may enter into negotiations with the appropriate representative organizations of the employees affected in a true spirit of collective bargaining?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the government is keeping a very close watch upon the situation at the moment, and every possible method is being considered at this time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I revert to another strike which I am sure is receiving the attention of the minister and to which the Montreal Gazette refers this morning as being considered actively by the government by way of several alternatives. I refer to the strike on the west coast against the Canadian Pacific steamship facilities. I wonder whether the minister is in a position to make a statement with respect to that dispute.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my remarks were directed to the Canadian Pacific Steamships dispute. The Black Ball ferries dispute is being considered by the provincial government.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister how soon he expects to be in a position to table the report of the royal commission on the revision of the terms of union with Newfoundland.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend last mentioned this matter I said that I hoped to be in a position to give an answer in about 10 days. That period has lapsed now. I shall make the necessary inquiries and if there is going to be unnecessary delay I shall table the report in English and table the report in French when translation and publication have taken place.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the Prime Minister very much for that course, which he will recall I suggested on Friday last. I suppose the Prime Minister is aware that already this session over 50 documents have been tabled by the government in English only.

CIVIL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER PLANS TO STEP UP ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question. In the light of the sudden turn in world affairs, has the department any further plans for stepping up civil defence?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As the hon. member is aware, Lieutenant General Graham has been appointed to make a complete study of the civil defence organization in Canada. Otherwise civil defence is carrying on in the usual manner.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the general and former chief of staff not expected to make a report that will not be completed before the end of September?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): His report will be completed as soon as possible following his appointment.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—STATEMENT ON SITTINGS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on July 15 the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi asked me whether or not the royal commission on Canada's energy resources plans to hold public meetings in the Atlantic provinces and, if so, whether dates and places have been selected. As to the latter part of the question, the answer is no. With respect to whether or not meetings are to be held, the answer is that meetings will be held there later by the commission.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

TRADE

APPLES—REQUEST FOR LARGER SHARE OF BRITISH QUOTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of reports that Britain has established a northern hemisphere quota of about four million bushels of apples, and in view of the fact that Canadian apple growers may now sell more fresh apples to Britain, will the minister inform the house what steps his department is taking to secure as large a portion as possible of this quota for Canadian apple producers?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Department of Trade and Commerce will take all appropriate steps necessary to ensure that we get the larger quota that he has mentioned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

VAL D'OR, QUE.—PROTEST AGAINST REMOVAL OF PASSENGER TRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Did the minister receive a telegram from the town council of Val d'Or protesting against the removal of the Canadian National Railways passenger trains No. 34 and No. 21 from Montreal and Quebec to northwestern Quebec to take effect August 10 next? If so, will the minister tell the house whether his department will do something to satisfy the request of the council of the town of Val d'Or?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the telegram but I will make inquiries. If it should arrive at the department or if I see it I will refer it to the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Dumas: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house whether the board of transport commissioners could be authorized to hold a hearing in northwestern Quebec in respect of this extremely important matter?

Mr. Hees: I do not know how the matter stands with regard to an application before the board of transport commissioners, but I will discuss the matter with them and I feel sure they will follow the proper course.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY AS TO TENDER BOND REQUIREMENTS BY DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I have sent a copy of the question ahead. Would the Minister of Public Works tell the house why surety bonds, contractor bonds or performance bonds are not accepted in lieu of accepted cheques to cover tender requirements?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this has been the practice of the department for some time, and it is considered to be a better way to carry on the business of the department. One reason we do this is that the Canadian Construction Association prefers this method to the one suggested by the hon. member.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDITIONAL ELEVATOR FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Payne (Coast-Capilano): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister available any information with regard to the construction of additional elevator storage facilities to be undertaken in the near future in the area of the port of Vancouver?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question.

To meet the need for additional grain storage facilities at Vancouver harbour it has been decided to construct an addition to elevator No. 3. The addition will add 1 million bushels to the elevator's storage capacity, and the estimated cost is $900,000, of which it is estimated $200,000 will be expended in 1958. The work is scheduled for completion in 1959.

Elevator No. 3 is under lease from the national harbours board to United Grain Growers Limited, who have been tenants of this elevator since 1927. It is expected that the main contract will be let as soon as plans and specifications are completed, which it is estimated will be within three months' time, and that this addition to elevator No. 3 will be completed in about a year from now.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary question arising out of the answer given by the Minister of Transport with regard to grain facilities at Vancouver.

I wonder whether the minister has some similar information with respect to the same facilities at Prince Rupert?

Mr. Hees: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION "FEDERAL TAX NEWS REVIEW"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. Webster (St. Antoine-Westmount): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the publication Federal Tax News Review any connection with his department?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am glad the hon. gentleman asked that question at this time. The magazine in question has no connection with the Department of National Revenue, with any of the employees of the department, or with any association of employees of the department. I understand that subscriptions for advertising are being solicited in the city of Montreal on the verbal statement—it is never put in writing—that this paper is somehow or another connected with the department or approved by officials of the department. I want to make it abundantly clear that this is not the case. If any such representations are made I should like to have them brought to the attention of the department or of the R.C.M.P.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—ALLEGED DISCREPANCY IN FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question based on the discrepancy between the figures for registrations at national employment service offices, which were over 526,000 on June 19, and the dominion bureau of statistics figure of persons without jobs and seeking work, which was 320,000 on June 21. I wonder whether the minister has any way of explaining this discrepancy of over 200,000, which is more than twice as great as it was a year ago and which one would have thought would have been in the other direction.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have explained the situation to the best of my ability on a number of occasions in answer to questions that have been asked of me. However, I can say this: This is the method being followed by our national employment service offices in registering people amongst whom are those presently employed but who are seeking other employment. People who are retired are registered also, and many other categories are included in the N.E.S. figures that cannot be considered as actually out of work and seeking jobs.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question. I do not think I made my point quite clear. It was the gap between the figures. A year ago the gap between those two figures was only 100,000. Now it is 200,000. It is hard to believe that this figure of 200,000 could represent persons having jobs.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is why I wondered whether the minister had any explanation.

Mr. Starr: In answer to that question I would say this, and it will probably explain the situation to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The July 10 figure, and I think that is the one he mentioned—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the June 19 figures; the most recently published figures.

Mr. Starr: I will look into the situation and see whether I can give the hon. member an explanation for that discrepancy.

SASKATCHEWAN—STRIKE ON GOVERNMENT TRANSPORTATION COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister or his department received any representations from the employees' union or the Saskatchewan government seeking assistance in bringing to a speedy end the strike of employees of the Saskatchewan government transportation company, which is working a hardship on many people in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. The answer to the second part of the question is that in my opinion this matter would come under the jurisdiction of the province, and is the responsibility of the government of that province.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR RECORD OF DISCUSSIONS AT RECENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour if he is now in a position to answer a question I asked him some days ago as to whether or not it would be possible, after consultation with his colleagues, to make available to the members of this house the important discussions which took place between the 10 provincial governments, the representatives of management and labour and the hon. gentleman on the matter of unemployment, particularly winter unemployment. In view of the fact that we will soon be discussing the minister's estimates, can he say whether or not he will make available to us the kind of background information which would make his estimates even more interesting than they are normally?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The matter, Mr. Speaker, is still under active consideration.

CRIMINAL LAW

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION RESPECTING SALE OF OBSCENE LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the interest which has been shown across Canada in the subject of obscene literature, and perhaps in a particular way in the province of Quebec, and in view also of the statements—very excellent ones—which the minister has made with respect to that subject as well as the statements in the house, may I ask the minister if he intends to bring down legislation on the subject by way of amendment of the Criminal Code at this session?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for having indicated to me that he wanted to raise this question. In reply I can advise him that we are studying the matter at the present time in the department, but as I have said previously here and elsewhere we do not consider that it will be possible to bring down legislation before the next session of parliament.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON FRENCH EDITION OF PAMPHLET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Hull was good enough to praise my department for the very fine publication called "This is the Arctic". I want to say that I am very grateful for this comment and for the enthusiastic reception that has been given to the document by the house. However, he quoted part of the letter I wrote him and indicated that he was translating it into English and that the translation was his own.

I have been looking at this translation and at my original letter. In view of this study I think it would be better to put some of the letter into the record as originally dictated in English. I quote:

> I am sorry to say that there is no French edition of this booklet. It was originally prepared as a very modest publication for limited distribution to persons whose work took them into the Canadian far north. At that time we did not anticipate the more widespread interest in its contents which has since developed.
> I think you will agree that the style of the pamphlet—full of puns—is such that it would be difficult to preserve its quality in an ordinary translation. It would really need to be rewritten in the French language from start to finish. I would be opposed to the publication of a French edition that was in any way inferior to the English version. For this reason if there were sufficient demand for the publication of the booklet in the French language, I would want to give the most careful thought to the selection of the person entrusted with its preparation.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this fuller extract from my letter will clearly indicate why the booklet in question is not presently available in the French language. It will also indicate my interest in ensuring that if and when the booklet does appear in French, it will be of the highest possible quality. It also answers the hon. member's question about the difficulty of "asking for something which is non-existent".

I might say this is not the first time the department has published material in one language only. Since I have come into the department there have been several publications in French only, and I have brought a few with me for the hon. member to examine if he wishes to do so. I asked the department about this matter, and it was indicated to me that in about the last year we have issued some 35 publications of various kinds in the French language, and that at the present time there are 27 publications in various stages of production also in French.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. I think his translation is much better than mine, but the facts remain the same. It was done without the intention—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Caron: I will come to my question. Does the minister think the French-Canadian people are not interested in going north?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the answer is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker; that at the time of publication of the booklet we were not expecting such a widespread demand for it. If the demand for the pamphlet, which incidentally costs 25 cents, is widespread then I think we will certainly make the effort to have it rewritten in the French language in order to maintain its quality.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister if this is the publication which pays such glowing tribute to the work of development in the north under the previous administration?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I sent a copy of this delightful little booklet to my hon. friend, and if he had read it he would know that it makes clear to the people of Canada who intend to go to the far north that it is very pleasant up there, and that the climate is not too different from the other seven-eighths of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: The answer to the question is yes.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DELIVERY OF SEED GRAIN, MALTING BARLEY, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, July 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Churchill for the second reading of Bill No. C-31, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On July 16 I introduced this bill rather briefly, because it was then four minutes to six o'clock and I did not have the time to make the full explanation desirable. On page 2311 of Hansard for that date hon. members will find my introduction, which I will not repeat on this occasion, but I will bring up to date the figures relating to cash advances and the figures relating to quota deliveries.

With regard to cash advances my latest report is dated July 18, according to which the percentage refunded has reached 92.9 per cent, an indication that in the remaining days of July it is more than likely that the cash advances will be practically all repaid. Second, with regard to quota deliveries I stated on July 16 last that within a few days right across the prairies all the stations would be on 6- or 7-bushel delivery quota. Hansard has the word "years" where I used the word "days", which I corrected the following day. My prediction was correct; the wheat board now reports that of the 2,071 delivery points in the western provinces, 1,016 are on a 6-bushel quota, 1,023 are on a 7-bushel quota and there are 32 closed stations, indicating that the marketing of grain out west has gone ahead very well.

To proceed with my introduction to the amendments to this act, I have the following statement to make, and again this will be very brief. When the act was drafted last fall there were two or three omissions from the legislation which the proposed amendments are designed to correct. As the act now stands, a farmer who delivers malting barley is precluded from drawing an advance on his farm-stored wheat; similarly, deliveries of grain to be used for seeding purposes count against an advance. In the amendment we propose exempting deliveries of malting barley and of seed grain.

The third major amendment provides for the consolidation of cash advances from one crop year to the other. This will make it possible for a producer who has not fully repaid his cash advance through no fault of his own, which means because his quota has not been large enough to permit him to deliver or because there has been some difficulty for which he is not responsible, to obtain a further cash advance on his new crop year if desired. The two advances would then be consolidated and recorded in the permit book, and as quotas were raised the producer would repay both advances.

We do not anticipate that many producers will be affected by this provision, but we wish to guard any inconvenience to a producer who has grain to deliver and whose quota may be low. I have just pointed out that this is unlikely to affect very many people because, with two weeks to go for deliveries, cash advances have been repaid up to 92.9 per cent. Nevertheless we are introducing this amendment just to assist anyone who, through no fault of his own, might be subject to some inconvenience.

These are the main features of the bill. The cash advance system will receive a further trial during the next 12 months, and if further changes are considered necessary as a result of experience we are quite prepared to consider amendments. To date the system is working well. Elevator agents have been fully co-operative, and the wheat board has experienced no inconvenience in providing additional payments to producers.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, on reading this bill, I noticed at once that the proposed amendments are only minor ones, because it was only after certain difficulties had been experienced in applying the act that such changes were considered necessary.

Moreover, the minister has just stated that, if the changes submitted today are found inadequate, other amendments will be introduced next year.

I find it rather strange that there should be uncertainty about this bill; the government seems to be groping somewhat, because we cannot anticipate one or two years in advance what will come out of the act.

I wonder if it might not be better to go back to the act which the Liberals had introduced in 1956, under which farmers could get advance payments on their grain through the banks.

If we consider to what extent farmers benefited from the act in recent years, i.e. in 1955-56 and 1956-57, we find that the government has spent an amount of $28 million in payments for stored grain.

I therefore suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) to consider this legislation very carefully, so that if he finds it necessary to amend it next year, he might then be in a position to suggest amendments of a permanent nature, and not cause unnecessary trouble to western farmers, who, because of frequent changes, do not know from year to year where they stand in this matter.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this group welcome the amendments which have been proposed. It is of interest to note that during the past year advance payments under the act have been made to 50,317 farmers in the prairie provinces amounting, in Manitoba, to an average of $607, in Saskatchewan to $759 and in Alberta to $634. While these are not great sums of money they have been appreciated, according to reports I have heard, and in addition the farmers appreciate some of the changes that are now being suggested.

We are very pleased to note that the cash advances have already been repaid to the tune of 92 per cent. The consolidation of two years cash advances was recommended a year ago, but at that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that the house should wait and see how this developed. We are very happy that he should now see fit to include this amendment.

There is one problem I think I should mention, and that is the case of farmers who are renting land from non-resident owners. In this situation, as I understand it, there is a great deal of difficulty in getting cash advances. Should the owner of land, the absentee landlord, live, for instance, in England, the tenant would have to write to him and get his permission before he could secure a cash advance on the grain he produces on that land. In many cases farmers are finding it difficult to get such permission because the people to whom they write are not familiar with Canadian statutes and may not realize why this action is necessary. I should like to suggest to the minister that possibly something could be done to help these farmers who are renting land so as to facilitate their obtaining cash advances in these circumstances.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Grain delivered in exchange for seed.

Mr. Hanbidge: Before this clause is carried, may I mention that there was one matter raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming that I should like to see incorporated in the act, and that is giving the tenant the privilege of securing a cash advance on his grain without requiring him to secure the consent of his landlord. I believe that at the present time it is necessary to have forms completed by the landlord. I wonder if the bill could be left in committee until this has been checked? I should like to have this checked over before the bill is finally passed.

Mr. Churchill: There is some urgency about passing this bill now in order that the necessary forms may be printed and sent to the elevator agents to reach their hands before the beginning of the new crop year, which is August 1. Any further delay would be to the disadvantage of the farmers. The point which has been raised by two hon. members is not properly under discussion under this section, but if the chairman would so permit that might be considered.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the observations made by the hon. member who preceded the minister will, I am sure, have to be weighed in the light of the fact that he represents a constituency which is faced with this problem, and with his legal qualifications, he has, no doubt, more than usually good reasons for pursuing this matter of the position of the tenant as opposed to the position of the landlord. Understandably the minister says it would be difficult to postpone a bill of this sort when the proposed benefits are urgently needed at the moment. I can fully appreciate the minister's attitude, but surely the point is not so much what the mechanics should be to give effect to this but whether or not the government subscribes to the desirability of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kindersley. Does the government accept in principle that proposal? If the government does, then there should be no difficulty in providing an amendment at once, because it would not cause any delay.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman. You have not been listening to me or you would not ask whether clause 6 will carry.

Mr. Harkness: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I do not blame him for not listening.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Chairman, I have asked the minister a question. I wonder if he is in a position to give an answer.

Mr. Churchill: I am in a position to give an answer, Mr. Chairman, but I submit that this question should have been raised at the appropriate place. If we are going to have a general discussion on this particular problem, is it to take place on clause 6? My hon. friend is a lawyer of repute. He appreciates some of the difficulties involved in this matter. He is also a skilled parliamentarian. I suggest that clause 6 is scarcely the point at which to discuss this particular matter.

Mr. Hanbidge: What clause is the appropriate clause?

Mr. Churchill: Clause 1.

Mr. Hanbidge: I was always under the impression that when a bill was brought in to amend a statute or act, the whole act was open for discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is most unusual. He suggests that this is not the place to amend the act. I do not know of any more appropriate place and opportunity in the discussion than at this very stage. The hon. member for Kindersley has said he regards the suggestion made by another hon. member in this particular as important. If the minister takes the position that there is no merit in the suggestion, then he will be expressing the government's policy; but if there is merit in the suggestion surely no amount of inconvenience can stand in the way of providing the necessary kind of amendment.

That is the question that is before the committee; is this a desirable proposal in itself? If it is—and the proposal is not put forward by any hon. member of this party but by a member of the party of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a distinguished member—he can tell the committee whether or not it is possible for him to accept that amendment.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, it might be well for this committee to take a few moments to place this discussion in its proper perspective. Not all farmers are going to use this legislation. Certainly the percentage of farmers who are likely to fall into the category under discussion is extremely small. There is nothing to indicate what that percentage is, but offhand one might say that the total percentage of users of the legislation who are tenant farmers and who may require the facilities of this measure would be something less than 5 per cent. Certainly that applies with respect to the area I have the honour to represent.

It is worth pointing out, too, that a tenant farmer is usually one who owns land in his own right and rents additional land for the purpose of fully utilizing his equipment and adding to his gross income. This entire question of the revision of farm legislation is going to be a long term process. This provision will not be perfect when this session closes. The amendments forthcoming to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will probably not fully meet the needs of western farmers, but—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that we are on clause 6 of this bill, and I wish he would bring his remarks a little closer to the clause under discussion. This is not a general discussion of the farm situation.

Mr. Brunsden: My apologies, sir. I was merely following the pattern laid by the earlier speakers with respect to this legislation. To return to the question under discussion, I would say it would be a tragedy in so far as western Canada is concerned if there was a delay of a week or two or more in order to deal with a point by way of amendment that is, after all, going to affect only a very few people.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It should be clearly understood, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no suggestion by the hon. member for Kindersley and certainly not by anyone speaking for this party that there should be any delay in this legislation. The issue is simple; should there be an amendment provided now to cover tenants? That is the only issue; and if the government takes the position that there should be no amendment to cover the tenants the committee will have to deal with the government's policy in whatever way it wishes, but there need not be any delay whatsoever as far as the implementation of this legislation is concerned.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is attempting to raise a straw man as usual.

Mr. McIlraith: Now, now.

Mr. Churchill: When the committee reaches the discussion of clause 6 of the bill it proceeds with it and does not revert to other matters; but if it is the consensus of the committee that this matter should be discussed we could deal with it when we get back to the title of the bill. I have a statement here I am quite prepared to make with regard to the general problem of the renter receiving cash advances and obtaining consent of the landlord and so on, but clause 6 is hardly the place for it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On the title:

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Churchill: On that point, Mr. Chairman, last year when the bill was being considered for drafting one of the most important points was this very one raised this afternoon, as to what to do with regard to land in which perhaps two or three people have some interest. We tried to simplify the legislation last year, and we related it to the permit book. The permit book lists the owner of the land, the renter and all people who have an interest in it.

It was found necessary, relating cash advances to the permit book, that all those who had an interest in the land must then sign the application form if a cash advance was desired. It has caused some trouble to some people where the landlord was living far away or was unfamiliar with the legislation or not agreeable to signing the application form. All of that was very carefully considered. We reached the decision last year that we could not make provision for a cash advance based on the permit book to someone who was unable to obtain the signature of another or others who were also listed in that permit book.

Then this year we went through the same process again, and the most careful consideration was given to this problem. I asked the officials both here and those of the wheat board in Winnipeg to look at this again, and I have asked several hon. members of the house to produce a satisfactory solution to this problem. No one has come up with any good solution.

Let me just place on the record the considered opinion with regard to this matter. Section 6 of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act requires joint application by all persons named in the same permit book before any advance will be made against grain deliverable under that permit book.

No distinction is made between a situation in which all or a substantial part of the land is subject to share interests by two or more persons, and the situation under which a substantial portion belongs outright to the actual producer and only part of the farm is subject to interests held by other persons. And finally, there is no means by which a tenant can compel a landlord or other interested persons to enter into a joint application.

The problems involved in joint applications, and the knowledge that they may give rise to delays, refusals to execute and so forth, were of considerable concern during the preparation of the legislation. The scheme underlying the act had, of course, recognized that grain stored on farms could not be inspected by competent persons as a condition precedent to entitlement for an advance. The time element and the number of persons required made this impossible. It also had to recognize that it would not be possible to impose some kind of requirement for segregation of the grain on which an advance was to be made, either segregation from all the grain stored by the farmer or segregation of the different portions of grain belonging to different interested persons.

The scheme also had to recognize that there are probably a multitude of ways in which an actual producer and his landlord, mortgagee or other type of producer divide their respective interests, and a multitude of forms of contract or other means as to how these shares were agreed upon or could be established or proved. It seemed an extremely difficult if not impossible task—other than by the various parties themselves confirming their private arrangement in a joint application form—to impose upon anyone to determine and satisfy himself just what were the true and accurate arrangements between the several interests in any given situation and in every situation.

Finally, partly because the permit book is the chief document to rely on to show past deliveries, and partly because it is the essential document in relation to recovery of the advance payment, the scheme had to be closely related to the permit book system. Under a scheme for cash advances against undelivered grain, however, the question of the respective shares of joint holders of a permit book becomes important and is exceedingly difficult.

This arises in three different aspects. First of all if, instead of the joint application principle now used, a joint holder was allowed to obtain an advance irrespective of the wishes, knowledge or interests of the other holders, someone would have to know not only what grain there was behind his application but what his true share of that grain really was. It is difficult to see how this could be avoided, and it is difficult to know how the person making the advance could satisfy himself, without information or confirmation from the other interested persons, that the share stated by the applicant was correct.

This would be necessary for two reasons. The first is, of course, that since the advance is made and its amount is determined against grain that the applicant has and undertakes to deliver, he could only rightfully deliver his own true share, errors concerning its accuracy would greatly increase the dangers of overadvancing. Second, the total advances for any one permit book are limited by the grain to be delivered under that book. Hence if a single applicant overdraws by falsifying or misunderstanding the share of the grain to which he is entitled, the legitimate entitlement of other applicants under the same book would be reduced unless the over-all limit for any one farm unit is to be increased in such cases.

Another difficulty would arise in connection with the general lien created by section 10 of the act. At present, with the idea of joint applications the lien relates to all the grain in respect of which an advance payment is made, and in many cases this is probably coincident with most or all of the grain stored on the farm. If separate and independent applications were allowed this would, of course, require a change in the concept of the lien to cover only that share of the grain belonging to each individual applicant.

The third and perhaps the most important difficulty of all relates to the chief way in which advance payments are recovered. Under section 11 of the act, one half of the initial payment for grain delivered under a permit book is deducted and paid to the Canadian wheat board until the advance is fully recovered. This is obviously the best security that could be imposed. At present, with the requirement of joint applications, all grain delivered under the permit book is subject to this statutory deduction irrespective of whose grain is delivered. If individual advances were made in the case of joint permit books without any consent from the other holders, it would certainly be necessary to restrict this recovery provision to grain delivered by the individual recipient of the advance, and then only when he was delivering his own proper share of grain.

This would, I think, make it absolutely essential that the elevator operator receiving the grain—and the wheat board which is taking one half of the payment for itself—would need to be satisfied that the grain belonged to that person. If he were delivering some other holder's share I would think—since the board in effect takes one half of it without any payment at the time of delivering—the board might be liable for conversion of another person's property.

The only practical means of meeting this problem, therefore, seems to be through a joint application signed by all parties possessing a joint interest in the grain as indicated in the individual permit books.

That, Mr. Chairman, constitutes the position we take after the most thorough consideration of this problem. When I made my introductory remarks on this bill I said that, based on another year's experience, if there are adjustments or changes that should be made we are quite prepared to do so provided they could be fitted into the general purpose of the act. As of this moment no one has produced the type of amendment which would meet this particular situation and, of course, the whole thing hinges on the question of what to do when a farmer is in default and who becomes liable. We tried to simplify the problem and related it to the permit book. So far it has worked extremely well, as the figures I gave earlier this afternoon indicate. The percentage of repayments is so close to being 100 per cent that the number of defaulters, if any, will be very limited and we will not face that problem of attempting to assess responsibility except in very few instances.

If too great a burden is placed upon a renter of land we have to get around this problem of responsibility in case of default, and I certainly am open to suggestions along that line. On the other hand, we are very close to a new crop year. We want to make it possible for advances to be made just as early as the farmers ask for them, and the only amendments which have been introduced on this occasion have dealt with the points that were chiefly under criticism during the last several months.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, since I represent a rural riding on the prairies I also am very interested in this problem. In fact it is one of the complaints we have had about this act. The minister has said that it is working extremely well except for those who could not get the consent of the landlord. I think those are the ones we have under consideration this afternoon. Where there is a joint application, could there not be some method by which the permit book is divided in two, one part for the rented land and the other part for land owned by the applicant, so there would not have to be a joint application?

I am quite sure, judging by the remarks of the minister, that his department is going to look into this, and one more session will not make too much difference as far as our constituents are concerned. But it is a problem, and although it does affect very few it is something that we should amend, if not now then the next time the act comes up for amendment.

Mr. Hanbidge: I am sorry I have put the minister to a little trouble in connection with this matter, but there is a problem, particularly where the landlord is non-resident. I was away when the minister introduced the bill and I did not hear his remarks. Realizing that the crop year begins on August 1 and that it will be necessary to get these forms prepared, I certainly do not want to hold up the bill. But I am sure the minister will appreciate that there are cases where the tenant has to get the consent of his landlord who lives in Ontario, or somewhere else in eastern Canada or in the United States, and that this can be quite a problem. It makes it very difficult for the tenant to be able to take full advantage of the act and get these cash advances, but I certainly have no intention of holding up the minister's legislation. As the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has just pointed out, we can see how the legislation as amended works out and then at another session see that the proper amendments are made.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Just before I report the bill I should like to say that in the opinion of the chair this debate on the title has been out of order. It should have been done either on second reading or on clause 1. As the committee rather wanted to discuss the matter I did not stop hon. members, but I want to express my thoughts so that hon. members will be prepared on another occasion.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EXTENSION OF BENEFITS AND CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to extend the benefits of the act and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration thereof.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Are we to hear from the minister?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, all members who come from constituencies in the three prairie provinces are well aware of the fact that for many years past there have been a very large number of complaints with regard to anomalies and inequities which have been apparent as far as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is concerned. Under the terms of the act as it has existed a great many of these have been inevitable. The purpose of these amendments is to remove, as far as it is possible to do so, the situations which have given rise to nearly all the complaints we have had in such large numbers in past years. It is proposed to do this by removing certain limitations in the act and a number of inequities in the method of making payment under the act.

Briefly, it is proposed to remove the six-section block limitation for areas with a low yield adjacent to eligible townships. This will have the effect of qualifying for payment, irrespective of township boundaries, any number of low yield sections in ineligible townships, provided they form a block with a side that is contiguous to an eligible township. It is also proposed to remove the six-section block limitation when excluding from payment high yield areas in eligible townships. The proposal is to exclude from payment any single section of land having a yield of 12 or more bushels, and also to exclude such sections from the computations in determining the category of payment. At present the high yield sections are included in computing the amount of award, and as a result the amount of award is not always commensurate with the yield in the payable area.

Another proposal is with regard to the minimum size of an eligible area. Up to date this has been an 18-section rectangular block. It is proposed to reduce the minimum area to be eligible for payment under the act to one third of a township, that is to a 12-section block rather than the 18 section block which has been in existence up to this time. This applies particularly to what has been known as C blocks, that is, blocks which may cover two, three or four townships.

The exclusion of certain crown lands granted after 1940 from benefits under the act is also considered discriminatory, and it is therefore proposed to repeal that section of the act so that no matter when the land was granted by the crown it will be eligible for Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments.

A further proposal is to make flax and rape seed subject to the 1 per cent levy. Since the growers of such crops also benefit under this legislation it is felt that they, as well other farmers, should contribute to the prairie farm emergency fund. This was one of the quite apparent anomalies in the act. People growing flax and rape seed were eligible for benefits, but there was no levy imposed on their crops as there was on other crops.

Another change to be made is in the definition of "farmer" under the act. Up to date the definition of "farmer" in the act, and the way in which it was interpreted and spelled out in the regulations, provided that a man who had any other source of income or whose main source of income was as an elevator agent, school teacher or some other form of occupation and who also operated a farm was ineligible to receive any award under the act. It is proposed to change the definition of "farmer" in order to remedy that situation, and also to change the regulations. Therefore when this particular amendment is passed and the regulations are changed anyone who operates a farm, except a corporation, will be eligible to receive an award under the act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That would cover a tenant, I presume.

Mr. Harkness: Yes. Tenants, of course, have always been eligible. Anyone operating a farm has been eligible unless he had some other form of business. For example, a large number of elevator agents in western Canada also have quarter or half sections which they farm in the same way any other farmers does; but because they were elevator agents and had a steady source of income they were not eligible to receive payment although they had to pay into the fund. The 1 per cent levy was taken from them. These people will now become eligible. It is not proposed to make eligible corporations such as insurance companies, mortgage companies and so on which may have repossessed land as a result of a lien they had on it.

Another change has to do with flooding. Through the years there has been a considerable amount of complaint in areas where flooding takes place that it was extremely difficult for a farmer whose land was flooded to be eligible unless he was in a very widespread flood area. These complaints came from farmers who suffered from flooding, and who felt that the minimum area necessary to qualify was too large. At present there must be a flooded area of at least one sixth of a township or 3,840 cultivated acres before the farmers can qualify. That figure does not mean simply that much acreage, but that much cultivated acreage. It is proposed to reduce this acreage by making eligible any area consisting of six or more adjoining sections of land where at least one-third of the cultivated acreage is flooded. In other words, eligibility as far as flooding is concerned will be reduced so that if you have any block of six sections that may run along the course of a river and one-third of the cultivated land in those six sections is flooded, then those farmers will be eligible for awards under the act.

Another matter that has caused a great deal of complaint is in those areas where little wheat is grown. Under the act as it is at the present time awards have been made on the basis solely of the damage to the wheat crop. You would have cases in which there would be perhaps only 40 acres or 50 acres of wheat in a whole township of 36 sections, but nevertheless the determination of what the award should be for P.F.A. payment was made on that small amount of wheat. It is proposed to put into effect an amendment which will provide that in any eligible area in which the percentage of wheat seeded is less than 10 per cent, then the predominant crop—oats, barley or rye—may be taken as the crop to be used as the one to determine what the eligibility for award will be.

Those are the main changes in the act or the main amendments which are proposed. There are several others of lesser importance whose purpose is largely to facilitate the administration of the act and which, without the act being before hon. members, I do not think it would be profitable for me to go into at this time.

As I have already indicated, of course, in addition to these amendments it is proposed to revise the regulations established under the act so that they will be in accordance with the amendments which have been made. In some cases the regulations will be changed, although no actual change is being made in any particular section of the act, in order to liberalize the administration of the legislation.

I should just like to say one further word, Mr. Chairman. There is some urgency in getting these amendments through in view of the widespread drought conditions which exist in western Canada this year and which mean that what acreage there is in some areas will be ripening up earlier than usual. Therefore it will be necessary to start the P.F.A.A. program this year earlier than is normal. As a result, it is highly desirable to have this legislation completed in the house as soon as possible so that then there will be time to have the regulations amended, and then to have the necessary new forms which will be required printed and distributed so that everything will be ready to put the program into operation very soon after the end of this month.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the members of the house will do all they can to accommodate the minister in passing this legislation but I am sure that he would expect us of the opposition to make what comments we believe are, in the circumstances, proper and desirable.

Mr. Harkness: Certainly. There is no idea of anything else.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. In the meantime my hon. friend's officials, of course, could anticipate the passage of this legislation by making the necessary amendments in the regulations and at least have that much work ahead of them.

The amendments which are proposed have been indicated in a general way by the minister who has spoken in the committee stage on the resolution. While these amendments in the regulations and at least have that vantages, I think the minister would agree that they are not of a fundamental kind but rather are designed to extend the legislation by simplifying some of the regulations and making it possible to be more generous and more flexible in the granting of assistance. This legislation, of course, makes its appeal to those of us who sit on this side of the house because we have had a long association with this particular measure the purpose of which I think could be described by saying that it was to assist in the rehabilitation of drought and soil drifting areas in the prairie provinces and to provide greater security and stability for agriculture generally.

The basic legislation was passed in 1935. It provided for the payment out of the federal exchequer of some $4.75 million over a five-year period. In 1937 an amendment to this basic act was drafted extending the scope of the program. Provision was made to resettle farmers on better land and poor lands were withdrawn from cultivation and placed under pasture.

Mr. Harkness: That had nothing to do with it. That was under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Herridge: The wrong act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I know. But nevertheless it had a basic and kindred result, as my hon. friend so well knows. A subsequent amendment providing for this legislation, of course, dealt with many of the features in principle that are already contemplated by my hon. friend. I suppose it would be true to say that the basic purpose of this legislation is to compensate for crop failure due to drought, as my hon. friend has said. He has pictured the condition that earns it. However, it has also been used in compensation for hail and other natural hazards for which it was primarily intended. It is now suggested, I think, by those who have spent a good deal of time in studying this particular type of project that the reason why it has not proved completely satisfactory for all the purposes for which it had been applied was that it was used extensively, as I have said, for hail and other natural hazards. It may be that on this account the rigidity has been unduly severe because it is easier to define areas of drought, I suppose, than it is to define areas of hail. I suggest that the legislation before us today might be indicated somewhat by the observations made by the present Prime Minister and by the Minister of Agriculture himself. It may be that some of the suggestions that were made by the Prime Minister in 1957 are being incorporated in the present bill. In any event, we can ascertain that matter when the particulars of the bill are brought before us. However, as reported at page 1472 of Hansard of February 20, 1957, the Prime Minister said:

> My suggestions as to other amendments that might be made are these. First, while the placing of indemnities on an individual farm basis may be impractical, consideration should be given, as far as possible, to the amendment of the act to provide for the payment of indemnity on a section basis.

I am not sure whether or not that is the kind of amendment that my hon. friend has spoken of in a general way. However, it will be very interesting, when we come to the bill, to see whether or not the Prime Minister's desires of 1957 when sitting on this side of the house are now incorporated in the amendment. Then as reported at 1473 of Hansard the Prime Minister said this:

> The question of crop insurance is one that requires a great deal of investigation. If one reads the report of the Saskatchewan commission on rural questions and the report of the Manitoba royal commission one has some idea of the immensity of the problem and all the difficulties inherent in introducing in our country legislation analogous to that in the United States. While I realize that this parliament is now rapidly approaching its end and it is only a matter of a few weeks before it will cease to exist, even now the committee on agriculture might be convened in order to hear representations, consider recommendations and come to a general decision on this very important matter, for sooner or later it has to be faced.

That is the matter of crop insurance. The legislation which my hon. friend has indicated and of which the house is now seized does not, of course, deal with crop insurance, and one is inclined to strongly agree with the suggestion made by the present Prime Minister when he was leader on this side of the house that this matter is one which it is becoming increasingly important to face. The Prime Minister went on to say at this time:

> Third, I suggest that the regulations now in existence should be revamped to a considerable extent.

He does not indicate the extent to which regulations should be amended, but it is possible that some of the amendments about which my hon. friend spoke a few moments ago are along the general lines indicated by the then member for Prince Albert, who was leader of the opposition at the time and who, at page 1473 of Hansard for February 20, 1957, continued as follows:

> I believe that is necessary and I believe that if the committee on agriculture were set up even at this late date suggestions and recommendations could be made by the committee which would lay a foundation for the establishment of a crop insurance plan.

The Minister of Agriculture, who was then the member for Calgary North, said at page 1482 of Hansard for the same date:

> I would hope that when the act is being amended the minister will take the opportunity to correct some of the injustices as far as payments are concerned. I refer particularly to Indians.

I do not know whether my hon. friend has the Indians in mind or not, because he did not indicate that in his main statement, but undoubtedly when we get to the bill we will have the opportunity to learn whether it has been possible for the government to bring forward legislation along the lines which the minister at that time thought desirable.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member does not mind, I might say that that is one of the things which will be dealt with in the regulations. There is nothing in the act which forbids that, but the interpretation of the matter and the way in which the regulations have been drawn prevent Indians receiving payment. There are many people, including Indians, who have not been eligible and this is one of the things with which we intend to deal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank my hon. friend. Then the minister went on to say:

> Another group of people whom I can see no reason for excluding are those covered by section 3 of the act, subsection 3 of which reads as follows:
> "3. No award under this section shall be made—"
>
> And this is under paragraph (c) (i).
> "(i) lands disposed of to a settler or veteran under the Soldier settlement Act, chapter 188 of the Reviser Statutes of Canada, 1927, or the Veterans' Land Act—"

The minister continues:

> Why people who hold land under the Soldier Settlement Act or under the Veterans' Land Act should be excluded from the benefits of this act I quite fail to understand. It seems to be another case of gross discrimination for which there is no excuse. I would make a very strong plea to the minister that he remove that exclusion from the benefits of this act as far as people holding land under the Veterans' Land Act are concerned. As a matter of fact the amount of land any veteran was able to get under the Veterans' Land Act was a small farm, not sufficient to put him in farming in a very big way. They are among the very group of farmers who on the whole perhaps need the assistance or help they can get under a scheme of this kind more than do farmers generally.

There followed some interjections on which I do not need to dwell, but these were some of the views expressed by the minister at that time and it will be interesting to know whether it has been possible for him to carry out his recommendations. I know whether he has or has not carried out this particular recommendation he will deal with it very frankly, as is his usual practice, when we deal with the bill.

I think this is the moment to reiterate what I know has been stated by some hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect that benefits of this legislation should, of course, at some time or other and given the necessary conditions, be made applicable not only to particular sections of Canada but to all parts of the country. I am speaking now for myself and I would say that any legislation which is of benefit to one section of the country but which is capable of application in terms of benefit to all parts of the nation should be made to apply to the nation as a whole and it will be very interesting to have the minister's observations on this suggestion.

It may be that the most effective way of dealing with the matter is to respond to the request now being made, according to my information, by a growing number of people all over the country for the establishment of a nation-wide system of crop insurance. This view is one which has been expressed by my leader, who proposed a national system of crop insurance generally financed by the provincial and federal authorities with municipal assistance in respect of its administration.

It seems to me the time has now come to urge the convocation of a federal, provincial and municipal conference to discuss the possibility of such a scheme and to set experts to work preparing for it. I hesitate to suggest such a meeting between the federal and provincial governments because of the great difficulty we have had in getting the federal government to reconvene the meeting with the provinces in respect to fiscal matters, but it may be that we could bring about that important result by these ad hoc arrangements, one of which was provided by the Minister of Labour the other day when municipalities, management and labour met with the departments of labour of the various provincial governments and with the federal Minister of Labour in order to discuss the important matter of unemployment.

As I said a moment ago, this matter of crop insurance seems to me to be increasingly capturing the attention of a large section of the public and in view of the heavy contributions made by the Canadian taxpayers generally to groups of Canadians of various occupations for one reason or another, it seems to me that in the matter of crop failures due to acts of God and the like, this might be regarded as a very effective way of providing the kind of assistance needed.

I do not know if the Minister of Agriculture recalls this, but I was very interested in some correspondence I had with him and a very frank telephone conversation between us on the matter of the great damage suffered by farmers in a certain section of Canada which will not be affected by this legislation. These farmers suffered the loss of millions of dollars as a result of crop damage due to very serious damage by hail stones. This was in a section of the country in the east and, based upon statements made in the election campaign of 1957 to the effect that the federal government would provide assistance for such crop failure, I had written to the Prime Minister reminding him of his promise through one of his spokesmen during that election. I pointed out the nature of the damage and the millions of dollars loss suffered by the farmers and I asked him to implement his pledge. The Prime Minister replied saying that the matter would be looked into and at the same time one member of this house who comes from my section of the country made an announcement that the matter was also being looked into by the government of the province of Ontario. We have heard nothing more of this, and the province of Ontario has not acted.

Then I confronted the Minister of Agriculture who, quite properly, pointed out that there were constitutional practices in this country and that as long as he was Minister of Agriculture the responsibility for looking after individuals should be shared in the way I have indicated—that they should be looked after first by their own municipality and then if the municipality was unable to help, by the province. Only then, in his judgment, could it be expected that assistance would be provided by the federal government. As I say, I think that is a correct statement of the constitutional practice.

But that is not what was said by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe who was the spokesman for the government on that occasion in the town of Essex when the farmers in that area were assured that the government would come to their assistance in the event that their crops suffered as a result of storms or acts of God.

So in order that we may deal finally with situations of this sort, possibly the minister could find occasion during the discussion of this bill to indicate what the government's intentions or thoughts may be with regard to crop insurance generally. It would be a relevant matter to discuss in respect to the amendments being provided to this bill, a bill which undoubtedly has given much satisfaction and contributed considerably to the well-being of the farmers of the prairie provinces.

Mr. Peters: We should like to thank the minister for the amendments that are to be introduced as indicated in this resolution, and we should like to take the opportunity of suggesting that some further improvements could possibly be made in this legislation.

I should on my own behalf like to suggest that the minister give consideration to extending this legislation to farmers in areas other than the prairies, because although the problems are not similar, the results are. In my area we are more apt to be troubled by rain than by lack of it, but this type of legislation would be advantageous in Ontario as well as elsewhere. In view of the rise in costs which has taken place in recent years, an increase which has affected farmers in particular, we would like to suggest that the amount of compensation be increased to $6 an acre and that the deductions be increased to as high as 3 per cent in those areas which have proved to be very high risk areas.

We appreciate the fact that the zoning has been changed, thereby eliminating the rigidity that formerly existed with regard to the large township areas, and we think that much good will accrue to farmers who are in an area on the boundary of a good area and who were in the past eliminated from the possibility of obtaining assistance under this act.

Mr. Rapp: Speaking on this amendment I should like to say in just a few words how welcome the changes will be in my constituency. I want to deal particularly with the change pertaining to flooded areas. A few years ago many sections of my constituency were flooded and since the size of the farms, or the area, had to be very large to get any benefit from this Prairie Farm Assistance Act, it was impossible. Now since the changes are such that the size is quite a bit smaller I think these changes would be very well appreciated in my constituency and welcomed.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has certainly been very helpful in the past to the prairie farmers. I have a few observations to make about the advantages of that legislation, which has been of real benefit to farmers in western Canada.

This legislation was enacted to give assistance to farmers who suffered damage as a result of drought, floods and other natural causes. Eastern farmers are in favour of the measure but would like it extended to the whole of Canada.

Eastern farmers, like western farmers, suffer damage from those same causes. In fact, I remember that last year some farmers in my neighbourhood lost their entire crop as a result of a storm. Not only did they lose their crop but their farm buildings also suffered considerable damage, such as broken windows, and so on, and some of their cattle were injured. In short, after the storm they had absolutely nothing left, not even enough potatoes or vegetables for their own use. Therefore, they lost the fruit of a whole year's work and consequently were very badly off financially. It is for that reason that we would like to see that legislation extended to the whole of Canada.

Like the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), I would like to see crop insurance inserted in that legislation. I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) has referred to this many times in January, February and March before farmers organizations. In fact, he said at the time that he would introduce legislation on crop insurance. Unfortunately, the house has yet to hear about it. In my opinion, the minister had an excellent opportunity to elaborate on this project when he introduced his amendment, because I believe that crop insurance would be complementary to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

We urge the minister to take this into consideration; in putting forward these recommendations, I am expressing, I believe, the views of our eastern farmers.

(Text):

Mr. Speakman: Since the constituency I have the honour to represent is entirely agricultural and depends entirely on agriculture for the livelihood of all its constituents, I was very interested to hear the amendments proposed to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and I should like to take this opportunity to compliment the minister on a very forward looking change in this outdated act which we have been using.

The proposed amendments will, in my opinion, remove at least 95 per cent of the complaints received last year concerning the administration and use of the act. Perhaps one of the greatest complaints received last year which is now being straightened out concerned high yield acreages in eligible areas which received payments while low yield acreages in various constituencies and townships received no payments. High yield acreages in eligible areas will no longer receive payments.

Perhaps one of the most forward looking amendments is the reduction of eligible acreages which has long been a bone of contention. I commend the passage of this resolution to the committee so that it can get into operation in time for the 1958 crop season.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before proceeding, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he knows why crown lands granted after 1940 are excluded under the present act?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the reason for that was a very firm belief on the part of my predecessor in office that for the most part these crown lands were poor lands which should not have been put into cultivation and therefore it was a wise thing not to make payments on them because it would encourage more poor land being put into cultivation which should have been left in grass.

Mr. Pickersgill: I may say that was also my understanding. Of course, the act was passed, if I recall correctly, before 1940.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): 1935.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman will find it was later than 1935. P.F.R.A. was 1935 and P.F.A.A. was later, but before 1940. This was not excluding any land which was occupied at that time by farmers. It was a precautionary measure with relation to future grants and it was at a time, as I am sure the minister will recall, when we still lived in the shadow of the great droughts of the thirties which I think both he and I can remember very well. It was felt that no encouragement should be given to the farming of land which because it had not been settled before 1940 was presumably in most cases marginal land in the first place.

I wonder if the minister has satisfied himself that this would not have the result of people going into areas—we all know there are a few people who would do this kind of thing—and seeding them in a sort of fashion not for the purpose of getting a crop but for the purpose of getting a crop out of the treasury.

Mr. Harkness: In actual fact most of the lands granted after 1940 were not these submarginal, dried out plots of land at all but up in the Peace river country and the more northerly areas of Manitoba and Saskatchewan where the yield has generally been heavy. In addition to that there was a list of exemptions as far as those crown lands were concerned and the result of this has been that there has been a difficult administrative problem. It has cost a lot of time and effort and therefore money to show whether any particular quarter section was or was not excluded. My officials inform me that the cost of doing this is much greater than the amount of money that would be involved if we paid on everything. Also, as I say, there is a very clear indication that a severe inequity exists in that most of the lands granted after 1940 were not sub-marginal lands but land that is among the best producing land in the three prairie provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not want the minister to think I am opposing this at all and I am sure he is right about the lands that are now occupied. I wondered if the minister had satisfied himself that the result which his predecessor feared could not operate in the future and whether he thought of the possibility of saying that no crown grants made after 1958 would be eligible in order to meet that contingency or whether he thought it was not at all a serious contingency?

Mr. Harkness: No, I do not think it is. As a matter of fact, all these sub-marginal lands now reside in the crown either in the right of Canada or in the right of the provinces. Those taken over by the provinces and the dominion are now in community pastures or something along that line for the most part. I think there is little chance that any of that land would go back into private hands and thus become eligible.

I should like to say a few words about some of the statements which have been made during the course of this debate. The hon. member for Essex East quoted some statements which the Prime Minister made and some which I made when we were in opposition. I am glad to see that he is carrying on research of that kind and I am sure it will be very profitable for him—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can assure you it is very difficult.

Mr. Harkness: —and thereby he will gain quite a wide acquaintanceship with a large number of subjects with which I am sure he did not have an opportunity to become familiar whilst he had the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare on his shoulders. Among the statements the hon. member for Essex East quoted was one concerning crop insurance which is a matter that must be faced. I thoroughly agree with that. The hon. member is doubtless aware that ever since I have been Minister of Agriculture I have stated repeatedly that one of the big forward steps we must take in order to improve the general situation of agriculture in Canada is to institute a comprehensive system of crop insurance. I also think he is aware that in answer to questions in the house I have said on many occasions that an extensive study of crop insurance is being conducted in the department. It has been proceeding for some considerable time and I hope we will be able to introduce legislation in that regard in the not too distant future.

The hon. member also mentioned that perhaps a dominion-provincial conference should be held with respect to this question of crop insurance. The hon. gentleman will recall that approximately two months ago a meeting was held in Ottawa of all provincial ministers of agriculture. One of the matters discussed at that meeting was the question of crop insurance. I might say that the result of that meeting has been to complicate the situation because a number of provinces expressed no interest whatever in a system of crop insurance. I might point out that some provinces were interested, others were lukewarm and others displayed no interest at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the way it is in the matter of fiscal relations.

Mr. Harkness: No. But what it means, as I think the hon. member is aware, is that in order to introduce an acceptable system of crop insurance it makes it very difficult to find a scheme which would be applicable in the various provinces to ensure that no province would have a complaint because too much money was being expended in another province, and so on. There is no doubt but that the extreme variability of climatic conditions across Canada makes the matter of a general dominion-wide crop insurance scheme an extraordinarily difficult problem to solve. However, as I say, we are working on it in the department and I hope that in the near future we can introduce legislation in respect of a crop insurance scheme.

Another statement made by the hon. member for Essex East which was also referred to by other hon. members was that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be extended to all parts of Canada. In that regard I would merely point out that the great difficulty is how to make the levy. How would you collect the payment the farmer makes in connection with this? As far as the three prairie provinces are concerned it is very easy because grain is all handled through the wheat board. The levy is deducted by the wheat board and paid into the fund by the board and so it is a very simple matter to make collection of the levy but in any other part of Canada the question of collecting the levy from the farmer comparable to the 1 per cent levy collected on western grain would present very great difficulties as I think hon. members will readily appreciate. It would be an almost impossible practice to put into operation particularly as most agricultural producers in other parts of Canada derive the major portion of their livelihood through livestock or livestock products rather than through crops as is the case in western Canada.

That is one of the great difficulties as far as extending this particular scheme to other parts of the country is concerned. I do not think it would be a practical proposition. That is another reason why I think we should have a system of crop insurance.

The hon. member for Essex East also referred to certain damage that took place in an area of his own constituency. All I can say in regard to that is I do not know what statements the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe may have made prior to the 1957 election but, as the hon. member himself said, he is well aware of the fact that damage to a small area or damage to an individual has always been and must be, under our constitutional system and practice, looked upon as the responsibility of the municipality and of the province and then if it is damage of such an extensive nature that the province is not able to handle the matter, it applies to the dominion government for assistance. This was done in the case of the Red river flood at Winnipeg; it was done in the case of the Cabano fire and in various other instances, but the matter of expecting—I do not think the hon. member himself really does expect it—the dominion government to come in and pay damages of individual farmers in a small area is something that would be hopeless and impossible for us to do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was pointing out the assurances that had been given and I said the Prime Minister had seemingly followed along with them but that I thought that the Minister of Agriculture had taken the correct constitutional position.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Timiskaming made the statement that the C.C.F. also thought that the amount of the payment should be very considerably increased, up to $6 an acre. I think that is what he said and at the same time that they could be paid for by increasing the levy in certain areas to three per cent. Now, what that would amount to would be to convert this from a drought relief scheme, essentially, to a farm crop insurance scheme and it would be an attempt to convert it to a system of crop insurance without having any basis to go on as to what land should be on the one per cent levy, the two per cent levy, the three per cent levy, and so forth. The result, of course, would be that it would cause a great deal more dissatisfaction than the type of system we have had, with all the faults which were inherent in it. In other words, if we are to put in a system of crop insurance—which I certainly trust we shall do—it should be done in a reasonable and proper way and not by attempting to say that this particular section of the province of Saskatchewan will pay three per cent and this section will pay two per cent, and so on, because I am quite sure in those circumstances you would create nothing but dissatisfaction and difficulties.

I should like to thank some of the other hon. members for the remarks they have made in regard to what the effect of those amendments will be. I feel quite convinced myself that when these amendments are in effect they will remove the greatest percentage of complaints which have been current in years past. I might state, which I did not before, that the cost of those various amendments is estimated to be around 20 per cent increase in the amount of money which will be paid out under the act in a normal year. In other words, sufficiently more people will be eligible who had not been eligible before so that there will be about a 20 per cent increase in the amount of payments made.

Mr. Boulanger: When the minister spoke about crop insurance he said that it would be difficult to collect the levy in the eastern provinces because in the west the collections are made by the wheat board. In the province of Quebec I think the collections could be made by the farmers organizations. L'union catholique des cultivateurs de la province de Quebec now have life insurance and automobile insurance but they do not have crop insurance. I am pretty sure they would be interested if the minister would talk to them and I am pretty sure that they could make the collections for crop insurance in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Harkness: I can only point out to the hon. member, as I did before, that this is not a system of crop insurance; it is a form of drought relief essentially and is not a system of crop insurance. It is the type of thing which is applicable really only in the prairie provinces where you do have widespread drought. As I said before, I trust that in the near future we shall have a system of crop insurance which would be applicable throughout the country.

Mr. Houck: Mr. Chairman, the minister referred to the fact that he had a conference with the other ministers of agriculture of the various provinces of the dominion. I was wondering whether the minister recalls the attitude of the minister of agriculture of the province of Ontario? When I refer to that I am speaking especially on behalf of the fruit and vegetable growers of the Niagara district, Essex, Kent and Leamington, and those other places which as the minister knows, have to depend a lot on the weather just as do the prairie farmers. In fact, an early frost in the fall could damage at least 40 per cent to 50 per cent of the crop. I was wondering whether the Minister of Agriculture showed any interest in this type of insurance for that type of crop?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, those meetings which have been held periodically by the provincial ministers of agriculture are confidential. If I start to say what each minister of agriculture thinks in connection with crop insurance I am quite sure the hon. member would see that it would cause a great deal of difficulty and it would make it impossible to hold another conference where people would express themselves freely. For this reason I do not think it is advisable to make any statement in regard to what the ministers of agriculture of the different provinces felt in regard to this or any other matter.

Mr. Fisher: I want to ask the minister one question. Is the difficulty in extending this sort of assistance beyond the prairies purely an administrative one or are there principles involved that get in the way of including any other parts of the country?

Mr. Harkness: The chief difficulty is that there is no basis of making the levy in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Fisher: In other words, it is strictly technical.

Mr. Harkness: It is much more than technical. As I said before, the thing is that the livelihood of most farmers outside of the prairie provinces comes really from livestock production or livestock products, dairy products, poultry and what not, and those products are marketed in scores of different ways. Therefore, it is an absolute impossibility to make any sort of fair levy, which you can make in western Canada on the grain which is produced because it is all handled by the wheat board.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was a study not made by Professor Drummond of the Ontario Agricultural College of this very point? I wish I could remember the details of it. I do remember seeing a reprint of it, I think it was in the "Canadian Political Science Quarterly". He acknowledged that there were these difficulties but that a formula could be arrived at. I just merely mention that for the minister's consideration.

Mr. Harkness: I am not familiar with that, but anybody who has studied this matter will agree that the only thing that could possibly be used in most parts of the country is some type of crop insurance in which you would have a premium the same as you have in any insurance policy, and the amount of premium would vary greatly from area to area and possibly from one type of crop to another. The premium on a tobacco crop, for example, would be much greater than the premium on a hay crop, and so on.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harkness thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-40, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIMITS ON COMPENSATION FOR SLAUGHTERED CATTLE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to remove the statutory limits on the amount of compensation for cattle slaughtered pursuant to the act, except when slaughtered pursuant to area or herd disease eradication programs, in which case the limits are to be increased.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill to be introduced is to amend the rates of compensation for cattle ordered slaughtered as a disease control measure under the authority of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. As the act now stands, compensation is authorized at their market value for all classes of livestock except horses and cattle. In the case of cattle there is a statutory limitation on compensation at a maximum of $100 for purebred animals and $40 for grade animals.

There are two types of circumstances under which cattle may be ordered slaughtered and compensation paid. One has to do with spasmodic outbreaks of serious diseases which do not normally exist in Canada such as the foot-and-mouth outbreak in 1952. It is desirable that the owners of animals slaughtered in such instances should be compensated at market value. That has not been the case up to date. All cattle were compensated for at the regular rates laid down which I have just indicated.

The other circumstance under which cattle may be ordered slaughtered and compensation paid has to do with area or herd programs for the eradication of diseases which are established in Canada. Examples of that are the tuberculosis eradication program and the recently instituted one for area testing and eradication of brucellosis.

It is not considered necessary or desirable to compensate owners at full market value for cattle ordered slaughtered under such programs, but the maximum compensations now permitted by the act are felt to be inadequate under present conditions. I might say that these limits were established quite a number of years ago and since that time prices of cattle generally have increased. Therefore it is felt to be only fair and reasonable that the rates of compensation should be increased in a way somewhat commensurate with the increase in the price of cattle.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When were the basic rates fixed?

Mr. Harkness: The basic rates were fixed shortly after the first war. It just happens that at that period cattle were a relatively good price. Otherwise the rate of compensation would have been extraordinarily badly out of line with the price of cattle during recent years.

The effect of the present bill will be to permit the payment of compensation at market value for cattle ordered slaughtered in the control of spasmodic outbreaks of serious diseases and to raise the maximum compensation under the tuberculosis and brucellosis eradication programs to $140 for purebred cattle and $70 for grades. I might say that the bill is a very simple one of one clause for the purpose of increasing the rates of compensation as far as cattle are concerned under the herd testing programs.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the increase for purebred cattle is to $140. I do not know whether the minister is aware that for some few years now the price of purebred cattle has been from $400 to $1,000 for good purebred cows. I wonder whether the minister would consider increasing the amount from $140. The same holds true in the case of grade cattle. If you want to buy a reasonably good cow today you have to pay $150 to $250 but under this legislation farmers will only get $70 when cows have to be slaughtered. I think the minister should consider increasing the amounts to $125 for grade cows and to $200 or $250 for purebred cows. When a farmer loses his cows he has to buy others and he is not able to replace the slaughtered cows.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harkness thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-41, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS MOUNTAIN OIL PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, July 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Broome for the second reading of Bill No. S-6, respecting Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): On Friday last, Mr. Speaker, I was drawing my remarks to a close at six o'clock and I have but one or two other comments to make on this bill. The house will recall that I had just entered the phase of my discussion that dealt with the representations that had been made to those of us in the C.C.F. by the officials of this company and the admission by the officials that probably one of the main reasons why the stock rose from its original value of $10 to something in the neighbourhood of $140 was that they did not place on the market more of the original shares which they had in the treasury. The opinion was expressed that perhaps if the company, in the first instance, had allowed for the sale of more of their original 5 million shares on the market the price of the shares would not have gone as high as it did and they would not have had to come to parliament last year and again this year asking for a five-to-one split.

We have a number of questions which must be answered but unfortunately I do not think the officials of the company can answer them, for certainly those officials have no control over the movement of share prices on the market. There is no guarantee by the officials of the company that if this stock split is allowed under the present system of selling shares the general public will get an opportunity to participate in buying more shares. There is no guarantee that these shares will not be offered privately to the same oil companies that now have the bulk of the shares in Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company. There is no assurance either as to what will happen when the stock split takes place. Past records will show that when a stock split has taken place in other companies there has been a tendency for the price to go up again to what it was before the stock split took place. We have no assurance at all that this rise in price will not develop again and that the public interest will not be unprotected.

As we submitted earlier in 1951 when this company was originally incorporated and as we submit now, there is only one way in which to protect the interest of the public with respect to the operation of this particular oil pipe line and with respect to its sister organization the gas pipe line and that is to classify them as utilities and operate them under public ownership so that the public gets the fullest possible benefits from the operation of that profitable industry.

Those are my remarks, Mr. Speaker. It is true that they have been spread over three different days and that a number of questions have been raised. I am sure the bill will pass second reading. When it gets to the committee the members who are on the committee will have an opportunity of raising these questions with the officials of the company who are there. I hope that they will undertake to elicit information about these questions that have been raised and will undertake, as best they possibly can—inasmuch as the company is not publicly owned—to ensure that the interests of the general public will be protected all across the board.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

EILEEN ROSE BROWN PORTEOUS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. SD-154, an act for the relief of Eileen Rose Brown Porteous.—Mr. McCleave.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all the divorce bills this afternoon be allowed to stand until later this week. As far as I know, in none of these divorce cases has the evidence been distributed to the members of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that these divorce bills on the order paper, items Nos. 39 to 72, stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order stands.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING RETURNS SHOWING INCOMES OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-18, to amend the Canada Elections Act (election expenses).

He said: First, I must express my appreciation, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member who seconded my motion for second reading. I refer to the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis). As outlined in the explanatory notes, the purpose of the bill is as outlined in the explanatory notes. Basically it is this. The Canada Elections Act at the moment, as hon. members know, provides that each candidate must file with the returning officer in his constituency a return setting out the sources of income for that candidate's campaign and also setting out the expenditures that are made on behalf of that candidate in respect of advertising, transportation and similar related costs in the conduct of the election. Unfortunately, though, the act at the moment does not make any provision for the declaration of income or expenditures by the central parties themselves.

We all know very well what happens. A candidate in declaring the source of his income—which I think must be properly treated as public information—can hide the true source if he has knowledge of it, or if he has not knowledge of it he can merely indicate that part of the contribution to his election campaign came from a central party headquarters, no matter which party it might be. The purpose behind the bill, as I said, is to provide that the national party headquarters, the national office of the particular political party, also be required to make a return indicating the source of their income, the amount, and whether it is in cash or whether it is as payment by some other outside group for services rendered to that particular party's operations.

I will undertake to get some statistical material as it relates to the province of British Columbia from returns filed by candidates in that province representing all of the political parties which ran candidates. We have from the province of British Columbia, of course, only two of those parties represented here in the house at the present time. It is not my desire to place on the record the source of income as declared by each individual candidate, whether or not he be elected.

One of the interesting things which was discovered as a result of this information, which incidentally is available to any member of the general public who wants to pay 20 cents in order to get it, was that with respect to the Conservative party and Liberal party declarations of sources of income, the major portion of the contributions to the campaign of an individual candidate was listed as coming from party headquarters. As far as the Conservatives were concerned, the figures ran in amounts such as $4,500, $10,000, $6,000, $7,000, $5,000 and so on. The major portion of contributions to the campaign of individual Conservative candidates in the province of British Columbia are listed anywhere from $4,000 up to $10,000 and the source is declared as either the Progressive Conservative party provincial headquarters or a private accounting company by the name of Field and Company in Vancouver, which was probably a bookkeeping agency hired by the Conservatives in order to keep track of the vast amount of money which they received in order to operate the last election.

The main issue is that there is no compulsion under the act for the candidate to declare the source, because he may not know where the money originated, but also that there is no compulsion on the central party to indicate where it gets these thousands and thousands of dollars with which to run a campaign. Certainly if political parties are to operate to the best interests of the general public then there must be an accounting to the general public as to the source of campaign fund contributions. If it is equitable that a candidate must declare the names of individuals or companies from whom he receives contributions and the amount of such contributions, then it is equitable that the national party itself should make a similar declaration to the general public as to the source of its income. We all know, I am sure, of the bible phrase, "Where your treasure lies there lies your heart also."

One of the unfortunate parts of the operation of elections here in Canada and even more so in the United States is that large industrial concerns and financial corporations, huge monopoly or semi-monopoly interests which want to ensure that the party forming the government will be partial to their ideas can easily and probably do make contributions in large amounts of money towards the campaign of any particular party. I am not saying because they make these contributions that any particular party will perform some sort of skulduggery to ensure that legislation passed is in the interests of the people who make such contributions, but it naturally follows that the party concerned will look upon those who contribute to it as friends and that the legislation it passes will be drafted with this in mind.

The general public, in the long run, pays for every political contribution made, whether it be to the Tories or to the Liberals. It is made by large business concerns but the general public in one way or another pays, in the final analysis, for all contributions made to the so-called free enterprise parties. Therefore the general public should have an accounting as to the source of such income. Without going into too much detail this is purely and simply an expansion of the principle already laid-down in the act as it applies to individual candidates. Certainly if it is just that a candidate must show to the general public the sources from which he gets his campaign contributions it is equally just that the central parties make a similar declaration.

I rather expect, Mr. Speaker, that in the ensuing moments before six o'clock some other hon. members may have some comments to make on this bill, which I do hope will be given the support of the house. We all know from past experience that public bills in the hands of private members have very little chance of speedy passage through the house; invariably discussion is still going on at six o'clock and a vote is not taken on the bill. However, as I expressed myself on another bill standing in my name, which has been dealt with and which has not yet been voted upon by this house, I am not adverse to deferring second reading of this bill and having the subject referred to the committee on privilege and elections where it could be discussed and studied in more detail than is possible in committee of the whole house.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Most certainly.

Mr. Drysdale: I was wondering if this bill was more motivated by the amount of campaign funds supplied to the other two parties and if the hon. member perhaps felt that the lack of success of the C.C.F. party was as a result of the insufficiency of the money it received?

Mr. Howard: There is no doubt that if you have—

An hon. Member: Through the Speaker.

Mr. Howard: I naturally at all times speak through you, Mr. Speaker. In answer to the question just posed there is no doubt that if, as it is reported, the Tories had spent something in the neighbourhood of $7 million to $8 million more on this last campaign, there is probably no limit to the effect on society of the man in the grey flannel suit of the huge advertising agencies, but the motivation behind this bill has nothing to do with the relative numerical position of the parties in this house. Nor has it anything to do with the support they have received during the last election or in any preceding election. It is merely a desire to expand the principle of asking candidates or official agents for candidates to make declarations as to the source of their incomes. As I say, if it is just that the general public should have that information from candidates then it is even more just, and more sensible, that they should have similar information from the national parties themselves.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a supplementary question?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I will permit my hon. friend all the questions he desires to ask.

Mr. Drysdale: As a point of interest. I was wondering if the hon. member could state how his expenses related to those of the other candidates within his particular riding?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I cannot admit that question as being relevant to the matter under review.

Mr. Howard: I would be most pleased to answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, I merely wonder if the hon. gentleman would give us the chapter and verse of his biblical quotation?

Mr. Howard: I did not hear the question, I am sorry.

Mr. Brundsen: I would like it very much if the speaker would quote the chapter and verse of the biblical quotation used?

Mr. Howard: I am sure the hon. member knows full well that Mr. Speaker cannot quote things of that nature.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, while the essential motive of the hon. member proposing it appears quite clear, I felt I would like to suggest to hon. members that the purpose and the language of the bill is very indefinite. As a matter of fact, I say that this bill in its present shape, even to accomplish the limited purpose defined by the proposer, is in such woolly and indefinite language that it would create more confusion and be subject to more varying interpretations than is the present act.

First of all, let us look at the wording of the bill. It says in clause—

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to stop the hon. member discussing the principle of the bill by dealing with the details, but I would remind him that this is second reading and that it is the principle of the bill which is under discussion.

Mr. Lambert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for drawing my attention to that. However, on the question of the principle of the bill, it aims at a declaration by the central committee of a party as to the sources of its revenue. I am wondering just what the hon. member means when he says "central committee". I can think of any number of central committees in a political party. Is it the national central committee? Is it provincial? Is it city-wide? Is there a regional committee? What committee does the hon. member call a central committee? Even on the basis of the limited language of the bill, there is no indication as to what is meant by "central committee" and therefore I say right away that the bill is bad for uncertainty.

Another matter that I find very difficult to comprehend is just what funds a political party must account for. Are they funds used only for the purpose of meeting electoral campaign expenses, or are they funds that are gathered in between election campaigns, and again, since this is aimed at the matter of electoral expenses, how can we determine that the funds which are obtained from varying sources in between election years are allocated to definite election expenses?

The proposer of this bill feels that all political parties, including his own, it would seem, come into an election campaign with their coffers bare, devoid of any funds, when the writ is issued; that the funds are collected, and then wholly spent. In this bill, and from the explanation given by the hon. member, the funds referred to are those used for election expenses, and here again I say that it is impossible to determine just what funds were collected—and from whom—and spent for the purpose of an election. On a second count, therefore the bill is bad for uncertainty.

A third point is that it says "a political party". Now just what does a political party consist of?

Mr. Howard: John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Lambert: Is it a national party, is it a regional organization, or does it consist, in the case of an independent candidate, of a committee of two or three? I know of one man who presented himself for election and he was his sole committee. Was he a political party? There is no indication anywhere in the bill that would throw any light on this point. Hon. members who have had experience in a number of political campaigns will know that when they have had to deal with independent candidates—and good independent candidates—that these, too, have had resources. If the hon. member wants a political party to disclose the sources of its funds he must also insist that independent candidates should disclose the sources of the funds used for their election. It is quite simple for an independent candidate to arrange his affairs in such a way that he receives his funds from, shall we call it, the John Doe committee. Is that the central committee to which the hon. member refers in his bill? Is that committee a political party? I believe I have demonstrated on this score a third point on which this bill is most indefinite and indecisive.

I do not know just what the proposer of this bill feels he is going to unearth—whether he feels that there are some grave national scandals which will emerge from it on the assumption that you know a party by its friends. I believe that it is part of our democracy that the individual, if he is so minded, can donate anything to a party if he so desires, or $5, $10, $500 or even $1,000 to a particular candidate if he wishes to support that man. The proposer of the bill is fully aware that elections cost money; they cost money in varying amounts depending on the type of constituency and the desires of the candidate as to the sort of campaign he wishes to wage. Surely if we have the right of a secret ballot, which is a way of supporting a candidate, we also have the right to secret contributions from members of the public in support of a candidate.

Mr. Howard: That provision is in the bill already.

Mr. Lambert: I am still saying that if an individual wishes to make an anonymous contribution he can make it to a central committee within a local organization. Yet this bill if more clearly stated would force that contribution to be disclosed. On this principle anyone could be asked the question: how did you vote in the last election?

Mr. Howard: I voted C.C.F.

Mr. Lambert: You may be an individual voter, I do not know. But I earnestly submit that the purpose of this bill does transgress the right of any individual or organization in this country to support whatever individual party or individual candidate it desires. This is part of the hemming-in rigidity and conformity which follows some of the thinking of the hon. member's party.

I know there are other difficulties. I have seen it in the last election. In the city of Edmonton there was a public nomination meeting for the three candidates of the C.C.F. party to represent the three Edmonton ridings. After the nominating meeting was held the hat was passed around and it was reported that the sum of $600-odd was collected which would be sufficient to meet the deposits of the various candidates. This appeared in the press and therefore I am not disclosing any hush-hush secret. That money was furnished to the candidates by a central committee. The hon. member's bill seeks to ask that central committee to divulge the source and the names of the contributors to the fund. Every one who dropped something in the hat would have to include his name with the contribution. One cannot reconcile the logic of the hon. member's bill and the regulations—

Mr. Howard: I would submit there is more logic in the bill than there is in your argument.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member's bill asks for a declaration or disclosure of the sources of funds by a central committee. If a central committee of a political party is asked to divulge its sources of revenue, surely to goodness when it passes the hat the C.C.F. party is in the same position as any other.

I understand that in the city of Sudbury during the last election campaign, and perhaps prior to it, there was outside the pay offices of the International Nickel Company a type of receptacle much like those used by the Salvation Army at Christmas with a sign asking men to contribute to the campaign of the C.C.F. And still this bill seeks to have divulged the sources of funds and the names of contributors.

Mr. Howard: Declared as meeting collections and accepted.

Mr. Lambert: It is very easy to defeat what is sought to be accomplished by this bill. It would be easy to organize a meeting of contributors to a political party, gather them in a small room or hall and go about with a hat collecting cheques or bills. It is all the same. I would submit that this bill has so many loopholes, contains so many points that are vague, nebulous and not clearly defined that it could not accomplish the purpose the hon. member has in mind.

The hon. member says he wants political purity. When we speak of political purity I am reminded of a bill which was introduced in this house in 1938 by an hon. member of the other place. It was known as Bill No. 90. I understand that its popular name at that time was Power's political purity bill. According to my research it was introduced on March 28, 1938. The bill had a checkered history. It was debated on first reading and then sent to a committee. Presumably the committee had some discussion on it but at the same time they had before them another political purity bill which apparently occupied them at greater length. The committee reported that because of the contentious nature of the other bill they had before them they had not been able to consider Bill No. 90 for any length of time and therefore could not report much progress. Parliament was prorogued and that is where Bill No. 90 died.

As a matter of fact that bill went much further in purpose than does the one before us. It sought to have the moneys received by a political party paid into a specific bank account and stipulated that payments of all kinds by a political party should only be made from that one bank account.

Mr. Howard: What has that got to do with this bill?

Mr. Lambert: I am indicating that there have been predecessors to this particular bill. I am attempting to draw a comparison between the principles of the two bills. The hon. member might perhaps be interested in knowing something about the other bill.

Mr. Howard: How do you know that I do not?

Mr. Lambert: It is possible. The first object of Bill No. 90 was to make traceable and provide a public record of all receipts and expenditures for political purposes. The second object was to limit expenditures which may lawfully be incurred in promoting the election of a member. Some discussion took place about the limitation of expenditures which is not germane to the discussion this afternoon. If one considers the length and complexity of Bill No. 90 one can assume that some hon. members at that time felt that the problem existed which it is suggested by the hon. member for Skeena now exists, that there is something nefarious about politics and that political activity must always be carried out in the open. And that was so, as I have indicated before. To me there is as much value and right in keeping my contributions to a political movement anonymous as there is in keeping my vote anonymous. My contribution to a political movement represents a contribution in support of the ideas I hold.

The hon. member appears to be out after corporations and people who because they have the "limited" behind their names are in the category of big bad wolves threatening our economic and social life. I would ask him this question: what about contributions that are made to his own party from that and other sources?

Mr. Howard: That is what the bill covers.

Mr. Lambert: It might be interesting to know, admittedly, but on the other hand people might not be interested in finding out.

Mr. Howard: We have consistently made them public.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman who introduced Bill No. 90 as recorded in Hansard, volume II, of April 5, 1938, at page 2025. I intend to quote only briefly from his remarks. The hon. gentleman said:

> I agree, and I presume this will be urged during the discussion, that we must not go beyond the lengths to which public opinion would want us to go. . . . It must have the support of the public, and this particular legislation must have the support of the persons most directly interested, namely, members of parliament. Otherwise it cannot be of any effect. I am quite aware it will be urged that you cannot make people honest by act of parliament.

There is much truth in that latter statement. If my hon. friend feels that we can legislate the people into morality, then I suggest to him and to this house that this bill misses the mark very widely.

I believe I have shown in the few moments during which I have spoken, that the amendments proposed in this bill to the Canada Elections Act contain so many loopholes that they would in no way clarify the law or improve election practices but would create more confusion and give greater opportunities for abuse.

On that score, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the bill, on the brief notice we have been given, is not one which should be considered in its present form by this house. I would suggest to the hon. member that he withdraw the bill, and if he wishes to consider his purpose more closely that he sit down, along with learned counsel who may assist him, and devise provisions which would make this bill rather more definite so that we could come in and say, "all right, we think this will accomplish the purpose". Honestly, Mr. Speaker, in its present form I do not think this bill will serve the purpose of getting at the source of imagined trouble which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) thinks exists and so motivates his thinking. In all earnestness I ask him to withdraw his bill and bring it in at some other time, when we have a committee on privileges and elections. We must before long go in the matter of revision of election practices. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has something on the order paper which has to do with elections and I believe the hon. member for Skeena has another in connection with the straw vote.

Mr. Howard: No.

Mr. Lambert: Then, it is one of his colleagues. We are facing here a sort of scatter-gun campaign.

Mr. Pallett: Scatter-brain.

Mr. Lambert: Somebody suggests "scatter-brain". This is a matter of taste and interpretation but I would look upon it more as a scatter-gun campaign which I do not believe will accomplish anything worth while. If there are defects in the Canada Elections Act—and I would agree with hon. members that there are defects in certain sections—then, we should sit down in committee at the appropriate time and with the advice of the appropriate officials discuss these matters in their entirety. We cannot discuss the effect of certain other aspects of election practices within the ambit of this bill. When we have the whole election act before us we shall have an opportunity perhaps to redress some of the grievances that the hon. member for Skeena believes do exist, and there may be some. On that score, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must oppose the principle of this bill.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has covered this subject very completely, and he has set forth several suggestions that I intended to put forth myself. In the few minutes that are available I hope I will not repeat too much of what he has put forward. This subject is one which is obviously prominent in the minds of hon. members because most of us have been through two elections within the past year. This refers not only to the expenses which the member himself has incurred but to those which the party has incurred as well.

I wonder whether this bill is aimed at the contributors or at the party? Perhaps it is a little of both. I think that if it is aimed at the contributor it is an effort perhaps to pin him down. Perhaps it is well known that some contributors manage to contribute to two or more parties. Theoretically there is nothing basically wrong with that if the contributor feels that it is his duty to see that the platforms and the literature of all the parties are put forward equally, but that is the theoretical basis. I think the practical basis is —and I think this is what the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has in mind—that perhaps some of those contributors, in supporting two or more parties, are just playing it safe. I believe they are perfectly entitled to do so if they feel that this will achieve what they expect. However, this brings up the second question to which I wish to refer. If there is any suggestion that those contributions amount to something corrupt or that practices coming from them are contrary to public morals, then I would say there is something to be concerned about; but there is no suggestion—at least I heard nothing in the introduction of the bill—that there is corruption and therefore it is not necessary to go ahead on the basis that we must pin those people down.

I feel that any legislation which tends to limit the rights of the public to do as they like, any legislation that tends to regulate what a person may do in general terms, must be justified. This is an instance of regulating the contributions that a contributor may make to a political party in the same way, as mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton West, as revealing his vote or finding out which party he supports. Any such legislation that restricts or regulates the rights of private individuals or corporations must have some justification and must be necessary in the public interest, before this house should see fit to carry it.

There is another matter. That concerns the definition of a political party. The bill makes no attempt to define a political party in a manner which would meet a good many of the situations which arise. We know that in this house there are three recognized political parties. I would suggest that in the case of these three parties perhaps they can be readily identified and their national headquarters can be identified; but there are many people who run in an election under a variety of party names. If one person forms his own party and runs, is he a political party or is he merely an individual? I think that he is not a political party at all. Let us suppose, that two or more people are running on a similar ticket with a similar name. Would they become a political party? I think there is a possibility that they might be. There are always a number of people who run, as far at least as their public declarations are concerned, as independents. I think we must recognize that there is no independent party, as such, and therefore all the people who call themselves independent I submit should not be recognized as a party.

Mr. Howard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Aiken: Yes.

Mr. Howard: I am just trying to help him along until six o'clock, that is all. Does the hon. member realize that the definition in the bill which defines a political party is taken from the provincial elections act of British Columbia and has operated for some years to define political parties without any difficulties?

Mr. Aiken: Not being from British Columbia I am afraid I am not aware of that fact, or whether or not it is a fact. Nevertheless I accept the hon. member's statement that this definition is contained in the British Columbia act, but I have no knowledge of the working of that provision or the extent to which it has been satisfactory. Furthermore, I think it probably has no particular cogency in this house.

There is one other thing I was about to mention having to do with the fact that on the ballot papers there is no indication as to political parties. I know that my hon. friends in the C.C.F. group have advocated that party affiliations be shown on the ballot papers but that is not the case now and I feel that it is not desirable. How then can we determine to which party a candidate belongs when he runs on an independent ticket or as the candidate of a party not generally recognized?

Finally, may I say that I am not raising these matters as a smokescreen behind which to hide, because I am not in favour of the bill. There are many practical problems involved and they would result in fairly broad changes in the principles we now follow in this country. Therefore I am not in favour of the bill as it now stands.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as everybody knows, elections cost money.

Mr. Habel: That is what Mr. Duplessis says!

Mr. Martineau: It seems that, when the time comes around for federal elections, a certain number of contributors always turn up at the right moment and provide what are referred to as "the sinews of war", and the campaign is on.

As for the bill proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), I recognize that it is no doubt inspired by a certain spirit of idealism, which I cannot criticize and I therefore congratulate the hon. member for bringing about a discussion on the contribution of electoral funds. However, I do not believe that the bill will accomplish its purpose, since it purports to change, as it were, to a certain degree, human nature itself.

There is already in the Canada Elections Act a parallel to the bill now proposed by the hon. member for Skeena. I mean the report which all candidates are required to fill as regards contributions received and expenses incurred. However, in spite of all the precautions taken in the Elections Act to give a definition of numerous offences, often subject to very serious penalties, everybody admits that the reports filled in by candidates and their official agents, as to their expenses, are not complete.

I do not say that candidates or their agents send in reports which are deliberately inaccurate, but there are a thousand and one ways of eluding that provision of the act which, for all practical purposes, becomes inoperative and, in my view, encourages a certain hypocrisy.

Hon. members also know that many expenses specifically prohibited by the Elections Act are made just the same, not by the candidates or their official agents, but by other people who take part in elections and spend money for purposes which, under the act, are illegal. We know it and I believe that if this bill goes through, the same situation would prevail. The parties would, as a matter of form, send in reports stating amounts of official contributions. However, beside this official accounting, there would be an unofficial accounting, and a large number of contributions would not be accounted for.

I also feel that we should oppose this bill for the sake of public morality. If it went through, it would indeed give many people an opportunity to violate an explicit provision of the Elections Act. That is, in my view, one of the objectionable features of this bill. There are of course many others minutely described earlier by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

I think it would be impossible in practice to apply this legislation. That is why, in spite of all the statutes that are enacted, the matter of electoral funds and expenses, not only of political parties, but of candidates, is always surrounded with mystery. Despite the inadequacy of the present system, there have been no suggestions of dishonesty or evidence of contributions made for the express purpose of illegally obtaining political advantages after the elections.

12. That the excise tax on special editions of non-Canadian periodicals imposed by Part II of the act be repealed.

13. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of June nineteen hundred and fifty-eight.

The Deputy Chairman: I rather assume perhaps, as you have done in the past, although it will be one resolution, for discussion purposes we might go through it item by item. The first one is No. 1 (a). Is there any discussion on this item?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask you a question just so that we will clearly understand the procedure that you have suggested. You suggest that the general discussion should be on what item?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think you are suggesting that there ought to be general discussion; but in keeping with the practice that has been followed on budget resolutions, while under this heading of Excise Tax Act there is one resolution, what you were suggesting was that we should follow the practice we followed with reference to the resolution respecting income tax and treat it as one resolution but call the paragraphs seriatim.

The Deputy Chairman: So it is clause 1, paragraph (a) which takes in from (i) to (viii). There are eight parts in it.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the hon. member for Essex East was trying to be helpful.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course he was.

Mr. Chevrier: What I was inquiring about was whether it is the intention to take the whole resolution or to take clause 1 (a) and go through it and dispose of it and then go to clause 2.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I take it that what you have called now is the whole resolution but for convenience of discussion and in order to contribute to orderly discussion you are calling the paragraph numbered 1 in the resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: Paragraph 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance this question. If he were discussing the question of the excise tax on automobiles, under what item would he discuss it if he were sitting on this side of the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I were sitting on that side of the house I would realize that there is nothing in this resolution with regard to the excise tax on automobiles and I would know that if I attempted to discuss that subject I would be completely out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We want to help my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thank you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is now engaged in tactics that are certainly not calculated to promote the swift disposal of the matter. Certainly one is entitled to discuss something that is not provided for in this particular resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Bourque: Can the minister tell me when the time will come to discuss article (b):

Certain goods sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale, as follows:

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do it right now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps it would facilitate matters Mr. Chairman, if you would call paragraph (a) now and if there is no discussion on paragraph (a), call paragraph (b); then my hon. friend would have the opportunity of discussing the matter to which he refers.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 1, paragraph (a) which takes in items (i) to (viii).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think that the proper place to discuss the particular matter I have in mind, along with others, particularly at this moment, namely the failure of the Minister of Finance to provide for some reduction if not the elimination of the excise tax on automobiles would be at this very stage in our proceedings and I propose to do that unless the Minister of Finance, who seems to be concerned about our procedure, can offer some valid explanation as to why I should not do so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend knows that the place where he can raise that subject for discussion, and where indeed he did raise it, was in the budget debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, we did that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; he did so there. Quite so. It was proper to do so there. That was the place for my hon. friend to raise objection to the omission from the budget proposals of something he thought should have been there provided. We are now on the resolution respecting the amendments to the Excise Tax Act. There is in this amendment nothing that says anything about the excise tax on automobiles.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is my point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What my hon. friend is proposing to do is to start another budget debate and, with great respect, Mr. Chairman, I submit that is completely out of order in this committee of ways and means when we are dealing with these resolutions. You have the rule binding in committee that the discussion must be relevant to the item before the committee; and there is nothing in this resolution that says anything about the excise tax on automobiles. This matter has been discussed before, Mr. Chairman. The same point arose when the first of the budget resolutions was called in committee of ways and means. The same issue arose there and the chairman corrected some hon. gentlemen who sought to engage in another budget debate. If my hon. friend were right, Mr. Chairman, it would mean that every time you called the budget resolution with respect to the amendment of one of the taxing acts anybody would be quite in order in starting another budget debate over what he considers to be the shortcomings of the budget with reference to proposals affecting that particular act. We have before us a resolution that deals with a number of specific proposals for amendment of the Excise Tax Act. In my respectful submission discussion must be relevant to the terms of the resolution before us; and according to the orderly procedure that has been settled in these cases it must, in my submission, be relevant to the particular section of the resolution that is immediately before the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I speak again to the point of order, Mr. Chairman? I think there can be no question as to my right to discuss this matter on this resolution. The authority for so doing lies, of course, in the practice of this house and the rules of this house. The resolution states:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

My hon. friend makes a number of points. One of them was that the opportunity for engaging in this discussion resides in the budget itself. My hon. friend will recall that during the budget debate I took advantage to make reference to this matter, along with other matters. But there can be no question of the right of an hon. member in discussing a particular act to suggest in the course of remarks that he may choose to make that the measure is faulty in that it does not include items which the member may feel should have been included. That is precisely my position now. That is also the position which my dear and hon. friend took on May 18, 1954. If he will look at Hansard—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You had better see whether he took it successfully or not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will deal with that matter when I deal with the substance of what I have to say. If my hon. friend will look at Hansard for 1953-54 at page 4815 he will find that the minister of finance then presented the motion dealing with the amendments that he had in mind with regard to the Excise Tax Act. We find this:

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

My hon. friend used the same resolution on that occasion as that which is being used tonight, and which has always been, as I am seeking to do. Then after the resolution was introduced there followed a preliminary statement by the minister of finance. Then, as found at 4817 of Hansard, my hon. friend began to discuss his amendment to the Excise Tax Act and in the second paragraph on the left hand side of the page he said this:

The matter I should like to mention, sir, is not to be found in the resolution as such. My purpose is to express regret that no action has been taken by the Minister of Finance in regard to the matter.

Then he referred to the matter which he specifically had in mind, namely the exemptions from sales and excise taxes. My friend spoke at some considerable length—no, I am wrong, on that occasion he was to the point—but the fact is that he did resort to the precise procedure which I am now following and that, Mr. Chairman, is certainly an excellent and highly authoritative precedent for the action I am taking.

An hon. Member: Was there a ruling on it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No objection was taken for the simple reason that there could be no exception taken except by one who for some reason or other was anxious to pass, surreptitiously and too quickly the measure he was asking us to approve.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now that my hon. friend has spoken to the point of order, may I challenge his statement that the course he now proposes to follow is in keeping with the practice of the house. The fact is that two years ago this issue arose just as it is arising now and that was the occasion for a ruling by the Chairman, who was deputy speaker at the time, and which is to be found in Hansard for April 3, 1957. The house was then in committee of ways and means on a resolution respecting an amendment to the Income Tax Act, which resolution was preceded by similar words as is the present resolution, namely:

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

And then followed some nine paragraphs setting forth detailed proposals for amendments to the Income Tax Act. The hon. member for Greenwood, as financial critic of the opposition, began to make certain remarks of a somewhat general nature concerning the Income Tax Act and the failure of the budget to make provision for relief from the burden of that act. He was challenged by the then minister of finance who said in effect that the hon. member was making another budget speech and then on the second page of the discussion the chairman intervened. At page 3022 of Hansard of April 3, 1957, this is what the chairman said:

Order. May I intervene here to say that I believe to some extent we are repeating what would more appropriately be said in the budget debate. I have not interrupted the hon. member up to this point because I thought he was laying a groundwork for discussion of this resolution but I must point out to the hon. member that we are now discussing the resolution with regard to income tax which is very confined and set out in numbered paragraphs. I do not believe that a general speech of this kind is in order.

If I allow latitude to the hon. gentleman I of course must allow latitude to other hon. members to reply and we are in committee governed by the strict rule of relevancy. I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the proposals which are set out in this particular resolution.

What could be more clear than that, Mr. Chairman? A specific ruling two years ago by the chairman of the committee, who was then the deputy speaker, the late Mr. Robinson, and who said on that occasion that the hon. member who was speaking must confine his remarks to the proposals set out in that particular resolution.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is a sound and binding ruling which completely meets the point raised by my hon. friend. It is not only, as was mentioned by the chairman on that occasion, that if the latitude sought by my hon. friend is accorded to him it must also be accorded to all hon. members of this house, but there is also the point that the Excise Tax Act deals with hundreds upon hundreds of commodities and chattels and if discussion is permitted on anything in that act then we might as well reconcile ourselves to being here for months. If my friend, the hon. member now discusses something not contained in the budget resolution—and the words "automobiles" or "motor vehicles" are not to be found in this budget resolution—then he or any other hon. member of this house is perfectly in order in discussing any one of the hundreds of items to be found in the schedules to the Excise Tax Act.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the ruling made in April, 1957 is sound and binding and completely precludes my hon. friend from following the course he has indicated he wishes to pursue.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I speak on the point of order. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, who has just spoken, in past years has invariably taken advantage of his privilege to speak on this stage of the discussion of the budget resolutions. I think it was in 1956 that he himself was given a privilege in this house to the full extent of 40 minutes—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no.

Mr. Benidickson: —to discuss why, in a resolution relating to the Excise Tax Act, the government had not seen fit to deal with the Carter commission. In addition, this particular problem arose on July 10 of this session and you, Mr. Chairman, said, when as it happens I spoke on that occasion, that I should make no general observations about the budget but that I was perfectly at liberty to refer to things in and things which should be in the resolution before the committee. That is recorded at page 2113 of Hansard of July 10 of this year.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if I might be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. With reference to the argument of the Minister of Finance, I would like to draw your attention to the speech made by the hon. member for Greenwood as recorded at page 3021 of Hansard for April 3, 1957, where he said:

> I wish to make one general observation about the minister's budget.

Then follows a lengthy argument about the budget; not about income tax at all, but about the budget, and throughout the whole of this discussion it continues in this vein. That was the point on which the chairman was ruling, and I would like to read the following paragraph to illustrate my point:

> The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond complained when speaking in the debate that I had failed to appreciate the various functions a modern budget can perform—

That is the sort of remark made by the hon. member at that time; it was a general budget speech that was being delivered and the objection was taken to that very point. The ruling was that the hon. member's remarks must be confined to the resolution and in this respect I would draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the rule itself, Rule No. 59 (2):

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The item under consideration is that it is expedient that the committee pass judgment on the wisdom of introducing a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act, that is to say, whether or not an item should be introduced to amend that act. Perhaps it should not be introduced because it is going to be defective because it does not deal with articles that should be dealt with and I submit for these reasons it is quite clear that any discussions limited to excise tax items which should be or should not be in the amendment are relevant.

Mr. Crestohl: If it is intended that the debate should be limited strictly to those items listed in the resolution that means that there is no meaning whatsoever in the words "among other things" I think the minister should at least inform the house what is meant by the words "to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, among other things." I think those words are superfluous if the debate is to be restricted only to what is listed in the resolution, and I respectfully submit that the words "among other things" open the door wide for us to debate any matter which has to do with the Excise Tax Act. We have had one such experience quite recently in connection with the Dominion Succession Duty Act, with regard to one very brief paragraph. But we have received a bill containing close to 60 sections, and I respectfully submit we should be able to debate under this heading anything which we can possibly visualize as being brought in under the act, and this would be provided for by the phrase "among other things."

Then, too, if the minister should say that we cannot now go into these matters because he interprets it as being another budget debate, I would suggest that in the budget debate speeches are limited to 40 minutes, and inside those 40 minutes an hon. member is expected to cover four different budget resolutions. I submit that to debate four different resolutions a member of the house should have the opportunity to debate each one for the full length of time.

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to speak about the point of order.

Mr. Crestohl: I am talking about the point of order. I am suggesting we should be given the full period of time in which to talk about each one of these resolutions, because we do not have that facility in the general debate on the budget.

The Deputy Chairman: It is, of course, up to the Chair to follow the regulations set out here, and with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Ottawa West, standing order No. 59 does say in section (2):

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Now this is an amending act, and when you amend an act it does not open up the discussion of the full act. All hon. members realize that. The Chair wants to be as generous as possible, of course, in order to help the thing go through, but we cannot let this grow into a debate on the entire Excise Tax Act, and therefore I will have to ask members to limit their general remarks to items that appear in this amendment. There is no other way, and that is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: With the greatest possible respect, Mr. Chairman, if I may refer to one observation you made in your ruling, this is not an act or a bill, but a resolution asking us whether it is expedient that a bill be introduced and surely what we are debating here is the acceptance of what is to be put before us or some different course, otherwise there would be no point whatever in having a resolution. I would, of course, agree with the view taken by Your Honour if this was a bill under discussion, but there is no bill before us, and no act being amended as yet. What we are discussing is whether there should be a bill.

The Deputy Chairman: I realize this is a resolution—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of your ruling, and the importance of this question, may I suggest that Your Honour, who always does his best to devote painstaking care to these matters, may want to give further consideration to the point which has been raised. The Minister of Finance, commenting on what I said, really did not touch the point—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order. The ruling has been made. Surely, Mr. Chairman, you have made your ruling and it is not open to the hon. gentleman to argue the point.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Essex East realizes that the Chair has made its ruling and that the matter is disposed of unless anyone wishes to take it further.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I regret I will have to appeal your ruling.

An hon. Member: Get the flag.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea) resumed the chair, and the acting chairman of the committee (Mr. McGee) made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, in committee of ways and means, when the committee was considering a resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act, the chairman ruled that, in accordance with standing order 59 (2), the debate must be relevant to and confined to the provisions of the proposed resolution, whereupon Mr. Martin (Essex East) appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea) put the question as follows:

[The Deputy Chairman.]

The question is an appeal to the house from the ruling of the chairman of the committee of ways and means, as follows:

"In committee of ways and means when the committee was considering a resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act, the chairman ruled that in accordance with standing order 59 (2) the debate must be relevant to and confined to the provisions of the proposed resolution, whereupon Mr. Martin (Essex East) appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair."

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): This is not debatable.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard not on the point—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There is no right to be heard.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes there is.

Some hon. Members: Closure again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When the Speaker is on his feet no one has the floor.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee:

On clause 1.

The Deputy Chairman: We are on clause 1, items from (a)(i) to (viii).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; we are on the general discussion. I have a submission to make. We are now dealing with the general resolution. Mr. Chairman, I move that the resolution be amended by adding thereto a subparagraph in the following wording:

That the excise tax on motor vehicles be repealed.

Mr. Chairman, I am now ready to speak to the proposition which I have put forward.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, would you please put the motion? Would you read it, please?

The Deputy Chairman: It is moved by Mr. Martin (Essex East):

14. That the excise tax on motor vehicles be repealed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that amendment is so clearly out of order that I find it difficult to speak with restraint—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —when it is put forward by a member who has been in the house now for nearly 20 years and yet puts forward an amendment as completely and clearly out of order as that one.

Mr. Chevrier: Why don't you speak to the point of order?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Every member knows perfectly well that no such amendment may be moved, except by a member of the government, as it affects the balance of ways and means and consequently, like all the resolutions contained in the budget, requires the royal recommendation. This matter does not even require discussion. It is so palpably and obviously an attempt to circumvent the rules of the house for what is thought to be a political advantage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to deal with the last observation made by the Minister of Finance. He knows perfectly well that there is a duty on those of us on this side of the house to do what we think is in the interests of the nation and of our constituents. I could well ask you, Mr. Chairman, to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw what he said but I am not going to. The hon. gentleman said that he spoke in reply to my proposal with restraint.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not in reply; I was speaking on the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Many of us had occasion within the last few minutes to give careful consideration to the desirability of restraint with regard to procedural matters that have taken place in a most unusual way in this house tonight.

Mr. Benidickson: We did not ask for a flag.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on the point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —before my hon. friend tears any more of the rules of the house to shreds and tatters it might be well to remind him that it is completely out of order to reflect on the vote of any hon. member of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: You cannot raise a point of order on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend, of course, dismisses the right of an hon. member to take the course I have taken by using a series of adjectives, none of which, of course, was based in any way upon the rules of the house. My hon. friend did not refer Your Honour to any rule of the house. He simply said that it was so obvious that my motion was out of order that it required no comment except the whole series of characteristic adjectives that flowed from the lips of my hon. friend. I refer Your Honour to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, 1958, No. 265 on page 221, which is in these words:

> No member other than a minister of the crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the house—

I would call these words to Your Honour's attention.

> —enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility.

I will make no comment about the implications of that with respect to the right of those of us on this side or in any quarter of the house to discuss the taxation policy of the government, but I would call Your Honour's attention particularly to the final sentence.

> This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. On the question of whether or not this motion is in order, in the opinion of the chair it is not relevant and therefore is not in order. There is nothing in this amendment about automobiles.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, whenever the untrained seals have completed their noisemaking—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: With the greatest possible respect to the chair, surely the excise tax, the one now under consideration, is the tax which does in fact impose this impost on motor cars and surely, therefore, it is a mistake on Your Honour's part, quite an honest one, I feel—

An hon. Member: It has been disposed of.

Mr. Pickersgill: —to suggest that this does not come within the ambit of the act which the minister is now proposing to have amended.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, you have made your ruling and the hon. gentleman is simply seeking to argue over a ruling that has already been made.

The Deputy Chairman: May I point out to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that what he says is certainly relevant to the Excise Tax Act but it is not relevant to this resolution which has to do with certain amendments to the act. The chair has made its ruling and certain courses are open to hon. members. Shall we continue the discussion on clause 1?

Mr. Pickersgill: I accept Your Honour's ruling without any question or reservation whatsoever. I should like, therefore, to address myself to the motion now before the house. The motion is that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and I say, sir, that it is not expedient to introduce this totally inadequate measure which is being proposed by the Minister of Finance. I say that the most obvious of the inadequacies which make it most inexpedient for us to be asked to do this is the total failure of the government to do anything about the excise tax on motor cars which is imposed under this act.

The Deputy Chairman: I know that the hon. member was in the house, knows what has transpired and is aware of the ruling of the chair. We cannot make this discussion an automobile runway through the house at the moment and I must ask the hon. member to address himself to the resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall endeavour to comply with the increasing limitations and restrictions imposed by this government, which went to the country to restore the rights of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and which is now exhibiting what it meant by restoring the rights of parliament. Surely what British parliamentary history was about was the right of the House of Commons to decide what imposts should be imposed upon the people. Here we have a Minister of Finance with the arrogance to say that what he says is expedient we have got to accept as expedient without any question, that we cannot discuss whether he has chosen the right way or the wrong way to do this, that we simply have to rubber stamp this limited, inadequate list of things totally at variance with what the minister promised from one end of the country to the other in two general elections. In other words, sir, the word "expedient" in any dictionary that I have ever looked at, if it means anything, means "advisable".

This course is advisable or it is not advisable. Surely it is impossible to discuss that matter without discussing alternatives. As I say, it seems to me that since the most important perhaps of any of the imposts in the public mind imposed under this tax—and one which, incidentally, the government promised either to take off or substantially reduce—is not comprehended within this resolution, it makes a mockery of parliament, of our procedure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and of our whole parliamentary procedure if we are to be gagged and circumscribed in this fashion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must ask the hon. member to come back to this resolution of the amendment and not to wander away from it quite as much as he has done.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he thinks that the public will be satisfied and will consider it an expedient thing to do to remove the sales tax on chimneys instead of removing it on motor cars, particularly as this tax is not even being removed on all chimneys but only on chimneys not in fireplaces.

An hon. Member: What about rat poison?

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I ask the minister whether he thinks that the public is going to be satisfied—the public to which he made these sonorous promises in those booming organ tones with which we are so familiar—to have the tax taken off cornices, friezes, and pilasters and other units or members of wood milled for use as structural or architectural building components, not including assembled or unassembled cabinets, cupboards, furniture, ironing boards, work benches and similar installations. If the minister thinks that this kind of puny reduction is going to satisfy the people who were promised that the excise tax on motor cars was going to be taken off, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. Ricard: This is just a start.

Mr. Pickersgill: Moreover, if the minister thinks that ash handling—

An hon. Member: What is going on now?

Mr. Pickersgill: I forbear to make the obvious reference to ash handling, Mr. Chairman. If the minister thinks that the removal of the sales tax on ash handling and fuel handling equipment—I suppose the fuel handling equipment is to lift coal that is no longer being mined in Nova Scotia—will satisfy the public. If the minister thinks that the public will think this is as good as taking the tax off motor cars, I think the minister had better not go back to the public again for a while.

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, of course, perhaps he has come a little bit nearer to what would be expected when he proposes to take the tax off fuel oil tanks for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings and connected directly to such furnaces. But now here is one that will certainly give a thrill to the average man who expected the cost of motor cars to be reduced. This is something that is going to give him a thrill when he finds that the sales tax is going to be taken off latch sets, master key cylinder blocks, knobs and hinges.

Mr. Ricard: Is there anything about bubble gum?

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, Mr. Chairman, we come to something that I think will have an almost universal appeal from cape Bonavista right to Estevan point. The tax is to be taken off hard surface plastic laminated building materials. I have no doubt that it is a very good thing to take the tax off these things. I have no objection to it whatsoever. But I suggest that it is a rather inadequate substitute for what before the election—and particularly before the election a year ago—the public were told they could expect from hon. gentlemen who are now sitting on the treasury benches.

Mr. Ricard: What about bubble gum?

Mr. Pickersgill: Then we have another one. The tax is to be taken off underlayment material for hard surface floor coverings for permanent bonding to floors. Of course, the sex appeal of that is evident to every hon. member and it will no doubt have a tremendous appeal to the people of Canada. Then finally we have this one:

(viii) Articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of the foregoing.

I do not know what is used in the manufacture of the foregoing, and I imagine that matter is going to present certain difficulties to the tax gatherers.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the municipalities are going to be grateful for this very small, miserable pittance that is to be offered to them compared with the total removal of the sales tax on purchases by municipalities which hon. gentlemen promised when they were on this side of the house.

Mr. Ricard: They did much better than you have done.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another example of what happens when people talk before they think—

Mr. Churchill: That is happening now.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and promise before they understand. Then, Mr. Chairman, we have this one:

(c) certain agricultural, horticultural and forestry goods as follows:
(i) stock conditioners, condiments and food supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds:

An hon. Member: Very funny.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not funny at all. It is undoubtedly a very good, small, insignificant tax reduction—

An hon. Member: Like yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: —for which a few people will be quite grateful. But it is certainly not what the people expected when they voted to have the tax taken off motor cars. Then we have this one:

(ii) goods enumerated in Customs Tariff item 417: "Machinery and apparatus and complete parts thereof and structural iron and steel, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported for use exclusively in the construction or equipment of factories for the manufacture of sugar from beetroot, or for receiving sugar beets, under regulations prescribed by the minister;"

I have no doubt my friend the hon. member for Essex East will be happy to vote for this small bit of relief for the people in his part of the country, but it is not something that is going to have a universal appeal. I have a feeling that the people in the counties of Kent and Essex would have preferred to have the tax taken off motor cars even if they had to go on paying the sales tax on this machinery and apparatus not made in Canada.

Then we have this one, and of course it will appeal to all lovers of trees all over the country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps, as some hon. gentleman suggests it will appeal to more than lovers of trees. We have:

(iii) individual tree guards and tree protectors not exceeding thirty-six inches in height;

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, why not 37 inches?

Mr. Kucherepa: Why don't you check it yourself?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder why the minister took 36 inches? I think that matter can be left to the public imagination.

An hon. Member: We will leave it to yours.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then of course we have: "cut flowers". I am surprised that it appears the flowers may be of any colour and not merely blue ones. Once again it seems to me that this is reminiscent of other days which were sad days.

An hon. Member: Liberal days.

Mr. Pickersgill: This will not bring a thrill to the hearts of the ordinary people of Canada who hoped and expected and believed that if they voted for the Minister of Finance and his friends they would have the price of motor vehicles in Canada reduced.

Mr. Benidickson: Also shoes and clothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then we have materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of grain or seed feeding machines and parts thereof, but I will leave this for the hon. member for Assiniboia to discuss at the appropriate time.

Mr. Kucherepa: He is not here.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I suppose he is in the same place as your leader.

An hon. Member: And yours.

An hon. Member: They know all about the next one!

Mr. Ricard: You had better call on the C.C.F. to help you.

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe I caught the remark of an hon. member opposite to the effect that I ought to know all about the next one. I do not know that I would be particularly proud to be a member of a government the symbol of whose budget is the reduction of the tax on rat poison.

An hon. Member: And bubble gum in your time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am only too happy to leave the Minister of Finance to his own rat poison. These are apparently all the repeals. Then we have the second section which is certainly the kind of section that a person who wanted to buy a motor vehicle at a lower price than he is now paying would find more than adequate as compensation for his disappointment.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What did your government do?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, good heavens, Mr. Chairman; good heavens.

Mr. Kucherepa: That staggers you.

Mr. Pickersgill: We are in this house to debate the ambit of this resolution and the hon. member, the aspirant for the position of parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, now proposes to debate the record of the previous government. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, in raising such an issue he is out of order.

I suggest, furthermore, that it is doubtful that this second section will provide the compensation, the heart balm the minister apparently thinks it is going to provide, especially in respect of the exemption of fruit juices, which consist of at least 95 per cent of pure juice of the fruit, which exemption is to be extended to fruit juices consisting of at least 85 per cent of the pure juice of the fruit.

Mr. Kucherepa: Go drink some orange juice, Jack.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Tory government is not satisfied merely to water down its promises but now it is going to water down our fruit juices. However, here we have something which has perhaps a little more appeal if my first glance has not deceived me, and it may be that after all there is something hidden in this amendment which will be a compensation to the people of Canada. Here it is:

That the wording of the exemption for "bases or concentrates for making beverages other than soft drink beverages—

Apparently we cannot have cheaper motor cars but we can make beverages other than soft drinks and can console ourselves in that way, but I must say I find it an odd provision for the present Minister of Finance to be putting into the law.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member had better read the whole section.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is to be changed to read:

Bases, not including fruit or imitation fruit bases, for making non-alcoholic—

Once again a disappointment—

Mr. Kucherepa: Are you disappointed, Jack?

Mr. Pickersgill: It reads:

Bases, not including fruit or imitation fruit bases, for making non-alcoholic food beverages;—

An hon. Member: You talk as though you had been into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is speaking out of his own vast experience and so would no doubt be able to tell. It continues:

—fruit bases or fruit concentrates for making beverages, when sold in containers not exceeding ten ounces and consisting of at least 85 per cent of the pure juice of the fruit.

I do not know whether it should be pure fruit juice or pure juices of the fruit. No doubt that is a distinction, as the hon. member for Kootenay West would say, without a difference.

Next we come to paragraph 4, which seems to me will hardly compensate the present aspirants to motor vehicle ownership for not having the tax taken off which the Minister of Finance promised when he was on this side of the house. When such people read that instead of this tax reduction which they expected what they are going to have is an exemption on flavouring extracts—as a matter of fact there seems to be a lot of flavouring in this resolution—in foodstuffs under schedule III, which is to be changed to read:

Food flavouring extracts, emulsions and powders, not including those for beverages.

I think he is likely to be slightly disappointed. The popular appeal of that particular tax reduction will be obvious, and I use the favourite word of the Minister of Finance, to all who read, but I must say I do not know myself what it means.

An hon. Member: That is understandable.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then we come to another section which I admit is a concession of a very sensible nature. This is that desks and chairs designed for classroom use do not have to have a particular design. I realize I have taken a certain amount of the committee's time but I think perhaps if I had been allowed to express myself in the way I originally wished to do I could have said what I had to say much more briefly. Since I am forced to be strictly relevant to the motion before the committee, however, it does somewhat delay my progress. I must say the puritanical note in this particular section does rather astonish me.

Mr. Benidickson: Upholstery!

Mr. Pickersgill: Whether the Minister of Finance has himself always had a hard seat I do not know but why children should be denied upholstery if the school boards want to provide it for them I cannot understand.

Mr. Benidickson: Or the whole school, for that matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: The next paragraph, I think, must have been very close to the minister's heart because it seems to deal with refractory materials, and I could well understand why the minister would want to remove the tax on refractory materials because there are no materials which the minister handles better than those and in my experience there is nothing much more refractory than the most conciliatory of the minister's speeches, and those which are less conciliatory are even harder. Then we come to materials consumed or expended directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods which are to be clarified and brought into line with the exemption for fuel for lighting or heating, which excludes fuel for use in internal combustion engines. I have no doubt the minister will explain that it is a good thing—

Mr. Benidickson: This is going to cost the taxpayers more money.

Mr. Pickersgill: —since he will not take the tax off motor cars, to make sure that he keeps it on the fuel that is used in the motor vehicles. Apparently that is the only object of this section of the resolution if it has any meaning at all.

And now we come to something that is not hard to understand from this government. Advertising sheets, local bulletins, local circulars and similar publications are to be excluded from the exemption for newspapers unless they have qualified as newspapers enjoying second-class mailing privileges. Evidently, the only kind of advertising that is to be free of taxation in this country is the advertising of hon. gentlemen opposite.

In the next section it is provided that certain goods enumerated in item No. 848 continue to be exempt from sales tax by listing in schedule III of the act the following tariff items under which these goods are being regrouped by customs tariff resolutions No. 399a and so on. I will not take the time of the committee by reading that. Again, it seems to me that this may have a useful and limited purpose, but that is very far indeed from what we were led to expect would be done in the first budget brought down by the Minister of Finance after all the promises we have heard in two succeeding elections. It seems to me that the rest of the provisions of this section have no real meaning at all so far as the general public is concerned.

An hon. Member: There are 13 of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend suggests 13. Item 13 says:

> That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the 18th day of June, 1958.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

I thank the hon. member for Cartier for having reminded me of a day that will go down in Canadian history as a day of dupes.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, coming from a constituency where the people are mostly workers and farmers I wish to say that what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been saying tonight is just harmful to our people. Those exemptions that are listed here will benefit the small people and it is unfortunate that a former member of the late government should be able to stand up here and complain because our present government, the Conservative party, is bringing some help to the small people. I do not intend to speak very much, and those fellows who hate the province of Quebec and who take every opportunity to run down their own province should shut up.

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to refer to the items in the amendment, and he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Robichaud: Give us some more natural gas.

Mr. Ricard: Would you tell that gentleman from Nova Scotia who knows nothing about the province of Quebec to shut his mouth while we are talking?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he withdraw that last remark.

Mr. Pickersgill: Particularly as all Nova Scotia members are Tories.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, the man is from New Brunswick and not from Nova Scotia, so—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just spoken used words which are offensive and which are against the rules of this house when he said that an hon. member should shut his mouth. Those words are unparliamentary, and they should be withdrawn.

The next point is that the hon. member referred to hon. members from Nova Scotia, and most of the members from Nova Scotia, in fact all of them, are on the other side of the house. Your Honour asked the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot to withdraw and I think, on those two grounds, that he should not only withdraw but amend the offensive words he used when he asked the hon. member to shut his mouth.

The Deputy Chairman: I asked the hon. member to withdraw his remarks and I understood that he had, in fact, withdrawn them.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ricard: Could I ask the member to remain quiet?

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Deputy Chairman: Did you withdraw those words?

Mr. Ricard: With respect to your order, sir, I will. I am not surprised to see the hon. member for Laurier coming to the rescue of his friend over there because the hon. member for Laurier came to my constituency, and the very fact that he did so—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must ask the hon. member to keep his remarks directed to the item under discussion or I will be forced to ask him to sit down.

Mr. Ricard: With all respect to your judgment I will only rise again and say that I feel sorry that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should think that he has to get up and feel sorry because the Conservative government brought in some measures to help the small people. Thank you.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, with the usual sense of responsibility and high regard for parliamentary procedures and constitutional practice which is shown in this house by members of this group on all occasions, I wish to deal with one or two matters in this budget resolution which concern some of my constituents.

I wish to deal first of all with an item which is of serious concern to the small mining and lumbering companies in my constituency and, I presume, in many other areas.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder if the hon. member would wait until we reach that item because there is an amendment on it which, I believe, will deal with the point I have in mind.

Mr. Herridge: Has the minister responded to the entreaties of the companies in question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can tell the hon. member that there is an amendment to be introduced when we reach this particular item. I think I know the point he has in mind, and if we can proceed with this in order I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. Herridge: Very well, Mr. Chairman, that is so heartening that I will sit down forthwith.

Mr. Robichaud: I have a question to ask the minister. I wonder if the minister could explain to the committee if item 1 (a)(v) where it mentions latch sets, master key cylinder blocks, knobs and hinges includes the latch sets, master key cylinder blocks, and hinges, which are used on certain machines which I cannot discuss at this time but they are machines on wheels propelled by a motor.

Mr. McGee: How clever.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can hardly restrain myself at the mirth that the hon. gentleman has invited the committee to indulge in, but putting aside that natural temptation perhaps I should say to my hon. friend that this new amendment will round out the present exemption for locks and lock sets.

Mr. Robichaud: On what?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On anything; even my hon. friend.

Mr. Habel: You wish he had one, eh?

The Deputy Chairman: Section 1(a) clauses (I) to (VIII); does anyone wish to discuss anything in that section?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, having in mind the different items the Minister of Finance mentioned—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. McMillan: —in connection with the elimination of sales tax for everything purchased by—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. McMillan: —school boards and municipal councils, I wonder if (b) (III) would apply to them. It relates to fire truck chassis for the permanent attachment thereon of fire fighting equipment to be used directly in fire fighting.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. McMillan: Municipalities have to buy chassis for dump trucks, for general use trucks, for garbage trucks and equipment of that nature. I was just wondering if I will be permitted to use the word "truck" which, is after all, an automobile. I also wondered if it is allowable to refer to chassis for police cars, for instance. The municipalities buy a great many cars for police and other services. I am wondering just whether or not we will be allowed to discuss cars under this particular item. Certainly if the Minister of Finance wanted to do something for the municipalities he could have helped them by eliminating the sales tax on the particular trucks and cars to which I have referred that municipalities use in their municipal services.

Some of the small municipalities might require a chassis for a fire truck only once in 10 or 15 years but they must be purchasing general purpose trucks every year or two. If the minister sincerely wanted to assist the municipalities he could have done so by removing the sales tax on these trucks and cars that are purchased by municipalities.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any other discussion on section 1 (a), clauses (I) to (VIII)? The hon. member for Welland referred to section 1 (b). If there is no more discussion on (a) we could proceed to (b).

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as I recall it there has never been any ruling to the effect that when you have a resolution such as the one before us it must be dealt with seriatim until the general discussion is concluded. It is one resolution and invariably in the past we have gone to subsections only with the unanimous consent of the house or committee.

The Deputy Chairman: That is what the Chair was asking, if there was any more discussion on those points.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that the items covered in this particular section all apply very aptly to conditions which we are experiencing in Canada today. Earlier during the course of this session we passed legislation to increase the homebuilding program in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wonder how the hon. member for Rosthern can relate a speech on housing to any of the particular items in this part of the resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to ask the hon. member for Rosthern how he intends to do that?

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I think it is perfectly obvious in the items set forth.

The Deputy Chairman: I again ask the hon. member for Rosthern what he proposes doing.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, thanks very much.

Mr. Pickersgill: One rule for both sides of the house; that is all we ask.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of items that directly affect the building of new housing and the repair of old housing. As I look down the list I see reference to chimneys for buildings. If I were building a house today I should be very glad to note the removal of sales tax on chimneys. There is also provision for the removal of sales tax on assembled or unassembled cabinets, counters, cupboards, furniture, ironing boards, work benches and similar installations. These represent a big reduction in the cost of these articles that go into the building of a home and this will also benefit the young and old homebuilder alike.

In the next section there is reference to ash handling and fuel handling equipment for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings when connected directly to such furnaces and installed in the same building as such furnaces. Even the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will realize that the person installing a furnace in a building will receive a considerable saving in respect of the sales tax.

Mr. Rouleau: How much?

Mr. Nasserden: If a home builder instals an oil burner as most people do today he will require a fuel tank and because fuel tanks are referred to here he will benefit through the removal of the sales tax on this item. When you build a house—despite what has been said by hon. gentlemen in the opposition during the course of this debate—you have to instal a door with a lock and hinges. Here, too, the homebuilder will have a saving in the sales tax on these items. Reference is also made to hard surface plastic laminated building materials and the sales tax has been removed on these items. There is not an hon. member in this house tonight who does not know that those who are building homes today are using more plastic and laminated materials than were ever used in years gone by. The use of these modern building materials is increasing and I commend the minister for removing the sales tax on these items.

I want to assure the minister, those on the treasury benches and hon. members of the house as well that in a constituency such as mine where many of the people are engaged in the building trade and many are improving the existing housing the people there appreciate the savings they will make in respect of these items.

Section 1 (b) deals with various things the municipalities are using in the vast development program that is taking place in all parts of Canada today. The municipalities are seeking to provide the essential services to the people who are crowding into the urban centres.

Mr. Robichaud: He is making the minister's speech.

Mr. Nasserden: The removal of the sales tax on such items as culverts, structural aluminum for bridges, fire truck chassis for firefighting equipment, fire hose including couplings and nozzles, diesel fuel oil for use in generating electricity and goods for use as part of sewage and drainage systems will be of vast assistance to the municipality in terms of savings.

We come now to section 1 (c) which refers to certain agricultural, horiticultural and forestry goods.

Stock conditioners and food supplements used by livestock raisers and other people are things that enter into the cost of production on every farm in Canada, particularly on the livestock farms. As a farmer who has carried on livestock raising in years gone by, I know that the removal of the sales tax on these particular items will certainly be welcomed by the particular people who will have occasion to make those savings.

There is an item here having to do with cut flowers and hon. members, particularly hon. members of the opposition, have been tossing a lot of words around about cut flowers. This is all part of the same kind of program that is giving young people in this country a little bit of savings in this budget that they need to help them in their work. I certainly think the members of the opposition would not want us to raise the sales tax on cut flowers. I have not heard them say that.

Mr. Robichaud: What about rat poison?

Mr. Pallett: What about bubble gum?

Mr. Benidickson: What about boots and shoes?

Mr. Nasserden: Rat poison, as hon. members know, is a very important part of the control program of rats which take a tremendous toll in this country. It is amazing to think that a government of this country would have put a sales tax on rat poison, and yet that is the kind of government we had for 22 years.

We heard quite a lot about the exemption for fruit juices. We know what the result of this particular clause in the legislation will be. It will mean that the producers of fruits in this country will have a little better market for their fruit products and as a result they will have a little better income. From that point of view I do not think any member of the opposition will go out electioneering and say that they want to put a sales tax on fruit juices.

We now come to the exemption on desks and chairs. I am not going to say very much about it. I think all of us should agree that so far as desks and other classroom equipment are concerned we can be thankful that we have a government that recognizes that education is as important as this government believes it is and which was not recognized by a government that was in power for so many years.

One of the interesting clauses is clause 6 which reads:

> That the exemption for fire brick, plastic refractories, high temperature cement, fire clay and other refractory materials be extended by removing the present condition requiring them to be "for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment".

This will have a tremendous impact on the over-all building trades in this country. It will bring about a saving to almost every person engaged in the building of houses who uses these particular materials.

Something was said about advertising. I thought for a minute that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would seize on the second-class mailing privileges. We did not hear him say anything about that. All I want to say is that the action of the government will promote the distribution of this material without sales tax. Clause 11 reads:

> That the annual fee for sales and excise tax licences be abolished.

I understand that the fee was $2 and that it was paid by those who collected the excise taxes for the government. That was the way it used to be under a Liberal administration. Under the present administration the people who collect the tax will not have to take out a licence to collect it. I do not think I need to say anything more about that. There might be some item that we would like to see included.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nasserden: I wish to thank hon. members of the opposition for their applause; I really appreciate it because I know they are going to have a hard time to applaud what they have said in the house tonight when they go out on the hustings in the next election campaign.

Mr. Denis: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether the hon. member for Rosthern who has just resumed his seat is his unofficial or unchosen parliamentary assistant?

Mr. Bourque: In the Montreal Star of June 2, 1958, there appeared the following news item:

> Civic Fight Urged for New Tax Split
> Victoria, B.C., June 2—Canadian municipalities' coffers have become appalling reminders of old Mother Hubbard's cupboard, Mayor Lloyd D. Jackson of Hamilton, Ontario, today warned the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities convention.
>
> "They may not be as bare but they have nevertheless been pretty well stripped by the federal and provincial governments," the outgoing president pointed out at the opening meeting of the three-day convention.
> Asks "Lost" Revenues

"All we want is the return of the equitable share of revenues we formerly enjoyed and lost out to the two governments, but without any strings attached. We want our autonomy more than ever so that we can properly do the job—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman,—

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid I will have to remind the hon. member that we are not on dominion-provincial relations; we are on an amendment to the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, if I may say so respectfully, sir, the tax exemption has to do with both the provincial and the federal governments and I was coming to that. I was building up my case to come to that. It is related to tax exemption.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not related to that at all.

Mr. Bourque: I respectfully submit it is.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member can come to it without taking so long to build up his case.

Mr. Bourque: The tax exemption paragraph is a significant paragraph and that is what I was building up to, Mr. Chairman. The article goes on:

We want our autonomy more than ever—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I ask you to bring the hon. gentleman to order. We are not discussing municipal autonomy; we are discussing an amendment to the Excise Tax Act which, among other things, has the effect of relieving municipalities from the excise tax on certain things they purchase. This has nothing to do with the subject the hon. member is quoting from and I suggest we come down to the business that is before the committee. This evening we have had a demonstration of slapstick comedy and everything else. I suggest we now come down to the business of the house which we were elected by the people of Canada to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: More dictatorship.

Mr. Bourque: I am not slapsticking or doing anything that the minister suggests. If he does slapsticking or whatever he calls it that is his affair. I am strictly trying to bring my point to the question of tax exemption for the municipalities. I think I have the right, Mr. Chairman, to make the point when we are dealing with a tax exemption clause.

I should like to read now, Mr. Chairman, from the submission to the government of Canada on behalf of the municipal government of Canada:

The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities . . . acts as the spokesman of the municipal governments with respect to matters of interprovincial and national concern.

The federation, over recurrent years, has come before the dominion government—

The Deputy Chairman: I am going to have to ask the hon. member to discuss the items before us.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think you are well aware that the speaker is mayor of one of our important municipalities and I have every reason to believe that he is building up to the taxes which are imposed on municipalities which he hopes would be reduced, such as the items we have before us in this resolution.

The Deputy Chairman: I realize the hon. member is trying to build up a case on that matter and I appreciate it very much but I do hope that the hon. member will cooperate with the Chair and please direct his attention to the subject matter of this resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Bourque: May I submit again since there are three levels of government, namely the federal, provincial and municipal, that the taxes which the municipalities have to pay are relative to what I am saying, as are tax exemptions also. I am leading up to that by quoting from an authority, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. Taxation is related to tax exemption, Mr. Chairman, and that is exactly what I am alluding to now.

The federation, over recurrent years, has come before the dominion government for the purpose of presenting resolutions passed at its annual conference and . . . to place before the cabinet the point of view of municipal governments with respect to... municipal problems which . . . fall within the scope of the dominion government's jurisdiction. Many of these matters are of a financial nature. Others have to do with trends and developments which... are of vital interest to the government of Canada.

In earlier submissions to the dominion government, the federation outlined in considerable detail the background problems, particularly the financial problem, which have plagued municipal governments ever since pre-war depression years . . . The central fact which emerges is that whether it is depression, war or prosperity, municipal revenue resources are both tenuous and vulnerable. In periods of deflation—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I must rise again. Your ruling is simply being defied by the hon. member. We are not dealing here at all with the question of municipal revenues. We are simply dealing with the problem of amending the Excise Tax Act in certain respects and in one particular with respect to certain purchases made by municipalities. This has nothing to do with municipal revenues and I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call upon the hon. member to adhere to the rulings of the chair instead of defying them as he is now.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. member is leading up to the point that a sales tax is imposed upon municipalities which makes it more difficult for them to carry on their financing, and I am sure that he is simply indicating that this has universal appeal to all municipalities in the country. He will come to the point of the reduction in sales tax with respect to goods purchased by municipalities.

The Deputy Chairman: I will have to ask the hon. member to come to the point right away. I have allowed him a lot of leeway in building up to it but I now ask him to co-operate as much as possible with the chair and come to the point.

Mr. Bourque: The case has been very well put by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and as this is nothing but closure I will sit down.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, the resolution does not relate to the revenue of municipalities but it does relate to the removal of the excise tax on municipal purchases. In the list there is structural aluminum for bridges. I wonder whether the minister is aware that bridges constructed in municipalities are constructed with steel. Steel is largely used for the construction of bridges. I think there is an important omission there. I should like to have the minister's opinion and ask him whether he will not change his mind to include steel for the construction of bridges.

I also wish to express regret in the same way as has been done by my colleague that there is no provision in the resolution to abolish the excise tax on motor vehicles used by municipalities. It has been pointed out that municipalities use trucks in different departments performing various works and also motor cars for police departments. These are important purchases. The provision in the resolution takes care of a few items and the changes are welcome indeed. They are a help but they do not go far enough. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Finance will consider this matter and will bring in an amendment to include the purchase of such things as trucks and automobiles for police departments. These are important purchases involving the spending of a lot of money by municipalities.

There are other items purchased by municipalities which I think should be included in the resolution but which are entirely overlooked. Culverts are included as well as goods for use as part of sewage and drainage systems but I do not see anything here to cover the piping used by waterworks departments. There are other very important omissions that should be considered and I hope that the minister will give consideration to the matter. We appreciate the little that has been done but I think a lot more can be done on behalf of the poor, hard pressed municipalities.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, but I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that here the government is doing something to aid the municipalities that the former government was not prepared to do. My hon. friend speaks about structural steel for bridges. Evidently he is not aware that it is already exempt.

Mr. Chevrier: By the former government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are doing something here to remove the discrimination left by the former government against structural aluminum for bridges.

Mr. McIlraith: Because it was not used at that time. Don't you know that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would expect that kind of remark from the hon. member for Ottawa West—

Mr. McIlraith: It is a fact.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —who cannot help saying these things. We do not hold it against him. He cannot help it. The fact is that there is substantial benefit in this resolution so far as the municipalities are concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: How much in dollars?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend has been told frequently already that there is over $5 million of tax relief here but he has forgotten so often that I suppose it is permissible to remind him again.

Mr. Benidickson: Are you referring to this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of this clause with respect to municipalities is to bring direct tax relief to them and the particular items selected for exemption here in the case of purchases by municipalities for their own use are items in every case for which there is justification for the exemption that we are recommending. We believe they are workable from the administrative point of view and they are sound in principle.

Mr. McIlraith: On the item of structural aluminum for bridges, I want to point out to the committee that the reason it is now in the resolution is that it is a new use for aluminum developed in the last few years. The principle has always been that structural steel and metal for the building of bridges have been exempt in the case of purchases by municipalities. The minister has been quite inadequate in giving the reason for this change. Structural aluminum is a new material developed for this use and therefore this change is in accordance with the principle established by the previous government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman has answered himself when he says it has been in use in the last few years.

Mr. Benidickson: May I just say that the minister himself advocated full exemption for municipalities and school boards in the past and I simply refer him to his own words on page 4375 of Hansard for June 2, 1955.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Which the hon. gentleman and all of his party opposed.

Mr. Pickersgill: And which you are not doing.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a $1 million affair for 1958-59.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the acting government leader what the business is for tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the first item to be taken up tomorrow will be the bill arising out of the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture on today's order paper respecting the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The second one will be the item appearing as No. 11 on today's order paper, the bill arising out of the resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt at this point? Does the acting house leader mean item 12? He refers to the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I refer to the bill that was introduced today following approval of the resolution that appears as No. 12 on today's order paper. The second will be the bill that was introduced arising out of the passing of the resolution which is No. 11 on today's order paper, namely the bill respecting the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. Following those two bills, the house will turn to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether he can give any indication of what the business will be on the following day, namely Thursday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not yet.

Mr. Chevrier: May I remind the acting house leader that we on this side of the house expect a debate on external affairs on that day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The reminder is not necessary really, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend is aware of what has been said in the house in recent days on that subject not only with regard to a possible debate but also with regard to other aspects of current international events.

Mr. Chevrier: That is true, Mr. Speaker. But on the other hand, because of the discussion which took place then, I think we on this side of the house were led to believe that a debate on external affairs would take place on that day and I hope it will be possible for the government to have such a discussion then.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

(2) It is not the policy of the board to disclose the competitive position of shippers and exporters in their capacity as agents of the board.

(3) The Canadian wheat board does not pay any commission to its selling agent. The agent may include a commission which becomes a part of his selling price and is paid by the purchaser.

(4) No agents made sales of wheat to China on behalf of the Canadian wheat board during the crop years 1955-56 and 1956-57.

(5) See paragraph 1 above.

(6) The Canadian wheat board classifies its agents as to eastern agents and western agents. All eastern agents must have an office in Winnipeg and all western agents an office in Vancouver.

In addition to the above requirement, the Canadian wheat board, before granting an agency agreement, requires that: (a) The company is in good financial standing and is registered to do business in Canada; (b) eastern agents are members of the Winnipeg grain exchange and lake shippers clearance association and that western agents are members of the Vancouver grain exchange.

7. The Canadian wheat board does not permit an agent to transfer a contract that it has entered into with the board to another agent. An agent who has entered into a contract with the board may recall the wheat to another agent but the board looks to and holds the originating agent responsible for fulfilment of the contract.

8. See paragraph 7 above, and also, the Canadian wheat board does not have information in respect to wheat that may have been sold by one agent to another during the crop years 1955-56 and 1956-57.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds) presented the second report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPRESENTATION AT ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. Speaker: I think I should perhaps advise the house that this parliament is being represented by parliamentary observers at the 47th annual conference of the interparliamentary union being held from July 24 to August 1 in Rio de Janeiro, and that the representative from the Commons is Mr. Broome of Vancouver South and, from the Senate, Senator Dessureault.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LEGISLATION DEALING WITH STRIKE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make, and at the same time I make a request to hon. members of the house to grant unanimous consent for the presentation tomorrow of a resolution and also a bill respecting the British Columbia steamship services strike.

The government has had under continuous consideration the endeavour to achieve a settlement of the strike which has tied up the British Columbia coast steamship services of the Canadian Pacific Railway since May 16 of this year. The situation has assumed urgency, and I can tell the house that in the last few days every possibility of a settlement has been exhausted. All that remains is for legislative action to be taken to provide a solution to a situation which has proven so difficult for the people of British Columbia, and in particular for those living on Vancouver island and the northern areas of British Columbia, and which has had such an adverse effect generally on the economy.

Ever since negotiations commenced last September for renewal of the various collective agreements involved the facilities of the Department of Labour have been at the disposal of the parties, and every effort has been made by the department and by the Minister of Labour to effect a settlement by conciliation and negotiation. Effective June 1, 1958, the company signed collective agreements covering four groups of employees represented by the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks. Notwithstanding continued efforts by the department and the personal intervention of the Minister of Labour, it has not been possible to bring about any settlement between the company and the seafarers' international union, which had first taken strike action in May of this year. Meantime, on June 24 the two unions representing the officers had also notified the C.P.R. that they were declaring themselves on strike.

During most of the time the strike against the C.P.R. ships has been in effect some services in the coastal regions of British Columbia have been provided by the Black Ball ferries previously referred to. Since, however, the C.P.R. supplied the bulk of the services the Black Ball ships have been able to only partially fulfil the needs of the area, and increasing hardship and loss have been accruing to the residents of Vancouver island and other coastal points on the mainland of British Columbia. On Friday last the Black Ball ferry service was interrupted by strike action and conditions in the area reached a critical point, with certain essential supplies and services being almost entirely discontinued.

As I said a moment ago, every effort has been made to resolve the dispute by negotiation and also to have the parties renew negotiations on a voluntary basis. All these efforts have been unsuccessful, and for that reason other steps must now be taken. I am accordingly giving notice now of the intention to introduce legislation immediately to provide for the appointment of an administrator of the British Columbia coast steamship services for the resumption of operations and return to work under the administrator immediately after the legislation has passed, and for the continuation of operations under the administrator while the process of negotiation is resumed looking to a voluntary settlement. The powers of the administrator will continue until such time as settlement is arrived at. A resolution has been drawn up and handed in and will appear in Votes and Proceedings tomorrow. That resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the resumption of the British Columbia coast steamship service operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, including provisions for the appointment of an administrator to carry on all or any part of the said services, and for other related matters.

The bill will be printed and available for distribution tomorrow morning. The house will be asked—and that is the request I make under the circumstances—to give unanimous consent to taking up the resolution tomorrow, and as soon as it is adopted to proceed at once with consideration of the bill through all stages.

There was a tentative arrangement made that tomorrow the debate on external affairs would be proceeded with. However, in view of the present position, the adjournment without a set date on the part of the security council, I would suggest that the question to be considered could be postponed for another day and that this matter, so important to the economic life of the people of British Columbia, might receive the support of all hon. members in all parts of the house, to the end that without delay, following discussion, action may be taken to resolve, in so far as the people are concerned, a situation that is proving very difficult and trying and one of great discomfort, which in addition is causing severe damage to the tourist industry in that province.

If the house would agree I should be only too willing to fix any date as the day for the debate on external affairs. There is no indication that immediate action will be taken in New York, certainly not before the beginning of next week.

In making this request I do so because I believe it is of the essence that parliament be seized of this matter at once. We have made every effort and have met with no success. Indeed, there is no possibility of a settlement being arrived at which will make possible the resumption of the services unless parliament in its wisdom will act. I am not given to endeavouring to bring about changes in the legislative planning of the house or the planning of debates, but in this case I do make an appeal to hon. members to realize the situation that prevails and, to that end, make possible consideration tomorrow of this extremely important matter.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with interest and concern to what the Prime Minister has just said. The house will recall that only yesterday the hon. member for Laurier and also the hon. member for Skeena asked questions with regard to the strike in British Columbia to which the Prime Minister has referred and the seriousness of which is apparent to us all. In replying to these questions only yesterday the Minister of Labour merely stated that——the government still has this matter under very serious consideration.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we would have been the more surprised, I think, at the announcement the Prime Minister has made so soon after these questions if we had not read in the press this morning the Canadian Press story—which is dated July 22—to the effect that—

Legislation for halting the west coast C.P.R. steamship tie-up will be brought before the federal cabinet tomorrow, it was learned late today.

Informants said it will involve passage of a back to work measure by parliament.

The situation, of course, Mr. Speaker, is serious, but I think we have to be equally serious as members of parliament about the way in which we approach this problem in order to resolve it. The Prime Minister has said that the strike began on May 16, 68 days ago, and the report of a conciliation board set up by the government to consider the strike was received, I believe, by the Minister of Labour on April 24. The matter has been before the government for a considerable time.

Some hon. members will recall that in 1950 parliament and the country were confronted with a grave transportation emergency owing to a railway strike which was national in scope, which if it had been allowed to continue would have had disastrous national results. This strike in British Columbia is equally serious in a sense for those who are directly concerned with it on Vancouver island and on the mainland, but it differs from the strike in 1950 in that that latter strike was national in scope as well as in character.

The house will no doubt recall that at that time in 1950 the prime minister of the day, almost within hours of the beginning of that strike, called parliament together in special session and introduced legislation to deal with that national emergency, as it undoubtedly was. At that time, on introduction of the legislation, the leader of the Conservative party quite rightly emphasized that even in an emergency there must be sufficient time for members of parliament to give consideration to the measure that was being introduced by the government. Mr. Drew said, as reported at page 3 of Hansard of August 29, 1950:

It is highly desirable that there be an opportunity for hon. members to examine the bill, and that there be an explanation by the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), before hon. members are called upon to express an opinion upon the bill itself.

Later on Mr. Drew said, as reported at page 4 of Hansard:

I am certain that the bill will be dealt with much more expeditiously if we have it before us and have the explanation that will enable us to understand the intention of the government in presenting it.

If I remember right the prime minister of the day and the minister of labour did explain the purpose and nature of the action they were asking parliament to take, and the bill was before members who had an opportunity to consider it before debate took place. I suggest that the same procedure certainly should be adopted at this time. For that purpose and because we do not wish to delay the matter unduly, having regard to the right of parliament to give it adequate and informed consideration, I suggest that the Prime Minister should get unanimous consent at this time to introduce the resolution, that perhaps the resolution could be passed at once and the bill then printed and, as the Prime Minister has suggested, be distributed to members sometime tomorrow morning.

But I also suggest that we should not proceed to deal with it immediately in the afternoon, as there certainly would be very little opportunity to consider the bill, but that we should proceed to deal with it on Friday morning. This does not seem to me to represent unnecessary delay, and such a procedure would have the additional advantage of enabling us to proceed with the debate on external affairs which had been contemplated for tomorrow. While it may well be, as the Prime Minister has said, that the security council has adjourned and there will be no immediate decision taken in New York with respect to the Middle East situation, nevertheless that situation remains tense and dangerous, and I think the time has come when we should be given the opportunity in a full dress debate in parliament to state our views with regard to it.

I think the opposition, and it is quite right that it should, has attempted to be cooperative in this matter with regard to procedure. There have been very good reasons for postponing the debate and we have accepted them, but I would hope that the debate could go ahead tomorrow, because that would also give us a few extra hours to study the legislation that is to be brought forward. I think, as Mr. Drew thought in 1950 with respect to an emergency even greater in its nature, that the opportunity to give the legislation that kind of study will not delay the bill more than a few hours and will ensure that all members of parliament can discuss it in an intelligent and informed way. I therefore make that suggestion to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making a lengthy statement with respect to this matter, for I am sure all hon. members and the people of the country are aware of our sincere interest with respect to the situation on the west coast. With regard to agreeing to the introduction of the resolution and the bill without notice in order that the house may deal with the legislation at the earliest possible moment, we have no objection to that either. We regret, however, that it has taken the government such a long, long time to deal with the situation. We have kept a very close watch on developments over the past weeks, and know the hardships that have been caused the employees involved and the general public.

We feel that while the approach of arranging for an administrator to operate the steamship line may bring relief to some quarters, nevertheless it only deals with the immediate problem and can do relatively little to solve the longer range and more important aspects of coastal shipping. The government would have merited extreme commendation if it had dealt with coastal shipping problems some months ago. It would still receive accolades from all parts of the country if it would consider dealing with passenger and other shipping facilities from the point of view of providing a service to the general public and to our economy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I say just one word in connection with the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. What I was asking for was expedited action in order to meet the situation. In 1950, as I recall, there was no resolution. There was simply a bill introduced, and at the time the request was made by the then leader of the Conservative party there was no bill available. In the present case it is necessary to introduce a resolution. At the resolution stage the fullest information will be available so that, in so far as the bill itself is concerned, after discussion has taken place at the resolution stage the house and the country will have every bit of information that will be available on the bill.

I am, naturally, in the hands of the house. If the house does not give consent then of course I must proceed in the ordinary way. This may mean very well that we will not be in a position to act before the beginning of the week. After all, once the discussion gets under way, if we started tomorrow and took even two days we would be able to get passage, if the bill is acceptable to the house, by Saturday. Then the legislation could be sent over to the other place, and if acceptable to the other place there could be a resumption of service by Saturday.

However, if the Leader of the Opposition takes the view he does, and does not feel like altering that view, I can only say that it may very well be that there may not be any legislation passed during the present week. Monday is private members' day. I simply point out these facts. If, however, unanimous consent is not forthcoming, then all we will be able to do is introduce the resolution and go no further.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I add one word to what has already been said by the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister stated that he is anxious to expedite this legislation, and has made a suggestion upon which the Leader of the Opposition has commented. What I am saying now is in support of what the Leader of the Opposition has said, that we are willing to go even farther than the Prime Minister has asked by consenting to the passage of the resolution now. Once the resolution has passed we will then be in a position to have the bill before us and will be able to consider the bill on Thursday, at which time the debate on external affairs could take place.

Under those circumstances we could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be holding up the legislation at all. We are anxious to assist the passage of this legislation in view of the urgency to which the Prime Minister has referred. If the resolution is not passed until tomorrow, and we get the bill after the passage of the resolution, we will then be in the stage of committee of the whole and may not have, at that time, the opportunity to which I think the opposition is entitled, to consider the bill as we should.

In effect we are saying, upon the suggestion put before us by the Prime Minister, that we consent to the passage of the resolution at once so that we may have the bill before us and ascertain what the contents of the bill are. We are, we think, entitled to know what the powers of the administrator are going to be and what the terms of the resumption of service are. All these things must be given consideration, and it strikes me that if we had that information by getting the bill today we would then be in a position to ponder upon it until tomorrow and the bill would move much faster through the various stages.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask your guidance on a point of order, Mr. Speaker?

We have agreed, as my hon. friend has said, to the introduction by unanimous consent of the resolution and the passage of that resolution through this house this afternoon. Am I right in thinking that once we have given that unanimous consent it is then within the rights of the government, if it so desires, to proceed with the bill after 24 hours. Do they not have that right once we give unanimous consent to the introduction of the resolution? We are not interfering with that right, but we suggest to the government that in its exercise they should print the bill, give us a chance to see it tomorrow morning, and not begin the debate until Friday morning, instead of Thursday morning. Nevertheless, if they feel they must go ahead with it tomorrow, once we have given unanimous consent to the introduction of the resolution today and its passage through its various stages today, then that is their responsibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In order to be perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, if I introduce the resolution now it will be with the consent of the house. Then, according to the Leader of the Opposition, if the government chooses to go ahead with the bill tomorrow it will be in order to do so, and that being so we are back in the position where we started. My request was simply—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I realize the reason for the dissent at the moment. A few minutes ago there was no dissent but now there is a suggestion that it is not in keeping with the consent for which I have asked. Therefore I ask leave to introduce the resolution; the bill will be available tomorrow morning, and we will be in a position to go ahead with the debate tomorrow, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: In dealing with the discussions and the questions raised it seems to me that to accomplish what is suggested it would be necessary for the house to make an order giving unanimous consent to the introduction of the resolution, the passage of the resolution and the introduction of the bill without discussion, so the bill would then stand on the order paper for second reading tomorrow.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister has stated that I have changed my position on my second intervention. With great respect, I did not do that at all. I said at the very beginning of my remarks that we were quite agreeable to the introduction of the resolution, and then we asked the government, through the Prime Minister, to print the bill so those of us on this side of the house might have a chance to see the bill and study it before it is discussed on Friday morning. But the Prime Minister feels that he must proceed with the bill tomorrow afternoon immediately after it has been printed and circulated. Once having given consent to the introduction of the resolution at this time—and this is what I said at the very beginning—we must go along with that procedure, but it is the responsibility of the government if they choose to follow it.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the Prime Minister is now asking for unanimous consent to introduce the resolution at this time, to pass the resolution and to introduce the bill, so the bill will then be on the order paper for tomorrow and will, presumably, be printed and available to hon. members in the morning?

As I understand the matter, if it is dealt with in this way by unanimous consent we will in effect leap-frog the committee stage and introduce the bill all at one time now, so what I am proposing to the house is that it give unanimous consent to an order giving permission to the Prime Minister to introduce the resolution which he has read, to an order passing the resolution, reporting the resolution and to an order giving leave to introduce a bill based on the resolution, all in one order, so that on the order paper we will then have the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Second reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to the order I have outlined?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WATER RESOURCES

MANITOBA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF COMPLETION OF ENGINEERING SURVEY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the house that the board of engineers appointed on behalf of the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba to make a survey and report on lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba and the resources of waters within Manitoba flowing into and from the said lakes under terms of reference dated July 5, 1956, has completed its assignment.

The covering report entitled "Report on Measures for Control of the Waters of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba, Province of Manitoba", comprising three volumes, will be tabled as soon as additional copies are available. I will also be pleased to provide copies to those members of the house representing Manitoba ridings and to those members who desire to review the report in detail.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might ask the minister if this report is available in French?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

STARRED QUESTION

WALTER MITCHELL

Question No. 30—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Was Walter Mitchell, of the city of Montreal, an employee of the Department of Agriculture at the port of Montreal?
2. If so, in what capacity and for how long?
3. Was he dismissed from his employment?
4. If so, for what reason and on whose recommendation?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the questions are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. As a casual checker and fumigator during the open period of the port of Montreal, from 1936 to 1940 and from 1946 to June 14, 1958.

3. Yes.

4. I received complaints that this man had been an active political organizer for the hon. member for Laurier during the last two elections. Later I received information that on November 29, 1957, Walter Mitchell was found to be in possession of contraband liquor and a quantity of contraband United States cigarettes which he had obtained, by his own admission, during his employment as a casual checker and fumigator with the department, from ships in the Montreal harbour. This, of course, is conduct which we cannot countenance, and as a result I ordered his release.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I say many of these statements are totally inaccurate, with which I will have an opportunity to deal on the minister's estimates.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, these are accurate statements—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member has said they are not accurate statements. I guarantee they are accurate statements, and I would suggest—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I think the debate on this matter had better be deferred.

Mr. Harkness: I would suggest the hon. member be more careful in his political associations.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: You will hear about it later.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that tomorrow we will be discussing not external affairs but a bill to bring to an end a shipping strike, so we are informed, and in view of the fact that this debate may continue beyond Thursday, would the Prime Minister give some indication now as to when the discussion on the international situation will take place?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should be very happy to see it take place as soon as we conclude the debate on the bill respecting the steamship strike. I cannot say how long the debate on the strike situation will take, but whenever it concludes we will be in a position to go ahead immediately.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CIGARETTES—SUGGESTED LISTING OF TAR AND NICOTINE CONTENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as an ancient member of the Maple Leaf pipe smoking club, and because of my concern for the health of cigarette smokers, particularly the ladies, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that the federal trade commission of the United States is giving consideration to amendment of the law to require cigarette manufacturers to list the tar and nicotine content of cigarettes on their packages in order that the public may be able to assess correctly the differences in this respect between various brands, would the minister inform the house if consideration is being given to the enactment of similar legislation for the information and protection of Canadian consumers?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. While I have not previously been aware of this suggestion, I can assure the hon. member that the government would watch such a development with keen interest.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Has the minister given any consideration as to the constitutional right of parliament or of the government of Canada in this matter? This is, of course, altogether apart from the question of whether or not this is desirable.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker, purely because, as I mentioned a moment ago, this is the first time this has been brought to my attention.

INCOME TAX

ADJUSTMENT PAYMENTS ON CONVERSION BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the adjustment payment made to bondholders on reconversion subject to income tax?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this adjustment payment to bondholders on reconversion has an element of interest in it; that is, part of the payment involves interest which has accrued on the bond. Another part is entirely independent of the interest. In so far as the interest element is concerned, that is taxable in the hands of the holder of the bond, who in fact will be required when he surrenders the bond for conversion to sign an ownership certificate indicating the proportion of interest which has accrued thereon.

I may say that these ownership certificates are forwarded to the Department of National Revenue, so that all persons receiving this interest must report it in their income tax returns for the year 1958, the returns they will file next spring. The balance of the adjustment payment is not taxable; in other words it is tax free in the hands of the recipient.

[Later:]

Perhaps I should qualify that answer in one respect. What I said a moment ago applies to the ordinary holders of bonds throughout the country, but there may be cases where people deal exclusively in bonds, thereby earning an income therefrom, and these may be placed in a different category from that of the ordinary bondholders in Canada.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has yet reached a conclusion as to when he will be able to table the report of the royal commission on the revision of terms of union?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I can only say that if there is any further considerable delay I will table the report in English and, as I indicated earlier, before doing so I will see that a copy is delivered to the premier of Newfoundland. As a matter of fact this afternoon I will make inquiries in this connection, and if it appears that there is going to be any further appreciable delay in the printing I will try to get a letter away to the premier of Newfoundland for tomorrow so as to be in a position to table the report in the house as soon as it has been received in Newfoundland.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. We have noticed that a number of reports have been published in English but that the French publication has been quite late in reaching our hands. Could the Prime Minister make inquiries to see why it is that the French translation often comes so late, and endeavour to remedy this situation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think it has been the experience over the years that there is in almost every case a longer period taken to provide the French translations and texts, and finally the printing, than has been the case in the production of the documents in the English language. I will certainly look into this to the end that any difficulty in this connection may be removed if at all possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN OBSERVERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I address a question to the Prime Minister with regard to the request of the Secretary General of the United Nations for additional observers. The Prime Minister indicated yesterday that three additional Canadian observers had been sent. Was Canada asked to send only three observers; and could he now indicate whether or not a further request for observers has been made?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): When I advised the house yesterday that three additional observers had been provided for, that was the number which was requested. There has been no further request as far as I know. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was held up in New York this morning by the late departure of his aircraft, and he only arrived in Ottawa a short time ago. My information at the moment is subject, of course, to conference with him, but no other request has been brought to my attention.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

SUGAR—REPORT ON INDUSTRY IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether any legal action is contemplated as a result of the report of the restrictive trade practices commission regarding the sugar industry in western Canada, which has been public knowledge for some time?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a decision has been taken in that regard, but I am not quite sure whether counsel has been retained. I should prefer to look into the matter before I make a definite announcement.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—STATEMENT ON ALLEGED DISCREPANCY IN FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate drew my attention to what he termed a discrepancy between the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics and the national employment service, and he was concerned by the fact that the discrepancy for June was approximately 200,000 while at the same time last year it was only 100,000.

The answer to this, on investigation, is that on a percentage basis and taking into consideration the fact that all these sets of figures are larger this year than last year, the percentage of the discrepancy is, I would say, almost identical with that at the same time last year.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Nevertheless, does the minister feel that there should be a doubling of what we both call the discrepancy? It has always been understood in the past that this discrepancy was about 100,000 whether unemployment was high or low. It seems to me that the discrepancy has widened.

Mr. Starr: I think the gap to which the hon. member refers is partly due to the fact that seasonal benefit claims were still being processed at that time this year, and were not being processed at the same time last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether any changes have been made in the sampling procedures for arriving at the dominion bureau of statistics figures?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take that question as notice.

NICKEL—REPORTED CUT IN WORK WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received from the municipal corporation of the united townships of Neelon and Garson a request to take immediate action to alleviate the present crisis in the nickel mining industry in northern Ontario where operations have been cut down to four days a week? If so, what action has been taken or is contemplated concerning this crucial problem?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Without notice it would be impossible to give a full answer to the question. In so far as the nickel industry is concerned, there has been a situation developing in the last year and a half or two years detrimental to the export of nickel. This was one of the matters which was discussed during the recent visit of the President of the United States.

All I can say at this time is that full representations have been made to the end that the United States realizes the effects on the Canadian industry. May I add that recently I met a delegation representative of the nickel producers, who placed before me at considerable length their views and suggestions, and these views and suggestions are receiving the attention of the government.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REFERENCE TO REPORTED ACTION OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the attention of the right hon. gentleman has been drawn to a newspaper account in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen in which it was mentioned that during a C.B.C. telecast the right hon. gentleman had placed the jobs of a number of C.B.C. employees in jeopardy. If that has been drawn to his attention, would he care to comment upon it?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I were to endeavour to answer all the speculative articles that appear I would be kept busy and have no time for anything else. I seem to recall that there was an epigram on the wall of Abraham Lincoln which read something like this: If I were to endeavour to answer all the attacks that are made on me and all the speculative stories that are spoken about me, this shop might as well be closed.

Certainly there is no foundation for any suggestion that I have anything to do with the jobs of employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the resumption of the British Columbia coast steamship service operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, including provisions for the appointment of an administrator to carry on all or any part of the said services, and for other related matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we do not intend to hold up this resolution, of course, but I should like to ask the Prime Minister two questions. The first relates to something he mentioned in his earlier statement but perhaps not in sufficient detail. When are we likely to get the bill if in fact the government wishes to proceed with its consideration tomorrow afternoon? Second, would the Minister of Labour do what I think the minister of labour did in 1950 on the occasion of the railway strike, and explain to the house in as much detail as possible what will be in the bill following the remarks of the Prime Minister. This was the procedure adopted in 1950.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the bill is concerned, Mr. Chairman, it will be available first thing tomorrow morning. It will be printed tonight. I could furnish the Leader of the Opposition as well as the representative of the C.C.F. with a mimeographed copy, and the bill itself will be printed this evening and made available tomorrow morning.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask whether or not the bill will be in our boxes in the morning?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the intention.

Mr. Pearson: I thank the Prime Minister for his statement. It would be convenient for us if I could have a mimeographed copy of the bill any time this evening. I had a second question. Could the Minister of Labour add anything to what the Prime Minister has already said this afternoon about the action the government proposes to take, and its form?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, before I do that may I refer to the fact that in speaking this afternoon on the proposal of the Prime Minister to introduce this resolution with the unanimous consent of the house, the Leader of the Opposition and also the hon. member for Skeena suggested that this government had not moved in this matter with sufficient speed, and had allowed a long period of time to elapse before finally deciding to take action. For the information of these hon. gentlemen I should like to briefly outline the history of this development. Probably in making their remarks this afternoon the hon. gentlemen lacked full knowledge of what has transpired throughout the course of this dispute.

On July 29, 1957, the Minister of Labour appointed a conciliation officer to mediate this dispute and meetings were held with representatives of the parties on August 1, 12, 13, 16 and 28. On August 30 the conciliation officer reported that he was not able to bring the parties to an amicable agreement and recommended the appointment of a conciliation board.

A conciliation board was appointed which sat for many days, heard the evidence and brought in three separate reports. The chairman recommended 25 per cent, the employee nominee recommended 31 per cent and the employer nominee recommended 17 per cent. This was rejected. The board conducted further negotiations on its own.

In the end we appointed a commissioner of inquiry, a man of high reputation for many years in these disputes, who spent close to five weeks presenting formulas of various kinds to both parties in order to bring about a settlement, but he failed in this. Eventually he recommended the form of arbitration. Immediately upon receiving his recommendation the Minister of Labour contacted all parties concerned to see if the recommendation was acceptable to them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are referring to the commissioner from Toronto, whose name I have forgotten?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Eric Taylor.

Mr. Starr: We received acquiescence from all the parties to proceed on the basis recommended by the commissioner of inquiry with the exception of the seafarers' international union, which rejected any form of arbitration. We then proceeded to call both parties to Ottawa in the hope that I would be able to put forth some other formula that might be acceptable, and to afford an opportunity to the parties to present a formula that would be acceptable to the other party. Two meetings were held in Ottawa on July 7 and again on July 10. On July 10 we brought together the major principals of the dispute without any conclusion being reached.

Since those two meetings we have been in direct communication by telephone and other means with both parties, endeavouring to bring about some solution to this problem. I say this, Mr. Chairman, in order to inform the committee that every effort and indeed a continuous one has been made by the Department of Labour to bring about a solution.

As far as the bill is concerned and the request of the Leader of the Opposition for an outline of it, I think I will leave it to the Prime Minister, who has asked for the introduction of this bill, to outline its various aspects.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell us how many days these men have been out?

Mr. Starr: They have been out since the strike began on May 16.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if I understood the reading of the resolution correctly it contains three parts: first, the resumption of the services of the Pacific coast steamships; second, the appointment of an administrator; and third, other related matters. I wonder whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour could throw some light on these three parts of the resolution.

What I am directing my attention to at the moment is, in what form is it intended to suggest, direct or order the resumption of services? Next, what will be the duties of the administrator and what will be his functions? Will he have jurisdiction to get the parties together and will he be given a certain time in which to do that, or will there be no such time? Will the legislation resemble the legislation to which the Leader of the Opposition referred earlier? Finally, what are the other related matters that are mentioned in the legislation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the three phases of the matter referred to by the hon. member for Laurier, of which the first was the appointment of an administrator, the administrator is to be appointed by the governor in council to carry on all or any part of the business of the steamship company. He will be regarded as an agent of the steamship company for the purpose of carrying on its business. Forthwith upon his appointment he will carry on the business of the steamship company which was suspended by reason of the strike, and every employee who is now on strike will be required to resume his duties or his employment with the steamship company.

As soon as the ships are put in operation there will be a direction that the steamship company and each union shall forthwith enter into negotiations with a view to settlement of any matters in dispute between them at the present time, and the authority of the administrator to carry on the business of the steamship company shall continue until a new collective agreement is concluded or until his appointment is terminated by the governor in council.

In order to secure the operation of the ships there will be a provision to the effect that the employees shall go back to work and that in general the negotiations shall continue with a view to determining, by the necessary operation of bargaining the questions still in dispute as between the S.I.U. particularly and the steamship company. I think that in general represents a summary.

There will, of course, have to be provision made for the assumption by the administrator of the full authority of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in operating the steamship company.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it contemplated to appoint an officer of the railway company to act as administrator?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has not been finally determined but is the subject of consideration. There are considerations on both sides, but I would feel that in general the administrator should be someone with considerable administrative business experience in a governmental sense, and also with knowledge of the problems of the operation of steamships and the like.

Mr. Chevrier: Under what authority is this legislation being introduced?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not quite sure what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. Chevrier: What I mean is this. By virtue of what provision of the constitution in the legislation being introduced?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is because of the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is involved, and it is a company under national jurisdiction.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it from what the Prime Minister said that there will be a provision in this legislation requiring the employees to go back to work. What would happen in case they did not obey the direction of parliament? Is there a clause to cover that situation?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. gentleman knows, there is general provision that any infraction of a statute passed by parliament is subject to a general penalty.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask two questions which I think are pertinent. In view of the fact that the legislation proposed under this resolution does provide for compulsory operation of the ships my first question is, what is the basis under which the men would return to work, the contractual basis, wages, conditions, benefits, and all that sort of thing? My second question is, in view of the action which is proposed, was there any previous intimation given to the parties concerned that the government had the intention of introducing legislation of this kind?

Mr. Diefenbaker: With respect to the second question, may I say that during the negotiations every consideration had been given to bring about a determination of the unsatisfactory situation, and I think it was made very clear that unless some amicable agreement was arrived at it would be necessary for the parliament of Canada to act; that public security and maintenance of a proper regard for the rights of others would demand the introduction of such legislation.

I may say that in taking this course we are following the suggestion we made on August 30, 1950, when the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act was before the House of Commons and the leader of the Conservative party moved an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West, as follows:

> That Bill No. 1 be not now read the second time but that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to a measure which would provide for the appointment of a national administrator to ensure immediate operation of the railways pending final solution of the dispute by the free process of collective bargaining.

It is consonant with the viewpoint thus expressed that we proceeded as we have in the resolution and as we intend to proceed in the bill.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister what action the government would propose to take if the free process of collective bargaining does not work out effectively under this administration of the steamship company. Under the 1950 procedure, if I remember correctly, provision was made to deal with an emergency under which operation of the railway could not be carried on. The particular contingency of a deadlock could not have arisen under the earlier legislation. May I ask the Prime Minister what the government proposes to do in case of a possible deadlock, if the administrator is not able to operate the shipping company because the processes of collective bargaining have not worked out effectively?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1950, of course, provision was made for compulsory arbitration under the legislation, and we opposed that at that time. On this occasion we simply make provision to get the men back to work and the ships in operation. If we get the ships in operation I believe we will have achieved the first major step. If other eventualities arise, and I am not here for the purpose of trying to envisage what the possibilities might be, then in that case, of course, we will be placed in a position where, if other action is necessary, it may be taken at that time.

The immediate purpose, the immediate aim and the immediate desire, I believe, not only of members of the house but generally is to bring about the restoration of the operation of these ships. Having done that, I feel that the negotiations that have been continuing will have renewed hopes of success.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour, who was seized with these negotiations more directly, I suppose, than the Prime Minister, when it was intimated to the parties to the dispute that the government would give consideration to the course it is now following. When was that information given? Was it given as late as yesterday?

Mr. Starr: During the discussions we did not give any intimation that any action would be taken, but we did point out that if the parties did not arrive at a solution themselves action would have to be taken to bring about the resumption of this vital service, because it is a public utility upon which so many people on Vancouver island depend. We did discuss certain aspects of the bill with the parties concerned yesterday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the minister tell me when he did give information in the form in which he said it was given, a form which, if I understood the Prime Minister correctly, was not exactly as the Minister of Labour has just indicated?

Mr. Starr: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question is, can the minister say when information was given as to possible action by the government?

Mr. Starr: This particular action was discussed last night in all aspects with one of the parties interested.

Mr. Howard: I have been trying to get in on this discussion so perhaps between us we may find the answers. With respect to the discussions between officials of the government or the Minister of Labour and one or both of the parties regarding the proposal to appoint an administrator to operate the ships, which proposal will be contained in the bill, were there any negotiations between either of the parties and the minister about the conditions surrounding the appointment of an administrator? In the event of the appointment of an administrator, did either of the parties indicate that this would be acceptable or not acceptable if certain other conditions were met? Was there any discussion of this nature? I am trying to determine whether, if the question was discussed, it was discussed at some length or expanded upon.

Mr. Starr: We explored every avenue and had discussions with both parties about the possibilities of legislation at this time in order to see whether certain things were not acceptable for the purpose of resuming operations on the west coast. These discussions have been going on for several days now with one or other of the parties.

Mr. Howard: Discussions took place, but what I am trying to determine is whether there was an expansion or exploration of different ideas that would hinge upon the appointment of an administrator. Was there any discussion that centred around that sort of thing with one or both of the parties? Apparently the intent of the government was to find a solution mutually acceptable by each party to the dispute, which would probably be the most advantageous thing to do; but in attempting to reach mutual understanding or acceptability by the two parties was there any expansion on the idea of an administrator and any other matters discussed in relation to it?

Mr. Starr: Every aspect of the bill was discussed fully with both parties confidentially in the light of the desire on the part of the government to bring about a measure that would be acceptable to both sides to the dispute.

Mr. Howard: May I ask one further question. The minister used the word "confidentially". Am I to take it from this that he is not able to discuss the trend or import of the discussions?

Mr. Starr: We discussed every aspect of the bill that will be presented to parliament, but I do not feel that I can disclose the details or exact wording of our discussions.

Mr. Howard: All right; we will let that one ride. There are one or two other questions I have in mind apart from the matter we have just discussed. Has the government any particular person in mind? I realize that this question was answered to some extent a little while ago, but has the government any particular person in mind who might act as administrator?

Mr. Starr: Yes, the government has a person in mind, but no definite decision has been made that he will act in this capacity.

Mr. Howard: Has this individual been approached and is it merely a question of awaiting his reply as to whether or not he will accept? Is that the hold-up?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to look ahead a bit and ask the minister a question as to how this new operation, which we all hope will not have to be carried on for very long, is to be conducted. On what basis will the administrator get people to run his ships? What inducements will he offer them in the way of wages, working conditions, other benefits and so on? If he has to offer them the salary scale and working conditions against which they are now striking, how is the administrator going to get these people back to work under the old conditions against which they have been striking now for four months? If the administrator offers better conditions, and he reaches the point where he has to offer the conditions which they have put forward as strikers and are asking for now, what will be the purpose in turning the shipping company over to the administrator?

Mr. Starr: As I mentioned earlier, there has been an agreement signed between Canadian Pacific Steamships, west coast division, and the stewards union on the basis of an 8 per cent increase. The purpose of the bill is to provide for the resumption of work under the administrator by all employees on the same basis of an 8 per cent increase. All employees going back to work will have an increase of 8 per cent from the time the service is resumed.

Mr. Pearson: They go back to work, in other words, at a higher wage level than they had when they struck?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister this. Is it true, as reported, that the Canadian Pacific has already disposed of two of their ten ships? Does the minister feel the Canadian Pacific has any obligation to maintain service between the mainland and Vancouver island if the strike is settled?

Mr. Starr: I have heard that the Canadian Pacific disposed of two of their ships. My answer to the second part is that I feel they have an obligation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A legal obligation?

Mr. Howard: I gather that this settlement is not to follow the same pattern as that which was followed by British Columbia with respect to the Black Ball ferries, that is in so far as the profit and loss picture of the company is concerned. The government or the treasury will not enter into any arrangement with the Canadian Pacific so far as taking the profits or making up the losses is concerned?

Mr. Starr: No, it is not contemplated that the government should enter into that.

Mr. Caron: A while ago the minister said it was the understanding between the company and the stewards that they would go back with an 8 per cent increase. Will the balance of the crew go back at that same rate? What was the demand of the union for the other members of the crew?

Mr. Starr: There is a signed collective agreement, Mr. Chairman, between the Canadian Pacific and approximately 58 per cent of the employees in this service now on the basis of an 8 per cent increase. I am not able to say what the demands were. I can give the recommendations of the conciliation board. As I stated before, the chairman recommended a 25 per cent increase; the employer representative recommended a 17 per cent increase, and the employee representative recommended a 40 per cent or 50 per cent increase.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the minister should explain that these 25 per cent and 17 per cent increases were divided into two amounts over a two-year period.

Mr. Starr: That is true; it is a two-year contract, and part of it was for the first year and part of it for the second year.

Mr. Chevrier: Earlier the minister referred to the two bargaining agencies involved, one the S.I.U. and the other the brotherhood of railway steamship clerks. In answer to a question put by the Leader of Opposition he said that the stewards, which I believe belong to the latter union, would go back to work at an 8 per cent increase. What is the position with respect to the other members of the other union, that is the S.I.U.? Do they go back at an increased wage?

Mr. Starr: I cannot say with certainty that they would go back, but I expect and have every hope that they will, at the same rate of 8 per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that contemplated in the bill?

Mr. Starr: This is set out, that all the personnel go back at an 8 per cent increase.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister say what percentage of the men under contract belong to one union as opposed to the other?

Mr. Starr: The average number of persons employed in this service on the west coast has been as follows: deck officers, represented by the Canadian merchant service guild, 62; engineering officers, represented by the national association of marine engineers, 93; unlicensed personnel represented by the S.I.U., 300; pursers and stewards, officers and ratings, represented by the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, 413. This latter group is the one that has a collective agreement signed with the Canadian Pacific. The total average yearly employment with the company is approximately 930.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you. May I go back to a question asked by someone earlier, I believe the hon. member for Essex East. What is the legal or constitutional position with regard to the company furnishing steamship service from the mainland to Vancouver island?

Mr. Fulton: I do not quite follow what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. Chevrier: I mean, for instance, with reference to the steamship service on the east coast from the mainland to Newfoundland, there is a constitutional obligation by virtue of the terms of union with Newfoundland. There is also an obligation with reference to steamship service on the west coast. I should like to know from the government what this is. Is it legal or constitutional or by virtue of what agreement between the provincial and federal governments, if such exists, that this steamship service be operated?

Mr. Fulton: It is not within my knowledge that there is any provision in the constitution or that there is an agreement that would cover the point mentioned by the hon. gentleman. The basis upon which we have jurisdiction is that the company is a company under federal jurisdiction. We are not asserting here any legislative jurisdiction by virtue of a written agreement, by virtue of a provision in the constitution for the provision of the service because, as I say, there is no such written or constitutional requirement. There is the fact that this company, and its service, is under the legislative jurisdiction of parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When the Leader of the Opposition asked the Minister of Labour about two ships being disposed of by the company, and what was the minister's understanding as to the obligation of the company to carry on the operation with at least a limited number of ships, the Minister of Labour replied that he understood there was an obligation. I then put in an aside, was it a legal obligation? I do not expect the Minister of Labour to be able to answer whether or not there is a legal obligation, but perhaps he will explain what he meant by saying he understood there was an obligation as to the continuation of this service, which is so important?

Mr. Starr: When I said there was an obligation I meant a moral obligation. After all, the Canadian Pacific have been operating these steamships for many years. People are dependent upon them, and they have more or less carried on the operation of this ferry service between the island and the mainland. After this bill is passed there certainly will be a legal obligation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the Minister of Justice will give consideration to this. There must be a legal obligation on the part of the crown, in the right of Canada, to see that there is communication between the mainland and the island?

Mr. Pearson: May I add to that question just one observation. Is there any obligation in the original franchise, if that is the right word, by which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was granted the right to build the transcontinental railroad? Is there any legal obligation in that franchise to continue the service to Vancouver island?

Mr. Fulton: I believe that has been the subject of dispute and representation over the years. The fact is that the service was established. I would not care, at this stage, to revive a controversy which died many years ago. The fact is that the company has been providing a service. It is a company under the legislative jurisdiction of parliament, and it is on that basis that I would prefer to rest the authority for this legislation rather than enter into a hypothetical discussion as to whether or not there is now a legal or constitutional obligation on the company.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is aware, of course, that it was a condition of the union with British Columbia that a railway should be built to the pacific coast. Does the minister recall—I confess I do not—whether or not there was any obligation on the dominion at that time to provide steamship service between the mainland and Vancouver island?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman, Mr. Chairman, is himself a student of history. I know he will recall, as well as I do, the controversy that existed as to whether or not there was such an obligation. My point is that I do not see that there is any purpose to be served by reviving that controversy.

It is not necessary to found this bill on one point of view or another with regard to that controversy. We are concerned with getting the steamships back into operation and surely no hon. member opposite would question that this company is under the legislative authority of parliament—

Mr. Pearson: No, that is so.

Mr. Fulton: There does not seem to me, therefore, to be any purpose to be served by going back to controversies which died 50 years ago.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps there is this purpose to be served—it is reported, and I ask for confirmation other than this report, that the company has disposed of two of these ships. Does the company or can the company relieve itself of any obligation which it might have by disposing of all of these ships?

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Chairman, that is a hypothetical question because I am not aware that there is any intention or thought on the part of the company of disposing of all its ships, so I am really not able to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to pursue this subject a little further. This is a most extraordinary measure the government is proposing to take, which would have the effect for the time being at least of confiscating the property of a private company. The government is obliging people to go back to work by law—also a very unusual procedure—and is making it criminal for people not to go back to work for this shipping company. It would be a different situation if there were an obligation on the part of the federal government to maintain that service, as there was in 1950, between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and hon. members will recall that the service was resumed with the consent of the union almost immediately after the strike started.

If the government is resting its authority for action solely on its jurisdiction over shipping and over federal companies—neither of which one would contest—I would think, and the minister is a lawyer and I am not, but I would think that the government's jurisdiction over shipping might be a more solid foundation than its jurisdiction over federal companies upon which to rest its action. It does seem to me that, although the minister says this business of disposing of the ships is a hypothetical question, it is not really hypothetical, especially when we consider something which has happened very recently on the east coast. It is true that jurisdiction exists over these Canadian Pacific ships and it also existed over the Canadian National (West Indies) ships on the east coast but the government did not see fit to take this kind of action in that case. There must be some distinction or difference between the two cases. It is true that this is a service between one place and another place in Canada—

Mr. Fulton: You have answered your own question, surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and the other was a service between another country and Canada. I admit that is a very important difference but I assume the government is acting here because of some sort of principle and we are anxious to find out just what is that principle.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the government recognizes that it is a matter of concern to the government on behalf of the people of Canada to see that the people of Canada are served with adequate transportation facilities and I suppose that is the broad general principle involved in the bill. If it were not for something like that there would be no need or occasion for the federal government to take action but, as I say, I felt it was not useful to seek to set a narrow legalistic basis on which to found this bill. We felt the interests of the country required it; we know we have the legislative jurisdiction to do it, and we propose to submit this proposition to parliament for its approval if parliament agrees with the course being adopted. I might just say, however, that the hon. member should, I think, look at the bill before he makes broad, sweeping assertions about the confiscation of property of the company because I am sure he will find nothing like that in the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might substitute the word "appropriate" for "confiscate" the property of the company.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps it is because both the minister and I come from the same province that we find ourselves in at least partial agreement at this time in that it is not necessary to rehash all the controversies on this particular item.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It might have some effect on the rights of labour.

Mr. Howard: There was a comment on the rates of labour which I did not hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It could possibly have some effect on the rights of labour.

Mr. Howard: Oh, yes it could possibly, but it is interesting that the point arose with respect to the speculation as to whether the company has any legal obligation to maintain some sort of service out there or not. This is a worth-while speculation which I think points up, by the mere fact that it was raised, the objections we have made for some time about the operation of passenger and steamship services on the coast of British Columbia. From what I can glean from the comments and answers by members of the cabinet about the contents of the bill, and I may have to revise this statement after I see what the bill contains, but from what I have been able to gather so far it does relatively little with respect to the over-all, long-term project of providing shipping on the coast of British Columbia. It certainly has an immediate good effect of allowing the ships to go back into operation so that some sort of service is provided between Vancouver and Vancouver island, between Nanaimo and Vancouver, but it does practically nothing in respect of the over-all co-ordinated approach which must be taken by this government. I think the government has failed just as the previous administration failed, in not taking cognizance of and in not paying more attention to the shipping problems on the coast of British Columbia. I have mentioned this a number of times and will continue to do so, but these stop-gap measures—particularly this one in the light of its effect on the overall shipping on the coast of British Columbia—are merely short term approaches into which the government was jockeyed because it was unable to deal with the situation in past years.

We have always contended that if some sensible approach or attitude had been evident on the part of the previous administration and on the part of this administration with respect to the operating of shipping in this area we would probably not have got into this difficulty in the first place because, as hon. members will know, this difficulty arose because of a difference in opinion regarding the wage structure which would exist. I have no intention of getting into a discussion on the wage structure as to whether or not there was merit on one side of the argument or the other. I think if we analyse the matter, as did the junior chamber of commerce in Victoria, we will find that the fault lies with the Canadian Pacific steamship company more than it does with the union representing the employees.

Because of this difference of opinion, however, we ended up with a strike and I think we have to look at the attitude of the company which said "We cannot afford to pay any more than the 8 per cent which we signed for with another union", and secondly they said, "Even if we did it would mean an inequitable structure of wages within the same company or an inequitable structure of wage increases within the same company; therefore we cannot have anything to do with it." The question of subsidies was involved and if the company wanted to comply, the question of their fare structure was involved and the type of ships the company has been building was involved, as was also the inefficiency of the ships. I am sure anyone who is familiar with the operation of the C.P.R. boats on the coast of British Columbia would not say that they are anything but inefficiently run, and that they are improperly built for that type of service.

All these factors have to be taken into consideration in looking at coastal shipping as a whole in British Columbia and I submit that while this legislation may have the immediate result of providing a service between one point and another out there, and of getting the employees back to work at a wage increase equal to that which the other employees got, there is no guarantee and, if you analyse the trend of collective bargaining and the attitudes taken and which could be taken in the future with respect to this particular strike, there is not even a pious hope that this will do anything more than have the immediate effect for which it is designed of getting these ships back into operation. This effect, of course, is a good thing because the general public is certainly suffering in British Columbia far more than anyone else, far more than the employees and far more than the company.

Unless and until the federal government which is in office now, and any other federal government which succeeds it is willing to take the final step of placing all coastal shipping in British Columbia under an all-inclusive crown corporation, you are going to continue to have these problems you have now, you are going to have subsidies involved, and ships are going to lose money on some runs and make it on others, and then you will have to balance it up, and so on. Until you do that you are going to have problems of this kind arising because of the costs involved, and because of the wage rates, and because the attitude of the companies is that they cannot afford to pay anything better, while they have millions of dollars in other accounts and there is no argument about that.

If it were a crown company where you could balance a loss against a profit and consider the operation of such a passenger service as primarily, a public service, you would have less chance of such a situation developing. So while there may be no reason to go back into the history of this industry to find out these things, I point out that these particular problems will continue to arise.

There are all sorts of detailed things that we can get involved in, probably, when we see the bill, because then we will be able to go into more detail than we can at the moment when we are just groping around in the dark, but I have a strong impression that the effect of this legislation, as far as I have been able to grasp it, will be a purely short term one and that there is no conception of what the long term problems are, and, fundamentally, I do not think this government has any conception of how to deal with them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not wish to become involved in a controversy, but as I listened to the hon. member pointing out that all we have to do was to set up a crown corporation and then all the difficulties would be settled, I thought I might just remind him that we have, in the province of Saskatchewan, a socialist government, and that it had a crown corporation in operation some years ago, the employees of which asked for higher payment—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. I think it is permissible to rise on a point of order at any time. My point of order is that last evening we were so restricted as to what might be—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. What is the point of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is that we are debating a measure to deal with the Canadian Pacific steamships on the Pacific coast, and not the provincial government of Saskatchewan, and the Prime Minister is quite irrelevant and therefore out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I notice the celerity with which the hon. gentleman raises points of order, when the question has already been raised by the hon. member for Skeena. It was he who raised the question of setting up a crown corporation, and I did not hear any objection coming then from that authority, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

I will simply terminate by saying this: That in Saskatchewan we had experience of a crown corporations—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have raised a point of order—

Mr. Howard: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatsoever to the Prime Minister's remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a matter of total indifference to me whether or not the hon. member for Skeena has any objection. What I am seeking to do is to have order maintained in the committee. The hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches were very anxious to do that last night, and we were exceedingly restricted.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member may talk about a point of order, but he cannot discuss a ruling that has been made. It is true the Chair was a little lax in allowing the hon. member for Skeena to develop his remarks, but perhaps I may now ask all hon. members to direct their comments to this resolution which is concerned with the British Columbia steamship services.

Mr. Pearson: I have a question which concerns this matter and which avoids the difficulties about crown corporations and their merits or demerits. I wish to raise a matter which does, perhaps, throw some light on some of the difficulties which may confront the government in the action which they propose to take, and I ask the government if they have yet taken these possible difficulties into consideration. I am thinking of the action taken by the provincial government to take over the Black Ball line and put it under an administrator, and the difficulties which the provincial government is facing in carrying out that order and operating the ships, difficulties which have now reached the point where they have had to secure an injunction to keep the ships going. I should like to ask someone in the government whether that difficulty has been taken into consideration and, if that difficulty should arise, whether this is the kind of remedy they would apply to it?

Mr. Fulton: I can assure the Leader of the Opposition and the committee that these difficulties, and this sort of situation, were taken into consideration when the legislation was considered. We do not anticipate that this difficulty will arise, because the scheme of the bill will be to provide for a collective agreement subject to provisional amendment with regard to the increase in wages, and there will be therefore no reason for the employees to refuse to go back to work or for anyone to persuade them to refuse to go back to work, because a collective agreement will be in force.

I am not fully aware of the legal position in which the provincial government found itself, but my impression is that they appointed an administrator by virtue of their civil defence act, and my understanding is that the situation in which a strike had been declared was not remedied and that no attempt had been made to deal with that aspect of the situation. I do not say this by way of criticism, but merely according to my understanding of the position.

The situation here is quite different; there will be collective agreements in effect. As to what would happen if the men did not go back to work, the Prime Minister has already answered that with respect to the penalty but, again, I may say that the situation, as I have just outlined it, is that we do not contemplate that anybody will refuse to pay due regard to the legislation and to abide by what parliament will have provided.

Mr. Pearson: The premier of British Columbia has stated his position in the action that has been taken in the Vancouver Sun of July 18 which quotes him as saying:

> The government of British Columbia is determined that in future ferry connections between Vancouver island and the mainland shall not be subject either to the whims of union policy or to the indifference of federal agencies.

Mr. Fulton: I think that sort of statement speaks for itself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is there any connection between the decision of the government in this matter and the visit of two distinguished members of the government to British Columbia? This is a matter which has been in the hands of the government for some 60 days. I am not criticizing the Minister of Labour, who has been conducting private negotiations, but there was a very unusual statement, attributed, I think, to the Minister of Public Works. If I am correct, when he was out west he said that now at long last he was convinced that this was really of vital importance to the people of British Columbia, and that he would go back to Ottawa as quickly as possible to bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister and undoubtedly, as a result of his vicarious activity, a solution to this problem which has been outstanding now for 65 days would be achieved.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East knows as well as I do that it is not always wise to depend on press reports of what one said. I did not see the particular one he has mentioned with regard to myself but certainly I said nothing of the kind. We have always been terribly concerned about this situation ever since the Canadian Pacific steamships were first tied up but the position became extremely critical toward the end of last week when the Black Ball service also was tied up. The result of that was the only way a person could get to or from Vancouver island by sea was by going either from Anacortes or from Port Angeles in the state of Washington. While it was possible to get across by air or to send freight over by barge the situation became simply impossible. Hon. members of the committee must remember that there are almost as many people living on Vancouver island as there are in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh now!

Mr. Green: This situation had to be met. The proposal the government now brings forward is designed to get these ships operating and I am convinced it will do so, not only the Canadian Pacific ships but also the Black Ball ships, if the latter are not as a matter of fact already in operation again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a good thing to go home now and then.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Justice. I may not have understood what he said but I believe he said one provision in the bill was to expand the terms of the collective agreement that was in effect up until the time the strike started. Not being familiar with it, I do not know if the agreement contained such a provision, but I understood him to say it was to extend the terms of that collective agreement with the exception of those provisions relating to wages. Is that correct?

Mr. Fulton: I believe that I said the terms of the collective agreement would be extended, subject however to a provisional amendment with regard to a wage increase of 8 per cent. I do not think the hon. gentleman would expect us or parliament to require men to go back to work without a collective agreement in force.

Mr. Howard: In effect, what parliament will be asked to do is to write a collective agreement the same as was in existence before with the addition of an 8 per cent increase in wages?

Mr. Fulton: Parliament is not being asked to write a collective agreement but to extend the provisions of the agreement subject to a provisional amendment by way of an 8 per cent increase in wages.

Mr. Howard: Until what time?

Mr. Fulton: Until settlement has been arrived at and a new collective agreement is substituted therefor.

Mr. Howard: What provisions will be in there with respect to some of the other matters that were dealt with in the original negotiations and which I understand have not yet been resolved?

Mr. Fulton: I understand—and the Minister of Labour can correct me if I am wrong—that the great bone of contention is wages and that the other issues were not major issues. I am also informed that the main subject upon which it became impossible to reach agreement or on the basis of which it became evident that agreement up to this time could not be reached was wages. That being the main bone of contention it seems to me that is the matter with which parliament should concern itself leaving the other matters to be the subject of the renewed negotiations.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice one question. Is it not a fact that the principle, procedure and method of this bill is essentially the same as that brought forward by the previous administration with respect to the railway strike?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. I am confident that when the hon. gentleman looks at the bill he will find there is a substantial departure in principle and that the principle in this bill is that enunciated at the time of the railway strike by the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, in the amendment he moved on August 30, 1950, and for which the hon. member for Kootenay West voted on that day.

Mr. Herridge: If I voted for it, it must have been correct. I misunderstood the explanation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Kootenay West will remember that this bill, if he examines it, would seem to provide—rightly or wrongly—compulsory arbitration which has the effect—again rightly or wrongly and I am not arguing that point at the moment—of interfering with the processes of collective bargaining.

Some hon. Members: No.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: As the house has given unanimous consent to this proceeding, I suggest we complete the introduction of the bill and first reading now even though the bill is not available and probably will not be available for distribution in mimeographed form until perhaps six o'clock. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-42, to provide for the resumption of the British Columbia coast steamship service operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Fulton.]

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EXTENSION OF BENEFITS AND CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-40, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting the resolution preceding this bill yesterday I outlined the general purpose of it and at this time I should like to briefly recapitulate some of the things which it is proposed to do by way of amendment to this bill. The general principle underlying the amendments which are proposed, of course, is to broaden the scope of the act and to thus make it possible to make payments to certain farmers and groups of farmers who heretofore have not been eligible for payments as the act is written at the present time. A very considerable number of farmers who have been precluded from receiving payment in the past because of the size of the minimum area which could be declared eligible for payment may now be put in receipt of payment and a considerable number of anomalies which have existed in the act will be removed by the amendments now proposed.

I should like to briefly outline the complaints and the proposed remedies and this will be a sort of brief compilation of what the amendments are and what their effect will be but before doing so I think I should point out to the house that it should be borne in mind that under legislation of this kind it is not feasible to pay awards to all farmers who suffer a crop loss in any particular year nor is it possible in all individual cases to make the award proportionate to each farmer's loss. This could be done only under a crop insurance scheme. We had a considerable amount of discussion yesterday with respect to a crop insurance scheme. The general opinion expressed by those who spoke on the resolution yesterday was that a crop insurance scheme should be brought into effect and I indicated that this was the opinion of the government and we were proceeding with that in mind.

However, this scheme has never been a crop insurance scheme. That was never the intention of this legislation. The main purpose of this act has always been to assist the municipalities and the provinces to deal with a relief problem which they could not otherwise undertake, or which they could not deal with alone, and I think that should be kept in mind in discussing the act, that this is not a crop insurance scheme. It has been, and essentially throughout the years has remained, a form of drought relief. That form of drought relief has been greatly extended to cover other types of crop losses such as loss by rust, by grasshoppers, by hail and by flooding.

The majority of the complaints received—and they have been received, of course, for years—are protests against the inclusion of high-yield sections in an eligible area when computing the category of payment. It is proposed to exclude from both payment and the computations to determine the category of award all those sections having an average yield of 12 or more bushels; that is, the individual sections. This will enable the marking of payments on those sections with a loss of crop more in proportion to the loss.

Many complaints are also received from farmers in eligible townships who, even though they have a low yield, are excluded from payment because their lands are in a block of six or more sections with an average yield of over 10 bushels, that is contiguous to a high-yield township. It is proposed to repeal this section of the act and simply exclude from payment all sections having a yield of 12 or more bushels.

Many complaints are also received from farmers with a low yield who are in an ineligible township and denied an award because they do not form part of a block of six or more adjoining sections that is contiguous to an eligible township. It seems unfair to deny payments to such farmers when they are in many instances just across the road from an eligible township. It is therefore proposed to remove the restrictions as to the size of the block and make it possible to qualify any number of sections of land adjoining an eligible area, regardless of township boundaries as long as those sections are contiguous to one another.

It is also proposed to remove from the act the authority to exclude farmers with other occupations. It is felt that everyone who farms land himself, or hires the work done, should participate in the benefits, particularly as the levy is collected from him.

Another proposal is to repeal that section of the act which excludes from award all crown lands which had not been sold or granted until after 1940. It is felt that farmers on such lands are as much entitled to an award as anyone else.

Many farmers complain that the minimum size of the area for eligibility, namely one-half of a township, that is, 18 sections, is too large. It is proposed to reduce this to one-third of a township, or 12 sections.

In areas where coarse grains are the predominant crop, many complain because wheat is used as the index in determining eligibility. They recommend the use of the predominant coarse grain crop. It is proposed to provide that the regulations may authorize the substitution of any grain for wheat where less than 10 per cent of the cultivated area is sown to wheat. That 10 per cent figure was taken because in any township where 10 per cent or more of the land is sown to wheat in nearly all cases that 10 per cent will perhaps be the best land, the land which has been summerfallowed and so forth, and therefore if the yield on that land is low the yield on the other land is likely to be considerably lower. Therefore, continuing to use wheat as the index in cases where more than 10 per cent of the township is planted to wheat means that the farmer will get a better deal than if you take merely the predominant coarse grain crop. In other words, where you had 15 per cent of the township planted in wheat, 45 per cent of it planted in oats and 30 per cent planted in barley, if you took in that case oats the farmers in most cases would not get as good a payment as if you took the wheat as an index for payment.

Many farmers also feel that crops other than wheat, oats barley and rye, should be subject to the one per cent levy deducted at the elevators. Since flax and rapeseed are now grown in large quantity it is proposed to make these subject to the levy also. The growers of these benefit under the act in a year of crop failure and have benefited, of course, for many years past, and it seems unfair when they benefit that they should not contribute toward the fund the same as the growers of wheat, oats, barley and rye.

Some complaints come from farmers who suffer from flooding because they feel that the minimum area to qualify is too large.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the crop that the minister spoke of just now?

Mr. Harkness: I spoke of those who grow flax and rapeseed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister takes his seat will he address himself to the question he raised yesterday as to the difficulty of assessing farmers in eastern Canada who, it was suggested, might benefit from this scheme.

Mr. Harkness: Flax and rapeseed are handled just the same as wheat, oats and barley are handled. They are handled through the elevator system in western Canada. The deduction can be made from them just as readily at it can be made from wheat, oats and barley. There is no such system in handling grains produced in other parts of the country and, as I pointed out yesterday, most of the production in any event is not sold in the form of grain; it is sold in the form of livestock and livestock products.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Harkness: I wonder whether I can finish. Of course, hon. members can pose their questions when they speak on second reading and we can have the ordinary question and answer discussion when we are in committee on the bill.

As I was saying, some complaints come from farmers who suffer from flooding because they feel that the minimum area to qualify is too large and that, I think, has been a justifiable complaint because you get many instances of flooding in a river valley and in many instances it has been impossible, of course, to get an area of 18 sections which was flooded. You have the river following an irregular course, and so on. At present there must be a flooded area of at least one-sixth of a township—that is of course six sections—to qualify. It is proposed to reduce this by making eligible any area consisting of six or more adjoining sections of land where at least one-third of the total cultivated area is flooded. In other words, to be eligible now the area really is reduced to one-third of what it was before.

A considerable number of complaints have also been received because the payment of awards is made in two instalments. It is proposed to amend the act to authorize payment in future in one instalment instead of two, and payment to be made in the month of December.

A number of other minor amendments to the act and regulations are proposed but these are largely to facilitate the administration of the act. One of the major amendments to the regulations will be to qualify for payment lands operated by Indians within reservations. The hon. member for Essex East asked about this yesterday and I gave him a guarantee. In future such lands will come under the operations of the act on the same basis as other lands.

I think this summary I have given of the various amendments covers all of those which are of any considerable importance and I would hope that all of them would receive the unanimous approval of the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—"Farmer".

Mr. Boulanger: I notice that family corporations will benefit under this law but will business corporations owning land also benefit?

Mr. Harkness: The reason for the amendment is that in recent years an increasing number of families operating farms have organized themselves as family corporations for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the farm. Quite frequently you have a set-up of a father and a son or two sons. They form a family corporation and carry on the farm as such. Such corporations have been ineligible to receive awards under the act as it stood and therefore we are including family corporations of that kind in the definition of "farmer" so that these people will be eligible for awards in the future. It has been manifestly unfair that families who found it more convenient to organize themselves as private companies in order to carry on their farming operations should be cut off from the benefits of the act.

In most cases these family corporations carry on in the same way as similar families which are unincorporated. You have a father and a son or a father and two sons or a father, a daughter, a son and a son-in-law and so on. In order to make a better division of the proceeds and to meet other requirements these families have found it more convenient in many cases to carry on business as private corporations rather than as individuals. That is the reason for the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A non-family corporation is not included. I do not know whether it will be too strong to say that the minister regards non-family corporations as a threat to the family farm or whether they are excluded purely for economic reasons, namely that they do not need any assistance. The minister nods that that is the case.

Mr. Harkness: On that point, as I stated when speaking on second reading of the bill, the intent and purpose of the act have been to provide a measure of relief to farmers who have lost their crops, especially because of drought. I do not think anyone will argue that the Royal Trust Company, for example, is in need of any form of relief on lands they own and operate either as a result of drought or for any other reason. Therefore I do not think it is appropriate to include corporations, particularly loan companies which have foreclosed on land and taken possession. I do not think it is proper to include them under the provisions of the act and to make payments to them and, of course, there is no intention of doing so.

Mr. McIntosh: I might say a few words to correct a wrong impression that may be held by some hon. members. Although the minister says that this is a form of relief, the funds required to pay this form of relief do not all come from the government. The plan operates on a contributory basis. The farmers pay one per cent of the gross revenue from their grain.

Last night a member from northern Ontario, I believe, asked why the levy could not be raised to three per cent. I am quite sure that if he will inquire from the farmers in his constituency he will find that they do not want to participate. We have found that to be so in the western provinces in the case of farmers along the edge of the foothills of the Rockies. They have contributed to the fund for years and have never participated in the benefits. They would be pleased to get out of the scheme and not be included in a P.F.A.A. area. If members from eastern Canada will inquire from the farmers in their ridings I think they will also find that they do not wish to participate under the act.

It is a form of relief although each farmer has to contribute. We grow grain exclusively but the eastern farmers have not got the same problems. They can feed some of their grain and they also have sources of income from cattle or mixed farming. This is not the case in the west. Hon. members may ask why western farmers do not diversify their operations. The land in the west is not suitable for diversification. A lot of the land does not have water or shelter for cattle and you cannot raise cattle unless you have shelter and water. Therefore these farmers can only grow grain and that is the reason for this legislation. I do not think that eastern farmers would want to participate at all. It is not a case of 100 per cent of the relief coming from the government. The farmers of western Canada contribute one per cent of their gross revenue to the fund and I do not think eastern farmers would want to insure on that basis.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which I think falls squarely within the four corners of the section of the act being amended by this clause. It is one that is peculiar to my constituency. We have there several associations known as metis associations which are incorporated pursuant to a provincial statute. They consist of a number of groups comprising metis or Indians who have contracted out pursuant to the appropriate provisions of the Indian Act. They occupy land for which they have a certificate of occupancy. They are not owners and they are not tenants.

Consequently when they had occasion last fall to make application for the first time for the benefits of this act they discovered that they could not qualify either within the meaning of the section or the regulations passed pursuant to section 5. They are farmers but, as I said, they are not owners and they are not tenants. When the minister is considering the regulations that will be drawn at a later date I would ask him to take into account the situation of these people, of whom there are a considerable number, so that they can qualify. They pay the ordinary levy, of course, when they haul their grain to the elevator but in the past they have not been entitled to receive benefits.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time this particular group of people and their problem with regard to prairie farm assistance has come to my attention. For many years past, as the hon. member for Essex East mentioned yesterday, I urged most strongly on the previous government that Indians should be included. That is being done by these amendments. I was not aware of this situation but I should like to thank the hon. member for bringing it to my attention and to assure him that we will give sympathetic consideration to putting these people in the position where they can secure payment in the same way as Indians on reservations and other people who will now be included and were not included before.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) who stated that eastern farmers are not interested in a crop assistance scheme.

If eastern farmers are beginning to show interest in this legislation, it is because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) talked about it in their area. As a matter of fact, he made several promises to them and if those people are interested in the matter, it is because, as their opposite numbers in the west, they need some sort of insurance to protect their crops.

As I said yesterday, the farmers of the constituencies of Megantic and Lotbiniere sustained heavy losses last year. In fact, they completely lost their crops and would have welcomed some sort of assistance.

I do not mean that eastern farmers should pay the 1 per cent premium as do western farmers. Out west, farmers incur damages generally as a result of drought, which is rather exceptional in the eastern part of the country, where wind, hail and flooding normally cause such damage.

You will no doubt recall that three years ago considerable damage was suffered in central Quebec and that this damage recurs every year. That is why eastern farmers are beginning to show an interest in the matter, all the more so since the Minister of Agriculture made them wonderful promises during the last election campaign.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: If I have understood the hon. member correctly, Mr. Chairman, I think he is in error in stating that I said at any time in speeches here in eastern Canada that the benefits of the P.F.A.A. would be extended to farmers in the east. I have never had any such idea in my mind at any time, and I can assure him I have never made any statement along that line.

I have said on numerous occasions, as I said yesterday, that we hope to bring in a system of crop insurance as soon as possible. There is no question about that. But it has never been in my mind at any time, nor do I think in the mind of anyone else who is familiar with the operations of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in western Canada, to extend it to other areas of the country. For the reasons I have indicated today and yesterday, it is not a practical proposition to do so. I do not know how the hon. member would have secured this impression, but I can assure him it is an incorrect one. I have never at any time had any such idea in my mind, and therefore I know definitely I have never made any statement along that line. I have talked to a considerable extent about crop insurance.

Mr. Boulanger: I would remind the minister that last January at a meeting of the federation of agriculture in Montreal, he talked about crop insurance.

Mr. Harkness: That is correct.

(Translation):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) has very well understood the remarks made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) has just told us that the Minister of Agriculture had spoken to Montreal farmers; I am very glad to learn this, as I had been unaware that there were any farmers in Canada's metropolis.

(Text):

I do not believe the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek fully understood the remarks of my colleague, who expressed a view that I believe would be shared widely by the farmers in eastern Canada as well. The provocation may not always be the same, but as the hon. member pointed out the farmers in eastern Canada do have great losses, total losses, and notwithstanding other kinds of assistance that may come from the possession of other forms of farm income, these losses can be very great, having in mind the proportions of stock that a farmer may have on hand.

In my own area, for instance, where the farmers grow large cash crops of corn, soybeans and wheat, total failures mean a great deal and put the farmers in a very difficult position. I can assure my hon. friend that notwithstanding the element of contribution that does exist in this measure my judgment would be, as his has been, that there would be a wide measure of support if it were practical to arrange for this kind of measure for the farmers of eastern Canada. I am not pitting the farmers of one section of the country against the other. I believe that in the national interest we must regard farmers as having special problems. There is an understandable feeling on the part of many farmers in eastern Canada that some of these measures might, with benefit, be applied to them. It is for that reason we have taken the position on this side that consideration ought to be given to the application of this measure.

The minister indicated today, and more particularly yesterday in greater detail, that he thought the way to do this would be through a system of crop insurance because it was not possible to make the kind of assessment necessary of the eastern farmer in order to bring him within the advantages of this particular measure. However, that is a matter that he is studying. It may be that through crop insurance, what cannot be done for the eastern farmer under this measure, can be done under that proposal.

I do not believe the minister has given any indication of the estimated total cost of these particular amendments or of the operations of the act this year. I believe I saw an estimate made by the Prime Minister that the cost of this measure this year would run somewhere in the neighbourhood of $39 million. I understand that the cost of the drought in 1949 was some $22 million. I have seen it suggested in western newspapers that the Prime Minister's estimate of $39 million was high. I would be grateful to the minister if he could give us those figures.

(Translation):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I understand the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) much better when he expresses himself in English than when he speaks French. However, I want to point out to him that when I spoke to farmers in Montreal, I was not addressing Montreal farmers, but farmers gathered from all parts of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Visiting farmers.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, of course.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: In connection with the estimate of total cost, I said yesterday that it is estimated it will increase the payments made by about 20 per cent. It is impossible to say what the payments in any particular year may be. However, I have here the figures as to what the payments have been since the inception of the act in 1939. They have totalled, up to and including April 15, 1958, $202,254,261.90. The amount of the collections up to March 31, 1958—not exactly the same date, it is 15 days earlier—has been $103,955,728.82, in other words, about half of the amount paid out has been collected through the one per cent levy.

The largest amount which was paid out in any particular year was in 1954 when the total payments were $33 million odd.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And $22 million for 1949, is that right?

Mr. Harkness: In 1949, it was $22,050,000. Those were the two biggest years.

The estimate for this year, of course, is that there will be more paid out than was paid out in 1954. The estimate which was made some three or four weeks ago was that it might run up as high as—I think I stated this myself in the house although I do not recall having heard or seen an estimate made by the Prime Minister—between $40 million and $50 million. That estimate would be reduced downward at the present time, I believe, in view of the extensive rains which have occurred during the past two or three weeks in western Canada. I am very glad to say these rains have considerably improved the situation, particularly as far as late sown crops are concerned.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the minister about what he told the farmers in Montreal last January as reported in Le Devoir of January 30 last, as follows:

> I am at present studying the possibility of setting up a form of insurance which would protect the farmers against calamities, floods, hail storms or drought, acts of God which the farmers must always bear in mind.

The minister went on to explain the difficulties of collecting levies for insurance, if we ever do get this insurance in Quebec, and I would like to ask the minister whether the only reason the eastern farmer would not receive the benefit of this legislation is the difficulty of collecting levies from the farmers?

Mr. Harkness: From what the hon. member said and from what he has read in connection with the speech I made in Montreal, it would appear to me that he is still under the impression that this is a type of crop insurance. I have tried to make the point several times yesterday and today that this is not a crop insurance scheme. What the hon. member read from my speech to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in Montreal is quite correct. I made that statement there and I made it numerous times before that meeting and have made it numerous times since. I made it here in the house yesterday, but that has no relationship to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act or to the amendment we are considering at the present time.

When we put into effect a system of crop insurance the farmer will of course pay a premium and, as I indicated yesterday, if he has a tobacco crop, which is a very high cost crop, and if he is to be paid compensation for the money he has put into that crop—which is likely to be $500 per acre or more—the premium he would pay and the amount of compensation he would receive under a system of crop insurance would be very much greater than in the case of a man who wanted insurance on a wheat crop, for instance. This is because the amount the latter man has put into his crop is less than one-tenth of what he would put in per acre to grow a tobacco crop. In other words, a system of crop insurance would have to be based on regular insurance principles, the higher the value of the crop you are insuring the higher your premium would naturally be, and of course the premium would also be determined by the likelihood of damage in a particular area. One area would have a lower premium than another and the same thing applies at this time to hail insurance in western Canada. We have hail insurance schemes in one section of the country which would run at 5 per cent or 6 per cent, while in another section of the country it could be as high as 22 per cent on account of the greater likelihood of hail, which experience has shown has fallen in a particular area in previous years.

Any system of regular crop insurance will have to be based on factors of that kind, with great variations in premiums according to the differences of crops insured and because of the difference in areas and the likelihood of damage in those areas.

Mr. Boulanger: I know the difference between the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and insurance on crops. I know there is a difference, but I would ask the minister when he intends to institute a system of crop insurance such as the one of which he spoke in Montreal?

Mr. Harkness: As I have stated, we have conducted very intensive studies for many months and we hope to be in a position during the next session of parliament to bring forward legislation. We do not know whether this will be possible or not as yet but we certainly intend to bring it in as soon as we can possibly work out a scheme which would be acceptable in all provinces across Canada.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Calculation of average yield.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wonder, with regard to clause 2 if I might ask the minister a question. As I understand it, this provides that a farmer or a group of farmers can qualify for an area of six or more adjoining sections or lots rather than an area of one-sixth of a township, as at present. That would seem to be an improvement, as I am so advised. However, a crop failure to a farmer is a tragedy whether or not the adjoining sections are affected, and I wonder if the minister has given consideration—as undoubtedly he has—to this matter and has investigated the possibility of dealing with this clause on an individual farm basis rather than on an area basis. It does not seem fair that someone should be excluded just because there are not enough adjoining sections or lots to qualify, and perhaps the minister would enlighten on this point.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have given a great deal of consideration to the matter. If you bring it down to the individual farm basis you really to a considerable extent get into a system of crop insurance and to attempt to do that under this legislation, where you have a 1 per cent levy only as the farmer's contribution and where half the funds are put up by the dominion government, you would very greatly increase the administration costs, which would be out of all proportion to the benefits paid out and to the levy collected. It is not really a practical proposition under a scheme of this sort to bring it down to the individual farm basis.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The amendment also includes sections that have an average yield of 12 or more bushels. Is this not restrictive? Why is it not possible to provide a system for farms having an average yield of 12 or more bushels and likewise for farms with crop failures?

Mr. Harkness: No, as a matter of fact the chief complaint against the act as it now stands has been that where a farmer had a return of more than 10 bushels per acre he was excluded from payment, but his land was still taken into consideration in determining the average yield in that particular township so that the effect was that if he had, we will say, 15 or 20 bushels per acre as a crop and the other farmers in the township perhaps had no crop, they got a lower payment than would have been the case if his land had not been included in the determination of the eligibility of the township.

This proposal is to get away from that effect by excluding any section—in this case we bring it down to individual sections—from the computation which is made when the section has a yield of more than 12 bushels per acre, and of course we are also excluding them from payment. As I say, it was previously 10 bushels and farmers were not paid but their land, nevertheless, was taken into consideration, or the yield from their land, was taken into consideration in determining what the other people would be paid. Those other people, however, were not paid as much as they were entitled to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With regard to paragraph 2, may I ask the minister what he has in mind where less than 10 per cent of the cultivated acreage of land is sown to wheat. What special circumstances does the minister have in mind to enable another kind of grain to be taken in the place of wheat as the basis of an award? Why is it necessary to tie the act to wheat? Is it for administrative reasons? Is it for the reasons the minister mentioned yesterday with regard to assessment? What is the reason?

Mr. Harkness: I dealt with this to some extent when I was speaking on second reading. The situation is that in considerable areas in northern Manitoba, northern Saskatchewan and northern and western Alberta, the amount of wheat grown is quite small. In some cases there is practically no wheat grown there at all. But you have a situation in some cases such as I described yesterday in which, in a whole township of 36 sections there is only some 40 acres of wheat. Nevertheless, under the act as it existed we had to take that small patch of wheat as an index for determining whether that whole township was eligible for payment or not. The purpose of this amendment is to get away from this situation, and in any township where less than 10 per cent of the cultivated acreage is in wheat we will take whatever is the predominant coarse grain crop, whether it is oats, barley or rye. The reason why the 10 per cent figure was taken is that farmers, generally speaking, put their best land into wheat, so if you have any area in which more than 10 per cent of the crop is in wheat, in nearly all cases the farmer would be better off by taking wheat as an index rather than oats and barley which are quite frequently planted on stubble land—land which has had a crop on it a year or perhaps two years before.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIMITS ON COMPENSATION FOR SLAUGHTERED CATTLE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-41, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act at the resolution stage, I stated that it has two purposes. One is to permit payment of compensation at market value for cattle ordered slaughtered in controlling an outbreak of a serious animal disease which was not normally present in Canada. The other is to raise the statutory maximum compensation rates for cattle ordered slaughtered in connection with area or herd eradication programs for such diseases as tuberculosis and brucellosis.

Section 11 of the act authorizes the minister to order the slaughter of animals suffering from or exposed to an infectious or contagious disease. Subsection (1) of section 12 authorizes him to order compensation to be paid to the owners of such animals, and subsection (2) of that section establishes the basis of compensation.

If members will turn to the explanatory note accompanying the bill they will find there the present wording of subsection (2) of section 12. It will be noted that the authorized compensation is the market value of the animal except in the instance of horses and cattle, for which maximum compensation amounts are specified by paragraphs (a) and (b).

The amendment, which is to paragraph (b), limits the exception in the case of cattle to those ordered slaughtered pursuant to any area or herd disease eradication program. The effect of this will be to permit payment of compensation at market value in such circumstances as the foot-and-mouth outbreak in 1952. While such circumstances are rare, I am sure the house would agree that in those instances the owners of cattle which are ordered slaughtered in the national interest should receive full compensation for them.

The most important impact of the amendment will be in relation to compensation paid under the tuberculosis and brucellosis eradication programs. At the present time the maximum compensation is $100 for purebred animals and $40 for grade animals. The amendment will increase those maximum figures to $140 for purebreds and $70 for grades. It may help in an understanding of the bill to explain briefly the nature of those programs.

The restricted area plan for tuberculosis was introduced in 1922. Areas are established, usually counties in eastern Canada and municipalities in western Canada, on the recommendation of a provincial minister of agriculture and following a request to him by a majority of the cattle owners in the area. All the cattle in the area are then tested for tuberculosis, reactors are removed from herds and if the incidence of tuberculosis is below one-half of one per cent the area is accredited. There is also an individual herd plan, known as the accredited herd plan, which operates on a somewhat more stringent basis and which is also entered into voluntarily by herd owners.

All sections of all provinces are now included in tuberculosis restricted areas. The programs have virtually eliminated tuberculosis from Canadian cattle herds. As an illustration of that, the incidence of tuberculosis in cattle tested has declined from four per cent at the start of the program to only slighly over one-tenth of one per cent last year.

A similar program for the eradication of brucellosis, or Bang's disease, was introduced in 1957. It operates on virtually the same basis as the area plan for tuberculosis. Most provinces have now requested the establishment of some brucellosis control areas, and the testing has been under way for some months.

In these programs it has never been considered necessary nor, in fact, desirable to compensate owners of reacting animals at their full market value. When an animal reacts to the test the owner is required to dispose of it for slaughter, under post mortem examination, and receives the carcass value of the animal. Also, the removal of reacting animals from the herd is to the owner's advantage as well as in the national interest. For these reasons the act has always placed a maximum limitation on the amount of compensation which can be paid for cattle and this principle is maintained in the present amendment in so far as programs of this nature are concerned.

The maximum compensations now authorized by the act, $100 for purebreds and $40 for grades, have been in effect since 1923. There have been numerous representations to the government from farm and livestock organizations that these rates are no longer equitable in relation to present cattle values. We have felt that these representations are valid and propose, by the present bill, to increase the maximum compensations to $140 for purebred cattle and $70 for grades.

I should perhaps explain the implication of the last portion of section 1 of the bill which reads:

—and if the sale of the carcass is unlawful an additional amount for purebred and grade animals equal to the value the carcass would have if the sale were lawful.

I mentioned earlier that if an animal is ordered to be slaughtered under the tuberculosis or brucellosis eradication programs the owner is required to dispose of it for slaughter and receives the slaughter value. All such animals are directed to plants operating under federal meat inspection, where they are subjected to veterinary post-mortem examination. When the infection is limited, the infected portions are condemned and the balance of the carcass is eligible for sale.

The effect of the last part of section 1 is that if the infection is sufficiently general as to require the entire carcass to be condemned an additional compensation may be paid to the owner to the value the carcass would have had if it had not been condemned. This provision has been in the act for some time.

Members will note from section 2 of the bill that the amended compensation rates will become effective on April 1, 1958. As I stated earlier we have just recently started testing under the new brucellosis area program. When we accept an area under the program on the recommendation of a province and start testing the cattle in it, our veterinarians move progressively from farm to farm. The owner does not have the privilege of electing when he will have his herd tested. Some, therefore, are tested at the beginning of the operation and some at the end.

We felt that it would be inequitable to have circumstances where some owners who quite fortuitously did not have their cattle tested until after the enactment of this bill may receive a higher rate of compensation than their neighbours who may have had their herds tested a few days before that. It was felt, therefore, that the amended rates should be effective from the first of the fiscal year which also coincides with the beginning of the main activity in brucellosis testing.

I might say that I had representations from a considerable number of hon. members in connection with the last point I mentioned of setting the date when the act will become effective and particularly from the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). It seemed to me it was only the reasonable thing to do although in general I must say I am very much opposed to retroactive legislation of any sort. But in view of the fact that the program has just started and for the other reasons I mention about inequities that would occur if the date of enforcement were not set back to the beginning of the fiscal year and the beginning of the testing program the April date has been put in the act.

I have gone into these tuberculosis and brucellosis schemes as well as into other matters in some detail because I find there has been and there remains a considerable amount of misapprehension in regard to what the Animal Contagious Diseases Act provides for and the reasons for which compensation is paid for animals ordered to be slaughtered. As I indicated in answer to a question yesterday, the act does not provide compensation for animals which die of a particular disease. It provides for compensation only for animals which are ordered to be slaughtered when it is felt in the national interest they should be slaughtered in order to prevent the spread of a disease.

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, if I may take the time of the house for a moment I should like to bring to the attention of the house and the minister the occurrence in this country of another disease which I feel we should act upon now and take into consideration in an effort to curb its spread and if possible eradicate it. I refer to what is known as Johne's disease or paratuberculosis in cattle. Today in Canada it is not a very serious matter but it is highly important that we act at this time before the disease becomes widespread across the country. The latest figures in this regard which I have been able to obtain reveal that there are about 25 affected herds, approximately 1,000 head of cattle.

I should like to say something in regard to this disease. It is contagious and affects the intestinal system of cattle. It is quite widespread in Europe, particularly in France and Germany, and in Great Britain and Iceland. It is also found in the United States. An interesting feature of this disease is that it is quite insidious. It sneaks up on a country, as it were. There is a lapse of time of perhaps three or four years between the period when the cattle catch the disease and when the first symptoms are discernible. Another aspect of the disease is that it invariably means the death of the cattle once the symptoms are apparent. Prior to death it can mean a considerable decrease in the production of milk in dairy herds and flesh in beef herds.

To give some idea of the extent of the damage this disease can cause I might mention that it is estimated to be causing damage to the extent of £6 million in the United Kingdom. The government there has set up a control program of sorts. The people in the European countries know most about this disease and on the occasion of a recent seminar at which the problem of Johne's disease was discussed the representatives from the European countries made some definite recommendations. They recommended that if a country is free of this disease it should use very stringent methods with regard to the importation of cattle to ensure that the disease does not enter the country. Unfortunately, we now have the disease in Canada although it could be described as being a minor infection in scattered herds. Another recommendation was that a country should establish a very stringent program of slaughter and quarantine to eradicate the disease as soon as possible.

I do not wish to take up any more time of the house but I can assure any hon. member who may be interested that I have accumulated a considerable amount of data with regard to the disease which I would be pleased to make available to him. May I close by pointing out that this is the time for us to attack and eradicate this disease because particularly in the west where we have community pastures it could become a problem of extremely serious proportions if some effort is not made to curb it.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of representing an agricultural constituency of the province of Quebec known for its dairy industry. The people of the riding of Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes have expanded that industry to an extraordinary degree. I need not recall the organization work which was necessary for the operation of their farms, that is for their mechanization and all the other modern improvements required before they could send their milk to Montreal but I must point out that they have had to face and solve many problems.

To do so, the farmers formed various agricultural organizations, study groups and particularly what is known as the famous milk control which is now the subject of disputes and debates in Montreal and in my riding. The milk producers realized that in their own interest they had to protect themselves against milk distributors in Montreal, and, to that end, they established what is called a zone. This step was of the utmost importance for them but at the same time could entail serious consequences.

I wish to thank the hon. minister for this consideration he has shown for the people in my riding by allowing the brucellosis tests to take place as early as the beginning of June. At present, we find that this disease has spread to some extent; the minister was therefore right in providing for such tests. The losses to farmers of my constituency will be lighter as a consequence.

I understand that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) is now making a special effort to amend this compensation act so as to bring the payments up to $70 for grade cattle and to $140 for purebred stock. However, in view of the fact that farmers will be prevented from buying cattle outside this area, prices have become prohibitive and the Minister of Agriculture will soon have to consider whether the compensation payment should again be changed.

I wished to call the hon. minister's attention to this matter, in order to warn him that next year I shall submit other requests to this effect.

I thank him for his gesture and the interest he has shown in our farmers who fully appreciate the new compensation payments offered them.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, anyone who has had anything to do with the production of livestock throughout the years realizes the excellent work that is being done by those who have had the authority to administer this act across Canada. In my opinion the administration has been continually improved and has brought about a great deal of advantage to farmers and producers of livestock and consumers of their products. I was pleased to note in this amending bill that the government is giving favourable response to representations of various organizations which are concerned with this matter. While the bill in one respect might be considered a piece of minor legislation, it is of great importance to the agricultural industry as a whole. We in this group intend to support the measure.

However, I do want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that the administration of the act and the requirement that the farmer or the cattle producer must have his cattle slaughtered in a licensed packinghouse places some of those farmers and cattle producers at a considerable extra expense. For instance, Mr. Speaker, in my constituency I think in order to reach a licensed slaughter house operating under the regulations that are required under this act the farmer would have to truck his cattle some 300 miles over the mountains. For some who have cattle in the Lardeau valley, in the Beaver lake district and in the Pend d'Oreille this is a considerable extra expense; so much so that under normal circumstances I would say it would not be worth the farmer's while to truck a few cattle this long distance over rough mountain roads. I wonder whether that problem has arisen in other parts of Canada and whether any consideration has been given to it by the minister and whether he has given consideration to some extra compensation being paid to farmers living under those conditions?

I wonder whether the minister has had any complaints concerning that aspect of the question, or whether any of his officials has had experience with the circumstances of farmers living in isolated districts and long distances from packinghouses, such as I have mentioned, of the type required for the slaughtering of cattle under this act? If so, will the minister consider some form of extra compensation under those circumstances, or would he even consider allowing the cattle to be slaughtered on the ranch under safe sanitary conditions under the inspection of, say, a licensed veterinary inspector or an appropriate official of his department?

I make these few remarks and suggestions because they do represent the experience of some of the farmers and cattle ranchers who reside in my constituency. When the minister replies I would like to hear his comments on my suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) brought up the question of Johne's disease. I think he has done a service to the house and to the government in bringing this to our attention. It is certainly a matter which I will go into with the director general of the veterinary service, and give very serious consideration as to what steps can be taken in order to eradicate this disease while it is still existing in very small proportions in Canada.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has just brought up the matter that animals condemned under this act have to be slaughtered in government-inspected plants; that is, as far as brucellosis and tuberculosis control measures are concerned. He said that in some instances in his own constituency there is no plant within 300 miles. He asked whether I had any complaints. I have not had any. This is the first time that this particular matter has been brought to my attention. I would think that there are very few instances, particularly where any considerable number of cattle are concerned, where there would be any such distances the farmers would have to go to reach a plant. In any event, ordinarily cattle going in would be shipped along with other cattle going for slaughter also. I know that the area from which the hon. member comes is in a somewhat isolated valley in British Columbia in which there is no railway transportation and where water transportation has been very seriously curtailed in recent years and therefore the transportation problem for cattle, as well as for most other things, is a rather serious one. I sympathize with him as far as that situation is concerned but it is not a problem which has been brought to my attention before or over which there has been any complaint.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask the minister one question?

Mr. Harkness: We will deal with it in committee.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the fact that there have been very few of these cases apparently and the number of cattle has been very few would the minister, along with his officials, give consideration possibly to making some arrangement whereby some appropriate official of the department could, shall I say, inspect the slaughtering of the cattle and avoid those long distances?

Mr. Harkness: I am always glad to give consideration to representations made by hon. members and I shall certainly be glad to take this matter up with the veterinary service but I would not like to give any definite assurance or have it taken that any definite assurance or promise has been given in connection with the matter because, as I said before, I do not really know what the circumstances are, or whether it is a practical move to do what the hon. member suggests.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1

Mr. Boulanger: I have only one question to ask the minister. I wish to remind him of what I said yesterday. I said that the amounts of $140 for purebred cows and $70 for grade cows were not enough. Would the minister explain how the figures of $140 and $70 were arrived at?

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member was asking why the amounts were placed at these figures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How you arrived at the $140 and $70.

Mr. Harkness: As far as grade animals are concerned, in the majority of cases where an animal is ordered slaughtered $70 plus the value of the carcass would give a pretty good return. In some cases the return would be higher than the market value of the animal.

With respect to purebreds, as the hon. member knows, some purebred animals run up to many thousands of dollars apiece and I think it is not a practical proposition to ask us to determine what the particular value is in the case of such animals. If you pay compensation at the rate of $140 a head, that amount plus the value of the carcass brings you pretty close to the average value of most purebred animals. If it is a particularly good animal that is not so but, as I say, if we were to try to determine what the value of a particularly good cow was it would lead us into all sorts of difficulties.

The hon. member was not here something over a year ago when, as the hon. member for Essex East will remember, we had a great deal of difficulty over determining the value of sheep. An inquiry was made by the agricultural committee as a result of charges made by one or two members of the house, which charges were not vindicated by the committee. Nevertheless, this has been something that has caused trouble for some years past and a great deal of talk which was not justified. If we had to do this in the case of every cow slaughtered under the brucellosis and tuberculosis testing programs we would really be faced with an impossible problem.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What the minister has just said is historical but it is of some interest because it is a confirmation of the stand taken by his predecessor. Charges were levelled at that time that this particular individual who received compensation in the neighbourhood of $100,000, I believe, was a political partisan and so on and so forth. Of course, subsequent events prior to the last election indicated that the political convictions of the gentleman in question certainly were not as had been alleged. Have there been any large scale slaughterings of herds with consequent compensation under the act since the minister came into office?

Mr. Harkness: The veterinary director general informs me that the number of animals condemned during the last year was not very great. No whole herds have been condemned. Of course, a certain percentage of the animals tested for brucellosis have been condemned but just about the number that one would expect. As I indicated in speaking on second reading, the number condemned for tuberculosis is very small now.

In connection with the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West, the veterinary director general informs me that what the hon. member has requested should be done has been done for some time now. If an animal is condemned in an isolated area the veterinary who condemns the animal is authorized to have the animal slaughtered and carry out a post mortem on the spot. Compensation is then paid on the basis of the post mortem report. He informs me that the only difficulty that arises under these circumstances is that the farmer has to dispose of the carcass, which in some cases presents a little difficulty.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad to hear the minister's remarks in that respect. We have not had any of these cases in recent years. I remember that some years ago some small farmers suffered considerable losses. I am always in favour of doing what we can for those who are farming in isolated sections and who, by operating their farms, are performing a service in keeping the country opened up and in pioneering the establishment of other farms in the area. However, I do think that in our area it may be somewhat difficult on occasion to get a veterinary surgeon from the department. I am not sure whether there is one in our district at the present time.

Mr. Harkness: I might say that this only applies when a tuberculosis or brucellosis testing program is under way and in order to carry out such a program you have to have veterinaries there. You have to bring them in for that purpose. Therefore the veterinary who was there had tested the herd for brucellosis, we will say, and found two or three animals that had to be condemned would, if it were an isolated area, have them killed, would examine them and compensation would then be paid.

Mr. Herridge: The minister referred to the disposal of the meat. That would not be any problem in such an area because there is always a local market. I am very pleased to get that explanation.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time? Now, by leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $674,164.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the minister would reply to a few questions concerning the matter which came up earlier, one Walter Mitchell. I do not propose to debate it at any length in view of the shortness of time, but perhaps the minister would tell me, first of all, upon whose recommendation Mr. Mitchell was dismissed because of political partisanship.

Mr. Harkness: As I indicated in answer to the hon. gentleman's starred question this afternoon, it was on my recommendation and order. When I had placed before me all the circumstances concerning this case, which I outlined very briefly this afternoon, it seemed to me there was no question whatever but that I had no option except to dismiss this man. As I indicated, he had been securing contraband goods from the ships which he had been inspecting as an inspector of the department, and this puts the department in an extremely bad position to have things of that sort occurring. I think there is no question at all but that the man had to be dismissed. As soon as I learned of this, I did dismiss him.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that there were two reasons for dismissal, first, the political reason, and I take it that it was on the recommendation of the minister, and the second the possession of contraband liquor and cigarettes, as the minister stated. With reference to the second, may I ask this additional question? When did the minister ascertain about the contraband liquor?

Mr. Harkness: Not having the documents in connection with this matter before me, I cannot remember exactly when that came to my attention. In any event, I did receive a report along those lines.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister, then, if any prosecution was instituted against this man because of the charge the minister made this afternoon?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman, it was decided not to institute a prosecution in this particular case.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask why?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Harkness: One reason was that we did not want publicity. I am sorry the hon. member asked these questions. We did not want publicity given to the fact that an inspector of the department had been engaged in these practices.

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the minister as to whether or not this man is a casual employee who works during the navigation season, that is from the opening of navigation in April until the closing of navigation in December?

Mr. Harkness: That is correct, yes.

Mr. Chevrier: The information about the possession of contraband liquor came to the attention of the minister, according to his statement this afternoon, on November 29?

Mr. Harkness: No, it was on November 29 that the man was found in possession of these contraband goods, just about the end of the navigation season, as the hon. member knows. However, the matter did not come to my attention until some two or three months ago. I have forgotten exactly when it was, but it was shortly before the man was dismissed.

Mr. Chevrier: If this contraband liquor was in his possession on November 29, can the minister say whether or not he was still a casual employee performing his duties or whether he had ceased his casual work? Was it during the navigation season?

Mr. Harkness: I cannot answer that question precisely. It was either just at the end of the season or just after the end of it. It was in that period. As I say, the information did not come to the attention of my officials and myself until considerably later.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister says the information did not come to his attention until considerably later, I think he said about two months ago?

Mr. Harkness: I have forgotten how many months ago it was.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to hold the minister down to dates, I can assure him about that immediately. But I should like to get as much information as I can, as accurately as I can. Since the minister has not the papers with him now, I would appreciate it if, at this time, he could give me the additional information I require. If he cannot, I will be willing to wait until another occasion. Is it accurate to say that this matter came to the minister's attention about two or three months ago?

Mr. Harkness: The exact time, I do not know. I have forgotten the date now when the man was dismissed. As the hon. member knows, having been a minister, all the little details, and particularly dates, do not stick in one's memory. There are too many other things with which to deal.

Mr. Chevrier: I realize that.

Mr. Harkness: I am not in a position to say precisely that this or that happened in connection with this case.

Mr. Chevrier: I realize all the details cannot be kept in the minister's mind. On the other hand, this man's position has been prejudiced. He has been dismissed, and I think the house will be entitled to certain information in connection with that.

As I said earlier, I do not want to hold the minister to any dates. I wonder if, at another sitting of the house, it would not be possible for him to give me the exact information. If he wants to put on the record any affidavits or other information he has, I am quite happy that he should.

Mr. Harkness: I shall get further information with regard to this matter, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fisher: I have not been able to distinguish from the minister's earlier statement whether or not this dismissal was necessitated completely by the fact the man was found with contraband, or whether the fact he had some political relationship with the hon. member for Laurier had already brought him to the department's notice. Are one or both of these factors involved?

Mr. Harkness: It was on both grounds. As a matter of fact, complaints, as I said in answer to the hon. member's questions this afternoon, were made to me as a result of this man's political activities on behalf of my hon. friend. I ordered an investigation into the matter, and as a result this other information which I have mentioned concerning the contraband came to light.

Mr. Fisher: Does the decision in relation to the man's political activity indicate the minister feels no member of his department at any time should take part in any political activity?

Mr. Harkness: I feel, Mr. Chairman, anybody who is employed by the dominion government should not be taking an active part in politics. This is forbidden in the Civil Service Act, and a man who does take an active part in politics knows he is subjecting himself to dismissal.

Mr. Fisher: The difficulty there is in defining what is active politics. I just wonder whether the minister could tell us that. Does he mean by active politics, the holding of a membership in a party?

Mr. Harkness: I mean overt and active political activity. In this case, there was no question about that. I not only have affidavits, if the hon. member is looking for affidavits, but I have pictures of this particular man in the hon. member's committee room, evidently in charge of the political activities there.

Mr. Fisher: Just on that point, I would imagine anyone who has a committee room could have a civil servant drop in to give information, such as whether or not he is on the voters' list, something of that kind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I hope that those laughs are coming from eastern members who tend to be sceptical about politics, and not from western members who tend to be a bit more practical. It does seem to me that it should be accurately defined as to what you have in mind when you say active politics, and if the minister needs advice I suggest he consult with the Minister of Public Works who, I understand, is becoming an expert in these matters.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business will be tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall commence with the discussion of the bill to provide for the resumption of the British Columbia coast steamship service and when that has been concluded through all stages we shall revert to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

On Friday we plan to have a debate on external affairs and a motion will be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs referring the estimates of his department to the committee on external affairs. Under the rules such a motion is not debatable, but by agreement between the parties it is to be debatable on Friday and the debate is to last for one day.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the leader intend to put a notice of motion on the order paper?

Mr. Green: A notice of motion has been handed in this afternoon and should appear in Votes and Proceedings tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the house leader tell us what we will do on Saturday?

Mr. Green: We shall be considering estimates, starting with the estimates of the Post Office Department and then taking the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Chevrier: No agriculture on Saturday?

Mr. Green: Not on Saturday, no; the Minister of Agriculture will not be here on Saturday.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough) presented the fourth and fifth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the fourth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Third report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cathers.

Third report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Stanton.

LIVESTOCK

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN MOVEMENT OF ANIMALS AND FODDER

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement with regard to dominion government assistance in the movement of fodder into the drought areas of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the movement of livestock out of these areas.

Some three to four weeks ago the situation in these drought areas looked extremely serious, and it appeared at that time that very large quantities of feed would have to be moved in and a very large liquidation of livestock would have to take place. Fortunately, during the past two to three weeks widespread rains have greatly improved the feed situation. However, it appears that a considerable movement of both fodder and livestock will still be necessary.

The government has decided to participate in emergency programs to aid farmers and ranchers hard hit by drought on the prairies. One-half of the freight assistance now being offered by Manitoba and Saskatchewan will be paid by this government, and the policy will be effective as of July 1, 1958. Both provincial governments have undertaken to help farmers in the stricken areas in the shipment of haying equipment, fodder and livestock.

Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway will reduce by one-third existing freight rates on hay and straw moved into drought areas and on livestock moved out of these areas up to a maximum of $10 a ton, from August 1 to April 1 next year. I wish to express my appreciation to the railways for agreeing to participate in these drought relief measures. The western provinces will negotiate with trucking companies for rate reductions similar to those agreed to by the railways.

Hay shortage in affected areas in Saskatchewan is estimated at 100,000 tons and in Manitoba at 15,000 tons. There is some surplus hay in certain northern areas of both provinces and in Alberta. It is hoped that this will be sufficient to meet the needs, but it may be necessary to import some hay from adjacent parts of the United States.

The Saskatchewan relief program went into effect June 16 and the Manitoba program followed on June 23. Both provinces are paying full railway freight for the round trip when equipment is moved to where hay is harvested. When trucks are used, 50 cents per mile is paid one way only. In Manitoba a 25-mile limit is stipulated and in Saskatchewan the limit is 30 miles. On homeward movement of fodder, provided the distance is more than 25 miles, Manitoba is granting 5 cents per ton mile up to $8 per ton. If fodder is moved by rail, two-thirds of the freight is paid to a maximum of $10 per ton. The railways, of course, will be absorbing the other one-third.

In Saskatchewan 5 cents per ton mile is paid on harvested fodder moved by truck provided the one-way distance is 30 miles or more and up to a maximum of $7.50 per ton. Half the railway freight on harvested and purchased fodder is paid to a maximum of $10 per ton. However, there is a Saskatchewan stipulation that 4 cents per ton mile will be paid on hay that has been purchased provided the one-way distance is 30 miles and up to a maximum of $7.50 per ton.

In both provinces, when livestock is moved out of the drought areas for pasture or winter feeding, freight assistance is granted. Manitoba pays 2 cents per head per mile on the one-way distance for cattle and horses over one year old, and 1 cent per head per mile for cattle and horses under one year and sheep of all ages. Saskatchewan grants 2 cents per mile per head on the one-way distance for cattle over one year and 1 cent for cattle under one year.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Fear of heavy liquidation of breeding stock with resultant losses to owners and long-term damage to agriculture in the drought areas, together with some general depression in livestock market prices, prompted the decision on federal aid.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he is aware of the fact that today is the six-month anniversary date since Professor Huson, who had been commissioned by the government to examine into the old age and survivors system in the United States, announced to the country and to the Prime Minister his inability to make his report within the period prescribed by the government of the day? Pursuant to the announcement made by the Prime Minister on January 24 last that he had to accept Professor Huson's resignation because of the limitation of three or four months in which to make the investigation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if the report has been prepared, if it is now in his possession, and if the commitment made to the country by the Prime Minister in this respect is going to be lived up to?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, of course all commitments made to the country will be lived up to. The report has not been presented to me yet. I have not got it in my possession but, as I explained to the hon. member for Essex East in the house only a short time ago, preparation of the report is progressing very satisfactorily.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare why he says the commitment has been lived up to when this is the six-month anniversary date?

An hon. Member: Twice as long.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Another election promise discarded.

Mr. Hees: You started in 1919.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Election promises don't mean anything.

Mr. Hees: You never quite made it.

[Mr. Harkness.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—BUREAU OF STATISTICS SAMPLING PROCEDURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me whether any changes have been made in the sampling procedures for arriving at the dominion bureau of statistics figures, and I took the question as notice. The answer is that no changes have been made.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED REMARKS OF PROVINCIAL MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a report in this morning's Montreal Gazette which states that the British Columbia minister of labour charges "the federal government with an obvious attempt to bypass the provinces in seeking a solution to unemployment problems"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it that this is a reference to the matter which is to come before the house later today?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Winch: —and a further charge by the provincial minister "that the provinces were not given an opportunity to make submissions". Has the minister any comment to make on the charges by the minister of labour of British Columbia?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): This conference on winter unemployment was called, Mr. Speaker, and all the provinces were invited to participate. As a result there were nine provincial ministers of labour in attendance, and one who was ill and could not attend had his representative there. All the labour ministers representing the provinces had an opportunity to discuss fully, in committee, all aspects of this problem. They had full opportunity to put forth any suggestions they had. The chairmen of these committees summarized the findings and submitted them, or will submit them, in final form to me for consideration by the government. The charge, therefore, which the hon. member says appeared in the newspaper I would say is not true, because every opportunity was given for participation in this conference and for any recommendations by the provinces.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—STATEMENT ON SUSPENSION OF FAST TRAIN CONNECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the hon. member for Chapleau made an inquiry regarding the proposed change in train service between Montreal-Quebec and Senneterre-Noranda. The hon. member for Villeneuve also raised the question. I am advised by the board of transport commissioners that as the proposed change is scheduled to take place on August 10 arrangements were made immediately to send an inspector of the board to Noranda and Senneterre and meetings are actually to be held in these two cities today in this connection. I understand that all interested parties in the areas have been notified of the meetings.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALASKA—STATEMENT ON PROPOSED HIGHWAY FROM U.S. VIA ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on July 16, Wednesday of last week, the hon. member for Kootenay West addressed a question to me. In order to give the house some appreciation of my reply I am obliged to read part of the question:

In view of the report in the Financial Post of July 12 to the effect that Alberta highways minister Taylor flew to Washington some time ago to encourage Washington to build a link to Alaska from the United States via Alberta and the Alaska highway, and in view of the fact that this proposal is in opposition to the proposals being made by the government of British Columbia, would the minister inform the house if these proposals by the representative of a province are being made after consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

The answer to that part of the question is no. There has been no consultation. The second question was, "Is this procedure regular, according to protocol?" I would say in reply to that question that there are no prescribed and definite rules with respect to protocol. Protocol depends upon good judgment, and the decision in a particular case must be considered in the light of the good sense of the persons concerned in every instance.

SPORTS

SOFTBALL—ANNUAL GAME BETWEEN MEMBERS AND PROTECTIVE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that members of the house acquitted themselves so nobly on the field of athletic endeavour last night, has the Prime Minister considered the possibility of applying on their behalf for a franchise in the international baseball league?

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. When will the agreement on the Saskatchewan river dam be signed?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): It will be signed tomorrow morning.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF MONITOR SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of prior utterances of the Prime Minister in this house to the effect that here he is among his peers, can the Prime Minister inform the house what consideration is being given to extending the privilege of an office monitor on Commons debates to others of his peers, including ministers, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. group?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think the suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is one that deserves attention. I am particularly impressed with the suggestion on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. gentleman is in a position to speak with authority on his behalf I would say that certainly is something that deserves immediate attention.

REFERENCE TO AIR CONDITIONING SYSTEM IN CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wanted to ask the house leader whether it is true that since air conditioning units have been installed in the ministers' offices—and I understand they have been established there—the air conditioning in this chamber has been dispensed with?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no air conditioning units have been established in any of the ministers' offices. Certainly there is none in my own. May I say that there is something to be said for not improving the air conditioning in the Commons chamber.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question. Would the minister consider not improving the air conditioning but restoring it to what it was in happier days?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I checked this matter with the officials of the Department of Public Works some days ago, and they tell me there is a great deal more hot air in this chamber now than there was before.

Mr. Pickersgill: With 208 Tories.

Mr. Green: I might add, Mr. Speaker, that the information I get from the experts is that it is all coming from across the way.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has a committee, as suggested in the speech from the throne, been established as yet to inquire into small business? If not, when can we expect that to be done?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not a copy of the speech from the throne here, but in so far as small business is concerned every investigation is being made to the end that small business shall receive the implementation of the terms in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Mitchell: That is not exactly the question I asked. I asked if a committee has been set up as yet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can say no committee has been set up as yet, but the matter is being investigated by the experts. Here is the reference in the speech from the throne:

> In order to assist small business, there will be established a small business section within the administrative machinery of government.

Hence the question, of course, surprised me in that reference was made to a committee. In the speech from the throne no reference was made to a committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the Prime Minister say what department of government will be charged with responsibility in this matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That matter is still under consideration as between two departments of government.

[Mr. Green.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO CONVENING OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I direct it to him because it may involve government policy and because I think the house would like to have a definite answer. Will the public accounts committee be convened this session? If so, when? If not, why not?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, certainly the public accounts committee will be convened, and at the earliest possible date.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to which minister to direct this question; it may involve more than one. On May 29 I placed on the order paper a question, No. 43, relating to certain expenditures of government departments. I wonder whether I could have any indication as to when it might be answered.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire into that matter for the hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO EARLY CLOSING DUE TO HEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State or in his absence to the minister acting in his behalf. Would the Secretary of State or the Acting Secretary of State inform the house whether the privilege extended to civil servants of early closing of the work day during times of excessive heat is also extended to prevailing rate employees; and if not, why not?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter into which I shall have to inquire. I was under the impression that it was so, but I shall be glad to find out for certain and inform the hon. member.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-42, to provide for the resumption of the British Columbia coast steamship service operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to bring about a settlement by agreement of the differences between the parties to this dispute which has, of course, a long history.

We have been directly interested and concerned in this matter, as I told the house yesterday, since July of 1957, but its origins date back considerably beyond that time. The question is now being brought before parliament in this way because of very special circumstances not usually present in a normal impasse between labour and management. Among other circumstances are, of course, the extreme hardship to which a substantial number of Canadians who are in no way parties to the dispute are being subjected by the failure to reach agreement between the company and a part of its employees. It might be well at this point to emphasize that over half the employees of the company have signed a two-year agreement providing for an 8 per cent increase in pay. It is the difference between the company and the remainder of its employees which creates the present situation.

The hardship imposed on those who are not directly involved is very real. It is not merely a matter of inconvenience or discomfort to them; in many cases the livelihood and welfare of both individuals and communities are threatened. As a matter of fact, it is not too much to say that for many it involves serious problems in their supply lines for the necessities of life.

In this situation the government is faced with two alternatives. We can either do nothing, allow the strike to take its course and at the same time allow these communities to suffer, or we can take positive action to bring home to both parties the seriousness of the situation and provide new procedures under the authority of parliament which will supply a new initiative and, perhaps, a new climate in which settlement by agreement may be reached.

The bill provides, in the interim, for the immediate resumption of this essential service by the appointment of an administrator with the necessary powers. In effect the bill ends the strike so far as its impact on innocent bystanders is concerned, but it provides for the resumption of negotiations between the parties vitally concerned within the existing rights of each. To this extent it may be said to reactivate the normal procedures of collective bargaining which have broken down after 12 months of almost continuous settlement attempts.

Yesterday I gave the house a resume of these attempts and indicated the many steps which have been taken by the Department of Labour to bring the parties together through the good offices, first of the conciliation officer, then of a board of conciliation, then of an industrial commission of inquiry and, finally, of the minister himself, in personal intervention and direct talks with the principals of both parties.

The situation has been further complicated by a dispute which tied up the only alternative water communication between the mainland and a number of island communities. That is now before the courts, and I will say no more in this connection except that the uncertainty of this situation is one of the factors which was taken into account before a decision to introduce this bill was reached.

In addition to appointing an administrator and providing for the renegotiation of differences, this bill also makes provision for the establishment of an additional procedure in the event that the dislocation of vital communications and the resulting hardship to large numbers of people develops into emergency proportions. I do not predict, Mr. Speaker, that this will happen. The government will use every resource at its command to prevent it from happening. But should it happen the consequences would, in our opinion, be tragic if all we could say to those who were suffering was that our hands were tied and that there was nothing we could do about it, whether because parliament was not in session or for some other reason. That would be the position if this bill were not to have the assent of parliament, because—and I wish to emphasize this—we have already availed ourselves, and so have the parties to the dispute, of every statutory provision now existing for reaching a settlement.

The bill, therefore, provides that the parties themselves, if they wish, may refer any matter on which they are unable to agree for decision by an independent board. It will also be possible, as a last resort, for the governor in council to refer any matter to the board under emergency conditions. The board would be empowered to act within the limitations of the revision or amendment of the existing collective agreement, either at the request of the parties or by the decision of the governor in council.

The bill also provides that the governor in council may make regulations to give effect to the decision of the arbitrator. The bill includes provisions to safeguard the right of employees who may have gone on strike to return to work without fear of being discharged from their employment because of the strike action. It provides for the immediate withdrawal of the notice of strike, which will become invalid when this bill becomes law.

Many members of the house represent areas which because of their geographical situation could not be as vitally affected by a strike of this kind as the residents of the British Columbia communities in question. I need hardly say that many of the problems which face us as Canadians are geographic, and this is particularly so in matters involving vital communications. It is for this reason, of course, that the question of the proper limitations and responsibilities affecting government intervention very often arise in the communications field.

In the case of British Columbia on the one hand and our eastern maritime provinces on the other, the disruption of water communication over an uncertain and extended period can have widespread and serious results. In moving the second reading of this bill, I think I may properly request the sympathetic consideration by all members of this special aspect of the problem which underlies the bill before the house.

In conclusion, it may be well to explain to the house that there is an immediate provisional 8 per cent increase in the rate of wages. This will have the effect of providing a wage increase for the group of employees who will now go back to work, in line with the increase granted to the majority of their fellow employees, under the two-year contract effective June 1 of this year. This in no way prejudices the position of either party in the negotiations which will now continue.

I should advise the house that I will be asking one of my colleagues to move an amendment at the appropriate stage to provide that instead of a reference at the request of the parties or otherwise to a single person, the reference will be to a board of three, and this amendment will be made to clause 7.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before the house, and it is certainly a bill of an unusual character, is based on a resolution which was introduced in this house yesterday afternoon. Because of the urgent consideration which was requested, quite rightly, that resolution was passed through all its stages in this house in a couple of hours. The bill was then printed overnight, placed in the hands of hon. members this morning at about ten o'clock, and we are debating second reading of the bill at 3.15 this afternoon. Surely, therefore, there can be no suggestion that the opposition is holding up this bill or showing any other consideration than that of awareness of the urgency of the problem.

[Mr. Starr.]

Nevertheless, we have our responsibilities to discharge in connection with this bill, and we intend to do that. Incidentally, when I say the bill was in the hands of hon. members at ten o'clock this morning I should add in fairness that it was in my hands in mimeographed form last night at approximately seven o'clock. I appreciate that courtesy, which I assume was also extended to the leader of the C.C.F. party.

The chronology of this unhappy business of a labour dispute which began, as the Minister of Labour has just reminded us, over a year ago and of a strike which began on May 16, is a monument to an inept governmental performance of which British Columbia has been the victim. As we see it—and there is a great deal of evidence to support the view and I hope to produce some of it—this procedure has exhibited a careless unawareness of a labour problem which was permitted to develop into a crisis, and which has created loss, distress, great inconvenience and business dislocation to an important section of the Canadian people. In the words of the minister himself it has caused "extreme hardship", and it has caused that extreme hardship not for days but for a good many weeks.

The question then that faces us in this house is this. Does the public interest which must be paramount now, require the end of this strike by legislative action of the kind suggested, with a renewal—and this is certainly indispensable—of the process of collective bargaining in some form?

Certainly the situation, as I have said, has been serious in British Columbia for a good many weeks now. I have read, and the information is no doubt founded in fact, that the strike has already resulted in the loss of $2 million to the tourist industry alone on Vancouver island, and that 30,000 tourist reservations in that island have been cancelled this summer. I suppose it is too late now to restore the position of the island in that regard.

I submit that an energetic and determined effort to solve this problem, not days ago but weeks ago, would in all probability have prevented what the minister has called this extreme hardship. Certainly it is true, as he has suggested, that Vancouver island has been effectively cut off from the mainland so far as Canadian water transportation is concerned or, as perhaps the people in Vancouver island might prefer to put it, the mainland has been cut off from Vancouver island. That is a situation, of course, that somehow must be ended even at this late date; and I take it this bill is designed—but as we see it not well designed—for that purpose.

We submit that if the right kind of action had been taken earlier it likely would not have been necessary to produce this kind of bill or indeed any bill. It would not have been necessary to rush it through parliament in a few hours after the bill was printed, without sufficient opportunity to study it and to consider whether amendments could be drafted to make it a better bill for the purpose in mind.

I have been informed that one hon. member of this house, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, in a telephone radio statement last night has criticized the opposition for obstruction and holding up this bill, for delay, when the bill was in the boxes of hon. members at ten o'clock this morning and we are debating second reading at 3:15 this afternoon. I do not think anybody is likely to be very much impressed by that kind of argument.

We are now faced with the situation that has been created, and we agree that in view of that situation water communication between the mainland and the island as a public service—because it is a public service, however it may be conducted—must be restored. We will not, therefore, oppose the bill, but we will certainly condemn the government for allowing a situation to develop which makes this bill necessary because of urgent practical considerations which makes this kind of hasty emergency legislative action necessary, the kind of action that should only be required of this house in times of great national emergency. Perhaps when we reach the committee stage we will be able to submit some changes in the light of the discussions that have taken place which will improve the bill. We will have to consider that as the discussion proceeds.

Let us look at the situation, Mr. Speaker. This strike, as I said, began on May 16 and is now in its 69th day. The seafarers' international union, a union which has more than once in recent years been the centre of controversy, representing 303 employees of British Columbia coast steamships, called its members off their jobs following the failure to reach an agreement with the company. The principal issue of course was, and remains one, of wages. As the Minister of Labour pointed out to the house yesterday afternoon, and he mentioned it again this afternoon, negotiations began with this union in the summer of 1957 and the existing contract expired, I think, on September 15, 1957.

No progress was made during those negotiations between the company and the union and on July 29 of last year, at the request of the union, the Department of Labour, as the minister has pointed out, appointed a conciliator who met with the parties to the dispute I believe on five occasions. The conciliator reported on August 30, 1957, to the Minister of Labour that he had failed in his efforts to bring about an agreement; therefore a conciliation board was appointed at that time by the minister.

That board began its hearings on October 28 last. It filed its report with the minister on February 11 of this year. As the minister knows, three members of the board agreed unanimously on the recommendations covering 13 items in dispute, and the chairman of the board and the representative of the employer agreed on recommendations, I think, covering 10 other items in dispute; but in the matter of wages, which was the most important matter before the board, each member made a separate recommendation. The minister was good enough to put on Hansard yesterday what those recommendations were.

The chairman recommended a two-year contract; that wages be increased as of Septemper 15, 1958 by 16 per cent in the first year and 9 per cent in the second year, or a total increase over the term of the contract of 25 per cent. The employer representative —and this is interesting in the light of what is happening now and what is provided for by this legislation—recommended an increase of 12 per cent in the first year and if the agreement was to extend into the second year, a second increase in that year of 8 per cent, I believe.

Mr. Starr: Five per cent.

Mr. Pearson: Five per cent, or a total of 17 per cent. The employee representative recommended something that I think would have given in terms of percentage about a 31 per cent increase over the period of the contract. Well, these recommendations of the board were rejected, and following that rejection the government on May 27 of this year appointed a commissioner of inquiry, Mr. Eric Taylor, who failed to bring about a settlement.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, May 27 of this year was the time when the government should have stepped in, or just after May 27, when the commissioner of inquiry reported that he had been unable to bring about an agreement; but that did not happen. The commissioner was asked to go back and try again. He failed and recommended voluntary arbitration, a recommendation which I understand was accepted by everybody but the seafarers' international union. There is a strike not only of this union but also of members of the association of marine engineers and the merchant service guild, and I shall do no more than just mention that fact.

Canadian Pacific Steamships

Now, Mr. Speaker, for over six weeks in this house the opposition asked a good many questions of the government as to what they were going to do both to recognize the seriousness of this situation and what they were going to do about it. I have those questions before me. Incidentally, there was only a single Conservative member in this house from British Columbia who asked a question on this subject during this period, and that question was asked by the hon. member for Victoria last May.

Why, Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned in the house yesterday, we were told as late as Tuesday of this week by the Minister of Labour—after the Canadian Press had indicated that legislation was going to be introduced—merely that the government was giving serious consideration to the matter. That was said in answer to some questions asked by the hon. member for Laurier. Why, nine days ago on July 15, according to the press, the Prime Minister wrote to the president of the associated members of commerce of Vancouver island to the effect that the government was restricting its efforts to mediation. Presumably at that late date there was no suggestion to the parties in dispute that legislation might have to be introduced by the government.

We did not take very much time yesterday in discussing the resolution, but we did take enough time to try to find out whether the parties to this dispute had in fact been informed in advance that in default of agreement there would have to be legislation. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter. It has a very important bearing on the possibility of settling this dispute without legislative interference. When we asked this question yesterday the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 2578 of Hansard:

I think it was made very clear that unless some amicable agreement was arrived at it would be necessary for the parliament of Canada to act.

Shortly afterward, on the same page of Hansard, the Minister of Labour said the government had not given any intimation during the discussion that any such action would be taken. But having said that, he went right on in the same intervention to say, and I quote from page 2579 of Hansard:

—but we did point out that if the parties did not arrive at a solution themselves action would have to be taken.

Well, that statement in its two parts seems to me to be contradictory and therefore somewhat confusing. That statement was supplemented by the minister a minute or two later, when he said:

This particular action was discussed last night in all aspects with one of the parties interested.

[Mr. Pearson.]

By "last night" I presume he meant Tuesday night. Naturally we queried him about this, and he amended that answer as follows, as reported on the same page of Hansard:

We explored every avenue and had discussions with both parties about the possibilities of legislation at this time.

Well, I am quite sure that leaves the house in a state of confusion, doubt and uncertainty about this very important aspect of the problem. Surely, therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have the right to know when the parties to this dispute were told that legislative action might be necessary. In what terms were they given that information, namely that if they did not come to an agreement themselves parliament would be asked to act? Because I can imagine no more important incentive to get the two parties to agree than to tell them that if they did not agree, tell them in specific terms at the earliest stage possible, last May, if you like, that if they did not come to terms parliament might be asked by the government to act.

The conclusion that we on this side of the house have come to is that the government did not act energetically and effectively to meet this situation and did not show an appreciation of the seriousness of developments. I think it is quite unwarranted to say, then, that everything had been done that could have been done.

The Vancouver Sun said on June 5, and I quote from that paper, that the present situation——was brought about, in part, by the federal government's failure to find a means of settling the C.P.R. strike. These vessels, unlike those of Black Ball, are under federal regulation. Ottawa seemed apathetic so long as the Black Ball line was open for business. It appeared that Ottawa was content to play for time.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that was not the time to be playing for time. On July 17, three weeks or so later, the same newspaper had this to say:

The federal government persists in treating British Columbians—and Vancouver island residents in particular—as second class Canadians.

For two solid months now it has neglected or refused to take decisive action to bring an end to the strike tying up the Canadian Pacific's Princess fleet.

In the same editorial we find the following:

The Canadians living in these two parts of British Columbia certainly deserve as much consideration as Canadians living elsewhere. So far they aren't getting it.

Why, Mr. Speaker, earlier in May, immediately after the strike started, the mayor of Victoria and many others on Vancouver island and in British Columbia generally did their very best to impress on the government the seriousness of the developing situation.

The mayor of Victoria is reported by the Vancouver Sun as saying in May that acting under the authority of an emergency meeting of business and civic leaders he had tried to reach the Prime Minister or transport minister Hees by telephone for a whole day, and that he was unsuccessful. He wired the Prime Minister, according to this newspaper report, asking a telephone call at the Prime Minister's convenience, but he had not received one and he added, "I am disappointed and very concerned that the people of this area are being ignored." That was last May.

On June 11, of course, it is true that the Minister of Justice was in British Columbia after the failure, I take it, of the federal mediator, Mr. Taylor, to find an acceptable solution to the dispute. The minister is reported as having said at that time that attempts would be made at another level to reach agreement, and that the matter would be put before the labour department in Ottawa. The matter had been before the labour department at that time for a good many months, and that kind of response does not seem to me to indicate an awareness of what was happening.

Mr. Starr: What report are you reading from?

Mr. Pearson: I am reading from a newspaper report in the Vancouver Sun. I will be glad to send it over to my hon. friend. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this somewhat easygoing procedure is in startling contrast to that followed by the previous government in connection with the railway strike in 1950. Some hon. members will remember that the strike began on August 22 and that parliament acted on August 30 to end it, eight days later. That was only 12 days after the mediator appointed by the government on that occasion had announced that he had failed in his task. In other words, 12 days after the mediator appointed by the government to end the strike announced that he had failed, the strike had been ended by parliamentary action.

Notwithstanding the speed and efficiency, as I believe, with which the government of that day acted, which was due in large part, as hon. members who were here will remember, to the vigorous personal intervention of the prime minister of that day to bring the strike to an end, what did the opposition then say about the steps that were taken? The present Prime Minister, who was then a member of the opposition, had this to say as found on pages 73 and 74 of Hansard for August 30, 1950:

> Urgency there has been for months. While the urgency of the situation required action by this government and while our economic position in this country was worsening week by week, the government was vacationing.

And again:

> —for days . . . the government did nothing. The government was not giving that leadership which the people of Canada had a right to expect.

The present Prime Minister castigated the government of that day for not taking action sooner than one week after the strike had been called.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The trouble had been going on for months.

Mr. Pearson: The trouble had been going on and action was being taken by the government. A strike took place. A special session of parliament was called, and within a week of the strike being called the strike was over. What are we then to say about a government which has been unable to take effective action in connection with a transport strike which has been going on since May 16?

As a result of this inability to bring the strike to an end in any other way, we now have a bill before us, a bill which as I understand it—some of my colleagues will have more to say about its details later—seems to me to be unclear in spots, which perhaps may create as many problems as it solves, and certainly warrants a great many questions being asked about it. Parliament is now being asked to intervene by passing legislation compelling strikers to go to work. That is a very unusual role for parliament and one that no member of parliament enjoys. However, that is what we are being requested to approve at this time. The first question that comes to mind, of course, is what principle is the government acting under in submitting this legislation? The Prime Minister had this to say yesterday on this point, as found on page 2578 of Hansard:

> —it would be necessary for the parliament of Canada to act; that public security and maintenance of a proper regard for the rights of others would demand the introduction of such legislation.

Presumably that is the principle he had in mind in asking the parliament of Canada to act. I can see all sorts of possibilities of danger in the adoption and extension of that principle, "a proper regard for the rights of others", as justifying parliamentary action in a labour dispute. The Minister of Justice also had something to say on this point. As found on page 2582 of Hansard, he said with respect to the question of the principles under which the government was acting:

> Of course, Mr. Speaker, the government recognizes that it is a matter of concern to the government on behalf of the people of Canada to see that the people of Canada are served with adequate transportation facilities, and I suppose that is the broad general principle involved in the bill.

Then he went on:

We—

The government.

—felt the interests of the company required it.

Mr. Fulton: There is a misprint there. It should be "country".

Mr. Pearson: Then I withdraw my observation. It read "in the interests of the company" and I was about to say—

Mr. Fulton: I have no hesitation in saying that what I intended to say and what I think I said was "country" and not "company". I think my hon. friend will agree that that is borne out by the context.

Mr. Pearson: I accept without hesitation the correction of my hon. friend. In that form, of course, it is a perfectly proper observation to make.

We felt the interests of the country required it; we know we have the legislative jurisdiction to do it, and we propose to submit this proposition to parliament for its approval if parliament agrees with the course being adopted.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, orders strikers back to work by section 4. That, of course, is an unusual and very significant provision in a legislative enactment, and one which is bound to arouse a good deal of questioning in every member's mind. Every member of the house wants to be absolutely certain that he understands what is meant by this and that he has some appreciation of the government's position in justifying it, because the clause now reads that every employee who is now on strike shall return to the duties of his employment. It includes everybody, every employee who is now on strike.

This is not a situation such as existed in 1950 in the railway strike, when the strike had only lasted for a few days and the employees were available and ready to go back to work if a settlement could be reached. This strike has been going on since May 16, and now legislation is being passed ordering every employee on strike to go back, every employee who presumably was working on May 16, which is quite a long time ago. What about those employees who may have left the province during these weeks? What about employees who may be, if you like, out of British Columbia and in Nova Scotia? Are they to be ordered to go back and resume employment as it was on May 16, with the changes submitted in the legislation?

What about the situation that has been created by the Canadian Pacific disposing of two ships? Must the men who worked on those ships, and who are no longer in the employ of the company, be given work; or must they, under this legislation, be compelled to go back to work on ships which are now no longer part of the company's fleet?

Yesterday when we were discussing the resolution the hon. member for Laurier asked this question, which appears at page 2580 of Hansard:

What is the position with respect to the other members of the other union, that is the S.I.U.? Do they go back at an increased wage?

The Minister of Labour is reported in Hansard as replying:

I cannot say with certainty that they would go back, but I expect and have every hope that they will—

I hope we will hear something from the government side as to the exact meaning of this compulsory back to work order. What happens to men who were employees of this company last May and who now either desire not to go back to work or are not in a position to go back to work?

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. gentleman would just read two more sentences he would find the answer to his question.

Mr. Pearson: I have not found it yet.

Mr. Fulton: May I read it to the hon. gentleman then, because it says on page 2581—

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the hon. member will be intervening in the debate—

Mr. Fulton: I thought it might save my hon. friend some time. If he will just read two more sentences he will find the answer to his question.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to do that. Let me ask another question, and perhaps my hon. friend will be as happy in his own mind in clearing this up as he has been with the one I have just asked. Clause 6 of the bill reads:

The company and each union shall forthwith enter into negotiations with a view to the settlement of any matters presently in dispute between them as to the terms of an amendment or revision of the existing collective agreement——and so on. There is no time limit in the bill with reference to the period during which this resumption of negotiations may continue.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he is getting pretty close to the details of the sections, and those would be more appropriately discussed when we are in committee. If he can he should keep his remarks as closely as possible to the matter of principle. I do not object to a section being read to illustrate a principle, but it seems to me he is now getting into the details of the wording.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe, Mr. Speaker, in view of the peculiar circumstances connected with the consideration being given to this bill, and it having been in the possession of the Leader of the Opposition only since last evening, there would be no objection raised and the application of the ordinary rule should be abrogated.

Mr. Pearson: I shall do my best to keep my remarks within the ordinary application of the rules on second reading, and restrict them to questions of principle. There is, of course, an important principle involved in clause 6 of this bill. The principle is that collective bargaining is to be resumed, and nothing could be more important than that in a bill of this kind. However, Mr. Speaker, this principle is not subject to any time limitation, and the proceedings could go on indefinitely. Yet there is no incentive, indeed there is quite the reverse, to reach an agreement within the terms of this legislation by the ordinary processes of collective bargaining.

For instance, the men are going back to work with an increase in wages of 8 per cent, which is considerably less than that offered to them by the employer's representative on the board. Surely that is not a proposal which is going to commend itself to the men, when it is less than they would have obtained from the employer representative's recommendation. Nor is it going to be an incentive to the company to make an agreement with the men, when the administrator is operating for the company on the basis of an 8 per cent increase. Aware of this difficulty, and aware of the possible complications raised by the fact that nothing in this bill puts a time limit on the negotiations and bargaining at the end of which perhaps the matter might again have to be looked at by the government, we asked the Prime Minister yesterday, if there was no agreement what happens then?

The Prime Minister said, as reported on page 2579:

> On this occasion—

He was contrasting the procedure with that of 1950.

> —we simply make provision to get the men back to work and the ships in operation. . . . If other eventualities arise, and I am not here for the purpose of trying to envisage what the possibilities might be, then in that case, of course, we will be placed in a position where, if other action is necessary, it may be taken at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is provided for in clause 7.

Mr. Pearson: That is right; but there is no specific statement to the effect that if at the end of 30 days, 60 days or 90 days no settlement has been reached, then other action will be taken. There is merely a provision that at any time the government can step in and take other and presumably more effective action.

As the Prime Minister points out, this provision is in clause 7 of the bill. While I do not wish to infringe the rules by quoting clause 7, it is true that this is a very important principle in this legislation. The government, by order in council, can take any action it desires in connection with this bill. Unlike the legislation of 1950, which, whether you approve of it or disapprove of it, did provide certain definite provisions by which the parties concerned knew exactly where they stood. Perhaps that was one of the reasons why the compulsory arbitration provision of that legislation was not required. We do not know what will happen under this legislation. We do know that there is not going to be a very great incentive to the company to bring about an agreement with the union when the members of the union are being paid an increase less than the employer's representative recommended.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he elucidate what he meant a moment ago, when he said that is why compulsory arbitration was not then required. What did he mean by that statement?

Mr. Pearson: I meant that in connection with the railway settlement under that legislation, agreement was reached and the compulsory arbitration provisions of the legislation were not required and were not used. I am suggesting that in this legislation there is provision for compulsory arbitration in this clause, because the governor in council has the power to take action to that end if the government feels it is necessary. But it is an indefinite provision, and there is no time limit. There is, of course, no certainty that it will ever be used, or that that kind of action might be taken. I suggest, however, there are great possibilities of confusion and danger in that kind of indefinite, unlimited power being given to the governor in council.

There are other provisions in this legislation with which we will be able to deal when we are in committee. But quite apart from the particular issue of the strike and the desirability or necessity of getting this service resumed, I suggest we should take advantage of this situation to bring this whole matter very forcibly to the attention of the House of Commons so that we as a parliament may give consideration to a new policy for communication between Vancouver island and the mainland under modern conditions, and perhaps prevent this kind of situation developing again in the future. Surely it is obvious to all, in the light of what has happened, that the island now must have adequate all year round secure water connection with the mainland.

The question is not, as I understand it, whether or not it is profitable. That matter is important, just as it is important when a new six-lane highway that is considered to be essential has to be built. But while the question of profit is important the question of service is even more important, and indeed is a paramount consideration with regard to this matter. It would therefore perhaps be well at this time for the government, if it saw fit, to initiate immediately a federal-provincial survey by experts to examine and report on the most efficient and least costly method for a combined highway and short-haul service between the island and the mainland which might even be considered if you like, as part of the trans-Canada highway system.

There is also, Mr. Speaker, the even more important, indeed the fundamental question of federal policy and federal responsibility with regard to the settlement of industrial disputes of this kind in the light of changing conditions. As early as 1950, in connection with the railway dispute of that year to which I have already referred, the present Prime Minister made a strong plea for a parliamentary committee to re-examine and restate the principles of collective bargaining. He will remember his plea; it can be found in Hansard 1950 at page 74. Again on January 9, 1957 he advocated—and I quote from the Hansard of that day—as follows—

—a revision of the conciliation methods and procedures in the interests of flexibility and the prompt settlement of industrial disputes.

He also advocated, and I quote further——improvement and modernization of the machinery for conciliations.

Perhaps this situation in British Columbia has driven home to us all the necessity for doing something along those lines. On March 9, 1958, during the election campaign the Prime Minister is quoted by the Vancouver Province as stating in that city that his party wanted legislation to prevent long delays in settling industrial disputes.

I suggest to the Prime Minister and the government that this is a good time to carry out or begin to carry out that promise. That kind of action may help the government in avoiding in the future the kind of deplorable situation which has developed over this strike; and certainly, Mr. Speaker, it should save the people of British Columbia and of other parts of Canada from the unhappy consequences in the future of a situation such as that with which we are faced today, when the intervention of this parliament is required to settle an industrial dispute.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in rising to deal with the second reading of this bill I should like to say first that I certainly associate myself with the general remarks of the Leader of the Opposition as they apply to the great delay that has taken place in dealing with this question. I may not agree with some of the other things the hon. gentleman said but with his approach, from the general point of view that there has been unnecessary delay, I agree.

I think first we should probably look at the conciliation machinery under the Department of Labour at the present time and attempt to determine why it has failed to operate in this case—because it resulted in a strike some weeks ago—and why it has generally failed to be of much benefit to labour-management relations over the years. In attempting to look at it in that light we might find part of the reason why this government found itself in a quandary as to what to do with respect to the situation on the west coast of British Columbia.

We have had the same machinery in effect for some number of years now and have used it in the same manner without any attempt on the part of the government—and I am not confining my remarks to this particular government; I refer to the governments that were in office during the period of time this legislation has been operative and up to now —to appear to grasp changing psychological forces that were at work in labour-management relations. This criticism is not confined to the federal field either; it applies equally well to all the provincial governmental conciliation proceedings that I know of. Ever since the end of the war there has been a failure to realize that changes are taking place, that there are different attitudes on the part of management and on the part of the unions also, and that there is a different industrial picture now from that which existed some years ago. Nevertheless the legislation and the philosophy of the people administering it have not kept pace with those changing times. That is probably one of the major reasons why we find this particular situation at the moment.

Certainly the closing remarks of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to an overhauling of the legislation and an overhauling of the machinery were most pertinent. That is something that is certainly long overdue. If this government will undertake to realize that fact and attempt to deal with the matter, perhaps in the future we shall have the type of legislation and the type of attitude on the part of the people administering it that will be conducive to the settlement to differences of opinion between employees and employers when matters get to this stage.

While the government spokesmen have indicated from time to time over the past few weeks that they had this matter under consideration, I would submit that the only reason they finally took action to deal with it was that the government was forced into it. They were forced into taking action from the point of view, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, of the Black Ball ferry service being discontinued as of last week, the result being the cutting off of all shipping services between the mainland and Vancouver island. In addition I would submit also that the government was forced into action by a number of Conservative backbenchers who apparently have been under considerable pressure from their constituents to get some action on this particular strike.

We all know that probably every part of the province of British Columbia has a willingness and a desire to see the service reinstituted and to see a settlement of this dispute. We all know, especially those of us who come from British Columbia and who have travelled on these steamship lines between the island of Vancouver and the mainland on many occasions, the detrimental effect the strike has had on people living on Vancouver island, especially during this tourist season. We here in the House of Commons, in considering this bill, must look at it having in mind the great responsibility we have to the general public and for the economic welfare of the area affected by the strike.

It is true that the bill has only been in the hands of hon. members for a short period of time. It will, I think, require fairly lengthy discussion, and we will have to analyse main principles and some of the subsidiary principles involved before proceeding to an examination of the various clauses. We must look at the bill in the light of discharging our responsibility to the general public, and if an extended discussion does arise I hope the house will not consider that those who ask questions or make comments are doing so merely to delay the proceedings, but that they are merely seeking to understand the bill and its implications adequately before consent is given to its passage.

In this regard, while I did not see the news report to the effect that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) had, over radio or television or in a telephone interview, last night deplored the fact that the opposition was delaying the passage of this bill, I think that if he did so—and I do not know whether he did or not—he owes an apology to members of the opposition parties, especially since he knows that the bill was not in our hands this morning until twenty minutes or fifteen minutes to ten o'clock. Certainly, last night there could have been no possibility of delaying the progress of this legislation.

I think it may be well to explain in a little detail some of the events which took place during the negotiations leading up to the cessation of this service, because I am sure that not only those who are directly affected by this service, or lack of service, but all members of the house would wish the employees of this company to be amply rewarded for the work they perform. It may be that a review of some of the wage rates and some of the changes that have taken place over the years would be of interest to the house and the country in considering this matter.

According to information compiled by the British Columbia federation of labour and the Vancouver labour council, the average wage rate paid to the seamen, to the employees, on these runs at the time of the strike, was from $1.31 to $1.35 an hour, which may be compared with the minimum wage in a number of other industries in British Columbia of $1.60, $1.70 and $1.75 an hour.

Mr. McPhillips: What about their perquisites, the perquisites they get in connection with their employment, such as free meals and free board.

Mr. Howard: I was talking about wage rates. Free meals and other things are in addition to that, but I mentioned wage rates because both the minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) indicated today that this question was the main problem at the root of this strike, not board and lodging. That is all I am talking about. The only increase these men have had since 1953 has been in the neighbourhood of $19 a month and, averaged over a 40-hour week—it would work out less if averaged over a week longer than 40 hours—it means an increase of approximately 10 cents an hour since 1953.

The junior chamber of commerce of Victoria had an interest in this matter, and I am sure the hon. member who asked a question just now may be familiar with the investigation which was carried out by that organization. In an attempt to provide a public service, in accordance with one of the objects for which it was formed, the junior chamber of commerce interviewed representatives of the C.P.R., representatives of the union, and Mr. Taylor who was the commissioner appointed to consider the dispute, and posed a number of questions to the individuals concerned.

I am not going to read this three-page document in toto, but if any hon. member would like to see it he would be welcome. Chamber of commerce representatives posed some questions to a Mr. Fraine of the C.P.R. on the wage structure and its relation to the fare structure, and so on. Four or five very important questions were put to Mr. Fraine in an attempt to discover, for instance, what a certain wage increase would mean with respect to a fare increase; the comparison between the transportation rates of the C.P.R. and those of other companies; the effect of special fare structures during particular seasons of the year; and so on. To all these important questions Mr. Fraine's answer, generally, was: "I do not know", or "We are not too sure on this point." The conclusion reached by the junior chamber of commerce, was that the union has considerable merit in its demand for increased wages. This, the conclusion added, would appear to be supported by the fact that the company's nominee and the chairman of the conciliation board respectively advocated increases of 17 per cent and 25 per cent. The report added:

> We feel the onus is upon the company to take the lead in view of the fact that the union has dropped from its original exorbitant demands to a figure similar to that recommended by the chairman of the conciliation board and further because the company's nominee recommended a figure approximately the mean of the company's present offer and the union's current demand.

The question of whether or not either of the parties, or both of them, have up to now been bargaining in good faith is one that need not be referred to at this time and, probably, one person's interpretation with regard to this will be just as valid as another's.

In our efforts to discharge our responsibility to the public who are suffering hardship because of this strike we must be careful not to destroy any of the fundamental rights of either of the parties in dispute. I do not think we should attempt to interfere with what we have developed in Canada, with what is considered as the free play of forces between industry and management in labour negotiations. I doubt very much whether we are not, by considering the passage of this bill, or some parts of it, laying the ground for the destruction of some of these fundamental relationships between union and management. Questions such as penalties have to be considered, but that we can deal with later on in the bill.

Apart from the principle enunciated yesterday and today that this bill represents an attempt to get the line back into operation, there is another principle set out in the bill. In this regard the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was questioned yesterday about what would happen if the bill passed and if, after the parties sat down to negotiate, they failed to reach agreement. What steps would be necessary following upon that? I believe the Prime Minister misled the house or did not give us a complete account of what was likely to happen when he made his answer. I quote his remarks as recorded at page 2579 of yesterday's Hansard. I believe the Leader of the Opposition quoted these remarks, too, although for a different purpose. The Prime Minister said:

> In 1950, of course, provision was made for compulsory arbitration under the legislation, and we opposed that at that time. On this occasion we simply make provision to get the men back to work and the ships in operation.

I take from the remarks of the Prime Minister yesterday that he and the members of his party were opposed to compulsory arbitration in 1950. Surely they should be consistent and oppose it now. Although he said this bill would simply make provision to get the men back to work and the ships in operation we find there is another purpose to this bill which lays the groundwork for the cabinet or the governor in council to institute compulsory arbitration in this particular instance.

We in the C.C.F. have not changed our position in this respect since 1950 and I can appreciate why the Leader of the Opposition did not make reference to this. Our position with respect to compulsory arbitration is the same as that we held prior to the election in March and prior to the election last June. Of course on close examination of the bill we note that it provides for compulsory arbitration and we can see, therefore, that the opinions of other parties in the house in this respect have changed. The establishment of the principle of compulsory arbitration is just another indication of how little real thought the Conservative party gave to the statements it made when its members sat on this side of the house. It is merely another attempt on the part of the Conservative party to double-cross those whom it espoused during the election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Hon. members can "oh, oh" as much as they wish. The fact remains that during the election campaign the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet went from one end of the country to the other with their arms around the working class people and said "All you have to do is vote for us"—they even had some literature printed about it—"and we will renounce compulsory arbitration as an instrument for settling industrial disputes". In fact, the features of the Prime Minister appeared on the front page of a document published by the Conservative party in which excerpts from speeches of the hon. gentleman were quoted. One of them reads in part as follows:

—we reiterate our opposition to compulsory arbitration as an instrument for settling industrial disputes.

Comments were made about this matter during the debate on the railway strike in 1950. I have one or two references about which I should like to remind hon. gentlemen opposite. I have one or two quotations taken from the remarks made by Mr. Drew, the then leader of the opposition, but because he is not here I doubt if it would serve any purpose to place them on the record. I shall only mention that they indicate that he was opposed to the feature of compulsory arbitration. Dealing with this question, on August 30, 1950, as reported at page 73 of Hansard of that date, the present Prime Minister had this to say:

What is being done in this section of the bill is what we take our objection to, namely the granting of uncontrolled and untrammelled power to one person to determine decisions in trade union matters and to change the provisions for settlement of labour disputes that have existed for over 70 years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, in the 1950 bill no provision was made for what is real compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Howard: Of course, I could not be expected to understand what the hon. gentleman was thinking about when he made that statement but those were his words.

The hon. lady who is now Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) had some comments to make also as reported at pages 75 and 76 of Hansard of this same date on which occasion she said:

I hold very strong views on this particular subject, views which I have held for many years. They are not dictated by partisanship. As a matter of fact, if my party had seen fit to do otherwise, I should still have had to vote against the bill and against this section, because I do not believe it is in the best interests of those things for which we stand. I do not believe it does anything at all to further our history of labour negotiations—negotiations, may I say, and laws, that can exist only in a free democracy such as that we love and seek to protect in this country.

The hon. lady was opposed at that time to the very same thing that is now being proposed by her colleagues which undoubtedly has received the endorsation of the hon. lady in the cabinet. I can only speculate to that extent.

I merely want to point out that there is a feature in the bill which is most objectionable. It was most objectionable to hon. members opposite when they were seeking votes and when they sat on this side of the house attempting to criticize in every possible way the attitude of the previous Liberal administration. I think they had ample justification for criticizing that attitude. But we find today that the views they held then have now been abandoned and this bill lays the groundwork for compulsory arbitration and that is the part of the bill that I find most objectionable. When we reach that particular clause of the bill I am sure other hon. members as well as myself will have additional comments to make.

Before concluding I wish to make a comment or two, one in the form of a question. My question refers to a matter about which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) probably intended to inform the house. Before we are asked to give formal approval to this bill in second reading I think he should inform us about it. A great deal of authority is being given to the administrator by this bill. I should like the minister to inform us who this person is to be, if that decision has been made, and I rather expect it has because I know the government feels an urgent desire to proceed with this bill as speedily as possible. It should be made clear to the house who this individual is going to be because certainly the attitude and approach of the administrator will have a great bearing upon the relationships between himself and the company. I feel that the house is entitled to know who that person will be.

My hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, made some reference to particular clauses of the bill and notably to clause 5 pointing out that one of the failures of that clause was that no time limit was provided. It was suggested, of course, that there should be a time limit and the hon. gentleman mentioned, I believe in speculation, 30, 60 or 90 days, or something of that nature. I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that it would be most detrimental to impose a time limit on the duration of the negotiations which we expect will arise if the bill receives approval. We find in many cases of labour-management discussions that it is not possible to impose a time limit for reaching a decision no matter what the time limit might be. Let us suppose a time limit of 30 days were to be imposed. What position would the parties find themselves in if on the 29th day at the eleventh hour they felt they were in a position to reach a decision but had not quite reached it because there were some matters left to be determined? What position would they then be in?

They would be bound by the 30-day restriction in the legislation to arriving at a decision or not arriving at a decision, and if they did not arrive at a decision they would be subject to the other features of section 7 of the bill, namely compulsory arbitration, which is the only natural and logical step that can follow.

I think the hon. gentleman should revise his suggestions that there should be a time limit, not only from the point of view that the parties may find themselves in the position of almost reaching a settlement at that time but also from the point of view that if there was a time limit it would tend to aggravate the situation and project the resolving of those differences into the hands of an arbitrator or an arbitration board appointed by the governor in council, and I am sure he would not want that to happen.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I have comments to make similar to those of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to passenger communication and automobile communication between Vancouver and Vancouver island. As I say, they are similar to what the Leader of the Opposition suggested with respect to the establishment of those facilities probably through a revision of the present provisions relating to the trans-Canada highway. I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) who has all kinds of money that I know he would like to spend, and he would certainly be agreeable to this particular suggestion.

Any hon. gentleman who has been out to that part of the country will realize that between the lower mainland and Vancouver island there are a group of islands called the Gulf islands. The trip from Vancouver across to Nanaimo by the C.P.R. boats takes approximately two hours. It takes a little less than that time by the Black Ball ferry line as they have a little shorter distance to go. I suggest it would not cost the country a great deal to investigate from the engineering point of view and the cost point of view the possibility of a bridge between Vancouver island and Gabriola island and the construction of a road along Gabriola island on a 50-50 sharing basis, as is done in the case of the trans-Canada highway, and the establishment of a crown-operated ferry between the lower part of Gabriola island and the mainland. The trip could be made in about 45 minutes. The construction of such a ferry certainly would not require the capital expenditures that the Canadian Pacific railway has found necessary to put into the operation of their boats. I think it could be done for much less cost. I commend it very seriously to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing full well that it will not be done next week. But there is next year, Mr. Speaker, and we hope that some steps will be taken to provide some alternate means of transportation, some more speedy arrangement for transportation between the mainland and the island.

I would like to close with the remarks I made at the opening. This situation has developed on the west coast because of the ineffectiveness of the Department of Labour to deal with it up to now, and the inability or the ineffectiveness of Mr. Taylor, even though I understand he is a very reputable and capable person in this field. His ineffectiveness to resolve the dispute should give ample indication to the government that it is necessary completely to revise the outmoded conciliation procedures which are established under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. We find many, many times, both in provincial fields and in the federal field, that conciliation officers and conciliation boards have no great deep-seated desire to settle disputes. They merely sit and listen to the parties argue and say, "well, we will make some sort of report and we hope it is accepted." We find people being appointed as conciliation board chairmen who in some instances have no conception or no understanding at all of labour-management relations and have no intention or no desire to solve a dispute or to attempt to solve it. They merely say, here, I am a retired banker, or something of that sort, and here is an opportunity for me to rake in some government money, I will take the appointment but I will not do anything drastic to solve the dispute. I hope the parties solve it among themselves; if they do not, it is too bad. That is the unfortunate attitude that has developed over the past few years.

This government, Mr. Speaker, and the Liberal government before it, are equally guilty in failing to grasp the circumstances arising out of changing times and in failing to grasp the changed attitude of both parties to an industrial dispute, the changed psychological approach they have, and the government has failed to adjust the legislation accordingly. So long as we have the present legislation on the statute books which is outmoded and has relatively little effect, we are going to continue to get in these sorts of difficulties. We have to bring our legislation up to date. I hope this is one political promise which the Tories made which they will live up to, namely revamping our legislation.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, in spite of what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor), it is important in my view that we should take the trouble of analysing the principle of this bill. In my opinion, the bill is both delicate and dangerous, for it might affect the terms of the collective agreements arising out of organized labour, and even the discussions preceding the adoption of such agreements.

I have no intention of repeating the very appropriate remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I merely wish in these remarks to blame the government for introducing a resolution at the last moment, after negotiations which had been going on for a year, and 66 or 67 days after the strike had been called, and for asking us to rush it through without having had time to consider it, and then for introducing a bill which must be carried after a cursory examination since we have had no time to give it due consideration.

As the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has said, the members from British Columbia, particularly those from Vancouver, are directly concerned since their electors are affected by the present situation. However, members for other constituencies in the country are also interested in studying employer-employee relations, and that is why I say that the government, by introducing that bill at the last moment, puts us in a practically impossible situation.

The government followed that same procedure in connection with the bill extending the period of unemployment insurance benefits, at the beginning of this session. It was altogether unexpected and, as we had no time to discuss it, we subsequently found out that mistakes had crept in which could have been avoided.

In this case, since we are not as directly concerned as members from British Columbia, we from the rest of the country are not in a position to know the underlying causes of that strike.

We know that discussions had been going on for a year, and that the strike is now 66 or 67 days old, but we know nothing of the labour conditions prevailing before that time. We have no knowledge whatever of the wages these men had been getting or of their present demands; nor do we know anything about the cost of living in that particular area of the country. We do not know of the financial situation of the Canadian Pacific with regard to that company, neither do we know anything of the effects of that strike on people who live in that area. So I say, information on all those points should be given to the house so that hon. members might intelligently consider a bill as important as this one.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, one hon. member is smirking because I said that we should consider this bill intelligently. His reaction does not surprise me, because some members have already been referred to as "trained seals", and this behaviour actually proves that the species does exist in this house.

I am entitled, it seems to me, to ask for more details in order that we may better understand the situation.

In all parts of the country, negotiations are taking place between employers and employees. There are some at present going on in the eastern part of the country between the pulp and paper companies and pulp workers with regard to a new labour agreement. How can we consider this particular labour agreement if we know nothing of the conditions prevailing in British Columbia?

That is why I claim that the government having waited a year before taking any action, having allowed the strike to go on for 60 days, could very well have given us a few days more—I am not offering this alternative as an amendment but merely as a suggestion—could very well have referred the matter to the industrial relations committee, where union representatives and C.P.R. officials could have been called to testify and to answer questions that have to be put in such circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the government is attempting to slip this bill in by the back door. It is a dangerous bill because it involves compulsory arbitration in the field of labour relations.

I admit that in certain circumstances, when public interest is at stake, the government has to step in, but it should always do so before the harm is done. Indeed, the government should have intervened before the strike was called, because it knew that the unions had made proposals to the Canadian Pacific in order to settle the situation. Union leaders even told Canadian Pacific management that, if the situation was not settled within 30 days, they would take a strike vote. The Minister of Labour must have known, and his officials must have kept him informed of the fact that there would be a strike. There should simply be no waiting until the harm is done before intervening.

Not only does the government lay down the dangerous principle of compulsory arbitration, but I say that it has not given us a chance to examine the bill intelligently, and I again ask the Minister of Labour to kindly allow us to refer the matter to the industrial relations committee so that we may be able to call in witnesses who would enlighten us, in the rest of the country, on prevailing conditions. We would then have a chance to consider the matter seriously. Perhaps we would then be willing to support the bill heartily.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that those who understand French will make it a point to translate my remarks to the minister. Better still, I will repeat them myself in English, so that he may understand me.

(Text):

I will translate into English the last part of what I said in French. This is an important bill. Those from the east do not know the conditions existing. We do not know the working conditions. We do not know the wages paid before the strike. We do not know the demands made by the union. We have no knowledge of the cost of living in the region affected. We do not know the situation of the C.P.R. with respect to this service. We do not know the situation created by the strike so far as those living in the area are concerned. Therefore in order to be able to study properly a bill of this importance in which forced bargaining is being brought about I think that the bill should be sent to the industrial relations committee so that we can call representatives of the unions and of the C.P.R. in order to study the matter more completely. We will then be in a better position a few days from now to decide upon the matter. The situation has been pending for a year and the strike has been going on for 65 or 66 days. Therefore I say if we could have a chance to discuss the matter with witnesses we would be better able to decide upon it.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this bill as I read it this morning contains four principles upon which the government intends to proceed in order to dispose of the dispute. One of these principles is the appointment of an administrator who shall act as the agent of the company for the purpose of controlling and carrying on the business of the company. Another is that forthwith upon his appointment the administrator shall resume the carrying on of the business of the company which was suspended because of the strike and that every employee of the company is directed by this legislation to return to work. Another of the principles laid down in the bill is that there shall be an increase of eight per cent over and above the amounts contained in the collective agreement which existed prior to the enactment of this legislation. Finally, as soon as the ships have been put into operation the steamship company and the union shall enter into negotiations with a view to a settlement of the matters in dispute under the authority of the administrator.

I should like to say that while the opposition will support the legislation because of the urgency of the situation and also because of the special circumstances involved in the dispute, nevertheless it should be pointed out to the government that there are a number of inherent defects and weaknesses in the legislation. I should like to couple my remarks with those of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in his reference to the delay that occurred prior to the introduction of the legislation. Yesterday in answer to a question the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) gave reasons indicating that there had been no delay and proceeded to put on Hansard in chronological order the actions taken by the Department of Labour. While it is true that the normal processes of the Department of Labour were available during a large part of the duration of the dispute, still the position remains that the government should have indicated much earlier that this legislation was necessary. I am somewhat surprised at the statement the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) made earlier today that the government found itself faced with two alternatives. One of those alternatives was to do nothing and allow the strike to carry on, the other alternative was to proceed by way of legislation as it is doing now.

I say to the Minister of Labour, and to those associated with him on the other side of the house, that if they had proceeded in this manner with reference to another strike, namely that of Canadian National Steamships, perhaps they would have succeeded in saving those eight ships of the crown corporation. Instead of doing this, however, they did absolutely nothing in connection with that dispute. They did exactly what the Minister of Labour says was represented by one of the alternatives before him in the present circumstances, they did nothing and allowed these steamships to be transferred to the flag of one of the West Indian countries. They even went so far as to allow a number of the crew from the West Indies to be flown to Canada. It is true that in the middle of the flight instructions were given to have the crew returned to the West Indies.

I do not want to transgress the rules of this house by laying too great stress upon the dispute of Canadian National Steamships, other than to say this. The circumstances were not entirely different. It is true that, having regard to the stoppage of steamship service on the west coast, this dispute was much more serious than the other. Nonetheless, many of the circumstances which we find here were found with reference to Canadian National Steamships, and in that case I repeat the government took no action, whereas if it had acted as it has in this case, then that service would have been saved.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And they interfered with the rights of labour.

Mr. Fulton: These profound observations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is true.

Mr. Chevrier: There is another observation which comes to my mind, and it is this. What is the basis for this legislation? Upon what basis does this legislation rest? When the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) answered that question yesterday he said that public security and the maintenance of a proper regard for the rights of others demanded the introduction of this legislation. I shall not comment upon that statement, other than to say this. This legislation, in effect, sets aside the normal process of collective bargaining. If no settlement is reached in accordance with the first part of this legislation, then the government may impose a new settlement under the terms of clause 7 (b) in part and (d) in full. The right to strike has been taken away by this legislation by means of the provision directing the employee back to work, as set out in the section to which I referred earlier, the last half of clause 4. The right of the employee to strike has also been set aside if the government finds it necessary to resort to the conditions set out in clause 7 of the bill.

While I am dealing with clause 7 I should like to remind the house that the governor in council has taken upon himself a great deal of power and is, in effect, legislating on this very important subject by order in council. I remember how violently the opposition criticized the former administration because of that sort of legislation.

This is, in my opinion, compulsory arbitration because it means that the company need never agree to the terms and hence it will, of necessity, if that is the case bring into operation the regulations of the governor in council as set out in clause 7 and lead, in the final analysis, to compulsory arbitration. I should like to make another observation, if I may, with reference to the question which I asked yesterday. I asked the Prime Minister under what authority this legislation was being introduced. He seemed not to understand the question I put, and perhaps I did not put it clearly. I repeated it, and there seemed to me to be in his reply, as well as in the reply of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) a confusion as to the authority under which this legislation is being introduced.

The legislation which was introduced in 1950 was introduced because the railways were national in scope and because of the authority which parliament has under section 91 of the British North America Act. In this case, I ask under what authority is this legislation being introduced? Is it under the terms of section 91 or is it under the terms of section 92 of the British North America Act? It seems to me that section 92 does have some application in the case. Perhaps I should read section 92:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:—
>
> (a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways—

I skip over a few words.

> —connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

This would mean that if the operation of these steamship services comes within the exception, then it falls under the jurisdiction of parliament. I am told that a portion of these services does fall within the exception. I am informed also that there is a portion which does not fall within the operation of this exception because that portion of the service is exclusively within the province. Of course, if this service has been declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, then that is another matter.

I am asking the question whether or not the legislation would apply to that part of the service which is entirely within the province. I am sure the Minister of Justice will want to deal with that point, and that is really what I had in mind yesterday when I asked the question, and the reply that was directed to me failed entirely to answer that. If, of course, the operations of this company have been declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada then I must admit that there is no basis for the question which I am asking. If it has not, then I think as to that part of the service operating between the province and a foreign country, there is jurisdiction. But as to the part which operates wholly within the province there appears to be some doubt, unless, of course, it is declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Then it seems to me that this legislation is ineffective as to a large part of the services if the question which I have put has any validity. I am sure that the government must have given consideration to that aspect of the case; and if it has done so, I hope that there will be some reply. The Leader of the Opposition has dealt with the position of employees who have found other jobs and also with the position of the employees on the ships of Canadian Pacific Steamships that have been sold and I shall not deal with that matter again. However, I should like to take that argument a step further and ask the government whether there is not in this bill some authority to prevent the company from selling one or all of its remaining ships. Is this steamship service to be restored in its entirety the way it was before? If it is, then consideration must be given to the question of the two ships that have been sold. What is going to be done about other ships that may be sold? Is there in this legislation any provision to prevent the steamship company from disposing of any of its assets?

Then, of course, the main weakness of the legislation, to my mind is that there is no finality to it. In that respect I must respectfully disagree with my friend the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who seemed to think that the position of the Leader of the Opposition in that respect was not the correct one. It strikes me that there should be a limit to the negotiations; because if there is not a limit to the time in which these negotiations can be carried on, while it may result in a position such as that referred to by the hon. member for Skeena in so far as employees are concerned, what will be the position as far as the employer is concerned?

Mr. Howard: Precisely the same.

Mr. Chevrier: I disagree. It may well be that the employer will be dissatisfied with the proposal that will have been made and, according to the legislation, he will be able to refuse to accept it for a period of many years. Then the government is driven to exactly the thing to which I was objecting at the outset, namely arbitration by compulsion or again arbitration by order in council.

For instance, if I may carry that argument a step further the points which seem important to me are these. Are the wages or the increases in wages to be paid by the federal treasury or will they be taken out of the operating revenue of the company? If, as would appear to be likely from a statement made by one of the officers of the corporation, a deficit results from the operation of the service by a federal administrator, is that a charge against the federal treasury? If an operating profit results, on the other hand, does this money belong to the federal treasury or does it belong to the company? If the operation of the fleet is entirely a financial concern of the federal treasury, is the C.P.R. to be paid a rental to cover depreciation and use of the vessels?

These financial questions are important in view of the remarks made by the company in rejecting the conciliation board recommendations in the dispute with the seafarers' international union. The C.P.R. said that British Columbia coastal steamships did not cover its full operating costs from operating revenue last year. It rejected all recommendations made by the three members of the board of conciliation because the company, to use the words of the employer "could not undertake further expense" in the light of this operating loss. The company concluded by saying that after the most careful consideration of each of the recommendations the C.P.R. could not contemplate accepting any of these. I think the house is entitled to know what the position will be if an operating deficit continues or exists after the administrator has taken over.

Then again I pose this question, referring to the two ships that have already been sold. Once the new legislation is passed, is the C.P.R. prevented from selling its vessels? There does not appear to be in the legislation any section which would prevent this action. Hence, on the whole, Mr. Speaker, there appear to me to be a number of serious weaknesses in this legislation. I protest the aspects of this bill that have to do with the powers which the governor in council will be taking by virtue of section 7. But we on this side of the house, and I am sure all members of the house, are interested in one thing, namely the resumption of services between Vancouver island and the mainland. I realize that it is impossible to segregate the resumption of services from the other objectionable features of the bill which, to my mind, are quite objectionable.

However, I am sure that in the drafting of this legislation many of the hon. members on the other side of the house, particularly those who sit on the treasury benches, must have recalled with some concern the statements they made when they sat on this side of the house when similar legislation or legislation similar in principle was introduced in 1950. As was stated by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), in 1950 it was not necessary to put into operation the compulsion part of the legislation. I am sure that the government feels the same way about this legislation. However, there is no assurance, because there is no time limit, that such will not be the case.

For the reasons I have outlined, we on this side of the house will support the legislation.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, without doubt this is a most important piece of legislation that is now before the house. I think we all realize that it is possible, from many points of view, to rise in one's place and to speak with emotional emphasis on the bill from varying angles. It would be possible to be righteously indignant at a company not being able to say that it is no longer going to operate a business because its power is interfered with, because this bill is going to put in an administrator to operate the business. On the other side of the picture I know, as a trade unionist since 1924, that one could really wax indignant about a bill which, as mentioned by a previous speaker, basically removes the right to strike.

Or one could, I imagine, as the previous speaker had in mind, at least, make a lengthy speech on the constitutionality of the bill itself. It is not my intention in what little I have to say to do any of those three things. I believe the introduction of this bill should compel all members of this house, industry and labour, to face up to the realities of the Canadian economy with regard to what is taking place in this country and, also, to face up to the question as to just what are our responsibilities as employees, as employers and as government, and consider just how far we should go in any one of these aspects motivated by individual thought or by individual action when it comes up against a social reaction.

I am not quite certain whether I have got the wording exactly as I wanted, but what I have in mind is that I believe the introduction of this bill means far more than would appear on the surface. We have here a situation where men are legally on strike, where they are on strike because they have been unable to obtain from their employer satisfaction of what they think are their just demands. The company also is in a legal position, but because of the nature of the situation the effect of this conflict has gone far beyond those directly concerned. A few moments ago an hon. member was making a recommendation that this bill should be referred to a standing committee of the house because there are so many things concerned with this situation about which hon. members who do not come from British Columbia are ignorant. I can understand that point of view. But we must also realize that the time has come when something has definitely got to be done because one segment of the population of British Columbia—some 200,000 people on Vancouver island—has been cut off from the mainland. We can wax as indignant as we like from any point of view. I know I may be criticized for this some other time, but I am trying to be honest now, and I say we have got to face up to this situation, and whether we like it or not we must accept the fact that this service has got to be resumed.

Although I regret the necessity which has led to the bringing in of this bill, I think the fact that the government has found it necessary to do so may be the spark that will cause both industry and the trade union movement and parliamentarians, too, to face up to their problems and responsibilities. We could —and I know I could—spend a long time in recriminations. We could spend a long time, and rightly so, in pointing out differences between what the government says now and what it said on some previous occasions; between what it does now and what it did earlier on. Very definitely, recriminations could be based on the fact that it has taken so long to get action. However, I do not think, from my own point of view, that this is my responsibility at the present moment. My responsibility, as I see it, as an elected member from Vancouver, is to get the service back into operation as speedily as possible while protecting the interests of both parties concerned. Therefore, I intend to support this bill in principle, but I will make a suggestion —one that is not new; it has been made by others—that the measure be changed in one respect at least to remove the part that deals with compulsory arbitration.

I feel, after studying the bill and reading it several times, that the desired results can be achieved without that part in section 7 which deals with compulsory arbitration. Under the terms of this bill—and I think I understand the situation—if the industry and its employees cannot get together and hundreds of thousands continue to suffer hardship, the only group which can move is parliament, and parliament is being asked to move —and it is very unwilling to do so, I think— and through parliamentary action we provide that the service has got to be resumed. Right. I imagine they will obey the law.

After resumption the owners of the industry and the representatives of the workers will get together and try to settle their differences. There is no time limit. As I interpret the act the government will maintain their administrator there until there is agreement between the employer and the employees, whether it takes a day or a year. Then you do not need that vicious principle which so many of us oppose, the introduction of compulsory arbitration.

I could be wrong, but I do not think I am, in saying that the C.P.R. does not want the government running its business. It wants to operate its own C.P.R. line and I believe it will do everything it can to get its business back into its hands. I consider this will be their approach. Equally, the employees will not want to continue working with only an 8 per cent increase in wages. They will want to work out something which will approach more closely their original demands, or what they were offered in varying degrees by various people. From the point of view, of the employees, then, it will be desirable to reach an agreement with the company. It may be asked: why have they not done so in the past? The answer is that they were not able to do it. The company had the power of lockout, and the employees had the power of strike and, as a result, agreement was not reached.

But now, with the action which the government has recommended, and with the service being resumed, there is no basis on which the two parties can proceed except that of trying to get together and negotiate a settlement. So, from a logical analysis, I say they are going to work out an agreement and because of that I sincerely recommend to the government that they remove from this bill a provision which is not required and one which is hated by almost everybody in this country, that is compulsion. I ask the government to remove something which is certainly hated by the trade union movements, namely compulsory arbitration. I am convinced that the entire intent of the bill can be met even with the removal of that clause and I commend that thought to the government.

I am going to conclude with just a little repetition and say that it would be extremely easy to wax wrathful about this type of legislation, to condemn one side and commend another, but I am not going to do that. I believe that as we ask industry to have a sense of responsibility and as we ask trade unions to have a sense of responsibility, then I must accept responsibility also when I stand in my place in the House of Commons and so I say, in these remarks, that much as I dislike the legislation I do not think the government could have done anything else in the circumstances and it will have my support.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take the time of the house very briefly indeed. I may say with about the same reluctance and for some of the same reasons I take the same view as was taken by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) about being willing to support this legislation. I represent a province which is largely an island and though it has almost twice the population of Vancouver island—I might point this out to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) —still, there are over 250,000 Canadian citizens on Vancouver island who have been deprived of a service which has existed for a very long time and which is, in my view, an essential national service. We know that the service to Newfoundland and to Prince Edward Island, the other two large inhabited islands on our shores, is guaranteed by the constitution and while the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) refuses to be drawn into any discussion about whether Canada has any obligation to maintain this service, it seems to me that by the fact the government has seen fit to introduce this extraordinary legislation it is admitting that.

I am very troubled not only about the feature of the bill that the hon. member for Vancouver East is troubled about but also about the failure of the government to enunciate any principle on which this action is taken. I think perhaps we can discern the principle. I have tried to suggest a principle that there is an obligation in the case of Vancouver island that perhaps does not exist in the case of Pelee island although we do subsidize a ferry to Pelee island, as I happen to know. In other words, this is such a large segment of the total Canadian population that it is a national problem. I am personally of the view that it is a national problem. It seems to me that by its failure to state any principle on which it is acting and by its failure even to state clearly, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) pointed out, on what section of the constitution it is basing its action, the government may be, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) suggested, letting itself in for an awful lot of trouble and pressures of all kinds in the future.

This is a precedent that none of us likes any more than any of us who were associated with it—and I was not in parliament at that time though I knew something of the circumstances—liked what was done in 1950. It is a very disagreeable thing for the parliament of Canada by law to oblige or compel people to work. Indeed, some of the bitterest struggles in the history of our country were over the question of whether or not we should compel people to fight when the very life of our country was at stake. Here we are picking out a small segment of our population and saying that these people have no right to choose where they shall work, that for an absolutely unlimited and undefined period of time—because there is no time limit in this legislation—the members of this union unless they die or become incapacitated—and I presume they would be let out on those grounds—are going to be compelled by law to go on working for this company or for the administrator acting in some capacity in connection with this company.

It is difficult for me personally and I believe it is equally difficult for all hon. gentlemen on this side of the house to understand why all the workmen who went on strike on May 16 should be compelled to go to work whether they have moved to Newfoundland or Nova Scotia in the meantime —presumably as long as they are within Canadian jurisdiction—in view of the fact that there may be no work for them. There is no similar compulsion in the bill for the company to keep all the ships in operation.

In the Vancouver Sun of July 23, 1958 we read that two of the strike-bound ships have been sold. What are the crews of these ships going to do when they turn up in obedience to this law and find there are no jobs for them? There are obviously not going to be as many jobs as there were on May 16 as was pointed out by the hon. member for Laurier a few moments ago. Which employees will the government compel to go to work? How will the government choose which employees will be those who will be compelled to go back to work?

It seems to me this is one respect in which the legislation is not fair as between the employer and the employees. All the employees have to go back to work but apparently the C.P.R. does not have to put back in operation all its ships and we have heard rumours to the effect that two more ships may be sold. The government should insert a provision in this legislation by which the C.P.R. could not sell any more of its ships as long as this statute is on the statute books. There has been a lack of foresight and forethought here on the part of the government.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver East is no longer in the chamber.

Mr. Winch: Right here.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want very respectfully and with due regard to his very much greater experience in this field than mine—and I do sincerely respect the hon. gentleman's experience—to point out that under the conditions that will be created if we pass the bill in this form there can be no fair collective bargaining once this bill is in operation because the C.P.R. will have no incentive whatsoever to agree. It is going to be paying an 8 per cent wage increase. The union is asking for a lot more. Why should not the C.P.R. continue to pay the wage prescribed in this statute and never reach an agreement? There is no incentive on the side of the company whatever. If we do not have some way of terminating this provision there is an indirect compulsion on the men far greater than any direct, clear and unequivocal compulsion stated by parliament in the law could possibly be and the legislation as now drafted is not fair as between the employees and the employer. It does not hold the balance fairly between them but creates a very strong bias on the side of the employer against the employees.

There is another thing about the legislation that troubles me very much and which I thought would have troubled the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and most of the hon. gentlemen who kept us here for over a month in the summer of 1955 debating the Defence Production Act because it gave certain extraordinary authority to the governor in council to be exercised in secret and with no time limit on it. The powers that Mr. Howe was asking for at that time did not include the power to compel human beings to work for an indefinite time at a fixed wage. That was one thing that was not included in the Defence Production Act. Here we are being asked to pass a statute without any time limit on it. If the Minister of Justice would like me to remind him of it, he will find on page 4733 and again on page 4737 of Hansard for June 13, 1955, his eloquent pleas for a time limit on that arbitrary legislation. I am not going to break the rules of the house by reading clause 7 but we are being asked in that clause to give the governor in council power to prescribe any kind of arbitration that he deems expedient.

When the government in 1950 brought in the maintenance of railway operations legislation, what did it do? It prescribed precisely what the arbitrator could do. It said, in the first place, that he could not reduce the wages under any circumstances. This bill does not say that. It said furthermore that he must begin his determination within 30 days, and that it was to be done according to prescriptions carefully laid down by parliament on behalf of the Canadian public whom we represent. Here we are being asked to give to the governor in council to exercise in secret —as hon. gentlemen opposite were so fond of saying, as the Prime Minister made most of his political reputation by saying—by order in council the powers, and they are asking that this arbitrator shall have the power to make any kind of arbitration, that some day when this parliament is not sitting, when we are away at our homes and the government gets into another panic, as they did over this strike after 68 days they will suddenly decide to ask the arbitrator to do something.

I do say that this is not good enough. I do think that the government should either do what the hon. member for Vancouver East suggests, knock this provision out of the bill entirely—though I see grave difficulties about that because it means that these men are going for an absolutely indefinite period to be subject to this wage, to being compelled to work at this wage for an indefinite period—or else the government should put a time limit on that portion of it and parliament should be allowed to prescribe the conditions of the arbitration in great detail.

I would not object to the idea so much that perhaps the governor in council might decide to meet the point of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), that the governor in council might have the power to prescribe some longer period if the parties were getting together and were in the midst of negotiation, but it does seem to me we should not have timeless legislation of this character. That is the argument the hon. gentlemen put up.

As I say, the powers of the other legislation did not include—and I repeat this—the right to compel a small group of Canadians to go to work and to stay at work at a fixed wage for an absolutely indefinite period. This, it seems to me, is important and I go back to my first point. It is essential to restore this service. I am happy that all parties in the house are agreed on it; I am happy, particularly because I do represent an island, and I know how the people on an island feel about the isolation there can be if communications are interrupted. I have even experienced interruptions which are caused not by man but by nature and know something about how inconvenient and awkward they can be; but, at the same time, I do feel that to ask us to pass legislation that is to stay on the statute books indefinitely, that has no time limit of any kind upon it, as the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Laurier have pointed out, is to ask us to do something which hon. gentlemen opposite made the main point of their campaign in the session only three short years ago.

It seems to me there is another point—and this is the only other point I wish to make at this stage—which troubles me a good deal about this legislation, and this was also mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier. I am merely repeating perhaps to underline it. In the case of the maintenance of railways operations legislation in 1950, parliament was restoring the operation of the two great railway companies, one of which is owned by the taxpayers of Canada, and if it incurs any deficit that deficit has to be met by the parliament of Canada, anyway. The other at that time was quite clearly not losing money; therefore, there was no question that this legislation would be putting directly or indirectly any charge upon the taxpayers.

But it does seem to me that we are not at all clear as to what this legislation is doing to the exchequer. The minister should tell us that there should be some provision in the legislation itself which makes clear whether, if these ships are operated at a loss, that loss is to be borne by the Canadian Pacific railway or, if not, is it to be borne by the taxpayers of Canada and if so on what authority is the government going to pay that loss? This seems to me to be a very serious question. Are we being asked to say that the people of Canada, through their parliament, are taking away the private property of a company, operating it at a loss, if that happens, and then making the shareholders of that company pay that loss? That is a very new principle, a very new thing to be doing, if that is what we are doing. If we are not doing that, what are we doing? The legislation, it seems to me, does not give us any clue, any answer to that question.

If there should be a fortuitous profit, which I assume is very unlikely, but which might conceivably happen, what would be the situation? But that question is not nearly as serious as the first question. If there is a loss incurred in this operation, particularly if it is a greater loss than the Canadian Pacific railway has been experiencing—I believe they claim that they have not been operating those ships at a profit; we do not know much about it, at least I do not know anything about it—under what authority is parliament imposing that on the C.P.R. or on the taxpayer? Surely, it is one or the other, and we should not pass legislation that does not cover that contingency.

But I come back to what seems to me the most serious thing of all and what has been emphasized by my leader and by the hon. member for Laurier, and what I feel I must emphasize again. Here we are in this legislation engaging in a kind of compulsion, which I think is even worse than compulsory arbitration, namely compelling men to go to work at a fixed wage for an indefinite period. That is what we are doing. Let's face it. That is what the law says and they are subject to the penalties of the law. If they do not go back to work they are criminals, and we are not even saying that there is to be work for them when they get back because of the two ships being sold, if they have been sold. But what is most serious of all is that we are giving to the governor in council this power to provide for any kind of arbitration that the governor in council may see fit. We are being asked to do that. I do hope that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) will rise in his place and tell us that some kind of definite prescription will be put into section 7 of this legislation and that some kind of time limit will be put either on this provision that those people must work at this wage or that in some way or other there will be some definiteness about this matter.

Because it is an emergency, because we recognize that Vancouver island should not be cut off from the mainland, we do not feel that we should oppose the principle of what the government is trying to do any more than the hon. member for Vancouver East felt that he should, but we do oppose the indefinite character and the effect of this legislation. I know the government can say, just as we said with far better reason three years ago, that we would not do any of these things, we would not let that go on indefinitely. The hon. gentlemen will not forget, and certainly I will not, the debate we had at that time about that time limit, and that was only about the power to do things to things, not the power to do things to people. Here we are being asked to take action for an indefinite period, we are being asked to give the government, or the administrator appointed by the government, the power to compel men to work at a fixed wage with no guarantee of any kind that for all that period the wage will be changed regardless of changing conditions.

It seems to me that this is so grave a defect in this legislation that, while we are most anxious to co-operate with the government in getting this thing through as quickly as possible in order to end what I am ready to regard as a national emergency, we still think that they should do something about those points that I have raised and which, I may say, were raised previously by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Laurier.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation of the participation of hon. members in the debate on second reading of the bill and the many suggestions that have been given us. As to the questions that have been asked, may I suggest to hon. members, and I think they will agree, that they were directed to certain clauses of the bill and in my humble opinion these same questions can be asked when we are in the committee stage. We will endeavour to provide satisfactory answers to them at that time.

However, I do wish to make some comment on what has been said in the debate so far. It has again been put forward by those participating in the debate that the government caused delays with regard to this situation. I want to reiterate that that has not been the case. This whole problem has been of deep concern to the government, particularly to the labour department. We have used our facilities to the fullest extent. Because of the fact that we believe firmly in collective bargaining we have endeavoured to use every means we possibly could think of to bring about a solution to the situation through collective bargaining between the parties and through mediation and the facilities of our department.

May I say that in the appointment of the commissioner of inquiry every possible formula was exhausted by him that could be thought of and he spent four to five weeks doing this in conjunction with the parties to the dispute. During that period of time there was nothing else the government could do as long as the negotiations were in progress. However, the stage was reached where the commissioner of inquiry reported to the Minister of Labour that he had exhausted all efforts and he made certain recommendations. Therefore all in all throughout the whole negotiation of the dispute there has been no time lag whatsoever.

The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) suggested that the bill should be referred to the standing committee. Under ordinary circumstances that might be the right procedure but at the present time, with the situation as critical as it is in this particular instance, I say that would certainly cause greater delay and greater hardship. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) wanted to know who the administrator would be and whether we were prepared to announce his name. I feel that should not be done now when we are in the process of dealing with the bill but the name of the administrator will be announced after the passage of the bill by parliament.

The hon. member also referred to having a look at the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to see whether the legislation could be brought more up to date in order to deal with present problems. I might say to him that one of the first actions I took on assuming office was to ask for advice and suggestions from labour, management, in fact all interested groups in the country, as to how the act could be amended and improved to bring about better conciliation procedure and better collective bargaining between management and labour. I have received many suggestions but some of the more important bodies have not sent theirs to me yet. I know that they are working on them and that they will be in my possession in the not too distant future.

With respect to the appointment of conciliation board chairmen, I have looked over the roster of those who have been used in the past and I am quite satisfied that the chairmen appointed during my term of office at least have been men with a great deal of experience and a good background in the field of industrial disputes. I feel certain that the procedure we have followed has been most fair and I might say that our industrial relations record in the settlement of disputes in the federal field of jurisdiction has been most excellent and is of high rating.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked a number of questions. I suggest to him that he ask them in committee on the clauses of the bill and we will endeavour to supply the answers. However, I might point out that the administrator will be an agent of the company in the operation of the steamship line so that the financial responsibility, whichever way it is, will be a responsibility of the company.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Only for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company.

Mr. Starr: And financial responsibilities, the operation. I want to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) for his remarks, particularly with regard to the responsibilities of management, labour and government. I think he is right. There is a great deal of responsibility and the time may be coming when we must look at the situation to see where responsibility lies so that each of us will carry out our own responsibilities in the hope that we will bring about a situation that will be harmonious in the future.

Mention has been made of what I am loath to call compulsory arbitration. I would prefer to call it binding arbitration. In this regard I can only say that the power is there to impose arbitration of the differences remaining after, and only after, the other procedures provided have been exhausted and there is danger of an emergent situation of serious proportions arising. However, as I have indicated, implementation of that particular provision in the bill will only arise if and when circumstances at the time indicate that it is required. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is the hope of the government that by having this power in the bill this in itself will make it unnecessary to use it provided, of course, that the parties involved in the dispute display a reasonable sense of the public interest and, of course, their own interest in this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: As they did in 1950.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Starr: I am hoping that reason will prevail in the discussions that will be held on a collective bargaining basis. I do not think a time limit can be put on them. As long as people are willing to talk about a problem they have between them, most certainly we should not impose a time limit because that is the system upon which we have based collective bargaining and it is a system acceptable to both management and labour. That is all I have to say at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The question is the following—

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct what may be a misunderstanding of my earlier remarks to which the minister referred. In my reference to conciliation board chairmen I was not confining my remarks to those appointed specifically and purely under federal jurisdiction but was referring to my knowledge of conciliation board chairmen as they have operated both in the federal and provincial fields.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Starr) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Is the house agreeable that this matter be put into committee before we rise?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I might first ask a question of the minister and, following his reply, depending on what it is, I may have a comment or two to make. This may not be the proper section on which to raise this particular question, but I do not see any other clause in the bill under which it could arise. My question deals with the subject of penalties arising out of failure to comply with the act.

In reviewing some of the comments which were made on the bill of 1950 I see reference was made to the Criminal Code. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether section 107 of the Criminal Code is the provision that sets out the penalties?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I might answer that question, Mr. Chairman. I am not able at the moment to give the hon. member a reference to the section, but I will answer him before I sit down. Perhaps at this point I might answer a number of the other questions which were raised on second reading.

First, there was a question as to the principles on which this bill is founded. The Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Laurier, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate all raised this point and asked if we would indicate the principles on which this bill is based. Some hon. members said we had not indicated yesterday what was the principle of the bill. I would suggest to them that both the Prime Minister and myself indicated fairly clearly yesterday what was the general principle on which we were founding this legislation. The Prime Minister said yesterday, as reported at page 2578 of Hansard that > Public security and the maintenance of a proper regard for the rights of others would demand the introduction of such legislation.

And I said, as reported at page 2582:

> The government recognizes that it is a matter of concern to the government on behalf of the people of Canada to see that the people of Canada are served with adequate transportation facilities, and I suppose that is the broad general principle involved in the bill.

I would suggest to the hon. member who raised this question that these two passages are an adequate expression of the reasons, if you like, why the government of Canada should take action at this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question on that point? The Prime Minister gave us the reasons—and they are now repeated by the Minister of Justice—namely public security and the rights of others, as a justification. That seems very plausible, but surely there must be some other principle behind the raison d'être of this bill, because every time management or labour takes a decision, that involves the rights of others. That kind of intervention would not justify action by the government of the kind now proposed. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not argue that this is the case.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. gentleman would read the two extracts together, as I suggested they should be read, he would have the answer to his questions—that this is the maintenance of an essential service which the government of Canada recognizes as being a concern of government. It is on that basis we felt it was essential to act.

The hon. member for Laurier pursued in somewhat more detail the question of the constitutional validity of the legislation. He asked whether in view of the provisions of section 92 this matter came within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada. I would answer him by saying it has been generally recognized over the years that this service is an essential part of the transportation system of the Canadian Pacific railway and that the transportation system of the Canadian Pacific railway is one which falls under federal legislative jurisdiction. And inasmuch as the service connecting the mainland of British Columbia with Vancouver island is an integral part of the Canadian Pacific railway's transportation system, it is therefore clearly within the exceptions contemplated by section 92, paragraph 10(a) and thereby comes under the general provisions of section 91, paragraph (29) of the British North America Act.

In addition, I would refer the hon. member to a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada as to the validity and applicability of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act recorded in the 1955 supreme court reports at page 524 in which the question of the jurisdiction of the dominion government in connection with labour disputes arising with respect to steamship companies of this sort was decided. The court had before it for consideration the applicability of section 53 of part II of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and I am reading, now, from page 534 of the supreme court report:

> 53. Part I applies in respect of employees who are employed upon or in connection with the operation of any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada including, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing,
> (a) works, undertakings or businesses operated or carried on for or in connection with navigation and shipping, whether inland or maritime, including the operation of ships and transportation by ship anywhere in Canada.

The court found that the parliament of Canada had complete legislative jurisdiction in connection with navigation and shipping. The operations of the British Columbia coastal steamship service by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company falls immediately and directly under that section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. At that time Mr. Justice Kellock, as reported on page 561, found in part as follows:

> In my opinion, therefore, such matters as wages, hours of labour, and agreements relating to conditions of labour upon ships, whether operated in local or interprovincial or international waters, are within the exclusive jurisdiction of parliament.

I may say that the court by a majority found that parliament had exclusive legislative jurisdiction in connection with labour matters on ships in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question here? The point the minister is making is that there are two areas under which parliament would have jurisdiction. There is the case he has just referred to, and which I am not in a position to assess without giving it some consideration, and the proposition that it has been recognized over the years that the British Columbia coastal steamships service is an essential part of the transportation system—

Mr. Fulton: I think I said it was an integral part.

Mr. Chevrier: Whether it is one or the other does not seem to me to make any difference. Let us say it is an integral part of the transportation system of the C.P.R. I do not think that is sufficient. I should like to see some evidence that that is the case. I know that is not the case with reference to the Canadian National Railways. It is not all the steamship services of the Canadian National Railways that are considered as an integral part of that railway. The minister did make the statement and I am not in a position to deny that it is accurate but I do know of certain instances in which it has been argued that the steamship services of the Canadian Pacific railway were not for other purposes an integral part of the transportation system. That is the reason I was raising the point. I wondered if the bill were referred to a committee, which of course it cannot be under the circumstances, and if it were possible to ask these questions of the steamship officers, they would be able to provide answers with which I would be perfectly satisfied unless, of course, after reading the decision, that proved to be the answer. However, I did want to make that observation with reference to the steamship services because I am not convinced it is in all cases an integral part of the railway system.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think it is necessary for the purposes of this legislation to argue that point in too fine detail. As I said yesterday, it is, I think, accepted without question that the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction over the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and on that broad general principle we rested our general case. In addition, there is the specific finding of the Supreme Court of Canada that, with respect to labour relations on steamships of this nature, the parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction, so I do not think there is really room for doubt but that this legislation is within the competence of parliament to enact.

The question was raised as to the financial relationships between the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company once the administrator is appointed and assumes responsibility under this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: May I see the decision?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laurier has asked me to show him the decision. I should say I have not attempted to summarize all the judgments. It was a majority decision of the Supreme Court and the passage from Mr. Justice Kellock's judgment seemed to me to be representative of the majority opinion.

Mr. Pearson: Before the minister leaves the question of the principles on which the legislation is based I wonder if he would elaborate on that principle which he has mentioned and which was invoked by the Prime Minister yesterday, that of public security. He will be aware, as hon. members of the committee will be aware, that when the provincial government of British Columbia took over the administration of a shipping line the other day they invoked that principle of public security in its civil defence aspect. Is that what the government has in mind when it refers to the principle of public security as a principle, among other principles, justifying this legislation?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to indicate that the decision of the government was that the public interest demanded legislation of this sort. I should add only that the federal government has jurisdiction in this field. And so you have the two things: the public interest demanded it—and all my hon. friends on the other side of the house who spoke this afternoon agreed with that statement—and then I went on from there to try to satisfy the hon. member for Laurier by saying that not only did we have that basis for the legislation but we had the solid constitutional basis on the authority of the principles that I have laid before him in the last few minutes.

Mr. Pearson: I quite agree, Mr. Chairman, that public interest can undoubtedly be used as a valid principle for this legislation and I take it from what the minister is saying that by public security the Prime Minister meant public interest because public security can be a much more limited concept than public interest.

Mr. Fulton: I dare say that the hon. gentleman is quite right and I take it that there is no quarrel but that it is in the public interest and there is, therefore, justification for intervention at this stage by the federal government. I think we are all on common ground in that connection.

Then the question was raised as to the financial relationship that would be created between the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a result of the appointment of the administrator and whether or not the government would be liable for the losses, if any, incurred by the company and whether or not any surplus would accrue to the government. I suggest that the simple answer to both these questions is found in the fact that the administrator will be the agent of the company and I have not yet heard of an agent who was responsible or liable for the losses of his principal or an agent who could put into his pocket any profits made by his principal. I think that is the simple answer.

With respect to the other aspect of this question, the relationship of the administrator to the company, hon. members asked whether or not the company could suspend service or sell its ships or do other similar acts when this bill comes into effect. I should like to point out to hon. members that the bill provides that the administrator is appointed for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company. I suggest, therefore, that the wording of that clause would indicate that the company cannot arbitrarily dispose of its business or arbitrarily suspend services while the administrator is empowered to carry on under the terms of this legislation.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question on that point? What the minister is saying, I take it, is that the company operating the ships under the administrator, if this legislation is passed, cannot now dispose of any of those ships irrespective of any operating losses that might be incurred in the management?

Mr. Fulton: I would answer that by saying that the administrator is appointed with the powers and under the provisions of clause 3 of the bill and further the governor in council is empowered to make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of the bill and for ensuring the operation of the business of the company and for directing the administrator in the carrying on of the business of the company pursuant to this bill. By virtue of those two provisions that sort of question with relation to the business of the company would have to be reviewed before any decision was made in connection therewith.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely my hon. friend left out an important word in that clause. Clause 7 (a) reads as follows:

(a) for ensuring the continued operation of the business of the company;

I agree with the minister that he may ensure the operation of the business of the company but the significant phrase is the continued operation of the business of the company.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is correct in that respect. By virtue of that provision and, as I say, the provision of clause 7 (b), any such proposal, it seems to me, would have to be reviewed before any action was taken thereunder.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister is now in a position to answer my question?

Mr. Fulton: With respect to the question asked earlier by the hon. member for Skeena, he is correct in his reference to section 107 of the Criminal Code as being a general penalty clause but with respect to the position of corporations under that section I would refer him to section 623 of the Criminal Code which provides in effect that although you cannot put a corporation in jail you can substitute for a jail sentence a fine imposed against a corporation.

Mr. Howard: Can the minister tell me what the amount of the fine is to save me looking it up?

Mr. Fulton: There is no limit provided by the section; it is in the discretion of the court.

Mr. Howard: In that light, Mr. Chairman, if I have it correct, section 107 would provide for a jail term of a period of two years. There is no provision under section 107 for the court varying the length of the sentence?

Mr. Fulton: Two years is a maximum sentence. It may be anything up to two years.

Mr. Howard: In conjunction with or in lieu of a jail sentence for a contravention, could a fine be imposed by the court?

Mr. Fulton: Not as I understand it against an individual, but an individual could receive a suspended sentence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are still dealing with the first clause under which there may be a general discussion. I have a number of questions on the very point that my hon. friend is making and I want to follow up the answer that the Minister of Justice has just made with regard to the continued operation of the company but I would think that at this stage we ought to be discussing the more general terms and deal with that particular point when we come to section 7, and I think my hon. friend's point would come under section 4.

Mr. Howard: I should like to deal with the question of penalties, if I may.

Mr. Fulton: With the permission of the hon. gentleman, may I make a correction. It is pointed out to me that under section 622 there is provision for a fine in lieu of a jail sentence against an individual.

Mr. Howard: If the suggestion is that we cannot deal under section 1 with the question of penalties, which is a general matter arising out of other sections of the legislation, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that this would be the most appropriate place to deal with it; for, arising out of the discussion, it might be felt wise to make some revision in the bill or have additional clauses added or changes made in the present clauses respecting penalties. I would think that this would be the more appropriate place to deal with the question of penalties than section 4 or any other specific section. I should like to proceed along that line, if I may, Mr. Chairman.

The question of penalties is a rather important one, because certainly the bill sets out that there shall be certain things done and certain things shall not be done, or people should refrain from doing them. Specifically, every employee is supposed to return to his duties. The company is to refrain from discriminating against or discharging employees by reason of their having participated in the strike, and things of that nature. I would submit that the providing for penalties under the three relative sections of the Criminal Code which the minister mentioned is certainly not in keeping with our past practice or understanding with respect to penalties arising out of contraventions of the present Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, illegal strikes and things of that kind.

With my limited knowledge of the federal labour code or the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, I would point out that there is no provision in that act for jail terms being imposed on employees who contravene the act with respect to failing to work. I am thinking particularly of this. If this bill passes and a group of employees, in concert with one another, decide to refrain from working, then they would be in contravention of the act and in all probability—this is a legal point—it would also be an illegal strike.

The other phase of it is that while the administrator is charged with the responsibility of carrying on the business of the company and assuring its continued operation, yet if the company likewise acted to prevent the employees from carrying on or working for it there would be in effect an illegal lockout. I would like to know what is the position of the company or of an employee or a group of employees who find themselves for one reason or another in an illegal strike or in an illegal lockout? Would they be subject to the penalties set out in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which provides merely for fines in the case of an employer who declares or causes a lockout contrary to the act? He is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $250 for each day the lockout exists and every person who acts on his advice, and so on. Every trade union which declares or authorizes a strike is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine of $150 for each day, and every officer or representative of a trade union which authorizes or participates, and so on, is guilty of an offence, and again a fine is imposed.

It seems to me that we would be well advised to keep the question of penalties in line with the application of penalties for similar acts under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I suggest that the providing of a penalty of a jail sentence, albeit the court may suspend it, up to a maximum of two years, is certainly not in keeping with the principle that we have adopted in contraventions of the present Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I would appreciate it very much if we could have some clarification of that. In any event, I think we would be well advised to put a further section in the bill before us now restricting penalties for contraventions of it to the penalties which are set out in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I had better outline the general position under this bill and then deal specifically with the points raised by the hon. member for Skeena. Actually, several hon. members in the course of the debate on second reading asked the question, what happens to employees who are not now in the area and what happens, for instance, to employees who formerly were working on the two ships which were sold between the time of the commencement of the strike and the present day? I would direct the committee's attention to the terms of section 4, which is the operative section here, which states, reading from line 12:

> —every employee who is now on strike shall return to the duties of his employment—

So that an employee who is no longer an employee of the company, and who is not on strike but has left and taken other employment is obviously not covered, and not bound to come back to the work which he was doing on May 16, or before May 16, when the ships were still sailing. That is the first point that should be realized. The only ones who will be obliged to go back to their employment are those who now regard themselves as and are in the position of employees of the company and who are prevented from returning to work by the fact that there is a strike in force. Those are the only people to whom this legislation will apply.

Then, in the second place, the provisions of the Criminal Code, to which I referred earlier, will apply, in so far as employees are concerned, only to those who refuse to go back to work notwithstanding the provisions of this act. Once they have gone back to work, once the operations have been resumed and the men are working again then, as I understand it, with respect to the employees, the company, and the unions as bargaining agents, the penalty provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act will apply. It is only with respect to persons, if any, who defy the provisions of legislation enacted by parliament and refuse to go back to work, or refuse to resume operations, in the case of the company, or continue to counsel men not to work, in the case of a union, that the penalty provisions of the Criminal Code to which I have referred would apply.

Let us be quite frank about this. We do not contemplate, in fact we are confident that neither men nor unions nor company will defy legislation enacted by the parliament of Canada. It is for that reason, amongst others, that we have not put a special penalty provision in this legislation. The situation is, therefore, that we are satisfied that men, unions and company will co-operate to resume operations. Once that is done, then, as I have said, the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act will apply. There will be a collective agreement in force by virtue of the legislation and if there should be any cessation of employment on the part of the men by strike action or lockout action by the company then, because there is a collective agreement in force the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act will apply.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, first of all it was not my suggestion that a special provision should be put in the bill with respect to penalties but that the penalties applicable under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act should apply under this legislation. The question of employee-employer relations is involved, with which the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act also deals, and in my opinion to provide for penalties under section 107 and the other two relevant sections of the Criminal Code in the initial instance is to make special provision with respect to infractions of this legislation. In order to make things equitable across the board and to treat this dispute as we have treated all other industrial disputes or relations between employers and employees under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in the past, I submit that the penalties under that act should apply and that we should not make the special provision of a two year jail sentence by way of penalty.

Mr. McPhillips: It is not a special provision; it is the law of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: I think what my hon. friend does not appreciate is that what we are doing here is enacting a statute to get the men back to work and to get the company to resume operations. It is only if there is defiance of the legislation that the penalty under the Criminal Code applies. I would ask my hon. friend whether he does not really agree, if there is concerted, deliberate defiance of a statute of parliament enacted to bring about the resumption of this operation that the penalty provided by the Criminal Code should apply, especially in light of the fact that once the operation is resumed, the ships are operating and the men are back at work then it is only the penalties provided by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act that will apply. It seems to me that that is a reasonable situation to provide.

Mr. Howard: I understand the minister's interpretation of the application of penalties but I shall submit that the penalties should be set out in the bill and that they should not be as severe as those under section 107 of the Criminal Code in the initial instance involving an infraction related to not doing what the legislation provides in order to get operations resumed. The minister may have in his own mind a good understanding of the definition of "employee" and whether or not an employee is or is not on strike but I would submit that the interpretation he has given does not clear up the question. Some years ago, when the O.B.U. and the industrial workers of the world were formed they attempted to establish the principle that when a group of employees went on strike it was not compatible with their theory of conducting strikes that any of the people on strike should go to work somewhere else. They attempted to establish the idea that if a person was on strike he was on strike and that was it. He walked up and down on the picket line and was not supposed to leave the picket line to try to earn income from some other source.

Since that time that attitude has changed. A number of unions now have strike funds and receive contributions from other unions with which they attempt to make relief payments to the people on strike. But they also promote the idea of as many employees as possible finding employment elsewhere during the period of the strike.

Mr. McPhillips: Take another man's job away from him.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) wants to participate in the debate in more than an interjectory fashion I suggest that he do so in a formal way by catching the eye of the chairman. I would also submit that his observations in this regard are probably no more accurate than those he made with respect to the efficiency of the employees working on these boats a few months ago. A person can be on strike and can be gainfully employed with some other company than the one against which he is on strike. Inasmuch as that situation now applies, is that person on strike or is he not? In his own mind he may say: "I am on strike against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, B.C. coast steamships but I am working somewhere else in the meantime." Many people do it.

It is a question of the attitude of the individual whether he is or is not on strike and you cannot define the attitude of the individual in a statute. I submit that there will be a great deal of difficulty in attempting to apply the provisions of clause 4. I only deal with it because the minister raised the matter but I think it may be just as well to do so now. You will have a difficult time applying the provisions of clause 4 with respect to individual employees. Some employees may find work elsewhere and some who would like to work in some other occupation may not be able to. What is the difference between the two classes of employees? Unless we spell out the definition of "employee" more clearly there will be difficulty. It can be done under clause 2 or maybe under clause 4. I do not think that matters too much but we should spell out the definition of "employee" more clearly so that it does not include individuals who consider in their own minds that they have left the employ of the company or individuals who, subsequent to the enactment of this legislation, decide that they no longer want to remain in the employ of the company. If you will spell that out clearly I think you will be in a much better position and will overcome the almost impossible task of legislating with respect to the feeling that an individual employee has when he is on strike and may be working elsewhere.

Mr. Fulton: I think the point that the hon. member has overlooked is that the bill does not override the right of the workman to quit his job. Therefore in the case of a man who no longer is working for and does not regard himself as an employee of Canadian Pacific steamships there would be no offence under this legislation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what clause 4 says.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman knows very well—

Mr. Nowlan: We are not on clause 4 yet anyway.

Mr. Fulton: —that there must be the element of intent. The man must regard himself as an employee and say, "As an employee I refuse to go back to work because I am not satisfied with the wages or other conditions". But if a man says, "I am not working for the C.P.R. any more, I am working for a lumber company" or "I am travelling to the interior of British Columbia", then he is not an employee who is on strike, and the matter is just as simple as that.

This does not say that no one can leave his employment with the Canadian Pacific. A man can say, I do not want to work for the Canadian Pacific any longer; I am not an employee of the Canadian Pacific Railway coast steamships.

What this is designed to accomplish is that no employee or group of employees can say to themselves or to their fellows, "We will continue the strike against the Canadian Pacific boats, notwithstanding the provisions of this legislation". It does not prevent any employee from resigning from his employment with the steamship company.

Mr. Crestohl: He is bound by a contract.

Mr. Howard: I will accept the explanation and interpretation given by the minister at this time, but I still submit it is fraught with difficulties and the intent of the bill could easily be overcome.

Mr. Pearson: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Skeena is a real one, but perhaps we will be able to return to it when we reach clause 4 of the bill. I should like at this time to raise a point which I think cannot be raised except under clause 1 of the bill which we are discussing now. My point is one which was mentioned by more than one speaker this afternoon. It is the fact that there is no limitation of any kind in this bill in respect of time. There is no date set when this legislation could come to an end. Under this bill the process of collective bargaining can go on indefinitely or not go on at all. As I understand it, under the bill, the government can intervene in that process at any time it sees fit. There is no limitation of any kind in respect of that power of the government.

Hon. members will recall that in the 1950 bill provision was made by which, after a certain length of time—I think it was 30 days—if agreement had not been reached other steps had to be taken. When those steps were taken—as it happened under the legislation they were never required—

Mr. Fulton: They were taken.

Mr. Pearson: Not steps in respect of compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Fulton: An arbitrator was appointed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The parties agreed to the recommendation.

Mr. Pearson: In any event, the point remains that after a certain length of time action had to be taken under another clause of the bill. There is no provision of that kind in this legislation.

Mr. Starr: May I just set the record straight in respect of that point. In 1950 Mr. Justice Kellock was appointed arbitrator under the Maintenance of Railway Operations Act, section 5, and the date was October 17, 1950. He handed down his award under date of December 8, 1950 and the terms of his award were incorporated in the collective agreement between the railway companies and the union.

Mr. Pearson: There was agreement reached under the act before the expiration of the date after which compulsory arbitration had to be undertaken; that is the point I was making.

Mr. Fulton: The record does not agree with that because 30 days had gone by. The bill was enacted on August 30, 1950; the arbitrator was appointed on October 17, 1950, one month and 17 days later. I do not know all the facts because my hon. friend and his friends were in power at that time but it is my recollection, and the record seems to bear it out, that the compulsory features had to be resorted to because of the time limit that the government of the day had written into the bill.

Mr. Pearson: We will be able to give our version of the record in due course. The fact remains that in that bill there was a time limit after which action had to be taken. When that action was taken, the effectiveness of the bill lapsed, as did the powers of the government under the bill. There is no such limitation of that kind in this bill. As I have said, the process of collective bargaining can go on and on or not go on, and at any time in the indefinite future the government, by order in council, can take the power which is laid down in this legislation.

We think, and my hon. friends opposite ought to appreciate the importance of this argument in view of what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out this afternoon, in arguing that there should be such a limitation in this bill. I am not now concerned with the arguments, pro and con, that there ought to be a limitation on the time within which collective bargaining should be exhausted. But I do think there should be a time limit upon the bill itself. It seems to me, and my friends will tell me if I am wrong in this, the only way that this can be done is by the addition of a clause at the end of the bill which would provide that the act would expire at a certain time unless action were taken to keep it alive.

When we come to that time, Mr. Chairman, and I suppose it will be at the end of our consideration of the clauses, we think that this sort of clause should be inserted in the bill. I am merely suggesting this to the government for any action which they might see fit to take, and if they do not see fit to take any such action we will, ourselves, submit an amendment at the appropriate time to the effect that the bill shall expire no later than the fifteenth sitting day of the next parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to make one or two brief general observations, as I have not thus far participated in this debate. I agree, of course, with what the Leader of the Opposition has just said that in a matter of this importance, in order to preserve the freedom which is implicit in the principle of collective bargaining, there must be some limit, otherwise that freedom is not guaranteed.

Now, all of us in this house are confronted with a fait accompli presented by the administration. I must say, speaking for myself, I have had some difficulty with the position I took before six o'clock in registering my vote on this matter. I was influenced by the fact that the members in this house from British Columbia, particularly those who sit to my immediate right, thought that the statement of facts as presented by the government warranted their support. I do not know what is the situation in British Columbia. All I have is the statement made by the Minister of Labour, in whom I have great confidence, that the situation is one which, to use the ambiguous phrase of the Prime Minister, comes within the ambit of public security and the rights of others, but what I would prefer to regard in the light of the phrase used by the Minister of Justice, involves the public interest.

This situation is not unique. This kind of situation has arisen before within fairly recent times and the government did not bring forward the unusual legislation that is now before the house. When we were in power in 1955, I believe, there was a strike involving the Princess Helene which operates between Digby, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. This situation resulted in a considerable amount of dissatisfaction and provided great inconvenience for the population of the area. No steps were taken such as those now proposed by the present administration.

But the government of the day has a responsibility and in the light of its responsibility it says to us "This is the situation; this particular procedure must be followed in the national interest". I think a member would be bold who disregarded the implications of that statement by the government. But as the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, it is one thing to be confronted with a particular situation and it is another thing to ask why that situation had to arise at all. My leader charged that the government had been dilatory in allowing this situation to eventuate; and because it has happened, we in this parliament are confronted with the necessity of taking the unusual step that is proposed. Was the government dilatory?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice says no. I am going to deal with his visit to British Columbia in a few moments, a visit that might have some bearing on this point. What about the negotiations that took 65 days? Could they have been firmed up if the government had taken steps consistent with those now proposed? In any event we learned from the press on June 21:

> There are unconfirmed reports that, as a result of on-the-spot observations made by two members of the cabinet, the government may act and appoint a controller to run the C.P.R. ferry service between the island and Vancouver.

Then we know that on the next day or rather on July 23 from reports appearing in the local papers,—this one appeared in the Ottawa Citizen—the government was being spurred on by rebellious B.C. Tories and that it was still expected that there would be some delay in announcement of government policy but that a statement setting out the government's position would be made on July 23. Then it was indicated in this same newspaper story that opposition to the idea had developed within the cabinet itself:

It is not believed that the chief complaint is with the principle of seizing the fleet, a course advocated by the Conservatives in the 1950 C.P.R. railway strike, but with the terms under which the striking seamen will be ordered back to their jobs.

Then the story continues:

While cabinet thrashes out the problem, west coast M.P.'s are continuing to apply pressure. A delegation of four confronted Prime Minister Diefenbaker Tuesday afternoon demanding action to end the nine-week tie-up.

It was the second outburst from impatient British Columbia Conservatives. At a party caucus last week several joined in a noisy criticism of the government's inability to reach a decision.

Are these the facts? Is it a fact that members from British Columbia sitting on the opposite side who were close to the situation felt that the government last week and earlier should have taken steps suggested by them that are now being adopted by the government? If that is the case, then certainly the charge made by the Leader of the Opposition is well based. This government yesterday indicated the unusual course it proposed to follow. Did the government at that time have the bill ready?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says yes.

Mr. Fulton: You obtained it last night.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We obtained it last night but I suggest to this house that when the Prime Minister spoke yesterday morning it would seem—

Mr. Fulton: He spoke in the afternoon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Fulton: Don't be confused.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When he spoke yesterday afternoon it would seem that the government's law officers had not yet prepared the bill that is now before the house. We received the bill for the first time at ten o'clock this morning.

Mr. Fulton: Wrong as usual.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says wrong as usual. If that is the case, why was a mimeographed copy given only to the Leader of the Opposition late last night?

Mr. Fulton: That is all that was asked for.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us not be mistaken about what is happening in this measure. It is all very well to suggest that this particular situation can only be corrected in this way. It may be that that is the situation at the moment as a result of allowing some 65 days or 68 days to pass without any action being taken by the government as a whole.

Mr. Starr: That is not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By the government as a whole, except through the Minister of Labour and more particularly through Mr. Taylor who was his commissioner in the matter. But compare this situation with the situation that confronted the government of Canada in 1950 when the prime minister of that day was, to the knowledge of every man in this house and of the country, engaged every minute for many days in continuous negotiations with both management and labour, so much so that when he announced the settlement of the strike the representatives of the union paid the then prime minister of this country a most unusual tribute when they referred to his ceaseless efforts, efforts which alone they said were responsible for the advantage which they had achieved. Compare that situation with the situation involved in this matter. The Prime Minister's only known participation was the announcement yesterday that the government proposed to bring forward or to carry out this unusual procedure. There was no indication of real effort being made day in and day out to avoid the necessity of coming to parliament and asking for unusual powers, powers which the present Prime Minister and others criticized with such great vigour in 1950. They said that freedom had been denied and that the lights of freedom had gone out as a result of the policies of the previous administration. As recorded at page 73 of Hansard of August 30 of that year the Prime Minister said:

That was and is our attitude. No one had objection to paragraphs 1 and 2, and to the noble preamble. What is being done in this section of the bill is what we take our objection to, namely the granting of uncontrolled and untrammelled power to one person to determine decisions in trade union matters and to change the provisions for settlement of labour disputes that have existed for over seventy years.

I believe that if the debates that have taken place on this bill lead to the setting up in parliament of a committee to re-examine and restate the principles of collective bargaining, much good will result in labour relations. Evolution makes change necessary.

But let there be no mistake that what we are doing here is granting uncontrolled and untrammelled power to one person. This bill is a bill that gives untrammelled power to one person and it is introduced by a government headed by one right hon. gentleman who used this argument as a mighty weapon against the former administration. This is one more example of chickens coming home to roost. This is one further example of the Prime Minister's being forced to eat his own words, of finding that when in office there is not the same freedom and the same luxury which he enjoyed for such a long time in the opposition.

An hon. Member: Careful; the Prime Minister may be listening.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says that the Prime Minister may be listening. If he is listening, he will shortly come into the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Incidentally, why is he not here?

Mr. Starr: You were not here when the vote was taken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If those words of the Prime Minister in 1950 were valid in respect of the legislation then offered, what about the legislation that is now proposed?

An hon. Member: Would you agree that they were not valid then?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the light of the situation of that time with a national disaster confronting the country I felt that the government had no other course open to it in spite of the exhaustive efforts by the government of that day, including the prime minister, to bring about a settlement between the parties. We have had no evidence whatsoever here of those efforts being carried on by anyone other than by the Minister of Labour in the limited way indicated by him.

Mr. Starr: To the fullest extent. Not limited in any way at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister corrects me. Now what I am seeking to establish is that these words of the right hon. gentleman that were quoted all over this country and used by him at Rotary clubs, Canadian clubs and political platforms to demonstrate his love of human liberty, now confront him tonight, and he should be the first to acknowledge that there are situations which would cause him to revise those statements made in 1950, particularly in respect of a measure which goes much further than the measure of 1950. That is why the Leader of the Opposition has suggested there should be a limitation of time. Otherwise, the company would be put in a position of being able to exercise over the men a form of control that would negative any assertion that there existed the right of collective bargaining for the period of the contract under the control of the administrator to be appointed under section 7 of this act.

In addition, this particular measure not only provides for an unlimited period of operation but it provides that the men shall go back to work on conditions of income return which represent the lowest recommendation made by one member of the conciliation board. My hon. friend corrects me. It is lower than that. That was not the situation with regard to the bill of 1950. With regard to the bill of 1950 the men were given an economic advantage that would encourage them and encourage the company to arrive at an agreement through the processes of collective bargaining. This does not exist in these particular circumstances because of the fact that the men will receive eight per cent instead of, at least, the middle recommendation. They will operate in circumstances that are the least generous of any of the awards made by the members of the board of conciliation.

And so, as we deal with this unusual measure, reserving for ourselves each in the light of our own conscience what our attitude will be towards some of these clauses, let there be no mistake about it—this government which criticized the previous administration so much for the course that it took has placed itself, as a result of its own dilatoriness, in a position where it has had to take a course similar in principle.

Mr. Fulton: We have just seen the traps into which simulated indignation can lead exemplified in the speech of the hon. member for Essex East. He has, on the one hand, attempted to suggest that this government should be condemned for doing, as he alleges, what his government did in 1950 while on the other hand he says we should be condemned because we are not doing it fast enough. He says we are putting this provision for compulsory arbitration in the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I never mentioned the words "compulsory arbitration".

Mr. Fulton: No, the hon. gentleman did not have the courage, because he does not like to be reminded of what they did in 1950 and what we have scrupulously avoided doing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Wait till we come to section 7.

Mr. Fulton: But the hon. gentleman tried to make out that we are doing it and says that we should be condemned for doing it, and then he says: why do you not hurry up and do it, why do you not have a timetable and do it even faster.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You have missed the point.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman is trapped coming and going and he is not even sure of the direction he is going in and he does not know what direction he would like us to go in either.

We are quite clear in our minds and intentions as to what we are doing, and we are clear that it is in the interests of the country and in the interest of the parties to the dispute. Let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite when they talk of the great courage they showed and the celerity with which they acted with regard to the railway strike of 1950, when they imposed compulsory arbitration with a time limit of one month, that there was another strike more comparable with the present one—a strike of the SS Princess Helene in the maritimes,—in which case they allowed the strike to go on for three months and did nothing.

Let hon. members opposite complain because we are doing something here tonight.

I was not quite sure, when I heard the hon. member for Essex East at the opening of his remarks, whether he was complaining because we had failed to act soon enough or because we had heeded and paid attention to the pleas of the people and to the pleas of hon. members from British Columbia. The committee will remember that he quoted with obvious relish a newspaper report about pressure being applied by what he called "rebellious British Columbia Tories". I am not surprised that he found that extraordinary, because there was never a Grit member on the backbenches, or a private member on that side who dared to rise in his place—

Mr. Pickersgill: Not many of them have risen over there.

Mr. Fulton: I see the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is back in the committee having avoided voting on the bill.

We are glad that we have members who make their views known in the house and outside the house and in the caucus and that our members dare to raise their voices in caucus. We do not have a C. D. Howe running our caucus, and certainly we have listened to the views of hon. members from British Columbia, as we have paid regard to the interest of the people of British Columbia. What we are doing here is quite clear; we are providing that there shall be a resumption of operations; that the company's service shall be continued and that the men shall go back to work. Then we are providing for a principle in which we believe, and that is a resumption of negotiations looking to a settlement by the processes of free collective bargaining, and when hon. members opposite suggest we should be ashamed of having waited for 68 days, that is evidence of the difference between our party and their party when it was in power.

We believe in the processes of collective bargaining; they believe that governments should step in, and apply compulsion immediately, and they are trying to persuade us to do that. And then they believe that, having stepped in, governments should put a gun to the heads of the parties and say: you have a time limit within which to negotiate. Not only do they want to see in this bill the principle of compulsory arbitration, applied to the settlement of disputes, but they want a time bomb put in with the short limit of 30 days. That is what they did in 1950.

What they did in 1950 and what they want us to do today is to come to a situation in which the parties have negotiated for weeks and months and find themselves in fundamental disagreement, and then to say, "Now, you get back to work and negotiate and if you do not find a solution within 30 days then your negotiations are going to be blown sky high", so that violence will have been done to the principle of free collective bargaining.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. Is he not aware of the fact that it was his own colleague from British Columbia, the Minister of Public Works, who suggested the period of 30 days?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on that point may I point out that the former prime minister suggested 15 days and I suggested that it should be at least 30.

Mr. Fulton: In other words, Mr. Chairman, then as now, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was twice as good as any of our friends opposite.

That, sir, is a short summary of the situation. My hon. friends opposite still believe in the principle of compulsion and they want it applied now. In fact, they wanted it applied yesterday. They say we should not have waited as long as we did, that we should have applied compulsion before. We have brought in the bill and they say, "Don't give the parties any time".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: Another question?

Canadian Pacific Steamships

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend said that we have urged compulsion at this time and he keeps repeating that. My hon. friend knows he has said something that has not been urged by any hon. member on this side of the house.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, from the Leader of the Opposition down to the hon. member for Essex East, those on that side of the house have said, "Apply compulsion and apply it tomorrow. Write a time limit into the bill". In effect they have said we should have done it as soon as the strike was called.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Harkness: You were not in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was absent only when the Prime Minister was wasting the time of the house by an unnecessary vote.

Mr. Fulton: We do not operate in that way, Mr. Chairman. We have introduced a bill based on the principles I have outlined, namely that the people of British Columbia should continue to be served by getting these steamships back into operation, and that the parties should now be required to resume the process of negotiations without any time limit. Because we believe in the good faith of the Canadian people and we know that these parties are Canadians just as hon. members in this house tonight are Canadians, we believe they will recognize their responsibilities and accept that what the government did today was done of necessity after giving all the time that could be given up to now; and that with this bill in effect the parties will resume negotiations through the process of collective bargaining and will be able themselves to bring about a just and equitable settlement of the dispute.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to my friend the hon. member for Essex East defending the action of the Liberal administration hither and yon with both barrels and condemning the government—although he probably did not mention it in those words—for introducing the question of imposed or compulsory arbitration. I have also listened to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice with equal relish attempting to decimate the Liberal forces and make reference to their attitude now and previously. It is one of the few occasions in my life when I find that I am in agreement with both hon. gentlemen.

However, I should point out that what these hon. gentlemen have been saying is incorrect for they both know—and my friend the hon. member for Essex East certainly should know—that the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act that was passed in 1950 contained words that definitely placed it in the category of legislation that imposes compulsory arbitration. He cannot get away from it no matter how he attempts to twist the words for in section 5 of that act the following provision appears:

> —the governor in council shall appoint an arbitrator to decide all matters not then agreed upon between them that appear to the arbitrator necessary to be decided—

Whether or not the parties agreed to this was immaterial. The governor in council was to appoint an arbitrator if the parties failed to do certain things.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not compulsion.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says that is not compulsory arbitration but I submit that it clearly is the imposition of compulsion. That is the imposition of an arbitration board upon two parties to a dispute without their agreeing to it.

There are two ways in which you can obtain arbitration in labour disputes. One is for the two parties to agree to go to arbitration which has happened in the past and which, in fact, happens practically every day of the week in the interpretation of collective agreements and in the determination of whether or not a person was discharged for proper and just cause. In cases of that kind it has been mutually agreed between the parties that they should have arbitration. When arbitration is imposed on them from an outside source as it was in 1950 under the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act introduced by the former Liberal administration it is compulsory arbitration.

It is made compulsory, in the first place, that they participate in arbitration proceedings and the next logical step is that it is compulsory for them to accept what the arbitrator decides. It is the same principle as that enunciated in the bill before us, a principle with which hon. gentlemen opposite disagreed so strenuously when they were in opposition and concerning which they spoke in the last two election campaigns when they stomped up and down the country with their arms around the working class people saying, "You will never have this imposed on you in the future if you elect us".

This bill imposes compulsory arbitration because the matter must be referred to an arbitrator. I understand that subsequently this will be amended to read a board of arbitration but it is immaterial whether it is an individual arbitrator or a board because it is still compulsory arbitration. The principle outlined in this bill is that outlined in the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act of 1950 and no matter how hon. gentlemen in the front benches of the Liberal party attempt to juggle the English language and no matter how hon. gentlemen in the treasury benches of the government attempt to twist the wording of this bill when referring to it, they cannot escape the fact that both parties have been guilty of introducing legislation that imposes compulsory arbitration upon parties to a dispute. This is the very principle that members of the government denounced in the last two elections and in years previous to them.

I have entered into a discussion of this matter only because it appeared that it was the intention on the part of both the supporters of the government and of the official opposition to say that this legislation and the act of 1950 to which I have referred are something that they are not. I think it would be well to put the question to the Minister of Labour point blank and ask if he agrees with compulsory arbitration or not.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I should like to revert to the question of sanctions and the omission of any reference in the bill to sanctions or penalties which were mentioned by the hon. member for Skeena. There are at least five clauses in the bill which may provoke the imposition of sanctions of some kind either for any one refusing to return to work or submit to arbitration or for refusing to obey the directives of the administrator or in the event of disobedience to the provisions of clause 9 of the bill.

The Minister of Justice quite properly explained that sanctions or punishments are imposable under section 107 of the Criminal Code and he relies on that section for imposing punishments for disobedience or the violation of any sections of the proposed act. I do not think it is the intention of the Minister of Justice or of the government to be as severe as the act allows in the imposition of punishments upon an employee who refuses to go back to work or who disobeys an order issued by the administrator because the punishment under section 107 of the Criminal Code is very severe, in my judgment. That section provides for the imposition of a penalty of two years imprisonment without the choice of another form of punishment.

The minister also referred to section 622 of the Criminal Code, which might provide for a money penalty in lieu of imprisonment. If he will read section 622 I think he will find that that is not a fact. Under that section you cannot impose a money penalty in lieu of imprisonment.

Section 107 of the Criminal Code, following the application of law, says very clearly, or the judgments say, that the provisions of section 107 do not apply where the statute itself provides a penalty and a mode of punishment. The legislation now before us makes no reference to and provides for no mode of punishment whatsoever; consequently, in any penalty or punishment that was imposed we would have to fall back upon section 107 of the Criminal Code, and I do not think that that is the intention of the government.

I think the hon. member for Skeena did make a practical suggestion to remedy the situation. Perhaps the bill could be amended to say that in so far as a breach of any of the provisions of this legislation are concerned the punishment should be punishment similar to that which is contained in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, or some similar reference. I respectfully submit to the Minister of Justice that under good law, and in the application of the principle of law he should indicate in legislation of this kind the mode of punishment. If it does not say it directly, it should refer to some other statute which is similar in spirit and circumstances, and make the practice accordingly. I think that would certainly solve the question of the imposition of sanctions which I respectfully submit should be contained in the bill itself.

Mr. Fulton: I think I can only answer the hon. gentleman along the same lines as I answered the hon. member for Skeena, namely that this is not—if you like to call it that—a continuing statute which is liable to be the subject of continuing contravention in which you provide a scale of penalties. When enacted this will be a piece of legislation by which parliament directs a certain course to be followed in a certain set of circumstances. Therefore, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman himself, on reflection, would agree that where there is a wilful defiance of a statute enacted by parliament to deal with a specific set of circumstances the penalties made applicable by the Criminal Code should be allowed their normal operation. And, as I have pointed out, once there is a compliance with the direction of parliament—not of the government but of parliament—once there is compliance with that and there is a resumption of operation and return to work, then the penalties for infraction of this statute do not apply but the penalties provided by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act will apply, because operations are in process and work is in progress and there has been compliance with this statute. Those penalties will, therefore, no longer be applicable.

I do point out, however, that section 107 creates a penalty for which there is a maximum sentence, not a minimum and, therefore, under the provisions of section 622, there is the alternative of a fine and in both of those provisions it is in the discretion of the court, having regard to the nature of the offence, the state of mind of the accused and all the surrounding circumstances, to impose the appropriate penalty up to the maximum and only the maximum which is provided by the code.

Mr. Crestohl: I respectfully disagree with the minister. I am simply observing that section 622 does not provide an alternative. It might provide an alternative where there is an additional form of punishment, an additional punishment to the imprisonment imposed. There is an alternative on the second level of punishment but not on the original.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3.—Administrator.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, on second reading I asked the Minister of Labour whether he could indicate the name of the administrator and he indicated that he would do it on the passage of the bill. I do not know whether he meant second reading or the passage of the bill by both houses of parliament.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I meant that when the bill is passed by both houses of parliament then we will announce the appointment of the administrator.

Mr. Howard: Has the government someone definitely in mind and has that person accepted?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why the secrecy?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is right that we should announce the administrator when parliament has not even passed the bill.

Mr. Howard: According to a subsequent portion of this section of the bill the administrator is to be an agent of the company. Will he be paid and employed by the company or will the crown enter into any financial arrangement with respect to his remuneration as administrator?

Mr. Fulton: If I might answer that, I think the appointment of the administrator is provided for in the section which we are now discussing, not by a later section, but by subsection 2 of the present clause.

Mr. Howard: I said a subsequent portion.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry. Subsection 2 provides that he will operate as the agent of the company and he will therefore not be paid, as I understand it, by the company but he will be—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He will not be paid by the company?

Mr. Fulton: He will not be paid by the company in accordance with the present intention. For the purposes of the operation he will be carrying on as the agent of the company.

Mr. Chevrier: And paid by whom?

Mr. Howard: By whom will he be paid, if anybody?

Mr. Fulton: If he is not paid by the company, surely the hon. gentleman can draw his own conclusions as to who will pay him. I do not want, by a sort of question and answer process, to open the door to a process of elimination as to who the administrator will be, but I think I can say that the present intention is to appoint somebody who is in the government service at the present time.

Mr. Caron: Will he be a government employee? The question is important, sir. If the man is paid by the company and acts for the company, then he is responsible only to the company.

Mr. Fulton: I have just said the man will not be paid by the company.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask for some enlightenment with reference to the second part of subsection 2 of section 3 which reads:

> —except that the company does not have any right to control the business of the company—

Will the administrator have the power to prevent the sale of additional ships?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would say that under the terms of the statute he would have the power to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask another question? As to the employees who are on the ships which have been sold, what is their position and how is it covered in this section?

Mr. Fulton: My answer is that they would no longer be employees of the C.P.R., no longer employees of the company.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said that the agent would have the power to prevent the sale of the ships. The important question is, as the agent is responsible to the governor in council, what is the policy of the government with regard to that? Will the government permit the sale of the ships?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is asking me a question based on a hypothesis. We have discussed these matters with the company and, as I said last night, I have no knowledge of any present intention on the part of the company to sell their ships so the question does not arise.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it surely does in this way, that the company under the bill will have no right to control its business. That will be done by an administrator appointed by the government and subject to any instructions he may receive from the governor in council. Therefore if the company finds that it is operating this service at a great loss it has no control over its business and would not be able to take steps to reduce that loss by disposing of ships or in any other way without the approval of the administrator and, presumably, without the approval of the governor in council which gives instructions to the administrator. Therefore it is not the company now but the governor in council which will decide the operating policy of this shipping company under the administrator.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know whether I would go quite as far as to say that we will decide the operating policy of the company under the administrator. The intention is quite naturally that the day to day physical operation of the ships will be carried on by the company. There is no intention of putting in an administrator who will interfere and make radical changes with respect to the operation of the ships. He will not be qualified to do that. He will not have the staff to do it.

As to what would happen in the event of the eventualities arising to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred, I do not think it is possible or sensible for us to attempt to answer at this time because it will depend upon the circumstances in existence at that time. The purpose of the bill is to cause the resumption of operations and the hope and expectation is that the dispute will be settled within a reasonable time and a new collective agreement brought into force at which time, of course, the administrator will immediately be withdrawn.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this is undoubtedly one of the most important features of the measure. The minister has said that the agent will be able to prevent the sale of the ships. He expanded on that in his answer to the Leader of the Opposition. We in this house are about to take the very important step of imposing upon both management and labour unusual obligations in the matter of labour negotiations. The company has already disposed of two ships. The men are going back to work on the basis of an increase of eight per cent in the rate of wages established by or pursuant to the agreement. That represents the lowest recommendation made by one member of the board.

If there is any danger of these ships being disposed of, we should know that now. The minister said that at the present time he did not know of any intention but the government should go further. The government should say that as long as men are subjected to this particular form of imposition they shall not be prejudiced by having the rug pulled out from under them by the sale of the ships which might be approved of by the administrator and, pursuant to the regulations envisaged in clause 7, by the governor in council. There should be an unequivocal statement by the government on the matter of the disposition of the ships.

Mr. Fulton: I think that the short and simple answer to that very bold and brave statement by my hon. friend is, did his government ever make a statement as to whether or not they would prevent the C.P.R. selling their ships when they were in power? The answer I have given already is the obvious answer to the situation and the only one that can be given. When and if circumstances arise in which it comes to our knowledge that the company wishes to pursue a certain course of action with regard to the ships, the course of action of the government and of the administrator will have to be determined at that time. It is not possible nor would it be sensible to attempt to write into the statute at this time a course of action which would govern for an indeterminate period because I might point out to the hon. gentleman that if in fact there were no strike, if this situation had not arisen, neither we nor he could stop the C.P.R. from selling its ships.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a different situation.

Mr. Pearson: In reply to what my hon. friend has just said, perhaps he should be reminded that when we were in power the cabinet never ran a shipping company but under this clause this shipping company will now be run, not by a crown company, not by the company itself, not by an administrator but by an administrator getting his instructions from the cabinet. Under those instructions he can do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company. We now have, and I think it must be the first time in history, a government directly operating a shipping company through an administrator, and that is why we are so very interested in the policy of the government in this regard.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman is not quite right. In fact, he is far from right. There were three occasions when the previous government appointed a controller as they called him, not an administrator. They appointed one to run shipping on the great lakes, and I doubt very much, if they had been pressed—

Mr. Pearson: That was in wartime.

Mr. Fulton: —as to what they would have done if one of the companies had come along and said that it wanted to sell its ships that they would have said anything other than what I am saying now, that if and when that eventuality arises, which is not likely, we will make up our minds as to what is the proper course to pursue.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the minister tell us whether the controller to whom he has just referred also carried the title of agent of some company because here you have a paradox?

Mr. Fulton: I have not got the orders in council here although I have read them, but as I recall it he was given even greater powers than we have given the administrator because he was given all the powers of the board of directors of the company.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said two very contradictory things. He said earlier when we were talking about a time limit that he anticipated that the parties would bargain in good faith and that the statute would be in operation for a very short time. A few moments ago he talked about it lasting for an indeterminate time and said that it was therefore impossible for the government to say what it would do about these ships during that indeterminate time. The government should decide which of these two positions it is going to take in defending this bill. If the minister is right that it is only going to be a matter of a few weeks or a few months before the act is spent, then surely it is not unreasonable for the government to give us an undertaking that these ships will not be sold during that period. I say that, Mr. Chairman, because we should realize what we are being asked to do here. We are being asked to compel men to go back to work on these ships at a wage fixed by the government, at a wage that cannot be changed. Parliament is being asked to compel these men to go to work and to leave it to the governor in council to decide some day that the company can sell its ships, in which case the men will have no jobs. This is what we are being asked to do. It is a most arbitrary thing. The minister said that it was parliament that was going to direct this operation, not the government.

Mr. Fulton: I said that parliament is going to direct the resumption of operations.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly. In other words, parliament is being asked to approve a bill which will have the effect of compelling men to go to work and compelling them to go to work at a wage fixed by the government.

An hon. Member: You told us that before.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is worth repeating a good many times because, as I said earlier, this is much worse compulsion than any other form of compulsion in this legislation.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend obviously has not read the legislation of 1950 when there was a rate of wages fixed.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would listen instead of being so anxious to interject, as he always is, he would have perceived that I was talking about this bill and not any other. I was saying that the compulsory feature in the bill that I find most objectionable is not even the suggestion that there may be arbitration at some future date. What I find most objectionable is that we are being asked, and I admit I agreed to go along with it, to compel a group of men to go to work and remain at work at a fixed wage. That is what we are being asked to do and it is a pretty grave thing to be doing. That is what we are asked to do, yet the government will not tell us whether they might one day allow the Canadian Pacific to sell the ships out from under these men and leave them without jobs.

It does seems to me that this legislation is so extraordinary, and what parliament is being asked to do is so unusual—the kind of thing we want to do as rarely as possible—that the government should tell us they will not permit any of these ships to be sold for the duration of this act, or if they believe circumstances have arisen whereby, in the public interest, the ships should be sold, the government will report the proposed transaction to parliament before it is carried out. It does not seem to me that is an unreasonable proposition to make. The inference was left with us that the resumption of this service was in the national interest. If the resumption of this service is in the national interest, surely parliament is entitled to know what the service is going to be, how many ships there are going to be. Is it in the national interest to have all these ships operate today? Is it going to be in the national interest to do something else in October when, presumably, parliament will not be sitting?

We are not suggesting, at least I am not suggesting that the government change the bill. I am quite willing to have the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister get up and say, we will not allow the administrator to sell these ships while this bill is in force without coming to parliament. I would accept that at once, and sit down. However, I think we ought to be told.

Mr. Starr: May I answer in part what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said about this bill forcing men to go to work at a fixed rate. May I bring to his attention the provisions of the act of 1950 which compelled employees to go back and resume operations. Section 3 of that act reads:

> The terms of each collective agreement to which this act applies are provisionally amended forthwith by increasing by four cents per hour each rate of wages established by or pursuant to the agreement.

Nowhere in that act was there any guarantee that the railways would not be sold or the assets sold.

Mr. Pearson: What about answering the question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, the fact that the minister produces the act of 1950 and says we asked men to go back to work at a fixed wage—I admit that right away; it was disagreeable then, and it is disagreeable now.

Mr. Fulton: You said this was the only time it was done.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I said it was a most unusual thing that was being done in this bill. I think if the hon. gentleman will examine the record he will find I said it was the most objectionable form of compulsion in this bill. I still maintain it is, just as the similar act in 1950 contained this most objectionable part which none of us liked. I am not saying that doing it this time is any worse than it was in 1950. I am saying it is a very disagreeable thing to do at any time, and I do not think any of us are taking any satisfaction or any pleasure out of it.

I do say that when we resumed railway operations in 1950 we knew we were resuming the operations of all the railways in Canada. Here we are being asked to resume a service but the government will not tell us whether that service is going to be unchanged or whether some alteration is going to be made in it. It seems to me, if this is going to be a matter, as the government believes, of a few months they would save everyone's time if they would meet this request.

Mr. Fulton: I can say that while this bill is in force it is not our expectation that the ships will be sold, and they will not be sold without the governor in council knowing about it and having approved. As every member knows, this service is subject to seasonal variations, and in the wintertime some of the ships are laid up. It is, therefore, not possible to write into this statute all the details of the manner in which the service will be conducted. It may well be that the Canadian Pacific will find, and will be able to convince the government or would be able to convince any reasonable person, that they can carry on this service just as efficiently in the wintertime with one ship less. We do not know.

If they did this, then it seems to me, as I say, one would have to take account of all the circumstances existing. It is impractical and it would be, as I see it, reckless to say in advance or to tie the hands of the government and the administrator in advance as to what course will be followed because no one can know at this time with what circumstances the administrator may be confronted. It is for that reason, or that is one of the reasons, the government is given the power to regulate the conduct of the administrator in this business, not because the government intends to regulate the day-to-day operations of the business, but the governor in council does have a residual right to review, and refuse or confirm any radical or important departure from normal operations.

I know very well that if my hon. friend thinks the matter over for a moment he will realize he is trying to make a debating point; that it is not a point which any practical administration would see written into a bill or on which they would be prepared or able to give a hard and fast undertaking in advance.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to pursue the matter further, but I want to make it quite clear that I am unconvinced.

Mr. Fulton: We are all devastated.

Mr. Starr: I know that what I am about to say will not convince the hon. gentleman, but I do want to bring to his attention that this is not a controversial rate that we have established, that is the eight per cent. Approximately 58 per cent of the present personnel engaged in this operation, represented by the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, have signed a collective agreement for an eight per cent increase. This was signed in the early part of June.

In drafting this bill we felt that we could not, in all fairness, ask the men represented by the other unions to return to work at anything less than the rate agreed to by the majority of the personnel engaged in this operation.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Administrator to resume business.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question with reference to the last part of clause 4. It has to do with the obligation of the men to return to work. Following the dispute of 1950 there was one question which was uppermost in the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side, and I should like to ask it in this case. If the men do not return to work, what will happen to their pension rights? I ask this same question with reference to the latter part of this clause, what will happen to the pension rights of these employees if they should not return to work?

Mr. Starr: I am advised, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot make a provision for pensions in this case because they are subject to an agreement between the employer and the employee. If the employee chooses to leave the employment of a particular employer, then of course he forfeits his right of pension, if it is an agreed pension plan.

Mr. Chevrier: He loses his pension if he does not return to work?

Mr. Starr: No, it depends on the terms of the pension plan.

Mr. Howard: I have one question to ask with respect to paragraph 2 of clause 4. I am sure one could debate the principle enunciated by the minister in establishing the rate at eight per cent. He could equally well argue for the 17 per cent which was recommended.

Mr. Starr: No, one was contained in a collective agreement and the other was a recommendation of one party on the conciliation board.

Mr. Howard: One could argue that if the 17 per cent were not acceptable then the 12 per cent originally recommended with respect to the first year's operation might apply. However, I do not intend to get involved in that. I do not believe, in view of all the circumstances with which I am familiar with respect to the conduct of negotiations, that the eight per cent is fair or justifiable. But I would ask this question. As I read subsection 2 it states:

(2) The terms of each existing collective agreement are provisionally amended forthwith on the commencement of this act by increasing by eight per cent each rate of wages established by or pursuant to the agreement.

I am not sure what wage rate is in effect with respect to each one of these operations or with respect to each of the categories. But I know that it is a common practice in many operations to set out according to the terms of the collective agreement—as this one was—a certain figure or a certain rate of wages to apply for a certain job. For argument's sake, let us assume that the rate for the category of the job might be set out as being $2 an hour, and that because of the capabilities of the individual employee the company may determine that he should be paid more. In many instances it will happen that while the wage rate may be set at $2 an hour the company may pay him $2.25 or $2.50 an hour. They will pay him an extra amount over and above the wage set out in the collective agreement itself. I rather expect that if this situation exists in any one of the categories of wage rates applicable under any of these collective agreements or to any of the employees, then subsection (2) should be reworded so that the 8 per cent increase will apply not only on the rates set out in the collective agreement, if he is receiving that rate, but will apply to any additional wage rate that he is getting over and above the rate set out in the contract. Otherwise he will not be protected.

Mr. Starr: As far as we are concerned, the rates are set out in the collective agreement and those are the only rates applicable to the classifications to which we can apply this 8 per cent.

Mr. Howard: I submit that is not so. It is a common principle to follow in adjusting wages by wage increases to make those wage increases applicable on the wage rates being paid and not necessarily only on the wage rates set out in the agreement. Otherwise you could find—and this happens; attempts have been made along this line in some collective agreements—that an employer at one stage will determine that a certain employee, because of specific qualities that he may have and because of long-term service should be paid more and he may pay him 25 cents or 50 cents an hour more than the rate that is set out in the collective agreement. Unless the increase—in this case 8 per cent—is made applicable to that extra amount also, then the employee will not be getting a wage increase as are all other employees. Unless it is spelled out in there, it is going to mean that some people may get an 8 per cent wage increase and some may not.

Mr. Fulton: It is my understanding that the only thing we can look at and the only thing we can make this sort of legislation applicable to is the written collective agreement. Other matters are matters of negotiation outside the agreement. For legislation of this kind it would be improper to do anything more than to cover the written agreement that governs the over-all relationship between employees and their employers.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask this question?

Mr. Howard: On the same point, if I may, I should like to ask a question to clear this matter up.

Mr. Chevrier: Very well.

Mr. Howard: Is the minister familiar with any of the clauses of any of the three collective agreements that relates to wage increases as having applied in the past? He may find, in looking at them, that the clauses will show that the wages shall be increased by so much. In that case those wage increases applied.

Mr. Fulton: May I point out to the hon. member that the wording of the section is as follows:

(2) The terms of each existing collective agreement are provisionally amended forthwith on the commencement of this act by increasing by eight per cent each rate of wages established by or pursuant to the agreement.

If therefore there was any specific clause in the agreement that had resulted in an increase in wages those would be increases established pursuant to the agreement and they would be increased by 8 per cent. The point which I think the hon. member is trying to make is met by the wording of the section.

Mr. Howard: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Minister of Labour this question? Will the crews of the two ships that have been sold be compelled to go back to work under this section?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman; they will not be.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am rising to address an observation to the house leader. It is now one minute to ten o'clock. Obviously we are not going to be able to complete the clauses of this bill by ten o'clock. I think we must try to reconcile our responsibility at this stage to see that these clauses are given careful consideration with the desirability of getting this bill through as quickly as possible. I should like to make the suggestion to my hon. friend that perhaps we might sit after ten o'clock until this bill is completed.

Mr. Green: That course would be very satisfactory to the government, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Crestohl: A few minutes ago I think the Minister of Labour said that as recently as June a collective labour agreement was signed in which an increase of 8 per cent was given and that that is the basis of the 8 per cent that is referred to here. If such an agreement was signed in June and an 8 per cent increase will be granted as of the day of the coming into force of this bill, you are exposed to giving another 8 per cent on the 8 per cent.

Mr. Starr: I wish to refer the hon. member to schedule A in the appendix to Bill C-42, in which the agreements are set out. He will find that the ones to whom I am referring who signed the agreement are not included and the bill will not apply to them.

Mr. Caron: I think I heard the minister say tonight that if they do not want to go back to work they will be prosecuted or if they refuse to go back to work they will be prosecuted. Is that not what the minister said? If anybody on strike at the present time refuses to go back, will he be prosecuted?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I did not say what the hon. gentleman suggested I said. What I said was that if a man is no longer in the employ of the company, although he may have been an employee at the time the strike began; if he has left his job; if he has gone away; if he is working for someone else; if he is no longer an employee of the C.P.R., then he will not be subject to any penalty or any action if he does not go back to work for the C.P.R. under this bill. And as I also explained, neither will this bill have the effect of preventing a man from leaving his employment; that is to say from resigning from his job. It is only designed to prevent any man or group of men who are now employees and are on strike from refusing to go back to work because they say, "We still want to strike against the C.P.R.". That is the object of the bill and the only effect of the section.

Mr. Caron: I want to have this matter clear. If a man is on strike and refuses to go back to work, will he be prosecuted?

Mr. Fulton: If the facts in any particular case—

Mr. Caron: The question is a simple one. I think I ought to be able to get a simple answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: Of course a simple question deserves a simple answer. I am trying to give a straight-forward answer and one that will not be misleading. If the facts of a particular case establish that a man refuses to go back to work in defiance of this statute, he will be prosecuted.

Mr. Caron: Then he would be prosecuted?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Caron: Suppose he chooses not to work any longer on a steamship but is on strike. He does not work anywhere else but he has decided that he does not want to work any more on the steamship. In that case will he be prosecuted?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caron: Oh, you can laugh if you want to do so.

Mr. Grafftey: That question was answered hours ago.

Mr. Caron: Some hon. members laugh but they will not get very far. It is a clear question. If a man is still on strike but, of his own accord, as a result of deliberate action, chooses not to go back to work on the steamship, is he liable to prosecution?

Mr. Fulton: I tried to suggest previously that in those circumstances, as I say, he would not be liable to prosecution; that is, if he says. "I no longer regard myself as an employee of the C.P.R., I do not want to work for the C.P.R. any more; I want to go to work for someone else". In that case he would not be liable to prosecution under this act.

Mr. Caron: But what about the case of one who does not work anywhere else at the time but who says, "I do not feel like going back to work on the job" but who is still on strike? What about the man who simply says: I do not feel like going back to work on the ship? He is still on strike and he is a member of a union which is on strike.

Mr. Fulton: I think in the circumstances the man would, in effect, be saying "I quit", and I have never heard of a man being prosecuted because he says "I quit".

Mr. Caron: Well, it is not at all clear. Clause 2(c) says:

> "employee" means a person who is employed in the business of the company and is bound by an existing collective agreement.

The bill does not say what the minister has just told us.

Mr. Fulton: May I point out that a collective agreement does not prevent a man from resigning or leaving his employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can put the point which I apprehend the hon. member for Hull has in mind in slightly different language.

An hon. Member: Use nautical terms.

Mr. Pickersgill: The way I put it is this: is the minister quite satisfied that there is a definite status, a status of striker, that will enable those charged with the enforcement of this law to know against whom it is properly enforceable? That is what I believe the hon. member for Hull is trying to find out.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I am quite satisfied about that. I am satisfied that the courts will have no difficulty in interpreting and applying the statute if the necessity arises. I want to say again that I am satisfied the necessity will not arise, but if it does, I am confident the courts will be able to apply this statute because, as hon. members are probably aware, it would be necessary to prove that the man intended to defy the terms of this statute and, as I apprehend it, a man who says: "I am not working for the C.P.R. any more", is not liable to prosecution under this statute.

Mr. Pearson: I understand that under this clause every employee of the company who went on strike in May and who now returns to work will be given a job. There will be an obligation to see that he gets a job, and that would include, presumably the employees of the two ships that have been sold during that period.

Mr. Fulton: I would assume that those men would by now have been laid off or absorbed in another part of the service.

Mr. Pearson: But if they have not?

Mr. Fulton: I assume they are not still employees of the company. The main obligation on the company by virtue of section 9 is not to refuse to permit an employee who has gone on strike— I am leaving out some of the words—to return to the performance of the duties of his employment. If the opportunity for his employment no longer exists, it would seem to me there is no violation of the statute, by saying to the man: your job no longer exists. It is only in cases where the job still exists that the company is prohibited from refusing employment to an employee who was on strike.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely that interpretation, if correct, justifies the observation made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Here is an employee of the C.P.R. company who is out of work because the company has sold a ship on which he worked. The man still regards himself as an employee of the company although he is out of work and on strike. Now this act does impose great obligations upon the men as well as on management, and I am saying to the minister with great respect that if the interpretation that he has given is correct, then it is an unduly restrictive one so far as the men are concerned.

Mr. Fulton: I understand the situation would be the same as if a strike were not in progress and the C.P.R. had sold these ships. It would then be a question whether the men could be absorbed in alternative employment. If the ships were sold, then presumably employment for some men would cease to exist. The prohibition against the company is against refusing employment, merely because they have been on strike, if employment still exists for them.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one problem that may arise; I do not know whether it will or not, but the minister may know, and this is important. I am not sure whether these crews are really distinct or whether the men were employed sometimes on one ship and sometimes on another, and this would have a considerable bearing on the answer the minister has given us.

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid I am not in a position to give a detailed statement on that point. I understand that with regard to the deck and engineer officers there was a certain amount of rotation, although there was more permanent assignment than with regard to some of the other employees. But with regard to the seamen, particularly, there was a fairly large floating pool of employees and it would be difficult to say who was among the crew of a specific ship. I make that comment as a general observation setting out my understanding of the position.

Mr. Starr: The deck officers numbered approximately 170 and they were employed practically the year around. The S.I.U. members had a turnover of about 300 seamen but in practice there was a hard core of some 68 in the operation of the ships.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Regulations.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I will ask my colleague the Minister of Justice to move an amendment to this clause as follows:

That paragraph (d) of clause 7 be amended as follows:

1. By deleting the words "an arbitrator" where they appear in line 5 on page 3 and substituting therefor the words "a board of three arbitrators";
2. By deleting the words "the arbitrator" in line 13 on page 3 and substituting therefor the words "the board of arbitrators".

We hope the necessity of appointing arbitrators will not arise and, as I have said before, that this matter can be settled by collective bargaining between the parties concerned. However, because of the fact that if an appointment became necessary it would result in one person being vested with a great deal of power therefore we feel that in order to distribute the authority we should appoint three people and have a diversified view on this issue.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the heart of this bill is to be found in clause 7 and in the regulations to be made thereunder. While we have been discussing the implications of the various clauses, not confronted with the actual regulations we might find we have been dealing with something that is secondary in importance. I am sure the regulations have not yet been drawn up but I should like to ask what procedure the government proposes to follow so that the regulations will be made available to the house. I presume they would automatically appear in the Canada Gazette but there is no requirement in the statute to that effect. If there is a requirement that they should automatically appear in the Canada Gazette a provision should be placed in the act so that they would be tabled in this house within a certain number of days from the date of formulation. I think the usual practice in respect of most bills is ten days or something of that sort.

Mr. Fulton: I would have to check it to make certain but I believe my hon. friend will find it is all covered by the Regulations Act which provides that the regulations must be tabled in parliament within two weeks or 15 days of their passage if parliament be sitting and within a similar period after parliament next begins to sit if parliament be not then sitting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could my hon. friend advise us at the moment if that is the case?

Mr. Fulton: I am assured by the officials in front of me that it is but we are not certain of the number of days without checking.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Within 10 or 15 days of the passage of this act we will have the regulations tabled in this house?

Mr. Fulton: Within two weeks or 15 days —whatever the period may be that is stipulated in the Regulations Act—of the making of the regulations they will be tabled in the house. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will not violate the provisions of that statute.

Mr. Pickersgill: You hope.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Remember what happened to a previous minister of justice?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. We shall not do that.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have some comments to make about clause 7 (d). While the amendment proposed and adopted by the committee with respect to a board of three arbitrators was acceptable in terms of the numerical structure of the board of arbitrators nevertheless as far as we in this group are concerned one of the general provisions in clause 7 (d) is certainly not acceptable. I refer to the provision that empowers the governor in council to impose compulsory arbitration on the parties to the dispute when he may deem it expedient. There has been ample discussion about it and I do not think it necessary to repeat what has been said or to refer to attitudes that hon. gentlemen opposite had in years past which are not compatible with the attitudes they have at this particular moment.

I have an amendment to propose with respect to clause 7 (d) which I should perhaps explain first. The amendment provides for an arbitration board to consist of three as is the case with the present provision but it would also provide that the establishment of the board of arbitration would be done in the same manner as is the establishment of a board of conciliation under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. That is to say, each party to the dispute would select a member of the arbitration board. There would be a certain time limit—I believe of five days—during which these two appointees, one representing the union and one the company, would be able to decide whether they could mutually agree on the selection of a chairman of the board and if these two members could not so agree the Minister of Labour would appoint a chairman as is done in the case of a conciliation board at the present time.

The amendment would also provide that the arbitration board would have all the powers, functions and obligations of a conciliation board as stated in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It has been the experience of those engaged in labour disputes that where agreement can be reached between the two disputants in the selection of a chairman of a board of conciliation there is less disagreement following the award of the board than is the case where the chairman of the board has been appointed by an outside party. It must be kept in mind, of course, that the decision of this board is an arbitrary one but nonetheless disagreements do arise over the awards of boards. The chairman is the key person and where agreement exists as to his selection there is less likelihood of difficulties arising following the award of the board of arbitration.

The provisions of the amendment would also provide that the arbitration board be established only at the mutual request of the parties and that it not be imposed on them by the governor in council. Accordingly, I move:

That clause (d) be deleted and the following substituted therefore:

For referring to a board of arbitration of three members to be constituted and appointed in the same manner as is a board of conciliation and investigation under the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and to have all the powers, functions and obligations of a board so constituted and appointed such matters relating to the revision or amendment of an existing collective agreement as the parties thereto may request, including the fixing of the term during which the new collective agreement shall operate and the day to which the agreement or any provision thereof may be retroactive, and for giving effect to any decision by the board of arbitration upon such a reference for the purpose of this act and the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, but no regulation made under this paragraph shall be deemed to limit or restrict the rights of parties to an existing collective agreement to agree to vary or amend any of the terms thereof and to give effect thereto.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, before you put the question I wish to say this. We did give the composition of this arbitration board a great deal of thought. The suggestion of the hon. member for Skeena that we appoint an arbitration board on the same basis as a conciliation board most certainly is not applicable when you are dealing with a dispute in the arbitration stage. I say again that we have given thought to this matter and to proceed properly with this arbitration, if and when it reaches that stage, the only way we can do it is by the appointment of the three members who will compose the board. Because of that, Mr. Chairman, we must reject the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before this matter proceeds, we on this side in this group believe that this amendment should receive our support. As I indicated and as the Leader of the Opposition indicated the character of the bill is such as to impose an indefinite period of forced relationship during the period of work on both parties to the dispute. We are ordering the men back to work; we are telling the company to begin operations through the agency of the administrator. Those are unusual steps, and in view of those unusual steps which we have taken to get the ships back into operation we feel that the general circumstances of this particular situation are such as to warrant our accepting an amendment which I think will meet the situation as it will develop in the light of the indefinite period of negotiation that is enforced by section 6 on both parties to the agreement. For these reasons we shall support the amendment.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 120.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Howard: I have one other question to raise which was dealt with on second reading but I am not sure that there was an answer to it. Apparently provision was made in the act respecting the operation of the railways in 1950 to ensure that the arbitration board could not reduce the wages of the men or apply any conditions which were less favourable to the employees than those existing at the time they went back to work. I should like to know whether provision will be made to ensure that the arbitration board cannot reduce the wages of the men or apply any conditions which are less favourable to the employees than those existing under the collective agreement plus the eight per cent. Has any consideration been given to that or will consideration be given to it?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the answer to the hon. member's question is that only one union has agreed and has signed an agreement; the other three have not signed an agreement with the company; therefore it is only a provisional amendment.

Mr. Howard: I did not get clearly what the minister said. Did he say that only one union has a collective agreement and the other three have not?

Mr. Starr: That is right; only one union has signed an agreement with the company for eight per cent.

Mr. Howard: Yes, but there are three, and they are named in the bill, which have no collective agreement but upon the passage of this bill they will have, they will be working under the terms of a collective agreement, the provisions of which have been extended.

Mr. Fulton: No, provisionally amended.

Mr. Howard: By an increase of eight per cent.

Mr. Fulton: But only provisionally.

Mr. Howard: Yes, only provisionally; but it appears to me that there should be some guarantee given so that the board of arbitration in dealing with this, if it gets to that stage—incidentally, this does not apply if the board of arbitration is established by mutual consent, but it would apply if the governor in council set up the board of arbitration and in effect instituted compulsory arbitration. It does apply then and some guarantee should be given that the board of arbitration cannot reduce the wages for which the employees are working at the time nor establish conditions less favourable than the ones under which they are working plus the eight per cent. There should be some guarantee that the board of arbitration has no authority to impose less favourable conditions upon the employees than they are enjoying at the moment of arbitration.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the hon. member is asking for is something similar to section 5, subsection 3, of the act of 1950.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think the position is that a union has signed a collective agreement with the company for an increase of eight per cent and that union is not coming under the terms of this statute. Therefore, their agreement is not subject to variation or subject to the statute in any way. However, the other three unions or organizations have no agreement with the company. We felt that it would not be proper to contemplate sending men back to work at different wage rates. If we put nothing in here, then the stewards' union would go back with an eight per cent increase and all the others would go back with no increase, so we felt that for the duration of the period while the statute is in operation and while they are back to work under the statute they should all be back with the eight per cent increase.

Therefore the three unions which have not signed new collective agreements go back under their old collective agreements which are provisionally amended by an increase of eight per cent. If, however, they and the management are not able to agree on an increase then it seems that the thing should go back to the status quo, namely, where it is now. If there is no agreement as to what should be the increase in wages and negotiations proceed on that basis under the statute and if negotiation fails and arbitration becomes necessary, arbitration proceeds on that basis. It did not seem proper to us to ask parliament here and now to legislate as to what should be the terms of agreement between the parties so that when negotiation commences and if arbitration should commence the thing will be free and open to arbitration and negotiation.

Mr. Howard: I object most strenuously to that sort of reasoning. It is quite true that this legislation will have no effect upon the employees covered by the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks. They have already signed an agreement with certain provisions in it. But if the government is of the opinion, as it apparently is that when these employees go back to work they will be covered by the provisions of the agreement that applied last year plus an eight per cent increase based on the fact that another union has already signed an agreement for an eight per cent wage increase, then the government has absolutely no right in my opinion to allow an arbitration board to undercut that eight per cent. If you think that is the floor that should be established—

Mr. Fulton: No, no.

Mr. Howard: —you are attempting to impose upon these employees something that is most unjust.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me. I did not say that we had established a floor. I said that we felt that it was inequitable to have one group of men going back to work with an eight per cent increase because they had signed an agreement and another group of men in effect going back to work under a statute without any increase at all. We felt that when they went back to work under the terms of this statute all the men who went back to work should go back to work at the same wage rates. We are not writing a floor under arbitration or negotiation. Negotiation will proceed on a free and open basis and if arbitration becomes necessary it will proceed on the same basis.

Mr. Howard: Maybe mine is just the normal difficulty of the layman trying to understand the legal mind. It was not equitable for the employees to go back to work under wages and conditions that differed from those of other employees. They are all involved in the same dispute so we establish by legislation now a wage rate of what they were working for plus eight per cent. We have established that and decided that under the present circumstances that is an equitable wage rate for these employees at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: It could be much higher. We do not know. Would you want us to establish a ceiling? We are establishing neither a floor nor a ceiling.

Mr. Howard: Just a minute. We have already passed clause 4 but I should like to go back to it. It provides that the terms of each existing collective agreement are provisionally amended by increasing by eight per cent—

Mr. Fulton: Provisionally amended.

Mr. Howard: All right, but they are amended. The employees are going back to work at a wage rate of what they were getting before plus eight per cent.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Fulton: But that is not a firm term of agreement. It is a provisional term of agreement as long as the statute continues in effect.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that it is a provisional term. Maybe I am putting my thoughts in words—

Mr. Fulton: How can a provisional term be either a floor or a ceiling? If it could be a floor it could just as well be a ceiling and I am sure my hon. friend would not accept that. It is a provisional term and nothing more nor less.

Mr. Howard: All right. You are also saying, and this is acceptable, that if as a result of direct negotiations without any interference by the governor in council the unions and the company mutually agree to establish any wage rate they want that is perfectly all right, whether it is above eight per cent, below eight per cent or is eight per cent. That is entirely up to them as a result of negotiations and has nothing to do with the argument. But if the governor in council is going to step in and impose compulsory arbitration, then to be equitable I think the government should guarantee that if a board of arbitration is imposed by the government the board cannot undercut the wages established provisionally by this legislation. The government should establish the basic floor of the old wage rate plus eight per cent below which a board of arbitration cannot go.

The government has no right to establish a board of arbitration which could grant by way of an award wage rates less favourable than their brother workers are getting under a collective agreement signed by their union of its own free will. All I am asking is that if a board of arbitration is imposed by the government that board should not be allowed to arbitrate below the present provisional rate. Whether such a board will or will not is another question as is whether or not the matter will ever get to that stage, but I submit that that protection should be given if parliament is to be asked to order people back to work, restore this service, appoint an administrator and particularly to give authority to the government to impose compulsory arbitration. Surely we have a right to ask for that little modicum of protection of the wage rates of the employees of the unions affected so that they will not go below the wage rates established by collective bargaining through another union.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the hon. member for Skeena. This is what was done, of course, in 1950, and if the minister will look at the statute of 1950 he will see that section 5, subsection 3, provides "the arbitrator by his decision shall not provide for a reduction in a rate of wages established pursuant to section 3". In other words, parliament did legislate at that time—I was not here—a provisional increase in wages and said that the arbitrator could not go below that. That was written into the statute.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend forgets that at that time the company and the union had agreed on a basic four cents an hour increase. There was no area of disagreement on that point whereas here only the company and one union have agreed on the terms of the wage increase. We feel that we should write neither a floor nor a ceiling into this statute, that if it is not fair that we should write a ceiling it is not fair that we should write a floor. That is the great difference between this situation and the one to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that I cannot agree with the minister on that point and for these reasons. The company has evidently been quite willing to agree to an eight per cent increase—

Mr. Fulton: And they got an agreement as a result.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman might allow me to finish my sentence. The company signed an agreement and was therefore agreeable to an eight per cent increase in the case of one union.

Mr. Fulton: There was a settlement.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would not appear to me, therefore, that there was the slightest injustice to the company in providing this floor across the board. That is what we are doing and the government must think there is no injustice to the company or they would not be asking parliament to do it until such time as a collective agreement is reached. Therefore it seems to me that what the hon. member for Skeena has asked is perfectly reasonable. We are asking that these men, after we compel them to go back to work, should not be compelled by an arbitrator or a board of arbitration appointed by the governor in council to take a wage lower than the wage set by parliament, and that could happen under the bill as it now stands. All that the hon. member for Skeena is asking is that we should do what was done in 1950, write that in as a floor and say that the arbitrator cannot go below it. It seems to me that that is an eminently reasonable request.

Mr. Caron: Did the company not offer an increase of twelve per cent to one union?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, after signing an agreement with one union, the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, providing for an increase of eight per cent they offered the same increase to the other three unions but it was rejected by all of them.

Clause 7 as amended agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—withdrawal of strike notice

Mr. Pearson: You are now on the last clause, clause 10, Mr. Chairman. The minister will recall that at the beginning of our discussion I suggested that there should be an additional clause to deal with the question which has been brought up by so many members on this side who feel that legislation of this kind should not be unlimited as to time. Our feeling on that matter is stronger because no change has been made by the committee to clause 7 (d), and the amendment which was proposed to that clause has been voted down. I did suggest to the minister, and perhaps he will tell me now his reaction to the suggestion, that there should be a new clause to the effect that this act shall expire no later than the fifteenth sitting day of the next session of parliament.

Mr. Starr: I think the amendment would be acceptable if the hon. member would make it thirty days.

Mr. Pearson: I think that is all right; that is an additional fifteen days. I believe the fifteenth sitting day is customary in amendments of this kind. It seems to me that another fifteen days is not a very high price to pay for what I think would be a very useful amendment, and which would meet our point that we are not legislating in this unusual way for an unlimited period of time.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would move:

That the following be added as a new clause:

11. This act shall expire no later than the thirtieth sitting day of the next session of parliament.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

Schedule B agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time? Now, by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader could tell us what is proposed for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall take the debate on external affairs, which is a one-day debate by agreement. On Saturday, we shall take estimates, commencing with the Post Office Department, then take veterans affairs and if they go through we shall take the Department of Justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it intended that Monday should be private members' day?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the house is prepared to give unanimous consent that a vote be taken tomorrow at ten o'clock. Is that so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

It being 10.48 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Fourth report of standing committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Dinsdale.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, in English and in French, the report of the royal commission on Newfoundland finances. I wish to say that in the union of two states there are always many factors that require settlement and many divergent views have to be reconciled. Members of this house will recall the prolonged negotiations leading up to Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada on March 31, 1949.

It is not surprising that agreement was not readily reached. Although every effort was made to provide definitive terms for the entry of Newfoundland into the federation of Canada, it was found necessary to introduce a saving clause among the financial conditions. It was with respect to this reserve or saving clause, paragraph 29 of the terms of union, that the royal commission was concerned. The requirement that the financial results of union be examined within eight years by a federal royal commission was unique in the constitutional history of Canada. It is true that extensive studies have been conducted from time to time and adjustments made, in some cases, but in no other instance has there been a mandatory clause. The mandatory clause read as follows: The commission required to be appointed was——to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

After full consideration of the terms of reference, the commissioners have concluded that the burden of taxation in the province of Newfoundland does not differ materially from that in the maritime provinces. It is their opinion, after studying the course of provincial finances since union, that additional financial assistance is necessary if the province is to maintain the levels and standards of public services reached.

Accordingly, basing their recommendations on the anticipated results of the fiscal year 1957-58, they have recommended that an annual payment be made to the province of $8 million a year, commencing on April 1, 1957, this amount to be reduced by the amount of any transitional grant that may still be payable.

The government will study the report and its recommendations and will decide upon the appropriate course of action. The decision will thus bring finality to the terms of union of Newfoundland and Canada.

The government is most grateful to the commissioners for their efforts in meeting the obligation in the terms of union.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side have listened to the Prime Minister's statement with much interest. We will study the report with care, as I know they will in Newfoundland. I would merely say now it is our understanding and our assumption that this report will be implemented with the least possible delay.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT COVERING CONSTRUCTION OF DAM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like now to make an announcement in regard to the South Saskatchewan river dam project agreement. The agreement was signed this morning by the Minister of Agriculture, having previously been signed by Premier Douglas on behalf of the province of Saskatchewan.

The signing of this agreement with the province of Saskatchewan represents an important step forward in the development of Canada's resources. Its main objective is, through its large-scale water conservation and irrigation potentialities, to provide stability for agriculture in central Saskatchewan, where droughts, sometimes prolonged, have in the past created serious problems for more than 50,000 farmers, a truth that is driven home by conditions this season.

While many think of irrigation as associated particularly with the production of specialty crops, it may be that the production under irrigation of alfalfa and other fodder crops in the centre of Saskatchewan's most populous farming area and in quantities sufficient to remove the fear of having to sacrifice livestock because of feed shortages in drought years or having to bring in fodder from other areas at great expense will prove to be the greatest benefit in the long run.

I say the greatest benefit. But irrigation possibilities represent by no means the only good to flow from the project that the signing of this agreement will inaugurate. The construction of the earth dam now agreed upon will make possible the production of hydroelectric power on a scale that will mean much to the industrial development of the province, while the assurance of adequate water supplies for such cities as Regina and Moose Jaw and the control of flooding are benefits that in the minds of many would of themselves justify much of the outlay that will be called for in carrying out this vast project.

It has been under discussion for many years. The need has been there, and it has been very obvious. I look back a matter of 25 years to the time when the question was first given consideration and discussion. Again after 1940 when I represented Lake Centre constituency, as it then was, within which a portion of the dam will be located, discussions continued. Fifteen years ago investigations were begun by P.F.R.A. officials, and during the past decade these investigations have been continued to determine the feasibility and economic importance of the project. Naturally I am happy that the project is now inaugurated, and I am sure the country as a whole will share my satisfaction.

I have stressed the irrigation possibilities, possibilities that may one day see water brought to 500,000 acres of Saskatchewan's good lands, the immense power development potentialities and the assurance of water supplies. There are many other benefits that will accrue as a result of the building of the dam. The control of water levels in the Qu'Appelle valley and its lakes, as well as the formation of a completely new great lake of the South Saskatchewan river system upstream from the dam, will provide recreational facilities and wildlife possibilities that will doubtless be appreciated by generations to come, and may well become one of the major tourist attractions in the western provinces.

I am very happy that this project is now in a position where construction can proceed, and I am sure members in all parts of the house will hope that out of the completion of this project will come for agriculture within that area of Saskatchewan and for Saskatchewan and the western provinces generally the dawning of a new day.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, in swinging from Newfoundland to Saskatchewan, makes us once again conscious of the extent and the development of our country. We on this side of the house have heard with satisfaction the announcement the Prime Minister has made, a satisfaction which I am sure will be shared by the people of Canada, especially those in Saskatchewan and the western provinces and by none more than my former colleague the former minister of agriculture, Right Hon. James Gardiner. We on this side hope, indeed we are confident, that this project will be of value not only to Saskatchewan but to all the prairie provinces, and as such will make its contribution to national development.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): We in the C.C.F. group, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: I.

An hon. Member: Where's the group?

Mr. Winch: We in the C.C.F. group want to join in the satisfaction which the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have just expressed that at long last agreement has been reached and a contract signed for the construction of this most important work in Saskatchewan. I have been asked to convey the regret of our house leader, the hon. member for Assiniboia, that he could not be here on this occasion because of what Liberals and Conservatives know as the exigencies of conventions. The fact that at this moment I stand alone means nothing, because we represent a principle. I express, on behalf not only of our group in this House of Commons but our membership throughout all of Canada, our pleasure in the advance that has been made with the signing of the agreement at 10.15 this morning, when I took pride in the fact that I represented the C.C.F. of Saskatchewan.

It is a wonderful thing, sir, that this agreement has been finally reached. We all know that this will add particularly to the well-being of the province concerned, and will contribute to the well-being of all of Canada. We wish all success to this endeavour, recognizing that it is a gain to the economy of the prairies.

May I be permitted, sir, to make this comment. Since June of last year we have noted the signing of agreements, starting in the east and moving to the west with the signing of this new agreement today. I hope that westward movement will continue and that in the not too distant future we will have something on the Columbia river in British Columbia.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Government notices of motions:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs—The following proposed motion:—

That items numbered 85 to 111, inclusive, item numbered 502, items numbered 542 to 549, inclusive, and item numbered 655, as listed in the main and supplementary estimates 1958-59, relating to the Department of External Affairs be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Speaker: By order of the house this motion will be referred to government orders and will be called later this day and will be debatable.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES—STATEMENT ON EARLY CLOSING DUE TO HEAT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked a question as to whether the prevailing rate employees were given the same privileges as classified civil servants in respect of early closing in times of excessive heat and, if not, why not.

There is no uniform practice that is followed in relation to the prevailing rate employees under conditions of excessive heat. The rule that is followed is that the practice of other similar employers in the particular area concerned and under similar conditions should be followed. Even in Ottawa there is no fixed or general rule. It depends upon the conditions both as to heat and humidity in the different buildings.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—MORTGAGE FINANCING OF STUDENTS' RESIDENCES AT UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received representations requesting mortgage financing for students' residences at colleges and universities under section 16 of the National Housing Act? If so, has the government taken any steps to provide this type of financing to colleges and universities?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no representations have been received on this subject recently, but some months ago there were some. This is one of the questions that are under active consideration by the government. If and when any decision is made that policy will be duly announced.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR PAYMENT OF STUDENT NURSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the continuing shortage of nurses in Canada, has consideration been given to paying student nurses a nominal amount of, say, $1 a day, in order to encourage student nurses to complete their training without financial distress to themselves or their families?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I feel that the point he has raised is well taken, though I am not sure that the specific method he has suggested would be the most effective way of assisting student nurses. In any case, I shall have the matter studied by officials of my department and possibly brought before the fall meeting of the dominion council of health. I shall be happy to inform the hon. member of the outcome of these deliberations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): If this is done may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether it will be done under the national health program?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, in my reply to the previous question I simply mentioned that we would consider this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It would be done under that program, I assume.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JULY 24

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I very seldom rise on a question of privilege, but on this occasion I feel that I must do so in view of an interjection made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is usually very fair in debate. I know that on this occasion it was made in the heat of the moment. As reported at page 2636 of Hansard he said, "Incidentally, why is he not here?" He was referring to me.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I was in the house throughout the day with the exception of the period after eight o'clock last evening when I had responsibilities which, as he knows, sometimes take one out of the house. The bill was carried through the house by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice. I also find there is an omission at page 2651 of Hansard when you, Mr. Speaker, said "When shall this bill be read a third time?" At that time I rose and asked whether there would be consent to third reading last evening, and that remark was also intended for Hansard. I thought I ought to clarify that.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I of course accept the Prime Minister's statement without any question, and if I said anything that is in any way offensive I at once withdraw it.

[Mr. Bigg.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That items numbered 85 to 111, inclusive, item numbered 502, items numbered 542 to 549, inclusive, and item numbered 655, as listed in the main and supplementary estimates 1958-59, relating to the Department of External Affairs be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion I must confess that I have at the present time a feeling of anxiety with respect to international affairs, yet I hasten to add that that anxiety is brightened by a sense of hope, hope which is not founded on wishful thinking.

I am sure members will be happy to hear that I do not intend this morning to give the house a global survey of the international situation as it affects Canada, either directly or indirectly. Rather, I propose to deal with certain factors which very closely concern us at this time.

The first item, of course, with which the house will expect me to deal is the grave and vital situation in the Middle East. I am sure there is no need for me to rehearse in detail the developments in that area during the past two weeks, because members are no doubt familiar with those developments; but with respect to Canada, and indeed the whole world, our attention is directed to New York, and I propose at the beginning of my remarks to give to the house a full account of the latest happenings there.

Before doing so, however, I should make reference to the developments in Lebanon leading up to this particular crisis, and give to the house some information with respect to the evolution of that crisis. Members will recall that on May 27, 1958, Lebanon presented charges to the security council of the United Nations simultaneously with those to the Arab league. The charge of Lebanon was that the United Arab Republic had intervened in its internal affairs. The Arab league had nothing to offer in the way of a solution of the issues involved in this charge and subsequently the security council, after discussion of the charges, decided to act in this particular regard.

May I remind the house, however, that there had never been any overt aggression from Syria into Lebanon. It had to do with indirect aggression. This was a new type of aggression with which the security council had to deal. It is difficult to define what is indirect aggression, yet the security council addressed itself to this question.

I may interpolate here that for some time the United Nations has been endeavouring without success to define indirect aggression, and certainly it was understood and recognized that the security council had power to investigate charges with respect to that type of intervention, indirect though it be, in the affairs of another country. And so on June 11 the security council set up an observation group, and I read part of the text of the resolution:

—to ensure that there is no illegal infiltration of personnel or supply of arms or other materiel across the Lebanese borders.

The government of Canada considered that the situation which was unfolding in Lebanon merited prompt action. From the beginning in the discussions in the security council we gave our firm support to this resolution, a resolution that provided machinery under the auspices of the United Nations. We welcomed the resolution, Mr. Speaker, by reason of the fact that it afforded to the secretary general an opportunity to contribute to the stabilization of the situation in Lebanon. We also welcomed the ambit of the resolution that gave certain flexibility to the secretary general in carrying out or implementing the resolution's objectives.

That resolution was adopted on June 11. There was no veto and no dissenting vote. On that particular occasion, and it was very encouraging, the U.S.S.R. abstained from voting on the resolution. The secretary general then moved very quickly, and within a few days he had officers of his observation corps present in Lebanon. Hon. members will recall that Canada immediately responded to the appeal from the secretary general and sent ten officers to join the observation group. Indeed, Canada at the moment has 11 officers there. A Canadian officer who was attached to the United Nations truce supervision organization was seconded to the observation group in Lebanon.

This group, the United Nations observation group in Lebanon, has become known as UNOGIL, and that is the designation I shall use. It encountered at the outset many difficulties in carrying out its task. Initially the group had access to only 18 kilometers out of the 324 kilometers of Lebanon's frontier with Syria. Other difficulties were encountered by reason of the rugged nature of the terrain, the location of the border populations, and also by reason of the traditional freedom of people to move across the border from Syria to Lebanon, a freedom they have had for many years. Here was a fairly recent boundary line between Syria and Lebanon. Many of these initial difficulties, however, were overcome by the middle of July and the observer group, UNOGIL, had access to all the frontier areas between Lebanon and Syria. They had been increased in numbers and personnel and were also getting aircraft for the purpose of carrying out their directives from the secretary general.

During recent weeks there has been one frontier of Lebanon that has been quiet. That is the frontier with Israel. Indeed, I would point out that during this difficult period all of Israel's frontiers have been quiet. That is a tribute to Israel, to the United Arab Republic and to other countries, and it is also a tribute to the effectiveness of two other United Nations organizations, the United Nations emergency force along the Egyptian-Israeli armistice line and the United Nations truce supervision organization on Israel's other frontier.

Now to return to the narrative of events that I anticipated a few moments ago I would give. On July 14 there occurred the sudden, swift and violent revolution in Iraq which transformed the situation in the Middle East overnight. Within Lebanon it appeared still further to exacerbate internal dissensions and—of this I am convinced—the happenings in Iraq rendered UNOGIL incapable, at least temporarily, of meeting its responsibilities, in the dangerous situation thus created. And so it was in this situation that President Eisenhower responded promptly and affirmatively to a request from President Chamoun of Lebanon. As President Eisenhower stated at the time of the landing of United States troops in Lebanon, the force was not there to engage in hostilities but to help Lebanon in its own efforts to stabilize the situation until—and I emphasize that word "until"—the United Nations could take the steps necessary to protect Lebanon's independence and integrity.

Two days later, as we recall, the United Kingdom found it necessary to take similar emergency action in response to an appeal from King Hussein of Jordan for military assistance in the face of a plot instigated from outside Jordan to overthrow the regime. I have been informed reliably, and I know, that there was not only a plot to overthrow the government in Jordan but also that the plot extended to other countries in the Middle East to overthrow their governments.

As the Prime Minister informed the house on July 17, the Canadian government appreciated that the United States and the United Kingdom had no alternative but to take these interim measures. We knew then that both governments had stated specifically that the landing of troops and the keeping of troops there would be terminated as soon as the United Nations could take effective action. We understood the difficulty of the decision that the two countries, the United Kingdom and the United States, had been forced to take.

To return to the point I attempted to make a moment ago, we recognized clearly that the United Kingdom and the United States appreciated the ultimate authority and responsibility of the United Nations.

Since that time we in Canada have made every effort at the United Nations and in some of the capitals of the world to bring about as swiftly as possible those United Nations actions which would provide some instrumentality of the United Nations to the end that the United States would withdraw their forces from Lebanon and the United Kingdom would withdraw their forces from Jordan.

In the United Nations security council, the United States and the United Kingdom have joined, or we have joined with them and other countries, in promoting steps that would provide personnel on behalf of and under the United Nations that would in turn enable those two countries to withdraw their forces. To this end we gave full support last week to a draft resolution submitted to the security council by the United States. In brief, the purpose of that resolution was to enable the secretary general to establish an instrumentality—and the type of instrument would be in his good judgment—that would add to the forces of UNOGIL now in Lebanon. We supported that; yet at the end of last Friday, just one week ago, the Russians vetoed that proposal. That was on July 18.

With respect to my own activities at this time, I may say that I had flown to Washington where I had valuable discussions with Mr. Dulles and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, a valuable exchange of views. The newspapers have quoted me as taking the stand on behalf of Canada that there should be no expansion of military activities by these two countries, that is, outside of Lebanon and Jordan. The Prime Minister has also taken that stand, and he has so informed the house. From Washington I went to New York, where I had discussions with Mr. Hammarskjold. Then I came here to report fully on the situation as I saw it to the Prime Minister.

I got off the aeroplane on Saturday and heard for the first time that Mr. Khrushchev had extended an invitation for a summit meeting on the Middle East. At the Prime Minister's request I went back to New York on Monday morning where I took charge of the Canadian delegation, and I seized the opportunity then to express the hope that nations would respond to the invitation issued by Mr. Khrushchev for a summit meeting on the Middle East. I shall deal with that matter later.

On that particular day the Prime Minister informed the house that on Monday morning he had sent messages to Mr. Eisenhower, Mr. Macmillan, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, and Mr. Nehru, and in those messages he expressed the hope that there would not be a negative reaction to the proposal put forward by Mr. Khrushchev.

In New York on Monday and Tuesday of last week our delegation worked very closely with the delegations from the United Kingdom, the United States and Japan in an endeavour to work out a compromise resolution which might be more acceptable to the Russians than the one they vetoed on Friday last, which had been put forward by the United States. This particular resolution was put forward by the Japanese. We were rather hopeful of this resolution that provided in its operative part for an increase in the observer group of UNOGIL and gave further authority to the secretary general to endeavour to stabilize the situation in Lebanon to the end that the United States could withdraw its forces.

As I said in the meeting of the security council on Monday of last week in support of this resolution, I deemed it a positive approach, one which offered the council an opportunity to use and strengthen the United Nations machinery that it had in Lebanon; but this, too, the Soviet union vetoed. And so, as far as the activities of the United Nations in Lebanon are concerned, we are back where we were at the beginning of last week. However, after the veto the secretary general expressed his determination to use the powers that had been voted to him on June 11 by the security council, and he said he would firmly proceed to implement his mandate in the resolution of the date to which I referred. I think it would be of interest to the house if I read a part of the statement the secretary general made on Tuesday afternoon after the veto of the Japanese resolution by the U.S.S.R. Mr. Hammarskjold said:

> I am sure that I will act in accordance with the wishes of the members of the council if I therefore use all opportunities offered to the secretary general within the limits set by the charter toward developing the United Nations effort so as to help to prevent a further deterioration of the situation in the Middle East, and to assist in finding a road away from the dangerous point at which we now find ourselves.

Even before the Japanese resolution failed of adoption Mr. Hammarskjold had decided to increase the personnel of the UNOGIL in Lebanon from about 135 officers to something approximating 200, and he requested Canada to send three additional observers. The Prime Minister has informed the house of Canada's ready response to that invitation from Mr. Hammarskjold, and I recall the words the Prime Minister uttered in this house, that Canada was willing to take that action, ready to do it, glad to do it, and then he made this statement:

> Canada will supply immediately three of the additional observers, of course giving every attention to any further requirement of UNOGIL as events transpire.

Therefore what is needed now is an expansion of the scope and importance of UNOGIL activity. The hon. member for Essex East asked a question on Wednesday of this week. I was not in the house at the time. The hon. member asked whether Canada had received any further invitation from the secretary general for additional personnel from this country. No invitation has come forward as yet, but Mr. Hammarskjold intimated on Tuesday afternoon at the meeting of the security council that if the Russians vetoed the Japanese resolution he would go to work immediately and evolve a plan for the increase in that particular group. That plan is now, we know, being developed but it has not yet been made final.

Members of the house may recall, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of the establishment of UNEF Mr. Hammarskjold, the secretary general of the United Nations, associated with himself an advisory committee of member states to assist him in the conduct of his task with respect to UNEF. There are indications now that Mr. Hammarskjold will invite certain countries to send representatives to such an advisory committee, and it may well be that he will choose the personnel of the advisory committee of UNEF, the advisory committee that has been in being for some time.

So that is where we stand now. A new United Nations body, not new since Tuesday afternoon but new since June 11, has been developed and set up, and we hope this body will be effective in enabling the Lebanese people to work out their own internal difficulties and dissensions in their own way. I have confidence that such a United Nations body, developed under a plan still to be presented by the secretary general, will be effective in establishing stability.

But what of the future? Is there a way to ensure permanently the independence and integrity of this small country with its unique balance of east and west, with its unique composition of population, about half Arab, half Moslem and half Christian? There were discussions in Washington while I was there—

Mr. Winch: Three halves? The minister referred to three halves. I could not understand the arithmetic.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I am sorry for that slip. The information I have is that it was roughly fifty-fifty as between Moslems and Christians. The Moslem group, incidentally, is broken up into two parts, one part Levantine and the other part Arab. I will seek to verify my information and if I am wrong I will tell the hon. member. We had discussions in Washington about the future of Lebanon. The discussions had to do with the possibility of having the Lebanese accept a position of neutrality. Favour was expressed by the United States and United Kingdom representatives with respect to that proposal.

I was not here on Monday, but I have read the address of that distinguished representative of a member of the commonwealth, the Prime Minister of Ghana. I know that he also advanced that proposal when he addressed members of the house in joint session with members of the Senate. Can we work toward a status of neutrality for Lebanon and have an international guarantee of its neutrality such as is provided in effect for Austria? It cannot be imposed on the Lebanese, but it should not come as a novel suggestion to them because throughout the centuries, indeed from Phoenician times, the Lebanese have been merchants and traders. Their history shows that by reason of necessity to be friendly with as many people as possible in order to trade with them, they have over the centuries achieved that relationship with bordering countries.

Of course there is a new factor, one that I adverted to earlier in my remarks. Recently Lebanon has been rocked by pressures, sometimes violent pressures, from outside countries. Recently those pressures have been manifested in hostile radio broadcasts and other activities, and these pressures have brought about the vexed situation in which the Lebanese find themselves at this particular time. But it is, I think, possible to find a way out of the situation along the lines I suggested a moment ago. I would expect that the Lebanese might welcome some arrangement establishing neutrality that would assure them their independence in this middle position. But I am convinced that that cannot be brought about without the practical assistance of the United Nations. Indeed, I think it might well require some physical manifestation of United Nations authority, a physical manifestation of such authority on the ground in Lebanon.

The task which the observer group is now performing and will perform to a greater and more successful degree, I hope, will be to insulate the political affairs of Lebanon from those of its neighbours and thus help to restore tranquility in that divided nation. That, Mr. Speaker, could be the forerunner of some continuing role on the part of the United Nations in that country, perhaps not unlike the role played not by the United Nations but by Canada and other members of the international commissions in Indo-China. As hon. members will recall, these commissions were set up by the Geneva agreements of 1954.

In putting forward this suggestion I realize that the United Nations should proceed cautiously, but if the experiment were successful it might be used as a precedent for stabilizing other countries in the Middle East, torn not only by fierce internal antagonisms but by hostile external rivalries and tensions. The possibility of insulation through the United Nations raises novel problems and vast difficulties, but so acute have the problems of this region become that we must cast our minds about to examine every possible line of approach which might offer the prospect of advance.

I make another reference to the stability not only of Lebanon but also of the Middle East. Much of their trouble can be traced to the economic difficulties in which they find themselves, and I would hope it would be possible to give some assurance of economic stability not only to Lebanon but to the whole Middle East that would warrant and promote political stability. In this particular task I can foresee for the United Nations and for other organizations a really valuable role.

As the Prime Minister said the other day in the house, this is not the time for stagnant thinking, and if there is anything in this new United Nations approach, the west could seize the opportunity at the summit meeting which now appears certain to be held in New York and endeavour to make a small beginning, at any rate, in the country of Lebanon.

That was one reason that prompted the Canadian government to welcome the Soviet proposal of last Saturday, a proposal that contained offensive and provocative language giving unnecessary offence to the addressees. Indeed, I had occasion to point out to Mr. Sobolev when I was in New York that it was unnecessarily truculent and offensive. But I know I can speak for the Prime Minister when I say that in sending messages to President Eisenhower, Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Nehru, expressing hope that there would not be a negative attitude to Mr. Khrushchev's proposal, we had in mind that some constructive measure such as the one I have been indicating might be looked at and adopted not only for Lebanon but for the Middle East.

Then with reference to the message that was received by France, the United Kingdom and the United States from Mr. Khrushchev, we had in mind that a meeting at the top could result in a diminution of international tension. On Sunday we discussed also the terrible possibility, not the probability but the terrible possibility, of the nations of the world sliding into a global nuclear war. The leaders of the governments of this generation would never be forgiven if they did not exhaust every possible way of relieving, at least in some measure, international tension.

This was another basis for the messages that went out from the Prime Minister over the week end. I can claim that in this regard Canada took the lead. The public expression of the desire of this government to promote the holding of a summit meeting was the first public utterance on the western side in this respect. I took the opportunity in the security council, as did the Prime Minister when he informed the house on Monday, of making very clear our concept of the desirability of holding an international conference as suggested. I have in mind, but I cannot claim this, that my observations had something to do with the postponement at least of the U.S.S.R. proposal to call for a general assembly meeting in which they could indulge in more propaganda.

I have in mind also that the stand of the Canadian government, as expressed by me in the security council on Monday of last week, had something to do with the acceptance of the counterproposal put forward by Mr. Macmillan on behalf of the United Kingdom. The real significance to me of the resolution with respect to the holding of a meeting in the security council—I do now expect it will be a favourable decision—is that this meeting will be held under the aegis of the United Nations. The security council, and I quote from the United Nations charter, was established for the following purpose:

> In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its members confer on the security council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the security council acts on their behalf.

In my opinion, that is the proper forum for a meeting of Mr. Macmillan, Mr. Khrushchev, Mr. Eisenhower, General de Gaulle and others.

We have noted with encouragement that Mr. Khrushchev has responded to this proposal that was sent out in clearer terms, perhaps, from London than from any other capital, that this meeting should be held within the security council. It could be, it may be—I emphasize the word "may"—a meeting of momentous consequence. Again, I say that it is worth trying in terms of the voice of humanity. Furthermore, I have in mind that apart from the powers whom I have named and to whom the letters were addressed by the author, the presence of Mr. Nehru, the distinguished leader of one of the nations of the commonwealth and a representative of the awakening world of Asia, would contribute much to such a conference.

With reference to the eventual composition of the conference, I am sure that the house will have noted the observations made yesterday by Right Hon. Mr. Macmillan at Westminster. These are his words:

> I am glad to note Mr. Khrushchev's latest letter recognizes . . . (that) . . . until the form of the meeting has been agreed it would be premature to lay down which countries, which are not members of the security council, should attend, or by whom they should be represented.

I agree with that particular view, at this stage, when there will have to be negotiations with respect to the time, with respect to the agenda and other matters. I would say this, however; that it will be for the security council to decide what nations, which are not members of the security council, should come to the table of the security council. That is a procedural matter for the security council. I saw it in operation on Monday and Tuesday of this week, for example. The council, by formal resolution presented by the chairman before one meeting on Monday started and before the two meetings on Tuesday started, asked the representatives of the United Arab Republic, Lebanon and Jordan to come and be present at the council table. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that is a matter for the security council to decide.

However, I express anxiety lest these matters having to do with who will sit and who will go to the meeting should jeopardize the holding of that meeting. Questions of this sort should not be insuperable or prevent the proposed meeting of the security council. In my opinion they should be treated and considered as secondary. With respect to this meeting in New York, whatever the date may be, I have in mind that it is desirable also, if some means can be found, to have the opinions of the numerous countries concerned, because no plan that may be evolved in the security council will be successful unless the proposals are accorded the approval of the peoples of those regions.

One of the problems we in Canada must always keep in mind is a concern, for example, lest the prosperity of Israel should not be safeguarded in the forthcoming negotiations. Surely it will be possible to get the views of the Middle East countries whatever the procedural device may be. Many problems, as I indicated a moment ago, will arise on the subject of time, on the subject of the agenda and prior consultation. But when the Prime Minister spoke in this house on July 25 about the possibility of holding such a meeting within the security council he deliberately used words which took into account the flexible procedure that would have to be devised if this conference is to be brought into being.

I would express on behalf of Canada the hope that we will have this concept of flexibility. It is here, I believe, that the secretary general, with his great experience and wisdom which he has shown particularly during the past two weeks, could be given the opportunity of devising some formula within the existing United Nations structure in order to enable these important conclusions to be reached with respect to those matters to which I referred, and to the end that the consultations at New York will be fruitful.

It is not inappropriate that I announce at this time an important development in connection with the responsibilities of Canada in Indo-China. I would just bring back to the attention of the members of the house the role that Canada has played through its membership in three international commissions in Indo-China; one international commission in Laos, one in Cambodia and one in Viet Nam. That was an example I used a few moments ago. Here were powers sitting down at Geneva in 1954 to deal with dissensions in these three parts of Indo-China. There was in that particular area the possibility, indeed the probability, of a collision of the communist powers on the one side and western countries on the other.

What was done? There was established at the Geneva meeting machinery whereby the situation in these three countries could be stabilized or helped to be stabilized through the presence of international commissions. Canada was and is a member of those international commissions in the three countries, the other members being India and Poland. With the physical manifestation, if nothing else, of these three international commissions the result was that in Laos the royal government was enabled to bring about the stabilization of the situation there.

There was a reconciliation of the communist forces and the royal force and there came about stability. On May 4 of this year supplementary elections were held in Laos and they indicated to Canada that its task had been performed in Laos through its membership in that commission.

Hence I informed the house recently that the Canadian delegation to the international commission for supervision and control in Laos had introduced a resolution calling for the dissolution of the commission. I wish now to inform the house that the international commission for Laos was adjourned sine die on July 19. There were forces at work there —and you can guess their origin—which resisted the retirement or the adjournment of the Laos international commission.

In the end Canada joined with others in bringing about this adjournment sine die. We made it very clear that we were not getting out by reason of any threats or suggestions by Laotians, but we had in mind the representations made here by Souvanna Phouma, the Prime Minister of Laos, that after the election had been held and the situation stabilized, he felt that the commission would have performed its task. That commission can be reconvened in Laos at the call of the chairman, the representative for India. Canada must be consulted. If we go back by reason of any particular emergency we will always have in mind the rights of the Laotian government, and we will not interfere with the sovereignty of that country. In the opinion of the Canadian government the commission which began its operations in 1954 has completed its task.

With respect to Viet Nam there is tension, as the members of the house well know, between South and North Viet Nam. That situation has not been stabilized. There is a need for the continuation of the work of the international commission in Viet Nam, but we have advice that we can apply a formula similar to the Laos one to Cambodia where the situation has been stabilized.

I seize this opportunity to pay tribute to India, which provided a chairman, for its co-operation, and also to pay a tribute to the success of the royal government in Laos in bringing about a reconciliation of the two forces that were indeed hostile to one another. We will now take up the problem with respect to Cambodia. As I indicated a moment ago, we should be able to use the same formula of adjournment.

I come back to this concept that I advanced earlier with respect to Lebanon and with respect to certain other countries in the Middle East. Is there not something in the example of the success of the international commissions in Laos and Cambodia for a solution of some of the problems at least in some of the trouble spots in the Middle East?

I will now speak on the problem of disarmament. It may be that some will have the thought that we should not be talking about disarmament in the particularly vexed situation that we now have. I do not share that view. Indeed, the interest in and the desire for disarmament have been intensified by events in the past few weeks. In order to provide members of the house a perspective with respect to disarmament, a perspective that will be read with deeper concern during the present situation, I am tabling a white paper with respect to the disarmament discussions in 1957.

I need hardly recall for the information of the house the breakdown of the negotiations that were carried on through the subcommittee of the commission on disarmament established by the United Nations. France, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada put forward certain proposals on August 29 of last year. They appeared to be a package deal, if I can use that expression. Since the time negotiations broke down, the Russians having flatly rejected the proposals, the countries of the west including Canada have been endeavouring to make clear that those proposals of August 29, 1957, were merely put forward as a basis of discussion. Indeed the Prime Minister in the general assembly last year and I myself in the political committee of the United Nations and in the general assembly urged that the Russians look at those proposals as being flexible. But that situation was not accepted by the U.S.S.R., and little if anything has been done within the United Nations since last autumn with respect to disarmament.

However, there have been some encouraging signs recently of a resumption of negotiations. We were all gratified that President Eisenhower felt it possible to make a suggestion with respect to one kind of disarmament or with respect to certain measures that could lead to one kind of disarmament, and he put those forward to Mr. Khrushchev. We are gratified and encouraged to hear that Mr. Khrushchev has accepted the proposal to establish a technical group for the purpose of examining the possibility of providing adequate supervision and control of nuclear tests and methods for the detection of nuclear tests.

The discussions began in Geneva on July 1 of this year with respect to the scientific problems involved. Even if I knew what had been happening at those discussions I would not understand the scientific problems, but I can say it is authoritatively reported that the talks between the scientists are making headway in an encouraging manner. Without attempting to predict the final outcome of this scientific conference, I am confident that significant findings will be made by this technical group. Canada, as the house knows, is represented there by Dr. O. M. Solandt who has associated with him four other Canadian scientists. The other Canadians are Mr. H. Larnder and Mr. A. K. Longair of the defence research board, Dr. P. L. Willmore of the dominion observatory and Professor G. M. Volkoff of the University of British Columbia.

The government has held the view that after the findings of this group are made known, in which findings we feel confidence could be placed, a method might be arrived at by which to detect nuclear tests, and then the countries carrying on such tests might come to a political agreement with respect to the cessation of these tests. This is a view which has been advanced by the Prime Minister throughout the country on several occasions; but let me say that the detection and inspection, the control and supervision of nuclear tests do not constitute in themselves a measure of disarmament. They are a means to ensure disarmament; they provide sanctions for a political agreement with respect to a type of disarmament, and I would express the hope that after the successful conclusion of the present technical studies there might be taken what could be regarded as a step having a revolutionary effect on the international climate.

An initial move might be made with respect to the cessation of further nuclear tests, and in that way there might be established some element of mutual trust and confidence, after which the nations concerned could move on to the more complex aspects of a disarmament program. The suspension of nuclear tests with these guarantees as to detection could constitute the first step toward agreement, which agreement would in turn be the first step toward disarmament, even though this would not be the most important measure, which is that having to do with the use of nuclear weapons already proved.

There is another encouraging factor on which I would like to report with respect to disarmament. Mr. Eisenhower proposed that it would be useful to study practical measures to provide required safeguards against surprise attacks and we have been heartened by a rather affirmative reply by Mr. Khrushchev. We in Canada should promote in every possible way the holding of a meeting of experts of a somewhat similar nature to the present Geneva meeting with respect to the detection of nuclear tests, in order to study means and methods of preventing surprise attacks. This is a matter which is, of course, of very direct concern to this country with particular reference to surprise attacks over the Arctic region.

I am sure I need not spell out the implications of this matter or draw a picture of what we have advocated in this regard. I reported on our advocacy at the Copenhagen meeting. The Russians have indicated—and this I would like to emphasize—that they might be willing to sit down with such a group. I do not think a political agreement would be necessary at this stage, any more than it has been necessary to enter into a political agreement with respect to the holding of nuclear tests while the current meeting of scientists is being held. I propose, however, that experts should be brought together in order to study this further problem.

One cannot anticipate the measures which the experts would put forward. They may have to do with electronic or radar devices, or they may be along the lines of ground inspection as proposed by the U.S.S.R., which could operate rather simply as a bilateral exchange of inspectors, or a more strictly supervised international system might be involved under the control of the United Nations. We could, however, make progress in this regard.

The U.S.S.R. has on many occasions replied to the proposal for detection or knowledge of the possibility of surprise attack over the Arctic that this really does not matter very much. To us in Canada, however, it does matter, and the Prime Minister indicated last summer that for the operation of a scheme to prevent surprise attack all of the Canadian territory would be made available on a reciprocal basis if the Russians would give a similar undertaking.

The proposal has now been made by the United States and Canada that both countries would throw open their territories to inspection to ensure against surprise attacks if the Russians would do likewise, but the U.S.S.R. wants this system extended to the United States bases in Europe. The United States has said, we will throw open Europe from the Atlantic to the Urals, but if we go as far as Europe will you also agree to allow inspections of that kind? It seems to me, however, that without decisions at this time as to the exact location of such inspections we would at least make a start by arranging a meeting of experts to consider effective technical measures which could be taken in the event that such a political agreement were made.

To come back to the Arctic area, it would be easier to establish a system of control and supervision in that region than it would be in the more populous areas of the North American continent; but we must arrive at some agreement, however small and paltry it may seem, to take a step forward in order to establish some measure of mutual trust and confidence. We could go on from there to deal with the more difficult areas and more complex problems. We must, however, always be conscious of a dilemma. Every government must be concerned about the security and safety of its people. Any government which failed in that respect would be guilty of a grave sin.

On the other hand, if we are not going to think about the possibility of disarmament, if we are not going to endeavour to take some steps, what is the situation ahead of us and of the world? There is a certain inevitability, an inexorable result, that might flow from a continuation of the building up of armaments on this side and on that side. That is what I meant when I used the word "dilemma" in terms of national and international security. We will have to break that down and give our people some assurance that we do not admit the abiding necessity of building up armaments, and that we intend —to use an expression that I employed in this house some months ago—to keep our powder dry and at the same time endeavour to make some advance in establishing mutual trust and confidence and come to some understanding with the U.S.S.R. I cannot believe that the peoples of the U.S.S.R. any more than the Canadian people want to go on and on in building up armaments. Indeed, there are suggestions and signs that it concerns them economically now as well as in terms of the possibility of an international conflict that would destroy the governments and many people of all countries.

I should now like to refer to another device of the U.S.S.R., and that is the economic device to the end that they might obtain and could obtain world domination. They have been infiltrating into countries in various parts of the world that are not yet committed to the U.S.S.R., to the communist group, and not committed to the west. By economic penetration, by barter systems and loans and other means they are making advances in that regard. To me that might mean that they will win the victory in their search for world domination without ever firing a shot. I regard this as one of the most urgent aspects of our foreign relations and one of our major contributions to peace, the aid and assistance particularly of underdeveloped countries, and I know I speak for the Canadian government when I say this. There are measures that are being taken—but I think they should be increased—to respond to this challenge.

With respect to Canada's role, during the past year we have continued to support the Colombo plan and the specialized agencies within the United Nations. Indeed, in several instances the support has been increased as compared with the year before.

The Colombo plan operates under the broad umbrella of an annual consultative conference. It really works out, though, that the assistance is given by bilateral arrangements between Canada and some other country, and out of these arrangements come discussions that have to do with the plans and priorities of the recipient country. There has been no suggestion on Canada's part, and I think it is wise and will be effective in the long run, of any political strings attached to the gifts.

With respect to the Colombo plan, there are two countries that are not within the Colombo plan but for which we have a deep concern, namely Ghana and the British West Indies. This house has been informed of the contributions that have been made to Ghana in terms of personnel and to the British West Indies also in terms of personnel. I will not take the time of the house to inform you with respect to the men who are now in those two countries, men who are particularly well qualified in their own chosen field, in order that they may assist these newly emerging countries and also help them to help themselves. The bulk of Canada's aid, however, is now under the Colombo plan which is being directed to those parts of the world for which we have a special concern.

With respect to economic aid, I would remind the house that Canada has contributed to the establishment and the sustenance of the international bank for reconstruction and development, and we would hope that agency could be strengthened. We can take pride that Canada, on a per capita basis, is the second largest contributor to United Nations technical assistance; but getting away from the per capita yardstick, Canada is the fifth country of the world in terms of total contributions to the United Nations in her technical assistance and relief programs.

Hon. members may recall—I am certain that those who were members of the committee on external affairs last session will recall—that there was much consideration given to the possibility of establishing a fund within the United Nations to be known as SUNFED. That concept as conceived at the United Nations was given up and in its place there was proposed the establishment of a special fund. This proposal was referred to a preparatory committee of the United Nations on which Canada was represented. The economic and social council is now considering the report of this preparatory committee, and at the next general assembly the final details should be settled and a new instrument of United Nations aid achieved. Canada has indicated that it would consider making an appropriate contribution to this fund provided that the organizational arrangements are well designed and provided that there is broad support for the proposal among, particularly, the contributor nations.

During the last session information was given to the house with respect to Canada's extension of its aid in terms of flour and wheat in emergency situations.

I would go back for a moment to the West Indian contribution. I recall that a few weeks ago the hon. member for Laurier asked a question with respect to the giving by Canada of a steamship for interisland communication in the British West Indies. I intimated then that there would be a team of shipping and shipbuilding experts sent from Canada. That team has been to Port of Spain and has now returned. We expect that a report will be made in due course concerning the specifications for the new ship that Canada has undertaken to build and give to the British West Indies.

We will be holding a conference with respect to trade and economic matters within the commonwealth at Montreal in September of this year. There will be on the agenda of that conference an item relating to the economic progress of the underdeveloped parts of the commonwealth. I am confident that through those discussions Canada can make a further contribution in respect of those nations to which I referred, a contribution not only of capital but also in terms of technical assistance. I should not like to leave the impression that under the Colombo plan and other systems of aid to underdeveloped countries Canada has forgotten underdeveloped countries that are not members of the commonwealth. The most of our assistance, however, has gone to the commonwealth countries and, as I intimated a moment ago, further thought will be given to these matters in the context of the Montreal meeting.

My foregoing remarks have to do with countering the movements of the U.S.S.R. in the economic field. Indeed it is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the west has given more and has been giving more for a longer time to underdeveloped parts of the world than the Soviet bloc. They are paying us the compliment now of following our activities in that regard, but you may be sure that their gifts always have a political string attached to them. I do not think we should ever endeavour to counter every Soviet gesture. We should work steadily, in co-operation with the people of those countries, within their plans and priorities in our earnest desire to help them and to bring reality to their hopes. In this way we can best counter the Russian activities in this regard and we can contribute to the peace and prosperity of the world.

I eagerly look forward to this debate and to the discussion in the meetings of the committee on external affairs, to the end that in the formulation of its external policy and in the implementation of this policy, Canada can speak with a strong voice.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will, I am sure, have listened with great interest and appreciation to the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He has covered many important subjects, more particularly perhaps one which is very much in our minds at the present time. If he will permit me to use the expression, in recent days he has been a winged mercury flying backward and forward from here to New York, to Washington, in the search with others for a solution to an international crisis which is centred in a part of the world which may seem to be very far from Canada but which in terms of its effect is very close to Canada. He has been seeking a solution which, if it can be found, will reduce tensions and strengthen security and which, if it cannot be found, will add to those tensions and diminish that security.

I know the minister must have had a very exhausting time in recent days. I know that his work has been not only exhausting but at times it must have been frustrating, but I know also he has found it rewarding and that he has received great satisfaction out of the opportunity he has been given. I know too that he has taken full advantage of that opportunity in making on behalf of the government a contribution to the search for international peace and security, which is a search in which we are all engaged in one form or another.

I can assure him and the government on behalf of the opposition that our good wishes go with them in the work he is doing, and we wish him well. He has covered some important subjects. There are some, of course, which he has not had the time to cover and this resolution before us now, which will permit the setting up of the committee on external affairs, will give us a chance in the committee to go into some of these matters which we have not the opportunity of discussing today.

There are many subjects and there is little time. I would like to begin by making a reference—and it will be only a brief reference; some of my colleagues may follow it up later—to the United Nations and its activities in recent weeks and months. It has shown itself once again to be an indispensable piece of international machinery even when it has not been effective. We have once again had driven in upon us that when trouble starts and when the big powers do not want to get into it, or want to get out of it after they have got into it, they go to the United Nations and seek—and it is right, of course, that they should seek—ways out of their difficulty through our world organization.

The United Nations now, as in the past, is being asked—thank goodness it is being asked—to come to the rescue, to stop trouble spreading. But while that is a vital role to be playing, especially at this time, even more important is the role of the United Nations in preventing trouble. We sometimes forget—the minister reminded us of this aspect of its work today—that trouble-preventing role, that positive and constructive role of the United Nations in the humanitarian, social, economic and co-operation fields; but the core and centre of its responsibilities are its political activities in its efforts to prevent war. That, of course, is where we encounter at the United Nations and elsewhere our real difficulty.

Perhaps the best example of that difficulty has been given by the minister himself in his statement this morning, when he referred to the work in the United Nations and indeed of committees outside the United Nations on disarmament, the agonizing attempt which has been made now for so many years—and I recall when it began with the old League of Nations in the late 1920's—the efforts to reconcile security and disarmament and to decide which comes first.

I welcome the white paper which the minister has been good enough to table this morning and which will perhaps give us the basis for a useful discussion of this matter in the committee on external affairs.

We are getting toward the end of July. This reminds us that the United Nations annual assembly will soon be taking place. I have no doubt that the Canadian government are now beginning to discuss and decide what attitude they should adopt at this assembly. I would like, if I might, to mention three things in which I think it might be helpful if Canada could take the initiative. Indeed, I think in at least one matter Canada has already taken an initiative. That initiative might be followed up. The first matter is I think of great importance at the present time, an importance which should not be obscured by the immediate international crisis in the Middle East which occupies so much of our time and attention, if it can be done—and I do not know where it can be done except at the United Nations—is to try to halt the spread of the manufacture of nuclear weapons to other than the three countries which now do manufacture them.

I quite appreciate the difficulties in the way. For that purpose would it not be desirable to explore at the forthcoming United Nations assembly the possibility of a resolution which might get the necessary acceptance and which would embody a self-denying principle accepted by all the other members of the United Nations in regard to the prohibition in their own territory of the manufacture of any atomic weapon of any kind? It is frightening enough to have those weapons made in three countries. It will be much more frightening if that manufacture is spread to countries all over the world, and that will happen if something is not done about it because the techniques and the procedures in regard to those matters are becoming known.

It will not be long before there will be a number of governments, some perhaps in the control of people whom we may not trust—I have no particular area of the world in mind when I say that but it may happen in the future—that may all have access to weapons which can destroy the world. While the situation is bad enough now, surely that is infinitely more frightening.

Then there is another matter which is related to the one I have mentioned. I refer to the suspension of tests of nuclear weapons of mass destruction. I think we in Canada should now push the initiative at the United Nations for the abolition of these tests over a period of let us say five years, without any conditions being attached except that of United Nations supervision which, of course, is an important one.

Then there is a third matter which does not involve taking the initiative because Canada has been pressing this at the United Nations for some time, and I believe did so at the last assembly. Is this not a good opportunity in the light of what has happened in the last few months to press forward for the establishment of a permanent United Nations police force? I hope to have something to say about that a little later. Perhaps the atmosphere now is more conducive to progress in that regard than it was a year or two years ago. These, then, are three matters which perhaps might be pushed at the forthcoming assembly of the United Nations.

I come now to the matter to which I shall devote most of my time, as the minister quite rightly did; the situation in the Middle East and more particularly in Lebanon and Jordan. This situation developed quickly, at least in its more critical manifestations of recent days. I know the difficulties the government must have had in trying to make up its mind without very much warning as to the policy that should be pursued. In appreciation of those difficulties and with some understanding, as we should have, of the responsibilities incumbent upon us, the opposition attempted to be as constructive as possible during these days, not to ask questions merely for the sake of asking questions or which might confuse an already complicated situation and, indeed, to do nothing which would prejudice the maximum degree of unity in this house and throughout the country over an issue which transcends and I hope will continue to transcend partisan considerations. When peace is threatened—and peace was threatened and perhaps still is—we must all be as united as possible in the house and in the country.

That has been the spirit that has animated us on this side during recent days; nevertheless we have our responsibilities as an opposition, and we must discharge them in a way which will result in questions addressed to the government on various aspects of policy. Indeed, we have also a duty to put forward proposals ourselves when we think that is desirable, so I am going to deal with the Middle East question in somewhat more detail than I confess I have ever been called upon to do before either on this side or the other side of the house, and the reason for that is obvious. I am going to try, if I can, to put the problem in perspective, and that will perhaps require a little more discussion of the historical background than would normally be the case.

As I have said, the problem is greater and deeper than its recent manifestations, because they are merely the reflection of a situation which is deep-rooted, difficult and dangerous. That situation, that problem—and it certainly is an international problem—is the emergence of a passionate Arab nationalism which expresses itself at times in bitter and even savage anti-foreignism or anti-imperialism as they more often call it. Perhaps we should not forget that as we have to face the immediate problems that arise from day to day out of this situation.

The situation in its historical perspective has been well put by Professor Smith of the school of Islamic studies at McGill University in his book, "Islam in Modern History", when he says:

> For 75 years the Arab has got up in the morning, has lived his life, has pursued his pleasures and his dreams, always under the shadow of guns—guns in alien, unfriendly hands, ready to fire, ready to call in from across the sea more guns, ships, tanks, planes, might. Whether this power was used, as from time to time it shatteringly was, or was merely threatened, as often it cogently could be, or was merely there, always the shadow, the shame, the oppression remained. Whether terror or insult, provocation or opiate, this bitter foreign power has stood, an abiding fact. Any thought about the Arab world uncoloured by the vivid imagination of this dominating reality is unfruitful, misleading, false.

I know that this feeling, expressed so graphically in this quotation, is fomented, exploited and when possible directed by the forces of the international communist conspiracy and also—and we should not forget this—by Russian imperialism, which is something else. But without communism there would still be trouble in the Middle East and there would still be Russia with her eyes and ambitions on her historic goal in the Mediterranean. That, Mr. Speaker, is the historical background against which we have to consider the crisis facing us today.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, this would be a good time for me to ask you to call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ELIMINATION OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' HOUR THIS DAY

Mr. Speaker: I understand the house leader wishes to revert to motions to deal with a matter relating to the procedure of the house. Does the minister have leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The suggestion has been made, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the importance of this debate on external affairs the house should not take the hour this afternoon for discussion of private bills. This course is quite satisfactory to the government, and we have arranged among the three parties that the debate on external affairs should continue right through.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to an order dispensing with the period for private and public bills at five o'clock today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac):

> That items numbered 85 to 111, inclusive, item numbered 502, items numbered 542 to 549, inclusive, and item numbered 655, as listed in the main and supplementary estimates 1958-59, relating to the Department of External Affairs be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): When the house rose at one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to deal with the situation in the Middle East and to put that situation in what I call historical perspective, relating it especially to the rise of Arab nationalism as one of the important factors in contemporary history.

The Arab people have found a man or, if you like to put it this way a man has imposed himself upon them, to personify and also in a sense to harness these nationalist forces, and that man is Colonel Naşser of Egypt. He did not create but he is attempting to dominate and direct these forces and bring them all within a united Arab federation an ideal which if it is realized without force or aggression is not, I suggest, anything which in itself the west should oppose, even if that federation decides to be uncommitted in what we call the cold war.

For this purpose Colonel Nasser and the United Arab Republic have skilfully exploited their hatred of the new state of Israel and their hatred of the old state of imperialist control, as they call it, from outside the Arab world whether by Briton or Frank or Turk or any other outsider. The Russian, never having been able to accomplish his political objectives in this area, retains a relatively good reputation, based on ignorance, perhaps, and recent skilful diplomatic tactics. The United States until recently has also been reasonably popular because the United States has been the country of aid, oil royalties and schools.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this surge of Arab nationalism, accompanied by a demand on the part of the people for a better life, has expressed itself in agitation in Arab countries and in North Africa for liberation from outside control. We should not forget that Great Britain had recognized this surge before the Suez crisis by withdrawing from many of its previous positions in the area, as the French had done before them.

I have suggested that no one man and no one state was responsible for these withdrawals. They were due to the increasing nationalist forces in the countries concerned, and a weakening of western European force after the exertions and sacrifices of two world wars. These withdrawals, whatever may have been the reason for them, reflected this weakening of the position of Great Britain and France in that area and they caused, in a sense, a vacuum of instability, of disorder, which seemed to many of us in the western world to spell revolution, subversion and danger.

There is no doubt that Colonel Nasser hopes to fill this vacuum by establishing a united Arab republic under Egyptian leadership and including all the Arab states. The most dramatic and indeed disturbing, but certainly not the only evidence of this Arab nationalism, was expressed a few years ago in the expropriation of the Suez canal which caused an international crisis at that time and which is very much in our minds even now. This expropriation took place after which the question of the Suez canal was brought before the United Nations and it led, as we know, to intervention by Israel which felt compelled to move into the Sinai peninsula, and then the intervention of Great Britain and France.

The purpose, the details and the results of that intervention are well known. Perhaps it is not inappropriate to say that that intervention at that time might never have taken place if the United States had adopted a steady, consistent and wise policy toward the Middle East in the month preceding it. Of course this is an argument on history. The fact is that intervention did take place suddenly, with force and certainly without any consultation of any kind with Canada.

There has been a tendency, even more than a tendency, in certain quarters to compare the Anglo-French armed intervention in the Suez crisis with that of the British in Jordan and of the United States in Lebanon. I think there is very little similarity, if any, between the two. The United Kingdom and France found it necessary to intervene in Suez after the fighting had begun between Israel and Egypt, against the wishes of both parties and against the resistance of one party to that fighting.

There was no reference of the matter to the United Nations, but on the contrary there was opposition to any such reference. Shortly afterward, however, when the reference was made against the opposition of those who found it necessary so to oppose, the two intervening countries agreed to withdraw as soon as United Nations forces could ensure order. So steps were taken to that end by the assembly with which we are all familiar.

Contrary to what has been stated, and stated more than once in this house, during the whole of that episode, during all that stirring and tragic time, neither Great Britain nor France was ever declared by the United Nations to be an aggressor. Indeed, one of the things from which some delegations, including the Canadian, derived the most satisfaction is that they were able to block moves which were made to that end throughout the discussions in the United Nations assembly, moves that were pressed by anti-western powers with unscrupulous vigour.

Surely the recent interventions in Lebanon and Jordan are very different. They took place at the specific request of the governments of those countries. They were warranted, so it was claimed, by the doctrine of collective self-defence embodied in article 51 of the charter, or at least by a constructive and not unreasonable interpretation of that article. As my hon. friend the minister mentioned this morning, it was stated that in Lebanon intervention was required to protect United States lives and to help to protect—I am quoting from the statement of the President of the United States on this subject—the independence and integrity of Lebanon. It was also made clear that this move was made under the influence of what the President called the tragic and shocking events which had just taken place in a neighbouring state, namely Iraq, from which perhaps too hasty and too alarming conclusions of immediate disorder had been drawn. As far as Jordan is concerned, the United Kingdom explained that the king and the government of that country had asked for help not only in the face of the developments in Iraq but because of evidence, we are told, that the United Arab Republic had decided to attack and overthrow the regime of King Hussein. The actions taken by the United States and the United Kingdom up to the present have not resulted in the use of force, and we must hope they will continue to avoid the use of force.

These actions were reported to the United Nations security council and, as was mentioned by my hon. friend the minister, they have been discussed rather fully there. Both governments have emphasized at the security council that not only are they willing but are anxious to withdraw as soon as the United Nations take measures adequate to protect the independence of the countries concerned. I can understand that their protestations with regard to their desire to withdraw are sincere.

There is little similarity, therefore between the Suez intervention and that today in Lebanon and Jordan. I think it is demonstrably wrong and unfair to accuse the United States of doing now what Washington criticized the United Kingdom and France for doing two years ago. The United States action may have been wise or unwise but it was not similar to that previous action. It can be criticized but not, I suggest, on those grounds.

There are, however, those who claim that although the situations may not be the same, United States intervention in Lebanon is belated but complete justification of the British and French armed intervention in the Suez a couple of years ago. Speaking for myself I fail to see how any such deduction can validly be drawn. It is quite true that the armed intervention that took place at that time could, without too much difficulty, have resulted in the overthrow of Colonel Nasser. Indeed, if the British and French governments had had primarily that objective in mind they might have waited for a few days and perhaps the Israeli army would have done it for them.

But what would have been the result? What would have been the price that would have been paid for that overthrow? I suggest that the Asian and African world and especially the Moslem world, including nations of the commonwealth in that world, would have been and would have remained bitterly hostile and antagonistic. I also suggest that the Soviet union would have been able very skilfully to exploit that bitterness and hostility. I suggest that a new Egyptian government would in all probability have been set up which would have required British and French armed and economic support against the opposition of the Arab people, fomented and supported from the outside by the forces of communist imperialism and from inside by the forces of Arab national extremism. It seems to me that the difficulties the British and French are encountering today in Cyprus and in Algeria do not encourage the belief that they could easily or successfully have handled a situation of that kind in Egypt along with all the other problems with which they have to deal.

Finally there would have been division and dissention inside the United Nations to a point, I suggest, where that body might have been fatally weakened. Hence it is my conclusion that those who think that the ejection of Colonel Nasser from Egypt and from power two years or so ago would have solved all our Middle Eastern problems and would have forestalled the present crisis, misread the facts of history and the logic of contemporary international problems.

To return, however, to the intervention which we are facing in Lebanon and Jordan today, may I say this. The test that must be met by that action is not whether it could or can be justified on grounds of international law and morality, although I think that test can be met. As I see it, the test is whether it was wise and likely to achieve the ends desired. What are those ends and perhaps I should add, what should they be?

The first—and this was obviously an objective on the part of the British and United States governments, and indeed it is an objective of Canada—is stability, security and peace in the Middle East; and also recognition of Arab nationalism based on Arab countries free of Soviet communist threats, free of penetration and subversion, each one governing itself as it desires without interference from or without interfering in neighbouring states.

The second objective is collective security for defence against aggression. That certainly has been an objective of the British government over recent years in this area. The west, led by the British government, has tried to promote that objective of collective security through the Baghdad pact, which, we must not forget, it was hoped would embrace all the Arab states but which has never succeeded in doing so. However, it has split the Arab world into two camps, with the United Kingdom and the United States in one camp or at least with the United States half way in that camp and the other forces in the other camp.

I suggest that the third end that is being sought is security for oil supplies in that area which are vitally important to the whole economy of western Europe and, to a lesser extent, to other parts of the world; the security of navigation through the Suez canal, and the maintenance of legitimate western economic and other interests in the area.

Finally, I suggest as an objective of western policy in that area the right of Israel to a national existence within recognized and agreed boundaries. Of course there have been other objectives and policies, but perhaps these are the main ones.

A couple of weeks ago the violent and sudden overthrow of a friendly regime in Iraq seemed to strike at those policies and to foreshadow not only the end of the Baghdad pact but the revolutionary absorption of Lebanon and Jordan into the United Arab Republic; hence the intervention.

Again the question arises, does the intervention which has taken place strengthen and safeguard the objectives I have mentioned or does it serve to prevent some of the undesirable results which I have also mentioned? I doubt the first, though I admit the pressure which appeared to necessitate intervention at the time. I also admit the possibility of unhappy consequences if the action had not been taken. Presumably there was not very much time. That is one of the tragedies of international affairs these present days; there is never enough time to assess the consequences of action or no action. Presumably on this occasion there was not enough time, certainly not very much time, in which to weigh the disadvantages or advantages of intervention or no intervention because—and this is one of the most worrying features of the whole situation so far as I am concerned—the outbreak in Iraq seems to have caught the western countries which have the most in the way of intelligence services completely by surprise. Yet we are now told by the authors of this revolution that they had been plotting it for months and years.

It is also now clear, and the minister mentioned this this morning—at least I believe he mentioned it, though if I am misinterpreting what he said he will correct me—that the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States are anxious to liquidate their intervention as quickly as possible and replace their forces by those once again, of the United Nations, for the important purpose of establishing and maintaining the right of Lebanon and Jordan not to be gobbled up, if I can put it that way. That is an understandable policy on the part of London and Washington because it is difficult, at least it is difficult for me, to see anything but difficulty ahead if this intervention has to be maintained.

We ask ourselves this question. Will the United States intervention in Lebanon increase the interference and aid for the rebels from outside, to prevent which was one of the purposes of the intervention? We read in the newspapers today, that the foreign minister of Lebanon is again complaining of assistance to the rebels from outside which he says has increased during the last week.

Another question we can hardly refrain from asking ourselves is what is the continuing objective of the intervention? What happens if King Hussein goes, or if he moves out of Jordan against Iraq? And above all, what effect will this intervention have on Arab nationalism in Lebanon, Jordan and elsewhere? Mr. Hanson Baldwin, writing in the New York Times on July 16, had this to say:

> Their mere presence—

That is the mere presence of the United States forces.

> —in Lebanon will be to Arab nationalists like a red rag to a bull—it will do more than any other event since the Port Said attack to knit together Arab nationalists throughout the Middle East and to inflame them . . . the forces of Arab nationalism, symbolized by President Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt, will ultimately be strengthened—not weakened—by the United States action.

The London Economist gave expression to the same thought in a recent edition, and then there is another question that these governments must now be asking themselves. What about the security of the oil pipe lines if popular passions against western intervention should boil over?

However, the most important question of all is what should we do about the situation generally. I was glad to hear the minister say this morning that it is now time to look ahead and perhaps, in attempting to answer the question "What should we do about it?", we are looking ahead. My own effort to answer the question is as follows. I suggest we should recognize that the present situation in the Middle East is very much to the liking of Mr. Khrushchev of the Soviet union, who must be very happy at this western intervention since its major result may well be to stir up anti-western feeling, and who benefits most by this feeling in any part of the world. In that sense perhaps this kind of action is really playing the Russian game. I suggest that Mr. Khrushchev, in spite of all his recent words, may not have any great desire to see the United States and the United Kingdom leave these countries. I believe, however, that he has a very great desire to secure the maximum propaganda out of their being there.

I submit that the second aspect, the second phase of the policy we should adopt, which follows from my answer to the first question, is the withdrawal as soon as possible from these countries by the United Kingdom and the United States, in accordance with the desire they have themselves expressed. However, as we all know it is much easier to land troops in an emergency than it is to withdraw them, and sometimes it is not easy to avoid getting enmeshed even further than was originally intended.

This is where the United Nations comes in, and I am glad to see that that organization is playing its part. The United Nations could help make possible the withdrawal of these forces, which is the desire of the two governments concerned, and perhaps this assistance can now be obtained. It is going to be difficult to negotiate in the security council, as my hon. friend knows, because of the veto used by the Russians with respect to action in that council. Assistance may be obtained, however, through a summit meeting, although a good deal of confusion seems to now be developing over the calling and the composition of such a meeting. It was only a few days ago that we discussed this matter in this house, when Mr. Khrushchev issued his invitation to discuss the Middle East question at a summit meeting.

It seems to me that this was a suggestion which the two powers most concerned, Great Britain and the United States, should have taken up at once, especially in so far as the terms put forward by Mr. Khrushchev regarding the composition were concerned, although they certainly could not have accepted the form of the invitation which was, to say the least, offensive in character. Surely, however, they could have replied at once that the invitation was acceptable in the sense that the four powers and the secretary general should meet, and meet quickly, and that the meeting should be held under the auspices of the security council.

I personally felt at that time, and I still feel—even more so in the light of developments in the last day or two—that it would have been a good thing for the security council to have been called together at once. They could have set up a committee of the council to consist of the four countries plus India and the secretary general of the United Nations, as mentioned in the invitation of Mr. Khrushchev. Under the chairmanship of the secretary general that committee could have commenced work right away in any place recommended or chosen by the secretary general, with the agreement of the governments concerned. He may well have chosen, although of course I do not know this, Geneva; and while it is not possible for any summit conference to be held without a good deal of publicity, perhaps there might be a little less publicity in Geneva than on the east side of New York.

I do feel, even more strongly than I did a few days ago, that the represention put forward by Mr. Khrushchev for this meeting was a very advantageous one from the point of view of the west, because of its inclusion of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, India—a member of the commonwealth—and the secretary general. I suggest we are now getting away from that sort of clear-cut composition. The press reports would indicate that there is a good deal of manoeuvring going on, not only as to where the meeting should be held but also as to who should attend. Perhaps a solution will be found in a full meeting of the security council, with additional countries invited who have special interests in the problem, as Mr. Khrushchev has suggested, and after a first or second meeting at the summit in the security council in New York perhaps then the countries which were originally mentioned by Mr. Khrushchev might meet under the chairmanship of the secretary general in private sessions, as indeed was the practice during the Suez discussions at New York I think three years ago this summer.

But I cannot myself feel too optimistic about a full meeting of the security council to discuss Middle Eastern matters in this tense and excitable atmosphere with additional governments invited, as Mr. Khrushchev has suggested, to a number not yet determined; a meeting to be held in New York in public in the United Nations. I am afraid it will be difficult to avoid that kind of public meeting becoming an instrument merely of propaganda.

Mr. Walter Lippmann, who is a pretty wise commentator on these matters, I think, had this to say this morning in his column in the Montreal Gazette:

> As things stand at this moment, the notion of a summit meeting in the heart of New York city has the characteristic of one of those nightmares in which one feels compelled to do what one desperately does not want to do.
> At this time, a public confrontation between Eisenhower and Khrushchev would be a ghastly spectacle, almost certain to poison the air still further with charges and counter-charges.

I do not think we have to be as pessimistic as that but I do hope, and I feel certain my hope is shared by the government, that if this meeting takes place in the full security council in New York, then advantage will be taken at the earliest opportunity of arranging small and confidential meetings of those most concerned to be held under the auspices of the secretary general himself.

There are two other questions to be considered with regard to policy in the Middle East. After withdrawal, the United Nations I think should move in, if the circumstances require it, and if authority can be secured from the security council, or if not from the United Nations assembly. In referring to moving in I do not want to be too dogmatic as to how it should be done. One way would be by a United Nations emergency force, but another would be the way pointed out by the minister this morning, by strengthening the existing United Nations observer group to a point where it might be able to exercise a pacifying and stabilizing influence in the country in which it is operating.

We on this side heard with much satisfaction the statement of the minister to the effect that the government is prepared to support to the fullest extent action to strengthen that group of United Nations observers. It is encouraging to read in the press that the secretary general, without requiring a further resolution from the security council, has already taken advantage of an earlier resolution to strengthen the observer group. This constitutes another debt we owe to a man of exceptional quality, integrity and ability, the secretary general of the United Nations.

What we have been going through during the last two or three weeks—and I mentioned this earlier in my statement, before lunch—has served to underline and emphasize the necessity of a permanent United Nations emergency force. I do not mean by that 20,000 or 25,000 soldiers in a camp of their own in some country chosen for that purpose. I mean a force consisting of contingents earmarked and available for service at the request of the United Nations authorities; ready to serve at a moment's notice, forces earmarked by other than permanent members of the security council that would be kept available in their own country for such United Nations service.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. He had his experience over the years at the United Nations. Was not that very thing attempted on several occasions, and was it not discontinued because of the fact that it was impossible of attainment? I am not attempting to throw cold water on the suggestion, because I believe in it myself, but I ask the hon. gentleman how that could be achieved in the face of the veto situation.

Mr. Pearson: As the Prime Minister has pointed out, Mr. Speaker, it was attempted more than once. It was attempted under the provisions of the charter which provide for an international force under the security council. The Prime Minister will remember that at the very beginning of the United Nations an international staff of the permanent members of the security council was set up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under article 43.

Mr. Pearson: Under article 43 of the charter, as my hon. friend mentions. I think that this permanent military staff is still in existence, nominally, and I am not sure that it does not even meet once a month or so. It consists of military officers from permanent members of the council. It was frustrated from the beginning by the failure of those members of the council to agree on anything, let alone building up force behind the charter. While it became clear over the years that it could not be done in that way, the Prime Minister will recall that during the Korean crisis the first steps were taken by which the assembly could move in to organize forces when the security council was paralysed by the veto. That was done by an assembly resolution which was called the "Uniting for Peace" resolution. That was the resolution used during the Suez crisis to build up on an ad hoc basis a force which I believe was of assistance and which I believe is still doing good service in that part of the world.

That was done under emergency conditions. The Prime Minister will remember that within 48 hours of the resolution of the United Nations assembly authorizing the creation of this force, the force was formally in existence, and within 72 hours the first members of the force were on the job. But surely we should not rely on that kind of thing in an emergency. Surely it would be better using the assembly resolution for this purpose, if we cannot do it through the security council, to set up in the countries concerned —and they would have to be the non-permanent members of the security council, omitting the big powers—contingents which would be available for this kind of service if the assembly or the security council requested it; which would be organized for that purpose and which could move into action without delay.

I know that this has been attempted in the last year. I think it was brought up at the last assembly. I am not in a position to criticize anyone because it has not been done, for we have all been trying to do it. But perhaps this second demonstration in an international crisis of the value of this kind of police organism in permanent existence will give us now more chance of success in following the matter up at the next assembly than we had at previous assemblies. That is all I am putting forward at this time.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on that point would the hon. gentleman permit a question. The hon. gentleman used the expression "move into action". Did he mean into military action, or would he care to change that expression?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; that was perhaps a careless expression. I meant that it could be moved into police and supervisory action. I know perhaps as well as most hon. members of the house the limitation of this kind of force and indeed the limitation of this kind of action. This force would be of no value at all as a military force in the normal sense. It could not stand up against a big or a middle power. If there were a dispute between the big powers this force would be futile. But as a police force operating as it did in Palestine, and operating as it might in the Middle East now under the authority of the United Nations for police purposes, it might be of great value. All I am suggesting is that if it has any possible value of that kind, that value would be very greatly increased by having the force ready to go into this kind of action when required.

But more important perhaps than the questions I have brought up as to the future policy toward this area is the necessity of following up this immediate crisis by some kind of economic and political solution for problems of the whole area, and I was delighted to hear the minister express that thought this morning. Withdrawal and perhaps replacement by a United Nations police force will not be enough unless we do something about the political and economic difficulties that brought about the situation in the first place.

I recall very well and with a tragic memory that while in the Suez crisis we may have succeeded in producing a United Nations police force which was of help in that crisis, we failed in our major objective, which was to take advantage of that atmosphere of crisis and do something about the political and economic difficulties between Israel and her neighbours which brought about the crisis in the first place. We did nothing on that front; therefore we did not succeed there even though we may have succeeded in the more limited field of preventing the conflict spreading.

We hope we will not make that mistake this time. I know how easy it will be to make such a mistake after the immediate crisis is solved, but I hope that this time the west will try to work out on a firm and permanent basis its relations with those nationalist forces in that area I have been talking about. I believe that for this purpose the west—and I am thinking of the United States, the United Kingdom and France particularly—must base their relations with those countries on the acceptance of Arab nationalism and of the United Arab Republic; must try to bring about as much co-operation as possible with those forces; try to remove the suspicions which have been engendered over the past and which are not by any means all the fault of the west. They must accept the realities of the present and base their policy on the fact that the nineteenth century is dead and is not likely to return.

I suggest something else, and this is going to be even more difficult politically; that our policy in the Middle East in the future must recognize that the U.S.S.R. has both interest and power in that area. Indeed its power in that area is far greater than that which could be produced in the west to bear upon the problems of that area at any given time. I think we must all be very conscious of the fact that while there are 10,000 United States marines in Lebanon and two or three British paratroop battalions in Jordan, there are 23 Soviet divisions, it is reported, strung along the Iran-Turkish border. Therefore it is idle to pretend the Soviet union need only be tolerating that area. It is also idle to deny the fact that the Soviet union has very real interests in that area which perhaps should be recognized.

The minister said this morning that one of the happy developments of recent years, and a development which might be applied to the Middle East, was the successful operation of the international commissions in Indo-China.

I agree with him, though I also agree with him when he said the time has come to wind up the activities of two of those commissions in the way he mentioned. But he himself also said—and it is an important fact—that in that operation in Indo-China one of the three members of each commission was from a communist state. While it is true that it is a state which is making moves toward communist nationalism, yet at the time it was appointed it was pretty close to the foreign policy and the defence policy of Russia. That was recognized at that time and I was at the Geneva conference when it was accepted that there could be no settlement of the kind desired in Indo-China without a recognition of the participation of the communist world in that settlement. It was done, and the results have not been too bad.

Perhaps if we are going to have a final economic and political settlement in the Middle East we will have to recognize in some appropriate way the interest of the Soviet in that settlement. Perhaps the best way to do that would be to bring any political and economic aid scheme—the minister mentioned it this morning—into the United Nations; a Marshall plan, if you want to call it that, for the Middle East but administered by the United Nations, where perhaps Soviet participation will be less open to exploitation than if it were done in any other way. Indeed they may not wish to participate at all in that kind of plan.

Then finally Mr. Speaker—it will be an important phase of our policy in this area in the future—that we have to continue in the west to give support to Israel's right to a secure national existence. We have got to do more than that with Israel's co-operation and assistance. We have to think of some way of liquidating the Arab refugee problem.

This is a very sketchy outline of the basis of our policy in the Middle East, a policy which I think provides the best hope of strengthening legitimate western influence and strength in that area and at the same time strengthening the chances of peace and security.

The alternative is the pursuit of power politics without sufficient power, or at least sufficient power in the face of the hostility of another and nearer great power which can bring more power to bear on that particular area. That is one alternative, and I certainly hope we will not follow it. But an even worse alternative than that, perhaps, is a policy of drift and uncertainty; of trying to pursue contradictory aims and trying to execute those contradictory aims in a half-hearted and confused way. I suggest the policy which I have ventured to outline in brief is one of realism and common sense, and one which the west should pursue at this time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to deal with a good many other subjects, but I do not want to take up all the time of the house on this debate. I probably will have another opportunity to discuss these matters. I was going to talk about NATO and its importance in many things, and particularly in this Middle East crisis. I was glad to read in the press this morning that the NATO council is meeting today, as it has been meeting in recent days, to consider developments in the Middle East. It is of the greatest possible importance to strengthen political co-operation through the NATO council not only in the area covered by NATO but in the areas contiguous to the NATO countries which are of vital importance to them.

I also suggest that political co-operation in NATO requires a solution of the difficulties between its members with special interest in the Middle East. Something must be done, for instance to halt the growing bitterness and enmity between the two NATO countries, Turkey and Greece. I have stated a good many times, my view that a military and defence foundation for NATO is not enough, indeed it is necessary now as it was never necessary before to make progress in the field of economic and political co-operation.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the most important question of all, and this concerns not merely the Middle East, which is a reflection of the importance of this general question. What can we do at this time to ease tensions and remove or diminish some of the dangers of war? The minister touched upon the matter this morning, but it really deserves far more time than we can give to it in a debate of this kind. But I suggest, however, as I have suggested many times, that we should not allow the crises of the moment to prevent us continuing to seek solutions of our problems with the Soviet union through diplomatic and political channels. We should not only keep our defence strong—we have to do that, though it is a little difficult these days to know what kind of defence should be kept—but we have to keep our diplomacy enlightened and imaginative and vigorous.

The fact that we all feel—and I think we have felt it more in the last two weeks than for quite a long time—the fear of what we call in diplomacy brinkmanship should not obscure the fact that even without that kind of diplomacy, even without those tactics which at times may worry us, even without brinkmanship, we remain on the brink of extinction. This is true because of the developments in nuclear warfare, because of the piling up of weapons of mass destruction which if they are ever used can make life on this planet impossible. We do not need brinkmanship to emphasize that we are indeed on the brink of that kind of extinction if we allow diplomacy to degenerate into conflict or the world to slide into general war, which is perhaps the only way we will get in. We have existed in this way now for more than 10 years.

We have existed in a world which is bedevilled by a combination, as I have put it before, of hate and hydrogen, of fear and ferocity. That combination still overhangs our life. Our policy surely in this country, and in all free countries, must be to bring about the replacement of that kind of thing by some form of security, on the basis at least of mutual toleration, if we cannot do any better than that, between those who must coexist but cannot co-operate, plus—and this is equally important—closer and closer co-operation between those states which can and must work together for their very survival. That, I suggest to the house, is the only policy that makes sense today. We are all proud as Canadians to know that Canada has played, and I am sure is playing and will continue to play, a good and proud part in the pursuit of that policy. Perhaps I know as well as most Canadians how terribly difficult this part is, how exhausting at times it is and, as I said at the beginning of my statement and as the minister must have found, —how frustrating it often is. At times it seems so much easier to fall back into our foxholes, into our national trenches, to dig ourselves in there and wait for what may happen. Movement is hard and at times we wonder where we are going; or if we are going anywhere. We reach a green pasture and we find that there is a greener pasture beyond. We scale a peak and we find a higher one barring the way. As a poet puts it, "We are forever climbing the ever-mounting slope". But I know all members of the house will agree with me when I say that is no reason for giving up but is a reason for continuing to climb.

I know the house will also agree with me when I say that in this search for peace in a better world all members of the house, irrespective of the party to which they may belong, as indeed all Canadians, will be happy and proud to work together.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this is without doubt an important day in the present session. An opportunity is accorded for the free expression of the views of members with respect to international affairs and the crises that face our country and all countries of the world. It is to me, of course, a very unexpected and unusual experience to have to follow the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) of the present government and the secretary of state for external affairs of the previous government. I am the first one to admit, sir, that I do not know the intricacies and strategies of inner diplomacy as they must be known by the two previous speakers because of the present position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the past experience of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

Therefore it follows that I do not intend to go into the intricate details of strategy or policy, but I do welcome this opportunity to put forward a few general thoughts from the viewpoint of a layman. I feel quite certain that in taking part in the first discussion of external affairs this session we can all start from the same fundamental belief, namely that nobody wants to see another world war. On that premise we have to consider developments as they occur.

In the present century the major countries of the world have seen two world wars in which countless billions of dollars in productive effort have been expended in the holocaust of war. In addition millions of men, women and children have either died or been mutilated. No one wants to see that happen again, and in saying that we have particular reference to the scientific and technological developments of recent years from which it is known by all that a third world war could possibly mean the annihilation of civilization as we understand it at the present time.

This leads me to make the observation that a world war can start from a spark in international relations in the same way as a catastrophic fire. In my own province of British Columbia right now there are almost one million acres on fire, a fire that could have started from a bolt of lightning, a carelessly thrown match or a cigarette that was not put out. So it is in war. Officially at least the first world war started because an archduke was assassinated. Officially at least the second world war started because of the aggression of one country, because of the insanity of one man.

That leads us, therefore, to the realization that as nobody wants to see another world war, very close attention must be paid to international affairs and relationships to see that with modern weapons, technology and science no spark occurs to lead the world into a conflagration which could mean the end of civilization. If that is accepted, and I think logically it may well be, we have to approach our external affairs and relationships not only on the basis of day to day developments but on the basis of what has given rise to these developments.

There may be those who will not agree with me, which is understandable, but I quite honestly feel that if we are truly going to play our part and take every possible action to preserve peace we must understand what gives rise to certain actions by certain countries. In the past few years our major troubles have developed in the Middle East.

I have not yet seen any factual denial that even in connection with the Suez crisis it was not a matter of country against country but was a matter of the protection of oil interests. In these past few weeks we have again seen a Middle East crisis. I believe it would mean a great deal if we could be told whether or not the armed intervention was on an anti-communist basis or for the protection of certain oil interests. Personally, I am not going to state any conclusion, but I do consider this something upon which there has not been any government consideration or public answer.

I am convinced that nobody wants war. We can make the definite statement that Canada does not want war, nor do I believe that any of the western democracies want war. In view of that fact, I am led to ask if Canada could not play a greater part in advising on the present international crisis? We recognize that Canada is not a major power in the world but it is, if I can use the terms, a middle power. It is my definite belief that because Canada at no time has had imperialistic or colonial ambitions, and because of its economic strength Canada could play a most significant role in these very critical days.

When this present Middle East crisis developed I will say I was most disappointed in the first pronouncements that were made by this government. I interpreted them, and I think the majority of the press across Canada interpreted the statements as unqualified support of United States policy. I hasten to add that it was with appreciation and gratitude that, in very short order, we did see leadership and direction coming from the government, and not a supine following of the United States. There was a recognition of the seriousness of the situation, and very definite representations to deal with the crisis. Personally, I feel proud of the direction that was given after the first pronouncement, and I hope that direction may have had some effect upon the developments of recent days and the changed policies. The result has been that Canada has given some leadership on the calling of a summit meeting.

I listened very intently to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) in what he had to say today, but I have one regret. He failed to give to this house any indication of how strong a position Canada is going to take in view of the recent pronouncements made by, or on behalf of, the President of the United States. We in this corner of the house believed even up until yesterday that some country of the western world had to speak very clearly and bluntly to the United States about its foreign policy with regard to the present Middle East situation. Personally, I cannot understand why, if we truly believe that our economy is the best in the world, that our democracy is the best, we are afraid—when I say "we" I mean as western democratic powers—to meet with anybody else in this world face to face. Quite honestly, Mr. Speaker, I think that the prestige, the influence of the free powers has slipped within the past few days if what appears in the press is correct. According to press reports the government of the United States is disturbed that Khrushchev has accepted the invitation to a summit meeting in New York. There are statements, and perhaps we will have more information about them, that they fear Khrushchev would use such a meeting for propaganda purposes.

I am not going to go into any more detail about that, Mr. Speaker, except to say that if we believe in our way of life, if we believe in our democratic system, then we need have no fear of meeting the leader of any country, any time, anywhere, especially if it may be the basis upon which some agreement may be reached to settle the present mid-eastern crisis and prevent a conflict that could possibly lead to a third world war.

This is a general discussion on external affairs, so may I add this. I know it is of importance to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I direct my remarks in particular to the Prime Minister: I am not in any way derogatory of efforts made by his government or the previous government towards the cessation of nuclear tests or on behalf of world disarmament. But I should like, on behalf of the group in this corner of the house, to ask if still greater emphasis could not be put upon the efforts of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs as between their counterparts in other governments, in the United Nations security council, the United Nations general assembly and special committees, to drive home the absolute essentiality of the cessation of nuclear tests for war purposes and disarmament if we are to avoid another world war.

We must be honest at all times. Today we have a world armament race; you can call it a defence against another country but the other country is saying the same thing. So whilst we work on defence, we also work on offence. I think the history of the world proves that if you build weapons of offence and defence, eventually you use them. As I said before, I am saying nothing derogatory on what the Prime Minister has worked for in the past. I am just asking that in following up—and I am certain the direction has come from the Prime Minister in the present Middle East crisis—that additional emphasis be placed along the lines which I have just suggested.

We in this group completely agree—and we emphasize this point—that you cannot sit on the fence or play both ends against the middle. The western powers agree on collective security or they do not. We believe in collective security. If we are going to have collective security in the democratic countries it must not be broken down or betrayed. That is why in this house and in our convention which is still going on in Montreal we have expressed our regrets and our condemnation of the countries—yes, of the United States to the south of us and the United Kingdom in which I was born—taking independent action in the landing of troops of their own volition without going through the collective security agency which we are trying to build up, which we support and in which we are all partners. If the United Nations general assembly means anything or if the United Nations security council means anything and if it is going to have a proper respect in this world, it must be because those who are partners in it follow through on collective action. Anything else is not only a betrayal of the meaning of collective security but is making a gift of a propaganda weapon and putting it in the hands of those who we are told are our enemies and who will use it to best advantage.

Mr. Speaker, I said just a few words this afternoon about the exigencies of absence. Very often the Prime Minister, because of the responsibilities of his office, is obliged to be away. We all understand that. Various cabinet ministers, because of their responsibilities and the exigencies of their offices, also are obliged to be away. Private members also very often are obliged to be away. We in our group find ourselves in a similar position because our biennial convention is being held this week and, as I think you will all understand, it is rather important that some M.P.'s be at that convention to discuss national and international politics. Unfortunately, I was not able to be there. However, learning that certain members were not able to return in time for this discussion this afternoon, I was on the telephone for about 30 minutes speaking to a colleague in Montreal in between the lunch hour and now. We are a democratic party and hold a democratic convention representative of our movement across the length and breadth of Canada. I said, "I am going to have to speak this afternoon. What is the viewpoint of the national convention representative of our movement all across Canada with regard to the present situation?"

Mr. McCleave: Are you asking for the party line?

Mr. Winch: No. I asked for the democratic decision of our representatives from all across Canada.

Mr. McCleave: Are you asking somebody else to tell you?

Mr. Winch: I have been talking here completely extemporaneously. I have not a solitary note. But knowing the kind of thinking that some people do, having expressed myself completely without a solitary note I thought I should give you the decision of our democratic movement; and that will show you up, my friend. This resolution was passed by our movement:

> The present crisis in the Middle East is a direct result of the failure of the western powers to evolve a constructive policy based on the legitimate aspirations of the Arab peoples for freedom from outside domination and for social and economic advances and the legitimate aspirations of the people of Israel for a durable and viable peace with their Arab neighbours.
> It is also the result of the deliberate subversion of these aspirations by ambitious men and forces both within and without the Middle East.
>
> The C.C.F. has always opposed militarism and totalitarianism in all their forms. It has always censured military intervention whether it be in Hungary, Poland, Suez, Lebanon, Jordan or elsewhere.
>
> It has always urged and urges today that international police action should be undertaken only through the United Nations if peace is to be achieved.
>
> This convention of the C.C.F. therefore condemns the military intervention of the American and British governments in Lebanon and Jordan.
>
> It also censures our own Canadian government which, in the initial stages at least, condoned and supported an action which was clearly an irresponsible risk of nuclear war.
>
> However, the very urgency of the crisis gives the nations of the world an opportunity to lay the foundations of a permanent peace in the area along the following lines:
>
> 1. The American and British forces should be withdrawn immediately, and replaced, if necessary, by a United Nations force composed of nationals of other than the major powers.
>
> 2. In the meantime, all the great powers, as well as the neighbouring states stay out of Iraq.
> 3. An immediate meeting at the summit should be held preferably through the United Nations to work out solutions not only for the present crisis, but for the economic and political problems in the area which present a constant threat to the peace of the world.

4. A guarantee by the United Nations, to which the great powers are collectively committed, of all the nations in the area, including the state of Israel, against aggressive action.

5. In order that conditions permitting lasting peace in the Middle East can be established, oil resources should be transferred in a peaceful and orderly fashion to the ownership and control of the Arab peoples and to this end the United Nations should offer to establish an international Middle East development commission, to assist the economic development of the area and ensure the raising of living standards for the people of these areas. Only such a broad and constructive approach to the problems of the area can end the legacy of hatred and dangers that threatens to engulf the whole world.

This convention therefore demands—

They say demand but I say request, sir.

—that the government of Canada pursue these policies unequivocally and vigorously at the United Nations and seek to unite all middle and small powers in a determined effort to achieve a peaceful and constructive settlement of the perilous situation in the Middle East.

I had a very good reason, Mr. Speaker, for wanting to place on the record at this time a decision made only within recent hours at the national convention of the C.C.F. This was because on the occasion of another debate in this house, when we were discussing national and international affairs, some hon. members, including the Prime Minister—as a matter of fact it was the Prime Minister who raised the issue and said that I and other members were saying something different to what had been passed at a provincial convention. This was when we were discussing NORAD and the Prime Minister read a news report with a good deal of relish. I do not blame him, for it was good politics. But I am a federal member, we are all federal members, in this house, and in the Prime Minister's party and in that of the Liberals and also among ourselves there are differences of opinion in localities and provinces, but national and international policy is laid down in the C.C.F. by a national convention. This is the national convention policy on the issue which we now face and I give it to the house unequivocally.

I am now about to draw my remarks to a close. I am sure the Prime Minister knows the importance of this matter but I wish to commend to his attention the fact—and this I wish to emphasize—that Canada can exercise great influence and leadership but that the guidance must come from the Prime Minister himself through, of course, his ministers. I think upon consideration he will agree that emphasis would not be misplaced on the banning of nuclear tests and the working towards disarmament in this crisis or in any future one. That action should not be taken by individual countries but only under the United Nations as a collective action when it is found to be necessary in the interest of the maintenance of peace. Forces should not, moreover, be landed in any country in the uniform of any particular nation but only under the aegis of the United Nations emergency force.

The Prime Minister and I, belonging as we do to different parties, perhaps have a different outlook on fundamental philosophy, politically speaking, but we have had two world wars in our time and nobody wants another. It is unfortunate that power politics are being played by two great nations but it is my belief that this country, small as it may be, might nevertheless be able by its sense of direction and sanity to maintain peace throughout the world. I am but one of a group of eight members in this house, but this is my thinking which I commend to the Prime Minister for his consideration.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take advantage of this debate on external affairs to report to the house on Canada's participation in a very important international gathering which took place some three or four months ago. It will not of course be on the lofty level on which this debate has so far been conducted but it will be a proud story nevertheless.

I am going to digress if I may—I feel in one way that I should not, but I cannot help but pass this observation. I am sure the house listened with interest to the statement of policy of the C.C.F., particularly because many of us recall the varieties of C.C.F. policies on international affairs over the years. Back in the thirties, particularly around 1935 to 1937, the policy of the C.C.F. was, I believe, pacifism; by 1940, after our troops had gone abroad, the policy was to withdraw them from Europe and to sell our goods to both sides and to let the imperialistic powers fight it out; but 1945 the slogan was "Vote for the C.C.F. and help win the war". The varieties and shifts in C.C.F. policy will make one of the most interesting studies in Canada's history when the time comes some day to write the story of the rise and fall of this party.

My story today, however, deals with the international conference on the law of the sea held at the European headquarters of the United Nations in Geneva between February 24 and April 28 of this year. Sometimes in our preoccupation with the high principles and great hopes of the peoples of the world for the achievement of a family of nations living at peace with one another we forget the ordinary workaday procedures of the many hundreds of delegates and representatives of various countries who work, without the bright lights of publicity upon their efforts, and yet move steadily forward in man's progress towards a more peaceful state. This report is a record of one of the more prosaic but none the less tangible steps forward made by mankind in its long and slow progress towards a peaceful civilization.

This conference is one of the most significant of international conferences of recent years and one that has achieved far-reaching results. It is true that much more was heard of the failure of the conference to reach agreement on the matter of fishing limits and the breadth of the territorial seas but may I remind the house and the nation that this was merely one article of 73. One hardly ever hears of the articles passed and which became part of international law, but this conference dealt with problems which were very complex and which had a tremendous range of conflicting interests, namely those of 86 different nations. In order to achieve any sort of agreement with so much complexity and among so many nations is in itself a very substantial achievement.

It will, I know, be a source of satisfaction to hon. members on all sides of the house to learn that during the deliberations the Canadian delegation played a leading role and its contribution, throughout the nine weeks of the conference, will long be remembered as one of the outstanding features of the conference. A good deal of the credit for this must go to the Honourable George Drew who gave such vigorous and imaginative leadership to the Canadian delegation and to the able and devoted team of officials who assisted Mr. Drew as members of that delegation. During my own brief visit to Geneva I was able to observe at first hand that Mr. Drew was regarded on all sides as one of the persons playing a very major part in the conference and one to whom the success of many of the negotiations was due.

It is worth while recalling here that the last conference of a similar type on the law of the sea was held at The Hague in 1930. It was known as The Hague codification conference. At that time some 40 nations participated and the international conference broke down on a single issue, the question of the breadth of the territorial sea. Twenty-eight years later with twice as many nations participating it seems rather significant that this same obstacle to agreement did not bring the conference to failure. The significant thing is that the participants achieved many things that went far beyond anything achieved in the whole history of international law since mankind first began to keep its history.

Specifically, the conference produced four international conventions as well as a protocol providing for the judicial settlement of disputes. These four conventions were (1) a convention on the high seas; (2) a convention on fishing and the conservation of the living resources of the high seas; (3) a convention on the continental shelf; and (4) a convention on the territorial sea and contiguous zone. It was on April 29 that Mr. Drew signed these conventions on behalf of Canada as well as the protocol on the settlement of disputes and the final act of the conference. I might say that Canada was the first nation to sign all six of the instruments embodying the results of the conference. The four conventions and the protocol on the settlement of disputes are, of course, subject to ratification by the government of Canada and will not enter into force until ratified by at least 22 nations. Copies of these conventions have already been tabled by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) and are reported in Votes and Proceedings of July 15.

Before dealing in more detail with the conventions and their significance to Canada it might be of interest to provide a little background on the events leading up to the conference and the method of work adopted by the conference. The conference was called as a result of a resolution by the general assembly of the United Nations on February 21, 1957—Resolution 1105X1. It grew out of the studies and recommendations made over the years by the international law commission of the United Nations which had been meeting since the initial formation of the United Nations in 1946. The commission had given very intensive study to all aspects of maritime law and then produced an extremely comprehensive report. It provided for 73 articles and was a compilation of all the rules of the sea which have been adopted over the years by the various nations. These 73 recommendations or rules have two different aspects to them. On the one hand they sought to codify all existing international law where there was already in existence extensive practice, precedent and doctrine. Then, on the other hand, they were concerned with the progressive development of international law on matters such as the continental shelf that were as yet largely unregulated because 30 years ago at The Hague conference they hardly thought of such a thing. And then, in addition, the conference was asked by the general assembly to consider a matter not included within the compass of the international law commission report the question of access to the sea by landlocked countries.

After a brief plenary session the conference resolved itself into five committees of the whole, each of which was charged with the consideration of a group of related articles. The results of the committees' work were considered in the final plenary sessions during the last week of the conference. The committees and the subject matter referred to each were as follows: committee I, the territorial sea and contiguous zone, and specifically articles 1 to 25 and article 66 of the original I.L.C. report; committee II, the high seas, general regime, and specifically articles 26 to 48 and 61 to 65; committee III, the high seas, fishing, and specifically articles 48 to 60; committee IV, the continental shelf, and specifically articles 67 to 73; and committee V, access to the sea of landlocked countries. That was a new subject to be discussed at the conference itself. It will be seen that the breakdown of the conference into these five committees follows in general the subjects of the conventions I have already listed.

It may be of interest at this point to comment briefly on some of the results of the conference which were of particular significance to Canada. In commenting on this I might point out that for the first time in history there is now an international agreement on the continental shelf. I mention this first because it is usually lost sight of because this subject was uneventful in terms of news coverage and as far as producing quarrels or differences is concerned.

The continental shelf convention gives to the coastal state sovereign rights over the exploration and exploitation of the natural resources of the sea bed and subsoil off its coast out to a depth of 200 meters. It also provides that these rights may be exercised beyond that depth if the exploitation of the resources is a practical possibility. In the long term, this agreement may have consequences of far-reaching importance to Canada in the development of underwater oil and mineral resources. It means, in effect, a very substantial addition to the potential area of Canada's natural resources. Those who have followed with interest the development of techniques in the exploration of resources know that we can drill for oil at depths of 1,500 feet under the surface of the sea.

It is not without significance that it was a proposal put forward by Canada in committee IV that led to the adoption of the convention on the continental shelf nor is it without significance that it was a Canadian proposal to the final plenary session that led to a prohibition against reservations to the three main substantive articles in the convention. To have permitted these reservations might have undermined the whole purpose of the convention. Finally, it was not without significance that it was Canada which proposed that this convention should enter into force when signed by 22 nations instead of 50 as proposed by another power.

The second convention dealt with fishing and the conservation of the living resources of the high seas. The convention on high seas fishing is the first such general convention regulating high seas fishing and it accords well with Canadian interests. It recognizes the special interest of the coastal state in maintaining the productivity of the living resources of the high seas in areas adjacent to its territorial sea. It also entitles the coastal state to take part on an equal footing in any system of research or regulation for purposes of conservation in that area even though its own nationals may not carry on fishing there. To all people who understand the importance of fishing to underdeveloped countries, the significance of this particular article is self-evident. Further, it provides that when conservation measures in the high seas have been adopted by a coastal state, they must be observed by fishermen from other countries. And then finally, under emergency circumstances, coastal states may unilaterally enact the necessary conservation measures on the high seas.

The third important feature to Canada was the question of straight base lines and bays. To those of us who live in the island portions of Canada the fact that our coastline is very irregular hardly comes to our attention but in trying to define territorial waters the sinuosity of our coastline is a matter that gives us considerable concern and therefore these regulations in this regard, as drafted and codified by this international law of the sea, are very important to the future of our country.

In the convention on the territorial sea and the contiguous zone, article 4 provides that where the coast is deeply indented the method of drawing straight base lines from headland to headland may be followed in setting the boundary of the territorial sea rather than following the sinuosities of the coastline. I think the importance of that can be realized. Thirdly, our shoreline now in so far as the territorial sea is concerned is not the line of the high water mark or the low water mark; it is a line drawn from headland to headland. This provision, which reflects the 1951 decision in the well-known Anglo-Norwegian fisheries case is of particular interest to Canada because much of our coastline is deeply indented, as I have already pointed out.

In the committee stage there was a move to impose a limitation of 15 miles on straight baselines which would have had undesirable results for us. However, action by Canada in the plenary session was successful in having this limitation removed. The conference also adopted a provision recognizing that bays with mouths of 24 miles or less are to be regarded as internal waters. This limitation would not, of course, affect bays along coasts where the baseline system is applicable.

The fourth convention deals with the general law of the high seas. The convention on the high seas has perhaps less significance for Canada than the others because, in the main, it simply codifies existing international law. It provides for the first time a systematic compilation of recognized international law on a number of important matters and seeks to ensure the maximum freedom of the high seas. This applies not only to navigation but to fishing on the high seas, flying over the high seas and such activities as the laying of submarine cables and the building of pipe lines under the high seas.

Among other things, the convention deals with such matters as the nationality of ships, safety of life at sea, the suppression of piracy and the slave trade, the right of hot pursuit in certain circumstances and the prevention of pollution of the seas by the discharge of oil or the dumping of radioactive waste. It was, Mr. Speaker, a very thorough compilation of the existing laws of the sea into a code which we now hope will be ratified by the great majority of the nations of the world.

I have referred in brief summary, Mr. Speaker, to some of the highlights of the four conventions. Now I would like to turn to the question of the breadth of the territorial sea and the related question of coastal fishing zones. It is on this subject, of course, that the publicity was given which attracted such widespread public interest. It is unfortunate in one way that this aspect of the conference's work reached so much public interest because it tended to obscure many of the more constructive achievements of the conference. I would like to give some of the background of this matter of the breadth of the territorial sea to see whether we cannot make clear what the problem is and the importance of Canada's contribution so far and what we think it can be in the future.

There has been no uniform practice, Mr. Speaker, in so far as the breadth of the territorial sea is concerned. Generally speaking, the great maritime nations have accepted and enforced the three-mile territorial sea off the coasts of the various countries of the world. Many countries for many years have had breadths of the territorial sea off their countries of more than three miles. There are countries with a four-mile territorial sea; there are several with a six-mile territorial sea and there is one with a nine-mile territorial sea—that is Mexico—and the Soviet union has a 12-mile territorial sea. Some go beyond that, even to the extent of 200 miles. This great variety of claims on the breadth of the territorial sea indicates that there is no such thing as uniformity. Generally speaking, the maritime powers have insisted on and recognized only three miles, even though there has not been any direct challenge to the countries that have territorial seas of different widths. As a matter of interest, the U.S.S.R. has a territorial sea of 12 miles, going back to the days of the Czars and it is not likely that anyone is going to challenge anything that has been in existence for over 50 years.

Having given this background, I think it is now fitting for me to point out that this problem was so complex that the international law commission did not make any definite recommendations to this general conference of the United Nations on this matter, but simply pointed out that 12 miles in its opinion was the maximum limit that they thought should exist. Now, for some time Canada has felt that a 12-mile limit was necessary to protect our fishing interests but we have recognized that an extension of the territorial sea to 12 miles might jeopardize the proper interests of those nations and those people who want to maintain freedom of the sea and freedom for air navigation. Therefore, our dilemma was, how could we reconcile the defence interests, freedom of the seas and the freedom of the air, which really requires a very narrow territorial sea, and the needs of our people on our coasts for some priority in harvesting the fish off their shores?

It is a matter of general knowledge, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time by Canadian law we have forbidden Canadian trawlers to fish within 12 miles of our coasts, and yet, because there is no international law, the trawlers from foreign nations can come inside our 12-mile limit and do fish in waters that the Canadian people do not allow Canadian trawlers to fish in. Quite frankly, we would like to reserve those first 12 miles off our shores for the people who cannot afford the big trawlers and who would like to make a living out of this band of water that they can get to and from with their limited resources as far as capital equipment is concerned.

Now, that was the problem that we faced at this conference, and this goes back for several months and years. The Canadian government proposed what became known as the Canadian proposal. This was first put forward two years ago. Reduced to its simplest terms it was an attempt to reconcile the interests of defence, freedom of the seas and freedom of the air with the interests of the people who live in coastal states and whose living is largely dependent on the products of the sea off that coast. This Canadian proposal was very simply to have a three-mile territorial sea but to have an additional nine miles in which the coastal state would have exclusive rights for fishing. This became known in our minds at least as the three-and-nine mile proposal, three miles of territorial sea, and nine additional miles in which the littoral state would have exclusive fishing rights. At the present time under international law coastal states have certain rights in that 12-mile area with respect to sanitation, fiscal arrangements, customs arrangements and immigration and we thought we would like to extend that principle to include fishing.

I think it can be said, Mr. Speaker, that this suggestion was acceptable to Canadians generally and was supported by all political parties. During the conference the basic conflict was between those states which have fishing interests off their own coasts and those that wish to see the widest measure of freedom to secure or to maintain fishing rights in distant waters off the coasts of other counries. The Canadian suggestion of a fishing zone in which a coastal state would have the same fishing rights as in its territorial sea was an entirely new concept and from the time of its introduction by Mr. Drew at Geneva it affected profoundly the whole course of discussion. Canada played a major role throughout the discussions and negotiations on this matter and it was not for any lack of initiative or good will on the part of Mr. Drew and the Canadian delegation that the Canadian effort to achieve a satisfactory solution was not crowned with some success.

Here I might note that one of the most significant features of the conference was the importance of the position taken by Canada to the newer national states. The Canadian delegation was keenly aware of the legitimate aspirations of these newer nations which have neither traditional claims to established fishing rights in distant fishing waters nor well developed fisheries in their own offshore waters but which are looking more and more to this important source of food and income as a part of their national birthright. In plain language, Mr. Speaker, Canada took the lead among these newer national states in trying to achieve greater economic security and stability for their own people and at the same time to express the new nationalism of their people in a responsible manner. We were very keenly aware of the legitimate demands of these nations.

Our delegation enjoyed the very closest and friendliest relations with the African and Asian delegates, particularly with the very able delegates from our commonwealth partners, Sir Claude Correa from Ceylon, Mr. Bing who represented the new commonwealth nation of Ghana, Mr. Suffian from Malaya and Dr. Bhutto from Pakistan. I want to acknowledge the constructive and important contribution of the delegation from India under the leadership of Dr. Senn.

We also had occasion to work very closely with the delegation from Mexico, particularly Dr. Robles who represented that delegation on the first committee. I should like to pay a warm tribute to Prince Wan of Thailand, the president of the conference, to the able chairmen of the five main committees and in particular Professor K. G. Bailey, solicitor general of Australia, who presided over the deliberations of the first committee which dealt with the vexing problem of the breadth of the territorial sea and fishing zone.

I should like to relate to the house, if I may, an anecdote which occurred on the Friday preceding the very tense and dramatic voting on Saturday in the second last week of the conference when Mr. Dean made a very brilliant exposition of the United States proposal lasting for 45 or 50 minutes. The Hon. Mr. Drew representing the Canadian delegation spontaneously walked up to the podium without notes and, taking about 45 minutes, put forward in one of the most brilliant presentations the case of Canada and the smaller nations as opposed to those who had so-called traditional fishing claims in distant waters. Professor Bailey, the chairman, got up and told the assembled delegates that they would rarely see such a high standard of parliamentary presentation of argument as they had witnessed that day and the whole convention floor of delegates of 86 nations took time out to applaud these two very fine men.

It is my impression that the significance of the Canadian proposal, which was adopted by a simple majority vote of the committee but which did not get the necessary two-thirds majority in the plenary session, was made quite evident in spite of the bitter opposition from most of the major powers. It is my impression that the majority vote accorded the Canadian proposal in committee represents the first time in any United Nations conference that an important substantive matter has passed without the support of any of the five permanent members of the security council. I wish the house could see the picture as I saw it with the United Kingdom, the United States, China, France and the U.S.S.R., together with all their friends over whom they have influence and exercise persuasion, massed against Canada, India, Mexico, Libya and many of the newer and younger nations reaching out for some claim to fish in the waters off their coasts. I wish hon. members could have been there to see the little nations, in spite of all the pressure of the five permanent members of the security council united on one side of a very important substantive issue, mustering a majority. I believe that is the first time the five permanent members have been defeated when they were on one side of an issue.

Although the Canadian proposal was rejected in the plenary session, a new concept of international law has been introduced which must surely be taken into account in any future consideration of this question. In the early stages of the conference the United States of America supported the Canadian proposal. Later, however, the United States delegation introduced a proposal of its own for a 6-mile territorial sea with an additional fishing zone. The fishing zone in the United States proposal, however, was not exclusive because it granted so-called traditional rights in perpetuity in the 6-mile zone.

The United Kingdom had introduced earlier a 6-mile territorial sea proposal which was in reality a 3-mile territorial sea with an additional 3-mile fishing zone. The Canadian delegation made every effort to accommodate these two important and friendly partners. As a matter of fact, it was very much because of our concern over the defence aspects so far as the United Kingdom and the United States were concerned that we originally introduced the proposal for a 3-mile territorial sea and 9-mile fishing zone instead of a straight 12-mile territorial sea.

It was very disappointing when first the United Kingdom and then the United States abandoned the 3-mile rule after we had made such efforts to accommodate them, and after this development the Canadian delegation felt justified in converting its proposal into a 6-mile territorial sea with an additional 6-mile fishing zone, the form in which it received a majority in the committee vote, in an effort to reach general agreement. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the final analysis the central issue before the conference was not whether there should be a fishing zone but whether it should be subject to existing traditional rights as proposed by the United States or whether it should be exclusive and without impediment as proposed by Canada.

It is quite evident that the Canadian proposal had a tremendous impact on the conference. Without this concept there would have been no hope whatever of agreement because of the basic conflict between those states interested in coastal fishing rights and those interested in maintaining the maximum freedom of the high seas. This question remains unsettled for the moment, but it has not been forgotten and is still under very active international consideration. I might point out in this connection that the conference adopted a resolution put forward by Cuba in these words:

> —to request the general assembly to study at its thirteenth session (1958) the advisability of convening a second international conference of plenipotentiaries for further consideration of the questions left unsettled by the present conference.

It is felt in New York, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian delegation will press for a second conference to be held at the earliest possible date to carry on the consideration of this question. I think it is safe to assume that any solution ultimately arrived at will incorporate the Canadian fishing zone concept in one form or another. At any rate, the Canadian position remains that the concept of an exclusive fishing zone should be adopted, and our efforts will be directed to this end. Agreement on a regime of law is very important to us, and to all countries. Without it, conflict and disagreement are inevitable, with dangers to the peace and welfare of all countries.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that agreement can be reached, and when it is achieved Canada will have played a significant part in reaching it. In closing, may I repeat that in spite of the fact that the questions of the territorial sea and the fishing zones have not yet been completely resolved, the conference on the law of the sea can be regarded, both from the Canadian viewpoint and from the standpoint of strengthening international relations, as a most significant milestone.

Mr. Winch: I rise on a point of order. I do this because the minister has said he is drawing to a conclusion. I have not raised the question before, and I think in this I have been considerate. I should like to know under which of the items, 85 to 111, 502 and 542 to 549 this matter comes for discussion? I deliberately waited until the minister had completed his remarks, but I should like to know under which of the items mentioned in this motion the matter to which the minister has referred can be discussed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am not an authority on the matter of estimates, but I am sure in these estimates you will find an item covering the expenses of delegations to overseas conferences. I believe it is also the practice, during these debates on external affairs, for ministers who have been representing their country at international conferences to take this opportunity to give a report to the house on these important conferences.

Mr. Winch: I do not deny that for one moment. I am very happy if the minister and other ministers want to do that. However, I am referring to the motion now under discussion. I feel I was very considerate in not raising the matter until now, but I do believe, sir, it should be drawn to your attention that this is a discussion of external affairs. The opportunity was provided by the government for that particular purpose. We have heard a most interesting summary from the minister but, as a point of order, I should like to know under what item contained in the motion the minister can discuss this subject?

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, surely it is the practice in the house, under the first item of the estimates of a department, to have a general discussion of any item of international affairs. Surely, then, it is in order for the minister to discuss any international conference under that item.

May I ask the minister, before he takes his place, two questions in connection with what he has been saying. Can he tell us whether the policy and attitude of the Soviet union in regard to the Canadian proposal for the width of the territorial sea was the same as that of the United Kingdom, the United States and France? Would he also inform the house whether the Canadian government is going to recognize the action taken unilaterally by Iceland since the conference in establishing its own jurisdiction over a 12-mile zone irrespective of the results of the conference?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not mind dealing with these questions, because they are pertinent and should be answered.

Mr. Winch: May I ask whether or not we are going to deal now with the point of order? I should like to hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) as to the authority for continuing with this report.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Estimate No. 90.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe that on item 1 of the estimates a discussion of a general nature can take place. Naturally, it is preferable to adhere as closely as possible to matters pertaining to external affairs. I do consider that the minister's remarks have been in order to date, and I cannot rule him out of order.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have just about concluded. I was pointing out that in this very important part of Canada's external relations, a part that does not show on the surface, delegations do go to conferences and achieve worth-while results. I have been asked two very important questions by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The first question was, what was the stand of the U.S.S.R.? At the conference the U.S.S.R. had a proposal that the width of the territorial sea should be 12 miles. Then they had an additional clause, over which the lawyers argued back and forth, which would seem to indicate that they believed the territorial sea should be 12 miles or more in certain cases. Their stand, informally, was that they would give support to the Canadian proposal, but that declaration was never made formally on the conference floor. However, countries like India and Mexico, had the definite impression that the U.S.S.R. and their satellite countries were very much in favour of guaranteeing to coastal states exclusive fishing rights for 12 miles.

Canada co-sponsored a proposal with Mexico and India, which more or less accepted the status quo by limiting the territorial sea to what nations already had in effect, and gave exclusive fishing rights up to 12 miles. When the Indians and Mexicans found out the Russians among others were not going to support this, they withdrew and our coalition fell apart. We went back to our original proposal. I might say that the attitude of the smaller nations, if I can report this accurately and I think I can, was one of intense disappointment that the U.S.S.R. position had been one thing in discussion but when the votes were down, and when it seemed possible Canada would get a two-thirds majority, they backed away from supporting us. This affected the good feeling that had existed between the U.S.S.R. and the Afro-Asian nations.

The second question deals with Iceland. We opposed at the conference the idea of any change any nation might make unilaterally, in the hope that there would be no unilateral declarations before a second conference. Since that time Iceland has declared that on September 1 she will have a 12-mile exclusive fishing zone off her territory. As you know, this has been opposed by the United Kingdom. Our stand is still the same. We do not think the answer lies in any nation unilaterally trying to establish any changes in the breadth of the territorial sea or establishing fishing rights in a larger zone, so long as there is any hope of achieving agreement through the United Nations.

Naturally enough, we would oppose such a matter being dealt with in any smaller regional groups because the subject affects nations all over the world. We have an obligation to our allies in this struggle to give to coastal nations some share of fishing off their coasts. We hope that these two civilized nations, Iceland and the United Kingdom, meeting together in some form of bilateral understanding, can resolve these differences or postpone them until they can be dealt with by the United Nations conference, which I hope will come next year.

I should like to repeat that I am quite confident, once we can get rid of the impact of these power blocs and the issue can be clearly dealt with on an economic basis that a decision can be arrived at supported by two-thirds of the nations of the world. If we can achieve some modus vivendi among traditional fishing countries in this period of adjustment, civilized nations dealing with this on a purely economic basis could resolve these differences. If we can achieve agreement on this article dealing with the breadth of the territorial sea and the breadth of the fishing zone off the coasts of our country, we will have achieved something that mankind has looked forward to for nearly 2,000 years.

I should like to close with a statement of my own as far as the visit to Geneva is concerned. I think I can report to the house, as can every other Canadian delegate who has been to any of these international conferences, the growing respect for Canada by people all over the world for our moderation and for the principles on which we operate. I think that we can play a great part which the United Kingdom and the United States cannot play.

Whether we like it or whether we do not, these newer nations of Africa and Asia—and to some extent this is true of the South American republics—sometimes are reluctant to rely too implicitly on the United States and the United Kingdom. To them they sometimes represent a form of something which they have been trying to get away from. At the same time these same nations in Africa and Asia do not want to come under the subjection of imperialistic power which does not give them any freedom whatsoever. They are looking for leadership of a moderate sort. In their minds Canada has no axe to grind. They feel that when we put forward a proposal that we are going to stick to the three-mile zone for the territorial sea and when we tell them why we want to support it, they tend to trust us; and when we advocate moderation on this question of the 12-mile limit they tend to follow us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to inform the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that his time has expired.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have just one sentence more.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Finish it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the minister be allowed to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think that the long term advantages gained at this conference will not only be in the fact that our country is rising in the respect of these nations but that we are winning the battle for the minds and the hearts of men in these new nations. Particularly, with this friendship coming from India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya, Ghana and these moderate Arab states who are looking to our country for leadership, I think that we should try to give it to them.

(Translation):

Mr. Jacques Flynn (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I realize of course the responsibility if not the risk I am taking, and the house will not expect me to venture into the intricacies of the diplomatic process. I do not intend to more than bring out a few general ideas which guide, as they must, our foreign policy.

In the light of developments in these last two weeks, it is appropriate, I believe, that our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) be warmly congratulated for the excellent job he has done in the interest of Canada and peace at United Nations. In my opinion, he has ably expressed Canada's position and like his predecessors, he was a credit to Canada.

The position taken by Canada in the field of foreign affairs can be expressed by two propositions. The first one, a positive proposition, is to promote understanding between all the nations and the second, a negative one, is to prevent armed conflicts and to maintain peace which is essential to the well-being of all nations.

The promotion of understanding between nations is quite in line with our belief that the state must serve the individual and not the other way around. It is in accordance with this principle, Mr. Speaker, that we have gradually come to reject the idea that international conflicts must be settled by force and by war. It is also that philosophy which made us realize the interdependence of nations and, as a consequence, the responsibility of the haves to help the have-nots.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, through the Colombo plan, through similar organizations within the United Nations and through the British Commonwealth of nations, Canada has given help to underdeveloped or economically weak countries and has continued gradually to evolve a policy of assistance to those countries. In fact, I was glad to hear this morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs refer to the gratifying results of this policy of support, of understanding and of assistance to weaker and needier nations. It is a policy of the utmost importance, one that yields better dividends, because it is calculated to ensure world peace.

However, foreign policy aimed at preventing armed conflicts runs into more serious difficulties. It becomes so much more of a problem, due to the fact that our philosophy —and I mean the philosophy of Canada as well as that of other free nations—conflicts with that of the communist countries and their satellites.

But, Mr. Speaker, whether we profess our own philosophy or that of communist countries, the progress achieved in the field of nuclear weapons forces us to extreme caution in the field of international relations, precisely because of that danger, the possibility of a nuclear war.

Undoubtedly, the small conflicts arising here and there could lead to a conflict which might mean world destruction.

The current crisis in the Middle East is extremely serious. It illustrates this ideological conflict between free nations and communist nations. Even if it is not just like the one we had in 1956—and I agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) that it is not of the same nature—I believe that both crises have resulted from the same cause and that the one led to the other. It remains, Mr. Speaker, that the situation in the Middle East is not serious simply because American troops have landed in Lebanon or because British troops are posted in Jordan, nor because there was a revolution in Iraq. It is serious mainly because all those events stem from the very strength of Arab nationalism which began to develop since the rise to power of Colonel Nasser in Egypt.

In itself, that surge of Arab nationalism would not be as threatening as it is, were it not that communist countries are using it as a pretext to move in and to substitute their influence in the Middle East to the traditional influence of France, Great Britain and the United States.

At the time of the Suez conflict, it was possible to confine that outbreak by creating a United Nations force but that force which was sent to Egypt, did not constitute an adequate solution and no doubt, at that time, great hopes were entertained that the crisis had definitely been settled. It was indeed the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition who said on March 15, 1957, I am quoting from page 2351 of Hansard:

> This Middle East problem has been almost continuously before the United Nations assembly since I spoke to this house on external affairs last November and that consideration by the United Nations I think has helped not only to bring the fighting to an end in that area but to prevent the conflict breaking out again or, even worse, spreading.

However, at that time there were reasons to fear that this first conflict might spread and break out elsewhere. May I be allowed to quote a statement made at the time by the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister, in reply to the secretary of state for external affairs, as reported on page 2371 of Hansard. He said:

> First, we said that if necessary we should extend the United Nations police action to cover not only the borders between Egypt and Israel but also the borders between Israel and Lebanon, Syria and Jordan, because we believe it is of the greatest importance that peace must be maintained in that area. We asked that there be a peace treaty arrived at between Israel and the Arab states, and we know the extraordinary difficulties which lie in the road of that. We are convinced also that no matter how annoyed we may feel at certain individuals in the Middle East, no matter how angered we may be by their actions, it would be folly to let either annoyance or anger change us from a settled course. This course must be to secure a settlement in that area, through peace treaties arrived at between the opposing countries.

Now, precisely because the United Nations, at the time, failed to consider settlement of the whole problem, Arab nationalism, abetted by Russia, broke out once more, this time by way of indirect aggression. It is in the face of this indirect aggression, somewhat reminiscent of what happened before world war II, that the role of the United Nations organization becomes most ticklish.

We are a long way from the scene but surely we must be interested in the solution of this problem because today, the interdependence of free nations is an acknowledged fact. In the face of this difficult situation, what has been the policy of Canada and on what principles was it based?

Mr. Speaker, I think that it would not be hard to prove that our attitude in those circumstances has been consistent with our philosophy which rejects the settlement of conflicts by force. We have demonstrated our confidence in the United Nations. However, the United Nations is no stronger than its moral authority which, in turn, depends upon the support of all member nations. We know that this moral authority can fail when one or two great powers withhold their support and also because, too often, the United Nations cannot apply in a practical way the authority it holds from the majority of its members. And I do believe that, if it were possible to solve the technical and practical problems involved, it would be an ideal solution to put a permanent force at the disposal of the United Nations. However, in such circumstances, there would still remain the difficulty of deciding at what time, in case of indirect aggression, this permanent force should step in.

As far as Canada is concerned, it seems to me that our policy should first be determined on the basis of unity of thought.

It is essential that we work out our international policy first on a non-partisan basis, seeking unity of thought within our country. And I believe that, in this field, the present government has continued to apply the principles applied by the former government, seeking the unity of all men of good will in the determination of our policy. I was glad to hear, last Monday, the Prime Minister thanking the Leader of the Opposition for a suggestion he had made, inviting all hon. members to present theirs and assuring them that any of their suggestions would be seriously considered by the government.

Not only should we endeavour to achieve unity of thought throughout the country, but we should also strive to achieve the same unity of thought with our allies, within the British commonwealth and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The British commonwealth, as a result of the diversity of nations which it includes and the diversity of economic interests of these various nations, is a body through which it is possible to work efficiently in favour of peace and understanding between nations. Within the commonwealth, precisely on account of Canada's action to which I referred a moment ago, we contribute, I think, towards greater understanding between peoples of all parts of the world. If within this organization we do achieve some unity of thought in the working out of our foreign policy, I am sure that in the United Nations we shall carry more authority over other member nations. And the situation is almost the same with regard to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which is, of course, a defence organization. However, the latest developments, in my opinion, call for more frequent consultation between all nations belonging to that organization, in order that no unilateral action may be taken, and in order that any decision taken by one member of that body may be communicated to and approved by the others, in advance. In fact, here as well as abroad, we must promote understanding, we must try to understand others and make them understand our point of view.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I believe that our international policy must be realistic. It must be based on facts. Let us be guided by principles, but those principles must be applied to individual facts in all cases. Of course we have reached full nationhood, we are in a position to hammer out our own international policy, and we are doing just that. It would be naïve to contend that our decisions are merely dictated by a feeling of subservience to Great Britain or the United States.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, since reality prevents us from taking decisions based on sentimentality, the danger at the present time is rather that, due to our economic interdependence with the United States, we might be inclined to submit to their dictates.

On the other hand, even if we have reached our maturity, we should harbour no illusion as to our ability to prevent conflicts.

Canada should not repeat the mistake of the frog that would bloat itself bigger than the ox.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, that we realize that our role should be that of a mediator, of a go-between and arbiter within the British commonwealth of nations and within NATO. If we succeed in being accepted as conciliator and mediator within these two organizations, I believe that we stand a much better chance of commanding respect for our views at United Nations. I repeat, it is important that we fully realize that ours must be a personal role, but it is also important that we do not overdo it. As long as we have a proper understanding of this role, and if we are content with it, Canada, in my opinion, will be in a better position to contribute to world peace and to the well-being of nations.

(Text):

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to be able to have an opportunity to say a word about this subject which has evoked such great interest not only in the House of Commons but in this country. I think we have all been much impressed in the last few days to have witnessed a part of the drama of parliament. In those recent days which were more tense than the present the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made his statements on the international situation and we saw evidence of a high level of mature bi-partisanship in the very friendly relationship that existed between him and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I am sure we were all cheered and perhaps even a little thrilled by the drama of this wonderful democratic system of parliament.

I believe, too, that all Canadians followed with much interest and great pride the activities and actions of our distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) as he represented Canada—and indeed, I am sure, at many times he spoke for a certain part of the free world—in these delicate and extremely important conversations which were held in the country to the south of us last week. We are proud of him, Canada is proud of him, and rightly and justly so. This is not the first crisis to stir the Canadian parliament and to interest and arouse the people of Canada and I am sure it will not be the last.

It has been said, and it is all too sadly true, that tensions today are normal. We move from crisis to crisis. We fear perhaps that one will become an explosion with catastrophic and universal effects. Happily, I believe, we live in a world which despite all its disadvantages in this connection at least has this advantage, and that is, the boiling point is higher today than it was some years ago. The nations tolerate and accept incidents which in an earlier period would have evoked a war-like response. Although the potential for destruction is greater than before, the tolerance of the nations today at least allows for a freedom of manoeuvreability into which our statesmanship and diplomacy may flow.

It is perhaps wrong in a general debate of this kind to concentrate all our attention on recent events in one portion of the world. Therefore perhaps I might seek in a few words to present my point of view—I am proud and happy to belong to a party which allows a backbencher to express his point of view and listens to it—on a subject so important as the relationship of some of the immediate events with the general pattern of world diplomacy.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

The whole picture of diplomacy has changed. I can remember studying geography much less than a half century ago and at that time we learned about the great powers. I think there were seven in my day. Most of them were European and certainly the great burden of responsibility rested on the continent of Europe. We used to see an arrangement of power alignments among various members of the group of great powers. For a long time that situation prevailed and the responsibility for world peace was primarily that of Europe. Throughout the outreaches of the world the great stabilizing power of the British navy was ever-present.

Those calmer, quieter days are gone forever. We now have a situation in which two leading super-powers—one quite non-European and the other as much Asiatic as European—loom on the horizon of international affairs. The relationships between these two powers in all parts of the world form an essential part of every equation in the consideration of diplomatic questions because whether we like it or not we must accept the fact that the diplomatic interests of the U.S.S.R. and of the U.S.A. are worldwide. In recent times we have seen occasions when the interests of these two great powers have come into conflict and at some times in certain sensitive areas on the periphery of soviet power we have encountered threats that were very serious, just as threatening and dangerous as the situation through which we are now passing.

We can remember shortly after the conclusion of the second world war the problem of Iran. Then, we remember also when it was in northern Greece that the two worlds were in contact, in unhappy and bloody contact. Then, it was Korea and before that it was Berlin. I remember that over the Berlin blockade there was great danger and great anxiety, and it was the masterly display of united power that brought about a solution of that very grave situation.

Then, another place was Indo-China where the two worlds met and some kind of accommodation was necessary. I suppose a very simple illustration would be for one to look at a map of the world which we see in 1958 and compare it with one for 1938. If we did that we would see one fundamental effect of diplomatic life, and that is the tremendous spatial expansion of the Soviet union. Its growth, its extension, has been phenomenal.

We remember, too, that at one time the United States had a policy which was called a policy of containment and we used to speak about the Truman doctrine. I am one of those who still believes that the doctrine of containment was a good doctrine and that the Truman policy was a good, sound and very effective policy for dealing with the new situation which had then developed. The Berlin airlift was an expression of that and was one of the great triumphs of the western world when in unity, dignity and strength we stood by our position and we won. It is very easy—and I find a great tendency in Canada to do this—to criticize the errors, the miscalculations and the blunders of the United States in recent times in the field of foreign policy. But I think it is essential for us as an ally of the United States to consider at all times some of the difficulties and some of the realities of its position and therefore of ours.

The role of the western world has been essentially defensive. We have allowed the initiative—because we had to—to lie with the Soviet union, so we never knew just where on this great area of contact the excesses of tension would break out. At the same time it requires massive power on the part of the United States to stand ever-prepared for such a situation. It also requires great efforts on the part of the United States to bring together alliances of friends in strategic areas as an important development of its own military might. Much of the activity of the United States in the last 10 years has been in the development of those two arms of defence.

The magnitude of the responsibility of the leader of the western world has been immense. There is one that I think it is proper for a group of parliamentarians to consider. It is this, that in its diplomacy the western world must operate in the framework of popular democracy and always with regard for the moral content of our diplomatic values. We can never, in our part of the world, judge any action in purely strategic or military terms.

A few years ago there was a suggestion, which never was a very serious one, that the United States, for strategic reasons, should launch a preventive war. Whether or not, even in the narrow strategic and military sense, that would have been feasible, it was utterly impossible with the sense of values we have; but yet it was not impossible for the Soviet union to take the action which it took in Hungary not long ago. It is not under the same moral restraints as a free country with ideals and ethics which its people insist upon. This cannot be forgotten. Indeed, I think it should always be remembered in our occasionally, ill-advised, perhaps sometimes ungenerous criticism.

If there is one thing I believe in, not only in the history of democracy but in the history of any political or social development, it is that it is very difficult to be dogmatic, to be certain and to be self-confident. I wish I could be as sure as some members who have spoken that the action at Suez some months ago was altogether wrong, or that I could so easily and so thoroughly condemn the attitudes of the United States and the United Kingdom when, in the first moments of flux, of uncertainty—(indeed, I think the only certain thing was that a dangerous situation existed)—and believe that that immediate action was wrong, was immoral. As I say, I cannot be sure about these things; there are too many "if's"; that we can only read back into those events in the light of the things which are possible. But, as we look forward to the summit conference, we can recognize that this, too, is a part of a continuing policy.

I am sure we all were impressed the other day when the Prime Minister referred to this country's attitude on a summit meeting and said, as reported at page 2473 of Hansard:

> I still believe that no nation should or dare shut the door on any matter that offers the prospect of any solution or even a diminution of international tensions.

This attitude is not at all inconsistent with a sustained posture of strength in a determination to support and maintain the position of the western world, because the two great power agglomerations today must establish some basis of accommodation, else the prospect of the future is too awful to contemplate. Therefore, I think it shows a good perception of the existing situation that our country should take an important part in arranging for the forthcoming summit meeting.

It is not my intention to discuss the various technical arrangements or make an appraisal as to whether it would be more beneficial to hold the meeting at the United Nations or elsewhere, but I do think that the general emphasis upon the universality of the United Nations' responsibility is all to the good and I think our government and our country, for this is not a partisan matter, should be commended for its action.

The present area of tension is certainly not a new one. All down through the years, from the very early days of man's social experience, this part of the world has been a trouble spot.

It has been the meeting place of continents. It has been the lifeline of ancient empires.

It has been a buffer zone between east and west, often vulnerable to attack. The rough boots of the conquering invader have perhaps been heard more times over this area than in any other part of the world.

Here again in our own time we have the same area causing universal concern. But we have here factors of tension in the situation which are somewhat unique. We have fomenting in the Middle East the heady new wine of nationalism, an expression of national feeling which was very strong in Europe a century ago and very weak in other parts of the world. But now the situation is quite different and nationalism is a potent factor in Asia and Africa. I believe this was portrayed so well by a representative of an Asian nation at the United Nations some years ago when, after discussing the splendid job of administration which had been done in his country by Great Britain, he went on to say that good government is no substitute for self-government. That attitude, that very deep-seated thinking, is something which cannot be ignored.

There are other factors that are difficult to understand in their entirety and to which it is perhaps difficult to adjust ourselves. We have not only a feeling of nationalism there but strong forces leading to some kind of union among various states whose separate existence is somewhat incongruous. Many movements like to find a prophet and the present dictator of Egypt obviously aspires to be the leader of the great movement of pan-Arabism although, it would be wrong to say that he led it or created it. Perhaps he merely appropriated it. But the ambitions of the Egyptian dictator are very clearly set out in these words in a book which he wrote:

> When I consider these hundreds of millions, I emerge with a sense of the tremendous possibilities which we might realize through the co-operation of all Moslems . . . enabling them and their brothers in faith to wield power wisely and without limit.

This man is the man on the scene today, a man who has the tremendous psychological impact of this feeling behind him. Perhaps in recent years we have failed, as other speakers have mentioned, to realize fully and to appreciate the forces of nationalism in this key area. I think the efforts of the western alliance were very clear. The attempt was made to build a bridge of support right across the northern tier of the Middle East, as it was called. But this was never developed with strength and in our time we have seen the constant withdrawal of western power. The withdrawal of western power seems to delight some members but whether or not it is greeted with delight or something else it has certainly happened. France withdraws from her former mandates.

Britain departs from the Suez and Sudan. She forsakes Palestine. Then into this vacuum of power comes indirect Russian power and the highly activated development of nationalism.

One hon. member has pointed out that it must be recognized that the Soviet union has interests in the Middle East. Russia has had interests in the Middle East for many years and no one denies that. Indeed Russian interest was a very definite part of the strategy and diplomacy of that period. Fifty years ago Great Britain and Russia made an arrangement as to sphere of influence in Persia. One of the agreements among those many unhappy agreements before the first world war dealt with the realization of an old Russian dream, control of Constantinople. If we remember the Victorian era, the great emphasis in British foreign policy at that time was on the containment and curtailment of Russian penetration into the Middle East. We might recall one figure who was identified with that policy, that great statesman Benjamin Disraeli.

The Middle East for over 2,000 miles bounds upon the territory of Russia or of her satellites or her allies. Her interest there is very great and she is pursuing it with all the means at her disposal, nonetheless significant or effective because often indirect.

In the Middle East we find that one of the old factors in the equation has been removed, and that is the traditional friendship between Arabs and Britons. It is a long story and it is not altogether a happy story. There were many misunderstandings, some broken promises, some agreements which perhaps should never have been made and others which perhaps should never have been broken. But in any case that old friendship is gone and it can no longer be relied upon when we consider this part of the world and this portion of the diplomatic equation.

It is always a part, of course, of every country's foreign policy to accommodate itself to new conditions. We cannot now deny the fact of Arab nationalism. Nor can we deny the fact of what is called Nasserism. It is too late to cast recriminations as to how Nasserism was created or how it was fostered. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who declared that we must, in following our policies in this area, have reference to the interests, needs and desires of the millions of people living there. I think that in the long run that will be in our interests too.

The Leader of the Opposition and the Secretary of State for External Affairs were profoundly right when they pointed out that beyond this immediate crisis there is great urgency and great need for long-range consideration as to what will be done about the Middle East. The western record there in recent years has not been a glorious one. We have suffered reverses. There is more that we can do and we must take the initiative. We in Canada are proud of the fact—I hope it is a wholesome and not a smug pride and I think it is the former—that we do not have a legacy of ill will there, that we are not suspect. We say that our record is good. That being the case, I think it behooves us to take more responsibility.

I have been impressed in recent years how, with the development of Canadian diplomatic posts across the world, we seem to have been so neglectful of the Middle East. There were areas there in which we should have had more highly developed listening posts than we did have. I think we could have used our position to better advantage. We could make use of our reservoir of good will and our recognition of the importance of the economic question.

We have confidence, I think, in the immediate developments. We listened with great interest as the Secretary of State for External Affairs recounted the steps which the United Nations were to take. We will follow with interest the activities of UNOGIL. However, none of these things can ever be regarded as in any way a permanent solution to the problems. Our country has not been very long in this field of foreign policy. It is only a few years, historically speaking, since Sir Robert Borden won for us a place in the international field, so to speak. We have been doing rather well, but I am sure that the challenges before us will be ever greater. I am confident that, aware of the responsibilities which we have, our response to them will be fuller, more complete, than ever before.

I hope that we will never forget that, differ as we may in the details amongst the members of the western alliance, and using our influence as we might to try to persuade the policies of those who are stronger than we are, the greatest folly of all would be to contribute in any way to the weakening of the basic unity which must exist between members of the western alliance. If there was one thing which was more disturbing than anything else in the recent Suez crisis it was the fact that there appeared to be a weakening of that essential unity which must exist between members of a free alliance dedicated to the same principles, principles which we must pursue with vigour and determination in these very tense days.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): It is a fortunate circumstance, Mr. Speaker, that makes it possible for me to participate in this debate following the distinguished member from Prince Edward Island who has just spoken. It is not the first time I have heard him speak on the very important subject of external affairs, because just a few years ago we were more or less linked in a common interest in these matters out in my own city of Brandon. I am sure the members of the house would agree that his contribution has been enlightening and helpful this afternoon.

I have been impressed during this discussion with the unanimity that appeared on all sides. Every member who has contributed to this discussion so far has joined in agreeing that during the past few days we have been faced with the most critical situation that has confronted the world since the end of world war II, in the events that have transpired in the Middle East. I am not going to endeavour to look at this problem from the standpoint of praise and blame. I was impressed the other day, as I listened to the distinguished Prime Minister for Ghana, who I thought made an excellent contribution to the whole approach to foreign affairs, when he said he was not going to pass any judgment. It would be foolish, and it would be premature, because we are dealing with matters that are so complex that only the Almighty himself could understand actually what has transpired and what might inevitably result therefrom.

There has been the common reaction that we, in this chamber, have been deeply disturbed and troubled by the events. I think the general feeling that has gone across the country has been that we have been hovering in the shadow of a possible outbreak of world war III. Perhaps one of the reasons for such a deeply troubled feeling in the country is that these events are taking place in the Middle East. The Middle East is generally regarded as the cradle of civilization, as it is from that area that the three great western religions have had their source, Judaism, Moslemism and Christianity. Yet, notwithstanding the historic past in this part of the world, it has almost seemed in recent years that what we have regarded as the cradle of civilization might become, unless we are very careful and unless we are very wise in the way we handle this problem, the grave of civilization. I believe that is the spirit that has been present in this discussion this afternoon and is the universal attitude in regard to these matters. Mankind has the feeling that he lies under the threat of universal Hiroshima.

Of course, the Middle East problem is not the only trouble spot in the modern world. Like the previous speaker, I feel we in this mid-twentieth century period have almost become accustomed to living from crisis to crisis. It is these circumstances that arise which add to the confusion of the twentieth century in which we have seen social and political change move forward at such tremendous speed it has been quite impossible for the mind of man to keep abreast, and certainly it has been impossible for our social institutions to keep up with these changes.

In every generation, the record of history tells us that there are times of social change and social confusion. In fact, if we were to go back to the beginning of the record in scripture, we would find in the opening verses of the Book of Genesis a description of the beginning of things which would tell us that the pattern that has unfolded since that time has been typical of the situation in human affairs. We are told that in the beginning God created the world. Then, the words go on to say:

> And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep.

Finally, we are given a ray of hope:

> And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.
> And God said, let there be light: and there was light.

In that second verse I think we have a very apt description of the situation confronting those of us in the twentieth century, namely that the affairs of men are without form and void and darkness is brooding over the face of the earth. The events of recent days and of recent years have definitely demonstrated that there is continuing chaos and confusion.

It has been my privilege, Mr. Speaker, since I came into this house, to take part in several debates on external affairs. I have done so only infrequently because these matters deal with complex matters that cannot be discussed without considerable thought and consideration. I remember the discussions that revolved around Canada's participation in NATO. I remember the heart searching there was when we were considering the proposal of German rearmament and German participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. At that time it was thought that here was the main trouble-spot in the world and that here would be the possible source in the future of any serious outbreak of hostilities. It might be that such is still the case because we are still confronted with the very vexing problem of German reunification. I agreed entirely with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) when he emphasized that we should not forget the role of the NATO nations during the present crisis, and that is something we must continually keep in the back of our minds.

Then the trouble-spot moved towards the Far East to Korea, Formosa, Indo-China and all those other areas that have marked the headlines of our newspapers during the years that have gone by in the recent past. We thought that there might be the final source of the outbreak of hostilities which is universally dreaded by mankind everywhere. But now attention has been focused on the situation in the Middle East. As a result of the Suez event, and as a result of the continuing difficulties on the Israeli frontier I sometimes feel that we are forced to the conclusion that today the way to Washington and Ottawa and London may be through New Delhi and Cairo.

It seems to me that a new power situation has emerged in the world or at least has become clarified. The trends have been there for some time but it is only in recent years that these trends have emerged in a distinctive form. I refer to the awakening of the underdeveloped countries in Asia and Africa, their demands for independence and self-government and the rising claim of the coloured races to their share of the world's goods.

As I look at the situation, Mr. Speaker, and as I have seen the pendulum of the threat of war swing from Europe to the Far East and now to the Middle East, I am almost forced to the conclusion that this awakening of the peoples of Africa and Asia is a more significant development than even the events of world war I and world war II and even more significant than the rise and fall of Hitler and nazism or the Russian revolution. As a result of these new forces in world affairs we are no longer faced with the power situation that confronted us immediately following the war. I refer to the so-called east-west bloc with the west on one side of the chasm and the east on the other, the west led by the United States of America and the east led by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, separated by the unbridgeable chasm in world affairs since the end of world war II.

But now in the world we have this new situation—we might almost call it a third force—the tremendous political power of the upsurge of nationalism in the underdeveloped countries and their increasing desire and demands for a place in the sun. These nations are largely the smaller neutral nations. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that they are exerting and are going to exert in the future an influence to which we in the west must pay increasing attention.

I say that this force represents a neutral force because as I have examined the situation and as I have listened to spokesmen and as I met some of those spokesmen here is what I found. Judging from their statements and their comments, they have no particular desire to be drawn in the direction of either the western orbit or the eastern orbit. That point was underlined by the prime minister of Ghana when he spoke in this house the other morning. I merely quote his words to emphasize that point. He spoke of a positive neutralism. As the Hansard record reveals it, he said this:

I should like to take this opportunity to comment on certain aspects of our foreign policy. Basically the policy of our government is one of non-alignment and positive neutrality. I have emphasized on several occasions, however, that this should not be interpreted as a purely negative neutralism. On the contrary, we will always adopt whatever positive policy will do most to safeguard our independence. We have a vested interest in peace, and we will do everything in our power to support the United Nations.

I think we make a mistake, Mr. Speaker, if we regard the cause, so far as our relationships with these new uncommitted countries are concerned, as a lost cause. Out of the present disturbance in the Middle East I am optimistic enough to believe that there yet will come a new and more positive approach to these difficulties. Actually I suppose that the real motivation in the thinking of these neutral powers today is their mortal fear of the military force concentrated in the so-called civilized nations of the east and of the west.

In this debate so far it seems to me that the shadow of the Suez crisis has been hovering near. In his remarks the Leader of the Opposition made some reference to this matter this afternoon. It is true that there are certain similarities that can be noted in reference to the Suez crisis and the present difficulty. It was a manifestation of anti-colonialism which is peculiar to these neutral nations.
