Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at the supper hour I had been dealing with what I regard as a very important development in the power structure of international affairs and pointing out that no longer is a two-power world a valid concept. I mean by that the old east-west motion of power politics that prevailed after world war II. It seems to me that the rising influence of the neutral, uncommitted nations is the most significant development in international affairs in recent times. They have the legitimate desire to strive for a place in the sun.

As I understand the problem of the Middle East it would certainly appear that in the background, at least as the basic motivating force, is this desire for self-government, for independence, for a place in the sun on the part of an increasing number of underdeveloped regions. The Middle East situation has been at the boiling point for some years. As the house rose I was making a comparison with the events that took place at the time of the Suez crisis—this was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon—and was about to comment that in those events we can trace the growing wave of anti-colonialism.

I recall, for example, during the last war when I had the privilege of being in the Middle East in the uniform of the Royal Canadian Air Force that even as far back as 18 years ago that underlying hostility to the west could be felt on all sides. It is also significant that the mere fact that I and other Canadian servicemen were wearing the Canada badge at that time caused us to be regarded with special respect by the people in the city of Cairo, where we had contact from time to time during our visits to that area.

That spirit of anti-colonialism is present today in much greater intensity. It is generated by this striving toward nationalism. Certainly it has been encouraged by a political figure such as Nasser but it would be present even had Colonel Nasser not risen to a position of influence in the Middle East at the present time. Some one has said that no matter what attempts are made to the contrary, under the upsurge of interest in the United Arab Republic, federation will take place regardless of other considerations.

At the time of the Suez situation there was a fundamental difference from the condition prevailing at the moment. There was an unfortunate confusion and division in policy amongst the nations of the west. This prevailed in both the NATO countries and the countries of the commonwealth. To my mind that was the most unhappy aspect of the whole Suez crisis. I felt at the time, and I stated in the debate that took place on that occasion, that Britain's withdrawal from the Middle East would leave a power vacuum that was bound to create even greater trouble in the future. There is not a doubt in the world but that the present machinations there have been intensified and facilitated by the departure of British influence from that area. I believe this point was made this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition, and I thought it was rather speculative, that if Britain had not gone through with its intervention in that area in that particular incident then Nasser would have been crushed by the Israeli forces. My understanding of the British intervention at that time was that it was a desire to stop hostilities in the fear that their continuation might precipitate a third world war which is feared so much in all parts of the world.

There is a very much happier note in the crisis we are facing today. There is a spirit of unity of purpose and unity of policy amongst the commonwealth nations as well as amongst the nations participating in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I should like to express a word of appreciation at this time to both the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) for the important part they have played in making possible this present spirit of unanimity amongst the nations of the west. They have exerted initiative in exactly the right amount and at precisely the correct moment to make it possible for the western forces to rally around a common meeting point. In so doing for the first time Canada is beginning to enter into that long-desired role where she is initiating policy of her own rather than being a mere echo of either the British viewpoint or the viewpoint of our neighbour to the south, the United States of America.

It is a happy state of affairs when we see the commonwealth and western nations working together in a unity never achieved before to meet a common crisis. It goes without saying, too that we are all delighted that this problem is finding its way back to the United Nations and that the prestige of the United Nations is not being undermined by any attempt to institute deliberations outside the framework of that organization. A large part of the credit for the initiative in this regard, I feel, goes to the Prime Minister and our Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Having said that much about the note of unanimity I must add a further word concerning the general approach to the problem confronting us. It seems that the concept of power politics is still the basic approach of the west to the settling of these disturbed conditions. The very fact that we have had to adopt at least military acts by landing troops in the trouble area is a confession of our own failure to grasp the essential nature of the problem and to try to reconcile this growing spirit of nationalism with the interests of the western nations in the Middle Eastern area.

It does not need any emphasizing to make the point that in this hydrogen age it is no longer possible to maintain the balance of power by means of the old power politics idea. It is much too dangerous a balance to try to resolve on that basis. That is why it is so disturbing when we read remarks by the premier of the soviets as quoted in an editorial of the Globe and Mail today, as follows:

> Let the imperialists beware. We are revolutionaries. We are Marxists and we are delighted when the colonial nations rise up and cast off their chains. The boot of the foreigner must be removed from their soil.

That is not the kind of attitude that is going to bring about the necessary reconciliation of viewpoint and interests at this time. There had been an encouraging indication, particularly since 1956, that the Russian emphasis on power politics, the effectiveness of power politics in the world struggle had diminished somewhat. They seemed to be backing away from a brutal power concept. For example, they had minimized somewhat their stress of the theory of the inevitability of war in achieving desired ends, and also there seemed to be a softening of belief in the necessity for civil war for the seizure of power in any outside nation. More recently, too, there has been the tendency to emphasize the economic struggle rather than the political or the military struggle. It is to be hoped that spokesmen of the U.S.S.R., when they come together in the contemplated summit conference, will adopt a much milder tone than in the statement that was released by the Russian premier in response to the statement of the President of the United States of America.

I cannot get out of my mind that in the background somewhere in the thinking of the soviets there might be mischief contemplated and I still remember the quotation of Premier Khrushchev when he said ,"Always remember that the bear can crush just as effectively with a hug as it can with a blow." That is provocative language and it is language that should not be used if we are to have any success at all in the summit conference.

I say that the old concept of power politics is outmoded by the very nature of the world in which we live. We could not keep up to the soviet in adopting this technique even if we tried. The Minister of External Affairs (Mr. Smith) referred to the subtle intervention penetration of the soviets and the difficulty of analysing the nature of this subtlety. That is quite true. A monolithic state such as the soviets is always at an advantage in this regard. There are no democratic inhibitions, no rules to follow, and on top of it there is the strong outthrust in the cold war of communism as a new world religion. We just cannot compete in the same league with that kind of approach.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that our approach at this time—and I am sure the sharp reaction of all the leaders of the west indicates that they realize the difficulty—toward a solution of the problem must be other than that of the outmoded power politics. Already we have made very remarkable forward steps in this regard, and I refer now to the attempts of the west to provide economic assistance to those under-developed areas in a gesture of good will and of understanding. It is a great step forward when we reach the point that we are more and more interested in offering economic aid than we are in providing military aid to assist those new and developing neutral nations.

I could spend some time this evening, were time available, in analysing the role that oil plays in the present problem of the Middle East. There is not the time but I think we are aware that if we are to avoid further alienation of the neutral nations we must make it quite certain that we have only their best interests at heart, that we want to assist them in every way to achieve their legitimate desires for independence and self-government.

My final point, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps the main point that I wish to bring before the house tonight. It deals further with this subtle approach, this subtle intervention that is the growing influence in world affairs at the present time. I refer to the impact of psychological warfare, the psychological factors in the cold war, the role that values play in influencing world events. At the time of Suez the United States prided itself on the fact that it had struck the correct moral tone in its approach to that problem and condemnation was heaped upon Britain and France because they had acted independently of the United Nations, outside the moral framework of our Christian ethic. Well, as far as that went at the time I could agree with the United States postulate. It is very important that we exert a proper moral leadership. The difficulty was that having, as they claimed to have, achieved a position of prestige and world leadership in the Middle East, the United States did not move fast enough to consolidate that position.

We always have to look at these problems from two standpoints, the standpoint of political realism as well as the standpoint of idealism. We in the west are essentially idealistic. The Americans and Canadians are particularly idealistic but I am afraid there are times that our idealism is so badly adulterated by materialism that we cannot see the woods for the trees, as it were. President Eisenhower has said that in the end result there is very little difference between atheistic materialism and theistic materialism. The soviet system is quite unashamedly materialistic.

They believe in the efficacy of physical power, prowess and military force. We have depended upon these things only because we have felt ourselves forced by outside pressures and threats.

Yet as a theistic society, we too have become saturated by theistic materialism. Our symbols of democracy, those things that we would wish to bring before people who in the first instance actually receive their inspiration from the west through our missionaries, our religious missionaries, our church missionaries, our political emissaries, our commercial salesmen, have been confused by these people with such physical achievements as skyscrapers, juke boxes, refrigerators and the like. Sometimes too it seems to me that the symbols of democracy are obscured completely by the very struggle for existence of these underdeveloped nations.

A truism that used to be preached by General Booth of the Salvation Army was that you cannot preach to a man with an empty stomach. I am quite sure that we cannot expect these nations, with their low standard of living and faced with very difficult economic circumstances, to understand our democratic ideas as long as all their time is consumed in the task of eking out a bare existence.

My time is expiring, Mr. Speaker, and I must bring these remarks to a close. I think we are in a much happier position in the present crisis than we were at the time of Suez. Canada has added laurels to the lustre that is already ours because of our participation in world affairs down through the years. The Prime Minister of Ghana paid us a generous tribute in speaking in the house last Monday when he said that he was greatly impressed by Canada's record in the field of international affairs in recent years. I believe firmly that at the summit conference and out of the present discussions and deliberations we will see a coming together of the leaders of the various nations of the world, a closer understanding of the basic issues and an attempt to get at the common humanities underlying the skin of each one of us. If we get the other man's point of view I think we can go a long way in helping to resolve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I recall an interesting discussion at the United Nations in the fall of 1955. The very delicate and difficult race problem in South Africa was under discussion. I remember that the representative of Indonesia was speaking. He said that the white man believes that the only solution for the problem of South Africa is for all blacks to turn white. With a smile and with a good natured chuckle he went on to say, "I have got another solution for the problem. Why should not all white men turn black?" You see Sir it all depends how you look at the situation.

We have many problems to contend with but I think the basic solution is that we interpret correctly our way of life, the values underlying our way of life. As the United Nations charter so ably puts it, if wars begin in the minds of men it is in the minds and hearts of men that the defences of peace must be built. Canada has made a great contribution to that great structure in the past and will make even greater contributions in the critical days that lie immediately ahead.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the debate that has taken place on the resolution proposed today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) represents the common desire of all of us in the house to assist the government in the very difficult responsibilities confronting it at this time. At the same time each of us is anxious to bring forward views that we believe are directed towards that particular objective. We may not all agree on the details of foreign policy of the government of our country but I am sure that all of us in the house without exception are united by a common purpose on a common understanding of the difficult problems involved and confronting each country in the world at this particular moment.

Like my leader I should like to say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we on this side of the house, free from direct responsibility, extend to him, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the other members of the government our best wishes for a satisfactory discharge of their responsibilities in respect of these matters, some of which in other days have engaged the attention of some who have spoken today. Possibly in my case I can say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, remembering the period when I did have a status best described by saying that I was in statu pupillari, that I have for him nothing but best wishes in the discharge of responsibilities which are his for some months.

I echo at once the words of my leader who expressed his faith in the United Nations and in its charter. As one who has spent a good part of his life in a less effective way at the league of nations and at the United Nations, I feel that it is well that we should have had today, through one who has played such a great part in current events in our time, an expression of faith in the value of the charter and in the concept of collective security as a means of bringing about order in a disturbed world. I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will not begrudge me this opportunity to say that. We have been proud of my leader in his former capacity of secretary of state for external affairs and as a great exponent of peace in our time. But we thought today that in the bold initiative he took in his speech he lived up in an exceptional way to the high standards which he has set for himself in this important field of human endeavour.

He began his speech by suggesting to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that as the general assembly would meet in normal session some time in the month of September, consideration might be given by the Canadian delegation to a strong sponsorship and initiative regarding certain matters that have a bearing on whether or not we are going to be able to ease current international tension and make a contribution in a positive way to the preservation of peace in the world.

He suggested we might take the initiative at the assembly in the matter of trying to bring about some agreement that would lead to the arresting or stopping of the manufacture of nuclear weapons, now confined to three powers; that secondly, we might put forward in a way acceptable to a wide number of nations an agreement that would lead to the suspension of tests, he suggested for a period of five years, under the supervision of the United Nations; and, thirdly, echoing one of his favourite themes, he urged that in the face of the current international situation we might find great encouragement for pressing forward with the establishment of a permanent United Nations police force.

I am sure that all members on all sides of the house, including the Prime Minister, whose interest in this matter was represented by the interrogation he levelled at the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), will agree, at least in principle, that the principle of collective security as envisaged by its authors at San Francisco can be effectively realized by the acceptance of an additional principle of collective security and by doing indirectly what it has not been possible to do directly because of the intransigence of the Soviet union in respect of the implementation of article 43 of the charter of the United Nations. Whether or not it is possible to establish a permanent United Nations police force remains to be seen. But undoubtedly, if we are to pursue the original concept of the interdependence of the nations of the world as envisaged by Her Majesty's Prime Minister in the United Kingdom, this is the next phase towards which we must seek to develop the principle of collective security, attempted in 1919 in the covenant and so unfortunately rejected finally in September of 1939 by so many members of the league of nations.

Then, my leader spoke of the importance of initiative, not irresponsible initiative but initiative on the part of nations who have won respect of their fellow members in the United Nations, capable of providing constructive solutions for difficult problems. Possibly no one had a greater right to suggest that we should pursue this tactic of initiative than my leader, who perhaps more than any other man in the last decade, has day in and day out at the United Nations himself given an example of what responsible initiative can mean towards the achievement of good purposes amongst the nations. He expressed the views, and I think we all associate ourselves with this, that we are proud of the role of Canada in recent days. This does not mean that every particular act of the administration commends itself to us. Indeed, speaking for myself, it would be possible to argue that in the first few hours of this current situation there might be found occasion for justifiable wonder as to the actual course that the government of our country had in mind.

Whether or not that is right, the fact is that subsequent events, declarations of the Prime Minister in this house, statements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the United Nations, the reported meetings that he has had with his opposite number in the United Kingdom and the United States, all suggest that the role of Canada in the past few days has been such as to warrant the observation of my leader that we approve in a general way the role of Canada in these recent days. However, I wonder why the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he spoke today about meetings in Washington on Friday of last week with Mr. Dulles and with Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, referred to the reports made in the United States press as to the nature of Canada's contribution. It may be that because negotiations on these matters sometimes obviously must be private at certain stages he could go no further. But it would have been helpful, assuming that under the circumstances it would have been desirable for him to do so, to have an account from him of precisely the position that Canada took in the conversations that were held at that time, prior to the conversation he had the following day on this crisis with the secretary general of the United Nations.

We had today from my leader, I think, a valuable historical statement of the situation in the Middle East, a historical narrative that puts its problems in prespective. Then, associated with that, was the concrete proposal made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs who spoke first. Speaking of the situation historically in the Middle East, my leader mentioned the constant strife that has prevailed in that theatre, without attributing to any particular source the cause of the strife, indicating the competitive forces that persist; the interest of the Soviet union currently and historically in the Middle East; the animosities that prevail between the various groups, and suggested that whatever kind of formula eventuates we must bear in mind these impotrant historical facts, amongst which is the natural urge of the people of the Middle East, as well as other nations, for self-determination. We must note their desire to use whatever help they can get, from whatever quarter, to further their nationalist aspirations. We must recognize, too, that these aspirations, no matter what will happen within the next few months, are bound in the processes of human history, to assert themselves as they have asserted themselves in the past. I thought he left the implication that what we must seek to do is avoid creating any unduly lengthy breach of misunderstanding between the western nations and these nations in the Middle East.

It undoubtedly was because of considerations of this sort that the Secretary of State for External Affairs projected the idea that one way of bringing about stability in the Middle East would be to provide for some form of international guarantee of the neutrality of Lebanon. When I first heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs make this proposal, without in any way disagreeing with it, but reflecting on what it meant, I found myself hoping that the Secretary of State for External Affairs might have found it possible—he undoubtedly had his reasons for not doing so—to explain the reasons which prompted him to underline this very interesting suggestion, which I noted during the dinner hour was made in a recent issue of Le Monde.

The article in that newspaper called attention to the fact that Lebanon vis-à-vis the other nations of the Middle East for a long time has occupied a position of unofficial but acknowledged neutrality, a neutrality that was respected historically up until perhaps a year ago by the adoption of the Eisenhower doctrine, a position which the Secretary of State for External Affairs compared to the guarantee of neutrality given to Austria in the treaty of peace signed by the Soviet union and certain western powers four or five years ago.

I am sure there is much merit in the suggestion made today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. However, I am sure that he would agree with me that the guaranteeing of the neutrality of Lebanon to preserve the national integrity of that historic little community and state could serve as a pilot project for guaranteeing the neutrality of other countries in the Middle East as well. One thinks, of course, immediately of Israel. Certainly to guarantee the integrity of Israel would be a stabilizing factor in the Middle East. But one should not even stop with Israel. Guaranteeing the neutrality of other nations of the Middle East by these nations themselves and by other nations of the world might well prove to be an extremely important factor just as the neutrality of Austria in recent years has proved to be a valuable asset and as the neutrality of Switzerland for a long period now has served as an extremely useful facet in the conduct of international affairs.

I would hope that I do not misread the objectives that the government has in mind and particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs in saying that not only would we want to guarantee the territorial and national integrity of Lebanon but we would also want to see the expansion of that principle in the wider theatre of the Middle East itself as a means of steadying and disciplining those forces that have existed and have contributed so much to the lack of order which has existed in those areas during the past decade and more. In any event, one can only hope that these suggestions will be pursued with vigour and initiative by the government of this country in the days and months ahead in order to achieve what we all so earnestly desire.

Immediately we are confronted with a proposal by which this problem in the Middle East is to be met and by which it is hoped tension can be eased not only for the benefit of this area but for other areas as well. The proposal has been made that the way in which to do this is for the heads of the governments of the great powers to confront one another and to deliberate on matters relating to the Middle East. This it is argued might have a steadying and clarifying influence. I want to say first of all that as an individual I believe that nothing is to be lost in principle by those who have the responsibility in these matters in various countries getting to know one another in the hope that as a result of such acquaintance they will better be equipped and disposed to resolve the frightening problems that divide them. But I think we have to resort to the practice and the achievements of history in assessing whether or not this understandably good wish is practical in every circumstance. Argument, talks and articles about a summit meeting to end the cold war I think very often give one a feeling of unrealism, almost childishness, sometimes of nightmarish insincerity. The notes fly back and forth on who will meet, where, when, how, why, and with what; notes usually given to the public before they have been received by the person or the country to whom they are addressed. I think the former secretary of state for external affairs, my leader, properly expressed the situation in this particular when at Williamsburg he recently said:

> The best kind of summit meeting that I can visualize in present circumstances—and it would be no formal conference at all—would be a meeting of the heads of the American and Russian governments for a couple of days, without agenda, files, or crowds of experts; to exchange views informally and frankly; to try to get to understand each other and in the process perhaps to remove some misconceptions and even some fears. Then, the work of negotiation and diplomacy on a wider basis and dealing with concrete problems—the long, hard pull—could follow and in perhaps a better atmosphere.

Then he went on to say this:

> The worst kind of summit conference that I can imagine is a meeting of the heads of a dozen or more governments, more or less evenly divided between communists, anticommunists and uncommitted, each with a staff of a hundred or so, and all surrounded by 4,000 journalists, photographers, radio and television commentators, crouching on any ledge they can find, however uncomfortable, providing it is on or near the summit. In this melange, there will be only one man who knows exactly what he wants to do, Mr. Khrushchev. He will submit ten propositions at once to the conference, full of such words as peace, co-existence, disarmament, prohibition, and ask that they be agreed to at once as being entirely consistent with the Sermon on the Mount and the U.N. Charter. He will have a wonderful time and the Asians, Africans and Arabs—and others—will blame everything on Mr. Dulles.

My leader has fairly good authority for this a priori view that not necessarily is related to the current suggestion that, in the face of exigencies as they are now presented, there is no alternative but to do what I think the Prime Minister so properly suggested the other day, namely that this meeting should take place. Sir Winston Churchill said as early as 1953:

> This conference—

He was speaking of a summit conference.

> —should not be overhung by a ponderous or rigid agenda or led into mazes and jungles of technical details, zealously contested by hordes of experts and officials drawn up in a vast cumbrous array. The conference should be confined to the smallest number of powers and persons possible. It should meet with a measure of informality and a still greater measure of privacy and seclusion.

No one will deny that throughout the whole of his prime ministership during the period of war no one was more properly gregarious and more interested in meeting those in other countries who had to do with similar problems than was the prime minister of Great Britain. Indeed, Viscount Montgomery expressed the same view in this city only a few weeks ago when he said:

> Two talking couldn't decide anything but at least they might find out what is the trouble.

In the preparations and the suggestions that the Prime Minister and his colleagues will be making about this summit meeting I think they will want to bear in mind, as I am sure the Prime Minister is doing, the desirability of a meeting at the summit under circumstances the most practicable and in a form the most desirable to achieve the purposes that he and all others must at this time have in mind.

My leader suggested the other day when commenting on a statement made by the Prime Minister in this house and bearing in mind, undoubtedly, some of these particular situations which I have related, that a subcommittee of the security council might be devised to decide on the most effective way of bringing about what is commonly desired in this matter. This may not be possible and the Prime Minister has information, as has the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which is not available to the rest of us, but I think that this may be a valuable suggestion for the Prime Minister to bear in mind.

Assuming there is a summit conference and assuming that he will take responsibility, as head of the government of Canada, for sitting in the Canadian chair, and assuming that it should turn out—and I am not saying that this will eventuate—that the particular locale selected and the particular prearranged circumstances for the meeting prove not to be fully satisfactory, then this idea of a smaller committee could very well prove workable and it could be convoked at some subsequent date, possibly not too far removed from the date of the larger meeting but in another locale or even on another continent. This locale could be Geneva. We must not forget that in the month of July 1954 the heads of the governments of the United States, the Soviet union, France and Great Britain did meet for a week in Geneva. President Eisenhower, Premier Bulganin, Premier Faure and Mr. Eden were present and we all recall that at that meeting, when the agenda was not too carefully pre-arranged, the discussions resulted in the creation—perhaps it was a false creation but it nevertheless existed—of a measure of confidence and trust as between the four powers which had not existed for some time.

I suspect that in spite of the fact that there was a lot of publicity connected with that meeting the negotiations for the most part were held in private and it may be that this experience will prove useful when considering the events having to do with the setting up of the machinery and the decisions on the circumstances as to where and when the heads of the great powers or the members of the security council and certain other invited states shall meet. In any event, those are suggestions put forward without any background knowledge to the Prime Minister, who I know wishes to discharge, as do his colleagues, his responsibilities in this matter in the interests of our country and in the interests of preservation of peace in the world; and as a private member of this house I give them to him.

I was very interested in what the Secretary of State for External Affairs had to say about the formula for the adjournment sine die of the international supervisory commission on control in Laos and Cambodia. These commissions, as I understand it, have now adjourned sine die—

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): In Laos.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in Laos and in Cambodia the adjournment has yet to take place. All I can say is that even though he did not say this, it seems clear that the adjournment sine die means that the commissions will not return, certainly not to Laos; and assuming the realization of the same position in Cambodia, it will not return to Cambodia. I am not quarrelling with that; I think this is a rather ingenious solution to a problem which has concerned the government of Canada for some time.

No doubt these two commissions as well as the commission in Viet Nam have served an outstanding purpose and, as the Leader of the Opposition said today, the fact that Poland, India and Canada are represented on those commissions is possibly demonstrative of what can happen on a much wider scale in a sphere in which there would be participation by nations of both east and west which would be designed, by employing the instruments of adjudication and conciliation, to ease tension and preserve peace.

It is right that the commission in Viet Nam should continue as a means of guaranteeing satisfactory conditions for the holding of an election in that country on terms which will permit the elections to be free and so that the people of that troubled country may have the opportunity of deciding whether or not they are to follow the leadership of that great liberal-minded statesman, President Diem, or to follow the dictates of the representatives of communist China and of the Soviet union in North Viet Nam.

I also want to pay tribute to the members of the international commission in the three countries I visited a year and a half ago, not only with respect to the military personnel but also those officials of the Department of External Affairs who under great difficulties and sacrifices have rendered a very distinct service to our country and to the cause of international peace.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs concluded his statement with a recital of the problems of disarmament. Of course, as my leader said, disarmament could begin with the suspension of nuclear tests. This could be the beginning of a solution for a problem which has confronted the United Nations since the first meeting of that body in Church House in London, in 1946. It has not been possible to achieve any success with respect to this matter, and I fully agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs who believes that because of the tensity of the current international situation we should not prevent a discussion of disarmament. I am not going to engage in an argument as to whether disarmament is the cause of war or whether it is a reflection of international tension, but undoubtedly the very reasons that provoked the suggestion that there should be a suspension of tests are the same kind of reasons which should provoke civilized men and women to try and bring about in their respective countries policies designed to reduce the heavy burdens of armament in a manner consistent of course with national security.

We have always made it plain in this country—and this applies to this government as well as the previous administration—in our talks with the Soviet union and with our friends the representatives of the United States, of France and of the United Kingdom, that we are not engaged in a process of trying to bring about unilateral disarmament but that we wanted disarmament on such conditions that we would be certain both sides of an agreement were carrying out the various terms to which they had committed their governments. I agree that for us not only inspection and control are important. It is also important that we have a clear understanding with the Soviet union as to what we mean by the objectives of control.

The Soviet union has traditionally taken the position that this really does not matter but that what does matter is an agreement in principle, the matter of control could be decided or discussed later. That is a chance, obviously, which in the light of the current international situation no country could take. I was a little mystified, however, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the disarmament program as revealed in the white paper which he tabled, described it as a package deal. If by "package deal" is meant that there must be an acceptance of all its provisions, then I must say I never understood that to be the position of the previous administration nor do I understand it to be the position taken by the United States, by France or by the United Kingdom. I have always understood that we were prepared to embark on a stage by stage program insisting only at the end of each stage that there would be set up the kind of international control and inspection which would guarantee the fulfilment by both sides of the features of the particular stage to which agreement in principle had been accorded.

In any event, if we have not succeeded in bringing about some progress in a measure of disarmament the fault lies at the doorstep of the Soviet union because of its reluctance to accept these elementary guarantees of control and supervision which are inherent in the character of nuclear weapons of war now in the possession of at least three of the great powers.

I hope the government will persist in this matter of disarmament, and I believe it will, no matter how frustrating it becomes and no matter how much patience it takes, remembering as the Leader of the Opposition recalled today one of his own initial participations in the field of international affairs at a disarmament conference long before the outbreak of the second world war. We all remember the long periods of discussion from 1922 on under the chairmanship of Mr. Henderson toward conditions which ultimately led to a form of unilateral disarmament which placed many nations of the free world in a disadvantageous position vis-à-vis Hitler's Germany. That shall not occur again, that is clear. And once the deliberations of the scientists at Geneva have been concluded, once it is determined that it is scientifically possible to supervise the suspension of these tests, it may be hoped that will be a strong stimulant for agreement in the first stages covering conventional arms and leading ultimately down to the prohibition of the manufacture and use of atomic weapons along the lines indicated by my leader this afternoon.

I fully agree with what was said about economic assistance to other countries. The role of Canada in the Colombo plan is well known. Now we have to envisage a wider form of assistance, either bilaterally or through the United Nations toward countries in the Middle East or countries already begun through the form of limited technical assistance thus far in the Caribbean and, let it not be mistaken, apart from Ghana, assistance to other theatres, including Africa itself.

This will place great obligations on the citizens of individual countries where the governments of those nations have to make policies that lead to the act of giving. That will place not only upon the people but upon those of us in political parties the responsibility of realizing that in urging these things in parliament we are in honour bound precluded from using them in inverse manner when we come to face the electorate which so often happens and has happened in this country. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs may be assured that they have from us on this side of the house, as my leader said with much greater authority than I, nothing but good will and best wishes in the prosecution of their difficult responsibilities.

We are not the leading power in the world. That is a self-evident statement. But we are a nation that is respected. We are a nation which, because of the achievements in this field during the past decade, has won for itself an honoured place among the nations of the world. We have an opportunity of taking initiatives not open to every other country, not only among the smaller and middle but among the greater powers, initiatives which still rest within the power of any government of our country. Mr. Henry A. Kissinger, writing in the Ottawa Journal of May 15, 1958, said:

> The more intransigent the Soviet union the more important it is for us constantly to put forward proposals which demonstrate our willingness to settle, but which also define the issue for which we are prepared to contend. We should make no proposal we are not willing to see accepted but by the same token we should not refrain from making proposals simply because we believe they may not be accepted. We are under no obligation to frame proposals we are sure the Soviet union will accept. To do so would invite the U.S.S.R. to drive us back step by step. We are under an obligation to make responsible proposals which are not designed to undermine legitimate soviet interests.

These are words to which I am sure all of us will subscribe and which I commend to the Prime Minister at this time. I take my seat by simply saying to the Prime Minister on one occasion when my leader as then secretary of state for external affairs asked me to go to the United Nations to head our delegation, the right hon. gentleman served on that delegation as an observer. He will recall our pleasant and what I think I may describe as a useful association. As I now look at him sitting in the seat—my leader said in the seats of the mighty, and it is true,—occupied by the first minister of this country, I recall that association and I know that now occupying a post of even greater responsibility than that which he occupied in 1955 the right hon. gentleman will go to the United Nations bearing in mind the tradition in the field of foreign affairs established by others and to which this house has contributed in its discussions, and he will do his utmost not only for the honour of Canada but for the peace of the world.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed an occasion, one of those that occur from time to time, when this House of Commons becomes a cathedral in devotion to great principles. I am sure every hon. member of this house was moved by the power and eloquence of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) as he revealed his views in connection with the seriousness and in keeping with the seriousness of the situation which has been the basis of our discussion today. Indeed, from the time the debate started this afternoon one could be very proud of a House of Commons which produced the contributions that were made here as hon. members on both sides of the house spoke, beginning with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) and followed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in what I may be allowed to say was a masterful analysis, and finally now concluding with the speech of the hon. member for Essex East. I am not going to bring into this discussion any of those things that are past. Once or twice the Leader of the Opposition went back two years ago, almost to the crisis at the time of Suez. On this occasion I do not intend to return to those events, nor to deal with them again.

Today we are faced with a situation, and have been during the last two weeks, serious in its import, challenging in the opportunity that comes to those of us in office who have responsibility. We hope we may discharge those duties that are imposed upon us by virtue of the position we occupy in keeping with the nature of the challenge that is ours. We find, however, that there are bright sides. Today we find the United Kingdom and the United States in a degree of unity which is necessary if freedom is to be preserved. We realize something of how fearful the prospect would be if the United Kingdom, the United States and France found themselves in disagreement at a time like this.

As the hon. member for Essex East said, whatever the results of the summit conference, should it be convened—and I am implying no doubt by placing my remarks in that form—mankind and free men everywhere must never place that degree of faith in the conference which would remove the realities of the future or the realization of the fact that the division as between the forces of freedom and the communist world will still continue, not I hope in the same attitude of mind as has prevailed recently but certainly let no one carry in his heart the hope that all will be solved.

In the last two weeks the communist world has shown its point of view again on more than one occasion. Mr. Khrushchev has spoken in words that cannot be misunderstood regarding his relationships with Tito and with all communist nations that believe that communism can be a matter of nationalistic concern alone.

When my hon. friend mentions the needs of disarmament—and all of us in the free world hold that view—and of the hopes that he has that out of the conference in Geneva will come a measure of agreement that will permit of disarmament, I can only bring to his attention the fact that on the twelfth day of July Mr. Khrushchev said that the hope to work out a system of complete and fool-proof control over disarmament is unfounded. That is the atmosphere today in the communist world. I believe that the dynamism of the communist world will not be met by frozen negativism, and it is because I believe that that I took the stand in the House of Commons on Monday last when I set out something of the point of view of this government, something of our ideas and of our concepts of our responsibilities. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the members of the government and myself agreed that whatever the purpose that Khrushchev may have had in mind in suggesting a summit meeting, for any of the nations of the free world, and in particular for the United Kingdom or the United States, to turn down that invitation preemptorily and without the fullest consideration of its import, the realization that it might convey a new hope for mankind, would be acting in a way detrimental to world peace.

I am very pleased this evening, as I have been throughout this day, as I have listened to the hon. members on the other side of the house join in their words of commendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for after all, just as the Leader of the Opposition at one time occupied that position and at another time the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent—and generally through those days we in the opposition endeavoured to join as Canadians to achieve a degree of unity in foreign affairs—so on this occasion members of the opposition in generous terms have followed that course which is representative of true democracy within our country.

The hon. member for Essex East stated that in everything he would not agree. I would not expect that because after all there are bound to be disagreements as to the means being adopted, while agreement as to the objective is being maintained. It is because of that fact that a few days ago I stated I would welcome this debate with a view to having the views of the members of this house expressed on a matter that far transcends party affiliations or political consequences.

The stand that we as the government of this country take on this question is one that we hope will command the support of Canadians as a whole. Certainly the members of the opposition on this occasion in the contributions that they have made have shown that realization of the gravity of the occasion and the necessity for closed ranks. In other words, each of us realizes that the events of the next few weeks may indeed have a tremendous influence not only on the future of our country but on the welfare of mankind.

I am going to refer to one or two suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon. One of the things that he suggested was an international police force and, as he said, that is no recent inovation or suggestion. Indeed, as I listened to him my mind went back 350 years in the reading of history to when the concept of an international police force was first brought to the attention of mankind by Grotius. The hon. member for Essex East referred to the league of nations and its failure in 1939. I think it failed prior to that when, in spite of the need of the establishment of an international force being generally recognized, it failed to secure the necessary support for the setting up of such a force, that aside from the fact that the restriction of the membership by the actions of one or two nations made it almost impossible for the league of nations to be a success.

I remember on one occasion hearing the late John W. Dafoe say that the only way in which mankind can preserve peace will be through the instrumentality of an international organization having the power to command respect and obedience to its commands and its determinations. The Leader of the Opposition has suggested that the general assembly might take steps towards the establishment of such a force. Under the uniting for peace resolution the general assembly has recognized the need for the existence of an armed force which could be used collectively notwithstanding the failure of the security council to discharge its responsibility. Article 43, to which reference was made by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East, is as follows:

1. All members of the United Nations, in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, undertake to make available to the security council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements, armed forces, assistance and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

2. Such agreement or agreements shall govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided.

3. The agreement or agreements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the security council. They shall be concluded between the security council and members or between the security council and groups of members and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

As the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, that has been the aim and purpose of successive meetings of the assembly but the achievement of that aim and ideal is still far removed. The general assembly has indeed recommended that states members maintain national armed forces elements for service as a United Nations unit or units upon recommendation by the security council or the general assembly.

Similar considerations which led to the enactment of the united for peace resolution or a development of the recommendations in that resolution might indeed lead to the establishment of some kind of permanent United Nations force, but there are, as was recognized here this morning, this afternoon and this evening, immense practical and political difficulties before agreement between the nations can be achieved. I am not going to give quotations this evening of some of the stands over the years in that behalf that have been taken by various members in the house. Suffice it to say that in March of 1945, prior to the convening of the United Nations conference in San Francisco, in common with other members of the house I advocated the need of the establishment of such a force. Later on in 1946 in the United Nations assembly Mr. St. Laurent advanced the proposition as one worthy of support.

But unfortunately as we look back on the perspective of events those who were in a position to bring about the achievement of that desirable end, without which peace under an international organization is founded on a slender reed, have made no great advance towards the attainment of this objective.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned disarmament. I am going to refer to that a little later. He also dealt with the economic phase, as did the hon. member for Essex East, the need of assistance being given to underdeveloped countries. In that regard there are no boundaries to the attitude taken in support of that proposition by members in all parts of the house, and in the last year or so there have been material increases but that of itself is not sufficient.

One of the most serious challenges today is the challenge of the U.S.S.R. in its economic warfare, and in 1955 Khrushchev said, "We value trade least for economic reasons and most for political purposes." Everywhere in the world today the U.S.S.R. and the communist world generally are expanding their trade relations without regard to profit considerations and Russia is measuring its success on the basis of the degree to which it is able to achieve control of the minds of those who for the moment trade economic advantage and ultimately lose their freedom. Only recently the New York Times made a survey of the trade offensive of the communist world and indicated that in 1955 communist trade exceeded $6 billion, that the communists have achieved footholds in 19 countries and that the increase in trade is double that of five years earlier. Indeed, at this very moment China is engaged in a trade offensive in Asia and Europe involving farm products, cement, textiles, manufactured products and the like. It affects us here. The U.S.S.R. is engaged in similar conduct with respect to aluminum, rails and general production.

I place before the house as worthy of attention that one of the courses we must take is the reconsideration of the resources of the international monetary fund and the international bank to the end that we will be able to achieve that degree of economic stability within the free world which will permit, indeed encourage the expansion of trade so that we can meet this offensive. For as the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, this is one of the major means being used by the communists today to undermine the stability and strength of the free world. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out in a similar statement that the economic stage is one of the most important today, and one that challenges the free world by the tremendous danger that faces our trade and economic welfare by reason of this communist campaign.

I suggest that the international monetary fund, having played a useful part particularly in the last two or three years in helping countries tide over the rough spots in any balance of payments by making available short term loans in foreign exchange, mainly United States dollars, Canadian dollars and deutschemarks, deserves further assistance at this time. The fund has resources in gold-based currencies amounting to about $2,750 million, more than half of which are already committed in stand-by credits. I believe that consideration must be given to an increase in quotas of 50 per cent which would bring in an additional $3,000 million in gold and useful currencies, the result of which would be, according to the economists, substantially to increase the liquid assets underpinning world trade and give confidence to members of the fund that help would be available in case of need, so that they would not have to impose fresh import restrictions to deal with a temporary balance of payments problem.

In so far as the international bank is concerned, that position is also one that deserves attention. All the uncommitted countries of the world today look to the international bank for help in their development programs. The bank has become the main source of dollar capital for this purpose, with loan commitments now approaching $4,000 million. The main source of funds for lending is now the sale by the bank of its debentures to private investors. These debentures can be sold readily on account of the guarantee provided by the United States, and by other financially strong countries, of 80 per cent of their capital subscriptions. I suggest that if the bank continues to lend at the current rate it will, within a couple of years, have to issue additional debentures, which would bring its obligations within sight of the amounts guaranteed by the United States and Canada. In other words, by an increase of the guarantee from 80 per cent to 160 per cent of national capital subscriptions, there would be an increase in the banks borrowing power by several billions of dollars. Such action at this time would assure the less developed countries of the possibility of further assistance and would build a bulwark against the communist advance in the uncommitted countries. This would shore up those countries economically and give them new hope to meet the economic challenge of the communist world.

I mention this because the Leader of the Opposition dealt at some length with the need for economic action in the Middle East. His plan was a United Nations plan, as I understood it, the contributions to which were to be made by all countries, including the U.S.S.R. While naturally any step in that direction would be welcome, I am sure that the experience of the hon. gentleman in the past does not lead him to look too hopefully on the attainment of the objective that he mentioned, however desirable it might be.

Those were two of the matters to which the hon. gentleman gave particular attention. I come now to the question of a summit meeting. I betray no confidence when I say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did, in the last week or ten days, give the leadership to break the deadlock which seemed to result from the original letter from Mr. Khrushchev offering a summit meeting. The press of our country have been generous, and have been mindful of his contribution and of the action taken, which I am glad, in general terms, has received the support of the opposition. The fact that we believe there is a responsibility in Canada in the Middle East as a threat to the world, is indicated by certain courses that are about to be adopted.

At the present time we have an ambassador in Cairo who is accredited to Lebanon, with Lebanon being in charge of a charge d'affaires. We have an ambassador in Athens who is accredited to Israel, and a charge d'affaires in Tel Aviv. With the problem of the Middle East so much in our minds, and the need of having the closest relationship with those countries so that we may be assured that our views shall receive full consideration and also to strengthen our relations both politically and commercially and, as I said a moment ago, through our missions, to increase our knowledge and understanding of the area, and of our confidence in its future, we intend within the next few days to initiate negotiations with the governments of Israel, Lebanon and Iran, with a view to setting up full, permanent diplomatic missions in the capitals of these three countries. These countries represent to us the standard bearers of freedom in that section of the Middle East which, up to the present time, have not received the diplomatic representatives which they had been desirous of having and have been entitled to have.

Having mentioned that, I now want to say a word in regard to the general question of a summit meeting, and some of the ideas and views that were held by the government with respect to this meeting. I think in the last few days events have moved very quickly. Mr. Khrushchev, having first advocated the necessity for a summit conference outside of the United Nations, finally agreed that the summit conference might be called in connection with the United Nations. It is the United Nations aspect of the forthcoming meeting that I think deserves the most serious consideration at this time.

I want to give you something of the thinking of the government on this matter for this meeting may well constitute a precedent for similar meetings in the future. Generally speaking, Khrushchev's prompt acceptance of the suggestion that the discussions between the representatives of the great powers should take place before the security council, not at a separate meeting at Geneva or elsewhere, does underline the authority of the United Nations. It was my view that any attempt to deal with the subject of the Middle East, with which the United Nations was seized, outside of the security council at this time would derogate from the real authority of the United Nations.

I think generally speaking—and it has been evidenced here today—there is reasonably general agreement that the proper auspices for the holding of this meeting should be under the aegis of the United Nations. There, there are rules of procedure which provide for the calling together of a special group of nations as has been suggested, and any additional nations upon which the security council agree. In the interests of continuing peace which, after all, is the supreme purpose to which this country is dedicated, we believe there is being offered an opportunity to strengthen the security council and the United Nations by demonstrating that the rules that already are in existence which govern its activities are effective to deal with present problems. To have a separate meeting of nations to deal with specific problems which the security council itself has been discussing would, I repeat, be nothing less than a declaration to the whole world that the security council is incapable of carrying out the duties and responsibilities for which it was created.

We took a lead in this regard because while from the point of view of population we are still one of the smaller nations, we believe —and I think the belief is held generally throughout the whole world as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said —that smaller nations must be recognized and their rights upheld in the United Nations and the assurance of their viewpoint being placed before the United Nations maintained. It is for this reason that we take the view that a formal council meeting to initiate the talks between the heads of government concerned, after the procedure has been determined by the security council regular membership, should be attended by the heads of government able to be present. For it is in the full security council that the heads of government of the major powers, in whom our destiny rests in such large measure, can best explain their policies and having done so obtain the moral support needed to carry them out in accordance with the rule of law as symbolized in the charter of the United Nations.

It may not be possible for all heads of government to attend the special security council meeting of which I am thinking but I hope as many as possible will attend. I believe that they should request the great powers to meet and after quiet and reasoned discussion—the four powers to meet in private —to report to the security council on the issues. To this end Canada is prepared to take all necessary steps. Instructions are therefore going forward to our permanent representative to the United Nations to consult immediately with the secretary general, and with other delegations to the end that urgent consideration be given to the further steps necessary if this heads of government meeting of the security council is to pave the way for practical discussions and hoped for solutions of the problem which beset the Middle East area. To that end we believe that some preparatory meetings of the security council, as I said a moment ago, in regular session will have to be held within the next few days to work out the details, for all of us must appreciate the fact that a top level meeting of that body, to the success of which mankind attaches such great importance, may take some little time to arrange.

In achieving this purpose and laying the proper foundation, we will be guided by the wisdom and experience of the secretary general in setting the necessary procedures in motion and a broad pattern will be sought. The procedure is something as follows. It will be first necessary to inscribe on the agenda of the security council in regular session an item sufficiently broad to permit not only a discussion of the problems of Lebanon and Jordan, of which the council is already seized, but to move on to those more deep-rooted issues which affect the area as a whole and of which, as the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, the Lebanese and Jordanian crises are but a manifestation.

When my hon. friend spoke this afternoon of the rise of Arab nationalism I thought of the book by Nasser entitled "Egypt's Liberation". That little book of 120 pages or so is the blueprint upon which Nasser has proceeded. He set the course out as clearly as ever did Hitler whose viewpoint in Mein Kampf few regarded seriously until it was too late. Indeed as one reads this book and sees something of the psychological influences which were referred to by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) this evening he realizes something of the tremendous forcefulness and tenacity of purpose which Nasser has exhibited in bringing about first among the peoples in that area a realization of their nationalism and also using that nationalism under the activating influence of the U.S.S.R. for purposes which brought about the conditions existing today in that area. After dreaming his dreams, giving his viewpoint, revealing his innermost thoughts, he says:

> The pages of history are full of heroes who created for themselves roles of glorious valour which they played at decisive moments. Likewise the pages of history are full of heroic and glorious roles which never found heroes to perform them. For some reason it seems to me that within the Arab circle—

This book was written or published in 1955.

> —there is a role, wandering aimlessly in search of a hero. And I do not know why it seems to me that this role, exhausted by its wanderings, has at last settled down, tired and weary, near the borders of our country and is beckoning to us to move, to take up its lines, to put on its costume, since no one else is qualified to play it.

There is the story. He took the role. He did what the Leader of the Opposition said today. He fomented. He aroused. He inspired. That is why, because of this matter of nationalism, the Arab countries cannot be taken for granted. It is one of the questions that deserves the most serious consideration by this summit meeting.

As far as the inscription is concerned, perhaps the item need be no more specific than "The Question of the Middle East", and I would hope that all members of the security council would find it possible thus to set the stage for discussions of an area which has been the focal point of so much strife and international tension in recent years. The heads of government when they meet at the special session of the security council, as I hope they will—and everything I have said is based on that meeting taking place—would address themselves to this broad problem and would express their concern and make available their ideas to those nations both in and out of the council whose interest in the Middle East is of a more direct nature. All of us recognize the primary responsibility of a few in this matter but the manner in which they discharge that responsibility is of vital concern to all nations great and small, both inside and outside the area concerned. Canada as a middle power occupying a strategic position wants the right to speak on this occasion.

As far as Canada is concerned, we believe that after the general discussion and after the opening statements, if that viewpoint is accepted in the security council, those principally concerned with the Middle East, namely the four or five powers mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition would be able to carry on their deliberations in private. I could not be more in agreement with the member for Essex East with respect to his remarks when he described what a conference of this kind might be if it were conducted under the glare of klieg lights and transmitted to all parts of the world by television. I believe we must free those at this meeting from the temptation to use it in order to turn it into a propaganda agency, for to do so would indeed be to hold back the advance of what I hope will be a reasonable degree of security in the Middle East and a realization, through discussion of the problems, by all parties, of the need for a decision to be arrived at.

If this were generally agreed Canada would be prepared to introduce a resolution at the special session of the security council calling on the permanent members most directly concerned with the Middle East to meet at the heads of government level in order to carry forward the discussions initiated, in the council in full session, with the secretary general present in an appropriate capacity.

Some reference was made to the need for other nations to be called in, in particular India, and I am one of those who believe, with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Mr. Nehru has a contribution to make at this time. Provision has already been made by article 31 of the charter which provides as follows:

> Any member of the United Nations which is not a member of the security council may participate, without vote, in the discussion of any question brought before the security council whenever the latter considers that the interests of that member are specially affected.

Finally I would suggest that our resolution should call upon the secretary general to report the results of the private deliberations to the end that the people in the various countries concerned would have some knowledge of the discussions taking place. The question arises as to where to hold the meeting and much has been said about New York being the United Nations headquarters. Others have pointed out the possible dangers of holding a meeting in that city but there is naturally preference for New York out of regard for the necessity of preserving and consecrating, if I may use that word, the United Nations aspect of the proceedings which is of paramount importance. It would therefore seem logical on the whole to hold the initial high level security council meeting in New York but, if as a result of the general discussions or the full consideration of the problem in all its ramifications, it was decided that the meeting should be held elsewhere, I would remind the house that when I wrote to the Soviet union leader on January 18, 1958, I said:

> You may be aware that there has been a suggestion in the Canadian House of Commons that the government might invite the participants in such a meeting to consider holding it in Canada. This suggestion was undoubtedly prompted by the consideration that Canada is the next-door neighbour of the United States and the U.S.S.R. and has a special relationship to commonwealth countries and to France. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that when the participants decide that they are ready to call such a meeting and should they decide to hold it in Canada, they will be welcome.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are several other matters with which I wanted to deal on this occasion, including the matter of disarmament, but I think I have covered in general the immediate problem, namely that of the meeting and the attitude of Canada towards that meeting. I repeat what I said originally that I believe Canadians as a whole are proud of the fact that Canada took the initiative in bringing about the attainment of this meeting in which the hopes of mankind will indeed be reposed.

In conclusion, I remember well, in April of 1945, at the United Nations meeting in San Francisco, seeing the beginnings of that organization and feeling the hopes then held for the success of a world organization which would preserve and maintain peace. The United Nations Organization has had its ups and downs since 1945. It now has what I believe is its appointment with destiny and I hope—and I am sure this hope is being expressed throughout the world not only in the free world but behind the iron curtain—that if the summit conference takes place, in good sense and with appreciation of the awful consequences of failure, the participants, through the security council, will go forward with the feeling that whatever the cost we must endeavour to attain at least some degree of assurance of security which has not existed in recent years. It is almost too much to hope for, but while there are some who say "why discuss these matters when past discussions have not been successful," I would like to remind the house that it has also been said, "While they are talking they are not fighting." One has only to go back to the remarks of Lord Grey in his memoirs when in reference to 1914 he said that if the nations in Europe had continued to talk rather than arriving at the conclusion that further talks were useless, world war I could and would have been prevented.

This meeting can be the crossroads for a new future. That is my hope and that hope has been shown in abundant measure today in the opening speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and in the contributions made by the Leader of the Opposition and the other hon. members who have spoken here.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I presume the business for tomorrow is as announced last night?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the estimates.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on July 14.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MOTOR TRANSPORT MAIL TENDERS, GLOUCESTER COUNTY, N.B.

Question No. 119—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Have public tenders been called for the motor transport mail route from Pokemouche to Bathurst, Gloucester county, New Brunswick?
2. If so, what are the names of those who submitted tenders, and what was the amount of each tender?

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—STEPS TAKEN TO INCREASE RESOURCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the Prime Minister's statement last night calling for an increase of $3 billion in the resources of the international monetary fund and a very large increase in the lending capacity of the international bank, can the minister tell us whether the Canadian delegation to the economic and social council of the United Nations, which is currently meeting at Geneva, has been instructed to pursue these important objectives and, if so, with what result?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker, except that I make this observation. I am not clear that this is a matter for representation to the economic and social council. We are represented on the boards of the international bank and the monetary fund.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—REPORTED STATEMENT ON CONCLUSION OF SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a report in La Presse, Montreal, dated July 23, to the effect that the Borden commission has completed its hearings for the whole country. Will the Prime Minister clarify the present situation in the light of the contradiction between this report and his statement to the house on Tuesday that the commission would hold sittings in the Atlantic provinces at a later date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question. All that has been completed is the hearings before the issuing of an interim report. There will be a resumption of hearings after the interim report has been completed, and then there will be hearings, as I said the other day, in the maritime provinces.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

CANADA COUNCIL—STATUS OF CIVIL SERVANTS AWARDED SCHOLARSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. I have been informed that some persons awarded scholarships by the Canada Council have been denied the opportunity to take advantage of these scholarships because they are civil servants. Can the Prime Minister inform the house of government policy in this respect, and would he have this matter looked into to see that there is no conflict in policy or with the government's intentions?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I just received this notice before coming into the house and I have no knowledge of the matter in question, but will give it consideration and will communicate with the Canada Council with a view to being able to answer the hon. gentleman at an early date.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPORTED LAY-OFFS FOLLOWING TRANSFER OF 14-FOOT NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The Cornwall Standard-Freeholder of July 23 carries a statement to the effect that the superintendent for the Ontario-St. Lawrence canal system announces the retirement of 122 men on the canals who are affected by the transfer of 14-foot navigation from the Canadian side to the United States side. The article goes on to state that 50 of these men will find employment, following the plan to which the minister referred earlier, in other branches of the Department of Transport. Then the superintendent goes on to say that the remaining 70 or 72 men will be laid off on September 1. My question is, what will happen to these 70 or 72 men who will find themselves without employment on September 1?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not sure. As I assured the hon. member and stated in the house, everything will be done that is possible to find employment for the men who are laid off.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. What I think the superintendent is saying is that pursuant to the plan of the minister employment has been found for 50 men. My question was directed to the remaining 70. What will happen to them?

Mr. Hees: I take it the statement is self-explanatory; that it has been possible to find jobs for 50 of the men but there are not jobs to be found for the other men, unfortunately.

FINANCE

REPORTED INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE ON MUNICIPAL BORROWINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Would the Minister of Finance care to make any observations on the growing number of reports that interest rates on municipal issues are rising?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I do not think there is any comment that could be usefully made on that subject. Within recent times there have been movements in the market. There were movements in the market in May and June, and there have been movements in the market since. I do not know what particular date my hon. friend is referring to, and if he would care to indicate that I shall be glad to comment if I can usefully do so.

Mr. Regier: I have cases on record where investment houses sent amending telegrams to municipal councils changing their previous offerings and indicating a rise in interest rates after the minister's bond conversion announcement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can say, Mr. Speaker, that since the announcement of the conversion loan the current quotations on some provincial issues and some municipal issues have risen and some have dropped slightly. There is no direct connection, I think, to be drawn between the loan and the situation my hon. friend has alleged.

POWER

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—STATUS OF AGREEMENT RESPECTING THERMAL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Now that tenders have been called and awarded for the equipment and machinery to be used in the thermal plant at East Saint John, New Brunswick, can the minister advise the house whether an agreement has been signed between the federal government and the province of New Brunswick in this regard?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I inquired into this matter about a week ago, and I find that some tenders were called over a year ago for equipment in the Saint John East plant. I spoke to the officials of the government of New Brunswick on this matter. Additional tenders are being called of a routine sort. They do not affect the over-all agreement between the two governments. As far as the agreement is concerned, progress is being made on completing it. It has not been signed at the present time concerning the Saint John East plant.

AIR TRANSPORT

DUTIES OF ACTING CHAIRMAN OF BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In a press release emanating from his office comes the announcement of the appointment of Mr. Shepard as acting chairman of the air transport board to perform certain duties. My question to the minister is this. Will the acting chairman of the air transport board have two capacities, namely (1) that of hearing applications now before the air transport board for transcontinental competition with T.C.A. and (2) will he be authorized to make an investigation into further competition in the field of transcontinental services?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the task which the chairman of the board of transport commissioners will perform while acting as chairman of the air transport board will be limited to hearings dealing with the transcontinental route.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

304. Departmental administration, $1,886,095.

Mr. Denis: May I ask whether the Postmaster General has a statement to make before we go on with the item?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): In introducing these estimates, Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to review briefly the operations of my department since the last time the estimates came before this house, explaining some of those aspects of the operations which are not covered in detail in the department's annual report. In making this presentation I cannot help but feel that I enjoy a great advantage which was denied my predecessors in office during the period since 1953, namely that I shall not be obliged to deal with the questions of the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace who had a great deal of curiosity about the department.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister will find there are others who have curiosity about the department as presently administered.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As is well known, the Post Office Department is a vast one extending into every part of Canada and serving every Canadian. Less well known is the fact that in terms of staff it is the second largest government department, being exceeded in size only by the Department of National Defence. Some 25,000 civil servants plus another 25,000 people composed of revenue postmasters, rural mail carriers and various other categories, handle an average of 10 million letters a day through 12,000 post offices. Each day our rural mail deliveries cover 133,000 miles; translated into other figures this represents the fantastic annual equivalent of some 55 return trips to the moon. In the cities, letter carriers in the course of their work walk over 6 million miles a year—an equivalent figure is 240 times around the world. An average letter posted in a street letter box in one city and delivered to its destination in another will undergo a minimum of ten individual handlings in the course of its journey; yet the post office is so smoothly functioning and so efficient that the same first class letter deposited in any major city in Canada will normally be delivered within 24 hours in most other major centres in our country.

On the other hand, the department does not claim perfection; human beings are fallible, and in the process of handling these 10 million letters a day to which I have referred it is impossible to avoid the occasional mistake. The percentage of error, however, is extremely small, on an average one hundredth of one per cent or one piece of mail in ten thousand, which figure represents delays, mis-sorted mail and even the occasional letter which disappears and can never be found. But compared with any business operation of which I am aware I think the record of the post office is outstanding.

I will now review the financial operations of the department. The year 1956-57, which is covered by the report available to members of the house, showed total revenues of close to $168 million with total expenditures of just over $162 million, and a favourable balance of $5,827,000. I am not going to attempt to give a further detailed review of this particular period, first because it ended some 15 months ago and second because whatever I might say in that connection is available to members in the published report covering the operations of the Post Office Department.

In the year ending March 31, 1958, for which period the report has not yet been issued, the total postage receipts of the department amounted to $164,899,000, or an increase of $9,122,000 over the preceding year. In addition to these postage receipts the department enjoys revenue from a number of other sources, primarily fees on postal money orders, the rental of post office boxes and the payment from other countries for the handling of certain types of mail. The total of this revenue was $12,534,000, or an increase of $482,000 over the previous year; and with the inclusion of one or two minor adjustments representing $50,000 or so we arrive at the significant revenue figure for the Post Office Department for the year in question of $177,493,000, or an increase in total of $9,604,000 over the preceding year.

The department's disbursements for the same period totalled $177,893,000, or an increase of $15,843,000. Deducting the total disbursements from the total receipts the department therefore shows a net excess of disbursements over revenues of $399,901, and this compares with a net excess of receipts over disbursements to which I have already referred for the previous year of $5,780,471.

There are those who refer to this difference between the receipts of the department and its disbursements as the department's profit or loss on the year's operations, an assumption which is not strictly correct, because not included are such items as the cost of mail which is carried free for government departments, the cost of public buildings which are supplied free to the department by the Department of Public Works, and perhaps one or two other items. But the figure does provide a very adequate method of assessing the operations of the department.

Hon. members will have noticed a change in the department's net position from what might be termed a profit of $5,780,000 in 1956-57 to what might be termed the loss of some $400,000 in the year under discussion, and I should like to set forth the major reason for this change. Incidentally, these reasons were forecast some ten months ago in the last annual report of the department, which said:

> It is advisable to draw attention to the fact that again in the coming fiscal year very heavy additional expenditures are in prospect—expenditures which are quite beyond the control of the Post Office Department.

The report then continued to outline these additional expenditures which have resulted in the figures which have been given to the house.

The largest single item of increased expenditure was in salaries paid to post office employees, $8,312,000 to our civil service staff proper plus $1,824,000 to revenue postmasters, making a total increase of $10,136,000. While a portion of this increase represented staff required by the increase in the volume of our business, the great majority, represented by some $7,500,000, resulted directly from the general civil service salary increases which became effective on May 1, 1957. An 11 per cent increase was also granted in January of 1957 to the railways in mail payments, and this is estimated to represent a cost increase of $1,250,000.

These two increases, totalling $8,750,000, could be added to in a great many cases, each representing an increased payment for exactly the same quantity of work performed or of goods and services received, and it becomes clear that even had the post office operations remained at exactly the same level as in previous years our previous favourable position would have been completely wiped out and would have been represented instead by a net loss of several million dollars.

In actual fact we did enjoy a substantial increase in the volume of our operations and this brought with it increased revenue. But increased revenue also brings with it increased expenditures, and these increases have been still further augmented by the natural growth of our country and the need to increase such postal services as rural mail routes and the like. Typical of such increases are those of $2,636,000 in salaries over and above the increase necessitated by the general salary revision, $2,036,000 for mail services by ordinary land conveyance, which includes the rural mail delivery, and an increase of $1,478,000 for mail service by air.

In addition, very briefly, there is another factor which was at work during the year under discussion, one which it is impossible to measure exactly but which we know affects the operations of the post office adversely at certain times as far as its revenues and expenditures are concerned. This is what we might call the revenue mix, and it relates to the various types of mail and the volume of each which is handled. It is important because certain classes of mail bring to the post office more revenue than others in relation to the cost of handling them. When business conditions become at all unsettled there is a certain falling off in first class profitable mail and a substantial increase in such comparatively unprofitable fields as third class mail, circular mail you may call it, since business firms begin to more actively solicit business by mailing advertisements, circulars, and the like.

Having reviewed the financial position of the Post Office Department over this period, I would like to summarize briefly the conclusions and then proceed to some other aspects of our operations. While the revenues of the department have increased, the expenses have increased at a faster rate in the year under discussion so that we are almost exactly at the break-even point where revenues and expenses are equal. The increases in our expenses are due to factors over which the department has no control, such as cost increases for the same services performed and cost increases due to increased volume of work required. There is some evidence that the unprofitable types of mail increased in the year under discussion. The fact that cost increases totalling $8,750,000, from which the department enjoyed no advantage, could be absorbed and net revenue decline only $6,180,000 shows that in the year under discussion the department has operated at a substantially higher degree of efficiency than previously.

I would now like to turn to a review of specific aspects of our operation during the past year. In order to try to be as up to date as possible I will take the period from the beginning of July, 1957, to the end of June, 1958. In that period, of course, the most outstanding feature was the congress of the universal postal union. I must say that I have been touched greatly by the wonderful things which have been said about the organization and handling of that congress by the postal officials of so many countries in the world, both when they were here in Ottawa and subsequently when I met them or corresponded with them. Over 100 members of our staff were available for part-time work on various functions of this conference, working to arrange the details of the operation. We are also grateful to the dozen or so other government departments which co-operated with us.

The congress itself included over 300 delegates from 96 member countries. Together they considered over 1,200 propositions relating to the various aspects of our international mail service.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with this congress it is only fair to say that the preliminary arrangements and planning had been made by the previous administration, and that this contributed greatly to the success of the congress. We took over at a period shortly before the congress started and were helped by that previous work.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, to pay a special tribute to Mr. Walter Turnbull, the deputy postmaster general for a number of years. He was elected president of the congress and he personally directed practically all its operations. He did an outstanding job in every respect.

I would just like to say another word about Mr. Turnbull. In 1956 he announced his intention to retire following the congress, and he carried out that plan. He was an outstanding postal official who contributed greatly not only to postal development in Canada but throughout the world as a result of his contacts with various postal administrations in every part of the globe. Not everyone was always in accord with Mr. Turnbull during his term as deputy postmaster general either inside this house or outside of it, but no one to my knowledge disputed his tremendous ability, intelligence and imagination as deputy postmaster general, and at his departure he left a Canadian postal service that in case after case bears the imprint of his own achievements.

Since we are on this subject, Mr. Turnbull's successor, to whom I paid tribute last year on the announcement of his appointment and to whom I will pay another tribute at this point since his appointment has become effective, is Mr. George Boyle, who has an intimate knowledge of the department gained over 43 years in its service during which time he has risen from one of the most minor positions to the highest permanent post in the department. In an organization which has so many excellent people from whom to choose, Mr. Boyle's progress is the best indication of his own ability, and already it is possible to see additional evidence of that in his new post.

I will have something more to say about the post office staff generally a little later, but I singled out these two men at this point because of my conviction that the Post Office Department is completely dependent upon the calibre of its personnel, and my feeling also that the type of man we have as deputy postmaster general is just one indication of the worth of that personnel.

Now, with respect to specific details and changes, over the last year door to door delivery was inaugurated in 10 cities serving 28,424 calls. In centres which already had this service it was extended beyond previous boundaries to add 48,342 calls, and in addition there was new service to 31,310 billed as "fill-ins" and calls falling within existing boundaries. The total number of new calls added under these three classes was 108,076.

While I am on the question of letter carrier delivery I might refer to two a day delivery, because this question of the return to two a day delivery of mail in the residential sections of our country where letter carrier service exists has often been discussed in this house. Hon. members will recall that it was abolished in 1952 by the previous administration.

In every aspect of postal service it is necessary to balance off those things which we might like to do against the cost of providing the service concerned, and these same considerations apply in this particular instance. In the last few years hours of work have decreased and rates of pay have increased, so that the resumption in residential areas of a second delivery a day at the present time would cost something in excess of $6 million a year.

In addition to the cost factor, conditions have changed in the past few years, with the result that a great deal more mail moving between cities is available for delivery in the cities of destination on the morning delivery, and also many arrangements of routes have been undertaken so that areas which faced particular problems at the change-over are now better served and more satisfied.

Over the years I have made a point of checking with people across this country on their reactions, and I have found that the average householder seems to feel that he is adequately served with one delivery a day, although business firms often find it an inconvenience when they are faced with that particular situation. I might just mention that such business firms and householders, if they are particularly interested, are in a position to obtain lock boxes at the local post office and thus pick up their mail several times a day.

Taking all these factors into consideration I have concluded that any general resumption of the two a day mail delivery in residential areas is not now warranted. However, every effort is being made to deal with local situations in a way satisfactory to individual patrons, and I am convinced that we can render satisfactory service in this way without the great increase of cost which would be entailed in the general resumption of two a day mail service.

In rural routes 74 rural routes were established to provide service to 11,500 patrons. In addition, 728 existing routes were extended to give service to 4,500 patrons. Twenty-eight revenue post offices were established in rural areas. Fifty-nine sub-offices and four new postal stations were opened in cities. To me a point of particular interest are the stamp vending machines, which many people find helpful. I feel that government stamp vending machines, which provide service 24 hours a day and give full value for the money inserted, are a great convenience to the public and therefore we are trebling the number available.

The choice of subjects and designs for postage stamps has been a subject of careful study, because we desire to produce stamps which will receive general approval of the public that uses them. Because stamp design is essentially a matter of aesthetics, and human tastes differ in that field perhaps more than in any other, we have to resign ourselves to the fact that it is unlikely that any stamp is ever going to be issued which will receive universal acclaim. However, steps are under way to establish an advisory committee on postage stamp design, because I feel that the views of a representative group of Canadians will be helpful in determining subjects and designs which will be most satisfactory to the majority of Canadians.

Because of changes in rail schedules and equipment which make it impractical to handle mail over certain routes where it used to travel, we have instituted additional highway services which are providing equal or superior connections.

Recently our regulations covering certain types of insertions in magazines and periodical publications were relaxed so that Canadian publishers might compete more successfully with publications coming into Canada from the United States.

During the year under discussion 55 new federal buildings were occupied by post offices, including two major projects, one in Vancouver and one in Winnipeg, which contain extensive mechanical mail handling equipment. One machine in operation at both Vancouver and Winnipeg is an electronic device for the sorting of parcels which is probably the most modern anywhere in the world. In addition to our new buildings, we have 16 additions to existing federal buildings, and we have 118 other projects in the planning stage.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

Here is something which I think members might find interesting and perhaps have not heard about yet. Because all mail originates with the public, public co-operation and understanding of our problems are a vital necessity to successful postal operation. One way to achieve this co-operation is to keep the public well informed about the post office. We have therefore produced and issued a very fine moving picture in colour and sound in co-operation with the national film board. It is expected that millions of Canadians will see this moving picture over the next few years, and that it will result in a much better appreciation of our problems and more co-operation from the general public.

I turn now to our activities which concern more directly the internal operations of the department and the mechanical handling of mail. In previous years it seemed to me that the opportunity existed for closer co-operation among the United States, the United Kingdom and Canadian postal services in a number of fields. There has always been discussion of particular problems which concern the services in these three countries and, indeed, discussions with every country in the world wherever possible, but on no occasion in recent years until Canada took steps to initiate action have there been joint meetings of the most senior officials of the three services for a wide range of discussion of the general problems with which each was dealing and the plans for the future which each was developing.

Such an interchange of information is most important at a time like the present, when it seems apparent that we are entering a period of substantial development in mail handling operations. Over the past 40 years and until the present there has been substantially little development in the way mail has been handled in post offices. About the only general change, apart from one or two new types of machines in isolated cases, has been the introduction of moving belts and chutes to transfer mail from one location to another. Other operations have remained static and heavily dependent on the manual manipulation of each individual letter or parcel. This situation has applied in every country in the world, so it is no criticism of the Canadian postal service to point out that it exists in this country as well.

The primary difficulty in mechanizing and modernizing mail handling operations is, first, that large volumes of mail are found only in a limited number of locations and then only at relatively short peak periods, so that the installation of costly and complicated machinery to deal with such situations requires economic calculations and decisions of considerable complexity. On the technical side the development of the necessary machinery, much of which is of an electronic nature, presents again very substantial difficulties. Most mass production operations deal with a standardized product. The mail stream varies widely, with each unit having the possibility of differing from every other unit in such respects as the size of the envelope, the position and denomination of the stamp, the thickness of the enclosure and the ultimate destination which is involved.

As a result, while highly qualified research technicians have been at work in a number of countries, including Canada, the United States and Great Britain, for a number of years trying to develop machinery which will handle mail more effectively and more expeditiously than at present, it is only in recent months that anything has begun to appear which, when put into operation in a post office in the regular mail stream, operates in a satisfactory manner. All of these facts and a great many more, all of which have been helpful in making progress in this respect—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The time set for the Postmaster General is up. Has he unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Thank you, Mr. Chairman; about another ten minutes should cover it. I regret that we have 15 months to cover since the last annual report. All these facts to which I have referred were discussed at a series of meetings which have been held during the last year between Canada, the United States and Great Britain. One of the results of these meetings has been to convince us in Canada that the British post office has developed certain types of machines which should be of great help to us in this country, and we are in the final stages of discussion to enable us to instal prototype units of this equipment so that we may examine them under Canadian operating conditions and determine how extensively they may be used in our country. What our course of action will be after that I do not know, but certainly we should examine and study means which we feel are now available to speed and improve our mail delivery.

I have no doubt that within the next four to five years we will see the commencement of radical changes in mail handling techniques, and that within the next decade these same techniques will be widely employed in our Canadian postal service. In introducing them our prime purpose is to speed up and make more effective the handling of large volumes of mail, and to introduce machinery for certain laborious and unskilled post office tasks. It cannot be anticipated that this machinery will make any appreciable reduction in our permanent personnel, first because many of our jobs represent work which can never be mechanized—letter carriers are a good example—and second because the steady increase in volume of mail now demands a steady increase in our personnel, and the purpose of the machinery is to allow us to handle a larger volume of mail more quickly and effectively with the same number of people.

I should like to say a word about our own major project in the Canadian postal service. It is the electronic sortation machine on which close to $3 million has now been spent for research and development. The basic concept of the machine shows promise, but at no point up to the present could it be said that the machine is anywhere near the point at which it might be placed, even on a trial basis, in a post office to test it on regular mail for any extended period of time. I think that point should be made quite clear, Mr. Chairman. We are currently engaged in a very careful reassessment of this machine to determine our future course of action so far as it is concerned.

May I say a few words now about staff management, which is of interest to many members of the house. The general personnel policy of the Post Office Department, including staff training and development, is a well advanced and creditable one. As part of the department's program of management development, there was a marked increase in the number of officers and supervisors who rotated jobs or were assigned temporarily to other locations for varying periods according to individual needs. In this way we secured an interchange of ideas and information between headquarters and the field which is tremendously valuable in a widely extended operation such as our department.

A series of coloured slide films was produced within the department to give an over-all picture of the postal service and to acquaint our headquarters staff with postal operations, as well as to help indoctrinate new employees. We also use these slide films as visual aids to training.

We started in recent periods an accident prevention program in the Montreal post office. This resulted in such a substantial reduction in the number of accidents and the number of days lost as a result of accidents that the program was extended to the Toronto and Ottawa post offices.

We decentralized still further, giving the senior field officers wider authority for leaves. Headquarters no longer maintains individual records of staff for the larger field offices, nor any personnel records at all for part-time employees in the larger offices. This reduced the records staff at headquarters without any corresponding increase in the field.

The usual pattern continued of a percentage increase in staff of about half the percentage increase in the volume of mail. The turnover in our staff showed a moderate drop from 11 per cent to 9 per cent per annum. During the period I am reviewing the remuneration of 594 mail service contracts was adjusted upward to offset increased operating expenses and to bring the rates to a level comparable with those paid for similar work.

One of the heaviest burdens on our letter carriers is what is known as household circulars. A change has allowed these to be delivered on Monday as well as other days in the week, and this has spread the load to the advantage of the letter carriers and improved the service to the mailers.

Mr. Benidickson: What did the minister call that?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Householder circulars; a type of third class mail which the postman drops in at each house at which he calls.

To meet the constant problem of quickly providing suitable uniforms to new employees a change was made in the method of ordering and stocking them. It seems to me that this will improve both the appearance and morale of the new members of the uniformed staff.

Very special attention has been given to safeguarding the cash and postal values, particularly in the face of a substantial increase in the number of burglaries throughout the country, which applies incidentally not only to the Post Office Department but to other sections of the economy as well. Additional burglar alarms have been installed and additional safes have been supplied. More use is being made of night depositories in banks and other security measures have been introduced, designed to offer the maximum protection to the public whose valuables we hold.

Inquiries, which improve the post office service because they enable us to locate possible weaknesses and correct them, are being more effectively analysed and followed up on a national basis. We have established a more uniform system of processing them.

We have a work management program which involves the measurement of mail volumes processed, hours worked, and in most cases work standards. During this period the program was extended from certain major sections of eight of our largest offices to two additional offices.

It seems to me this is a very important part of our operation, because the results of the program make postmasters and supervisors aware of the salary costs of various sections of their offices. It assists them also in studying operational conditions from the point of view of more effective use of staff. Finally, it instils a spirit of teamwork amongst employees and an ambition to better production. I can recall going into a post office in Winnipeg on one of my inspection trips and finding a large blackboard there on which the previous week's results were posted. A spirit existed in that post office, and exists in many others, of teamwork and a sincere desire to do a little better next week to improve those figures.

Here at headquarters, I think members will be very interested to know, we have installed one of the most modern machines available, a Univac 120 in our financial branch. This is an electronic accounting machine which will process the post office savings bank accounts and reduce the routine clerical work in that connection. We also use it to process the salary payments to revenue postmasters. It is estimated that these two uses of the machine will save the department $26,000 per year. I might just mention, in case the question comes up later, that this has been achieved without laying off any individual affected by the installation of this machine. There is a turnover in the department, and these people have been absorbed in other capacities. They have been called for on other jobs. Whenever we think in terms of a machine we think also in terms of our staff and the need to protect them in their jobs and not deny work through the installation of such machines.

Intensive studies of our money order system are under way with a view to developing a system based on electronic accounting machines similar to those being developed for the American Bankers Association and the Canadian Bankers Association. Again, this would reduce the routine clerical work of the department. I might say that the money order forms were redesigned during the year, and just that one little change in redesigning the money order form reduced printing costs by approximately $10,000 a year. We have improved considerably the procedures for controlling costs of the many truck contracts for parcel post, street letter box collections and special delivery in our various city services.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion may I say just one word to express a general attitude. Personally, I have not felt it possible to perform my own job without a fairly detailed knowledge of the basic operations and conditions of my department in every part of Canada. For that reason I have covered Canada from Newfoundland to British Columbia to obtain personal acquaintance with our department and the individuals who work for it. I tried to work that out quickly this morning, and find I travelled something close to 25,000 to 30,000 miles last year in the performance of that duty. Wherever I have gone I have taken the time to talk personnally with post office employees at every level, particularly those employees at subordinate levels who never before had seen a postmaster general in their office or met him in any way.

There are eight regional postmasters' associations as well as a national association. I have attended conferences of six of these eight postmasters' associations and a national meeting as well. As to the other two, I have given an undertaking to be there at their next annual meeting. I have received representatives of our employee groups and discussed with them their problems and suggestions. Finally, I made some attempt to obtain comparative knowledge of other postal services in the world.

These subjective experiences lead me to certain objective conclusions. First, I feel that our Canadian postal service is generally the equal of any in the world and probably superior to most. We face peculiar problems in our country in this respect: a huge country with a comparatively small population which is widely distributed and with great density only in limited areas; long hauls for much of our mail; isolated areas which are difficult of access, and many other problems. We can therefore make no attempt to duplicate exactly in any part of Canada those services which some countries give under vastly different conditions.

None the less, I am firmly convinced that when all factors are taken into consideration the Canadian people enjoy a postal service as good as that anywhere in the world and probably better than that in most areas.

The greatest portion of the credit for this, Mr. Chairman, must go to the post office employees themselves. The reputation of a postal service is not achieved overnight or by some sweeping changes in policy. Rather, such reputation is the result of faithful service, faithfully performed by a host of individuals over a long period of time. I might say that the motto of the Canadian postal service is Servire populo, "To serve the People". That motto, that faithful public service, has been the case in the Canadian postal service and it continues to be the case. Fine buildings and good equipment, new plans and improved methods all contribute to our success but in the final analysis it is the individual postal employee, in whatever post he may be serving, who determines the effectiveness of our service.

I feel sure that I speak for every member of this house when I pay a tribute to the postal employees of Canada for their devotion to duty and the part they daily play so successfully in the operation of those basic channels of communication without which our modern society could not exist.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word of thanks to the Postmaster General for his comments and his analysis of the situation. However, in summing up what he has said I regret to say that his statement, as with that of other ministers, concludes by indicating a deficit as usual. It is far from being a break-even policy which he always advocated while he was the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace sitting in the opposition. He has had fine experience and shown great ability since he became a member of parliament. I think he was the official critic for the then opposition. He worked hard at the job, even making research all around the department and even having access to confidential reports which the minister at the time was good enough to let him examine. Certainly in the Woods and Gordon report he found many suggestions and many statements that were extremely useful to him, just as the report was useful during the time of the former postmaster general.

After reviewing what the minister has just said we must come to the conclusion that almost nothing of what he used to say or nothing of the statements and the suggestions made by him while he was only an opposition member of parliament has been implemented since he has assumed office as Postmaster General. I recall that in 1953, 1954 and 1955 he filled the pages of Hansard with declarations and statements with regard to two a day mail delivery. I do not see that anything has been done since he has been the minister of this department. I can recall full pages of declarations by the Postmaster General. For instance in 1954, as reported at page 1178 of Hansard, before he was Postmaster General but was the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, sitting in the opposition he said this:

> Before I resume my seat I have just one further question. I should like to ask the minister when we in Notre Dame de Grace are going to get our second mail delivery a day.

This matter of two a day delivery of mail was a political issue during the last election. In every province and at every meeting the Tory party used that kind of political issue, making promises and commitments. Now that the Conservative party is in power, now that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is Postmaster General, we are receiving letters from all over Canada asking when the minister will put into effect the dozens of declarations and statements covering pages and pages of Hansard asking for two a day mail delivery. Nothing has been done. For instance, from Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, Mr. Wadden wrote to us asking when this implementation would take place.

I do not know what is going to happen if, with regard to everything the minister said while he was a member of parliament, sitting in the opposition nothing is implemented. We are going to lack confidence in the minister. At that time he was extremely efficient. Today, when he occupies the post of Postmaster General, he might realize that the situation is a little bit different. Let us consider, for instance, the increase in the cost of postage stamps from 4 cents to 5 cents. How many speeches did the minister make about that increase in the cost of postage stamps? It was a good thing to say during the electoral campaign. But now that my hon. friend and his party have obtained power, now that they have obtained responsibility, now that they have obtained a majority on account of issues of that kind, now that he is in a position to implement the commitments he has made for many years, we find that nothing has been done.

He just said that the Post Office Department is very efficient. Does he mean that in the course of two, three, four or five months every efficiency there is in the Post Office Department is the baby of the minister, or is the efficiency the result of the fact that the department was well administered previously and he is taking credit for what was done by the previous government? I do not know whether he used to talk black one day and white on another day. In 1954, as reported at page 1818 of Hansard, when he was only a member of parliament sitting on the opposition side, the minister said this:

> —but I criticize in the very strongest terms the Postmaster General for his administration of the department, and for many of the ways in which it is administered under his direction.

Today, however, he says everything is in order, everything is in good condition. He has made declaration after declaration inside and outside of the house to that effect. On June 24, 1958 the Victoria Daily Times had this to say:

> "Canadian postal department is second to none" Mr. Hamilton said, "and the common feeling that Ottawa is unaware of local problems has no basis."

On July 25 the Globe and Mail reported that the Postmaster General had said that his four weeks' experience on the job had shown him an organization which, basically, was working very efficiently. Was it those four weeks of the Postmaster General's experience which made this department work efficiently? I doubt it, and I think he will admit that something was done before he came to office. A little further down it says:

> Formerly a fierce critic of the decision to revert to once-daily delivery, Mr. Hamilton now believes that few householders expect or want the mailman to call more than once—

I do not know what is going to happen over the years, but it is obvious that the suggestions made by the Postmaster General have not been implemented, so we must conclude that this department was well administered by the former government and that the present Postmaster General is only continuing what was done in the past. In his statement this morning no mention was made of the suggestions which he himself put forward when he was a private member, such as the one with respect to burglar alarms.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member must have been asleep.

Mr. Denis: Oh, no.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That was all covered in the statement.

Mr. Denis: But I would like to know from the Postmaster General how many burglar alarms have been installed since he took office and how many thefts have occurred in the same period, just so we may compare the difference between his administration and that of the former minister. All these questions in my opinion should be answered. There is another point which I would like to raise. While the minister said inside and outside the house that the former government should cut expenditures and should stop the waste and extravagance, the minister in his statement this morning made no mention of these matters. He had an opportunity today to tell the house and the country all about the extravagance and waste and poor administration in the past, and because he did not we must only conclude that he was talking—

Mr. Chevrier: Through his hat.

Mr. Denis: I would not say that because it is not polite, but I am sure the minister knows my meaning.

Mr. Chevrier: It is quite polite.

Mr. Denis: Instead of cutting expenditures, however, he has increased them by $5,700,000; and if hon. members will look at the estimates they will see that every item is increased—

Mr. Ricard: Wages of employees also.

Mr. Denis: —except departmental administration, which has decreased by $301,633. Of course there was the expenditure on the universal postal conference which last year cost $250,000 and we had $255,000 for publicity and advertising and so on, but still the conclusion one must draw from these estimates is that instead of cutting expenditures, for whatever reason, we have an increase of $5,700,000.

The minister spoke about electronic sorters and all kinds of machinery installed in the department, saying that he had not cut the number of employees. This may be so, though he was not very definite about it. I gather that this move will not hurt too much, but I would like to know from the minister how many employees are replaced by these electronic machines. If they have not yet cut the number of employees they may very well do so, which will stop Canadians from working in the department. When there is unemployment all through the country I do not think this is the time for the government to put in hundreds and hundreds of electronic or mechanical machines. Maybe it is a mere coincidence, but in recent weeks the civil service commission has been sending back applications for jobs to the senders because they are no longer taking records of applicants for mail carriers or clerks in the department.

Because of these facts it looks as if there will not be an increase in the number of employees of the Post Office Department, and I would suggest to the minister that the department should keep a file of all applicants for jobs such as those I have outlined so that when a vacancy occurs these applicants may be notified of the holding of examinations, rather than having to follow the newspapers every day or look at the notices in the public buildings. The minister I am sure will agree that it is pretty hard for an unemployed man to go through all the public offices to see if there is a notice of a job available to him. This is an improvement which could be made in the Post Office Department, and it is one which was advocated by the minister himself. All these questions should be answered, and the house should be informed of the cost of these electronic machines and of the department's experience in using them.

I do not think I have any more to say on this item, but I will have some other comments to make with respect to other items of the estimates. If he cannot implement the promises he made and which he repeated in the house and outside during the election campaign, he should tell us it was only for fun, that he was not really aware of anything wrong and that he was just taking a chance. And I know the present Postmaster General is in a position to say that, because he is honest and ready to comply with the truth and with the facts.

Mr. Winch: It is not my intention to speak for very long, Mr. Chairman, but I feel that on this first vote I must say a few words, mainly because the Postmaster General in introducing the discussion had one thing to say in particular. That was in part a comparison of his present position with the attitude he took while he was in opposition and, to some extent, a withdrawal of the criticisms which he had directed against the department in the past.

At the time of his criticisms, that is before June of last year, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace sat very close to me, right in the next row, and it is because of what he said then that I should like to ask him a question. What has happened under his administration since last June in comparison with what he said for four years when he sat two seats away from me? I do not have to refer to Hansard because I well remember the speeches made during that period by the present Postmaster General. Time after time he talked about two-a-day deliveries. Where are they today, and why has he changed his viewpoint? May I ask whether it is because in opposition he was irresponsible but that in government he is responsible?

May I also draw attention to a point which, though of less importance, is one which meant a great deal to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace in those days, when week after week, if there was ever a robbery of a post office, he got up on the orders of the day and referred to those robberies and wanted to know what was going on. I should like to ask the Postmaster General what has been the situation since he took office, and whether he has been able to give a greater degree of protection than his predecessors in office. I do not know why this matter was of such particular interest for years to the present Postmaster General, but it was. Perhaps he can now throw some new light on the subject.

May I also draw to the minister's attention the fact that when he was in opposition he felt that those who lived in small towns and villages should enjoy the same rights with regard to postal service as those living in large towns and cities. I should like to ask the Postmaster General, in view of this, what is the basic policy determining when a town may have home delivery of mail. I have received a great number of inquiries on this matter from British Columbia, but in recent days I have heard from the town of Tilbury in Ontario, and I have been sent an editorial from the Tilbury Times. I hope the Postmaster General will tell us what is the policy governing conditions when home delivery can be made.

In conclusion I come to the major point. Remembering the speeches which the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace made when he sat alongside me for four years on the costings of the department, and in particular his references to first class mail having to bear the cost of other classes of mail—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Just so that I may understand the question and answer it adequately, would the hon. member care to give me some reference to Hansard where this particular observation occurs?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have not those references here, but I am amazed that I should remember the hon. minister's speeches better than he does himself.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps over the lunch hour the hon. member would look up the reference, because I do not recall that there is anything in the record along the lines he has suggested.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps the hon. member would cast his mind back to the days when the previous government was making a change in the postal charges. Can he remember the days of discussion on that measure and the fight that was put up by the Conservative opposition at that time to resist those changes? Does the minister not remember his own remarks on that occasion?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are talking now about variations in rates—

Mr. Winch: The hon. minister does me the honour of allowing me to think I remember his speeches better than he does. The important thing is the position that was taken at that time. According to the last report of the department the post office, though naturally, of course, a public service, is a money-making proposition. All I want to ask the Postmaster General to do is to remember the position he took toward this matter while in opposition, and his opposition to first-class mail having to bear the heavy deficits incurred on other classes of mail of an industrial or advertising nature.

I merely draw this to the attention of the committee, and ask that during the course of this debate the Postmaster General will take the opportunity to outline the policies of the department in relation to the points I have sought to raise.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General opened the discussion on this item by congratulating himself on his great good fortune in not having to deal with the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. I think enough has been said already to prove to the Postmaster General that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is going to be quite a source of embarrassment to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace as Postmaster General.

I remember—I think we all do—that when the Postmaster General was on this side of the house he waxed very eloquent about numerous subjects. Among them were the two-a-day mail delivery, government public relations, postal surpluses, and other things almost too numerous to mention. It may be interesting to hear what the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace had to say about the two-a-day mail service when he was on this side of the house, and I am reading from Hansard of May 26, 1955, at page 4146:

> We know there is no use complaining because it is going to be crammed down our throats anyway. I think that has been the attitude of the people of Canada toward this one-a-day mail delivery. I suggest this thought in that connection to the Postmaster General. Why do we not have two-a-day mail deliveries five days a week? At the present time we give a mail delivery in most residential areas once a day, and that is six deliveries a week.

Then again, on January 20, 1956, at page 362 of Hansard, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is reported as having said:

> I should like to ask again, as I did last year, that the post office consider the re-establishment of the two-a-day mail delivery rather than the present one-a-day system which extends into such a large part of Canada. We should have a two-a-day mail delivery on a five-day week basis. I would point out that the return to the two-a-day, five-days-a-week delivery would not cause a major cost increase in the operation of the post office.

Again on May 26, 1955, at page 4146 of Hansard, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is reported as follows:

> I should like to say a few words about twice-a-day mail deliveries. I do not agree with the attitude of the Postmaster General and the department that once-a-day mail delivery is genuinely satisfactory or acceptable to the people of Canada.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that was the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace speaking as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. Contrast that with what the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace said this morning when speaking as Postmaster General. I did not have time to take down the exact words he used, but he did say that in considering the expression of two-a-day mail delivery we must balance what we would like to have against the cost of the service concerned, and he went on to say that this extra service would cost upwards of $6 million extra to the people of Canada but he did not stop there. He went on to say that he now believed that the one-a-day delivery was generally acceptable to the people of Canada, that the people were being adequately served with one-a-day mail delivery and that the second delivery would not be warranted.

When we compare what the Postmaster General said this morning with what he said on this side of the house we must come to the conclusion that he has learned a great deal since assuming the burdens of office.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Thank you; those are the kindest words that have been said this morning.

Mr. Pearson: He had so much to learn.

Mr. Carter: No member of parliament was more caustic in his criticism than the Postmaster General when he was just plain hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, and he used to wax loud, long and eloquent on the waste and extravagance of the Post Office Department. Yet when we look at the estimates for this year we find that they have increased by $5,786,390 over last year despite the fact that in 1957-58 there was $250,000 in the estimates for the universal postal union congress, and in addition the 1957-58 estimates included an amount for the approximate requirement for increases in rates of pay, but there seems to be no item to take account of further increases in the rates of pay in the estimates for the present fiscal year. Along that line, Mr. Chairman, the Montreal Gazette of March 22, 1958 carried the following extract, which is attributed to the Postmaster General:

> Interchange of jobs between executives of industry and government was urged here yesterday by Postmaster General Hamilton to help businessmen to understand why the government has to employ more people than private industry to do a given type and volume of work. "If we were able to have a change of officers between private industry and government departments, both would benefit and derive greater respect for the other", Mr. Hamilton told members of the Montreal chapter society for advancement of management. The absence of the profit motive and the element of competition was cited by Mr. Hamilton as one of the "valid reasons" why government operations cannot equal the efficiency of private enterprise or its speed of adaptation to changing conditions. "The government has found it necessary to employ certain measures which may seem like empire building or unnecessary red tape to the men engaged in private enterprise, but which are actually needed to replace control by profit and competition", he declared.

The Postmaster General should tell us whether this is the answer to the accusation he used to make against the department "that it was full of waste and inefficiency". Then as late as June 24 of this year, as reported in the Victoria Daily Times, the Postmaster General is quoted as saying:

> "Canadian postal department is second to none", Mr. Hamilton said, "and the common feeling that Ottawa is unaware of local problems has no basis."

Does this mean that the Postmaster General is convinced that in recent years his department is and always has been efficiently run? The recent information that we have big brother listening in on our deliberations in the chamber calls to mind that several years ago the hon. member for Peterborough raised a very strong complaint about the use of television circuits in the post office in Peterborough. I believe he complained that there were 16 of them. I now have his exact words. As found on page 155 of Hansard for January 16, 1956, the hon. member for Peterborough said:

> I understand that some 16 of these television cameras are to be installed in the Peterborough post office. Some of them will be dummies. In the past the men have never objected very much to the use of peepholes in post offices through which inspectors can watch and check on a man whom they suspect of not being honest, but they certainly do object to television cameras. Personally I think it is a waste of the taxpayer's money. It is going to cost over $50,000 to instal them, and will cause a great deal of hard feeling. The sooner the idea is thrown out by the Post Office Department the better for this country.

As late as yesterday, July 25, an inquiry revealed that this equipment is still installed in the Peterborough office. It was understood that it was installed on an experimental basis for a trial period. Perhaps the Postmaster General can now tell the house his conclusions as to its usefulness and if he thinks it is superior to the system of peepholes and observation galleries. Perhaps if experience warrants it we might improve the equipment in the Prime Minister's office and modernize it still further by installing a closed television circuit.

There are many things that I think would be very entertaining to us and very embarrassing to the Postmaster General, but I must desist from this pleasant occupation in order to deal with matters which are more urgent and pressing in the province from which I come. The first matter I wish to deal with is the position of revenue postmasters in Newfoundland. The Post Office Department report for 1957 lists 636 post offices in operation on March 31, 1956. It does not give any breakdown to indicate how many are staff post offices or semi-staff post offices, but I would assume that between 400 and 500 or approximately 75 per cent would be revenue post offices and that in the majority of these the postmasters would, in addition to their postal duties, have to carry out duties on behalf of Canadian National Telegraphs.

I have already referred to the plight of the postmaster-telegrapher in the house on many occasions, and I am not going to repeat what I have said before. My latest reference to the matter was on May 19 of this year, and earlier references in detail can be found on page 2235 of Hansard for April 20, 1951, and page 442 of Hansard for January 23, 1956.

The reason I bring the subject forward now is that Canadian National Telegraphs have recently made a decision, now in process of being carried out, to convert the equipment in these combined postal and telegraph offices from wireless telegraph to radiotelephone. As a result of that change many postmasters have suffered a serious decrease in that portion of their salaries which was paid by Canadian National Telegraphs, and the urgent question in the minds of all these people is, what is the Post Office Department going to do about it?

The Post Office Department cannot escape responsibility in this matter, because they worked out an agreement with Canadian National Telegraphs whereby they rented the services of these postmasters to Canadian National Telegraphs, and having done that they therefore made themselves responsible for the duties of these people and part of their remuneration; as a matter of fact the whole of their remuneration, because their cheques are received from the Post Office Department. I understand that the Post Office Department in turn has collected varying amounts from Canadian National Telegraphs in proportion to the services rendered.

This is an urgent matter because it concerns the welfare of human beings who, because of this action on the part of Canadian National Telegraph, have had their remuneration cut below a subsistence level. They are now on a starvation wage and, as I have pointed out before, hon. members must keep in mind that they cannot be compared with their prototypes on the mainland because many of them work in a separate building away from their places of residence and must be there during certain hours to answer calls and maintain a schedule of communication between the various C.N.T. offices. Therefore, even if they have to transmit their messages by telephone instead of by Morse code, the fact remains that their services are the same. Their time is tied up, and something must be done about their salaries. When the minister replies I hope he will give a full and detailed account of what the Post Office Department is planning to do with respect to this problem.

The second vital matter I want to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General concerns a recent order affecting some post offices in the rural outport communities of Newfoundland. This order stems from section 8 of the Post Office Act. That section has two parts. Part 1 reads as follows:

[Mr. Carter.]

Except as provided in subsection (2), the Postmaster General has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, conveying and delivering letters within Canada.

Subsection 2 reads as follows:

The exclusive privilege referred to in subsection (1) does not apply to

(a) letters carried by a friend on his way, journey or travel, if such letters are delivered by such friend to the addressee;

(d) letters lawfully brought into Canada and immediately posted at the nearest post office;

This section 8 of the act is amplified in the "Canada Official Postal Guide, 1957", page 108, under the general heading "General Laws and Regulations". On this page we find section 411 entitled "Postmaster General's Exclusive Privilege". I quote:

The Postmaster General has the sole and exclusive privilege of conveying, receiving, collecting, sending and delivering letters within Canada; and (except in the cases hereinafter mentioned) any person who collects, sends, conveys or delivers or undertakes to convey, or deliver, any letter within Canada, or who receives, or has in his possession any letter for the purpose of conveying or delivering it, otherwise than in conformity with the Post Office Act, for each and every letter so unlawfully conveyed or undertaken to be conveyed, received, delivered or found in his possession, is liable to a fine not exceeding $100 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two months or to both fine and imprisonment.

Then follow the exceptions:

The following are the excepted cases:—

(a) Letters carried by a friend on his way, journey or travel, if such letters are delivered by such friend to the addressee;

(b) Letters concerning the private affairs of the sender or addressee when sent casually by a messenger;

(c) Commissions, affidavits, writs, processes or proceedings issued by a court of justice;

(d) Letters lawfully brought into Canada and immediately posted at the nearest post office;

(e) Letters of merchants, owners of vessels of merchandise, or owners of the cargo or loading therein, when carried by such vessel or by any person employed by such owners and delivered to the respective addressees, without pay, reward, advantage or profit for so doing;

(f) Letters concerning goods or merchandise to be delivered with the goods to which such letters relate, carried by common known carriers without reward, profit or advantage for receiving or delivering them.

But the Post Office Act does not authorize any person to collect any such excepted letters for the purpose of sending or conveying them as aforesaid, nor does it oblige any person to send any newspaper, pamphlet or printed matter by post.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that this section places tremendous powers in the hands of the Postmaster General to interfere with the private rights and liberties of the individual. I have received complaints from some of my communities that they have now been ordered that they cannot post any mail outside their own community where post offices exist or other than at the nearest post office. When we consider that in most of these communities the frequency of mail service is once a week at the best and often once every ten days, it will be seen how handicapped the people of these places are, particularly the people who are trying to do business in these places, by not being able to send their letters to another post office where speedier mail service is available.

One complaint I received covered a businessman who lives in a community which has mail service once every eight days. He operates a boat from his community to Port aux Basques, which has a daily service, but he is not permitted to take his own letters on his own boat from his community and post them in Port aux Basques, where he can avail himself of a daily mail service. Surely this is a tremendous interference with the rights and liberties of that person, apart from the handicap it imposes upon him in the operation of his business. When I received that letter of complaint I could not believe that this order had gone out. I thought there must be some misunderstanding about it. However, since then I have received letters from other people complaining about the same thing.

Amongst these complaints we get some like this. A person may be in a certain community where the office closes at six o'clock. A taxi may be going to another community that evening or going to St. John's, where there is an air mail service. According to this regulation that person is forbidden to give the mail to that taximan to post for him in St. John's, where he could avail himself of better service.

I feel there is something wrong with this regulation, because certainly the mail is the property of the person who owns it and does not become the property of the post office until it is posted in the office. In any case, what is a letter? Does a letter become a letter merely because it is in an envelope and sealed? How do you distinguish between a letter and a note? I do hope the Postmaster General will look into this situation and give the house a detailed report on exactly what the order was that emanated from the post office in St. John's and went to these outport communities. What is his interpretation of the points I have raised in this discussion?

I see it is about one o'clock and I have another item to discuss. Perhaps I might call it one o'clock, because I notice my time is nearly up, so I will wait for another opportunity to discuss the other item.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the Prime Minister wishes to make a statement. Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this date?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PRINCE CHARLES

CONFERRING OF STYLE AND DIGNITY OF PRINCE OF WALES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for this opportunity. On this historic occasion I am happy to announce that Her Gracious Majesty the Queen has this day designated Prince Charles as Prince of Wales. It was particularly appropriate that the announcement was made at Cardiff, Wales, where today are taking place the concluding ceremonies of the British Empire games at which representatives of 35 nations within the commonwealth have been engaged in competition while their respective countries are joined in the co-operation which the commonwealth concept makes possible.

As I said a moment ago, the title is an historic one. It carries back the history of those in the British tradition to 657 years ago when Edward I created his eldest living son, Edward, the Prince of Wales, by letters patent. Since that date there have been 19 holders of the honour. During the period there have been long breaks during which no one held the position of Prince of Wales, the longest of which was following the elevation of Prince Hal to the throne as Henry VIII. One hundred and one years passed after Prince Charles, afterward Charles II, ascended the throne. For a period of 54 years no one held this honour.

It is now 22 years since there has been a Prince of Wales, the last being Edward VIII who had the honour conferred upon him on his sixteenth birthday in June of 1910.

I think that all of us would at this time desire to express our congratulations to the Prince of Wales who, in the process of the fulfilment of God's will, will ultimately occupy the throne. To Her Majesty the Queen I am sure all hon. members would desire to convey their good wishes coupled with the hope that her health may soon be fully restored. As to the Prince of Wales, I think I can do no better than quote the words of the poet:

> Among our ancient mountains,
> And from our lovely vales,
> Oh, let the prayer re-echo:
> "God bless the Prince of Wales!"

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house rejoice in the announcement which has just now been made by the Prime Minister that Her Majesty the Queen has seen fit to confer upon young Prince Charles the title of Prince of Wales. We rejoice also because, as the Prime Minister has said, this title has been vacant now for many years. We have watched with joy and interest the life of this young boy as he has been growing in strength and wisdom. I am sure that all of us on this side of the house would wish to associate ourselves with the words of the Prime Minister in congratulating the young prince upon this honour. I should like to add that I hope and trust that Almighty God will not only support him in his young years but will also guide his life so that the destiny which one day will fall upon him will be a source of consolation not only to the members of the royal family but a source of strength for those who form part of the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we in this group realize that under our form of government, our constitution, our basic rights and freedoms are vested in the crown. We were very much interested to hear the announcement made by the Prime Minister just now. We trust that this young man will continue to have good health and much happiness as a result of being a prominent personage in a commonwealth working toward greater freedom, greater happiness and peace for all people in the world.

304. Departmental Administration, $1,886,095.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am going to be quite brief in my opening remarks on these estimates. However, I want to make a few general remarks before we proceed to the items. Then when we come to the items I have some questions to ask relating to administration and some matters of more or less parochial interest to my constituents.

When I address the minister as Postmaster General, I think he should really be addressed as the minister of successful social enterprise. As a result of the precedents established by him when he was a member of the opposition, —he, in fact, I think on one occasion being almost solely responsible for holding up the postmaster general's estimates for two days—I trust that he will not object to a very close and lengthy study of his estimates at this time.

Having said that, I want to express my appreciation of the prompt manner in which the minister has dealt with any matters which I have brought to his attention and also of the courtesy of the senior officials, whether in Ottawa or in Vancouver, in their close attention to any worth-while complaint that is directed towards them. Furthermore, we should all express our gratitude to the great multitude of humble civil servants who stamp the letters; run the post offices; deliver the mail in our cities, towns and villages; and carry on the service on our rural mail routes. If it were not for this co-operation extending right from the rank and file of the organization to the minister we would not have the successful administration of postal affairs that exists today.

I noticed what the minister had to say when he was making his statement this morning and I, for one, as I think did the other members of this group, appreciated his making a full statement with respect to the administration of his department, particularly in view of the fact that the latest report we have is the one dated March 31, 1957. I understand from my experience in this house that the report of the Post Office Department does not usually come out until the fall. I might say in passing that I do hope, as one interested in stamps, that this will be the last edition of any report published by the post office which carries the picture of that gloomy goat, because I have lived very close to a lot of goats and I have never in my life seen such a caricature.

I was particularly interested in three matters raised by the minister, first of all the question of public relations, and I was very pleased to hear his reference to that topic because I think the successful administration of his department depends to a great extent on satisfactory public relations. I realize the work that has been done in the large centres in that respect and the attendance of the minister and his officials at such public events as fairs, and my only further suggestion is that these public relations activities be extended to the smaller centres as much as possible. As a matter of fact some of the, shall I say, complaints, arise from the smaller places because of a lack of understanding of the department's administration and so on, and I do suggest that his officials conduct these public relations activities in those smaller centres to a greater extent than has been the practice in the past so that the people there will have the same opportunity to understand the administration as the people in larger centres. I am one, as you know, Mr. Chairman, who has always urged consideration of these people who live in the smaller communities and the more isolated spots in our country.

I was also very pleased to hear the minister's reference to an advisory committee with respect to the choosing of designs for stamps. I think we have been very backward in this respect in Canada, especially when I look at some of the most beautiful stamps issued by little Oriental states and small nations elsewhere and by what we consider undeveloped and in some cases backward states. With respect to stamps we in this country have to date a lot to learn, and I am very glad the minister has suggested this advisory committee so as to get, shall I say, the viewpoints of numbers of people interested in this art. It is another illustration of the development of the collective principle within his department—not the "great wise man" but the collective wisdom of a number of people—it is another aspect of the C.C.F. policy being put into practice by the government.

Another matter I would like to mention particularly is that in recent years—and I think this is a very good practice—the departmental officials have somewhat changed their approach with respect to replies to applications for mail services or changes in mail routes and things of that sort. A few years ago one would get a rather cryptic letter from the department in reply to such an application to the effect that "the matter has been under consideration and the decision is in the negative" or something equally as cold blooded. I now find that on a number of occasions departmental officials are giving reasons and by way of illustration may I say that in my district some years ago there was quite a demand for changes of a mail service. From a local point of view this seemed pretty reasonable, especially in some cases where a certain mail service would appear to have a shorter route as a result of such an application being granted, but sometimes people are not acquainted with the economic factors involved. The particular instance of which I am thinking happened some years ago and the departmental officials gave me a thorough explanation of the costs involved and the reasons why it was not economic to accede to the wishes of the local people. I do suggest to the minister that when dealing with a lot of these questions a great deal of discontent and unnecessary correspondence might be avoided by some detailed explanation as to the basis upon which a decision is reached.

I mention this matter because I was very taken with the fact that when this application was first presented there was a lot of local heat but in some cases not very much light because they did not understand the situation. However, when I got the explanation in a somewhat lengthy letter those people who had been most active in the matter readily understood the situation and the basis for the department's decision.

Before the minister's estimates are concluded and when he replies to our various complaints on item 1 I wish he would give to the house a very brief summary of the types of post offices which exist within his department; that is to say the classifications and terms of employment for each type of post office. I am particularly concerned with the way the post office operates and the postmasters' salaries, some of which are covered by revenue from stamps and things of that sort, particularly with respect of the rights of the postmaster in regard to the employment of help. For instance, does the veterans' preference apply with reference to employment of help by postmasters of this revenue classification, and if competent citizens are available do they receive preference over non-citizens, and so on? I mention these matters because they have been brought to my attention on a few occasions.

I am also particularly concerned with payments to postmasters, particularly in small post offices and the usual regulations in respect of the administration of these post offices. For instance I would like the Postmaster General to tell us how many hours a day or how many days a week such a post office is required to keep open and if the minister could, when he replies, give an outline of classifications and terms of employment in each type of post office, I would appreciate that very much, although I am not suggesting he should go into any great detail.

Those are my few brief opening remarks. Later on I shall, after consideration of the minister's estimates, co-operate with anyone who is willing in order to demonstrate to the minister that we have an equal capacity to deal with estimates as he had when he was in the opposition.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You have already demonstrated that.

Mr. Deschatelets: This morning the minister informed the committee that an advisory committee would be set up to help the minister with respect to the design of stamps. We do hope that the minister does not for a moment think that if in the future a committee is to advise him on these designs that he can hide behind that committee. We will hold the minister responsible as he held the previous postmasters general responsible.

I would like to make one suggestion to the minister before he sets up this committee. I do hope all the provinces will be represented including, of course, the province of Quebec, so that when new stamps are issued to celebrate historic events all the provinces will be brought into the picture.

I have a few remarks to make on a subject which was the topic of previous speeches heard in this committee this morning and having to do, of course, with the numerous statements and promises made by the Postmaster General in connection with the re-establishment of a second mail delivery a day. This was more than a promise, it was a commitment and a solemn one, and at the time this commitment was made the Postmaster General was the spokesman for his party on matters having to do with the post office and he was therefore representing the views of his party. Then, to add insult to injury, on July 25, 1957 the Windsor Star reported that the Postmaster General had reiterated after the first election of his party that he would re-establish the twice a day delivery service.

We are awaiting a statement by the Postmaster General with the greatest interest, because he has completely failed to give us a proper reason for the change of policy of his party in this matter, and when we talk about Conservative policies unfilled we will always remember the bluff of the two deliveries a day.

Mr. Peters: Listening to the remarks that have been made this morning and this afternoon by the Postmaster General I draw the conclusion that the Postmaster General's statements previously were not in keeping with the operation of the department.

I draw the inference also from the fact that I looked up to find what the Postmaster General's report was—I find that this report, the last one endorsed by the present Postmaster General—published in March, 1957, and having observed the lag in time from the time that report is prepared to the time it is presented, I presume that the Postmaster General was, in effect, in this particular case, endorsing the program the Liberal government had already implemented with very little change. I think the Canadian people should take a good deal of interest in the department because this is one of the large departments of government. We find that while hon. members were in opposition certain considerations were raised and certain suggestions made, but when the opposition has formed the government there are very few changes. Unless the report which I think should legitimately have been published before this was discussed shows the contrary, we can only draw the conclusion that there has been very little change.

I should like to question the Postmaster General on the matter raised by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo this morning regarding these television snoopers that were installed several years ago in Peterborough. He mentioned the fact that he was very much opposed to this. This certainly was the opinion expressed by the hon. member for that constituency while he sat in opposition, and I think I would like to go further still and say we not only object to these television cameras being installed but, also, that they should remove the people who inspect the work of this department from observation galleries. Knowing, Mr. Chairman, the examinations that the people in the post office must take, the responsible positions they have to assume and the very satisfactory operation and performance of their duties by the post office officials across the country, I do not think, legitimately, we should allow any snooping, and certainly we are very much opposed to this television aspect of examining the work of people. We have had no reason for this type of investigation. Certainly I think a much more satisfactory method of supervising this work could be devised, and the minister might consider the bonding of employees.

Another matter which has been raised in the past, and this is one in which I hope the Conservative regime does not make a change, is the post office savings bank. Many hon. members may not have had any experience with this bank, but I would suggest that this is a very valuable service which the post office has performed which it should be proud of and advertise more. While it is true many of the small post offices do not want to be bothered with this, it is advantageous to the travelling public of Canada, such as salesmen and service personnel—that is the first time I came into contact with the post office savings bank, in the air force—and it means you can deposit money any time the post office is open, up to six o'clock. It is a great establishment for anybody moving from town to town where they are not too well known, because all you have to do is take your book into any post office and if there is any money indicated on your card you can receive that money in almost every small town across Canada. It means you do not have to go through the formalities of phoning a bank to check on your home account; you do not have to carry travellers cheques, and it seems to me a great service would be accomplished to more Canadians if the Canadian people were better advised on the operations of this bank.

I am quite sure that the Postmaster General is going to give a complete report on the financial position of the bank and I would strongly urge that he give some consideration to extending the services rather than curtailing them. We are well aware of the fact that some of the banks and other institutions in the financial field are not too happy about the federal government operating this type of savings bank, but I would point out that it has been in existence in Britain for many years and is used in a similar manner to that in which the Canadian service personnel use it but on a much larger scale, and I think it is a great establishment.

Something has been said today about the institution of the two-delivery system for mail. While we are not opposed to this, we suggest there must be an extension of the mail delivery service particularly in small towns on a greater scale than is taking place today before we contemplate extending two-service delivery in the larger centres. We still have many small and medium sized towns that do not enjoy a door-to-door delivery such as many of us have come to accept and want extended, and until that is done I think we should continue on a program of extending this door-to-door delivery before we extend in the other fields.

There are probably 3,000 rural mail deliveries being made in my riding, and with this we have a bit of a problem. We have been led to believe over the years, probably by United States movies, the old story that the United States mail must go through whatever the weather conditions. Unfortunately that is not true in Canada. In my area there appears to have been no consideration given to those areas that may be snowed up in the wintertime. The contract is let on the basis that the mailman is able to drive his car around the route. He may not own a horse, and yet 15 or 20 miles of his route will be blocked for two or three months, and I think an additional sum of money must be inserted into his contract to allow him to make these rural deliveries to the places that weather hazards make impossible to be visited for the contract price he is receiving for delivery of mail by car.

I think it may have been romanticized a bit by United States movies, but I think the idea when we post a letter is that we expect it to get to its delivery point as soon as possible. But in many of the areas I am speaking of the mail is not delivered for weeks at a time, and is only delivered then when people go out to a small grocery store. It is not a post office by any means, but the mail is there, and they can pick up the mail at that time. The storekeeper does not receive any remuneration for his part in the delivery, and I think something could legitimately be done about this matter.

Another problem is the extension of rural deliveries. While it is, as I understand it, the policy of the Post Office Department on occasions to make extensions to existing rural routes, it is very difficult to get a completely new route set up. We have a number of communities that were at one time associated with a small village. The people went to that village for their groceries and they picked up their mail in the small grocery store. That situation has changed. The grocery store is gone. The people do not go to that small community store any more; in fact, in many instances it does not exist any longer. The small village in which I was born is a good example. At one time it was a very small metropolis and now it is not a centre of activity at all, and yet the people in that particular area are not on the extension of an existing mail route, nor can it be argued legitimately that they should be on any existing route because there is no extension; but on a number of occasions they have petitioned to have another rural route set up but they have not been successful.

Another problem we are having in northern Ontario has to do with the extension of the suburbs of many communities. The people in the suburbs are having great difficulty in getting post office boxes. If we could extend the door-to-door deliveries in those communities it would solve the problem. If we are not in a position to extend the deliveries at the present time, then it is necessary for the Post Office Department to put postal boxes in the area. I have noticed that in a number of cities in southern Ontario they have placed outdoor boxes on the street and a person can get a key for the box door and get his mail in that way. Places like Blind River and Elliot Lake have undergone a tremendous expansion program in the last few years. The mail service is very poor. It is impossible to get a box. The mail is delivered through general delivery and frankly I do not think that is an efficient way of handling mail where four or five thousand people have to come into the post office in a limited period of time. The practice of installing temporary boxes, if necessary, would go a long way toward alleviating some of the problems in that area.

I am also quite interested in the matter of stamps. At one time I collected stamps and I might point out that such places as Ghana, New Guinea, Togoland and so on, which are only to me place names, have produced some of the best looking stamps that have been printed. Although we do not have tropical scenery, we have much scenery that could be reproduced on stamps. We do not have to try to draw waves that look like straight lines or curved lines; we do not have to make that kind of stamp, but we can produce very valuable stamps and I should like to express our appreciation of the stamp that was designed to depict the mining industry of northern Ontario. This stamp was very favourably received in northern Ontario and it was a satisfactory stamp. I think it could have had a little more colour in it. We have a great deal of colour in northern Ontario and the stamp could have depicted some of that colour. The stamp that commemorated the paper industry was also commended. If we can do that with two or three stamps I do not see any reason why we could not depict many more scenes in colour, and we might sell more to the stamp collectors.

When the Postmaster General replies I hope he will refer to the matter of the savings bank and that he will comment favourably on the fact that we should extend the post office savings bank, particularly for the benefit of those people who are no longer able to drop into their home bank when they need money and when they are travelling on the road for a week or two. In those circumstances they can drop into the post office and pick up $50 or $75 and not have to call their home bank. I have had to do that on many occasions and sometimes when I made the telephone call there was not enough money in the bank to call about.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to remind the house of the fact that the constituency for which I sit was formerly represented by one of the predecessors of the present Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), the Hon. Alcide Cote. Before beginning my remarks, I would very much like to remind the house of the excellent way in which the Hon. Alcide Cote discharged his duties at the time he was head of the department whose estimates are now under consideration.

The Hon. Alcide Cote was a man of deep honesty, a true democrat, a real servant of the people. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, he was prematurely taken away from us, and I felt than on this occasion I should recall his memory in the house.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest this morning to the speech delivered by the Postmaster General. We in particular, in the constituency of St. Jean, have long known of the hon. gentleman, as the one who had been entrusted with the task of criticizing in this house his predecessor, the late Hon. Alcide Cote.

I wish to thank those of my colleagues who, this morning, recalled a number of instances of criticism offered by the hon. gentleman who, at the time, was just the member for Notre Dame de Grace. Hansard records so many speeches of his criticizing the Post Office Department that I believe I should briefly point out some of the statements found in those speeches. Mind you, I have no intention of reading all the vague and insignificant claims made at that time by the hon. gentleman. I certainly have no intention of quoting from the official record the criticism, complaints, lamentations and gnashing of teeth indulged in at the time by the present Postmaster General. He would refer to post office robberies as though they had been invented by the Liberals. He would speak of departmental waste and extravagance; of inefficiency in the postal system under the Liberal administration; and he used to say that it was the department's duty to restore twice a day mail delivery in Canada.

Well, Mr. Chairman, when we saw the Postmaster General rise in his place this morning, we did not quite expect the remarks he did make. We were expecting the minister, who had witnessed so many robberies, to come into this house dragging after him the thieves he had ferretted out in the course of his inspection tours throughout the country. We were quite surprised to hear from him the admission that he was the first Postmaster General since confederation—and I wish to emphasize that fact—who had visited every post office in the country up to and including Newfoundland. The statement deserves emphasis for, if the Postmaster General has visited so many post offices, it must be because he was looking for those evil spirits which, at the time, were supposed to haunt the Post Office Department.

Having gone from one post office to the next, having put questions and carried out investigations, he comes back before us, to tell us what? To say that the criticism, the sly claims he had made before parliament for five years were but the outcome of a vision, to use a word which we have learned recently. We have it out of his own mouth, Mr. Chairman, that the postal system of this country, so well administered by the Liberals before him, compares favourably, he has found, with any other postal system in the world.

Let me therefore state at this point that, in making those remarks, the minister was not paying tribute to the present government; he was merely establishing that the preceding administration—the Liberal administration which he had so bitterly criticized—was not so bad after all but was thoroughly commendable.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the minister of what he had said, as reported on page 1179 of the French version of Hansard for January 14, 1954. The minister (who was then member for Notre Dame de Grace), giving the house a review of the Department's financial situation since 1945, said:

"In 1953, there was a surplus of $6,470,000 (in round figures); in 1952 the surplus was $6,649,000; in 1951 there was an error—"

"—somebody made a mistake and there was a deficit of $1,327,000;—"

"And there was a deficit!"

Now, Mr. Chairman, the member for Notre Dame de Grace, when in opposition, used to wonder how there could be a deficit! Surely, he would say, there must be a mistake! Well, today we could rightfully ask him where the error was made for we see that there is still, definitely, a deficit. And if error there be, it was surely the one made by the electorate in choosing the Conservative party.

Mr. Chairman, the minister also referred to an electronic sorting device to improve the system and speed up the handling of mail throughout the country. Now, I deplore that the present Postmaster General should speak of electronic sorting, that he should talk of substituting machinery for manpower, just when we need to recruit as much manpower as possible to arrest the tide of unemployment which is rife throughout the country at present. I hope the Postmaster General will alter his policy, and thoroughly contemplate the implications of such changes before introducing them.

Mr. Chairman, I will put off some of my observations until we take up the various items. Howevea, I wish to associate myself with all the others in saying that the Postmaster General has totally betrayed the promises he made when he told the public that he would expose the scandals he used to talk about. We have only to refer to newspaper reports of the election campaign to find accounts of the inflammatory speeches of the present Postmaster General. He has not always been indulgent towards his opponents. Furthermore, let me quote page 4346 of Hansard of the 26th of May 1955. The following sentence Mr. Chairman, will show you the mentality of the Postmaster General when he was merely member for Notre Dame de Grace. Just listen to this:

"But sometimes it's possible to knock some sense even into a stupid Minister—"

That's what he said at the time.

Well, Mr. Chairman, it is a reflection on his own even greater stupidity that, having spent five years criticizing others, he is now unable, having taken over from them, to put his finger on a single error of the government which was the butt of so many of his tirades.

(Text):

Mr. Wratten: Mr. Chairman, my remarks are going to be very brief. I want the Postmaster General to know how much the people of Brantford appreciate the work done by the local postmaster and his staff last week-end when the change-over took place from the old building to the new wing that has been opened. It was a good job, well organized and well carried out when you realize that service was given in the old building until Saturday noon and complete facilities for serving the public were transferred to the new wing and ready for service on Monday morning. I should also like to state that the people of Brantford appreciate the efforts of the former member for Brantford who was a member of the previous government and prevailed upon that government to start the addition into which the post office moved last week-end.

It is a splendid building and we are quite proud of it. It is a credit to the government and to the city of Brantford. We hope that when the complete job is finished and we have the re-opening ceremony the Postmaster General or the Minister of Public Works will come to Brantford and officiate because we would be very proud to have them in our city.

There is only one suggestion I should like to make to the Postmaster General. In my opinion, instead of creating double service in the larger cities we need to have service in the smaller centres and also to extend rural delivery service so that farmers who live some distance from their mail boxes will not have to travel anywhere from half a mile to a mile to the corner of the road in order to collect their mail. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, it has often been said that a person cannot quit a position, assume another and still have the same boss. As a former postmaster and supervisory postmaster for over 35 years I had the honour to work under the present Postmaster General for one year and now that I am a member of the house I feel that he is still one of my bosses. It was a privilege to work under his guidance, as well as that of other postmasters general, and I am happy to say that my welfare as a postal employee was always his first consideration. I have received co-operation from the Postmaster General and together with the assistance of the general public my position was a pleasant one.

Post office business is a big business. I was impressed by the fine report given this morning by the head of the department. The change that has taken place during my 35 years as a postmaster is amazing. Air mail and all-up mail service have been probably one of the greatest achievements in post office history. I was glad to hear the Postmaster General state that even greater improvements are being made with regard to this type of mail. I may say that not very long ago in my post office a letter was mailed at 5.30 in the evening and at 9 o'clock the next morning a gentleman walked into the Halifax post office and the letter was there in general delivery.

The sortation of ten million letters daily by 12,000 post offices can give some idea of the great work being done by the department. The addition of area superintendents throughout the whole of Canada and also supervisory postmasters has helped to make today's service, as the Postmaster General put it, second to none in the world. Area superintendents, district directors, regional directors and heads of the department were ever ready to assist all employees in their many problems. This gave us the opportunity to serve John Public as civil servants in a courteous and efficient manner. Post office boxes in the lobby, boxes throughout the town and rural delivery have helped to give better service in smaller communities. I understand that house to house mail delivery can only be provided in places with a population approaching that of a city.

I should like to suggest to the Postmaster General that part time assistants be employed under the civil service commission in the same way as full time employees. I believe they would give still better service than they are giving at the present time and they would also have the opportunity to have superannuation to their credit on retirement. If this were done we would have a better opportunity to secure part time helpers.

Finally my observations over 35 years lead me to say that postal employees working under the civil service commission and under the fine leadership of the Postmaster General are making an outstanding contribution to the welfare of our great country and I think we are all proud of their fine record. I am sure we can all say that our Post Office Department is second to none in the world.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly about the small salaries paid to postmasters in some of the more isolated places in Newfoundland. Actually, it is quite well known that in many cases these salaries are utterly inadequate. The surprising thing is that the government, which should lead in showing a proper appreciation for faithful service, has been so backward in allowing the scale of salaries to remain so low. I think everyone will agree with me when I say it is impossible for a man, his wife and family to live on the salary of $150 a month, and in many cases the remuneration is even lower.

The postmaster plays a very important part in isolated communities. He is one of the most important individuals living in that community. I hope the Postmaster General can find a way to reward him. I believe that up until recently postmasters' salaries were based upon the revenue of the post office. I have learned with a great deal of pleasure that the salaries now will be based upon the amount of work done rather than upon the amount of revenue which the office obtains. The thing that has to be done now is to make this unit value high enough.

I might also point out that the amount of rent paid for post office quarters in some instances is pitifully small.

I might mention, too, that in many areas of Labrador the mail service is poor and far from being what it should be. There are only a few places in which there are postmasters, and mail is landed from the coastal steamers only at those places. The result is that the people have to go for many miles in order to get the mail which has been dropped off by the coastal steamers. I would request that provision be made whereby mail will be dropped off at each port of call. As an illustration of what I am saying, I would point out that the mail for Port Hope Simpson is carried there on the steamer but is not landed there. It is taken on to Williams Harbour, 20 miles away, although the steamer has actually called at Port Hope Simpson. The people from Port Hope Simpson must chase the steamer 20 miles in order to get the mail. Then the steamer which calls at Green Bay does not have a mailman aboard. In the old days all the coastal steamers used to carry a mailman. Since this steamer does not have a mailman letters cannot be mailed aboard but they have to be carried to the nearest post office ashore. If a nurse wants to send a small parcel of medicine to a nearby community, she has to get a crew member or a passenger to carry it. The reinstitution of mail men aboard coastal steamers would be a great public service and the cost involved would be small.

I should like to mention, too, that the Canadian National telegraph office and the post office should continue to be joint offices rather than separated. In the old days, the Canadian National telegraph operator was also the postmaster, and between the two positions could sometimes get a reasonable salary. There has been an effort to separate these offices, and this effort should cease. In fact, a counter-effort should be made to make them joint offices operating under the same people and in the same building. While I am mentioning buildings, and before I sit down I hope that the Postmaster General will recommend the provision of post office buildings in Badger, Glenwood and Robert's Arm.

Mr. Regier: I was very pleased indeed to hear the minister's report this morning. I was particularly pleased to note the great pride that the minister took in his work, and in the work being performed by the post office. As the hon. member for Kootenay West pointed out, he is rapidly learning that public enterprise is workable and the people who work in a public enterprise are able to render a degree of efficient service that is equalled by no other. I noted particularly when he expressed the motto of the post office, that it was to serve the people. The motto is not to make money, not to make profit, but to serve the people. The minister did his utmost to convince us on this side that this public enterprise known as the post office was working. He used the phrase that it was functioning so smoothly, so efficiently, that our post office record was an outstanding one. I was pleased to note the compliment he paid the employees. It is often said that men must have the lash of the profit motive behind them; they must be able to see money; they must have every expectation of receiving a high monetary return, before they will exert their utmost effort.

I was very pleased when the minister referred to the former depuy postmaster general, who has spent a lifetime in public service by saying that case after case bore the imprint of his achievements. I think I have the wording right, but at least it is close. The minister expressed confidence that the new deputy minister will have an equally outstanding record of public service. Those of us who have met the new deputy minister from time to time know that the minister's confidence is going to be fulfilled.

I should like to call the minister's attention to a number of little matters which, to me, involves some principles. In the first place, I should like to refer to the suggestion of bonding the employees. I feel that would be rather unnecessary. I noticed that according to the annual report for 1956-57 there were only 335 prosecutions, and of those only 96 involved employees of the post office. Here again, Mr. Chairman, is a wonderful illustration of the ability of people to serve, even though the incentive to serve may not be monetary but rather one of serving people. I do not know, offhand, how many employees the post office has, but it likely runs into the tens of thousands.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): About 50,000.

Mr. Regier: The minister says, 50,000 and out of 50,000 people only 96 had to be prosecuted in one year for a whole host of wrong things, such as robbery, receiving, shortages, thefts, forgeries and so on. I think that speaks very well for our employees.

I should like to compliment the minister on the new atmosphere which prevails in his department from one end of Canada to the other on the part of everyone concerned. They make the public really feel that this is not some hierarchy of government, but this is the post office which belongs to the public and all the employees are actually public servants. I have only to compare the attitude of the minister with the attitude of other ministers to know that that is at least partly the wish of the minister that this new atmosphere ought to prevail. The success of any public enterprise depends very much on the attitude of the public being served towards that institution. If the public feels alienated in so far as that institution is concerned, if they feel that it is not part of them, they also do not feel any responsibility towards that institution and the efforts of that institution to serve the public are hampered.

I was hoping the minister would announce that henceforth regulations might play a slightly lesser role in his department. Every so often we run into regulations. Some of the requests of the people seem to be so logical and very often so minor and so simple yet they mean so much to the people concerned that they cannot understand the need for detailed regulations. I know that when there is danger of a bureaucracy in any institution, whether privately-owned or publicly-owned, you build up regulations. Every time something goes wrong some official thinks up a new regulation that ought to be put into effect. Without having regard to the small number of things that do go wrong, in an effort possibly to avoid a repetition of a wrong, out comes a new regulation.

I have in mind such regulations as that as to the hours at which wickets can be kept open in a major post office in one of our large Canadian cities. Surely at a post office such as in Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver—and I am now referring to the main post offices—where they have hundreds and hundreds of employees, it should be possible, by rearranging of employee hours, to keep wickets open right around the clock. I do not suggest that all the wickets should be kept open but some of the wickets might be kept open. However, on some afternoons I have found some wickets closed in large post offices. I believe that statement is correct, if my memory serves me rightly and unless there has been a change since then.

I know the origin of this regulation. It originated from the principle of the 40-hour week. However, there is no reason why the men cannot have a 40-hour week in a large post office and yet some wickets and some service be available to the public at all hours. Working people working regular hours in Canada—which ordinarily means that after breakfast they begin work and they come home for dinner at six o'clock at night—find it extremely hard to use some of our public facilities. It is for that reason that the chartered banks of Canada began opening on Friday night from 4.30 p.m. until 6.00 p.m. This procedure has shown itself to be a great convenience to those people who must work during banking hours. I think the larger post offices at least might consider an amendment to whatever regulation exists in relation to the hours at which wickets are open.

Then there is the regulation that covers rural routes: not more than so many, not less than so many. That may be all very well as an over-all policy or as a guide. However, I believe the application of the regulation works hardships in that it does not take account of different circumstances and of different communities. Another regulation governs the establishment of red letter boxes where people can post their mail without going all the way to the post office. Another one governs when door-to-door delivery service will be given to any special community. We have regulations in other matters. I would hope that the minister some time in the course of the next year will undertake a review of all these regulations that exist. He possibly knows how many there are. I am sure they run into the hundreds and hundreds. I hope he will make a review of them with a view of possibly eliminating half of them and instituting a little bit of common sense in the case of a goodly number of them. I know that procedure can lead to misuse as well. There is always a reason for the origin of a regulation. But I think far too often the origin is not a very serious one and only reflects something that has gone wrong somewhere along the line.

I am a little bit alarmed, Mr. Chairman, at another phase of the minister's report for the year ended March 31, 1957. I do not know what the situation is for the year ended March 31, 1958. Maybe the minister will be able to supply that information. However, at the beginning of that post office year—I suppose that is what it would be right to call it—there were in operation 947 post offices and at the end of the year there were in operation 940 post offices or in other words a reduction in the number of post offices by seven. I may say those figures refer to the province of British Columbia. For the whole of Canada the number of post offices in operation was reduced from 11,996 to 11,879. For the whole of Canada in that one fiscal year 83 new post offices were set up and 200 post offices were closed. That means that there were 117 fewer post offices at the end of the year than at the beginning of the year. We thought the population of Canada was growing. We thought that new communities were continuously being built up in many of the unsettled areas of Canada. I should like to have an explanation. I hope the explanation is not the one that I fear it may well be. The fear to which I have reference is that there is a growing tendency to consolidate, to which even this minister has not yet called a halt, to take away from little communities their own post office in order to build up a monumental post office—and I mean monumental in size—in the larger urban centre that is nearest.

That brings me to that huge memorial that has been built in the city of Vancouver to a former minister of the government, the Vancouver post office. I admire the building. I think it is marvellous. I believe it is beautiful. All the people like to look at the building. However, I believe this post office has been established for the purpose of serving a territory much larger than the immediate area, namely the city of Vancouver. I agree that in years to come the city of Vancouver will need a post office of that size. The minister can correct me if I am wrong but I believe that the cost was some $14 million and the tunnel to the railway station added $2 million. Why in the world the government would spend money on a tunnel to a railway station from the post office when in these days most of the important mail comes in by air anyway is beyond my understanding. Interest on the $2 million would have paid for trucking charges for years and years to come without the need of the original investment. However, be that as it may it is a nice post office and that is that.

We do not want the post offices around the city of Vancouver to have to disappear as a result of that Vancouver post office. We do not care whether the head of the post office in Vancouver is in grade 18 as a result of it and would only be in grade 9 if it were not for that centralized post office. The people want to feel that the post office belongs to them and not to a huge bureaucracy with inspectors inspecting inspectors inspecting inspectors. I know the minister is not at fault. I know this is not a policy initiated by the minister. I know that it was a previous regime that initiated that policy. However, it is not looked upon with favour by the people.

I have taken a few lessons in economics and I believe the minister has done so too. He knows that there is a point of maximum return and that if you exceed this point you no longer have efficiency but instead have inefficiency. The people in Burnaby can inform the minister that the efficiency of the postal services in their community has not improved as a result of the consolidation manoeuvres that have occurred.

I am referring to the policy of the department and am only using the lower mainland of British Columbia as an example in order to make sure that the minister knows what I am getting at. I refer to all the little services we get from the post office which usually involve 5 cents to 15 cents in respect of letters and involving 60 cents or 70 cents when we mail a parcel. They are relatively small and insignificant yet they affect the daily lives of the people who like to feel they are doing business with their own post offices.

I cannot understand why in Burnaby, where we have a population of 100,000 people, we cannot have an efficiently operated post office, when a former minister admitted that the city of Saskatoon, which has a much smaller population, has a post office which yields a net revenue to the government of Canada. So after all these years we come to the conclusion that we cannot have this post office even though we are the second largest community in our province because we have to serve the interests of that huge establishment in the city of Vancouver and if we did get our own post office some of the officials in the Vancouver post office would suffer a loss of salary or loss of category because their volume would be seriously reduced.

The post office—and this perhaps comes back to the question of regulations—might in the interest of public relations pay a little more attention to the boundaries of municipalities. I know the post office has announced that it pays no attention to such boundaries and I have letters to that effect in my office. This policy leads to utter confusion and to disappointment, and it results in poor service. We have in the city of Port Moody one example, where the population within the city possibly borders on 3,000, and yet within that city is the Port Moody post office, Pleasantside post office and the city is also served from door to door by deliveries out of the city of New Westminster. Not so long ago there was an effort on the part of the post office to persuade part of the city to accept a rural route which would be based in Port Coquitlam so that there would have been four identifications in one small city. This, as I say, leads to utter confusion, and I would like the minister some day when he sends out these public notices advising the people what to do about their Christmas mail to simply take my riding as a guinea pig. I would challenge him to mail one piece of mail to every householder within my constituency without having thousands of homes not served and without having thousands of these circulars arrive in some other constituency.

There is no way of which I know, although I know the riding which I represent intimately, whereby I could send a letter to each one of my own constituents—there is no reference I could use. I have the rural directory which helps for a little bit and leads to a mix-up in some sections, and then there is the voters' list, which has no addresses at all worth mentioning. There is the telephone book and surely the Post Office Department should be able to obtain a little co-operation from the telephone companies of Canada so that at least the telephone directories might give accurate addresses. However, there is no medium of which I know available to ordinary commercial people to enable them to accurately cover any area they wish to cover. One of the major flaws is because of this regulation or decision or whatever it is that the Post Office Department will not pay attention to municipal boundaries and this has led to a case such as I have described where there are four different identifications in one little city.

There is, I believe, supposed to be a regulation in regard to the drop letter rate. I do not know what it is and I am still attempting to find out, but some small communities adjacent to communities cannot have this drop letter rate, while the riding of Coast-Capilano which was represented by a former minister and which is further away from Vancouver than some ridings does enjoy that four-cent letter rate, at least in some parts of it.

The minister spoke to us of the financial aspects of his department and he referred to the profit making part of the mail. The first class mail, he said, is a profitable mail and I think he should give some very serious consideration to an increase in the rate for all this unnecessary material and garbage that we receive. Surely the taxpayers do not have to subsidize the Ford Motor Company or Lux soap or Rinso soap powder, or whatever else it might be, by means of taxes so that these huge corporations may be enabled not only to flood our homes with needless paper but also to overburden the backs of our mail carriers.

If the minister is thinking of instituting economies in his department and in the workload of the employees in addition to enhancing his revenues he might well recommend a realistic approach to that problem. This dates back to the very early days of Canadian history when it was in the public interest to distribute as much reading matter to the isolated pioneer as was possible, and this same principle has never been altered. Today we have the average resident in the average Canadian community receiving thousands of pounds of advertising delivered to him at the expense of a public service. This is not helping the public service at all, it is simply exploiting the taxpayer and the institutions of the taxpayer for the purposes of big business.

If one will look at the amount of money the people of Canada owe today I think it will be seen, and the minister himself must agree with this, that there has been far more advertising through the mail than there should have been for the welfare of the people during the last several years.

The points I wish to make at this stage are now fairly well covered. I think it is safe for me to say on behalf of all my colleagues that we are very pleased with the attitude taken by the minister since he took office in his department. This attitude has been one of accommodation and co-operation and we are very pleased to note the pride he takes in the honest and faithful work done by the men in this worth-while public institution and, in speaking for my own riding, I am particularly pleased to hear him say he intends to visit all post offices in Canada. I extend to him an invitation to visit the new Burnaby post office which I know he intends to have built very shortly.

Post offices in Canada are publicly owned institutions and as such they have rendered and will continue to render satisfactory services to the public only so long as and to the degree in which the people have the feeling that the individual institutions are their own. I would therefore plead with the Postmaster General to reverse the present trend of centralization lest the institution which so many of us have grown to respect develops into an octopus which is beyond the reach of public opinion.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a minute or two to say a few words about small post offices and particularly about the salaries paid to the operators of small post offices. In my riding there are 64 small post offices and I think the top salary received by any one of these postmasters is less than $4,000. In many cases salaries range from $3,000 down. It is not possible in many of these areas where the postmaster receives such small salaries for them to have anything more than a subsistence standard of living, and unless a man can take on supplementary enterprises and step up his income by some other means he is placed in a position of having to accept a low standard of living. He gets into a position where he does not want to go out and get another job and leave his post office business because he has put in a long period of service and will qualify for a pension in the end. So he is faced with the problem of getting by as best he can and covering his costs of living out of the revenue he receives from his post office salary. As we all know, the value of the dollar has decreased 50 per cent, and I should like to hear from the Postmaster General whether the salaries paid to these operators of small post offices have increased proportionately.

Again, I understand that the salaries are set by a rule of thumb formula which is based on the amount of work done or on the revenue of the post office. In so far as it would be possible to vary that in accordance with the conditions under which these small post office operators have to operate I think the Postmaster General would be perfectly within his right to make that variation, and I hope he does in the interest of these small operators.

In conclusion I want to add a note to what has already been said about the efficiency of the post office service. I have nothing but the greatest praise for its work in my riding. The work which is being done on the delivery routes and in these post offices is second to none. The atmosphere is good and the accommodation is good, and I think a great deal of this is attributable to the efforts of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Carter: When I called it one o'clock I indicated that there were one or two items I would like to deal with. One of them has already been introduced by the hon. member for Macleod who has just taken his seat, and I should like to follow up what he has just said. The report of the Post Office Department shows that we have 636 post offices in Newfoundland and while no breakdown is given as to the classification of these offices I presume there is some accounting which would give the total salaries paid in Newfoundland post offices, and if the figures are available I would be grateful if the minister could give us some idea of what the average salary of the Newfoundland postmasters amount to. If he could give it for each classification, without too much inconvenience, it would be even better.

While I am talking about salaries I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that in Newfoundland and possibly everywhere else in Canada the salaries of the revenue postmasters include the amount of rent that must be paid for the post office accommodation. That was a recent change. Several years ago the post office, through the Department of Public Works, allocated the accommodation for the post office and assessed its rental and this was paid separately from the postmaster's salary. When the change was made, the postmaster was paid a fixed amount and was charged with the responsibility of finding suitable accommodation for the post office. That, of course, introduced an element of inequity, because in some places accommodation may be readily available at a reasonable price while in other communities it might not be so easily available and the cost might be higher. Unless this is taken into account the remuneration of the postmaster might be considerably reduced. Thus, in two communities with equal workloads, although the remuneration may be the same the take home pay of the individual postmasters may vary considerably on account of this policy of making the postmaster's salary cover the rental of post office accommodation.

While I am on this subject I should call the attention of the Postmaster General to the anomaly which has developed in Newfoundland due to the policy of the federal government regarding the provision of post office buildings. When the estimates for public works were before the house the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and myself tried to find out from the minister just who had the last word in determining what type of building would be supplied and the amount of space that would be provided. We learned that the local branch of the post office made an estimate of the requirements and that this was sent to the branch here in Ottawa where it would perhaps be modified or revised, and then that estimate might again be revised in consultation between the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works, but we never did find out who had the final word in determining what space should be provided. I think the minister will recognize that I have in mind the post office building in Marystown in my riding about which there has been a great deal of controversy and which I understand has not been started because the town council has refused to issue the necessary permit. We know that the local branch, local architects and the personnel of the Newfoundland branch estimated certain requirements for that office. That was revised by the Post Office Department here and then after further controversy it was increased, as the Minister of Public Works told us, by 20 per cent.

There is still considerable controversy over the fact that this further increase is still insufficient, having regard to the infrequency of mail. It sometimes happens that six or eight weeks mail may accumulate and arrive at the same time before it can be distributed, and those conditions obtain in most offices in Newfoundland, which makes them different from similar communities or communities of the same size on the mainland where mail can be received and distributed almost every day.

This policy with respect to buildings has caused an anomaly to develop in Newfoundland because prior to Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada the government of the island built a number of post offices in various communities where they felt the amount of traffic justified it. Those buildings were inherited by the federal government and as they become dilapidated or as they require repairs or replacement it is the policy and the responsibility of the federal government to replace them. Many of those places have now been provided with nice, up-to-date, modern post office buildings, while communities of similar size, and perhaps even greater size, and often of greater importance, cannot get a building provided by the federal department for the simple reason that it was not fortunate enough to have one prior to confederation. I would suggest to the Postmaster General that the whole policy governing the erection of post office buildings should be revised and rather than providing them on a basis of revenue, which I believe now is the case, they should be provided on merit as the requirements of the community dictate, because in a community of a thousand people, or even 500 people, it is not convenient to the public to have to go to a room in some private residence to post and receive mail. Adequate facilities for the public cannot be provided under those circumstances.

Before I leave the subject of salaries and rental of those buildings altogether I should like to ask the minister whether he can give any example where the remuneration of the postmaster has been decreased when the post office has been moved from a rented building, or from the residence of the postmaster, to a public building for which rent did not have to be paid? I have been told there have been such instances, and if that is so then it destroys the whole basis of the post office argument in which they maintain that they do not pay rent, they pay only the salaries of the postmasters and it is up to them to get whatever accommodation they can and pay for it out of the remuneration they receive.

Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to the attention of the minister the position of some of our mail couriers. In Newfoundland we have very few roads and in many instances mail has to be carried either in a small boat from one settlement to another or carried overland by the courier on his back. Until quite recently I did not realize just what carrying Canadian mail is like. Before confederation we had very good regulations in Newfoundland under which the mailbag would contain bundles of letters and bundles of parcels under a certain weight, all done up in neatly wrapped packages but one courier told me this story when I discussed it with him, He said: "Sir, we are not carrying mail any more, we are carrying freight." I asked him what he meant by that. He said, "We do not carry packages, we are carrying anything, pieces of stoves, window screens and parts of washers, almost anything you can think of that can be put into a mailbag today."

These people have to carry that on their backs. I would ask the Postmaster General to take this into consideration when the remuneration of those couriers is being determined because, unlike the situation on the mainland where the courier can meet the train, deposit his mail and take mail away again, the courier in Newfoundland may have to take it to a point several miles distant. He may have to leave it there, return to his home and come back at some other time to pick up the incoming mail and carry it back to the post office. It is a much more complicated business than obtains anywhere on the mainland.

I would urge the Postmaster General to take all these factors into consideration when the remuneration of couriers is being determined.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I was glad today to hear the Postmaster General say that we had the most efficient postal system in the world. With that I agree, but this has been so for many years. I am glad to see that the Postmaster General has followed the tradition of other postmasters general who have preceded him. This situation is due to the fact that the officials and the employees are so loyal and so intelligent that they have helped to make our system one of the most efficient postal services in the world. I would ask the Postmaster General whether at any time he has had any intention of making any changes and whether he would consider the services that those employees have given to this country, and bear this in mind whenever he might have intentions of changing any of the personnel.

I should like to take a minute to say that when the Postmaster General was on this side of the house—and I have great regard for him and I have known him for many years—practically every day he would rise in his place in the house and denounce the once-a-day delivery. Being a businessman I approved of his action at the time. I believe he was sincere and whenever he rose to denounce the once-a-day delivery I was glad to hear him do so. And then he became a minister and, alas, he changed his mind completely. He was no longer a twice-a-day delivery fan, but he thought that the public was well served by having one delivery a day. What caused him to change his mind? He is a practical businessman. He must know that while it may not be economic as far as the post office is concerned, yet the hardship that it causes the people and the loss to the business firms in having only one delivery a day far exceeds the economies of the Post Office Department. He must realize that while it may cost the post office possibly a small amount less than it would if we had two deliveries a day yet it may be causing unemployment at a time when unemployment is rife and we need to have a job for every man. Is it really an economy? If we had these men and women working in the post office they would be drawing a salary and they would not be on the unemployment role and they would pay back in income tax possibly just as much as we are paying them now in unemployment benefits. Frankly, I do not think it is an economy. I think the minister should think back to the time when he was on the opposition side and when every day he said that we should have two deliveries a day.

The minister talked about electronic machines. I have no doubt they will be a wonderful improvement for post offices throughout the country. Automation is becoming a necessity. We must all look forward to evolution and I believe that some day we will have to have these machines. But does the minister think the time is right to introduce these machines, thus putting people out of post offices throughout the whole country because a lesser number of people will be required? I think he is making a big mistake. Possibly a few years from now when unemployment may have ceased to exist, and I hope that it will, will be time enough to instal these machines and to put in the best systems that can be installed in our post offices throughout the country. But I think it is a very bad thing for the minister to increase the unemployment rolls at the present time. Many questions have been asked today and before I sit down I should like to ask the minister if he does not think it would be a good thing for him to reply to some of them now.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, as usual I simply want to say a few words. My reason for rising is that I want to put before the minister a request made by the town of Acton Vale which is in another constituency than my own. Acton Vale is a progressive city and has requested me to use my influence with the Postmaster General to secure the building of a post office there. I know the city of Acton Vale very well. In recent years many industries have been established there and I think it would be most fitting if a post office would be erected there. I make this request to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, to take some point of departure in this debate, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean was kind enough to invite me to answer some of the questions which have been asked. Well, let us take one observation he made a little while ago to which reference has also been made by a number of opposition members. I am going to use this as an example of much of what has been going on today. On May 20 of this year, as found at page 280 of Hansard, the hon. member for Outremont said:

> What a wonderful difference there is between sitting in the opposition and being a member of the government.

After a few other words he went on to say:

> When he was on this side of the house he protested continually about the many thefts that were taking place in the post offices throughout the country. These thefts still go on just the same and he seems to do nothing about the matter. Possibly he tries but he cannot do anything about it. If we look at all the bank robberies that are going on throughout Canada today we realize it has become almost an impossibility to check them.

All through this morning and this afternoon we have heard that same type of approach being taken in the debate. "Here is what the minister said." "Why has he not done anything about it?" All right, let us take this question as an example. The fact of the matter is that in the year ended March 31, 1958, nine months of which were under my administration, while robberies in post offices did increase from 159 in the previous year to 191 the actual losses in those robberies declined from $161,500 to $130,100. The reason for that is simply that instead of the previous, self-satisfied, take-what-may-come attitude of the former postmaster general we went after this thing, introduced, as I pointed out to the house this morning, various security measures and we got results and cut down losses.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): More robberies.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Unfortunately we are not in a position to control the number of people who decide to break into post offices but we certainly are in a position to control the care of our own valuables. That is what we have done and it is typical of our record.

There is another point I want to make since we are on this matter. Incidentally, I want to congratulate the Liberal opposition on the excellent research they have done. Every one of them has been rustling sheets of paper containing quotations from Hansard and passing them from one to another. In fact, the finest example of this co-operation was when a couple of Liberal members rushed over to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam of the C.C.F. group when he was speaking with what they thought was a quotation which would help the hon. member. Hon. members will recall that I asked the hon. member for Vancouver East to prove what he was saying by quoting from Hansard but he could not find the quotation.

What I want to get at is this. My interest in the department and its administration has not simply arisen following my appointment as Postmaster General. A number of hon. members, and I am very grateful for it, have referred to my interest in the department and my activities over the years. Dealing specifically with the question of robberies and thefts from post offices, I have given the facts as to the results. This morning the hon. member for St. Denis asked for certain figures as to burglar alarms and thefts. I will give the figures later as to thefts but let me deal with burglar alarms for the moment because hon. members will see the development of an interesting situation.

As I said, my interest in the department has extended over a number of years. Liberal members have drawn attention to the fact that I laid great emphasis on the matter of thefts over a number of years. If we take the year 1956 we find that prior to August of that year there had only been 21 burglar alarms installed. I do not have a break-down as to how many were installed between that time and June 10, 1957, and how many after June 10, 1957, but in that period, after pressure had been exerted in this connection, 17 more were installed or almost a 100 per cent increase in burglar alarms. There were 11 buzzer alarms before August, 1956, and that figure was increased by 50 per cent. Six were added. There had been 75 safes with money chests prior to August, 1956 and subsequent to that time another 137 were added or almost 200 per cent more.

Here is the picture of what has been happening as a result of our efforts in connection with this department. Now, I want to deal with those questions where hon. members claim there has been no action. I have so many quotations here that I cannot begin to use them. The hon. member for St. Denis said nothing has been implemented. I think that is typical of what was said. Now that is the same argument that has been put forward from time to time, quite unfairly I think to other ministers as well, that criticisms made when we were in opposition have not been acted upon when we came to power.

In the case of mechanization, modernization and the development of electronic sorting equipment, I pounded away at that when I was in opposition. I made the suggestion in opposition that there should be closer co-operation between this country, the United States and the United Kingdom in examining developments and exchanging information. Nothing was done. When I came into office as Postmaster General I did have meetings in Washington; my officials and I have been to London; the United States and United Kingdom officials have been here to Ottawa and to other postal areas in Canada. This is a solid achievement that has been carried out.

Mr. Hardie: Who initiated the postal congress here last year?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The universal postal union, as it happened, five years before at their meeting, when they decided to come here.

Mr. Hardie: You admit you did not have anything to do with it; good.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? Has he completed the matter of thefts in the department? I want to ask him a question dealing with that, if I may.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am following a certain line of thought, Mr. Chairman, in order to attempt to deal with the questions which have been raised to date. Perhaps if it is agreeable to the hon. member we could have my officials come down here when the detailed consideration commences—

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I could ask the question now. Has the minister given consideration to a recommendation which he made when he was on this side of the house with reference to these thefts, namely that the whole matter of protection in post offices be turned over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Did he give consideration to that suggestion and has he asked the mounted police to take over the protective aspects of the post office?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In answering the hon. member's question, I would say there is a good deal of co-operation between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and my own department. On the other hand, there are areas in Canada where the provincial police force is formed of other than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and it, therefore, is not practical to use them for specific post office investigations. I think that is the answer to the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was that not the reply given to the Postmaster General when he was on this side?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I never said that the previous government was always wrong. I said that sometimes they were wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In this instance you are now saying the previous government was right.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I never disputed many of these facts which were given to me. In many cases I was searching for information, not attempting to criticize. Let me just deal with this type of interruption which I am getting at the present time from the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not an interruption, it is a question.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I was trying to follow a trend of thought and I am going back to it. A few moments ago I began to follow this trend of thought, and here is a quotation which deals with various observations which have been made today, particularly by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville in French, that I was critical of the whole Post Office Department; that I was so bitter about these people and the previous administration. I quote, Mr. Chairman, from Hansard of March 1, 1957, page 1805, from my own remarks:

> The minister has heard, and rightly so, praise and commendation from all parts of the house this afternoon for certain aspects of the operations of his department, and more specifically for the efforts put forward by the mass of the employees in the post office department whose number totals, if I remember rightly, some 50,000. That is as it should be. These are hardworking, conscientious people who are giving devoted service to their country. They are handling nearly four billion pieces of mail a year, and I join with other hon. members in commending them for their devotion and hard work.

Let me say this, Mr. Chairman. I hope the Postmaster General will not be led by that into rising subsequently and saying, "You have said so many nice things about my employees that those of you who have made certain critical observations are just unreasonable, carping critics who are contradicting themselves and contradicting other people within the party." Praise for the staff of the post office department and for their efforts does not necessarily include praise for the policies of the department, the expenditures of the department or certain of its actions, and I think that point should be made so we do not have any misunderstanding.

This same misunderstanding has arisen here this afternoon time and time again. Because I criticized the minister, because I singled out certain aspects of the administration for criticism and because I asked some questions, that does not mean I was bitterly opposed and critical of the entire administration.

Mr. Rouleau: You have changed your attitude since.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, let me go back to the point with which I was dealing. I was dealing with the suggestion that there have been no changes in the department as a result of the new administration, and I referred to modernization and mechanization.

In the case of stamp design, we have enlarged the field from which advice is sought and proposed the establishment of the stamp advisory committee to which I referred today.

In the case of the post office savings bank, we are now having a look at the possibility of extending its facilities to areas where it will not be in competition with commercial banks, and curtailing those facilities where perhaps the banking facilities are adequate. I do not know whether or not this is going to be practical. We are in the process of investigating that.

In the case of stamp vending machines, we have doubled the number installed and we have an additional 500 to be delivered by the end of this year.

Another matter we went over was the reference I made to the security of postal values.

In the case of our general personnel policy we have introduced changes, some of them requested for many years by our staff, some as long as 40 years, to improve working conditions.

In the case of our postal regulations we followed through with another aspect of our criticisms and made our regulations covering advertising and insertions in Canadian publications more realistic to enable them to compete more successfully with publications coming in from the United States.

This morning one hon. member was kind enough to congratulate us, and I am grateful to him—I think it was the hon. member for Kootenay East—upon the improvement in our correspondence. Part of this is the result of the emphasis being placed on adequate correspondence. There is a great interest in correspondence within the department, more so because most of this correspondence goes across my own desk. I, personally, was dissatisfied previously with the type of explanation and the type of reason which I was given by the minister. I felt, when I accepted this responsibility, I was going to do something to improve this and see that members got adequate, complete and satisfactory answers. I say here, Mr. Chairman, if any member, Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F., sitting in this house is not satisfied with the amount of information given in a letter from my office, he has only to ask and we will try to get him every piece of information for which he could possibly ask. I do not expect they will always agree with reasons given in the letter, but I do say that in this field as well we are dealing with criticisms which have previously been made.

I could go ahead on this score for quite a little while dealing with other developments and changes which we have made as a result of our criticisms. However, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that at this point I have dealt reasonably adequately with the general criticism which was so evident in those offered today that this has just been a continuation of the old regime.

In so far as two a day mail delivery is concerned, we have had innumerable quotations on that matter from my own remarks over the years when I was in opposition. You will have noted, Mr. Chairman—and it is an interesting fact—that the great majority of these quotations were from Hansard of 1954 and 1955, with one I think from Hansard of 1956. There is a reason for that. When I came here in 1953 the one a day mail delivery situation had been instituted a comparatively short time previously. No cost figures had been introduced into the house to show what the position would be if they returned to two a day mail delivery. The necessary adjustment had not been made in many cases to fit into that one a day mail delivery picture in order to make it operate as satisfactorily as possible. When I came here in 1953 and in 1954 there was a general feeling across this country of dissatisfaction with and opposition to the one a day delivery service in residential areas. Largely perhaps as a result of the debates which we had at that time and the criticisms which we made of the one a day policy at that time the department took various steps to ameliorate this situation. They arranged that more mail would reach the point of destination early enough in the morning to be delivered on that first delivery. They examined routes and rearranged routes in order to accommodate particular situations, particularly those of business. Finally, they came down to this house, Mr. Chairman, and put on the record adequate figures for the first time, after two years of pressure, to point out the cost increase which would result from a return to a two a day mail delivery. As a result of all this, finally when I got the information for which I had pressed for two years, my position and my view of the matter began to change and culminated in the observations that I have made today. I do not know what hon. members in this house expect—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did my hon. friend, as a private member, ever reveal his change of attitude?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did my hon. friend ever communicate, after 1956, what his attitude towards delivery twice a day was while he was a private member?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I have many examples which I could quote from the hon. member for Essex East. When he changed his mind he went to any length in order not to show that he had changed. As far as I was concerned, I have set out the story. I mitigated my criticism.

Mr. Bourget: You had not changed on March 1, 1957. Would the minister like me to read exactly what he had to say on March 1?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No. I have it here. There was a single paragraph there which was very definitely critical.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister like me to read it? It will be very interesting to the house, particularly after the remarks made by the minister to the effect that his ideas had changed with regard to twice a day delivery of mail. As reported at page 1807 of Hansard he said:

> The point I would make is that the elimination of twice a day mail delivery service has caused—

This is on March 1, 1957.

> —and is continuing to cause considerable distress and inconvenience in our metropolitan areas that are now served by letter carrier service.

If the minister has changed his mind, I do not know when he did so; probably it was since June 21, 1957, because on March 1 he had not yet changed.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, Mr. Chairman. This fits in perfectly with the picture I am trying to establish which was that when I came in 1953 there was general dissatisfaction with this service and that with growing emphasis in recent months it has become apparent that the normal residential householder is not unduly concerned about two a day mail delivery. But—and this is the point, and this is what I was referring to in those remarks which the hon. member for Levis has just quoted—the businessman is still concerned with getting two a day mail delivery. When I made those remarks I had in mind particularly the businessman. When I made my remarks this morning, as the hon. member who is very fair will recall, I drew specific attention to the case of the businessman operating in an area where one a day delivery is in effect and said that it presented a specific problem to such people. That is a problem which we are going to have to study and with which we are going to have to try to deal. But I wanted to give the house this morning as much information as I could and to establish the fact that, as of this moment, I did not feel that any general revision as to two a day delivery was the best policy.

Let me deal for a few moments as well as I can with the specific question of hon. members. Then perhaps we can ask my officials to come down here and deal with any more which may be asked. I find that in my general remarks here I have dealt I think with most of the points raised by the hon. member for St. Denis. Again I want to emphasize the fact that I do not accept his statement that I claimed the post office was poor or that it offered poor service in previous years. I never said that.

Mr. Denis: That is your own declaration.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You might quote it for me.

Mr. Denis: I did so.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): My criticism was of the work of the Postmaster General. The hon. member further observed or drew the conclusion that if nothing had been implemented of the suggestions made, he would have to conclude that the former minister was a good minister and that we are only continuing his policy. The fact that I have shown that we have made so many changes, Mr. Chairman, perhaps puts a couple of negatives into that statement with regard to the good administration of the previous minister.

I have given figures concerning burglar alarms and thefts. The hon. member for St. Denis asserted that I was talking about extravagance and waste in the post office. Here again I wish the hon. members would document their assertions because they have got themselves mixed up—and badly mixed up—in this case between what they think happened and what actually is on the record in Hansard. In the case of extravagance, for example, my great effort in that respect occurred back in 1954, and I based my argument completely on quotations from the department's own report —I refer to the Woods-Gordon report—in which reference was made time and again to certain inefficiencies in the department and recommendations were made for their improvement. I can remember that there were some of these observations and most of them have been dealt with by now. I have no doubt that a great many more have been dealt with than would have been the case had they not been brought before the house.

Mr. Denis: There was nothing about extravagance.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The point is this. I was quoting the Woods-Gordon report. Since then, with one exception, I do not remember having referred to any extravagance in the post office. The one which I did deal with quite adequately was the case of the universal postal union congress here.

This was budgeted for by the previous administration in the amount of $300,000 and I have just been checking up and I find that our administration managed to put the thing through for $226,000, or a saving of $75,000. I would point out to the hon. member for St. Denis that when we talked about extravagance we meant it, and in cases like this we are able to produce proof of performance.

Mr. Bourget: On that particular point, Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister would like to be fair, because when the amount of $250,000 was put in the estimates I believe the former minister explained to the hon. member who was at that time asking a question that it was only an estimate and that they were expecting 300 or 350 people at the postal union congress. Surely the minister would not boast that he had saved $75,000 on that estimate because the $250,000 was only an approximate figure, since they could not deal with all the details of how much it would cost and where the delegates would go, and so on.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I do not want to be misunderstood on that point at all.

Mr. Bourget: That was the way you put it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There was $25,000 in the estimates for 1954-55, $25,000 in the estimates for 1955-56 and $250,000 in the estimates for 1956-57, which total $300,000 and not the $250,000 to which my hon. friend referred. The actual expenditures totalled $226,000 and our complaint was purely and simply that they were over-estimating the cost—

Mr. Bourget: There is no extravagance in that.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —and they did over-estimate the cost. That is the only statement I am making.

The hon. member for St. Denis pointed out that every item in our estimates had increased and I think that point has been dealt with by my remarks this morning that it was as the result of the increased volume of mail and the increase in costs generally.

To take the question of electronic machines, as I pointed out this morning it is not intended that these machines should replace permanent employees of the post office. There is no doubt that in addition to the permanent employees, however, the post office has part-time people who work two, three and four hours a day in some of the major post offices and that there will be some reduction in this part-time employment. I want to emphasize the fact, however, that these are not people who depend upon post office employment for a living. It is very obvious that they do not—they are housewives and people who do such work after their regular jobs are finished. What reduction there will be in that respect it is impossible to say but this change, when it takes place will not fall heavily upon the people concerned because their post office employment is purely a subsidiary item in their lives and the turnover in these people is quite high, which indicates how little emphasis they place on their jobs.

Suggestions have been made by hon. members that we should not be examining the mechanization of the postal operations at a time when we have some difficulty with respect to unemployment, but a good administrator lives not for today alone; he lives for next month, next year, and the best administrator and planner lives and plans for the next decade. In my remarks this morning I did not talk in terms of the installation of these machines in three months or six months to any extent. It will be the beginning of 1960 before we have the prototype of these machines of which I spoke from England in operation in our Canadian post offices. In my remarks I pointed out that it will be five years at least before we will have the general plan laid down and it will be a decade before machines are fully operating but unless we begin to plan at this time to deal with these periods of Conservative prosperity which are coming—

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Chevrier: They are pretty slow in coming.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister says we have prosperity today.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Greater prosperity still is coming. Unless we plan now for these situations in the future we will not be able to deal with them, and that is the purpose behind this plan and the purpose behind the emphasis on mechanization and modernization of which I spoke this morning in my attempt to bring members into my confidence and to give them some understanding of what we are trying to do in this great department upon which every Canadian is so dependent.

The hon. member for St. Denis suggested we should retain files of people who apply for work in the Post Office Department. I would however point out to him that this is entirely the responsibility of the civil service commission. They recruit people and we are not in a position to do their work in any respect.

The Deputy Chairman: Once again I must advise the Postmaster General that his time has run out. Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. minister to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This will hold up your estimates.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked what had happened in my own period of administration and I think I covered that. He also inquired regarding the robberies which have occurred in the post offices in that period and with regard to small towns and villages being supplied with the same letter carrier service as the larger centres. He referred specifically to Tilbury. Actually I can understand that because Tilbury is a small community with about 1,000 points of call, as we call them in the postal service, which is organizing a campaign along with some other communities right across Canada in an attempt to get thousands of signatures with which to persuade us to extend our letter carrier service down into communities of this nature.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

Basically the policy which applies to letter carrier service is that it is introduced when there are 2,500 points of call in any particular community. There are other minor considerations but that is the guiding practice and the treasury board ruling is definite on that point. We have followed a policy of not extending the service until a community has reached this point and there is a specific reason for this because that is the lowest number at which it is economical to provide letter carrier service. The average letter carrier serves 500 or 600 homes; he works five days a week and the service is provided six days a week. Therefore there must be a relief man and there must be another man to fill in on holidays and in cases of sickness and such things. It has been the experience of the department that unless there are 2,500 points of call some of these men are not fully occupied and it becomes an uneconomic proposition when you have at least half of a man sitting around—if that is possible.

Mr. Regier: Why not on a part-time basis? The minister admits he has thousands of part-time employees. Why could not these small towns have letter carrier service by people working on a part-time basis?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is an interesting speculation but the exigencies of the service—I find my time is running so far overtime that perhaps I could go into this matter specifically with the hon. member later—are such that it is not economical because of the training requirements of the job, much as one might like to consider extending this service to these smaller communities.

The member for Burin-Burgeo made a number of interesting remarks. Concerning TV cameras in the Peterborough area to which he referred, it has been our experience that for the general supervision of post offices these are not a satisfactory operation. I could go into the details but I will not. There may be some time in the future when consideration could be given to them as a supplement in special cases, but certainly there is no thinking at the moment that they will be generally extended. On the other hand one hon. member, I forget whom, objected generally to these observation galleries in post offices. I think in passing it is as well to say that these do serve a useful purpose and that they have obtained the approval of the great bulk of our postal employees who are honest people and who know that the occasional malefactor who turns up in their midst embarrasses them until he is caught, and I may say that the only effective way of doing that generally is by the use of observation galleries. By the way, these only come into operation when there is some reason to suspect that wrongdoing is occurring at a particular spot in the post office.

Dealing with combined postal and telegraph offices in Newfoundland about which the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo spoke, there are 32 of these special cases from pre-confederation days. We have an undertaking to retain, in these cases, the same level of income for the incumbents who are people who have carried on under that understanding up to the present time. Twelve of the cases have been processed to the satisfaction of the people concerned. Another 20 are in the course of being processed now. By agreement between the Canadian National Telegraphs and ourselves, these people will be protected so that they will enjoy the same salary which they had at the time of confederation despite whatever technological advances may have occurred. That does not necessarily extend to all those who have come into the service since. Our undertaking is in respect of confederation.

I have been unable to locate a copy of the order to which my hon. friend referred. It is Saturday, and sections of the departments are closed. I must say that this is something neither I nor my officials with whom I discussed it at noon could understand, and we will look into the matter most carefully to see what the situation is. Basically, as far as we are concerned, we are opposed to the carrying of letters for a fee as a regular practice on the part of any private individual; in other words, we are working against anyone who attempts to avoid paying the proper rate of postage. But we are certainly not trying to be unrealistic about things.

The hon. member for Kootenay West suggested that our officials should conduct public relations campaigns in the smaller places. I could not agree with him more and I can tell him that having gone across the country myself and set that example, I am encouraging our senior staff to go out into the field and see for themselves what is happening right down to the smallest offices and to bring all the benefit they can to those areas.

We have heard the hon. member's observations on our departmental correspondence and I thank him. He has requested a brief summary of the types of post offices and the terms of employment therein. Basically, there are four. The revenue post office, the smallest, is normally located in a house or in the corner of a store, and the postmaster is paid $3,000 or less, depending on the size of the business, for providing both the service and the quarters. Veterans preference applies in this case as in others, and appointments are restricted to patrons of that particular post office.

The next type is the semi-staff post office where revenue is upwards of $3,000 and where the postmaster is under civil service regulations and where he is primarily responsible for appointing the staff underneath him. In these offices the premises are supplied by the government.

A staff post office is the largest type of post office and there you have premises supplied by the government and the entire staff appointed under the civil service commission.

Finally, in cities, you have sub post offices which are minor locations in stores. Again, this is to give service to particular sections which are not immediately adjacent to major post offices. The hours normally worked in most post offices, if my memory serves me rightly, are 40 hours a week.

I believe that criticisms which have been made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and one or two other hon. members concerned salaries. Post office salaries generally, I think, are on a comparable basis with those in other government departments and in competitive types of work in private enterprise. We do have the particular case of the revenue postmasters, and I think that is where much of the misunderstanding has occurred. The revenue postmaster in most cases is not obliged to spend every moment of his time in the operation of his post office, and his remuneration could go down as low as $2.20.

Mr. Denis: Is that the minimum?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think it is, according to my recollection. Revenue postmasters are free to run a store, or operate a farm, or to do any one of a great many other things. Let us also face the fact that while we are tremendously helped by these revenue post offices, in many of the smaller offices the work is very light and they handle five, ten or 15 pieces of mail a day, and the suggestion that to do that we should instal a civil servant at $3,000 a year is one, which, quite frankly, does not appeal to me.

Mr. Herridge: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I know. You are too much of a realist.

The sub offices are based completely on revenue—the amount of sales from the post office determines the income of the postmaster and the premises are supplied by the man who receives the rent.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me not to hide behind the committee on stamp design we are proposing to set up. I can give him an unqualified assurance that I will not. These people are there to advise the minister, but it is his responsibility.

The hon. member for Timiskaming suggested that we bond all our people handling money. That is not a practical suggestion, because everybody in the post office service handles money at one time or another. I dealt also with the observations on the post office savings bank.

With respect to rural mail, the hon. member for Timiskaming suggested an additional amount of money for winter hazard coverage. As far as rural mail delivery is concerned, the answer to that is very simple and it applies to some observations made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo as well. In connection with rural mail couriers, the price is a matter of tender. These people may tender any price they wish and then the contract is awarded to the lowest tenderer and, therefore, under these circumstances we do not have the responsibility for such special increases in payment to the man who, in the first instance, established the payment he wanted himself.

With respect to extensions, the hon. member for Timiskaming suggested it was difficult to get a new route set up. This may be a particular case. My earlier analysis pointed out the number of routes we had set up this year and I can assure him that if he gives me the details we shall be glad to examine them. We want to give mail service wherever it is possible, taking everything into consideration, to do so.

I am glad he likes more colourful stamps. I am sure he approves our policy of issuing stamps in two colours. I will look into the question at Elliot Lake where I know we have a difficult problem which I believe revolves around the provision of space.

The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville distinguished himself by saying that I was so stupid I spent five years criticizing and had no changes to make when my appointment took place. That sounds no more attractive in English than it did when he mentioned it in French. I think I dealt with that in some of my very first remarks.

Mr. Chevrier: A pretty effective speech, nonetheless.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): A pretty effective answer, I would think.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not see it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am grateful to the hon. member for Brantford for his congratulations to our staff in Brantford and I will certainly pass it on. I may say that it is typical not only of Brantford but of big places like Vancouver and Winnipeg where you have to make those changes over the weekend and it represents a fantastic amount of work. Our staffs have done a magnificent job.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Waterloo North. He had 30-odd years with the postal service, and when he says it is a fine service he knows whereof he speaks.

I have dealt with the observations of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador pretty well. He referred to small salaries in revenue post offices and asked why that should be. I think we should underline the fact that in those small post offices now we are paying our people on the basis of a unit of work rather than on revenues and it results in a much fairer arrangement as far as these postmasters are concerned. I have spoken to them across the country at the various postmasters' conventions and like everyone else they would like to be paid more. However, they are appreciative of the fact that they have received the increases which were given to the civil service and which increases did not automatically apply to them. They are particularly grateful, Mr. Chairman—and this applies to the small post offices—for the fact that in the last revision of the salary increases a greater percentage increase was given to the smaller post offices than to the larger ones and the net result of that has been to even out some inequities.

I will look into the various points raised by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, particularly in connection with the deliveries at Port Hope Simpson and Green Bay.

With respect to buildings, Mr. Chairman, let us all try to save some of the poor Postmaster General's energy and realize that honestly, absolutely and entirely our buildings are under the Minister of Public Works, although we have a good deal of co-operation between the two of us. Somebody wanted to know how these things are worked out. We establish our requirements; we review them in the field; we review them at headquarters and we transmit them to the Department of Public Works. There will be occasions on which they will dispute to some extent our requirements, not so much on the basis of what we require but as to whether a rearrangement of space may not allow us to operate more effectively. But these things are worked out. It is impossible to say who has the last word, Mr. Chairman, because they are worked out co-operatively and the Minister of Public Works and I have not yet come to blows on any occasion in connection with this and I have no intention of doing so because he is bigger than I am.

Mr. Chevrier: You will if you keep holding up your estimates.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am not holding up my estimates; I am trying to deal with the questions which have been raised in the last three and a half hours. I think I have answered most of the questions asked by hon. members.

I thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam for the kind things he said. He said he hoped that regulations will play a little lesser role in our department. I cannot promise that but I think I can promise that we will try to bring a realistic, sympathetic view to the problems which face the people of Canada in so far as our own department is concerned.

With regard to the reduction in the number of post offices, that is not essentially a matter of consolidation. I cannot detail every one but I can tell him that most of those reductions occurred where the post office quite honestly had outlived its usefulness. One still finds a great many cases where the last store in a village has closed up, where nobody wants the responsibility of the post office, where the cost of operation may have been $300, $400, $500 a year and where the revenue from that same post office may have been, say, $12, indicating that just nobody had any interest in it. When we send an investigator, he discovers that everybody is going two or three times a week to a community a few miles away where they do their shopping and pick up their mail at the same time. We can discuss specific instances but generally it is not a policy of consolidating and putting out of existence the post office in smaller communities.

He suggests we should pay more attention to the boundaries of municipalities in settling up our letter carrier areas. This is a recurring problem. It is just impossible to offer adequate mail service under existing conditions, with the growth of Canada, and still carve out that service to correspond with individual municipal boundaries.

The hon. member for Macleod again dealt with the salaries of the small post offices. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo came back, and I think I have dealt with his remarks pretty well, in connection with the relationship between public works and my own department. Because of the interest of hon. members from Newfoundland I must tell the members of the committee if they will excuse me, one of my Newfoundland stories. I went in there several months ago and in a little post office as I looked around, remarked to the postmistress that her equipment looked slightly antiquated and I thought something should be done about it. She said, "Well, Mr. Postmaster General, we have had this equipment here since confederation". To me as a central Canadian confederation took place in 1867. I nearly fell through the floor. However, when I checked up I found that in Newfoundland the time of confederation means 1949. That was yet another lesson, which I have learned so many times across Canada, of just how we have different little ideas and attitudes and how we manage to get along one with another pretty well nonetheless.

With respect to the replacing of old buildings with new buildings, Mr. Chairman, which applies to Newfoundland particularly, it is specifically a matter for the Minister of Public Works. Regarding the member's request for an example, if there is one, where the remuneration of the postmaster has been decreased when he moved from his own premises to a public building, I do not have information on that point at my fingertips but I shall be glad to look it up for him and see if one exists.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Public Works looks embarrassed.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): He just looks happy because he has such a co-operative Postmaster General who is giving him every degree of assistance that he possibly can.

On the question of mail couriers in Newfoundland, I covered that before, I think. It is by tender and if they are going to deal with these heavy packages they must adjust their tender price accordingly.

I dealt at the start with the hon. member for Outremont and some of his observations. I was interested to find that he was so vociferous and enthusiastic now in support of twice a day mail delivery. I sat in the house for four years and never heard him open his mouth on the subject and I am wondering why he did not ask for it then.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I shall refer to my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, the request of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot for a post office at Acton Vale because again that is specifically a decision of the Department of Public Works.

I apologize sincerely, Mr. Chairman, for having taken so much of the time of the committee in trying to answer the questions put to me. I have appreciated nothing quite so much as the few observations that have been made about the pride I take in the department. I do take pride in it. I think it is a very fine department, doing a very good job and for any questions that have come or will come from the floor of the house I believe we can produce pretty sensible and sound answers.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the Postmaster General for his very complete and comprehensive answers and the manner in which he has answered the questions I raised. If I heard the Postmaster General correctly when he discussed the position of the people affected by the change-over by Canadian National Telegraphs he said that there were 32 revenue post offices in Newfoundland. I presume what he meant was that there are 32 revenue postmasters left over at the present time from confederation and that it is these 32 who will receive some sort of protection against the situation that has developed from the change-over by Canadian National Telegraphs.

I am most grateful to the Postmaster General for that consideration but I also suggest to him that many of the other revenue postmasters, who may have had the misfortune to become employed since confederation, are in exactly the same position as those who were employed at the time of confederation with Newfoundland. I do believe that ordinary justice demands that some consideration be given to their plight too.

With respect to the other matter I raised about the order emanating from the local post office, like the Postmaster General I find it difficult to believe that an order would go out which would be interpreted in the way in which my constituents seem to have interpreted it. But I presume that the Postmaster General will look into this and we will hear more about it later when his estimates come before the house again.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is right, although I had hoped that we might get these estimates through today. If that should happen, I certainly will give the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo complete information without any hesitation.

Mr. Carter: I will not delay the minister's estimates another minute. The only other point I wish to make has to do with what he had to say about couriers. He said that they received the amount that they offered to accept when they tendered. I should like to point out to the Postmaster General that these mail couriers are at a disadvantage when submitting tenders because they do not really understand what they are tendering for. They visualize an ordinary bag of mail made up of bundles of letters and a few nicely wrapped packages. But they discover later than instead of carrying little packets of letters and a few packages they are carrying heavy objects and articles like doors, windows, screens, parts of washing machines and garden implements and other things which they do not regard as mail. If they had known that this was what they were tendering for I think they would have submitted quite different tenders. In view of the disadvantage at which they find themselves I still think they have a case when they ask that their tenders be revised.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, during the last half hour the minister has made quite an attempt to explain away statements he made in years gone by dealing with a twice a day delivery system. I feel that many of us here now who were here at that time will not readily forget the manner in which he proposed twice a day mail delivery and the frequency with which he made mention of it. During his remarks he rather left the impression that when he first came to the house this particular problem was of current interest and that over a period of four or five years public interest began to diminish and there was no longer the same need to express his opinion on the problem as there had been before.

I remember quite well when the hon. member made his maiden speech in the first session of the twenty-second parliament. At that time he gave quite an account of the need for a twice a day mail delivery system in the area from which he comes. I am going to read from the speech he made then. At that time he said, as recorded on page 343 of Hansard for the 1953-54 session:

> Our postal service is totally inadequate for the needs of a community such as ours. While we are essentially a residential community, stores and businesses are scattered throughout the area. We have numerous salesmen and representatives who combine both home and office. For some reason which was defended on the grounds of economy, but which still did not seem to result in any great reduction in the Post Office Department expenses mail delivery in our area was reduced a few years ago from twice a day to once a day. This has caused us a great deal of inconvenience. My riding is an integral part of a great city. It is a busy place with many interests, and it is dependent upon an adequate postal service. Many of these activities are being seriously handicapped and inconvenienced by a postal service which would be more appropriate for a small, sleepy country village.

Then he went on to say:

> We feel that we are entitled to the restoration of adequate postal facilities.

I would say to him, having said that, that surely the need for postal service in the area from which he comes has not decreased from that time to now. I am quite sure that it has not. If this country is going to expand at the rate we are told by some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues then we can look forward to the time when necessarily the larger and busier centres will be still larger and busier. I suspect that in that sense they will require a more adequate postal service. I say to the minister now that if such a service was required in 1953-54 it is still required.

In his remarks the minister went on to say that since then there has been no great public demand for this service. Yet only a year ago he himself still maintained the same opinion. I quote again from page 1807 of Hansard for March 1, 1957. The hon. member for Levis has already referred to this but I am going to read the whole paragraph. Just over a year ago when he was sitting on this side of the house the minister said:

> Let me say immediately that there is no quarrel with the rural areas in their demand for a minimum delivery once a day, nor is there any doubt in the mind of any of us, I think, that certain areas now on rural routes or on box systems are entitled to twice a day delivery. The point I would make is that the elimination of twice a day mail delivery service has caused and is continuing to cause considerable distress and inconvenience in our metropolitan areas that are now served by letter carrier service. The costs were worked out in detail and presented to the estimates committee last year They represented approximately one-third of the surplus of the post office department for the year 1955-56, and they will represent less than one-half of the estimated surplus of the post office department for the current year. In other words, we could change to twice a day delivery service, five days a week, and still leave the post office department with a substantial surplus.

These are the words of the minister just over a year ago. Well, I fail to see how the minister is going to square his statement of a year ago with the statement he makes now that it is going to be too expensive. I suggest the metamorphosis of changing from an ordinary member of this house to a minister by crossing 20 feet of green carpet to sit on the treasury benches, is one that changed him from making irresponsible statements to being faced with the realities of life. I am glad that he has done that. I hope that in facing these realities of life in the Post Office Department, he will face a few of the realities in the province from which I come. I am going to tell him about those.

In a section of Newfoundland which is thickly populated for that province, the mail service is most unsatisfactory. The fault is not all that of the Post Office Department, but a great deal of it is the result of the fact that mail deliveries by the Canadian National or other boats, or in the wintertime by airplane, are not too regular. I am not going to blame the minister or his department for that. I do feel that after the mail has been landed in that area some better method could be found for delivery from the point of landing to the various places along the coast. I have made some inquiries about this problem, but to date I have not made much progress.

I go farther up along the west coast of Newfoundland, along what is known as the St. Barbe coast and I come to a place known as Hawke's Bay, which is a large logging centre. The resident population may number 600 or 700 people, but during the logging season which lasts over a period of some months, the population will increase sometimes by 2,000 people. These 2,000 people come from all sections of the coast. They do not live in Hawke's Bay, and being away from home they are naturally looking for mail. The mail service to this particular place is most unsatisfactory because the place is a little isolated. During the coming summer Hawke's Bay will be connected with one of the largest centres known as Port Saunders by a road which is now being built by the provincial government. I should like to recommend to the minister that when that road is completed the mail service could be improved at a more reasonable cost than it could have been improved last year. I suggest serious attention be given to improving the mail service for Hawke's Bay.

Then I made a request of the minister about a place called Portland Creek. In explaining about Portland Creek I would have to explain the situation that obtains within this section of Newfoundland because the mail is now able to come from an area known as Norris Point down the coast by road, but that has only been possible within the last year. So, when the mail goes from Cow Head down to Daniel's Harbour the mail carrier has actually to pass through Portland Creek. Although Portland Creek is five miles away from the nearest post office I have so far been unable to obtain any mail service for this particular place. I would hope that when the minister's estimates are through and he has time to look over things that are going to be done in the future, he will take into account this little isolated settlement of Portland Creek.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the question of the post office at a very lovely settlement called St. Andrews on the west coast of Newfoundland. The minister is well aware now of the conditions under which Newfoundland came into confederation so far as the postal service is concerned, and is well aware of the conditions under which some buildings were taken over as federal buildings while other buildings remained in the provincial service. Here is a building which is now federal, which is very old and no longer able to meet the needs of that area. I am not so much concerned, Mr. Chairman, with whether the building itself be large or small, so long as it is adequate. I think the building which is known as the post office should be something of a credit to the federal government. It should be a decent looking building. I think the Postmaster General would want that type of building. I can assure him that this little building is no longer adequate to meet the needs of the people whom it serves; it is in a most dilapidated condition. I fear that some day when there is a good Newfoundland breeze this building will not stand on all fours as it has in the past. I do hope that something can be done about this to avoid any accident that might happen, and also to improve the service in that area.

In my correspondence with the department concerning this place, I fear that there has been some misunderstanding and they think I am speaking about some other place. In one letter I had from the department it was stated that this place received postal service in the summertime only. Of course, this is not true because it is served by two trains every day and is served by road during all seasons of the year and even in wintertime this road is accessible. It is quite often the centre to which mail is brought and from which mail is delivered to various points around it. I hope that it may be possible for the minister to have a look at this building and to decide that the service which it provides is not suitable for the Post Office Department. Then we could make a recommendation to my good friend the Minister of Public Works, who may be able to do something about this particular problem. I am sure the construction would not be costly and could be completed within a short time.

Jutting out from the west coast of Newfoundland is an area of land known as the Port au Port peninsula. This Port au Port peninsula has only one main point of contact with the mainland, which has a large and thriving town of Stephenville, on the borders of which the United States has had for some years a very large air force base. I am not going to give the minister a description of the mail service on Port au Port peninsula. I am going to suggest to him a survey be made of the needs of the area all along that Port au Port peninsula to ascertain what can be done to improve the service for the people who live there. Not too long ago, when the people who live within the Port au Port peninsula found work at the air force base in Stephenville, they were able to collect their mail at the local post office at Stephenville. Times are changing there and more people, by reason of having to be employed somehow, are returning to the fishing industry and are living continuously in the areas in which their homes are built. These people are feeling more keenly as time goes on the need for postal service which will be an improvement over the service now provided.

I do not want to delay the minister too long, but we have in Newfoundland numerous small buildings that are serving as post offices. Sometimes the post offices are separate buildings, sometimes they are in rooms in private houses or in a section of a store, something of that type. In many of these cases we find that the rent being paid by the postal department would not pay for the charwoman to clean up after the mail has been delivered. I recommend to the minister that a very serious attempt be made to see what can be done about renting these buildings. I will agree that many of the people who are getting little or no rent at the moment are a little bit afraid to say too much about it because they fear that the community would lose the postal service as there would be no place to house the post office. In many of these cases, the rent being paid is very small. It is really too small, as I said before, to pay for the coal and the cleaning up. It is far too small to warrant anybody building a building, even a building which might be rented in the area. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would, if time permits, go into this whole problem of building rentals for the post office services in Newfoundland.

I intended to have something to say about the Canadian National Telegraphs and its connection with the postal service. However, my hon. friend for Burin-Burgeo has gone into that matter. I believe it is a most gnawing problem and one that is not conducive to the best of efficiency either in the post office or in the Canadian National Telegraphs. However, I am going to reserve my comments in this regard and possibly make them at a later date when the estimates of the Minister of Transport are before the house.

Mr. Denis: As we all now know, Mr. Chairman, co-operation exists between the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works. While they are both here and having regard to the construction of post office buildings, maybe one of the two or the two together could give me this information. Can the minister tell the committee when tenders will be called for the construction of a new postal station in the city of Cote St. Luc in the constituency of Mount Royal? Have plans been drawn? Who is the architect? When is the construction likely to start? I believe the minister in answer to the hon. member for Mount Royal stated that the building of the post office has been decided on.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes. In that particular case it has been decided to put up this building. The plans are now being drawn. Tenders will be called, I would think,—according to the information which I have received—in order to allow construction to start about mid-October of this year.

Mr. Bourget: I want to ask the minister what policy he follows in the recommendation of the construction of new post offices. Does he make a recommendation only in cases where the revenue of the post office is $10,000 or does he do so when it is less than that?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is a certain amount of elasticity. Certainly it is not our practice to recommend construction of post offices in areas where the revenue is less than $10,000. Where the revenue goes over that amount we may sometimes recommend the construction of a post office and find that the Department of Public Works can provide more than adequate rental space which in their judgment is better. In other cases—and there are not very many of these—where the revenue is less than $10,000 the Department of Public Works may be planning a building to incorporate two or three units in the community and decide to include us in that building. Generally, the breaking point at which one moves into the construction of a public building for a post office is $10,000.

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to ask the minister whether construction of a postal station is planned for Rosemount. I remember that at the end of 1957 we exchanged correspondence with the previous postmaster general. Since Rosemount is a district which is developing very rapidly it is felt that a new station is in order in that district. Can the minister tell me whether there is anything on the way?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am sorry to keep the hon. gentleman waiting. I will have the information in just a moment.

Mr. Deschatelets: Perhaps I can help the minister out by stating that the site was on Pie IX boulevard near the new shopping centre.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The information I have at the moment is that there is nothing immediately on the way in connection with Rosemount.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder whether the minister can tell us what has been done this year with regard to housing for post office employees in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is a problem which does not apply particularly to the Post Office Department but which is generally a matter of government policy. I believe it is under study; that is to say, the provision of quarters for government employees in the north is under study by a committee of the government. As the hon. member will notice, there is a substantial increase in the amount of our estimates for the provision of this accommodation owing to the fact that we are obliged to pay more for certain forms of taxation and provision of services in the north.

Mr. Hardie: A year or so ago it was government policy that the Post Office Department supply housing at least for two of their employees, namely the postmaster in Fort Smith and the postmaster in Yellowknife. These buildings were to be completed last year. My question now relates to housing for the employees of the Post Office Department other than the postmaster himself. In this particular case, I imagine that Yellowknife would be about the only place where employees would have to be supplied with houses in order to bring their standards in line with those of employees of other government departments.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wish I could give the hon. member the details that he requires now; but actually, as I understand it, this is purely an extension of the housing of government employees in the north.

Mr. Hardie: Is anything being done this year?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): To the best of my knowledge, the matter is still under study by a committee of the government.

Mr. Hardie: Then nothing has been done this year to provide any additional housing units in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is right.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, Le Droit of September 25, 1957, carries a report of a speech made by the minister before the advertising and sales club of Ottawa which is an organization dear to the heart of the minister, I know. The statement which he is reported to have made had to do with publicity as a means of communication between the government and the public. Perhaps he had in mind the post office at the time; I do not know whether or not that is so, Then he went on to say that in the last budget presented to parliament—that is not the one that was under discussion recently—expenditures of all departments amounted to slightly over $4½ billion which means the expenditure of about a dollar on publicity for each $900 spent on other matters. The question I should like to ask the minister now is whether he has been able to increase that amount set out in the speech referred to in Le Droit, I think an example was given by the minister at that time. The reason I raise the point is that I understand that this matter has been under consideration by the departmental officials. I wondered whether the minister had anything to say on that matter.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): On the broader picture which affected the total government expenditures and total government disbursements in respect of advertising and publicity, I know the hon. member would agree with me that it would be quite improper for me to make any wide-ranging observations which are more properly the responsibility of the Prime Minister.

As far as our own department is concerned, at this moment our expenditures—and I can give them to the hon. member exactly—are very much in line with those of the preceding year, subject however to a reduction due to the fact that our film was paid for largely in the preceding year. We are now contemplating certain aspects of future operations which may require public co-operation with respect to such things as the zoning of mail if that should become once more an active issue such as in a case where a person in addition to putting the city on the address will also put a particular location within that city.

This might require additional expenditures because the purpose of expenditures on publicity and advertising is to achieve some result which will merit such expenditures, and I can assure the hon. member that any expenditures we make will be in order to achieve a specific result.

Mr. Chevrier: May I press the minister a little further with regard to this matter. Is there an increase over the amount for last year of this kind of advertising?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The figure which was in the estimates for 1957-58 was $255,300, covering expenditures on advertising, films, broadcasting and displays, while the figure for the current year is $216,700. That is a decrease of $38,600. The decrease is primarily, as I have said, due to the fact that the post office film was paid for in the preceding year.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a further question. According to the Ottawa Journal of September 10, 1957, the minister made a statement referring to the 12,000 rural mail carriers in Canada, and I quote his words which were reported as follows:

> 12,000 rural mail carriers in Canada have been warned to refrain from political activities at the risk of losing their contracts with the dominion government. A Post Office Department directive to be read by all mail contractors was approved by Postmaster General Hamilton a month ago and has gone forward to post office districts over the signature of Sarto Chartrand, post office director of transportation.

May I ask the minister if following this statement and because of the directive referred to there have been any dismissals from the post office?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In the case of rural mail carriers, Mr. Chairman, the answer is no. The hon. member is asking now about political activity on the part of rural mail carriers?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The answer is no.

Mr. Hardie: Some weeks ago I noticed in the Edmonton Journal that the Post Office Department was now routing mail for Uranium City, Saskatchewan, via Saskatoon and Prince Albert rather than, as formerly, via Edmonton by C.P.A. to Uranium City. I wonder if the minister could give us the reason why this service has been changed and could also give us an idea of the cost of transporting mail from Saskatoon to Uranium City as against Edmonton to Uranium City?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will be delighted to give the hon. member the information he requires. Actually it is a technical matter having to do with our transportation vote and if he would wait for a moment or two until the expert on this question is here and we come to that item in the estimates I will be glad to give him an answer.

Mr. Chevrier: May I pursue the question I asked concerning political patronage a little further? The minister has said that no rural mail carriers have been dismissed and I would like to ask whether in any other branches of the post office there have been dismissals because of political patronage?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, there has not been a single dismissal in my department because of political patronage in the way suggested by the hon. member. However, I think I know what he is trying to get at and I want to help him if I can. There has been one dismissal for political activity on the part of an employee in respect of which an affidavit is on file from the employee concerned admitting the particular political activity.

Mr. Bourget: A few minutes ago the minister told us that the international postal convention held in Ottawa last year cost $225,000.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): What I said was $226,000.

Mr. Bourget: $226,000—would he give us the breakdown as to hospitality, transportation, staff, and so on?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is something we have available because we felt sure someone would be interested in it. I do not know how much detail the hon. member would like but I will give him a reasonable amount and if he finds it insufficient I will give him more.

The administration covering salaries of House of Commons staff was $22,000—I will give these in round figures—the reporters' travelling and living expenses were $3,000; the travelling and living expenses of certain other non-Canadian people were $4,500; expenses of printing, stationery and various other items totalled $55,900; sundries in that classification were $460; provision of equipment for simultaneous translation and so on, $6,790; provision of accommodation—and I here refer to accommodation when we were travelling and when these people were our guests in various parts of Canada, and the same applies to the following two or three items—$33,384; meals under the same circumstances, $20,850; entertaining in Ottawa and elsewhere of specific people, $3,090; gifts, because it is customary at these international conventions to present them with a booklet of stamps of the country concerned and to provide other publicity items which are given as souvenirs of the country—$15,000; transportation in connection with trips, $21,800; and the delegates were also given very adequate photographic albums and coverage costing $4,160, and that adds up roughly to $192,000, to which we add $34,000 from the previous year's expenditures, mostly in connection with the system of simultaneous translation, for a grand total of $226,000.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the minister if he has disposed of that system of simultaneous translation?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As I remember it, Mr. Chairman, this never belonged to us; it was equipment which was the property of the national defence department. That department bought it and we paid the cost of putting it together and operating it while it was here but it was then returned to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Bourget: Would part of these expenditures be invoiced to the postal union?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There may be a few minor items in that category but the great bulk of these expenditures are properly chargeable to the Canadian government as host and organizer of the convention.

Mr. Batten: Could the minister tell us the number of people employed in administration in the province of Newfoundland and the cost of administration in that province and could he also give us the same information with respect to the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am sorry, but I have not that information available. I will be very glad to give it to the hon. member during the debate, or see that it is sent to him.

Mr. Batten: That will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. Denis: Talking about expenses, may I ask the minister about the item under travelling expenses amounting to $80,000 on page 438. And then if the minister will turn to page 442 he will see there under travelling expenses an amount of $387,750. I have here a statement which was made by the hon. gentleman while he was in opposition, and I quote from his remarks at page 4186 of Hansard on May 27, 1955:

> Finally . . . I would ask the minister to tell us why his travelling expenses have had to go up from $35,300 to $100,400. Even with all the effort put forward by this government in finding new and fanciful ways of spending public money, that is an accomplishment of which he may well be proud.

Of course, the hon. minister was then talking about the expenses of the department and not about the expenses of the Postmaster General himself. Now I have just mentioned a couple of items amounting to at least $460,000, and I ask the minister whether he is in a position to explain this large increase in travelling expenses and, if he is not in a position to do this, whether he will apply to himself the remarks he made about the former minister?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Of course, the increase in travelling expenses in this particular estimate has not been anything like as great as the increase to which the hon. member has just referred in the estimates of the previous minister. I think it was from $35,000—

Mr. Denis: To $100,400.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In other words, when you find an increase of from $35,000 to $100,000, that is quite legitimately the cause of a question. The particular case we are discussing concerns $80,000 in the estimates as against $80,000—the same amount—in the estimates for the preceding year, and in the other case it is $387,750 as against $345,150, an increase which is slightly over 10 per cent. The reason, of course, for our travelling expenses is that we have a fantastically far-flung postal department with headquarters in Ottawa and the necessity of covering all Canada to inspect post offices, and to have officials dealing with special situations. And you have hundreds of men—that figure is, perhaps, a little fanciful—scores of men, certainly, who are on the road every day in the year, and that is the basic reason for the travel expenses as such. The increase is simply and solely due to the fact that it costs slightly more to travel today than it did to travel last year. And also, in line with the undertaking I gave to the hon. member for Kootenay West, we are laying emphasis on getting our senior people out into the field in order to get in touch with conditions, and one does these things at an expense.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, is this the estimate where we can ask the minister what the additional cost would be to have a twice a day delivery?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Technically it would come under operations, Mr. Chairman. We could give the figures now, but just think how wonderful it would be if we could put this item through and then deal with it under operations where it would properly come.

Mr. Chevrier: Referring to the travelling expenses, may we have from the minister a statement as to the over-all travelling expenses of the department. He has dealt with two items, one under the first vote, and the other with regard to which a question was raised by my hon. friend from St. Denis. I do not know whether these two items cover the whole field or not. What is the total amount?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will be glad to give that figure. It is $80,000 under administration, $387,750 under operations, $10,000 under transportation and $3,500 under financial services. That is $479,000 I think.

Mr. Bourque: I have quite a few questions, and I was wondering whether I could ask them now or at some other point. For instance, I want to know about the cost of these electronic machines and the cost of this advisory council for the changing of the design on stamps, and why the stamps must be continually changed. Would I get an answer to those questions later on?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean will have an answer from me on any question he cares to ask, but I do not think I will be able to answer any of those questions now, because it is six o'clock—unless the committee wishes to sit later, in which case I would be perfectly agreeable.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Item agreed to.

Resolution adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that Monday is private members' day. Would the leader of the house care to tell us what the business will be on Tuesday?

Mr. Green: On Tuesday we will commence with item 4 on the order paper, the house in committee on an act to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act. We will then take item 21, the resolution concerning the Financial Administration Act; then the budget resolutions, item 22 on the day's order paper. After that we will take item 3, the house in committee on the Estate Tax Act; item No. 10, second reading of a bill to amend the Income Tax Act; item No. 12, second reading of a bill to amend the Loan Companies Act; item No. 13, second reading of a bill to amend the Trust Companies Act; and item No. 20, the resolution concerning the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act.

Mr. Chevrier: I see the Minister of Finance is going to have a busy day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not any more than usual.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister indicate what the business may be on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker. We may go on with these items I have mentioned or we may take estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT INQUIRIES

Question No. 148—Mr. Howard:

1. How many inquiries under the Combines Investigation Act were instituted during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958?
2. How many of these were made (a) under section 7 of the act; (b) ordered by the director; (c) by order of the minister?
3. In each case, what was the nature of the alleged offence and the names and addresses of the persons, organizations or corporations involved?
4. Which of such inquiries (a) are still under investigation; (b) were discontinued; (c) referred to the restrictive trade practices commission; (d) resulted in prosecution or other legal proceedings being taken?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. Sixteen.

2.(a) None; (b) fifteen such inquiries were commenced by the director pursuant to section 8(b) of the Combines Investigation Act which provides that the director shall cause an inquiry to be made whenever he has reason to believe that the sections of the anti-combines legislation have been, are being or are about to be violated. One such inquiry was commenced by the director pursuant to section 42 of the act which provides that the director may carry out an inquiry concerning the existence and effect of conditions or practices relating to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce and which conditions or practices are related to monopolistic practices or restraint of trade; (c) none.

3. Five of the inquiries relate to the merger, trust or monopoly provision (section 2(e)); four relate to combinations in restraint of trade; five relate to predatory or discriminatory pricing (section 412 of the Criminal Code); one relates to resale price maintenance; and one relates to section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act above mentioned. It is not considered advisable or appropriate to publish further details relating to an inquiry unless and until a report has been made to and published by the minister.

4.(a) Fifteen; (b) one; (c) one; (d) none.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION ON NARCOTIC CONTROL

Question No. 160—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received from or through the United Nations a copy of the proposed convention to replace all existing international treaties for the international control of narcotics?
2. If so, was the Canadian government asked for comments on this proposed convention?
3. What reply has been made by the government?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

The draft single convention on narcotic drugs underwent some revision at the thirteenth session of the narcotics commission of the economic and social council which met in Geneva in May this year. The commission agreed that the text of the convention as revised should be forwarded to the economic and social council with a recommendation that it be referred to governments by the secretary general for comment and that a plenipotentiary conference be convened in 1960 for consideration of it.

The economic and social council is meeting at present in Geneva. If it approves the recommendations of the narcotics commission we can expect that the convention will be sent to governments for their comments shortly after the session which is due to end on August 2, 1958.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 28, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENT OF PRAYER FOLLOWING DESIGNATION OF PRINCE OF WALES

Mr. Speaker: In view of the announcement in the house on Saturday last by the Prime Minister that Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen had designated His Royal Highness Prince Charles as Prince of Wales, it appeared to me that it would be appropriate to amend the wording of the prayer for the royal family to give effect to the change in the title of the heir apparent. May I have the approval of the house to the appropriate change, which I took the liberty of making in reading the prayers today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASED PENSIONS FOR SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS, ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL AND MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a statement, Mr. Speaker, relating to the provision which the government intends to recommend to parliament at the present session to increase pensions, based on length of service, of former members of the civil service, the armed forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in those cases where the recipient has been retired for a number of years. The proposed provision will also extend to the widows and children of former members of the three groups on a similar basis.

In the course of long personal study of this subject, I have found it one of the most complex problems which I have faced in this portfolio. It would have been the wish of the government to bring this proposal before parliament at an earlier date had the problem admitted of an easier or simpler solution.

Apart from the relatively minor increase which was made in the pensions of certain former members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in 1925, the measure now proposed is unprecedented in Canada in federal legislation dealing with long-service pensions. Prior to 1945 the pensions of the three groups I have mentioned were such that there was no strong demand for an increase. Since 1946, however, a combination of the rise in the cost of living and in the general salary levels of the three groups in the public service has led to increasing representations not only by retired members of the three groups but by members of the house and the various civil service organizations.

The representations affect pensions related to length of service, and accordingly the present proposal does not affect pensions payable under the Government Employees Compensation Act, the Pension Act, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act in respect only of disability or death arising from service, nor pensions payable under part IV of the last named act.

There are, in round figures, 23,000 former civil servants or their widows in receipt of pension. Of these 10,000 are over 70 years of age and 6,700 are between the ages of 65 and 70. The government decided, however, that old age pensions and old age assistance should not be taken into account in determining the proposed increases in pensions based on length of service.

A survey which has been recently conducted shows that in most cases the small pensions are attributable to short service. While at times in the past a pension could be paid for less than five years' service, now under the Public Service Superannuation Act the cases where a pension can be paid for such short service have almost disappeared, and the normal pension is payable on retirement for age or disability after a minimum of five years of service, and a widow's pension is payable if her husband had at least five years of service. Thus a minimum pension of 10 per cent of average salary is payable in the case of a civil servant himself or 5 per cent in the case of his widow.

The survey has also demonstrated that, as a result of the general increases in salaries in recent years, persons retiring in this period can receive higher pensions after shorter service than those who retired from the same positions in earlier years with longer service. This situation has naturally caused dissatisfaction.

It does not seem to the government to be fair to the employee with long service to supplement only the very low pensions.

Generally speaking this would tend to favour those who have given a relatively brief portion of their working lives to the service of the federal government, or those employees who rendered longer service in quite junior positions.

It is equally clear that a flat percentage increase in all pensions would be inequitable. It would favour those now enjoying the larger pensions, particularly those who retired recently. Moreover, the pensioners who retired ten years ago have a higher claim for an increase in their pensions than those who have been retired more recently with pensions more closely related to the present higher scale of salaries.

On the other hand, if the basis of increase were a flat percentage confined simply to all pensions commencing prior to a determined date, a pensioner retiring immediately prior to that date would have an unjustified advantage over a person retiring immediately thereafter with the same service to his credit.

There is an additional complication to be considered even for those retiring at the same time, because of the fact that there are six different benefit formulae to be considered when determining what increase should be made in the pensions of the three groups under review, namely former civil servants, members of the armed forces and members of the R.C.M.P. Depending upon the time at which the individual affected qualified under the relevant pension statute, he will have received a pension of 2 per cent of a certain salary or average salary over a certain period for each year of service up to 35. This period on which the average salary is based ranges from the most favourable extreme of the final salary in the case of long-time members of the armed forces and the R.C.M.P. to the average salary over the last ten-year period of employment in the case of civil servants. In between these extremes there are four other formulae using the salary for the last year and the average salary over the last three, five and six years of service respectively. The fact that pensions are payable to members of the armed forces and the R.C.M.P. immediately on retirement at an age which may be earlier than the civil service immediate pension age of 60 makes the usual military or R.C.M.P. pension even more valuable than the usual civil service pension.

In the studies which have been made it has been recognized that those whose salary for pension purposes is based on the shorter period of time will retire on pensions more closely related to the level of salaries at the time of retirement than do the ten-year average cases, and so will have gained a greater pension benefit from general salary increases in their last years of employment.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The government has come to the conclusion that the method of adjustment chosen should take account of these factors, otherwise the disparity in pension as among the various groups would become even greater. For this purpose more than one series of adjustment factors has been worked out in relation to the change which has taken place during the period on which the average salary in question is based. This method has the effect of bringing closer together pensions for the same period of service and salary under the different formulae.

After careful study of all the complicated factors involved, the government proposes an increase of a maximum of 32 per cent of the first $2,000 of the pension of those pensioners who retired in 1945 and earlier years. The percentage of increase will be lower for those retiring since 1945. The effect of this graduation in the increase will confine benefit as follows: To those who retired prior to 1953, on the ten-year average formula; to those who retired prior to 1952, on the six-year average formula; to those who retired prior to 1951, on the five-year average formula; to those who retired prior to 1950, on the three-year average formula; to those who retired prior to 1949, on the final year formula; to those who retired prior to 1948, under the final salary formula. This difference in the cut-off dates arises from the fact that those whose pension formula is based on the shorter average salary period have already gained a benefit from that formula in the form of a higher pension as the result of the introduction in the years just before their retirement of general salary increases which helped to a much lesser extent those subject to the longer average salary period.

It is proposed that the increase in the pension shall be confined to pensions not exceeding $3,000 per annum, and that the total of the increase and the pension combined shall not exceed $3,000.

In the case of widows and children the percentage of increase will be that appropriate to the year of the husband's retirement or death while in the service, whichever is applicable, and will be calculated on the first $1,000 of pension for a widow, with corresponding amounts for the children. The increase will be limited, in the case of a widow, to pensions not exceeding $1,500; and in the case of her child to pensions not exceeding $300. In the case of an orphan child the increase will apply on pensions not exceeding $600. In each of these cases the pension and increase combined will not exceed these respective amounts.

It is estimated that the increases will apply to some 15,000 pensioners, including 12,000 former civil servants, 2,500 former members of the armed forces and 600 former members of the R.C.M.P. These figures include the widows of deceased pensioners. The estimated cost of the increase is approximately $3,300,000, for a full year at present.

The government proposes that the increases take effect from July 1. In view of the advanced stage of the present session the government proposes to insert a special item in the further supplementary estimates which will be introduced in parliament at the present session to provide for the payment during the present fiscal year. Further details will be available at that time. It is the government's intention at the next session to introduce legislation to provide continuing authority for these increases. It is expected that the retroactive payments will be available to recipients in the autumn. The precise date will naturally depend on the course and duration of the present session.

In conclusion I should like to express my gratitude to the advisory committee of the Public Service Superannuation Act for the very helpful advice I have received from time to time from that group, which is composed of equal representation from the official and staff sides of the public service.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I happen to be a pensioned civil servant, so perhaps in the strict application of the conflict of interest principle it is not appropriate for me to make any comment upon the interesting statement the minister has just made. Nevertheless, I am very sure that all others concerned will have heard this announcement with great pleasure and satisfaction.

I take it from what the minister has said that the action taken by the government does not extend to C.N.R. pensioners, and I would like to ask him whether there is any intention on the part of the government to include this group of pensioners under this scheme at a later time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker, this does not include Canadian National Railways pensioners. They, of course, come under the jurisdiction of the Canadian National Railways. This provision applies to three groups, the civil servants, the R.C.M.P. and the armed forces.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we in this group remember how for so many long years the former member for Winnipeg North Centre brought the cause of these pensioners to the attention of the government.

Mr. Murphy: He was not the only one.

Mr. Regier: We also remember reminding a previous minister of finance that, whereas the parliament and the government of Canada were responsible for the fiscal and financial affairs of the nation, they also had a responsibility with respect to the buying power of the pensioners' money.

We remember the former minister of finance saying that if he could find the solution he would be one of the ministerial marvels of the world. I am now hoping that the present Minister of Finance is one of the wonders of the world.

We welcome most heartily the announcement that has been made and, like the leader of the official opposition, we regret very much that the minister has not seen fit at this time to include in this righting of a long-felt wrong the plight of the retired railroad workers as well.

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF AMENDMENTS TO BUDGET RESOLUTIONS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I by leave of the house table, and ask to have printed in today's Votes and Proceedings for the convenience of hon. members, the amendments which it is proposed to introduce in the budget resolutions when they are reached tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING AGREEMENTS

Motion No. 27—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged since June 21, 1957, between any member of the provincial governments and any member of the federal government, concerning the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Subject to the usual reservations as to the consent of the provinces concerned, there is no objection to this motion. I think it is likely that the greater part of the correspondence has already been tabled, but we shall be glad to see whether there is any remaining within the scope of this motion.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

PROPOSAL FOR JOINT LOANS TO TOURIST RESORT OPERATORS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to authorize the making of loans, jointly with an approved lending institution, to tourist resort operators for the purpose of constructing or making capital improvements to tourist accommodation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject of this resolution is of considerable urgency and interest both to the people of this country and to hon. members of the house. I feel that it has received insufficient attention from a large section of the population and, moreover, I think the subject is one which has not been recently discussed in parliament.

Before proceeding to deal with the financial aspect of the resolution, I should like to place the tourist industry in its proper perspective with regard to the national income. As a direct source of foreign money the tourist industry in Canada ranks third after newsprint and wheat. In 1957 we received in Canada no less than $362 million in tourist funds from all sources in connection with the tourist industry. In 1957 the tourist resort industry came second among Canada's industries in terms of receipt of United States dollars. In that year $328 million came to Canada from the United States in connection with the tourist business. The tourist business comes third in receipt of foreign dollars from all sources and second in receipt of United States dollars.

In the third place, the tourist industry is a major source of employment in this country. The indirect sources of employment are much greater than the direct. For that reason we sometimes do not consider that the published figures are correct. If we consider merely those dollars that come into the country and if we consider merely those dollars received by the tourist industry itself we do not get a complete picture, because we must consider all the money that is spent in Canada by tourists in places that are not tourist locations. For instance, we must consider the merchandise they purchase, the money they spend in restaurants and stores and things of that nature to get a complete understanding of the situation.

The tourist economy is important for another reason. It does not require any outlay by the government or any public services. The product involved in the tourist industry, as it were, is the beauty of Canada's scenery and her rich resources. The only thing the government has had to do thus far has been to advertise, and that has been very well done by various government agencies. The tourist industry does not deplete our natural resources. Those who come to visit Canada, for the most part, come to look at our scenery. They take away with them the memory of a holiday spent in beautiful surroundings, but they take nothing more of a physical nature except those goods they have purchased.

Another feature of this industry is that we do not have to transport any particular product to market. We do not have to do what must be done in connection with wheat and many other products which have to be shipped to some other country. In the case of the tourist industry the people come here to buy the product.

And finally, the tourist industry is something we in Canada have taken for granted for some time, and therefore through neglect we are beginning to lose the position we held in this industry. As to the future of travel, we must bear in mind that travel has developed from a luxury on the North American continent to a way of life. There has been a general increase in wages and a shorter work week, and employees are now granted longer paid holidays. All these things have combined to give the average individual on this continent more time in which to travel and see the world. Properly managed and planned, the tourist industry could and should become Canada's major industry.

I wish to say a few words by way of comparison between Canada's tourist industry and that of the United Kingdom. The tourist industry in the United Kingdom is without question the most important industry of that country. Let us look at Canada for a moment in its relationship to other countries in terms of this industry. Not very long ago Canada used to be the No. 1 country for United States travellers.

We do not need to extol the beauties of our native country. I will have a few words to say about the particular area in which I am interested, and I am sure other members will also wish to mention those in which they are interested. Every province and territory in Canada has many places which can compare with those anywhere else in the world, but in spite of this we are losing business while others are increasing theirs.

To look at some of the figures, Mr. Speaker, in 1948 about 45 per cent of the United States tourist dollar came to Canada. That was only 10 years ago. In 1951 it was down to 35 per cent. In 1952 we commenced to have a trade deficit with the United States in travel account. In dollars Canadians spent $37 million more in the United States in 1952 than United States tourists spent in Canada. In 1956 our percentage of the United States tourist dollar was down to about 25 per cent and our trade deficit in travel was $82 million.

I should like to point out the significance of these figures. We had in 1956 a trade deficit on travel of approximately $161 million on a world-wide basis. The United States has a population ten times ours, yet Canadians spent many millions of dollars more in the United States than the people of that country spent in Canada. Our 17 million people spent more than they spent in Canada with their population of approximately 170 million.

On the basis of world-wide travel the situation is the same. From 1926 until 1950 we had a world travel credit balance, but since 1951 we have had a travel deficit with all countries of the world. I am pleased to see from the figures that there was a little improvement last year. Our deficit with the United States dropped from $82 million to $75 million. However, taking the whole picture the position remained the same, with a deficit of $161 million with all countries.

I should like to quote for a minute from a publication entitled, "Travel Between Canada and the United States", issued in January, 1958, which gives preliminary figures for 1957. It says:

> Expenditures in Canada by travellers from the United States and other countries set a new record in 1957. First estimates indicate that visitors from other countries spent approximately $362 million while travelling in Canada, an increase of $25 million or approximately 7 per cent higher than the previous year. Receipts from residents of the United States advanced some $19 million, due to higher average expenditures per visit for most classifications in addition to an increase in the number of crossings. The aggregate number of visits advanced some 953,000 when compared with 1956. The estimated figure of $328 million spent in Canada by residents of the United States is an all-time record, although residents of countries other than the United States also increased their expenditures on travel in Canada during 1957. Receipts from residents of overseas countries reached a new record of $34 million, an increase of $6 million over the previous record established in 1956.

This indicates that we have had more visitors to Canada during the past year than in previous years. But I quote again from the same document:

> The gain in foreign travel expenditures in Canada was accompanied by a more moderate increase in Canadian travel to other countries, particularly to the United States. Canadians spent an estimated $23 million on travel in other countries during the past year, an increase of $25 million over 1956 or approximately 5 per cent. The increase of travel expenditures in the United States amounted to $12 million or some 3 per cent, whereas expenditures on travel to overseas countries advanced some 12 per cent or about $13 million as compared with the previous year.

While our receipts from travel expenditures are increasing, as they naturally will, our expenditures in other countries have also increased. There has been a decrease in the past in certain classifications of travel to this country. As I previously noted, we had 45 per cent of the United States tourist dollar in 1948 and now we have less than 25 per cent.

For a moment I should like to look into what I feel are the reasons for this decline. We are losing business from United States tourists to the European market. There seems to be an increase in the number of people who travel overseas from the United States. We are also losing very extensively to the United States home market. Under the small business administration in the United States hotel or resort owners can borrow up to $250,000 for renovating or refurnishing their resorts, the loan being repayable over a period of 10 years at an interest rate of 5 or 6 per cent. By making funds available to the United States home market people there are enabled to improve their accommodation and offer more attractions for their own tourists.

There are also more Canadians going to the United States rather than travelling at home, and I believe the reason is the same. To illustrate the point I should like to read from the proceedings of the committee on travel trends at the 1956 convention of the Canadian tourist association. In the report there is the following:

> There is another area where I suspect we are losing ground—

This refers to the loss of tourist business in Canada.

> —although it is difficult to secure figures which will prove it. The areas to which I refer may be described as those playground areas immediately south of the border, just south of the border. Not only do these areas attract Canadian tourists and vacationers, but they also intercept much of the business which might otherwise find its way across the border right into Canada. It is with these areas that we must compete, at least in the near future, and to do so is a sizeable task. We must endeavour to match or better them in a type and decor of accommodation, the meals we serve, the hospitality we offer, the prices we charge, the recreational facilities and planned entertainment, and of utmost importance, the quality and quantity or roads of access from border points and between provinces and vacation areas in Canada.
> We cannot expect full measure of success until we meet our competition with a product as good as or better than he is offering, nor until this is done, can we expect to receive full value for our advertising money which we spend seeking tourists to come to Canada or to stay in Canada and to spend their vacations here.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, it is no longer sufficient for the tourist industry and for our country to show our visitors nature's great beauties by day, and ask them to sleep in roadside cabins at night. The travelling public now wants the beauties of nature enhanced by modern buildings, neat gardens and conveniences. The short-term stay is increasing as a result of motor travel, and there are many more people touring the country staying by night at enjoyable sites, and perhaps only staying one, two or three days. It is to these people that we must offer accommodation which will be comfortable. It is not necessary for such accommodation to be anything more than comfortable. It can be rustic, as long as the tourist feels he has had a good place to stay, good meals and something which he could not get at home. It is only in that way that we can hope to hold the tourist business.

Our tourist operators are beginning to realize this difficulty. They want to modernize their accommodation. Recently the Canadian tourist association presented a brief to the Minister of Finance containing recommendations for the establishment of a fund similar to that which I am proposing today. Parts of this brief are very pertinent to this subject, so I should like to read a few paragraphs. These paragraphs deal entirely with the need of tourist operators for assistance in improving their plant, equipment and buildings. This is the quotation:

> The tourist industry is composed mainly of small businesses. While the few larger establishments, such as the hotels and lodges of the transportation companies, are well known, the greater percentage of restaurants and accommodation establishments are small. Many are family enterprises.
> Most of Canada's hotels, resorts and camps are 30, 40 and 50 years old. They were built when our national standard of living was not as high as it is today, when many hotels were not equipped with private baths or even running water in the rooms. At that time, the rooms were much smaller and were not furnished as comfortably as the travelling public expect and demand today.
> Today's travellers are also demanding restaurants with the best decor, service and food. To meet this demand the modern restaurant must invest heavily in comfortable furnishings and labour-saving and sanitary equipment.
> Most visitors come to Canada by automobile, and this mode of travel creates a greater demand for roadside accommodation of the highest quality. Although many motels have been built in recent years, a substantial percentage of Canada's motels and cabins need to be improved and enlarged.
> The expansion and improvement of Canada's tourist establishments, which includes resorts, restaurants, hotels, motels and camps is urgently required. At present, the facilities which are inadequate and outmoded are being compared unfavourably with the more modern establishments which have been built in other countries in the past few years.

I believe that quotation sets out the situation so far as our business in Canada is concerned. Hon. members may say, if these people want to stay in business, what is wrong with them? Why are they not managing? Why are they not making sufficient income so the banks will assist them by way of loans? The answer is one of finances, and it is a rather basic problem.

In the first place, capital improvements cannot be made by these operators from the moneys received during a season's operations. It is true that the establishments which have been making money in the past few years have been able to go to the bank in the spring and secure a loan to cover the cost of their summer improvements. In this way they can paint up and perhaps build a new fireplace, improve the dining room and so on. Then in the fall, when the season is over, they can repay the bank and have a little bit over on which to live during the winter. I am referring to the smaller establishments. The larger ones do not have this trouble because they are well established and have adequate finances behind them.

You may ask why the mortgage companies will not help these people. I feel there are two basic reasons. In the first place, the tourist business is a seasonal operation and is not classed as a good security or as a trust security by the mortgage companies. It is for this reason that a trust company or a mortgage company which handles trust funds cannot lend money to the tourist operators.

The reason for this is comparatively simple. A lot of these businesses are only as good as the man who operates them. He may have sufficient buildings and sufficient equipment, but if he is not a good operator he will lose money. While the mortgage companies may give a loan on a larger, well established business, when it comes to a smaller one these companies turn him down. As those with legal experience know, the terms of their mortgages do not prevent the owner from selling his property, provided the new purchaser undertakes payment. The mortgage is given, therefore, on the security of the land and buildings that the company finds there. If the company have to rely also on the integrity of the operator they may find themselves in difficulty. They are, therefore, very loath to grant loans to these people because of the fear that the operator, getting that much cash out of his business, may sell subject to the mortgage and someone could take over who might not operate the business in a satisfactory manner.

The mortgage companies do not like trouble, regardless of what some people may think. If they feel that they may run into difficulty on a loan, they would rather not grant it. This is what has happened on a good many of our smaller and medium-sized tourist businesses in Canada. I would say that the operators are completely unable to make improvements to their resorts because the bank can only lend money for the season, a six-month period, and the mortgage or trust company is unable to grant mortgages. These companies are not interested in whether or not this is a good thing for Canada, and you cannot blame them because, after all, they are in business to make money. Our people who want mortgage money just cannot get it.

Many of these people realize that they have to make improvements. Perhaps they have some roadside cabins or a hotel or restaurant, the standard of which they would like to improve. So they make the effort; they go around from the banks to the mortgage companies trying to borrow money, and they cannot get it. So finally they decide, "Well, if I can't get the money I will just stay on here and get whatever I can out of this business, and not spend any money on it at all". As a result they leave their accommodation in the best condition in which they can put it and they get the odd three or four dollars from somebody who gets stuck on a heavy week end and finds there is no place to go.

I think that is a very bad advertisement for our country. There are not many of these people who wilfully withhold repairs. Most of them would like to make them but they cannot get the money. They just have to hang on. I feel that that is the basic cause of a good deal of our loss of the tourist industry. We are losing to overseas markets. We are losing to the United States. Those people are providing accommodation that people will stay in.

I should now like to speak for just a moment in connection with the financial proposal I have put forward in this motion. I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the form in which the motion is put forward is the final and absolute answer to the difficulty. After the subject has been discussed today and after it has been given some consideration it may be felt that there is some different way in which to help the tourist operators. But the proposition I should like to put forward is that the government give assistance to these people by somewhat the same method as national housing loans are made, where the lending company makes the loan and a certain proportion of the loan is guaranteed for repayment by the government.

This procedure would not cause any outlay in government funds until the point where they were called upon to make good the guarantee on a proposition which had become a loss. This is one proposal, and I think probably it is the best one, because the people who are willing to make these loans will go only so far. Even if they agree to make a loan they will go so far and they will say "Beyond that point we will not go".

The percentage in respect of the average house loan, I would say, in the case of the mortgage company will run anywhere between 40 per cent and 60 per cent of the value of the residential property. But when it comes down to tourist property, if they lend at all it is not only at a high rate but the amount they will lend is very little more than 25 per cent of the value they place on the property. I would feel that the industry could be assisted if the mortgage companies were to make these advances in the percentage to what they would normally make if they were homes and if repayment could be guaranteed by the government.

Other propositions have been put forward to the government, Mr. Speaker. In 1956 the hotel association of Canada submitted a brief to the banking and commerce committee of the house, and at that time they suggested an amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act by which the tourist business would be classed as an industry and some of the money available under the Industrial Development Bank Act could be given to the tourist industry. That is one suggestion.

This year, in 1958, the Canadian tourist association has suggested a tourist establishment improvement loan act. That is the suggestion from which I read a few moments ago. The tourist association would limit the loans to the improvement, replacement or expansion of existing resorts, restaurants, hotels, motels and camps. I stress the word "existing". Their proposal is that money should not be advanced to a new business. Their reasoning is that those who are in the tourist business and who have been reasonably successful in it will be able to take advantage of government loans and improve their properties and carry on. They suggest that the loss on such a project would be small, because those people who are in the business and who know it—and they admit that it is a seasonal business dependent on weather and a great many other factors—can meet these conditions and know what to expect.

Of course we must understand that the Canadian tourist association is made up of associations already in existence, and that they are putting this suggestion forward on the basis that those in existence are the only people who can properly operate. I am not sure that I would be prepared to go all the way with that suggestion. However, there is some need for discretion and direction in the way the loans are made. They cannot be made to any person who decides he wants to go into the tourist business. It is too dangerous, risky and seasonal. When such a loan is made they must be satisfied that the person who is going to take it out can make the business pay under normal operating conditions.

That is the proposition that I intended to put forward, Mr. Speaker. To be fair, I think I should mention some of the objections to it, and there have been objections. If there had not been objections the legislation would have been put through years ago.

The first objection that has been suggested to me is that if the operators cannot make sufficient money to run their business, why should the government step in and help them? In other words, if this is not a paying business why do they need help, and why should we spend public money to give it to them?

I think I have covered the answer. My answer to that question is first that the tourist business is of importance to Canada. The government plays very little part in the tourist business except to advertise it, but it is of very great importance in connection with our foreign dollars. That is the first answer. The second thing is that these people are in an unusual classification by reason of the type of business in which they are engaged. By and large they make money. If they did not make money there would not be so many of them going to Florida and setting up the adverse tourist balance that we already have. I do not think it is those people whom we need to help; I feel it is the smaller person who is struggling with a small business.

There is the second objection I have heard, namely that there are too many government subsidies, that everybody is getting a subsidy from the national treasury. Of course that is a very good answer. As far as I am personally concerned I think the less we interfere with private business, the better it is. To that extent I would agree with the objection. But again, here is a class of people who are, in effect, working for the government to bring money into the country. In so doing I feel that they merit some assistance, quite aside from the fact that they come third as a national income producer.

The third thing I should like to mention as an objection I have heard is this. I have read such objections in the newspapers and in reviews of this situation in other types of publications. It is said that this is a responsibility of the provinces rather than of the federal government.

The tourist business as it relates to a particular province has been very closely guarded by that province; for instance, the provinces do a certain amount of licensing and I know that in Ontario, for example, they have set up an act and a system of inspection which are intended to maintain standards. But I submit that this is a national problem; it is a problem which relates not to this or that province but to the whole country. A tourist coming to Ontario will probably go back to one of the United States or will go to Quebec or another province, and I think these people should be encouraged to stay in this country.

[Mr. Aiken.]

In this connection I would like to raise a few points respecting regulations in some of the provinces. In some provinces a tourist resort operator is told, "You will have to build new buildings, your buildings do not come up to standard. You will have to tear these down because we will not allow you to use them; they are in too bad shape." It is very difficult for a person to be placed in the position of being told he cannot stay in business, yet he cannot get any help. He is told, "You will have to fend for yourself or go out of business." Perhaps in some cases if his business is that bad it is as well that he go out of business, but a great proportion of such operators could carry on and keep their plant in good condition if they were given some assistance. I feel this is a joint responsibility between the federal and provincial governments, and that if some thinking were given to the matter along these lines it might produce beneficial results.

In conclusion I would like to say a few words about my particular riding and my own interest in this subject. While I have spoken in the house several times I have never made what might be called my maiden speech, because I have never had an opportunity to extol the virtues of Parry Sound and the Muskoka area. I would just like to say that the area which I represent includes all of the district of Parry Sound, all of the district of Muskoka and a major portion of Algonquin park.

It would be impossible to mention all the beautiful sections of this country lying between the Loring, Restoule, French river and lake Nipissing areas in the north to the Kahshe and Sparrow lake districts in the south, from the Georgian bay coast on the west to most of the Algonquin provincial park in the east. Georgian bay is, of course, one of the premiere tourist attractions in Canada, particularly for those interested in boating, and Algonquin park needs little introduction to anyone in this house. My riding also includes the Muskoka lakes chain, the lake of Bays and the Magnetawan river system, and thousands of smaller lakes and rivers in the tourist districts. It also includes the Parry Sound harbour area which has a rather unusual potential as a seaway port; but the importance of the area is shown in the fact that the national tourist industry is extremely well represented there. Mr. Dalton J. Caswell, the president of the hotel association of Canada, Mr. Ted Wright, president of the association of tourist resorts of Ontario, and Mr. George A. Martin, director of the Canadian tourist association, all operate resorts in the Parry Sound or Muskoka districts.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would indeed be remiss if at the very outset I did not say a word of congratulation to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka for bringing in this notice of motion. I also congratulate him upon his well-chosen and well-delivered words which contain a lot of common sense and recommendations which I trust will be considered by this government. I also hope the government will take quick and justifiable action, and that the requests made will be granted as soon as possible.

Naturally, as a member of this house coming from Niagara Falls, which is the greatest tourist centre in the Dominion of Canada and indeed in the whole world, it might be expected that I would say something on this subject. As I have often said before, we are not jealous or selfish in any respect in my constituency. We like to share Niagara falls with the rest of the world, but we do appreciate its beauty as do our many visitors. In fact I had a dream about Niagara falls recently, and in it I was going up the steps to meet St. Peter—if a politician ever does get up the steps to meet St. Peter—and St. Peter asked me, "Houck, where do you come from?" I told him that I came from Niagara Falls and he said, "That is a very beautiful place, and I don't think you are going to like it here."

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, spoke about the Minister of Finance being one of the wonders of the world, but I would like to point out that we are known as one of the wonders of the world at Niagara Falls, and we would have to take that fact into due consideration before we would allow the minister's name to be added to the list. I think we are justifiably proud of the fact that the Princess Margaret has been fit to select Niagara Falls as one of the few places she will visit, and she will be there on Friday next. We are also very glad to know the Minister without Portfolio from Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) will accompany the princess when she visits Niagara Falls at that time.

As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has so ably stated, the Canadian tourist association has requested the Minister of Finance to submit to parliament a bill to establish a tourist establishment improvement loan act, but I would like to say that I think this title is cumbersome though the request is pithy. I think the government at present in power should act quickly and should see what the association wants. I believe the requests made are reasonable and would benefit not only the people catering to the tourist industry but the Canadian economy as a whole.

As was pointed out by the previous speaker, tourism is a major industry in our dominion, and I would like to emphasize the point made in the association's brief that only wheat and newsprint bring more money to this country than do our tourists. Furthermore, only newsprint brings more money to Canada from the United States than does the tourist industry. Tourism is big business in this country, but it is not as strong as it should be because all the people in this industry do not operate the sort of establishment which builds business. If they hope to improve their plants they must charge stiffer prices, which would mean discouraging business. The answer so far as I can see, and from what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said in this regard, would be a business loan. Such a loan, however, is generally difficult to obtain except at high interest rates.

I do not think the association is asking for a hand-out, but it does need a source from which it might borrow money—money which will be repaid but over a longer period and at easier interest rates. It is not asking for subsidization, but it does need help to improve facilities in order to attract more visitors, and that is what we want. We want to keep more Canadians from spending their money abroad, which is something they have been doing rather recklessly in recent years.

All this is simply good business for Canada. Wherever people travel they will buy, and that is why businessmen of all kinds in Canada stand to gain in terms of larger markets for their products if Canadians as well as overseas visitors are encouraged to travel in our dominion. If people do their travelling in this country this is where they will do their purchasing; it is as simple as that. There is a little-tapped source for greater prosperity in the fact that most Canadians still have not seen too much of their own country. Until recently more than one quarter of all adult Canadians had never seen any province beyond their own, yet two thirds of these same people had visited the United States.

Actually Canadians are the world's greatest travellers, and per capita they spend far more on travel outside their own country than do the people of any other nation. If we divide $441 million spent by Canadians outside Canada last year among 16 million, our population, we arrive at a figure of about $20.50 a head. Take the estimated billion and a half which Americans spend outside the United States and divide that by the population of the United States, and the figure works out to something less than $10 a head.

Of the $441 million mentioned as Canadian expenditure outside Canada, $361 million represented the amount spent in the United States alone. Of this sum, $69 million represented purchases declared under the $100 customs exemption privilege for Canadians returning to Canada after an absence of 48 hours. This is actually a smaller percentage spent on duty free tourist imports than in previous years.

One reason for the popularity of foreign travel is, of course, advertising. It is becoming more and more apparent that at least in some parts of this country Canadians represent the fastest growing travel market in the world. For example, there are over 60 travel agencies in the city of Toronto, far more than can be found in a city of the same size in the United States. Cleveland, which is bigger than Toronto, had at the latest count only 23 travel agencies. While these travel merchants do help to sell Canada to Canadians, a greater part of their efforts must necessarily result in the sale of trips to far away places. This is not simply because commissions are greater on world cruises and flights to Florida than on smaller domestic tours, but also because the promoters of far away areas are very conscious of Canadian population centres as a source of tourist visitors and do everything in their power to help travel agents, transportation companies and other travel salesmen to send people their way.

As a result of years, perhaps decades, of promotion the trip abroad has been invested for Canadians with an aura of glamour. Many parts of Canada have glamour too, but no one has troubled to develop it in the minds of Canadians themselves. The Canadian government spends a million dollars or so on advertising to encourage United States residents to visit Canada's vacation attractions. In addition the provincial governments among them spend about another two million dollars. Of these provincial travel promotion dollars, four out of five are spent in the United States. Americans and others are being made aware by conscious effort of the pleasure and virtue of visiting Canada and knowing Canada better, but Canadians themselves are not. The fact that more than 28 million visits to Canada are made annually, seven or eight million of them for extended periods, attests rather obviously to the fact that we do have very real attractions for tourists. It is simply that we are not conscious of them ourselves.

An impressive example of what tourism can mean to Canadian industry was recently given to the Pembroke, Ontario, Kiwanis club by C.T.A. president W. Gordon Wood. Speaking on April 28 Mr. Wood said:

> About 7,500,000 Americans came into Canada by car to stay for more than two days last year. If each one of these visitors had been induced to remain just another 15 or 20 minutes to buy a fried egg sandwich, they would have consumed an extra 625,000 dozen eggs, 750,000 loaves of bread and 120,000 pounds of butter.
> Don't ever let a farmer say that the tourist industry does not mean anything to him. Tourism benefits everybody.

Then the Minister of Finance, and the minister of northern affairs spoke at the tourist convention held in Ottawa in 1957 and made some very encouraging remarks to that convention to the effect that they, in their official positions, would do anything they could to help the tourist business in Canada; that they realized the obstacles the industry had to face and felt that the industry should be encouraged, and that this encouragement should be supported by some definite action.

In dollar volume, tourism is Canada's third largest industry. It is big business, and it is the aim of the C.T.A. to make it bigger business. No dollar gets into circulation as quickly as the tourist dollar, which is distributed over and over again until it reaches everyone's pocketbook. The wholesaler, distributor, banker, jobber and manufacturer, the butcher, baker and, yes, even the undertaker, benefit from travel, whether from within or without Canada. Tourists add to our tax collections. This means better roads, better schools and a better estate for all Canadians.

And let me tell hon. members that no business is as furiously competitive as the international travel market. The world is now living on one Main street. No land is remote any more. To meet this competition Canada must increase her promotion and improve her plant. The small operators in the tourist business cannot do this by themselves. In Great Britain bankers, industrialists and businessmen have thrown their weight behind the travel industry. Tourists now earn more dollars for Britain than any other business. But Canada, despite its proximity to the world's richest nation, is losing its share of the travel market, as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka so rightly pointed out.

I wish to add that in my opinion the Canadian tourist association was right when it asked the government of Canada to take action which would relieve the Canadian tourist industry of the very serious disability caused by the lack of financial credit, and thus make it possible for our tourist industry, through expansion and modernization, to compete effectively in the world tourist market. In its request for assistance the C.T.A. submitted three points for consideration with regard to the travel industry, as follows:

1. Through travel from other countries it is the source of new found money which creates additional commerce and employment in Canada.
2. An efficient, attractive tourist "plant" in this country can hold travelling Canadians in Canada and keep in circulation here money which would otherwise be lured abroad.
3. Travel by Canadians within Canada promotes a deeper understanding of our own country and a greater appreciation of our land and our rich heritage, and it fosters national unity.

The association also pointed out to the cabinet that the important addition made to Canada's wealth from tourist income is unusual in three ways:

1. It causes very little depletion in our natural resources.
2. It sells our goods and services without our having to pay the cost of transporting them to market. The "market" pays its own way here.
3. It benefits almost every phase of our general economy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to place a few figures on the record. In 1951 the average spending per person per trip was just under $49. In 1952 that expenditure increased to $62.25, and today it is almost $70. One thing is very important. In order to increase the success of our tourist business we must increase the length of time tourists spend in our country. Some 75 per cent of our tourists spend less than four days here, yet about 73 per cent of our visitors have between 14 and 20 days annual vacation.

Only 10 per cent of our visitors spend from two to three weeks in this country. If we could only induce those who at present spend only one day with us to increase their stay by two more days, it would increase our tourist business by at least 15 per cent. A survey shows that out of the United States tourist dollar 11.6 cents is spent on gas and oil, car repairs and transportation generally; 49.4 cents is spent on accommodation and food; 35 cents is spent on consumer purchases, and 7 cents on licences for fishing and hunting, boats, and so on.

Mr. Speaker, I am very serious about the point I am about to make now, and I think I have a right to bring up this subject. I have often heard it said by Canadians—and I think it is to be regretted that it has been said—that "the Yanks" are crude and boastful and that the United States opinion of us is similar. Nothing can be further from the truth. Generalities are always dangerous and usually founded on half-truths from unreliable sources; certainly they are ill-considered opinion. I am sure that every clear-cut, right-thinking Canadian agrees with me that such statements about our friends from the great republic are utter nonsense. Most Canadians like the people of the United States, and I can assure you that most Americans have a high regard for us as well.

Disraeli once said over 100 years ago, "It is much easier to be critical than to be correct." He also said that individualities may form communities but it is institutions alone that create a nation. I have found through my experience in Niagara Falls in talking to tourists that one of the things our United States visitors complain most about is that in certain sections of our country we are too much Americanized. On many and many an occasion I have heard it said that some Canadian businessmen fly the American stars and stripes on every occasion in order, as they think, to lure the United States trade.

Nothing could be farther from the truth. The reason many people visit the United States or Canada is not that they want to see the same things they could walk down their own main street and see but they want to see Canadians as they live, as they act, as they work and as they really are. I am for things Canadian. To me a Canadian is a person of manners and people with manners do not go around insulting their neighbours, let alone their best customers.

The United States government is certainly to be congratulated because with its recent customs exemptions it has been doing everything possible to assist our tourist industry. United States residents may now take back, once every 31 days, merchandise for personal or household use to the value of $200, duty and tax free, provided that resident has remained in Canada more than 48 hours. An additional exemption of $300, which makes a total of $500 duty and tax free, is allowed once every six months if the resident has been in Canada more than 12 days.

Residents of the United States visiting Canada for less than 48 hours may take back, for personal or household use, merchandise to the value of $10, duty and tax free. Such exemptions must not include more than 50 cigarettes, 10 cigars, one quarter pound of manufactured tobacco, four ounces of alcoholic beverages or four ounces of alcoholic perfumes, whatever that might be. Gift packages may also be sent to the United States if they are plainly marked "gift" and the value indicated if the aggregate value of the articles received by a person in one day does not exceed $10.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka spoke about his riding, and I should like to say a few words about my riding and my experience with tourist operators in that area. In the first place, many tourist operators have a short season, with a few exceptions who operate all year round and who generally have some connection or work in a commercial trade to keep them going. Most of the tourist operators in Niagara Falls calculate their season from May 1 to November 1. They reason that if they have not made any money by then they will not make any at all. Naturally, as was pointed out by the hon. member who introduced the resolution, the farther north you go the shorter the season, unless the operators there promote such activities as skiing.

We normally figure that about 6 million people visit Niagara Falls during the year, including those attending conventions. The regrettable fact about this is that only about 10 per cent of these 6 million visitors to Niagara Falls remain overnight. In other words, I do not think we need any more people to visit Niagara Falls, but we should do and are doing everything possible to persuade these people to come and stay overnight. That is where the actual money is, and that is when it reaches the local merchants.

Using all available accommodation in Niagara Falls we can bed down about 7,000 people each night, but I must admit that one of our biggest headaches is the provision of more modern accommodation. It is true that within the past 10 years tourist accommodation has grown in our city by nearly 80 per cent, but I am sorry to say there are still many establishments which could or should be torn down and replaced by up to date services. It is also true that the owners of such establishments spent every cent they could get while they were in the money instead of laying it away for replacements. In the meantime the newer establishments which have been erected have so many improvements that the cost for each new unit runs from $6,000 to $10,000, including equipment, whereas originally some of the cabins would have cost perhaps less than $1,000 had they been constructed 10 years ago or more.

Many of the tourist establishments have good locations but poor conveniences, and these would be the ones which might utilize any loan provision. Some of our up to date motels in Niagara Falls could be greatly improved or extended if more money were available to them. Normally it takes a tourist establishment from three to five years before it begins to get repeat business, and these three to five years are the danger years. Certainly the industrial development bank does a good job for industry and a similar plan for tourism might be feasible, though it is my belief that the controls would have to be pretty well defined.

In the case of industry there is usually a past history which could be used as a guide, but in the case of a tourist establishment the tourist business is relatively too new to enable one to design the same kind of code. Unfortunately many of the people entering the tourist business have had no experience and have never demonstrated an ability to conduct a motel on a businesslike basis. They would be the greatest headache of the government in considering a tourist loan program. Certainly with the federal and other levels of government making grants and other provisions for municipal development such as those for hospitals, education, etc., there is no reason in the world why this government should not consider making grants to the tourist industry, as it is one of the most economical to operate.

This year in Niagara Falls has been an unusual one from our standpoint. Our chamber of commerce reception office and that of the Ontario government has received fewer inquiries over the counter than in previous years. Mail inquiries are also down to some extent, though not as much as personal inquiries. In spite of this, however, the bridge figures are higher and cars entering the park are more numerous than last year. One can enter the park on almost any day during the tourist season and find cars bearing license plates from every state in the United States and every province in Canada.

This year people seem to be skimping on meals, the purchase of souvenirs, etc., but interestingly enough—and at the same time difficult to understand—our most expensive overnight accommodation seems to be at a premium. We in Niagara Falls have increased the tempo of our publicity and have attempted to advertise our more up to date establishments. Perhaps because of the fact that we are a tourist centre in Niagara Falls, private capital would be easier to obtain than in the northern areas.

I wish now to sum up the remarks I have made. I would reiterate that in the first place the tourist business is much more fickle and much more difficult to assess than is ordinary industry. It depends upon location, the services provided, unemployment and other factors which are not so important with respect to regular industry.

In the second place, if the government establishes a loan system a person who applies for assistance should have some record of a successful business operation, either as a tourist operator or in some related line.

In the third place, there is a great demand for improved facilities, and although people may seem to skimp on some expenses they do appear to want modern, comfortable accommodation.

In the fourth place, the tourist business in Canada generally needs improvement in order to successfully compete with our competitors in various other countries. I would remind the house, though, that much improvement could be shown in other fields as well, such as courtesy and meals.

In the fifth place, I would remind hon. members that the tourist industry is one of the cheapest to operate, yet is a very lucrative source of income for the entire country.

May I say, as I said at the beginning, that I hope this government will take cognizance of the motion presented so well today by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I trust it will be only a matter of a short space of time until we will hear it announced that the government will extend this assistance to an industry which so greatly requires it. I would remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the government has boasted that it would lend assistance to small business. Tourism is a big business, but it relates to and affects 90 per cent of the small businesses in this country. If the government will come to the assistance of the tourist industry many small businesses will be helped, and the Canadian economy will receive an uplift as well. I remember my leader's platform in the last campaign, that we would help small business as much as possible. This is one of the things we would have done. Therefore I plead with the government to give some recognition to what has been said by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). Let us not talk out the motion but rather let us have action by the government.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I join with the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) in congratulating the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for bringing this motion before us. It is often difficult to avoid a repetition in the house when there is a division of opinion but it is almost impossible to avoid repetition when we are apparently in complete accord and, perhaps more important, when some of us have done our homework from the same general report for which I think we should thank the Canadian tourist association.

I should like at this particular time, because I think it is appropriate when a great many people are returning from their holidays, to add a word or two not by way of statistical evidence but as to the general need, so ably put forward by my good friend, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I think that perhaps I would not be accused of repetition if I were to accept as read his case for the necessity for a motion and eventually legislation of this type, but rather deal with the forecast of the potential that we may expect yet even this year and what we may anticipate as well in the years to come.

The fact that we may be losing part of our opportunity to develop this industry has been placed before us in no uncertain terms. In Great Britain the tourist industry is regarded as its most important. In the United States, as has been stated, it is second and in the case of Canada it is exceeded in gross dollars only by wheat and agriculture. Forecasts of what we may expect present an even more interesting comparison in that this year it is anticipated that 2.6 million carloads of United States visitors alone will stay more than 48 hours in Canada and will spend some $350 million on goods and services. In my own city of Calgary it was estimated that in a 90-day period recently they spent some $5 million in that growing centre of the tourist industry. In addition it is anticipated that this year transportation companies will spend another $4 million in advertising and promoting the tourist industry. The government of Canada already has an appropriation of slightly over $1.2 million for the purpose of advertising the advantages of Canada to anyone who wishes to visit our country as a tourist.

The question before us, Mr. Speaker, is how we can best back up that investment, for I think we will have to concede that there is no point in spending this amount of money if we are not prepared first of all to accept the challenge that competition is growing stronger for the tourist dollar throughout the world and, second, that it is no longer sufficient for us simply to make use of posters in a number of countries pointing out the advantages to be gained by visiting Canada unless we are able to provide the entertainment and type of visit these people are going to expect.

We have made a great deal of headway. At long last most of our provinces have recognized the need for improved roads. Many of our provinces have at long last recognized that social changes require more lenient liquor privileges. Many of our provinces have recognized the need for more uniformity in traffic signs and signals. So we come down to the last problem, that of the accommodation plant, whether it be one of the 3,000 motels or whether it be one of the major hotels in our hotel system which house the people who come to our country.

Loans to Tourist Resort Operators

It has been shown that to put up a motel based on minimum standards and with perhaps 10 to 12 rooms requires an investment of something in the order of $100,000 or about $6,000 to $8,000 per unit. You can find any number of requests at the chartered banks by individual businessmen and women who have applied for loans either on a short or long term basis and have been refused or had their requests only partially granted because of the limiting factor that the tourist industry has been considered to be only a seasonal industry. The limitation imposed by the chartered banks is no fault of theirs but is one of the requirements under which they are permitted to operate but nonetheless the limitation prevents these individual businessmen and women not only from building and reconstructing but from improving the facilities they now have.

There are, of course, a variety of methods by which the problem I now present can be solved. They have been enunciated by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. The generality of the resolution refers to one method. A system by which we can create wider or more generous provisions for the chartered banks so far as lending is concerned is another. A third, which has been suggested on many occasions, is the utilization of the industrial bank. I think that in principle most members will agree that the industrial bank should deal with the larger borrower, one who is undertaking something of a more substantial nature than an individual hotel or motel.

I am going to leave the case for improving the plant or facilities for a moment to introduce a new thought and to take some of the responsibility for improving the facilities and the methods by which we attract people to Canada off the shoulders of the government and place it on the shoulders of the operators themselves and, in fact, the Canadian public at large. I think that most of us who have looked at this motion have regarded it favourably but with this reservation. How far is the government expected to go in underwriting, subsidizing, supporting financially, giving outright grants to or interfering with a particular business or industry? I am one of those who believe that regardless of political party we are inclined to go too far in this day and age in endeavouring to provide assistance to bail out people, assistance which was never intended to be within the means of the free enterprise system under which we live today.

I think where you find the line of demarcation, and this is the reason that I can lend unqualified support to this motion, is that the government should give consideration to helping those who are prepared to help themselves on the basis that this money will be returned with interest, but most important on the basis of creating a better understanding between Canadians and of providing facilities which, in themselves, are going to create increased revenues within Canada which will circulate within Canada. All this will build up, as has been pointed out, the second most important industry in our country, and these are firm bases for support of this motion.

I do not not wish to deviate from the point I want to make here. This is not the responsibility of the government alone. We find many of our operators who regard the tourist as something essential only to have a bed occupied, and can hardly wait to have the occupant replaced by yet another tourist in order to collect yet another fee. Fortunately these people are in the minority. Too often we find the services or facilities which are offered are inclined to be restrictive, and not because of the shortage of income. Too often our own Canadian people, and we are no exception in this regard amongst the other countries in the world, are inclined not to realize that they, as individuals, benefit from every tourist who comes to Canada. The moneys which are given directly to the tourist industry filter back into the pockets of the ordinary citizen. The principle of making the tourist welcome so that he will want to come back is still, in my opinion, in relation to this motion the most important quality that we will have to instil into Canadians.

Now, I have had my share of opportunity to travel throughout Canada. In the context in which I have already spoken, one of the most important areas in which we can improve this industry is by showing some imagination. We have developed a number of centres which contain tourist attractions, Muskoka, Niagara Falls, the Calgary Stampede, the great Shakespearean festival at Stratford, the great areas of the maritimes. These centres add much to the imagination of Canadians who realize that they are indeed lucrative sources of income. We, in Calgary as an example, some years ago introduced the white hat. Unfortunately, the other areas of Canada with less imagination have also seen fit to adopt it as their national headgear. Anybody west of the great lakes today is referred to as a Calgarian, regardless of whether or not he wears a white hat, but invariably he does. I think the point I would make is that imagination and initiative to develop ideas, to develop entertainment and attractions, must come from the people themselves so that we will establish what has been described heretofore as a national character.

The people from Europe and the United States do not come to Canada to see us copy a particular type of individual or type of country; they expect we will be different. They expect to see something that will identify us as Canadians and not as a carbon copy of any other country. I suggest that one of the most important things towards which the Canadian tourist association has been working has been not only the improvement of the plant and its operations, but also the frame of mind in which Canadians would recognize the importance of this industry to their own welfare as such they can feel they are a part of this industry. As I said at the outset, we should make the tourist want to come back.

The motion calls for an improved system of providing loans, and I had intended to go into the method by which this could be done. However, that has been so ably covered by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka that my remarks would only be superfluous. Let me say that there is another area, that of the larger institution in the larger centre which has a potential to draw the tourist and which must also be given consideration. It could come within the confines of this motion, but perhaps it might be more adapted to a widening of the provisions of the industrial bank. Today, Mr. Speaker, I received from the olympic development committee of my city of Calgary an interim submission to the government of Canada requesting the Canadian amateur athletic association to ask for the winter Olympic games in 1968 to be held in the Banff, Lake Louise and Calgary area.

The potential here is almost unlimited. It will require a capital investment of some size, largely to accommodate the very substantial number of competitors and visitors who would attend such an attraction. One only has to look at the city of Vancouver and the investment of half a million dollars put into the British empire games by the government to realize how important it is to the tourist industry of Canada to lend some support to an occasion of this nature. This group, the Calgary olympic development committee, have estimated that there will be 2,000 officials; that accommodation for about 100,000 people will be required, and improvements to the facilities not only in Banff but in Lake Louise will require a substantial capital investment.

They point out that only once before have the winter Olympics ever been held on this continent. They also are very conscious of the fact that wherever any form of olympic games have been held it immediately becomes a great centre for the tourist industry in future years. So, I commend this request by this group, recognizing the advantages that will be gained if this undertaking receives the support of the government, and also accepting the fact that support has already been given to it by the province of Alberta and the municipalities concerned.

I come to the final point which was introduced by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, the case for the improvement of plant, which is all that he has placed before us in this resolution. He has emphasized the necessity for making Canada more competitive, recognizing that we have, according to the statistics made available to us, lost part of this business in that a greater percentage of United States tourists have visited Europe since 1953 than have come to Canada. There is not time for us to sit and discuss in future months what we are going to do; action now is essential. It is not sufficient to say that the provisions of this particular resolution do not meet the requirements of the particular section under which we normally award loans. Let us keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that there was no objection in the last parliament to giving aid to the agricultural industry. Let us remember that we continually provide assistance to other industries which have meant less to us. I think when we look at the advantages to be gained, the natural resources we have in Canada today; when we look at the attitude of Canadians towards this industry, we, as a parliament, should take effective action, not next year or next month, but in this session to provide needed and essential help to keep the tourist industry one of the top industries within Canada.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I am always rather apprehensive when I see the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) get to his feet at any time on private members' day because it usually means the kiss of death for the resolution. We will regret this particular kiss of death because this resolution embodies fairly good and sound socialism. Naturally we are going to be for it. We hope the resolution comes to a vote. I think a word of encouragement might be given to the government here to realize the gigantic forces that it has on its benches and to let them vote for these things for which they are so much in favour. This is by hearsay, but I understand that the former Liberal government—that terrible colossus that ruined the country for so long —occasionally used to allow some of these resolutions to come to a vote. I would appeal to the government to let the same opportunity come now, especially for resolutions presented by their own backbenchers.

I said that this motion had in it a certain amount of socialism. I think you could see the logic of that view if you noticed the two points at which the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and the most recent speaker rather boggled. They both gave you the assurance, that, by gosh, they were for free enterprise; they certainly did not want the government handing out things. But the fact remains that you have got to grant that they both want to get their finger in the pie or their hand in the pie and they offered some good substantial reasons, reasons with which we can go right along and we are not so taken aback.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka listed the objections that could be made to the resolution. I think it is always good tactics to outline the objections that will be made to a proposed resolution. But in discussing it he made four points all of which, with the exception of the one relating to provincial responsibilities, revolve around this factor that we notice causing so much general embarrassment in a mild way because they do keep it down, amongst the government members. After all, they are the party of free enterprise, according to their slogans and their doctrine. Yet when they get down here most of them find, as I say, that their main wish is to put their hand in the pie for their constituents whether it happens to be cash advances for prairie farmers or deficiency payments or parity prices or support prices for pulpwood or greater old age pensions.

I notice they applauded today when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) introduced his increase in pensions for civil service people and R.C.M.P. people. We welcome it but we wonder how these free enterprisers can go along with these things because there is a possibility that maybe these handouts or these subsidies or these increased pensions will sap the initiative and moral fibre of the people. I wonder at these two hon. members who spoke so strongly from the government benches for this resolution, one that we like, that they are not embarrassed about its possible effect on the moral fibre and the backbone of these tourist camp operators.

The tourist industry gives each one of us who has any relationship to a tourist area an opportunity to do a bit of a Cook's tour. I was greatly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck). I was greatly disappointed that he failed to mention where Niagara Falls first made an impact, illustrated by the old song to honeymooners:

> To Niagara on the sleeper;
> There's no honeymoon that's cheaper,
> And the train goes slow.

Not once did he mention the fact that Niagara Falls was the great honeymoon centre. I just wonder whether it has slipped into the discard. It seems too bad that what was once the real romantic capital of North America should have been ignored.

Mr. Crouse: There is nothing to do there now.

Mr. Fisher: I always understood those people always had something to do. The constituency that I represent and its general area I think gives an indication of the trend in the whole tourist business and what the United States business means to Canada. One of the points that has been made by three previous speakers that I have to disagree with is to the effect that Canadians should try to make their country more Canadian so that it will appeal to the Americans. I would suggest that one of the reasons why Canada appeals to the Americans is that they feel at home here because it is so much a North American society. They know that Heinz' 57 varieties will be in the stores. They know that they can get cokes and ice cream very much of the same calibre they get at home. They know that their credit cards are good at the gas stations and that sort of thing. I think that the whole point of trying to make Canada uniquely Canadian and different from the United States in many ways misses the fact that we are a North American country and that we just cannot resolve or unresolve the link that we have with the United States and its whole culture. If you walk into our news stands you will find that practically everything there except the daily papers has been printed in the United States. The trend all the way through is American. I think that is one of the things that Americans like about coming to Canada. I know they appreciate having their picture taken with the mounted police. I know that many of them who have come to Ottawa seem to appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is doing something for the Ottawa tourist season by keeping us here and giving an extra little fillip to the tourist trade in this particular area.

Mr. Macdonnell: You are doing your bit to keep us here.

Mr. Fisher: The point about the Port Arthur area in which you can see the trend of what I think is the future of Canada as far as the United States tourist trade is concerned is with regard to our areas, especially our wilderness areas developing into what in effect are summer dormitories for the United States. That has been the trend. Knowing what happened 20 years ago when the Americans first started coming up into northwestern Ontario, they came up to get big fish such as the musky—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Did you say they came 20 years ago?

Mr. Fisher: Going back 20 years or 25 years.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Longer than that.

Mr. Fisher: Yes; into Nipigon. I am speaking of my birthplace which is west of the lakehead cities. However, they first came to fish in the Nipigon about 1873 when Lord Dufferin was Governor General. He focussed the world's attention on the Nipigon. I know that a development of the tourist industry in northwestern Ontario began just as the depression was welling up there. Most of the people came up for sports fishing, especially to get muskies and trout. What has been the pattern since then? A few fishing camps were developed at which the rates were very high.

The point I want to make in connection with the lakes up there is that now practically every attractive bit of property has been taken up by Americans and they are developing their own camps. Many of them are staying there throughout the whole summer and right into the hunting season or they establish the camp and lend it to their friends. Red Lake road was opened up stretching for a hundred miles from the C.N.R. up into the Patricia district. Almost like magic United States camps popped up all over the place and most initially with boats and guides for fishing. But I visited there just a little bit over a month and a half ago and the amazing change is that while you have this tourist business with guides, that is already slumping down, and there is building up a much larger, what I would call, camping population of Americans with their own property and with their own private camps. I think anyone who looks at the Muskoka area has seen the same thing. Lakes Rousseau and Muskoka in summertime are summer dormitories for the Toronto-Hamilton area and they also get a certain amount of the United States traffic.

I suggest this is one of the phases of the tourist industry which is really going to have an unbelievable expansion, especially when more of the northern roads are opened up. We have, for instance, a new road from Geraldton to Nakina, running a distance of 35 to 40 miles. This is an important moose hunting area and visitors from the United States are coming up to this part of the country. They will soon of course clean out all the moose and the next step will be the buying up of the islands and lakes and the establishing of relatively permanent summer homes. I believe this trend suggests the future of the trade from United States tourists in this country. We must realize we will have more and more Americans living with us in these areas.

That analysis suggests to me that one of the main things we need in order to set up and establish a successful tourist industry is good accommodation for the people who are en route from one part of the country to another in so far as motels, restaurants and small hotels are concerned. I very much agree with the intent of the resolution in this particular regard and we could certainly stand a great deal more in the way of motel facilities in the outer reaches of northern Ontario.

Most people who have established motels in my area have discovered that their year round business is building up; while it is concentrated in July and August they are finding that all sorts of uses are developing for their resorts, in the spring for the early fishing season and in the fall for the hunting season. At the same time more and more Canadians are taking advantage of these sleeping facilities which were largely designed for the use of the United States travellers.

Our particular region is going to be increasingly a summer dormitory and the opening up of the pulp and paper roads has created a tremendous network of roads throughout the area—I would imagine well over 2,500 or 3,000 miles of them. These roads stretch from the Manitoba border east to White River. The Ontario department of highways is taking over more and more of them so that the tourists are getting deeper and deeper into this country. There is a certain conflict of interests at present between the pulp and paper industry and the tourist operators. The tourist people are clamouring for the right to use these roads while the pulp and paper companies are trying to go slowly because they have built them at considerable expense and while they have nothing in particular against the operators of resorts for tourists from Canada or the United States establishing sites on good lakes they do not like the idea of a truck loaded down with 14 tons of pulpwood having to vie with tourists on a relatively narrow gravel road. But the trend is there and these roads are being gradually taken over by the department of highways in my province which is going to accelerate the process of penetration by United States tourists with respect to the more permanent type of summer camp.

The final point I would like to make in support of this resolution—and I am now quoting from something mentioned by the previous speaker, namely the record of proceedings at the 1957 convention of the Canadian tourist association—is a report under the heading of "Government—Federal" by, I believe, Mr. John Fisher, which says that the association has pressed the federal government, amongst other things, for the following:

(e) An amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act to permit the tourist industry to borrow capital. We have worked on this from many angles and the appearance of the finance minister at our convention is not unrelated.

The Minister of Finance appeared at the convention and made a speech and he concentrated, I do not know if it was properly so or not, upon the difference in the rates between the United States and Canadian dollars, rather than doing anything about what Mr. Fisher had suggested he might do, namely something in the nature of an amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act. When the Minister of Finance had completed his remarks a gentleman by the name of Mr. Lawson Mackle made a few comments as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Honourable Mr. Fleming, ladies and gentlemen: I had prepared some remarks that I would like to have addressed to the Honourable Minister of Finance but I have been given to understand that he has a very important meeting and far be it from me to detain him but I will ask him just for a moment. I will give you the highlight or the thesis of what I was going to say and maybe the rest of the audience will suffer after you have left sir. I am a split personality. I operate a summer resort and I also own a couple of small farms. As a summer resort operator I am not permitted to borrow money for capital expenditures from banks, financial institutions, insurance companies because we are considered a seasonable industry. On the other hand, as a farmer, that's where I become lopsided, they are constantly encouraging me to borrow more money under the farm improvement act on my farm and my great need today is to borrow money on the tourist resort so that we can get a greater first class accommodation in this country in order to entice more people to spend more money here. Now, sir, that is the gist of what I was going to say and I know you are in a hurry and I won't go any further. If you care to, sir, I will give you a copy of the remarks I intended to make and if you have a few spare moments you might read them over.—

We trust that the Minister of Finance did read over these remarks and we are sure they had something to do with loans for tourist resort operators as was suggested in the resolution of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

We are strongly in favour of the resolution and we hope the government will allow the hon. member's resolution to go to a vote; we think it is a good one and like the free enterprisers and private enterprisers who have spoken we have no hesitation at all in saying, "This is good and we support it."

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I would like very briefly, Mr. Speaker, to indicate my support of this resolution and to compliment the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) upon bringing it in at the present time. I would also like to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck), on his very fine contribution to this debate. I feel I should however warn him that my colleague from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger) will dispute his nomination of Niagara falls as one of the wonders of the world because in his riding of Labrador are the Hamilton falls which we understand surpass Niagara falls in majesty and scenic splendour. In the face of that competition I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will have a tough time getting himself on the list of the wonders of the world.

I am very pleased to be able to assure the house that in my province we are much more aesthetic in our approach to the tourist industry than appears to be the case on the mainland. We do not entice people to stay another hour or so or to eat another 600,000 eggs, nor do we entice them to spend another few million dollars. We like them to stay with us because we like people; we are friendly and sociable and we enjoy their company. We want them to enjoy us and furthermore we like them to drink in our natural beauty and to enjoy the pleasure of our outdoor life, which is second to none in this country. Of course if in the process they do spend a few more millions or eat a few more eggs that is all to the good but it is purely incidental.

Those hon. members who had the pleasure of seeing the pictures shown in the committee room last Tuesday, I believe through the courtesy of Senator Pratt, will realize that in Newfoundland we do have very fine tourist attractions. Those hon. members who were unfortunate enough to have missed those pictures will, I hope, have another opportunity in the near future, because I understand there was sufficient interest aroused to request a second showing. As those pictures prove, we do have unsurpassed tourist attractions in the way of hunting for both big and small game, fresh water fishing, boating and deep sea fishing. The opportunity to develop our tourist industry, was, in fact, one of the main arguments put forward in favour of confederation, and to that end the terms of union embodied a provision that the trans-Canada highway should cross the province from one end to the other and that when this route was completed a new and modern car ferry would be built by the federal government and put into service on the Cabot strait. The vessel designed for this service is the William

Carson, and we understand from what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) told us a few weeks ago that it will undertake this service some time in the middle of next month.

The delay has been somewhat of a blessing in disguise, because the tourist industry in Newfoundland cannot prosper until we have sufficient accommodation available for the tourists. That is our greatest need at the present time, but in spite of the lower interest rate tight money still exists as far as the tourist industry is concerned. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka gave us some of the reasons why this should be the case, and I think that since this is a national question it is right for the industry to expect some assistance from the federal government.

The industry is not asking for a handout; it is asking for credit which cannot be obtained from the usual sources because of conditions which apply to the tourist industry more than to other industries. The season is short; business takes a long time to become established, and there are, even now, better investment opportunities. There is a definite need here which must be met, and in Newfoundland, and in my own riding in particular, the tourist industry has practically come to a standstill because of the lack of accommodation.

Efforts have been made by the provincial government during the last four years, but because of conditions on the money market these efforts have not been successful, and unless funds are made available to people who are willing to risk money of their own in these ventures, the tourist industry cannot develop as it could properly be expected to develop.

Nevertheless, it seems to me that this industry has today become almost an essential industry; it is certainly an industry of national importance and one which makes a great contribution to both the national economy and the provincial economy not only through the money which visitors spend directly but because of the encouragement which is given to the development of small home industries.

It is now not uncommon for the government to make money available to assist industries which private capital is not prepared to develop, and certainly the tourist industry has a very strong claim for assistance. As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has pointed out, the method by which this money is made available is not important; it is the principle which is important, and I hope that the government will recognize the principle embodied in this resolution and, before long, embody it in the laws and statutes of this country.

Loans to Tourist Resort Operators

Mr. J. C. MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to authorize the making of loans, jointly with an approved lending institution, to tourist resort operators for the purpose of constructing or making capital improvements to tourist accommodation.

This is, I feel, an excellent one, and most timely. I was deeply interested in this resolution when I saw it on the order paper because I have spent all my life in a province which is very tourist conscious. I refer of course, to New Brunswick, which has been called the picture province of the dominion. It has been said by previous speakers that the tourist industry is big business, and that is quite true. That is borne out by figures which have been given, but which, I feel, bear repetition. In 1948 the money which came into this country as a result of this industry amounted to $280 million; by 1957 it had risen to $362 million.

Since the end of the second world war travel has grown from being a luxury of the wealthy few to being an accepted way of life for every portion of the North American population. The increase in wages and salaries, the shorter working week and longer paid holidays have put the travelling vacation within the reach of everyone. Tourism has reached the status of a major industry. In addition to the moneys spent in Canada by visitors from foreign lands, millions of Canadians spend hundreds of millions of dollars every year travelling in Canada. Tourism has a special significance for the Canadian economy and society in three ways:

1. Through travel from other countries it is the source of new found money which creates additional commerce and employment in Canada.
2. An efficient, attractive tourist "plant" in this country can hold travelling Canadians in Canada and keep in circulation here money which would otherwise be lured abroad.
3. Travel by Canadians within Canada promotes a deeper understanding of our own country and a greater appreciation of our land and our rich heritage, and it fosters national unity.

Tourism means much to Canada, but it could mean a great deal more if the tourist industry were more adequately equipped to meet competition in the international market. In the United States, for example, the tourist business in 1956 grossed about two-thirds as much as the whole agricultural and livestock industry, according to the United States department of commerce. If this trend continues, tourism in the United States may soon surpass agriculture as a major industry.

Loans to Tourist Resort Operators

Obviously, with more potential tourists than ever before, tourism could be very much bigger business in Canada. But under existing conditions Canada is not holding its own, because last year we had a deficit of $161 million in our tourist account. In other words, while those visiting Canada—and these are dominion bureau of statistics figures—spent $362 million, Canadian visitors to the United States and other countries abroad spent $523 million, a deficit of $161 million which is approximately the same figure as in 1956. It has gone up from a balance, on the other side of the ledger, since 1948, of $145 million.

Canada formerly received the largest share of the money which residents of the United States spent in visiting other countries but that is no longer the case. Since 1953 Europe has attracted more United States dollars through visiting tourists than Canada has. Despite the increase in the cost of transportation, spending by United States travellers in all countries outside the United States is almost double since 1949 but during that same period United States spending in Canada increased by only 23 per cent while Canadian expenditure in the United States rose by 144 per cent.

Many reasons can be given for these travel trends. Among the most important and the more obvious in this competition are the romance of distant areas, the speed of modern air travel, the premium on the Canadian dollar about which I should like to speak later, and the comforts offered by facilities abroad. Competition for the Canadian and United States travel dollar will increase as the world shrinks and as North Americans take more to the motor car and as we, as a people, grow more curious about the world itself. This makes it imperative that Canadians who cater to tourists be able to offer the very best services and facilities to those who demand them when they come here.

It is, of course, sound business practice to improve tourist facilities and accommodation. Millions of dollars are being spent every year by governments, transportation companies and other businesses by way of large advertising campaigns inviting our neighbours in that great country to the south of us to visit Canada and inviting Canadians to travel in Canada. Last year the Canadian government travel bureau spent more than $1,200,000 on an excellent promotion campaign in the United States. I believe that it is economic to back up this expenditure with a product of the highest quality. Promotion of this type abroad and improvement to the tourist plant at home are inseparable. Good advertising alone will not sell an inferior product.

We must offer the traveller more when he gets here. We want him to enjoy the longest possible vacation in Canada and, even more important, to return another year with his friends.

I feel that one of the major deterrents to improvement in tourist facilities and accommodation is the lack of credit facilities. The tourist industry needs long term credit at a reasonable rate of interest. Loans of this nature are not readily available from the chartered banks, insurance companies and trust companies. Without long term credit at moderate interest rates, the return on investment in the tourist industry, especially in the seasonal establishments, is not high enough to allow for the extensive upgrading which is required. The prices charged by the older establishments are low in comparison with those charged by newer places and yet, for what many operators have to offer, the rates are perhaps all that the service is worth. Most of these operators realize that their facilities should be improved and they are anxious to carry out a modernization program but they lack the needed resources. Should an operator improve his facilities by borrowing other than from a bank, insurance company or trust company, he is often obliged to pay a bonus of 10 per cent to 12 per cent and interest payments of eight to 10 per cent or higher. He is then forced to charge very high prices in order to be able to repay the loan in the allotted time. This situation gives the tourist industry a bad name and decreases Canada's competitive position in the industry.

In a recent brief presented to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) the Canadian tourist association advocated that this government should enact legislation to be known as the "tourist establishment improvement loan act". The resolution now being discussed follows along that line. I should like to place on the record the recommendations of the association with respect to the provisions of the proposed act:

Such an act should provide:

(a) Moneys for the improvement, replacement and expansion of established resorts, restaurants, hotels, motels and camps.

(b) A maximum on individual loans of not less than $50,000.

(c) A maximum term of not less than 10 years.

(d) Loans to be made at a reasonable rate of interest, not to exceed the prevailing rate at the chartered banks.

(e) Funds to be made available by means of government guaranteed loans through the chartered banks.

(f) Total amount to be guaranteed by the government of Canada, not less than $15 million.

The Canadian tourist association is the authority on this particular phase of our economy and it is interesting to consider what it feels the adoption of these provisions would accomplish. The brief states that in the opinion of the Canadian tourist association the adoption of these provisions would reduce the risk factor of the lending program in two ways:

(i) The operation of tourist enterprises requires specialized knowledge and techniques. It is therefore prudent to guarantee loans only to persons who are established in the industry and have demonstrated success.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) made that point very well but I feel it bears repetition. The brief continues with these words:

The risk of lending to inexperienced operators, who might fail in business, is therefore minimized.

(ii) Lending through the chartered banks would also minimize the risk factor. The manager of the local bank knows local conditions, and he is in the best position to assess the credit worthiness of the client—to assess his record as an operator and the improvements which are contemplated.

I feel that a loan of this type would have beneficial results beyond the improvement of many individual tourist establishments. It would assist in making Canada's tourist industry more competitive in the world market. It would generate new income which would ease Canada's international trade deficit, especially with the United States. It would support our extensive travel promotion program in other countries. It would provide construction and employment during the fall and winter months when seasonal unemployment is at its peak. It would stimulate every phase of the national economy.

The question was raised when the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) was speaking about how long the tourist industry had been a factor in our economy. I can well remember as a very young lad on the Restigouche river in northern New Brunswick—that river which is famous all over the world for its Atlantic salmon, the finest fighting fish in the world—United States sportsmen who came up there summer after summer and who had been coming for years. Their contribution to the economy of that particular region was one of the most important factors in the livelihood of many of the people there. I had a personal interest in it because, as a young teacher in a community on that river, 90 per cent of my salary was paid by the United States sportsmen. I began to realize how much the Atlantic salmon was worth to the people there.

I feel, however, that we in Canada who are interested in the tourist industry—while most of us have no direct connection with it yet we are interested in the economy of the nation and the financial betterment of our country—have missed the boat badly in several ways. It has been said, and I should like to emphasize it, that we try to be merely carbon copies in too many ways of the United States. Take, for example, in the matter of food served. There is perhaps no finer dish in the world than a freshly boiled lobster recently taken from the sea off St. Andrew's or somewhere else in the east, or perhaps steamed clams or Atlantic salmon. But what do we see served so frequently in many Canadian restaurants? Southern fried chicken! I do not believe that visitors from the United States have come to Canada to enjoy southern fried chicken. I feel they would enjoy much more a St. Andrew's lobster or Atlantic salmon or some other fine Canadian dish. I could continue at some length but I need only say that all of us have had the unfortunate experience of eating in restaurants where the food has been poorly prepared and served although in all fairness I must say that many of our eating establishments are adequate.

As I have driven about the country—and in the last few years I have seen much of Canada—I have been amazed at the number of hotels and motels that are located right beside the road. Perhaps here in Ottawa where there are several fine motels that is necessary but when I go to bed at night I like to be located some distance from the road so my sleep is not disturbed by traffic and street noise. Many people do not seem to give any thought to the location of the tourist accommodation they construct. Perhaps the only thought they have is the cheapness of the land. I think a great mistake is made in this respect.

There is another thing about which I should like to speak very briefly. I think we miss the boat again with respect to the service that is provided in so many of the hotels, motels and restaurants in this country that cater to our people. I do not think there is any substitute for courtesy and cleanliness. At the 1957 annual meeting of the Canadian tourist association it was suggested by one of the panelists that there should be a school for those people who are in this type of service and I can quite appreciate that. As a teacher deeply interested for most of my life in education and teaching others certain skills, I think that is an excellent idea. For example, I think waitresses should be taught that it is not necessary to insert the whole thumb into a bowl of soup but only up to the first knuckle, and other things like that. In a more serious vein, I believe there certainly is scope for improvement in this direction. Too many times it seems to me that restaurant operators, motel operators and others seem to get their help from the cheapest possible source. That may be so; I do not know. But I think if more care were exercised in hiring and training staff it might help.

I come now to another point with respect to which many will perhaps disagree. I think one of the curses of travel is that degrading habit known as tipping. I am told that some 100 or so years ago the word "tip" originated when a box was placed in Lloyds restaurant—at the beginning Lloyds was a coffee house before it became a great insurance firm—with the words "to insure promptness", and from that the word "T-I-P" evolved. On the other hand I have read that thousands of years ago this same practice was in effect. How many times in our travels, have we received poor service and yet have been expected to tip the person who has performed some service for us for which they have already been paid a salary?

I had occasion a few years ago to travel to Vancouver and to stay for a short time at one of the luxury hotels of the west. I do not do that very often because I never felt I could afford it. But in this particular instance in getting from the train to the hotel and then from the hotel back to the train I ransomed my luggage several times from the young lads who carried it. The president of the Canadian tourist association, W. Gordon Wood, who is also vice-president of sales for T.C.A., had this to say about tipping at the 1957 convention of the association:

Perhaps the time has come for us to consider the establishment of a committee to study the abolition of tipping. We are not saying that this is practical—

I think it is practical.

—or whether it is right or wrong—

Personally I feel it is wrong.

—but we do know this—

This is the point made by this man who is very conversant with tourist affairs in general.

—that if Canada could announce to the United States tomorrow that we have abolished all forms of tipping, we believe that we could wipe out our travel deficit.

That deficit, as I said earlier, is now $361 million a year. I believe that people who perform a service, whether as a porter on a railway train or as a waitress in the parliamentary restaurant, should be paid a salary commensurate with the work they do. I do not and never have believed in the practice of tipping because I feel it is degrading.

There is another point I wish to put forward and it is strange it has never been mentioned before. I refer to the handling of United States money in our country. When United States tourists come to the border no attempt is made to change their currency into Canadian currency. A Canadian or anyone else travelling in France would very soon obtain French francs. A person travelling in England would immediately obtain his pounds, shillings and pence or his "quid" and "bob". But when United States tourists come to this country no such attempt is made.

What do we find? We find that because of economic factors their money is not worth as much as ours. The result is that time after time in our establishments we see arguments going on between some poor harassed cashier and a United States tourist because their dollar is only worth 96 cents. We have all had the experience in the past—I know I can remember it as as a youngster—of going across the border to the United States, having our money thrown back to us and being told that it was no good. Possibly that still happens. I do not know. But I believe it would be a very sensible thing for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration or whatever department is concerned, to have at the larger border crossing points at least, the necessary facilities so that as soon as these people have been checked through by customs and immigration officials they can change their money into Canadian money. Then they would have the currency of our country as long as they were here and there would not be these arguments and hard feeling—there is hard feeling when United States tourists find that their money is not worth as much as ours.

Going back to my youth many years ago I can well remember living with a farmer who had a rather good mixed farm. He had done well and I asked him what was the secret of his success. He said, "My boy, on a farm like this the whole year round you have always got to have something to sell." I think that in Canada we have a great deal to sell if we package it properly.

Like other members who have spoken today, and as I will perhaps be the only speaker from the province of New Brunswick, I should like to take a few moments to tell about the beauties of my province and what it has to offer to the visitor. I am sure many hon. members have never been that far east. There is the beauty of the Restigouche, Miramichi and Saint John rivers, perhaps second to none on the whole North American continent, —the tidal bore of the Petitcodiac, the reversing falls on the Saint John river, the only phenomenon of its kind in the world the Magnetic Hill, the beauty of the islands of the bay of Fundy such as Grand Manan and Campobello. In fact, so beautiful is Campobello that for much of his life the late President Franklin Delano Roosevelt spent his summers there and, some say, loved it even more than his own country.

There is the beauty of the historic sites, the land that Cartier first saw in 1534, that was first settled in 1604 and to which the Loyalists came when they emigrated to this country. I could talk for many hours about the beauty of the province from which I come. I simply suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all other members that at the earliest opportunity you come to visit us in New Brunswick. I am sure you will receive a welcome second to none in the whole country.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. member for Port Arthur, I feel that the resolution of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is not socialism. It is merely justice. If it is implemented, and I am sure it will be at some time by this government in its wisdom, and it possesses a great deal of wisdom, it will be a great boon to this most important phase of the life of our country.

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): As the representative for Bruce, Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to make a few remarks on this resolution sponsored by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to authorize the making of loans, jointly with an approved lending institution, to tourist resort operators for the purpose of constructing or making capital improvements to tourist accommodation.

I should like to say that we in Bruce are very happy to claim the mover of this resolution as an ex-Bruce boy. I should like to compliment him upon the presentation he made. I should like to say also that we in Bruce are very happy that there are two other hon. members in this house whom we claim as ex-Bruce boys. I refer to the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Hanbidge) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McLennan). I am sure that these three hon. gentlemen will back up any remarks I have to make this afternoon.

Bruce is classified as a rural riding. Our largest town has a population of less than 3,000. We have some very reliable industries in these towns, but I would say there is room for a lot more. The riding is about 140 miles long and we have about 300 miles of shoreline. Our county is two-thirds very good agricultural land, and the other one-third contains some very good tourist locations. I should like to say that we in Canada are very fortunate. We have many wonderful places, and one realizes that after hearing so many hon. gentlemen extol the virtues of their locations this afternoon. I am happy to say that we in Bruce do not have to take a back seat to any of them.

Now the tourist industry is a very important industry, not only in Bruce but in the whole of Canada. Our federal government spends a considerable sum in advertising Canada as a tourist attraction, as do many provincial and municipal governments. The tourist industry is something that is really good for the world in that it encourages visitors from one country to another, and the people become better acquainted. It is good for our country as a whole, because it encourages visitors to go from one province to another. I think, in the end, a bit of travel is really a very broadening experience.

As I said before, a large amount of money has been spent in advertising, but in addition a large amount of money has been spent by Canadians in visiting other countries. I think it would be good business to take stock of our own locations, and try to make them more attractive. I am sure that if we did so much of the money spent by Canadians in other countries would be kept in Canada. I believe that the old slogan "See Canada first" applies ever more strongly today. Most of our tourist industries in Bruce are run by local people who have started from scratch, and in many cases with very limited means. Under the circumstances, they have done a wonderful job. However, I am strongly of the opinion that if the principle of this resolution is carried through, it will be a boon not only to the tourist operators in Bruce, but also the surrounding district.

I wish to quote part of an editorial which appeared in the Owen Sound Sun Times on July 21, 1958, entitled "Figures Show Importance of Tourist Industry":

> Any centre that is able to persuade a few dozen tourists to stop in its area during the four summer months will reap financial benefits corresponding to the presence, and year's operation, of a small manufacturing plant, says an Ontario department of travel and publicity statement and, it adds, for every dollar a tourist spends, the community benefits in these proportions: food and refreshment caterers, 27 cents; transportation services, including gas and oil at service stations, 22 cents, lodging and accommodation, 21 cents; retailers, 14 cents; theatre and entertainment, 7 cents; tourist attractions, 4 cents and miscellaneous services, laundry, etc., 5 cents.
> A Muskoka popular resort bought $18,855 worth of food and accessories for the season and "gave the proprietor a reasonable profit and kept the producers of the farm and orchard products and kept manufacturers of many and various materials, supplies and equipment gainfully employed."

Now, at the bottom of that editorial it says this:

> In the face of such figures one receives a much greater realization of how unfortunate it is that many of our best summer resort areas are under the jurisdiction of councils composed of men whose vision is strictly limited. They deeply begrudge money spent on what they consider the "summer colony", even though such money is many times contributed by direct taxation from those same people, to say nothing of the other benefits shown from the above example.

According to these figures, we find 27 per cent of the tourist's dollars came to over $18,000. It is logical then, to conclude that four times $18,000 was spent by the tourists who visited that one summer resort, and this would represent a total of approximately $70,000.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks about civil defence as it ties in with this resolution. I should like to quote part of an editorial from the Globe and Mail dated July 19, 1958.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a statement that civil defence ties in with this resolution. I should like to have that developed a little bit before I allow him to proceed.

Mr. Robinson: If you will permit me, sir, it is a very short quotation and as soon as I have concluded I am satisfied you will see I am in order. I quote:

In the event of an impending attack metropolitan Toronto citizens would be moved to reception areas in the Bruce peninsula and to regions north of Brockville, it was learned last night.

I hope the time will never come, Mr. Speaker, when the metropolitan Toronto area has to be evacuated. If it does, we in Bruce would hope to be good hosts, and we will be helped in being good hosts if this resolution carries, thereby permitting us to have bigger and better tourist accommodation. I am very much in favour of this resolution.

Mr. H. W Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise to give this resolution my hearty endorsation and to congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for bringing this matter to the attention of the house. In this resolution, in my opinion, he proposed something that is of value to society and of value to a good many individuals. It is obvious that the great need for the expansion of the tourist industry in this country, under the requirements of the future, is some form of long term credit which is not available, generally speaking, from the orthodox lending institutions in the country; credit which is required, to my own knowledge, in my own constituency for the development of tourist resorts and things of that type. I have listened to the majority of the speakers this afternoon, and it is quite obvious that the condition which exists in my own constituency exists generally in Canada.

I should like to support also what the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Robinson) said, when you rather cocked your eye, Mr. Speaker, as though he was getting out of order. As a matter of fact, that same suggestion has been made in our own district and tourist resorts have been registered as areas where people can be sent, if necessary, under certain conditions. We in this country have a tremendous potential to be developed in this respect in our scenic assets and a potential in the development of opportunities provided for swimming, fishing, hunting, boating, mountain climbing and all those other enjoyments that go with the enjoyment of our lakes, rivers, mountains, parks and other natural resources of that type.

Naturally I cannot refrain from becoming somewhat parochial in this discussion in order to illustrate my point and my reasons for the support of this resolution and to bring to the attention of the house—and I trust to some limited extent to the attention of the country in certain directions—the opportunities provided in Canada's paradise, the Kootenays. I made a summary some time ago of the possibilities for the establishment of tourist resorts in my constituency in certain locations. While at the present time we have excellent accommodation in Nelson, Trail, Rossland, Nakusp, Needles, St. Leon, Kaslo, Beaton, Boswell, Balfour, Proctor, Queen's Bay, Kootenay Bay, Gray Creek and so on; there are unlimited opportunities for further development.

In our district we are today largely overlooked, shall I say, by some very interesting mountain ranges which many famous Canadian climbers have taken the opportunity to enjoy by climbing. They include the Selkirk range, the Purcell range, the Monashee range, the Duncan range, the Battle range, the Valhalla range, the Goat range and a number of others. We have many well-known peaks that have been climbed by a good number of people, and largely as a result of the limited development of the tourist industry in my constituency today. They include Halcyon peak, Nelson peak, Akokla peak, Nowitka peak and mount Fosthall.

Then we have some magnificent parks that can be developed to a much greater extent if the facilities are provided. Passage of legislation of this type will make it possible for people who understand the country, competent people, to develop the tourist resources and the accommodation required to provide for the further enjoyment of the things I am mentioning in Kootenay West. We have excellent parks at Kokanee Glacier park, Nakusp hot springs provincial park and a number of other areas. We have hot springs to be developed at Ainsworth, Nakusp, St. Leon and Halcyon, they are magnificent hot springs and in all but one case are largely undeveloped at the present time because of lack of co-operation—and in one case particularly, an operator has already spent nearly a quarter of a million dollars in the development of one hot spring—lack of opportunity to borrow sufficient long term credit to develop these hot springs to their proper capacity and so on.

We have some famous lakes including the Arrow lakes, the Kootenay lakes, Slocan lake, Trout lake, and Whatshan lake, which provide magnificent boating, swimming and fishing. In the paradise in our district are offered innumerable opportunities for the development of tourist accommodation. I know a number of people who own very suitable sites. In some cases there is no development because of lack of capital and in other cases there is very small development because of lack of capital.

Then we have opportunities for fishing in Howser lake, Beatrice lake, Demers lake, Little Slocan lakes, Wilson lake, Kemball lake, Duck lake, Caribou lake and Sugar lake, just to mention a few of the multitude of excellent lakes in the area which provide fishing for Kamloops trout, lake trout, Dolly Vardens and fish of those species.

As to rivers, we have the Inonoaklin river, the Duncan river, the Howser river, the Lardeau river, the Kettle river, the Columbia river, the Kootenay river, and the Slocan river which also provide tremendous opportunities for this type of development. We have many natural creeks which contain the famous Kootenay brook trout, to which, when people come once, they return year after year. They include Incomappleux creek, Akolkolex creek, Pingston creek, Kuskanax creek, Hamill creek, Sheep creek, Monashee creek, Meadow creek, St. Leon creek, Halfway creek, Sitkum creek, Slewiskin creek and many, many others which provide the excellent brook trout which is becoming known all across this country.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, we have many undeveloped areas that I shall not take the time to mention now. I have just mentioned a few to illustrate the outstanding opportunities in my constituency for the development of the tourist industry and for the provision of accommodation for which this type of legislation is required if the people who are interested in the industry are to have the opportunity to develop it.

I think this is one facet of our development that can be related to planning as a result of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, particularly those departments that have under their jurisdiction our natural resources of this type and their development and those departments that have under their jurisdiction the development of highways and things of that sort, whether they are trans-Canada highways or provincial highways. It also offers an opportunity for the correlation of that co-operation between provincial government departments with whatever department of the federal government would be concerned with administrating legislation of this type so that the development can be planned and money can be lent for sound projects. I am always in favour of sound business policy. I always believe that two and two make four. Oftentimes people think they have a wonderful opportunity to do something and would like to borrow money with which to do it. But when you investigate it you find out that the possibility for patronage, business and so on is far too limited and that their ideas are largely in the nature of dreams. However, I suggest that there could be some very sound co-operation between the departments of federal and provincial governments that are interested in the development of our national resources, particularly our parks, recreational development and the provision of tourist accommodation.

I suggest that this subject is worthy of further study. I should like to see this resolution adopted unanimously by the house and then be referred to the appropriate committee of the house for further study and for the hearing of the representations of those in the various departments, federal and provincial, who are particularly interested in this problem and the development of these facilities and the hearing of representations from persons interested in the development of tourist resources, owners and so on, and the various organizations that represent their interests. As a result of that inquiry by a parliamentary committee I think the government would be on very sound ground in introducing legislation to give effect to the purpose and the spirit of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

(Translation):

Mr. Vincent Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, a country like Canada which has a very considerable trade deficit with its neighbours to the south should, in order to balance its payments, make the greatest effort to promote the tourist industry, as one of the most efficient means to balance our country's trade deficit. In practically all spheres of our economic activity, the tourist industry acts as a stimulus. Let tourists come over in large numbers and it means more business for hotels, restaurants and, therefore, all who supply food products and services.

There are, of course, areas in Canada that are just about perfectly set up for that purpose. Indeed, in such areas, the tourist trade is so profitable that in some cases it can be said that it is their chief industry. However, Canada as a whole is far from being perfectly organized in this respect, and there are still large areas which, though extremely picturesque, do not benefit from the economic help this very modern industry could bring them. Why? Because lack of capital has prevented the building of essential accommodation that would draw and hold visitors here. One case in point is my own riding, though I shall not attempt at this time to describe all its features and attractions. Of course, we have first class hotels and restaurants, but just enough to accommodate commercial travellers or businessmen. To open up the kingdom of Saguenay to large scale tourism, several million dollars should be invested in specialized accommodation, and our businessmen lack the required capital to finance such a project on their own.

Until about 10 years ago, the only tourists who came over would sail up the Saguenay in a Canada Steamship Line vessel and used the boat as a hotel even when it put in at Chicoutimi. This is a type of tourists who are profitable only to the steamship company. As for our railway, to which I have referred on a previous occasion, it is far from being the modern, twentieth century transport which is likely to attract visitors to the area. Until that railway has been overhauled or rebuilt, you can be sure, Mr. Speaker, that those who travel over it for the 13 hours it takes to cover the distance from Montreal to Chicoutimi are people who have no choice but to do so. However, for the past decade, a modern highway has linked us to Quebec city by a 2½ hour drive. This road, which is open the year round, even in the dead of winter, is one of the most attractive highways in Canada, and at each turn reveals new vistas of unsuspected beauty and grandeur. So far, it has been used chiefly by highway transport operators in competing with our railway, for this area has not been ready to accommodate tourists who, on reaching Quebec city, look for interesting side trips they can make.

Hotel organization is therefore a compelling necessity in our district, and that is why I fully support the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). This resolution is based on a remarkable realism, because it would help reduce considerably the commercial deficit of Canada towards the United States, while developing most districts of our country.

I know that, in principle, the federal government must not interfere with private business, but every rule has its exceptions and, with regard to the urgent situation prevailing in several districts of the country, in so far as tourism is concerned, some legislation is imperative to remedy the situation. Tourist establishments are in the same position as any small industry unable to borrow from credit organizations or on the money market. The previous administration had partially dealt with small and medium industries in establishing the Industrial Development Bank. The present government would complete the cycle and would break the vicious circle in introducing some legislation allowing the Industrial Development Bank to finance tourist establishments.

Another good way of killing two birds with one stone—that is to say develop the tourist business and at the same time increase revenue for the Canadian National Railways—would be to build several other large hotels in various key areas of the country, and especially in Chicoutimi, where such an establishment has long been a crying need.

This summer, about 10 conventions, provincial and even national in scope, will take place in Chicoutimi; and we always find it very hard to provide the necessary accommodation for all our visitors. Besides, many organizations that would like to come and enjoy our marvelous climate in summer, our unique landscapes and, above all, our proverbial hospitality, have to be turned down through lack of accommodation.

Mr. Speaker, in closing my brief remarks, I repeat that the government should do all it can to offset our unfavourable trade balance with the United States. This resolution provides an excellent means to do so, and it is our duty to support it, so that Canada may regain the rank it has lost in favour of Mexico, as the country most frequently visited by American tourists.

(Text):

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the first opportunity this house has had for a full scale debate on the important subject of the tourist industry in Canada and I would therefore congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for making it possible to have such a debate under the resolution now before us. It is rather remarkable that we do not hear more in this chamber about tourism. I have been listening to the contributions made so far in the discussions and it is obvious that the tourist industry in Canada is assuming very substantial proportions.

As we have heard from several speakers, in terms of revenue this industry is surpassed only by the wheat industry and the newsprint industry and I think it is time that we in this chamber began to take a more detailed interest in what is involved in its thriving and growing activity. The whole subject of the increase in tourism, of course, arises from the increasing mobility of the people during the last few decades. Our society has been moving in the direction of shorter hours of work with correspondingly longer hours of leisure. The advent of the automobile and suitable roads to accommodate automobiles have made it possible for almost every citizen on this continent to become mobile. Holidays are now a universal pattern and when all these things are taken into consideration they account for the tremendous upsurge in the tourist industry and the incidental development in those important bi-products—trade and industrial activity.

We have heard from members from the maritimes and from the central parts of Canada and I would now like to relate some of the issues they have raised and some of the suggestions they have made in their discussions to our situation in the province of Manitoba. Manitoba is popularly known as the keystone province because of its geographical position, right in the centre of the federation and has become increasingly popular as a mecca for tourists. The geographical position of Manitoba is partly responsible for this because we are also close to the geographical centre of the North American continent and when I say we I mean particularly my own constituency of Brandon-Souris.

Relating the phrase "the keystone province" to broader issues, I have for the past few years been maintaining that this term not only applies to economic things but that it applies also to the political situation in Canada. We have been in a cross current of opinions from both east and west over the years, and as long ago as 1951 I was making the prophecy that as goes Manitoba so goes the rest of Canada. That has certainly been revealed in the political developments which have taken place within the past few months right across the nation. I think the same interpretation would result from an analysis of the developments which have taken place in trade and industry in Manitoba, and certainly it could be used to describe the developing situation in relation to the tourist industry.

It is somewhat significant, I think, to recall that the city of Brandon in the southwestern part of the province of Manitoba was originally known as the wheat city of the west. It has long since lost that title to the province of Saskatchewan but I will suggest this afternoon—and present some facts that will substantiate this suggestion—that as the city of Brandon was once known as the wheat city of the west, the area surrounding it is gradually becoming known as a tourist centre, at least of the continental prairie section of Canada.

I say this because we have a highway passing through this area of the province which is rapidly becoming known as the main street of the Americas. It is a highway which extends from South America through Mexico, right up through the United States, into Canada and on to the northern reaches of Manitoba. At the present time the road terminates in Flin Flon, but with the rapid developments which are taking place in our northern mining communities in Manitoba it will only be a matter of a few years before we have an all-season driveway right through to the port of Churchill.

Along that highway are located some of the most attractive tourist areas not only in Manitoba but in the whole of Canada. I am hoping that at some time those who are interested in the tourist industry in Canada—those responsible for the mass media of information; the press, radio, television, films and other media of that kind—will have their attention attracted to this area. Indeed, I hope that this debate today and this particular presentation may be the means whereby their attention will be directed to this area and that they may do a story on the significance of this main street of the Americas. I propose to deal only with the attractions on the Canadian side, of course.

Right at the border on No. 10 highway we have the international peace garden. Hon. members who have been in this chamber for the past few years will recall that I have had occasion to refer to the international peace garden on former occasions. My interest in the development of this tourist area—because it is that, in addition to being much more than a tourist attraction—began long before I came to the House of Commons. My predecessor in the House of Commons, the late J. E. Matthews, was also vitally interested in its potentialities. The peace garden is a joint Canadian-American project on the Manitoba-North Dakota boundary which is dedicated to the symbolization of the universal desire of the human family for peace. I attended the ceremonies at the opening of the garden back in 1932.

It is a spontaneous project originally sponsored by the international gardeners association—I believe that is the name. They had been searching right along the boundary of Canada for a natural area, an area untouched by the handiwork of man, which might prove a suitable location for a project of this kind. Mr. Moore of Islington, along with other representatives of the international gardeners association, visited the area, and immediately saw its natural advantages. That was in the year 1929. In 1932 the official opening took place with the unveiling of a cairn which had been raised from the native stone of the area. The inscription on this cairn conveyed the purpose of the international peace garden in the following words:

To God in His glory
We two nations dedicate this garden and pledge ourselves that as long as men shall live, we will not take up arms against one another.

That is the purpose of the peace garden, as is simply stated in the words on the cairn. I had to become active in the house in behalf of this project because shortly after I came to the House of Commons an annual federal grant of some $15,000 was suddenly removed and we had to take action regarding the restoration of that grant which was one of the important financial measures by which the garden was being developed. The grant was restored after one year, but at a reduced amount of $10,000. I am delighted to see from the supplementary estimates that this grant is to be increased to the original amount of $15,000, and I must congratulate the government and particularly the minister of northern affairs (Mr. Hamilton) on having taken this action. It demonstrates that both the minister and the government are aware of the growing importance of the tourist industry generally.

I could spend some time discussing this particular aspect of the tourist industry in Manitoba, but I must not yield to that temptation other than to say that in recent years it is encouraging to note that as result of growing publicity thousands of people annually are coming from all parts of North America and indeed from many European countries to hold international gatherings of various kinds in the garden. Others merely come to the garden and try to capture the inspiration which motivated the founders to establish it and dedicate it to the pursuit of peace. I have already indicated that this project is more than simply an aspect of the tourist industry.

We have, for example, an annual meeting of students. Students from both Canada and the United States gather there for discussions of international affairs. I should give honour where honour is due and say that the junior member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie was one of the founding spirits of this international conference. Various service clubs and international bodies are also holding their gatherings there. As a matter of fact, if the necessary facilities were available this would be an ideal place in which to hold a summit meeting. The summit is not very high, of course, because although this is on top of Turtle mountain hon. members will realize that with regard to mountains Manitoba can hardly be compared with British Columbia. But the location, and the spirit behind this garden would, I think, create a very fine atmosphere in which the leaders of the nations of the world could confer.

I must mention this point before proceeding with my remarks. A most interesting development has occurred in recent years. I refer to the establishment of an international music camp in the international peace garden. The founder, as one might guess from his name, is a Minnesota Norwegian, Dr. Merton Utgaard, a well-known professor of music from Northern Illinois university. He first got the idea when working in a C.C.C. camp in the depression of the thirties, on the United States side of the garden. During the first week of July musicians from all parts of Canada and the United States including 500 students of music gathered together at this point. The group included such eminent musicians as the leader of the Winnipeg symphony orchestra. The idea behind it is to have not only a workshop for high school musicians but to eventually send these musicians to various parts of the North American continent and to Europe with a view to contributing to the promotion of peace and international good will and understanding through the medium of music the universal language of the soul. That is the animating purpose behind the meeting of the musicians in the international peace gardens.

There is one handicap in the operation of activity of this kind and that is the lack of suitable buildings and facilities. That is a subject I want to direct to the attention of this government. They will be called upon for assistance as concrete proposals of this kind are formulated. That is just the beginning of the main street of the Americas. Extending right up to the northern part of Manitoba we have a series of tourist attractions. All of these demonstrate the tremendous potentiality of this area, the keystone province, as a source of tourist interest.

I should also mention that our neighbouring state, North Dakota, is so enthusiastic about the peace garden to which I have referred that the licence plates for automobiles issued in that state bear the designation, "The Peace Garden State".

Along the main street of the Americas in Manitoba we have such well-known tourist attractions as lake Killarney, as beautiful as its namesake, Pelican lake and Oak lake. Passing through the city of Brandon, whose virtues I need not extol, we are contemplating there in the immediate future construction of lake Brandon which will add to the value of that area as a tourist centre. Next we come to lake Minnedosa in the constituency of my colleague the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) and Manitoba national park on Clear lake, one of the finest national parks in our whole system. It is second only to the well-known park at Banff in the number of visitors it attracts annually. This weekend I might add the national park in Manitoba has been celebrating the observance of its 25th anniversary. We then continue on to lake Dauphin, to Flin Flon with its many tourist attractions and then come to the north which is a subject in itself.

All throughout this area there is a great need for development along the lines contained in the proposed resolution of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I am grateful that he has provided an opportunity for making some observations in this respect. The problem has been raised by several hon. members concerning just how far private activity should go and to what extent government activity should mingle in this kind of development but that is something that can be sorted out only with experience. The government has already made a large contribution to promoting our tourist industry through the government travel bureau. I believe the publicity that is now being undertaken will assist tremendously in overcoming some of the handicaps that have been mentioned about Canadians going to the United States or even to Europe instead of seeing Canada first. I agree with hon. gentlemen who said we certainly have not been getting the proportion of tourists from that great country to the south of us that we could have expected were the advantages of touring in Canada fully known. The problems of publicity and the provision of adequate hospitality and facilities need solving.

I should make one observation in this regard in which governments should be extremely interested, and that is that the state of our highways in certain areas of Canada leave much to be desired. We know that the roads on the prairies in particular are not very conducive to providing the kind of hospitality that will invite tourists to return or encourage them to invite their friends and neighbours to come to Canada. It is not a new idea to sponsor the notion that governments on all levels should take a very hard look at the problem of providing roads that are suitable and adequate to meet the needs of this thriving new industry in Canada. If the tourist industry is third in position as a revenue bearer, with a very small outlay and little thought in organization it could easily assume the topmost position. As far as my area is concerned, any assistance of the kind proposed in the resolution will be welcome. It will provide a great boon to the diversification of industry that is so badly needed in that part of the country.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not thought I would be following directly another Manitoba member in this debate. Perhaps it is a good thing for by strength of numbers and conclusiveness of argument we may be able to convince members of the house to visit and enjoy our fair province.

With regard to the resolution before us, as many of the previous speakers have pointed out the Canadian tourist association is a non-profit organization serving the Canadian tourist industry and as the national voice of Canada's tourist industry it represents almost every phase of the Canadian economy. It has been further pointed out by previous speakers that the tourist industry in Canada is an extensive business and that part of everyone's income comes from visitors to our communities and to the country. It has been said that tourism means much to Canada and I agree completely with that statement. However, apart from the national picture as a whole I should like to point out to the house that the tourist trade in the province of Manitoba is an important segment of the national tourist business and, in effect, has been growing larger and larger every year.

Many people across the country do not realize that the city of Winnipeg is located only 60 miles from the United States border and Manitoba as the keystone province in its favourable geographical position and with its abundance of tourist attractions now occupies an important status in the Canadian tourist business. You have heard my good friend, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), extol the virtues of the tourist attractions in his constituency and the area surrounding it in the southwest portion of the province. I do not intend to repeat his remarks but rather I should like to discuss the tourist business in the province of Manitoba as a whole with, of course, some reference to the city of Winnipeg.

In 1957 more visitors came to our province and spent more money than in any previous year. The estimated value for 1957 is well over $31 million and it is considered that this amount was spent by at least one million tourists. For the year 1957 the province of Manitoba had the largest percentage increase in the tourist industry of any province in Canada. Another significant index of the upward trend in Manitoba's tourist volume is that for the first six months of 1958 there was an increase of 12.9 per cent over the corresponding months of 1957 in the number of foreign vehicles coming into the province. This is the largest increase of any province in Canada, with our closest competitor being the province of British Columbia. Present indications suggest that the year 1958 will be the best tourist year in the history of the province. The current period of economic adjustment in capital investment, industrial activity and consumer purchases appears to have had little, if any, reflection on the tourist trade of Manitoba.

It is noted that families and sportsmen are already allocating more money for travel and holidays than ever before. Disposable income available for travel and vacations has increased more than most commodity prices and service charges. The factor of money is not alone in influencing the tourist trade in Manitoba. As is pointed out in the Manitoba tourist industry report, a publication of the department of industry and commerce of the province of Manitoba, "time itself is a big factor".

In the states of the United States closest to our province paid vacations for hourly workers have more than doubled since 1939. Today well over 95 per cent of hourly workers have vacations with pay. Four times as many companies now allow three weeks vacation as did ten years ago. The five-day week has become standard practice throughout business and industry. Thus all facets of the tourist trade, theoretically at least, have a stake in over 120 days of an employee's year. This figure is made up of the annual vacation plus statutory holidays and week ends.

The trend in Manitoba this year is reflecting the influence of these factors. Capital investments in new motels, hotels, resorts, hunting and fishing lodges, in additions and modernizations to be completed in 1958, will see the greatest amount of investment in tourist facilities ever made in a single year in this province. This in itself is reason enough for me to give serious consideration to the resolution before the house tonight.

The population of our province is approximately 850,000 with roughly half of this number being concentrated in the Winnipeg area. From the Winnipeg of 1874 with 4,000 people to the present Winnipeg with close to half a million people, Winnipeg's growth has been truly amazing. Today greater Winnipeg, which includes Winnipeg proper and its twin city of St. Boniface across the Red river, stands as Canada's fourth largest city and the leading industrial and agricultural centre of three provinces. Every year, and this is a point I should like to emphasize, the city is host to more than 600,000 tourists and, whatever the purpose of their visit, you may rest assured that Winnipeg offers them a warm hearted welcome. The mayor of the city of Winnipeg would, I think, agree with me in saying that the key to our city in effect is available at all times for all visitors to the capital city of the province of Manitoba.

The fact that a great deal more than half of the estimated number of tourists who come into the province of Manitoba visit the city of Winnipeg is also another reason why I, as the member for one of the Winnipeg constituencies, should consider seriously this resolution. The city of Winnipeg welcomes the tourist trade for the city can provide adequate accommodation, is a mecca for visiting shoppers and has within the limits of greater Winnipeg over 1,000 green acres of park made up in the main of spacious Kildonan, St. Vital and Assiniboine parks which I am sure you would all enjoy.

Throughout the year the city of Winnipeg has a wide selection of entertainment ranging from sports as played in our magnificent new arena and stadium by professional hockey, baseball and football teams, namely the Warriors, the Goldeyes and, of course, our famous Blue Bombers,—I may say that Winnipeg is one of the few cities in Canada that is able to support three professional athletic teams—to the new modern Assiniboine Downs race track and, on the more cultural side, the Royal Winnipeg ballet and the outdoor Rainbow Stage at Kildonan park to the latest production at the Playhouse theatre. Of course, the tourist's visit would not be complete unless it included the colour and pageantry of the very interesting and beautiful festivals of the various ethnic groups in our fair city. Whatever the tourist's taste may be, he may rest assured that in the city of Winnipeg he will not be bored.

In concluding this brief résumé of the attractions of the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba,—I must admit it is very brief and I could go on for many hours but I have not got that many hours—I should like now to dwell on the resolution with regard to the financial aspects. I have attempted to show the house that we have a tourist industry in our province which is very important to the people of Manitoba. This makes it necessary that I consider this resolution in all its details. Who benefits from the tourist trade? In the first place it should be established that what is called the tourist trade is, in fact, a combination of many private businesses and government services. In most cases, they work independently, but all contribute goods or services which are used or consumed by the tourist.

Whatever one may do for a living, whether it is in industry, farming, the wholesale or retail trade, or some other business or profession, part of your income is derived from the visitors to your community or to our country. The Manitoba government has done a great deal of research on the tourist industry. I should like to take up some of your time by quoting from figures which show a breakdown of every tourist dollar spent in our province. It is estimated that the retail stores all over the province are the chief beneficiary of the tourist spending, in that 31 cents of every tourist dollar is spent in retail outlets. About 24 cents goes for accommodation of one kind or another in hotels, modern hunting and fishing lodges, camp grounds and trailer parks. Restaurants, dining rooms and snack bars collect 21 cents of every tourist dollar. With regard to this last factor, the province of Manitoba estimates that in 1957—how they procured this estimate, I do not know—the consumption of foodstuffs by tourists amounted to 600,000 eggs; 2.5 million pounds of grain products; 1.5 millions pounds of sugar and syrup; 725,000 pounds of butter; 7.5 million pints of milk and 4.5 million pounds of meat and meat products. These figures aptly demonstrate the large and important tourist industry in the province of Manitoba.

Of every tourist dollar spent in our province, there was 15 cents spent for gas and oil. Altogether, in 1957, tourists purchased $5.5 million worth of gas and oil. You can just imagine, on the gasoline tax alone the treasury of the province of Manitoba collected about half a million dollars. I was amazed when I was in receipt of these figures to find that the tourist industry of Manitoba actually was so large. Of the balance of the tourist's dollar, 9 cents was used for entertainment and miscellaneous unclassified purchases. From these official figures, it may be seen that the tourist trade benefits many different sections of our economy in Manitoba and, of course, across Canada as a nation.

Conversely, the introduction of these important tourist dollars means a high standard of living for many of our people. It is reasonable to assume that the tourist industry will play an increasingly important role in the future in broadening the base of our economy. We may make this reasonable assumption, and I make it in all seriousness, because of definite trends in high and rising incomes; the allocation of more consumer dollars for vacation and travel; the increase in the number of privately owned automobiles; the growing participation in outdoor activities by both sportsmen and family groups. Of course, so far as Manitoba is concerned, there is the further fact that there is close proximity of a receptive class of prospects for travelling and holidaying in our province. Because of the importance of the tourist industry and the reasonable assumption that it will play an increasingly important role in the future, we are well advised to study this resolution with regard to long term financing for tourist resort operators.

As the brief submitted by the Canadian tourist association to the government concerning a tourist establishment improvement loan act—which is much the same thing as this resolution proposes—points out, the tourist industry is composed mainly of small businesses. While there are some larger establishments, the greater percentage of restaurants and accommodation establishments are small. Many are, in fact, family enterprises. The brief goes on to point out that one of the major deterrents to improvement of tourist facilities is the lack of credit resources. The brief suggests that the tourist industry needs long term credit at reasonable rates of interest. With this suggestion, I am in complete accord.

However, with regard to a long term credit plan, I would point out that it would be preferable for this house to consider at just what point within the tourist industry as a whole, such credit plan would be needed. I have pointed out previously that in the province of Manitoba, the largest portion of the tourist dollar, 31 cents, is spent in retail stores. Surely, if any long term financing plan is needed for the tourist industry, it is most appropriate to consider the extension of such a plan to the independent retail merchant. Even before I was elected to office I had given a great deal of thought to the importance to our economy of the small retail merchant. There are many reasons for my interest in this field, but probably the main influencing factor was that my father had his own retail business in the city of Winnipeg for a great many years. It was only natural that I became aware of his problems, and consequently the problems of the independent retail merchant in Winnipeg today.

As I have pointed out, the greater portion of the tourist dollar is spent in retail outlets. Therefore, I should like to consider this resolution as it affects retail outlets in the city of Winnipeg. It has been forecast that by this time next year there will be an additional $20 million investment in supermarkets operating in the city of Winnipeg. I have no quarrel with this, for the supermarket idea is beneficial to the housewife and to the community at large. This development shows an extreme faith in the future of the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba. To emphasize the extent of this investment, I should like to read from part of an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune of Thursday, July 24:

The $20 million investment planned here in the next year—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. member to consider whether he is not getting off the course of this debate if he gets into a discussion of supermarkets?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): With great respect, I do not think I am. What I am trying to do is point out that if this long term financing plan should be applicable to the tourist industry, then the various places where the tourist dollar is spent should be considered. In the province of Manitoba, the largest portion of the tourist dollar is spent in retail outlets. I am trying, therefore, to make the point that perhaps this long term financing as set forth in the resolution should be extended to independent retail outlets. I am trying to make the point that the independent retail outlets need it.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid it is rather remote from the subject under discussion.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I shall not go ahead with the editorial. However, the point I should like to make, and I think it has been made, is that it is becoming increasingly more evident, and will be more so by this time next year in the city of Winnipeg, that the independent food retailer in Winnipeg has to be competitive with those in the corporate fields. As a matter of fact, in so far as this resolution is concerned, the retail merchants' association submitted a brief along very much the same lines as those incorporated in the resolution before us.

I make this point of the independent retail merchant only to point out to the members of the house for their consideration the importance of the independent retail merchant to the tourist industry and the fact that consideration of this resolution should not be confined to tourist resort operators only but should include retail merchants and retail outlets in all towns and cities across this country.

I could perhaps go further at this point and dwell on the great needs of small business and industry in Canada today, for some kind of long term financing is drastically needed. It is true that a tourist resort has singular characteristics such as seasonal operation and possibly a higher rate of depreciation. However, in the main, they are at present in the same position as nearly all small business across this country with regard to long term financing. This question has been discussed in this house on other occasions. The government is especially aware of this problem and is busy at the present moment setting up a small business section to consider these difficulties with a view to finding some solution.

As the Canadian tourist association stated in its brief, it welcomes the expressed intention of the government to take measures to alleviate the difficulties which operators of small enterprises encounter for the improvement and expansion of business. It might be possible,—and it is my hope that this possibility will eventually become a reality—with adequate legislation, to allow small business and industry to participate in the financial field in much the same way as do larger corporations.

In any event, I heartily approve of this resolution. The hon. member who proposed it is to be commended for bringing it to the attention of the house. However, I should certainly like to see the resolution broadened to bring in the independent retail merchants and other small business and industry throughout Canada. As I have already pointed out, the tourist in Manitoba spends the greater part of his dollar in the retail outlets, and I believe any consideration that might be given to the tourist resort operators with regard to long term financing and credit should be given to the independent retail merchants across this country.

This subject of long term financing, of course, is something that deserves diligent and careful scrutiny and study in order that some constructive suggestion could be offered to the tourist industry and small business right across this country. If I may do so at this point, I should like to say that I have been in the house all day and have been greatly interested in the remarks of the various hon. members who have spoken on this resolution which is now before us. One in particular, namely the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), referred to the fact that a recommendation has been made that the 1968 winter Olympics be held in the Calgary and Banff area. This would be the second occasion on which such games have been held in Canada. The hon. member for Calgary South brought this suggestion forward with the idea that perhaps the members of this house would support such a recommendation having regard to the boon it would be to the tourist industry in western Canada and Canada as a whole. I only hope that this event comes to pass for it is important not only to the tourist industry but to Canada's status as a nation. I heartily support the recommendation made by the hon. member for Calgary South.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) spoke at great length of the beauty of Niagara Falls and quite rightly so, for it is one of Canada's great spectacles. But as the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) pointed out, no mention was made of the fact that it was still a rendezvous for honeymooners. We in Manitoba have no Niagara falls but we have some of the world's best fishing, hunting and scenic resorts. We are quite prepared to welcome all the honeymoon couples to come and honeymoon in our province and enjoy our wonderful western hospitality.

The hon. member also remarked on the critical attitude of some Canadians towards Americans vacationing in this country. This is an attitude that must be dispelled at all costs. We in Manitoba—and I am sure this is true right across Canada for the majority of Canadians—welcome our friends from across the border who, we feel, should not be the object of such criticism.

I have not spoken at as great length as I might have spoken with regard to the advantages to be enjoyed by any tourist visiting the province of Manitoba. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) dwelt on some aspects of that matter this afternoon. All I should like to say is that our province has a great deal to offer anyone who is desirous of visiting us. On behalf of the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba I am extremely pleased to invite the members of this house to pay us a visit at their convenience so that they may enjoy what we Manitobans consider to be the finest tourist attractions in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Before any other hon. member takes the floor may I recall to the house the subject matter of our discussion. It relates to the lending of money for the purpose of making capital improvements to tourist accommodation. I expect a reasonable amount of oratory from each hon. member about the tourist attractions of his own constituency and undoubtedly that subject is related to the tourist industry. But I would urge hon. members not to engage in full length discussion of the beauties of the spot from which they come but to relate their remarks, if possible, to the capital improvements that are needed in the tourist industry and the loans that are required for that purpose.

Mr. Stuart Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, this debate which has been going on here today is as good evidence as you could find of the growing awareness there is in the country of the value of the tourist industry as it is and as it can be. The resolution submitted by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) is also an indication of the awareness of the necessity for the development of our facilities if we are to maintain the position that we now hold and certainly if we are to improve that situation in the country.

In recent years the tourist industry has become one of our major industries. It is an industry with a tremendous potential; but that potential will be realized only if the facilities to cater to the tourist trade are provided. As has been pointed out here today in many of the speeches, the tourist industry is largely in the hands of the independent or small businessman whose financial resources are limited and who, owing to a relatively short season, is unable to secure from the operations of his business the additional capital that is required for capital expenditures. Consequently, if the very people who will provide the means of expanding our tourist industry are going to be able to do so, they must have access to the money they require.

The resolution suggests that the federal government can make this money available through a system of extending credit. There has been a suggestion—and I think it is a reasonable one—that it is perhaps not entirely the responsibility of government to make this money available, that there are other channels or other sources by means of which funds could be made available to the tourist industry. I feel that we must not lose sight of the fact that the government has not unlimited credit and cannot meet every requirement of business and industry in Canada. Nevertheless, if there is in any industry a branch capable of a development that will return to government more than the cost of creating the necessary development in the industry, then probably there is a good case for federal government participation.

In that case I am inclined to disagree with the hon. member for Port Arthur who suggested that those who support this resolution are endorsing socialism because by making credit facilities available and by loaning money secured as to repayment plus interest the government would not be giving anything away. It would simply be providing a facility which in its turn will ensure repayment with interest of these loans and this is something which is not necessarily true of socialist ventures.

There are in Canada many areas where there is a highly developed tourist industry including regions which are internationally as well as nationally famed for their beauty and recreational attractions which are perhaps developed as far as is possible. There are other areas which are only now becoming appreciated and it is only recently that people have realized what such areas have to offer to the tourist industry. These regions are being opened by the development of our highway system; the trans-Canada highway alone has provided access to regions which will I imagine in the years to come constitute some of the major tourist areas in Canada. This will only be so, however, if cash advances are available to people who wish to go into the areas and provide the facilities which must be provided. Many such regions are now virtually wilderness without even a gas pump. Everything will have to start from the bare ground and be built up.

A tremendous amount of capital investment will be necessary and, as has been pointed out during the course of this debate, such capital is not at present available to the small operator at a reasonable rate of interest or for a sufficiently lengthy period. Many of these areas are areas which produce primary products only, in most cases supporting only seasonal industries. They cannot support a secondary industry and consequently have but one source of revenue. In order to develop they will of course require further sources of revenue but it may be years before they can be developed to this point. With no factories or like facilities the people who live in such areas have inadequate income at this time but there is one point in their favour and that is that in many places their natural attractions give them a potentiality for development as popular tourist resorts.

The lack of year round industrial payrolls is of course a serious disadvantage but such sources of revenue might be provided by the development of the tourist industry which in turn would provide the funds required to create the necessary facilities with which to satisfy the travelling public. The whole potential of the tourist industry in Canada can be related to these areas which are only now beginning to be viewed with an understanding of what can be done by the careful expenditure of money and with adequate advertising. Such regions are not sufficiently prosperous to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

For instance, to particularize, there are regions in this country which are primarily farming areas growing seasonal crops and providing employment for perhaps six or eight months a year—some of them even less than that. There is an idea which has started to grow in recent years and which is not a new one—it is perhaps a very old idea but like so many old ideas is now being reconsidered with a fresh approach—that is the development of the farm vacation. No one will argue that in this country there does not exist the need for improving the level of farm incomes and any measure which could increase the income of our farm people will not only be of direct benefit to them but it will also be of benefit to the country as a whole. The farm vacation is only now beginning to be appreciated although that appreciation is limited to some extent to eastern Canada. It is, however, an idea which could spread although there are few farmers who have the necessary additional revenue required to create facilities necessary to cope with the tourist trade.

The idea of a farm vacation sounds very good and I have encountered people who have considered the idea and some have actually begun to develop their farms to provide such vacations. However, when they find out what is necessary in the way of accommodation and in order to meet the provincial health regulations and the demands of the modern travelling public they realize that the farm vacation today is not the same as it was 25 or 30 years ago. Farm incomes are not adequate to provide the facilities which people have come to expect and the farmers have sufficient difficulty in finding the capital they require to cover their ordinary expenditures so that if they are to develop the tourist trade they must have access to additional revenue on a long term basis and at reasonable rates of interest.

A further problem in Canada is the problem of providing employment during winter months. We have heard during the course of the debate that the tourist industry is in many cases a seasonal one, generally speaking, for perhaps four to five months of the year. The largest proportion of our tourist business is done during the summer months but there is no reason why we could not extend our facilities to include more highly developed winter vacation programs thus providing a valuable source of winter employment. We have the climatic conditions necessary for every type of winter recreation. The Canadian people are in the habit of taking their holidays in the summer months because it is then that facilities are available to them and except in a relatively small part of the country little is done to provide facilities for winter vacations or recreation. There is at present very little encouragement for Canadians as a whole to take winter holidays and much should be done to provide the accommodation so that such vacations could be promoted.

Skiing facilities, sleighing facilities, ice for skating and all the other winter recreations that build up into a typical winter resort town are expensive, and the accommodation which will serve them is expensive. The cost of heating has to be very carefully considered; it has to be done on the most economical basis, and that usually means an expensive type of installation.

There are many regions which are multiple regions for recreation, and if these regions can be helped to extend their season and increase their opportunity for earning income by providing facilities that operate more nearly on a 12 months a year basis then we will have further strengthened the economy of many regions in Canada which now have only a limited or restricted economic basis, regions which will never realize their potential unless some means is found of establishing their economy on a 12 month year.

There is a further benefit. If Canadians find that winter recreational facilities are available to them, we can expect that more and more people will, over a period of time, choose to take winter vacations instead of jamming the greater proportion of Canadian vacations into the summer months, which in turn will mean that important employment opportunities in the winter will be available, at least on a temporary basis, to many thousands of people who will supply the places vacant in our factories, businesses and so on to replace vacationing employees. We will find out also that as we are not only interested in providing recreational opportunities for our own people but also for the benefit of foreign tourists, particularly for those people in the United States who come to Canada in search of something different, I am sure that just as Canadians head south for a winter in the sun, United States citizens would find considerable pleasure in the novelty of a winter in the north. But until we provide the kind of accommodation which they expect and which they are accustomed to finding at home, we will never get them.

It comes back to this; that if we are to realize our potential and if we are to develop this industry which is of proven value to the country we must find the means of aiding financially those who are engaged in the business and who want to grow in the business. The government can provide some of the necessary assistance through a program such as is suggested in this resolution. It is to be hoped that the provinces, realizing the value of the industry, will undertake similar programs. I would also express the hope that our regular channels of finance—the banks, the mortgage companies and financial houses—will take a fresh look at the tourist industry in Canada and realize that though at the present time it operates on a season of four or five months, with the proper kind of encouragement, capital addition and development the industry could function during a far longer season. The season could be at least doubled in many areas.

But this will never occur as long as we approach the problem timidly or without imagination. Therefore I feel that we in this house must consider this resolution with imagination and certainly not with timidity, and I hope the government will realize that there is a tremendous opportunity here, and that much can be done. Although there are limitations on the amount of money which the government can make available to any one sector of the economy, there is reason to believe that whatever is spent in this field will be returned to the coffers of the government many times over.

Mr. B. C. Thompson (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the tourist industry is a very important one in my riding, I am very pleased to support the resolution which has been proposed today by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken).

In doing so I will abide by your observations, sir, and a proper interpretation of the rules of the house, and not speak at any length on the many beauties of my riding and the many attractions which are offered to tourists and travellers. However, I should like to say in passing without covering all my riding that the areas bordering the Trent canal, Presqu'ile provincial park and the district around Rice lake offer almost anything in the way of a tourist attraction that can be asked for by any vacationer.

The resolution which has been proposed asks for government assistance to tourist operators by way of loans for capital improvement, and I feel sure that any hon. member who has a segment of the tourist industry in his riding will have been made aware of the difficulties of tourist operators in obtaining loans where necessary for improvement or an extension to their establishments. Long term loans, which seem to be the most necessary, are the ones most difficult to obtain. The banks seem to be reluctant to lend money to these people on a long term basis, although the fact that the industry has managed to survive for so long should be an argument in favour of loans being made available. I think a good case can be made out for the tourist industry in Canada and I should like to cover some of the points which I think support this contention.

The tourist industry in Canada has become the third largest industry. Probably not many of us realize that this is the situation, but over the years the industry has grown slowly and without much publicity until it has reached its present dimensions. The industry is national in scope. It extends from coast to coast, and every segment of the Canadian economy benefits from its achievements. Today, every one travels and takes vacations. In the past it was not possible for everyone to travel or take a vacation and this was perhaps a luxury of the well-to-do. In this day, however, vacations and travel are not restricted to one class of people but are taken advantage of by everyone.

Tourism is promoting trade for Canada and in assisting tourism we can help overcome the trade deficit which we have with the United States at the present time and which has been causing us so much concern.

I have in my hand a copy of a pamphlet published by the Canadian tourist association from which I should like to quote concerning Canada's present status in the tourist trade with the United States:

> Canada used to get the largest share of the money which United States residents spent visiting other countries, but that is no longer the case. Since 1953, Europe has attracted many more United States visitor dollars than Canada, even without counting the cost of transportation.
> Indeed, spending by United States travellers in all countries outside the United States has almost doubled since 1949. But during the same period, United States spending in Canada increased by only 23 per cent.
> Canada's overseas competitors for tourists have not only captured the increased business that we might have had, they have quadrupled their share of travel expenditures made by Canadians themselves.
> Spending by Canadians abroad has reached such a point that Canadians travelling in the United States and other countries took more than one-half billion dollars out of Canada, in 1957.

I believe a good case can be made out for promoting the Canadian tourist industry and therefore helping to overcome our adverse trade balance. Also, tourism is a means of promoting national unity, a means by which Canadians can get to know Canada better. I feel the Canadian people should be encouraged to travel across their country and to see the many beauty spots that can be found here at home.

Another feature of the tourist industry is that tourist income as an addition to the wealth of this country takes little if anything from our natural resources. The services which are provided by the tourist industry do not involve any costs for transportation. As I see it, the task of the tourist industry in Canada is twofold. In the first place, the industry wants to persuade Canadians to vacation in Canada and, in the second place, it wants to persuade others to vacation here. To my mind these objectives can be accomplished in two ways. The first is by advertising and the second is by providing enough of the best possible facilities for tourists.

In order to accomplish the latter objective capital is required for improvements and expansion. I am not going to go into any detail about the improvements that are required but certainly we all know that over the years tourist establishments have come to offer a great deal more by way of comfort and convenience than they did, let us say, 20 or 30 years ago. Providing this capital for improvements is an area in which the government can assist to promote the tourist industry of Canada.

Most of the governments at all levels in Canada at the present time are spending a great deal of money in advertising and attracting tourists to our country. It seems to me that money could be made to do even more than it does now by ensuring that no one in this country who is desirous of improving his establishment is unable to do so because of a lack of a source from which to borrow funds. If we place anyone who is desirous of improving his establishment in a position to borrow funds, in that way we are spending good money after good money.

In other countries assistance is given to tourist establishments. In the United States, for instance, under the small business administration provisions a hotel or resort operator can borrow up to $250,000 for renovating or refurnishing for a ten-year term at an interest rate of 5 or 6 per cent depending on the particular application. The United States has also made money available through the export-import bank for the developing of hotels and accommodation in foreign countries. Other countries including Belgium, Ireland, Norway, Great Britain and Switzerland give assistance to their tourist operators by way of various plans. The economic progress of a country is measured by the impression that is made on the visitors to that country. In my view that impression is made in the places where the visitors stay when they are visiting the country. I am sure we all want to give a good impression of Canada to those who visit this country so they will return with their friends and have the faith in Canada we want them to have.

Having attempted to make out a case for the tourist industry and for the provision of loans to that industry by the government, let us consider just how this assistance might be given. In the first place it could be given by way of a government guaranteed loan similar to those available under the National Housing Act. Secondly, it could be given under the industrial development bank. The industrial development bank which was established in 1944 makes available loans to industrial enterprises. The preamble of the act which incorporated the industrial development bank reads as follows:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish an industrial development bank to promote the economic welfare of Canada by increasing the effectiveness of monetary action through ensuring the availability of credit to industrial enterprises which may reasonably be expected to prove successful if a high level of national income and employment is maintained, by supplementing the activities of other lenders and by providing capital assistance to industry with particular consideration to the financing problems of small enterprises—

Tourist operators do not come within the ambit or scope of this act at the present time but it seems to me that if the spirit and wording of this preamble are to be carried to their logical conclusion tourist operators could well be included within the ambit of this legislation. The interpretation section of the act defines industrial enterprise as follows:

> 2 (d) "industrial enterprise" means a business in which the manufacture, processing or refrigeration of goods, wares and merchandise or the building, alteration or repair of ships or vessels or the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on;—

That was the definition in 1944. In 1956 the definition was extended to take in even more business enterprises. I believe that this statute could be further extended to give some form of loan to our tourist industry and tourist operators. I hope the day is forthcoming when there will be set up in this country a small business agency in government to provide small business liaison with government and advice on assistance measures as announced and outlined in the speech from the throne. Possibly something will be forthcoming when that takes place. I think the measure proposed by the resolution could not help but be of benefit to the country. Benefiting the tourist industry, it is bound to benefit the country as a whole. Therefore I am very pleased to offer my support for the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part in the debate and perhaps attack the problem from a little different angle. I think that the motion proposed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) is very good but in my view it does not go far enough. Because tourism is such a great industry in Canada and can become much greater I think we have to do perhaps a little more than the resolution proposes.

To me the industry has four basic components. First of all, there is the basic resource, your beauty, your recreational facility, your developed resource. Second, there is the problem of transportation because no beautiful spot is of any value whatsoever if people cannot get there to look at it. I feel that the third component of the industry is advertising because again if people do not know the beauty is there they are not likely to go to see it. The fourth and primary component is accommodation of the tourist once he gets here, which is what we have been discussing. I submit that any one of the four can have some effect upon the capital required, the type of capital required and the length of time it may be required. Therefore I feel it would be of advantage to have a look at these four basic requirements to see if we can come up with any answers after we do so.

The first one is the basic resource. We in Canada are richly endowed. We have magnificent scenery from coast to coast, some of which has been set aside by previous governments in the form of national parks. I should like to say something about them later. Certainly we have an abundance of beautiful scenery from British Columbia to Newfoundland, anywhere you want to go. We also have an abundance of natural recreational facilities for fishing, hunting and skiing in every province of Canada. Then there are our developed resources of which we have a great many in Canada. We are in the process of finishing one of the greatest, the St. Lawrence seaway, and we are just starting on another, the South Saskatchewan dam. These will be great tourist attractions in the years to come and must be taken into consideration in any discussion of the Canadian tourist industry.

Other developed resources which we have and need more of are those developed for recreation. We need more and better golf courses right across the country. We need more and better fish hatcheries so that we can stock some of our depleted lakes. Then we will have the actual resource there when we ask people to come and visit us. In nearly every community there is some resource and all that needs to be done is to advertise it and let other people know you have it. The people of Jasper-Edson feel we have been fairly well advertised by the presence of Jasper national park and we have a particular interest in the tourist industry.

The next natural component of the tourist industry which we should discuss is highways and means of transportation to our beauty spots and recreational facilities. I think highways are the most essential accommodation required for our tourists. We have to provide them with decent highways on which to travel. In that regard I should like to suggest that in my part of the country we are waiting anxiously for the completion of the Yellowhead highway. It will be the greatest boon to the tourist industry in northern Alberta since the inception of the province.

Looking at highways nationally, we are nearing the completion of our first trans-Canada highway. We in the west, especially in the northern part of the prairies, would like to see a start on a second trans-Canada highway. I think these highways are primarily for our tourist industry and not primarily for tourists from outside the country because we are tourists when we go to the next town to see what it is like. It is for this great mass of humanity on wheels that we have to have more and better national highways. That deals with the first two components of the tourist industry.

The third one is advertising. We have been spending a considerable amount of money on advertising but I do not feel we have been spending enough because any good business will tell you that there is a direct relationship between good advertising and the profits which accrue to the business. The more you can advertise the better the results will be. It has already been proven in the tourist industry that by a massive type of advertising the number of tourists going to any one particular area can be greatly increased.

Then we come to the question of accommodation, which is directly covered by the resolution. I support the resolution wholeheartedly, not on a socialistic basis, as the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has suggested, but rather from the point of view that the government, acting as a catalyst in the tourist industry, can stimulate it and make it grow.

Mr. Herridge: That is a nice explanation.

Mr. Drysdale: "Catalyst", not "capitalist".

[Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson).]

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I should like to mention some of the particular problems tourist resort operators have in the national parks because here we have an additional factor over and above those encountered by tourist resort operators outside the parks. I may say that this is a very important matter because according to the statistics 75 per cent of the close to two million people who visited the province of Alberta in 1956 entered one of the three national parks. Therefore the whole administration of our national parks, the facilities provided and the operation of tourist resorts in the parks become very important. The tourist operators in the parks are at a disadvantage for the reason that they do not hold title to their land. They have leases which may vary anywhere from 10 years to a maximum of 21 years, but certainly you cannot get a long term loan when you only have a 10-year lease. Therefore these people are at a particular disadvantage. Yet they have a special responsibility in providing accommodation in these show places of Canada.

At a later date I should like to see the government tackle the serious problem of national parks administration, particularly with regard to the matter of townsites within our national parks. I feel very strongly that we must face up to the fact that we have to have townsites in these parks and therefore it is high time that we had some policy with regard to them and set up some sort of local government so that the people could have a say in what is going on in their own towns. Right now they do not.

They are probably the only people in Canada who have no local self-government. The park is administered by a superintendent, and the superintendent refers most things to Ottawa. People who have their affairs administered by someone who is 2,000 miles away may become angry very quickly over the suggestions and decisions meted out by mail or telephone. This will be a difficult problem in the development of our parks as tourist resorts, and as these parks are used more and more by people, not only from outside Canada but inside Canada, as the result of improved highways.

In so far as Canadians are concerned, these parks were set aside for our use. We would like to see better highways and better accommodation provided. If I may, for a few moments, go back over these points, I would say that these assets of the tourist industry seem to fall into the four categories to which I have referred. I should like to make the suggestion at this time that in view of the importance of the tourist industry the government should give consideration to the establishment of a separate ministry to look after that industry. This ministry should have control over our national highways; over our national parks; over our Canadian travel bureau, and should have a branch which would look after not only the financing of these tourist resorts but also the education of operators in operation and maintenance according to certain standards. It would be, of course, through our national parks that the federal government would get jurisdiction in this regard. I feel such a proposal is worthy of study at the moment because, as I say, our national parks and our national highways are basically a part of this tourist industry. Of course, our Canadian travel bureau would fit into such a ministry, as well. I should like to repeat the suggestion to the government that they give consideration to the establisment of a new ministry, a ministry of tourism, which would look after our national parks, our national highways, and so on.

There is one other point I should like to make. I am in agreement with what the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Fleming) said to the effect that an attempt might be made to make some of our tourist accommodation available on a year-round basis rather than on a seasonal basis. Naturally capital will be needed for such a change because it will cost quite a bit to provide that accommodation. We, in Jasper, are particularly interested in that aspect of the proposal because we have some of the best undeveloped skiing country that there is. We feel that government leadership in this regard would be worth while. I am in agreement with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) with regard to the winter olympics in 1964. I have no quarrel with the suggestion, but I would suggest that the winter games be split between Banff and Jasper because by 1964 we hope to have our new road between Banff and Jasper open. I should like to urge upon the government once again that they give serious consideration to the immediate construction of the Yellowhead highway through Edmonton, Kamloops, to Vancouver.

Mr. J. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in congratulating the mover of this resolution requesting the government to consider the opportunity of introducing legislation that would authorize loans to tourist resort operators.

I believe that the tourist resorts in Canada are very well kept, and provide at present for the comfort of travellers. But there is always room for improvement. In fact, we have noticed that Americans, this year in particular, are not as numerous as usual in our country. We can therefore well ask ourselves why.

I think that the chief reason is that, in the United States, many of the tourist resorts are superior to ours. Therefore, if we want American tourists to bring to Canada the cash necessary for the development of our tourist industry, it is important that we improve our resorts. It is also important to encourage Canadians of all provinces, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to visit their own country before going abroad.

It is always agreeable to travel when resorts offer at least a minimum of comfort. Unfortunately, we note that in several places, due to lack of capital, there is no modern accommodation. I think that a well-organized tourist industry would encourage Canadians to visit one another. This would promote national unity, much more than inflated speeches, especially those of the opposition.

There is no more positive way of learning and of getting to know one another than to travel. In this country we really need to know one another better. This country is huge and with the constant improvement in the road system, travel is getting easier all the time. It is possible to travel over considerable distances without a proportionate increase in costs. This means that if tourist facilities are improved, more and more Canadians will be encouraged to travel over greater distances, to visit their fellow-citizens who live far afield and to learn to know one another better.

We all know that the government has already loaned enormous sums to foreign countries. We have in fact lost several million dollars through those deals.

On the other hand if we look at the various steps taken by the government in order to lend money to Canadian farmers, as well as to Canadians in every walk of life, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, we will have noted in this connection most happy results indeed.

Why then should we not enact a measure designed to assist all those people who at the present time operate tourist establishments so as to make it possible for them to improve their business? I feel I may say that the returns will be assured and that we will have no regrets on that score. To obtain good results, we need only place our confidence in our fellow Canadians. The past has demonstrated that fact and the future depends, to some extent, on the past.

Up to this time there has been some friction between the various groups who make up this Canadian nation of ours. These difficulties are disappearing gradually. I could even add that for a year or so now they have hardly existed at all. We certainly have to agree and live in harmony throughout this country, and I think we now have here a bill that might establish such conditions.

I would feel remiss if I did not say a word about the province of Quebec, particularly after the bad publicity some people are gratuitously giving us. But if you consider the great number of tourists, American as well as Canadian, from the west and from the maritimes, who come and visit our province, you will easily realize that we can live on good terms with any Canadian from one end of the country to the other.

Therefore, it is obvious that our people in Quebec need a certain measure of encouragement in this field on the part of the national government to help improve their present position.

Vaudreuil-Soulanges, the riding I have the honour to represent is one of the most beautiful not only in the province of Quebec but in the whole of Canada. It is an ideal site for tourists. Thousands of them spend their holidays with us each year, more especially in order to visit a district dear to us, which unfortunately is doomed to disappear in the near future, that is to say the area of the Soulange canal. We need back there some industry to replace the one we are losing and the tourist industry would be well suited in this respect.

I therefore commend the mover of this motion. I also ask all my fellow members in this house to support the motion before us so we may soon benefit from its happy effects.

(Text):

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, at this hour of the evening, after practically a full day of debate on a question such as this, it is rather hard to make remarks that are not repetitious. However, I should like to take this opportunity to commend the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for introducing a resolution at this time to authorize the making of loans jointly with an approved lending institution to tourist resort operators for the purpose of constructing or making improvements to tourist accommodation.

I feel that this resolution is an extremely important one, first, because it has to do with an industry which, as so many hon. members today have indicated, ranks third in importance in bringing dollars into Canada. In fact, in that respect, I understand it ranks next to newsprint and wheat. Hence it is of great importance to the people of Canada and to our entire economy.

Second, I feel it is important because, in spite of the natural advantages we have in beautiful rivers and lakes, unexcelled bathing beaches, tremendous mountain ranges and an abundance of good hunting and fishing grounds, the combination of which make for natural tourist attractions all year round; in spite of all these things the tourist industry in Canada has not kept pace with the tourist industry in other countries.

A great many hon. members have extolled the beauty and the attractions to be found in their own ridings. Coming as I do from a riding in western Ontario, perhaps I do not have quite so many natural attractions of which to boast. However, in that connection, I should like to mention the work that has been done by the Grand river conservation commission in providing three lakes which today are attracting a tremendous number of tourists.

Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that it is rather hard to understand in looking back through the records of the last few years. Although the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has been spending a great deal of money in promoting this industry and expects to spend over $1.5 million in the coming year to advertise Canada through the media of newspapers, radio, television and magazines, it is hard to understand why there has been so little discussion in this house on this important industry. As I have indicated and as has been indicated by others, it ranks next to wheat in importance in bringing dollars into Canada. I do not want to belittle the position of our wheat industry but if half the time that has been taken up in this house in talking about wheat had been spent in talking about the tourist industry probably we would not be in the deficit position in that respect in which we are today.

There must be a reason why we are losing out in this industry, why more people are not coming to Canada and why more of our own people are travelling in other countries. I feel that this resolution gives us an opportunity to examine this entire question so that steps may be taken not only to attract tourists to Canada but to make their stay in Canada more pleasant and happy.

This resolution has to do with the provision of tourist accommodation. As the brief of the Canadian tourist association would indicate, some of our present tourist accommodation is many years old. The people who travel make comparisons; and if the cost is not as fair as it is elsewhere, the surroundings not as pleasant, the food not as tasty or not served in as bright and pleasant surroundings and if the accommodation lacks all the modern facilities for comfort and convenience, then in spite of our natural attractions the tourist may not return and will not be an advertising medium through which more people will be attracted to Canada.

As one of the briefs presented would indicate, it is of no use to advertise if we cannot handle the customers. It is of no use to build up our plant if we are not prepared to take adequate steps to keep those customers. There are many media through which the tourist's stay and travel in Canada can be made more pleasant. I sometimes feel that our railroads could do more in helping to hold and to increase this very important industry. Too often we find, as in my part of the country, the railroad facilities taking the tourist to the lovely summer resorts on the shores of lake Huron and Georgian bay are uncomfortable and inadequate. Too often we find on busy week ends, when more people are travelling to these resorts, some of the oldest coaches that were ever made are pressed into service, coaches with hard seats and with no modern air-conditioning facilities, and tourists are compelled to use these coaches at the end of a long and tiresome journey. Certainly these conditions do not improve public relations as far as the tourist industry is concerned. No doubt there are many people who, in spite of the beauty of these resorts and the relaxation to be found there, prefer to go some place else rather than take these arduous train trips.

In the same connection, may I say that I sometimes wonder whether our provincial governments in their road-building programs give proper consideration to the fact that considerable inconvenience is caused to the tourist during the summer vacation period, and the heavy tourist season, by broken-up roads and rough, dusty detours.

Today, as figures indicate, more and more of our people from Canada are travelling abroad rather than investigating and enjoying the wonderful natural beauty that we have in Canada. In travelling abroad they will compare the accommodation provided. Does ours compare favourably with what they will find abroad? Is it as convenient and is it as comfortable? Through this resolution ways and means will be provided so that this accommodation in Canada may be improved and as indicated by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Thompson) there are indications of what is being done in this connection by means of providing loans in the United States. Many countries in the world appreciate the importance of the tourist industry and Professor L. Dudley Stamp of the London University, London, England, has this to say in a very interesting little bulletin put out by the Canadian tourist association:

> Tourism is the most important industry today without any exception whatever. It employs more people and has a larger turn-over of money than any other.

I feel Canada should do something concrete to assist this industry. We are living in a high cost economy; we have money or we have found money for our home builders, our farmers and our industrialists through the medium of government loans and the same principle holds good in respect of the tourist industry where the cost of modern accommodation has gone up by leaps and bounds and it is impossible for the small operator to provide the requirements.

Finally, I would again like to commend the member who, through the medium of this resolution has brought this matter to the attention of the government and I sincerely hope it will receive the consideration it deserves.

Mr. W. G. Beech (York South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of this resolution I would like to say a word or two from the point of view of the travel agent. I do not think I will be called to order for speaking at great length about the tourist attractions of my riding because, although we have some buildings which might be worth seeing, we have not even a post office to show you, a fact which I have mentioned previously in this house. We do have, however, 120,000 people, each one of whom is a potential customer for the tourist operator, which should be of the greatest interest to those concerned.

Much has already been said about the importance of the tourist trade to our economy and if we are to correct the imbalance in this trade as it relates to that of other countries we will have to do everything possible to attract overseas tourists to Canada. To this end the operations of camp, motels, lodges, restaurants and all other establishments catering to the tourist industry must be equipped in order to provide the facilities obtainable in foreign countries. As it would benefit everyone I have no hesitation in supporting the making available of money at the going rate to enable these operators to equip their premises in a suitable manner. One of the immediate effects of lending such funds for this purpose would be that the lenders would be able to exercise some supervision over operations in order to safeguard their interests and the tourist business is a field in which we have been falling down despite the excellent work done by the Canadian tourist association and the various provincial travel departments.

The travel agent constantly receives complaints from his clients about food, facilities, rates and even lack of courtesy in some of our tourist resorts and, as he depends on repeat business for his livelihood, the travel agent is not likely to send clients to places where they will be dissatisfied. At one time a client of mine was telling me about the meal situation in some of our resorts and he made the remark that when you go into some of these places you never know whether you are going to get a burnt offering or a bloody sacrifice. In some cases this is truly indicative of what happens.

It is only recently that in Canada the value of the travel agent has been recognized in the promotion of the tourist trade but we still have a long way to go before the same benefits now accruing to foreign travel as a result of his services will be available to the Canadian travel industry. In Canada there are many tourist resorts which favourably compare with any in the world and many thousands of dollars are spent annually on advertising these resorts through various media. Yet there is very little if any encouragement given to the travel agent by way of information concerning facilities, rates, reservations or commissions. Most of such agents make no charge for their services and depend upon commissions paid by the resort and the carriers in order to operate their businesses. People are now becoming aware of this fact and are going to the travel agent for advice when they consider where to go for their holidays. Needless to say they are being advised to go to places which provide the most profit for their agent and, as pointed out by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck), the commissions paid by carriers for international travel are in a higher range than those paid for domestic travel. Even with respect to railways the European carriers pay commissions whereas no such commission on rail travel is paid in this country except in respect of the odd excursion, despite the fact that thousands of dollars are collected by the travel agents on behalf of the railways.

While there has been over the past few years a considerable increase in international travel there are still many thousands of our citizens who would prefer to spend their holidays in Canada. This is in some cases because these people have a "see Canada first" policy and in others because their means do not permit them to travel long distances, because their time is limited or because they prefer to spend their time at Canadian resorts. There are thousands who seek the advice of travel agents with respect to where they should spend their long week ends and there are many such places within easy reach which should be publicized and developed. No one can do this better than the travel agent if he is given the proper information with which to work. I can only speak with respect to the province of Ontario because that is the only province of which I have any knowledge, but the department of travel and publicity in Ontario issues periodical information concerning motels, lodges and resorts in various parts of the province. This is particularly valuable because many people have no idea where they should spend their holidays and it is very handy to be able to go to a travel agent and get this information.

Complaints have been received that commercial fishermen have been allowed to deplete the stocks of fish in areas which might better have been designated tourist areas and a very good example of this is in the Georgian bay area where millions of dollars have been lost in the tourist business because of the loss of the lake trout fishing. Much of this has been lost because of the depredations of the lamprey, but I think a great deal of it can be attributed to the fact that the commercial fishermen were allowed to work in there, and they certainly depleted those stocks. Another complaint is that in certain provinces the liquor laws are too stringent.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls mentioned the operators who used the United States flag as a come-on. There is another type of operator who has a big sign advertising gasoline for 39 cents a gallon. Underneath, in very much smaller type, is added the fraction "nine-tenths" so as to be scarcely visible until you reach the point where you have to buy gasoline. In my opinion this is a sharp practice. It does not enhance the prestige of the Canadian businessman, and all these things do not encourage tourists to return to our country.

The best advertisement we can get is a satisfied tourist who goes back and tells his friends what a fine time he had in Canada. Tourism should be developed in such a way as to encourage a repeat business. Since everyone benefits as the tourist trade prospers, it is the business of everyone to foster that development, including the operator for whose benefit this resolution is designed. I congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) on having introduced this resolution, and on the manner in which he presented it, and I trust the government will give it favourable consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, there is possibly no greater source of wealth for a country than its tourist industry. That is why municipal and provincial governments should encourage that industry, and should also encourage the citizens of this country to put money into the construction of motels, for instance, or other tourist facilities so as to ensure the future of the industry.

I congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for introducing this resolution, though I feel that it would have been just as simple to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) to bring in amendments to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act so as to make it possible for the corporation to make loans for construction of hotels and motels, thereby promoting the development of the tourist industry throughout this country.

To my mind it would also be in order to call a federal-provincial conference on the subject in order to bring all the provincial governments into contact and make it possible for them to exchange ideas so as to implement a uniform policy throughout Canada. Not only would this be more effective in also attracting American tourists but it would attract visitors from other countries.

It is a recognized fact that the national economy of France has been maintained through its tourist industry.

Other countries, all but devoid of natural resources, have developed the tourist trade to such an extent that they have managed to put their natural economy in balance by attracting tourists in various ways.

I would also like the government to continue to develop national historic sites here and there throughout this country. I might point out in this connection that in recent months the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) presided at the opening of Cartier-Brebeuf park in Quebec city thereby making the public aware of an important area of this country which up to now had remained unknown. This location has now become a nationally important site and is attracting tourists from one end of this country to the other.

I would also suggest to the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) to erect historic monuments here and there in order that the Canadians themselves may travel from coast to coast and visit those places which have witnessed the deeds of the greatest figures of our national history.

Several important events have taken place this year in our country. In fact, Quebec city is now commemorating the 350th anniversary of its foundation by Samuel de Champlain. British Columbia is commemorating its 100th anniversary. St. Boniface is celebrating the golden jubilee of its foundation. I am of the opinion that these events are bound to stimulate the influx of tourists, not to mention the fact that they will encourage Canadians themselves to visit their own country, while offering them the opportunity of better appreciating, understanding and knowing each other.

It is needless to remind you that the province of Quebec occupies perhaps the most important place from a tourist standpoint, in view of its particular character, history and monuments. Everybody admits that it has greatly developed its tourist industry.

The other provinces are also attaching growing importance to the tourist industry. That is why I believe that if, some day, the provinces should meet on a national level to discuss their tourist programs and exchange their views, this would contribute to stimulate the tourist industry, in other words it would be a service to our country.

Each year, Calgary has its stampede. Each year, in the Palais du Commerce, at Montreal, there is a national agricultural exhibition. Well, Mr. Speaker, the setting up of such organizations calls for much work and sacrifices on the part of those who devote themselves to such tasks. They thus contribute to enrich our country, while offering to tourists, American or others, the opportunity to visit Canada.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, I said that France had managed to balance her economy, thanks to the tourist industry. Well, we should pay particular attention to the tourist industry, because I am of the opinion that it is the most important in the country. Our country is young, yet of great historical interest, being the cradle of New France as well as of those people who came from abroad to found here a civilization.

I am sure that all right-thinking Canadians believe that governments, at every level, should invest more money to help private enterprise undertake the necessary construction works and development of facilities required by the tourist industry across the country, in order that foreigners coming to visit our country may be well accommodated and well fed, so that our Canadian tourist industry can maintain its reputation.

When, for instance, Canadians or Americans go to France, they say: "We are happy to go to Paris because there we eat well and we see some lovely landmarks". That, to my mind, is why the government must be encouraged to invest more capital in this great natural resource, the tourist industry.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for introducing his resolution and I also would suggest, if possible, that provincial governments meet at least once a year at the national level, to study their various points of view on the tourist industry, which I think is the most important in our country.

I shall conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by saying that after the current session, hon. members from all parts of our country should start giving an example and visit Canada. Those from the west, for instance, could exchange visits with their representatives of central Canada and while giving leadership in this respect they would be able to know and to appreciate each other better.

I would encourage every hon. member of this house and all Canadians to visit my riding which is one of the richest from a geographic, economic and touristic point of view.

Indeed, you will find in my county the town of St. Lin, where our great autonomist, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was born, who would today sit in the ranks of the Conservative party if he were still living.

There is also the College of l'Assomption, where Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a pupil and, of course also the town of Joliette, on the banks of the Assomption river, which was founded by the Sieur Barthelemy de Joliette.

That is, Mr. Speaker, a very brief list of the touristic attractions in my riding.

There is also another place, the old manor of Mrs. McConville, where the late Lord Bennett spent a few days every year. These are resorts which deserve being known.

I therefore again urge all hon. members, as well as all Canadian citizens, to visit the riding of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm which is really a jewel from a tourist's point of view.

We should always keep in mind that the tourist industry is one of the most important industries of our country. Every citizen, whoever he may be, has the civic responsibility to try and make his small community, his home town, his own Canadian country, more attractive.

I therefore want to commend the hon. member who moved the resolution and I am asking the government, whether municipal, provincial or federal, to consider whether it would be opportune to subsidize that kind of private enterprise, so as to give to our municipalities, our provinces and our country as a whole, incomparable attraction which would draw large numbers of tourists to our country where they would spend the amount of dollars necessary to our economy.

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, although the riding of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, and not St. Hyacinthe Baghdad, as it has once been called in this house, is not particularly known as a riding where the tourist industry is of prime importance, everyone would do well to visit it and specially the city of St. Hyacinthe which is rightly called St. Hyacinthe the fair one.

Mr. Speaker, even if this means repeating something that has already been said, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for his fine contribution in submitting this resolution to the house. His speech was clear, concise and intelligent, as well as realistic. This resolution deserves the serious consideration of all members of the house. I therefore ask hon. members, no matter where they sit in this house, to give full consideration to his resolution.

Everyone is aware of the fact that the tourist industry brings us each year millions of dollars. A large number of small villages which, for the rest of the year, are barely known, become real cities during the tourist season owing to the large number of tourists coming in. It follows, of course, that trade expands considerably in such communities and that farmers as well as tradesmen take advantage of it. Everybody knows, without a doubt, that the province of Quebec offers exceptional attractions for tourists. There is the old Quebec inside Quebec city, which is of particular interest to the tourist. I may say that each year thousands of American tourists go there for a visit.

We have also, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) when he was speaking about his own riding, lakes by the thousands where fish is plentiful, where boating is practised on a large scale, and where the scenery is perhaps the main attraction for the tourists.

I therefore wish that this matter of tourist industry be seriously considered by the federal, provincial and municipal governments; I hope they will co-operate closely in order to develop this industry which brings us each year large sums of money.

It has become a common practice in the industry to grant workers and labourers longer and longer holidays, which allows them to put their spare time to good use, by improving their family's general knowledge through visits to these nationally important sites in their province or in the rest of the country.

It is therefore highly important to recognize the value of that industry, which is becoming one of the leading industries in this country, and to provide it with the assistance needed for its development.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the resolution put forward by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) would contribute to the development of this country. So, while reiterating once more what I have just said, I would ask all hon. members to support the proposal, as I intend doing myself.

(Text):

Mr. H. C. McQuillan (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I see I have only time to say a very few words.

Some hon. Members: Question. Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it is perhaps too late for the hon. member to commence.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the business of the house having already been announced for tomorrow, I wonder if the house leader would indicate what the business will be on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot do that. It will depend on what progress we make tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CANADAIR COMPANY, ST. LAURENT, QUE.—CONTRACTS

Question No. 124—Mr. Rouleau:

1. Have any contracts been awarded to Canadair company, of St. Laurent, Quebec, since August 10, 1953?

2. If so, how many, what is the nature of each contract and what was the amount of each such contract?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1. Yes.

2. (a) The Department of Defence Production has awarded 182 contracts, $10,000 or more, having a total value of $340,060,869.48, from August 10, 1953, to June 30, 1958. The nature and value of each contract are shown on the attached lists.

(b) The Department of Defence Production has awarded 375 contracts, under $10,000, having a total value of $503,493.05, from August 10, 1953, to June 10, 1957; and 91 contracts, under $10,000, having a total value of $107,875.46, from June 11, 1957, to June 30, 1958.

Unclassified Contracts for $10,000 or more Awarded to Canadair Limited, St. Laurent, P.Q., by the Department of Defence Production from August 10, 1953, to June 30, 1958.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 29, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Sixth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McCleave.

TRADE

UNITED KINGDOM—ABOLITION OF RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS OF INDUSTRIAL CHEMICALS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the house that the United Kingdom government has announced today its decision to abolish restrictions on imports of industrial chemicals from Canada and other dollar countries. This major new measure of relaxation is to take effect on August 18. These discriminatory restrictions have been an impediment to the development of our trade in this field for many years.

With only a few exceptions, all Canadian chemicals and allied products of a kind used industrially will now be completely free of import controls in the United Kingdom. They include a number of important chemical products with respect to which we have been seeking improved access to the United Kingdom market.

Total Canadian exports of industrial chemicals in this field amounted in 1957 to some $130 million, of which about 10 per cent went to the United Kingdom. With the removal of restrictions our producers and exporters will be in a position to compete freely in the United Kingdom without quantitative limitation, and we are hopeful that this may lead to a substantial increase in our chemical exports to Britain.

APPLES—NEW QUOTA ANNOUNCED BY UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should also like to take this opportunity to refer to the new quota arrangements announced recently by the United Kingdom for fresh apples, which should provide increased opportunities for sales of Canadian apples. The new apple quota which has been established on a weight basis amalgamates and replaces the former separate quotas for western Europe and certain other countries, and North America. The new combined quota provides for total imports during the year beginning July 1, 1958, of 1,500,000 long hundredweights of which 300,000 long hundredweights may be imported in the period July to December, 1958, and 1,200,000 long hundredweights in the period January to June, 1959.

I am sure we all welcome this response by the United Kingdom government to the representations we have been making to them. These new measures are a major contribution by the United Kingdom toward providing new opportunities for expanding trade between our two countries.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, having reference directly to the information just given us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, would he say whether or not these were unilateral concessions on the part of Great Britain? If not, what concessions did Canada give in return?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we have been carrying on discussions with the United Kingdom for a considerable length of time with regard to these two matters to which I have now drawn attention. The one with regard to chemicals obviously will apply throughout the world, because they are clearing the import controls in the United Kingdom. The apple quota again is open to all, and not solely to Canada.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Unfortunately I was unavoidably detained for a few minutes, and I did not hear the minister's statement on the apple quota allocated to the North American continent. But in any event I want to ask him this question.

As, according to newspaper reports, the meeting of the international apple association commenced in Montreal yesterday, and in view of the fact that a common marketing plan for apples is being considered, would the minister inform the house if the appropriate officials of his department will be in attendance at this meeting?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this question, of which the hon. member gave me notice, was quite properly addressed to the Minister of Agriculture for whom I am substituting on this occasion.

The answer is that the meeting in question is being held by representatives of the apple industries of Canada and the United States. An officer of the Department of Agriculture is attending as an observer to obtain whatever information is available as to apple crop and market prospects, but he will not participate in decisions or recommendations, which are purely those of the industry representatives.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED ARRANGEMENTS FOR SHIPMENT OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I regret that I was only able to give him notice a few moments before the opening of this sitting, so he might wish to treat the question as notice. My question is based on a press dispatch from Washington to the effect that Canada has presented for approval in Washington a number of export cases for shipment of strategic materials including sulphite pulp to communist countries. Can the minister tell us how many cases have been presented for approval, what products they cover and whether or not any approvals have been granted?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to examine this press dispatch, but I will have an answer for the hon. member tomorrow.

REPORTED REDUCTION BY U.K. IN PROHIBITED EXPORTS TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. Has his attention been called to a report in the press today to the effect that by unilateral action the government of Great Britain has reduced the list of goods prohibited for export to China, and does the Canadian government propose to take the same kind of action?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that is another press report I have not seen, but I shall look into it and endeavour to have an answer for the hon. member tomorrow.

[Mr. Churchill.]

REPORTED PROPOSAL TO ABOLISH TARIFFS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of an U.P.I. dispatch dated Washington, wherein it states that Senator Neuberger today proposed abolishing all tariffs between the United States and Canada on a five-year trial basis. I am wondering if the government has given any consideration at all to the advantages or disadvantages of a free trade area between Canada and the United States, and whether any negotiations are taking place at this time revolving around this very important proposal put forward by Senator Neuberger?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the full text of Senator Neuberger's statement; therefore my answer to the hon. member is that no action is being taken by the government at the present time.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could inform the house whether he or his department have considered in any way the implications of a free trade area between Canada and the United States? I would have thought some study would be going on in the department, even if merely on a routine basis.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Trade and Commerce is very active at all times in its efforts—and they have been successful—to stimulate trade between Canada and other countries. The particular subject mentioned by the hon. member and which has been mentioned by Senator Neuberger is not under study at the moment.

FISHERIES

SALTED COD—STATEMENT ON 1958 PRODUCTION AND MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, over the past several weeks a number of questions have been raised in this house concerning the 1958 production and marketing of salted cod. This product is of major significance to the economy and the fishermen of Newfoundland, Quebec and the maritime provinces.

Much of the concern expressed by members of this house and by all branches of the industry arose from reports that from 1,500 to 2,000 additional fishermen would be operating in Newfoundland this year. There was also fear that above average stocks of 1957 fish would be carried over into the new marketing year.

The whole question was reviewed by the fisheries prices support board here in Ottawa on July 22 and July 23. The board found that considerable improvement had occurred in the statistical position from a marketing point of view. It is now estimated that the 1958 production, even under most favourable conditions for the balance of the fishing season, will not exceed that of 1957. Furthermore, stocks have been reduced to normal levels for this time of year.

In view of these developments and bearing in mind that production in most competing countries is not yet known, the board decided to adjourn its meeting and will meet again early in September in Halifax and St. John's. At that time the board should be in a position to make a recommendation to the government based on more complete facts.

While prices to fishermen have not yet been set for the 1958 production, the board feels that in view of the reduced supply position commercial market prices will be established at much better levels than were previously anticipated. I have asked the board to watch the situation very carefully, and I can assure the fishermen that their interests will be constantly borne in mind.

In so far as the marketing aspect of the problem is concerned, the position is much improved over what it was a few weeks ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government is giving consideration to recognition of the new government of Iraq.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there is no mutual diplomatic representation between our country and Iraq, this is not a matter of urgent concern to Canada, but I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that the matter is under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs could tell the house what Canada's attitude has been toward seating a delegate to the United Nations from the new government of Iraq? Does the minister feel that a voice from the new government should be heard at the United Nations in the interests of clarifying the position taken by the new government with regard to the international crisis in the Middle East?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): That matter is under consideration now in New York by the delegates to the security council, and I give the same answer I gave before: the attitude of Canada in this respect is under consideration.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—STATEMENT ON STEPS TAKEN TO INCREASE RESOURCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to amplify an answer I gave to a question addressed to me by the Leader of the Opposition on Saturday last. The question asked was as follows:

> In view of the Prime Minister's statement last night calling for an increase of $3 billion in the resources of the international monetary fund and a very large increase in the lending capacity of the international bank, can the minister tell us whether the Canadian delegation to the economic and social council of the United Nations, which is currently meeting at Geneva, has been instructed to pursue these important objectives and, if so, with what result?

The interim answer which I gave on Saturday last was in part as follows:

> I am not clear that this is a matter for representation to the economic and social council. We are represented on the boards of the international bank and the monetary fund.

To this answer I would like to add the following statement. The annual reports of the monetary fund and of the world bank are considered by the economic and social council, as the hon. member knows. However, this item was on the agenda of the council at its 25th session in New York last spring, not at the current session. Normally, the affairs of these two bodies are not studied at the summer session, the meeting now under way in Geneva. In any event the membership of the economic and social council is such that no very useful purpose would be served by seeking to have these matters discussed in that forum.

It will, I think, be readily appreciated that the ideas put forward by the Prime Minister could more appropriately be explored in the first instance within the organizations involved, that is to say the international monetary fund and the international bank.

Canada is represented on the boards of those two organizations. Those meetings will be held in New Delhi beginning October 6.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is it, then, the intention of the government to press this very important initiative which the Prime Minister announced the other night at the next meeting of the boards of the two organizations in question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Instructions have not yet been formulated for the representatives of Canada at the meeting in New Delhi on October 6.

PENSIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance concerning certain increases to superannuated civil servants and others, I should like to ask if similar action will be taken with regard to the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that matter is under consideration, but no immediate action is planned.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

SUGAR—REPORT ON INDUSTRY IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. On Wednesday last I inquired as to the action being taken with respect to the possible prosecution of a sugar company in western Canada as the result of a report of the restrictive trade practices commission; and because my question was without notice the minister's answer at that time was somewhat incomplete. I wonder if he could complete his answer now?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for the delay in completing my answer, and I am now able to report that instructions were given to Mr. F. O. Meighen, Q.C., of Brandon, Manitoba, on July 10, and that he has accepted those instructions. His terms of reference were to proceed with a prosecution and an application for an order dissolving the merger, unless he should come to the conclusion, in the course of preparing for trial, that the evidence is not sufficient.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REPORTED SALE OF VESSELS TO PANAMANIAN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he confirm or deny the report that the eight ships of the Canadian National Steamships have been sold to a Panamanian company, and whether or not two of his officers were in Panama to arrange for the transfer of the flag?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have no knowledge of any such sale, or any information about my officers being in Panama for such a purpose.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CHARLES LYNCH—APPEARANCES ON TELEVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue in his role as spokesman in the house for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The question relates to a story which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on July 26 by Mr. Charles Lynch regarding question No. 92 on the order paper. Can the minister inform the house whether there are grounds for the implication contained in that story, to the effect that the writer has had fewer appearances on C.B.C. television as a result of the placing of this question on the order paper?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any definite answer to that question. I received no notice of the hon. gentleman's intention to raise it. I may say, however, I am quite sure that the C.B.C., being an independent crown corporation, is not motivated in any way by questions which may be asked in the House of Commons, and I am convinced that Mr. Lynch has not been prejudiced because of any question which has been asked. I must say, however, having read the story in the Citizen the other day, that I wondered if I should not allow the question to reach No. 1 on the order paper in order to give full recognition to what I assumed was the facetious article written by Mr. Lynch the other day.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL TO $6 MILLION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-38, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Capital stock.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on clause 1, I wonder whether the minister would care to answer a question that has been discussed among farm organizations from time to time. As the minister knows, I was in Montreal last week and did not have a chance to attend meetings of the committee at which this question may or may not have been asked during the course of its deliberations.

There has been a feeling in farm organizations that the Canadian Farm Loan Act might lend itself to the administration of the Department of Agriculture perhaps more readily than it does to that of the Department of Finance. There are a great many people who feel that the knowledge of the agricultural industry which is possessed by persons attached to the Department of Agriculture would make the operation of this act more effective than under the Department of Finance, where, I am sure the minister will agree, there are not nearly as many people with a thorough knowledge of agriculture as there would be in the Department of Agriculture.

On an offhand basis it would seem to me a sensible suggestion. I do not wish the minister to take this as any criticism either of himself or of his department, but the minister well knows there are many instances when at times it is just a debatable point whether a particular act can be better administered by one department as compared with another. I wonder whether there is any intention to transfer this act to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, when I spoke in the house at the resolution stage on July 16 I had this to say, which is to be found at page 2297 of Hansard:

> The government is keenly aware of the importance of agricultural credit and finance for the prosperity of our farming community. There are on the statute books three important acts which deal with the capital need of farmers, namely the Canadian Farm Loan Act; the Farm Improvement Loans Act which deals with intermediate credit, particularly for financing the purchase of farm equipment; and the Veterans' Land Act administered by my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs. At the present time the government is engaged in a comprehensive study and review of all three acts with a view to determining where enlargement of scope, expansion of function or improvement in the methods of operation may be required.

Now, questions as to administration will naturally be included within the scope of questions that are under consideration, but I should like to state that I think it can be said that under the Department of Finance—I am speaking only for the last year; I make no comment as to previous times—the Canadian farm loan board has given very sympathetic administration to the provisions of this act. But the question my hon. friend raises is obviously for consideration in the wider context of the three measures I referred to. Two are administered under the Department of Finance at the present time and the other under the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister would bring us up to date on the position the studies are now at regarding the plan of supervising agricultural credit, which relates to three avenues of credit. I am wondering whether any intensive study is being made toward providing supervised farm credit more in keeping with the activities of the Veterans' Land Act and bringing this act at a later date into such a plan.

The minister has said there has been a more lenient approach to farm credit to his knowledge as minister in charge of the present Canadian farm loan board. This is undoubtedly correct, but I do think the change took place following meetings of the banking and commerce committee back in 1956, and that this more lenient approach, for lack of a better term, was something that was started then. It has been accelerated in the meantime, and has come to the position now where the board looks more generously upon applications, so far as approval is concerned, than they did in the past. I would appreciate from the minister any information he can give on the progress of studies leading toward a supervised system of agricultural credit, perhaps along the lines of the well established credit system in the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think any comment on my part in connection with that subject would be premature now. Suffice it to say that the whole subject of farm credit is under review, and that review will likely continue for some time yet.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether or not some conclusion is expected within the next few months, and whether the government is going to move in this general field of farm credit now or at the next session? The minister knows his party has made a particular point of the importance of agricultural credit, and I think we would be all interested in learning whether the studies will have reached a point of offering the house certain recommendations for action at an early date?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is fully expected that the review will be completed before the next session.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words in connection with this bill and express two opinions: first that we are in favour of this legislation and, secondly, that it is not quite the farm credit act wanted by the people of this country. Amendment of our farm legislation is indeed necessary to meet the requirements of farmers, and particularly young people who want to settle on their own but have little or no capital to do so.

We realize that very many farmers' sons, really cut out for this work, are only waiting for a chance to set up a profitable farming business. Today they lack this opportunity, and that is why they quit the farm and seek jobs in the cities, where they sometimes swell the ranks of the unemployed.

Another group of people who need more capital are the farmers whose borrowing power is limited. They need more funds to improve their farming methods, to buy more equipment and to produce more efficiently.

All farm organizations in Canada have agreed to petition the government for improved, more up-to-date legislation. Several hon. members have made similar claims in the house. The government recognized those needs and, before the election, made various promises; however it seems that in the meantime, hon. ministers have lost their memory. Indeed, we just need to recall statements by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), more particularly to the effect that our farm credit legislation should be amended. He said among other things that this legislation should be modified in order to improve the farmer's position by allowing him to buy new land and to have better machinery. Moreover, he repeated those statements in every part of this country.

At a recent meeting of the agricultural committee, government members put forward a number of very well taken points, stating that the basis for farm appraisals was not generous enough and that the maximum amount of loans allowed was not sufficiently high as yet. I hope that these same hon. members will have the courage to rise today and to repeat those statements.

In the province of Quebec we look to an improvement in loan conditions, so that those farmers who do not pay homage to the Union Nationale may be allowed to borrow—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boulanger: We know, Mr. Chairman, that the province of Quebec has an extremely generous farm credit act; unfortunately, it is of benefit only to people dominated by political organizations—

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Boulanger: At the risk of shocking certain hon. members I must say, in the light of what I have learned since I have been sitting in this house, that certain small farmers of my constituency were unable to obtain loans under provincial legislation because they refuse to kowtow to members of the Union Nationale.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Boulanger: Regulations governing the granting of loans in the province of Quebec are not really administered by the provincial farm credit board but by parish politicians and members of the Union Nationale.

As at December 31, 1956, the province of Quebec had made 51,204 loans—

The Chairman: Order! I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he will admit that his remarks have nothing to do with the legislation under discussion. I would therefore ask him to be so kind as to keep to the provisions of the bill now before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I draw your attention to the fact that when a bill is being considered, the debate on section one is of general interest, and the fact that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) is making general remarks, although of a political nature, is, in my estimation within the scope of the debate on this bill. I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to kindly consider that aspect of the matter.

The Chairman: I respect the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), whose remarks are fairly well taken. However, I would ask the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska to stick as much as possible to the terms of the bill now under study, without entering into any details of provincial politics.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I was just about to say that on December 31, 1956, under the provincial farm loan program, 51,204 loans, totalling 143 million dollars, have been granted. I am inclined to believe that those loans were made to help the farmers.

My reason for making those remarks is to let farmers know, who cannot now secure a loan from the province of Quebec, that they can do so under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, while abiding by the rules governing that legislation.

At this point, I should like to congratulate the employees of the Canadian Farm Loan Board whose impartial decisions have made it possible for all Canadians to benefit from this act.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), to the importance of introducing, as soon as possible, a further amendment to that act. I shall have the opportunity of outlining the views of the Liberal party and my own, when a certain resolution is introduced, which will be shortly, I hope.

(Text):

Mr. Gour: Mr. Chairman, I think I will speak in English in order to be better understood. I am much in favour of this resolution. I should like the amount to be more, because $120 million is not so much when it is a matter of lending money to all the farmers of this country.

There is one thing I am glad to note, namely that something may be done for the farmers who were promised so much during the 1957 campaign and the 1958 campaign. I am glad to find that something will be done before two years have passed. Up to now nothing has been done, except a little bit here and a little bit there that does not mean anything. I hope the loans under this act will be handled in somewhat the same way as loans are handled for housing purposes. As to the appraisers, they are very good men.

I am not in a position to comment on what was said by my colleague from Quebec. There are no politics in Ontario on the question of farm loans. The Ontario government has done enough bad things without that. Therefore we must give them credit. The Ontario government do not engage in politics in any way in that respect except that when they make a loan to the young people, they take only the cream of the young. Maybe a little bit of politics enters into the matter, but not enough to do any harm.

What we need in this country is a provision for farm loans up to at least 90 per cent of the appraised value. As the situation is at present in Ontario and part of Quebec —and I think the same is true to some extent in all parts of Canada—the appraiser appraises the buildings at nothing. He fixes the value at $8,000, and that is only on the house. If it were in a small village like my own or in a place like Eastview near Ottawa, that building would be worth $10,000, but it is on a farm and so the valuation is less. As for the big barn and the other buildings, they do not allow much; they just put on a small valuation.

Most of the appraisals are made by good, sound appraisers. But when the appraised value is only $8,000, and loans will be made up to only 60 per cent of the appraised value, therefore you could get a loan on 100 acres of $5,000 to $6,000. They cannot do anything with that when consideration is given to the cost of farm machinery and equipment, which is high. A good Liberal government introduced legislation providing loans for the purchase of machines and the repairs of buildings, but the Conservative government has done nothing up to now. The situation is worse now than it was before.

I shall be happy to see this bill passed as quickly as possible. I hope that my good friend the Minister of Agriculture will have a free hand to lend money through the Minister of Finance and through the cabinet, because right now the people need more credit than they ever needed it before. Machinery and things of that sort are very expensive.

As to the rate of interest it should not be a cent more than 4 per cent. If you want to help the farmer that is the only way to do it. Provision should also be made for loans up to at least 90 per cent of the first $10,000 of valuation. The rate of interest should be 4 per cent and repayment should be spread over 30 years, with the possibility of repaying at any time without notice. I will give full credit to the experts of the government, because we have good men in the federal Department of Agriculture, first class men, and we also have good men in the department of agriculture of Ontario. I am speaking for Ontario right now. We have good and clever people who carry on to the best of their ability.

What we need is the same thing we have for our veterans under the Veterans' Land Act. We need experts to go out to these farmers and tell them gently and quietly how best to carry on. Give a chance to these farmers to produce more. No doubt they will not say that because some are afraid of the vote, but for 50 per cent of the farmers I know, if they had these experts from the federal government and the provincial government they could be educated, if I may use that word. In French I will use another...

(Translation):

—helping those people to improve their farming methods, to take better care of their livestock, they would, I believe, increase their income by 50 to 100 per cent.

(Text):

I will not delay the bill. I should be more pleased if it provided for more, because after all we lend money to everybody. If there is a good place to lend money it is to those on the farm. If we do not keep our farmers prosperous the country will not be prosperous, and the government will go more deeply into debt. The more deeply the government goes into debt the greater the interest thereon and the less prosperity there will be. The thing to do is to help our farmers. By helping them prosperity will be maintained to some extent, even under a Tory government.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a weakness that appears to exist, not so much in the Canadian Farm Loan Act itself as in the interpretation or administration of the act in the field at the level where an applicant first makes his application for a loan.

On the basis of complaints that have arisen among the farm organizations in my riding it would appear that those who first receive these applications in the department tend to find existing debt a deterrent to a loan, without sufficiently taking into account the ability of the farmer applicant to repay principal and interest. It would appear that the first consideration in dealing with an application would be ability to repay, yet on the basis of the experience of people at least in my own riding there is a hesitation to consider an application where debt exists and a tendency not to give sufficient consideration to ability to repay.

In many cases a farmer seeks a loan for the purpose of consolidating debts, to transfer or exchange short-term debt for long-term debt at a rate of interest and over a period of time more within his capability of paying. But so long as that debt exists apparently there is a hesitation on the part of the officials in the field to consider a loan. I know of cases where farmers have been told that when they have cleaned up existing debt the farm loan board will consider their application; yet if they were in a position to clean up existing debt there would be no necessity for an application in the first place.

Consequently I feel that possibly the intention of the act is not being fulfilled if officials do not give first consideration to ability to repay and only in that regard consider an application, and not permit themselves to be put off consideration by the fact that debt exists. Many farmers over a period of time, particularly in recent years, have resorted to short-term borrowing at fairly high interest rates. The act provides them with the means of changing, but many of those who have sought to make the change have found that simply because of interpretation they have been unable to do so.

If that aspect of the administration of this act were given consideration, to see whether there is justification for perhaps a direction to officials to consider the aspect of repayment rather than the aspect of debt, a very great service may be done to many farmers without any change whatever in existing legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I did not speak on this bill on second reading. This was because I realized that it was going to committee, though to a committee of which I was not a member, and I was very pleased to hear the Minister of Finance say when he was explaining the bill that he attributed some of the accelerated lending and some of the present improved conditions to the very careful study which was given to this whole matter in 1956 by the banking and commerce committee.

Both the minister and I of course attended that committee. At the present time—and I do not quarrel with this—the discussion of the bill was before the agriculture and colonization committee, and it was not until noon that the second printed report of that committee became available to members. This makes it very difficult to keep up with the proceedings, but I did read with interest the first report of the committee, and I must say I was a little surprised that some of the members of the committee, who while they were on this side of the house had complained that there were a lot of inadequacies in the farm loan act, did not successfully recommend changes in the bill presently before us. I realize, however, that members were given some assurance that the general subject of agricultural credit is being carefully reviewed by the government.

I would like to point out, however, in view of the fact that such statements were made as long as a year ago, that this is an urgent problem and one which should be dealt with. I rather thought there would be more in the bill than simply a change of capitalization for the purpose of increasing the possible amount of borrowing from the government. I share the views of those who have spoken in that it is a fine thing to see additional credit facilities being developed, but I am sure the Minister of Finance himself would be the first to say that the actual extent of the rate of increase, either in the amount of new lending or the amount of the average loan, has been about the same between 1956 to 1957 and from 1957 to 1958. Those two years seem to be very comparable in regard to the percentage of increase over the previous year on both those counts, that is to say either the average amount of the loan or the total amount lent by the board.

We had some discussion about the possible rate of interest in the future when we were, I believe, at the resolution stage. The act says that the interest rate is not fixed under the act itself but is an interest rate which in the opinion of the board is sufficient to provide for the interest payable by the board to the minister's department plus the expenses of the board.

I noted that while one or two members of the committee advocated, as was also done in 1956, that this form of lending should be conducted at an interest rate which would involve a substantial subsidy from the taxpayers of the country, the Minister of Finance pointed out, as did the chairman of the board, that a very slight reduction in the present interest rate of 5 per cent would completely wipe out the surplus on the operations of the board. I believe the chairman of the board said that one-tenth of one per cent would be about the equivalent of the surplus for last year on the board's operations.

I am not going to criticize unduly the minister or anyone else but, while I was not a member of the committee, it did seem to me as I was reading the material we all receive that it was rather unfortunate that the actual printed report of the board was available or tabled in the house only a day or two after the committee on agriculture and colonization had concluded its sittings. I am not for one moment suggesting that the committee was denied any information, but I do suggest to the minister something to which I am sure he will give careful study, and that is that if the actual report is just about ready it would be so much more helpful if it could be made available to the house when legislation is in the resolution stage or on second reading, because of course there are a great number of members of the house who are not members of the committee which is going into the details of such matters, and I am sure that at this stage of the session it is the desire of all of us not to be unduly repetitious.

I notice that the present rate of administrative costs is at 1.22 per cent in relation to the total amount of loans. One can see that this does not give the board a great deal of margin over the cost of interest that seemingly now has to be paid by the government for its own borrowings. We know that on the conversion loan the government is prepared to pay on a 25-year term as much as 4½ per cent. The board, of course, gets its funds only from the government, and I presume the government makes available to the board funds either at the rate at which the government itself can borrow or something very close to that figure. I was wondering if the minister could indicate to the committee the rate of interest on the last borrowing from the government by the board, and the term of such borrowing.

We can immediately see that if it is costing the government 4½ per cent for a loan over a period of 25 years, and if it is costing the board 1.22 per cent of the amount it loans to others in respect of administration costs, there is nothing there to give us much confidence that the present 5 per cent interest rate will be maintained unless the policies of the board are different from those outlined in the statute —and I imagine they cannot be different from what is there outlined—or the remarks made by the minister himself in committee warning against something in the nature of a subsidy.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak on this amendment to the farm loan act, and it is not my intention to cover what was said by the Minister of Finance when he introduced the amendment. I would, however, like to express my satisfaction and that of the people I have the honour to represent with respect to this amendment to the act and what it means to us. The change is long overdue, because since the bill was introduced some years ago conditions in our farm industry have considerably changed; methods of farming, the value of our farm lands, the price of our farm equipment and so on have all undergone changes.

By making it possible for the farm loan board to borrow another $40 million from the federal government it will mean that many more applicants will receive loans and, according to the chairman of the farm loan board, a greater demand for these loans in coming years is foreseen. At the present time there is a $15,000 limit upon the amount which a farmer can borrow from the board. Some are of the opinion that this amount is not large enough, and that it should be raised to $20,000. Others are of the opinion that it should be left at $15,000 because no farmer can borrow his way into prosperity, and because credit is not the cure for all our troubles.

However, I am confident that in due time this matter also will receive consideration by the government. I base this belief on what has happened here in the last few days. It is very significant that so many amendments have been introduced in the last few days to measures pertaining to agriculture. For instance, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was amended, with the result that many complaints will be removed; the Animal Contagious Diseases Act was amended also, and only recently the act making possible cash advances to farmers was amended to give a better service to our Canadian farmers.

All these changes are an indication that our government is alert and that it is very interested in removing some of the troubles we have had to face out in the west. We will, I am sure, be very interested in the working of this act when it has been passed into law. I am in favour of the amendment, and will give it my support.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister not going to answer some of the questions which have been raised in the committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the standing committee on agriculture held two meetings on this bill, which was sent to it by a decision of the house on July 16. Those two meetings were held on July 22 and July 24.

Three of the officials connected with farm credit came before the committee and testified there on all the points upon which the committee wished to examine them. Mr. F. L. Chester, the commissioner of the Canadian farm loan board, reviewed the operations of the board, and he was followed by Mr. J. F. Booth, chief of the economics division in the Department of Agriculture and Mr. A. H. Turner, principal economist of the economics division of the Department of Agriculture.

A number of suggestions were put forward by hon. members of that committee as to ways and means by which the scheme for providing farm credit might be, they considered, improved. Those suggestions, as well as any others which have been made in this house, will of course be duly studied and considered in the course of the current review of all legislation pertaining to agricultural credit and the administration thereof.

Turning specifically to some of the points which have been raised this afternoon, may I say to the hon. member my namesake from Okanagan-Revelstoke, when he urges that ability to repay should be taken into account in determining whether loans should be extended under the present act, that this is precisely what the board does. The board does take account of ability to repay. It is directed under the act, of course, to have regard to the value of the land within the terms of the act. Ability to repay is of course an essential ingredient at all times in determining whether a loan should be extended to an applicant.

[Mr. Rapp.]

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) will perhaps allow me to state that I do not claim this bill to be the key to all farm problems, to all farm credit problems, or that it contains the whole policy of the government in this respect; but I do say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is urgently required, as I stated in this house on July 16, when I said:

> The best estimate at this time is that loan commitments by the board, unless the present measure is adopted, must cease by about August 15 and available money for commitments made will be exhausted by about October 31. There is therefore urgency in this present resolution, Mr. Chairman.

(Text):

Reference was made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to the extent of the business which is being done by the board. May I draw his attention to page 14 of the proceedings of the committee, where Mr. Chester, the commissioner, has put on record some figures which illustrate the tremendous increase in the volume of the business which is being done. I shall not attempt to read into the record all the statistics which Mr. Chester gave in that context, but perhaps I might place several of them before this committee of the whole.

Mr. Chester in this table was dealing with the number of loans approved, accepted by the borrowers and placed with solicitors for disbursement in the first three months of the year. In 1956, to go back no further, the number in those first three months was 407; in 1957 it was 653, and in 1958 it was 1,236. Hon. members might care to hear the amounts of money involved in the first three months of those years respectively. In 1956 it was $1,940,000; in 1957 it was $3,900,000, and in 1958, $8 million in round figures. There has been a tremendous increase in the business the board is doing. The size of the loans has been increasing as well as their number.

With regard to the cost of doing this business, Mr. Chester was asked as to the possibility of reducing the cost of transacting the board's business, and he pointed out that the cost of doing business has not been increased within the past year or so despite the substantial increase in the volume of the board's business. He was asked as to the possibility of a reduction in the rate of interest and his answer, as reported at page 22, was that if you only lowered it by the amount of the board's surplus earnings you would not be lowering it by as much as one-tenth of one per cent.

The scheme under which the board operates is this. The board borrows its money from the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance is authorized to extend loans to the board of up to 20 times the board's authorized capital, and the minister is directed to extend those loans to the board at the current rates of interest. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked about the interest charged on the last loan by the government to the board. It was 4 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: How long a term?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was some months back—

Mr. Benidickson: I meant, how long was the term of the loan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid I will have to get that information and give it to the hon. gentleman another time. But, Mr. Chairman, the board has to operate and pay all its expenses of doing business on a margin of 1 per cent. It now borrows at 4 per cent and lends at 5 per cent. That is the position at the present time.

With respect to the matter of interest rates, I may say that shortly after I became Minister of Finance the board felt it was being very severely squeezed between the rate of interest it had to pay and the rate of interest it was being permitted to charge, and felt that some increase in the rate charged by the board to farm borrowers was going to be necessary unless the board was to go into the red, but I declined to give approval to any such increase.

The hon. member for Assiniboia asked me on a previous occasion if I expected there would be any increase in the interest rates. At that time I said no, and that remains my opinion.

I believe I have reviewed the points that have been raised in the course of this discussion. This measure is urgently necessary in order that the board may be able to carry on its lending operations, for otherwise the funds at its disposal within the permissible terms of borrowing and relending will be exhausted about the middle of August.

I may add that I am now in a position to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. The term of borrowings is 25 years.

Mr. Benidickson: And what did you say was the date of the last loan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say.

Mr. Benidickson: Do you recall?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Benidickson: I was, of course, simply going to point out again that you yourself are obliged to pay 4½ per cent for money from the public for a 25-year term, and section 7 (e) of the act seems to be mandatory on the part of the board that they must at least break even or attempt to do so. This just raises some concern on my part. You are not proposing to amend this section, and I just wondered how with a cost of 1.22 per cent for administration the board could carry out the instructions of this statute and still be consistent with the minister's statement that interest rates to borrowers from the board are not likely to rise beyond the present 5 per cent.

Mr. Brooks: Does the hon. member suggest that it should be increased?

Mr. Pearson: You have done that.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no suggestion of that from this side of the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could inform the committee about the cost to the board of doing business. He may have already informed the committee, but I missed the point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is 1.22 per cent. That figure was placed on record in the committee and referred to by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Argue: So on the basis of the board obtaining money at 4 per cent and lending it at 5 per cent, if there were no other factors the board would be incurring a net loss. With this net loss, at least on this particular amount of capital being made available to the board, is the minister still prepared to assure the committee there will be no increase in the 5 per cent being charged by the board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot foresee the course of interest rates for all time to come, but I did give my hon. friend an answer on that point as applied to the situation in which we find ourselves today, and I remain of that opinion. I reaffirmed the determination I have expressed in that regard. I do not know whether my hon. friend followed what I said a moment ago, but the matter of the narrow spread was a matter that did give concern to the board. Soon after I became Minister of Finance the board approached me and expressed its concern on this point. The board felt they were headed for a deficit unless the rate which they were permitted to charge borrowers was increased, but I declined to approve any increase.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his statement; I think it will be well received. On the basis of the minister's own record and that of the Conservative party the minister is being consistent, because no one has fought harder against the so-called tight money policy and the policy of increasing interest rates than the minister himself. It would seem to me, however, that without any other additional facts the refunding procedure in which the government is now engaged is strengthening interest rates very substantially, and will make it more difficult for the minister to maintain his position that the 5 per cent rate will not be increased, unless he is prepared to see the Canadian farm loan board incur a deficit and pay the deficit out of the national treasury. But in spite of the fact that one aspect of the minister's policy seems to be working against the other aspect of it, we are all for keeping interest rates down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there will be a proper time for discussion of interest rates in connection with the Canada conversion loan of 1958. I do not share some of the views expressed by my hon. friend in that respect, but there will be a proper opportunity provided at which to discuss that subject.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, am I right in my recollection that in the past the board has been provided with up to $4 million of capital funds from the taxpayers of Canada, and that to date no dividends have ever been paid on that sum? As I recall it the government has to borrow the money it gives to the board, but so far the government has received no return on that sum. Is that still the situation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is my understanding, Mr. Chairman. Under the provisions of the act the government has extended $4 million to the board, which is the board's authorized capital, and the act bases the board's power to borrow from the minister and relend to those qualifying under the act in terms of 20 times the authorized capital of the board. The purpose of this measure is to increase the authorized capital from $4 million to $6 million, and consequently the borrowing and relending power of the board from $80 million to $120 million.

Mr. Benidickson: The board does pay interest on its borrowings but not on its capital?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Just before the title carries. Mr. Chairman, I cannot resist an observation. I have had very little to say with respect to this act today because I intend to make my remarks concerning farm credit suitable to meet Canadian conditions under the appropriate item in the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture. But I was interested in the explanation of the Minister of Finance as to the attitude of the board itself toward a possible deficit position owing to the present rate of interest being charged. I was very interested to note that even the minister is more tenderhearted than the board in that respect. His position fully affirms the opinion of this group and of farm organizations in Canada that the Canadian farm loan board is run on straight, hardheaded, businesslike and mortgage company principles, and it definitely supports our point of view that the legislation does not meet the requirements of Canadian farmers today.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is usually very fair in his observations, but the remark he just made concerning the board and its attitude is, I think, not fair. The board was simply doing its duty in bringing to the attention of the Minister of Finance the fact that with the cost of operations, the cost of borrowing, and the rate at which the board was permitted to relend, the board was, it felt, headed for a deficit position. The board brought that fact to the attention of the minister as it was its function to do. That should not be a matter of reproach to the board.

Since the amendments that came into effect in 1956 and which have been referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the board has found the provisions of this act much more useful and the administration has been much more sympathetic. I do not think the impression should be left in the minds of hon. members of this house that this board has taken an unsympathetic attitude toward its responsibilities under the act, or that it has taken a hard attitude.

During the 13 months in which I have been dealing with the board in my present capacity I have found no evidence to warrant that assertion. On the contrary I believe the board is trying, within the limits set by parliament in the act, to give sympathetic administration to the legislation. Fortunately the amendments of 1956, which had the support of all parties in this house, have enabled the board to give an administration which has had the effect of making the act much more useful in meeting the needs that parliament envisaged in enacting the measure in the first place, and providing for its extension by amendments in succeeding years.

Mr. Herridge: I was not wishing to reflect upon the individuals composing the board, but I just gave it more as an indication that the board was giving effect to what it considered to be policies of the government under which it has had to operate, past and present.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to leave this ray of hope with hon. members; that naturally if the volume of business of the board tends to increase, particularly with this additional provision that parliament is being asked to make now, it may be that the cost of the board's operations as a percentage of its turnover will be somewhat reduced. That is our hope. The board has 1 per cent to work on. Naturally if its turnover is larger there is going to be, we hope, more business over which to spread certain factors in the cost of doing business.

Mr. Benidickson: I am very glad the minister made those comments with respect to the board, because I just wanted to point out to the hon. member for Kootenay West that no matter what harshness he may say there is with respect to rates, it is not a decision to be made by the board. Parliament has said that the interest rate must be a rate that, in the opinion of the board, is sufficient to provide for the interest payable to the minister and the expenses of the board, including reasonable provision for reserves against losses. I am not quarrelling with the minister. I quite appreciate that the only way out of this riddle at the moment would be a substantial increase in the volume of lending—if it is safe lending. It is possible increased volume of lending would not increase proportionately the administrative expenses; but in view of the statute and the fact that the minister is not proposing to amend it, I just wonder by what right he tells the board that they can ignore this statute.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, I told the board that I was not prepared to support any increase in the lending rate of interest to applicants for farm loans.

Mr. Benidickson: Did the minister indicate to the board for how long he was taking that responsibility notwithstanding what parliament had told the board to do?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I said a moment ago, I cannot foresee the future concerning interest rates; but in the circumstances then existing and in the circumstances existing now that is the position I have taken.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister, of course, referred to the 1 per cent spread between the cost of borrowing by the board from the government at 4 per cent and the amount charged by the board to farmers at 5 per cent, but I point out to him that that last borrowing antedates by probably some period of time the actual present borrowings of the government itself on a 25-year period, where the rate has risen to 4½ per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no; there has been no borrowing of new money in the market at the figure my hon. friend mentioned and the rate charged by the government, as he well knows from his experience in the Department of Finance in earlier years, is established every six months. The rate charged on the loans by the government to crown corporations is established in the light of prevailing market rates on moneys borrowed by the government at similar maturity plus one-eighth of one per cent, and this present rate of 4 per cent is the rate that was set for the six months ending September 30.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely my hon. friend has not agreed to borrow money at present from the public or convert bonds at the present time at a rate any higher than he feels is the proper and necessary rate that he has to pay, and the current rate is surely 4½ per cent because that is the rate he will pay on a 25-year term on the conversion loan.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier, this is not a debate on the Canadian conversion loan. There will be a proper time to discuss that to the extent that is desired by any hon. member. But my hon. friend talks about borrowing. The fact is that the conversion loan is not a borrowing of new money at all; it is simply the conversion of existing obligations into obligations of a later maturity.

Mr. Boulanger: Could the Minister of Finance tell us what was the net income of the Farm Loan Board for the financial year ended March 31, 1958?

(Text):

Can the minister tell us what was the net income of the farm loan board for the year ended March 31, 1958?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will get that figure for my hon. friend and give it to him.

Mr. Boulanger: I see by the 1957 report that there were net earnings of $218,755. I am wondering whether a reduction of 1 per cent in the interest rate would be something that we could absorb out of this profit.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I referred earlier to the answer given by Mr. Chester before the committee concerning what would happen if the board's surplus were applied to a reduction in the interest rate. At page 22 of the proceedings and evidence of the committee Mr. Chester's answer reads as follows:

> If you only lowered it by the amount of our surplus earnings you would not be lowering it one-tenth of one per cent.

He was referring to the interest rate to borrowers.

Mr. Boulanger: My question has to do with income tax of $40,000. I presume it would mean one half of one per cent on $218,755.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no. I have not worked the figure out but it would be a very small fraction indeed. I think one would be obliged to say it would be only a very tiny fraction, an insignificant fraction.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the minister, in advancing this amending bill in the house had given consideration to the position the board is in. It is their opinion that parliament is relying on and I wonder whether he gave consideration to taking over from the board this matter of opinion and taking it on himself, if he feels that even increased lending, contrary apparently to the opinion expressed by the board to the minister, might not rectify this situation. Did he not give consideration to taking that responsibility and recommending to parliament that the interest rate be as in the opinion of the minister instead of in the opinion of the board, if the opinion of the board is to be avoided?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the government has taken the responsibility of submitting this legislation to parliament without proposing any increase in the interest rate to borrowers.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister tell us whether the report of the board for the year ended March 31, 1958, is available?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is not it will be shortly. When Mr. Chester was before the committee a week ago we operated with the report for the year ended March 31, 1957, and Mr. Chester gave information to supplement that report with respect to the fiscal year that ended March 31, 1958.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister answer this question. Does the minister know whether the board in its operation has, by means of a soil map, an economic survey map or some other means, stated that certain substantial areas of land in a given province will not be eligible for loans, or that farmers living within that area will not be eligible for loans?

Before the minister answers the question I want to tell him that in my experience in years gone by the board has just said, "Well, such and such a district is a high risk area, and applications coming in from that area will be turned down".

I think that such a decision could be justified on the economic return from grain. But these areas that I have in mind are areas where the production of livestock is a very important industry, and if the returns to the farmer on that kind of land were considered, I think the farmer in that area should be eligible for a loan.

My question is this. Is every single loan considered on its merits or does the board say certain general areas are of such high risk that the experience in the past has not been such as to warrant the granting of any loans, no matter what the individual circumstances of the farmer may be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no such thing as a general exclusion. Naturally there are farms so located that their value for borrowing purposes is greater than others. But the policy of the board is to consider every application on its merits, having regard to all the circumstances that bear upon the application, including the capacity of the individual himself as a farmer, his record in the matter of credit and repayment and the type of land.

I may draw the attention of my hon. friend to page 21 of the proceedings of the committee where the hon. member for Acadia was asking Mr. Chester the following questions:

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have a question in respect of the purchase of farm land. Is it strictly grass or grazing land?

Mr. Chester: Any land.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Does it have to be cultivated?

Mr. Chester: No.

I am informed, Mr. Chairman, that the report of the farm loan board for the year ended March 31, 1958 has now been tabled.

I can assure my hon. friend there is no such thing as the exclusion of farm lands from the benefits of the act.

Mr. Benidickson: I have been reading this act further. Does the minister not think that he is telling the board to disregard what is laid down for the board if, in their opinion, they are doing something contrary to what parliament directed them to do? I can appreciate that he might say that if he were anticipating introducing an amendment to the bill in this session. He might state, "I am going to recommend to parliament a change in what parliament has determined and we, as a government, will take responsibility for operating on a deficit, if necessary, for public policy until the act is amended. But is there some section that I have overlooked that says that notwithstanding this obligation on the part of the board with respect to their conscientious exercise of opinion the minister can override them and tell them to disregard parliament?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This government will never be a party to any course that involves overriding parliament; I can assure my hon. friend of that. In this case, the board did its duty in drawing attention, under the circumstances that existed when we came into office a year ago, to the fact that at that time it looked as though the board, if conditions continued as they then existed, would be faced with a deficit. In the following period, having regard to the fact that the interest rate on loans by the Minister of Finance to the board is determined in six-month periods, that interest rate was reduced in line with the reduction that was made in the interest rate charged by the government to all crown corporations. The board was, therefore, entitled to the benefit of that reduction.

As things now stand, I take the responsibility for saying that under existing circumstances I do not think there is any occasion for submitting an increase in the rate of interest charged by the board to agricultural applicants. I am taking the responsibility for saying in this house this afternoon that I certainly am not recommending any increase in the interest rate on loans made by the Canadian farm loan board to farmer applicants.

Mr. Benidickson: Where does the minister suggest he gets his authority? He talks about responsibility. I suggest to him his responsibility is to come before parliament at the present time and say, I am prepared to recommend that this section is not a fair impost on the board; I am prepared to change the provision respecting these matters from utilizing the opinion of the board to the opinion of myself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend keeps talking as though the Canadian farm loan board today were recommending an increase in the interest rate. That is an unwarranted assumption. I referred to the view that the board expressed to me a year ago, under the conditions then obtaining. The conditions that exist today have not led the board to renew any such expression of view.

Mr. Benidickson: I was coming then to the next question. As I indicated, the No. 2 minutes of the agriculture committee only became available about noon today, and I frankly confess I have not had time to read them. May I ask the minister whether or not any member of the committee did ask the chairman of the board when he was before the committee whether in his opinion, the interest rate on loans is sufficient to provide for the interest payable by the board or likely to be payable if they were to go into the market right away—the minister has indicated they do have to borrow right away because they are out of funds—and the expenses of the board, including a reasonable provision for reserves against losses.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think that question was specifically asked of Mr. Chester. There were questions asked of Mr. Chester concerning the rate, but the questions were directed not to the possibility of an increase in the rate but to the possibility of a decrease in the rate.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the minister then say that except for this expression of opinion on the part of the board to the minister a year ago the board has expressed no further apprehension about its obligation by statute under this section?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I have had no communication from the board on that subject since the time I mentioned in 1957. I will not say it was precisely 12 months ago, but it was in 1957. The board has communicated no view to me on that subject since. I think it is clear from the testimony that Mr. Chester gave that the position at the present time is more satisfactory, having regard to two factors; first, the reduction in the interest rate charged by the government to the board within the past year since the occasion I mentioned; second, the fact that the increase in the volume of business transacted by the board permits spreading certain factors of cost over a wider area, and that will help reduce the drain upon the spread between the four per cent that the board now pays and the five per cent it charges.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the board paid the government an interest rate beyond four per cent in the last couple of years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, they paid that rate earlier. I cannot give the precise times, but this interest rate has fluctuated. If my hon. friend will look at the testimony of Mr. Chester he will see that the interest rate has fluctuated.

Mr. Benidickson: Has it ever exceeded four per cent in the last couple of years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot say precisely. I shall have to obtain that information if my hon. friend wishes it. May I remind my hon. friend of the testimony Mr. Chester gave at page 12 of the committee report:

> When the board commenced lending in 1929, it was obliged to charge 6½ per cent. In October 1934, the rate was brought down to 5½ per cent. In May 1935, the rate was further reduced to 5 per cent and so continued up to April 1, 1945. From April 2, 1945, to March 31, 1952, the rate was 4½ per cent and since that time the rate has been 5 per cent.

Now, that is the rate charged by the board on loans.

Mr. Benidickson: My question, of course, related to the cost of borrowing money from the government within the last two years.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister this very simple question? Is he satisfied that, without raising his rates for loans—and nobody wants that to happen—and having regard to the likehood that it may have to pay a certain amount for the money it will get from the government in the weeks and months ahead, the board is now in a good position to discharge all its obligations under the act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The board cannot possibly discharge its obligations under the act at this present time beyond another three weeks. This bill, if it is adopted, will permit the board to discharge its obligations for the foreseeable future in accordance with the terms of the present act. It has been indicated several times already that the whole subject of agricultural credit as available under this act, as available under the Farm Improvement Loans Act and as available under the Veterans Land Act is under review. That review will be completed before another session of parliament. If my hon. friend is asking me whether the board, if this bill is passed, will be in a position to discharge the responsibilities laid upon it by this act in accordance with its present terms, I say, yes, as long as this additional provision lasts.

Mr. Argue: With interest rates at the level they are today and with the costs the board has to incur does the minister feel that the board can operate one further year and stay in the black?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot be precise about that matter. One can only make the best judgment that one is capable of at this present time. If this bill is passed and if the rate of lending continues, and if the volume of business that is being done continues then the view that I put before the house in line with what I have just said now in reply to the question of the Leader of the Opposition is that the board will be able to discharge its responsibilities under the act in accordance with its present terms. In another session the house will have before it, I have no doubt, the results of the study that is being conducted now into the operations of the three acts.

Mr. Argue: Is it the opinion or the estimate of the minister that under all present circumstances the board is able to operate at a profit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not say at a profit, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Argue: With the surplus it has?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has a surplus at the moment; a tenuous sort of surplus. That may vary from time to time. I have given my answer in broad terms, Mr. Chairman.

I can be more specific now in reply to the question asked a moment ago by my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River as to the highest rates of borrowings in times past.

Mr. Benidickson: In the last couple of years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In recent years I am informed that the board has borrowed at 4⅜ per cent, 4⅛ per cent and at 4 per cent.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister tell the committee what is the average cost of money the board is now employing? In other words, is most of the money in use at interest rates lower than 4 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would have to be calculated.

Mr. Argue: I do not think the minister's answer to me a moment ago was entirely satisfactory, Mr. Chairman. He said he was not certain, as I understood him, that the board would be able to make a profit, but in future it might not be in particularly difficult circumstances. But I note that at page 16 of the evidence taken before the committee, the board for 1958 shows $235,534 under a column entitled "Profit on Operations before Income Tax".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What page is that?

Mr. Argue: Page 16. I think this committee is entitled to know whether the officers in the minister's department feel that the board under present circumstances and foreseeable circumstances during the present year is likely to be able to operate at a profit. I do not suppose anybody can guarantee whether or not there will be a profit. But surely realistic estimates are made of the operation of this board and the operation of all aspects of the government's own department. The view of the minister on the advice of his officials as to whether or not the board, with present interest rates, can operate at a profit is important, and I think it is a reasonable question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, to operate at a profit or to operate to break even are two different things. My hon. friend is asking whether there will be a profit. I cannot say whether or not there will be a profit. I know that the board, before income tax, in the past fiscal year showed a profit of $235,000. From what information has been given to me I have a reasonable expectation that the board will break even during this coming year. I think it would be quite improper on my part to hazard at this time some estimate of the profit that may accrue from the board's operations. But having regard to operations in the past and the increased volume of operations during the fiscal year up to the present and the prospect that if this bill is passed the increase is likely to be maintained, it would appear that the board would be able to operate, as in the past, on a profitable basis. But I am not hazarding any indication to the house as to what the surplus might be. I think that it would be quite improper for me to attempt to do so.

Mr. Argue: My question was merely whether the minister expected that the board could operate at a profit, not make a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I say that the view of the board is that they will be able to show a surplus on this year's operations but that they are not hazarding any indication of how much it might be. That is the position as it appears at the moment, that they will be able to produce a surplus for this year again, according to present indications.

Mr. Argue: That would seem to be a full answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who was asking whether the board was carrying out all its responsibilities under the act. The minister now says that even with the high interest rates prevalent in the country the board is likely to make some kind of a profit, certainly not a loss. That would satisfy the provisions of the act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I now have the answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia a moment ago. He asked for the average rate. I am informed that the average rate is less than 4 per cent. I cannot give him any very precise figure but it is less than 4 per cent. I think that is a factor to be taken into account. In assessing the board's operations at this present time, one should not treat the cost to the board of its aggregate borrowings to date as though that rate were the same as the most recent rate. The most recent rate is as I indicated 4 per cent; but the average rate on loans—

Mr. Benidickson: You gave three rates, what is the most recent rate? You gave $4\frac{3}{8}$ per cent, $4\frac{1}{8}$ per cent, 4 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I just finish what I was saying. The average rate is below 4 per cent. I will not be prepared to give the actual figure but it certainly would be as close to 3 per cent as it would be to 4 per cent; that is on the aggregate outstanding which is substantial. As hon. members will see, if they will look at page 15 of the proceedings of the standing committee on agriculture, the principal of loans outstanding at March 31, 1958 was over $67 million.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his reply. I think it is a most significant one. It demonstrates to the house that because of low interest rates available to the board in the past during the years when the Liberal party followed a low interest rate policy, it is now possible for the board at this present time to operate at a profit in spite of the high interest rate policies now being followed by the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are no high interest rate policies followed by the government today.

Mr. Argue: Just high interest rates.

Mr. Benidickson: Let's consider the minister's last statement. He has informed the house and the committee that within ten days this board will have run out of money and will have to go to the government to borrow more money. Surely with a period of ten days in which to forecast he could without any crystal ball give to the committee an idea of what he would feel the government would be obliged to charge the board for a borrowing on a 25-year term.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As the hon. gentleman is well aware the interest rate is effective for the present six months' period and is therefore the rate which will be charged this board on all its borrowings from the government in this period. The rate of interest for the present six months' period to September 30 is 4 per cent. The interest rate is always set at the beginning of every six month's period. As my hon. friend knows, this was set by the government at April 1 and is applicable to all loans by the government to all crown corporations at the rate of 4 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: So that if at the end of the period of six months in September the government's experience is that it has to pay $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on its borrowings within the newest period it would not be government policy to charge any crown company less than it has had to pay to the public.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend, I am sure, will recall the way in which the rate is set. It is a rate that is established as the rate the government has to pay for money with a similar maturity plus an advance of one-eighth of one per cent as the cost of doing business. That is quite clear and when October 1 comes the interest rate to be charged to all crown corporations will, as at all times in the past, be set in the light of that cost, whether it is larger or smaller than 4 per cent. The government has not borrowed new money in the market at 4½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: The government at the present time is asking the public to convert bonds that have not yet matured and it has indicated that the government requires this money because it has a sufficient feeling of necessity that it is prepared on a 25-year basis to pay 4½ per cent for it, plus bonuses and commissions and the other things involved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is about half true.

Mr. Pearson: Which half is wrong?

Mr. Argue: I think the discussion illustrates the very serious aspects of this matter with respect to the financial policy being launched by this government. It is a policy which means the strengthening of the interest rates; it is a policy which in fact means higher prices for loans to the ordinary people of this country; it is a policy which is the very antithesis and negation of the policy the minister advocated while he was in opposition for so many years; it is a policy which if pursued will result in either the Canadian farm loan board having a tremendous deficit—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but we are not at the moment discussing the fiscal policy of the government. We are discussing the farm loan act.

Mr. Argue: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, if the fiscal policy of the government results in higher interest rates for the money available to the Canadian farm loan board, it is the most pertinent thing one could imagine, because the cost to that board of money which is borrowed will decide whether or not the board can make a profit. The minister can say that there is not a word of truth in the statement but everything he has said this afternoon would demonstrate that interest rates are going up and it will be more and more difficult for this board to operate at a profit in the future.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quite sure my hon. friend will not find anything in my remarks to warrant the conclusion which he is attempting to draw.

Mr. Pearson: If the board in October, when the rates for its borrowings will be established by the government, finds that the new rate of 4 per cent or more than 4 per cent—whatever it may be—is such that it would make it impossible to carry out the specific obligations under section 7 (e) of the act, which is the requirement to establish an interest rate on loans sufficient to provide for the interest payable by the board to the minister and the expenses of the board plus reasonable provision for reserve against loss; if it finds that to carry out that obligation would require an increase in the rate for loans, is there any provision in this legislation which gives the minister any authority to overrule the judgment of the board in this respect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend can read the terms of the present legislation which proposes to amend clause 5 (1) of the act by changing the word "four" to "six" and the figure "40" to "60". That is the entire effect of this present bill; it does not purport to change any of the other terms of the act which will stand as they have existed since the 1956 amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, the short answer would have been no.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. I was asking the minister for information in regard to other sections of the act which are not to be amended and I wished to know whether he had any authority to overrule the board if it desired to alter the interest rate charged by it on loans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Neither the minister nor the government nor the board has any power to override the terms of this legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words the assurance of the minister is worth absolutely nothing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think on reflection the hon. member will regret having made that statement which does not contribute anything useful to a discussion of this subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to put a question to the minister. Did the minister not give the committee an assurance a few moments ago that this rate would not be increased? I ask this question because he is now saying that he has no authority to override the statute and therefore, as I said a moment ago, his assurance is worth nothing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend can put his own estimate on his conclusion. I have put my estimate upon it and our estimates are as far apart as the poles.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORIZE DELETION OF CERTAIN ACCOUNTS, CLARIFY ISSUE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Financial Administration Act to authorize the deletion from the accounts of obligations or debts due to Her Majesty or claims by Her Majesty that do not exceed twenty-five dollars; to clarify the circumstances in which special warrants signed by the governor general may be issued; to permit a crown corporation to establish a receiver general account with ministerial approval and to authorize the payment of interest on money placed to the credit of such an account; and to provide for certain consequential changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill to be founded upon the present resolution is to amend the provisions of the Financial Administration Act. The bill will be a quite short one and will have as its objects, first, to authorize the treasury board to make regulations for the deletion from the government's books of small debts of $25 or less; second, to clarify the circumstances under which special governor general's warrants may be used and to provide an opportunity for prompt parliamentary consideration of those warrants when they are used; third, to permit a crown corporation, with ministerial approval, to pay all or part of its money into the consolidated revenue fund to be held for it by the receiver general and to provide for the payment of interest on moneys so held, and, fourthly, to make certain other technical and consequential changes.

The operative provisions of section 28 of the act relating to the circumstances and conditions governing the use of special warrants restrict their use to cases:

(a) where an accident happens to a public work or building for which an expenditure for the repair or renewal thereof is urgently required, and

(b) where any other matter arises for which an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by parliament is urgently required for the public good.

Moreover, warrants may be used only in periods when parliament is not in session or when it is under adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the day the accident happens or the matter arises.

The wording of the act, which has remained virtually unchanged since provision for the use of special warrants was made shortly after confederation, has been found in some respects to be lacking in clarity. Accordingly, these provisions have been rewritten in the bill to simplify the language and to clarify the circumstances in which warrants may be issued. I should like to stress that no change in substance has been made. As under the present act, warrants can be used only when parliament is not in session or is under adjournment, when there is no other appropriation for the service, and when expenditures are urgently required for the public good.

As I have indicated, it is also proposed to make provision to give hon. members an early opportunity for the consideration of special warrants when they are issued. There are now two requirements enacted by parliament to ensure that the existence of governor general's warrants may be made known soon after they are issued. These are to be found in sub-section (3) of section 28:

Every warrant issued under this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette within thirty days after it is issued, and a statement showing all warrants issued under this section and the amounts thereof shall be laid by the minister before the House of Commons within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session of parliament.

We are proposing no change in these requirements. However, we do propose to add a new provision whereby the amounts appropriated by a special warrant shall be deemed to be included in, and not to be in addition to, the amounts provided by the next appropriation act enacted by parliament. The effect will be that provision to cover all such warrants will be included in the first appropriation act submitted to parliament in the session following the period in which the warrants are issued, and the house will thereby be given a full and early opportunity to consider such warrants.

In addition to these amendments relating to the use of special governor general's warrants, there are three other amendments to the act, mostly of a technical nature, which I should like to mention.

The first relates to the deletion of certain small debts due to, or claims by, Her Majesty. Section 23 of the act now provides that the governor in council on the recommendation of the treasury board may delete from the accounts certain obligations or debts due to, or claims by, Her Majesty that do not exceed $500 and which have been outstanding for five years or more, or that do not exceed $1,000 and have been outstanding for ten years or more.

It is costly and uneconomical to continue to maintain records and to seek actively to collect very small debts for the period of five years now required by the act. Indeed in many cases the cost of administration and collection exceeds the amount of the debt, and it has become evident that there should be some procedure under appropriate circumstances for dealing more expeditiously with these small uncollectable debts. Accordingly, vote 689 was included in the further supplementary estimates (2), 1957-1958 to provide authority for the treasury board to make regulations for the deletion from the accounts of small debts that did not exceed $5. We do not propose to include this item in the final appropriation act for 1957-58. Instead, it is proposed that it be placed on a statutory basis by making suitable provision in the Financial Administration Act. At the same time it is proposed that the maximum amount that may be deleted under this authority will be $25. A report of all amounts deleted under this provision will be published each year in the public accounts.

The second amendment which I should like to mention refers to the making of regulations for the destruction of paid government cheques. Section 34(2) of the act now provides that the treasury board on the recommendation of the auditor general may make regulations governing the destruction of paid and cancelled cheques or similar instruments issued by the comptroller of the treasury for payments out of the consolidated revenue fund. I do not believe that the auditor general should be responsible for proposing regulations governing administrative action. On the other hand it is most desirable to ensure that cheques are not destroyed until they are no longer required by him for the purposes of his examination and audit of the public accounts. Accordingly I am proposing that the present section be amended to provide that in future regulations governing the destruction of paid cheques be made by the treasury board on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance with the approval of the auditor general.

There is one other amendment to the act which will permit a crown corporation, with ministerial approval, to establish a receiver general account. Section 81(2) now provides that a crown corporation, when directed by the Minister of Finance with the concurrence of the appropriate minister, shall pay all or any part of its money to the receiver general to be held for it in a special account in the consolidated revenue fund and such money may be paid out for the purposes of the corporation or repaid to it. It is proposed that this section be amended so that a crown corporation may on its own initiative but with the approval of the two ministers pay surplus money to the receiver general to be held for it in the special account. Specific provision is also being made in this section to make it clear that interest may be allowed and paid on such money.

These are the amendments which I am proposing. I believe that they will clarify and improve the provisions of the present legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think this particular statute has been up for review for some time. It is a statute in which the public accounts committee usually takes an interest. In 1951 when there was a substantial overhaul of our financial procedures, and when this act was designed to consolidate a number of financial provisions the public accounts committee was given the bill for examination and study. I wonder if it is the intention of the minister to have this bill considered by the public accounts committee which I believe is in the process of organization.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think there is any occasion to do that in this case. This is a very short bill. The hon. gentleman will find, if the committee permits the bill to be introduced, that it is very short, only two pages in length.

Mr. Benidickson: I hope that perhaps on further reflection the minister will reconsider what he has just said. I will speak to him about it privately. I do feel, particularly because governor general's warrants are of some consequence, that the public accounts committee might very profitably consider the significance of these changes.

With respect to this statute and some of the minor items, such as the amounts receivable, I may say that the work of any member of parliament has been greatly facilitated with respect to financial administration by an audit office guide, prepared in recent weeks, which came into my hands a few days ago. I know that it was designed to save the audit office itself the necessity of consulting a great number of authorities in connection with its own detailed work, but I can recommend this guide to all hon. members who find that some of these procedures are baffling. I may say that it has already been very useful. Even in reading this resolution I found very readily the references in the act. I found very useful the references to practices to which some of these proposed amendments have reference. The accounts receivable item is discussed. It is my impression that subject to section 23 which my hon. friend read it is not possible for the administration to eliminate a debt owed to the crown except by notice to parliament through an appropriation bill. I agree that while the limits now proposed are worthy of some consideration they may be just too much of a drop from the present provisions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt for one moment. We do not propose to eliminate the obligation. It is simply to provide that—

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. They will not appear in the public accounts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In other words, that it may be deleted from the public accounts.

Mr. Benidickson: It would not be necessary in those circumstances to appeal to parliament to relieve the administration of what public servants might think was an obligation to continue efforts and expenditures with respect to collections that might be quite out of keeping with either the age of the account or its collectability and so on. I believe that has been given consideration for some time.

I must confess I am not too familiar with the reference to the receiver general accounts that will be established for crown companies. I believe it has a relation to section 16, subsection 2. I have no doubt that when the bill is presented by the minister we will be able to examine that. I know that a department is able to establish a receiver general account and funds are available to the receiver general for purposes as he sees fit and there is provision for crediting interest. I see that a crown company would similarly get some interest credited if an account were transferred with the permission of the minister.

Mr. Benidickson: I think most interest in the committee today at this stage will be with respect to governor general's warrants in view of the size of governmental financial operations today. We had an experience of governor general's warrants in recent times of most unusual dimensions.

I was very interested to try and find out from the minister just what technique might be utilized to carry out the commitments of the Prime Minister in the election campaign when he discovered the attempt on the part of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to depart from what had been standard custom with respect to governor general's warrants being included in the supplementary estimates for parliamentary discussion. There was an uproar in the country and we all know that the Prime Minister has a very keen ear to political discontent of that kind. He very quickly indicated that he was not going to support that kind of policy. A typical comment the other day when this resolution was introduced is that made by one of our respected correspondents in the gallery. Mr. Norman Campbell writing in the Ottawa Citizen said:

> A tradition cast aside by the Tories is now to be given statutory effect on second thought. It is a full retreat by finance minister Fleming.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was never an article written with less of fact to substantiate it.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend has said that several times today. The technique for parliamentary consideration seems to be a new one. If I understood my hon. friend correctly it would appear he is proposing to have references to governor general's warrants in the next available appropriation bill. That does not seem to be what was contemplated in the speech from the throne or what was suggested by the Prime Minister himself when he spoke in the throne speech debate. It seemed very clear to me when the Prime Minister addressed this house after its opening, when he was making reference to the setting up of new committees and particularly the public accounts committee, that he was making a commitment to the effect that it would be part of the function of this committee to discuss particularly the very substantial governor general's warrant and the amount of money that was so issued with respect to the fiscal year that ended on March 31. I refer to page 34 of Hansard of May 13, 1958 where the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

> We intend to set up this committee; we intend to have an examination of the expenditures made under governor general's warrants.

One can only draw the conclusion that it was anticipated that these particular expenditures under governor general's warrant for the year that had just concluded would be given the careful attention of that committee. There is not so much difficulty with respect to the other two governor general's warrants that have relationship to the new fiscal year. They, of course, will be carried through in this year's estimates and we will have the usual right of debate but there is considerable concern on the part of hon. members of the opposition, and I am sure on the part of hon. members of the government as well as to the opportunities they lost by virtue of the hasty dissolution of the house last February. Through that action we were deprived of the opportunity to examine thoroughly all but five departments of the government. I think it is probably fair to say that five departments were fully considered and six were only partially considered and it so happens in that particular year that some of the departments whose estimates the opposition were particularly interested to inquire into because of economic conditions were those that at no stage during that year came up for parliamentary review. I think of such departments as labour and public works. I would hope that there would be an opportunity to examine in considerable detail the policies of those departments in this very critical year 1957-58.

In addition to that there has been a request made of the Minister of Finance in the past and I repeat it now. When he was making his calculation as to the amount of funds that would comprise the total of the governor general's warrant for the year ending March 31, 1958 he found it possible in some slight measure to provide a figure that was under unvoted balance of the total in the blue book of estimates. He has never indicated to us what these items were except by comparing the totals department by department. We would very much like to have from the minister an indication of just how hon. members of this house are going to be able to examine these particular deletions that the minister decided were appropriate and not likely to be spent in the year ending March 31, 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would my hon. friend like me to clarify that now?

Mr. Benidickson: I know there were totals but my hon. friend must realize we still have not had any indication of detail to determine the merit or otherwise of those deletions particularly in the period of economic distress in which we were operating because at that very time the Minister of Finance was speaking in terms of certain savings and economies, other hon. members of the government were speaking in terms of an accelerated pace of public expenditure for the first quarter of 1958 which was the last quarter of the fiscal year. I have no doubt there will be a great deal of curiosity on the part of those who will have an opportunity of inquiring into those estimates as to just how one reconciles the bragging of some hon. members of the government about economies and savings and the similar boasts that were made by other hon. members of the government of a contradictory nature indicating that there was an accelerated pace of expenditure particularly in terms of public development, public works and so on and that a terrific pace of acceleration was being established in the first quarter of the calendar year.

I would very much like to hear from the minister a further explanation of the technique that he proposes for parliamentary examination. He was very clear this session when he introduced the first interim supply bill. He indicated on May 13 and on May 14 that members of the House of Commons would have a full opportunity of examining the 1957-58 estimates. I will concede that something of this nature in the way of an undertaking was desirable because as far I can find out in the records—I have examined them for some 30 years back—I do not think that ever before did we have a situation such as we had in February when parliament was dissolved with a substantial amount of estimates not voted in the committee of supply.

The minister said on May 13, as reported at page 18 of Hansard:

> It will be the intention of the government at a suitable time in the session to present to the house a measure in respect of the accounts for the year 1957-58 to deal specifically with these items, and on that occasion there will be accorded to the house, it is proposed, the fullest opportunity in committee of supply to discuss, to obtain information and to pass any judgments that may be required on the sums appropriated and expenditures made under the provisions of the governor general's warrants.

On May 14, in reply to the questions I advanced to him, he said this, as reported at page 70 of Hansard:

> I thought I gave the house a clear assurance yesterday that in the provision which the governor general in council made in strict accordance with the provisions of the Financial Administration Act to meet the needs of government and provide the sums urgently required for the public good for the balance of the fiscal year to March 31, nothing had been done that was not included in the estimates, and that provision would be made this year at this session in due course for as much review as hon. members may wish of any appropriation made by governor general's warrant.

I am sure that in replying the minister will amplify on the technique that he proposes to utilize so that those commitments will be carried out with respect to the warrants applicable to expenditures for the fiscal year ended 1957-1958. Perhaps the minister might be prepared to amplify that now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the government's intention to bring forward a resolution on that subject in the near future. It will contain the information my hon. friend requests and will afford to hon. members the fullest opportunity to discuss all of the items that entered into the expenditures for the year 1957-58.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend, of course, is well aware that in every year, except perhaps 1926 when there was an unusual situation, two minority governments were defeated within a matter of a few weeks at that time and a portion of the warrants by one government was not subsequently adopted in the parliamentary session that followed the election. We have had the opportunity. Apart from 1926 I cannot find that we ever lacked an opportunity in all those years to consider the expenditures under governor general's warrants in the form and with details just as they would be presented in a supplementary estimate. Is my hon. friend contemplating that similar details as to purpose and description as in a vote will be provided in the measure that he has in mind for our consideration later in the session?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This may not be in order, Mr. Chairman, because it has nothing to do with the present measure at all. My hon. friend has asked the question and I will be brief about it. I think when my hon. friend sees what the government proposes to lay before the house he will be completely reassured in that regard.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend cannot again say that the discussion is not pertinent to the measure that he has described, because he himself said that he proposes to introduce an appropriation bill, or resolution, or something of that kind, that would relate to warrants. While we have the question and answer opportunity now I am curious to know whether or not the opportunities we will have under such a measure will be the equal of those parliament has always had when eventually governor general's warrants were discussed as supplementary estimates.

I am just going to say that in his opening remarks about the need for amending section 28 of the Financial Administration Act for the purpose of dealing with governor general's warrants and procedure thereunder the minister said that in the past they had been lacking in clarity. I think those were the words he used. I simply want to say that if they were lacking in clarity there was certainly nothing at any time ever lacking in past precedents.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, while I have not the close technical knowledge of the massive financial transactions that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has I do want to say a few words on behalf of this group. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the clock now records five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

Private Bills

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to standing order 15(3).

Since there are a number of bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole, is it agreed that all these bills be referred to the committee of the whole in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-12, respecting Ogdensburg Bridge Authority.

He said: This bill is similar to the bill passed in 1956. The Ogdensburg bridge authority was incorporated by private act of the parliament of Canada, being chapter 57 of the statutes of 1952. The purpose of the authority is to co-operate with a similar authority incorporated by the legislature of the state of New York in the building of a high-level vehicular bridge from the vicinity of Johnstown, Ontario, that is about two miles east of Prescott, to Ogdensburg, New York.

When the company was incorporated in 1952 it was estimated that the bridge would cost approximately $10 million to $12 million and accordingly the right of the company to borrow and to issue bonds, debentures or other securities was limited by sections 12, 16 and 17 of the act of incorporation. By the year 1955 it became apparent that the original estimates of the cost of the bridge were low and accordingly at the 1956 session an amending act was passed, being chapter 65 of the statutes of 1956, increasing the amount of debentures or other securities which could be issued and the amount which could be borrowed to $20 million. It now appears that the bridge will in fact cost more than $20 million but less than $25 million, and accordingly the present application is to obtain authority to borrow or issue debentures or securities to an amount not exceeding $25 million. This is the sole and only purpose of the bill which follows the exact terms of the 1956 bill.

I should like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that the act of incorporation provides that when the cost of building the bridge has been retired, that portion of it over Canadian soil will revert to public authorities in Canada and that part of the bridge in the United States of America will revert to public authorities in the United States. In other words, this is not an undertaking for the financial gain of any private individual.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the tenders are practically all let for this bridge at the present time and the authority finds that the increase in the cost of labour from 1952 to the present time and the increase in the cost of materials used will mean that the bridge will cost in the neighbourhood of $22 million. It is for this reason the bill is being brought before the house and Senate at the present time, seeking authority to borrow or issue debentures or securities to an amount not exceeding $25 million. This is a very short bill. It has already passed the Senate. The construction work is proceeding rapidly, so it is the desire of those concerned that this bill be passed at the earliest possible opportunity.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

THE ALGOMA CENTRAL AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-13, respecting The Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

He said: If I may give to the house a brief outline of the purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, I would say that there is a rather lengthy explanation note contained in the bill. Primarily, this concerns a refinancing scheme of this company. The Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company was incorporated by chapter 50 of the statues of Canada in 1899. The company has constructed and operates a line of railway from the city of Sault Ste. Marie to Hearst in the province of Ontario, and a branch line thereof running in a southwesterly direction to Michipicoten Harbour in the province of Ontario.

As I said, the purpose of this bill is to reorganize the capital structure of the company which has had a long and somewhat complicated history. In 1916 a compromise financial arrangement was made by the company, other companies and the bondholders, but the obligations of this scheme were not met in 1931, at which time a new scheme was arranged. At that time the scheme was confirmed by chapter 62 of the statutes of Canada. Under that scheme the bonded indebtedness of the company was to consist of $10,308,500, bearing interest at the rate of five per cent and being secured by first mortgage debentures on the stocks and bonds. I might say a trust deed, and the usual type documents were made at that time to secure the interest of the bondholders. Also a second mortgage of $318,800, bearing interest at six per cent, was authorized, but this was paid off in 1937.

The company was further authorized to issue preference shares to the amount of $500,000 which provided 125,000 shares at $4 each. Under the present arrangement the proposal is to pay off the indebtedness which becomes due on December 31, 1959; to pay off the present preferred shares and to pay off the accumulated interest which, as at June 2, 1958, amounted to $5,729,808. Under a further scheme which was authorized in 1941 the company was authorized to allow the interest to accumulate provided that interest was paid when the bonds came due.

As a result of the scheme, when it is passed by the house, it will also permit the addition of further common shares. There will be a total capital authorized as follows: common shares to the value of $10 million, being 1 million shares having a par value of $10 each; preferred shares to the amount of $12,500,000, being 250,000 shares having a par value of $50; and the raising of $11 million by bonds and debentures. This procedure will completely reorganize the capital structure of the company. I may say at the present time all the said debenture stock and bonds and the preferred shares and common shares of the company have been issued and are outstanding except the $318,800, which I stated before were redeemed in 1937. I think that is a brief outline of what is to be done. If there are any particular questions of a complicated nature that might need to be answered, I may say that the officials will be present during the committee stage to answer such questions as hon. gentlemen might like to ask.

Private Bills

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. McGrath: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question? I have two questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member, before he takes his seat, would permit a question or two. It is not the procedure on second reading to ask and answer questions.

Mr. Morton: It is quite all right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: My questions are these. Are the majority of the shareholders of this company Canadians or non-Canadians? The second one is this. In view of the fact that this company appears to have had financial difficulties in the past, can the hon. member now inform the house as to the financial standing of the company at the moment?

Mr. Morton: As to the first question, Mr. Speaker, I may say that the majority of shareholders are non-Canadians. However, I have here a letter dated July 11 from the general counsel and secretary of the company. It sets out in detail the shareholders, which information I can read to the house. I might say that under the arrangement all the shares of the company are held in trust under a trust agreement by the Royal Trust Company in Montreal; I refer to all the common shares and the voting shares. There are 2,221 holders of 420,755 shares divided as follows:

	Holders	Voting Trust Shares
Canada	296	190,677
U.S.A.	115	35,901
United Kingdom	1,113	181,641
France	654	10,628
Others	43	1,908
	2,221	420,755

As to the second question, I may say that I have the financial statement of the company for the year ended December 31, 1957. The net profit for the year was $1,495,775.58. The surplus balance of the company at the end of the same period, namely December 31, 1957 was $5,113,007.14. If any details are wanted, I can give them. However, that will give the house a general idea of the financial picture of the company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Speaker: As there are a number of additional divorce bills standing for second reading, is it the wish of the house that these bills be dealt with in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Morton.]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT PUBLICATION OF STRAW POLL RESULTS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-19, to amend the Canada Elections Act (publication of straw poll results).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to prohibit and make punishable as an illegal practice the publication in any manner before election day the result of straw polls or polls on the political opinions of the electors. The proposed amendment does not prohibit the taking of such polls for private purposes and it should be pointed out that we in this group have no objection to the taking of polls of political opinions of the public. We have no objection to the taking of such polls in high schools or public schools or in any other places but what we do object to is the publication of the results of those polls to be used for purposes other than that for which they were intended when the poll was originally taken. Some consideration has been given to this matter by other countries and by certain provinces in Canada, which have passed legislation prohibiting such use of polls.

Something should, I think, be said with regard to what may be accomplished by the taking of polls and the results which sometimes may be found from the conducting of them. We all know of cases where questions are asked of the general public which are very innocent in nature but by the time the results of such polls are used by certain advertising agencies and implications are drawn from them, the information presented to the public does not necessarily represent the opinions expressed by the participants in the poll. There is actually no guarantee to the Canadian people that such polls are taken on a regular sample basis; the people who are asked questions may or may not be representative of Canadians as a whole.

One of the problems facing our people in respect to politics is the fact that an increasing number of people appear to be interested in or concerned with being on the winning side and when a poll is conducted they have a tendency to make the predictions made by a poll come true because they wish to be on the winning side and so vote in accordance with the indications of these polls. A good example of what can happen from the improper conducting of a poll was the case during an election in the United States. At that time a poll was conducted as to the public opinion with respect to whether the future president of the United States would be a Republican or a Democrat. The general result of the poll suggested the vote would be in favour of the opposition of Mr. Truman to the extent of 12 per cent. On page 663 of volume 2 of "A History of the American People" by Harry J. Carman and Harold C. Syrett, it says:

> Throughout the campaign the so-called—and often self-styled—experts, the newspapers, and the professional poll takers were unanimous in their predictions of a sweeping Republican victory.

> On the day after the election Truman almost alone could take credit for engineering the most stunning upset in the history of American presidential elections.

This was one case where the poll in fact indicated an incorrect trend although it resulted in little change in the general attitude of the voting public of the United States. It does, however, point out that polls are not necessarily true expressions of opinion and therefore while we should allow them to be taken because they do serve a useful purpose, we should prevent their results from being made public during an election campaign.

We would like to extend this principle to the schools. The practice is becoming quite widely adopted of conducting polls in public schools and in my area the public school children are allowed to conduct an election on election day while they are not allowed to do so three or four days beforehand because this might have some effect on the opinion expressed on election day. In British Columbia some action has been taken on this matter and an amendment has been introduced to the elections act in that province, namely section 168, which reads as follows:

> 168. No person, corporation, or organization shall, after the issue of the writ for any election, take any straw vote which will, prior to the election, distinguish the political opinions of the voters in any electoral district.

This was passed in 1939 and has worked very satisfactorily in British Columbia and we are suggesting similar legislation be introduced by the government of Canada. I am quite sure there will be some expression of opinion on this matter and I will not now take any more time but will allow the house to decide whether it will vote on this bill today.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting for a new member to examine bills introduced by opposition parties during a first session.

While we are considering the bill introduced by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), I should like to say that in the first place, we should ask ourselves whether the action taken by the hon. member opposite has not been influenced by the results of the last federal election. While the result of the last election campaign was not very favourable to the party he represents, I trust the hon. member for Timiskaming is rather more interested in the principle at stake. I must therefore congratulate him on introducing this bill.

We must realize that the straw votes or public opinion polls conducted prior to election campaigns cannot indicate with any degree of accuracy the actual facts and the state of public opinion.

We know, and the hon. member did point that out at the beginning of his remarks, that in certain countries the results of public opinion polls conducted for the purpose of determining public feeling prior to voting day were not vindicated by the results of the vote itself.

We also are aware of the fact that election campaigns should be carried out in an atmosphere of calm and serenity. We see by the Canada Elections Act, particularly with refference to those days which immediately precede voting day, that the lawmaker's intention was that the people be put in a position to analyse with as great a degree as possible of calm and serenity the various political platforms submitted to their approval as well as to judge at their proper value the men who are seeking to obtain endorsation through universal suffrage. That is why I feel convinced that the proposed legislation introduced by the hon. member opposite is very much in line with that atmosphere of calm, serenity and balance in which any election campaign should, in fact, take place.

It can be claimed that straw votes, public opinion polls are more likely to foster the ambitions of the various political parties than to enlighten public opinion to any substantial degree.

I remember, among other things, that in the province of Quebec, during the last election, a certain newspaper asked its readers to send in their opinions with regard to the probable outcome of the vote. This newspaper having compiled various letters and communications from its friends and subscribers proceeded to publish first rate articles —in large type, of course—in an attempt to show that the views of those friends and subscribers were, in fact, a true indication of public opinion in a certain area, in the province or even in the country.

This shows that straw votes, or public opinion polls are not based on a fair sample of citizens, a representative cross-section of the people, but that on the contrary, especially when they are conducted by newspapers or propaganda agencies and involve friends and subscribers of those organizations, they provide results which have very little to do, if anything, with the current state of public feeling.

Indeed, we have seen that, in the course of history, some countries ruled by dictators, have benefited from such artifice. If we recall Hitler's career, we remember that he prepared his elections by resorting to such manoeuvres and that he did so with a great deal of acumen and flexibility, so that the voter was not left to himself facing his conscience, and weighing with a calm and balanced mind his final opinion of the actual value of party programs or candidates. Well, by such excessive campaigning, he influenced voters and public opinion singlemindedly as to the actual value of his political program.

Here in Canada political parties favouring the universal vote are placed in a position perhaps more peculiar than in other countries, for our economy varies according to the area where we live. Because of Canada's geographical conditions, Canadians face different issues. For instance those living in the west or in British Columbia have to solve problems relating to industry and fishing. In the more central part of the west we have the issues of farming and agriculture. In Ontario and in the province of Quebec there are problems concerning industry and labour, while in the maritimes the problems of thermal stations, of fisheries and of shipbuilding take the spotlight.

We see therefore that because of the geographical configuration of our country, the Canadian citizen who wants to form his own opinion and study the various policies, must first consider every issue from various angles, always taking into account the province or the area where he lives. Now those propaganda organizations talk only in figures, without giving any substantial or constructive idea. They are often content to publish figures in support of this or that party. Needless to say that when a survey is limited to a certain district, the citizens of that area, because of geographical differences will not always be able to share, with regard to our commonweal, the opinion of those other Canadians who live outside that area or at the other end of the country.

That is why we have witnessed during the last election a propoganda which did not adequately inform our people. I believe those publicity and propaganda agencies should rather try to explain the economic and industrial problems of Canada, instead of just luring people with figures which do not give a real picture of the Canadian way of thinking.

In the last election campaign—as would have been the case in any other—Canadian citizens should have been informed of the problems facing the country. This way, Canadians could have been told of the situation of the textile industry, which is vital for many cities in the province of Quebec. In fact, several cities of that province depend upon the textile industry, as it employs more than 47,000 workers. Those propaganda agencies could have provided our citizens of the areas concerned with interesting data, constructive ideas about that industry, explaining the origin, history and cause of the slump, while suggesting at the same thing the appropriate remedies to improve the situation in that field.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that during an election campaign, the propaganda organizations should endeavour to keep Canadians informed of the very basis of our government, its various fields of activity, as well as about the Canadian constitution of 1867.

I feel that several members of the house realized, during the last election campaign —as was the case in previous campaigns— that very few Canadians are aware of the provisions under which the Canadian constitution allows the federal government to exercise powers in certain fields, while granting provinces perfect freedom of action in others, and putting municipalities in a position to meet their respective obligations. Consequently, propaganda agencies should endeavour, during any election campaign, to inform the Canadian citizen, so that he may be aware of the industrial and economic problems facing his country, as well as of the constitution which governs him. He would then be in a better position to assess the political platform of the various parties because, after all, propaganda should seek to educate, and this it cannot do by merely showing figures that do not mean much for, while they might reveal trends or policies, they do not explain the various grievances upon which the Canadian population is called upon to decide.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure —as I said at the beginning of my remarks— in congratulating the hon. member for Timiskaming, for raising, by means of his bill, a principle which is well in line with the general principles of the elections act, which demand that, during any election campaign, both male and female electors enjoy full freedom of thought and full liberty of conscience, in order that they may better understand the Canadian problems and the political platforms which are presented to them in those important circumstances.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, by taking part in the discussion of this bill I shall most probably ruffle the feelings of my colleague from Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard).

If I correctly understand the purpose of Bill C-19, it merely consists in amending the Canada Elections Act by adding the following sentence:

> After the issue of the writ for an election, or after the dissolution of parliament or the occurrence of a vacancy in consequence of which a writ for an election is eventually issued—

That, as I see it, is what the sponsor of this bill wishes to add to section 108, subsection 1, chapter 23 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, which at present reads as follows:

> No person, company or corporation shall, in any province and before the hour of closing of the polls in such province, publish the result or purported result of a straw vote or poll of the political opinions of the electors or any of them in any electoral district or districts in Canada, whether such publication is by radio broadcast, or by newspaper, news-sheet, poster, bill-board, handbill or in any other manner; any person contravening the provisions of this subsection (and in the case of a company or corporation, any person responsible for the contravention thereof) is guilty of an illegal practice and of an offence against this act.

Mr. Speaker, if I correctly understand this bill, it seems to me superfluous because it makes no change whatever in the elections act; it merely adds a few words to the provisions of that legislation. I feel that our opponents will certainly not achieve their purpose by amending the act along the lines of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, we were happy to read in last week's newspapers that according to a poll conducted recently in this country, the Conservative party is increasingly popular. This has had no effect whatever on the results of the March 31 elections.

I think I have a pretty fair idea of the real purpose behind the proposed amendment. I wonder, not without some anxiety, if our hon. friends of the "group"—to use the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch)—are not somewhat afraid of public opinion. Knowing full well that they do not enjoy a great deal of popularity in this country, they obviously must make every attempt to limit, among the people of this country, the results of the very restricted popularity they enjoy.

I would feel remiss in my duty, Mr. Speaker, if I were not to pay some tribute to the value of public opinion polls. I am convinced that many of my colleagues in this house share my views on this matter. Public opinion polls are the basis of true democracy, devoid of any taint of socialism, whatever form this socialism may take. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I believe that public opinion polls serve to prove the freedom of opinion enjoyed in a truly democratic country and that, further, it confirms the liberty of the press in this country.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are some of the reasons why I do not welcome the proposed amendment to the Canada Elections Act. By proposing such a legislation, it is obvious that certain political persons can gain a certain amount of newspaper publicity.

If our friends believe they are harmed by those public opinion polls, all they have to do is to ask for enforcement of sub-section 1 of section 67 of the Canada Elections Act. They will find there essential factors protecting their popularity, if they feel concerned.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that by bringing this amendment to the Canada Elections Act there is any other purpose than to suggest very sincerely that those reports are liable to influence people. There certainly is no undue influence in those popular polls because section 67 provides for such cases during an election campaign, and could be invoked to forbid their publication. If my hon. friends of the small group of the opposition will allow me, I will read that section:

> 67. (1) Every person is guilty of the corrupt practice of undue influence and of an indictable offence against this Act punishable as provided in this Act, who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, makes use of, or threatens to make use of, any force, violence or restraint, or inflicts, or threatens the infliction,....

I will not read the rest of the section. I only wanted to draw a parallel between the provision of section 108 of the act and the undue influence to which my hon. friends seemed to refer.

Mr. Speaker, I do not see how those public opinion polls can in any way influence the vote. I have more confidence than that in the integrity of the Canadian electorate. I am convinced that nobody would let his vote be influenced by glancing, on occasion, with a bit of discretion, at the results of those popular polls. People want to be informed, and I believe that it is the duty of the newspapers to inform them. A poll does not constitute propaganda. The report of a public opinion poll is only the announcement that, in some measure, a percentage of the population declared itself for or against a political party or politician.

I do not think that these polls can prejudice our friends in any way because people very often consider not so much the results of such popular polls but rather the programs and the candidates. That is why the Canadian people sent 208 Conservatives to this house in the last election. Therefore we see that the result of the public poll taken before the last election gave the facts and that the survey was neither inaccurate nor dishonest. I heard the hon. member who moved this bill talking of criticisms directed against the Gallup poll after the election campaign of Mr. Truman in 1948. However this just proves that such surveys of public opinion do not in any way change individual conviction, for even if those polls did not favour former president Truman, the result showed that the personal opinion of each voter was worth more than such public survey.

Mr. Speaker, I made these remarks because, though I am not opposed to this bill, I do not see any use in it. Without wanting to influence anybody, I believe this bill should not have been submitted to this house this afternoon.

Mr. Rouleau: Will the hon. member who just sat down allow a question?

Mr. Valade: I will allow you many more than you would allow me.

Mr. Rouleau: I did not quite catch the hon. member's answer but does he allow a question?

Mr. Valade: Yes.

Mr. Rouleau: As the hon. member is in favour of public opinion polls, does he also approve the public poll with regard to what has recently happened in respect of natural gas in the province of Quebec?

An hon. Member: Some of your friends have bought some.

Mr. Valade: I accept the hon. member's question. He might get information from Liberal members who have bought some of those shares.

(Text):

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, speaking in all frankness, at this very moment, I find myself sitting squarely on the horns of a triple dilemma. I do not know whether this bill has been prompted by a sense of seriousness, sour grapes or regret but, at any rate, we have to deal with it. I would like to point out, as previous speakers have done, that on two notable occasions, namely an election in the United States of America in 1948, and our own election on June 10 of last year, the public behaved in a way exactly opposite to that indicated in the Gallup polls.

I would like to submit very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion this bill denotes more than a modicum of paternalism on the part of that group. It displays the C.C.F.'s normal lack of faith in human nature and it is an attempt to legislate on a quasi moral basis. Frankly, I find it very hard to believe that this bill is put forward in a spirit of real seriousness. I would only submit that, in my opinion, it constitutes a violation of our inalienable right of speculation and on this basis I would like to say in brief that I cannot support the bill.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this is one of five bills before us this session which I believe are legacies of the former member for Winnipeg North Centre and all dealing with proposed amendments—

Mr. Herridge: Not this one.

Mr. McCleave: —to the Canada Elections Act. I hear my hon. friend opposite say that this is not one of his legacies. I am very happy to hear that. I have always thought that Mr. Knowles was a man of great intelligence and to know that this was propounded by someone else confirms me in my original belief.

If the House of Commons were to accept Bill C-19 we would be striking a massive blow at the freedom of the press.

Mr. Winch: Do you agree with the Progressive Conservative support of an election bill in British Columbia?

Mr. McCleave: May I read an extract from the bill which is before us:

> No person shall publish the result of a poll of the political opinions of the electors in any electoral district in Canada.

These are the words that are in the bill; there are others in between them, but assuming that this bill should pass the words I mentioned would make it impossible for the members of the press gallery, for example, to assert their right, as they have in the past, to travel about from one end of Canada to the other, to be wrong about the results of an election, or for that matter to be right. It would prevent them going forth asking questions, as is the normal custom of reporters, to find out how Canadians think about elections. I think it would be a very serious thing if we were to cramp these gentlemen of the press by passing such a measure as this. But, apart from the freedom of the press, there are other very grave objections to a bill of this kind.

Again, according to the subsection proposed, it would be an offence if any one of us were to write a letter to anybody else in Canada making some prediction or forecast about the result of an election. This brings me to a very grave form of objection. If we are to have a law we may as well have a law that can be enforced. It would seem to me to be a very difficult matter for the mounted police to run on the tail of all the reporters making the rounds to find out how they think the Canadian people feel about this, that or the other political party. As to the censorship that would be involved in the mail were you to send election guesses through the mail, it would be a terrific job. Under this section you would be committing an offence and we, of course, should not have the mails used for committing offences. Then, it would mean that almost every person in Canada would be up for violation of the section.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCleave: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Does the hon. member repudiate the expressed views of the Progressive Conservative members of the legislature of British Columbia who supported this principle in a bill covering elections?

Mr. McCleave: That is a fair question and if my hon. friend will send me over an exact copy of the bill that was passed by the British Columbia legislature I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. Badanai: You should know.

Mr. McCleave: Since it is coming up to six o'clock, I shall be glad to answer him privately and put my views on paper before him. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, you cannot call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The house does not agree to your calling it six o'clock.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, the question proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West is whether I agree with the philosophy of the Progressive Conservative members who supported a similar bill in the legislature of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: It now being six o'clock, the hon. member can sit down.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock. With the permission of the house may we return to committee of the whole on the matter which was under consideration at five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORIZE DELETION OF CERTAIN ACCOUNTS, CLARIFY ISSUE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Financial Administration Act to authorize the deletion from the accounts of obligations or debts due to Her Majesty or claims by Her Majesty that do not exceed twenty-five dollars; to clarify the circumstances in which special warrants signed by the governor general may be issued; to permit a crown corporation to establish a receiver general account with ministerial approval and to authorize the payment of interest on money placed to the credit of such an account; and to provide for certain consequential changes in connection with the administration of the act.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: Just prior to five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, when the house considered private bills, I had given vocal indication I wished to say a few words on this resolution on behalf of this group. I might say that we support the resolution, in principle, and anticipate the bill. This resolution provides for the introduction of a bill to make certain amendments to the Financial Administration Act. I notice most of these amendments are somewhat minor in character, generally speaking, but there is one amendment provided for that does interest this group particularly, and I judge from the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River interests his group also, and that is the amendment to clarify the circumstances in which special warrants signed by the governor general may be issued.

I cannot read the word "clarified" without thinking of the former member for Cape Breton South because that was a favourite phrase of his when he was in this house, when he was trying to get the government to clear up some misunderstanding with respect to legislation. I believe, from the point of view of this group, this is an important part of this legislation, particularly in view of the government's action last session and the large amounts that were passed under governor general's warrants and in view also of the failure of the government to include a certain warrant in the estimates of citizenship and immigration. I am sure the minister will recall the afternoon and evening debate that occurred on the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration because of the failure of the government to include in those estimates a certain estimate provided for by a governor general's warrant. I presume that while at the time the efforts of this group in that respect seemed somewhat futile, and the response from the government side of the house was negative, the introduction of this resolution would indicate that some afterthought caused the government to give a second consideration to their former actions.

As I said before, we are interested in this question of clarifying the circumstances in which a special warrant signed by the governor general may be issued. I think not only we in this group but a good many members of this house and, during the last year, a very great many people in the country, were seriously concerned about this matter. I am not questioning for one moment that the government did find itself in somewhat unusual and particular circumstances, and found it necessary on occasion to issue these governor general's warrants for very large sums of money. But the circumstances were such as to cause a certain amount of eyebrow raising and concern across this country by people who give consideration to the proper recognition of the rights of parliament, and a recognition of the proper procedures, and so on. We are very glad, therefore, the government has introduced this resolution.

However, to indicate the concern, I am simply going to quote from an article that appeared in one newspaper, and similar articles appeared in newspapers across Canada. I should like to quote from the Ottawa Citizen, February 17, 1958, shortly after parliament was dissolved and we had all gone home anticipating an election. The article is headed "Bypass Parliament with Half-Billion in Single Warrant". I should like to quote from it briefly:

> Largest single governor general's warrant ever issued in Canada—$544,290,332.32—has been received by the Diefenbaker government.
> By issuance of a warrant covering practically the full balance of the appropriations asked of parliament in the 1957-58 estimates, and the supplementary estimates to go with them, parliament is being bypassed completely.
> The only way parliament will have to deal with this half-billion is when public acounts are presented more than a year hence, after all the money is spent, unless the government elected March 31 chooses to get parliamentary approval in some other way—
> No additions to the estimates have been included in it but there are certain important deletions from them including one of $103 million which former finance minister Harris put in to cover the deficit on the old age security fund. This $103 million will not now show in the accounts for the current fiscal year and will either increase the surplus or reduce the deficit for the final accounting on the fiscal year.
> The government is said to have decided that there was no precedent for covering such an expenditure by issuance of a governor general's warrant.

Then, there is one more short paragraph headed "Difference in 1940 Warrant":

> One has to go back to 1940, the first full year of the war, to get a warrant of a size even remotely approaching the present one. But even there there was this important difference:
> The 1940 warrant did not cover expenditures up to the end of the fiscal year which meant that when parliament was asked to vote the money for the last month it could examine every item in detail if it wished.

I quote that to indicate the criticisms that occurred in newspapers across this country and which I think did reflect the concern of thinking people with these procedures, and with the securing of governor general's warrants shortly after parliament had been dissolved for such large sums of money.

I said, Mr. Chairman, we were going to be very brief at this stage. We look forward to the bill, and we will reserve the greater part of our discussion until we have the bill in our hands, and after we have had an opportunity for close scrutiny of the proposals contained in this measure.

Mr. Pearson: Before this resolution carries may I say that in so far as it deals with methods of tidying up some of the financial procedures that have been carried on in the past I think it is a useful bill and will be supported on this side. But as has already been indicated, we have a special interest in that part of the resolution which deals with a very important, and certainly last January, a very controversial question, that is governor general's warrants.

We should like to be assured, and we hope the bill will give us that assurance, that procedures will be laid down which will ensure that these warrants can be given full parliamentary consideration in the future, and given the consideration which we felt was not given last January. I should add that this kind of consideration was always given when we were in office because I think we were scrupulous in insisting that when governor general's warrants were utilized there was a method adopted by which parliament could always consider and pass upon them. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River before six o'clock did suggest that perhaps it would be a good thing to have this bill go before the public accounts committee for scrutiny. No doubt the minister will be considering that suggestion.

But apart from that, Mr. Chairman, we remind the minister, as no doubt he was reminded before six o'clock, that there is a specific statement on the record by the Prime Minister to the effect that the committee on public accounts would be set up for the purpose, amongst other things, of considering governor general's warrants. I refer to page 34 of Hansard for May 13, 1958 where the Prime Minister said:

> We intend to set up this committee;—

That is the public accounts committee.

> —we intend to have an examination of the expenditures made under governor general's warrants.

He must have meant an examination before that committee. He went on to say this:

> It is not a question of amount. There were governor general's warrants issued and passed and my reading of the record does not indicate that the stand we are going to take whereby the expenditures were made available to a committee of the house for complete examination was taken in the past.

Hence from that statement of the Prime Minister we have the right to assume that if and when this bill is passed the governor general's warrants with which we are concerned at the present time and which have not been considered by this house will be referred, as the first item or as an early item of business, to the public accounts committee as stated by the Prime Minister on May 13 last. We should like to get from the minister an assurance that this course will be followed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to confirm the precise reading that the Leader of the Opposition has put upon the statement of the Prime Minister on that occasion. He is reading that statement as saying that the warrants are going to be referred to the public accounts committee. If you will have regard to what was said on May 13 and May 14 by myself on the same subject, Mr. Chairman, you will see set out in some detail the procedure that is intended to be followed.

Any expenditure that is made, whether in pursuance of an appropriation by act of parliament or in pursuance of an appropriation by warrant, of course, falls within the ambit of review by the public accounts committee when reported to the house in the public accounts in the ordinary course. Certainly the expenditures made by warrant in the months of February and March as well as in April and the first half of May of this year will in due course fall within the ambit of the public accounts committee after the Auditor General has completed his normal audit. That is a different matter, however, from the task that will confront the house at the present session of dealing with warrants in a different context.

As was indicated by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River this afternoon, what is looked for and what I indicated in my remarks on May 13 and 14 as the intention of the government is to bring in a measure which will deal with the supply for the year 1957-58 including the warrants in a manner that will afford the house the fullest opportunity to go over the supply item by item. That is another measure. It is not the measure before us now.

What we are dealing with now is a resolution contemplating the amendment of the Financial Administration Act, for the future, dealing with the kind of situation we have encountered this year and to clarify the law in all respects so that in future neither parliament nor government will be left in any question as to what is the course that should be followed in a situation where it is necessary to provide for a needed expenditure under urgent circumstances by governor general's warrants. The situation about which the Leader of the Opposition was talking is one that is quite outside the scope of the present resolution. I expect within a few days to be bringing before the house a resolution which will deal with that subject and which will afford to hon. members an opportunity of reviewing the items that enter into the supply for 1957-58, including warrants.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps in a narrow, technical sense the point that I raised may not be related directly to the resolution which my hon. friend has introduced. But that resolution deals with governor general's warrants; and it seemed to me to be appropriate to refer at this time to the statement of the Prime Minister which does not bear any other reasonable interpretation than the one I have given when he said:

> We intend to set up this committee;—

That is the public accounts committee.

> —we intend to have an examination of the expenditures made under governor general's warrants.

The only expenditures made under governor general's warrants about which he could have been thinking were those made by the government in the last twelve months. Those must have been the expenditures which he said would be referred to this committee which was about to be set up. My hon. friend said that he is going to introduce another resolution on this subject which will indicate how these governor general's warrants are to be dealt with in order to ensure that parliament will be given the full right of discussion. All I am suggesting—and perhaps he will bear this in mind—is that in that resolution we would expect some provision to be made for the discussion of these warrants in the public accounts committee because that is what we were led to believe would happen when the Prime Minister made that statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I should remind my hon. friend that accounts are referred to the public accounts committee under the procedures of this house only after they have been audited by the Auditor General. The public accounts that go to the public accounts committee are those which have been audited by the Auditor General and are accompanied by his report. They will be available in due course when he completes his audit of the accounts in question. However, I doubt very much whether they will be ready for this session, unless we are here for a very long time. I can give my hon. friend the assurance that the measure which, as I have indicated, I expect to be introducing in a few days will fully reserve the rights of the public accounts committee to review all expenditures when audited in the ordinary course by the Auditor General. That measure will take nothing away from the well-established rights of the public accounts committee.

Mr. Pearson: I take it that my hon. friend is suggesting that provision will be made for discussion of these governor general's warrants in this session in an appropriate way by parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: The 1957-58 warrants.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; the 1957-58 warrants.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what I have been trying to say for some time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; but my hon. friend is also presumably suggesting that the governor general's warrants referred to by the Prime Minister on May 13 are governor general's warrants which will be available for discussion also in the public accounts committee when they become part of the public accounts. Presumably that means a year from now. By that does he mean that we shall have a chance to discuss these governor general's warrants now in the House of Commons and, if that is the case, that we shall have another opportunity to discuss them as part of the public accounts a year from now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, my hon. friend will have the double right. He will have his opportunities heaped up to the brim and running over. I wish to leave no doubt in my hon. friend's mind on that matter. The measure that will be brought in will undoubtedly afford the house an opportunity to discuss item by item the supply for 1957-58 that has not already been voted, including warrants for 1957-58.

Mr. Pearson: That is the interpretation then that my hon. friend is giving to the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is precisely what I said myself in reviewing this subject in greater detail on May 13 and 14. I dealt with this matter at some length and my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River this afternoon was referring to my remarks.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I think the minister might take us a little bit further along the road and tell us precisely what technique is going to be followed in this measure that he is going to bring in to provide for the consideration of these warrants. It is an unusual thing the minister is doing. It is something that has never been done before. It is very closely related to this measure. The minister need not fall back on the strict rules because there are plenty of precedents in this house established by the previous administration for the government taking the house into its confidence in order to get one measure through quickly, and telling us precisely what the contents of another resolution are going to be. A great deal depends upon the technique. We were told on February 1 that the present Financial Administration Act was perfectly adequate, that no change was contemplated. In fact the minister's own words were that it is crystal clear. Now he is bringing in a bill in respect to a measure which he says lacks clarity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are talking about two different things.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, if the minister will refresh his memory he will find it is precisely the same thing but, of course, as we know, the minister's memory has frequently failed him since he crossed the floor. However, I believe the passage of this bill might be expedited if the minister would take us into his confidence and tell us the technique which is going to be used in the measure he wishes to bring down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already quite fully indicated to the house the steps which will be taken in order to ensure to the house a full opportunity to deal with the items in the 1957-58 supply, including warrants, in so far as those items have not already received the approval of parliament. We are dealing with a measure to amend the Financial Administration Act and it would not perhaps be proper on my part to go any further than I have already gone; in fact, I think I may have already gone further than is proper in indicating the steps the government proposes to take to ensure to parliament the full opportunities requested and of which the government gave assurance on May 13 and 14 and again today.

The details of the procedure will be clearly spelled out when the resolution is before the house, which I have already indicated we expect to be in a matter of a few days.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-43, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

1. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) certain building materials, as follows:

(i) chimneys for buildings, not including fireplaces;

(ii) cornice, frieze, pilasters and other units or members of wood milled for use as structural or architectural building components, not including assembled or unassembled cabinets, counters, cupboards, furniture, ironing boards, work benches and similar installations;

(iii) ash handling and fuel handling equipment for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings, when connected directly to such furnaces and installed in the same building as such furnaces;

(iv) fuel oil tanks for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings and connected directly to such furnaces;

(v) latch sets, master key cylinder blocks, knobs and hinges;

(vi) hard surface plastic laminated building materials;

(vii) underlayment material for hard surface floor coverings for permanent bonding to floors;

(viii) articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of the foregoing.

(b) certain goods sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale, as follows:

(i) culverts;

(ii) structural aluminum for bridges;

(iii) fire truck chassis for the permanent attachment thereon of fire fighting equipment to be used directly in fire fighting;

(iv) fire hose including couplings and nozzles therefor;

(v) diesel fuel oil for use in generating electricity;

(vi) goods for use as part of sewage and drainage systems;

(vii) articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of the foregoing.

(c) certain agricultural, horticultural and forestry goods as follows:

(i) stock conditioners, condiments and food supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds;

(ii) goods enumerated in Customs Tariff item 417:

"Machinery and apparatus and complete parts thereof and structural iron and steel, of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported for use exclusively in the construction or equipment of factories for the manufacture of sugar from beetroot, or for receiving sugar beets, under regulations prescribed by the Minister;"

(iii) individual tree guards and tree protectors not exceeding thirty-six inches in height;

(iv) cut flowers;

(v) materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of grain or seed cleaning machines and parts thereof;

(vi) rodent poisons.

2. That the present exemption for fruit juices which consist of at least ninety-five per cent of pure juice of the fruit be extended to fruit juices consisting of at least eighty-five per cent of the pure juice of the fruit.

3. That the wording of the exemption for "bases or concentrates for making beverages other than soft drink beverages" in Schedule III be changed to read:

"Bases, not including fruit or imitation fruit bases, for making non-alcoholic food beverages; fruit bases or fruit concentrates for making beverages, when sold in containers not exceeding ten ounces and consisting of at least eighty-five per cent of pure juice of the fruit."

4. That the wording of the exemption for "flavouring extracts" under "Foodstuffs" in Schedule III be changed to read:

"Food flavouring extracts, emulsions and powders, not including those for beverages."

5. That the exemption for desks and chairs specially designed for class room use when sold to educational institutions be extended to apply to chalkboards, desks, tables and chairs, excluding upholstered chairs, without the requirement that they be specially designed for class room use.

6. That the exemption for fire brick, plastic refractories, high temperature cement, fire clay and other refractory materials be extended by removing the present condition requiring them to be "for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment".

7. That the exemption for materials consumed or expended directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods be clarified and brought into line with the exemption for fuel for lighting or heating, which excludes fuel for use in internal combustion engines.

8. That advertising sheets, local bulletins, local circulars and similar publications be excluded from the exemption for newspapers unless they have qualified as a newspaper enjoying second-class mailing privileges.

9. That certain goods enumerated in Customs Tariff item 848 continue to be exempt from sales tax by listing in Schedule III of the Act the following Tariff items under which these goods are being regrouped by Customs Tariff Resolutions:

399a, 399b, 399c, 848, 848a, 848b.

10. That payments under section forty-seven of the Act to the institutions for children and aged, infirm or incapacitated persons to which that section applies, be increased

(a) by enlarging the class of such institutions eligible to receive such payments by removing the present requirement that the shelter or care provided must be permanent or semi-permanent;

(b) by including in the payments an amount equal to the taxes paid on purchases made within two years prior to certification by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and made by or on behalf of the institution in the course of construction during that period.

11. That the annual fee for sales and excise tax licences be abolished.

12. That the excise tax on special editions of non-Canadian periodicals imposed by Part II of the Act be repealed.

13. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of June nineteen hundred and fifty-eight.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just want to take about 30 seconds of the committee's time to make reference to a speech made the other evening, if you could call it a speech, by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot—and I will not say Baghdad. The hon. member, when he finally got the bubble gum out of his mouth and got the maritime provinces straightened out—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Monteith (Verdun): Do you think that is funny?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it is funny and I did not think it was funny when the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot kept interjecting during my speech the other evening.

An hon. Member: If you spoke as well in French as he speaks in English you would be doing all right.

An hon. Member: Take your hands out of your pockets.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is obvious that the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare was not present and has not read the proceedings the other evening because the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot was very much obsessed with bubble gum and, as I say, when he finally got the bubble gum out of his mouth and got the maritime provinces straightened out he suggested that I was objecting during my speech to these tax reductions. I of course did nothing of the kind; I said that one thing which was apparent to me was that they all appeared to be good in themselves but that they were a paltry substitute for the removal of the excise tax on motor cars and I am still of that view.

Mr. Herridge: Am I in order, Mr. Chairman, in making a few remarks—

The Chairman: If the hon. member would not mind waiting a few moments I believe we were discussing paragraph 1 of this resolution. Shall we now discuss paragraph 2?

Mr. Ricard: Before we proceed to paragraph 2, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I find that it took him a long time to stand up in the house and to say that what I pointed out was not correct. I think that he has been advised, because of the repercussions and the things which were said about the way he felt about tax reductions and about the way in which he was judged by the small people, to say such things in this house. That must be the only reason why he now stands up to say something. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member flatters me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it, Mr. Chairman, that we are now dealing with the resolution paragraph by paragraph. I make that suggestion as a contribution to an orderly discussion, and if that is the case, Mr. Chairman, as paragraph 1 is divided into three parts, (a), (b) and (c), perhaps you might wish to call them as 1 (a), then 1 (b) and then 1 (c)—if that meets with your approval.

The Chairman: Is the discussion on paragraph 1 (a) complete?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question or two. I recall a very interesting speech made by the hon. member for Rosthern the other night, and, in reading some of these items he gave me the impression that he thought practically all the articles referred to were for the first time becoming exempt from sales tax. That of course is not the situation. For instance, chimneys for buildings, not including fireplaces, have always been exempt for buildings on the site and I think if hon. members will look at the next subparagraph, namely (ii), they will see that we are dealing with something very similar. It says:

> Units or members of wood milled for use as structural or architectural building components, not including assembled or—

And the word I emphasize is the next one—

> —unassembled cabinets, counters, cupboards—

And so on. I can understand that if cupboards and furniture and cabinets are manufactured off the site they might not be exempt from sales tax but I do not understand the word "unassembled" and my question is does the minister suggest that a cupboard cannot be built with lumber which is exempt on the site? If so we would not have any of these articles such as counters, cupboards, furniture, ironing boards and so on built from lumber exempt from sales tax if they were constructed on the site.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The ordinary rule is that if it is constructed on the site it is exempt but this new exemption excludes cupboards, cabinets and other things when they are prefabricated. They have not been exempt when prefabricated.

Mr. Herridge: Before this clause is carried, I want to deal very briefly with (b) (v) which provides for the repeal of sales tax on diesel oil used by municipalities in generating electricity. Apparently it does not exempt diesel oil used by lumber companies or mining companies—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Has the hon. member read the amendment? If he will look at Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, he will see on the third page the amendment I propose to introduce. The new paragraph 7a reads as follows:

> That diesel fuel oil when used in internal combustion engines used in logging operations and in the manufacture of rough lumber be made exempt.

Mr. Herridge: Does that include mining operations as well?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not mining operations; it applies to logging and lumbering.

Mr. Herridge: The minister has anticipated my recommendations 50 per cent, but I would still like—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder if the hon. member would mind waiting until we come to that particular item?

Mr. Herridge: I will wait until that time.

Mr. Benidickson: On this item 1(b), before getting down to the details we had some interesting observations from members of this party representing Fort William and Outremont-St. Jean. I will not repeat their remarks but simply say that some of us are a bit surprised, in view of the all-out statements of the Minister of Finance when he sat on this side when he said all purchases of municipalities should be exempt from sales tax, that his proposals tonight are not broader.

I am concerned with this item of ordinary materials to be used exclusively for the foregoing, in particular the sewage and drainage system reference. We are all aware today that municipalities, of course, normally make expenditures of this kind, but frequently municipalities pass on to subdividers responsibility for putting in this type of municipal service, such as sewage and drainage systems. Of course, the cost of these is passed on to the home owners, either put on their original down payment, as is unfortunately the case in too many instances today, or amortized through the tax system. But I am wondering, when the municipalities, in their expenditures for sewage and drainage systems, are to be exempt from sales tax, whether or not the minister has considered, when the municipality imposes an obligation on the subdivider to undertake this service, the subdivider's expenditure will similarly be exempt from sales tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Where sewers are installed by subdividers or contractors they may enter into a contract under which the pipe and equipment are furnished by the municipality and the contractor does the work of installation; or the contractor on finishing a job for which he has furnished the pipe and materials as well as the installation work may invoice the municipality separately for the work done and for sewer pipe and equipment sold to the municipality. The contractor would then apply for a refund of sales tax on the pipe and equipment he has sold to the municipality.

Mr. Benidickson: This would require that subdividers who are now providing these services should carefully look at the new law proposed, and they would have to make arrangements with the municipalities different from which they have been accustomed to do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In some cases that would be necessary.

Mr. Benidickson: On (c) this, of course, is an amendment to the farm and forest schedule of page 27 of the Excise Tax Act. I was wondering about the necessity for this amendment with respect to stock conditioners, condiments and food supplements for addition to poultry, cattle and other stock feeds. Does the administration consider that condiments and feed supplements are in addition to the item that already exists in the schedule for exemption, materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of feeds for cattle, poultry and other stock and fur-bearing animals? Why does the administration be so narrow sometimes? I am not suggesting this is anything new, but why would that wording not be adequate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The act already provides exemption for poultry, cattle and other stock feeds, so these additives are already tax free when sold in manufactured feeds. That is the nub of the problem. This exemption is to cover these additives when sold direct to the farmer who mixes his own stock feeds.

Mr. Herridge: I want to congratulate the minister on that amendment, because it is becoming an increasing practice in order to lower costs and if the minister had not introduced this amendment the farmer would not have received the benefit of the exemption.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. gentleman that this government is the farmer's friend.

Mr. Nasserden: Number five. Does that include the elevators, or are they dealt with separately? Most of these seed cleaning plants have a little elevator to run the seed from one to another.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, but I did not hear the hon. member at all clearly. Did I hear him say that this was under number five?

Mr. Nasserden: Under (c). The fifth one under (c). I asked whether the elevators are included with the seed cleaning machine itself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Grain and seed cleaning machines and complete parts therefor are already exempt. Most farm machinery is also already exempt from sales tax and in their case the exemption also extends to the materials used in their manufacture. This change will place the exemption for grain and seed cleaning machines in line with the exemption for other farm machinery by providing that the materials used in their manufacture shall also be exempt.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed to No. 2?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment on 2 which I would ask my colleague the Minister of Public Works to move. It is an amendment of which notice has appeared already in Votes and Proceedings. It is to this effect:

That paragraph 2 of the Excise Tax resolution be amended by adding thereto the following words: "and concentrates thereof."

It simply adds three words at the end of paragraph 2.

Mr. Green: I so move.

Mr. Benidickson: What does this accomplish?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment moves a reference to concentrates from paragraph 3 to the present paragraph. This is done because it is probably not accurate to speak of a concentrate consisting of 85 per cent pure juice of the fruit as paragraph 3 does at the present time. When the juice is concentrated it becomes something different from ordinary fruit juice. For example the water content is reduced. This amendment makes it clear that concentrates of tax-exempt fruit juice will also enjoy the exemption.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the discussion on item 2. We will proceed to item 3.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On 3 there is an amendment which appears in Votes and Proceedings which I would ask the Minister of Public Works to move. The amendment reads as follows:

That the present paragraph 3 of the excise tax resolution be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

3. That the proposed wording of the exemption for "bases or concentrates for making beverages other than soft drink beverages" in Schedule III—

That is Schedule III of the act. I continue:

—be changed to read:

"Bases or concentrates for making food beverages but not including bases or concentrates for making soft drinks or alcoholic beverages".

Mr. Green: I so move.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I recall in the past that the committee sometimes has difficulty with these matters. I have heard one or two hon. members who sit near me ask where they can find the schedule. The schedule, of course, is in pamphlet form and is also to be found at page 1251 of Hansard of June 17, 1958. The amendments appeared yesterday and I compliment the minister for putting them in Votes and Proceedings. They appear on page 1 of yesterday's Votes and Proceedings. I have no other questions at the moment.

The Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Does that complete the discussion of paragraph 3? Is there any discussion on paragraphs 4 or 5?

Mr. McIlraith: I have a question on paragraph 5, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if the minister would explain the requirement in paragraph 5:

—the exemption for desks and chairs specially designed for class room use.

Why must they be specially designed for class room use? Suppose they are of ancient design and it is not known why they were designed originally. What is the significance of that qualification?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those are the words of the present statute introduced by our predecessors, Mr. Chairman. What we are seeking to do is remove those words in so far as they prevent the exemption from applying to desks and chairs with the exception of upholstered chairs which are purchased for educational institutions. I think my hon. friend will recall that when some of us were on the other side of the house we complained that the exemption introduced by our predecessors was too narrow in limiting the exemption to the case of furniture of this kind specially designed for class room use. That meant where school boards purchased such equipment they had no exemption unless the chair was of a kind virtually suitable only for class room use. This present resolution is designed to remove this very restrictive application that was introduced when the amendment was first brought in by our predecessors.

Mr. Benidickson: I see that the minister is still forsaking some of his convictions because he is saying that education must be followed the hard way and he is not prepared to exempt the school board that buys a chair that has any upholstering on it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. It was felt that that might leave the door open to purchases that would not be regarded by my hon. friend and me as entirely reasonable for use in connection with educational institutions. If you introduce the upholstered chairs it is hard to draw the line.

Mr. Pearson: The farmer's friend but not the teacher's.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend in days gone by was one of those who advocated that all purchases of school boards be exempted as did his colleague in those days.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Give us time.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion on paragraphs 6 or 7?

Excise Tax Act

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Following the adoption of paragraph 7, may I ask my colleague the Minister of Public Works now to introduce by amendment a new paragraph, 7a which reads as follows:

That the following new paragraph be inserted in the excise tax resolution immediately after paragraph 7 thereof:

"7a. That diesel fuel oil when used in internal combustion engines used in logging operations and in the manufacture of rough lumber be made exempt".

Mr. Green: I so move.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I had not realized we had passed paragraph 7 itself. I thought we had only passed paragraph 6. It may not be readily known to hon. members of the committee that paragraph 7, as I understand it, is not actually a resolution that is bringing tax relief but it was designed for the purpose of bringing certain things into tax that somehow by administrative ruling have recently escaped tax. I wonder if the minister would give us a thorough explanation of the purposes of paragraph 7?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps it is convenient for the committee to discuss paragraphs 7 and 7 (a) together. Paragraph 7 proposes that the exemption for materials consumed or expended directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods be clarified, and brought into line with the tax treatment of fuel for lighting or heating, which excludes fuel for use in internal combustion engines.

The wording of this portion of the schedule to the act is as follows—

Mr. Benidickson: What page, please?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is in schedule III. It is under the heading "Processing Materials". It could be found on page 31 if my hon. friend has the same pamphlet copy I have.

Mr. Benidickson: I have the August 1957 consolidation of the Excise Tax Act and page 31 deals with schedule III not schedule I.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct. Schedule III appears on page 31 under the heading "Processing Materials". It is the only item under that heading. The language of this part of the schedule is as follows:

Materials (not including grease or lubricating oils) consumed or expended directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods.

This provision created an exemption for processing materials falling within these terms and it has been in the act for some time. The question concerns fuel used in internal combustion engines. It is obvious that fuel so consumed is consumed in production if the engine it drives is used in production but it was always construed that the fuel should be subject to sales tax and indeed until last October this clause was always interpreted as meaning that such fuel was made taxable by that part of the schedule that deals with lighting and heating because that section specifically excluded fuel for use in internal combustion engines. A situation arose last October which brought this matter into very direct focus. It concerned fuel oil used in internal combustion engines. At that time the view was expressed that if the fuel oil was used in internal combustion engines and consumed directly in production of goods it was not taxable under the present wording of the schedule which I have read.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Benidickson: Who reached that decision? What authority reached that decision?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Department of National Revenue, on advice. There was nothing conclusive about it. There has never been a judicial determination on the subject. But that was the view that was put before the department and in the light of that view the department notified the logging and lumbering industry of the view that they had reached that if the diesel fuel was used in internal combustion engines of the kind that are in use in logging and lumbering it was exempt.

The situation also concerned municipalities and recently in preparing the budget we came to the conclusion that this matter should be clarified and not be left in any doubt. Therefore provision was made here in the sense in which the clause that I have read from page 31 of the act and schedule 3 has always been interpreted to mean, and then we proceeded to deal specifically by amendment with the cases that had tested the law as it had always been interpreted. In other words, we have introduced the amendment which the committee has already approved in clause 1(b)(v), where the diesel fuel oil is being used in generating electricity and has been sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale.

Paragraph 7(a), the new amendment, is designed to extend in clear terms the exemption to logging and lumbering. I think that is the whole situation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Besides the lumbering industry a number of producers have enjoyed an exemption from this tax since October. What is the situation, that the tax will be reimposed on them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact is that they always had been understood to be not exempt, and this view that I have mentioned was expressed in October last, a few months ago, in connection with—it started actually with a municipality, where the issue was tested and then it was made applicable for a time to logging and lumbering. There never was any thought of throwing this matter wide open because very substantial revenue was involved in this feature of the tax and it was a situation that arose, as I have indicated, just last October. This is the first opportunity there has been to deal with it. No one has acquired any rights to any exemption by any judicial decision. It was a situation in which a doubt was introduced into the minds of the Department of National Revenue as to the effect of the act. Now, we are simply clarifying the act to make perfectly clear what has always been understood to be the law, what has always been administered as the law; and to meet the situation of the municipalities and of logging and lumbering operations we are creating the specific exemption for those three.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to see the minister introduce this amendment that exempts the logging operations and those persons engaged in the manufacture of rough lumber from this tax. I am rather pleased with the wording of the resolution because the rough lumber manufacturer is concerned. It will affect a lot of the smaller operators, people sawing rough lumber and using diesel engines to run their mills. They are the ones who are having the most difficult time under present conditions to continue in operation, and I can assure the minister from personal knowledge I have of a good number of small lumber operations who are in a touch-and-go position, not because of the lack of markets for lumber but because of what my friends from the prairies call the cost-price squeeze. I think that is the proper formula and every assistance in this way is of some value. I am very pleased to note this amendment on account of the number of small operators whom I know personally.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I assure my hon. friend that the situation of the logging and lumbering industry at the present time was carefully taken into account in providing this exemption for them. One realizes that that industry, particularly in British Columbia, is experiencing difficulties and this exemption is now clearly provided by the statute to assist that industry in view of circumstances.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad the minister has taken an objective view of a very real situation so far as the lumber industry is concerned. However, I do want to say that after conversations with the operators of a number of small mines in my district I think the same complaint applies to other operations particularly those engaged in the production of lead and zinc and those minerals which are falling in price. I find that they are operating under very difficult circumstances indeed and particularly those who are trying to continue development in small mining properties and continue at least a limited production in order to keep their men engaged. The cost of transportation, the cost of operation generally is up. The price of their products, as the minister knows, like the price of lumber, has dropped very seriously. In this respect I am appealing on behalf of the small mining operators, of which there are quite a number in the interior of British Columbia, particularly those who are mining the metals which have recently fallen so seriously in price. To indicate the position I wish to read a letter which I have received from Mr. Doelle, whom I know very well, the managing director of Sheep Creek Mines Limited. This is what he has to say:

> We are advised that implementation of budget excise tax resolution 1(b)(v) will result in the re-imposition of sales tax on diesel fuel used by mining companies to generate electricity at their operations.

And their drilling and their compressors and things of that sort where, by using mechanical plants, they use diesel fuel. The letter goes on to say:

> We are greatly concerned over the results that will ensue should the sales tax be again applied to diesel fuel.
> Mining operations in the West Kootenay located in remote areas where hydro power is not available have to use diesel fuel for power generation.
> Metal prices are depressed and costs continue to rise making it extremely difficult to continue to operate.
> The re-imposition of the sales tax on diesel fuel will be another burden that will certainly discourage us in our efforts to maintain operations or develop new properties in the area.
> We would solicit your support and co-operation with the hope that it will be possible to amend the resolution to maintain the exemption previously granted.
> Yours truly,
> H. E. Doelle,
> Managing Director,
> Sheep Creek Mines Limited

I read this letter, Mr. Chairman, only as a sample of a number I have received explaining quite clearly the difficulties that quite a number of those small operators are having, particularly those who are trying to continue to operate small mines in isolated places. Those people have unusual transportation difficulties compared with the larger owners and, shall I say, the larger and more highly developed properties where they have the capital and expend a lot on roads, tramways and things of that sort.

I was wondering whether the minister could give some consideration to amending the act so as to include, say, mining companies of a certain category or undertaking certain forms of development or operating under certain conditions; that is where they are operating at a loss or near loss in order to maintain employment and to keep the condition of the mine satisfactory until they can carry on with full development and full production. I would ask the minister whether he could give some consideration to an amendment that would meet the needs of those people. I am not making representation on behalf of those who are making profits and the larger corporations which are not suffering the difficulties of those small mining companies.

But in the interior of British Columbia we are very much dependent, so far as the mining districts are concerned, upon the continued operations of a great number of what are relatively small mining companies.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the committee will appreciate the difficulty, when you start introducing exemptions, of drawing the line. Here is a case where one has to be drawn somewhere. We have gone some considerable distance in creating exemptions for municipalities, for logging and lumbering operations. These exemptions are going to cost the treasury a substantial amount of money. I thought there was a special case for the municipalities, and I think there is a special case, which I believe my hon. friend himself sketched out, for the logging and lumbering industry, but as to other operations it is going to be extremely difficult to draw a line.

I must say to my hon. friend that the line cannot be drawn on the size of the mining company; that is not possible. It cannot be drawn, either, on the distance the mine is located from rail or anything like that. There are many, many complications in a situation of this kind. We looked at it very carefully, and we have not seen any basis on which we could, as yet, recommend an exemption for mines from the tax on this particular commodity. It is difficult, admittedly, but I think my hon. friend will appreciate the serious problem with which we were confronted. I must say to him that we did go a long way this year in creating these three specified exemptions.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister whether an internal combustion engine used to develop electricity for a logging camp would qualify for this particular exemption?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, I did not catch my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. Fisher: In logging camp operations, if a diesel engine is used to develop electricity to light the camp, will it be eligible for this exemption?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is in the camp, and if the fuel is consumed in the camp in the course of operations of logging or lumbering, yes, it will be exempt. It has to be used in the camp, associated with the actual logging and lumbering.

Mr. Fisher: That is fine, and it makes good sense. However, I should like to point out that you will find mining camps within a few miles of a pulp and paper camp with a lighting system based on diesel machinery. It does seem regrettable that one operation wil benefit from the exemption, and the other will not.

Mr. Benidickson: Am I right in thinking that since October they have probably both enjoyed tax relief, but the tax relief will only be continued in the case of the logging industry and will, from now on, not be continued in the mines who have enjoyed tax relief since October?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are not aware of any case where mines have claimed exemption or refund and the claim has been acknowledged.

Mr. Benidickson: Exemption was provided to municipalities on the grounds that they were producing goods or electricity?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, electricity.

Mr. Benidickson: In consequence of what they have enjoyed you are allowing them to retain the tax exemption privilege?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not just on that basis. It is an exemption created for the municipality in respect of the fuel oil that is used by it in generating electricity, and has been introduced as part of the program of the government in this paragraph to assist the municipalities. I stress again that this was not a matter of judicial determination. There was no decision of a court that the tax was not exigible in the case where diesel fuel was used by municipalities in internal combustion engines. There has been no judicial determination. It is a situation in which doubt arose in the Department of National Revenue as to whether the interpretation that has been applied throughout the years was the correct one. This, in fairness, was made known, and in this present resolution we want to clarify the law and we have, for the special reasons I have given, proposed to the house three exemptions.

Mr. Benidickson: Apparently it was made known only to those people who were in the production of goods, such as logs and lumbering or producing electricity—I am thinking of municipalities. Are those the only segments of the community that learned of the new attitude?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the first to learn were the logging and lumbering operators.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend says he does not think the mining industry has enjoyed this exemption, so he is not taking away anything from them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Canadian manufacturers' association learned of this too, but I am informed by the officials of national revenue that no one has claimed the benefit of exemption or refund except the logging and lumbering operators; I should say claimed and acknowledged.

Mr. McQuillan: I should like to ask if the diesel fuel used in logging truck engines would qualify for exemption?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If they are diesel engines that are used in logging operations, that will be exempt.

Mr. Benidickson: I hope that between now and the introduction of the next budget the minister will try to get an estimate of the loss of revenue that would be entailed in endeavouring to accede to the suggestion of the hon. member for Port Arthur that those engaged in the production of ores and minerals should similarly have an exemption from sales tax on this very important purchase that they have. As he says, they operate contiguously and there will be a sense of discrimination. I think there would be bad feeling if the matter is not given careful consideration.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on 7 or 7 (a)?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On No. 8, Mr. Chairman, there is the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday and which appeared in Votes and Proceedings. The effect of this amendment would be to strike out No. 8. I ask my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to move this.

Mr. Nowlan: I move:

That paragraph 8 of the excise tax resolution which reads as follows:

"8. That advertising sheets, local bulletins, local circulars and similar publications be excluded from the exemption for newspapers unless they have qualified as a newspaper enjoying second-class mailing privileges."

be struck out.

Mr. Benidickson: This amendment did not concern tax relief but introduced into the tax something that had not been taxed. I was wondering what type of paper the minister had in mind. I must confess that in my own riding in northern Ontario we have several very small newspapers. They are not the hand-out type of thing you often see in the cities to which nobody subscribes and the operator or editor of which receives his reward through soliciting advertising. The papers I had in mind were much simpler than the linotype production type, but they are produced and have good news value in the community. People subscribe to them.

Frankly, I was a bit alarmed when I saw this item in here because I had doubts that such papers would qualify, as do some of the weeklies with which we are more familiar, for the privilege of second-class mail rates. What was the minister aiming at when he put it in this resolution and what has prompted him to remove it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This resolution was originally intended to clarify the provisions of the schedule. If hon. members will look at page 29 of the consolidation of the act, in the schedule they will find under the general heading of "Printing and Educational" about half way down, the one word "newspapers". This word "newspapers" has not been defined by the act. This resolution had been intended to assist the authorities charged with enforcement of the act by attempting to define "newspapers". The rule that is followed in the post office, I may say, in determing whether a publication is to have second-class mailing privileges is that if the advertising does not exceed 70 per cent of the space it is still classified as a newspaper. If there is less than 30 per cent of the space that is devoted to news, then the ruling of the post office is that it is not entitled to second-class mailing privileges.

In view of some misunderstandings that have arisen as to the purpose of the resolution, we simply dropped it. The situation will remain as it has been. The exemption created by the act is in favour of newspapers and it will have to be left to other means to define what is the meaning of the word "newspapers".

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am very glad to note that the minister has dropped this proposed resolution from his list. I am quite sure he has had a good number of representations from across Canada objecting to the inclusion of this resolution.

Mr. Nowlan: No; not across Canada.

Mr. Herridge: From British Columbia.

Mr. Nowlan: And Alberta.

Mr. Herridge: Yes. We are more prone to take a progressive approach to legislation than are some of those who come from other parts of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: I received a number of representations, and I think they were based on very sound grounds. Some of what are called advertising or ad sheets are very useful little publications in small communities which in some cases could not support the regular type of weekly newspaper. In other cases they provide a sort of free enterprise competition for the local weekly newspaper that in some cases has adopted a Rip Van Winkle attitude to life, and things of that sort. I am pleased to see that the minister has recognized the value of these little ad sheets and mimeographed newspapers which on some occasions I find to be quite interesting. Many people have told me they were very glad to have them published in the communities. Once again I must say I am glad that he has listened to what appear to be representations from British Columbia.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee have heard the amendment. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion on No. 9?

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether the minister would explain this item. It refers to schedules in the tariff with which very few of us probably have any familiarity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This paragraph of the resolution is largely a technical amendment. The schedule of exempt articles in the Excise Tax Act now includes tariff item 848 which covers machinery and apparatus used in drilling petroleum and gas wells and in the exploration and operation of potash and salt mines as well as various kinds of drill pipe. The customs tariff resolution proposes that this tariff item be divided into six new items. That followed, as my hon. friend will realize, the report of the tariff board. Therefore if these articles formerly defined in tariff item 848 are to continue to be exempt, it is necessary to add the new item in the schedule of sales tax exemptions. Tariff item 848 and the new tariff items listed in this paragraph of the resolution are before hon. members. The six new tariff items contain everything that was formerly included in tariff item 848 except, and here I quote:

> Seamless, lapwelded and electric welded iron or steel casing, tubing and drill pipe of a class or kind not made in Canada for use in the exploration, discovery, development and operation of potash and rock salt mines or for use in the production of muriate of potash, or for use in the production of crushed and screened rock salt.

I may say that the customs officials of the Department of National Revenue have taken the position that the six new items cover everything that was formerly covered by item 848. In a word, this present provision is consequential; it is largely technical but it is intended to bring these benefits to the oil and gas and mining industries.

Mr. Benidickson: Do I take it that the exemption prevails for the salt and the potash mining although not mentioned in the resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; that is correct.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): In order to clarify the matter may I ask the minister this question? Is it not true that in the transfer from item 848 this just recategorizes the item under a different section from that under which they were formerly duty free? However, in the new category the duty now becomes 5 per eent, 10 per cent and 20 per cent. In other words, are these the items which come under what we generally refer to as oil country goods?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; that is included here and that is I think the one on which I laid particular stress. However, it is quite obvious that this amendment has to be introduced into the Excise Tax Act in order to conform with the new numbering and the changed provisions to be brought about by the tariff resolutions in the Customs Tariff to which we will be coming shortly, I trust.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): The point I am getting at is this. What is the relationship of this kind of item which is referred to as item 399a.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This present provision is introduced in order to preserve the exempt provision that has been enjoyed hitherto.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Surely the exempt position; but if you look at item 399a, I assume this has been recategorized as such and there is now placed on these items a tariff which hitherto did not exist.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We will come to the tariff resolutions in due course. This does not make any change in the tariff as such. It simply takes account of the change which the tariff resolutions are going to make in the tariff and seeks to preserve the exempt position under the Excise Tax Act that has hitherto been enjoyed with respect to these goods.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I understand, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: Am I right in understanding that this neither adds any new items to the exempt list or takes away any items from the present exempt list?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the view that the customs officials of the Department of National Revenue take.

Mr. McIlraith: That was my understanding of it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on No. 10?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on No. 11?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on No. 12?

Mr. Pearson: Item 12 deals, as the committee knows, with a very important matter indeed. It is concerned with a problem that really transcends the particular item itself. I refer to the problem of maintaining in this country a Canadian periodical literature. I am not at all sure—and perhaps the minister will give us his views on this matter—that the particular method used by the previous government to deal with this problem was the right approach to it. I am not sure whether or not it would have solved the problem if it had been continued. But there is no doubt in the world that the problem remains. The repeal of this particular tax does not do anything to solve the problem one way or another.

This problem, I suggest, is unparalleled in any other country of which I am aware. I do not know of any situation similar to that which exists between our country and our neighbour, the United States, in so far as the influence of periodical literature of one country upon another is concerned. That problem of course arises from the fact that we 17 million Canadians live alongside a country of 175 million people who speak the same language as do most of us and with whom we have a very close, friendly and intimate relationship with them which we desire to maintain. Our manner of living is the same. All this encourages the entry of periodical literature into Canada from across the border. It has also encouraged in recent years the production in this country of what are called the Canadian editions of United States periodicals. The problem, of course, would not exist if United States periodical literature and other forms of literature from that nation were printed in a language different from our own but that is not the case. The result is obvious if one looks at a bookstand in any Canadian town or city, but the common language manifests itself in this particular way I have just mentioned, the Canadian editions of United States periodicals.

This tax was meant to deal with that particular problem. I suggest that the increase of periodical literature from the United States into this country and the growing influence of that literature upon our people does have a relationship to our desires to develop a distinct and self-reliant Canadian identity—what we call Canadianism. The report of the Massey commission in 1951 had something to say on this subject, and this is a problem which I suggest is not being faced by the repeal of this tax. The Massey report had this to say:

> Every intelligent Canadian acknowledges his debt to the United States for excellent films, radio programs and periodicals. But the price may be excessive—
> The Canadian periodical cannot in its turn invade the American market; for Americans, it seems, simply do not know enough about Canada to appreciate Canadian material. Our periodicals cannot hold their own except in their limited and unprotected market, nine million English-speaking readers—

That was in 1951 but there would be more today.

> It cannot be denied . . . that a vast and disproportionate amount of material coming from a single alien source may stifle rather than stimulate our own creative effort—
> Officially we have no concern with newspapers or magazines . . . Nonetheless, it would seem to us incongruous . . . to leave unmentioned the newspaper and periodical press of Canada which provides most of the reading matter of most Canadians and which is still probably the chief source of knowledge to Canadians of their country and of one another.

Now that is the situation which confronted the Massey commission in 1951 and the situation exists today in a new form through the development of this device—if I may call it that—of Canadian editions of United States periodicals. It was to deal with this problem that the tax was imposed two years ago and I suggest that while this may not have been the most effective way of dealing with the matter—and the minister might give us his opinion on that—the problem nevertheless remains and something should be done about it because it is not an ordinary form of competition. This tax was not meant to interfere and did not interfere in any way, shape or form with competition, in the ordinary sense of the word, between Canadian periodicals and United States periodicals. It was, as I say, to deal with the problem of Canadian editions of periodicals coming from across the border and that is a problem with which it was particularly difficult to deal. I presented special difficulties for Canadian publishers and it has been alleged—and a good deal of evidence has been brought forward to support this allegation—that these so-called Canadian editions could never have developed and flourished in Canada on the advertising rates which were in fact charged if it had not been for the parent magazines upon which they could lean. It appeared that part of the expenses of the Canadian edition had been met by the larger publication in the United States and in that particular sense—although I certainly would not want to push this parallel too far—it might be alleged that this was a form of journalistic dumping as it was an unfair advantage given to the Canadian editions and the United States magazines. However, as I say, I do not wish to push this parallel too far, but whatever the reason may have been these Canadian editions have occupied an increasing proportion of the reading time of the Canadian public over recent years. This has constituted a special threat to Canadian periodical literature.

So far as this tax is concerned, as I have said, it did not make the position of the Canadian magazine publishers any less competitive than in the past and it was not meant to have and has not had the slightest effect on the United States magazines coming into Canada. In fact the two Canadian editions which have most benefited from this situation —Time and Reader's Digest—have not lost any substantial volume of advertising but perhaps it is correct to say that it has prevented an increase in the volume of advertising and in the circulation of these magazines in Canada. Perhaps it is also correct to say that it has prevented the appearance in this country of new so-called Canadian editions of United States periodicals. If this were a question of straightforward competition between one Canadian magazine and another I do not think anybody would have any interest in defending the position of any one magazine against another, but this is a question of competition in Canada from so-called Canadian editions of United States publications, some of the expenses of which are met in the United States. That is a very special problem.

I am informed, furthermore, that since the announcement of the repeal of this tax in the budget speech two United States magazines have announced their intentions of, in one case publishing a Canadian edition and, in the other case, resuming the publication of a Canadian edition which had been suspended when the tax was put into effect a couple of years ago and that yet another United States magazine, which I believe was on the point of publishing a Canadian edition at that time, is now reconsidering the possibilities in that regard.

Mr. Chairman, I merely call the attention of the minister and the government to this particular problem. Surely it is nothing that we can contemplate with any degree of equanimity, the disappearance or serious diminution of Canadian bona fide periodical literature. Surely the vision of Canada cannot include a periodical literature circulating in this country which is alien in spirit, in thought, in origin and indeed, perhaps, in some other respects. Therefore I ask the minister whether in repealing this tax as they are proposing to do in this particular resolution, the government is aware of this problem which I have attempted to outline and if he is aware of the problem, what steps does the government propose to take to meet it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. gentleman that the government was aware of this problem long before this evening. I yield to no one in my concern for the flourishing growth in Canada of a Canadian culture. The problem is a very difficult one in a country like ours with 17 million people alongside a country of 175 million and where the cultural influence of the United States is exerted with very great strength, persistency and constancy on the Canadian public in very many forms. I yield to no man in my desire to see a Canadian culture express itself in every reasonable form, and that will certainly include Canadian culture as reflected in Canadian magazines.

However, it is a far cry from a position of that kind, which I trust and believe is shared by all hon. members of the house, to defending this tax. This tax was brought forward two years ago in the guise of a measure that would assist in the preservation of the Canadian magazine industry. It never was a sound method of assisting the Canadian magazine industry. As a tax it was open to all of the criticisms that were levelled against it in all parts of Canada. It was an attempt to use the taxing power for a purpose for which, in my respectful submission, the taxing power ought not to have been used.

The problem was there before 1956. The government of that day had done nothing else about the problem. In 1956 it brought in the magazine tax. That tax was not a sound way of dealing with the problem, and we resisted it at the time. Nevertheless, the government of that day chose to impose this tax. What has happened in the two years during which this tax has been in effect has confirmed everything that we said about it at the time. What we indicated then might be expected to flow from the tax has, indeed, been realized. We were given to understand that there were two United States magazines in particular, that had Canadian editions which were going to feel the weight of this tax. We said then that those magazines would not feel the weight of this tax but that it would be Canadian magazines that would feel its results. That has been proved to be the fact, because the revenues of those companies from their advertising sources in Canada have not been diminished, but evidently the total budgets of Canadian firms that are advertising, so far as their advertising expenditures have gone into magazines or other media which are strictly Canadian in their origin, have been abated accordingly.

And so this tax measure was not of benefit to those whom it was claimed it was going to help. In repealing this measure, as we invite the house to do, we are asking the house to deal with the tax measure on its merits. The tax measure was not sound in the first place, and it does not deserve to be continued.

The Leader of the Opposition asked what the government is going to do about the problem. I may say that the problem has not changed in its essential aspects from what it was when the hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition was in office, and from what it was before 1956 when this tax was imposed. We have received representations from the periodic press association and others in connection with this tax, and in every case we have tried to show an understanding of the problem and a sympathy with the difficulties that have confronted the Canadian magazine industry, and we have sought some other ways of meeting the problem. We have invited them to put forward suggestions for meeting the problem, but nothing has yet been forthcoming that will meet the problem without either creating other and exaggerated forms of the same problem, or discriminations that cannot be tolerated, or measures that are of the nature of the present tax and which therefore cannot be supported.

I would be happy to receive from the Leader of the Opposition, or from any hon. member regardless of party, any suggestions at all for measures that can be of assistance in relation to the larger problem of the position of media of Canadian culture in Canada. I draw a line here, Mr. Chairman. We are not prepared, as we made quite clear two years ago in the debate on this measure when the former government proposed to impose the tax, to entertain suggestions that contemplate any interference with the flow of ideas, and a great many of the suggestions that have been made, all of which we have carefully considered, have been suggestions that would interfere in some form or other, perhaps not altogether blatantly, with the free flow of ideas. Undeniably there is a problem, and we will be glad to have suggestions as to anything that is sound and acceptable in giving assistance to meet the problem. But so far as this tax is concerned, it never was any contribution in any degree whatever to assisting in this problem, and therefore on its merits this tax, in my respectful submission, should be abolished.

Mr. Pearson: I am grateful to the minister for suggesting that members of the house should provide him with some ideas which may help him in the solution of this problem, the importance of which he said he recognizes, and I can assure him that any ideas which may come from this side of the house will not be such as to interfere with what he called the free flow of ideas across the border, because that is certainly not in our minds. If that were the solution to the problem, all we would have to do would be to put obstacles in the way of the admission of the United States magazines into Canada, and we do not want to do that. But the minister in his speech apparently did not make any distinction between news magazines as such coming across the border and United States magazines, news magazines like Time, putting a couple of Canadian pages on the front and a maple leaf on the cover and being sold in Canada as Canadian editions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is aware about the printing in Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I am aware of that but I am also aware of the fact—and the minister must surely recognize it—that the editorial comment and news and opinion—because it is a magazine of opinion—is United States opinion on all matters with which the magazine deals except in respect of two or three pages in the front of the magazine. Apart from that it is a United States magazine. I am not complaining about it being a United States magazine and in fact I read many such magazines but it does constitute a separate problem by calling itself a Canadian edition of a United States magazine.

Therefore, the problem we are faced with, as I see it, is not the admission into this country of United States magazines concerning which the minister asked us to address ourselves and provide any ideas we may have in connection with the matter. On the contrary the problem is specifically one of Canadian editions of United States magazines. He has not given us the benefit of his views as to that problem or as to whether it is serious and what perhaps might be done about it. He did say, however, that the problem existed before 1956 when this particular action was taken and that nothing was done about it until 1956. That is true, but the problem had not existed many years before 1956. The development of Canadian editions of United States magazines is a comparatively new growth in our periodical literature. I do not know exactly how far back it goes but I feel sure it does not go back much beyond 1956.

The minister in his statement said that this tax was not effective, that it was of no value or use. I am not defending the tax or attacking it. I am merely trying to elucidate the problem and get from the minister some appreciation of it and perhaps an indication that something will be done about it.

The minister said the situation is the same now as it was when the tax was imposed and that the tax had done nothing to help solve the problem. That, of course, is not the opinion of the periodical publishers in Canada of whom I have knowledge. They are of the opinion that this tax had been of some help to them. The figures reveal that in 1956 these two publications with Canadian editions, Time and Reader's Digest, had 49.9 per cent of the total number of advertising pages carried in all magazines published in Canada and a year later, in 1957, that had dropped to 49.5 per cent rather than increased. So perhaps the tax may have had that particular effect in stopping the increase in those two magazines so far as advertising pages are concerned. The same would not be true in terms of advertising revenue because the advertising rates were increased.

It also had another effect which I mentioned in my other statement. We are told that the imposition of this tax did prevent the appearance in Canada of additional Canadian editions of United States magazines since, in the last two years, none of these has appeared. We are informed now that two of them are forthcoming. One is to reappear and a third publication is contemplating a Canadian edition. While this tax may not have been the right way to deal with the problem perhaps it did have the particular result of precluding additional Canadian editions and if it is to be dropped I would hope something could be found to replace it which would make a contribution to the solution of this problem which is a very real problem affecting the Canadian nation.

Mr. Benidickson: Just for the record, Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire if the situation has changed. My last information was to the effect that Reader's Digest is printed in Canada but I understand that Time is printed outside of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, Reader's Digest is printed in Canada and has been throughout the period of which we are speaking. As far as Time is concerned, I am not sure.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think it is printed in Canada.

Mr. Fisher: Is it a fact that one of the magazines involved has taken proceedings against the government concerning paying the tax? If so, which one?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Reader's Digest resisted the imposition of the tax and there is a case before the Supreme Court of Quebec awaiting adjudication on that question.

Mr. Fisher: Does the government have every intention of proceeding with the case even if the tax is repealed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The repeal of the tax will not affect the tax liability up to date of repeal.

Mr. Fisher: I believe that the opinions of the minister and his concern for Canadian culture are more than merely pious expressions but I do feel that the Leader of the Opposition left with him a conundrum on which I hope he will exercise the government's initiative rather than taking a passive course. The remarks made by the minister sounded to me somewhat like the tradition established by William Lyon Mackenzie King of saying, "You bring your ideas to me". If this is a difficult problem, what do we have a government for if it cannot come forward with a proposal that will help the Canadian periodical press? It is too easy to say to hon. members of the opposition that they should come forward with their ideas. The people of Canada put these hon. gentlemen where they are because they were supposed to have ideas.

Mr. Pearson: I do not share that criticism. I think it is a highly encouraging thing that the government realizes there are ideas on this side of the house and would like to take advantage of them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said the same thing to various groups whether on one side or the other who came to see me about this. We want their suggestions and the more helpful they are the more we are grateful.

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion on paragraph 12? Is there any discussion on paragraph 13? Shall the resolution as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-44, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff by striking out subsection (1) of section 2 and substituting the following:

2. (1) In this act, and in any other act relating to the customs,

(a) "free" in any one of the tariff columns in schedule A means that the goods opposite which the word appears, and to which the tariff in the column applies, may be imported and taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, without duty;

(b) "gallon" means an imperial gallon;

(c) "hot-rolled" or "cold-rolled" when applied to shapes or sections, bars or rods, plate, sheet or strip, of iron or steel, includes shapes or sections, bars or rods, plate, sheet or strip that have been subjected to such further processing as annealing, tempering, pickling, liming or polishing;

(d) "in diameter" when applied to pipes and tubes means the actual inside diameter;

(e) "M ft." represents and has the meaning of the words "one thousand feet board measure";

(f) "n.o.p." represents and has the meaning of the words "not otherwise provided for";

(g) "p.c." in any one of the tariff columns in schedule A represents and has the meaning of the words "per cent, ad valorem";

(h) "plate" when applied to iron or steel means a flat-rolled product of any shape, of the following dimensions: more than eight inches but not more than forty-eight inches in width and 0.2300 inch or more in thickness; more than forty-eight inches in width and 0.1800 inch or more in thickness;

(i) "proof", "proof spirit" or "proof spirits" means any spirit having the strength of proof by Sikes' hydrometer, that is, spirit that at the temperature of fifty-one degrees Fahrenheit weighs exactly twelve-thirteenths of the weight of an equal measure of distilled water at the same temperature;

(j) "rubber" includes synthetic rubber, which may be defined by regulations prescribed by the minister;

(k) "sheet" or "strip" when applied to iron or steel means a flat-rolled product of any shape, of the following dimensions: "sheet": more than twelve inches but not more than forty-eight inches in width and 0.2299 inch or less in thickness; more than forty-eight inches in width and 0.1799 inch or less in thickness; "strip": more than eight inches but not more than twelve inches in width and 0.2299 inch or less in thickness; eight inches or less in width and 0.2030 inch or less in thickness;

(l) "steel" means any metal or combination of metals containing fifty per cent or more, by weight, of iron;

(m) "ton" means two thousand pounds avoirdupois.

The Deputy Chairman: In looking over this resolution I find there are 13 paragraphs. Is it the pleasure of the house that we proceed as we did before and discuss this as one resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this case, Mr. Chairman, there is a difference in the form of the resolutions. In respect of the amendments to each of the other three acts there was one resolution with various paragraphs in them. In the case of the proposed amendments to the Customs Tariff, however, there is a series of individual resolutions. They were put in that form before the house because most of them arise out of individual reports of the tariff board. They are rather different in nature and it was felt this would be of assistance to the committee of the whole in dealing with them.

For instance, the first resolution is one simply dealing with amendments of definitions. The second resolution deals with certain amendments affecting zinc and zinc products which arise out of a particular report of the tariff board. The third resolution pertains to iron and steel products and the amendments arise out of another report of the tariff board. Resolution No. 4 also arises out of the tariff board report on iron and steel. No. 5 arises out of the report of the tariff board on pipes and tubes and so on. We are, therefore, dealing with a series of different subjects which are the occasion of proposed amendments to the Customs Tariff.

The Deputy Chairman: Well, the first resolution is at the top of page 6 and continues down to (m). Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister in presenting these items in sections according to the tariff board recommendations and leaving to the last the miscellaneous items that we usually encounter is using a good system. At page 1247 of Hansard the minister made some reference to these resolutions that would come before us when he was delivering his budget speech. The first package group, if I may call it such, would be the zinc and zinc products group, and I find he had something to say about it rather different from what is referred to in any of the other groups. He was more positive. He said:

> These proposed tariff changes constitute a balanced package. On balance the proposed changes do not involve any increase in the Canadian tariff on zinc and zinc products.

With respect to the other packages, I take it that on balance he could not go that far. I am speaking in a general way—I do not want to delay the committee—but I want to show the contrast. He said, with respect to pipes and tubes:

> A major result of these changes will be to make more effective the protection which it affords to Canadian producers.

Then, with respect to the basic iron and steel products, he concluded his reference to that by saying:

I understand that Canadian steel producers consider the new schedule to be a decided improvement over the old one.

There is nothing that I think is more important to most members of the committee these days, Mr. Chairman, than the matter of trade. I think the expression of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is just as valid now as it was when he said it. He said:

Canada has need of three things. The first is markets; the second is markets and the third is markets.

I think most of us realize today that a number of our products are subject to the general agreement on tariffs and trade and we all very well realize that trade is a two-way street. I quoted the Prime Minister in my budget speech and he explained very carefully at Brantford that if we are cutting off trade in the nature of imports we are bound to find that some of our opportunities for exports will suffer, and that is what I think will concern the committee as we go through these items.

It is very difficult for the committee to determine, unless the minister will draw it to our attention, which items of the many that we have—several hundred of them—in front of us were bound items and have something to do with the trading that necessarily takes place when it is the intention of the government to increase the tariff on something that is bound under the GATT agreement.

The minister said on June 17 that there were other negotiations pending respecting GATT. We, I am sure, will be interested to know to what extent they relate to some of the items that we have in front of us, if they relate at all. I am thinking particularly of the negotiations that have been initiated with respect to fresh fruit and vegetables. The minister said: "Negotiations have been initiated." Again he said: "I hope that these will soon lead to an agreement on a more satisfactory schedule of duties." Well, as someone said, of course, the question is always, more satisfactory to whom? In all of these resolutions that we have in front of us I think that is the basis of the inquiry of the committee. What is the balance or is it more satisfactory to one segment of our economy than another.

I wonder whether the minister would care to tell us about the progress of negotiations with respect to fresh fruit and vegetables, particularly as it relates to the possibility of anything coming before the present session?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me say at once there is nothing in these resolutions that touches on fresh fruit and vegetables and I do not think it is proper to lead off into a matter of that kind. It was mentioned in the budget speech; it was discussed in the budget debate. If my hon. friend wishes to ask me questions of that kind on my estimates I shall be glad to deal with them. I do not think it is proper in this series of resolutions to deal with something that is not touched on in them at all. I should be glad to deal with it on my estimates.

Mr. Benidickson: I would like to hear from the minister as to the progress. Certainly, it is appropriate on the bill, but without delaying the committee I think the minister might just save time by telling us. He lost time last week, I think, by being a bit truculent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I was not truculent at all; the committee lost the time.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no doubt about that at all.

Mr. Benidickson: I intended to refer to it only as an illustration, that if we are negotiating to increase tariffs we are all practical minded and know that if we are dealing with items that are bound under GATT agreements some part of the economy has to be jettisoned and members of the committee want to know just who is being sacrificed if someone is being benefited and particularly in some of these agricultural items. If fresh fruit and vegetables get further protection than they have had so far is our principal supplier going to demand that they have their laws much more restrictive on some other product such as potatoes, apples, cattle or fish, or something of that kind.

On the zinc item I do not think that I have any questions. I accept the minister's statement that on balance this seems to be something that has not changed the general average of protection either up or down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend has no objection to the zinc item? Could we then deal with resolutions 1 and 2? Resolution 1 relates to definitions and there is an amendment to that resolution which I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works to move. The resolution appears to be a lengthy one as set out in Votes and Proceedings. Actually, it is not a change in substance but there are some definitions which the draftsman in the Department of Justice felt that in the amended form now appearing in Votes and Proceedings it would be improved, but there is no change in substance in the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I so move:

That resolution No. 1 of the budget resolution relating to the Customs Tariff be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff by striking out subsection (1) of section 2 and substituting the following:

"2. (1) In this Act, and in any other act relating to the customs,

(a) "diameter" when applied to pipes and tubes means the actual inside diameter;

(b) "free", when applied to any goods in the tariff columns in schedule A, means that the goods may be imported and taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, without duty;

(c) "hot-rolled" or "cold-rolled", when applied to shapes, sections, bars, rods, plates, sheets or strips of iron or steel, includes shapes, sections, bars, rods, plates, sheets or strips that have been annealed, tempered, pickled, limed or polished;

(d) "M ft." means one thousand feet board measure;

(e) "n.o.p" means not otherwise provided for;

(f) "p.c." in any one of the tariff columns in schedule A means per cent ad valorem;

(g) "plate", when applied to iron or steel, means a flat-rolled product of any shape

(i) having a width of more than eight inches but not more than forty-eight inches, and a thickness of 0.23 inch or more, or

(ii) having a width of more than forty-eight inches, and a thickness of 0.18 inch or more;

(h) "proof", "proof spirit" or "proof spirits" means any spirit having the strength of proof by Sikes' hydrometer, namely, spirit that at the temperature of fifty-one degrees fahrenheit weighs exactly twelve-thirteenths of the weight of an equal measure of distilled water at the same temperature;

(i) "rubber" includes synthetic rubber, which may be defined by regulations prescribed by the minister;

(j) "sheet", when applied to iron or steel, means a flat-rolled product of any shape

(i) having a width of more than twelve inches but not more than forty-eight inches, and a thickness of 0.2299 inch or less, or

(ii) having a width of more than forty-eight inches, and a thickness of 0.1799 inch or less;

(k) "strip", when applied to iron or steel, means a flat-rolled product of any shape

(i) having a width of more than eight inches but not more than twelve inches, and a thickness of 0.2299 inch or less, or

(ii) having a width of eight inches or less and a thickness of 0.2030 inch or less;

(l) "steel" means any metal or combination of metals containing fifty per cent or more, by weight, of iron; and

(m) a reference to a unit or standard measure of weight, capacity or extension means the Canadian unit or standard measure established by the Weights and Measures Act."

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Am I right in saying that the amendment really simply takes out certain definitions of measures and the plural is used occasionally where the singular had been used and there is a provision with respect to the plate matter and with respect to sheet?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And a rearrangement of some items.

Mr. Benidickson: It does not in any way affect the impost of the duty?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not at all.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution as amended carry?

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the second one, which is the zinc item, my hon. friend has indicated there is no objection to it. Perhaps we can carry that one tonight?

Mr. Chevrier: If you are a good boy we will carry it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am always good.

Mr. Benidickson: I would be agreeable to that. I did not say and I probably should say that to the extent I have been able to compare the recommendations of the tariff board with the schedules in resolution No. 2 I find there has been no deviation, that the tariff board report has been accepted throughout, both in definitions and in rates. Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Mr. Argue: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall resolution No. 2 carry?

Mr. Argue: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask if No. 2 was carried?

The Deputy Chairman: No.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, we shall commence with the second reading of the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act; then take the resolutions concerning the Customs Tariff; then the Estate Tax Act; the Income Tax Act; the bill to amend the Loan Companies Act; the bill to amend the Trust Companies Act. After that, we will take agricultural estimates.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 30, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Third report of standing committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government.—Mr. Rowe.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on public accounts, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Question No. 32—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Have any changes been made in the regulations or the procedure for dealing with Chinese immigration applications since June 21, 1957?
2. If so, when were the changes made and what is their effect?
3. How many applications for the admission of Chinese were outstanding on June 21, 1957?
4. How many applications have been (a) accepted; (b) rejected since that date?
5. How many Chinese applications were outstanding at the latest available date?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

The answer to part 1 is yes, a change has been made in the regulations. No change has been made in the procedure.

The answer to part 2 is by order in council P.C. 1957-1675 effective December 20, 1957, paragraph (d) of section 20 of the immigration regulations was revoked and the following substituted therefor:

a person who is a citizen of a country other than a country referred to in paragraphs (a), (b) or (c) or in section 21, if such person is the husband, the wife or the unmarried child under 21 years of age, the father where he is over 65 years of age, or the mother where she is over 60 years of age, of a Canadian citizen or of a person legally admitted to Canada for permanent residence who is residing in Canada and who has applied for and is in a position to receive and care for any such person, but no such child shall be landed in Canada unless his father or his mother, as the case may be, is landed in Canada concurrently with him.

This change enables persons who have been legally admitted to Canada for permanent residence and are residing in Canada to apply for their dependants.

The answer to part 3 is 122 as of June 30, 1957.

The answer to part 4 is 1,844 accepted, 73 rejected.

The answer to part 5 is 119 as of June 30, 1958.

VICTORY BOND REPLACEMENTS

Question No. 35—Mr. Benidickson:

1. In dollar value what has been acceptance to date of the government's offer to replace all unmatured 3 per cent victory bonds?
2. What amounts, applied for conversion, are in the 4½ per cent, 4¼ per cent, 3¾ per cent and 3 per cent interest rate categories respectively?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I am very happy to report to the house in reply to the first part of the question that the volume of conversions yesterday passed the two and a half billion dollar mark. More than 40 per cent of all the outstanding victory bonds have now been converted.

The answer to question No. 2 is that the information is not available. The operation is so huge that it is not possible to collate, check and break down into these categories the information that is coming in from more than 5,000 reporting agencies now.

CONVERSION LOAN—COMMISSION RATES

Question No. 36—Mr. Benidickson:

1. What compensation in commission rates or otherwise has the government agreed to pay agents or brokers handling the Canada conversion loan of 1958?
2. How does this commission rate compare with similar brokerage fees applicable to annual sale of savings bonds, during the last three years?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The answer to the first question is that, on the 3 per cent bonds for three and one-quarter years, the commission is one-quarter of one per cent; on the seven year 3¾ per cent bonds, one-half of one per cent; on the 14 year 4¼ per cent bonds, three-quarters of one per cent, and on the 25 year 4½ per cent bonds, 1 per cent. The issuing fee on all maturities is one-quarter of one per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: The issuing fee is in addition?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, they are separate. I should add that no sales commission or issuing fee is payable in respect of bonds converted by the Bank of Canada, government accounts or chartered banks for their head office portfolios. Moreover, there is a list of about 2,500 names including all the large corporate investors in Canada who are being covered on a co-operative basis by the investment dealers under the direction of a national committee. In the case of conversions by these corporate investors, the rate of commission is one-quarter of one per cent on the three and one-quarter year 3 per cent bond, and one-half of one per cent on all other maturities. It will be seen that this is substantially reduced from the ordinary commission available.

The answer to the second question is that there have been savings bonds campaigns in the years 1955, 1956 and 1957. In every case the commission paid was three-quarters of one per cent. The issuing and redemption fee in all cases was one-quarter of one per cent.

It is quite clear that the average rate of commission paid in the total on the conversions on the Canadian conversion loan of 1958 will be less than that paid on the Canada savings bond issues in any of the years that are referred to in the question of my hon. friend.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WALTER MITCHELL

Motion No. 30—Mr. Chevrier:

For a copy of all papers, affidavits, letters, photographs, and other documents, including all the evidence in the possession of the Minister or the Department of Agriculture, or any other department, leading to the dismissal of one Walter Mitchell as checker and fumigator at the port of Montreal.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the documents asked for in this motion, I am informed, are interdepartmental reports and correspondence, reports and correspondence within the department, and correspondence which is marked personal or confidential. I am also informed it has never been the custom of the house to have documents of this nature produced. If there are any documents in addition to these I shall be glad to produce them.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I protest the minister's decision. The minister will recall a debate which took place early last week in which he made it clear that there was no secrecy in connection with the dismissal of this individual.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion is not debatable.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING PLAN AGREEMENT

Motion No. 29—Mr. White:

For a copy of the complete agreement between the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand regarding the commonwealth air training plan, entered into in May of 1940.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): May I have permission to revert to motion No. 29?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give permission to revert to item No. 29 under this heading, which was allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: This motion can be accepted with a reservation which the Secretary of State for External Affairs wishes to make.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to express a reservation—I am not debating the motion—by way of explanation. I assume that the matter to which the hon. member referred is the memorandum of agreement relating to the training of pilots and air crew in Canada and their subsequent service, dated December 17, 1939. There was no agreement entered into in May, 1940. Subject to the usual reservations, the motion is acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the reservations expressed?

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

UNITED STATES—PRESSURE TO CURTAIL IMPORTS OF ALUMINUM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of reports that pressure is being brought on the United States government by domestic producers to limit the importation of aluminum into that country, will the government emphasize to the United States government the strong exception that would be taken in Canada to any such course, if they have not already done so?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In order that I may discuss this matter with other departments I will accept the question as notice.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would care to say what progress is being made with the United States in the setting up of administrative machinery in that country through which to clear orders given to Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies with respect to trade with China, and whether there has been an order for pulpwood sent to the United States for clearance.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question or one similar to it was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), and perhaps my answer to that question will be sufficient for the hon. member who is asking this question.

The hon. member for Ottawa West yesterday referred to a press dispatch from Washington to the effect that Canada has presented for approval in that city a number of export cases for shipment of strategic materials, including sulphite pulp to communist countries, and his question was in part as follows:

Can the minister tell us how many cases have been presented for approval, what products they cover and whether or not any approvals have been granted?

I am not aware of any press dispatch which fits the description given by the hon. member for Ottawa West, although there have been a number of press dispatches on this subject in somewhat general terms. There have also been reports of discussions in Washington in which officials, acting on the request of a Canadian subsidiary of a United States company, have put information before United States authorities in order to obtain release for the United States parent companies from the effects of the United States government foreign assets control in cases where the subsidiary wishes to export to China under a Canadian permit.

So far only one request for such assistance has arisen; it affects bleached sulphite pulp. I understand the United States authorities have this order under consideration, and I do not anticipate any difficulty in this case; in fact I understand that a licence is being issued to the United States company, but if the necessity should arise there would be a consultation in accordance with the understanding reached on the occasion of the President's recent visit.

We are prepared to continue our consideration of this general problem in accordance with the favourable attitude adopted in this matter by the President and by Mr. Dulles when they were in Ottawa.

Mr. Argue: As a supplementary question, may I ask if the minister has any information which he feels would warrant a statement in a Canadian Press dispatch, as reported in the Montreal Gazette today, to the effect that United States officials said they expect to set up within the next few days the administrative machinery for handling requests from those United States-owned subsidiaries in Canada which wish to trade with red China. Does the minister know whether such administrative machinery is likely to be set up within the matter of a few days?

Mr. Churchill: That, of course, is a matter for the United States. I did see that press report, but I have no further information.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a further supplementary question. In view of the uncertainty which still exists in regard to this matter, can the minister now tell us what was the exact understanding reached with the President when he was in Ottawa, to which the minister referred in his statement?

Mr. Churchill: The Leader of the Opposition refers to uncertainty. There was tremendous uncertainty with regard to this subject at the time my hon. friends opposite were in power, and nothing was done. We had a clear understanding with the President and Mr. Dulles that this matter would be given full and careful consideration. It is only a matter of a few weeks since those distinguished gentlemen were here, and it is not possible at this stage to dot all the i's and cross all the t's with regard to these negotiations. We have made some progress, and I point to the fact that bleached sulphite pulp is now about to be shipped to China as a result of this arrangement. This is a step in the right direction, and we have every reason to hope that we will have a very clear and complete understanding on this subject in the very near future.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED REDUCTION BY U.K. IN PROHIBITED EXPORTS TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question with regard to a report in the press to the effect that by unilateral action the government of Great Britain has reduced the list of goods prohibited for export to China, and the hon. gentleman went on to ask if the Canadian government proposed taking the same kind of action.

I judge that the Leader of the Opposition was referring to current press reports concerning discussions which have been proceeding in Paris on the subject of the future of strategic controls. There has been no unilateral action to my knowledge. The conference has now concluded its discussion and a wide measure of agreement was reached regarding the form of controls on east-west trade in strategic materials which will be maintained by all participating countries. The results will be made evident as soon as possible by an amended version of the export control list, which will be published in the Canada Gazette in due course.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT OF PROPOSED INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sorry I have not given him notice, and perhaps he will take the question as notice and answer it at a later time. The first part of the question is, what position has Canada taken regarding the proposed extra diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second through the Chicago drainage scheme? Second, if this diversion is permitted what effect will it have on our hydro potential and the successful operation of the St. Lawrence seaway; and third, if this diversion is permitted will Canada apply the same principle or doctrine with respect to boundary waters between Canada and the United States, and rivers with their headwaters in Canada but flowing into the United States?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I accept this question as notice.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO HALT VIOLENCE IN INTERIOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stuart Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that there have been three more bombings in the Okanagan valley by persons unknown during the past 48 hours, and in view of the fact that the lines of the Canadian National Railways have been attacked for the first time, could the minister state whether he is prepared to intervene in this matter and, by the implementation of more intensive police activity, seek to find an effective means of protecting the lives and property of Canadian citizens from further jeopardy?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I am aware of the incidents to which he refers, and I wish to assure those whom he represents and this house that we are continuing to investigate these incidents with every resource at our disposal.

With regard to the specific terms of the question, I must point out that we could intervene with specific action only on the request of the provincial authorities, and that no such request, in that sense, has been received.

As the hon. gentleman knows, the whole matter of the Doukhobor problem has been under discussion recently between ourselves and the government of British Columbia, and it continues to be the subject of negotiation between the two governments. I might say that in regard to these discussions—and I do not think I am in breach of any agreement regarding the confidential nature of such discussions—satisfaction was expressed by the provincial authorities with respect to the efforts being made by the police with the resources at their disposal. There was no criticism of the police methods or activities or the interest or readiness of the police to co-operate with the provincial authorities and use every method at their disposal to investigate and identify the perpetrators of these outrages.

I should also say that the authorities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police here are maintaining constant communication with the officer commanding E division—that is, the contract division in British Columbia—with a view to ascertaining from him whether any further support or assistance is desired and, if so, to be in a position to furnish that assistance whenever it might appear that further actual strength is necessary.

I should point out further that while we are not as yet able to report any results of the investigation of these most recent bombings, which took place only within the last 48 hours, five arrests have been made as a result of the series of bombings which took place elsewhere in the Okanagan area within the last two weeks. Those cases have not yet come up for trial.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman and the house, as I have assured the government of British Columbia, that we remain ready at all times to consider sympathetically any specific requests which might be made for specific assistance in dealing with this problem.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister inform the house if there have been any further developments with respect to the correspondence between the Canadian government and the government of British Columbia which he mentioned some days ago?

Mr. Fulton: I have not checked on that matter today, Mr. Speaker, but as of yesterday I was informed that no further correspondence had been received. The hon. member will recall that the premier of British Columbia had said that we would be hearing from him in due course as to the specific proposal under discussion between the two governments, and nothing further had come in as of yesterday.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY UNIONS—INQUIRY AS TO CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I have a question which I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour. I note that his office announced yesterday receipt of the report of the conciliation board in the dispute between the non-operating employees of the railways and the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and other railways. I am wondering whether the minister has any comment to make on the majority report, and whether he has any information to give to the house as to whether it will be accepted by the parties.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The report has been received, that is both the majority and the minority reports. We have sent copies of both these reports to the interested parties in the dispute, but I have no comment to make at this time as to how the majority report will be received. I can only hope that it will be accepted.

FINANCE

RUBBER FOOTWEAR—INQUIRY AS TO TARIFF BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister inform the house when he expects to table the report of the tariff board on rubber footwear?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received the report.

FISHERIES

REPORTED AGREEMENT BY JAPAN TO MOVE FISHING BOUNDARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report in a recent issue of Business Week to the effect that Japan had agreed with the United States to move her fishing boundaries five degrees to the west of the present boundary and, if the report is correct, was Canada consulted as a member, along with the United States and Japan, of the north Pacific salmon fisheries commission?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I have not seen the article to which the hon. member refers and I should therefore not like to comment on it at this time, except to say that all three countries referred to are members of the salmon fisheries commission which the hon. member mentioned, and that no official action would be taken unilaterally by any one of them.

Mr. Howard: This was bilateral.

FRUIT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I apologize for not having sent him notice, but the question is the result of a sort of mental spontaneous combustion. Anyway, I am sure the minister knows the answer to it, and has it on the tip of his tongue—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance that the government is the farmer's friend, could the minister inform the house when this friendship will be further demonstrated by the making of deficiency payments to British Columbia fruit growers on certain 1957 tree fruit crops, to which they have been looking forward for some time?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member asked much the same question about 10 days ago, I think, and I told him at that time that we were giving consideration to this question and waiting for further information from the British Columbia tree fruit growers' association with regard to the 1957 apple crop. That information has come to hand, and I expect I will be in a position to make some statement about this matter in the very near future.

PRIVILEGE

MR. AIKEN—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter which I believe to be a question of privilege. In the first column on page 7 of the Ottawa Journal of July 29, 1958, I am described as "Gordon Aiken, Liberal, Parry Sound-Muskoka." This is such a colossal misstatement of fact in a usually reliable newspaper that I believe the record should be kept straight.

PRICE SPREADS

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we all realize that the Prime Minister is, understandably, away on an errand which I am sure will give him much pleasure. Could I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would take this question as notice. Would he give the house a progress report on the investigations being carried out by the royal commission on price spreads which was set up on December 10, 1957, under the presidency of Dr. Andrew Stewart of Alberta university? We all noted that Dr. Stewart was here last week, and I imagine he probably conferred with members of the government.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Perhaps I could reply to this question. Dr. Stewart and the commission have been carrying on an active investigation of this matter, as I think the hon. member knows. The commission held hearings in the western provinces first of all, and then moved to the maritime provinces. During the summer months they have been doing a considerable amount of investigatory work. The public hearings will be resumed this fall.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—ORGANIZATION OF MASS DELEGATION TO OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the very far-reaching and extraordinary decision taken recently by the Saskatchewan federation of agriculture, namely that a mass delegation be organized to go to Ottawa because of the failure of the government to make a statement on deficiency payments arising out of its promises in that regard.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am waiting, because you have not put the question yet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have made your speech. Now what is the question?

Mr. Argue: I thought the minister heard my question.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Argue: My question was whether or not the minister's attention had been drawn to a far-reaching and extraordinary decision taken a few days ago by the Saskatchewan federation of agriculture, namely to organize a mass delegation to go to Ottawa because the government had failed to announce its policy with regard to deficiency payments, particularly in view of the government's many promises in that regard. I asked for comment, but if the minister does not care to comment I ask him when the government is going to make an announcement on deficiency payments, and whether he has had any word of such a mass delegation being organized.

Mr. Churchill: I have no hesitation about commenting on any proposition or question put forward by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I am quite prepared to deal with him on any occasion. This problem of deficiency payments has been drawn to my attention very forcefully by practically all the members of this house who come from western Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia is certainly the last one to mention it to me today. He has sent me a clipping from the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of Saturday, July 26, which reports that the president of the Saskatchewan farm union described the discussions which the interprovincial farm union council held with the federal government and then, in quotation marks, follows the comment of the S.F.A. secretary:

> Both farm officials concurred that promises of deficiency payments had been made, but apparently no action was forthcoming.

I submit that to my knowledge no promises with regard to deficiency payments were made, but a promise to consider the representations of the farm organizations was made, and great pains have been taken to consider fully all these proposals.

In reply to the final part of the hon. member's question, there will be an answer to this whole problem just as soon as it is possible for the Prime Minister to be back here in Ottawa. He has had other duties which have taken him afield. It will be just a matter of days before an announcement is made concerning this whole problem, and I think that announcement will clearly indicate to members of this house as well as to the people of western Canada that this government is fully aware of the problems affecting western agriculture and is quite prepared to take such steps as are necessary to assist the farming population of western Canada.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Has the attention of the minister been drawn recently to a statement made by the Prime Minister in Moose Jaw on March 15, 1958, to the effect that sympathetic consideration should be given to making deficiency payments to wheat, oats and barley growers so that their returns would bear a fair relationship to the cost of production?

Mr. Churchill: My attention has been drawn to that statement. There is nobody in this country with more sympathy for the problems of the farmers than the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wonder if he is aware of a mimeographed letter that was sent to the residents of my constituency by the hon. member for Assiniboia in regard to deficiency payments?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to the contents of that mimeographed letter in which the hon. member for Assiniboia offers some criticism of me—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I think I will send out another one, because it is getting so much attention.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That public accounts, volumes I and II, and the report of the Auditor General of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche).

To a question I had put on the order paper, the answer I received from the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) was in English only. Can the Secretary of State tell the house if he is in a position to intervene with his colleagues so that regard may be had for the bilingual character of this country and that, accordingly, answers to our questions may be obtained in the two official languages of this country?

(Text):

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-44, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that this bill does not meet with the approval of what I believe is the overwhelming majority of the Canadian people who fully expected the elimination of the excise tax on automobiles, I therefore move:

That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the repeal or reduction of the excise tax on motor cars.

And now, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Chevrier: You do not run the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I ask, if my hon. friend has given the house the text of the amendment, that it be read, because I wish to make a submission to you to the effect that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. Badanai: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a few words. I do not wish to take the time of the house unduly.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member is speaking on the principle of the bill on second reading?

Mr. Badanai: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have no power to direct that any amendments be filed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understood that my hon. friend had just read an amendment he was offering to the house. I believe he just read the text to you.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; did the hon. member propose an amendment?

Mr. Badanai: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have just read it and a copy has been sent to the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: It has been moved by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai):

That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the repeal or reduction of the excise tax on motor cars.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, now that the amendment is before the house I submit to you that it is not in order. It has no relevance to the bill or to the principle of the bill. What is now before the house for debate on second reading is the principle of the bill. The principle of this bill is to amend the Excise Tax Act by certain designated amendments in accordance with the resolutions which were reported to the house by the committee of ways and means and approved by the house. There is not a word in this bill that relates to the excise tax on motor vehicles.

It is a well established principle that the opening of an act by an amending bill opens it only to the extent of the amendments proposed and only as to those clauses of the main act which the amending bill proposes specifically to amend. My hon. friend is now proposing to go completely outside the terms of the bill and introduce a subject that is foreign to the bill. In my respectful submission the amendment is out of order.

There is, of course, the further point directly associated with the principle of the bill. The amendment has no relevance whatever to the principle of the bill.

There is also the third point that an attempt was made in the committee of ways and means to introduce a similar amendment, in other words to amend the resolutions that were put before the committee of the whole in the ordinary course arising out of the budget resolutions, and that attempted amendment was ruled out of order in the committee of the whole by the chairman. This is an attempt to repeat the same tactic and introduce the same amendment. In my respectful submission this amendment is completely out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be able to refer me to some authority to support his case, because I consider that different principles apply to debate on second reading than to debate in committee at the resolution stage, and I should be glad to have some authority if the hon. member has any to give.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you will give me a moment I think I can find an authority. I quite agree, Mr. Speaker, that the context and scope of order in the debate on second reading are not the same as in the committee of ways and means, but what I have indicated in the third point I submitted to you was that the amendment was ruled out of order in committee on the ground of relevancy, and that ground in my respectful submission to you is equally applicable at this stage as in the committee of ways and means. If it had been on some other ground there might have been reason to say it had no application at this time, but it was on the ground of relevancy that the amendment on that occasion was ruled out of order.

If you are seeking specific citations I shall have to ask you to give me a moment in which to locate them.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps while the hon. member is looking that up I will hear the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: I have an authority to submit on behalf of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Fort William, but before doing so I should like to remind you respectfully that it has been the practice in this house over the years on second reading to move amendments of this nature that declare in principle against certain aspects of the attitude taken by the government with reference to a matter such as motor cars.

Mr. Speaker: I presume the hon. member will be able to give me some instances of that.

Mr. Chevrier: I will do so at once in order to save the time of the house. I refer Your Honour to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, at page 277, citation 382, where it clearly, in my opinion, sets out the position of the hon. member who has moved the amendment. It reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

What the hon. member has done is to move this very simple amendment, which reads:

> That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the repeal or reduction of the excise tax on motor cars.

The language in citation 382 is broad enough, in my opinion, not only to include the amendment but to go away beyond the scope of the amendment which my hon. friend has read and because of this I submit with deference that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is of course the obvious other point that this amendment, if it were entertained, would have the effect of disturbing the balance of ways and means.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: It asks for consideration only.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is simply a matter of asking for consideration, in my respectful submission that is not an assertion of the kind of principle that is open to a private member in moving an amendment to the second reading of a bill.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I should like to refer you to a ruling which you made yourself, sir, on June 18, when I was speaking on the second reading of the bill to amend the hospital insurance act, in which you said, as reported at page 1400 of Hansard:

> The principle that is being discussed is the principle of a rather narrow amendment to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

Which I took to indicate that that would not open up the whole act for discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member for Fort William to defer his remarks until I have finished my ruling. I had some doubt as to whether this was not simply a negativing amendment and, as all hon. members know, amendments are not accepted which are simply negative, because a negative point of view can be expressed by voting against the motion. I think this is more than that at this stage of the bill. This is a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act in a number of particulars, and the principle that is before the house is how the Excise Tax Act should be amended. The government has indicated how it feels it should be amended by introducing this bill and this amendment indicates that it should be amended in some other respects, or should not be proceeded with until other considerations are given effect to and I am inclined to allow the hon. member to proceed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to say a word. You asked to be given an authority. I have one now that I should like to cite before you give your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I shall be glad if there is any authority to be given.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, at page 281, we find citation 393. This citation has to do with the procedure on public bills and the third section deals with motions for second reading and reads as follows:

> An amendment which is not adverse to the principle of a bill but proposes that certain provisions be added to the bill cannot be moved on the motion for second reading.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the only purpose of this amendment is to say that in addition to the reductions created by the bill there should be another provision made by the bill, namely that consideration should be given to exempting motor vehicles from the present special excise tax. That, it seems to me with respect, comes clearly within the principle so stated that:

> An amendment which is not adverse to the principle of a bill but proposes that certain provisions be added to the bill cannot be moved on the motion for second reading.

There is nothing in this amendment to say, as I take it, that the numerous reductions in the sales tax which are created by the bill shall not be made, but it proposes to add something to those provisions in saying that consideration should be given to a further exemption. That, with respect, Mr. Speaker, comes clearly within the provisions of the citation I have read.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may say a word precisely on that point—

Mr. Speaker: I am not disposed to accept the argument just presented and suggest that the hon. member would save the time of the house by allowing me to proceed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do so with pleasure.

Mr. Speaker: This amendment does not propose to add anything to the bill. It is not a motion to add to the bill; it is a motion to defer consideration of the bill on a basis which I am disposed to regard as a basis of principle such as can be put forward on second reading. What I suggest is that the house allow the hon. member to proceed at least on the interim basis that this is a regular amendment. If I find good and sufficient reason to change my mind or to come to a different conclusion in the course of the debate I will advise the house accordingly. As presently advised it seems to me that the proper course for me to take would be to allow the hon. member to proceed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I call Your Honour's attention to paragraph 660 in the third edition of Beauchesne.

Mr. Speaker: I have made an interim disposition of the matter and I shall be glad to consider anything which any hon. member wishes to draw to my attention in the course of the debate. If the hon. member gives the citation I will look at it now.

Mr. Badanai: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying when I was interrupted, I do not wish to take up the time of the house to repeat what has already been said in support of the intent of the amendment, but I do wish to read a number of extracts from a speech delivered by the Prime Minister in Windsor on May 9, 1957, as recorded in the Toronto Star, as follows:

> John Diefenbaker last night promised a Conservative government will reduce the "scandalous" 10 per cent excise tax on autos.

Now, just bear in mind the word "scandalous". I continue:

> The national Conservative leader told an audience of 450 in this motor capital of Canada that the tax on cars was an unjustified burden on workers and farmers to whom cars are essential.
> "If we are elected" he pledged, "we will take from the shoulders of the taxpayers a portion of this taxation burden."

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Which we have done.

Mr. Badanai: Yes, 2½ per cent. Relate the word "scandalous" to 2½ per cent and 10 per cent and I do not think you will find that the relationship is what the Prime Minister meant when he made this statement:

> This, he said, would stimulate auto sales and boost employment in the auto industry on which this city depends.
> He told his audience auto workers were unemployed partly because of the Liberal government's discriminatory taxes on autos. Its unjust tax policies were pricing Canadian products out of the markets of the world and shackling municipalities with a desperate lack of revenues. This condition, he warned, would eventually tax real estate "right out of existence" because municipalities had no other revenue sources.

Here is an opportunity for hon. members sitting opposite to give tangible proof of their support for a measure which, as appears quite evident from the reported speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), was approved by him as far back as May, 1957. It is now more important than ever that this measure should be adopted. I hope that the house will take a vote on this motion as soon as possible.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I propose to be very brief on this matter. Reserving the submission I made to you on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I remind the house that at the last session of parliament on the recommendation of the government parliament reduced the excise tax on motor cars by one-quarter. To introduce this amendment now, assuming for the moment that it is in order, would simply mean that the important reductions and exemptions provided by the bill and which are, I think, eagerly awaited by the Canadian people, will be postponed. That is the effect of the amendment. It would postpone the reductions under the Excise Tax Act that are provided by the bill. The Canadian people should not be denied the benefit of these reductions, nor should they be postponed. For these reasons I urge that the amendment should be defeated, its purpose and effect being simply to withhold from the Canadian people or delay their receiving the benefit of the important tax reductions and exemptions provided by the bill.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I think the last statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is rather ingenious, to say the least. I repeat that to say that to accept the amendment will delay benefits to which the people of Canada are entitled is a rather ingenious device to gain some favourable publicity which actually is not deserved. The minister knows perfectly well that the date of the coming into force of the bill can be regulated according to the date of his choice and not the choice of the house. Therefore to say that the bill cannot be made retroactive to whatever date the minister desires in order to give the people of Canada the benefits he intends to give them as of the date he intends to give them is not presenting the facts in their proper light.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I presume in the course of the debate you are also taking representations on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will permit the debate to proceed, I would prefer to have that done at one time. If I come to the conclusion that there is any doubt about the amendment I will give him the opportunity before the motion is put.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speaker I fail to see any validity whatsoever in the minister's argument because paragraph 13 of the resolution states very clearly that any enactment founded upon the resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of June, 1958. Therefore, provided that in the final analysis the resolution itself is carried, I fail entirely to see how the adoption of the amendment would have any bearing at all upon the effective date of the benefits that might accrue to taxpayers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is it not clear that that clause of the bill cannot be put until the present motion is carried? The whole point is that the amendment prevents the bill from being put and carried. When the bill is adopted that clause will have a retroactive effect but until we have the bill carried the clause is simply writing on a piece of paper that is before the house. That is the point involved.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I think that the argument of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is very technical and specious. An opportunity is provided to hon. members of the house by the rules to have reconsideration of things that are not covered by the minister in his bill. We are very surprised at some of the inadequacies of the bill, particularly because the minister has been a member of the house for a great number of years. During that time he was never hesitant about expressing his views, especially when he was on this side of the house.

I hope to have an opportunity at another stage in the debate to discuss in a broader way some of the views of the minister with respect to sales and excise taxes but at the moment I will simply confine myself to his views and those of his colleagues since they are now in power and have the opportunity to carry into effect their advocacy with respect to automobiles made over a number of years. I think the house had every reason to expect that the present administration, particularly when the automobile industry is admittedly in the doldrums, would have brought in something by way of legislation that would have been a stimulant to that industry and not only would have increased the opportunity for employment in the industry but would have encouraged people to purchase the product.

Over a year ago the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was travelling up and down the land saying that the additional 10 per cent tax on automobiles over and above the sales tax was scandalous. That is the word he is quoted as having used. At Windsor, appealing of course to a particularly interested audience, he said on May 9 as reported in the Windsor Star:

> The present 10 per cent excise or luxury tax on new cars is discriminatory to automobile producing centres. Its continuance brings unjustified unemployment.

In past years we heard the present Minister of Labour (M. Starr) say many times that this tax should be abolished. I am rather disappointed that his influence in the government has not been sufficient to bring that about immediately. I am not going to try to prolong the debate, but somebody may say, "Why did you not do it?" It must be remembered that at one time, by reason of the necessity of raising revenue for war purposes and to reduce production activity with regard to certain types of automobiles to some extent, the tax was as high as 35 per cent. It was reduced in several successive stages by the previous government, but at no time while we were in office was the industry in its present state of depression. I can confirm those statements by referring to page 18 of the Bank of Canada report for 1957, tabled in the house by the Minister of Finance. The governor of the bank, with respect to automobile production in 1957, had this to say:

> In Canada, although 1955 was a record year, 1956 was still better and no significant decline in automobile sales occurred until well into 1957.

It is clear that my hon. friends were in charge of the administration of this country well into 1957—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, that change—

Mr. Benidickson: —and therefore knew conditions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend consulted the statistics he would be aware of the fact that the decline started in March, 1957.

Mr. Benidickson: Not in automobile production.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In automobile production; it was at the end of March, 1957. We were all over this in the last session, and it was the end of March 1957 when the production figures on automobile production in Canada began to fall below those of 1956.

Mr. Benidickson: In any event, it was long after the February, 1957 budget. I am quoting from one of the most authoritative sources from which one can quote, a report which was submitted to this house by the minister himself from the governor of the Bank of Canada. The governor of the bank states that automobile sales had not declined until well into 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, March.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not well into 1957, as my hon. friend well knows.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the fact. May I ask my hon. friend if he is not aware of the fact that it was at the end of March, 1957, that the turn came in the production of automobiles.

Mr. Chevrier: Why don't you make your speech later?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend yesterday, and again today, is simply interjecting to deny certain statements made by others who have every right in this house to put forward their view.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't you want the facts?

Mr. Benidickson: I want you to give the facts to me in a speech. I want you to counteract, if you can,—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: This interruption was not addressed to you, of course, Mr. Speaker. I suggest the minister can very well put on the record anything he suggests counteracts this authoritative statement I am presenting.

I say we have every reason to believe, particularly after that decline occurred in the production of this industry, that this administration, having regard to what its prominent spokesman said in years gone by, would have extended some relief. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was one of those who consistently over the years said that even if one were to regard solely the matter of revenues to the crown, it was his opinion that a reduction in this excise tax would stimulate sales to the extent that the crown would lose nothing in revenue; that the crown would more than get back from this 10 per cent sales tax what it might lose on the extra 10 per cent excise tax by reason of the extra production that would result from this stimulus.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So we reduced it.

Mr. Benidickson: I suggest to him no better climate has ever been presented to a government for an opportunity to show to the people that they meant what they said at that time.

Mr. Speaker: If the house is ready for the question, I will hear the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) before putting the question.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The proposed amendment, Mr. Speaker, is that this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to a reduction in the excise tax on motor cars. I would refer you specifically to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 394, page 281, the first part of which states:

> Nor may such an amendment deal with the provision of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, nor attach conditions to the second reading of the said bill.

It seems to me that this is specifically a condition which is attached to the second reading of the bill, that it be not read a second time until further consideration, and therefore the motion is directly contrary to this particular reference which says that such a motion shall not attach conditions to the second reading. I would, therefore, feel the motion is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say a word on the point the hon. member has raised? The hon. member has suggested that this citation 394 governs this case. Surely, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) does not propose anything that could be done in committee. It proposes that a delay should take place in the second reading of this bill until such time as consideration is given to the matter of the motor tax. It does not propose anything specific.

May I also draw your attention to the provisions of Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, fourth edition, citation 265, which is in these words:

> No member other than a minister of the crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the house enjoys—

I stress this respectfully to Your Honour.

> —complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility. This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the tax proposed by the administration.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for the help they have given me. As I see this amendment, it really is a declaration of a contrary principle to that which is under debate. The principle under debate is an amendment of the Excise Tax Act as the government has proposed. Now, the view which is brought forward is that the government has taken a wrong line and should have adopted another principle in amendment of the Excise Tax Act, that of reducing excise taxes instead of the tax with which it has dealt.

This is clearly not a matter which can be introduced as an amendment to the bill in the course of its consideration in committee. I think that has already been decided. At the resolution stage an attempt was made to propose an amendment in this category, and it was properly ruled out. Nor can it be introduced into the bill when the bill is in committee of the whole, because the resolution does not cover an amendment of that kind. Here, where the principle on which the government has proceeded is under consideration, it seems to me this is a proper declaration of a contrary principle. I realize that there are some difficulties in accepting this point of view. Members may raise innumerable minor amendments to the Excise Tax Act as matters of principle, and of course that could not be acceptable to the house as it would delay proceedings endlessly. But in the view I take of it—I may not be correct in this but as advised I feel I am—I think I should put the amendment to the house. Is the house now ready for the question?

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is now on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister outline, generally, any additions to the act which are not referred to in the resolution? He will realize that we received the bill only this morning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the bill follows the terms of the resolutions that were approved in committee of ways and means last night. The provisions of the bill are confined to carrying those resolutions into effect, and anything of a consequential nature.

Mr. Benidickson: Is section 7 perhaps the only section that has reference to something of which we have not already had notice in the resolutions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The other provisions are all incidental and consequential on the resolution, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the remarks I am about to make are in order. They have reference to fuel oil for diesel engines used in generating electricity. If I understand correctly, the minister stated yesterday, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), that only municipalities and those who are engaged in logging and lumbering were to be allowed to avail themselves of the tax exemption in this regard.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the point my hon. friend is raising has nothing to do with this clause. It relates to clause 8 of the bill which is the clause that has the effect of repealing the schedule and introducing the new schedule. The matter my hon. friend is speaking about is in the schedule. When we come to clause 8 of the bill there is something I have to say on that subject because the information that was given to me in respect of an answer I gave last night was not correct and I have something to say about that as applied to mines. That relates to clause 8 of the bill.

Mr. Dumas: I am very happy, Mr. Chairman, to hear the minister say he has something to add because he may agree to what I was about to suggest. I am willing to wait until clause 8 is called but I want to make sure I can speak on that question on clause 8.

Mr. Chevrier: The point I was going to make was simply this. There are a number of hon. members on this side of the house who want to deal with this question. In order to assist the minister I was wondering if it would be possible to do it now and avoid a long discussion on clause 8. However, if the ruling of the Chair is otherwise I am sure we will be happy to enter the discussion at that time.

Mr. Benidickson: The only suggestion I would make is that if we had unanimous consent we could deal with schedule III with some slowness. Each of the bracketed materials in that schedule has a heading. I thought perhaps there might be an opportunity given for debate in committee or questions and answers in committee. Perhaps that does not agree with what my friend the hon. member for Laurier was suggesting but I think it would be a more systematic debate than if we were to deal with the items in the schedule simply because we happened to be dealing with schedule III. Perhaps the Chair would do what was done last night and call the items in schedule III seriatim. The headings are "Building Materials", "Charitable, Health, Etc.", "Coverings" and so on.

Mr. Chevrier: That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that when we reach the schedule we will call the various headings for discussion and when we have completed that we can ask if it carries?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I take it that it is clear that any reference to the schedule must wait until we reach clause 8. The matter of dealing with the schedule is one of calling the amendments made in the schedule under convenient headings.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Licensed wholesaler or jobber.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the minister tell us whether the purpose of this amendment is merely to delete the prescribed fee of $2 in the old section?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it goes a little farther than that. The old section prescribes two things: first of all that there must be an annual licence and, second, that there is a fee payable on the licence. The change that has been made eliminates the licence fee entirely and eliminates the provision that the licence must be annual. In other words, it rests then with the department to decide for what length of time a licence shall be issued. I expect the department hereafter will issue licences for longer periods than one year at a time.

Mr. Crestohl: One further question, Mr. Chairman. Today it is compulsory for a licensee to apply for a licence. Under the amendment will it be equally compulsory for the department or the minister to issue a licence when it is applied for? The language used is that a licence "may be granted" and that means it may not be granted, too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The clause under consideration makes no change in the present provisions of the act in that regard. The language "may be granted" is the language the act has employed for a long time, as far as I am aware from the beginning of the act. That is the standard language of statutes in respect of the granting of licences and there is no change in that respect.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the minister tell us what has been the practice?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that the practice is that anybody who qualifies under the terms laid down receives a licence.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Evidence.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, this is a new clause and I believe it poses a problem. If a return is purported to have been filed on behalf of some one that return is to be considered as prima facie proof. Can the minister tell us if it is intended that the prima facie proof be a rebuttable proof? When a return has been filed by an accountant or some one else on behalf of an individual or if a person has filed a return which is not signed by the individual involved will the person have the right to rebut that and say it is not his return?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Certainly, Mr. Chairman. Any prima facie presumption is always rebuttable.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Schedule III.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion under the heading "Building Materials"? Any discussion under the heading "Charitable, Health, Etc."?

Mr. Benidickson: Under this heading, Mr. Chairman, I would just remind the minister of the discussion we have had in previous sittings. I think particularly of the speech made by the hon. member for Welland when he said that probably the best relief, if one were thinking in terms of hardship for those who have ill health would possibly be the exemption of drugs from sales tax. The most needy people in the land do not have an income on which they pay tax and consequently the exemptions provided under the Income Tax Act do not apply. If in another year we could have a further look at the possibility of exempting drugs from tax as one of the necessities of life it would be a very worth-while effort on the part of the administration and the exemption. This is probably a new field and a widening in this regard would be commendable.

The minister of course will recall that when he and his colleagues sat on this side of the house and were free to speak frankly about these things some of his colleagues—I do not know if the minister did personally but I believe he did—advocated this and some of the rest of us who were at that time sitting on the government side were doing what some of my hon. friend's colleagues are probably doing at the present time, making representations to him about some of these matters.

Some of these drugs are extremely expensive and the list is probably not as large as it should be bearing in mind the new drugs that come on the market most of which, particularly in the initial stages, are exceedingly expensive. I myself, when assisting the minister of finance, did receive some information about the actual factory cost of some of those drugs. I was rather amazed to find that neither customs tax nor sales tax did have a particularly big relevancy in relation to the ultimate cost to the consumer. That, of course, does not come within the rules of debate when we are discussing this item here. But it is all related and I have thought that it is something that should probably deserve and receive from the officials of the departments of health and welfare, national revenue and finance very careful study. I feel that while we have customs duty on the import of some drugs and we have sales tax on some drugs that are very expensive there is still not a relationship between the actual cost in another country as compared with this country and I would hope that the minister and his officials might look at this. I myself gave it some consideration, as some of the gentlemen in front of the minister will remember, in the very recent past.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion under this heading? Is there any discussion on the heading "coverings"?

Mr. Benidickson: This, of course, has no relationship to coverings of school desks or seats.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no amendment involved there, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on the heading "diplomatic"?

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether there is anything new in this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the amendments are underlined and there is no amendment under "coverings" or under "diplomatic"; there is nothing under "engines" and only when we reach "farm and forest" are there some further amendments introduced into the schedule.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on the heading "engines"?

Mr. Benidickson: Not having taken advantage of the opportunity to speak on second reading on this item, except on the amendment, may I say that I would like the minister and the department to consider very carefully here the possibility of exempting such things as Delco plants for the generation of electricity from sales tax. This is, I admit again, not a new request. It was considered by the previous administration; but we have been constantly extending some of these sales tax exemptions and I notice in the budget this time we have a relief with respect to the purchase of diesel fuel oil for the generation of electricity. That is a very essential thing in many parts of our northern areas which we are endeavouring to develop and I think should have another consideration. To an extent I am abusing the privilege of the committee simply because I know it has been in the past—and I assume it is now—the policy of the officials and of the minister to review very carefully the remarks which are made at this stage of the debate by hon. members from all parties. In the past it was the practice to prepare a memorandum during budget discussions for the consideration of the budget committee when there was a particular item or request for the reconsideration of the tax structure with respect to some of these things. I assume that practice is continuing. Without prolonging the debate I would just like to have that in that category for consideration.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on "farm and forest"?

Mr. Benidickson: What is the estimated tax loss on the exemption of cut flowers as one of the major items?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I stated in the budget speech, $1 million.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on "fire brick, refractories, etc."? Is there any discussion on "foodstuffs"? Is there any discussion on the goods enumerated in Customs Tariff items?

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the minister would mind clarifying a point here that seems to be bothering a great many persons, namely the reference to the new tariff items in the proposed tariff that will be before the house for discussion? There is a reference here to the goods exempt, giving the new numbers, and there seems to be confusion as to how we can legislate on new items that have not yet been enacted into law. If the minister would just clarify that point we would appreciate it. An example of that will be found in item 848, oil country goods, which is in the present Customs Tariff item 848, but appears in the proposed tariff item as 399a. Would the minister just clarify that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I explained last night that this reference to some half dozen new sections here, or a new reference to half a dozen sections, arises out of the amendments which are proposed in the Customs Tariff and we know now what these are going to be. They are set out in the resolution to which I trust we shall be coming shortly in the committee of ways and means. This measure of course, will not be coming into effect until the amendment to the Customs Tariff also comes into effect and the references are completely harmonized in that way.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you. A few moments ago an hon. member questioned me about this. Perhaps I can ask a simple question here that would serve to dispose of the question that was in his mind. I take it that oil country goods or casing that goes into an oil well or a gas well is sales tax exempt but that transmission pipe or tubing, are not sales tax exempt.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on machinery?

Mr. Pickersgill: On this last point, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister whether I understood correctly what he said about this reference to changes in the Customs Tariff. Are we to understand that we are being asked in this bill to assume that the house is going to pass another measure that has not even been submitted yet to the committee of ways and means? Is this not rather taking parliament for granted?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not think so, Mr. Chairman. This was discussed last evening. The committee is well aware of the effect of the reference and the reference is to items that are already before the committee of ways and means. It is not a reference to something with which the committee is not already well acquainted. This has been before the house since June 17. The house knows precisely what they are and we shall be dealing with them further in committee of ways and means.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not my point at all.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is usually fairly sharp in his observations, has a point that while we have had notice of a consolidation of tariff items, we are assuming here that the new tariff items will be as in the schedule in the budget resolution but it is conceivable they will not be. That is the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not appear to have got my point. I can well remember when the previous prime minister sat in the seat next to the one the minister is in now he was most scrupulous never to assume, no matter how large a majority was supporting him, that anything would be passed by parliament until it had been passed. Here, it seems to me, we are going pretty far if we are going to put a section in this bill and the minister is going to proceed with it and pass it, making reference to something that is going to be in a bill that has not yet been introduced in the house. Many things might happen. The government might be defeated between the time of the passage of this bill and the passage of the next bill and the law would be in a terrible mess. Hon. members may laugh but we heard a lot of eloquent speeches from this side of the house in the last parliament but one about the rights of parliament. I would not object at all to the minister allowing this section to stand and deal with the rest of the sections and then the committee could rise and we could come back to this bill after the Customs Tariff had passed and thereby preserve the rights of parliament. I do think this is not just a technical point. This is a question of preserving the rights of parliament and of not passing a bill about an act that does not exist. If I am wrong about my facts I would be glad to be corrected.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the hon. member is perfectly correct because there would be new numerals in the customs tariff schedule to which we are now referring. I would think there would be no hesitation on the part of this group in passing the bill with alacrity with the exception of this point. We could rise, report progress and pass it after the other items are actual items in the new tariff schedule.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, surely it is quite clear that the bill would never be brought into effect unless parliament had also legislated in terms of the changes in the numbers. It is only a matter of changes in numbers. There is no change in the tax and no change in substance. It is simply a matter of the numbers. There is nothing else involved than that. Surely the proper course to follow here is to allow the bill to pass. If hon. members do not wish the bill to be given third reading until the amendment to the Customs Tariff has been dealt with in committee of ways and means, I have no objection to that. It is always possible at that stage, if the house did not approve the changes in the numbers that are proposed in the amendment to the Customs Tariff, to have the change made by amendment on third reading by referring the bill back to the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that I have not given the bill the same attention that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has but I do not apprehend that the bill comes into force on proclamation. My understanding is that once it is given royal assent it is the law. Therefore it does seem to me that the minister is not factually correct in saying that if the bill passes it would not come itno effect until the other measure had come into effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are talking about being passed by the house and what I have suggested—

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have the floor. What I was pointing out was that once this bill is passed by the house we lose control of it. We have given up our rights as representatives of the people. This is a taxing statute, and while I admit that all the minister says about this being a purely technical point is true it does seem to me that it is by the preservation of these technical points that we have safeguarded our liberties and the right of the subject to consent to imposts upon him and that we should be extremely careful about these forms. Speaking for myself, I would feel much happier if we just allowed this section of the schedule to stand. We could come back to it, as my hon. friend says, and no one would be disposed to hold this up five minutes after the other measure had been dealt with. Of course, as the minister has pointed out, no time would be lost because this measure cannot come into effect anyway until the other one does.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend is not aware of the fact that the number of the present item in the Customs Tariff is 848 and what is proposed in the resolution respecting the amendment of that item is that, in addition to its having No. 848, there be a number of other parts into which it is broken down and those are the underlined parts. If parliament did not see fit to enact the proposed resolution into law by amendment of the Customs Tariff then we would still have the law as at present because 848 is still there. There has been nothing taken away. There will be no change made in the law. You would have a reference to some non-existent parts but that would not in any way affect the operation of the law because 848 is still there and if it remains unchanged the law has its full application and the Excise Tax Act has its full effect. Therefore I think my hon. friend can see that parliament is not being asked to anticipate anything that is going to have the effect of tieing its hands in any way or preventing the operation of the law as parliament chooses to legislate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister has satisfied me that instead of having the law in a state of chaos parliament would be merely making itself ridiculous, and if the minister insists on that I do not make any further objection.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to ask the minister this question. While the ultimate end will be the same, does the minister not think that it would be setting a rather unusual precedent to reach that end without following the proper sequence? I think the point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is logical. I think we should reach the objective we are after in the proper sequence according to law and the rules of parliament.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion of that item? Is there any discussion of machinery and apparatus to be used in manufacture or production?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think it was under this section, was it not, that the hon. member for Villeneuve—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. If I correctly apprehended the point made by the hon. member for Villeneuve, it has to do with the very last item of the schedule on page 12. I have some things I wish to say by way of correction of remarks made last night when we reach it.

Mr. Kennedy: Mr. Chairman, at the present time there is a 10 per cent sales tax on power driven equipment used for clearing bush. This is used considerably in areas where the cultivation of blueberries takes place. Since this type of equipment is necessary in the production of the crop, I should like to ask the minister to bring it under agricultural equipment and to remove the tax at some future date.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on marine and fisheries? Is there any discussion on mines and quarries? Is there any discussion on miscellaneous? Is there any discussion on municipalities?

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I have good reason to bring up the question of fuel oil under this item and I will explain the reason why I think I can bring it up under this heading. In remote areas mining operations are carried on by companies which at the same time look after housing. In most cases they do not have any electric power and they have to use diesel motors.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me, the provision on page 11 which the chairman has called applies only to goods sold to or imported by municipalities. It has nothing to do with goods sold to or imported by mining companies. I understood that my hon. friend was going to speak about the use of diesel fuel oil in internal combustion engines when used for that purpose by mining companies. That arises under the heading "processing materials" on page 12. The heading that the chairman has now called simply pertains to goods sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale.

Mr. Dumas: Maybe the minister is right but I still think I am also right. There are many small communities not incorporated as municipalities where mining companies look after the housing for miners and other people in the community. The mining companies are called upon to look after this agglomeration of houses. I feel that we have many examples of that in northwestern Quebec, and the mining companies are going to be paying taxes on this fuel oil used in engines to produce electricity. I think this is discrimination against these mining companies. The minister should consider amending clause 7 of the act in favour of the mining companies, just as he did for the logging companies.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This brings us directly to the point I was raising, that the matter appears under the heading "Processing materials", on page 12 of the bill. It is the last item, and that is where the lumbering and logging companies are dealt with. That is the point in the schedule, as I understand it, where my hon. friend thought perhaps there should be an enlargement. It is not the provision we are dealing with under the heading of "Municipalities".

Mr. Benidickson: Coming from the north as I do, I can understand the point that has been raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve. There is a very close connection between the type of service rendered householders by certain mining companies in the matter of generation and so on, and the type of service that would be provided by an organized municipality. I think that having regard to the exemption that is provided here for municipalities he is making a very good point to which consideration should be given. He is saying the same consideration should be given to the private company, a company town—it is really less than that, it is an unorganized area. The municipal services that normally are provided by the municipal government are provided by the mines or some other industry. If a duly constituted area is getting exemption for this very important item which, in terms, is passed on to the consumer, it seems to me that my hon. friend is very relevant in suggesting that an extension of this exemption must be made to the company areas.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Villeneuve, Mr. Chairman, of course has his opportunity to raise this matter. There is no question about that. We discussed the point with reference to mines last night, in reference to the amendment that was being introduced with respect to the use of diesel fuel oil for internal combustion engines used in the logging operations and in the manufacture of rough lumber. There is no question about his right to bring that up.

Mr. Chevrier: Why not allow him to do so now and save time?

Mr. Benidickson: No, there is a suggestion in the last item to which my hon. friend the minister is referring that the materials must be consumed or extended directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods. My hon. friend from Villeneuve is speaking about a public service that is provided by a private company for home owners. It is the equivalent of this exemption that is given the municipalities to exempt them from sales tax on fuel that is used for the purpose of generating electricity in that community.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We should not take up a lot of time on this. I thought what I was going to suggest would meet the desires of the hon. member. In this case the diesel fuel oil is used in the production of electricity, and not in the production of other goods, and that is why this matter falls under the clause I have mentioned. We have spent so much time now in talking about where it should be taken up, and I think it is quite clear that my hon. friend will have his opportunity to bring it up and the last item is the place because that is where we had our discussion on the subject last night.

Mr. Dumas: I do not object to discussing it under the last item of the schedule, if the minister is right in what he is saying that the diesel fuel oil used by municipalities in generating electricity could have been included in the last paragraph. However, if the minister is ready to propose that amendment for the mining companies, as he did for the lumbering and logging companies, I am willing to wait until the last paragraph.

Mr. Crestohl: Perhaps before we approve this section under the heading "Municipalities" the minister could give us the proposed amendment to the last section.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say I was proposing an amendment to the last section. There is an amendment that was introduced into the resolution in committee of ways and means last evening.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister said he had a statement to make on it, did he not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, when we come to that paragraph under "Processing Materials".

Mr. Chevrier: Would he make it now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It does not relate to municipalities at all.

Mr. Chevrier: The only fear we have is that if we wait until the last item "Processing Materials" to discuss the matter which the hon. member for Villeneuve wants to discuss it may be suggested we are out of order and that is why hon. members feel it should be discussed under this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I expressed the opinion the hon. member for Villeneuve would be entirely in order in raising it there. I think that is clearly the place where it ought to be raised. There is no problem about his raising it at all. It was on that subject we had our discussion last night and clearly that is the place for it under "Processing Materials".

Mr. McIlraith: There seems to be a lot of time taken up on points of procedure. I hope my remarks will help to clarify it. The point under discussion last night was a proposed exemption for fuel oil for use in internal combustion engines in logging operations, and the suggestion was that should apply to mining operations and the production of minerals. The point under discussion now by the hon. member for Villeneuve is a different point. It is suggested there should be an exemption for diesel fuel oil for use in generating electricity, which electricity will be used for servicing groups of homes which in most parts of the country are grouped together in municipalities, but which in some parts of the country are not given municipal status but are operated by mining companies.

That latter point is in order under this subheading "Municipalities", and the other that was under discussion last night is in order under the subheading "Processing Materials". I would point out to the committee that the hon. member for Villeneuve is now discussing a different point from the one discussed last night, except that both points apply to mining companies. That is the only thing they have in common.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the minister tell us if there is a definition of municipalities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not in this act.

Mr. Crestohl: Then, how are we going to differentiate between the form of set-up that a corporation in the north country creates by which it builds 100 houses, builds some streets and, in fact, becomes a mining municipality and providing the same sort of service as will be given by organized municipalities? If there is no definition of municipality, could we not, in some form, cover that sort of organization by a mining company or lumbering company? I think that is what the hon. member for Villeneuve has in mind. They will be generating electricity by using diesel fuel oil, so why should a creation of that kind not get the same benefit as an incorporated municipality? It is, in fact, a municipality without legal status. If there is no definition in the act, would the minister think an organization like that would be covered?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: There is one saving provision, I would think. It would be in the interests of the mining company to organize something that was the equivalent of a municipality, apply for an improvement district or something of that kind, because by so doing in the province from which I come they would get substantial provincial grants for school purposes and things of that kind. So I imagine even in a company town there is some form of organization that is the equivalent of a municipality.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to explain the Excise Tax Act as it now applies to the purchase of automobiles and trucks by municipalities and what changes are involved in that regard as a result of this bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Automobiles purchased by municipalities are subject to the sales tax. This is the form of exemption permitted to municipalities in the case of the purchase of equipment which is designed for these purposes but my hon. friend has observed that there is a clear exclusion from the terms of exemption on automobiles and ordinary motor trucks.

Mr. Regier: I believe the minister will admit that certain classes of trucks are exempt from excise tax and I would like him to now say what are those types.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Fire trucks, for example.

Mr. Regier: I rather regret the minister has not seen fit to aid the municipalities by exempting from excise tax all manner of trucks purchased by them. A number of municipalities have complained to me that it is only on their larger vehicles, and I am not quite sure that the minister is quite comprehensive enough when he says only fire trucks are exempted at the present time. My information may be wrong and the minister can no doubt correct me, but I believe certain trucks utilized for road building purposes are also exempt and have been so exempt for quite a while.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right under the clause my hon. friend has read. The exempting provision is as follows:

> Equipment, at a price in excess of five hundred dollars per unit, specially designed for use directly for road making, road cleaning or fire fighting, but not including automobiles or ordinary motor trucks;

It is quite clear that leaving out ordinary motor trucks and automobiles, the clause provides that equipment that is used directly on road making, road cleaning or fire fighting and which costs more than $500 is exempt.

Mr. Regier: I am sure the minister will agree that these days the municipalities—especially the older ones—have a considerable need for motor vehicles such as light weight trucks and they find it more convenient and economical in many departments to supply their men with half-ton or one-ton trucks. Yet these vehicles are not exempt from excise tax.

There are also many departments of municipalities, especially in the urban areas, which have to be supplied with automobiles and if the government is really sincere in its desire to aid the municipalities and yet not interfere unduly with the concept that the municipalities are primarily the responsibility of the provincial government, it might at least extend to the municipalities all the aid possible within the confines of its own responsibility. This might be done by removing from the municipal corporations every taxation burden possible.

I know the department of the minister has been giving this problem some consideration and I wonder if he might outline to the house the reasons why the department—especially since he has taken office—has decided not to include automobiles and small trucks purchased by municipalities for municipal use in the exemption.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it will be quite clear to my hon. friend, if he examines the language of the amendment, that the type of amendment introduced pertains to equipment and exempts equipment of a nature associated with municipal use. That is very clear and would not admit of the equipment being devoted to some other use.

That principle does not apply in the case of ordinary automobiles purchased by a municipality, for instance, in the case of a fleet of automobiles for the transportation of members of the city council. Perhaps such a fleet after a year or two would be disposed of or turned in by the municipality and would then be purchased by someone else—possibly private persons—and no tax would have been collected on such vehicles. I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate that difficulties arise with respect to a fair application of the tax as compared with the purchase in the first instance by an ordinary individual who must pay tax. Here we have dealt with this matter in what we believe to be a sound and logical way. We have exempted the kind of equipment which the municipalities have to buy for essentially municipal purposes.

Mr. Regier: It is now being assumed, Mr. Chairman, that the municipality, for its police department and social welfare department or any other department for which automobiles are needed, is able to buy them without having to pay the excise tax, and that when the municipality after several years turns in these cars and buys a new fleet, somebody is going to get the benefit who was never intended to do so.

I must submit to the minister that when the corporation of the city of Toronto turns in 100 police cars to some firm and takes in a trade 100 new automobiles, the valuation placed by the dealer or automotive agency on these used cars would include some credit to the municipality concerned for the fact that the cars would be available for resale. It would not be the second hand purchaser who would get the benefit at all, it would be the municipality turning in the used cars, and I do not think the minister can successfully argue that benefit would accrue to anyone other than the municipal corporation.

The same thing applies to the half ton and one ton truck and to the station wagon, which is coming into greater use by municipal corporations. In most cases our municipalities use such vehicles, in the aggregate, to a far greater extent than the heavy fire trucks or road building items of machinery. This is especially so in the case of the older urban areas where there is no longer any major road building left to be done and where the major items of fire fighting equipment already have been purchased. By far the greatest expenditures today are for the purchase of automobiles and small trucks for the use of the various departments of the municipalities.

I believe that if this government was sincere in its repeated expressions of sympathy for the municipalities it would have seen fit to extend this concession to them. The argument used by the minister is an old one which was also used by the former minister and I do not think he has readily given this problem very serious consideration. I sincerely hope he will do so before long.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, under municipalities there appear the words "goods for use as part of a sewage and drainage system" and it says that the minister might name any agency to act on behalf of the municipality, which agency, I presume, would recover the sales tax. I may say in connection with sewer systems that there are different sizes of cast iron pipes—4 inches, 6 inches and 8 inches—that might be utilized. They also use pipes of these sizes in water systems, and I take it there is a sales tax payable on water pipes. How does the minister presume to differentiate between the use of these two different pipes when made to serve as water pipes or sewage pipes?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I also am in the position of not quite understanding why the Minister of Finance will not give complete recognition to the principle that goods which are purchased solely for the purposes of municipalities ought to be exempt from taxation. I want to commend what the minister said a few moments ago, and support such steps as he now intends to take. But there appear to me to be a number of anomalies. For example, if a municipality purchases a fire engine, which lasts 10 or 15 years, they will be relieved of taxation of this kind, but I would point out that one of the larger expenses of a municipality is the purchase of cars and trucks, and these only last two or three years. Take, for example, the city of Vancouver and its requirement to purchase large numbers of vehicles for the use of the police department. These vehicles are all bought for a municipal purpose, and in Vancouver, as far as I know—and I think I know the situation fairly well—every time they purchase a new car for police purposes another car is turned in in exchange. In the long run all purchases made by a city or municipality are for the purposes of that city or municipality itself, and I am not able to understand the minister's argument that he cannot extend the policy which is exemplified in this bill to the point of removing sales tax on all municipal purchases.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a very long subject. For one thing, we have a deficit this year of $648 million. For another, one would have to go very far in examining the different types of goods which are used by the municipalities. There are very great difficulties in applying the ordinary safeguards which it is the responsibility of the Department of National Revenue to apply in dealing with exemptions when goods of certain kinds are purchased by municipalities.

We have gone a considerable distance this year; we have gone that distance in seeking to create more exemptions for municipalities. The exemptions that are created by this bill in favour of the municipalities will be worth $5 million to the municipalities of this country in a year. We think that is a very substantial measure of assistance to municipalities, and we have moved in the direction of exempting goods of a nature with respect to which it is possible for the Department of National Revenue to exercise a proper degree of control. The department has, of course, the responsibility of policing the exercise of these exemptions and making sure that the exemptions are not being abused. We have made these exemptions in directions where we can be sure that it is the municipalities and the municipalities alone which will derive the benefit, and where we are not at the same time creating unfair discrimination.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister would agree that there is no restriction on exemption for sales tax with respect to hospitals? He accepts that there is full exemption in the case of public hospitals.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And the same applies to the provinces. Goods purchased by a province are not subject to sales tax. But then it is so much easier to police the purchases made and to see that the act is being properly administered. You have 10 provinces in this country, but you have nearly 5,000 municipalities. It is an entirely different matter.

I have to point out in this connection, arising from the hon. member's remarks, that in the case of the provinces which impose a provincial sales tax they do not, I think, exempt the purchases made by municipalities.

Here we have gone a very long distance in a direction which will, I hope, commend itself to the house in seeking to exempt municipalities from this tax. We have done so in cases where we can be very sure that the goods purchased are of a nature that will be used by municipalities and by municipalities alone, as far as we can see to it.

Mr. Benidickson: On that very point, I think the minister has a very good memory and I am sure he will remember that I had to tell him the very same thing not more than a couple of years ago. I explained the difficulty of dealing with 5,000 or so municipalities, and I explained, also, that certain of the provinces, whose children the municipalities are considered to be, were not exempting the municipalities from provincial taxation, even with respect to such purchases as were being exempted by the former government. But I would ask the hon. minister to have another look at this question, particularly in view of his former commitments and those of prominent members of his party. And, with regard to the most prominent of his colleagues, I refer to page 3396 of the 1956 volume of Hansard, when the hon. minister's leader at that time said there should be no sales tax imposed on municipalities and school boards.

And now with regard to this item, I should just like to be given some explanation with respect to the composition of the bill. Am I right in thinking that we have here a new section?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: That in itself is not underlined. I am not trying to be unduly critical in this respect, and I have great regard, of course, for the gentlemen who look after these things, with whom I was recently associated. But I may say that when I was trying to do a little homework on this bill I found some difficulty. I find it even tonight. I take it that the minister has before him the latest consolidation of the act as we discussed it last night, the consolidation which was published in August, 1957. On page 31 of that consolidation we have the former reference to exempting municipalities from sales tax.

I want to make this observation to those who draft these bills. It is very helpful to members of parliament—and the bills are first of all for their purposes—if when there is some change in placement of an enactment a notation were to appear on the right hand side of the page to the effect that there has been a change. It would be very easy for those who have spent many weeks dealing with the material to indicate on the right hand side that there has been a change. In the resolutions, for instance, I found it difficult to locate the change relating to structural steel versus aluminum for bridges. I know that my hon. friend has had more recent familiarity with the act than I have and I would like him to point out to me where I will find the exemption for structural steel for bridges in the consolidation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. On page 30 under the heading "Certain Building Materials" about ten lines from the bottom of the page. The item reads:

> Structural steel when purchased by municipalities for the construction of bridges in highway systems.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his courtesy. I had difficulty finding what is now the fourth item under the miscellaneous grouping under the heading "Municipalities". If there is to be a redesigning of the structure of the bill there should be on the right hand page an indication that would prove helpful to hon. members of parliament.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank my hon. friend for his suggestion. I think he has a point that could well be kept in mind by the draftsmen of bills. It has not been the practice in the past to give notes on the right hand side of the page opposite schedules to bills. The practice has been to do so opposite the substantive provisions of the bill clause by clause but not in the case of the schedules appended to the bill. In the present case I think it is quite clear that what has been done by the draftsman is to bring about a convenient rearrangement.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, I approve of the new section. I thought it should be drawn to our attention when we are trying to study the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no change in the provisions of the act in the respect that is mentioned, but for convenience—and I think it is commendable—the draftsmen have gathered together under a new heading "Municipalities" those items which in the case of materials purchased by municipalities for their own use and not for resale had not previously been gathered together under one heading.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer back to the comment made by the Minister of Finance a few moments ago on the question of the exemption from taxation of certain purchases by municipalities. First of all I wish to convey through you to the minister the appreciation of all of us for the recognition the minister has given in terms of a reduction in certain taxes paid by municipalities on their purchases but he outlined this as a principle and in my opinion did not follow through on the principle itself.

According to the terminology of the bill the tax is to be removed on purchases by the municipalities of certain materials such as culverts, diesel fuel oil, fire truck chassis and so on. That is a good principle without doubt and it is something for which many of us have fought over the years. But I do not personally understand the view expressed by the minister a few moments ago.

To the best of my knowledge a municipality would purchase a fire truck chassis perhaps once in five or 15 years but the municipalities constantly make heavy expenditures of other kinds. I think, for instance, of the welfare departments of municipalities and also of the police departments. The police department of a municipality represents one of its most heavy expenditures and they are required to purchase automotive equipment for that department.

I feel that I know something about the purchases made by the city of Vancouver and when the city purchases equipment for its departments of welfare, police or parks it is not purchased with the idea of reselling it. When new equipment is purchased the old equipment is invariably turned in on the purchase of the new material.

I hate to put it this way but I am going to do so. In view of what the minister said a few moments ago I can only conclude that he was implying that he suspects the municipalities may be guilty of bootlegging automotive equipment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no.

Mr. Winch: One cannot take any other interpretation from what was said by the minister. He not only said it once but twice. I do not believe there is a municipality in this country that makes any purchase with the idea of deriving the benefit of sales or excise tax exemptions and then re-selling the object for a profit. The municipalities do not try to cheat the federal government nor evade paying tax nor do they engage in bootlegging equipment purchased by them.

The majority of hon. members of this house know something about the expenses of municipalities. The municipalities have heavy expenditures for police and fire protection, park maintenance and operations and drainage, sewerage and waterworks operations but the present bill does not extend to expenditures in connection with these operations the principle outlined by the minister. The minister deserves commendation for the $5 million start he made on what he himself admits is a correct principle that a municipal government should not have to bear a federal tax on its basic purchases but the application of the principle should be extended to the fields of municipal activity I have outlined.

I would like to ask the minister if he believes—and I think he will admit he does believe—in the honesty of municipalities. If he does, the present bill should be extended to provide further tax relief on the necessary purchases of municipalities in discharging their governmental responsibilities.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I have already dealt with the unfortunate omission of trucks and automobiles in the exempt class by the minister. Now, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the importance to the municipalities of snow removal equipment. This equipment is very important to municipalities such as Fort William and all the northern Ontario cities, which must have snow plows and snow removal equipment which cost a great deal of money. A snow blower would cost approximately between $20,000 and $25,000. Snow plow equipment is not purchased for the purpose of resale, nor is it something we purchase every year. A piece of equipment would last probably five years to 10 years. Snow removal is a very important feature in a municipality. We in Fort William pride ourselves on keeping our city streets clean and we do plow them after every snow storm. Is the minister going to consider giving relief on that class of snow removal equipment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no occasion for consideration of that because that equipment is already exempt. If my hon. friend will look at page 11 of the bill, about line 10, he will see that certain named goods sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale are exempt. Now, the goods that I cited and the words following them include:

> Equipment, at a price in excess of $500 per unit, specially designed for use directly for road making, road cleaning or fire fighting—

And road cleaning includes snow removal.

Mr. Regier: Is it just the chassis?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is not confined to a chassis; this applies to the equipment.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister inform the house whether the motor of a fire truck is exempt from the excise tax? I notice it says "fire truck chassis". Would he define what it means exactly? Does it not include also the price of the motor?

Mr. Winch: At the same time would he also explain why only the chassis of fire fighting equipment bought by a municipality, city or town is exempt?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think there seems to be a misapprehension. The truck in that case has been exempt. The question that arose was in the case of a part of certain equipment, and here in the amendment we have spelled out the fire truck chassis for the permanent attachment thereon of fire fighting equipment to be used directly in fire fighting. Cases have arisen where it has been found that attempts have been made to add all kinds of things to the fire vehicle, on the truck chassis, which were not intended, and this amendment has been introduced to make it quite clear and assure to the municipalities exemption in the case of the fire truck chassis for the permanent attachment thereon of fire fighting equipment to be used directly in fire fighting.

Mr. Winch: Does that include the motor?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision enables—and this was widely sought, I may say—the municipality to purchase the chassis from a local dealer and then take it over to someone else to have the firefighting equipment attached to it.

Mr. Winch: Would you mind answering my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because, if he buys the whole fire fighting vehicle, equipment and all, it is now tax exempt.

Mr. Winch: Why the devil don't you say so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The chassis, Mr. Chairman, includes the motor that operates it.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, it does not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the interpretation that has been put on it and that is really what counts for people paying the tax.

Mr. Benidickson: If that is so, if the chassis includes the motor, surely it has always been an article of value over $500. Would it be exempt under the existing legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has not been a fire truck.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, the minister suggests the fear of a sale of a fleet of automobiles to a municipality and that ultimately those automobiles may be disposed of in a way by the municipality that the tax might not be paid? Now, when he suggests that a fire truck or the chassis of a fire truck could even be dealt with in such a way that something else could be constructed on it and again deprive the government of the tax, is he not going a little bit too far in questioning the integrity of the municipalities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is no questioning of the integrity of municipalities involved; it is a question of constructing legislation which can be properly administered by the Department of National Revenue which is charged by parliament with that responsibility.

Mr. McMillan: I asked a question a while ago and perhaps the minister did not hear it. I wanted to know how the department would police the end use of pipe? For instance, four, six and eight inch cast iron pipe is used both in waterworks systems and sewage systems. According to this amendment, any agency might be named by the municipality or by the minister on behalf of the municipality. I should like to know just how the minister would police it in connection with these different agencies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am sure my hon. friend is aware that this exemption exists in the case of these things when purchased by municipalities. I am informed that there is no difficulty in the administration in this respect and none is anticipated as a result of the enactment of the proposed exemptions. It is a matter of establishing by invoice, or by whatever other form of proof is required, that the pipe in question was purchased as part of a sewage or drainage system.

Mr. McIlraith: Not for the waterworks.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not for the waterworks system or water supply. This has nothing to do with the purchase by individuals of pipe for the course of their own water supply. This has to do with purchase by municipalities, and I am informed that the department anticipates no difficulty in administration in this respect.

Mr. Bourget: In that case, would the municipality have to supply plans to show that the cast iron pipe will be used for the sewage system only, because very often cast iron pipes are used in other systems and you would not be able to detect that by the invoice. You would have to ask the municipality to show you the plans and the length and the size of the cast iron pipes. Cast iron pipes are used in other places. You cannot detect unless the department has a certain way of doing it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think it is a matter that we can be sure will be covered by the invoices in question. A point was raised on a similar subject in the committee of ways and means as to whether it may be necessary to take account of the change in the provisions of the law with regard to the ordinary documents pertaining to sale. That might be. In any event, it will be necessary for the municipalities receiving the exemption to show to the department that the pipe, whether cast iron or of some other material, is used as part of a sewage or drainage system. I can only repeat that the department informs me they anticipate no difficulty in administering this particular feature.

Mr. Benidickson: I raised last night the question of the tendency to have a great deal of installations of sewage and drainage systems done by the subdividers of property. I take it that these people are not contemplating as being included in the reference here to "any agency operating a sewage or drainage system." I assume they do not operate such systems but simply instal them. Therefore this provision is not related to the problem of the subdivider who has an obligation to instal these things.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We dealt with the question of the subdivider last night. I think the matter is clear and I do not understand that my hon. friend wishes to speak further about it. What we are speaking about here with respect to an agency would be such an agency or commission as exists in some provinces. For instance, in the province of Ontario we have a commission established under provincial legislation which assists municipalities in the purchasing and financing of drainage and sewage systems. If the goods were purchased by the government for the province they would be exempt. If they were purchased by the municipality they would be exempt. In this case this particular commission is the agent of the municipality for this purpose and the matter, of course, presents no difficulty whatever from the point of view of administration.

Mr. Benidickson: But in order to obtain the exemption, if the construction is done by the subdivider the subdivider will probably have to change the form of his contract with the municipality so that the municipality purchases the materials. Otherwise there is no tax exemption which in the end would benefit the home owner who has to pay for these things in the long run.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think that is right. We went over that point last night. The contractor in this case may invoice the municipality separately for the work done and for the sewer pipe and equipment sold to the municipality. It is not going to present any serious problem from the point of view of establishing the contractual arrangements that are required to permit the exemption to be had in a case of that kind.

Mr. Benidickson: We have had a good discussion this afternoon and I see that the hour of adjournment is rapidly approaching. It does seem to me that for the benefit of readers of Hansard it would be appropriate if the hon. member for Villeneuve were permitted to indicate the point he has in mind. I think we have all received telegrams from certain mining organizations referring to discrimination in the case of diesel fuel oil for use in generating electricity. Other purchasers have enjoyed this tax exemption in the past and as the matter is relevant to the section we are discussing I think we should hear the hon. member.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is one opportunity I would crave before the committee rises at six o'clock and it is nearly that time now. I wish to place on record a correction of a statement I made last evening while we were on this same subject in committee of ways and means. In dealing with the matter of diesel fuel oil when used in internal combustion engines and reviewing the course of events since this question came to the fore last October, I gave the committee information I had then received in reply to a question with respect to whether there were any cases where mining companies had made claims since October and where these claims had been acknowledged by the department. The information I gave the committee, and which I had just received, was that there were no such cases.

I have learned since that that information is not correct. I should like to tell the committee that I regret that incorrect information was given to the committee and I should like to say now by way of correction that there have been cases since the situation arose which I described last night where mining companies have made claims in respect of the sales tax on diesel fuel oil used by them in internal combustion engines, which engines were used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods, in this case mining operations. There have been cases of that kind. They began in March and extended to May and there have been refunds paid to these companies in a number of cases in the light of the view that the Department of National Revenue took of the situation when the matter arose first in October of 1957, in that case with respect to a municipality. As I mentioned last night, the view that was expressed was not one arising out of a judicial decision. There has been no decision on this question by any competent court.

The interpretation that the department had been placing on the words I quoted last night was challenged by a municipality and after some consideration enough doubt was raised as to the effect of the provision of the schedule that the Department of National Revenue decided in that case to admit the claim of the municipality. Notification was given at the same time to logging and lumbering companies because it was felt that they came within the same provision. Later the Canadian manufacturers association, I am told, was made aware of the course of action.

When I spoke last night I stressed the fact that logging and lumbering companies had received the benefit of the ruling. I said then that my information was that in no case had a mining company made a claim and had its claim acknowledged by the department, but I want to correct that now.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his explanation. The hon. member for Kootenay West and myself raised the question last night with respect to mining companies specifically. I saw the minister consulting his officials and I am sure he got information from them that no mining company had benefited.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The signals got a little mixed.

Mr. Benidickson: In any event, they may not have been the officials who had to do with the exemption claims. In order to complete the record, and it would only take two or three minutes, I think that the hon. member for Villeneuve might read the telegram that most of us have received from the mining companies.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Benidickson: It will complete the continuity of the discussion. It may be days before we get back to it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think we have all received the telegram.

Mr. Dumas: If I may be permitted to do so, I will read the telegram. It was addressed to me and similar telegrams were sent to many other members of the House of Commons. It reads:

> Note first reading and passage of budget resolution re excise tax on diesel fuel used in generating electric power. As legislation now stands tax removed for municipalities and for logging and lumbering operations. After temporary suspension tax now reimposed on fuel used to generate electricity for mining operations. This measure greatly disturbing to mining industry which regards it as discriminatory and restrictive. Power for mines in settled areas supplied from established hydro stations not subject to tax. Present regulations impose great hardship on mining operations in remoter areas entirely dependent on diesel fuel for power and on new mines awaiting hydro power. To subject such mines to this tax appears discriminatory and not in keeping with government's declared intention of encouraging northern development. Trust careful reconsideration and revision will be given to the regulation by final passage by parliament.

This concludes the telegram, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to add to what has been said in this telegram. I suppose I shall have an opportunity later.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with item No. 21, which is the resolution preceding the amendment to the Children of War Dead Act; that is to go to the standing committee on veterans affairs, and we hoped it could get second reading tomorrow in order that it can be sent to that committee. Then, we shall take agriculture estimates.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PRODUCTION OF MARGARINE AND SPREADS

Question No. 169—Mr. Deschatelets:

How many pounds of margarine or similar spreads were produced in each province from June 1, 1957 to June 1, 1958?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Margarine and spread production in Canada, June 1, 1957 to May 31, 1958:

Ontario	98,124,334
British Columbia	13,062,710
Other provinces*	24,798,059
Total	135,985,103

* In compliance with section 15 of the Statistics Act production for individual provinces other than Ontario and British Columbia may not be released.

Fourth report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters.—Mr. Murphy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—STATEMENT ON ELECTION OF PRESIDENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make on UNOGIL and the Lebanese election.

Hon. members have no doubt already heard that the Lebanese chamber of deputies has elected General Fouad Chehab as the next president of the Republic of Lebanon. We in Canada sincerely welcome his election, both because of the widespread respect which he enjoys both inside and outside Lebanon and also because of the reassuring evidence afforded by his election that the Lebanese people are determined to put an end to the difficulties which have unhappily divided them in recent months. We express the hope that the transitional period before the new president takes office will pass peaceably and without further disturbances. We trust that under his presidency the task of the United Nations observation group will continue to be facilitated, and that UNOGIL will be able to contribute to conditions of stability that will render easier the task undertaken by the general.

On July 22 mention was made in this chamber of the increasing effectiveness of the United Nations observation group in Lebanon. It was announced then that in response to a request by the Secretary General of the United Nations the government was assigning an additional three Canadian officers for service with UNOGIL and that attention would be given to any further requirements as events transpired. There is every indication that despite the Soviet veto on July 22 of the resolution proposed by Japan—that was the resolution within the security council—it has been possible for UNOGIL, within the authority granted it by the security council resolution of June 11, to expand the scope and area of its operations.

We have now received a further request from the secretary general for additional assistance, and in response have agreed to assign an additional seven Canadian officers. This will bring to 20 the number of officers —in a total force of some 200—sent from Canada to help in this operation.

It is encouraging to note that so far 20 countries have been approached to provide personnel for UNOGIL, indicating the breadth of the international base that is being sought and achieved for this exercise which we believe will bring about the preservation of peace.

SUMMIT CONFERENCE—PROPOSED MEETING ON AUGUST 12

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish also to take this opportunity to say something in regard to the heads of government meeting and the security council. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom announced in the House of Commons at Westminster today that in the reply he has sent to Mr. Khrushchev's message of July 28 he has suggested that the proposed high level meeting of the security council be held on August 12, the place and details of the meeting to be worked out in the security council by the permanent representatives of the member states. The Canadian government welcomes the positive stand taken by Mr. Macmillan, a stand which is fully in conformity with the position I have taken ever since the suggestion for a summit conference on the Middle East was put forward.

As has been made clear in the House of Commons on more than one occasion, the government of Canada stands ready today to do all in its power to promote the successful completion of the steps now contemplated to the end that this meeting may take place. If the security council, of which Canada is currently a member, is in fact convened at heads of government level on August 12 in New York or elsewhere, I shall be ready to attend. If Canada can make any contribution to the success of the proposed conference, and that includes the convening of the meeting of the security council at the summit, that contribution will be made willingly and with full confidence that it will have the approval of all those who are sincerely dedicated to the cause of peace.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house and certainly hon. members on this side will welcome the news the Prime Minister was good enough to give the house to the effect that the representatives of the people of Lebanon have chosen a president in the person of a distinguished Lebanese patriot. We must hope that this step will help bring to an end the civil disturbances in Lebanon and restore peace and stability in that country, and thereby make possible the withdrawal of outside forces, in this case forces from the United States of America.

I noted with interest what the Prime Minister said about the strengthening of the United Nations observation group. That strengthening should make it possible for the group to discharge its functions in Lebanon, which in turn would make it still easier for the United States forces to withdraw. We most warmly support the decision of the government to add another seven officers to that peace preservation corps under the flag of the United Nations. I can think of no way in which the Canadian army through its officers could better act in the present circumstances than as part of this peace preservation corps.

So far as the summit conference is concerned, we welcome also the information that it is now likely to be convened very shortly, and I reiterate the hope already expressed that after an initial meeting of the full security council, which without doubt will be subject to a great deal of publicity, perhaps those governments most concerned will be able to meet in some manner under the auspices of the United Nations in as much privacy as they can obtain, and not only make a contribution to the solution of the immediate crisis in the Middle East but begin a process of settlement by international agreement, including all the governments concerned, covering those political and economic problems which have plagued that area for so many years and which, if not settled, will undoubtedly before long result in another crisis in that part of the world.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group are pleased with the further indication that there is a relaxation of the tension in Lebanon because it has been possible to elect a new president. We, of course, welcome wholeheartedly the announcement that UNOGIL will be strengthened in that area. We know that Canadians will support unanimously an increase in Canada's contribution. We express the hope that Canada will encourage the United States to withdraw its troops from this state as early as possible. We feel that the presence of United States troops in Lebanon has added to tension and is continuing to add to tension, and that they should be substituted by a strengthened UNOGIL immediately.

We welcome also the announcement by the United Kingdom that she is prepared to take part in a summit meeting, beginning August 12, at the United Nations. We express the hope that this summit meeting will be fruitful, that it will deal with the basic problems facing the people of this area, and that from that meeting will come not only arrangements for the withdrawal of the troops of the United States and the United Kingdom but also a program formulated for economic development that will result in the oil resources in that area being developed in the interests of the people who reside in those nations. We further express the hope that from the summit meeting will come an agreement which will lead to free elections in those nations so the people themselves may control their political as well as their economic destinies.

CEYLON—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR FURTHER ECONOMIC AID

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, late in May the Canadian government received an urgent appeal from the government of Ceylon for economic aid, which it will require in order to finance a broad development program designed to strengthen its economy and provide a substantial increase in the standard of living of its people. Subsequently discussions have taken place between the ministers and officials of the governments of Canada and Ceylon concerning the nature of the assistance which Canada might contribute.

On the basis of these discussions, and having in mind the request made by Ceylon, it was decided to offer Ceylon a loan of $2 million to finance the purchase of 25,000 tons of flour and to make an outright grant of 5,000 tons of flour valued at $400,000.

I take this opportunity to inform the house that the government of Ceylon has decided to take up this loan and grant, and the shipment of the first 10,000 tons of flour will be made before the end of December of this year. The remainder of the flour being made available under the loan and the grant will be shipped in the first quarter of 1959.

It will be recalled that on January 8 of this year my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced that a $15 million grant of flour and wheat would be made to India, Pakistan and Ceylon, and that $35 million in credit for the purchase of wheat and flour would be available upon request to all Colombo plan countries. Of the $15 million grant Ceylon received $3 million worth of flour.

In February last a loan of $25 million was made to India leaving $10 million uncommitted, and it is from this sum that the current loan to Ceylon is to be financed. The terms of the loan are identical with those covering the loan to India, that is the loan is repayable in seven equal annual instalments, with the first payment due at the end of the second year. It will bear interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent, payable annually.

I add to this statement that in the course of these discussions it was a matter of concern that the flour that Canada was being asked to provide to Ceylon might seriously jeopardize Australia's normal sale of wheat and flour to Ceylon. We have received firm assurances from the governments of Australia and Ceylon that the flour which we are now making available under the current loan and grant will not affect adversely Australia's interests.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether this particular grant to Ceylon, which we on this side support, is additional to the grant to India and Pakistan previously announced, and additional to the Colombo plan contribution?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

CRIMINAL LAW

CANADIAN PENAL SYSTEM—CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER FAUTEUX REPORT

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to inform the house that our study of the Fauteux committee report and recommendations has now proceeded to the stage where we will be able to call a meeting with the provincial representatives to discuss the whole matter. I have accordingly written to the provincial attorneys general asking them to name a period within the month commencing September 16 when they would be able to come to Ottawa for a meeting for that purpose. It is anticipated that discussions will cover the whole field of the Fauteux recommendations, including especially those where joint action or agreement by the dominion and the provinces is indicated. We on our part will be prepared to discuss all aspects and implications of the recommendations in that area, including any proposals put forward by the provinces.

TRADE

UNITED STATES—STATEMENT ON PRESSURE TO CURTAIL IMPORTS OF ALUMINUM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question with respect to the export of aluminum from Canada to the United States. My answer is that the government is aware of the efforts of primary aluminum producers in the United States to seek relief from the effects of a general decline in the level of their production. It is my understanding that one of the points raised by the United States industry is the adverse effect of Soviet sales of aluminum in world markets at cut-rate prices. These sales have also affected our exports.

While there has not been any direct attempt on the part of United States producers to identify their difficulties with imports of aluminum from Canada, the submission made by the producers to the United States administration proposed that there should be a regulation of imports from foreign countries. Any restrictions imposed on the import of aluminum into the United States or any action to raise the duty on aluminum would, of course, cause substantial damage to our Canadian interests.

It was with that thought in mind that we raised this matter in the discussions we had when the President and the Secretary of State of the United States were in Ottawa earlier this month. Our representatives in Washington are following developments closely, and the house can be assured that we shall take whatever action may be necessary to bring our views to the attention of the United States government.

BRIDGES

WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and, in his absence, to the minister in charge. Is it the intention of this government to make any contribution toward the cost of the proposed three overhead bridges to be built by the Ontario government over the Welland ship canal at Homer, at Welland and at Port Colborne, as reported in today's Toronto Globe and Mail? Also, are tolls to be charged on those bridges?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will take the question as notice and see that it is brought to his attention for an early reply.

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF THIRD BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): I would like to ask the Minister of Transport, or in his absence the acting minister, whether the minister has recently received representations requesting the implementation of the decision taken by the previous administration to build a third bridge over the St. Lawrence river in the east end of Montreal?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will have to follow the same course as in respect to the other two questions and shall bring the matter to the attention of the minister upon his return for an early reply.

IMMIGRATION

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES—REPORTED DECISION TO ADMIT ADDITIONAL 1,000

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether the report in the press is correct that an additional 1,000 Hungarian refugees are to be brought to Canada at the expense of the government?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not care to comment on the accuracy of the figure in the absence of the minister. I can, however, confirm that a decision in principle was taken, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to wait until tomorrow or until the return of the minister for any comment on the actual number.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the acting minister would be good enough at the same time to ask the hon. lady whether she could inform the house how many of the Hungarian refugees in Canada who were seeking employment are still unemployed and being cared for by the department, and also how many of those who came here have returned?

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to bring that question to the attention of the minister, but in the meantime I think the house and the hon. gentleman will be glad to know that in both cases the number is satisfactorily small.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought it was, Mr. Speaker, and I am delighted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—STEPS TAKEN TO FIGHT FOREST FIRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources based on a newspaper report that caused my body temperature to rise as a conservation enthusiast. In view of newspaper reports to the effect that in the Yukon fires are being allowed to sweep through the country unchallenged, except where they threaten homes, would the minister inform the house whether this statement is correct? If so, would the minister inform the house whether consideration has been given to the use of armed forces personnel for firefighting purposes in order to limit as far as possible the destruction of our forest resources in the Yukon?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources I should like to reply to this question. Before doing so, however, I should like to say that the hon. member for Yukon has been in daily touch with the minister and the department in connection with these fires.

I can assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that not only has consideration been given to the possibility he suggests but that members of the armed forces and of the R.C.M.P. have been actively engaged in the firefighting effort, and have made a tremendous contribution in helping to limit as far as possible the destruction of our forest resources in the Yukon.

It should also be made perfectly clear that firefighting activities have not been limited to those fires which threaten federal housing. In such a vast area so sparsely populated it is, of course, not possible to fight every single fire. Consequently it has been necessary to concentrate efforts on those fires which threaten the most valuable forest resources and, of course, those which endanger human life and property.

Under the direction of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory great efforts are being made to bring the fires under control. In addition to the regular force of forestry officers and members of the armed forces and of the R.C.M.P., a good deal of equipment and extra personnel have been brought in from outside, notably from several of the national parks. Above all, tribute should be paid to the civilian population of the territory, who are bending every effort to help bring these fires under control.

The house will be pleased to learn that, in part because of the coming of rain but in very large measure because of the exceptional efforts of everyone participating in the fire-fighting activities, the threat has been greatly diminished in recent weeks, and the worst of the fires have been largely contained.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I ask the minister if he would explain how the member for Yukon was in constant daily touch with the minister concerned in the minister's absence?

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member must have been around here long enough to know that when a minister is absent another minister is in charge of his department.

Mr. McIlraith: May I take it, then, that the minister's answer was incorrect to that extent?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member apparently, in spite of having been here for some 15 or 20 years, still does not understand how government is carried on.

FISHERIES

FRASER RIVER, B.C.—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries, not only on my own account but also on behalf of the member for New Westminster, if there is going to be an advance in the time of fishing between the Pattullo bridge in New Westminster and the Mission bridge on the Fraser river?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, both the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for New Westminster have given me notice of intention to ask almost identical questions on this matter.

This is a matter which has been brought to my attention from time to time during the last year by those especially interested, and as a result I have had a thorough investigation made of this salmon fishery between the New Westminster bridge and the Mission bridge over the Fraser river which, under subsection 14 of section 67 of the British Columbia fishery regulations, must ordinarily close on September 15 of each year. My object was to determine whether the season in the area might be extended without endangering conservation.

The problem is complicated, as there are five species of salmon involved in this fishery. Each is constituted of a race which runs at a different time and to a different river. It is obvious from the reports that early closure has benefited some runs to a slight extent, while others do not appear to be affected. I feel that the analysis must be carried further before a final decision is reached and this will be done.

For the year 1958, however, action has been taken to amend the regulations to permit salmon fishing in the area concerned, but of course subject to the provision that the area director of the fisheries department in British Columbia may use the over-all powers given to him under the regulations to prohibit fishing for part or all the season, should it be determined that such action is necessary for the protection and proper escapement of the salmon to the spawning grounds.

CRIMINAL CODE

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS—INSPECTION OF ANIMALS TO BE USED IN BULLFIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister inform the house if the bulls which are to take part in the deplorable exhibition at Lindsay this week end have been imported and, if so, were they subject to the usual tests and quarantines?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether they have been imported or not; the only knowledge I have in connection with the matter is that if the bulls were imported for any purpose they would be inspected in the normal manner by the health of animals division.

Mr. Cardin: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister tell the house why his department does not protest the use to which these bulls are to be put?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will refer to Hansard of 30 days or so ago, he will find that this question was dealt with by the Minister of Justice.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister table a copy of the agreement on the South Saskatchewan dam project which was signed July 25?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to table a copy of that agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: In French?

TRANSPORT

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—REPORTED FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION OF UNDERPASS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport, or in his absence the acting minister, a question based on a report in the Sherbrooke newspaper in connection with a recent delegation from that city to the minister in question. Did the minister promise this delegation a grant for the construction of an underpass on Acadia street under the C.P.R. main line?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Not having received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question in the capacity in which I now appear I will have to take it as notice. I will bring the question to the attention of the minister for his early reply.

Mr. Boulanger: I did send a note before noon.

Mr. Fulton: I did not receive it.

PUBLIC WORKS

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—REPORTED FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION OF MAIN SEWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works with regard to a delegation which is reported to have visited Ottawa from the city of Sherbrooke. Was this delegation promised a grant for the construction of a main sewer which will cost $1 million, with a view to relieving the unemployment situation in that city?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I have not had the privilege of meeting a delegation from Sherbrooke, but I should be very glad to meet such a delegation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF SALE AND SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I ask a question of the acting minister in the absence of the Minister Transport. What action has been taken by the government following the recent request of the Halifax board of trade, as reported in this morning's Montreal Gazette, urging the federal government to reconsider its decision to sell the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships fleet, and also to end the seafarers' international union strike which began nearly a year ago and to return the ships to service?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press report to which my hon. friend refers. I will have to have the press report studied and a reply made later.

Mr. Robichaud: The press report is in the minister's office, where it was sent earlier.

Mr. Fulton: It may be in the minister's office, but it is not in mine.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question has been before the house several times, and I am not sure that there is anything novel about it.

I would like to say that the ingenious device of giving apparent urgency to a question by asking whether someone has received a delegation or a communication seems to my mind to be going a bit too far. The urgency of the subject matter of the question is more important than whether or not a delegation or communication has been received within recent date.

Mr. Robichaud: If reference was made to my question, my question read "what action has been taken by the government".

Mr. Speaker: With respect to a communication from the Halifax city council, I think the hon. member said. My point was, the initial part of his question was that the Halifax board of trade had written a letter or sent a communication. The other part of the question has been dealt with quite extensively by the minister in the past.

Mr. Howard: I had a question for the Minister of Transport, but in view of what has taken place perhaps I will let it go.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the urgent need for deficiency payments on grain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: My question is asked today because of the answer given in the house on this subject yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said there would be an answer to this whole problem just as soon as the Prime Minister was back in Ottawa. I am sure that western Canada is waiting for a statement by the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I may say that the Prime Minister was absent for the same reason the Minister of Transport is absent today, namely as the responsible minister in connection with the visit of Princess Margaret, and I say this particularly in view of the rather facetious question which was raised a moment ago by the hon. member for Skeena.

In so far as the question raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia is concerned, that matter will naturally receive the earliest possible attention, and information will be communicated to the house when a decision is able to be communicated.

Mr. Argue: In view of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday that on his return a statement would be made by the Prime Minister in answer to this whole problem—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should attempt to argue the sufficiency of the answer. After all, whether or not an answer is given is a voluntary matter.

Mr. Argue: Then I will ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether a statement will be made within a few days, as was indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It will be made at the earliest possible date.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—SALE OF CANADA HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is it the intention of the government to sell the house now occupied by the premier of Newfoundland, known as Canada house?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I will have to take that question as notice.

CHILDREN OF WAR DEAD ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE ALLOWANCE AND EXTEND BENEFITS

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act so as to extend the benefits of the act to other classes of persons and to increase the allowance that may be paid in certain cases.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, this resolution has to do with amendments to the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act. Hon. members will recall that this act was given royal assent in May, 1953. Its basic purpose is to ensure that children are not deprived of higher education because of their father's death, where the death is determined by the Canadian pension commission to be related to service.

Briefly, the act provides for the payment, up to the age of 25 years, on behalf of a child who is following a course of higher education, of tuition fees and an allowance of $25 a month is granted for a period of four academic years or 36 months, whichever is the lesser.

The number of children who have already received benefits under this act has been somewhat higher than had been estimated, and that is all to the good. During the course of administration of the act certain anomalies and deficiencies have come to light, and it is hoped that these will be remedied by the proposed amendments which are contained in the bill to be introduced if this resolution is adopted. I shall now indicate very briefly the purport of these amendments.

The Deputy Chairman: I wonder if I could ask hon. members to lower their voices. It is impossible to hear the minister.

Mr. Brooks: Eligibility under the present act is restricted to a child on whose behalf a pension is being, or has been, paid because the parent's death is connected with war service. This has been found to be too restrictive. For example, it excludes a child who is over the age of 21 years at the time of the parent's death and who is already pursuing a course of higher education. It also excludes a child whose parent's death is compensable under a workmen's compensation act, or by legal liability on some person to pay damages, and the amount collected is such as to preclude the payment of pension which would otherwise be paid.

It further excludes a child whose parent's death is service-connected but, because of some technicality preventing payment of pension under the usual section of the Pension Act, an award is made by the commission under the compassionate clause. It excludes a child whose parent's death is found by the Canadian pension commission to be a direct result of a specific military duty in peacetime. And, finally, it excludes the child of a veteran who upon discharge from the forces is passed directly to my department for treatment and dies during such treatment. The Pension Act provides that in these circumstances pension is awarded to eligible dependents.

The bill which will be introduced later would extend eligibility for education assistance to the groups that I have mentioned. None of the groups is very large, but to the individual child his eligibility is of great importance. The government feels that justice and equity will be served by the proposed amendments, and I wish to point out that they preserve the principle of relationship of death to service.

Another amendment, and this I consider a very necessary and important one, would permit payment of the allowance at a rate of $60 a month where pension has ceased at the twenty-first birthday of the child. Prior to that age, pension would normally have been paid at $40 a month and an allowance of $25 is granted under the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act. Experience has shown that the sharp decline in income upon discontinuance of pension is inadvisable, and it is proposed to adjust the situation by paying an allowance at the same rate that was granted to the single veteran student taking higher education under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I rise not to delay this resolution in any way but to tell the minister and the committee that we on this side welcome the bill which will be brought in following the adoption of this resolution. As I understand the statement made by the minister, the resolution divides itself under two heads; that is, first, it is sought here to extend the benefits of the act known as the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act to classes of persons other than those now covered by the act and, second, also to increase the allowances that may be paid in certain cases as the minister has set out.

[Mr. Brooks.]

I have also listened with interest to the restrictions as to eligibility as the minister has detailed them here, and while I am unable to pass any comment on the validity of the amendments it would seem to us none the less that they appear on their face to be of the kind that should be approved by the house. Because of that we will be happy to see the bill receive second reading and sent to the committee on veterans affairs, so that it may be considered by that committee.

Meanwhile I wonder if the minister could say at this stage how much higher than the estimates are the number of children receiving educational assistance under the act? He said the figures were higher than those estimated when the act was introduced and he thought that was all to the good, with which I think I would agree. I wonder if when the time comes to reply the minister would give those figures at this stage.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am sure there is complete unanimity in the committee on the amendments proposed by the minister in this resolution. I was interested when he mentioned the fact that the number who were eligible was somewhat higher than was expected. I am pleased to hear that, and to learn that the act has been of benefit to a larger number than we expected.

I notice that there are two amendments. One extends the eligibility to include certain groups presently excluded, as explained by the minister, and we are pleased to support that proposal. The second amendment provides for the payment of an allowance of $60 per month which, if I understood the minister correctly, is the same amount paid to student veterans.

I am keen on this act because I know of a number of cases of children of deceased veterans in my constituency who have benefited from this act, and I want to emphasize the following remarks. When we can spend millions of dollars to bring certain immigrants to this country, and in some cases spend good Canadian dollars to bring and maintain immigrants here for a year who have fought against us, there should not be a single disabled veteran in this country suffer on any account because of the failure of this government to provide for his needs. Second, there should not be a single veteran's dependant in this country suffer on any account whatever or because of the failure of this government to provide for his or her needs. And third, and of equal importance, there should not be a single child of a deceased veteran who has fought in defence of his country and of freedom denied the opportunity of receiving an education.

Therefore on behalf of this group I want to express the strongest support possible for this act and for the amendments, and we trust it will be further amended to meet the representations of the Canadian Legion when that day arrives.

Mr. Brooks: Before the resolution carries, Mr. Chairman, I am now in a position to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Laurier, who wanted to know the number of children who had received benefits under the act in the past year. That number is 507. I might add that under the new amendments we anticipate the number receiving benefits will be in the neighbourhood of between 720 and 740.

I wish to thank the hon. member for Kootenay-West for his co-operation, which I have always received in the past. He mentioned the spending of considerable sums of money for bringing immigrants to this country. I would merely point out to him that this country has been settled by immigrants. As I read over the list of names of those who have received benefits under this act I observe that many of them are children of immigrants who came to Canada and served Canada in the last war. So those who came to our shores may be immigrants today but they will be Canadians tomorrow, and we find that in the past the immigrants and their children have played a significant role in the building up of this country and will do so in the future.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not at all opposed to immigration. I was referring only to immigrants from countries who fought against us in world war II, and only in the context of comparing what we do for these immigrants and what we should be prepared to do for the children of deceased veterans. We should not allow the needs of any veteran or his dependants to go unheeded or unremedied.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Brooks thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-45, to amend the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time; by leave, now?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the house to permit the bill to be read a second time now. The committee on veterans affairs is sitting, and we propose to send this bill immediately to that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: That is agreed so far as we are concerned.

Mr. Herridge: Agreed.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-45, to amend the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act.

Motion agreed on, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $674,164.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee I should like to revert to a matter which was under discussion yesterday, namely the dismissal of one Walter Mitchell, formerly employed as a checker and fumigator in the port of Montreal. I shall try to discuss this case without acrimony and as quietly and equitably as I can having regard to the circumstances.

The question arose some time ago because of a starred question which I put on the order paper. It also came up during a short discussion of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture one day last week and again yesterday when I moved to have certain documents produced in connection with the dismissal. I would have thought the minister would have had no objection to the production of these documents, because when a person is dismissed and loses his employment there should be no objection on the part of those taking such action to producing the evidence upon which the dismissal is based. For those reasons I should now like to put on record the other side of the case.

Mr. Walter Mitchell was a checker and fumigator at the port of Montreal for the last 22 years. I have forgotten how many years the minister said he was employed, not that long, but the information I have in my possession is that he has been employed in that capacity perhaps not during all the time but certainly in the Department of Agriculture for 22 years. He was employed during the season of navigation only; that is, he began his work in April and terminated it in December. He was a loyal, efficient, assiduous and honest employee of the Department of Agriculture. In fact, I am informed that during the 22 years he was in the employ of the department he never missed one day.

Notwithstanding that, Mr. Chairman, he was summarily dismissed. He was dismissed on 24 hours' notice. I hold in my hand a letter which he received from the regional veterinary director, Dr. G. T. Labelle of the city of Montreal. The letter is dated June 12 from the officer. Mr. Mitchell received it the next day, and it was to the effect that he should not report for work on the following Monday. In other words he was given exactly 24 hours to leave the service. The letter which the regional veterinary director wrote to Mr. Mitchell indicates that it is with deep regret that the doctor has to inform Mr. Mitchell that his services would be at an end.

Before I proceed further I should like to put on the record two letters which were addressed to Dr. P. Labelle, chief veterinarian health and animals disease, Department of Agriculture, Montreal. The first one is from the Cunard Steamship Company, Montreal, and the other is from Furness, Withy and Company of the same city, both dated June 13, the day on which Mr. Mitchell received his letter of dismissal. The first letter from the Cunard Steamship Company reads as follows:

Dear Dr. Labelle:

It is understood Mr. W. P. Mitchell, your inspector, will not be calling at this office in the future. While we appreciate any changes in the personnel is entirely a prerogative to the department, it is with regret that we will not have the pleasure of Mr. Mitchell's services.

For many years now, Mr. Mitchell, has been most co-operative, and a most conscientious worker as far as we are concerned. It is doubtful in our opinion, for what it is worth, that his successor can improve on his duty and devotion in his work.

You may be sure we would like to have Mr. Mitchell continue his visits to this office providing this is acceptable to you and to the department.

Yours faithfully,
The Cunard Steamship Company Limited

The other letter from Furness, Withy & Company Limited reads as follows:

Dr. G. T. Labelle,
District Veterinarian,
Montreal.

Dear Sir:

It came to us as quite a shock to learn that Mr. W. P. Mitchell has been laid off as of June 14.

The writer has been dealing with Mr. Mitchell for over 20 years and in all this time I cannot speak too highly of the service rendered by this gentleman. Have found him most efficient, yet at the same time courteous.

He has been most sympathetic to our problems in the transportation field and, at the same time, I am confident that he has fully protected the law as laid down by the Department of Agriculture.

In my own mind I am sure that he has acted without fear or favour in a diplomatic manner, and I trust that you may find some means of retaining his service, which to all parties concerned has been most courteous over the years.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

It is seldom indeed that we speak out for a civil servant, but I do feel that this is one occasion about which we should bring to your attention in the hope that you may reconsider and retain his services in his present position.

Yours very truly,
Furness, Withy & Company Limited

Before I proceed, sir, I should say the minister has said that this man was dismissed because of two reasons, first political patronage or activity, and second because he was found in charge of contraband liquor and cigarettes. I want to deal with both these points.

First let me deal with political activity. There is, sir, a method laid down in this house for the dismissal of public servants. It is a method that has been followed over the years by both parties. It is clearly set out in Hansard, and I want to put it on record. When a man has been found guilty of political activity he is not discharged because of an affidavit or on account of photographs or for any other reason save the reasons set out in Hansard.

That was agreed upon in Sir Robert Borden's day, by the late Lord Bennett, by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by the late Mackenzie King. I hope the house will bear with me for just a moment while I put on Hansard the method and the resolution that were adopted by both parties at the time concerning dismissals in the public service. I refer to the statement made by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, which will be found in Hansard of June 22, 1936, at page 4039. Mr. Bennett rose that day to deal with a certain dismissal, and after referring to the difference between the inside service and the outside service he proceeded to quote what Sir Robert Borden had said in an earlier debate, as follows:

In 1911, when Sir Robert Borden came into office, a discussion took place in the first session regarding the question of patronage and dismissals from the public service. Sir Robert Borden said:

"I would like to point out to my hon. friend what he seems to have forgotten, that with respect to both the inside service and the outside service this matter has been settled. In the first place by a statute of Canada concerning the inside service, in the second place by a resolution of this house, concurred in by both political parties with regard to the outside service. So far as the inside service is concerned, the statutory provision to which I desire to call attention is to be found in the act of 1908 introduced and passed by the late administration. Section 43 of that statute is as follows:"

Now the appropriate section of the present Civil Service Act is a different one; it has been amended, and it can be found in the present act.

Sir Robert Borden went on:

"Now, so far as the outside service is concerned, the rule was embodied in a resolution of the House of Commons moved by Mr. Lake on the 17th July,

1905, and accepted by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was then leading the government, and that rule is in these words:

That whilst it is desirable that every official in the employ of the government of Canada, should enjoy perfect freedom of political opinion and the untrammelled exercise of his franchise in accord therewith, no official should be engaged, or permitted to engage, in partisan work of any description in the election of a representative to the provincial or dominion legislature."

On the same page—890—referring to Mr. A. K. Maclean, he said:

"Now, my hon. friend has spoken of what should be necessary to convince the government or a minister of the crown that an official has taken an offensive part in any election. There are, obviously some cases in which inquiry would be rather futile. For example, on the 21st of September last I myself personally saw three office-holders of this country engaged in active partisan work in the city of Halifax. . . . In that case I would not grant an inquiry because I saw it with my own eyes."

At page 891, he said:

"Now, my hon. friend is anxious that inquiry should be had in proper cases, and so am I. No one is more unwilling to dismiss officials than I am, but where the government or responsible ministers is convinced that an official has been guilty of violation of the plain terms of a statute or a resolution of the House of Commons concurred in by both political parties, by which his conduct ought to be guided, I would ask my hon. friend what alternative would a government have in a case of that kind?"

Then Mr. E. M. Macdonald, member for Pictou at that time, raised a very interesting question as to whether or not representations made by a defeated candidate would have the same force and effect as those made by a member—

I will not go on to quote what was said there, because it was agreed during the course of that debate that a defeated candidate could not by any stretch of the imagination make a recommendation that should be acted upon by a minister of the crown. Why? Because a defeated candidate would not be in this house where he could rise in his place and state what the reasons were for the dismissal, or where, if need be, he could be cross-examined.

Well, then, Mr. Rhodes rose at a certain point and asked this question:

Does the hon. gentleman object to a minister taking the recommendations of a defeated candidate?

The answer was definitely yes. Then I go on, and I am now quoting Mr. Bennett:

In 1928, on May 29, the then member for St. Lawrence-St. George brought to the attention of the house a case in which a gentleman had been dismissed for partisanship. He had held office for seven years and seven months and was efficient. An inquiry was asked for but not granted. It was contended that as the minister had given a certificate he should be dismissed without further inquiry. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce in that debate said, at page 3526:

"I will admit that the matter to which the hon. member has just referred has given me some little concern. The dismissal took place entirely in accordance with the principle that has been observed by all parties. The complaint of a member of the house that an individual has been exercising partisanship in elections has always been accepted by the minister as a reason for dismissal. I have followed that principle, but I am glad to say there have not been many instances in my own department."

A little later Mr. Bennett went on to say:

The result was that the gentleman dismissed from office was without any appropriate remedy. I am going to refer to that presently. During the progress of the first debate, to which I have alluded, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not entirely in accord with what had been said by the previous speaker. Sir Wilfrid said:

"I beg my hon. friend's pardon. We said in 1896 that no man should be dismissed unless he was first given the opportunity of being heard. But I said also that we would accept the written statement of a member of parliament, giving the facts, and asking for the dismissal. That is the rule we laid down, and we have lived up to it. I am told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we did not live up to that rule. I do not admit the charge. I think we did, but even if we were deficient I would expect that the hon. gentlemen who are on the treasury benches at present would at least act according to their own doctrine. Are they going to throw over their own doctrine and institute dismissals right and left without giving any man the opportunity of defending himself or without any member of parliament taking the responsibility of placing on record a charge against the man whose dismissal he seeks?"

Then the debate continued with extracts from remarks by both Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Meighen in which it is agreed that a dismissal shall not take place from the inside service except in accordance with the Civil Service Act and from the outside service except in accordance, first, with a statement of a member of parliament who on his own responsibility will state that of his own personal knowledge he knows that a man is guilty of political activity and in the alternative, as Sir Wilfrid added, unless and until an investigation has been carried out.

Now, what happened in this case? As far as I am able to ascertain, and I tried to get the information by a notice of motion to produce papers yesterday, this man was dismissed because of an affidavit the minister has in his possession and because of a photograph which indicates that he was taking part in certain activities. But the resolution of both parties says that is not the manner in which a public servant shall be dismissed. A man shall be dismissed on the recommendation or the certificate of a member of parliament, as outlined above. From this it follows that the practice and procedure of the house have not been followed by the minister.

A public servant has been discharged because of political activity on the basis of an affidavit and the affiant, the person who made the affidavit, cannot be cross-examined because he is not here. A man has been dismissed ex parte without an investigation, without being given the opportunity to be heard and contrary, I say again, to the resolution approved by both parties in this house over the years.

The only way, as I say, in which this man could have been dismissed was either by the certificate of a member of parliament or by an investigation made by an impartial tribunal. In essence an individual should not be dismissed under any circumstances without being given the opportunity of being heard. The principle is clear. It is based upon the assumption that an hon. member of this house who certifies to such a condition has satisfied himself to his own personal knowledge as to the authenticity of the statements he makes, and that they are true; but if he makes such a statement without regard to the fine detail of it being true or untrue and the individual is dismissed, I think the man probably has an action against the member of parliament because he has compassed his dismissal and destroyed his position.

These were the reasons why, after a lengthy debate, the conclusion was arrived at that this was the only fair, equitable and reasonable manner in which to dispense with the services of an individual. Therefore with regard to the political activity part of this case I conclude that the man, Walter Mitchell, has not been dismissed in accordance with the long standing practice of the house and that a grave and serious injustice has been done to him under the circumstances.

The next reason given by the minister was that Walter Mitchell was in possession of contraband liquor and contraband cigarettes. What are the facts? I hold in my hand a document which the minister refused to produce yesterday. It is from the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise division, and is dated December 23, 1957, almost a full month after the alleged charge against Mr. Mitchell, which offence was said to have occurred on November 29, 1957. It is the usual and very ordinary notice served pursuant to sections 158 to 166 of the Customs Act advising this man that he was in possession of five bottles of liquor and six cartons of cigarettes. What member of parliament who has been in the house for any length of time has not acted on behalf of constituents who have brought such notices to him because they have been searched by a customs officer and found in possession of cigarettes or other articles they have brought into Canada without payment of the excise tax?

Over the many years I have been here I have had many such notices brought to me. Many of them were of little or no importance. Others were more serious and still others were very serious. But the point I wish to make is that this was not a charge but a notice pursuant to sections 158 to 166 of the Customs Act to the effect that Mitchell had in his possession liquor and cigarettes upon which the excise tax had not been paid. It was not considered serious by departmental officers. Revenue officers came to his home. He opened the door and said, "Look at the premises; you are entirely welcome to find what there is here." He told them how these articles came into his possession and he invited them to confirm the information he gave them. They must have done so, because a little later he received a notice from the same department, pursuant to sections 158 to 166 of the Customs Act, to the effect that the statements he had made were found to be true and that the officers of the Department of National Revenue were not proceeding against him.

I do not have that letter. I had hoped to get it from the minister when I moved for the production of papers. I was not able to get it. I have therefore only the information which has been brought to my attention; but the information is that the letter was forthcoming and did go to Mitchell to indicate that the department had no intention of proceeding because they did not consider this matter as being of a serious nature. If that is the case, I think the minister did the house an injustice when he did not produce that information. Notwithstanding that, I now hold in my hand two documents from officers of the Department of Agriculture attesting to the fact that Mitchell was a good, honest and assiduous worker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What is their political creed?

Mr. Chevrier: Somebody says "What is their political creed?" I would ask hon. members to listen to the letters as I will put them on the record from permanent officials of the Department of Agriculture and to draw their own conclusions. After Mr. Mitchell was dismissed, on June 20 he obtained from Mr. J. J. Kieran, who was his immediate superior at the city of Montreal, the following affidavit:

> I the undersigned do hereby solemnly declare, that for the past twelve years, acting in the capacity of supervisor of checkers and fumigators for the port of Montreal, that Mr. W. P. Mitchell was employed under my supervision, and has always been punctual, courteous, sober, reliable, rendered valuable service, and has always reported and remained on duty when requested.
> J. J. Kieran
> Sworn before me at Montreal, Que. > this 20th day of June, 1958.
> Leopold E. Lamoureux, a commissioner of > the Superior Court, District of Montreal.

This statement comes many months after it is alleged by the minister that Mr. Mitchell was found in possession of contraband liquor. Surely the official, his own official, must have known about this alleged offence and he could not have considered it serious when he, in the face of these facts, gave the statement which I have put on the record.

Then from a higher official of the Department of Agriculture, namely Dr. G. T. Labelle, regional veterinarian for the city of Montreal, comes this statement which is in French and which I shall read and translate. It is dated June 19, 1958:

A Qui de droit.

Ceci est pour attester que Monsieur Walter Mitchell, durant son emploi à notre Ministère comme Vérificateur et Fumigateur, a toujours été ponctuel et assidu à son travail. Nous n'avons aucun reproche à lui adresser concernant l'accomplissement de ses devoirs.

This statement translated in my best English is as follows:

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that Mr. Walter Mitchell during his employment in our department as a checker and fumigator was always punctual and assiduous at his work. We have no blame or reproach to attach to him concerning the accomplishment of his duties.

This is dated June 19, many months—in facts five or six months—after this alleged offence. Furthermore, notwithstanding that the minister said on two occasions that this man had been guilty of an offence on November 29, 1957, he was called back to work in April, 1958. If this charge was so serious and if it had not been abandoned, as I am informed, why was he called back to work? I have put on the record what the facts are.

I say to the minister that he has dealt unfairly and unjustly with this man. I say furthermore that he has maligned this man's reputation by putting on the record a statement which is certainly not in accordance with what he said the other day and with the facts. He has clearly left himself open also to an action for defamation of character if made outside the house. He has dismissed a person who was in the employ of his department for 22 years, and he refuses to produce the evidence. He says he has affidavits and photographs, but he does not want to give them to the house. He guarantees that the facts are accurate, but he will not tell us on what he bases his judgment. He says he decided not to prosecute because he did not want to give the case any publicity.

May I say that the case was not one in his department. The case came from another department, if there was a case; and there was no prosecution. The minister had nothing to do with the matter in so far as the other department was concerned.

The minister said he knew about this case only two or three months before July 23, which was when he spoke. If he knew about it only then, how could he refuse to prosecute as he said he did? Then of course he went on to say that he did not like the questions that were being asked. He decided this matter without inquiry and without investigation. When a man makes his livelihood by means of a position such as the one held by this man, and when he has been discharging his duty over the years—for 22 years in this case—without the slightest complaint and with the strongest recommendations even after the alleged infraction, I say that his reputation is at stake when action of the kind taken by the minister has been taken.

The decision of the minister was taken ex parte. I say again that he has committed a grave injustice to Walter Mitchell, particularly as this action comes from a minister of a government pledged to bring down a bill on civil rights by which the rights of the individual are to be protected. The rights of the individual in this case are clearly established by the record and the practice and procedure over the years in this house. That practice has not been followed. Someone in the department, evidently of a different political faith from that of Mr. Mitchell, has reported against him.

While it was the minister's prerogative to accept the report and consider it, I say that he should not have acted upon it (1) without getting a certificate from a member of parliament or (2) without conducting an investigation. An investigation was not conducted. The minister proceeded without an inquiry. I submit that his action is contrary to the practice; the rules of this house and contrary to justice. In the name of justice I demand that an investigation be now held into this case by an impartial tribunal.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the initial complaint of the hon. member for Laurier I thing characterizes the entire long speech he has made in this matter. He complained because, as he says, there had been failure to produce documents yesterday in connection with this case. There is no man in this house who knows better than does the hon. member for Laurier that documents of the kind he asked for have never been produced in this house.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is utterly untrue.

Mr. Harkness: In speaking to this matter yesterday I outlined the three types of documents which I said constituted most of the file in connection with this case. I then went on to say that documents of that type—that is to say documents within the department, reports of officials to officials and to the minister, interdepartmental reports and letters which have come in marked "personal and confidential"—have never been produced.

There is no who knows that better than the hon. member who has got up in the house and tried to create a completely false impression with regard to this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: I went on to say, as reported at page 2858 of Hansard for yesterday, that if there are any documents in addition to these I shall be glad to produce them.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, you choose your evidence.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Laurier was not satisfied with that, as he should have been and, as I say, he attempted to create a completely wrong impression in connection with this matter. He shouted, I think, the word "secrecy" or something of that nature, trying to create the impression that I was trying to conceal something.

Mr. Chevrier: You are.

Mr. Harkness: I have never tried to conceal anything in this matter. When the hon. member put his starred question on the order paper I answered it. I did not need at that time to say anything about the political grounds partly on which the man was dismissed. All I needed to say was that he had been dismissed because he was in possession of these contraband goods. I answered the question fully but the hon. member has been trying to create the impression that I have been endeavouring to maintain some secrecy in connection with it.

Mr. Chevrier: You certainly have.

Mr. Pickersgill: The record shows it.

Mr. Harkness: What he had to say in regard to the production of papers I think is characteristic of his whole speech. It was an effort to twist this case around.

The next point I would like to comment upon is that the hon. member went into a long diatribe as to what happened in 1902, 1911 and various other dates. As far as I can make out, all that this amounted to was a great complaint because I had not just fired this man upon the complaint of a member but that I had made an inquiry into the matter. I had the matter investigated but the hon. member for Laurier is apparently complaining because I did make an inquiry and after I made that inquiry I found there were very good grounds indeed for discharging this man.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well, if the minister does not want to answer my question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: I would point out to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that we are in committee and he can ask as many questions as he wishes. It is not a matter of not permitting a question, but I would first like to deal with the questions which have already been asked. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has a great habit of trying to throw people off the track by getting up and inquiring if he may ask a question or something along those lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: This is a tactic which does not always work.

Mr. Pickersgill: We shall see.

Mr. Harkness: The next point is that the hon. member for Laurier read from a document which happens to be a document not from my file. He said he was expecting it to be produced but I did not have that document.

Mr. Chevrier: You should have had it.

Mr. Pearson: Someone has been around the files.

Mr. Harkness: However, what I did have was a considerable number of police and other reports from which I am completely satisfied that this man was guilty of securing contraband liquor from these ships which he was inspecting in the Montreal harbour on behalf of the Department of Agriculture, and any employee of this department—and I hope of any other department of the government—who in the course of his duties as inspector takes gifts from the people he is inspecting should be dismissed just as soon as that fact comes to light. I do not think there is any question about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: That was exactly what was done in this case.

Mr. Pearson: With no chance to defend himself.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Laurier went around still trying to confuse the issue—

Mr. Chevrier: A fair kind of investigation that was.

Mr. Harkness: As far as I and the senior officials of my department are concerned, we consider it a very serious matter when a man engages in conduct of this kind. It brings the entire inspection service into disrepute and under suspicion and it is the type of thing which cannot be allowed to continue.

The hon. member for Laurier was trying to make it appear that we had known about this matter months back and did not take any action in connection with it. That is not the fact. The first time any information in regard to this man or his political activities or other activities came to my attention or that of my officials in Ottawa was May 1, 1958. That was the first intimation of any kind we had in this connection and it was as a result of the complaints we received at that time that I ordered an investigation made. The various facts I have already given to the house in connection with this man came to light and I finally ordered his release on May 29.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Which is about a full month later. Yes, I will answer a question.

Mr. Chevrier: Was this man given an opportunity to appear and defend himself?

Mr. Harkness: There was no opportunity to appear and defend himself, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: A fine investigation.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact by his own admission he received this contraband which was forfeited. He admitted buying the cigarettes and that he received the contraband liquor as gifts from the people on the ships which he was supposed to be inspecting. Hon. members can draw their own conclusions as to why he was getting gifts from these people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Fine justice.

Mr. Harkness: But if the information that this man had received contraband which had been obtained from these ships, and had been found in possession of it had come to my attention and the attention of my departmental officials at the end of November or when the events took place or at any time after that within two or three weeks or even one month—the hon. member for Laurier mentioned something about a date in December—then this man would have been dismissed forthwith and that would have been the end of the matter. He would then have been available for full-time duties in helping the hon. member to organize in the election campaign.

An hon. Member: He needed lots of help.

Mr. Harkness: In regard to the question which was raised in so far as the prosecution of this man is concerned, the customs department apparently decided not to bring him into the police court for prosecution because it had no evidence that he was selling this liquor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: All right; I am so informed by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Chevrier: You had better read the sections of the act.

Mr. Harkness: All right, in any event the prosecution branch of the customs department decided not to prosecute because of that fact.

Mr. Pearson: They had no case.

Mr. Harkness: They certainly had a case—they found liquor in this man's possession. He admitted where he got it and as a matter of fact he said he bought the cigarettes—he did not get them as gifts—but he admitted he got them from the ships and admitted that the liquor was given to him. As I say, however, they did not prosecute him, which happens in a large number of cases, according to my information.

Mr. Chevrier: When it is not serious.

Mr. Harkness: In any event, had the matter been drawn to our attention, as I have said, he would have been discharged forthwith.

The hon. member for Laurier said that I mentioned I did not like questions being asked, but I do not know where he can find any statement of mine along those lines. I do not mind any questions being asked—

Mr. Pickersgill: Except by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Ricard: You flatter yourself.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said it, I did not say it. I do not mind questions being asked but I do deplore the amount of time which is being taken up over a matter of this kind which I think the hon. member, as well as everyone else here, realizes is not a very important matter. I think if everyone in the house looks at this thing in any sort of a fair way he will agree that there was every excuse and every reason in the world for getting rid of this man. He was not the type of man one should have engaged on an inspection job in one's department.

Mr. Chevrier: After 22 years.

Mr. Harkness: I think that covers the matter, more or less.

Mr. Chevrier: More or less, less than more.

Mr. Harkness: In any event there has been a considerable amount of time devoted to it and I gave a full summary of the matter when it came up previously and I have given quite a full summary today. It seems to me that the hon. member for Laurier just made a mistake in ever bringing this matter before the house in the first place. Now he is attempting to get out of an awkward situation.

Mr. Howard: First I should like to make a very short comment about what I consider to be the most disgusting and deplorable attitude of both the Liberal government and this government in following the practice of having members of the civil service dismissed on the word of members of parliament that they have participated in the electioneering. I do not think that members of parliament, regardless of the fact that their statements made in their places in this house are to be accepted, have any right to act as both judge and jury in respect to anyone, and I should have thought that this government with its talk about a bill of rights and the rights of individuals might at least have changed that system and treated civil servants better.

Mr. Harkness: I did not use that system. I carried on an inquiry.

Mr. Howard: If the Minister of Agriculture feels he can justify this situation by means of interjections he is incorrect. He knows as well as I do, and it was said not only on this occasion but on another occasion last fall, that if a member of parliament indicates that a civil servant participated in politics, the latter should be fired instantly, and that is the attitude I am complaining about.

An hon. Member: What about the C.C.F. record in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Howard: I would be quite willing to discuss the attitude of the government in Saskatchewan with regard to civil servants on some other occasion but I know very well that the chairman has more understanding of the rules than to allow such a discussion to take place here.

We should not have had a debate of this nature. I do not know whether the attitude expressed by the hon. member for Laurier is correct in this case, or whether the attitude expressed by the Minister of Agriculture is correct. The truth of this matter is beyond my knowledge and it is, I think, quite unfortunate that the matter should get to this stage. Civil servants should be in a position no different from that occupied by employees of private concerns with regard to matters of this kind, and I maintain that they should be treated precisely as other employees are treated. I am dealing now with the question of bargaining rights and the opportunity to submit grievances to independent tribunals. If we had a sensible system and if this government would undertake to treat its civil servants as more than second class citizens—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Hon. members can laugh, but if they laugh apparently they do not have too much of an understanding about the rights of individuals, and I am sure many civil servants would like to hear the snickers you are making about them.

Some hon. Members: We are snickering at you.

Mr. Howard: If a civil servant is dismissed a channel should be provided so that that person, if he feels he has been unjustly dismissed, can take his case to an outside tribunal or arbitration board, as other employees are able to do, so that he can put his case, or so that the organization to which he belongs can put his case, and where the crown or the person who fired him, can also be heard. An independent arbitration board could make these decisions just as is done with regard to any other group of employees who are covered by a union agreement or who have collective bargaining rights.

Until the government of Canada undertakes to recognize the rights of individuals to be treated as individuals regardless of whether they work for the federal government or for an independent employer we are going to have deplorable discussions of this nature in which one hon. member says one thing and another hon. member says: no this is the true state of affairs. That is all I have to say about the matter.

Mr. Harkness: I shall make just one or two brief comments on those remarks. As far as the rights of individuals are concerned, I think everybody in this country knows that we have much greater respect for the rights of individuals than have the members of the C.C.F. party. The whole theory of socialism is to regiment all individuals. We believe in allowing an individual freedom in order to carry on his activities in any way he thinks best as long as he remains within the law.

Mr. Howard: You are not speaking the truth.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I ask for an immediate withdrawal.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the committee that we are not discussing the philosophy of various political parties, and I think we had better bring this whole discussion back to vote No. 1 that started it. The vote deals with the Department of Agriculture, administrative service, including the advisory committee on agricultural services.

Mr. Harkness: Before we proceed, I demand a withdrawal on the part of the hon. member who has just stated that I was not telling the truth.

The Deputy Chairman: Did the hon. member for Skeena say that?

Mr. Howard: Of course, but I would like to amplify it.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Deputy Chairman: I ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Howard: I will certainly withdraw it, Mr. Chairman, if—

An hon. Member: All right. Sit down.

Mr. Howard: —I may explain, because I feel that in asking to withdraw the minister has not understood what I was saying. When I said to him that he was not telling the truth, I did not say he was telling a falsehood.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, the hon. member for Skeena was asked to withdraw, not to make a speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is chairman of this committee?

An hon. Member: Not you, Jack.

Mr. Howard: I should like to explain. I have no objection to withdrawing, but I am sure the minister does not quite understand. He made a reference to the effect that the party to which he belongs had more respect for the rights of individuals—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. Howard: The minister indicated that the party to which he belongs has more respect for the rights of individuals than we had, and I said he was not telling the truth in that respect, but when I said he was not telling the truth I did not say he was telling a falsehood. I have got just the same right to say that the C.C.F. party has more respect for the rights of individuals than the Tories have, and along this line I do not think I should be asked to withdraw.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member withdrew those words, as he said before—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harkness: He does not withdraw them.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member said he was withdrawing the words that the minister was not telling the truth.

Mr. Howard: If you insist that I do, after the explanation I have made.

The Deputy Chairman: I think those words should be withdrawn or modified.

Mr. Howard: Well, I will modify them a little bit.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, like my colleague, the hon. member for Laurier I feel I have a good case and it is not therefore necessary for me to raise my voice as it seemed to be necessary for the Minister of Agriculture to do realizing—

An hon. Member: Speak a little louder; we cannot hear you.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as he obviously did that he had done something he had no justification for doing and no right under the law to do. The Minister of Agriculture said that this was an unimportant matter. Anticipating this debate I took some time this morning and looked up what the minister had to say in another debate a little over a year ago when he was urging me to disregard the law and to do things that were not provided for by the law because he claimed the rights of certain individuals were being interfered with. At that time the minister was very critical as was his party and the newspapers in his province because I insisted that my duty was to carry out the law made by parliament.

The minister has now dismissed a civil servant who had served in his department for 22 years. The minister did not say he did not do his work well, assiduously and conscientiously and the minister produced no evidence to the contrary. The minister admitted he dismissed this man, took his livelihood and his rights away from him without giving him a hearing. That apparently is one of those new civil rights the government the minister belongs to is going to include in the new charter we have been promised, the right after 22 years of good service of civil servants to be fired by a minister after a secret investigation—the papers concerning which the Minister of Agriculture has refused to give parliament—after the civil servant has been given no hearing and after the minister has made defamatory observations about the man under the protection of his immunity in this house, observations which if made outside the house would render the minister subject to an action for damages.

That is what has happened in this case and the minister has not produced one jot or tittle of evidence to this house, to which he is responsible, that this man engaged in any political activities. We are expected to accept the minister's affirmation of that fact unsupported by any documents or evidence whatsoever. None has been given. The minister said it is too trivial a matter to be bothered with and that we should get on with the important business of the country. The minister is a member of the party which promised us a bill of rights. In this case a man has been deprived of his livelihood.

An hon. Member: What did he do?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that you let the courts decide if this man did anything wrong. I think it is a shocking thing, sir.

Mr. McGee: You are shouting.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never expected to hear any minister get up in this house and say, "I have secret police reports which I will not show any one else which convict this man." I remind hon. members that this individual has never had a hearing or a chance to say a word in his own defence. The minister has said, in effect, "I have secret reports and parliament is not entitled to see them". There has never been a hearing in the courts and no charge has been laid in the courts. The minister said, in effect, "I just fired him because I, the Minister of Agriculture, was satisfied on the basis of the secret reports I received that he should no longer be an employee of my department".

First of all the minister constituted himself the prosecutor. Then he constituted himself the judge. And then he constituted himself the executioner. This, sir, is the new bill of rights the promises of which we have heard back and forth across the country.

Mr. McGee: You are shouting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not a scrap of evidence concerning political activity on the part of this individual was ever given to parliament to whom the minister is responsible. A charge has been made by the minister that this man is guilty of something about which no charge has been laid in the courts. The only person who has judged this man is the Minister of Agriculture and he reached his decision on evidence that the man has not been allowed to see and that the jury before whom the Minister of Agriculture has to appear has not been allowed to see. That is what we are asked to accept here as trivial and then go on with the business of the country. Nothing, in my experience, that has happened in a British parliament compares with what we have been asked to do here today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no evidence and no hearing. The man was just deprived of his livelihood on the order of an arrogant minister who refuses to account to the people to whom he is accountable, apparently believing that a huge and servile majority will justify anything he cares to do.

The minister said that as soon as the facts came to light he dismissed this man. I should like to know what the Minister of National Revenue was doing between November 29, 1957 and May 1, 1958 when the minister says he heard about the matter for the first time. Incidentally I should like to know why the Minister of National Revenue is not here at this moment when a matter is being discussed in which his department is clearly involved. An officer in the employ of the Minister of National Revenue seized contraband, or alleged contraband, in the apartment of a known civil servant. Either the minister or his officials thought it too unimportant to tell the Minister of Agriculture or they were derelict in their duty. Surely, if what was known to the Minister of National Revenue and his department last November was considered serious enough to merit the dismissal of this man and the taking away of his livelihood, it was serious enough for the Minister of National Revenue to have acquainted the Minister of Agriculture with the facts before six months had elapsed. And yet, on the admission of the Minister of Agriculture he did not hear about this case until May 1. Another civil servant in the employ of the Minister of Agriculture on the order of the minister some time before June 12 sent the dismissal notice which was dated we are told, although not by the minister concerned, June 12.

It seems to me the least the minister could have done, instead of abusing the opposition for defending the rights of individuals, was to have given this committee a detailed factual account of every circumstance that happened in this case together with the evidence because we have not yet—although the Minister of Agriculture came perilously close to disproving it—reached the stage where we operate under the system that obtains in the Soviet union.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said, "I have secret police reports. I am satisfied this fellow did something wrong and therefore I fired him". The minister speaks about his respect and the respect of his party for the rights of individuals but surely it is not a very far step from that kind of action to the Soviet system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, hon. members may protest but the minister did refer to secret police reports. Of course, the government has not yet put this man in a concentration camp but the man has been deprived of his livelihood on the order of the minister who says, "I have secret police reports that parliament is not entitled to see". That is what he told us. He said, "Parliament is not entitled to see these documents. I am satisfied that this man should not be in my department. Out he goes. And furthermore, if anyone asks questions I will malign the reputation of this civil servant so he will not be able to get a job anywhere else, and I shall do so in a place where I have immunity from the courts."

If it were done outside the ambit of the immunity provided by the house the minister would doubtless be liable for an action for damages.

An hon. Member: Is that your method?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman asks me if that is my method. That is not my method nor was it ever the method during the time my colleagues and I occupied the treasury benches.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the argument I am making now I am not in the least concerned about whether or not this man should be in the civil service and indeed I know nothing about that. As a matter of fact, I have never seen the man in my life and I know nothing about him except what I have heard in this chamber. What I am concerned about, is whether any civil servant, no matter who he may be, can be fired on the say-so of a minister simply because the minister comes into the house and alleges that he has in his possession some secret police reports and we in parliament are not allowed to make any inquiries about them nor are we provided with any evidence surrounding the case. That is what I am concerned about.

No doubt some hon. members heard the broadcast on the C.B.C. this morning. Perhaps we will not hear this sort of thing too much longer on the C.B.C., if this kind of attack on civil rights continues on the part of this government. What we heard this morning was that this was something much bigger than the case of Walter Mitchell. It is the right of every Canadian to have his case heard before an independent tribunal and not to be judged by his prosecutor, or his accuser, and then to be executed after the judgment, and then defamed after the execution. Here is a man who had 22 years of public service and he was taken on the service at the opening of the navigation season this year and then suddenly, on June 12, he is told that he has no more job. That is what the minister has done. It seems to me, sir, that this is no small matter.

I want to repeat what I said before. In my lifetime I can think of nothing that has happened in the parliament of Canada, or in the parliament of the United Kingdom comparable with this attack upon the rights of a free citizen, this attack upon the rights of a public servant and it seems to me, sir, that the minister should take this matter seriously. He should remember that he is no longer an irresponsible member of the opposition, as he was perhaps for too long. He is now supposed to be a responsible minister, responsible to this house, and it is the duty of a minister to treat this house with respect, to treat the members of this house with respect and to treat questions raised in this house seriously and with respect. It seems to me, that the minister should cut out his vituperation, cut out his innuendoes, cut out his cheap jibes and confine himself, as we have confined ourselves, to the known facts of the matter and give us a detailed chronological account of what really did happen in this case after May 1 when the minister first heard of it, and produce the evidence on which he acted. Even then I say, sir, that I could never be satisfied for this reason: this man had no hearing; he was never given a chance.

An hon. Member: He admitted it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Someone said he admitted it. How could he have admitted it? The minister never saw him; the minister admitted he had no hearing. How could he have admitted it if he had no hearing? If he had a hearing, if he did make admissions at the hearing, why did the minister not, in a straightforward, simple, consecutive manner, tell us so instead of doing what he did. Instead of doing that, what he did was just say that it was not important enough to be bothered with.

I seems to me, sir, that certainly in this session of parliament nothing has happened yet that is nearly so important as this. What we are entitled to, in this committee, and what we should insist upon getting in this committee is a proper accounting by the minister of what, on the face of it, on his own admissions perhaps more than on anything even that was said by the hon. member for Laurier, though what he said was pretty damning, too, was damning.

The minister's own admissions were far more damning. His admission that he was doing this on secret police reports that nobody else should be allowed to see, his admission that this man had no hearing, his admission that he conducted the inquiry and he reached the conclusion and he carried out the execution entirely on his own and that we are not entitled to be told what are the facts, it seems to me is far more damning than anything that has been said on this side of the house. I refer to what has come out of the minister's own mouth. I feel we should have from the minister a respectful and proper account of what happened.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think the peroration we have just heard from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will go down in this house as a classic of making a mountain out of a molehill. Two or three of the things that he has said I would just comment on briefly. I never at any time said, as the hon. member just stated, that this was too unimportant to be bothered with.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. Harkness: No. What I said was that it seemed to me we had spent a great deal of time on a matter of this kind.

Mr. Pearson: Too unimportant.

Mr. Pickersgill: "Not very important", was what the minister said.

Mr. McIlraith: "Not very important".

Mr. Harkness: That is not correct. The accuracy of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, of course, is not very good. He kept repeating that this man had been a civil servant for 22 years. The man has never been a civil servant to begin with, never. The hon. member for Laurier talked in the same way and so did the hon. member for Timiskaming. The man has never been a civil servant; he has been a casual, seasonal employee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is his livelihood not just as important to him?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Harkness: He was not employed for 22 years. He was employed at various times during 16 years.

Now, the hon. member is talking about giving a detailed account. I have given a detailed account; I have given all the details in connection with this matter and I do not know what else the hon. member is talking about when he is talking about a detailed account.

Mr. Deschatelets: Where is your written judgment?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Harkness: That, I think, is all I can really say in reply to the remarks that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just given utterance to.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to get your attention ever since the hon. member for Laurier was on his feet making his statement. When I rose to my feet to ask him if he would permit a question the Minister of Agriculture rose and he was recognized. I am wondering whether I am in order at this time in asking the hon. member for Laurier a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. McGee: I would like to know whether to the hon. member's knowledge the gentleman in question did participate politically on his behalf?

Mr. Chevrier: That is a good question and I am glad the hon. member asked it. According to the rules and procedure of this house the onus is on the minister dismissing an employee to establish beyond doubt—

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Cardiff: Answer the question.

Mr. Chevrier: I am answering the question by saying that the onus—

Mr. Cardiff: You are evading the question.

Mr. Chevrier: I have been asked a question; just let me answer it. I say, according to the procedure in this house, the onus is on the minister to establish that the person dismissed is guilty of political activity or political partisanship, not on anybody else.

Mr. Cardiff: That is not answering the question.

Mr. McGee: Am I then to assume that the hon. member will not reply to my question either in the affirmative or negative?

Mr. Chevrier: I have replied in the manner in which the procedure is laid down, and there is no doubt that that is the position taken by both parties in this house.

The Chairman: I think tempers are getting a bit frayed. We should really not be discussing anything else but the items involved in the resolution before the house. Consequently, we should not be discussing the conduct of individuals in this particular case or the conduct of the hon. member for Laurier. I would ask hon. members kindly to try to relate themselves as much as possible to the items under discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister one or two questions with your permission, Mr.

Chairman? The minister has said that he has an affidavit dealing with this case. Will he produce the affidavit?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have more than one affidavit in connection with this case but, as I stated yesterday, these affidavits have come in under a personal or confidential covering letter and the hon. member knows that when he gets a letter of that kind he does not produce it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor does he dismiss civil servants.

Mr. Harkness: Nor does anyone else.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, as found on page 2599 of Hansard for July 23 the minister said:

> In this case there was no question about that. I not only have affidavits, if the hon. member is looking for affidavits, but I have pictures of this particular man in the hon. member's committee room, evidently in charge of the political activities there.

I want the affidavits. Will the minister produce them?

Mr. Harkness: I have already answered the question.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has stated that he cannot allow conduct and practices of this kind among officers of his department. Is the minister aware of any other case or any other instances other than the one on November 29 dealing with this individual?

Mr. Harkness: I do not see what this has to do with the matter, Mr. Chairman, but I am not aware of any other case. If I were aware of any other case I would promptly discharge the man concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Then why does the minister say that he cannot condone these practices and these gifts that were taken? There is but one instance. Why does he make it far worse than it is? I ask the minister this question. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the notice which was served on Mitchell under sections 158 to 166 of the Customs Act?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I ask this final question. Has the minister seen the withdrawal notice from the Department of National Revenue advising Mitchell that they were not proceeding in the matter in accordance with sections 158 to 166?

Mr. Harkness: I have already gone over that point. I told the hon. member earlier that I had received information from the Department of National Revenue that they had decided not to prosecute in this particular case.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, now that this matter has been raised in the house I have a few observations I should like to make. I have listened to hon. members opposite who have bristled with righteous indignation and talked about the freedom of the individual, the rights of the individual and the right of the individual to speak in his own defence. I think that hon. members opposite are the last ones who should be talking like that because they are members of a party which, when they formed the government in 1935, fired people by the thousands without any affidavits, without so much as a yes, aye or no. They were just told they were not needed any more.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is totally untrue.

The Chairman: I am afraid the hon. member is not actually discussing the resolution before us now. We are not at liberty at present to discuss events of 1935 and subsequent years. We must adhere to the matter before us which is a resolution providing for the voting of a certain amount of money for the Department of Agriculture. I would ask the hon. member to adhere to the matter being discussed as closely as possible.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this matter has been pursued by other hon. members I think I should have the right to pursue it too because it affects my riding and what goes on there.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he cannot discuss at this time what has happened in former years or what is happening at present. Once again I must ask the hon. member to adhere to the matter being discussed at this time.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I will bring my remarks up to the present time. In my opinion the government has exercised a great deal more restraint in the dismissal of employees than has been exercised in the past. It is quite possible that the government may have even leaned over backwards in exercising restraint because if it were me there would be a lot more people fired.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Thompson: There are people in the civil service employed by the Department of Agriculture who are and have been doing excellent and conscientious work during their term of service. There is no question about that. But at the same time there are people in the civil service who are playing politics and when they do that they are playing with fire. If a civil servant breaks the rules then that person knows what the consequences are.

Mr. Pickersgill: He has no right to a hearing?

Mr. Thompson: The minister has referred to the evidence that has been obtained against this individual and I feel the dismissal was entirely justified.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I have very few remarks to make but I should like to comment on the remarks of the last speaker. He says that if someone in the civil service breaks the rules then he knows what the consequences are. I think everybody will agree with that statement but that is not what we are discussing. What is before the committee at the moment is the dismissal of a public service employee after 16 years of service without the minister having followed the rules that protect a public servant and which provide for a public hearing of the charges against him or for the dismissal to be brought about in the other way provided according to the practice in such cases.

I must say that I was appalled to hear a minister of the crown treat the dismissal of a public service employee in this way as not being very important. That was the first remark he made which I noted and I think I did so correctly. He also referred to the matter as making a mountain out of a molehill. The principle is very important. Our public servants now number hundreds of thousands. I do not know the exact number in the Department of Agriculture but it is quite substantial. We have built up a very good public service administration and these people have been led to expect fair treatment from the point of view of security of tenure of office.

Incidentally, I know nothing about this particular case. This man has been dismissed and the minister says he has been dismissed on the strength of some affidavits. The minister said a great many things against this former employee and used very strong language in describing his activities. But the minister refuses to table the affidavits from which he purports to get his authority for the statements he has made. The minister should have done either one of two things. Either he should have refrained from making the statements he did or he should have tabled the documents from which he purported to paraphrase and quote.

Mr. McPhillips: That is what you say but your premise was all wrong.

Mr. Pickersgill: We do not know what he relied on; he will not tell us.

Mr. McIlraith: Under our system the minister is responsible for his acts and is expected to produce the document from which he quotes. He either should not have quoted from it or he should have produced it. It is very important in this case because the minister by his own words says that the man did not have a hearing or an opportunity to answer the charges. I think I am correct in saying that there was no opportunity to answer the charges. What I want to point out here is that this is a very important matter, that it is fundamental in the whole administration of our public service and that the minister is quite wrong in his attitude that he can come in here and not be obligated to explain his action and to defend his action and to follow the law as laid down and the procedure established over the years. It is very good procedure, the procedure developed—

Mr. Bigg: Is that the law?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. Mr. Chairman, I must say something here about the interjections of the backbenchers on the government side during this debate. Those hon. members are witnessing today a procedure on the part of the crown that would not have been countenanced by any of the leaders of the past.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Laurier quoted leaders of the Conservative party in the past when the law was being evolved and the practice of this house was being developed. Those are very good statements and I think they were fairly well honoured by those leaders. I am somewhat mystified as to why the backbenchers on the government side today are so quick to repudiate the former leaders of their party.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Because this fellow is a civil servant.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister said he is not. Which is it?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): He is not a civil servant.

Mr. Pickersgill: So you can take away his livelihood without any question?

Mr. McPhillips: He is not a civil servant; he is just a Grit.

The Chairman: Order. I must ask hon. members to permit the hon. member for Ottawa West to carry on with his speech There are far too many interjections. I must ask hon. members to preserve more order in the committee.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I will conclude my remarks very quickly. However, I want to deal with the interjection made by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. He has stated precisely why this man was dismissed.

He was dismissed apparently because he was thought to have voted Liberal. Whether he did so or not, I do not know. That is precisely what the whole case is about. The Minister of Agriculture has said that he is not a civil servant. If he is not a civil servant, by that statement was the minister suggesting that he was not entitled to have the political right to vote or to have political views? I do not quite follow him in that statement. I wish he would elaborate.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I must say that this statement which the hon. member for Ottawa West has just made he must know is incorrect, namely that the man was dismissed because he voted Liberal.

Mr. McIlraith: I was referring to the interjection.

Mr. Harkness: That was the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa West. If the hon. member has not been asleep, he would know that is not the case.

Mr. McIlraith: I have not been asleep.

Mr. Harkness: The man was dismissed because he had been engaged in activities which I think everybody will recognize cannot be permitted by inspectors of any department in this country, namely taking gifts from the people whom he is supposed to inspect. That is the essential reason why he was dismissed. In addition to that, of course, he was engaged in very definite and overt political activities which would also have been a cause for dismissal.

Mr. Chevrier: Why do you not follow the rule laid down by the department?

Mr. Harkness: I also might say that the hon. member for Laurier who has made a long argument today is constantly demanding to know why we do not follow some rule that was laid down in the past to the effect that you can only dismiss people on the complaint of a member of parliament. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was taking quite a different line in connection with this matter as was the hon. member for Timiskaming. This man was a casual seasonal employee. People in his situation are laid off constantly from day to day and so on.

What all this fuss is being kicked up about is a little bit difficult to understand. As I said before, the only explanation of it is that I think the hon. member for Laurier did not know about the activities in which this man had been engaged. He had been a good political henchman of the member for many years, the member for Laurier was put out because the man had lost his government employment and he thought that he would raise the matter in the house and cause embarrassment to the government. The result was that he caused embarrassment to himself and he is now trying to drag this out in order to cover up that embarrassment.

Mr. McIlraith: If I understood the Minister of Agriculture correctly—and I will overlook his reference to my being asleep; I think he was referring to himself in that improper suggestion—he said that this man was dismissed for taking part in improper activities. I think that was the language he used. If that is so, then surely this house has a right to ask the minister to do one of two things, namely either to produce the evidence or to give the man a hearing. He has done neither.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister concluded his remarks a moment ago by saying that I found myself in difficulties and am now trying to extricate myself. May I tell the minister that I am not in the slightest bit embarrassed by the position in which I find myself. On the contrary, I am happy to find myself defending this man who has been improperly convicted by the minister.

The minister has made another misstatement, among many that he made during the course of his remarks. The one he made earlier was that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as well as myself had been saying that this man was a civil servant. Apparently the Minister of Agriculture was asleep when I dealt with the practice and procedure laid down by his former leaders in this house. I made it quite clear that Sir Robert Borden dealt with the outside service on the one hand and the inside service on the other, and that Sir Robert said that so far as the inside service is concerned, namely the civil service itself, it is dealt with by a section of the act; but so far as the outside service is concerned, the service in which this man belonged, it is dealt with by a resolution of the house.

Notwithstanding that fact, what the house should keep in mind is that this man was a member of the public service. He was entitled to the benefits of the superannuation act. He was entitled to sick leave. He was entitled to a number of advantages which the Civil Service Act gives to prevailing rates employees and to casual workers to which the minister does not seem to attach too much importance or to give too much attention. He has lost these. Notwithstanding the repetitiousness of the minister, I urge that the procedure and the practice laid down by all the leaders of the great parties should have been followed in this case.

I can only confirm what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, namely that this man was not given the slightest chance to be heard either with reference to the first part of the accusation made by the minister or with reference to the second part. He was summarily discharged. What the minister goes on saying continuously is that he made the investigation and that he was satisfied. That is not the way in which parliament has determined that a man should be dismissed. It has never been determined by the rules and procedures of this house that the minister shall decide on his own that a man should be dismissed. On the contrary, it has been determined that he shall not be dismissed unless by the recommendation of a member of parliament or after a public inquiry by an impartial tribunal. If the minister wants to follow the other course and conduct his own investigation and conduct it ex parte without giving the man an opportunity to be heard, that is his responsibility. I am sure the people of this country will judge his conduct accordingly.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, may I appeal to the hon. member who has just spoken. It is a pleasure to hear these discussions, but just so that we might get back to the evidence itself, it will be recalled that the late Mr. Casselman did make a statement about an individual—a labourer—who was dismissed. There was great consternation in the house at that time and last session the Liberal members of the house complained to high heaven that the workman had been dismissed because of a statement made by the late Mr. Casselman. In this case the Minister of Agriculture has gone to no end of trouble not to be so criticized and not to dismiss this man after 16 years of service on simply the statement of a member of parliament.

With respect to the legal aspect of the matter, I appeal to the hon. member for Ottawa West, who is an able lawyer, and to the hon. member for Laurier, who is also a very able lawyer, and I ask them have we not a preponderance of evidence, evidence beyond the shadow of a doubt? In the first place the man was found with contraband liquor.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Walker: He admitted it to be contraband.

Mr. Chevrier: Who said so?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Walker: He admitted it. Is the hon. member for Laurier denying that the minister's statement to that effect, after a thorough investigation and not depending simply on the statement of a member of parliament, was incorrect? He admitted it. Does the hon. member want us to go further than that?

Mr. Chevrier: Of course I deny it until the document is produced, and that is why I am asking for production.

Mr. Walker: This is the first time I have heard that one is required to produce a document when a person after thorough inquiry not only admits a charge but in this case also acts as his own prosecutor and turns over the whiskey. He turned over the contraband and admitted that he had obtained it from the very owners or officers of the ships he was supposed to inspect. What more damning evidence can the hon. member for Laurier want? Could we have anything more than the admission of this man? Is my hon. friend, the hon. member for Laurier, suggesting we should prosecute this man and, in the case of every person we dismiss who is either a civil servant or a casual employee, we should take action against him before he is dismissed?

Mr. Chevrier: I am suggesting an investigation.

Mr. Walker: There was an investigation, a very full investigation.

Mr. Chevrier: It was an ex parte examination. He was convicted without being heard.

Mr. Pickersgill: We want a public investigation.

Mr. Walker: There was an investigation by the officers of the department. Furthermore, we have not only the evidence to which I have referred but we also have the tacit admission of the hon. member for Laurier in connection with the second section of the evidence. He made no admission about the liquor because I think he did not know about that, but the hon. member for Laurier could get rid of the second charge that this man Mitchell did engage in political activities on his behalf by denying it. He refused to deny it in the house and he does nothing to support Mr. Mitchell in that regard.

Mr. Peters: Is he guilty by association?

Mr. Walker: My glib friend who is always ready to talk on every and any subject has now expressed his opinion but I would like to ask the hon. member for Laurier if he will deny that his so-called henchman, Mitchell, did give him aid and help through political activities during the last election campaign? If he would do this I would give serious credence to his statement, but he has not done so and I suggest he will not.

On the other point, namely the question of the contraband liquor, we have been hearing a great deal of the huge investigations going on in the United States with respect to the Goldfine scandal and so on, but that is nothing compared with this inspector accepting contraband while inspecting a boat under government regulations, and also accepting cigarettes under the same circumstances. Is the hon. member for Laurier suggesting that this independent investigation by the department is not the kind of investigation he wants?

Mr. McIlraith: We want it public.

Mr. Walker: Is the hon. member suggesting that casual labourers should be called in the public domain in open court and an action launched against them before anything is found against them, or is the hon. member for Laurier suggesting that this unfortunate person be now prosecuted to prove that the government was right in dismissing him? I would like his answer to all these questions.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member started by referring to a similar case which occurred in the constituency of Grenville-Dundas some time last year. In that case the procedure laid down, as I outlined this afternoon, was followed and the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas, the late Mr. Casselman, had the courage to rise in this house and to say that on his personal responsibility as a member of parliament this man was guilty of political activity, and so far as I was concerned I accepted that statement. If an hon. member had risen today and had said that on his personal responsibility Mitchell was guilty of political partisanship, I would at least have had the opportunity of asking him some questions. But that practice laid down for some considerable time has not been followed, and now the hon. member for Rosedale speaks of the legal aspect. It is not the legal aspect with which we are dealing at this time, it is the moral and humanitarian aspect of this case.

Mr. Walker: What about the immoral aspect? My hon. friend is surely trying to draw a red herring across our path.

Mr. Chevrier: I am grateful to my hon. friend for raising the matter of the immoral aspect and I will tell him that not a charge but a notice was served under a section of the Customs Act and if he will read these notices carefully he will see that it is not framed by way of a charge; it is a notice to the individual to which he may reply by way of affidavit or by way of oral or written statement, to rebut the presumption contained in the notice. Mitchell did state the circumstances surrounding this case and the circumstances were such that the officials of the Department of National Revenue decided not to proceed. They sent him a notice which the minister will not produce in which they indicated that that was the end of the case. Where is the immorality?

I now suggest, with deference, that the legal aspect does not enter into the picture at all since the charge was dropped and in so far as the question asked by the hon. member for York-Scarborough and repeated by the hon. member for Rosedale is concerned, I can only say that the onus of the discharge of an individual lies upon the person making that dismissal and upon no one else. That responsibility cannot be shifted over here by asking whether such and such was the case. If a man is discharged it is because of certain reasons which have to be supported and confirmed by the procedures laid down by resolution approved by both parties down through the years. It is because of this fact that I say this man was unjustly and unfairly treated, he was convicted without a hearing; more than that, his reputation has been attacked as a result of statements made by the minister. It is not so much the legal aspect with which I am concerned—I am concerned with the civil right aspect and with the fairness which should be dealt out to this man and which was not dealt out to him in these circumstances.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the minister has referred on several occasions to my having participated in this debate which, up to the present time, is not so. I do not object to remarks being credited to me—

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member will pardon me, I am sorry, but I meant the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Peters: I have no objection to being credited with those remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena because I entirely agree with them, but I think it is surprising that this sort of matter has arisen on discussion of the administrative item of the Department of Agriculture. Such discussions have taken place under former administrations and I recall the former minister of agriculture being quite proud of the fact that he could stand up in the House of Commons and say, Yes, I laid off people because of political activity in opposition to my political party. This may be true only of the Department of Agriculture, and if so this is a good time to stop it in that department.

We have heard some discussion this afternoon on the matter of civil servants—I do not in fact know the classification given by the government or the civil service commission—but I believe that anyone working for the government is a civil service employee and therefore should be classed as a civil servant.

I think one of the problems is that the federal government has not seen fit to do what most other governments have done, and that is to set up the Department of Labour in such a way that anybody working for the government may appeal, if they wish, on their own initiative to a board set up under the Department of Labour. In the province from which I come if they do not belong to any association or union, they still have a fundamental right, if they wish, to make an appeal against dismissal, and I know that is true in the case of one or two other provinces. It would appear to me that the civil service commission and the civil service associations are falling down on the job they are doing for their own people because they should be taking these people under protection, to give to the working people in the civil service the right to be protected against this vicious action. I do not think any parliament was elected here to be a judge and jury as to the rights of its peers and, further, it seems to me that not only members of parliament but others outside the house have been questioned with regard to this matter.

I think the hon. member for Northumberland and the hon. member for Rosedale should both be quite happy. I notice that the minister turned around when they were giving him support, and I presume they are going to be put on the list for parliamentary assistants.

An hon. Member: Don't be so foolish.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but we are not at present discussing promotion from the ranks of one party or another. Similarly, we are not discussing the vagaries—the good things and the bad things—of the civil service. We are discussing one resolution which concerns the Department of Agriculture, and I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the subject under discussion; in other words, to be relevant. And with respect to this matter I must remind members of the committee of article 59, paragraph 2 of standing orders which clearly states as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It is the opinion of the Chair that we have strayed away from the matter under consideration at considerable length for the last hour, so I will ask hon. members to be as relevant to the question under discussion as possible.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am in complete agreement with your ruling that parliamentary assistants cannot be discussed under item 1 of the estimates. However, I do not think it is not of interest to this committee because I think, probably, there are some who are interested in the matter.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Peters: Nevertheless, item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture is surely the place at which we can talk about the rights of the people working in the department, and I think that if there are two classes of employees in the Department of Agriculture something should be done to put them on the same basis and give them equal rights. I hope the house will not have to face this sort of problem again, and that some action will be taken by the minister in the near future to provide an opportunity in his department for people to answer charges that are made against them, and appeal against any action taken as a result of such charges, whether they are made inside or outside this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I feel that the opposition has caused enough waste of time as it is and that the house had better come back to the subject of the debate, that is, agriculture. May I therefore point out that, in the few months during which the Conservative party has been managing the affairs of this country, it has, in this very short time, brought in much legislation which, certainly, has been most useful to the farmers of this country.

Thanks to the Conservative party's progressive policy, farm revenue keeps growing. For the first quarter of 1958, farm income has reached $604 million, an increase of $29 million over that of the same period in 1957. This increase, Mr. Chairman, is mainly due to increased production and higher prices paid for cattle.

Since 1953, the number of Canadian farmers has dropped 10 per cent. Under the administration of our hon. friends in the opposition, production costs were rising and prices were on the down grade. Between 1946 and 1956, the prices of commodities and services to Canadian farmers have gone up 58.2 per cent, while farm products rose by only 1.7 per cent.

From 1951 to 1956, the prices of commodities and services to the farmers rose by 5.5 per cent and the price of their products decreased by 21.8 per cent.

As to the province of Quebec—still from the farming angle—may I be allowed to point out, Mr. Chairman, that over 88 per cent of Quebec farms now use electricity.

An hon. Member: Invented by Mr. Duplessis.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I would not like closure to be applied to me.

In the province of Quebec, in 1956 vegetable production amounted to $295.2 million, compared to $90 million in 1939. It can be broken down as follows:

Field crops	$176.8 million
Fruits and vegetables	27.4 "
Maple products	7.8 "
Timber	78.5 "
Miscellaneous	4.7 "

Live stock production, which was close to $393.6 million, was broken down as follows:

Live stock	$137.0 million
Dairy products	186.0 "
Poultry and eggs	68.5 "
Miscellaneous	2.1 "

In dairying, Quebec leads all other provinces in Canada. Milk is the chief product of Quebec farms. Since 1950, production has gone up by 28 per cent, while the increase for the country as a whole was only 5 per cent. The province of Quebec made noticeable progress in the production of fruit and vegetables. For marketing reasons, perhaps, the farm industry in Quebec has a tendency to satisfy local consumption rather than to produce for export. That is why the province occupies a leading rank in dairying.

A fact worthy of notice is that in 1941 the average acreage of Quebec farms was 116.8 acres, while in 1956, it stood at 129.8 acres.

Mr. Chairman, this government have done more for Canadian farmers in the past few months than any other government since confederation.

Mr. Dupuis: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Pigeon: No. If my hon. friend wants to speak, he can do so after I am through.

Mr. Dupuis: Did Mr. Duplessis have a hand in writing your speech? You say the same things he does.

The Chairman: Order! I would ask the hon. members to let the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm make his speech.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, need I talk about the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the most progressive measure enacted by any government on behalf of farmers? Need I remind the house of the names of the distinguished gentlemen who make up the advisory committee of the Agricultural Stabilization Board? Among them are leading figures in the agricultural field from the various provinces of this country. The Quebec representatives are Messrs. Jean-Baptiste Lemoine, president of the UCC, and Reynald Ferron, general manager of the Coopérative Fédérée de Québec. Of course, the other provinces of this country are also well represented. The people who make up that committee are leading agricultural figures; they are the best brains in the business.

Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that if this Agricultural Stabilization Act which came under such heavy criticism from our friends in the opposition during the last campaign, were not of real benefit to the farmers of this country, distinguished figures such as Messrs. Lemoine and Ferron and others would have consented to sit on the advisory committee of the agricultural stabilization board?

May I also take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Agriculture, (Mr. Harkness) who has already, on several occasions, made remarks in French in this house, thereby setting a far better example than his predecessor the Rt. Hon. Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to congratulate the government and the Minister of Agriculture for having set the support price of butter at 64 cents per pound, and for stabilizing the price of beef, of pork and of several other commodities.

The dairy industry is the very basis of the agricultural economy of Quebec as a whole. It is so in my constituency as elsewhere. Because of this guaranteed price, the farmer can get his fair share of the national income. May I also remind the house that, under the previous government, butter sold at only 58 cents a pound and that, while our farm organizations and farmers were pleading with the government to raise the support price on butter, our friends busied themselves with politics, paying no attention to the real needs of farmers.

Mr. Chairman, the dairy industry now ranks with the major industries in this country; in fact, it ranks among the largest because more than any other, it provides a basic food to a population of 17 million people.

With its production of 5,851 million pounds of milk, the province of Quebec leads all others.

Mr. Chairman, I would also ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture to consider the possibility of including, in the near future—after considering the matter with his officials—pipe, cigar and cigarette tobacco, with the products coming under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I would make the same request with regard to maple products.

In my opinion, it would be logical that, in a not too distant future, other farm products be included in that act.

Mr. Boulanger: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Pigeon: If the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), the would-be minister of agriculture, who never will be such in any case, wishes to take the floor, he may do so after I am through.

Mr. Chairman, some years ago, the federal government granted subsidies to those who wanted to exchange their sap buckets. That policy lasted for 15 years, from 1940 to 1955. As a result, in the province of Quebec, about 18 million sap buckets were exchanged.

I am wondering, Mr. Chairman, why the previous government discontinued that policy which favoured the agricultural class of the province of Quebec, when it is also well known that the federal government, through an act of parliament, forbids any traces of lead in maple products. The UCC, and several other farm organizations, had asked the former government to carry on this policy of sap bucket exchange, but the former government nonetheless discontinued this policy, probably because the province of Quebec was supporting a Liberal government.

But this situation will now cease. We have in the person of the hon. Minister of Agriculture a man who is close to the average Canadian, and to the farmer. It will not take 22 years, Mr. Chairman, for the agricultural class to benefit from the advantages of this government's policy. Mr. Chairman, I urge the government to consider the possibility of restoring this policy of sap bucket exchange. Cost to the government would be about $50,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the hon. Minister for Agriculture is now studying the possibility of devising some crop insurance program, to help all Canadian farmers engaged in mixed farming. Crop insurance legislation of this type has been in force in the United States for over 20 years. We have begun to hear about it since the Conservative government is in power. How is it, Mr. Chairman, that our friends of the opposition, who claimed to be the friends of the ordinary Canadian, never brought up the subject of crop insurance, or never as much as hinted that farmers might have it some time? I know that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is considering the possibility of developing a crop insurance program, and I might say to the would-be minister of agriculture from the opposition, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, that it will not take 22 years for such a program to be applied in the various provinces of Canada.

I urge the Minister of Agriculture to introduce crop insurance legislation, and I would advise him also to consider the possibility of applying such legislation, first of all, to specialized farming such as, for instance, the growing of pipe, cigar and cigarette tobacco, since such crops are very important, not only in my constituency, but also in Ontario.

Do you know how much it costs a Quebec farmer to set up a cigarette tobacco-growing farm? He must first of all pay $50,000 and, each year afterwards, he has to spend nearly $10,000 on labour, fertilizers and all sorts of services, to obtain a good crop.

Quebec tobacco growers, and those of Ontario too, feel they are entitled to crop insurance legislation. They are anxious that such legislation be put into force. That is why I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to consider the possibility of applying such legislation first of all to specialized farming, even if it has to be improved afterwards, and extend it as far as possible to other crops, all over the country.

Well, Mr. Chairman, each year, in the federal constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, considerable damage is caused by hail or frost, with attendant loss of farm income. Only recently, farmers of my constituency came up to me and said that hail had wrought havoc in their cigar tobacco fields at St. Esprit, St. Lin and St. Roch-West, in the county of Assomption and that of Montcalm.

Crop insurance is essential to the future and success of the farmers of this country. Before putting in his crop, the farmer needs to have some idea of the price he will receive for his commodity, but he also needs protection against hail, drought, wind and frost. The farmer has to be in exactly the same position as the worker who, before taking up a new job, inquires about the wages he will get and asks $1.50, $2.00 or $3.00 an hour, according to his trade. Before starting on a job, he finds out how much he will get out of it, before trading his skill for a wage.

Likewise before a farmer begins working his land or putting money and labour into it he must be assured of a profit from what will grow out of his land. I know that the Minister of Agriculture, in co-operation with the government, has made extensive studies into the possibility of implementing steps to the benefit of the farmers of this country. Crop insurance is absolutely essential to the future of specialized farming and of Canadian agriculture in general.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the Minister of Agriculture, more than anybody else, is concerned with the needs of the farmer and has made very careful study of that legislation. The member for Drummond-Arthabaska, pseudo-minister of agriculture—who in any event will never be minister of agriculture —would like this government to bring in within the space of a few weeks or a few months all those measures which his party failed to introduce during the 22 years they were in power, in spite of the representations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, for instance, or of farm groups in the province of Quebec or elsewhere in Canada. Instead, his party chose to ignore the needs of the people, and preferred to use closure rather than take heed of the needs of the farmers of the province of Quebec, and of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am also happy to note that the Minister of Agriculture is proceeding to put an effective end to dumping of American farm produce. I know that one New England senator at least has stated that Canadians had some reason to be annoyed at the United States and asked that more attention be henceforth directed to economic policy so as to contribute to the improvement of relations between the two countries. Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture—and this did not take 22 years—has already started putting a stop to dumping of farm commodities from the United States, a thing which our opponent's administration had never managed to do. What was done to attain these results? Well, the Conservative government has imposed a customs duty of 13½ cents per pound on American strawberries.

The Conservative government has also prevented dumping of American cheddar cheese. Severe restrictions were enacted with regard to the import of skim milk powder from the United States or New Zealand. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will continue along those lines. This does not mean that we will be persecuting the Americans.

May I be allowed at this point to quote an example of what happened on the Montreal market. Right in the middle of the production season, hundreds upon hundreds of carloads of vegetables from the United States were dumped on that market at the very moment our truck gardeners were attempting to market their produce on the same spot. This is also the case on the Toronto market and, indeed, when they arrive on this market with a truck full of vegetables, American farmers are just dumping their products here. I urge the Minister of Agriculture to pursue his action to stop that dumping. That doesn't mean that anyone should be persecuted, but we have to think of the average Canadian, that is the Canadian farmer. Just imagine: In a British Columbia camp the government of our opponents served United States potatoes to Hungarian refugees! That is how our farmers have been treated;—American potatoes served to Hungarian refugees.

That is what our opponents did to our Canadian farmers Mr. Chairman, and to-day they are defending the cause of our farmers in a tremulous voice, like an offended maiden. Well, they also served United States potatoes...

An hon. Member: What about eggs?

Mr. Pigeon: Also, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska wants to make a speech let him do so after I am through. I will not have closure applied to me.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister of trade (Mr. Churchill) announced some time ago that the government, following some representations made by Canada, was going to allow more fresh apples to be exported to the United Kingdom than at the present time.

The new policy with regard to the exportation of fresh apples to the United Kingdom will give us a chance during July and the next eleven months, to sell 1,500,000 hundredweight of that farm product, i.e., 300,000 hundredweight from July to the end of December 1958, and 1,200,000 hundredweight from January to the end of June 1959.

The Conservative government had been in power only a few weeks or a few months when it began to reclaim this lost market. I might say in all sincerity and frankness that the English market is vital to us, as England imports about 60 per cent of its farm products from abroad. Let us help them get the necessary Canadian dollars, and, in return, Great Britain will buy our surpluses of wheat, eggs and dairy products.

I strongly urge the government to reclaim that market, Mr. Chairman. What happened during the war? The Liberal government rationed the Canadian people and sold to Great Britain our farm products like wheat, meat, eggs, milk, butter, cheese, apples, etc., at a rebate.

We had obtained by contract a privileged market in return for this sacrifice. Our hon. friends then in power lost the English market, the best farm market in the world. However, following a request from the Liberals, Canadians organized themselves in order to increase production, they capitalized in order to meet the needs of that privileged market. The government of the day has not been able to keep the English market for them so that they might export their farm surpluses there.

At one time, England bought Nova Scotia apples. Having lost the English market, the federal government granted subsidies so that our apple trees could be replaced by other crops. England, which used to buy its lumber in British Columbia, now buys it elsewhere. It is also getting its newsprint, its eggs, its dairy products, its wheat and its meat in other countries.

I strongly urge the hon. Minister of Agriculture to consider, in co-operation with the Minister of Trade, whether it might be possible to go further ahead with the sale of our Canadian apples in the United Kingdom. I trust that the apple growers of the province of Quebec and elsewhere in the country would rejoice in seeing such a policy applied.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal now with the experimental farm of l'Assomption. What happened in 1956? Discontinued was the agricultural information service, that of soils analysis, that of bacteriological analysis of milk, and of purebred dairy herds. I charge the government of the time with sabotaging that experimental farm. Farmers in my riding are dissatisfied with the way the experimental farm of l'Assomption was dealt with. Yet, my riding is perhaps the largest dairy farming area in this country, being so close to the Montreal market. Dairying is its chief industry, followed by tobacco, poultry raising and truck farming. Under the former Liberal administration, the experimental farm of l'Assomption has been disorganized to a point where it no longer is able to give the important services it used to provide for the farmers and dairy producers of my constituency. The former administration has sabotaged the experimental farm of l'Assomption. The farmers have complained many times over about that behaviour of the former Liberal regime, but no one paid any attention to them. I urge the Minister of Agriculture to consider the possibility of reorganizing the experimental farm at l'Assomption. I also ask that the necessary grants be made to enable that farm to carry on the research needed to discover brands of tobacco which are milder than those the producers of my riding are now marketing.

A country can prosper only if its farmers prosper. As a rule farmers are heavy buyers of all sorts of goods, and they contribute to the wealth of the Canadian nation.

I want now to say a few words about the prices of farm machinery. I find the price of implements exceedingly high in relation to farmers' income.

The price of farm machinery has skyrocketed since the war.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

(Text):

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to see that we have finally got back to the agricultural estimates because I am sure that if the people of my constituency were to read the debate that has taken place so far today they could not help but feel that we have wasted a lot of their time and our time as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: Defending civil rights.

Mr. Nasserden: In dealing with the agricultural situation as it exists today and looking forward to what we hope for in the years to come, one cannot help but look back to what has taken place in the years that have gone by. If we do that we cannot help but remember the men who have played an important part in the Canadian agricultural scene. All of us will recall the work of the late Hon. W. R. Motherwell who for many years was minister of agriculture. As one who comes from the province of Saskatchewan I know that the people of that province appreciate the wonderful work that he did and although he was a member of the party that is in opposition today we feel that he continued the work begun in years gone by to build a better agricultural economy for Canada as a whole.

Mr. Pickersgill: One of the many good Liberal ministers of agriculture.

Mr. Nasserden: Following him, of course, came Robert Weir who in many respects was responsible for placing upon the statute books of the country much of the legislation that has endured to give agriculture those things that today are becoming even more important in our day to day living. One must also remember the Right Hon. James Garfield Gardiner, also a resident of the province of Saskatchewan. I have been surprised that members of the opposition have not referred to him very much in discussing agricultural matters but regardless of what they may think of him I want to say that he made a very notable contribution to the agriculture scene and, considering what he had to work with, I think he did a wonderful job.

I can pay tribute to him, to Mr. Motherwell and to Mr. Weir because today we have in the Minister of Agriculture a man who is following in the same tradition and placing upon the statute books of our country legislation that will give the farmers right across the country a little more security and stability than they have had in years gone by. We remember the improvements that were made by other governments and other parties but while they were and are good in themselves we say that they can be improved upon. I recall the prices support act brought in following the war which was supposed to be written in such a way to give to those engaged in agriculture a fair share of the national income. Well, we waited for a great number of years. I believe it took some 13 years for us to realize the extent of the fair share of the national income provided by that legislation as a result of the way in which it was interpreted. Because of this situation things happened in June of 1957 and again in March of this year. Farm people right across the country are looking to the government with a measure of expectation never before known as between the electors and a government.

I believe the reason they are looking to the government and to parliament is the legislation that was placed on the statute books in the last session of the House of Commons when Bill No. 237, having to do with the marketing of certain agricultural products, became the law of the land. This legislation, in the language in which it is written, gives to the agricultural industry those things that farmers and farm organizations have fought for and sought for more than 50 years. The notable exception, of course, is that it does not do anything for the people engaged in the growing of wheat, oats, barley and other grains in western Canada.

All members of the house know the record in that regard. All members know that representations were made by organizations in the province of Saskatchewan and elsewhere in western Canada that wheat, oats and barley should not be included under the act. In what I am about to say I am speaking for myself and not for the government. I think that the farm organizations made a mistake. I also think that the government made a mistake in listening to the farm organizations and not placing wheat, oats and barley under the price stabilization act. History alone will show whether that view is right or wrong. One thing is certain. Those who produce livestock products and other products covered by the legislation can look forward today with a little more confidence than at any time in the past.

I speak as a grain grower, one who knows what it was like to sell our product during years when people in other parts of Canada were enjoying an increasing measure of security and stability in their jobs, at a lower price than we should have received because of regulations enacted by the parliament of the country. I think too of the years following when the price of our product gradually dropped while the price of everything that went into the production of the product kept on rising. On this occasion I cannot help but remind the Minister of Agriculture and the other ministers on the treasury benches, as the people of western Canada do not need to be reminded, that the grain growers are in a desperate situation today, a situation brought about not by an administration that lasted for one, two, three or four years but by an administration that over many years failed to face the problems associated with the production of this commodity which has made Canada known all over the world as the home of the finest protein wheat that people can buy. The people of the world choose Canadian wheat if they have the money to buy it. Other countries have subsidized their agricultural industries in an effort to make themselves self-sufficient but still require some of the wheat we grow in western Canada. Despite that fact we saw session after session go by with nothing being done by a party that said it stood for the farm people of the country, that it stood for agriculture and free trade, a party that said it was guaranteeing our farmers a fair share of the national income and whose minister of agriculture came from the province of Saskatchewan, the greatest grain producing area in Canada. Yet they allowed that industry to sink to the depths that it reached a year ago and is still in today.

During the election campaign the leader of the Liberal party, who is Leader of the Opposition in the house, had occasion to come to Rosthern constituency to deal with agricultural policy and at that time he had certain things to say. I dealt with some of them the other night when the question of deficiency payments was brought up and I am not going to repeat what I said then. But I have a press report of his speech here and among the many things he had to say he said this:

> We propose to raise the initial price of oats to farmers from 60 to 65 cents per bushel for No. 2 C.W., in store Fort William; and the initial price of barley from 96 cents to $1.00 per bushel basis No. 3 C.W. in store Fort William.

When the people of my constituency heard that they said that if any one should increase the price of oats by five cents per bushel it was the party that had reduced the price by five cents at a time when farm costs in western Canada were rising as they had never risen before. But the interesting thing is that he went on to say:

> These increases would be promptly reflected in increased payments to farmers. They would not, however, add to the cost of feed grain to livestock producers in any part of Canada.

In one breath he was going to raise the price five cents. In another breath it was not going to cost anyone any more money. That is about as empty a promise as I ever heard during any election campaign in any part of this country. There was really one interesting thing he had to say and it was this and I quote:

> The traditional or historical pattern of low incomes of most farmers has made for poor housing —far below urban standards.

I should like to emphasize that statement. What a statement that was to come from a member of a cabinet that on three occasions at least came to the farm people of this country with the slogan "You never had it better". Then we find the statement being made that the traditional or historical pattern of low incomes of most farmers has made for poor housing far below urban standards. We have that statement coming from the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of a party that has appealed to the people on those terms and has said that their agricultural support program was based on those principles which would assure to the people of Canada in agriculture their fair share of the national income. Then he says that the traditional or historical pattern of low incomes of most farmers has made for poor housing.

I just wanted to read that into the record because, after all, Mr. Chairman, we hear a great deal about the promises that have been made and the promises that have not been made. But above all these things we know that whoever is in power, whoever is charged with responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture tries to do his best for the people of this country. All I want to say is that if that was the best that the Liberal party could do, it was surely time that we had a change of government here in Canada and gave someone else a chance to try to do better.

In so far as Bill No. 237 is concerned, may I say that I have heard people in the house here say that it is not giving to some producers what they had expected. All I want to say about it is that I believe the people of my constituency are willing to give the bill a chance to work and are willing to give this government and the Minister of Agriculture and also the Minister of Finance a chance to feel their way in order to find out what measure of support they can justifiably give to the people engaged in this most important segment of our industry.

In passing from Bill No. 237 I should like to say that I think it is an improvement over the old legislation. If anything detrimental can be said with regard to what has taken place so far under the bill, the only thing I can say about it is that we have not had wheat, oats and barley under it. While that is my personal opinion, it is an opinion not shared by some of the people in agriculture in western Canada. However, it is still my opinion and I wanted to get it put on the record today.

During this session we have noted many amendments to existing legislation dealing with agriculture and the problems of farmers right across Canada. What I like is the national approach that this government is taking to the many problems affecting this important industry. For the first time people in all parts of Canada can come to the government and, upon the basis of what is taking place in other parts of the country, justify their demands for like treatment. That is something that has been wanting in the administration of the Department of Agriculture for many years.

We have seen the development of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in western Canada. Some amendments made this year may solve some of the problems. I think they will possibly solve many of them. However, in the application of them I think it may be found that one or two things were overlooked, although not intentionally.

There is another part of the agricultural policy to which I wish to make reference, namely the freight assistance policy on grains moved from western Canada to feeders in eastern Canada. I have heard some people say that that is a subsidy to the western Canadian farmer. The western Canadian farmer figures that it is a subsidy to the eastern feeder. I am not going to try to say who is right and who is wrong in the matter. All I am going to say is that it is a policy for the moving of grain from the west to the east and also to round out a little bit sounder agricultural policy for Canada and for Canadians.

The board of grain commissioners handle the grain act in this country. I think it is a tribute to all who have been associated with that department that we have been able to establish ourselves in the world markets with a name in so far as the quality of our grain is concerned. All of us who produce grain in western Canada like to haggle with the elevator agent about grades, weight, dockage and all of these other things but every one of us is proud of what has been set up and has given us a chance to enjoy our share of the world market for this important commodity that perhaps is more powerful than any other single thing used by people in any part of the world. When I think of that, I cannot help but think—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but, it being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was dealing, among other things, with the growth of a national agricultural policy in Canada which would give to all our farm people equal recognition. I went on to commend the present government and particularly the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture for the part they have played in pursuing this objective, but there is another minister of the crown, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who constantly bears in mind the people engaged in our agricultural industry. Trade and agriculture are complementary to each other, and I do not wish to turn the minister's head but I would like to say I think he has done a notable job during the last several months in increasing the sales of western grain, particularly wheat. This also applies of course to grain sales in eastern Canada.

I have already mentioned the amendments passed by this house and I did not name them singly, because that would take too long. The problems in respect to agriculture all across this country do not differ very much. We all share, wherever we farm in Canada, the need for improved credit facilities. We all share in the benefits of increased markets for our products and the benefits accruing from legislation introduced to take care of disasters from time to time. We all share in the benefits of a proper price relationship between our goods and those of other industries and I have in mind particularly cereal grains, potatoes and fishing industry, which are the most important industries presenting problems to us at the present time.

These industries still appear to require the attention of the government with respect to some definite legislation, and I would suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to his department that at the Brussels fair Canadian fish and chips might be served and a bun made of good Canadian grain might be thrown in for good measure. Such a scheme might do something to develop interest in Canadian products. The minister might make a note of that suggestion because I may ask a question one of these days in order to discover whether those items have in fact been served at the Brussels exhibit.

In regard to the credit situation I notice that some members, particularly those in the C.C.F. group, have maintained that what we require is credit available for a 40-year period. In this connection I would point out that other workers expect to retire after a period of 20 to 25 years, during which time they hope to build up a pension in order to make this possible. I think, therefore, it is stretching it a little too far to say that if you agree other labour groups should be able to retire in 20 to 25 years that you expect at the same time the agricultural workers will be labouring under conditions which will prevent them from paying back the mortgages on their farms in less than 40 years. After all, the farm people are entitled to the same things to which others are entitled and I think, therefore, that a 25-year term would be a sufficient length of time to set for a farm mortgage. Why should we want the farmer to retire and have to hand over to his sons and daughters a heritage of a 15-year mortgage?

Another aspect of the matter with which I would like to deal is a possibility of something which might happen on a farm—I do not think it will happen in Canada but there is always the possibility. I have in mind that some day the Canadian farm loan board under such a set-up as has been suggested would acquire the bulk of our agricultural land and no matter from what province a farmer may come, I do not think he would want to think that at some time in the future he would be able to secure land only on a lease basis.

The first responsibility of any government is to build a national program which will eliminate inequities such as those which plague certain sectors of our economy from time to time. The second responsibility as I see it is to ensure some measure of assistance to those sectors in case of disaster which, because of national trends and policies, might mean that certain districts might find themselves in great difficulty and be unable to continue as effective and efficient productive areas.

The people in agriculture today are well informed, generally speaking, and one cannot place before them a proposition based on a false premise. They know the prices exacted by industry, labour and capital in the national scene, no matter in what part of the country they may live, because they have to pay those prices in order to remain a working partner in the Canadian nation. That is why I urge upon this government, which has already set the pace, to continue towards the objective I have outlined of providing a fair share of the national income for agriculture.

The administrative branch of the Department of Agriculture has a notable tradition and like everything which is notable the passage of time has left some marks upon this tradition. One thing is certain and that is that this government will never go wrong if it continues to build upon the foundations which have been laid legislation designed to complete a truly national policy for our country, one which will strengthen Canada from coast to coast and, what is more, will encourage and exemplify that spirit and understanding of freedom, that love of the soil, which constitutes the way of life in the Canadian agricultural industry.

I was in the reading room this evening and I noticed an article in the Star-Phoenix of July 26, which referred to Dr. B. M. Craig of the prairie regional laboratory of the national research council. He speaks of the strides that are being made to make rapeseed available for use in margarine. We know today that many of the firms in eastern Canada are exhibiting quite an interest in this subject and I merely wish to say that the research program undertaken by the Department of Agriculture is one of the most important services being rendered to Canada. It is important not only to the farm people but to every consumer because every stride forward in connection with new varieties, increased yields and advances along those lines, benefit every person in this country.

I am not going to say anything further because like all other members I would like to get on with the job of going through these estimates and I hope we will soon get back to our constituencies so that we may meet the people who produce these goods.

An hon. Member: That is a smart observation.

Mr. Nasserden: I believe someone said, "That is a smart observation", and I hope that hon. member will take his advice to heart when his turn comes. I wanted to put on the record some of the things that I believe the people of my constituency would like to have mentioned, some of the things that I believe the farm people right across this country believe in; some of the things, too, that I think should have been said to the administration for the tremendous job that they are trying to do at this time.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, when the debate on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture was adjourned on Friday, July 11 at five o'clock in order to revert to private and public bills, I had just stated that the prices received by small farmers for pulpwood was far from satisfactory and barely met the cost of cutting this pulpwood and taking it to the roadside. I had also placed on record the statement by the Prime Minister, as reported in the Toronto Star of February 27, 1958, which was made in Summerside, P.E.I. where the Prime Minister had said that he hoped the advisory committee and the stabilization board would give consideration to including farm produced wood in the provisions of the act so that farmers would know for at least a year in advance the lowest price they would receive.

This evening I have another statement which was made by the Prime Minister in Charlottetown, P.E.I., and I wish to place this statement on record. I hope the Prime Minister is listening on the other end of the line and will come rushing in to confirm or reject this statement. The statement, as reported in the Toronto Star of February 28 reads as follows:

> Mr. Diefenbaker . . . gave audiences at Charlottetown and Summerside an interpretation of the Agricultural Price Stabilization Act which would come as news to members of parliament.
> "The day will never come in Canada, no matter how great the crash (in agricultural prices) in other countries, that prices will fall to the same level here," he asserted. "There is a distress price in Canada below which all agricultural prices cannot fall," he said at Summerside.

The Prime Minister maintained here and at Summerside that there was a provision in the bill to provide a minimum support price "under all agricultural products" of 80 per cent of the price over the previous 10 years.

The act introduced in parliament by the Conservative government last year appeared to provide this protection by statute for only nine agricultural products—butter, eggs, cheese, hogs, sheep, cattle and non-prairie produced wheat, oats and barley.

Parliament was certainly never given the impression that the legislation would provide protection for all the commodities produced by the farmer in the event of the bottom falling out of the world market.

Last night, the Prime Minister charged the opposition parties with misrepresenting the Conservative farm bill. On the face of it, he appears to have been guilty of misrepresentation on his own account.

Yesterday at Rimouski, speaking of the same bill, Mr. Diefenbaker hinted that pulpwood cut by farmers might be eligible for price supports. Last night he indicated that producers of potatoes, a major crop here, might also apply to the price stabilization board to have supports put under that crop.

Now this statement was made by the Prime Minister over five months ago and our farmers are still waiting for pulpwood to be placed under price support.

On May 28 the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asked the Minister of Agriculture the following question as reported in Hansard at page 580:

Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Agriculture advise the house if it is the intention of the government to establish floor prices on maple sugar and pulpwood.

He received the following answer from the Minister of Agriculture:

In so far as maple sugar is concerned, I replied to a similar question last week, and the hon. member will find the answer in Hansard. In so far as pulpwood is concerned, we are giving some consideration to that matter but to date we have made no decision.

Two months have passed since then, and no decision has yet been taken by the department or by the prices support board in this regard. Our small farmers in eastern Canada depend largely on the sale of pulpwood from their own wood lots for ready cash to meet their obligations, and it is important that they be given the same advantages as are being offered to producers of other farm products throughout the country.

When a farmer is being paid as low as $8.50 for rough pulp out of his own wood lot, as was paid in some of the eastern provinces last winter, there is something wrong somewhere and the government must intervene to remedy such conditions. We have all heard those words "disastrous floor prices for agricultural products which should not exist in our country". I know of no price which is more disastrous than the one being paid our small farmers for the pulpwood cut from their own wood lots.

Another problem which seriously affects the operations of our small farm owners is the financing necessary to ensure that these family farms are preserved intact. The application of the farm loan board regulations has not been of too valuable assistance to our small farm owners. The last report published a few weeks ago shows that out of $69 million made available as loans in the last fiscal year, only $680,000, less than 1 one per cent, went to the province of New Brunswick. Loans to small farmers have been difficult to obtain and on many occasions our farmers were told that it was useless for them to even apply. The establishment of a farm loan bank would facilitate loans to farmers and make it possible for them to purchase land, to obtain equipment and to make their farm operations worth while.

Such a plan would certainly extend the borrowing facilities now available through the farm loan board. It would assist young Canadians to establish themselves on land, thus enabling them to take full advantage of the opportunities available to our farming population.

The establishment of a farm loan bank, operating under regulations somewhat similar to those of the industrial development bank, with agencies in every province and with lending facilities extending to individual farmers and fishermen would be a great advantage to the farm population of this country and to our fishermen. Such a farm loan bank, or even proper amendments to the National Housing Act, could also provide loans to young farmers to build new homes. I know I should be out of order if I began to speak about the need for housing in rural areas at this point, but I would urge the minister to have a special survey made in this regard with reference to the need of better homes for farmers. Our small farmers in eastern Canada need new homes, new buildings and better equipment. Our farmers cannot finance such improvements on their own, and it is the duty of the government to make adequate provision for such financing.

On Friday, July 11, in the course of my remarks, I mentioned that we from the maritime provinces wanted to know why potatoes were not included on the permanent list of commodities coming under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act or, alternatively, we wanted a firm statement of policy from the government with regard to potatoes. Interjecting in these remarks, as reported at page 2174 of Hansard of July 11, the Minister of Agriculture said:

> They have had a great deal of protection; a lot of money has been paid out to them.

The minister referred, of course, to the potato producers. On different occasions during the present session we have heard hon. members on the government side of the house criticize the previous administration for not doing anything for the farmers. It may be well for them to know that in the last 20 years over $2½ billion has been paid out of the federal treasury to the farmers of Canada. This evening I should like to place on the record what has been done by the previous administration for the potato farmers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Potatoes were supported under the Agricultural Prices Support Act for the crop years 1946, 1948, 1950, 1955 and 1956 previous to the support given in 1957. In addition, potatoes have come under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act which act is basically not designed for support but payments were made which had the effect of providing some support in connection with the 1950 and 1953 crops.

For example, the 1946 program indicates that potatoes delivered for processing bore a guaranteed price of $1.65 per barrel at factory for Canada No. 1 grade. Potatoes delivered for export or other shipment bore a price of $1 per 75 pound bag on car at shipping point bagged, tagged and inspected. The total cost of this program to the government was $170,748.48.

Under the 1948 program potatoes bore a price of $1.15 per 100 pounds in bulk on the grower's farm. The total cost of this program to the government was $1,646,739.34.

Under the 1950 program potatoes bore a guarantee of 60 cents per barrel when delivered under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act guarantee, which guarantee also amounted to 60 cents per barrel. The total cost to the government of the support of 60 cents per barrel amounted to $218,687.79. The cost under the co-operative marketing act was approximately $50,000.

In 1953, under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act the government guaranteed an initial advance of 45 cents, 50 cents and 55 cents per bushel in Prince Edward Island and 40 cents, 45 cents and 55 cents per bushel in New Brunswick for different time periods. The total loss under this program was approximately $5 million.

The 1955 program consisted of the payment of $1 per barrel of 165 pounds for potatoes delivered to starch plants less whatever the government could recover from the starch plants. The total government cost of this program was $4,830.77.

In 1956, under the program followed in that year, the support price was based on $1.65 per barrel provided the consumer market remained at a price of three-quarters of a cent per pound or higher on the average up to June 15. This was based on potatoes delivered for processing, with the government to pay the difference up to the figure of $1.65. The total cost of this program to the government was $449,279.16. As these figures will show, the previous administration certainly looked after the interests of the potato farmer.

What has been done this year by the present government for the potato growers of Prince Edward Island? We learned in this house that an application was made on May 16 by the potato growers of Prince Edward Island for assistance from the agricultural prices support board. The official offer by the federal government, or the confirmation of an offer, was made on June 24. On July 18 I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture as reported at page 2364 of Hansard of that date in the following words:

> My question is based on a press report in the Charlottetown Guardian of July 12 concerning price supports for potatoes, to the effect that all hope of receiving aid had vanished in so far as island growers were concerned. What factors have prevented the application of the provisions of the agricultural prices stabilization legislation to this important class of agricultural producer?

The Minister of Agriculture replied to my question as follows:

> Nothing has prevented it. As a matter of fact an offer was made by the stabilization board, which was approved by the cabinet, to the Prince Edward Island potato producers to give them support on the same basis as it has been given in New Brunswick as far as potatoes which are diverted to starch in that province are concerned. The potato association there accepted the offer but subsequently discovered that the potatoes had sprouted to some extent and therefore there was difficulty in so far as determining the grade was concerned. We are carrying on further discussions at the present time to try to overcome this difficulty.

I asked a further question in these words:

> May I ask as a supplementary question whether the delay of the government in applying this measure is not an example of the weakness of the agricultural stabilization program?

The Minister of Agriculture replied:

> Mr. Speaker, since this statement has been made I think I should have the opportunity of answering it. Any delays which have taken place in regard to the potato situation in Prince Edward Island have been due to the provincial government and/or the potato association in that province not being able to make up their minds, not accepting the offer when it was made to them, and not putting the plan which was offered to them into operation.

The reply made by the minister was not exactly according to the facts and in it he placed the blame on the government of Prince Edward Island and the potato growers there.

I have in my hand an excerpt from the Charlottetown Guardian of July 12, 1958, which I wish to place on the record. It bears the title "Department Ruling Kills Potato Support Program" with the subtitle "Ottawa Refuses to Relax Regulations on Firmness" and it reads as follows:

Even while producers' applications for assistance under the prices support program continued to pile up in the office of the potato marketing board yesterday, official word came through from Ottawa that virtually all hope of receiving aid had vanished in so far as island growers are concerned.

William MacLennan, chairman of the potato marketing board, stated yesterday evening that L. W. Pearsall, chairman of the agricultural stabilization board informed him that no relaxation in the quality of Canada No. 1 grade potatoes could be entertained. Mr. Pearsall said he was making his statement after consultation with federal Minister of Agriculture, Douglas Harkness.

Further on the article states:

The potato board was conscious of the fact that very few island potatoes would qualify as Canada No. 1 in so far as firmness was concerned and informed Mr. Pearsall accordingly. Mr. Pearsall told the potato board that he was sending Mr. Eardley to the island "with the purpose of making the plan work".

Yesterday Mr. Eardley denied that he had come here to "make the plan work". He said he was merely a fact finding committee of one to appraise and report on the situation as he found it.

Further along the article reads:

Mr. MacLennan said the industry felt that the offer was not satisfactory either from a monetary standpoint or from a quality restriction angle. "However", he said, "we were forced to accept it with the hope that some of the restrictions would be lifted. The matter has now been finalized and we know where we stand."

Mr. MacLennan estimates that by the rate applications are reaching the potato board office it would appear that about 600 carloads remain unsold.

He said every effort to move the potatoes has been made.

As we can see from this report, the fault was not with the potato growers of Prince Edward Island, nor with the provincial government of the island; the fault was that the offer made by the federal government was not acceptable and would cover only about 15 per cent of the potatoes which were then available for sale.

I have a letter from a Prince Edward Island farmer which also appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian on Monday, July 14, 1958, and I feel that this letter should be placed on record to show the attitude of the Prince Edward Island farmers toward the offer which they received from the federal government. The letter reads as follows:

Sir:

May I have enough space in your column to say a word about the potato problem which is causing unprecedented consternation throughout the province at the present time.

For more than two months now, we in the potato industry have been trying to get some satisfaction from the federal government at Ottawa which promised in the last election that the interests of our potato growers would be protected.

Our growers know by now that the assistance we have been offered is completely worthless. Many of the growers, including myself, are caught with large quantities of potatoes still unsold. And the assistance that has been offered has been made worthless because of the restrictions.

Can you imagine, Mr. Editor, how anyone would expect a bin of potatoes to pass Canada No. 1 right now. None of them will. Yet the government at Ottawa refuses to consider our potatoes unless they do.

Three of our Conservative members are in the province today and I suggest it is their problem. They told us glibly and emphatically at election time that their government and its legislation would look after such an emergency. The emergency is here now and they are doing nothing about loosening the grave restrictions.

The way I see it is either one thing or the other. These members must fight for us and get our just desserts or else they had better resign and let someone else take over the job who may be able to serve us efficiently.

Fellow potato farmers I suggest you see your member today and impress this upon him. I have already seen mine.

Their leader, Mr. Diefenbaker, is the man who made the promises right here in this province that our potato crop would be protected under such an emergency. Now is the time for our members to see that Mr. Diefenbaker keeps his promise.

I am glad to see the Prime Minister now in his seat. I see the line is working. I continue:

At that time Mr. Diefenbaker was all for the farmer. At least that is what he told us. Now his government orders two potato inspectors to inspect a potato bin and warns them that two more will follow. Does this look as though it is the farmer he wants to help.

Those same inspectors were capable of inspecting potatoes to go to our best seed and table stock markets all over the world. But now when there is a chance to help the farmer, Mr. Diefenbaker wants four inspectors to do the job where growers with large holdings are concerned.

I am, sir, et cetera,

Neil Bradshaw,
Searletown.

There, Mr. Chairman, is the opinion of a farmer of the island on the help which was offered by the present government.

Mr. McPhillips: Is he a farmer who raises third-grade potatoes?

An hon. Member: Not in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Robichaud: If my hon. friend only knew something about potatoes he would know that by the 26th day of June and early in July it is just not possible for the ordinary farmer to have all Canada No. 1 potatoes in his potato bin. He is just showing his ignorance of the potato situation.

The statement which was made in this house on July 18 by the minister blaming the potato grower and the government of Prince Edward Island, was rightly challenged by Hon. Eugene Cullen, minister of agriculture for Prince Edward Island. Here again I have an article which appeared in the Guardian on July 19, and I feel that part of this article should be placed on the record of this house to challenge the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture. It reads:

> Agriculture minister, Hon. Eugene Cullen, yesterday took strong exception to statements made by federal Minister of Agriculture, Douglas Harkness, in the House of Commons, regarding the implementation of a price support program for island potatoes.
> Mr. Harkness was credited with saying "the delay in giving assistance to potato growers of P.E.I. was due to the growers themselves in not making up their minds whether to accept the government offer."
> Mr. Harkness further stated that the plan offered to island growers was the same as that offered to New Brunswick growers in the starch diversion program. He concluded by placing all the blame on the government of Prince Edward Island and the growers in not deciding early whether to accept the offer.
> In a prepared statement issued last night, Hon. Mr. Cullen said: "I find it difficult to believe that the Hon. Mr. Harkness made the statement attributed to him in a Canadian Press dispatch yesterday.
> There are many potato growers in Prince Edward Island whose continued existence as farmers depend on the amount of assistance they receive in the disposal of the balance of their 1957 potato crop.
> This unfortunate situation puts a grave responsibility on those whose duty it is to administer the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and we therefore expect from them statements which are carefully considered and supported by the record."

The record is as set out in this report:

> "1. On June 3, I told the agricultural stabilization board that the province was prepared to provide for the administration of any plan that was acceptable to the growers.
> 2. The first definite offer of a diversion program for P.E.I. was received on June 26 which was two days after Mr. Harkness announced in the press that we had been offered 36 cents a bushel for a feed diversion program.
> 3. The application for a guaranteed price was made by a committee consisting of representatives of Prince Edward Island potato producers' association, the Prince Edward Island potato dealers' association, the potato promotion committee, the federation of agriculture and the P.E.I. marketing board."

No one would dare to say that those people do not know the condition or quality of the potatoes on the island. I continue:

> "4. After receipt was confirmed by wire on June 26, any delay in accepting the miserable offer was due to the fact that the committee wished to make every effort possible to secure a better agreement before accepting an offer which at best would give the grower only a small part of his cost of production and which under present conditions proved to be worthless.
> The only reason that the offer was accepted on July 7 was that the committee did not wish to deprive any grower of a chance to receive assistance, however small it might be.
> In regard to Mr. Harkness' statement that island growers accepted the proposal, then discovered that the potatoes had sprouted, I wish to say that four days before the offer I sent Mr. Harkness a wire which stated that his offer was practically worthless because less than 15 per cent of island potatoes were firm at that date.
> The offer was accepted only after I received an answer to my wire which stated that Mr. Harkness could see no reason for changing the conditions."

Fortunately, Mr. Chairman, a few hours after the minister had made this statement in the house an announcement was made in Charlottetown that the department, after representations were made from the potato growers association and from the government of Prince Edward Island, had modified their offer and I understand that now 75 per cent of the potatoes will be covered by this price support. My reason for putting on the record the information which I have placed there tonight was to answer the statement made by the minister, putting the entire blame on the government of Prince Edward Island and on the potato growers of the island.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to offer some very brief remarks on the agricultural situation in the province of Quebec in general, more particularly with reference to my own constituency.

During the debates on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I already had an opportunity of raising certain problems facing the farmers of my constituency. I believe that it is imperative that I should return to these matters, so as to refresh the memory of the Minister of Agriculture on that score.

It should be sufficient to note in this regard that many farmers are quite incapable of finding on the farm itself the income required to earn a decent living and that, consequently, they must look elsewhere for an increase in that income. That is why a large number of farmers, at least in my own constituency, must work in the bush or as day labourers so as to provide their family with the necessities of life.

The situation is perhaps not new, but there certainly has been no improvement in this regard because of the price-cost squeeze.

The farmers of my area are not getting their fair share of the national income. That is why so many farmers' sons have gone out into the cities to earn a decent living.

In my district, a number of farmers who were formerly in a position to count on the sale of pulpwood or maple syrup to help in balancing their farming budget, now find that these two products sell at ridiculously low prices.

We are still expecting, with a great deal of impatience some gesture by the government with regard to the setting up of a reasonable price for pulpwood.

During the last campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had promised that the government would see to it that the selling price of that product would be regularized. On February 26 he stated in Rimouski, as reported by the Toronto Star on February 27:

(Text):

I hope, and representations have been made, that the advisory committee and the stabilization board, which will administer the act, will give consideration to including farmer-produced woods so they will know the lowest prices they will receive a year in advance.

(Translation):

Up to now, nothing concrete has been done to solve this problem. I trust the government will act upon the recommendations contained in the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which was established by the previous government, at the particular request of the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc), whom we still have the pleasure of counting among our colleagues.

Of course, this will not compensate the farmers for the losses they have incurred in the past, but it would be very important that the government take the necessary steps in order that the 40,000 farmers and settlers of the province of Quebec, owners of farm wood-lots—obtain in the future full value for their products. It is a vital matter in so far as Quebec farm budgeting is concerned, and it is now up to the government to solve that problem.

Another product which I mentioned as supplementing the income of our farmers is maple syrup.

It is for me a duty to raise the matter again since, according to the statistical date available, it is the constituency of Beauce which occupies top rank in the production of this staple in the province of Quebec, not to say in the whole of Canada.

Nowadays the equipment necessary for the production of maple sugar and syrup is very expensive, and the producer has to buy it if he wants to supply the market with a first-class product.

Farmers have understood the situation and many of them, thanks to federal and provincial assistance, have now been able to exchange their sap buckets.

As a matter of fact, the time of the birch bark bucket is over, and out of about 21 million tapped maples in the province of Quebec, covering more than 20,000 farms, nearly 17 million buckets have been replaced by aluminum ones, the cost of which is being borne, up to ⅔ in equal parts, by the Quebec and Ottawa governments respectively.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) criticise the former Liberal administration for discontinuing the subsidy on sap buckets. I might tell him that, on 21 million tapped maples, 17 million buckets have been replaced and that, if the government which he supports is really interested in maple products, there would be only 4 million more to replace.

There is still quite a large extent of maple bush where buckets have not been replaced and the producers would certainly appreciate it if the grant were reinstated.

I recently received a resolution from the council of Beauce county, and the people of my riding will certainly not stop urging the hon. Minister of Agriculture, as I intend to do myself, to consider a matter which, as a matter of fact, is of vital importance to our sugar producers.

According to the statistics published by the government of the province of Quebec, for 1951, the latest I have been able to obtain on maple products, the total production for that year reached $6,879,000 and, in my own riding, the production amounted that year to $943,716 i.e. almost 1/7 of the total production of the province of Quebec, and the same is probably true for the whole of the country.

Our production of maple syrup and sugar has constantly increased since 1955 and, according to the latest statistics I have before me, it was worth $9,393,000 in Quebec.

As considerable amounts have been invested in maple bush, we should now consider a reasonable revenue, remuneration and profit in fixing the sale price for maple products.

As the production of maple commodities is not considered an industry, it should be given a reasonable profit margin.

Among the remedies to be applied to this situation, it would certainly be proper to establish an adequate support price taking into account the production cost and a compensation price which could also apply, in order to give some return to our farmers who are now obliged to sell at a loss.

Nor should we forget either that maple products are one of the oldest agricultural production, one which is typically Canadian.

That is why I feel that if the Department of Agriculture were willing to give an adequate publicity to that product, not only in the springtime, but the whole year round, we could hope that part at least of this product, if not all of it, would sell at reasonable prices in this country.

If it was required that all maple syrup marketed be clearly labelled "pure syrup", "artificial or falsified syrup", whatever the case may be, we could hope that the consumer, seeing the difference, would be inclined to secure pure syrup, even if its price were a little higher, and we are convinced that after one try, he would always insist on buying that delightful product of matchless flavour. If maple syrup were advertised to the same extent as cane sugar from Cuba, we do not see why it would not sell at a price satisfactory to the producer and why its consumption should not be increased.

Maple syrup production in this country has now passed the $10 million mark. I feel therefore that the government should bring an immediate solution to the marketing of this product, in close co-operation with the Quebec maple producers co-operative and the newly formed syndicate.

I also would like to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture to include in his credits some money for subsidizing the purchase of chemical fertilizer.

In various areas, the soil is not quite suitable for farming, and it is only with great effort and a great deal of pains that the settler, and later the farmer, succeed in making their land profitable, which often takes several years. That is why I feel that a subsidy of this kind would not only be an incentive, but a genuine help to all who have anything to do with farming.

I also believe that subsidies on the transportation of seed grain from the west to the east of this country should be increased, as an incitement to our farmers who would buy this grain. We would thus kill two birds with one stone, for while helping eastern farmers, we would promote the disposal of farm products from the west.

I could submit many more requests on behalf of our farmers, but I shall limit myself at this time to those I just mentioned. I must admit that I was somehow disappointed this afternoon when I heard the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm deal with farm problems in the light of political partisanship. To my mind, farming brings up issues important enough to be treated seriously by setting up the proper legislation that would help our farmers to solve them.

[Mr. Racine.]

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to deal briefly with the suggestions I wish to bring before the committee tonight I wish to express the appreciation of this group for the courtesy, competence and good work of the departmental officials and the staff of the department throughout the country. These well-trained men and women perform a vital and essential service for Canada without any fanfare and, in most cases, without any publicity. I suppose we all recognize that major improvements in farm efficiency and production to a great extent depend on their intelligence, training and industry.

I think everyone will say that in the Department of Agriculture we have on the staff a good percentage who have all three of those requirements. Still, Mr. Chairman, our sense of values in this country is so unbalanced that in many cases a peanut vendor or a hot dog pedlar receives more compensation for a year's employment than do some of these highly trained, well-qualified and loyal public servants.

I am somewhat interested in this question, Mr. Chairman, because as a matter of fact I went to college in 1909 with a good number of former officials of the Department of Agriculture, and the forestry branch of another department, but unfortunately most of those officials have retired. I am one of the ancient remnants of that class still surviving in this house and who will survive for some time yet, I hope. Anyway, I urge the minister to do all he can to correct any salary injustices that are brought to his attention by the agricultural institute of Canada or by any other appropriate organization concerned with the welfare of these people and this staff.

Whenever I think of the good work done by these people who carry on their services largely unheard of, largely unsung and to some extent underpaid in some cases, I cannot help thinking of those lines in Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard":

> Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
> And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

I think Mr. Minister, you will recollect the fact that you have two rather tall flowers in the department in Ottawa.

I am very much interested in these estimates because I come from generations of farmers and foresters in Great Britain primarily and in the last approximately 50 years in British Columbia. I have experienced all the vicissitudes that a green Englishman experiences in entering a virgin forest and converting it to orchards, grass-growing land, tillable soil and so on. I could tell you of some most interesting experiences but I would rather do that when I am not taking the time of the house. However, I should like to say this in order to illustrate the tenacity, the purpose, the vigour and the intelligence of the early settlers who came out in my district in the upper Arrow lakes with very little money but great hopes, some of which have been shattered in the years succeeding. We were greatly interested in raising a fine breed of poultry and none of us had the money to invest in a really topnotch rooster. Do you know what we did? We all clubbed together and we had something that was very rare in Canada, on the upper Arrow lakes in the early days—we had a travelling rooster and we used to put him in a crate and transfer him from place to place, as the poultry farmers' requirements demanded.

In any event, I am speaking tonight on behalf of this group because this group is greatly concerned about the preservation of the family farm in the agricultural economy of Canada. This group views with concern the devitalization of our rural life in some areas, the decline of the family farm in other areas and the lack of opportunity provided for young people on the family farm, the lack of opportunity for the sons and daughters of Canadians who wish to farm and are capable of farming—and I have personal knowledge of a good number in my constituency—but who, owing to the conditions that prevail today, are unable to give vent to their desires and their hopes in that respect.

When we come to contemplate the millions of dollars spent on defence and the millions of dollars spent in subsidizing industry—for instance, the gold mining industry; and that has been a necessary and temporary expedient in recent years—we cannot understand why we in this country cannot do something for the thousands of young Canadians who wish to farm at this time and are denied that opportunity. In the remarks I wish to make this evening I intend to suggest the necessity for national rational planning as the result of federal-provincial co-operation to undertake certain policies that we think are necessary to bring together our idle resources in land and our ambitious people who wish to take advantage of those resources.

The first requirement when you come to establish a farm is land. We have an abundance of that commodity in this country. Before passing on I want to say that I support very strongly—as does this group, as a matter of fact—the proposals of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for a national conservation and rehabilitation act, to be applied for the purpose of moving people from marginal farms on to good soil and developing the thousands and thousands of undeveloped and unused acres in this country.

Before proceeding further I want to say that I have followed with interest the committee in the other place which has been studying land use for some weeks, a continuation of the studies commenced last session. I think that committee is doing excellent work because they are hearing evidence from people who know something about this question. I advise any hon. member who is interested in this subject to read the minutes of the committee on land use that is being carried on in the other place.

To illustrate briefly—and this has some local application and no one can ever accuse me of talking for the folks back home; I am talking for Canada in general but I use local illustrations because I have personal knowledge of them—and to mention the opportunities in the thousands of acres that can be brought under cultivation, we have in the Kootenay district a valley known as the Lardeau valley. In that valley there are at the present time 16,000 acres of first class land that could be brought under production. At the present time a great amount of it is covered with timber. Quite a large extent of it requires draining. But under some national conservation or rehabilitation act there is an opportunity for the development of a large area of land, as a result of the co-operation between the federal government and provincial governments, for the placing of young Canadians who will live their lives as farmers.

Another valley is the Slocan valley which is over 31 miles long and with thousands of acres of land. Some of it requires draining, some of it requires irrigating and some of it requires clearing of a poor species of timber. This valley is very suitable for agriculture. It is about one and a half miles wide and 31 miles long and there is a paved highway down the centre. There is also a power line right through the centre of the valley and there is quite a large river of about a hundred feet in width flowing through the valley. It is good land with good roads, power and water, and everything required for successful agricultural development. All that is necessary is some co-operation on the part of the governments to bring it into production.

In this connection I would say that the Slocan valley agricultural and conservation association, of which I am very pleased to be a member, is very interested in this development and wrote to ask if I would take up with the minister the question of having surveys made to determine the possibilities of the valley. This I did, and I want to express sincere appreciation on behalf of all those settlers of his interest in the matter and of his willingness to consider undertaking something of that sort if the provincial government would also show their interest in the matter and would make some representation in this connection to the federal government. I do hope the people back home will be able to get the provincial government to take the initial steps in this direction.

We also have the Inonoaklin valley which is 15 miles long and has thousands of acres of available land, in this case mostly under cultivation. All that is required there is transportation. They have the soil, they have the production, they have the farmers on the land and a good many farmers' sons who are anxious to farm. I know dozens of these young fellows who are not interested in going to university or gaining an academic education but who want to farm. However, because of the amount of capital required under present conditions they are unable to do so.

We also have some smaller areas throughout my constituency along the Kootenay lakes, the Arrow lakes, and Slocan lake which present opportunities for agricultural development. I have mentioned this matter as an indication of what we have in Canada. These areas I have outlined are in one constituency which is largely a mountainous constituency, so what opportunities must there be in other parts of this country? The first requirement is, of course, land and we have that in abundance —good land. The second requirement is young people who wish to farm, and we have those in good numbers. The third requirement, as I see it, is a satisfactory form of agricultural credit on a long term basis which will permit these young people to undertake a farming life without being oppressed by the necessity to repay loans in a relatively short period of time. There has been much experience in this connection in Great Britain and other European countries and anyone who has knowledge of long term agricultural credit knows that as far as land is concerned it can rarely stand an interest rate higher than 3 per cent to be repaid over a term of 30 years or more.

In that connection I would like to quote briefly from a document I received from the director of the Veterans' Land Act administration with respect to supervised farm credit. I want to give Brigadier Rutherford every credit for exercising some imagination and I think anyone with any knowledge of what is being done under his administration, within the limited scope of the act and within the limited amount of credit permitted under the act, will agree that the administration has blazed a trail which we might follow with respect to the development of a sound agricultural policy in Canada. I would like to read three paragraphs from this document, which are as follows:

Supervised Farm Credit for the Family-Sized Production-Line Farm
by T. J. Rutherford

Supervised farm credit is not an entirely new idea. Something of this nature was tried out in western Canada by an association of lending institutions who were having serious difficulties with their farm accounts during the depression period. It has also been tried to a limited extent by some lending agencies in the United States. However, it remained for the veterans land administration to give it a name, and to put the idea to work on a wide base and in a manner which has demonstrated how very effective it can be made in "putting agricultural credit to its highest and best use, and in ensuring its repayment in the ordinary course of business and without tears."

Since the amount and value of the land, livestock and equipment required as components of an economic family farm unit continue to increase, the need for carefully supervised credit in just the right amount—no more no less—and made available at just the right time to competent and progressive farmers capable of using it to good advantage, becomes more and more urgent. In fact, it has now become a necessity if agriculture is to again take its place with other industries in the matter of income to those who work, manage and, at the same time, largely finance its production units—

Adequate Supervised Farm Credit a Necessity today

The provision of adequate supervised farm credit is undoubtedly the most effective way in which various levels of government can assist agriculture to correct the income differential as related to other industries and, at the same time, bring production more in line with future market requirements. While industrial corporations finance their production to a considerable extent with funds supplied by holders of bonds and preferred stocks—who, though not actively engaged in the business, have a first claim upon its assets and income as security for the credit advanced—farmers generally have no such source of credit. This disadvantage is one which government, at all levels, can help to remove by making adequate credit available to this basic industry under a type of supervision that will minimize risk of loss and ensure its highest and best use in the building up of economically sound family farm units—which are the backbone of a permanent, prosperous agriculture.

The capital requirements of those now engaged in agriculture are nearly three times greater, on a gainfully employed worker basis, than they are in other industries and at least three times greater than they were when the Veterans' Land Act was enacted in 1942. The lack of available capital is unquestionably responsible for much underemployment and uneconomic labour on Canadian farms—

And I can endorse that from experience.

—for the reason that many of these farms are too small and/or inadequately equipped and stocked to constitute sound, economic units. Larger and better units would, of course, mean fewer units, and also the taking out of agriculture and putting back into trees of considerable submarginal land and, in some cases, packets of reasonably good land that are too small, badly situated or scattered to be assembled into economic farm units under present conditions.

I think Brigadier Rutherford has stated the case very well indeed and I would just like to quote briefly from the table he mentions which shows the value of supervised farm credit. This table is as follows:

Net worth—The average net worth of the settlers, including the conditional grant of $2,320 as if earned at time of settlement $5,117
The average net worth, December, 1957, an average of 8.3 years after settlement $13,433

In view of the limited capital available and the situation under which many of these men commenced farming, I think this is very creditable indeed and is a clear indication of what could be done by an expansion of this form of supervised farm credit at low interest rates over a period of up to 40 years which is very badly needed.

The other day when the Canadian Farm Loan Act amendment was under consideration I did not take advantage of the opportunity to discuss this question because I thought I would be ruled out of order and my remarks on that act, therefore, were very few indeed. It was however obvious from the debate—and this applies to the remarks of many members from all parties in this house—that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction with respect to the adequacy of the present Canadian Farm Loan Act. I am not criticizing the commissioners or the officials—they are there to administer the act and the regulations—but the whole basis of the act makes it necessary that they administer it as a mortgage company would administer a loan, on a strictly, shall I say, mortgage company basis, expecting practically the rate of interest required by a mortgage company without any direct supervision of the operation of the farm and the attitudes towards loans are the attitudes of the mortgage companies, investment houses and institutions of that sort.

I am sure that during the debate the minister will be convinced of the necessity for exercising some imagination to bring together the land and the young people who wish to farm, many of whom are the sons and in some cases the daughters of men who fought for this country in the first world war, or the second world war, or both, because we have some pretty vigorous war veterans from the first world war, as evidence given before the veterans committee has shown.

Further, I think we need a national form of crop insurance. I was pleased to hear the minister say recently that the matter was being given close study. I do not for a moment underestimate the difficulties, particularly when one has to deal with all the ten provinces and take into account the different attitudes towards this type of legislation. But the need is obvious, the matter is urgent, and it is one which requires the co-operation of federal and provincial departments of agriculture and governments if this problem is to be met.

I am not suggesting for a moment that crop insurance will cure all the ills of agriculture. Some of the present ills can be cured by irrigation, some by satisfactory under-drainage, some by better tillage, but regardless of a farmer's efficiency in these directions there are still the hazards of weather, disease and insects. I see no reason why we should not, as Churchill said on one occasion, make the law of averages come to the rescue of millions in this country with respect to crop insurance which is so necessary.

I am quite sure that if the Minister of Agriculture wants to have some evidence of the success of crop insurance in a limited sphere he could do no better than study the hail insurance plan introduced by the British Columbia fruit growers association. I might say that this is not the only progressive step which has been undertaken by this association. We were the first fruit growers organization to fight for marketing legislation on a provincial basis, and the first agricultural organization of this type, I think, to establish a form of crop insurance with hail insurance. While that act is limited in scope I think it shows what can be done and if we can get the federal government and provincial governments with the farmer's associations and the farmers, whether wheat growers, or fruit growers or hog raisers working together, surely we have the intelligence to devise an act which will protect the farmers of Canada against the vicissitudes of nature.

Another field which I think is certainly worthy of investigation by the minister and by the government is the need for more satisfactory transportation. As I mentioned before, I have one valley in my area, the Inonoaklin valley which has a very good production record, but which lacks direct access to the markets by road. I do think that the federal government together with the provincial government of British Columbia should give thought to the development of such highways as are required to bring agricultural commodities to the centres of population. We hear a lot about the tourist trade and the necessity for building highways to assist these visitors, but I do think that the needs of farmers in certain areas deserve more attention by federal and provincial governments on a co-operative basis so that they may be provided with transportation facilities which up to now have been denied.

One other matter which I should like to discuss is the question of unemployment insurance for farm workers. As the minister knows, the British Columbia fruit growers association has repeatedly passed resolutions in recent years urging that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended so as to provide unemployment insurance for farm workers. I know that the failure of the government to do that has resulted in hardship to farmers in Canada. I have personal knowledge of a number of farmers who are unable to obtain labour for short periods, for which they are willing to pay industrial wages, because the men who might have accepted employment would not be building up unemployment insurance contributions. As a result, labour was simply not available for gathering fruit, making hay, and harvesting other crops, because, as I say, workers on farms are not covered by unemployment insurance. I would urge the minister to discuss this matter with his colleague the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Harkness: It has been done.

Mr. Herridge: You have already discussed it? Well why in the world do you continue to hide your light under a bushel?

Mr. Harkness: I was always a very modest fellow.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that these discussions have been undertaken, and I hope that at least in the course of next session—I am not one of those who are advocating that too much legislation should come forward during this session from now on—the minister will introduce amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to deal with the points I have raised. I am happy to know that we have had such a good influence on the minister.

In addition,—and I know this is primarily a matter for the provincial governments—I hope consideration will be given to making workmen's compensation available to farmers under better circumstances than now exist in most provinces at the present time.

An investment in rural life will, I am certain, pay dividends in national stability, in happiness for many people, and in cash for those concerned as well as for the governments who have control over the affairs of this country. I am a great supporter of rural life because I believe that for a nation to be strong, progressive and healthy and to continue to be democratic in every sense of the word we must have a strong, well organized rural population who are making their living on the land, not only because they love to do it but because the return provided is a fair share of the national income.

We have an excellent staff in the Department of Agriculture. I know that so far as British Columbia is concerned they have excellent people there. I have met a good many of these chaps at different times and they would be only too willing to feel that they were taking part in a well-designed, well-planned national policy with a particular purpose in mind, as a result of co-operation between the federal government, provincial governments, farmers' organizations and the farmers themselves.

Every one in the chain of responsibility should accept some responsibility in support of a national plan. As far as this group is concerned it is the only road we should travel in the future if we are going to achieve the success that is necessary. These things are required to ensure the continued operation, preservation and development of this very vital sector of our economy, the Canadian family farm.

Mr. Milligan: Mr. Chairman, I feel I would not be performing my duty at this time if I did not make a few remarks concerning agriculture. The subject of agriculture has always been very close to my heart. I am the third generation in my family to follow agriculture and I have three sons engaged in it at the present time.

I have been connected with farm organizations for about 15 years and as a result of this experience I have learned something of the problems that affect agriculture in every province in Canada including Ontario. We have heard a considerable amount of discussion about agriculture and particularly about western agriculture but not too much has been said about the industry in the east.

I listened with much interest and a certain amount of pleasure to the Minister of Agriculture when he made his remarks on Friday, July 11, 1958. At that time I was prompted to ask myself if agriculture is in the rosy haze of prosperity about which we have heard so much or, on the other hand, if there are some very important aspects of agriculture in a critical position to which we are attempting to blind ourselves and make ourselves believe they do not exist. I should like to explain what I mean by these statements and perhaps I can best do so by asking this question. Are we, as members of parliament, satisfied with the over-all picture of agriculture today? We must remember that agriculture is the oldest industry in the world. It is the life blood of this generation and of generations still unborn. It is the foundation upon which we have built up this land of ours.

I quite agree with the statement made by the minister when he said the total income of agriculture is much higher than it was a year ago. It is gratifying and a source of some satisfaction to know that this has occurred under the able leadership of the present minister but obviously it could have a detrimental effect on all agriculture if we do not explain to the consuming public the exact position in which agriculture finds itself. Most people scorn the thought of any assistance being given to agriculture. When we talk about increased protection from imports the consumer feels that agriculture is already in a prosperous condition and not in need of further consideration. I believe it is the responsibility of those who are dependent on agriculture for their livelihood to present a true picture of the industry and the position in which we find it.

When discussing the position of the farmer and his wife and family with an intelligent consumer a few days ago I was informed by him that there was plenty of money on the farm and that farming was a secure position. The consumer suggested that if the farmer did not like his position in agriculture he should get out of it and take up something else. I believe that is the feeling of a great many people who are not engaged in the agricultural industry. Those engaged in the industry must remember that they represent only a small percentage of the total population, about 12 per cent at the present time. There are, therefore, eight people looking for cheap food as compared with one who is trying to secure a fair return for his labour in this field of endeavour.

We have heard a great deal about the wheat situation and I can assure you that wheat is an important part of Canada's agricultural industry but there are other sections of the industry which are equally important. As long as we have a surplus of western grains we are going to have trouble in agriculture. We want to make it prosperous for the wheat farmer to be able to sell his wheat and continue selling wheat. Just as soon as it becomes unprofitable for him to do that he will engage in some other line of production such as livestock in which we have a surplus at the present time.

I fully agree with the following statement of the Saskatchewan wheat pool taken from one of its publications:

> Other exporters, such as the United States and France, directly subsidize their exports of wheat and flour. More recently the United States has offered a variety of inducements such as long term credits, barter deals and give-aways to induce importers to buy their wheat.
> The combination of import restrictions and export subsidies which are now almost universal in the wheat trade force the Canadian farmer into competition with foreign governments. So far, the Canadian farmer has met this competition virtually unaided. In requesting deficiency payments he is asking the government of Canada to help bear part of this burden of unfair competition.

At the present time the wheat farmer should be given some sort of support in selling his wheat at a profit to enable him to remain in the business of growing and selling wheat regardless of how this is done. I feel that every one from eastern Canada should be concerned about the situation and offer the western farmer every support.

The September 1957 issue of The Rural Scene published by John Atkins Publishing Company Limited in Midland, Ontario, contains an interesting article, a portion of which I wish to place on the record:

> We believe that Mr. Diefenbaker is actuated by a sincere desire to give Canada good government, and by an equally sincere desire to preserve Canadian agriculture as a self-dependent, self-respecting industry.
> We believe that, if he discovers that some of his pre-election promises were hastily made and without a clear realization of all they implied, and if a closer study of the problems convinces him that some of his promised remedies are likely to do more harm than good, he will not hesitate to do what is in the best interests of the country and of the farming industry, rather than what is closest to the letter of his promises.
> In this he should have the full support of all parties in the house.

I am sure there are not many hon. members who feel that agriculture has been promised too much. Another article in the same issue bears the title "The Market Price is Starting Point" and reads in part as follows:

> Minister of Agriculture Harkness is said to be studying the question of a fair price-cost relationship for farm products.
> In such a study the first thing to determine is what would be a fair price for any product.
> The answer to this question can be found in the decision of Mr. Justice W. J. Schwenger last December in a dairy arbitration case. The item reads:—
> "The gross value of 100 pounds of milk is not its cost of production under normal conditions, but what it will bring on the available market. The net worth of 100 pounds of milk must be this gross return less all expenses of shipping and processing."

If that applies to agriculture, why should it not apply to every industry? How many industries today throw their products on the market at whatever prices they will bring? Agriculture should be in a position no different from that of any other industry. The farmer must have his cost of production plus a reasonable rate of return on his investment. It is this kind of thing that is poisoning the consuming public against the thought of giving any consideration to agriculture. I continue reading from the same article:

No article of commerce has any value other than what it will bring on the market. The government's duty is to see that nothing interferes with the free functioning of the market, for the judgment of the market is the judgment of all interested parties.

In the same issue of this publication under the heading "Time to Define Farm Prosperity" we find this significant statement:

The question arises: If the Canadian taxpayers have to furnish 75 per cent of the capital the farmers need, and also have to give the farmer-controlled marketing boards monopolies in the Canadian market, and, on top of that, if they have to pay higher taxes to support farm prices at levels satisfactory to the farmers, of what benefit would the agricultural industry be to the country? It would be a mendicant industry, living on what it could get out of the government and not on the value of its service to the people.

By no stretch of the imagination could it be called a truly prosperous, self-supporting, self-respecting industry.

I am sure no one in the agricultural industry is looking for a handout or for any support that is not due to him. These statements should be corrected so that the consuming public will know the conditions we are facing at the present time. I have another quotation that I should like to put on the record:

We have all heard of the recently discovered Parkinson's law, which says that, in the government service, work will always be stretched out to occupy all the time available for its completion. The same law seems to apply to costs when the government is paying them.

The article goes on to say that agriculture is a high-cost producing industry, unable to compete in the free market without help from the government. I continue:

More and more our farmers are looking to the governments to solve their problems for them. More and more they are depending on their political influence and less on their farming abilities.

I do not think there are many farmers who try to drag out the cost of production so that they will have more grounds on which to apply for assistance from the government.

I would like to say a word about the stabilization bill that was brought in last year. It is one of the things that we should be proud of. I think it is the answer to our agricultural problem but there have to be amendments made to it from time to time. We have adopted some support prices. In some instances some of us think they are not high enough; others think they are too high. However, it is a step in the right direction, and if it is carefully handled it can prove to be of great assistance to agriculture.

We have heard a great deal about inefficiency. To me it has got to be a poor excuse for not giving consideration to agriculture.

[Mr. Milligan.]

Most of our farmers are efficient. I feel that there are many other industries that have not proved as efficient as agriculture. It is true that we have the odd farmer who is not so efficient, but by and large our farmers are certainly producing as much as and probably more than anyone in any other industry.

I did say something about wheat, but we must consider that world wheat trade is down. It has been dropping year by year not because of the fact that we have not been getting markets but because other things are affecting us along this line. According to the IFAP News one of the reasons for:

—reduced wheat imports needs in many countries, especially western Europe; reduced export supplies in several countries including—

Many of the larger producing countries have give-away and barter programs that are being conducted throughout the world. We have assisted through the Colombo plan a number of those countries which were importing our wheat a few years ago. Through better agricultural programs, tile draining, draining of land, insecticides and many other things, they have increased the yield of food in those countries many, many times. It is good that we have done that, but in doing that we have reduced some of our wheat exports. Again, the consumption of wheat, or of the products of wheat, has undergone a change. The eating habits of people throughout Canada today have changed. They are not eating as many products made from wheat flour. Therefore, a change should be made in the program but we must be careful that we do not bring it on too quickly and upset our whole agricultural program.

I would like to say a word about the beef industry with which I have been connected very closely for a number of years. It is quite true that we are getting a fair price for our beef cattle today but there should be a word of caution to those people who are thinking of getting into the beef industry. As long as we can export our surplus beef to the United States, as long as there is a demand for it, we are going to have a fair beef price; but just as soon as they get enough of our cattle the price will fall back to where it was before. Most of us realize that the United States would not be importing quite as much as they are importing at the present time if it were not for the drought conditions they have experienced in certain areas. Because of that their cattle population has been dwindling and therefore they want our cattle. But I would caution a number of people who are thinking of getting out of the dairy industry and into the beef industry. They might find that it will not be so profitable in a few years time.

I wish to say something about our hog production and our hog industry. We have been favoured with a good price for pork in the last year. I hope it will continue, but I am very doubtful whether we are not going to get into over-production. One of the greatest difficulties that we have in the agricultural and livestock industry at the present time, and that includes the hog industry, is the vertical integration and the contract feeding. We have quite a trend toward it in the province of Ontario and if something is not done to correct it we are going to put most of the small farmers out of existence. According to the pamphlet on hogs which I hold in my hand, in the United States 60,000 farmers with 100 sows, each farrowing twice a year, could produce 96 million hogs and the total consumption there is around 89 million hogs. In Canada we are consuming about 6 million hogs in a year. About 375,000 sows, averaging eight pigs twice a year, could produce all the pork that we need in Canada or about 3750 farmers would supply all the needs we have for pork products.

We had a vote in Ontario last Friday. There are 78,000 registered voters in Ontario alone. When we talk about setting up support prices I wonder who we are going to support. We talk about the cost of production. Nobody knows the cost of production. Most of us who have been engaged in agriculture for a number of years do not need too many economists to tell us what it costs to produce a hog, or the cost of production of most of the products on our farms; but if we are to set up a support price that will be an incentive to the large producers or to the feed dealers or the man who is setting up a hog farm, who can buy his grain at wholesale prices, who can buy his concentrates at wholesale prices, he will not care whether he makes too much on a hog. If he makes a dollar apiece and produces 5,000 hogs he will have $5,000; whereas the average small producer who produces a hundred hogs at a dollar apiece will receive only $100. I have heard something along that line. I know one producer in my own area who is building today and setting up a contract for 10,000 hogs a year with one of the large packers who will supply the feed. This is something that we must take a look at and not wait until the industry is in trouble before we correct this situation.

I would like to say a word about the dairy industry which is very important in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. We are very proud that we have a stabilization board. We have a support price under butter and cheese. Sometimes we have found that the support price becomes the ceiling. I have had numerous complaints and requests from the cheese producers this year when they were in trouble. The Ontario cheese producers association was able to get a licence to buy cheese and in the past few weeks they have been stepping on the market and buying cheese. At the present time they have been able to raise the price to 35 cents, which is only a cent above last year. If they had not been able to do that the result would have been that the cheese price would have been one cent below last year.

The minister has suggested that they reduce the price of powdered milk from 17 cents to 15 cents. Seventeen cents was the price arrived at last year as the cost of a pound of powder and it seems to me that with the cost of production going up the price should have remained at that figure. I do not think many industries would have accepted a reduction, and with the experience I have had in agriculture I quite agree with the statement made by Lord Boyd Orr, a former FAO director general, when he said that it is difficult to prevent surpluses by reducing prices because the farmer with capital increases his output to compensate for the reduced price in an attempt to maintain his income. I quite agree with that statement because when I was farming in the thirties I know that to meet my expenses and taxes I had to produce a little bit more when we were producing at a very low figure. In those years I produced hogs for $3.25. I think we have got to adopt some policy that will give a fair return to agriculture. We can control our surplus position by other means than reducing prices.

In the dairy industry you have a complicated set-up because you have the whole milk producer enjoying prices that range from $4.90 to $5.60 a hundred and on the next farm you have a farmer producing milk for cheese for $2.40 or a farmer producing milk for butter at about the same figure. I hope we can find some way of putting a guaranteed price under all manufactured milk. Maybe that will bring us closer to the pooling of all milk so that everyone in the dairy industry can get a fair return. There are a lot of people in the whole milk business who would not like that. However, I am a whole milk producer myself and I am quite convinced that if we had that type of program the farmers in the whole milk industry today would be getting more money because they would not have the extra surpluses they are dumping into some other product causing other surpluses and their over-all picture would be much better than it is at the present time.

I want to say something about the fruit and vegetable growers because a number of people in my riding are involved. We had a problem there a few weeks ago in connection with the dumping of raspberries on our market. There are a number of canning factories in my area which were canning raspberries. They had negotiated a price of 28 cents with the producers. I have a telegram I received from these people about a week ago which reads as follows:

—processor gave marketing board till 12 noon today at Brighton to decide to take 22 cents a quart which is below cost of production or they would import balance of pack. This means a reduction of 13 cents from last year.

They were going to import from New York state. The marketing board, rather than lose the opportunity of disposing of the berries, reduced the price to 22 cents. That is not going to result in jam or berries being a cent cheaper to the consumer. The price was negotiated at 28 cents and it is on that basis that the retail price will probably be decided. On the other hand, we cannot blame the processor too much because we allow canned goods to come in from the United States and he has to compete with them. Therefore, in order to compete he must secure his pack as cheaply as he can.

In my riding we have seven canning factories in Prince Edward county that are closed. Many people will say they are closed because they were inefficient. That is not the case. These factories were efficient. When they were Canadian Canners' factories they were efficient but when they were bought by California Packers they were immediately closed and the farmers lost their contracts. Each one of these factories had a payroll of some $200,000. That is gone and these people have nothing else to turn to. I understand that today Canadian Canners are operating two factories east of Toronto and two factories west of Toronto. They are importing whatever they need from California Packers and most of our stores today have the Del Monte brand of canned goods on their shelves. These are some of the things we must try to guard against.

Under the former government we lost many privileges because of the fact that concessions were given to other industries at the expense of agriculture and it is the former government that is responsible for the conditions we have today. It is very difficult for the present government to correct the situation in a short time. At the same time the opposition criticizes higher protection. I think it is up to all of us, whether on the government or opposition side of the house, to take a look at this picture.

It is not a small group that we are trying to protect but part of our agricultural industry. It has increased in size considerably in the last two years. The increased consumption of canned fruits and vegetables in Canada has not resulted in benefits to the producer in this country. The benefit of increased consumption has gone to United States canners who have been able to dump their product in this country.

I discussed this matter some time ago with Mr. West, the assistant United States agricultural attache. We discussed ways and means of correcting the situation and I quite agree that we should sit down with these people and discuss the situation. It is not a case of increasing our tariffs to the extent that we will restrict trade but I think we should sit down with the United States processors and producers and negotiate ways and means of correcting this situation. I understand that the processors over there will have a surplus and some jobber will come along, buy a job lot and then, because the door is wide open, dump it into Canada and make a large profit. That kind of thing is hurting us considerably.

I can remember very well sitting down last year with a delegation in the United States and discussing some of the problems affecting our trade. I think the discussion went a long way in helping to understand the situation. Mr. West mentioned this when I was talking to him not very long ago. That is one suggestion I should like to offer that might help to improve the situation.

A lot of people are criticizing subsidizing everything, but when we take a look at what is happening in every country in the world with which we have to compete we see that the picture is quite different. I have here the newsletter published by the dairy farmers of Canada in which there is reference to the United Kingdom price of butter. Butter in Great Britain is the cheapest it has been in some 30 years and the price of butter in Britain is seriously affecting the New Zealand producer. Why is it affecting the New Zealand producer? The New Zealand producer is affected because Finland is putting her butter into Britain at a much lower price than before. The price of butter in Britain was 32 cents a year ago and now it is down to 23 cents. I should like to read hon. members an extract about the high dairy and poultry export subsidies in Finland.

USDA Foreign Crops and Markets reports that export subsidies paid by the Finnish government for dairy and poultry products—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to offer with regard to agricultural research. If I am not mistaken, the Department of Agriculture has a division with two research services included. The science service is concerned with purely scientific research, where specialists carry out, for instance, research in entomology, to prevent destruction of crops by insects, or on weeds, so as to improve the quality of crops, etc. The experimental farm services is concerned with research in more directly agricultural matters, experts in these fields carrying out research, at experimental farms, on improved methods of production of certain commodities, for instance on the most economical way of producing eggs or milk, soil specialization, etc.

If I understand correctly the annual cost of these two services is $10,000,000 in each case, which is $20,000,000 in all.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) a very important point. I feel that if we are to improve the efficiency of agriculture in this country, in the west as well as in the eastern and central parts of this country, we should at once adjust our research procedure. Let us set up a new co-ordination of existing services and give a new, bold and forward looking impulse to these research services, so as to develop ways to increase the income of the farmer who is now caught in the cost-price squeeze.

I will now proceed to put a few suggestions forward for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture. These suggestions appear to have a great deal of interest for agriculture in general. However, before doing so, I would like to pay tribute to the former minister of agriculture in the preceding government who has, during his term of office, put into the hands of the farmers of this country production facilities which are without parallel anywhere else in the world.

When we were in power, we had, first of all, to look after the production problems, but we have also established a research system. And I note today that, since the Conservatives have been in power, no improvement has been made to that research system which was an initiative of the Liberal government.

Today, the selling at a loss of our farm products on the world markets is perhaps the most serious problem in Canada. The time has come, I believe, to consider the situation realistically. We should not hesitate a moment to spend millions of dollars more to find, by means of all known scientific methods, the various uses to which our farm products could be put, in addition to ordinary consumption, local and foreign.

Only scientific research applied to our agricultural products under new forms, could, in my opinion, considerably contribute to increase our agricultural production. The day is coming, and very rapidly—and I believe we should hasten the coming of that day—where industry will become the greatest consumer of our agricultural products.

Thanks to scientific research, Mr. Chairman, there is no limit to our hopes. However, when we consider our achievements in this field, compared to what is being done in some foreign countries where production is similar to ours, we have to admit that we are lagging behind. It is interesting to consider what the United States are achieving in this field.

I should like here to quote an extract from the Manitoba Co-Operator of November 21, 1957. It is from an editorial entitled:

(Text):

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH

Some months ago the United States Department of Agriculture announced its decision to increase its agricultural research budget to $50 million, an announcement welcomed by agriculture and industry alike, but one greeted in some quarters by criticism that the amount was too small and nearly twenty years too late.

The article proceeds further, talks about larger crops and surpluses and then continues as follows:

These mounting surpluses in both Canada and the United States point to the very great need for increased research, to find new uses for farm products. As one United States research worker points out "Science has given agriculture an almost limitless productive capacity, and therewith one of its biggest problems—control or utilization of surplus production. At the same time, it is on its way to solving that problem by finding not only new uses for agriculture products, but new farm crops that will be used only in industry".

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the government leader what the business is for Friday and Saturday? Also, could he project his mind forward to Monday as well?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with the Department of Agriculture estimates. When they have been passed, we shall take the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs and of the Department of Justice. This procedure will apply for Saturday as well.

Mr. Harkness: I will not be here on Saturday.

Mr. Chevrier: You are not very hopeful.

Mr. Harkness: It is not a matter of not being hopeful.

Mr. Green: On Monday we intend to move to go into supply. That will be the sixth and final supply motion. Earlier on Monday we plan to move that, commencing on Monday, August 11, the house will sit at 11 a.m. instead of at 2.30 p.m. on each day of the week and that Mondays, commencing with that day, will be devoted to government business.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the government be giving any consideration, within the next two days, to the bill which was sent today to the veterans affairs committee, namely the one having to do with the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act? I understood that was coming back tomorrow or Saturday.

Mr. Green: There will be three bills dealing with veterans affairs. I expect they will all be taken on the same day but I am not yet in a position to say what day that will be.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ARMED FORCES, FOREIGN SERVICE—FAMILY INCOME REDUCTIONS

Question No. 147—Mr. Carter:

1. With respect to families of the following ranks: brigadier, lieutenant colonel, sergeant, private (a) with wife and three children; (b) with wife and five children, what is the net reduction in family income, during a four year tour of service outside Canada due to loss of family allowance after adjustment for any tax saving?

2. What is the average reduction in family income in each case?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. Under the Family Allowances Act, administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, family allowances are not payable to children residing outside of Canada. The loss of income would depend on the age of the children and the total income, including any income from sources other than employment in the forces. It is not possible, therefore, to provide a specific answer with respect to loss of income for each of the cases listed.

2. Foreign allowances and living allowances paid to servicemen overseas would in the majority of cases exceed any reduction in family income due to discontinuance of family allowances while the children reside outside of Canada.

Questions

R.C.A.F. CRASH, JUNIPER, N.B., 1939

Question No. 165—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

1. Has an official investigation been conducted into the recently discovered wreckage of a small Royal Canadian Air Force aircraft near Juniper, New Brunswick, believed crashed on September 14, 1939, an a flight from Megantic, Quebec, to Sydney, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, what is the official report of this investigation?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. Following a report of the sighting of a wrecked aircraft on July 9, 1958, an investigation was conducted by personnel of the R.C.M.P. and the R.C.M.P. It was established that the wreckage was Northrop Delta aircraft 673 which apparenty crashed on September 14, 1939, 40 miles from Fredericton, N.B.

Investigating officers have conducted a thorough ground search of the surrounding area and they have located a number of items which indicate that the crew, WOI Doan and Cpl. Rennie perished with the aircraft.

It is not considered that any useful purpose would be served by a further technical investigation into the cause of this accident because of the long interval, the condition of the wreckage and the lack of information on the flight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, August 1, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Eighth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McCleave.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as action is required to complete the confederation agreement, can the Prime Minister advise the house if the government proposes, at an early date, to implement the report of the royal commission on the terms of union with Newfoundland?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The report in question is being given very careful examination and study at the present time. Just as soon as the government is in a position to report the house will be advised.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—REQUEST FOR INTERIM REPORT ON OIL AND GAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give the house any idea when he expects the interim report of the Borden commission to be presented to the government dealing with petroleum and natural gas?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I have no definite information in this regard. As I stated the other day, the Borden commission adjourned with a view to giving consideration to and making an interim report. However, I will communicate with the chairman at once with a view to ascertaining the approximate date when that interim report will be ready.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question coupled with a suggestion. There is every possibility, we are led to believe, that an interim report might be made available on natural gas in advance of the report on the marketing of petroleum products. Perhaps that suggestion could be contained in the request as well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the hon. gentleman will be brought to the attention of the chairman of the commission.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PULPWOOD—INQUIRY AS TO PRICE-FIXING BY COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton).

Does the Minister of Justice intend to proceed against the companies found guilty of price fixing in respect of pulpwood, as indicated in the report of the commission on restrictive trade practices with regard to the purchase of pulpwood bought from farmers or settlers in certain areas of eastern Canada?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. In answer I will state that this case has already been referred to Quebec lawyers who have been instructed to institute legal proceedings unless, in preparing the case, they should arrive at the conclusion that the evidence is insufficient.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DIRECTIVE RESPECTING PART-TIME OUTSIDE WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the Postmaster General issued a directive asking post office employees to report on their part-time work in outside jobs, and do postal employees wishing to engage in outside part-time work have to first obtain permission to do so from the postmaster or any other official of the Post Office Department?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. No such directive has been issued by this Postmaster General. However, in 1951 such a directive was issued under the authority of the deputy postmaster general, and it was repeated in 1956 by one of the senior officials of the department. In each case it referred specifically to staff offices, that is those where the entire staff comes under the control of the civil service commission. The directive was not sent to the semi-staff or revenue offices which are smaller in size.

FABRE STATION, QUE.—PROTEST RESPECTING CLOSING OF POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can the Postmaster General tell the house if he has received a petition signed by the majority of residents of Fabre Station protesting against the closing of the post office, which had been in existence for 33 years?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I will be glad to look into the matter and give the hon. member an answer next week.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED CONFERENCE ON DISPOSITION OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to a Canadian Press dispatch from Victoria dated yesterday to the effect that Premier Bennett proposed a meeting of himself, the Prime Minister of Canada and President Eisenhower to speed development of the Columbia river? While the procedure indicated by Premier Bennett appears somewhat irregular and unusual, would the Prime Minister care to comment on Premier Bennett's proposal for a North American summit meeting to deal with the problem of downstream benefits related to the development of the water resources of the Columbia valley, in order to arrive at the plateau of mutual understanding?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I will give a more serious answer to this question than the wording would suggest I should. In so far as our relations with other countries are concerned, those relations are conducted as between the Department of External Affairs or other departments of government and the government of the other country. Any representations that the premier of British Columbia has to offer will, of course, receive the fullest consideration, as we desire at all times to co-operate fully with any province directly affected in respect of any matter that comes under the responsibility of the national government. Further than that I cannot go at this time.

TRANSPORT

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION OF UNDERPASS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in my absence the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asked whether or not I had given an assurance to the municipality of Sherbrooke that an underpass would be built. When the mayor and members of the council of Sherbrooke were here they did not see me; they had an interview with the chairman of the board of transport commissioners about this matter, and I understand from the board that everything possible will be done to work out a mutually satisfactory solution to this problem.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF SALE AND SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester asked the following question:

> What action has been taken by the government following the recent request of the Halifax board of trade, . . . urging the federal government to reconsider its decision to sell the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships fleet, and also to end the seafarers' international union strike which began nearly a year ago and to return the ships to service?

All possible methods of dealing with the situation were considered at great length by both the management of the company and by the government before the decision to dispose of the ships was reached. In the circumstances I do not believe there is anything I can usefully add to what has been stated previously on this matter.

SUGGESTED TRANSFER TO FEDERATION OF WEST INDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister if the government has given any consideration to the suggestion put forward on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and on another occasion in the house that Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships might be transferred under some lend-lease arrangement to the Federation of the West Indies?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No consideration has been given to that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

BRIDGES

MONTREAL—STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF THIRD BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Papineau asked me the following question:

—whether the minister has recently received representations requesting the implementation of the decision taken by the previous administration to build a third bridge over the St. Lawrence river, in the east end of Montreal?

I have not been able to find any record of a decision by the previous administration to build a third bridge over the St. Lawrence river in the east end of Montreal. Various representations relating to this subject have been received from time to time and the matter, of course, will be kept under review.

WELLAND CANAL—STATEMENT ON FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon member for Welland asked me the following question:

Is it the intention of this government to make any contribution toward the cost of the proposed three overhead bridges to be built by the Ontario government over the Welland ship canal at Homer, at Welland and at Port Colborne, as reported in today's Toronto Globe and Mail? Also, are tolls to be charged on those bridges?

I have no knowledge of plans for the construction of the three bridges concerned over the Welland ship canal by the Ontario government, other than the announcement on this subject which was contained in the daily press recently. I am not, therefore, in a position to give the hon. member any further information in this regard.

TRADE

NAFEL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF WITHDRAWAL OF SPECIAL PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister contemplating any early announcement with respect to withdrawal of special permits from NAFEL?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I arrived a minute late. May I have permission to revert to motions in order to make this announcement?

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister permission to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Under the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada the statutes relating to the marketing of Newfoundland salt fish were to remain in effect for a period of five years from the date of union. Under this arrangement the exclusive right to market salt fish, including export to the mainland, was given to the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited. This was continued without change for five years.

In the spring of 1954 an extension of three years was granted to the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited, with the modification that export permits for wet salted fish were to be issued freely for movement to the Canadian mainland and the continental United States. This arrangement was extended on a temporary basis.

The exclusive right to export the products of a single province has no counterpart in the administration of the fisheries of any other province. However, it has been recognized by the government of Canada that a suitable period of time was desirable in which to effect a transfer to the normal practice of marketing. As nine years have now elapsed since union, one more year is considered ample for the completion of the transition. Therefore, the government has decided that the exclusive right of export held by the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited shall terminate on July 31, 1959.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I can ask the minister—I recognize there was no constitutional obligation—if in fact there was any consultation with the government of Newfoundland before this step was decided upon?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, I had a very useful conversation with the minister of fisheries of the province of Newfoundland some time ago.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

REFERENCE TO SALE OF "QUEEN OF THE NORTH"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which notice has been given to him. In view of the fact that the C.P.R. has sold its ship, Queen of the North, will the minister indicate what is the position of the C.P.R. and of Northland Navigation Limited, the purchaser of the ship, with respect to the subvention which originally was being paid to the C.P.R. for certain up-coast runs?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Although the hon. member says he sent me notice, unfortunately it has not reached me yet. Consequently I will look into the matter and give an answer on Monday.

IMMIGRATION

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES—STATEMENT ON REPORTED DECISION TO ADMIT ADDITIONAL 1,000

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked three questions with regard to Hungarian refugees. I took the questions as notice in the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and said I would bring them to her attention for an early reply. I should explain that the minister is away today as the minister of the federal government in attendance on Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret, and in view of her continued absence I should perhaps give the answer now.

The first question related to the number of Hungarian refugees coming over to Canada this year, and I can advise the hon. gentleman that 1,100 is the correct figure. The second question asked for the number of Hungarian refugees in Canada seeking employment who are still unemployed and being cared for by the department, and also how many of those who came here have returned.

The answer is that according to the records of the immigration branch, on July 25, 1958, there were 151 Hungarian refugee workers unemployed and on the same date the branch was providing subsistence to 500 Hungarian refugees. The 500 figure includes the 151 workers already mentioned. In answer to the last part of the question, 449 Hungarian refugees are known to the department as having left Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any decision has yet been reached by the government with regard to the recognition of the government of Iraq?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement later in the day with respect to that matter.

FISHERIES

REPORTED AGREEMENT BY JAPAN TO MOVE FISHING BOUNDARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the other day I directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries with respect to Japan's fishing boundaries in the Pacific. I wonder whether the minister has had a chance since that time to inquire as to the authenticity of the report and whether what is indicated therein has in fact happened?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): There has been no change in the tripartite agreement among Japan, the United States and Canada with regard to the north Pacific fisheries. However, we are aware of the fact that the industry in Japan have apparently undertaken to place further restrictions on their own activities, greater restrictions than required by the convention. We presume this is on a temporary basis.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $674,164.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: When I adjourned the debate yesterday evening, I had mentioned the fact that we do not give our agricultural research services the leadership and scope we should. I had also pointed out that in 1957 the United States had spent $50,000,000 on such services, an amount which has been found inadequate by several American commentators who have dealt with the matter.

Some time ago I read that no European country had done more than France, since the end of the last war, to apply specialization and scientific methods to the various aspects of its agriculture. We are told that the remarkable economic recovery of Europe has an intimate relationship with that research work.

Over the last few years, northern European countries not only have considerably increased their areas under wheat, barley or oats, but have found new consumer uses for their agricultural surpluses.

Those are the reasons for our surplus problems, and I suggest that, unless immediate development facilities are made available to our research services, a few years hence we will be unable to dispose of our surpluses.

When from time to time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) tells us that Canada has sold or has given large quantities of our farm surpluses to underdeveloped countries, either on the basis of a long term loan or as a grant under the Colombo plan, we welcome the news. But, there again, it provides merely temporary relief to our difficulties.

In Pakistan and in India I had the opportunity to inspect huge dams which, in 10, 15 or 20 years, through irrigation of lands which are now marginal, will yield a large crop of grains, and it could be that, by that time, those countries will give us stiff competition on the world markets.

Therefore, through scientific research, we should find new uses for our farm products. Science is now finding the answer to the problem of the use of farm surpluses. Let us follow suit in this field. We already have a first-rate research bureau, and it is up to us to give it the necessary leadership.

Accordingly, we on this side of the house, feel that the government should immediately implement a vigorous program of scientific research, and if we were in power today, we would set up, starting this very year, a large scale research organization.

We also believe that our government experts and specialists should have much more frequent contacts and exchanges with their counterparts abroad, so that the latest methods available be applied without delay.

We also believe that on a strictly federal-provincial basis, conferences should be frequently called with experts and specialists from the provincial governments so that all the provinces could have access to recent information and use it.

I do my best to keep abreast of problems which our farmers and producers have to face. I think our approach to those problems should be altogether different. Canadian agriculture should be reformed from top to bottom.

The Liberal party is a party of reform. At present, all it can do is to point out the facts to the government and make some suggestions as to policy. But the day will come when we shall put before the farmers and rural producers of our country a bold, original, new and revolutionary program of farm reform, and our friends from the western provinces certainly shall return to us much sooner than hon. gentlemen opposite think they will, and no doubt in far greater strength than they imagine.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I shall mention that I read with great interest the long list of election promises made by the Minister of Agriculture throughout the country during his last campaign. He has about promised everything, except that he ignored the most important field, that of research. This is an indication that he doesn't appreciate its real significance.

In any case we called his attention to this field, and during the next session, we shall not forget to ask about the progress, if any, made in this field.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, as they see me rise this morning, a number of hon. members may think I will bother to answer the speech delivered by the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). Let them have no worry on this account. I will certainly not give any publicity to a speech which is hardly worth it.

I am happy to have the opportunity of taking part in a debate on the work done by the Department of Agriculture.

In talking of Canadian agriculture, I know only too well that I shall be speaking of that sector of our population which constitutes the main element of stability in our economy, which offers the best talents that a nation can be endowed with, and whose right-minded philosophy and understanding of things have always shown that it remains the country's main strength.

I have carefully read the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture when his estimates were brought down. With all due deference, I must say that I was not greatly impressed by the minister's eloquence. And I believe that my impression is shared by the overwhelming majority of Canadian farmers who have read this speech.

As indicated on page 2074 of Hansard, this is what the minister said:

> The farm situation has improved steadily in late 1957 and 1958, to a considerable extent I think since this government came into office and instituted new policies in connection with agriculture.

On the following page, the minister returned to the attack, in the following terms:

> As I have said, I think a great deal of the improvement has been as the result of policies followed by this government, including the introduction of the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

The minister thinks highly of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I would like to have the time to show in detail that, up to now, the application of this act is far from having provided the farmers with the great advantages which the minister boasts of; but I shall touch briefly on this during my remarks. For the moment I will simply say that for all the minister's bragging, the few minor successes which he has achieved are due, in the overwhelming majority of cases, to the implementation of acts passed by the Liberal government, and to the fulfilment of the program which the Liberals launched when they were in office.

Mr. Chairman, in speaking of Canadian agriculture, some facts must be analysed if one is to grasp the complexity of the country's agricultural problems.

Thus, out of 623,000 farms in Canada, we find that the average area of farms in Newfoundland, in 1951, was 23 acres, whereas it was 527 acres in Alberta, and 550 in Saskatchewan.

Then there is the problem of our farms on the southern and south-eastern coasts of Nova Scotia, of Cape Breton, and of the centre and the northeast of New Brunswick, as well as the farms of the Gaspe district and northern Quebec and Ontario, which provide a meagre livelihood for their owners.

There is a world of difference between many of these farmers who sell $500 worth of produce and who have to eke out a living by taking on outside work and the farmers on the outskirts of large cities where milk is sold at $4 per cwt., or the western farmers who own a half section or a full section of land.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

The same difference exists between the young farmer—even if he has obtained a farm loan—who starts off in northern Quebec and Ontario and the one who has a flock of 100,000 to 200,000 fowl and who is near thickly populated centres which offer a ready market for his produce.

The farmers do, however, still have one thing in common. That is the interest they have in the income they obtain from their work, and their attitude of looking upon their work as a professional calling rather than a way of life.

With the ever increasing commercialization of agriculture, a whole array of problems arise which affect both domestic and foreign markets.

Several factors bring their influence to bear on the domestic markets, and the prices of agricultural products depend on such factors as the weather, diseases of plants and livestock, outbreaks of contagious diseases and other factors, resulting in unpredictable fluctuations in the rythm of production and the prices of some foodstuffs.

While these factors are not the only ones which affect the income of farmers, the fact remains that, unlike his counterpart in industry, the farmer does not have a steady income year in and year out.

The impact of foreign markets is another factor which has a great deal of influence upon stability in agriculture and the country's economy as a whole. Actually, Canada exports a wide range of agricultural products, including cereals, potatoes, grass seeds, tobacco, apples and livestock products consisting almost exclusively of beef, pork, bacon and cheese. Of all the products, the most important is wheat. For quite some time, Canada has been exporting 60 per cent of her overall production, i.e. 300 million bushels annually.

It is easy to understand the difficult position in which a country finds itself, in the face of ever increasing competition from other countries which want to corner the world market—sometimes in a way which seems to us like hitting below the belt.

But these are not the matters I intend to deal with today, my aim is rather to deal with the agricultural program which we shall have to work out to meet the ever-growing need for food products.

These needs are unequivocally illustrated in the report on an inquiry into the progress and the prospect of agriculture in Canada.

This shows that in the future, the available individual income will have risen by an average of approximately 18 per cent by 1965, and 70 per cent by 1980. This increased buying power will be accompanied by a population increase resulting from the birth rate and controlled immigration. We see from the report that the index of the volume of over-all production should rise to 232, based on an index of 100 for the period 1935-39. The most significant increase will be in production of livestock and livestock products, which will reach an index of 265. How will the country meet the need?

Assuming that the increase in the acreage of cultivated land will be offset by the transfer of land from agricultural use to industrial and housing uses, the area will not rise in proportion with the increase in the demand for foodstuffs. The Gordon report forecasts that, by 1980, the cultivated area will be 176 million acres compared with 174 million obtaining today. From this we must conclude that these needs will be met mainly by a more rational use of land and by the adoption of a progressive agricultural policy, worked out and carried out to encourage our farmers and enable them to draw the same benefits from our country's wealth as people in other callings.

Mr. Chairman, there are several ways of increasing soil productivity, and I do not wish to dwell upon the technical details of production and soil improvement. Usually, a well-balanced agricultural policy like the one we had during the 22 years of Liberal administration gives good results in that respect.

That does not mean that changes are not called for. Never did our legislation require amending more than it does today, and it is precisely because of that fact that the Liberal government, in 1955, appointed a commission to make an inquiry into the country's agricultural progress and prospects. The commission brought down its report in 1957, and its findings should be used as the basis for making the changes which are necessary. The Liberal party understood this, and that is why novel concepts for agriculture were outlined to Canadians during the last election campaign. As for the Conservative party, it made a few vague promises whose implementation seems conspicuous by its absence. Just because the government enacted their Price Stabilization Act, they think they have found the solution to all the problems of agriculture. Although this act does not usher in any improvement on the Price Support Act adopted by the Liberals, it was nonetheless as necessary as that act.

This act—a frequent subject of controversy during the last session—is still being widely criticized. It does not answer the need which gave rise to it. All you have to do to realize this is to look through the preamble, which reads as follows:

> In order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income;—

This preamble looks fine on paper; but, for all practical purposes, what does it mean for the farmer. For many, it is a disappointment.

I have already informed the house of the meaning of this act for producers of milk intended for the manufacture of milk powder. I said then that the farmers got 10 cents less per cwt. of milk. I repeat at this time that in the province of Quebec farmers have been getting 10 cents less per cwt. since that legislation has been enacted. Moreover, manufacturers have lost $200,000 on the stocks they had on hand when the minister decided to lower the price. The price of milk in most Quebec areas as well as in the maritimes and in northern Ontario where milk powder is manufactured ranges from $2.75 to $2.80 per hundredweight. I may say that in the province of Quebec milk sells for $2.79 per cwt., whereas last year it was selling for $2.90.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Boulanger: Does the hon. member wish to put a question?

An hon. Member: No, he is putting a question to himself.

Mr. Boulanger: Although this act was a temporary one when it was passed in 1945, it seems to achieve the aim of the Conservative government in agricultural matters.

An appropriate policy would be one based on full understanding of an economic principle not dissimilar from the one which applies in industry.

This principle, in agriculture, implies getting the most from a given acreage with a minimum of effort and expense.

The government must always strive to translate this principle into reality in formulating its agriculture legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I should like to continue my remarks in English because I want to be sure the Minister of Agriculture will understand what I have to say about the program I wish to submit to the government.

Mr. Ricard: He understands French also.

Mr. Boulanger: I wish to make some suggestions which I am convinced would improve the lot of farmers, especially those who are in the low income group, if only the government would consent to putting my proposals into practice. This program could be implemented in two stages, the first in the immediate future and the second as opportunities arise. In this way the implementation would be simply a matter of time.

The first suggestion I wish to make which could be implemented immediately concerns the necessity of increasing the income of farmers in the eastern provinces and in northern Ontario and Quebec. As we are aware, the farmers of those regions produce chiefly milk, potatoes, tobacco and other crops of lesser importance. I do not wish to be repetitious in referring to the level of income of farmers, so, I shall merely say that in 1950 out of the 623,000 Canadian farms, 387,000 were selling products worth $2,500 or less, the average being $984. I might add that 80 per cent of the farm products came from 236,000 farms and 20 per cent came from the remaining 387,000. Nobody can establish that some of the farmers of the areas I have mentioned are not included in those 387,000 farms.

It is an established fact that in the east we could appreciably increase the yield of the harvest by the rational use of chemical fertilizers. A number of experiments have been carried out by the experimental farms and by the universities. Here is what one of our great specialists said. Mr. S. Chagnon, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Agriculture, several months ago wrote the following comment:

> Once again our farmers claim that the cost of fertilizers is too high. Yet the work carried out on the experimental farms has shown that every dollar's worth of chemical fertilizers applied to pastures brings in $3.00 to $5.00 worth in the form of milk production. Although we have invested on our farms non-productive capital at a lightning pace, we have neglected to invest productive capital such as chemical or commercial fertilizers. It is most important to turn to a more intensive use of chemical fertilizers.

Dr. Ernest Mercier, superintendent of the Lennoxville experimental farm, says for his part:

> Every dollar invested in chemical fertilizers applied to pastures brings in $2.00 to $4.00 in the form of beef.
> Chemical fertilizers are complementary to manure and are indispensable to the maintenance of mineral balance. Chemical fertilizers are the best capital investment that the farmer can make.

An experiment was made by the New York state experimental farm to compare the production cost of one ton of milk by herds receiving various feeds and the cost was seen to be as follows: $12.10 when the animals were on pasture; $17.05 when they were fed corn silage; $25.35 when they were fed locally produced grain, and $34 when they were fed grain imported from the west.

I hope I have given a sufficiently comprehensive account of the experiments which have been carried out to prove the necessity of using chemical fertilizers, and the Minister of Agriculture should study the possibility of increasing their use by all possible means. One method which was used with success in the province of Quebec at a time when the province had a minister of agriculture who was interested more in agriculture than in electoralism was to grant a subsidy on every ton of chemical fertilizers purchased, in order to improve pastures. Another method would be to grant a certain quantity of fertilizer to the farmers for every milk cow they had on their farms. The money which the implementation of such a program would cost would be negligible because the program would increase production and, indirectly, lower the production cost of milk.

We of the province of Quebec and of the entire eastern part of the country consider these requirements to be justified to compensate for the loss caused to milk producers by the Minister of Agriculture when he brought down the support price of powdered skim milk by 2 cents a pound.

Another suggestion I wish to make to the Minister of Agriculture is that a special board be entrusted with the administration and implementation of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I will not claim credit for this proposal, for it is set forth clearly in the report of the Gordon commission in the following terms:

> This is an undertaking of such importance and delicacy that, in our opinion, it should be entrusted to a board of full-time members who would be relieved of other duties so that they could concentrate on anticipating the occurrence of emergency conditions and on determining the effects of particular prices on production and incomes.
> In addition to recommending the level at which the prices of particular farm commodities might be supported from time to time, such a board might be left free to recommend also how this should be done. In general, two methods are available: the government can either purchase agricultural commodities when the prices fall below the stated support level, or it can allow farmers to dispose of their products at the prevailing market prices even though these may be below the support level, and then make up the difference with deficiency payments. The latter procedure would avoid the difficulties in which the government would otherwise be involved in selling, storing, and disposing of surplus commodities. It would also have the advantage of letting the producer see the return that his products would bring him in a free market; and this knowledge might be expected to lead to a more realistic pattern of production. In our opinion, however, it is not possible to say that deficiency payments in all circumstances are to be preferred to direct price support; and an advisory judgment on this point, as well as on the level of support, might well be sought in each particular case from the board. Finally, we are convinced that neither the government nor the board in administering the price support program should be bound by any automatic formulae.

The prices stabilization board, which could be entrusted with finding new outlets for our products, would be able to perform much more valuable work than that done so far for the farmers by the adoption of the Agricultural Stabilization Act introduced in the house last January.

Since the Conservative government came to power, Mr. Chairman, the conditions of agriculture in general have been maintained due mainly to the commendable acts passed during the Liberal regime. In his speech on July 9 the minister stated that the improvement which has occurred arises out of the program adopted by the government, namely the adoption of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I have shown that this act has had some very paltry results; that it has even brought about a loss for the skim milk producer. As for agricultural products, the prices of which have been stabilized, the minister knows as well as I do about the discontent which exists among so many producers.

Therefore we are far from the realization of the promises which the Minister of Agriculture, anxious to obtain votes in the province of Quebec, dangled in front of the farmers in a statement to the annual convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in Montreal, reported in Le Devoir of January 30, 1958. The minister stated:

I am at present studying the possibility of setting up a form of insurance which would protect the farmers against calamity, floods, hail or drought.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, perhaps some hon. members, including the minister, will be surprised to see a lawyer by profession rise at this time and speak on agriculture. Last night we had a very good example of what a lawyer can do. I will try to do the same as he did.

It has been said that lawyers should know everything. I do not agree with that statement, but I do say that like any other citizen in this country or anywhere else, a lawyer has to try to learn something about almost everything, and this is what I tried to do about agriculture.

Sir, I would like to take this opportunity on the first item of the Department of Agriculture estimates to make a few remarks about agricultural problems and also to offer some suggestions which, if studied and implemented, would in my opinion be of some assistance to some of the farmers of our country.

(Translation):

During the few remarks I made in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, Mr. Chairman, I had the opportunity of speaking about employment, unemployment insurance and also on certain angles of education. However, I did not, at that time, mention any matter connected with farming. I therefore think I am justified to do so now.

As the minister knows, no doubt, I represent a semi-urban and semi-rural riding. As a matter of fact, there are three towns in my riding; all the rest consist in rural municipalities where a number of farmers try somehow to subsist and make both ends meet.

As everybody knows, our farmers in the province of Quebec, like in every other province of this country, work 16 to 18 hours a day when weather permits, and more especially in spring, summer and fall.

We might wonder whether our farmers in any area get a fair and equitable return for their labour. We should not forget that, in Canada, farming is mainly a family concern. The farm is a fundamental economic unit; and it is a sound one. But we should also keep in mind that farming is, to a certain extent, about to lose its character of a family concern in order to become a real industry.

I think that the government, in whom the voters showed their confidence on March 31 last, should concentrate on this problem and realize that the farms of our country might cease to be an economic family unit in order actually to become an agricultural industry.

It is up to this government, which has now assumed the responsibility of this country's business, to consider the situation and do whatever is required to protect our family industry and also to see to it that this farm industry develops at the same pace as other industries in this country.

The Liberal party had, in this matter, advocated a program which would have the advantage of preserving the family character of farming, while providing for its expansion as an industry. Thus, during the last election campaign, we had undertaken to administer a new and bold program with a view to bettering the lot of our farm population in co-operation with the provinces.

Mr. Tremblay: It is a bit late now.

Mr. Roberge: With this aim in mind, we said that farmers, and particularly young farmers, should obtain the credit they need, i.e. long term credit to help finance the purchase of a farm and to make permanent improvements, as well as medium term credit for the purchase of farm animals and farm machinery.

Such, Mr. Chairman, was part of the program set up by the Liberal party with regard to farming. I sincerely believe that this program—I mean the setting up of this farm development bank—would have, as I said, the advantage of protecting the family character of our agriculture and, at the same time, provide for its development as a farming industry.

There is, Mr. Chairman, a particular subject I would like to deal with this morning. It was already mentioned last night by my friend, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine), and some hon. members have heard about it during previous sessions: I mean the problem of maple products. You know, Mr. Chairman, and I do not doubt that the Minister of Agriculture is also aware of the fact, that the maple product industry is of great importance to farmers in the province of Quebec. I should add that is also a significant part of farming development for the rural population in my riding of Megantic.

The hon. member for Beauce said last night that his riding was the main producer of maple products in the province of Quebec and, therefore, in the whole country. I might add that, according to statistics supplied by the agricultural division of the bureau of statistics of the department of industry and trade of the province of Quebec, the riding of Megantic is the second largest producer of maple products.

In 1951, Megantic had 2,497 occupied farms, including 1,332 reported to turn out maple products. In 1951, the number of suspended buckets was 1,823,602 i.e. an average of 1,369 buckets on each farm. The total production of maple syrup was 194,082 gallons in 1951, while the production sold or to be sold reached 170,598 gallons.

As to the total value sold or to be sold in 1951, it amounted, in my riding only, to $544,747 and the total value of maple product also for my riding only, reached $728,484. I am speaking of the riding of Megantic in its provincial boundaries, because the hon. Minister of Agriculture certainly knows that my riding of Megantic also includes part of the riding of Wolfe and part of the riding of Frontenac on a provincial basis. In the constituency of Frontenac, the value of maple products in 1951 was $495,778 whereas, for the constituency of Wolfe, it was $130,508.

It is impossible to obtain accurate data for those parts of the constituency of Megantic, since those statistics are strictly provincial.

Last year the attention of the government was directed to the maple products situation in the province of Quebec as in Canada as a whole, that is including parts of Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. This was done by members for the province of Quebec, notably by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Landry) and by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme). I believe and suggest that the hon. members representing those constituencies should consider those problems and make constructive suggestions, instead of spending their time commending government action, without knowing whether that action can be of any help to our people.

The Liberal government had recognized the importance of maple products, the oldest industry in the province of Quebec, and indeed in the whole country. Besides, that was the opinion expressed by the hon. senator Cyrille Vaillancourt in 1955. The Liberal government of the time had introduced subsidies to allow the exchange of sap buckets, because those buckets were then considered unsanitary, and their continued use might have harmed our export markets.

Here is, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member for Portneuf, Dr. Pierre Gauthier, had to say on May 2, 1955, as found on page 3343 of the official report of the House of Commons Debates of that day:

> A provision of the Food and Drugs Act of Canada bans the presence of lead in any kind of food. Therefore, regulations have been adopted to do away with soldered tins as containers of all kinds of canned food; pressed tin containers are now being used. For the same reason, tea, chocolate and cigarettes are wrapped in waxed or aluminum foil; no more lead paper is used to wrap them.

That legislation had been enacted by the Liberal administration of the time. And, while the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm may not know it, that provision was always opposed by Conservative members at the time. May I just remind you that Mr. Frank E. Lennard, a Progressive Conservative member, fought the measure so strongly on June 14, 1950, that a rather acrimonious debate ensued, because at that time he objected to those grants being made particularly to the province of Quebec, where there are more maple products growers than anywhere else in Canada.

It is a well known fact, Mr. Chairman, that the maple product industry, in the province of Quebec, is now in a slump.

The production of maple sugar has greatly decreased from 1937 to 1957. In fact, it has dropped from 4,020,000 pounds in 1937 to 536,000 pounds in 1957.

It will probably be said that this is a consequence of the indifference of the government of the time, but I want to emphasize that those matters relating to agriculture, especially in the province of Quebec, come under provincial jurisdiction, and that all the assistance the government of the time could give maple products growers was given them, as I have just said, when any farmer who wished to do so could replace his sap buckets.

Last night, I heard one hon. member say that the present government should keep up that policy of exchange of sap buckets. However, hon. members from the same party opposed this policy, and it was probably due to their action that the program was abandoned in 1955. There were, at the time, a considerable number of farmers who had benefited from this legislation and made the necessary changes.

With regard to maple syrup, the situation is just the opposite, and understandably so. The consumer who wants maple products prefers to buy syrup rather than sugar. As a matter of fact, in 1937, maple syrup production was only 780,000 gallons; in 1957, it reached a volume of 2,705,000 gallons. The gross value of that production for the year 1956—for we have as yet no statistics for 1957, amounted to $8,566,000 for all maple products, both syrup and sugar.

Mr. Chairman, this situation creates a problem which the government has to face, and I think it should more particularly study the issue raised with regard to maple products in the province of Quebec, in the eastern part of Ontario, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

The yield of maple products represents, for those who deal in them, an annual revenue varying from $1,000 to $2,000 and I can assure you that this revenue is welcome when the producer is able to get it. However, the situation offers a particular angle; quite a few farmers do not want to tap—and I know some in my riding who, last spring, right in the middle of the election campaign, refused to tap their maple trees because they did not know what conditions would obtain on the market and they also were in the dark about production costs and sales prices. This is probably no fault of the farmer himself, nor of the government. I do claim, however, that the government must study the matter and bring at least temporary solutions to these difficulties in order to assist those farmers, both in the province of Quebec and in the other three provinces who are engaged in the maple products industry.

My colleague from Beauce offered a few suggestions yesterday evening which are in all respects similar to those I had intended putting forward myself.

In fact, I have realized that the best way to facilitate the marketing of maple products was to carry on a proper sales promotion campaign on a national scale, not one limited solely to the province of Quebec. The campaign might also extend beyond our own borders.

It is an admitted fact that there is nothing more delicious than desserts prepared with maple syrup or maple sugar. That is why I think that every Canadian citizen should be able to buy those maple products at their local grocery or supermarket. No better way can they find of satisfying their palate. In doing so the consumer would help to a considerable extent those farmers who, each spring, are engaged in this particular phase of agricultural operations.

Mr. Chairman, the central government should take particular interest in a sales promotion campaign of this type. This matter could be considered at meetings between provincial and federal agricultural ministers. In this way an integrated sales promotion effort could be launched in all provinces to the advantage of farmers engaged in the production of maple syrup or maple sugar.

There is another way of helping the maple producer and that is through price support.

This might not perhaps be fully efficient, in view of the ups and downs of the market, but it would be a good thing, in my opinion, and not later than this year, to establish a support price for maple products. This would allow farmers engaged in maple product industry to make both ends meet and earn enough to meet their production costs. If the support price I am suggesting were inefficient—as I fear it would—it could be replaced by an adjustment grant or a deficiency payment.

In my opinion, it would be proper to extend throughout the whole country the price adjustment legislation enjoyed by prairie farmers.

As I see it, it is not just the western farmers who should derive benefit, as at present, from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; all our farmers should enjoy these adjustment grants. This would not only mean that the maple producer would be just as sure of obtaining deficiency payments for his maple, but also that during unproductive years he would have the incentive to work on his maple trees—and also to hire helpers (for it is only fair to bear in mind that often, in such years, he works around the clock). In this way he could increase his annual income, and could more easily make ends meet.

It is my conviction, Mr. Chairman, that these suggestions are sound, and that the present government has the duty not only of giving them serious consideration, but of working out an appropriate formula for giving assistance to the farmers and producers of maple products in Canada.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the dark outline of the fate of the farmer which the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) gave us last night, I considered it my duty to make some remarks and to bring to the attention of the house a report which appeared in Le Droit of June 23, 1958, under the heading:

Farmer fares better this year. He is recovering from last year's drop in income.

The average Canadian farmer probably found the going a bit rough in 1957 but, according to statistics of the first quarter of 1958, he is faring better now.

In 1957, farm income in Canada decreased by $403,300,000 to $1,053,900,000, the lowest figure in three years, as compared with $1,457,200,000 in 1956, the dominion bureau of statistics reported today.

For the first quarter of 1958, figures are more encouraging and it is estimated that, for that period, farm income will reach $604 million, an increase of $29 million over the corresponding period of 1957.

Those are the facts, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member took great pains in an endeavour to show that agricultural prices stabilization was a failure. I wonder why, last year, the Liberal party supported the Conservative party by voting in favour of that legislation.

I would like to give some advice to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. Instead of spending his time talking against the beautiful province of Quebec, he should prepare his speeches more carefully, look for the facts and show them in their true perspective.

Those are, Mr. Chairman, the few remarks I wished to make following the gloomy speech of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I should comment briefly upon some of the statements which have been made in this debate and I could perhaps summarize my remarks in this way; that most of the criticisms made by the official opposition are criticisms of their own government, which was in power for 22 years and had done nothing about any of the things they now suggest should be done.

On the other hand, the major suggestions they have made I would say have been taken almost directly from the speeches which I and other members of this party have made during the last year in regard to what we were prepared to do and what we were making plans to do in connection with an improved farm credit system, a system of crop insurance and a soil and water conservation scheme. As I say, the major suggestions made from the other side of the house were along those three lines, and in many cases might well have been taken from the speeches I have made during the past year. In fact I think perhaps they were taken directly from those speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: That is a general summary of the criticisms we have heard during this debate, but I would just like to mention a few specific points.

The hon. member for Russell made, I think, quite a good speech, and he mentioned the way in which he himself had engaged in or had encouraged the production of flax.

I know he did a very useful piece of work from that point of view. But as to the hon. member for Timiskaming, I do not really think I should say very much about his comments. His knowledge of agriculture is indicated by this statement to be found at page 2173 of Hansard:

Mixed farming takes more from the soil than does the type of farming that is done in the west.

No statement could be more inaccurate than that, and it very well typifies and is an example of all the statements he made in his speech with regard to agriculture.

The hon. member for Gloucester went into the potato situation in Prince Edward Island in some detail. What he did really was to read into the record press statements from the Charlottetown Guardian of July 19, which I have here, and statements by Mr. Cullen, minister of agriculture for Prince Edward Island in which he was naturally trying to defend what he or the government of Prince Edward Island had or had not done in connection with the potato situation there.

I have here a compilation which is really a chronological case history of the potato situation in Prince Edward Island. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Gloucester put on the record this long statement by the minister of agriculture for Prince Edward Island, which is not correct, I think I had better correct it and the general false impression which may have been created by the statements made by the hon. member for Gloucester.

The first time this matter of potato support for Prince Edward Island came up was on May 20 of 1958—that is May 20 of this year—not on June 3, as was stated by Mr. Cullen. A letter was given to Mr. Pearsall, the chairman of the agricultural stabilization board, dated May 16—it arrived on May 20—requesting consideration of a guaranteed price for potato stocks remaining on hand as at July 1 or July 10 or July 15 at a price of $1.25 per hundredweight bulk for graded stock at loading point, or at the farm, if disposal for livestock feed from the farm was more convenient. A general discussion followed that proposal with representatives from Prince Edward Island, and no specific request was made by them for immediate action.

Then on June 3 and 4 Messrs. Cullen, MacLennan and Burge, with one other representative, met the stabilization board. At that time the board proposed, following a study of the previous letter, a feed diversion program; that is, to divert these surplus potatoes into livestock feed. This proposal was rejected by the representatives as unworkable and on June 4 an offer of financial assistance, equivalent to what was being paid to New Brunswick on their starch diversion potatoes, was made although the specific amount was not stated.

On June 12 Mr. Pearsall called the island representatives on the long distance telephone, since they had claimed they were waiting for a further offer from the stabilization board. In this telephone call the board offered specifically 45 cents per bag with the specific understanding that it was up to the Prince Edward Island potato growers either to accept or to reject this offer. On June 25 a wire was received—I may say this was 13 days later again—from Messrs. MacLennan and Burge accepting the offer on behalf of the potato marketing board but requesting that the total appropriation available be increased.

On June 26 there was a wire from Mr. Wright, the deputy minister of agriculture for Prince Edward Island, to Mr. Pearsall requesting details of the price support program. This wire was acknowledged the next day, on June 27, enclosing application forms.

On July 3 there was a wire from the minister of agriculture, Mr. Cullen, to myself raising the question of the quality of the potatoes and requesting relaxation of grade standards. Right up to this time they had not done anything about any of these things. This had been going on since May 26. Now they are making the claim that there was no delay on their part. If there was not delay there, where was it? It certainly was not here.

We received this wire on July 3 which raised the question of the quality of potatoes and requesting relaxation of grade standards. That wire was replied to in the negative at that time, on July 4. Then on July 11—in the meantime I may say there were a great many more representations—Mr. Eardley of the department's fruit and vegetable division, was sent down to Prince Edward Island to make an investigation on the spot and report back. He reported back to the board that indications were that about 300 cars of potatoes had not been marketed and that, based on a sample check, less than 10 per cent of these potatoes would qualify for Canada No. 1 grade.

After further discussion, on July 18 we advised these people that we would accept 75 per cent of the potatoes they still had on hand as having been eligible as first grade after inspection as to size and so forth, on the date on which this procedure should have been put into effect, say at the end of June. This was actually an extremely generous way of dealing with this relatively small amount of surplus potatoes in Prince Edward Island.

I might just point out the potato marketings for the last four years:

Crop Year	Marketings (000) cwt.
1954-55	3,923
1955-56	5,123
1956-57	4,735
1957-58	6,387

The year 1957-58 is the year about which we are talking and about which the hon. member was complaining. That figure of

6,387,000 was far more than had been marketed in any of the previous three years and the total value of the marketings of those potatoes was the highest in any of those years. The figures for value of marketings are as follows:

Crop Year	Total Value of Marketings $(000)
1954-55	8,233
1955-56	6,804
1956-57	6,991

In other words the total of marketings in 1957-58 was the highest that it has been for years, and the total amount of money received was the greatest that it has been. The request made to us really was to take the tail end of the potato crop and pay something for it. As I say, we made an offer. That offer was played around with, it was not accepted and so on and so forth. Then finally a great deal of complaint was made that we were not supporting the price of potatoes in Prince Edward Island. As I say, the actual situation is that more money was received for potatoes this year and more potatoes were marketed this year than in any year during the last four. There is certainly no cause for complaint.

I noticed that not only the hon. member for Gloucester—this evidently had been prepared in the Liberal head office by someone —put forward a great many figures as to the money which had been paid out for potatoes and that two hon. members in the other place who come from Prince Edward Island have written letters to the papers. In them is to be found exactly the same line of stuff as the hon. member for Gloucester put out here with regard to the amount of money which has been paid out for potatoes in various years past by the Liberal government. This is Liberal propaganda which comes from the office of the Leader of the Opposition, undoubtedly, and is intended to try to create the impression that the Liberals treated the potato growers of Prince Edward Island extremely well and so forth.

Actually as to the amount of money which was paid out for support may I say this, and I think I had better make this clear.

These amounts outlined by the hon. member for Gloucester and in the letters of hon. members of another place were not the amounts which were paid out for Prince Edward Island potatoes. Very little was paid out for Prince Edward Island potatoes in most of these years, and in many years nothing was paid. That was the amount paid out to support potato growers across the country as a whole, and I may indicate that under the agricultural prices support act, as it was, and the stabilization act as it is now, in only one year, 1948-49, was more money paid out for potatoes than in the year we completed a year ago this spring—no, less than a year ago—that is, for the crop of 1956-57. What the figures will be for the year 1957-58 we do not know yet, because a great many of the claims have not yet come in. So much for the potato situation in Prince Edward Island.

The hon. member for Beauce brought up the matter of maple sap buckets. I should like to point out to him that the party to which he belonged when they were in power were the people who did away with this subsidy. Why come complaining to us because the subsidy has been removed? It was done away with by his own party.

The hon. member for Kootenay West dealt particularly with farm credit, and paid a very well deserved tribute to the work the Veterans' Land Act people have done in connection with this. I fully agree with the remarks he made in connection with how well the credit facilities extended under the Veterans' Land Act have been supervised, how high a degree of repayment there has been, and how satisfactory that scheme has been, and as I have said on many occasions previously I hope and expect that we will be able to incorporate something along these lines in the improved farm credit scheme and legislation which we expect to bring forward.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont needs to look up his history. He made the statement that our great research facilities had been instituted by the Liberal government. If he will look into the matter he will find that these research facilities were started long before the past Liberal government came into existence. In fact they were started shortly after confederation in the way of some experimental farms and things of that kind, so he does not need to think the former government can take credit for the research facilities we have in agriculture, because these have been built up under many administrations over a long period.

And his criticisms, again, of the organization of the research facilities and the experimental farm service is a criticism of his own previous government. I may say that we are taking steps at the present time to reorganize the Department of Agriculture, and I will have a statement to make in that connection before this debate is over.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska complained about the support price of skimmed milk powder having been reduced from 17 cents to 15 cents, as though this were a terrible thing. I wonder if he has heard about the fact that before the price of milk powder was reduced from 17 cents to 15 cents, the price of butter was increased from 58 cents to 64 cents, an increase of 6 cents a pound.

The less he or any other Liberal member says about the price of skimmed milk powder the better off they will be, because they, and the previous Liberal government, created an absolutely impossible situation as far as skimmed milk powder was concerned. They put in a support price of 17 cents, which was about 5 or 6 cents higher than the world market price, and took no steps whatever to prevent skimmed milk powder coming in from any country in the world where there was a surplus.

The inevitable result was that when I became Minister of Agriculture I found a terrible accumulation of dried skimmed milk powder which had been coming in from the United States, New Zealand, Holland, and even Great Britain, which is a deficiency area with regard to dairy products. It was an example of terribly bad administration and policy on the part of the previous Liberal government. We, of course, had to put in import control in order to stop that flood of powder coming into this country and completely disrupting our market.

Those, I think, are the only points about which I need say anything now.

Mr. Regier: I can assure the minister I am not going to hold him up for very long. However, I do wish to raise one point, and I hope I will get a better answer than the answer he gave just now to the hon. member for Timiskaming. I think the minister would be well advised to look at the record with regard to the hon. member for Timiskaming. He may well be listed as a labour organizer, but he lives on a farm and was born and raised on a farm. Half the people of Timiskaming are farmers, and the hon. member for Timiskaming received tremendous support from them, over half the agricultural vote. I do not think they will be very happy with the brush-off the minister gave the arguments presented by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

I note that on July 9 the minister reviewed the condition of agriculture and stated that there had been in 1957, as opposed to 1956, a decrease in agricultural production of 22 per cent which he himself labelled a very sharp decline. He admitted that part of this was because of the poor prairie grain crop.

Mr. Harkness: Most of it.

Mr. Regier: Yes, I realize that; most of it. The statistics issued by the dominion bureau of statistics on June 20 underlined that the great decline was because of the poor grain crop on the prairies. I noticed also that both the net and gross income of Canadian agriculture in all the various provinces in 1957, as compared with 1956, 1955, 1954 and 1953, are shown in one of the tables of statistics. The gross and net incomes of farmers in Quebec declined only by a small percentage; in the province of Ontario there was a rise in net income as well as in gross income, but on the prairies, as was to be expected, there was a very serious decline. In British Columbia there was a small increase; I believe the net and gross incomes of farmers rose by some 4 per cent.

I know the minister was Minister of Agriculture for only half of 1956, so what I intend to ask him will, I hope, not be considered on a political basis. Would the minister care to offer an explanation to the committee of why there was a decline in Prince Edward Island in the gross income of farm operators of $4.1 million, which represents, roughly, a decline of one eighth? In the province of Nova Scotia it declined by $3.9 million and it declined in the province of New Brunswick by $7.3 million.

We very much regret the lack of industrial development in the maritime provinces. We have always looked upon agriculture as a part of the backbone of the economy of the Atlantic provinces, but those provinces did not have the great crop failures that were sustained in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The agricultural pursuits in the Atlantic region are more like those in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia.

I wonder if the minister would care to comment on why there was such a serious decline in the gross income of farm operators in the Atlantic provinces as well as in the net income of that section of Canadian agriculture, and he might indicate what over-all measures either in the field of research or in the field of aggressive action he is intending to implement as a result of the situation in the maritimes.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the reduction in income in the maritimes was due largely to a decrease in production. They had a very dry year in the maritimes, and particularly in Nova Scotia. The hon. member may not be aware of the fact that we put into effect a relief program under which we shipped hay to Nova Scotia. They had not produced enough hay even to look after their own needs for the winter. Hay had to be shipped in, on which we gave assistance. Therefore the general reduction in income in the maritimes was largely due to a bad year and reduced production. The total value of the potato crop, which is one of the big cash crops, of course, last year, as I indicated, was something in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000 or $2 million less in Prince Edward Island than it has been so far this year.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister care to say that agricultural conditions are reviving in the maritimes as a region in the year 1958?

Mr. Harkness: Certainly conditions are better. For one reason, they had a considerably better potato crop this year than last year. Potatoes are one of the big cash crops and the producers received more money for their product. I also think income from dairy products and beef cattle will be better this year. The general answer to that question would be that all the indications are that this is going to be a considerably better year for agriculture in the maritimes than last year was.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted in the course of my remarks on the agricultural program which I was suggesting to the government, I was about to explain a policy which should be adopted by the government and whose results would be far-reaching.

First of all, there is the inquiry into soil utilization and conservation, launched in 1955 under the Liberal government.

As compared with seven meetings held during 1957, there have only been three or four since the Conservative party came to power. I feel the present government should instil some vigour into this work so as to introduce a program which would go hand in hand with the soil study that will have been accomplished, especially in eastern Canada. Everyone versed in agriculture says it is necessary to classify our soil so as to put it to the best use in the various areas and to formulate the most fitting conservation recommendations.

Agricultural experts have noted that 46 per cent of the soil at Lake St. John has been seriously affected by erosion (350,000 acres out of the total of 860,000 acres of reclaimed soil). I deplore that the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) is not present in the house to benefit from this information in the interests of the farmers of this area.

The same phenomena can be observed in the Joliette area. Producers of flue-cured tobacco there are only too well aware of the destructiveness of wind in these sandy regions.

Indeed, the same phenomena arise everywhere in Canada—perhaps on a bigger scale in flat country.

[Mr. Harkness.]

One can get a good idea of the damage done by erosion in looking at our rivers after a heavy rain. The water becomes dirty and muddy and carries away the best elements of the soil. Such damage caused by the constant erosion of our lands may bring upon us the calamity of which a poet has said: "Old empires have been destroyed as much by the loss of their soil as by the sword of their enemies."

Mr. Auguste Scott, a distinguished professor at the Agricultural College of Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatiere, had this to say about the steps to be taken to control soil erosion:

> We should first of all undertake a thorough study of our soil and its fertility. At the same time, an education campaign should be organized among the farmers, additional meteorological stations should be created and research centres established.

More specifically, Professor Scott advocates the improvement of the fertility of poor soils or of soils which have lost their fertility through erosion. Among the most efficient means of warding off that danger, he suggests crop rotation and the use of lime and of chemical and organic fertilizers. He alsc recommended the establishment of a soil conservation board. I would like the Minister of Agriculture to take note of my observations concerning this soil conservation board.

The work of such an organization should be carried out as soon as possible so that its recommendations may be implemented without delay.

The second step would consist in improving the Farm Loan Act to increase the assessment value of the property given in guarantee, in raising the maximum amount and in establishing a supervision service made up of competent agricultural experts who would direct and advise the borrowers.

As I have had the opportunity of making a few brief comments on that matter, I will not add anything more for the time being.

A third step, which would certainly bring results although over a longer period, would be the expansion of our farm research services.

I am happy to pay tribute to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) who dealt thoroughly with that question and with whom I agree wholeheartedly.

The United States announced a few months ago that they were increasing their agricultural research budget by $50 million. At that time, many Americans criticized that measure, stating that the amount was inadequate and was lagging 20 years behind.

We could easily say the same thing about Canada. We are lagging behind 20 years, since most of the discoveries that we are applying to our agricultural and processing methods come from the United States.

This research should not have as its sole aim to increase the yield by acre or by livestock unit; it should also seek means of applying our products to other industrial uses.

All who are interested in agriculture recognize that, if we adopted all the new methods to increase the yield per acre, the development of new varieties of cereals, new fertilizers and chemical products to fight those plagues brought about by insects and plant diseases, our farmers would double the yield of their farm. Is not such a possibility of increasing the yields of our farms a sufficient reason to vote more money for research work?

The director of the federal research laboratory in the prairie provinces, in Saskatoon, Mr. Ledingham, made an interesting statement last November. I quote:

(Text):

He suggested, among other things, that land capable of producing high quality bread wheat was now being used for oil seed crop production while land in northern sections of the prairies, where oil seed crops could be grown effectively, is being used to produce low quality wheat. He mentioned recent developments in the laboratory in finding industrial uses for agricultural products, one of them the production of a fibreboard from wheat straw.

In Canada the cost of agricultural research, when measured against its contribution to the national welfare, has never been high. But there is a need for intensification of such research. There seems to be a valid argument for spending increased funds on research that may provide permanent solutions to the problem of agricultural surpluses rather than invest ever-increasing amounts on support of plans that in the United States particularly have only worsened this particular farm problem.

(Translation):

The Minister of Agriculture said on July the 11th that he would deal extensively with the research work of his department. On reading his speech, we find that he gave this topic a fifth of his review of the agricultural situation in this country. We were led to believe that the importance he was giving to that matter in his speech indicated that the government would spend tremendous amounts this year on research work.

However, on examining the estimates of 1958-59, I found out that no increase had been provided for research work on the experimental farms of this country, except perhaps for an increase of half a million dollars for the central experimental farm in Ottawa. In this instance, as in many others, is not the minister just attempting to make us believe that the government achieves great things, whereas it is satisfied to implement the programs and methods of the former Liberal administration?

Some hon. members who spoke before me maintained that the Liberal government had achieved nothing during the 22 years it had been in power. I would like to list briefly several projects carried out by the Liberal government: the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which cost the sum of $185 million from 1935 to 1956; the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, $110 million; the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, $10 million; the Farm Price Support Act, $89 million; the Farm Loan Act under which approximately 600,000 loans were awarded, totalling $653 million; the Farm Improvement Loans Act under which 653,000 loans were granted, totalling $723 million; the Western Grain Transportation Assistance Act under which $257 million were paid out by the former government to February 1957.

I could mention other figures—for instance I could tell you that the sale of farm products went up from $950 million to $2,400 million from 1936 to 1955; that the value of farm equipment and machinery rose from $19 million to more than $153 million; that the value of land and buildings rose from $3 billion to $5,500 million; that the value of farm animals which amounted to $579 million rose to $2,010 million. I also could add that the net farm income advanced from $536 million in 1935 to $2,655 million in 1956.

I could recall other things which the Liberal government accomplished in the 22 years it was in power.

To quote but one other figure, the value of exports of agricultural products jumped from $400 million in 1936 to $1 billion in 1956.

Had Liberals remained in power, we would today have a new improved farm credit plan, which would allow farmers to borrow a larger sum of money for a longer period and at a lower interest rate than is the case today. We would also have crop insurance. We would have better research services. Experimental farms would be expanding. I could not list all the things the Liberal party would have done in two years.

Mr. Pigeon: You had a chance to do them in those 22 years.

Mr. Boulanger: I know that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm does not understand anything about agriculture, especially when I judge by the speech he made yesterday.

Iraq—Recognition of New Government

Although the Liberal government accomplished a great deal, much remains to be done. We ask the Minister of Agriculture to fulfil at least one tenth of the promises he made in the last election campaign and I would ask hon. members from the province of Quebec, who were elected on the strength of those promises, to stand up in the house and to insist that those promises be carried out. Boastful speeches about the policy of the government will not make us achieve anything worthwhile. Conservative members from Quebec are as sound asleep as are members of the Union Nationale in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: How can we help going to sleep, listening to you?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item No. 1 carry?

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item No. 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Do I understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs wishes to make a statement?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: May I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—ANNOUNCEMENT OF RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

Mr. Speaker: Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs leave to revert to motions to make a statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to revert to motions to make an important statement with respect to recognition of the government of Iraq. Formal notification of this act of recognition of the new government which was established in Iraq on July 14, 1958, will be conveyed to the new government. In response to communications which have been received from their official representatives in several capitals of the world the Canadian government has taken the step of recognizing the Iraqi government.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the house, what there is of it, will have heard with considerable interest this important announcement. As far as we are concerned it is satisfactory because we think it is the right course to have taken. My own surprise at the announcement has been modified by the fact that the C.B.C. news at one o'clock today informed me that the Canadian government had recognized the government of Iraq.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs must have thought this a most important announcement to have taken the procedure he has in the house. May I say on behalf of this group that we believe he has taken the right action. We hope the action taken by other governments and now by Canada will help to lead to a possible settlement of the Middle East situation, and that Canada will go even further in making recommendations with respect to that situation.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Science service—

Science service administration—

4. Operation and maintenance, including an amount of $136,475 for grants in aid of agricultural research in universities and other scientific organizations in Canada, and an amount of $45,000 to assist in defraying the costs of the ninth international botanical congress to be held in Canada in 1959, $1,313,662.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question.

Would the minister tell the house the amount spent for agricultural research and the results of that research? Furthermore, how are the results of that research made available to individual farmers?

Mr. Harkness: As to the amount spent on research, it is listed here in the estimates book to which the hon. member may refer if he has that book before him. The science service involved an amount of $11,426,000 for this year, and the breakdown is shown; the central experimental farm service is $15,678,000, and the total amount spent on these two services is essentially for research purposes.

Item agreed to.

11. Experimental farms service administration, $276,462.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on item No. 11, the experimental farms services including the central experimental farm, I wonder if the minister could tell the house whether in regard to the central experimental farm it is the policy of his government to maintain that farm in its present location in the city of Ottawa for further scientific research, and whether there is anything to the rumour one hears from time to time that because of extensive city development and increasing property values some other use in the future may be made of part of the property now occupied by this farm?

I would express the hope that the central experimental farm may be kept in its present form and its present location. I think it is doing tremendous work and is, amongst other things, a most valuable tourist attraction in the capital city. I think it would be in keeping with the view of the Canadian people as well as the people of Ottawa that the central experimental farm be maintained in its present location.

Mr. Harkness: I am very glad to tell the hon. member for Assiniboia that the central experimental farm is going to be not only retained but expanded. The plans we have, of which there has been some indication in the press, are that the present experimental farm will be used entirely for plant breeding and plant research activities. The animal husbandry branch of the experimental farm service will be established at a new experimental farm which will of course still be part of the central experimental farm, a few miles south and west of the present farm property in what will be the green belt surrounding Ottawa.

We expect to secure from the federal district commission something in the neighbourhood of 4,000 acres of land in the green belt, and the animal husbandry activities of the experimental farm will be established there. The amount of land will provide us with sufficient grazing and sufficient area on which to raise forage for the animals, so that we can very considerably extend the animal husbandry research activities. The present farm is much too small to enable us to carry on nearly as much research in the animal husbandry field as we feel necessary and as is desired to be carried out.

Mr. Argue: I very much appreciate the minister's statement, but does he mean that the present acreage of the experimental farm will be retained and that the 4,000 acres to which he refers is entirely in addition to the lands now held?

Mr. Harkness: Yes; that is correct, Mr. Chairman. The present acreage will be retained and, as I say, will be used entirely for plant breeding and associated activities, such as horticultural activities and so on of the science service and the experimental farm service.

Mr. Forgie: I would like to ask the minister if he would give consideration to having funds allotted for research on soybeans, because as a result of discussion of this subject with the officials of the central experimental farm and also the provincial government and scientists, it is apparently felt that there are great possibilities of a bean being developed which will mature in sufficient time to perhaps provide the answer to the situation so far as the rotation of crops is concerned in western Canada.

The minister probably knows that at Morden there are about 4,000 acres now being cultivated, and that there are also some plantations outside of Saskatoon and Prince Albert. I would like the minister to give consideration to the allocation of funds for research in this connection, as the scientists and provincial governments in both Ontario and Manitoba are convinced that this research would have a very satisfactory effect, especially for western Canada.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we are presently and have been for some time carrying on very extensive research programs with respect to soybeans. This has been going on at the central experimental farm and at Harrow in Ontario, and also in Winnipeg. As a result it has been possible to produce a certain type of soybean which matures earlier than in the case of older varieties. Some of these are being used at the present time in Manitoba, and it is hoped that an earlier maturing variety which will be better adapted to the particular climatic conditions which exist in the west may be developed.

Mr. Forgie: I might say to the minister that it is not easy, because even 14 years ago I was in conversation with Dr. McRostie and at that time the Mandarin and Ogama brands of soybeans were being crossed. It had just then started, and it has taken all this time to develop a bean at Morden which has a yield of only about 12 bushels to the acre. The oil content is lower than in the beans grown in the province of Ontario. For instance, at Pelee island I understand they are growing 69¼ bushels to the acre at a price of $2.38 a bushel, which is quite a different proposition.

Mr. Harkness: I think what the hon. member for Renfrew North has said points up the fact that experimental projects in agriculture are very long-term projects, and in many cases the work has to be carried on year after year without any visible results. People then say, "Oh, they are wasting our money, and they should not be doing that; they should be doing something else." As I say, what the hon. member has pointed out illustrates the fact that it does take many many years of research work to get any great results, and sometimes even after many such years of research you still do not get any great results. Nevertheless, it is only by these long-term series of experiments that you do produce better varieties and superior animals in the long run. As I stated when the estimates first came up for discussion, it is only by carrying on this research work that we do produce improved varieties of plants and animals which will eventually mean a great deal more money in the pockets of individual farmers.

Item agreed to.

13. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $573,680.

Mr. Boulanger: I see there is an increase of $289,000 over last year, which means it is double the amount shown for last year.

Mr. Harkness: Would the hon. member explain what he meant by double? I did not quite understand what he meant.

Mr. Boulanger: Last year the figure was $284,000 and this year it is $573,000, so there is an increase of $289,000.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This increase in expenditure is for the new buildings for the animal husbandry work which will be built on the extension to the central experimental farm of which I spoke a few moments ago. There will, of course, be a considerable building program on this new farm, which will be spread over a considerable period of time.

Item agreed to.

Items 14 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

Health of animals—

17. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $6,676,108.

Mr. Robinson: I doubt if I have any questions to ask the minister, but I would like to make one or two observations on this matter. The act, as we know, is there to protect us as well as the farmers, and with respect to cattle—and here I am referring to tuberculosis—there is some background information I would like to give the house in order to make myself clear. I have in mind a recent incident in Bruce riding.

A large dairy herd in a restricted area had been accredited for quite a number of years and had a clear bill at each inspection. Recently it was found, however, that there were 12 reactors in the herd, which was quite a surprise to the owner and no doubt also to the veterinary surgeon who discovered this condition. I understand there was some discussion with the veterinary people who did the testing and also the inspector for the district but nothing could be done, apparently, or was not done. These 12 valuable cows went to Toronto and had to be killed, although there was no visible sign of tuberculosis in any of the 12 animals.

In Toronto they went through the ordinary channels in the packing houses and the owner of the herd is still not convinced that a mistake was not made. He does not know, of course, but he is not convinced that the veterinary surgeon was correct, and in speaking to the officials of the health of animals branch I was informed that there are certain cases where an animal is infected, yet it does not show after it has been killed, but that if a more thorough examination of the carcass was made the probabilities are that such a disease would show up. In fact I am assured it would though it would take a lot of research work on the carcass to be sure

The suggestion I would like to throw out to the minister is that in the first instance these 12 animals should have been quarantined and re-tested later on and that in the second place if they had to go to Toronto as a group of 12 and did not show any sign of infection, I think there should be a regulation that the inspectors should have tried to go further and confirm that the animals had really been infected. In these circumstances this owner has suffered a considerable loss, and everything should be done to find out whether or not a mistake has occurred. I am not saying the veterinary surgeon made a mistake at all, but it does look as though there was some doubt. If such was found out, namely that such cattle were taken out and slaughtered, I think in all fairness the owner of the cattle should be recompensed for his loss, at least in part.

Mr. Harkness: I have had a few complaints along this line with regard to cattle which were tuberculin tested and showed as reactors and then, when they went in for slaughter, there was found on post-mortem examination no definite sign of tuberculosis, but I understand from the experts in this line that this happens fairly frequently. If the tuberculosis is in the early stages the test which is made is very reliable in indicating that tuberculosis is present in the animal, but post-mortem examination quite frequently will not show that any definite deterioration has taken place. The test picks out the t.b. infected cattle before what are known as gross lesions develop which would be detected on post-mortem.

The fact that no gross lesions were found in these particular cattle does not mean that they did not have tuberculosis. One of the great values of the test is that it picks out animals before the disease has developed sufficiently so that the risk of infection to other cattle is very greatly increased. I think also we must be fairly stringent if we are to have a tuberculosis testing program such as we have, and which has resulted in tuberculosis in cattle having been reduced from something like about 4 per cent in 1923 to less than one-tenth of one per cent at present of cattle tested that are reactors. In order to be able to export our cattle, particularly dairy cattle, freely to the United States and other countries we must have a tuberculosis testing program of this kind in effect. It is hard on a particular farmer who has a large part of his herd go down. Nevertheless, in the interests of farmers generally in this country and in the interests of the general economy I think we must be fairly stringent as far as these tuberculosis testing programs are concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 17 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I understand this would be the appropriate vote under which to ask any further questions one wished to ask about the matter that was dealt with on item No. 1. If that is not correct I would ask the minister to tell me under which item they should be asked.

Mr. Harkness: What item are we on now, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Vote 17.

Mr. Harkness: The place at which the question should have been asked was on item No. 16, the one with which we just finished. This item deals with the contagious diseases act. However, as far as I am concerned I am quite willing to have questions of this kind asked here instead of on item No. 16, seeing that the hon. member missed item No. 16.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to revert to questions on vote No. 16?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have several questions I should like to put to the minister. As reported at page 2899 of Hansard the minister yesterday said this:

> The first time any information in regard to this man or his political activities or other activities came to my attention or that of my officials in Ottawa was May 1, 1958. That was the first intimation of any kind we had in this connection and it was as a result of the complaints we received at that time that I ordered an investigation made.

Would the minister tell us what were the complaints that came to his attention at that time?

Mr. Harkness: The complaints I received were that this man had been engaging in political activities on behalf of the hon. member for Laurier, in fact in very extensive political activities on his behalf; also that the man had been engaged in certain smuggling activities. That was the information I received.

Mr. Pickersgill: Had the minister received both those items of information at the same time?

Mr. Harkness: I am not certain that they were received at the same time but they were received either at the same time or practically at the same time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think a good deal turns on this question, Mr. Chairman. We have been told that the minister received personal and confidential letters which he says were affidavits and which were marked secret.

Mr. Harkness: So there will be no misunderstanding may I say this. The first information I received on this matter was verbal. It was not in written form at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would like to tell us what this verbal information was and from whom he received it.

Mr. Harkness: I have already told you.

Mr. Pickersgill: From whom?

Mr. Harkness: No. I am not going to tell you from whom I received it.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, Mr. Chairman, what the minister is saying is this. He is saying that the House of Commons is not entitled to know from whom he received the information on which he deprived this man of his job and his livelihood. That is what the minister is telling us now.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): No, he is not.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, this man has an accuser, a secret informer, and the minister is not going to give us the name of this secret informer.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member, of course, with some of his colleagues has been attempting to make a major issue out of this matter and to twist it out of all recognition. The actual fact is that right at the moment I do not recall who gave me the information verbally. But if I did recall who gave it to me, Mr. Chairman, I still would not give the hon. member the name, because it would merely expose the people who gave the information perhaps to unfortunate attentions from some of the henchmen of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, Mr. Chairman, the situation is this; and I may say that I am seeking to be as fair as possible to the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I put this question. Considering the fact that a Canadian citizen has been deprived by the minister of his livelihood—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: How many times was it done by your government?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that some of the backbenchers would be well advised to listen quietly and to assist in the defence of the civil rights of Canadians about which their leader was so eloquent not so very long ago.

Mr. Ricard: You have been doing it all the time.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I say, I want to be completely fair to the minister. I understand, then, that the minister received hearsay evidence from someone he cannot remember, and on the basis of that hearsay he has taken away this man's livelihood. Is that what the minister wants us to understand?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has had a full account in connection with this matter. He knows that the statement he has just made is absolutely incorrect. About a month and a half elapsed from the time I first received any information in regard to this matter before the man was discharged. There was quite a full inquiry made in connection with the matter. I satisfied myself that there was no question as to the reprehensible activities in which this individual had been engaged.

What the hon. member is trying to make out is that this matter involves civil rights. He might just as well say that an employee of any business concern in this country who happened to be caught, say, with his hand in the till could not be discharged unless he had been taken into court or some other kind of tribunal. In effect that is what the hon. member is trying to maintain; and he is trying to maintain that there was some loss of civil rights or something along that line because this man was discharged, having been detected, as I say, in activities which I at least am not prepared to countenance in employees of this department whilst I am minister.

The hon. member is trying to say that nobody, not even a casual employee of the department, can be discharged unless his case is taken to a tribunal of some sort. I suppose the idea is to take him into court or something along that line. This sort of statement is completely ridiculous. You could not carry on any business in that way, and you could not carry on a government service in that way; you must have some discretion so far as discharging people is concerned if you find they are carrying on activities that cannot be countenanced, and that was the situation in this case.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have quite a number of other questions I should like to ask the minister. First of all, does he think that he was vested with the right to discharge employees without giving an account to this house, to which he is responsible, of all the circumstances in which he did so? Does he think that because he is sitting on the treasury benches he is elevated to such a height that he does not have to account for this conduct to the duly elected members of parliament; because that is what he is saying.

Mr. Harkness: When the deputy minister here was superintendent of the experimental farm at Swift Current he has just indicated to me that he fired all kinds of men without referring it to the minister or anyone else. In other words this sort of thing has to go on in any institution which hires casual labour.

So far as the question about not being accountable to the house is concerned, and not making a full disclosure, I have made a full disclosure to the house. We have spent, now, several hours on this particular matter, and I do not think that there are any further details I can give.

Mr. Pickersgill: The mere fact that the hon. gentleman does not think there are any further details that we are entitled to have does not destroy our right of freedom of speech in this house, I hope; though I would not be surprised, if the minister continues in the line he is now following, that this would be his next attempt.

Mr. Harkness: And you said you were trying to be fair. Nothing could be less fair than the statement you have just made.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have sat quietly here without interrupting the minister, and yet when I attempt to utter a single sentence he interrupts me.

Mr. Harkness: That is not true. Read Hansard and you will see that it is not.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has just done it again to demonstrate the truth of my statement. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what was the precise status of this man Mitchell. The minister talks about casual employees. Was he a casual employee?

Mr. Harkness: As I stated yesterday, this man was a casual employee. He had been employed on a seasonal basis for some 12 years before this incident took place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yesterday the minister said 16 years.

Mr. Harkness: There was a period of about five or six years before that when he had not been employed, and then four years in which he had, which makes up a total of 16. The hon. member talks about my interrupting, but he cannot allow me to finish my statements even if those statements are correct, as his statements are not in most cases, and as a result need some correction for the record.

As I say, the man was employed for four years, then for five years he was not employed. Perhaps his services to the Liberal party were not considered of such worth that he was kept on after these four years. Then he re-established himself and was put on again, and was there for some 12 years until this incident came up.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says this man was a casual employee. He also said he was employed seasonally. Was he not a seasonal employee? Did he have any superannuation benefits?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed by my officials that the proper classification is "casual seasonal employee", just as I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister answer the other question I asked? Did he have superannuation benefits?

An hon. Member: He took it out in whisky instead.

Mr. Harkness: We have no definite information on that. The situation is this. People in these circumstances, if they have requested that they should be able to pay into a superannuation fund, are ordinarily permitted to do so, but whether this man had done so, or what the situation was, I do not know.

Mr. Pickersgill: So in the minister's detailed investigation of this man's case he did not trouble to find out whether or not he had any superannuation benefits. That is not a question; it is just a comment on the minister's answer.

I wish now to put another question to the minister. Did the minister have drawn to his attention any other case where this man had received or had in his possession liquor and cigarettes on which the tax had not been paid, except the one to which the hon. member for Laurier referred last night? Were there any other cases?

Mr. Harkness: There were no others to my knowledge.

Mr. Pickersgill: And when did the minister first learn about this matter. In other words after May 1, the minister told us yesterday, he received certain information from the Minister of National Revenue about this case. Did the Minister of National Revenue tell the minister why a decision was reached not to prosecute this man?

Mr. Harkness: I answered that yesterday. You are merely being repetitious.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would do me the courtesy of recalling the answer to my mind, because it has slipped my memory.

Mr. Harkness: I suggest that the hon. member should read Hansard. He will find answers to all those questions there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have read Hansard, and I have been able to find nothing by way of an answer to that question. The minister did not say when the Minister of National Revenue spoke to him about this case. He did not tell us when it was decided not to prosecute. The minister told us originally—

Mr. Smallwood: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We reverted from item 17 to item 16 so the hon. gentleman might ask a question, not make a speech, and I think it is quite unfair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon member for Bonavista-Twillingate has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I was about to point out that it was the hon. member for Laurier who gave us the only facts we have on this situation. I would remind you that the minister has given us none. The minister has not told us what this man did.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I protest against the hon. member making statements that are absolutely contrary to the facts as reported in yesterday's Hansard. I gave the full facts in connection with this matter. The hon. member has just said I did not give any facts. Hansard is there for anybody to read, and I protest against him taking up the time of the house with repetitious statements and questions the answers to which are already on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the committee has been very generous in allowing the hon. member to revert to item 16 so as to be able to ask questions, and I think he should confine his remarks to questions as closely as possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, with the greatest possible deference it seems to me that when we are discussing the dismissal of a public servant whose category the minister has not been able to give us precisely—

Mr. Harkness: I gave it to you. Don't keep making these incorrect statements.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said at one point he was a casual employee, and at another point that he was a seasonal employee. I am informed that there is a difference in status between seasonal and casual employees. And the minister has said, on his own unsupported testimony, that he satisfied himself that this man was engaged in political activities, and that he had broken some law. I am seeking to find out some of the facts on which the minister reached this conclusion,—facts which, I submit should have been given frankly to the committee. I want the minister to tell us on what date—no, first of all, I want to ask—

Some hon. Members: Make up your mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: —whether it is true he stopped the prosecution, as he told the house he did in his answer to the first question of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Harkness: Once more, if the hon. member had paid close attention yesterday and the other time this matter was discussed, or if he had read Hansard, he would know the answer to that.

I had nothing to do with the matter originally. When it came to my attention—as I say, six months after the offence had taken place—I considered the matter as to whether or not the man should be prosecuted and decided, as far as I was concerned, that after this lapse of time and in view of what the unfortunate results of that would be as far as confidence in our inspection services was concerned it would be undesirable for me to initiate a prosecution, especially after the lapse of that length of time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate requested permission to ask questions, and no one else has the right to do so at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether or not it is true that the Minister of National Revenue or the officials of his department had already decided not to prosecute before this matter was drawn to his attention?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have already answered that question in my remarks yesterday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, that question, I am sure, has never been asked before. I am asking whether or not the Minister of National Revenue or his department had decided not to prosecute before the Minister of Agriculture ever heard of this case?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is entirely repetitious. If the hon. gentleman will read the record he will see that I stated yesterday that at the time the liquor and cigarettes were found in this man's possession—I do not know how long afterward but almost immediately after that—the enforcement branch of the Department of National Revenue decided not to prosecute and—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The question of whether or not a prosecution should have been undertaken by the Department of National Revenue has nothing whatever to do with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and I would ask the hon. member not to pose any more questions along that line.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think your point of order is very well taken, sir, and I accept it without question. However, I should like to ask the minister this question. We have been told that the liquor and cigarettes were found in this man's possession on November 29. The Minister of Agriculture said the first time he ever heard of this case was on May 1. Did he learn about the liquor and cigarettes from the Department of National Revenue or from some other source?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, once more I say that if the hon. gentleman would read the record he would know the answer to that question. I have already said this afternoon that I first learned of this orally, and certainly it was not from the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, sir, this offence of which the minister has convicted Mr. Mitchell was never brought to the minister's attention at all by the Department of National Revenue. This offence which was discovered on November 29 was not considered by the Department of National Revenue of sufficient importance to bring to the attention either of the minister or of his officials. The minister has now told us he learned of it from some other source, and not from the Minister of National Revenue, and evidently it was considered by the Minister of National Revenue and his officials of no importance—

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member is supporting a smuggler in his remarks.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I understand that the committee gave unanimous consent to the hon. member asking a question. He has already asked 29 questions and at the moment he is no longer asking a question but making a speech. His remarks have become nothing more or less than a harangue and a cross-examination of the Minister of Agriculture. I suggest that the rules of the house are being flouted in a manner which is typical of my hon. friend, but which is nevertheless a disgraceful violation of the rules of this house.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee did give the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the right to ask questions. I must ask him again to confine his remarks to questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, with the very greatest deference I submit—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking on the point of order.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The point of order has been ruled on.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on the point of order despite the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, who does not seem to like this discussion very much.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: You cannot raise a point of order on a point of order, either. Mr. Chairman, I understand that we are not yet precluded from raising points of order in this house, even with the restrictions the hon. member for Rosedale is seeking to impose on our liberties.

Some hon. Members: Question. Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, my point of order is this. As I understand it I was given unanimous consent to revert to item 16 of the estimates. I do not believe it is competent to the committee to put any strings on what I may say in committee as long as it relates to the item. Once unanimous consent has been given I do not think it can be taken away, and I do not believe that my freedom of speech about this matter can properly be restricted under the rules in any way whatsoever. That is my submision.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. No one, of course, has any idea of taking anything away from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with reference to his freedom of speech.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You cannot take something away from nothing.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. gentleman asked if we could revert to item 16 in order that he could ask questions. I, as chairman, asked the committee if he could have unanimous consent to revert to item 16 for the purpose of asking questions and the committee gave unanimous consent. I feel, therefore, that the hon. member should confine his remarks as closely as possible to questions in accordance with the thoughts of the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, with the greatest possible respect I simply cannot submit to a form of censorship of that sort, and I shall desist at once from asking questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 17 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

20. Compensation for animals slaughtered, including compensation for eggs destroyed from infected premises under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $411,000.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, would the minister tell us under what terms and conditions eggs are destroyed, and in what quantity?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is an old classification which has been in the estimates for some years. It is due to the fact that Newcastle's disease and fowl typhoid can both be transmitted through the egg. Therefore provision was made for the destruction of eggs at a time when these diseases were prevalent. They have not been prevalent in recent years and no eggs have been destroyed for approximately three or four years, I am advised by the director-general of veterinary services.

Mr. McIlraith: There was an outbreak of Newcastle disease about three or four years ago, and some discussion occurred at that time.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Livestock and poultry—

21. Livestock and poultry production, including premiums on pure-bred sires and contributions for livestock improvement, $1,938,438.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about the production of lambs and wool in Canada. I saw a recent estimate which indicated that Canada imports 15 million pounds of lamb a year. Canada raises 1,500,000 sheep, but this production could be raised to 10 million. Could the minister tell us what he intends to do to improve the production of sheep in Canada?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we have already taken very definite steps in order to increase sheep production in Canada. We put into effect under the Agricultural Stabilization Act a support price of 60 cents a pound for wool. A two-day conference of sheep producers from all over Canada was convened in Ottawa, and this action was taken in response to their request concerning what effective steps might be taken in order to improve and increase the production of sheep in Canada. They were unanimous in saying that a support price for wool was the most important thing to be done, and as a result we put into effect this support price for wool.

I might say that of all the measures we have taken to improve agricultural prices in Canada, and all the steps we have taken under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and otherwise, this particular step of putting this support price under wool has resulted in more letters of thanks than any other single thing we have done. Sheep men from all over Canada have written thanking me most sincerely for having taken this step as far as the sheep industry is concerned.

Mr. Boulanger: This policy was indeed necessary and I too thank the minister, but it is not what we want to increase the production of lambs. We have a considerable area of marginal land in Canada in crops which could be put to better use as pastures. These pastures could be improved at little cost. They should be classified for this purpose following an investigation of land use. That is why I wish to ask the minister whether the land use investigation is being pursued by the special committee of the other place?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member that we could have and should have a great deal more sheep production in Canada. That is why I called this meeting of those sheep people in order to get their advice as to what steps to take. As I say they, unlike the hon. member, were unanimous in saying that the most important thing was to put this support price under wool. In addition they recommended various other steps of a less important nature. In order to carry on this work we have asked for a special grant in order to set up a sheep committee, or an advisory group, so there can be a continuing body during the next year to carry on the investigation of the sheep industry and to make recommendations as to the best steps to take to improve and enlarge that industry.

Item agreed to.

22. Supervision of race track betting, $279,988.

Mr. Boulanger: This is an appropriation having to do with racetrack betting. As I understand it, this item is under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I wonder why this item is not in the Department of Justice estimates, because the R.C.M.P. come under the Department of Justice. There is an increase of $20,000 in this vote, and I would like to know why?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is quite incorrect. If he will refer to the Criminal Code he will see that it assigns the supervision of racetrack betting to the Minister of Agriculture, and it is carried out under the supervision of this department. It is quite true that the mounted police are employed as far as some of the supervisory work is concerned, but they are employed under the supervision of or by this department. Whilst they are engaged on those racetrack activities the Department of Agriculture pays their expenses.

Mr. Boulanger: They are under the control of the Department of Justice?

Mr. Harkness: They are not under the control of the Department of Justice when they are working on this racetrack activity; they are under the control of the Department of Agriculture. As I said, we pay their expenses. Normally, of course, the mounted police are under the control of the Department of Justice. We have them, you might say, on loan for some of the work of supervising racetracks.

Mr. McMillan: Can the minister tell us whether any of these funds are recoverable from the revenue from racetracks? I understand the provinces get quite a bit of revenue from the racetracks. Why should they not supervise the tracks?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we receive one-half of one per cent of the moneys wagered, and that has produced a revenue very greatly in excess of what we have been spending in recent years. In other words, the department was making money by supervising betting at the racetracks. I might say that the people engaged in racing horses and in carrying on racing were, I think, justifiably put out that we were making a great deal more than we were spending in the supervision of racing, and they have been requesting for many years that the department undertake what they call an "eye in the sky" camera which follows the horses around the track, as a result of which they have a record of any irregularities. It is a means of making sure that the running of the race is carried on according to the rules, which also involves salivary and urinary tests. A few months ago I agreed to assume the cost of carrying on these operations, and we expect as a result that the revenues and the expenditures will be much more nearly balanced in the future.

Item agreed to.

23. To provide for grants to agricultural fairs, exhibitions, and museums in accordance with regulations of the governor in council; for payments pursuant to agreements in force on March 31, 1958, with exhibitions covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings; and for a grant of $50,000 to the royal agricultural winter fair, Toronto, and freight assistance on livestock shipments for exhibition thereat, $916,000.

Mr. Argue: On this vote, can the minister say whether any recent limitation has been placed on the amount of the grant that may be made toward the construction of various agricultural buildings? In other words, has there been any new regulation under this government which would make it more difficult for people to obtain loans?

Mr. Harkness: The answer is no.

Mr. Argue: There has been no new limitation of $100,000 on such grants?

Mr. Harkness: That limitation is there, Mr. Chairman, but it is not new; it has been there for some considerable time.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say when it was placed there?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed it was in 1955.

Mr. Argue: Has the minister given any consideration to raising the $100,000 ceiling? It seems to me, with the cost of buildings today and the very useful purpose to which they can be put, such a ceiling perhaps should be increased. It must have been placed there because amounts higher than that had been granted in the past. It would seem to me that for some buildings, at any rate, the $100,000 is relatively low.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we have had no representations from exhibitions and fairs that this amount should be raised. I presume the hon. member is extending them an invitation now to request it, but up to date we have not had any request that it be raised. What we have had from time to time over the years are requests for special grants, and a number of them have been made, grants considerably in excess of $100,000 for the erection of some particular building or to cover some particular situation. For example, the maritime winter fair, which lost its buildings just a short time ago, I have no doubt will apply for a special grant in order to help replace those buildings, and so on; things along this line.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister explain why this grant has been reduced by $37,000 while the next grant, item 24, the royal winter fair in Toronto, has been increased by $245,000?

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Chairman, this particular figure is the estimate of the officials of the department as to what the grants which have been applied for and which cover work which will be completed during the year will amount to. It so happens that in this particular year the estimate is, as the hon. member says, $5,000 less than it was in the previous year.

The reason for the increase in the grant to the royal winter fair is that some two to three years ago the previous government authorized a special grant of $1 million. This is one of the special grants I referred to in answering the hon. member for Assiniboia. During the first year after the grant was authorized the royal winter fair did not start building and did not use any of the $1 million. The following year they still had not completed their plans and did not use any of it. However, they have now informed us that they will need this amount this year. They informed the department that they would need this other amount in the previous year but they did not actually get started. I think they had some difficulties amongst themselves over the plans and as a result they did not get started on their building. They now inform us that this year their building will require this amount so that is the amount we have put in the estimates.

Item agreed to.

24. Special grant to royal agricultural winter fair, Toronto, $250,000.

Mr. McMillan: Does the royal agricultural winter fair get an extra amount in addition to this special grant?

Mr. Harkness: They get an annual grant of $50,000 a year. This is a special building grant.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—
28. Marketing service administration, including marketing of agricultural products, $666,454.

Mr. Boulanger: Under this item I see there is a position called "senior officer 2" with a salary of $13,785. Under the Agricultural Stabilization Act item the salary of the chairman is $11,500. I understand that these two positions are held by the same man. I should like to know what salary he receives. If he is receiving $11,500 I suggest that he should be paid $13,875.

Mr. Harkness: The head of the marketing service, who is also chairman of the agricultural stabilization board, is paid as head of the marketing service at the higher of the two figures mentioned. I have also made a recommendation to treasury board that he receive certain extra compensation because of the fact that he is carrying on two jobs. That has not yet been approved but I expect that it will be.

Item agreed to.

29. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, in the amounts detailed in the estimates $445,916.

Mr. Howard: First of all I should like to ask the minister what is the reason for cutting in half the amount of money to be expended under the Cold Storage Act.

Mr. Harkness: We decided, as the result of a considerable number of representations that had been made to us, that the amount of cold storage now existing made it unnecessary for us to subsidize everybody who wanted to go into the cold storage business. In the past we paid out quite large subsidies to large commercial concerns which were building big cold storage warehouses across the country. As a result of a review of the matter a few months ago I had the regulations changed so that the amount of grant would be limited to $50,000 in the case of any one cold storage project. The purpose was to ensure that this form of assistance was extended as far as possible to farmers' and fishermen's co-operatives and organizations of that sort which in many cases still need to build comparatively small cold storage warehouses and require assistance whereas we did not think it was necessary to continue that type of assistance to large commercial concerns. As a result, the amount of money that will be expended will be very much reduced and that is why the item is reduced.

Mr. Howard: I understand that formerly there was no limit to the total subsidy but there was a limit in terms of a percentage of the total cost, a maximum of one-third of the cost or something of that sort.

Mr. Harkness: That is correct. There was no limit on the total cost of the cold storage building which was erected. We paid one-third of the cost and, of course, we still pay one-third of the cost. There is no change in that regard but this upper limit of $50,000 has been imposed which means that in the future anybody who builds a $3 million cold storage plant will not get a $1 million subsidy.

Mr. Howard: It may seem strange—I found it strange when it came to my attention—that fishermen's problems should be dealt with in the department of agriculture but, as the minister has said, subsidy payments under the Cold Storage Act are also payable to fishermen's co-operatives to enable them to build fish cold storage plants.

Undoubtedly the matter to which I wish to refer has been drawn to the attention of the minister or his officials. I wish to make a formal plea on behalf of the Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative association. When there was no limit to the subsidy other than one-third of the total cost the Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative made plans to build a cold storage plant having in mind that they would receive a subsidy of one-third of the total cost from the department. I believe they received approval to go ahead some few years ago but difficulties then arose between the Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative and another co-operative in Vancouver and they decided to delay the building of the cold storage plant.

However, they have now made plans to proceed with it without realizing that a $50,000 ceiling has been placed on the subsidy they will be able to receive under the Cold Storage Act. If the minister feels it is necessary to place a limit of $50,000 on the subsidy because of the huge cold storage plants being built costing millions of dollars, I ask him very seriously, speaking particularly of the Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative although there may be other co-operatives or companies in the same boat, whether he would not consider relaxing the regulation in the case of the Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative and any other groups in the position of having developed their plans on the assumption they would receive a subsidy amounting to one-third of the total cost. Otherwise, now that they are ready to proceed they will be hampered by the fact that a limit has been placed on the subsidy they had expected to receive.

I think if the minister would undertake to do that he would certainly find, so far as the Rupert fishermen's co-op is concerned, he would assist them immeasurably in the expansion of their cold storage locker and that if there are other cases which fall into the same category I am sure this sort of action would be greatly appreciated. I hope the minister will undertake to take some steps in the direction of relaxing the $50,000 limit which applies to those who have unfortunately found themselves having to raise a few thousand more dollars than they had originally thought would be necessary.

Mr. Harkness: One thing I mentioned before and which I should like to make sure the members of the committee understand is that these subsidies are available only to people to erect public cold storages, whether it be a co-op or an individual enterprise. It must not only be a public cold storage but it must remain so, otherwise the subsidy is repayable. I do not know whether this particular co-op wants the cold storage entirely for its own operations or not but in any event to do what the hon. member asks would really mean we would have to go back about four years. These people, I am informed, had an agreement to build a cold storage but at the end of the year they had still not raised the money or completed their plans, and they asked for an extension. They got three such extensions and eventually the agreement became void.

If we were to go back and revise agreements entered into during the past five years I think the hon. member will recognize we would be in a practically impossible situation. I might also tell him that it would mean an expenditure of several million more dollars in subsidies for a considerable number of private enterprises which had agreements but which did not raise the money or complete their plans so that their agreements lapsed. If we were to do as the hon. member asks and recognize this voided agreement which is now five years old, we would have to do the same thing for everybody and there are a large number of such old agreements. This would create an extremely awkward situation and problem and would also, I think, be unfair to those people who have been in the cold storage business for years and to the many smaller farmers' and fishermen's co-operatives which have built cold storages.

Mr. Howard: I would like to carry on to amplify this thought. I was not suggesting we should go back four or five years and renew every old agreement. I am only stating the circumstances in so far as the Rupert fishermen's co-op is concerned.

Mr. Harkness: That was the situation with the Rupert co-op.

Mr. Howard: Yes, I quite appreciate that but I am also saying it has not been because of lack of desire or need that that co-op did not proceed with their expansion program but I think it is equally unfair to the Rupert co-op or to any other co-op or group wanting to operate and own its plant to allow them to develop their plans on the assumption that they would receive a one-third grant and then, when they are ready to definitely proceed, to find out that the subsidy is not there and that they are going to have to raise the difference between the one-third and the $50,000 if the cost is more than $150,000, as it is in this case. I think it is equally unfair to place co-op associations and others in a position of assuming that they are going to get it in the first place and then suddenly to discover they must raise additional capital and that their plan for orderly marketing and protection of foodstuffs—in this case fish—are all upset. I know the minister is very able and I am sure that if he tries hard enough he will find some way around this difficulty.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I do not see that there is anything unfair in this situation. This particular organization had four years to build its warehouse; they had an agreement which lapsed and it was extended three successive times. The agreement was for one year and it eventually lapsed altogether and is now void. I do not think there is anything unfair there at all. They had four years in which to mature their plans and they did not do so. It is much the same thing as if I entered a contract to buy a car for so much money and I did not go ahead and buy the car but four years later I came along wanting to get a car of that year's model at the same price I had contracted for four years earlier. It is just not a reasonable proposition.

Mr. Howard: Could I ask this one question: did the minister say the regulation was changed two or three months ago?

Mr. Harkness: No, I think it was six months ago.

Mr. Howard: At any rate it was a relatively short time ago. Did the minister or did any of his officials discover that groups or organizations or companies had in years past received subsidies under the Cold Storage Act and its one-third provision although they were not entitled to do so?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed that nothing is known along that line, but I can tell my friend that every application for a subsidy is very carefully investigated and we do turn down a considerable number. Many people put in applications although they have not met the regulations; they start to build their cold storage and then they come along and ask for a subsidy. Under the act we cannot pay it to them and we get a great many complaints from people who think they should get a subsidy and do not get one. I can certainly assure the hon. member that these applications are very carefully investigated before a subsidy is paid and before an agreement is entered into to see that the projected cold storage will meet all the requirements of the regulations laid down and that the expenditures for building are very carefully checked so that we can be sure we are not paying more than the one-third share called for by the agreement.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, this may have a bearing on the matter. I wonder if there are statistics available as to the average or general cost of fish cold storage as related to the general or average cost of cold storage for garden products, meats and so on?

Mr. Harkness: We have not any cost figures here, Mr. Chairman, but my officials inform me that the lower the temperature required the higher the cost, and therefore the cold storage for fish as opposed to that for fruit and vegetables would entirely depend on the amount of space devoted to low temperatures. In the present cold storage for fruits and vegetables a considerable amount of space is for deep-freezing purposes, for fast-freezing of fruits and vegetables and to keep them in that frozen form for long periods of time. It may therefore be that at the present time the cost of fruit and vegetable cold storage is more expensive than that required for fish, but that again would depend on the proportion of space required for these low temperatures.

Mr. Howard: I should like to proceed a little bit further. As I said earlier, it seemed to be somewhat odd to me when I discovered these subsidies for fish cold storage warehouses would come under the Department of Agriculture. I would have normally expected that subsidies for fish cold storage would more properly be administered by the Department of Fisheries, not that I am saying that the administration has not been good or otherwise. However, it would appear to me to be a more sensible division or application of it, inasmuch as the products which are stored and used are different, to divide the administration as it applies to fish cold storage plants and to place that under the Department of Fisheries where they deal every day with fish, fish products, fish marketing services, price supports, research and everything else. I wonder whether some consideration would not be given to that suggestion.

Mr. Harkness: The reason we administer this matter is that there is only one Cold Storage Act and it is provided that it shall be administered by the Department of Agriculture. The number of cold storages built for fish products is very small in comparison with the number built for meat, fruit, vegetables, butter, cheese and all the other products and it is not sufficient to justify a separate administration for fish cold storages. The actual practice is that when we get an application in for a fish cold storage we promptly send it over to the Department of Fisheries and ask them to investigate it and give us a report on it before we proceed any further.

Mr. Howard: Did the minister say "properly" or promptly?

Mr. Harkness: We promptly send it over to the Department of Fisheries. As I say we get their report before we proceed any further on it.

Mr. Howard: I should like to ask another question. I am sorry I did not do this earlier and I hope the minister will not mind my trying to get this information for my own sake. It is purely for that purpose at the moment. I understood the minister to say that the reason for the placing of a ceiling of $50,000 was that there had been some fairly heavy expenditures made under this act in the past to the huge cold storage groups and therefore it was felt to be unnecessary to be continually pumping federal government money into these cold storage operations. Is that generally what the reason was?

Mr. Harkness: As I indicated previously, the thing is that I received a considerable number of representations from people who already had cold storages in existence to the effect that the subsidy which we were through the department making available was resulting in cold storage space being overbuilt in their particular areas and was having the effect or was going to have the effect of forcing them out of business with their existing cold storage. We were putting up a third of the cost for the new cold storage.

After looking into the matter it seemed to me that in many cases this was a fairly valid complaint. Also on looking over the history of it and on getting the figures as to the amount of cold storage which we have in Canada and the percentage of occupancy, I was particularly struck by the fact that the percentage of occupancy in the cold storages in Canada was not very high. I have forgotten the exact figures but I think it did not run much more than 50 per cent. I am informed that my memory on that matter is correct and that it ran about 50 per cent. With occupancy of existing cold storages at only about 50 per cent and running up to 70 per cent in some seasons, it seemed to me to be an unjustifiable use of public money to subsidize the construction of further cold storages except those required in certain areas, as I say, by farmers and fishermen's co-operatives in order to hold their product until they could market it. For those reasons I decided to limit the amount of the grant to $50,000.

Mr. Howard: May I inquire whether those representations and the results of the study that was made and the realization that there was too much cold storage space and not enough use being made of it and so on apply to agricultural cold storage space or just that for fish? How did the fish cold storage plants fit into that study?

Mr. Harkness: The figures that I have compiled cover all the cold storages across the country. What the break-down was between the ones which were used entirely or primarily for fish, I do not know. The hon. member probably knows that there are a number of cold storages which are used for both fish and agricultural products.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has said that there is an upper limit of $50,000 put on assistance under this act. Would he explain why it is that at page 126 of the details of assistance, there are some grants which are well in excess of $50,000 for next year.

Mr. Harkness: Those are to cover contracts which were already in existence before the limit of $50,000 was put on. In other words, there were a considerable number of contracts which had been entered into by the government of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member, and we have not finished paying out under those; the construction was still going on or if it was completed, a complete check of it had not been made and the settlement had not yet been made. All those in excess of that amount which you see in the details are old contracts which were in existence when the change was made; and of course we did not make this change retroactive and disturb the old contracts.

Mr. Pearson: Would that explanation also cover the items in the supplementary estimates for assistance under this act?

Mr. Harkness: The deputy minister is still looking up those items but I am quite sure it would, yes; because since we made this change no cold storage subsidies have been authorized in excess of $50,000. If there are any in there in excess of $50,000, they must be old contracts.

Mr. Pearson: Even in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Southam: I should like to substantiate the minister's advice in that respect. I happen to be in the cold storage business myself in Saskatchewan and as president of the Saskatchewan locker operators association I know there has been a definite trend in the last few years away from the placing of food in cold storage plants owing to the advent of home freezers. It is a definite trend. It is something that we must face up to. But I think the minister's advice in that respect is quite right.

Mr. Argue: I feel that the Minister of Agriculture is making a mistake in putting this arbitrary limit of $50,000 on any grant that may be made to a cold storage firm. If the minister is correct in saying that in certain areas there has been over-building and that the amount of space that is used is too low, surely that would be a factor in considering any individual application—

Mr. Harkness: It is.

Mr. Argue: —as to whether or not storage in a given area were in fact needed. But it would seem to me that the instance of Prince Rupert, shall we say, or in any other instance—I do not claim to be acquainted with this case that has been raised—it would be a greater service to the agricultural industry and to consumers generally to judge each case on its merits rather than to say that an arbitrary limit of $50,000 is going to be placed on the amount that can be paid for any cold sorage. As far as farmers' co-operatives, fishermen's co-operatives or other co-operatives may be concerned, I think the $50,000 limit is going to mean a hardship for some of them. Even in this very estimate that is under consideration there is a co-operative in the province of Quebec that is to get a grant of $105,884. If an arbitrary limit of $50,000 were set, then of course that co-operative would get a good deal less. For the minister to say that this is for co-operatives, that we are going to give it to co-operatives through a kind of back door method by setting a $50,000 ceiling, is something that I do not think should be done. I do not think that is the way to administer anything.

If this is designed to help co-operatives, why does the minister not put in a clause saying that subsidies for co-operative organizations for the building of cold storage plants may be one-third of the cost without regard to a ceiling. I do not think it is possible to say we are putting on a $50,000 ceiling and at the same time say the whole program is for the purpose of assisting co-operatives. I can remember when I came into this chamber in 1946 or 1947, a couple of years after I was elected there was a long discussion on this very question. At that time, as I remember the discussion, the department was not following the practice of allowing co-operatives building locker plants to be eligible for this subsidy; it was a subsidy for large bulk storage plants. After a good deal of discussion, the minister of agriculture of that day, the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, agreed it should be extended to include co-operative lockers and I think I had the honour of having a subsidy paid to a locker plant in my constituency, one of the very first to take advantage of it.

We have heard it said in these discussions by members on all sides of the house that one of the reasons there is such a tremendous fluctuation in the price of perishable farm products is that ample storage is not available. I have listened to the Minister of Agriculture today, and I am not convinced that this ceiling is the way to administer cold storage facility development. If the government feels that in a given area no new storage facilities are required, let us have no subsidy at all. But if an organization, and particularly a co-operative association, can make a case for the building of a storage plant which costs in excess of $150,000, then I suggest it is not good business from the standpoint of the welfare of this nation to place an arbitrary ceiling on this item. I think the reduction from $915,000 in the former estimate to $445,000 in this year's estimate, together with a look at the estimates which show that there are a number receiving amounts in excess of $50,000, means that the government is going a long way toward wiping out a cold storage program which has been built up step by step, and which is serving a very useful purpose.

Mr. Harkness: I am not arguing with the hon. member that there was not a need for a cold storage program of this sort in the past, but I would once more draw to his attention the fact that the surveys I have carried out showed that the existing cold storage is only being used to 50 per cent of capacity. Under the circumstances, what excuse is there for using the taxpayers' money to subsidize in large amounts the building of more storage? There is no excuse for it at all. I would have done away with this altogether except that there still exists the need for more storage—small storage facilities—in isolated parts of the country, or in parts of the country which are more or less isolated. I said that most of the people who would benefit under the present regulations with a limit of $50,000 are farmers' and fishermen's co-operatives in areas which are to some extent isolated. But we do not want to limit this to co-operatives. Any group of farmers that wants to build a cold storage plant with public facilities, for instance, may receive a subsidy. These are the very people who need to be helped and I think from all the information I have been able to gather that $50,000 is quite adequate. If you put it at more than $50,000 you are in effect subsidizing the building of big cold storage plants which are just going to take storage business away from other large cold storage plants already in existence.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the minister could tell me how many cold storage plants there are which deal exclusively or, in the main, with agricultural products; how many deal exclusively, or in the main with fish; and how many handle both agricultural products and fish in combination.

Mr. Harkness: We have not those figures, but we could have them compiled by the department and I would be glad to do that and send them to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: Do I understand that the figures are not yet compiled but that this could be done?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Howard: The minister has informed the committee that he has conducted a survey and that he has discovered that the present storage facilities, or the operators of them, needed protection and that there did not appear to be any need for additional storage facilities.

Mr. Harkness: No. I did not make either of those statements.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the minister will let me finish.

Mr. Harkness: Don't put words into my mouth that I did not utter.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Howard: I do not want to get into the same sort of altercation with the minister as I did yesterday, but a good way to begin one would be by making these interruptions. The minister said he had conducted a survey.

Mr. Harkness: That is right.

Mr. Howard: And that as a result of that survey he had discovered certain things. Is that right?

Mr. Harkness: That there was a 50 per cent occupancy.

Mr. Howard: Sometimes going up to 70 or 75 per cent, I forget which figure the minister used.

Mr. Harkness: Seventy.

Mr. Howard: I attempted to discover from the minister what division there was with respect to fish cold storage and agricultural products cold storage, and he does not know the figures, though he says he can have them compiled and send them to me. But they will not do me any good. What the minister has just admitted is that in the course of the examination he conducted he did not attempt to discriminate between cold storage facilities for agricultural products and cold storage facilities for fisheries products. He just made a complete survey across the board, said this represented the general picture as far as cold storage is concerned, made no attempt to differentiate between the two products and decided that the ceiling of $50,000 would be appropriate.

I will go one step further and say that the reduction from $915,000 to $445,000, a sum equal to less than half of the former estimate, together with the $50,000 limit, is an indication that the main estimates will be cut in half again next year, because there will not be these large sums of money payable and I suggest to the minister with all due respect to what he may have said—and I have no intention of putting words into his mouth—that if he had made as thorough an investigation of this subject as he made of the question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Laurier, he would have discovered that an entirely different picture exists with respect to agricultural cold storage.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member is, in effect, accusing me of not knowing what I am doing and not having the information on which to do it.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wish the minister would not put words in my mouth.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I was not putting words in the hon. member's mouth. I said that in effect this was what he was saying. I ventured to suggest that in connection with cold storage the only information he has relates to the situation at Prince Rupert. I think he would be better advised to find out what the situation is with regard to cold storage across Canada before he begins making these broad, general sweeping statements.

The investigation which we carried on with respect to occupancy of cold storage facilities was very complete. I indicated some time before that a large number of these facilities are used for both fish and agricultural products. The hon. member is complaining because I do not have here a break-down as to the exact number which are used for fish only, the exact number used for both fish and agricultural products and the number used for other commodities. That would be an extensive compilation job. I have informed the hon. member that it could be done and I shall be glad to have it undertaken and send him the information but in the meantime I take objection to his making broad statements which are to the effect that we did not know what we were doing when we did this.

Mr. Howard: I could very easily agree with the minister on that point but I will not. With all due respect to him and his department I point out that when I opened my remarks I said I was referring specifically to the Price Rupert fishermen's co-operative association and that was it. I was not talking about fish cold storage plants throughout Canada or agricultural cold storage plants. Regardless of whether or not the minister knew what he was doing—and that is for him and not me to decide—he looked at the entire picture and decided that because certain conditions existed the subsidy would have application to everybody regardless of the merits of the individual case. I am objecting to the application of the subsidy not being based on the merits of individual cases without limitations being placed upon it.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could tell us if a survey was taken for only one year or over a period of years. Could he also tell the committee whether the 50 per cent occupancy of cold storage is a standard figure for a number of years or whether it has been diminishing rapidly as time went on? I hasten to admit that I am no authority about cold storage facilities but it would seem to me that if cold storage facilities deal in certain goods that are produced in a given season that figure might be fairly high. I should also like to know whether or not the storage survey was broken down as to areas, regions or provinces because if the city of Toronto has ample cold storage facilities and is using only 40 per cent of the potential capacity of the facilities this does not do much good for the people in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Skeena if they are greatly in need of such facilities. A national average of 50 per cent occupancy does not mean very much unless it is a general pattern that is prevalent all across the country. I am wondering if the minister could say to what extent there was occupancy of cold storage facilities a few years ago and whether the survey would show by provinces that the rate of use of cold storage varies a great deal.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we receive monthly returns as to the occupancy of these various cold storage plants and these are compiled on a yearly basis. The general trend of occupancy has been downward for some years past. In other words, the percentage of occupancy has been declining. These figures, of course, are broken down on a provincial and regional basis. There is naturally some variation on a provincial and regional basis but the chief variation is on a seasonal basis. At some seasons of the year occupancy is low and at other times it runs as high as 70 per cent in some cases, as I mentioned. Nevertheless the general trend of occupancy has been decreasing.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is a good example of the fact that whenever you attempt to put into effect a necessary economy, one which will save the taxpayers some money and one which serves other useful purposes, you immediately receive complaints from some hon. members of the house which makes it difficult to institute economies in government services. This is a case in which I think there is no question whatever but that the granting of subsidies running up to as much as $1 million or more to build cold storage plants is absolutely unjustified. We have sufficient cold storage facilities now. On the average it does not have more than 50 per cent occupancy. Why in the world should we continue to spend the taxpayers' money in building more cold storage facilities in the light of the situation I have outlined which would force a lot of people into bankruptcy? I cannot understand that kind of reasoning. Certainly the provision we have made of a $50,000 grant which is still available is sufficient to cover the needs of the smaller communities where storage facilities have not yet been built. The smaller areas are the only places where there is a necessity for new cold storage plants.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to what I said a few moments ago with respect to the situation. I live in Saskatchewan where we have a cold storage operation rigidly supervised by the Department of Agriculture. We have 216 licensed cold storage locker operators in that province. I believe the standard of operation is one of the best in Canada. Having been an executive officer of the governing association for some years I have watched the trend in this field.

Cold storage lockers came into popularity in Saskatchewan in about 1945. The popularity of usage increased sharply until approximately 1950. Beginning in that year there was a decline in cold storage occupancy. We as cold storage operators had educated the public to the value of cold storage and the economy of processing foods. The advent of home freezers on the consumer market lessened the need for commercial locker plants. I would presume to say there would be possibly twice as much food in cold storage today as there was in 1945 but it is in the individual homes. The result of this is that many operators in Saskatchewan feel they are going to be faced in the not too distant future with the problem of keeping their plants fully occupied and operating economically.

I believe the minister is taking the right stand in this regard. He is following the trend that has taken place in my province and I understand the same trend has taken place right across Canada. Rural electrification is taking place in many areas and the moment it is established a home freezer is the first utility the farm wife wants. The result is that she takes her products away from commercial locker plants. I can speak with some knowledge of the situation in Regina and elsewhere because I have spoken in the last few years to the operators of plants in those areas. This is a normal trend and something to which we must face up.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the minister has given us ample reasons why there should be this arbitrary limit. I am surprised that if he has made this comprehensive survey and the records come in from time to time he or his departmental officials who are before him do not have copies of these documents so the committee could see the entire cold storage picture across the country.

I was critical over the years of the former minister of agriculture, probably as critical as any hon. member of this house, but I was always prepared to say that as far as cold storage subsidies were concerned he was improving the program. Today we have determination on the part of the Minister of Agriculture to save money in this field and applications will not be judged on their individual merits. We all are aware of what was pointed out by the hon. member for Moose Mountain that other facilities are being made available.

We have a minister who does not judge each case on its merits, but arbitrarily slices off any chance there is of a co-operative, or any other organization, getting a grant in excess of $50,000. I am not one of those who has spent my time asking the government to spend its time ferreting out economies; but if the government wants to make some real economies I think they can be made in some department, generally speaking, other than the Department of Agriculture because, in my opinion, expenditures in the Department of Agriculture have never been excessive.

I am wondering whether, when the minister made this survey of which he has spoken a great deal, it was a special survey or whether it was merely a reading of those annual reports that normally come in from across the country. Can the minister tell the committee the percentage of cold storages in use in this country by provinces?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the investigation that I have made was a matter of taking those monthly reports—as I say, they are not yearly reports; we get them in monthly in regard to occupancy—and compiling the statistics. The hon. member will realize that that is a big job because there are a lot of those cold storages across Canada.

As far as judging any particular application for a cold storage on its merits is concerned, as I indicated before, that is what is done. When an application comes in a very careful investigation is made before a contract is entered into, and once more the costs which are submitted by the organization are very carefully audited and gone into before we pay out this subsidy. The thing is done on an individual basis and has always been done on an individual basis; but it seemed to me that as far as cold storage which was to be subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer, in the future, is concerned in view of the extent of the occupancy which exists at the present time and in view of the number of cold storages there are in all centres of any size, the only need for continued subsidization was in the smaller areas where cold storage has not yet been built. The limit of $50,000 I considered, and still consider, was more than ample to cover the needs of those communities. That is why the sum of $50,000 was put in as our contribution, which means a cold storage costing $150,000.

As far as the break-down of figures by provinces is concerned, the hon. member realizes that it is a big job. I have this book here which is just a summary of the various details, as far as these estimates are concerned, and it is an absolute impossibility to have here all of the documents which might be asked for. As far as information is concerned, such as the break-down of those cold storages, the officials just could not carry the documents. As I said before to the hon. member for Skeena, I will be glad to get the break-down by provinces, and so forth, but I have not it here at the present time, and it is just not feasible to have everything along with me here when I am taking up my estimates, as I think the hon. member realizes.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, there was another way in which the minister could have attained his objective if his objective was to save money or to accomplish economies. He could have taken each application and looked at it on its merits to see whether or not in a given locality such new cold storage facilities were needed. If in the opinion of the minister they were not needed, then it would not be necessary to grant a subsidy. My point is, if a co-operative wishes to build a cold storage plant, if it is needed, at a cost of $600,000, then it is a retrograde step to say that this co-operative is not able to get $200,000 by way of a grant but can only get $50,000. There were other ways of bringing about the same result, if that result were desired, other than to say that $50,000 is the limit and there will be no other subsidization of cold storage accommodation provided in this country. I do not think you can build anything adequate with the present building costs for the sum of $150,000. I would say that would be a relatively small plant at present costs.

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member has forgotten what were the purpose and the intent of the Cold Storage Act. Its purpose and intent were to provide cold storages which were deficient in number at the time the act was passed, and it was a subsidy by the Canadian taxpayer to encourage people to put up cold storages because there was not anything like enough cold storages in existence. Now once you reach the point where you have sufficient cold storages over the country so that they are only 50 per cent occupied surely the need for any subsidy has disappeared. As I say, I would have done away with the subsidy entirely; I would have asked to have the act repealed except for the fact that in quite a considerable number of those more isolated areas there is still a need for the construction of many of those smaller cold storages, and that is why the limit of $50,000 was put in.

Furthermore, I might say this. Any concern which is going to build a cold storage costing more than $150,000 should be able to raise the money itself. If the cold storage is going to be sufficiently profitable, well, then, they should be able to raise the money themselves; they should not need any subsidy from the Canadian taxpayer in building it. If there was a definite shortage, as existed at one time, well and good, the subsidy was justified; but when you have a situation where you have only a 50 per cent occupancy of those cold storages, then, in my opinion, it is completely unjustifiable to ask the Canadian taxpayer to put up money to build more of them. The result of building more of them, in most instances, is just to put out of business or into bankruptcy concerns which already have them.

Mr. Howard: I realize the minister may not have this information before him or it may be difficult to find, but can he indicate what the results of this survey showed with respect to percentage of occupancy of fish cold storage plants in Prince Rupert, and whether there is or is not a deficiency of them?

Mr. Harkness: I can send that information to the hon. member. As I said, naturally I have not it here.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry; I was trying to listen to two people at the same time.

Mr. Harkness: I said that I can send him that information but naturally I have not it here.

Mr. Howard: Did the minister compile that information as a result of a survey?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know what the hon. member is asking me, whether we compiled the information. We have the complete figures as to the occupancy month by month of those various cold storages, and from that information, which takes up a great deal of room in the files, we can compile any information which is asked for. But what is compiled at the present time and what I can lay my finger on in 10 minutes or half an hour I do not know.

Mr. Howard: Well, what I am trying to get at in another way and to point out is that I think this is an incorrect way of approaching this problem and saying that because we have discovered from the results of the Canada-wide study an average percentage use of cold storages is made, therefore that average should apply to every place. Some may be above and some below. I say that is an inequitable use of the results. To apply it all across the board—and I do not want to put words in the minister's mouth—is to say that Prince Rupert does not need additional cold storage facilities without knowing whether that is so or not.

Mr. Harkness: All I can say is this. I have explained several times before, and I have to take the responsibility, that in my opinion there is no need for the subsidization of cold storage facilities anywhere in the country in excess of $50,000 per cold storage plant. That is my opinion and I have to be responsible for the decision. I have taken it and I do not think I can say anything further about the matter. From the information I have received I am convinced that there are sufficient large cold storage plants in all of the more populous areas of the country, that further subsidization of them is not required and not only is not required but simply has the effect of damaging already established cold storage plants and organizations.

Mr. Howard: I am appreciative of the fact that the minister has just indicated there is no need for subsidization with respect to fish cold storage facilities in Prince Rupert.

Mr. Harkness: I did not say that.

Mr. Argue: In effect.

Mr. Harkness: I said that in my opinion $50,000 was ample by way of subsidy.

Mr. Howard: The minister is saying that $50,000 is an ample subsidy to meet what the act was originally intended to meet, a deficiency in cold storage facilities, and he is saying that without having any knowledge of the conditions existing in Prince Rupert.

Mr. Harkness: All I can say is that we cannot pass special legislation in the case of one cold storage plant out of hundreds or thousands in the country which happens to be located in Prince Rupert or anywhere else.

Mr. Howard: I suggest that the minister can pass regulations which will give him the authority to look at these matters on the merits of each individual case and adjust the subsidy, if necessary, just as is done by the government in many other actions it takes.

30. Agricultural economics, $764,345.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the minister a short question. How much of this money is for economic research to help farmers improve the efficiency of their farms?

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. There is quite a bit of noise in the house and I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. Boulanger: How much of this money is for economic research to help farmers improve the efficiency of their farms from the point of view of business operation? Is this information available to farmers?

Mr. Harkness: All of the work of the economics branch of the department is designed to improve the situation of farmers. The economics branch carries out studies in a very large number of different fields. One of the most important studies they have been carrying on for the last year has to do with farm credit. Another one they have been carrying on for several months concerns crop insurance. They have also been carrying on studies with regard to irrigation developments, particular types of crops, livestock of different kinds and the returns which have been received in various parts of the country and so forth. They do an enormous amount of work from the economic point of view in practically all types of agricultural production. Therefore my answer is that all of this money is spent in economic studies to assist farmers and improve their position.

Mr. Boulanger: What are the results of their research so far as the individual farmer is concerned? The farmer does not know much about the research that the government is doing. I think we should advertise it more in newspapers and agricultural publications.

Mr. Harkness: The head of the economics branch informs me that last year 40 pamphlets were published dealing with the research that had been carried on and for the purpose of making known the results of their research to the farmers who can make use of it.

Mr. Boulanger: Are farmers asking for these reports?

Mr. Harkness: A great many of the surveys made by the economics division have been requested by the farmers. They are undertaking a survey at the present time which was requested by the province of Prince Edward Island. Some of the surveys are requested by provincial governments, some by farm organizations and some by individual farmers. If a number of individual farmers write to the branch and it appears that the survey they request is justified and there is a real need for it then it is carried out.

31. Dairy products, $879,544.

Mr. Deschatelets: Has the minister available figures showing the number of pounds of margarine and other spreads produced in Canada last year?

Mr. Harkness: A report was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the house a few days ago outlining the number of pounds of margarine, butter and so on.

Mr. Deschatelets: Is this information given by the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Harkness: No. The Department of Trade and Commerce gets it from the dominion bureau of statistics which is under that department and the bureau gets it directly from the manufacturers.

32. Grants and other assistance in accordance with the Cheese and Cheese Factory Improvement Act, $1,228,000.

Mr. Howard: Could we have an explanation of the grants and other assistance, how they are spread around and to whom?

Mr. Harkness: These grants for the consolidation and improvement of cheese factories have been in effect for quite a number of years. Up to now I think the majority of cheese factories have had subsidies paid to them at some time or other. At the present time most of the subsidies are paid in cases where you have in the same area or just a few miles apart two or three old cheese factories or a co-operative or the owner of one of these cheese factories wants to consolidate his operations into a larger and more modern factory. He applies for a grant for that purpose. In the same way as we do with respect to cold storage we investigate the matter and if it is justified, if there seems to be a need, it is approved and a contract is entered into. In this case the subsidy is 50 per cent of the cost of the improvement or consolidation as the case may be. Quite frequently you have a case where a combination factory is being erected, one designed to manufacture cheese in one part and butter in another. The grant is only made for that part which is devoted to the manufacture of cheese.

Mr. Howard: I understood the minister to say that the amount is 50 per cent of the total cost as related to cheese.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Howard: Is it a subsidy?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, it is a subsidy.

Mr. Howard: Is there any justification for applying the same theory or principle in this case as in the case of cold storage facilities?

Mr. Harkness: To begin with, the amounts of subsidy paid out are nothing like the amounts which have been paid out in the case of cold storage facilities. Ordinarily the amounts are relatively small. The general purpose of this is to improve the cheese making facilities and therefore the quality of the cheese, which I think is still essential because we are only now able to sell the best quality cheese.

Mr. Gour: I notice that there is an amount of $128,923 shown as a decrease under this item, and I would like the assurance of the minister that he is not going to commence to do away with part of these subsidies. My hon. friends can take advantage of my experience in this respect in that the 50 per cent grant is more important than the subsidy for cold storage.

This measure was instituted by the Liberal government and the work they did was first class, and that is why Canadian cheese is recognized as the best produced in the world. The subsidies made it possible for the cheese makers to buy the best machinery and the best facilities with which to keep it in good condition. I do not agree, therefore, with my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture that this amount should be decreased.

In my own village a man had to apply for a subsidy to build a larger building. This was not permitted at that time but it was urgent that he do this job. He was receiving 100,000 pounds of milk per day and he is now receiving 210,000 pounds of milk per day. Anyone who knows anything about milk will realize that 210,000 pounds of milk is "some milk". It was necessary for him to do this work immediately so that the farmers would have a place to which they might deliver their milk and when in this country we are talking about helping farming we refer to amelioration of conditions and the overcoming of our difficulties. We should therefore be increasing rather than decreasing the subsidies.

The Liberal government did a good job and I am hoping that the cabinet will help my good friend the Minister of Agriculture. I know him well enough to know that he wishes to do a good job and I ask every member on the government side to help him out, not here but in caucus. I hope they will get the Minister of Finance to give him the money he needs for we must increase help to the farmers of our country along with the manufacturers of other products. The conditions in the agricultural industry, especially over the last 25 years, have been quite different from those in any other industry. It is not the same thing at all. There is an increase or amelioration of 300 per cent in respect of assistance to other industries and I ask the minister not to forget what I asked him in a friendly way, that he should not reduce too quickly the subsidies for dairy products. I am particularly anxious in this regard because we have been expecting help in my riding and this cheese producer was ready to improve the quality of his cheddar cheese until it was the highest quality in the world. I ask the minister to keep available sufficient money for this purpose and if the Minister of Finance does not agree we will help him out. My only object is to help him and the Tory government to do a good job. They will not do one-half of the job we did but anyhow I will help the minister to do a good job while he is in office.

We are not here to talk politics, we are here to see that the best chance is given for the most effective administration of the agricultural industry. That is the way I speak in this house and I would like to be assured that something will be done so that when the people of my riding, such as this cheese producer of whom I have spoken, need help they will get it in an effective way. This is one of the biggest producers in Canada, right in my own town, and I would like this particular case to be reconsidered by the minister because this year this particular man has spent over $200,000 and he is still short of space in which to receive the farmers' milk.

I do not ask my hon. friend to spend the money for nothing. I think the expenditure on cold storage is justified and I do not think there is any big mistake in that respect. Of course I do not think we should spend the taxpayers' money when it is not necessary, and Mr. St. Laurent was doing an excellent job in this respect, and we should not now put these people in a bad position.

I will not take up any further time, but I repeat that I hope my hon. friend will reconsider this case and will not allow this producer to go without the money he needs. The product he produces is a valuable one and his case should be favourably considered. Every similar case should also, in my opinion, receive the help of this government without the discussion of political issues.

Mr. Harkness: I would like to inform my friend that there is still quite a lot of money here; there is a subsidy of over $1.25 million in the main estimates and another $136,000 in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Gour: So long as the minister believes that is enough to cover my case and the other cases in a similar category, I am satisfied.

Mr. Howard: I would like to inquire from the minister, noting that in so far as this year is concerned the subsidy payment under vote 32 is something in the neighbourhood of three times as great as under the cold storage item, whether this same ratio has existed over the past five or six years, or what has been the relationship between the one item and the other?

Mr. Harkness: I might point out that in the supplementary estimates, item 527 shows a further $534,000 for these cold storage subsidies which figure needs to be added to the approximately $500,000 shown in the main estimates book.

Mr. Howard: A total of $1,700,000?

Mr. Harkness: No. There is $1 million as a total. There is $534,000 to be added to the $445,000 shown in the main estimates. You therefore have a total subsidy during this year as far as cold storage is concerned of just under $1 million, and as far as cheese factories are concerned the figures would be a little under $1,400,000.

Mr. Howard: Is this about the same ratio which has existed in past years between grants to cheese factories and subsidies for cold storage?

Mr. Harkness: No. The cold storage subsidy was very much higher than the cheese subsidy in other years.

33. Fruit, vegetables and maple products, and honey, $1,814,021.

Mr. McMillan: In regard to item 33, which has to do with fruit and vegetables, I notice that there is about $1.75 million and I would like to ask the minister if this includes any grants, subsidies or price supports?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman, the money used for price supports does not come under this vote at all.

Mr. McMillan: Can we then discuss price supports under item 41 which will come up later?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, that is the place at which to discuss them.

Mr. McMillan: Then I would like to ask the minister the reason for the increase of about $239,000?

Mr. Harkness: Of that $239,000 increase, $210,000 was for increases in salaries owing chiefly to the fact that an increase in salary was given to the civil service.

36. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $17,500,000.

Mr. Hicks: I wonder whether the minister could tell me how much of this $17,500,000 that was spent for freight assistance on grains went to British Columbia. I should also like to point out—and I presume he knows it already—that there is quite a stir in British Columbia to get more assistance in that regard. This stir is chiefly owing to the fact, of course, that the animals and poultry that consume this grain that comes to British Columbia are competing in the open market with animals and poultry that are fed in the neighbouring province. That hardly seems just fair.

Mr. Harkness: Up to date since this program has been in operation British Columbia has received $27,532,000 in round figures. The total amount expended has been $280,741,000. In other words, approximately 10 per cent of this subsidy has gone to British Columbia. For the current year the amount due to British Columbia is $1,526,000 and the total is $17,694,000.

Mr. Regier: Will this freight assistance also be payable on feed grains that are now being shipped out of the Peace river area in British Columbia along the new extension of the Pacific Great Eastern railroad?

Mr. Harkness: The answer is yes, as long as it is a rail movement.

Special—

39. For assistance in construction of potato warehouses under terms and conditions to be approved by the governor in council, $35,000.

Mr. Howard: I imagine this item falls into a category similar to that of the other two votes we discussed with regard to grants and subsidies. I wonder whether we could have an explanation of the method for assistance, what limits are on it and so on?

Mr. Harkness: This item is in a different situation from the others. In this case we put up the subsidy for the construction of a potato warehouse only upon the application of a province; and in that case, where the province puts up a third of the cost, we will put up a third of the cost and the people building it put up a third of the cost. In other words, it is a joint dominion-provincial scheme rather than a straight dominion subsidy as in the other two cases.

Item agreed to.

41. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Stabilization Act, $88,390.

Mr. McMillan: I think the minister indicated that this is the place to discuss the price support of fruits and vegetables. I wonder whether he would like to put on the record the different price supports that are established for the different fruits and vegetables?

Mr. Harkness: The what?

Mr. McMillan: The price supports that are now established for the different fruits and vegetables. I should also like to ask the minister whether, if a price support is established very much below the market price, the market price does not gravitate down to or near to the price support level. There were different members of a farm organization here and they said that this result was most likely to come about. I know that in the Niagara district that happened in the case of asparagus. For instance, in 1956 asparagus was selling from 22½ cents a pound to 23 cents a pound. In 1957 the price fell about a cent, and when it fell about a cent members of the minister's party infiltrated among the asparagus growers in the district and blamed it on the former government.

What happened following that? In 1958 the present minister I think set the price support at 17 cents, and the price of asparagus to the producer dropped from 21 cents or 22 cents a pound right down close to the 17 cent level, namely to 17½ cents or 18 cents. I know that in British Columbia there is a different price support. I was wondering whether in the Niagara district and in other parts of Ontario the producers receive the difference between what is received in British Columbia and what is paid there in the Niagara district? I know that a number of other fruit producers, particularly producers of cherries, are apprehensive. Cherries are 2 cents a pound cheaper this year than they were last year. I know that the cherry producers are afraid to come to ask for price supports because they feel that something will happen to them similar to what happened to the producers of asparagus. I should like the minister to comment on that matter.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock it is my duty, in accordance with the provisions of standing order 15(3), to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to consideration of private and public bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: The house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to standing order 15(3).

As the house will note, there are three bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole. Is it agreed that all three bills be referred to the committee in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. McMillan.]

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-12, respecting the Ogdensburg Bridge Authority —Mr. Stanton—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Howard: I was trying to get some background information on this. In 1952 the bill originally incorporating the company was referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, but unfortunately there is no printed record of the proceedings in that committee, and I was not able to get more than a few comments which were made in the house itself.

I have a number of inquiries which I should like to make. Unfortunately I was not able to make them the other day. I have got so many books here, now. I notice that in 1952 when the company was originally incorporated—and we have to compare one thing to the other here—they had authority to borrow $12 million, to issue bonds, debentures and other securities to the amount of $12 million, which was subsequently raised in 1956 to $20 million, and now in this year to $25 million. The thing I was concerned with was whether there was any appreciable effort in 1952 to assess the total cost of this bridge because in a period of six years the estimated cost has more than doubled and this is the second occasion the authority has come here to inquire for a change in the amount of money they are authorized to borrow. In addition to that, under the original act of incorporation, while they could issue bonds, debentures and other securities, as set out in section 12, another section of the act, section 16, gives authority to borrow only $10 million. I wonder why that difference exists, why they can sell debentures for $12 million and only borrow $10 million.

This may all have been explained in 1952 when the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines dealt with it, but, as I say, unfortunately there was no record kept of the proceedings on this particular bill and accordingly we could not get the information there.

Mr. Stanton: This is a very short bill. I did not know about it coming before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In 1952 when the authority came before the house they did make a low estimate of the cost of the bridge, but since that day the cost has gone up considerably both in material and labour. In 1956 they estimated that the cost would be in the neighbourhood of $20 million.

Work has started at the present time. The contracts are all let, outside of a few dollars that will need to be spent on the approaches on each side, and they now estimate the bridge will cost approximately $22 million.

But it is not their desire to come back to the house again, and that is why they are asking at this time for $25 million, to be able to issue debentures and bonds to that extent. They estimate the cost will only be $2 million more and they are very anxious to get on with the work. In fact, the work has started. The piers are practically completed. The land is practically all purchased for the approaches. As I got the information from the bridge authority, what they are requesting now is that this be passed authorizing them to issue debentures and bonds to the extent of $25 million which they hope they will have to issue only to the extent of $22 million.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-13, respecting The Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Morton.

CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF TIMISKAMING

The house in committee on Bill No. S-5, respecting the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming—Mr. Villeneuve—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Change of name.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I understand that this corporation is also engaged in the business of lending money. I am not for one moment in opposition to this. I think it is all well and good when agricultural producers—and I understand in this case they are largely that—are able to get assistance by way of capital.

However, since this corporation is, among other more important things, engaged in the business of lending money, I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill to whom this corporation presents an annual report. What is the maximum interest rate being charged on what I understand are these farm mortgages? Also, what is the volume of business in which it engages in one year's time? How much money has it invested in farm mortgages?

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, my understanding based on what the attorney had to say in the committee on miscellaneous private bills, is that at present they have a mortgage of $2,000 bearing an interest of six per cent. That was reduced from somewhere in the neighbourhood of $11,000 a year or so ago. These mortgages have been retired. My understanding also is that these mortgages were bequeathed to this church authority by deceased persons.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the hon. member would care to answer my other question. Since this is a corporation incorporated by the parliament of Canada I asked to which authority it renders an annual financial accounting of its operations?

Mr. Villeneuve: To its superiors in the church organization. It is certainly checked.

Mr. Regier: What I am about to say I say with all respect to this organization. I know that what I am going to say applies not only to this particular religious organization but also to a large number of other religious organizations in Canada. By way of bequests and otherwise they become involved in financial arrangements. I believe that some Protestant religious organizations are in possession of rather large holdings of real estate. I have always regretted the fact that legally incorporated religious organizations are involved in real estate and have an interest in mortgages and so on and are not required to report their affairs to some civil authority. I should like to see the day when the parliament of Canada or the provincial legislatures pass legislation under which when a religious organization, be it Baptist, Roman Catholic, Anglican or any other denomination, begins to dabble in real estate, the organization will be required to render a public accounting.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESTRICTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT TO CERTAIN OFFENCES

The house resumed, from Friday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winch for the second reading of Bill No. C-3, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, since I last spoke on the floor of the house on the question of capital punishment I have been doing some research into what type of person kills, into the types who may repeat a killing and into the history of the effectiveness of the death penalty as a deterrent to murder. On the other occasion I expressed the opinion that the death penalty should not be abolished through the motion of a private member but rather that if such action were to be taken it should be only after full and complete study by a committee of this house and the other place. The further research I have done has served to strengthen that first opinion.

I have found in my research that persons who kill can usually be fitted into two principal categories. There is first the cold, premeditated killer who plans his killing long in advance, who attempts to foresee every possible weakness in his plan and who hopes by careful planning to make his crime impossible of solution.

This type of killer usually kills for a definite purpose. He may kill for revenge. He may kill for monetary gain. He may wish to attain power. He always has a motive and once that motive has been achieved—with the exception of course of professional gang killers—he rarely kills again. Such killers when detected almost invariably receive the death sentence and in most cases the sentence is carried out.

The second type is, of course, the emotional killer. He may kill for a variety of reasons. It may be jealousy. It may be a fancied wrong. The slightest thing as trivial as a badly cooked dinner can set off a spark that will result in death. Drinking has also played a part in many such slayings. The majority of such persons are considered legally sane. That is, they have the ability to distinguish between right and wrong and accordingly are fit to stand trial for murder. But I suggest to this house that their emotional instability is such that they may be completely unable to control their actions. It is in such people that the danger of repeat killings lies.

Yet it would seem that the law leans heavily in favour of these emotionally unstable persons. Almost invariably the verdict in such cases is manslaughter. The sentence may be 10 years. It may be less or it may be more but it is a foregone conclusion that in a comparatively short period they will be turned loose again on society, those emotionally unstable people and who can say, if the same set of circumstances arise, that is, if the dinner is burned or if the wife stays out too late at night, or if they again have a few more drinks than they are able to handle, the same people will not kill again? Statistics indicate that the danger exists. These statistics also indicate that the man who commits a premeditated murder, and who does not pay with his life for the killing, rarely commits another crime. In England, over a period of 50 years, there was only one case of such a convicted murderer repeating his crime. In fact, records show that the majority of such people, after attaining their freedom, become good, responsible citizens.

It is because of these things that I say the question of capital punishment—whether it should be retained or abolished—is not something that can be decided lightly by a snap vote in this house.

Who are those people who might be classified as emotional killers? In my opinion, the best survey that I have been able to find is one made by the state of Wisconsin. Strangely enough, this survey would indicate that the path toward killing often began when the killer was still a child, and that in many cases much of the blame rested with the parents. In seven cases out of 10 these emotional killers came from an unfavourable family background. In about 40 per cent of the cases, for instance, either one or both of the parents were alcoholics. In 60 per cent of the cases the child was out earning money before the age of 14 and contributing to the family budget. In 90 per cent of the cases they were making their contribution before they had reached the age of 18 years. It is not surprising, therefore, that the vast majority of those emotional murderers were found to be people who had left school at an extremely early age and who had no opportunity to learn either a trade or a profession.

In 50 per cent of the cases the killer had not as a child been conscious of the love of either his mother or his father, and indeed the feeling of rejection was stronger in at least 20 per cent of those cases who said they hated their parents. Nervous instability is always a very strong factor. Again, in one-fifth of the cases, the killer came from a family where there was a history of insanity, epilepsy, or some other emotional disturbance.

The over-all result of this survey also is interesting, for the statistics indicate that one out of every four people who kill is insane, one out of every four is an alcoholic and one out of every three cases had an I.Q. of below 70 per cent. Unfortunately, there appear to be no such statistics available in Canada, but it is the sort of information that I believe is essential to any full and effective study of the question of capital punishment. I believe that such a survey should be attempted.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be at least somewhat anomalous that we should be here discussing the fate of an individual in view of the situation in the world today. This afternoon the world is divided into two armed camps capable of mass murder and legal slaughter, but we in this house are spending some hours discussing a measure that concerns only an individual and can affect at most only the occasional person in our population. And perhaps, in this very fact that we can discuss capital punishment while the world faces the horrible prospects of war lies the great hope for democracy as we in Canada believe in it, and the best chance of freedom for people now enslaved by ideologies abhorrent to us in this house. But it is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the nations of the world, while uttering lip service to the humanities have not become less cruel with the passing of time. Indeed the history of the world and the history of killing are so closely related that the history of one is almost the history of the other. We are almost forced to the conclusion that man has shown greater ingenuity in inventing and perfecting methods and machines for killing his fellow man than in any other pursuit.

Had the money devoted to the development of the atomic and hydrogen bomb been used in medical research I wonder whether we would not long since have found a cure for cancer, for multiple sclerosis, for muscular dystrophy and those other conditions which still, in far too many cases, mean death and a more certain death than the legal sentence of a court that a man shall be hanged by the neck or strapped in an electric chair, or placed in a metal cylinder with a dish of acid and a cyanide pellet to kill him. I wonder, too, whether, ironically enough, we do not find in today's international situation the ultimate example of the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent to murder.

After world war II the western powers, the victors, decided that in the years to come men must never again embark on war; there must be before such men the threat and the fear of personal punishment. Therefore, it was decided to seek out those Germans whom the western powers believed responsible for the last war and to bring them to trial. Hitler, the author of the conflict, escaped through death by his own hand in a Berlin bunker. Goebbels, another of the arch conspirators, went with him; but the majority of the others were rounded up. An international court of justice was set up at Nuremberg. The accused were given the protection of the western concept of law. They were faced by their accusers. They heard the evidence against them. They had the opportunity of putting in their defence. Day after day the proceedings went on. Day after day thousands of words went out to the newspapers of the world. Never was a trial attended by so much publicity. In the end what happened? Twenty-two high-ranking Nazis were convicted of war crimes. Eleven were sentenced to death. With the exception of Herman Goering, who evaded the hangman by use of a secreted cyanide pellet, they went to their deaths in a mass execution, at which the world, through press, radio and films, occupied a ringside seat.

Has the death by hanging of those 10 top-ranking Nazis as the result of the action of the international court of justice been a deterrent to international crime? I have my own opinion of course, but Mr. Nasser, Mr. Khrushchev and Mr. Stalin, if he were available, would be more competent witnesses than I.

There is one other aspect of this matter of capital punishment that I believe merits some attention. Respect for law in general is the foundation of our whole system of democracy under which neighbour is able to live peacefully with neighbour. In this connection I wonder, should the government decide to set up a parliamentary committee to study this whole matter of capital punishment, whether one of the directions to that committee should not be to make a study of public opinion on capital punishment? When I say "public opinion" I mean just that. I do not mean the officials and the lawyers of the crown; I do not mean only the psychiatrists, the penologists and the welfare workers; I mean plain John Doe who is quite likely some day to find himself a member of a jury trying somebody for murder.

I make this suggestion because my study of the effectiveness of capital punishment has made one thing clear to me. In my previous remarks on this matter I mentioned that there was a time in the United Kingdom when more than 100 crimes were punishable by death. Members may be of the opinion that it was the professionals, the lawyers, the parliamentarians, the crown officials, who cut that vast total down to the comparatively few that remain today, but I differ because I firmly believe that it was the plain Jones, Smiths and Browns who sat on these cases as jurors who forced the change. With their power they refused to bring in verdicts where the law said that the crime merited death. Their constant refusal to convict in capital offences was, in my opinion, one of the great factors in bringing about moderation in the British concept of justice.

I do not intend to interpret what is in the minds of the men who make up the juries in Canadian courts of criminal law today, but it does seem to me that there is an increasing tendency to bring in a verdict of manslaughter when even 10 or 15 years ago the same set of facts would have resulted in a verdict of murder and probable death by hanging. It seems to me that there would be a great deal of merit in studying the facts of the so-called murders of recent years and the verdicts of the juries who were best acquainted with these facts. Out of such a study I think a pattern would emerge that would be the best indication of the actual thinking of the Canadian people today.

With such information before us I believe that we could place a measure of punishment on our statute books that the Canadian people more nearly believed to be fitted to the crime. By doing so we would increase respect not only for the law as it applies to murder but also for all laws, respect for which is so essential to Canadian community living.

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that I am very much surprised at the source of this bill. The sponsor of the bill is well known in the political life of Canada and for many years before being associated with the political life of Canada was well known in the political life of my home province of British Columbia. It is not many years ago, Mr. Speaker, since the group to your left advocated that all the rich should be shot and everybody with a buck should be machine gunned.

Mr. Winch: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I ask that that be withdrawn. We are a democratic party. Mention was made of myself. For 20 years I had the honour of being member of the British Columbia legislature and for 12 years of that time I was leader of the opposition. I deny that I or the members of this party have stood for violence at any time. We have always stood for our democratic constitution. I ask, sir, that the hon. member withdraw his most despicable implication that either I or this party have ever stood for persons being shot by machine guns or in any other way. I ask, sir, that that statement be withdrawn immediately.

Mr. Speaker: So that I may be clear, would the hon. member indicate exactly what words he complains about?

Mr. Winch: Well, I have not got Hansard but my hon. friend—I am going to withdraw that—the member who has just spoken made a statement about myself with reference to the years when I served in the legislature of British Columbia to the effect that we had a policy that the rich should be killed in certain ways I am not going to mention. I ask that that be withdrawn immediately and that an apology be made not only to myself but to my party in the house.

Mr. McPhillips: In speaking to the point of order, may I say that I made no remark that the hon. member for Vancouver East was personally involved. I was dealing with the policy of the group to your immediate left some years ago.

Mr. Winch: Then as a representative of that group—

[Mr. Rynard.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: —I deny that any such policy has ever been followed in British Columbia or in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: One at a time, please. The hon. member will please complete such explanation as he wishes to make about what he said.

Mr. Regier: On the point of order, I very definitely heard—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) had finished what he wanted to say. He may wish to modify or withdraw in view of what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. McPhillips: Mr. Speaker, I was not dealing with any particular hon. member. I was simply dealing, and I submit I am entitled to my opinion, with the policy some years ago of the group that sits to your left which I contend was as I have outlined, and I must admit that is what upsets me. It has deteriorated so greatly that I wonder why they now turn pale at the old British practice of hanging.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria has explained that his remarks were not intended to refer to the hon. member for Vancouver East but to a group of which the hon. member is one. Undoubtedly the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria have given offence to the hon. member for Vancouver East and, having that in mind, perhaps he would wish to modify what he has said before I indicate my views about the remarks that were made.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think the hon. member for Victoria has given a very adequate explanation of his words and I do not think a question of privilege has been raised. There were no personal remarks referring to the hon. member who has raised this objection. Surely the hon. member for Victoria has a right to express his conviction with respect to what he thought was a policy of a political party.

Mr. Speaker: What I said was that perhaps in view of the offence that has been taken by the hon. member for Vancouver East at what was said the hon. member for Victoria would wish voluntarily to modify what he has said. I am not directing or deciding anything at the moment. Perhaps the hon. member may wish to do so.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I am asking more than that.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Vancouver East please contain himself while we hear whether the hon. member for Victoria has anything further to say on the point.

Mr. McPhillips: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would go this far. I did not mean to imply that the hon. member for Vancouver East would have done any shooting but I still contend that I am entitled to express my impression of the policies of the group to your left some years ago.

Mr. Winch: May I rise again, Mr. Speaker? Very definite mention was made not only of me but of the group which sits to your left. You will remember that that was done and that a statement was made about policy. I am a founding member of the group which sits to your left which was established in 1932. I am very proud of it and of having had the honour of being one of the first C.C.F. members ever elected to a parliament in Canada. Therefore I ask for a retraction not only as far as I am concerned as an individual but for the group I represent because the hon. member made the definite statement that we had a policy of violence, murder and shooting. I am asking that that be retracted not only with reference to myself but on behalf of the party I have had the honour to represent in one parliament or another since 1933.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Vancouver East is taking more out of what was said than was implied. I remember quite distinctly that although the hon. member for Victoria began talking about the hon. member for Vancouver East, when he made the statement about a policy of shooting capitalists it referred rather generally to a group or party. It has been the practice in the house, as the hon. member will recall, that unless an allegation is made specifically against a member I have not felt it to be my responsibility to compel the hon. member to retract beyond what he himself feels he should retract.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to you, sir? We in this group as members of the C.C.F. are members of a democratic party, and one cannot be a member of a democratic party in this country if one's party is a party of rebellion, of murder or of bloodshed. I ask you, sir, if we as members of the C.C.F. party in this house cannot ask you to have withdrawn that kind of aspersion and vilification against our party?

Mr. Speaker: I have already expressed my view and of course what the hon. member has just stated is not what was said. It was perhaps a rather strong metaphor indicating that a party was opposed to capitalism but I did not read into it, and I do not think the hon. member should read into it, any allegation that he himself is in favour of violence.

Mr. Winch: Or the C.C.F.

Mr. McPhillips: In any event, I find it somewhat surprising that this group now pales at the old historic process of British hanging. I have always believed, as I believe now and as I think I will always conscientiously believe, that the hangman is an influence for good. I have formed that conclusion over a number of years—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member thinks the hangman should also be the prosecutor.

Mr. McPhillips: As a practising lawyer I have acted for the defence in capital cases, and I have also prosecuted for the crown in capital cases. In my province this year we are celebrating our centenary and in some of the publicity about it, in dealing with our history, some misguided persons have referred to the late Chief Justice Sir Matthew Baillie Begbie as the hanging judge.

Sir Matthew Baillie Begbie was no more a hanging judge than any other judge; judges are only hanging judges because they must pronounce the sentences provided by the criminal law of Canada. I want to refer in the course of my argument to one way in which that long since deceased judge was able to effectively influence a large group of people. This incident occurred many years ago during the Fraser river gold rush at the then city of Yale where some 2,000 unruly miners who were in the habit of wandering around fully armed, usually carrying two guns and a bandolier of shells—they were not British Columbians for the most part—

An hon. Member: C.C.F.'ers?

Mr. McPhillips: When the chief justice arrived in Yale with the British Columbia police chief—and in those days the British Columbia police consisted of one man, Chief Chartres Brew—there was rowdyism going on, but the chief of police managed to get order. The chief justice got up on a stump, and with his rather stern visage, surveyed this group of rather lawless individuals and, having obtained order, he said "Now, gentlemen—" —I think he was very kind—"I just want to make one observation, and that is this, if there is a shooting I can assure you there will be a hanging." That had a great effect amongst that group of lawless people and there were very very few capital cases in that area.

I would like to speak for a moment or two on my experience in the courts of law in regard to capital cases. When one acts for the defence in a capital case one is always nervous and there is a great deal of tension involved, but I must admit that I cannot remember ever thinking or hoping that because of this nervousness and tension the sentence of hanging should be abolished. That has never entered my mind. In prosecuting for the crown one is in a different position; there is not the same responsibility or duty on the prosecutor for the crown. He must not struggle for conviction—we simply produce the evidence and the verdict of the jury is what governs. It is not and it never has been under our system of criminal jurisprudence easy to get a conviction for murder.

I can think of one instance in the year 1944 when I conducted an assize for the crown in the city of Vancouver, and on the docket we had four murder cases. There was one conviction and one hanging; there was one acquittal and there were two manslaughter verdicts. One man got a fairly heavy sentence and the other a fairly light sentence. I think most practising lawyers will agree that this is about the average for these cases.

I know, and this is confirmed in the joint committee report of 1956, that there are those who think innocent men may be hanged, but I think this possibility is very remote. Those of us who practise in the courts of Canada know that with all the protection that a British court of justice places around an accused person—and this I conscientiously believe—it is almost impossible for an innocent man to be found guilty of murder and subsequently hanged.

We also have those who refer to the horror of the hanging itself. It must after all be remembered, however, that a hanging only follows a conviction and while it may be said that it is a horrible affair and a degrading affair, murder is also a degrading affair. I think we must keep in our minds the proper perspective of the conviction and the subsequent hanging. Once there is a conviction of murder the subsequent hanging is something with which we do not need to concern ourselves too much.

In the report of the joint committee of 1956 it was pointed out—and I think this is very significant—that in every case the law enforcement officers of the provinces, with the sole exception of Saskatchewan, were of the opinion that the death sentence for murder should be retained.

As I said in opening my remarks, my experience has led me to believe that the hangman is an influence for good. We are, after all, dealing with murder and we need not worry about cases of homicide committed in a moment of passion because a British jury will never bring in a verdict of murder there—that is manslaughter. We need not worry about cases of justifiable homicide because they result in acquittal. My experience is not as large as that of some others, but I believe you only get a verdict of guilty from a British jury when it is a case of cold-blooded murder and I contend that if it is a case of cold-blooded murder the hangman has his proper place and it is a good thing for the country that this system exists.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a rather curious position in disagreeing with practically everything that has been said by a member of my own party and agreeing substantially with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). This is one of those rare occasions on which I think we agree. I agree with him to the extent that I do not think the deterrent aspect of capital punishment can be established. I have received the reports of the joint Senate and Commons committee on capital punishment and of the royal commission in Great Britain. Nothing in that evidence has led me to the conclusion that the deterrent aspect can be upheld. The same thing goes for the arguments advanced with regard to the protection of the police. For other reasons I reject out of hand the attempts to relate statistics, in terms of their unreliability, saying for example that 15.9 murders occurred per 100,000 people in certain areas and comparing that figure with the figures for certain other areas.

In my opinion the factors at work to bring about the conditions leading to murder cannot be simply put through an I.B.M. machine and an effective argument produced. Arguing from the point of view that capital punishment should be abolished, I should like to say that in my opinion I do not think our legal system as presently constituted or as it is expected to be changed can reach a sufficiently certain conclusion to justify the taking of a man's life. A man's life is something far more important than any other factor or than any other event that can occur in any of our lives.

Let us look at the situation concerning the structure of the law and what is involved in the trial. We have the judge and his attitude and influence. If he has certain tendencies which would tend to prejudice his position and direct the attention of the jury to a verdict of guilty of murder, how can those tendencies be detected? If they are detected, how can they be corrected under our present system? Yet I believe that in some cases this attitude on the part of judges exists. My friend the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. McPhillips) mentioned prosecutors. Prosecutors in the main have considerable experience in the treatment of such cases. They can bring to them background, they have experienced assistants and facilities to gather a prodigious amount of evidence.

Mr. Winch: Leading to conviction?

Mr. McGee: Not necessarily; and here we are disagreeing again. On the other hand the defence, in the case where the defendant is not a rich man or if a cause celebre is not involved, is most likely to end up with legal aid and in that case, I submit, with a counsel who is not as experienced as is his counterpart the prosecutor. From my observation, my readings and my research in this matter, I am led to believe that in the great majority of cases the odds are loaded against the defendant in a murder trial on that basis alone. Then we come to the jury and I can speak with some more authority, if you like, in this regard, having served on two consecutive murder juries a few years ago.

An hon. Member: Did you convict?

Mr. McGee: As a matter of fact, for the record, in both cases we did bring in a guilty of murder verdict. In both cases the guilty of murder verdict was appealed. In both cases the verdict was disallowed and the appeal was granted on the basis of misdirection on the part of the judge. In one case the charge was reduced to manslaughter in a subsequent trial, I believe, and in the second case the man was committed as being insane. Yet within that framework, within the framework of the law and the structure of the law as it exists and as it was put to us, there was virtually no alternative to the verdict which we in fact brought in.

But there are other aspects of this matter of the jury that I think bear discussion and mention here. One is the presence of people of sadistic inclination. I can draw no other conclusion from the result of a jury vote, having acted as foreman of the jury. When the votes and slips and paper were handed to me at a certain stage of our deliberations I found that one of the members of the jury had drawn a sketch of a man hanging from a scaffold. Does that indicate a normal and reasonable attitude to this subject on the part of the juror? There is the question of the ability of jurors, on the basis of the selection presently carried out, to cope with the complicated medical and psychiatric evidence where you have, as happened in one case, three and four psychiatrists offering authoritative medical opinion. During the greater part of that time a substantial percentage of the jury were not aware of what any of those doctors were talking about. They all reached a different conclusion, all for some excellent and impressive sounding medical reasons.

The other story, of course, bespeaks attitudes of the men who get to be jurors. I simply offer one example to indicate an approach taken. One of the cases involved an Italian immigrant who had been involved in a knifing. The attitude expressed by one of these jurors was: "I think we should hang him as an example to any other immigrants coming into this country". I do not believe this attitude, this frame of mind, has any place in the consideration, under our system of justice, as to whether a man is guilty or not guilty or whether he should or should not be hanged.

If I may have one moment beyond six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that capital punishment cannot be abolished. Last week we were told in Toronto that a certain packing company has erected a device for disposing of pigs, something which cost them $50,000. This step was largely as a result of effort by humane-minded people to bring about the humane slaughter of pigs. I suggest that if the manner in which we are now executing people found guilty of murder were proposed as a method of disposing of or slaughtering food animals in any slaughter house in this country we would have something approaching revolution on our hands. May I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter concerning every member in this house. For the last hour there has been no member of the cabinet in his seat. I think the government should show more respect for parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: They have the radio system.

An hon. Member: This is the hour for private bills.

On motion of Mr. McGee the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to resume in committee before rising?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

41. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Stabilization Act, $88,390.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, immediately before we adjourned for the private members hour, the hon. member for Welland had asked a series of questions. First, he wanted to have me put on record the different price supports that are established for different vegetables. I have that information here. There are soybeans which are supported at $2.10 a bushel and sugar beets which are supported on a differential basis according to what the prices have been, as laid down by the stabilization act—the average price over the last 10 years. The support price in Alberta is .0099 cents, in Manitoba, .0938 cents, in Ontario, .0798 cents and the same in Quebec. Tomatoes are supported, choice in case, at $5.20 a case; asparagus, Ontario No. 1, 18 cents a pound in Ontario factories and 17 cents a pound at British Columbia factories. Those are the vegetables that are supported.

The hon. member also asked whether, if a price support is established very much below the market price, it does not gravitate down to or near the price support level. If that is the situation I would point out the example of hogs. Hogs have been supported for several years at $23 a hundred. They have varied in price, going up to $35 during that period. At the present time they are supported at $25 a hundred and the present price, as I recall it, on the Toronto and Montreal markets is around $32 a hundred. I think that is an example of the fact that you can have a support price and it does not become a ceiling price, which I think is what was in the hon. member's mind.

These are the questions that I have that the hon. member mentioned. He said something about asparagus. He said: "I know that in the Niagara district that happened in the case of asparagus. For instance, in 1950 asparagus was selling from 22½ cents a pound to 23 cents a pound. I do not know what it was selling for in 1950—"

Mr. McMillan: Pardon me, but I said 1956.

Mr. Harkness: Then the hon. member goes on to say: "In 1957 the price fell about a cent, and when it fell about a cent, members of the minister's party infiltrated among the asparagus—" I do not know anything about any members of my party having infiltrated into the Niagara area. Certainly, I did not send anyone round there, and unlike some of his political associates I have no goon squads, and have never had any. With regard to the remainder of the questions which the hon. member asked, I have not got the sheet and I cannot recall them. Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask his questions over.

Mr. McMillan: Could you tell us the support prices on fruits?

Mr. Harkness: The only support price is on raspberries which, packed in SO2, are supported at 14½ cents a pound at British Columbia factories and in frozen form at 15 cents. This is not fresh fruit. It is put up in SO2.

Mr. Herridge: I had occasion to spend the morning and the afternoon in the veterans affairs committee, so I have not been very much of a nuisance to the minister today but I do rise on this item to bring briefly to the attention of the committee the situation of the British Columbia fruit growers, because I find some misunderstanding and failure on the part of many members of the public in general to realize their need for assistance and the modest nature of the request put forward by the British Columbia fruit growers.

I was advised that about the middle of June they made certain submissions to the stabilization board asking for differential payments for certain tree fruits, and they wanted those submissions to receive the earliest attention as the industry was awaiting the outcome with great anxiety. They also informed me that they would regard this as an indication of the government's intention in the field of price support. I presume that they supplied a number of hon. members with their submission to the board regarding the British Columbia apple crop, 1957, and so on. I will quote briefly from this submission to indicate clearly to hon. members the position of the fruit growers with respect to the 1957 crop.

Before doing that I want to quote the paragraphs in the brief dealing with the cost of production of a packed box of apples and the same applies to the cost of production with regard to other tree fruits in respect of which they have asked for deficiency payments. The submission in this respect reads as follows:

> We have based our estimate of the cost of producing a box of apples on statistics provided by a Canada Department of Agriculture publication called "A Study of Apple Production in the Okanagan Valley of British Columbia 1949", a report of a survey of 153 Okanagan Valley orchards conducted by D. W. Ware, E. D. Woodward and H. W. Trevor during the years 1948-49.

You can see that they arrived at the figures for the cost of production of these various tree fruits on the basis of information contained in a recognized government statistical survey.

With respect to apples they had this to say, and I am simply going to give the summary of their conclusions in each case so that hon. members will be informed of the seriousness of the situation. The summary with respect to apples is as follows:

> The foregoing we believe reveals that B.C. Tree Fruits Limited, under extreme difficulties succeeded in disposing of the whole apple crop produced within the area under the jurisdiction of the Natural Products Marketing (British Columbia) Act. The average net return per box of apples to the producer was 87 cents and the estimated cost of producing a box was $1.79. The final out-turn on the season's operations of producing and marketing the B.C. apple crop was an average net loss to the grower of 92 cents per box.

I believe that clearly indicates the position of the apple growers in British Columbia with respect to the 1957 crop. I turn now to the apricot crop. Again I will read the summary from the brief to save the time of the committee and to put the facts before hon. members. The submission in this respect reads as follows:

> The estimated return per ton to the producer on the 1957 apricot crop will not exceed $69.58, whereas the estimated cost of production per ton was $137.61, leaving a net loss on the season's operation of $68.03 per ton.

That shows the position of the apricot growers and the need for something to be done not only to provide some assistance in the form of deficiency payments for the 1957 crop but the need for something to be done by this government to ensure that the situation is not repeated in future years as a result, shall I say, of unfair competition from certain sources.

I turn now to the question of crabapples. The summary reads as follows:

> The average net return per box of crabapples to the producer in 1957 was an estimated 62 cents and the estimated cost of producing a box was $1.79. The final out-turn on the season's operations of producing and marketing the British Columbia crabapple crop was an average net loss to the grower of $1.17 per box.

That, I believe, clearly indicates the position of the growers who were producing crabapples although that tonnage is not high in relation to apples and some of the other crops.

I come now to peaches. The peach growers in south Okanagan and in some sections of my riding have been facing a difficult problem. The summary in the submission in this respect reads as follows:

> The average estimated net return per ton of peaches to the grower in 1957 amounts to $76.04 against an estimated cost of production of $116.85 per ton, leaving a net loss to the producer of $40.81.

It can be seen that the same situation exists with respect to peach growers as exists with respect to the growers of apples, crabapples and apricots.

We turn now to the final crop for which some assistance is requested and that is prunes. The summary in this respect reads as follows:

> The average estimated net return per ton of prunes in 1957 was $46.14 to the producer against an estimated cost of production of $96.81 per ton, leaving a net loss to the producer of $50.67 per ton.

I have quoted briefly from this submission. I am sure the minister is very well informed of the position of growers with respect to the 1957 crop. Mind you, the greater proportion of these growers are in the Okanagan district but on their behalf I urge that serious consideration be given to their representations which in my opinion are extremely modest indeed in relation to the net loss they have suffered on these various tree fruits. Consequently I urge the minister to make the long expected announcement in this respect as soon as possible because they are all on edge out in British Columbia awaiting word from the minister in this connection.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have always had a very great admiration for the command of English and the precision of word usage on the part of the hon. member for Kootenay West and therefore I was somewhat shocked when he started out by saying he was going to indicate the very modest nature of the request of the British Columbia fruit growers. The hon. member should consult the Oxford shorter dictionary or better still the full edition as to the definition of the word "modest". If he were to do that I doubt very much if he would argue that it is a term that can be properly applied to the requests of the British Columbia fruit growers in respect of the 1957 crop.

If I recall correctly their request was for a subsidy or whatever you may wish to call it in the neighbourhood of $7.4 million which is about as much as the entire fruit crop sold for and I can hardly look upon that as being properly described as modest.

I do not wish to engage in any discussion or argument with the hon. member concerning the extremely complex and difficult situation which exists as far as fruit production in British Columbia is concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: Why not?

Mr. Harkness: If you take the figures produced by the cost of production survey made in 1949 which served as the basis of computation for the figures produced by the British Columbia fruit growers and then apply the index figure for the cost of goods and services in 1949 you still get a price of not much more than $1 for a box of apples and it may even be less. I do not suggest that this calculation gives you a correct figure but I used it for the purpose of this illustration. The figure of $1 is a long way from the figure of $1.79 which I believe was the figure referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West. It runs in my mind that this was the figure the British Columbia fruit growers arrived at as representing their cost of production.

I must say that when cost of production figures are presented to me it does not serve any very good purpose if the figures are out of line and in fact it serves to operate in the reverse because it makes me look with grave suspicion on the whole submission. When you are given what can only be described as a fantastic figure which purports to represent the cost of production of a product it inclines you to examine the whole submission with very great care.

I regret that it has not been possible to announce whatever may or may not be done with respect to the 1957 British Columbia apple crop prior to this time. I do not have with me the file on this matter but in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West I placed on the record the date on which we received from the British Columbia growers the request for assistance with regard to the fruit crop. We wrote asking for further information in regard to the apple crop and it was finally received about ten days ago. We have been considering the matter since it was received. It has not yet been possible—for one reason, namely that, as the hon. member knows, I was away from here some five days preceding last Wednesday and necessarily so—I regret to say, to make a definite determination in regard to this matter prior to this date but I expect it will be done in the very near future.

Mr. Herridge: Briefly, in reply to the minister, last evening the minister in reply to a certain statement I made said "I am a very modest person." I use the word "modest" in exactly the same sense.

Mr. Harkness: You asked me whether I had not been hiding my light under a bushel.

Mr. Herridge: When one reads the whole story of the requests from the British Columbia fruit growers association for assistance from the federal government over the years, I think it is quite fair to say that their requests have been very modest indeed. The assistance given to the British Columbia fruit growers association to date for a box of apples produced in British Columbia since assistance was first given is, as the minister knows, only a fraction of a cent a box.

Anyway, in conclusion, I do hope that the minister reaches his decision as soon as possible and I am quite confident, knowing the officers of this association for a good many years, they did present a submission which, based on facts, justifies serious consideration by this government.

Mr. Benidickson: I note with pleasure that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand is acting as chairman of this committee. It is very appropriate when we are discussing an agriculture estimate. Has the Minister of Agriculture the figures available as to exports and imports between Canada and the United States with respect to the apple crop of both countries?

Mr. Harkness: We have not those figures here, Mr. Chairman, but I can say roughly—this is confirmed by my officials here—that over the past 10 years we have exported about twice as many apples to the United States as we have imported from them.

Mr. Benidickson: It may not be appropriate on this item, but would the minister consider it and give me in somewhat broad terms the relationship of the exports and imports with respect to potatoes?

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member would wait a moment the officials think that perhaps they can look it up. We can go on with something else and I will come back and answer it.

Mr. McMillan: Has the minister any figures as to amounts paid out under the Agricultural Stabilization Act?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, there was tabled in the house a short time ago a report of the operations of the Agricultural Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Prices Support Act for the end of the last fiscal year. Most of that was in connection with the Agricultural Prices Support Act, because the stabilization act came into effect only on March 1, so there is only a month of the stabilization act figures in that report. We have really no figures that I can give the hon. gentleman as to the cost of operations since that time. I might say that most of the operations have been purchase operations. We have purchased various commodities and we have not yet resold them; therefore we do not know what the cost will be. The other operations are ones in which we have guaranteed a deficiency payment. In other words, we have guaranteed a certain support price and if the commodity is sold at less than that support price we will make up the difference. We have not had any results of the sales yet, therefore we have not paid out anything under those programs. As a result I am not in a position to give any figures as to what the cost has been up to the present time.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister give the committee some idea of those commodities which are now being supported at prices higher than the current market price? I would think that in regard to hogs, steers and lambs the support price is so much lower than the market price that it is not likely the floor price will be paid during the present year. I would like to know what commodities are being supported at the present time at prices below the market price and what commodities are being supported at prices higher than the market, and what commodities are being purchased? The minister referred to some commodities which are now being purchased and that other commodities have support prices. I think we can get some idea, at any rate, as to what commodities in fact are likely to have some real support under this act.

Mr. Harkness: To begin with, Mr. Chairman, only one of those commodities under the stabilization act has real support under it. I am glad to say that so far as the majority of those commodities is concerned, the present market price is above the support price.

Mr. Benidickson: Every product.

Mr. Harkness: No, not every product. In the majority of products it is above the support price. The hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned cattle, sheep and hogs. I might say there is a great deal of, we will say, perturbation amongst a large number of hog men to whom I have spoken in the past month as to whether the price will not go down to the support price this fall. I sincerely hope that it does not go down to the support price, but nevertheless, as I say, there is a great deal of fear on the part of a large number of hog producers that that will be the situation and they are extremely glad that the support price is at $25 a hundred rather than at $23 a hundred.

As to the specific question of what commodities are supported above the market price, they are butter, cheese, skim milk, wool and, until very recently, eggs. Eggs are now, I am glad to say, above the support price; but all of these commodities have been or are above the ordinary market price; that is, the support price is above the ordinary market price and we are buying them as a result of that.

Mr. Argue: For example, butter is supported at 64 cents a pound. Can the minister tell us how much that is above the market price?

Mr. Harkness: Naturally, as the hon. gentleman knows, if we are buying butter at 64 cents, that keeps it at 64 cents. It is not allowed to fall below 64 cents. If there was no support price there I do not like to venture to predict what the price of butter would be, but I know it would be a great deal lower. The hon. member knows that butter is selling in London, England, probably the greatest world market there is for butter, at 23 cents a pound.

Mr. Benidickson: We have just passed the first third of the fiscal year for obligations under this act. Has the minister any estimate of gain or loss or whether we are ahead or behind with regard to the act in the first third of the current fiscal year?

Mr. Harkness: It is impossible to be ahead from a financial point of view as far as this act is concerned. Any estimate that would be made would be an estimate of how much was paid out under the act, and that is the type of estimate which I think the hon. gentleman realizes it is impossible to make. If the general world price of eggs, for example, drops to 50 per cent of what it is at the present time our obligations with respect to eggs are going to be very heavy but if the general world price of eggs remains at about what it is at the present time and we do not have terrific over-production of eggs—

Mr. Benidickson: Eggs are above the support price.

Mr. Harkness: They are at the moment. They were not until about a week or two ago. I just take that as an example. If we do not have a big over-production of eggs in Canada then the cost will not be too great, and the same thing applies to every other commodity. If the general price at which hogs can be exported to the United States fell below $25 a hundred then our obligations under this act would again become very heavy but as long as we can still export a certain amount of pork to the United States and their price remains about at the level it is now we are not going to have to pay anything under the stabilization act. As I say, this applies to every commodity. It depends entirely on how the general outside market for goods goes and what the supply of those goods is in Canada during the particular season.

Mr. Benidickson: I can quite understand that the Minister of Agriculture would not be able to tell us, for instance, what the relative holdings of products under stabilization prices were as of yesterday, which was the end of the fourth month of the current fiscal year, but perhaps as of a month ago he might be able to tells us in relation to the previous year what were the stocks of the products that it was necessary to purchase under the price stabilization act.

Mr. Harkness: We have quite a list of stocks. I understand the hon. member wants the stocks we hold at the present time compared with the stocks held at some previous time. The stocks held at the present time are as follows—

Mr. Benidickson: What date?

Mr. Harkness: July 25. Butter is roughly 59 million pounds. It is split into four different types of butter but when they are added together it comes to roughly 59 million pounds. With respect to dry skim milk, spray process, 1957-58 purchases up to May 1, 1958, were 14,801,000 pounds and 1958 purchases after May 1, 1958 were 24,362,000 pounds or a total of 39 million pounds. The figure for roller process was 5,394,000 pounds. These are rough figures. The figure for cheese was 5,639,000 pounds. Eggs, frozen whole, owned by the board totalled 3,194,000 pounds. Grade A large oiled eggs totalled 59,965 cases and eviscerated fowl totalled 831,000 pounds. These are the stocks which we hold at the present time.

Mr. Benidickson: I was asking for a comparison with the year before if they were similarly supported a year ago.

Mr. Harkness: Unfortunately we do not have those figures here. As it happens, these figures just go back to March 11.

Mr. Benidickson: That is satisfactory. I will put a question on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister tell us the names of the members of the advisory committee, how often the advisory committee has met and what is their remuneration or what expenses of members of the committee are paid?

Mr. Harkness: Unfortunately I have not got a list of names here but I think we can reconstruct it quite readily. The members are Mr. Dewar from Prince Edward Island, Mr. Lutes from New Brunswick, Mr. Lemoine and Mr. Ferron from the province of Quebec, Mr. McCague and Mr. Hill from Ontario, Mr. McAllister from Manitoba, Mr. Turnbull from Saskatchewan, Mr. Don McKinnon from Alberta and Mr. Ellison from British Columbia.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say what these people are paid for the time they spend at meetings and how many meetings of the advisory board have been held?

Mr. Harkness: There has been a change recently in this regard and I was trying to get it straight in my mind. The members of the board were paid $35 a day for expenses plus their transportation expenses. They represented that they did not find this sufficient to cover their expenses and it has now been changed to $35 a day plus their expenses.

Mr. Argue: I am sure no one in the committee has any objection at all to the amount that the minister has stated is being paid to the members or the committee. Can the minister say how many meetings have been held and how many days have been occupied in sessions of the board.

Mr. Harkness: Two meetings of the board have been held so far lasting two to three days each. Another meeting of the board will be held on the sixth of this month.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say when the first meeting was held?

Mr. Harkness: It was convened, I believe, on the fourth of March.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, this is certainly a very important act we are discussing. It is the whole basis of support for the agricultural industry with the exception of the initial prices that are provided under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. The support prices or floor prices now being paid represent the government's action toward implementing its election promises. In parliament and outside parliament the Conservative party has advocated adequate parity prices for many years. The Prime Minister has referred many times to two motions he moved in the house when he was in opposition calling for parity prices. Therefore the support prices under this legislation, and there are quite a number of them, are the government's answer to the promises it made to the Canadian people.

In the act passed last year a number of references were made to the cost of production and it was provided that in establishing support prices under the legislation consideration had to be given to the cost of production. As a matter of fact, prices were to be based on the cost of production. I should like to know what studies have been made in the department to determine the cost of production and what the minister might say is the cost of production for some of the important commodities that have support prices under this act.

There is a feeling amongst farm organizations and there is a belief amongst some of the members of the advisory committee which the minister just named that there is little or no regard to the cost of production in establishing prices under this act. I think that producers in the main would agree with me when I say that those prices are not satisfactory prices to the producers in that, generally speaking, they are not sufficiently high to cover the cost of production and to give the farmer a fair return on his investment and his labour. I am very much interested in finding out from the minister how the board is guided by the cost of production, what figures are used and what studies have been made to determine the cost of production of those various commodities.

Mr. Harkness: In connection with the first statement which was made by the hon. member as to parity prices, I should like to draw to his attention and to that of all the other hon. members of this committee that when his bill was under discussion last year I never used the term "parity prices" except to comment on the remarks made by the hon. member and other members of his party and of the Social Credit party in the house. At that time when I introduced the measure I made it very clear in every speech I made in connection with this matter, both in the house and during the election campaign, that I had deliberately avoided the United States system of support prices on the basis of what are known as parity prices. Over and over again I emphasized the fact that in my opinion and also in that of a large number of United States farmers the United States parity price system had proved to be one of the most colossal failures in history and that we were not going to introduce in Canada any system of that kind. I therefore do not think that the hon. member should say that I or others represented that this was a parity price system.

Mr. Argue: I said that the Prime Minister promised parity prices.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member knows that we fought the election as far as his part of the country was concerned, as he did, on the farm stabilization bill. He also knows what the results were. Certainly there was no question that we were introducing a parity price system such as that which exists in the United States and which most people have in mind when they talk about parity prices. There was never any suggestion of it.

As far as the cost of production is concerned in determining what these prices shall be, I think everybody knows that this is a fact. The determination of the cost of production as far as any particular commodity is concerned is an extremely difficult matter. First of all, I had better say this. Some studies in this connection are going on in the economics division of the department. In all cases we have attempted to take the cost of production into consideration and to relate the price set to the cost of production. But I must say that the amount of definite and precise information available as to what the cost of production is for most commodities is limited. That is not true for all commodities but for most commodities the information available is sketchy. What we have done is to take the cost of production figures which have been supplied by producers of the different commodities and we have examined those figures and we have applied certain tests to them. As a result, we have tried to arrive at a reasonable cost of production figure.

Just a short while ago there was a little discussion between myself and the hon. member for Kootenay West with regard to the cost of production figures which were submitted by the fruit growers of British Columbia. This is just one example of the extreme diversity of opinion which exists as to what the cost of production of any particular commodity is. But I can assure the hon. member that we have made an effort to determine the cost of production of these various commodities and to relate the support price set to that cost of production.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister could say what the estimated average cost of production of any one of these commodities happens to be. The minister knows that section 2 of the act, subsection 2, says that in prescribing a percentage of the base price, and so on, the governor in council shall be guided by the estimated average cost of production of the commodity, and such other factors as the governor in council considers to be relevant. I think it is fair to ask what is the estimated average cost of production of the commodity which is written into the act and which by the act the governor in council is asked to consider in setting these support prices. There must be some means by which the minister has determined the estimated average cost of production. Nobody perhaps can prove that a given figure is precisely correct in every way but the act does not say that it must necessarily be foolproof; it must merely be the estimated average cost of production.

Mr. Harkness: I have not the figures here in connection with that matter. However, there are one or two of them that run in my memory. I believe that the estimated cost of production of hogs here, we will say up to a month or so ago, was in the neighbourhood of $18 a hundred, live weight; and the estimated cost of production of Ontario wheat, it runs in my mind, was $33 to $34 an acre.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say how the $18 figure was arrived at? Does it include labour? Does it include interest on the farmer's investment? Does it include all of the cost of production figures in a normal accounting sense or is it merely an out-of-pocket cost figure which is a figure that the farmers themselves may sometimes use or consider when they are estimating their cost of production?

Mr. Harkness: I cannot say precisely what all it includes. However, I know it includes things like taxes and interest on money invested and things along that line. I might say that that is the price for the production of hogs in Ontario. The biggest element in the cost of production of hogs, as the hon. member knows, is feed; and the cost of production in western Canada, of course, would be considerably less than that.

Mr. Argue: The figure was $18?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Argue: When you have a support price of $25 a hundredweight at Toronto, I take it, what is the support price at Winnipeg or Regina or Edmonton?

Mr. Harkness: That is one of the very matters which the advisory committee is going to discuss and make recommendations on in their meeting here on the sixth. We have not as yet said what the support prices would be at these various points because the price of hogs was well above and there was no chance within the last few months of this coming into effect. We have therefore delayed setting these levels until there could be another meeting of the advisory committee in order to get their advice in this regard.

Mr. Argue: I think the hog producers of this country would say that the minister's figures for the cost of production are far too low and that if you have an ordinary price differential between Toronto and Regina—a price differential which has prevailed many times in the past—of around $3 a hundred you would get a floor price of $15 a hundred—

An hon. Member: Where do you get your $15?

Mr. Harkness: The floor price is $25.

Mr. Argue: The minister said to me a while ago that in calculating his cost of production that figure was around $18 for Ontario and what I was trying to arrive at was that if the cost of production in Ontario was $18—and the minister now says it is much less in Saskatchewan—a comparable cost of production out there might be $18 less the difference in freight. I will admit that is a very rough way of trying to arrive at it—

An hon. Member: A very, very rough way.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: If the hon. member wants to bark he should stand up.

If the minister wants to give any other cost of production figure for Saskatchewan, well and good. He has the information and I have not, but I think that the hog producers will feel this cost of production figure is very low and that in fact it is a good deal lower than the hog producers would consider it should be. If the cost of production in Ontario is $18 and the floor price is $25, that means that the hog producer in Ontario could of course make a profit of $7 per hundred.

Mr. Harkness: No, it is $18 live weight.

Mr. Argue: Live weight?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, live weight, and as the hon. member knows hogs which are ordinarily 200 pounds will dress out at somewhere around 155, 156 or 157 pounds for a reasonable grade of hog, which means that the cost of production is approximately the same as the support price of $25.

Mr. Argue: That paints a much different picture. I think that is more nearly accurate if the minister is calculating on that basis. In other words, the support price is the cost of production and there is not included in it any real margin of profit. The minister has not yet told me whether it includes labour costs or not.

Mr. Harkness: I think I did tell you that it includes taxes, interest on money invested and so forth and the deputy minister informs me it also includes labour costs. I do not have these figures here, as I say, and therefore I do not think it is very reasonable for me to try to answer in very great detail the questions put to me on this matter, which I think the hon. member will realize. I think I must say, however, that in regard to what he said about raising hogs in Saskatchewan I think I know a good deal more about the raising of hogs than does the hon. member. I have raised probably 10,000 to 20,000 more than he has. I have been in the hog raising business, off and on, for the greater part of my life and I am raising hogs at the present time. I have never at any time raised hogs when the margin of profit was as great as it is today. The hog-barley ratio is just about the best it has ever been in the history of hog raising in this country, and anybody who cannot make money raising hogs at the present time should not be in the hog raising business.

Mr. Argue: The minister has said that it is wonderful today, that it has never been better, but just about five minutes before he said it might drop $8 a hundredweight within the present year.

Mr. Harkness: And it would still be profitable if it dropped that much.

Mr. Argue: In my opinion it would be most unprofitable from the standpoint of the producers who are trying to make a living to try to produce hogs at a floor price of $25 a hundredweight at Toronto. This is $2 per hundredweight better than the floor price Jimmy Gardiner used to have, and we complained bitterly that that floor price was too low. I am sure the hog producers in this country will feel that the floor price which is just $2 higher is not at all adequate.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member will allow me I would like to point out to him that, as I have said, he is speaking about a subject about which I happen to know a great deal more than he does from personal experience and a floor price of $23 a hundredweight would still be much better than the floor price of $23 a hundredweight two, three, four or five years ago, because the price of feed is a good deal lower today than it was at that time and the biggest element in keeping hogs is the price of feed. That is your big cost factor. If you can get your hogs away in five months, for example, you will make more money than a man who takes six months to get them away and, on the other hand, if you get them away in six months you will make more money than the man who has to hold them for eight months. The matter of making money on hogs depends almost entirely on two factors; firstly, the cost of feed and, secondly, how well you feed your hogs and how fast you get them to market and therefore the amount of feed you put into them.

Mr. Argue: What the minister is saying is that the position for the hog producer is a little better now because when the farmer produces grain he can feed to the hogs he can make a profit because grain is not worth as much as it used to be. Of course that is exactly what we have been saying for many years, that the farmer's position has become worse.

Mr. Jones: We are doing something.

Mr. Argue: That is the whole point which concerns us—

Mr. Jones: We are doing a lot more about it than you could ever have done.

Mr. Argue: I would like to quote from the words of Mr. Olaf Turnbull, who is one of the members of this advisory committee. This quotation is taken from the Regina Leader-Post of July 9:

> The Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act is designed to help the large operator and does nothing to prevent elimination of the family sized farm, a member of the advisory committee to the board administering the act said Tuesday.
> Olaf Turnbull told a meeting of the joint board of the interprovincial farm union council that the act aids the big operator and "lets the devil take the hindmost."

I think those are far stronger words than I have used tonight and this is a man who is in a position of authority. He is a member of the advisory board and he makes this statement about the act.

I am prepared to give the government and the minister any and every credit wherever there has been an increase in the support price to the extent that the floor price for hogs is higher—I give the minister credit for that—but I do submit that the floor prices under this act are not in keeping with the terms of the act itself at least so far as farm organizations have understood the act.

The farmers' union presented a brief to the government, I believe dated May 28, in which they complained that the cost of production was not considered as it should have been in establishing these prices. The minister has said that the election in western Canada was to some extent fought on the circumstances surrounding this act. That is true, but I would like to ask the minister when were the support prices established under this act and when was the announcement made as to the price levels under the act?

Mr. Harkness: I think the first prices announced under this act were on April 7. I could have announced some prices before that; at the time the act came into effect and was proclaimed on March 1. Had I announced the prices at that time my hon. friend would have gone around the country saying what he said in the House of Commons just before we adjourned, that the prices set under this act before the election were political prices, that they meant nothing but were just put in there for political purposes. I thought it would be better, therefore, not to set any prices before the election was over and thus avoid any controversy along that line. The prices I would have announced would have been these prices: 107 per cent, 110 per cent, 110 per cent, 107 per cent, 107 per cent, 84 per cent, 80 per cent and 110 per cent. These were the prices we had arrived at and could have announced immediately after the act was proclaimed and the stabilization through the advisory committee was first made on March 4, 5 and 6.

We could have announced those prices. The members of the advisory committee were very surprised that I did not announce the prices because those prices were all considerably above average for the 10 years which included what the farmer looks upon as the best years he has had as far as prices are concerned, namely 1947 to 1950. Had I announced them, the hon. member would have complained ever since that I had announced them for political purposes and attributed the defeat of many of his colleagues to the fact we had put out those prices. I did not announce them because I did not want a lot of political controversy associated with these prices.

Mr. Argue: I do not know how the minister can have it both ways. He says the reason the other parties did not do so well was because of the support prices, and then he says the support prices were not announced until after the election. I made a statement during my campaign that as far as I was concerned the main commodities most people were producing would not have floor prices set above the market price, with perhaps the exception of butter, and I think that statement has been borne out. The government says it did no want to take advantage of other parties by announcing these prices in advance. This is a strange statement for the government to make when, as the minister has said, there are only four commodities whose prices are set a the moment above the market price. Certainly the floor prices on most commodities are below the market prices.

The minister has said he has never advocated parity prices. That may be true. The minister, perhaps, has never used that term—has never advocated it—but if the minister has not, certainly the Prime Minister has, and the Prime Minister has been very clear in this respect.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member give us his definition of a parity price?

Mr. Argue: I would think that the definition of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which is based on the period 1926 to 1929, would be an acceptable definition. They have had very excellent economists go into the whole theory of parity prices, and they have come up with that as a formula. Of course, if the Prime Minister were in the house I could ask him what a parity price is. Perhaps he will come down and grace us with his presence when we are talking about parity prices and the many promises he made during the election.

At Kipling on May 17, the Prime Minister is quoted in the Regina Leader-Post as follows: "By electing a Conservative government, he said, farmers would get parity prices." The Minister of Agriculture says no. In the Regina Leader-Post of May 18 the Prime Minister is again reported as saying:

"I urged this system of parity prices in 1941 in a resolution in the house . . . but every Liberal member voted against it."

The Canadian Press reported in the Ottawa Citizen of June 10, 1957, as follows:

He (The Prime Minister) promised that if a Conservative government is elected he will call a September session of parliament—

I believe he did that.

—to set up a system of floor prices for agricultural produce based on parity, cash advances for farm stored grain and a new loan scheme to aid young farmers.

So I think it is perfectly clear that while the Minister of Agriculture has not been known as a supporter of parity prices the position of the Prime Minister over the years is clear. He has been a complete advocate of parity prices. However, in the legislation we are now discussing there is no formula for the establishment of cost of production and with the exception of some very rough estimates on a few commodities neither the minister nor the board have adequate figures in this regard.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak on this item, but as a small hog producer and a new member of the House of Commons I must say I am greatly amazed at people in this house representing constituencies and trying to be, or being, spokesmen for agriculture and knowing as little about it as they appear to me to do.

The Minister of Agriculture definitely stated that he thought the cost of production of hogs was about $18 live weight. He definitely said "live weight". The hon. member for Assiniboia walked right into the trap. He does not know anything about hog production or prices. He does not know that a hog is sold on rail grade and that a good pig rail grades 75 per cent of live weight. And yet he wanted to be a good spokesman on the cost of raising pigs; he wanted to be the spokesman in this house for hog producers of western Canada. Yet he knows nothing whatsoever about hog producing.

Then the hon. member went on to read us what Mr. Turnbull had said about the present floor price on hogs. He said Mr. Turnbull had said it was only going to favour the large producers. I may add just as a point of interest that Mr. Turnbull himself is considered one of the largest producers of hogs in Saskatchewan.

Then he went on to say what the interprovincial farmers' union had to say about support prices on hogs. He said that on May 28 they said it was not high enough, and they still said it was not high enough. I met the interprovincial farm union on May 28. They said that the floor price was not high enough.

But what did they say about a month ago when they were down here? They said: Look out. We are going to have too many hogs.

They were contradicting themselves somewhere along the line, because you cannot have a floor price that is too low and still get too many hogs. I will point out that the supply of hogs is good this year. We have an abundance of hogs, and it must be remembered that as soon as you have a supply of something—particularly hogs—and I speak for the hog farmers, because I am one myself; a farmer is not going to produce something he is losing money on—or when there is an over supply they must be making their cost of production. As a farmer, I can tell you that you do not have to have a formula to know that when there is an overflow of something the farmer is getting cost of production out of it. I would advise the hon. member for Assiniboia, if he wants to speak on hogs, to begin raising some in his spare time and learn something about them.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to delay these proceedings beyond a few moments but I do ask the indulgence of this committee for a brief space of time in order to discuss a question which arises from this vote and which is of tremendous importance to western Canada.

Should I require some justification for taking these few moments I would remind the committee that the hon. members for Laurier and Bonavista - Twillingate took several hours of the time of this committee in this discussion to talk about the fate of one man. I would also remind the committee that the hon. members for Skeena and Assiniboia spent several hours this afternoon discussing cold storage plants.

Again I would remind the committee that the hon. member for Kootenay West treated us to a lengthy dissertation last evening with respect to a certain rooster and this evening he treated us to another dissertation with respect to prunes. May I also remind hon. members of the committee that we have had considerable discussion this evening with respect to hogs. Indeed, this might go down in history as hog night.

I wish to discuss a subject that vitally affects several thousand farm families in western Canada and surely in the light of what has taken place yesterday and today during the course of this discussion I am fully justified in doing so.

In referring to vote No. 43 I might point out that the hon. member for Lethbridge and myself are probably the only two hon. members of this house who can speak from experience and from a background concerning irrigation. We have a very intimate knowledge of, not only the practice of irrigation, but the problems of irrigation and it is my hope that in the next few moments I may be able to say something with respect to those problems.

We have in southern Alberta approximately 500,000 acres now under irrigation and we have a potential of another 500,000 acres with the major irrigation works already constructed. I am not going to elaborate on this, other than to say that this area has many grave problems.

The province of Saskatchewan is on the verge of a tremendous irrigation development. Let me say at once to the Saskatchewan members on both sides of the house that there is no jealousy on the part of hon. members from Alberta with respect to this development. Surely after the promises of the last 25 years; surely after all the work that has been done in the engineering field and surely after the hope that continuously has been raised in the hearts of Saskatchewan farmers, they are definitely entitled to some development with respect to irrigation.

Let me assure hon. members from Saskatchewan that we in Alberta are extremely happy about the irrigation development now projected for the province of Saskatchewan, and we are especially delighted that coupled with it is a power development. Had we in Alberta a similar development, a similar coupling, had we the opportunity to join together power development and irrigation, we would be in a much happier position than we are today.

There is a feeling on the part of many people that if you build a dam, or otherwise impound water, and construct a canal, and from that canal have outlets to spread the water on the land you will immediately find yourself living in a land of milk and honey and all your problems will be over. I say this as an aside, but I have found that conviction in many places. I have found it on this side of the house and I have found it in the office across the hall from the office which I occupy.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I have had many discussions with respect to the future of irrigation in Saskatchewan. He tells me quite spiritedly, that he has made eight or nine trips to the area in which I live, and he has seen the dahlias blooming, the trees budding and the vegetables growing, and he is convinced that when Saskatchewan has its irrigation development all will be well and life will be beautiful.

Let me say at once that irrigation has many problems. Perhaps sometime in the future those of us who know something about irrigation from first hand experience will have an opportunity to outline those problems.

Suffice it tonight to say that the problems are twofold.

First of all there is the problem of the farmer. The irrigation farmer is confronted with a tremendous operating cost. In my own area, the Eastern Irrigation District, centring on the town of Brooks, in the province of Alberta, the farmers pay an annual water rate—that is a rate paid for the use of water—of $2.70 per acre. That is a cost of which the dry land farmer knows nothing.

Our farmers also pay an exceptionally high labour cost for the spreading of the water on the land. They are required to buy much more machinery than a dry land farmer with its attendant expense, and they are also required to pay much higher municipal taxes than apply in dry land areas, this for the reason that bridges must be constructed, roads wash out, and the incidentals of municipal operations in irrigated areas are much more costly than in dry land areas. Therefore, from the farmer's point of view, unless he has a highly specialized cash crop his position is extremely risky.

In my area of southern Alberta, where at least 95 per cent of the irrigation in this country exists at the present time, the districts are very largely farmer-owned. In other words, other organizations that developed these areas in years past found them uneconomic. They found they lost money each year in their operations, and as an escape route turned the areas over to the farmers in those localities.

In so far as my own area is concerned, the Eastern Irrigation District, the Canadian Pacific railway after a very creditable development project, gave the district to the farmers, and also gave them $300,000 to operate it. The railway said, in effect, "We cannot make it go so you try it," and to the credit of the farm leaders in the Eastern Irrigation District, up to the present time, they have been reasonably successful. However, they have found it impossible in recent years, to lay away sufficient funds for the replacement of structures that will ultimately decay or become obsolete.

In our area, and this applies also to areas in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge, many of the structures are wearing out. They have reached the point in their existence when any day they may break or decay, and the farmers who are being served by those structures will find themselves without water.

[Mr. Brunsden.]

What is the future of the replacement of these structures? We talk to our provincial government and receive very little encouragement. I presume that primarily it is a responsibility of the provincial government and yet, if the provincial government does not function in this respect many millions of dollars of farm investment in terms of land development, and farm buildings, will be rendered almost useless because, after all, we do operate in a dry area in the Palliser triangle and there will be a great amount of disaster.

The great need of these irrigation districts, of course, in order to obtain sufficient revenue with which to build up reserves for the replacement of these structures, is industries. We in the Eastern Irrigation District have very few industries. Today we have one sugar beet factory at Taber and my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge has two in his constituency. We are supplying only a very small percentage of the sugar consumed in the Canadian market, yet we are told that that is the limit. We cannot think in terms of sugar beet area expansion. We have, it is true, a few small canneries covering from 100 to 150 acres. We have in our district one dehydration plant and I understand we are to have two. But these small industries add very little in terms of total acreage. What the irrigation districts need are industries, the requirements for which will reach back to a majority of farms in the irrigation districts. Until we are in the position in the older and newer irrigation districts, of being able to establish industries for the processing of the specialized crops grown on irrigated land we shall continually be faced with a serious problem.

You may ask yourself, Mr. Chairman, what is the point of all these remarks?

The point is simply that we have in southern Alberta an experience of some 50 years in irrigation. We have in southern Alberta now a second and, in some cases, a third generation of farmers on irrigated farms. It is stated that it takes three generations of irrigationists to make successful irrigation farm operators. Certainly, a dry land farmer moving to an irrigated farm is a lost soul, and usually leaves the farm in that same state of mind. It is our hope—and I speak now, I think, for all the southern Alberta members—that under vote 43 the experience of our errors—and errors have been committed; there have been many of them, and most of them were committed by the government to which the hon. gentlemen opposite owe allegiance; I refer to nothing specific—yet the experience of the past, regardless of who was responsible for it, may be consolidated, may be reviewed and may be applied to the benefit of the new area, the area in which we are all interested today, namely the new area in central Saskatchewan.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service—

Branch experimental farms, substations and illustration stations—

522. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $240,000.

Mr. Herridge: I happened to miss this item on the main estimate because I did not expect the squall that was going on to pass so quickly. However, I just wish to say a few words on this item because it is of serious importance to a number of my constituents. The minister knows that throughout the years there have been repeated requests from, I think, all of the provinces of Canada for the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all the provinces, to make it dominion-wide, and we in this group supported those requests over the years, as other hon. members have done, including the minister when he was in opposition. I think he made some rather vehement speeches in that respect. We are still of the opinion that if this act were operative across Canada in general it would be to the great advantage of a large number of people, and it would present a great opportunity for its application and utilization.

The minister knows what I am referring to; I mentioned it last evening. I may say, Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised to hear the member for Medicine Hat claiming for a few minutes last evening when he was speaking on these items and also this evening that I was speaking with respect to prunes. I think he mentioned them. Surely, he would not deny me the opportunity to give expression to the views of my constituents and I think he will also acknowledge the fact that I am not given to over-vocalization of my inner thoughts. I mention this because it is of serious importance to a number of my constituents.

As the minister knows, I wrote him some time ago with respect to surveys of an area in my district, namely the Slocan valley, which I referred to last night. I was very pleased with the minister's interest in the matter and his response. We are doing the best we can to get the provincial government to take up the matter with the federal government so that something can be done with respect to those very necessary surveys in the area before any development can be planned.

As I said before, I think a great deal can be done in that respect as a result of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments and the people directly concerned. I can assure the minister that the people in this district would be only too willing to extend their co-operation and assist in every way possible in the development of this valley.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has recommended the introduction of a Canadian national conservation and rehabilitation act. I think there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion. Will the minister inform the committee whether the government is giving consideration to the introduction of legislation of that type, say, at the next session of parliament?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as I have indicated on numerous occasions, we are studying the matter. Whether we will be able to bring in any legislation at the next session I am not yet in a position to say. I might point out, however, that I did not like to stop the hon. member, but this item we are discussing has to do with experimental farms service. I think he is on soil and water conservation.

Mr. Herridge: I thought we were on item 532. I had my say, anyway.

Item agreed to.

532. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage—further amount required, $375,000.

Mr. Herridge: My remarks apply to this item.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

473. Departmental administration, $2,438,212.

The Chairman: The Department of Veterans Affairs, vote No. 473. This item will be found on page 85 of the blue book, the details on page 597. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, while the minister has been appearing before the veterans affairs committee, I am sure he would like to inform the committee of the whole about the progress of the department in recent months.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words. I might say I have been waiting all evening to have this opportunity but sometimes it amazes me to see how slowly estimates pass. Then, in the last few minutes a change took place and they passed very quickly. Of course, we all know that the estimates of my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, are very important and it is not surprising that they took considerable time. I also think that the veterans affairs estimates are most important as well but there is not the controversy over those estimates that we find in the other departments. This is understandable, because veterans affairs estimates have to do with benefits to our veterans in the way of pensions, war veterans allowances, hospitalization and the many other benefits.

We have a great many individuals to deal with in the Department of Veterans Affairs and this is one feature of our department which I would like to emphasize. Our work is dealing mostly with individuals. We have, for instance, pensioners still living from the northwest rebellion of a good many years ago; we have the South African veterans; we have the veterans of world war I and we have the veterans of world war II. We are today a comparatively young nation and we are paying out a very large amount of money for benefits to those veterans.

As I said a moment ago, it does not surprise me that there is very little controversy in connection with veterans affairs.

As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River just mentioned, my department's estimates have already been before the standing committee on veterans affairs. The members of this committee have had the fullest opportunity to meet and question officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs and this has permitted, I am sure, a more detailed examination and discussion of the various items in the estimates and of my department's activities than is possible on the floor of the house. I am sure that this has been a great advantage to the members of the committee.

This has been the first session of the standing committee on veterans affairs and as the minister of that department I am very pleased with the work of the committee under the very able chairmanship, may I say, of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. Many of the members of the committee are new to the house and I have been impressed and gratified with the interest they have shown in the affairs of the department. I am also very pleased with the obvious good will that all members have shown in considering the various problems before the committee. This is bound to result in improvements in the legislation amending the veterans charter and subsequent legislation.

The department's budget for 1958-59, submitted in both main and supplementary estimates, including provision for loans, investments and advances, totals approximately $308 million, an increase of some $17,600,000 over the appropriations for 1957-58. Of this increase approximately $15,600,000 represents increased payments of war veterans allowances and of pension for disability and death, both of these increases being due to legislative changes. Most of the balance of the increase will be found in the provision for the operation of hospitals and administration which is due to higher costs of hospitals and medical services.

Hon. members will recall that effective July 1, 1957 the basic rate for married recipients of war veterans allowance was increased by $18 per month and the maximum annual income ceiling for that class was increased from $1,440 to $1,620 and for those with single status from $840 to $960. Again, effective November 1, 1957 the ceilings on maximum income for both single and married recipients were increased by a further $120 per year and the maximum monthly rate for single recipients from $60 to $70. These amendments, which were only in effect for part of 1957-58, together with the normal increase in the cost of this benefit, account for the additional provision of $9 million for the fiscal year 1958-59.

The increase in the pension vote results from certain changes in the scale of pension awards which became effective July 1, 1957. The legislative amendments provided for an increase in the basic 100 per cent pension payable to a single person from $1,500 to $1,800, and in the case of a married pensioner from $2,040 to $2,400. These changes, together with some further and minor amendments to the Pension Act effective November 1, 1957, are the main factors contributing to the requested increase for 1958-59 of approximately $6,600,000.

Representations have been made to me on behalf of Newfoundland disability pensioners and it is interesting to observe that on April 1, 1949, when Canada took over the Newfoundland pension liability as it existed at the date of union there were 1,816 disability and dependent pensioners, with an estimated annual liability of $779,021. As of June 30, 1958, the corresponding figures are 2,079 and $1,638,356.

The suggestion has been made that these Newfoundland disability pensioners should be treated on exactly the same basis as Canadian pensioners, and with this I entirely agree. In other words, instead of having their British awards of pension supplemented their entire awards should be paid by Canada. While I have every sympathy for these representations and, as I said a moment ago, I agree with them, they necessitate a study of the problem as relating to Canadians domiciled in Canada prior to world war I and world war II who served with the British or allied forces. Their basic awards are supplemented to Canadian rates during residence in Canada, and at the present time the entire subject is under review with the hope that it will be possible to find a solution which will be beneficial to both groups and acceptable to the governments involved.

I mentioned in my earlier remarks that there has been a general increase in the cost of hospitalization and medical services, and provision for the operation of this branch of my department for 1958-59 is some $2 million greater than for the previous year. The general level of treatment activity remains fairly constant but could increase with the advent of the various federal-provincial hospital plans. As I assured hon. members of the house in a recent statement as to the effect of these plans on the treatment of veterans, it is this government's policy that the operation of provincial plans will in no way adversely affect the rights and privileges for treatment to which any veteran is now entitled at the hands of the department.

I might explain to members of the house that the department's treatment requirements are provided for in roughly three ways. As you are aware, the department operates its own treatment institutions in many centres but in those locations where for various reasons it has not been considered desirable to construct departmental facilities arrangements have been made with certain hospitals for the priority use of a number of beds. In all other locations where there is no particular continuing load treatment is provided in any available general hospital at the expense of the department.

I might mention at this time that the department has for some time been studying the problem of the accommodation available for the treatment of veterans in the province of Newfoundland. This is a location where the department had arranged for the priority use of a certain number of beds in existing hospitals, but in the light of our experience, particularly with respect to domiciliary care accommodation, we have felt that this whole question should be considered again and certain recommendations have been submitted to the treasury board which are currently under consideration.

Referring now to the department's hospital construction program, I should explain that the policy is to bring existing accommodation and services up to an acceptable modern standard. In accordance with this policy, there has been a gradual replacement of old and outmoded accommodation but for financial reasons the department has had to restrict its major construction projects so that not more than two are under way at any one time. During 1958-59 the two major projects will be the replacement of outdated accommodation at Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, and at Westminster hospital, London.

There are in the estimates now presented certain increases and decreases in the amounts requested for various services when compared with those provided for the fiscal year 1957-58. In the aggregate, however, the totals of these variations tend to offset one another. In closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I might mention that the requested provision to meet the department's administrative services in general shows little increase over that for the previous fiscal year. This fact shows, I think, evidence of the careful supervision given to that phase of the department's operation costs.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to commend the minister on the statement he has just made and to say how particularly grateful I am to hear the references he has made with respect to the veterans of Newfoundland.

The minister has rightly stated that whatever political lines are drawn, when it comes to the matter of discharging our obligations to our veterans those political lines disappear and we are always at one in wanting to do our very best for our war veterans and their dependants. It is only right that there should be very little controversy with respect to these estimates because they are merely a financial projection of a policy laid down by this parliament and concurred in by all political parties. Since we are at one with respect to the policy we cannot find much ground for disharmony with respect to the financial means of implementing that policy.

The minister referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs, of which I am very happy to be a member, and I would like to concur in what he said with respect to the interest shown in that committee, particularly on the part of members who have been on the committee for the first time this session. There again no political lines are drawn whatsoever and we all try to do our duty to the veterans and to their dependants, also keeping in mind our obligations to this parliament and the public at large. I would like to join with the minister in the tribute he paid to the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, under whose able chairmanship we have I think achieved great harmony and progress.

The veterans legislation, as I said, was brought in in the first place by an all-party committee but it must of necessity be revised from time to time to bring it up to date and in line with the changing times in which we live. I have listened to the figures mentioned by the minister with respect to Newfoundland pensioners and I am not sure if I got them correctly but I think he said in 1949 the number was around 1,816 and that this year it had risen to 2,179. That is a very small increase over a ten-year period and of course in considering that increase we must also consider that time passes quickly and that a number of young veterans of the second world war and of the Korean war are now feeling the results of that service and are perhaps getting to the stage when they feel they should apply for some assistance from the Canadian pensions commission on account of their disability. However, that increase of 360-odd is very small and I think it also reflects the special position in which the Newfoundland veteran finds himself as a result of the system and the procedure to which he is now subjected.

I was very glad to hear the minister say he felt that the pensions of Newfoundland veterans should be paid in full by the Canadian government, like those of other Canadian veterans, instead of first being paid by the British ministry of pensions and supplemented by the Canadian pension commission. I know the argument has been put forward that the Newfoundland veteran is in the same position as veterans who were domiciled in Canada and who served in the imperial forces but there is one very great distinction which I would like to bring to the attention of this house and that is that veterans who were domiciled in Canada and who of their own free will voluntarily bypassed the Canadian forces to return home and join the forces of another country are in a very different position from that of the Newfoundland veteran.

The Newfoundland veteran did not do that; he could not do it because Newfoundland was not at that time part of Canada. He had to serve either in the forces raised and supported by the Newfoundland government or else in the imperial forces of the United Kingdom and he had no opportunity to bypass the Canadian forces so he should not be penalized. I do think that a person who voluntarily adopts a country and settles in it and then when an emergency breaks out sees fit not to join forces which are going to fight to protect that country but goes and fights with the forces of another country, deliberately passes up the benefits which might accrue to those people who fought in the forces of his adopted country. I must again emphasize that the Newfoundland veteran did not do that and he could not do it for the simple reason that Newfoundland was not part of Canada so he did the best thing he could do and joined the imperial forces. The terms of union recognized that fact and it is expressly stated that the Newfoundland veteran would be treated just as though he had served in the Canadian forces.

I have again gone into some detail over this matter because this question of being domiciled and putting a Newfoundland veteran into the same category as people who were domiciled in Canada but who left Canada to join the forces of another country is a quite incorrect picture of the situation. I am very grateful to the minister for his assurance that the problem is under consideration and to hear that the minister is of the opinion which he expressed earlier this evening. I am a bit disappointed that it was not possible to bring down legislation this session in order to correct this particular situation but I do hope it will not be delayed beyond another session.

The minister also mentioned that consideration was being given to the provision of a veterans hospital in Newfoundland and this is something which is very urgently needed. We have no veterans hospital, nor do we have sufficient hospital facilities to take care of our civilian needs. We fully understand the difficulties involved in the setting up of a separate hospital for veterans but I would like to bring to the attention of the minister the hospital facilities at Fort Pepperell and to ask him if he might consider the possibility of acquiring those facilities which may perhaps be available at an early date, and which may be acquired and utilized at a lower cost than would be involved in the construction of a separate building.

Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say one word about our merchant navy. I think every member will recognize that as a country Canada has not done justice to the veterans who served in the merchant navy and who supplied an essential service without which victory could not have been won and without which we could never have maintained our other forces overseas.

I have known many of these merchant navy veterans to die without getting the assistance they needed and which was provided to other veterans no more deserving than they were. I know now of countless merchant seamen who are crippled but who cannot provide for their families and their children as they should like to do. That incapacity has resulted from the hardships and the dangers which they underwent during the war period.

I should also like to include in the merchant navy the unit of the rescue tug service which also played an extremely important part, particularly in Newfoundland and on the Atlantic seaboard. I hope the minister will take into consideration again the legislation which we brought down last year and which gave veterans of world war I entitlement to war veterans allowance if they had served 365 days prior to armistice day in England. I do not believe that we have developed there a sound basis for the awarding of these pensions. I think that the earlier basis, under which the pension was awarded if these people had served in a theatre of war, was much more satisfactory than what we have now. I still maintain that it is not logical to say that a member of the naval force who escorted troop ships across the Atlantic served in a theatre of war and then to say that the soldiers and the veterans in transports were not in a theatre of war. I think that position is most illogical. I hope that we shall see fit before too long to bring in legislation which will qualify anybody who crossed the ocean to England or to Britain, anybody who crossed the ocean on service outside of Canada, to be awarded a pension on the basis that he served in a theatre of war.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman. There may be one or two points that I should like to raise later on because, although I was a member of the veterans affairs committee, it was not possible for me to attend every sitting as I was also a member of other committees sitting at the same time. Consequently, it was not possible to raise in the committee on veterans affairs all the questions one would like to raise. I hope I shall be able to do that later on when the estimates are under consideration?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, my remarks are going to be quite brief this evening. Having been a colleague of the minister on the veterans affairs committee since 1945, along with other members on the committee, I want to say that we were very much pleased when he was appointed minister. We know where his heart lies. We know that he will do all he can to assist the veterans' cause in Canada at this time. If anyone wants really to understand what the minister thinks, all he has to do is to read the minutes of the committee on veterans affairs since 1945. He will then know what the minister thinks about the many problems that are brought to the veterans affairs committee. We all know the minister's attitude towards these problems but our major function is to convince his colleagues that he is right when he is presenting some proposal on behalf of the Legion or other veterans' organizations in this country.

In the minute or two at my disposal I want to express our sincere appreciation of the good work of the senior officials of the department in Ottawa and across the country. The officials of this department are recognized, I think, by all the members of this house as being officials who are particularly and unusually interested in the problems with which they are called upon to deal. I also want to say the same thing with respect to the Canadian pension commission.

I think the request of members of this house over a long period of years for a standing committee on veterans affairs was fully justified by the results of the first sittings of that standing committee this session. The committee contained an unsually large proportion of new members who naturally were not well acquainted with the various aspects of departmental administration and of the legislation concerning veterans. But in the short time that the committee has had to sit this session that situation is rapidly changing; and regardless of party, there is a growing appreciation of the administration of the department and also of the many complicated aspects of veterans' legislation. We had an excellent opportunity to hear from the officials of the department and to ask them any questions that came to our minds or to our attention.

Quite recently the Canadian Legion held its national convention in Edmonton. I was very much interested in reading the speech the minister made to that convention because I think it was a jolly good speech from his point of view. I hope he continues in that vein. In any event, that convention passed a great many important resolutions, a fact which indicates that the veterans and their dependants, branches and zone councils, provincial conventions and finally the national convention have been giving serious study to the many problems that have to be adjusted for all veterans to receive justice in this country in the days to come. Those representations will be made to the government, I presume, officially on some day very close to Remembrance Day. I urge that members of this house, particularly members of the committee, give close study to them when they receive copies of the representations made to the government. Knowing the minister as I do, I am quite sure that those representations will receive sympathetic consideration.

I am going to conclude in a minute or two, Mr. Chairman. However, may I say that I have become extremely optimistic in recent days as to the possibility of progressive legislation. Do you know, Mr. Chairman, that in 1919, under a Conservative government the doors on the washrooms in this building were improperly hung. This government has been in power only about a year and that mistake was remedied this week as a result of representations from a good number of members of parliament who unfortunately had their noses bumped on many an occasion. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that that is an omen of what is going to happen with respect to veterans' legislation and other legislation in the days ahead. I always take these little straws in the wind, Mr. Chairman, as showing the direction in which the wind is blowing. I hope that is a good straw in the wind.

When we meet next session, Mr. Chairman, I hope we shall find in the speech from the throne a good number of amendments to the legislation which will indicate that this government is going to take some further steps to improve veterans' legislation on behalf of the veterans of this country and their dependents.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: I think I have already indicated our interest in the program for tomorrow. I was wondering about the effect of the royal visit on our proceedings.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we intend to take the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs and then those of the Department of Justice. I believe the Prime Minister had intended to make an announcement about an adjournment in the afternoon, and we had in mind that it might suit all hon. members if the house were to adjourn at 4.30 p.m. instead of 6.00 p.m.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: Was Your Honour thinking about getting unanimous consent tonight with regard to the hour of closing tomorrow afternoon?

Mr. Speaker: If the house is prepared to consent now to an order that we rise at 4.30, that would settle the matter. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on July 14.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, August 2, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

TRADE

AUSTRALIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF RELAXATION OF IMPORT CONTROLS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that we have just been advised of new measures of relaxation on imports into Australia from Canada and other dollar countries and as a result, effective yesterday, imports into Australia from Canada of most capital equipment, electrical machine apparatus and appliances are now given equal access to the Australian market in competition with all other suppliers under the Australian import controls. Canadian exports of these products to Australia have been faced with discriminatory restrictions. With the removal of the discrimination in this field we are hopeful that Canadian exporters will be able to increase their shipments to Australia.

Total Canadian exports of the type of products affected amounted to some $40 million last year, of which about $1 million went to Australia. In addition, a number of items have been completely removed from import controls in Australia, including magnesium.

These new measures by Australia are a welcome move in the direction of improved access for Canadian exports to the Australian market, and should make an important contribution to a further strengthening of the trading relations between our two countries.

[Later:]

SALT FISH—REPRESENTATIONS FROM CANADIAN ATLANTIC EXPORTERS ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, subsequent to his announcement to the house yesterday concerning NAFEL, he has received any representations from the Canadian Atlantic salt fish exporters association requesting consideration of some provision for mainland Canadian dealers this year to engage in perhaps even limited interprovincial trade. If so, can he make any comment?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, I have received a telegram from the Canadian Atlantic salt fish exporters association asking that a certain amount of limited interprovincial trade in dry and semi-dry salt fish might be permitted with the Newfoundland organization. This had been made known to us prior to this date, and the interest and representations of the Nova Scotia fishing industry have been given very careful consideration.

When I announced the termination of the exclusive right of NAFEL yesterday, to take effect a year from July 31, I was not able to accede to the request of the Canadian Atlantic salt fish exporters association for the concession they wanted on this occasion—they received a concession in 1954—with regard to some of the products from Newfoundland, and we are prepared to give further consideration to their suggestion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since his announcement yesterday has the minister received any representations from NAFEL?

Mr. Churchill: No, not to this moment, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PUBLICATION OF NEW MANUAL ON ORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to announce the publication of a new manual or a guide entitled "Organization of the Government of Canada", or in French "L'Administration federale du Canada". It contains detailed information on the organization of the federal government, including lists of members of the cabinet, the Senate and the House of Commons, judges and officials of the supreme and exchequer courts of Canada and of the territorial courts of the Yukon and Northwest Territories and top officials of the various departments, boards and agencies of the public service.

Numerous inquiries and requests received during the last few years by the queen's printer from the public, particularly businessmen, university professors and students, have indicated the need for a publication of this kind, where can be found information which is incomplete or difficult to find in other government publications. I venture to say that it is expected to be quite useful to government officials as well as to the public.

The project was first studied and recommended by an interdepartmental committee established by the previous administration, which comprised representatives of the departments of the Secretary of State and of Public Printing and Stationery and the privy council office, the treasury board office and the public archives. After authority for it was given by the cabinet of the day, editing and revision of the text were entrusted to a committee of representatives of the Department of the Secretary of State, the Department of Justice and the privy council office. Incidentally, considerable revision became necessary twice in the course of the preparation and proof-printing as a result of the last two general elections.

There is a bilingual edition for free distribution to those entitled thereto under the regulations governing distribution of government publications, and separate English and French editions for sale to the public. I might add that the queen's printer already has approximately 1,000 orders for this publication, which he is now starting to fill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the government upon carrying out this excellent project which, I say without modesty, I had the pleasure of getting started when I was secretary of state. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this does not mean that this publication is going to supplant the Parliamentary Guide, which I recognize is a private publication but which I believe was always assisted by the government and that it will not be too long before the Parliamentary Guide, which of course never appeared at all for the last parliament, will appear again.*

FINANCE

BUDGET FORECASTS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West, the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the discrepancies between the economic forecasts made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and the forecasts made to the government by its economic advisers as outlined in the recently partially disclosed report "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" and the need for the immediate full disclosure of the contents of this report.

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

Mr. Speaker: It is moved by Mr. Argue, seconded by Mr. Herridge—the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: We have moved this motion for the adjournment of the house, Mr. Speaker, because we have seen in the Toronto Star disclosure of the report on Canada's economic outlook which has been provided to the government by its officials.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I took it that you would be reading the terms of the motion to the house, but you called on the hon. member for Assiniboia. Was that only for the purpose of permitting him to indicate to you what his views are relating to the point of urgency of debate?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. The hon. member simply moved his motion, and I think he should indicate why he feels it is an urgent matter. I would also be glad to hear other members as to the urgency of the matter, which is the important issue at the moment. I would ask the hon. member not to proceed with the motion but to confine himself to the question of whether the house should entertain the matter at this time.

Mr. Argue: I feel that this matter is urgent because disclosure has just been made, and this is the first opportunity we have had to ask for a full debate on the question. The reason we ask for a full debate is our belief, after having heard the budget statement of the Minister of Finance and after having read extracts from the report in the Toronto Star of yesterday, that the house and the people of Canada have been misled by the forecasts of the Minister of Finance. They have been misled by his forecast that inflationary pressures are no longer of great importance, as found on page 1234 of Hansard of June 17, and his forecast of an increase of 2 per cent in the gross national product.

Because of these great discrepancies we feel that the house is entitled to an explanation from the government at this time with respect to why these forecasts were not based on the report, and why these forecasts vary so greatly from the advice given the government by its economic experts. We believe this secret document, which has been referred to in the house so often, should now be disclosed immediately because it has already appeared in the press, and because of the well known attitude of the Prime Minister in the past toward the disclosure of such reports.

We believe there is a question of privilege involved affecting the House of Commons.

* (See further remarks at page 3454.)

Parliament has been refused this report, yet we see it published in a newspaper.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take it that you are passing at the moment on the question of whether there is urgency of debate as applied to this matter within the rules and practice of this house. My hon. friend is asking you to regard this as a definite matter of urgent public importance requiring debate at this particular time. In my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, the motion not only does not fall within the accepted requirements in relation to such a motion but falls very far short of them.

If my hon. friend wishes to introduce this matter into the discussions of the house he will have an opportunity to do so only two days from now, because a supply motion is to be moved on Monday and any hon. member who regards this as a matter meriting the attention of the house will have full opportunity, I take it, to introduce it, if in order, on that motion.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another question which applies to the motion here. The hon. member for Assiniboia seems to be leading up to the point, certainly it was evident in his remarks this morning, of alleging that a certain report which the government received from its advisers should be placed before the house. You, Mr. Speaker, have already had that same question before you and it is standing on the order paper at the present time. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate brought in such a motion about one month ago calling for the production of the same document.

When the discussion opened on that motion for production you ruled that it was not open to debate. Then, following further discussion on the point of order, you ruled that the motion could not be pressed at that point to a vote, and the mover of the motion asked that it be transferred to "Notices of Motions". There it stands now, and will stand until it is reached in the ordinary course. It is to be found on page 16 of today's order paper, item No. 46:

> June 18—Mr. Pickersgill—That an order of the house do issue for a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

It is evidently the same document that the hon. member for Assiniboia is asking to have produced today. It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, in view of the previous proceedings in this house with regard to the same matter and the fact that the question is pending before the house on the order paper, that the motion is out of order on that ground.

There is one further observation I should like to make without trespassing into the realm of the merits of the issue which the hon. member for Assiniboia is seeking to raise. It seems to be implicit in his argument that this is a matter of urgent public importance, that there is some obligation upon the government in relation to advice of certain kinds that it receives from certain officials.

Let me make it quite clear that whatever use the government makes of advice from whatever source, whether advisers within the government or without, the government takes the responsibility for the views it puts before the house; and the government has taken responsibility, and full responsibility, for the views upon which the budget was based when it was introduced in this house on June 17.

Let there be no question about that. The government is not under any obligation to follow the views of any particular official or any particular adviser—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and certainly it will take responsibility for the advice that it chooses to accept and follow. I may say in this respect, Mr. Speaker, that the government chooses sound advice, and—and let me put full emphasis on this—up to the minute advice when it submits the budget to the house. The same is true in relation to all the economic questions that enter into the basis of that budget.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The closing remarks of the Minister of Finance with regard to the responsibility of the government in this matter, Mr. Speaker, make interesting reading in relation to the remarks of his leader last January in connection with the report from the same department in the previous year and the obligations of the government in respect of that report. However, that is not the question we are debating at the moment; it is the urgency and importance of this particular matter.

There is, I believe, no question about the importance of this matter, because an economic analysis was given by the Minister of Finance when he introduced his budget, and he based his calculations on certain statistics. Those have now, in part at least, been rejected by a government report which has, in part, been made public. Quotations from that report have appeared in the press, and they deny the validity of some of the minister's own calculations in the production of his budget. Nothing could be much more important than that.

Perhaps also it is a matter of urgency to correct any misunderstandings which may have been created in the public mind by the inconsistency between these two reports.

Surely it is urgent that this matter should be cleared up. However, Mr. Speaker, if you decide that the urgency is not such as to require a debate at this moment, then surely the urgency for making this report public now has been abundantly demonstrated.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the matter that is sought to be brought before the house is not the production of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", although the last clause in the motion rather indicates that that is sought. There is on the order paper a motion with respect to that report. I shall deal with this motion as a motion to discuss as a matter of definite urgent public importance the discrepancies between the economic forecast made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech and the forecast made to the government by its economic advisers in "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", as outlined in the recently partially disclosed alleged extract from this report.

As the Leader of the Opposition says, there is no doubt that the economic forecast of the Minister of Finance is a matter of great public importance. However, I think the house must bear in mind, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance, that it will have an opportunity on Monday, when a supply motion is to be moved, to make a motion relating to any matter that has not yet been decided by the house. On that account I think the urgency would have to be of such an extreme nature that it could not wait over the week end.

In this motion there does not appear to be anything of that kind. In fact it seems doubtful that the motion itself is the kind that can be introduced under rule 26, because it attempts to deal with opinions. The Minister of Finance makes a forecast, which is a matter of opinion. There is a report by the economic advisers, which is another matter of opinion. If the conflict of opinions is the sort of urgent matter which the house must debate immediately and suspend all its other business until it does so, it seems to me that we would get into hopeless confusion.

I therefore cannot accept this motion as a proper one under rule 26.

Mr. Pearson: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question with a view to clarification. Would the presence on the order paper of the motion which is in the name of my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and which deals with this subject preclude a motion being introduced on Monday on supply, dealing with it also?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Speaker: I did make that ruling. I am now departing from sound practice in answering a question of the Leader of the Opposition. As I did make the statement that these matters could be dealt with, I wish to justify it. I feel that on the supply motion there could be raised the question of the forecast, which of course is properly debatable on the budget motion, in so far as it has not been precluded by some decision of the house. Until the question arises I prefer not to rule on the question of how far the house is precluded from dealing with the existing motion with respect to this report. However, I might make this point. In dealing with it I think I should be guided by the prospect of the motion on the order paper ever being reached. That is a relevant factor.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point as to whether the motion on the order paper—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not inclined to hear more argument. We are really getting off the track. I have disposed of the motion which the hon. member for Assiniboia has moved, and there is nothing else before the house at the moment.

[Later:]

PUBLICATION OF ALLEGED EXTRACTS FROM "CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and ask him whether his attention has been drawn to the publication of excerpts from a report of his department, "Canada's Economic Outlook for 1958" which deny many of the optimistic assumptions on which the Minister of Finance based his budget. If so, can he say whether these excerpts are accurate?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My attention has been drawn to a report in the Toronto Star in regard to what the headline calls a secret report. I have made no further examination of the alleged excerpts quoted in the Star, as to whether or not they are from some secret report of the department.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ARGUE—"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I feel affects all members of this house. We are aware that for some weeks now an effort has been made by certain members of the opposition to have disclosed to this house "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958". That has not been done; but in spite of the fact that this report has not been made available to the house, we find what are purported to be very pertinent extracts from the 1958 report contained in the Toronto Daily Star.

We are raising this matter at this time because we feel that this matter affects the privileges of every member of this house. If such report has been disclosed in some other way than to the house, we feel it should be immediately tabled in the house.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member who raises this question as a matter of privilege that the house has never made any decision with respect to the report known as "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958". A motion did come before the house which was not voted upon and at the request of hon. members it was referred to the heading "Notices of Motions" so that it could be debated.

When the hon. member began to speak I thought his point of privilege was that the government had refused to produce this document to the house but had otherwise allowed it to be made public. That is not in accordance with the facts, because the house has not ordered the production of this document. It came before the house on a motion for return of which the house has not yet disposed, so the premise upon which the hon. member bases his matter of privilege seems to be wrong.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, surely—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: On the matter of privilege, surely, sir, you will reconsider what you have said. This is a matter which has been raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia and it is an issue which has been raised in this house on many occasions. The document in question is one which the government refused to file in this house because it was a secret and confidential document, but now we see in the press allegedly complete excerpts from that document. When an hon. member of this house sees in the press excerpts from a document which has been denied to this house then certainly, sir, it is not only a matter of privilege, but if the facts are correct it is an insult to the hon. members of this house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest possible respect—

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say—

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the hon. member for Vancouver East answered himself when he said there were "alleged excerpts in the press".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If on every occasion alleged excerpts in the press were made the basis upon which privilege could be raised in this house, privilege would be an almost daily occurrence.

Mr. Pickersgill: When I was interrupted by the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I gave the floor to the Prime Minister on the well established rule of debate that it is better to have contending views expressed alternately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I rose because of the fact that I have to leave the house at 11.30 in order to meet Princess Margaret. That is the reason I rose, so as to answer the argument, and at the same time not be late for a responsibility which happens to fall upon me.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the Prime Minister that I do not object to being interrupted by him at any time. When I rose I was about to point out to Your Honour with great respect that although it is quite true that the motion standing in my name is still on the order paper, and therefore the house has made no decision on it, at the same time the Prime Minister, in his statement at the time the motion was called, indicated very clearly that the government was refusing to produce this document, and it was because a debate was desired on the refusal of the government that this matter arose.

It appears to me that since this document, or large sections of it, have appeared in the press, although the Prime Minister used the words "alleged extracts"—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I took the words from the last hon. gentleman who spoke.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I think the Minister of Finance indicated quite clearly by his previous intervention that the alleged extracts were, in fact, actual extracts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did no such thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe I have the floor. It seems to me that since the government through the mouth of the Minister of Finance has admitted that part of this document has been published, surely now the house is entitled to the whole document forthwith.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In view of the last and utterly erroneous statement by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, let me make it clear that I have not said there has been any disclosure, or that what has appeared in the newspaper is taken from the report, or anything else. I have made no such statement, and I do not intend to have statements like that put into my mouth by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the minister if they are or if they are not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I have not made a point of reviewing all the conjectures that appear in the Toronto Daily Star. That would be a full time job.

Mr. Speaker: While the question of whether the privileges of the house have been infringed is a matter for the house itself to decide, I have to take the responsibility of saying whether or not there is a prima facie case. I have already indicated my view; and in reply to the argument by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, he made an assumption that if the house ordered the production of the document the government would refuse it. I do not think that is an assumption which can properly be made.

Mr. Pickersgill: With great respect, that was not my contention.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member to ask me to accept the Prime Minister's statement that the document was a confidential one and that therefore the government did not consider it should be asked to produce it, as a contravention of something the house has decided. But the house has made no decision in this matter. The hon. gentleman is also making an assumption that if the house decided to order the production of this document the government would not produce it. I have given a good deal of latitude in the discussion of this question, I think, and we might now consider the matter to be closed.

MR. MARTIN (TIMMINS)—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON AUGUST 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has to do with remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia. I hesitated to raise it yesterday because I wanted to make quite sure of the wording of his remarks so I should not do an injustice to the hon. member. I say further that these remarks were not made in the heat of debate; they were made in his opening statement, and consequently must be considered to be premeditated and carefully thought out. I refer to the words on page 2980 of Hansard, which read as follows:

> It is not many years ago, Mr. Speaker, since the group to your left advocated that all the rich should be shot and everybody with a buck should be machine-gunned.

As a member of the group to your left, sir, I feel that this is a reflection on my character, and certainly it is untrue. It is something I have never advocated, and furthermore I have never heard it advocated by any member of my party, certainly not by this group to your left. I think the words should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member read the rest of the remarks in Hansard, but that matter was dealt with fully yesterday and I think he will find, if he reads the rest of the report, how it was dealt with. There was a point of order as to whether the member was contravening the rules of debate, and it was dealt with. There was no reference to the hon. member for Timmins which would make it possible for him to raise the matter on the basis that he was not here yesterday and had not the opportunity.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I was here.

Mr. Speaker: Then the hon. member should have dealt with it. The phrase "the group to your left" could have referred to another group farther down and another group still farther down. In the context I do not think it did. As I explained yesterday, with respect to general allegations, unless they are brought home to individuals, members should not look for offence to themselves. I have acted on that principle.

Mr. Pearson: With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say we are not a group to your left; we are a party to your left.

Mr. Speaker: I was referring to the group beyond the hon. member.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, I have waited many a day so I could say, "speaking for this group". I assume when you say "beyond the Leader of the Opposition" you are looking from this point on.

Mr. Herridge: As one who is implicated in this charge I do want to say it is completely untrue. I have never murdered anybody. Speaking seriously, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the member was most unfair to make such a suggestion, and in fairness to the house in general he should apologize to this group.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, this whole question was dealt with yesterday at considerable length during the debate, and that should have closed it. Now my hon. friends of the C.C.F. come back this morning and make a second attempt to have the statement withdrawn. If they can do that a second time they can do it 10 times. I suggest it is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are all kinds of precedents for it.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is quite correct. I hope hon. members in the group to my left will govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, let me say one word.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the point has been taken that this matter was dealt with fully, and if the hon. member wishes to speak on it I must tell him that he is out of order. If he wants to speak about something else he has the floor.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—REQUEST FOR PROTEST OVER VIOLATION OF CATHOLIC SHRINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wanted to direct a question to the Prime Minister, but perhaps in his absence the Secretary of State for External Affairs might be able to deal with it. If not it could be taken as notice. I realize that the Prime Minister is not able to be here.

Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs or any other member of the government received an appeal from Canadians of Polish descent through the Canadian Polish congress that the Canadian government should protest to the Polish government concerning the violation by their police of the holy Catholic shrine at the monastery of Czestochowa? If so, what action does the government propose to take?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): While I will take this as notice, I give the tentative answer that I have no knowledge of any such communication coming to my department.

LEBANON—REPORTED LANDING OF FURTHER UNITED STATES REINFORCEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would comment on the report in this morning's press that the United States has landed further powerful armoured reinforcements in Lebanon. Can the minister assure the house that Canada takes the position that there should be no further build-up of military forces in the Middle East while current energetic and fruitful negotiations are proceeding?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have only the information that is available to the hon. member with respect to additional landings of United States troops in Lebanon. I have no official word with respect to that matter, and I have no comment to make about it.

Mr. Argue: On the general question, I wonder whether the minister can say that it is Canada's position that there should be no further build-up of military forces in the Middle East at this time while current energetic and, I think, fruitful negotiations are taking place within the framework of the United Nations?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I answered the question, and I rely on my answer.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on this point would the minister attempt to secure information as to the nature of these reinforcements, because it is important that we should know. If it is a matter of replacement or some additional housekeeping troops that is one thing; but if, as the press indicates, it is a matter of new armoured troops that is something else. Perhaps the minister would be able to find that out.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I am happy to assure the house that I have anticipated the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—STATEMENT ON EFFECT OF PROPOSED INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to answer the question which was addressed to me on Wednesday, July 30, by the hon. member for Lambton West dealing with water diversion at Chicago. My answer to his question, which was directed to three main points, is as follows:

1. The position taken by Canada with respect to a proposed additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second from lake Michigan at Chicago is set forth in an aide memoire dated January 6, 1958. As the document is somewhat long, I ask leave to have it printed as an annex to Hansard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

2. To the extent that any additional diversion of water may take place at Chicago, the level of the lower lakes and connecting channels will be reduced as far as Montreal, and there will be a corresponding reduction in the availability of water for hydroelectric generation at Niagara, Barnhart and Beauharnois. The effect, however, varies at different places and at different times over a period of years. I should be pleased to arrange for the hon. member to consult tables and graphs in order to determine precisely what effect a particular diversion would have at a specific time in a specific place.

3. Principles applicable to a diversion from lake Michigan would not necessarily apply to boundary waters, as lake Michigan is not a boundary water.

SHIPPING

STATEMENT ON SALE OF "QUEEN OF THE NORTH"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked the following question:

In view of the fact that the C.P.R. has sold its ship Queen of the North, will the minister indicate what is the position of the C.P.R. and of Northland Navigation Limited, the purchaser of the ship, with respect to the subvention which originally was being paid to the C.P.R. for certain up-coast runs?

Mr. Speaker, this matter is under consideration at the present time, and as soon as a decision is reached it will be communicated to the house.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if the minister could indicate how long it will be before the decision is reached.

Mr. Hees: I expect it will be possible to make an announcement within the next week or so.

BROADCASTING

REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF REGULATORY BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to that genial tranquillizer of public fears, doubts and suspicions, the Minister of National Revenue.

Would the minister inform the house if there is any truth in press reports and current rumour to the effect that Mr. J. George Johnston, publisher of The Printed Word, has been offered the position of chairman of a board to regulate both the C.B.C. and private radio and television in Canada?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

FABRE STATION, QUE.—STATEMENT ON PROTEST RESPECTING CLOSING OF POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Hull asked me a question to which I undertook to get an answer. The answer is yes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the leader of the house to give us the assurance, if he can, now that we are in the month of August and would normally soon be bringing our work to a conclusion, that all the legislation the government contemplates introducing at this session will be on the order paper by, say, Monday.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no doubt this will be dealt with during the debate on the motion which appears in Votes and Proceedings today, dealing with the change in the sitting hours of the house. I cannot give the Leader of the Opposition the assurance that all the legislation will be on the order paper by Monday. Most of it is already on, but there is a measure dealing with broadcasting which will not be ready on Monday. There may be others, but that one would certainly not be ready.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, may I ask the minister whether he does not realize our difficulty in deciding on the attitude we should take toward the measure to be debated Monday if we do not know what the legislation is that is to be introduced.

Mr. Green: During the course of another debate some weeks ago dealing with the sittings of the house the Prime Minister gave an outline of the legislation which was to be brought down. If the Leader of the Opposition will refer to that debate he will find that the statement covers the situation.

Mr. Winch: Everything named in the throne speech, he said.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR RESUMPTION OF PROGRAM "THE NATION'S BUSINESS"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue, now that more than three months have elapsed since the general election, if he can find out from the C.B.C. whether they have any intention of resuming the program "The Nation's Business" on radio and television, which was broadcast in previous years?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiry concerning that matter. I had the impression it was being carried on the radio, but I have not been listening to the radio very much recently and had not noticed that it had been dropped.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

War veterans allowances and other benefits—

483. War veterans allowances, $58,066,500.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that this is the exact place to ask this question, but perhaps it is as good as any other. Can the minister tell the house what advantage is now being taken of the educational courses that used to be supplied by the Legion?

Mr. Brooks: If I understood the hon. member correctly he wanted to know about the educational support supplied by the Legion?

Mr. Carter: No. At one time the Canadian Legion had a whole set of educational correspondence courses for members of the armed services, and I think they have been carried on under the minister's department for a number of years.

Mr. Brooks: I might advise the hon. member that we are still carrying on the work that was started by the Canadian Legion.

Mr. Carter: Do you know how many people are actually taking advantage of these courses? The item can be carried; I can get the answer some other time.

Mr. Brooks: The total number of veterans registered and taking correspondence courses in 1957-58 was 4,934.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister give the committee the total number of veterans who have benefited from the amendment made last January or February? I refer to the amendment whereby world war I veterans would qualify for war veterans allowance after having served a certain period overseas. How many applications have been approved since then, and what is the total annual cost?

Mr. Brooks: I am sorry, but we do not have that information. We will get it for the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

485. Treatment and other allowances, $2,400,000.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the question I wish to ask under this item should have been asked under item 476 but we are making such progress that we were beyond item 476 before I could get my book open. However, I think it is appropriate under item 485.

Has the minister any discretion with regard to the admission to veterans hospitals of persons who may not be technically qualified as veterans, but who for a special purpose desire to enter these hospitals for special treatment which they cannot get so easily elsewhere, who are willing to pay all expenses incurred and who, though not technically veterans, may have made an important contribution to war service during wartime? Has he any discretion in regard to the application of the act in that respect?

Mr. Brooks: The Leader of the Opposition has indicated that the people of whom he is speaking are definitely not veterans. With respect to those other than veterans it is only in the case of an emergency that the minister has discretion.

Mr. Pearson: He has discretion in a case of emergency but in no other?

Mr. Brooks: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

492. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans' Land Act; Soldier Settlement and British Family Settlement, $5,249,350.

Mr. Herridge: I want to make a few brief remarks with regard to policy under this item because, while we had ample opportunity to question the director of the Veterans' Land Act administration when considering the estimates in the standing committee naturally of course we have to deal with any change of policy in the house. I wish to bring up again the old hardy perennial that I have brought before the house quite a number of times and with regard to which the minister was kind enough to support me on two or three occasions in years past. I refer to the necessity for a reduction of the acreage to a quarter of an acre for small holdings under the Veterans' Land Act.

The matter is of primary concern to a number of veterans I have the honour to represent owing to the nature of the country and the difficulty in obtaining the acreage required under the present regulations. Before proceeding, I may say that I find that the vast majority of veterans prefer to operate under the Veterans' Land Act administration rather than under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The day they are transferred from the shepherding of the Veterans' Land Act administration to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is a sad day for them. There is a somewhat different approach to these problems on the part of the two organizations. I think that is understandable in view of the fact that the V.L.A. staff are all veterans and understand the particular problems veterans have, their psychology and their approach to things in general.

I mention the matter again at the request of a good number of veterans in my constituency and branches of the Canadian Legion. In view of the representations made in the house and in view of the minister's sympathy for our approach to this question in years past, I would ask the minister whether the government has given consideration to a reduction of the acreage for small holdings to about a quarter of an acre where the particular circumstances in any area indicate that this is desirable.

Mr. Brooks: I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I might advise him that it is receiving very careful consideration. We are studying the Veterans' Land Act in the department and it is our opinion that the act, being one of the most important pieces of veterans legislation, should receive study next year by the veterans affairs committee.

I think it will be realized that there are a number of amendments that could be made. The hon. member for Kootenay West will have an opportunity to present his views when this measure is under study next year. I assure him that we intend to make a very thorough study of the Veterans' Land Act next year in the veterans affairs committee. It is one of the first acts I intend to bring before it.

Mr. Herridge: I hope I am there to deny some of the pessimistic views that have been expressed by some of the officials with regard to the life expectancy of veterans of the first world war.

Mr. Pearson: May I take advantage of this item to pay my tribute, on behalf of this party, to the effective, intelligent and understanding way in which this act is being administered, and especially to the works of the administration.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his remarks. At the same time I should like also to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West, who in his remarks last night paid tribute not only to those who administer the Veterans' Land Act but to the officials who are administering all the different branches of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I appreciate those remarks, and I want to say that I personally feel they were well deserved.

Item agreed to.

494. To provide for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 38 of the Veterans' Land Act and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources under section 38 of the Veterans' Land Act, $215,000.

Mr. Winkler: I should like to speak very briefly on item No. 494 with regard to the Veterans' Land Act and the advisability of raising the ceiling on loans made under that act. I was happy to hear the minister say that this act would be brought up for consideration and amendment next session. I feel it would be wise, however, to give the committee certain information on this particular point.

As hon. members no doubt know, the ceiling for loans under the Veterans' Land Act has been set at $9,000, whereas in the case of the farm loan board it has been set at $15,000. Since the inception of the Veterans' Land Act there has been a total of something in the neighbourhood of $370 million in circulation, and at the present date there is a little more than $201 million in circulation. This is being repaid at the rate of $20,355,000 a year. There is a very negligible amount of money, $11,300, outstanding in principal and interest for more than a three-year period, and about $8,000 of this is in the province of Saskatchewan. I might add also that the province of Saskatchewan has a higher rate of cash repayment.

Because of the very low figure, and the efficiency of the program in the farming industry, I should like to ask the minister to take into consideration the advisability of raising the ceiling on loans under this act. I believe it is not necessary for me to mention a figure, because I am not one to judge the cost of establishing farms. I imagine that a sum in the neighbourhood of $20,000 would be a reasonable limit in view of the current cost of establishment. I noticed that according to the Canadian farm loan board the demand for money today is 306 per cent greater than at the time of the inception of that board. I would ask the minister to give this matter serious consideration in the future.

Mr. Brooks: I want to thank the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, Mr. Chairman, for his suggestion. I am very happy to be able to advise him that we have already prepared considerable material in the department on this very subject matter. As a matter of fact the material we have prepared is being studied not only by the Department of Agriculture but also by the Department of Finance in relation to the farm loan act. This is a matter which will be thoroughly discussed, I may tell the hon. member, in the veterans affairs committee when we have the Veterans' Land Act before that committee next year. I hope the hon. member will be a member of that committee next year as he has been this year.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

498. Veterans benefits, including assistance and training of certain pensioners under regulations approved by the Governor in Council, $1,050,000.

Mr. Caron: Has there been any increase in the gratuities given to world war I veterans? At the time they were treated according to the standards of the day following the first world war, and have those gratuities been increased since?

Mr. Brooks: I am sorry, I did not catch the hon. member's question?

Mr. Caron: The gratuities which were given to the soldiers in world war I; I think at the time they were calculated on the cost of living after the first war, and have they been increased since?

Mr. Brooks: No, the gratuities have not been increased. Of course the gratuities given at the end of the first war were moneys given to help re-establish the veterans. The value of the gratuity at that time was, of course, 100 per cent, and there would be no reason for increasing it now because these veterans have been re-established for a good many years.

Item agreed to.

499. To provide for the repayment in such amounts as the Minister of Veterans Affairs determines, not exceeding the whole of an amount equivalent to the compensating adjustment made under subsection (1) of section 13 of the War Service Grants Act or the payment made pursuant to paragraph (c) of subsection (2) of section 12 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, where the person who made the compensating adjustment or payment does not receive benefits under the Veterans' Land Act or where, having had financial assistance under that act, he is deemed by the minister on termination of his contract or agreement under that act to have derived thereunder either no benefit or a benefit that is less than the amount of the compensating adjustment or payment made, $250,000.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say a word or two on this item. I do not know whether or not I am strictly in order. I intended to say this on the administration item but it slipped my mind. In the committee we heard representations with respect to the merchant seamen. Mr. Heide suggested certain improvements concerning pensions, requested burnt-out pensions, dealt with medical boards and the extension of the Veterans' Land Act to certain seamen, and so on.

As a long-time member of the committee I realize all the complications and difficulties in doing justice to those within this group who should receive some consideration. I am primarily concerned with the individuals who may suffer some injustice at the present time because of the failure of the legislation to properly give them the protection or compensation they should have. We heard these representations from Mr. Heide, and I believe the departmental officials are going to secure some further information so we will have the representations of Mr. Heide and the information from the department to study.

I trust that at the next session the standing committee will have an opportunity to go into this matter thoroughly. I fully appreciate that the question is most complicated and difficult. In addition, although the Canadian corps of firefighters have not made representations as a body, I know that individual units or locals have written to various members in this house. Therefore I trust that at the next session the standing committee will have an opportunity to hear any representations that organization wishes to make.

Now, before I take my seat, I want to remedy an oversight on my part. In my hurry last night I forgot to express the appreciation of this group for the admirable way in which the chairman of the standing committee on veterans affairs performed his duties. We thought he was most fair in dealing with the questions that came up, and I simply want to say that so people will know that when we appreciate the way things are handled we say so, as we are not backward in saying when we think things are handled badly.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member realizes that this is not a new subject. It has been considered in veterans affairs committees for quite a number of years, ever since the second world war as a matter of fact.

I know he will agree with me that it has always received very sympathetic study from all members of the committee from all parties and at all times. He will recall that there was quite a stand taken right after the war to have the merchant marine considered as a fourth arm of the service, as it were. This was not done but it concerned, I think, the Department of National Defence more than it does the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Everyone realizes the great work that was done by the merchant marine during the war. The casualties were heavy. The men were in constant danger. We all remember the trips they took to Murmansk and across the various oceans and the seven seas constantly threatened by submarines. However, what applies to the Canadian merchant marine applied also to the merchant marine of all the allied forces. I might say that none of the nations—including Great Britain, France, Australia, the United States, Italy and others —ever accepted the merchant marine as a fourth arm of the service. I think that is correct. It has not been done in Canada either.

There were a good many advantages given to the merchant marine under the war pensions act. I should like to read to the committee just some of the benefits which were granted to the merchant marine after the last war.

1. Any seaman eligible for either the war service bonus or the special bonus was also eligible for railway fare from port to final discharge in Canada to the permanent residence of the seaman in Canada.

2. Pensions were awarded on a scale approximating the rate in the pensions act, and were granted for death or disability suffered as a result of enemy action or counteraction. Payments are authorized under the provisions of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and include payment to widows and dependents of seamen killed in enemy action.

3. Full benefits under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act were granted.

4. Treatment was provided for non-pensionable disabilities incurred in service at sea for a period of 18 months if evidenced within 12 months of termination of service.

5. Compensation with pay for loss of effects and wages and payment of special bonus was continued if in enemy prison.

6. If pensionable, treatment is provided for pensionable disabilities including hospital allowance.

7. If pensionable, benefits under the Veterans' Land Act were available.

8. Benefits of the Veterans Insurance Act are available to any seaman eligible for either war service bonus or special bonus.

9. The Unemployment Insurance Act was made applicable to merchant seamen to whom the war service bonus or special bonus are payable.

There were other benefits requested and, as the hon. member mentioned, the officials of my department are meeting the veterans affairs committee and this matter is going to be discussed at the next meeting of that committee.

While I am on my feet may I say this. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo made some remarks the other night and asked some questions with reference to the War Veterans' Allowance Act, or at least with reference to making Great Britain a theatre of war for the first war. He wanted to know why it was that a period of 365 days was required. It is not necessary for me to tell the house the history of the War Veterans' Allowance Act but I might mention a few facts.

It was granted first on the recommendation of some very prominent men in the Legion and in public life in Canada and in parliament. The basis for the recommendation was the fact that the men who served in the front line trenches—and these men had been visited by those who made the recommendation—put up with the privations which they had to encounter there. Those who were in the front line in the first war know that not only were the Germans a few yards away but that there were the lice, the rats and the mud to be contended with.

I think this was first mentioned in Saint John at a meeting of the dominion command of the Canadian Legion. I believe Dr. MacLaren who was a former minister of pensions and national health was one of those who made the following suggestion, and Senator Power who was also at the meeting supported it. It was suggested that the terrible hardships which these men had to undergo in the first world war must have shortened their life possibly to the extent of 10 years.

That is the basis, Mr. Chairman, for providing war veterans allowances for men of the first war. It has been extended since. It was extended to dual veterans, men who had served in two world wars. It was extended to take in all men who had served in England, just recently by our amendment, except those who had not been there for 365 days.

I might give the basis for the 365 days. As to the men who landed in England in the early part of the war, many of them were well-experienced men and they were needed to drill troops and for administration purposes. They also had to put up with many privations. We all read of the winter they spent on Salisbury Plain and know that the accommodation was not good. We also know that these men were away from their families and their homes for three and four years, whereas the men who only served for a short time and came to England—many of them, I know from reading their applications, some thousands of them—came just a few months before the war ended.

These men are not considered, and I do not think that anyone can so consider them, in the same category as the men I have just mentioned. They were home. Many of them received good wages in factories and so on. They came just at the end of the war.

In his argument last night my hon. friend said they sailed across the Atlantic ocean, and anybody who sailed across the Atlantic ocean was in great danger. I hope my hon. friend will never mention that argument before a group of these old soldiers I spoke of a few moments ago who served in the trenches amid the mud, lice, rats and so on with the Germans in front of them.

Mind you, if the late arrivals had suffered I would be the first one to ask that they receive this benefit. But in the latter part of the war the Atlantic ocean was not too dangerous to cross. The German navy had been destroyed. There were very few U-boats. There was no great danger in going across the Atlantic ocean in 1918, just before the war ended. As a matter of fact those who took that trip stayed a few months in England and came back again. It would certainly take some stretch of the imagination to make me or any of the members of the veterans organizations across this country believe that the lives of those men had been reduced by 10 years or 10 months or even by 10 days.

That, Mr. Chairman and hon. members, is my opinion and I think it is the opinion of most of the veterans across this country, namely that there is no necessity for extending the war veterans allowance benefits any further than we have extended them, namely to the extent of 365 days in England.

The hon. member spoke about the Newfoundland veterans and I have assured him, as I assure him once again, that this is one of the first matters with which I am hoping to deal. It takes a little time, and I perhaps get a little impatient. I thought we might have attended to this matter before now, but it does take longer than we amateurs expect when we try to do these things. It is, however, being thoroughly studied and is well on the way.

The hon. member also mentioned a Newfoundland hospital, and I think he suggested that the hospital at Fort Pepperrell might be acquired. Several weeks ago we became aware of the possibility that this hospital would be vacated by the United States forces and might become available for other use. Consideration was given to the usefulness of this hospital to the Department of Veterans Affairs. It is not intended to request that this hospital be turned over to the department, since it is considered that the proposal already made for the construction of hospital accommodation in St. John's will provide better and more efficient facilities for the hospitalization of veterans in Newfoundland. I also understand that the problem of getting doctors and nurses would create considerable difficulty.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words in reply to the statement the minister has just made. I think everyone would agree with the stand taken when the war veterans allowance was introduced, which was that by reason of his war service in the trenches and the hardships undergone by the serviceman, his normal span of life was reduced by about 10 years, and he would therefore require a pension at the age of 60 because his physical condition would be comparable with that of an ordinary person at the age of 70. Pensions at that time, however, were available only to people aged 70 and over and it was felt that something should be done for the veterans. This was carried out by means of the burned-out pension or the war veterans' allowance.

I am in complete agreement with the minister up to that point, but as he himself pointed out, as time went on these restrictions became relaxed, and pensions were awarded on the basis of a person having served in a theatre of war. That theatre of war was anywhere on the continent of Europe. Many people who went overseas in 1917 and arrived on the continent after the armistice, without having spent a day in the trenches and without having heard a shot fired, but simply because they were lucky enough to get across the channel and land in France, immediately became eligible under the act for a burned-out pension.

Many such people have received awards, and this introduces an element of inequity in the administration of this legislation. If the benefits were restricted to only those people who had served in the firing line and who had undergone hardships and privations such as the rats—the minister mentioned rats but he did not mention vermin, although I can assure him they were worse than the rats in my part of the line—

Mr. Brooks: I shall never forget them.

Mr. Carter: —that would have been perfectly all right, but we have gone away from that idea and have said that anybody who got to Europe at any time gets a war veterans allowance. I know of many cases of people who, just because they were lucky enough to get a draft in the last months of the war, are in this position. I also know so far as the Newfoundland regiment was concerned, those soldiers were pushed across pretty fast and were in England for perhaps three or four days and then were across the channel. Many became eligible for war veterans allowance after world war I who were not away from their families as long as a lot of other people; some were away for 365 days.

But my quarrel with this is the basis upon which it is awarded. That basis is that the man must have served in a theatre of war, and I contend that in the year 1917 the Atlantic ocean was every bit as much a theatre of war as was the continent of Europe at the time of the armistice.

Mr. Brooks: If a soldier went across in 1917 he would have his year. I was speaking of 1918.

Mr. Carter: I mentioned the latter part of the year. The minister made one statement which I want to refute right away. He said that he thought there would be quite a great deal of trouble in convincing the old sweats that there was much danger in crossing the Atlantic ocean. I would like to tell him that when I crossed that ocean the submarine menace was pretty bad.

Mr. Brooks: When did you cross? Let us get this matter straightened out. I was speaking of the latter part of 1918 after the German navy had been driven off the seas and the submarines had mostly been destroyed. I know that in the first three years of the war it was very dangerous to cross the ocean, but all those men are eligible for war veterans' allowance. Do not let us get confused. When did the hon. member cross the ocean?

Mr. Carter: I crossed early in 1917.

Mr. Brooks: Oh, certainly.

Mr. Carter: But I am referring to the people who came after that time, and I do not think the subs were chased off the ocean to that extent, even in 1918. Nineteen hundred and seventeen, if I remember correctly, was the height of the sub menace. That was the hardest time. This brings to mind another inequity, in that a merchant navy man who enlisted in 1918 and served on an escort for these fellows who were going over gets credit for having served in a theatre of war and receives a war veterans allowance. The poor devil who was on the ship being escorted, however, cannot get a war veterans allowance because he was not in a theatre of war. I think that inequity should be straightened out.

I was very glad to hear the minister state that certain proposals are being considered for a veterans' hospital in Newfoundland which would be much better than the facilities offered by the United States base at Fort Pepperrell. I wonder if the minister could go a step further and tell us just what proposals are under consideration.

Mr. Brooks: I may say the proposals are not yet final. As soon as they are I will let the hon. member know.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

Headquarters administration, national police services and training establishments—

373. Administration, operation and maintenance, $8,131,933.

The Chairman: The Department of Justice, vote No. 373. This item will be found on page 71 of the blue book, the details on page 499. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, is the minister going to give us any statement on this item?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention to do so and I do not think that has been the custom in the past. I shall be very glad to listen to any general observations members may have to make and attempt to reply to any questions of a general nature on this item with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few observations on one specific subject, and that is the security screening which is carried on—of course by and under the responsibility of the government—and of which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the principal instrument. I noted with a great deal of interest the answer given by the minister to a question put by the hon. member for Port Arthur which will be found at page 831 of Hansard for June 4, 1958. Perhaps in order to refresh the memories of members of the committee I might read both the question and the answer.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the welcome news that a new federal approach to security was revealed in a C.B.C. versus labour dispute involving an employee, would the minister care to make a statement to this house on the scope of the new federal approach in allowing adverse security reports to be seen by those reported upon?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think I should at once correct the misapprehension which would otherwise be created by the form in which the question was put. To my knowledge, at the hearing which was arranged as a special hearing in this one case, the written security reports, at least in the sense of the complete documents on file, were not shown to the employee involved. It would not be possible to disclose our security files to anyone not authorized to see them.

This particular procedure was an attempt to find an answer to the problem of allowing a hearing, which could properly be called a hearing, to an employee who is suspected on security grounds. In so far as the hearing went, it was a special arrangement, and we are continuing to study the whole question to see if this does suggest a suitable pattern for dealing with this problem.

I read that statement not to criticize it in any way whatsoever. When the Minister of Justice was on this side of the house on several occasions—and I will not waste the time of the committee by referring to them now—he expressed concern about the security procedures which were in effect at that time, and I certainly feel that any hon. member who does not feel concerned about this subject is not really sensitive to the fundamental concepts of justice.

As members of the committee know, I have had over 20 years' experience in the public service and in public life, and it so happens that in the past I have had a good deal to do with such matters in one way or another and in one capacity or another, and I can assure hon. members that there is no more difficult and no more disagreeable public duty which anyone has to perform than that performed by whoever is responsible for carrying out these procedures. It is, I think, distasteful to the natural sense of justice of all of us that any kind of circumstance should arise where a man should be deprived of his employment, or transferred, as often happens, from one kind of employment to another, for reasons which are not fully disclosed to that person. It is repugnant to all of us, or at least I hope it is. It was certainly very repugnant to me.

The only justification I considered to exist when I was where the hon. gentleman is now, on the treasury benches, for having any such procedure, is that it is the supreme duty of the government to safeguard the state itself, and that in the kind of world in which we have had the misfortune to live for a very long time—I say "misfortune" from a somewhat limited point of view, because I do not really think it is a misfortune to be alive, but in the kind of world in which we have had the misfortune to have had to carry on our public affairs—we have been faced at least for 20 years with enemies or potential enemies of the Canadian people who have sought to undermine the security of our country both in war and in the postwar period, and we had a very deplorable experience which is not yet out of the memories of many of us, immediately after the war, when it was discovered, by a series of accidents, coupled with excellent police work, that there were in various branches of the public service certain persons who appeared to be, and some of them were convicted of being, the agents of a country which, at least, had no friendly designs in having those agents there.

Therefore, it seems to me there is no way in which the government can escape its responsibility for security screening. As hon. members know, I am not very lavish in my compliments to hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have been very much impressed by the responsible attitude displayed by the Minister of Justice in this matter since he has occupied his present position. He has never attempted to pretend that every position he took when he was over here has turned out to be a tenable position. He has honestly and frankly stated the difficulties he found when he assumed his responsibilities, and he has tried to face this problem squarely.

If these people were guilty of some kind of crime, that would be very simple to deal with. A charge could be laid in the courts and the whole matter disposed of. But what really is the problem in the case of security is that all there is, is suspicion, suspicion that a man is not reliable. That does not mean he is a spy, but that he is thought to be the kind of person who, because of his habits or associations, might betray the interests of our country in essential respects.

The main debate about this subject is really narrowed down to a small point, and that point is this; whether, when such a man is suspected, he should be told precisely what the suspicion is, or whether he should not. This is the whole problem. We have had a good many debates in this house in which arguments have been raised on both sides of that question. The subject has been debated in Westminster also, and in neither Canada nor in the United Kingdom—I do not propose to go further afield for any examples, because I do not think any of the other examples have been very helpful—has it been found possible by the government, whatever its political complexion, to make all the information and all the allegations available to the suspected person in order that he might have an opportunity to reply to them fully, or to refute them.

That is what we should like to do. I hope everyone in the committee would like to see that done if it could be done, but I want to emphasize again that these people are not being charged with any crime, and the consequences of making information available to such a person could be manifold, if the suspicions were justified. There is the risk that if he is in guilty association he will inform the persons with whom he has that association. Another consequence could arise, particularly if the man did not feel any sense of guilt; with the natural indignation that all of us would feel in such a situation he might make the whole matter public.

I may be asked why I am concerned about that, now that I am no longer in the government, but I would say this. If, indeed, there be a good case for dispensing with the services of a man on security grounds, that is no reason for making him unemployable. But if a great public inquiry is aroused, what one is really doing is injuring the long-term prospects of the man himself for gainful and useful employment and for a quiet life, a man who is not guilty of any crime but who might be indiscreet. Now, this is, as I say, the problem. I know the minister feels the same concern that we felt when we were on the treasury benches to meet this problem in the best way it can be met.

The minister not only excited my curiosity but he also raised a point which I think should be of concern to all of us in the answer he gave on June 4. I was hoping that, after any other hon. members who wished to say anything about this particular aspect of the subject have spoken, the minister would tell us whether any progress has been made along this line, or whether any other changes have been made in the procedures that were followed.

Mr. Winch: Does the minister want to answer that before we speak on another subject?

Mr. Fulton: If no other hon. member wishes to speak on this subject I can perhaps deal with it at this time. I appreciate what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, both with respect to myself and the efforts made and the position taken by this government in connection with this matter in following out the desire to establish a satisfactory procedure. I like to think that perhaps some of the feelings now reflected in the remarks of the hon. gentleman on this subject have been instilled in his breast by the fact that he is now a student of law and because—

Mr. Pickersgill: I was a student of liberty long ago.

Mr. Fulton: —of that perhaps it may be fair to suggest that he has a livelier or at least perhaps a more perceptive sense and appreciation of the implications of this subject than when he was not a student of law.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

I agree with him at once about the difficulty of the situation. I do not think I have to take issue with anything he said, or particularly anything that he attributed as having been said by me when I was in opposition; but I think I should make it clear that at all times when I was on that side of the house and took part in discussions of this question I never went any further than to say that the man should be given some sort of hearing if some satisfactory method could be devised. I believe it will be found, on checking the record, that I was always careful not to go so far as to say that sources of information should be disclosed to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman is quite correct and I have no quarrel with him.

Mr. Fulton: When we took office we were concerned to see how far we could go in implementing the principle that we had enunciated, namely that it would be desirable to arrange that a person in the public service, suspect on security grounds, would be given a hearing at which he might get some indication of the nature of the suspicions against him; to see if we could arrange that sort of hearing and yet not have to go all the way and disclose such facts as would in fact compromise your security sources. We undertook that study, and we found ourselves quite early confronted with a particular case, which was the case referred to earlier by the hon. gentleman and which was the subject of question and answer on June 4, as recorded on page 831 of Hansard.

There is, I think, one modification I should make in what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said with regard to the situation in this country and the United Kingdom. He said, as I took down his words, "Neither in Canada nor in the United Kingdom has it been found possible to make all the allegations or all the information available to the suspected person." With these words in their literal sense I have no disagreement, but it is a fact that the United Kingdom went further than we did with respect to giving the suspected person a form of hearing.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: They had a committee which was set up. This will all be found reported in the United Kingdom debates of, I think, about five or six years ago, which I think the hon. gentleman has studied, as I did.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister will permit me, it was just by inadvertence that I did not go on to point that out.

Mr. Fulton: I accept that completely, but I say the significant difference between our procedure and the procedure in the United Kingdom is this. They had set up a system under which there was a hearing granted to the suspected person. It was made clear that all he would receive was a general indication of the sort of grounds of suspicion, that is, only an indication of the nature of the case against him, the government reserving always to itself the right to decide how far disclosure would be made. And at that hearing which, as I recall it, is conducted by a panel of retired civil servants—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: —the accused—that is the danger one gets into, the suspected person—I would like almost to expunge that word from Hansard, because he is not an accused person—the suspected person is not accompanied by counsel. When we took over, however, we wanted to see how far we could go in this direction, which was the sort of direction we had advocated when we were in opposition.

I must say also, to complete the picture here and in fairness to the former administration, that in the discussion that did take place in the house when they were here and we were over there the former prime minister made it clear that they had thoroughly studied the English system and the system in the United States—I think he went that far—and while they admitted that the British system went a little further than ours, they felt that ours was preferable and they decided not to adopt the British system.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: However, as I say, when we took office we immediately commenced a study to see how far we could go, what modifications we should introduce along those lines. We were confronted with this case in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which had commenced by way of a grievance brought by an employee who had been refused a promotion to which he felt he was entitled and to which the union of which he was a member felt he was entitled. There had been a special board of inquiry appointed to arbitrate this grievance, and they soon found that there was a reluctance on the part of the C.B.C. to indicate the real nature of the reasons why this promotion had been refused.

In any event, it soon became obvious to the chairman of the board, as I recall it; the question was put to him in such a form that it finally became apparent there was a security aspect involved. I think it is fair to say that there the situation pretty well bogged down, because there was no procedure for dealing with the situation that was then disclosed. Obviously the arbitration board which had been appointed to investigate a labour dispute could not assert jurisdiction over the question of security.

I know there was correspondence and discussion between the chairman of the board and my predecessor, but no solution of the difficulty had been found when we took office. So we were faced with a situation quite soon—well, in fact immediately—after June 10 of last year. In the discussions with the officials concerned and with my advisers in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has pointed out, are the main advisers to the government in the field of security, I outlined to them my view with regard to this matter of a hearing. They indicated to me all the difficulties and dangers which they felt in the matter and which had been made clear, I think, in the remarks of the hon. gentleman, namely the difficulty of giving a hearing which would be a hearing in substance and not only in form, the danger that you might disclose, and thus compromise, some vital security information, particularly with regard to the sources of that information. But it was felt that at least on an experimental basis in this particular case we would be justified in arranging a hearing.

Accordingly, with the approval of cabinet a special commissioner was appointed. I will not go into all the terms of reference, but we did our best to devise a system, a form of hearing, under which it would be made possible for the commissioner to disclose to the suspected man at least the general nature of the grounds of suspicion, the kind of thing of which he was suspected, and give him a chance to answer. The representative of the union and the representatives of the C.B.C. expressed themselves as satisfied with the formula we devised, as did the security advisers of the government, and the hearing was accordingly arranged and held with results that have been reported and are now public knowledge.

I should now revert to the general situation. Discussions were initiated with other departments and the ministers concerned, particularly in what may be described as the vital departments in this matter of security, and finally an interdepartmental panel was requested to go into the whole matter. I am not going to minimize the difficulties for a moment. We found that there were difficulties to which as yet we have not found an answer; that is, difficulties in the way of applying the procedure which was made applicable in a specific case to all the general run of problems that may arise in connection with this subject of adverse security reports on persons in the public service. As I said in the house on June 4, "in so far as the hearing went", referring to the specific hearing in the C.B.C. case, "it was a special arrangement and we are continuing to study the whole question to see if this does not suggest a suitable pattern for dealing with this problem."

The answer I must now give to the question raised by the hon. member as to what is the present position must be confined to saying that it is my feeling that we have found a pattern which, with some modification and some limitations, may be capable of expansion and of more general application than to the one individual case, but I am not able to say that we have yet found a pattern that can be applied to all cases that may arise in this field. We are continuing the study.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister care to indicate the general lines of the procedure, or are they so similar to those followed in this particular case that it really covers it? The minister referred to a pattern.

Mr. Fulton: The general lines of procedure we have in mind to apply would, I think, be somewhat similar to the formula in that case. The question would be to what areas of the government service you extend it and also what rights of representation does the individual have. It is a matter of record—the order in council was published—that in this particular case the person had the right to be accompanied by counsel. My hon. friend will appreciate that that goes further than the British system. One question we are studying now, and a very important one, is whether that right should be made general if we do apply this procedure to more cases, or to what extent the right of representation might be allowed.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is another aspect of the subject about which I should like to make one or two observations and pose one or two questions. As a foundation for that I think perhaps the simplest thing I can do is to refer the committee to a question asked by the hon. member for Skeena to which the minister gave an answer on July 8, as appears at page 2047 of Hansard. The question asked was as follows:

1. Does the R.C.M.P. maintain any files or dossiers on members of parliament?
2. If so, upon which members of the present parliament are such files or dossiers maintained?

The answer given by the minister was as follows:

All Royal Canadian Mounted Police files on individuals are confidential and many are secret.

Perhaps I might interject here that I agree completely with the answer given by the minister. I am not addressing myself to this question in so far as members of parliament or any particular group are concerned. What I am interested in is the general principle enunciated here.

One of the primary duties of all those responsible for such files is to respect and preserve the confidential or secret nature of their contents. It will be appreciated also that a large number of such files are started by reports, statements or knowledge of activities coming to the attention of responsible members of the police which they are bound to investigate in the course of their duties. The follow-up on such reports in many cases reveals no necessity for further action, yet there is still a file. This means that many files will be in existence under the names of individuals against whom there is nothing of a substantial, let alone a criminal, nature.

It will therefore be generally agreed that it would be grossly unfair to any such individual to have it revealed or even suspected that there exists a police file under his name, yet there may be many ways in which such a suspicion could be raised. One of the surest ways of laying the foundation for the raising of suspicion would be to isolate—

I think the rest of the answer applies specifically to members of parliament, and I would be wasting the time of the committee by reading it. I said when I started that I agree with the answer given by the minister. I am not one of those who believe in the purveying of hearsay from police reports or from any other source and the defamation of persons' characters in that way. I think it is right and proper, and indeed a fundamental duty of the government, to safeguard these files.

Of course I had a good deal of experience when I was minister of citizenship and immigration, a post which was also occupied for some time in an acting capacity by the present Minister of Justice. One of the duties, and a most disagreeable one, imposed upon the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was the duty of satisfying himself that he was not admitting to this country persons who would subsequently become a danger to the security of the state, and this involved almost daily consultation with the police and access to police files.

I see, sir, that it is one o'clock, and I should like to pursue this matter a little further.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: When we adjourned at one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I had just put on the record part of an answer given by the minister to a question by the hon. member for Skeena, on July 8, and which referred in general terms to the principle governing the use of the files on individuals maintained by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In order to give some continuity to my argument, I should like to read again the first paragraph only of that answer. It is only two sentences:

All Royal Canadian Mounted Police files on individuals are confidential and many are secret. One of the primary duties of all those responsible for such files is to respect and preserve the confidential or secret nature of their contents.

I believe I had said just before we adjourned for lunch that a great many of these files or, at any rate, reports from these files, came to my attention in my official capacity when I was minister of citizenship and immigration. The most scrupulous care was taken by me and by the deputy minister, who was the only other person authorized to see these files, to make sure, not only that nothing in these files was disclosed to any unauthorized person including the persons referred to in the files, but we went to very great lengths not to disclose the fact that "security" was the reason for our failure to accept applications from persons who wished to immigrate to this country. We simply said that the application was rejected, and I was criticized quite frequently in this house for doing so, by no one perhaps more strongly than by the present Minister of Justice. As I said, I was criticized for my failure to give any reasons for these rejections.

My argument always was that if I gave reasons in all other cases—this was my principal argument but there were others—I would isolate the security cases. People would know, by a process of elimination, that the rest of the rejections were on security grounds. In order to preserve the sanctity of the files and the information—although I was acting on my own responsibility and on the advice which I thought was, on balance, sound that I should do this—the course I have outlined was followed. I am not seeking to enter into any argument about the practice in the department of immigration; that would be quite unfair to the minister and to the committee. I am merely citing this as an example of how scrupulous I was, and I think this was true of all my colleagues who had to do with these matters, in the use of these police files and police reports.

I say again that I agree with what the minister said in reply to the hon. member for Skeena. I do not believe that anything but harm could come from making public even the existence of files. In order to preserve organized society we have to have police forces. No doubt if we were all good, all as virtuous as we ought to be, we could dispense with the police and save quite a lot of money. But we cannot. The police have to make investigations of people who, in many cases, are innocent or, at least, not guilty. I prefer, I must say, the old English phrase "not guilty", because it is very hard to arrive at any accurate conception of innocence, at least in my experience.

But I think it is obvious that it will be very harmful to the character and reputation and the position in society, indeed even the economic prospects, of many people if it is known that their conduct is being investigated by the police. I believe, therefore, the minister is completely right in the position he takes that there should be no disclosure that the police have files on any person until such time as the police use these files for taking action in the courts. We know from experience, and I am quite satisfied about this, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a very well administered force. I doubt if there is any better administered force anywhere in the world. We know that they do not take action on trivial grounds. There is the greatest consideration given in these matters.

I was, therefore, greatly perturbed, and I think that many hon. member were greatly perturbed, by something which happened in this committee a day or two ago when we were told by one of the minister's colleagues, in relation to a particular case—perhaps in order to make clear my point I shall have to refresh the memories of hon. members about this case—the minister was being asked what information—

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend is seeking to revive a matter that was discussed at great length in the committee when we were dealing with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Chairman, may I respectfully suggest he would be out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not seeking to do anything of the kind, sir. What I am seeking to do is to lay the foundation for a question of the minister respecting the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Fulton: Ask the question, then.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps I can exercise my judgment as well as the minister can for me, as to the foundation I need to lay in order to ask a question in a manner to enable all hon. members to understand it. The minister need have no concern about this question if he has no feeling of guilt about the matter.

We were told that certain action was taken by the Minister of Agriculture because he had a considerable number of police and other reports from which he said he was completely satisfied that this man was guilty of securing contraband liquor from these ships. I, of course, have no means of knowing, because the minister refused to answer so many questions, whether these police reports to which the Minister of Agriculture referred were reports of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. If the Minister of Justice can assure me they were not and the Minister of Agriculture had no report from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on which to base his statements, then I would feel I was out of order and would not pursue this matter any further. I would desist immediately.

If on the contrary, when the Minister of Agriculture was referring to police reports he was referring to reports from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I submit that this was an abuse of those documents, and an abuse of those documents such as in my experience there has never been before in parliament. The minister should explain how this came about. The minister told us one of the primary duties of those responsible for such files is to respect and preserve the confidential and secret nature of their contents. The question I am putting to the minister is a very simple question. Did the R.C.M.P. provide any files on this particular person to the Minister of Agriculture on which this public statement, made under his immunity in parliament, was made concerning the reputation of a man against whom no charge was laid in the criminal courts, a man who is, under our law, not guilty?

That is why I said earlier that I preferred the old English expression "not guilty" to the word "innocent" because it is extremely hard to define innocence. But under our law, under our system of justice, a man is not guilty until he has been found guilty by the courts. We had the experience here where someone under the immunity of parliament was found guilty by a member of the executive branch of government who said that he found him guilty on the basis of police reports. I was tremendously disturbed by that, Mr. Chairman. As was my duty, I did my best to find out—

The Chairman: Order. I must point out to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that he is at present discussing the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture in relation to the particular case to which he is referring at the present time. That procedure is quite out of order and I must ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to the estimates of the Department of Justice, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in particular.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I have in any way transgressed the rules of the house, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am sorry.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You have been out of order more than has any other member of the House of Commons.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert is not in order.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may be that I did not express myself very clearly. I will endeavour to circumscribe my observations to the limit. I am very much concerned at this time about this situation but in this committee at this time on the estimates of the Minister of Justice or of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I am not concerned about any aspect of the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture except one. I am concerned to find out whether the Minister of Agriculture used the files of the R.C.M.P. in a manner which is certainly not consistent with the answer given to the hon. member for Skeena by the Minister of Justice. That is the only matter with which I am concerned. It seems to me that I should now leave it to the minister to tell us whether or not the Minister of Agriculture was furnished with any files, information or reports by the R.C.M.P. on the particular case which was under discussion in this house and on which the minister made what I regarded as the defamatory statements he made in this house.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think this matter should be dealt with at once if other hon. gentlemen will permit me to do so. I think I can only echo the words used by the Minister of Agriculture that this is a classic example of making a mountain out of a molehill. It is true that, in answer to the question which has been referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I said that all Royal Canadian Mounted Police files are confidential and secret and that it is the duty of those in charge of those files to preserve their confidential or secret nature; and to that I add "as the case may be".

The hon. gentleman, under the guise of concern with regard to security which we all agree is secret—and the contents of security files must be secret—has proceeded to attempt to draw an erroneous, unfair and inapplicable conclusion with regard to the use to be made of files which are confidential. I made some reference earlier to the fact that the hon. gentleman is now a student at law. I think perhaps I should now refer to the fact that he could not have been applying himself to his studies very long or he would appreciate the difference between security and secret information, and confidential information.

The simple answer to this whole matter, so far as the case referred to in Montreal is concerned, is that there was an investigation of an official of the Department of Agriculture carried on by the R.C.M.P., as a result of which the R.C.M.P. took certain action. I do not think my hon. friend would wish to be this absurd, but he has been this absurd. He has suggested that the Minister of Agriculture should not have been shown or been informed as to the results of the police investigation into the activities of an official of that minister's department. The case is just as simple as that. It just shows the absurd lengths my hon. friend is prepared to go in his efforts to seek to revive here a discussion which properly took place—and which should only properly take place—on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to pursue this matter. The minister has made a definite allegation—

The Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has made a definite allegation about me.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that I have given the floor to the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am raising a question of privilege, which procedure I believe is in order at any time. The Minister of Justice has just asserted that I said the Minister of Agriculture was not entitled to be shown these files. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Fulton: That was certainly the inference.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not what I said nor was it the inference to be taken from what I said. What I said was that the Minister of Agriculture was not entitled to make the contents of these files public in order to defame a man who was not guilty in the eyes of the law. If the Minister of Justice considers that is a principle—

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is being not only absurd but is being repetitious.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking on a question of privilege. I would ask the minister to sit down.

Mr. Fulton: I am raising a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking on a question of privilege and I have not concluded what I have to say. I had many lessons in procedure from the hon. gentleman when he sat over here on this side of the house.

The Chairman: Order. We are discussing a question which has already been discussed in the house. We cannot go back to the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture nor can we discuss at the present time the conduct or the behaviour of the Minister of Agriculture. Our discussion must be relevant and we must talk about the estimates of the Department of Justice. Actually, if an investigation was made by the Department of Justice, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in particular, and if the information secured from this investigation was given to the Minister of Agriculture, it is quite normal to presume that the Minister of Agriculture based his further action on the information received. But this question was all threshed out in this house at great length and I believe it is quite out of order at the present time to go back to this particular debate and for hon. members to pass judgment on the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put another question to the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Order

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a question that has nothing to do with this particular case.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: It has to do with the general principles surrounding the case but not the specific matter itself.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to ask the minister whether he believes it is proper for himself or any other member of the government here in this house to use information secured from the confidential police files in order to defame and besmirch the character of a man who has not been tried in the courts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You are a privy councillor. Have you not more respect for parliament? Shame.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I would not normally answer a question of that kind but I do not think it should be allowed to stand on the record by itself. In the first place, there is absolutely no justification for the terms used by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In the second place, I would point out that the information given was requested, obtained and insisted upon by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister himself has not answered my question at all, Mr. Chairman. He has gone back to the case which you ruled could not be discussed. I asked a perfectly general question and I repeat it.

Does the minister believe that the confidential files of the mounted police should be used so that a minister may make statements in this house based upon those files concerning the character and reputation of a person who has not been convicted by the courts of any offence whatsoever. That is the question I am putting to the minister. Does he think that is a proper use of the files of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? I would remind him that such use was never made of those files in the days during which we were in office.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: I do not believe that question is relevant to the matter under discussion at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. We are now discussing the estimates of the Department of Justice with relation to the administration of this particular department and I do not believe the question asked of the minister by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is relevant to the present discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if we cannot discuss the use made by the administration of the files of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, then there is no aspect which we can discuss. Surely the files are the product of the police administration and the purpose, the reason why we have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is precisely to accumulate this information, to make these investigations in order that the information may be used for the protection of society. Furthermore, surely it is a restriction upon the freedom of speech in this house to suggest for one moment that we cannot discuss the use made of these files which are paid for by the taxpayers. We are in committee of supply, appropriating or not appropriating moneys for the service of Her Majesty which is to be spent by the minister who is responsible to this house. The minister is ultimately responsible for all of these files and the use that is made of them and I have asked him a question about their use. The minister did not have any hesitation in answering the hon. member for Skeena—

Mr. Fulton: I have no hesitation in answering the hon. member if he will just cease his tirade and give me an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I have the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Of course if the hon. gentleman wishes to prevent an answer from being given, that is his privilege.

Mr. Robichaud: Getting childish now.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to repeat what I said before, namely that I think this committee is entitled to know whether or not the minister considers it is a proper use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police files to base upon them statements in this house with respect to persons who have not been found guilty of any kind of offence in the courts of law.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this question cannot be answered in the abstract because of the efforts—and I make no comment as to whether they are proper or not—of the hon. gentleman to relate these files to an incident regarding an official of the Department of Agriculture, I have to answer the question in this way.

In this particular case no improper use was made of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police files. There was an investigation which disclosed certain facts and, as a result, an order was made by the Minister of National Revenue, acting within the proper scope of his statutory authority, for the destruction of contraband goods. That order was carried out without protest from the person affected by the order and the contraband goods were confiscated and destroyed. That is the sum and substance of that incident; there was no defamation of character and there was no improper use of Royal Canadian Mounted Police files. The order made on the authority of the Minister of National Revenue was based on information properly coming to him as a result of an R.C.M.P. investigation. That is the answer to that question.

The answer to the general question is that the hon. member knows as well as I do that of course it would not be proper to make improper use of R.C.M.P. files for the purpose of defamation of character, and no such thing has been done by this government, whatever may have been done by the former government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I assume that you will allow me the same liberty you have allowed the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —to comment upon his remarks on this particular case. I have no quarrel whatsoever and neither would any responsible person have any quarrel with what the minister has now told us was done by the Minister of National Revenue. If the Minister of National Revenue or any officer of his department used any information secured from the mounted police in order to deal with contraband goods, that is perfectly proper. I have no objection whatsoever to that and neither would any sensible person have any objection to it. I at no time objected to it, in fact I did not even know about it until the minister told us just now.

What I did know about, however, is that another of the minister's colleagues came into this house and boasted that he had police reports which he had never shown to the accused person—and I use the word in the same sense as did the minister because this man was never accused of anything; I would call him the defamed person—and took advantage of his immunity in this house and on the basis of these police reports blackened the character of a man who has never been allowed to stand trial and who has never even heard the charges against him, according to the admission of the Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: And if that is justice—

Mr. Pearkes: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: —then it is something new.

Mr. Ricard: He is a smuggler; are you trying to protect a smuggler?

Mr. Pickersgill: No one is a smuggler until he is convicted. Perhaps the hon. gentleman convicts a person without trial.

The Chairman: May I remind hon. members of this house that this is not the time to discuss the conduct of another minister of the crown in relation to a question which has already been discussed in the house.

We are now discussing the estimates of the R.C.M.P. and we must adhere to the administrative elements of the estimate before us, so it is quite out of order to hold a discussion on the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture in relation to this particular case which has already been mentioned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the minister is content to leave the matter where it now stands, I am satisfied.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to discuss two matters relating to the R.C.M.P. The first matter I raise at the request of a number of members of the R.C.M.P. who, of course, shall remain unnamed but who over a period of many months have drawn to my attention a question which is disturbing many members of the service and on account of which there have been many resignations and in respect of which there are likely to be many resignations in the future. I refer to a situation of which I am certain the minister is aware, namely, the insistence of the R.C.M.P. on retaining a regulation which says that because you are in the scarlet and gold love goes out of the window.

I know there are many things which can be covered by law and regulation, but I have my doubts that any law or regulation can ever be formulated which will stand in the way of a man falling in love with a woman, and heaven help us if any way is ever found in which to do that. But, Mr. Chairman, this regulation has been in effect for a long time in the R.C.M.P. that once you take the oath you cannot legally express yourself as a man to a woman until you have served at least five years. A great many of the new recruits to the service are young men, and just as time after time we find that those who are not in service meet the woman of their dreams, so do the boys in scarlet and gold. But they are told: you cannot get married. Why not, Mr. Chairman?

I know that the men of the R.C.M.P. move from one municipality to another and from one province to another, but why, because of that, should a man and the woman of his choice be told: you must remain separated. What is the result? I am certain the minister knows that there is a comparatively rapid turnover in the service every year, and I feel certain he would find out, very often, that it is because of this regulation, and because the man concerned says that if he cannot get the woman of his choice by staying in the service, then he is jolly well going out of the service. That does not mean he is going to be out of a job, because I have been told that a man who has been trained in the R.C.M.P. is not going to be out of a job long after he leaves that service, because the municipalities and provinces, because of the good training he has received, are tickled to death to employ him on provincial or municipal service. I have been asked by a surprising number of members of the R.C.M.P. if I could raise this point in the House of Commons, and I ask the Minister of Justice whether he could tell us if there is going to be any change in this regulation.

Mr. Chairman, I said there was a second point which I should like to raise at this time. Unfortunately, there are some men and women who are anti-social and who break the law. Because they are anti-social they are put in jail, and this country spends a great many millions of dollars every year to keep these anti-social persons behind prison walls. In addition, we spend millions of dollars annually trying to rehabilitate these persons and give them a social conscience. Millions of dollars are spent on formal education when required, on vocational training, on psychiatric treatment and on psychologists' guidance for the purpose of rehabilitating these anti-social individuals. Then, after the prison term is served they are released and go back into society, and I am sure it is the hope of the Minister of Justice that they will then become social beings. I think, also, that the Minister of Justice would agree that those who have committed an offence and who have paid for their crime should not be hounded back into a criminal life.

I would be the last person to condemn the majority because of the action of a few, and I want to make it abundantly clear that in my estimation the majority of members of the R.C.M.P. do everything they possibly can to assist in the rehabilitation of former criminals who have served their sentences. Unfortunately, however, there are a few who do not have that attitude, and this is a serious matter when we remember the millions of dollars which this country is spending in endeavouring to rehabilitate anti-social persons, and when we recognize that up to the present, at least, we appear to a considerable extent to have failed in that object.

I was somewhat amazed, reading the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, to see on page 53 that the percentage of recidivists in the penitentiaries that year in Canada was 80.23. It may be that the people I have just referred to constitute only part of that number, but whatever can be done in this regard should be done without delay, because men who have served their sentences and who are desirous of becoming useful members of society should not be so hounded that they cannot rehabilitate themselves. By that, I mean that they should not be stopped in public wherever they go by members of the police force.

At this moment I am discussing the R.C.M.P. If they get a job, it should not be felt to be the responsibility of the R.C.M.P.—and I repeat that I am only speaking now, of a very small minority—to go to that man's employer and say: do you know you have a former criminal in your employment? The result nine times out of ten is that the man loses his job, and when that happens more than once hon. members will realize the effect upon the man concerned who must have been somewhat weak-minded to have become a criminal in the first place.

I want to tell the Minister of Justice and the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. that I am not speaking in generalities or from rumour, but from my own knowledge as a result of information given to me in the penitentiaries as a visitor. Perhaps I have been able to be of some assistance in getting men out on parole, and getting them jobs. And then I find that time after time they have not been allowed to rehabilitate themselves. I was most interested in one young man who, on release, got a job as a truck driver. Day after day he was stopped on the street when he was recognized, with the result that he was fired. Another man was a recidivist of one of the worst types I have known, and yet toward the end of his last sentence the warden, the padre and the relations officer all said: this man is now reformed. The hon. minister's department let him out on ticket of leave and he got a job. One week later he had that job no longer because the R.C.M.P. went in and told his employer: do you know you have a criminal on your staff, a bank robber? The man got another job, and only 10 days later the same thing happened. He found yet another job, and shortly afterwards he was fired in the same circumstances. Not long ago he came to me and said: "Mr. Winch, I am going to get out of town. I am going to a small village up the coast hoping I will be allowed to redeem myself." I have not seen the man since but I heard about him recently. He was serving three months. Do you know why? It was because he had been stopped again, in this town, by the R.C.M.P. and this time his cup runneth over—he blew his top and socked the cop. He was sentenced to three months for assault.

It goes even beyond that. I have told the committee about this young man who lost job after job because of this hounding practice. He has another brother, a brother who is younger but who looks very like him. That brother has never been in conflict with the law in his life, but because his brother has been in jail four times he is stopped by the police and has lost job after job although he has no criminal record at all. I know this is not done by the majority, but I think that even if this happens only in a minority of cases it is nevertheless of importance. The rehabilitation of men in penitentiaries is, I know, of great concern to the minister, and I have an idea that he is going to bring in some legislation in this field while he is in office.

I am asking the minister whether he does not think that perhaps he might now take the action that was taken four or five years ago when I also raised this matter in the House of Commons and gave instances which were investigated, or at least one case, and as a result the minister's predecessor in office had a directive sent out—and I believe it was sent out by the commissioner—outlining to all officials; not that they all needed it, but some did—that they be very careful not to undermine this process of rehabilitation and establishment of a social consciousness; that if they felt they had to interrogate a person, it should be done on the quiet and not in public, but under no circumstances were they to go to an employer and have a man fired because he had a previous criminal record. I just make the suggestion that perhaps the minister might consider the re-issuing of a directive of the nature of the one that was distributed some four or five years ago.

I said, sir, I had two matters relating to the R.C.M.P. These are the matters. I hope the minister will agree with my second proposal but most certainly, sir, not because it affects me, because it does not—I am married; I have three children and five grandchildren; I have done well—but because it affects members of the R.C.M.P. who were born the same way and have the same emotions and feelings as the rest of us. How about relaxing that non-marriage clause and let them build up this country the same as you and I have?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the two points raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East, I should like to deal with the second one first. The problem of police contacts with persons who are out from penitentiary, having either completed their sentence or are out on parole, is not an easy one because the police recognize as fully as the hon. gentleman does, and as I do, the unfortunate effects of any suggestion of undue supervision or, as he put it, hounding. I can assure him that every effort is made from the top to the bottom to ensure that that will not happen; but, on the other hand, it is still a continuing police duty to check on activities or information coming to their attention which indicate that either investigation or possible action should be taken, and they cannot exempt persons who have been in penitentiary from their normal supervision. It is still part of their duty as police to supervise the conduct of those men to the same extent as it is their obligation to supervise or investigate the conduct of those who may never have been in penitentiary. That is the difficulty with which the force is faced, or with which any police force is faced; but I can assure the hon. gentleman that instructions have been issued—and they are continuing instructions—to which he has referred, to all detachments. I think I had better read the instruction which was issued. It is the one to which the hon. gentleman referred in the committee which sat in the spring of 1957. It reads as follows:

> It is sometimes necessary that members of the force inquire into the activities and associates of released convicts or interrogate ex-convicts as to their associations and movements. Such work is a part of police responsibility to the community and nothing in this instruction is to curtail the action of members in the investigation of crime or the proper questioning of suspects.
> Inquiries affecting ex-convicts must, however, always be carried out with great care and discretion in order that any genuine attempt being made toward rehabilitation will not be hampered or discouraged. Ex-convicts who have resumed or continued a life of crime deserve no special consideration but where there is any indication that a man is making any effort to re-establish himself as a good citizen, any contacts members have with him should be arranged so that his task will not be made more difficult.
> The force is vitally interested in rehabilitation work and must always be prepared to assist such efforts in any reasonable manner so long as our actions in that direction do not conflict with our primary police duty of protecting the public and investigating crime.

I am informed that that order or instruction was issued as a permanent instruction to all detachments and that as such it is incorporated in the book of instructions by which all members of the force are bound. We will at all times be prepared, however, to satisfy ourselves that the instruction is properly and sufficiently drawn to the attention of the members of the force. If at any time either from an instance drawn to our attention by others, or from information which we ourselves may bring to light, it should seem that the instruction is not sufficiently widely known or observed, then we shall be prepared to consider issuing some new—not a directive—direction that the instruction be drawn to the attention of all members.

In so far as the instances to which the hon. member refers are concerned, if they are exactly as reported by him, then I would say that if they were carried out by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has outlined, they were contrary to this instruction. But I would suggest to him that he consider carefully first whether in fact in regard to the incident he related, it was a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who was involved. If there is any case that comes to the attention of the hon gentleman or to any other person's attention, in which he has reason to believe that the attitude of the force is not that which they are instructed to observe, if he will bring it to our attention we will be glad to look into the matter.

With regard to the question of marriage, it is a difficult and continuing problem. However, I think the hon. gentleman has overlooked one thing. Probably he is aware of it but forgot to mention it, namely that some two or three years ago the rigid rule regarding five years' service before marriage was relaxed and in certain circumstances members of the force may now marry after three years' service. Therefore, we have made that concession at least—

Mr. Winch: What happens if he falls in love in the first three years?

Mr. Fulton: —toward the interest, considerations and requirements to which he has drawn our attention.

I should also point out that the figures of annual wastage from all causes, retirements on pension, discharges and retirements by reason of marriage, are not unduly heavy; indeed, they are satisfactorily light. One always likes to see them as light as possible. In 1957 they amounted to 6.41 per cent for all reasons, as I say, including retirements on pension.

Mr. Winch: Out of some 2,500.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend is quite wrong; there are some 5,300 members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Winch: Over 300 a year.

Mr. Fulton: Will my hon. friend please observe that this is not due to marriage exclusively; this includes wastage for all reasons, the great bulk of which will be retirement on pension, or a very large percentage of which is due to retirement on pension. This is a problem that the authorities are as fully aware of as my hon. friend. The best research and study given to it so far indicates that the purposes and requirements of the force are best served by maintaining a minimum period before marriage is permitted.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister explain just why it is necessary for the three-year or five-year period? I can assure the Minister of Justice right now that he has in his service a number of young men who are just waiting to hear what he is going to say now so that they may decide whether or not they get out of the force. Why? Because they want to get married. Why should they not be allowed to get married?

Mr. Fulton: As my hon. friend puts it, every man interested in joining the R.C.M.P. is on the verge of marriage but I can assure him that is not the case.

Mr. Pickersgill: How does the minister know?

Mr. Fulton: There are many young men wishing to join the R.C.M.P. who have no present intention of getting married at all and they become recruits. It is pointed out to me that there is a period of one year required for training before the man's recruit training is completed and he can be sent to his first post.

Mr. Winch: Who knows when love is going to strike?

Mr. Fulton: His first posting may be to an area where it is just not physically possible or sensible for him to contemplate taking a wife. It is for that reason that the requirement of five years or in certain circumstances three years is in the regulations. While, of course, we do not like to think of any potential recruits being barred from the force or in their own judgment finding it not desirable to join because they would rather get married, nevertheless I can assure the hon. gentleman that our recruiting program is going very satisfactorily and that notwithstanding the requirement of abstention from marriage for this limited period we are able to get all the recruits we want within the limitations of the manpower ceiling approved by cabinet.

Mr. Winch: What happens if after he signs up he meets a girl and falls in love? what are the basic reasons of the R.C.M.P. for having this requirement of five years or three years? Just what does the minister mean by saying that they can get married in three years under certain circumstances? What is behind all this?

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely not that old shotgun again!

Mr. Fulton: I can assure my hon. friend that I mean nothing sinister by that statement nor do I intend any reflection on those who come within the category where marriage after three years is permitted. In certain large communities where we are doing municipal police work and where it is found that the service is not as attractive to single men as service in some of the remote areas, and in certain other circumstances where the duty is not attractive to single men and the circumstances of the duty are such that there is no reason why marriage should not be permitted, then the time limit is reduced to three years. But I am sure the hon. gentleman knows well that there are some areas in which the R.C.M.P. is required to serve and some classes of the duty of that service where marriage is—

Mr. Nixon: Careful now.

Mr. Fulton: —admittedly detrimental, shall I say, to the efficient discharge of those duties. We would be accused of being harsh and inhuman if we posted married men to certain areas where the R.C.M.P. have to serve and therefore we have to make the requirement that our recruits do not marry for a minimum period.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, there are two matters on which I would appreciate some comment from the minister. One pertains to any change inaugurated by the minister after the famous date of June 10, 1957, which has resulted in substantial savings to the departmen. Second, I would appreciate some comment from the minister concerning an aspect of national defence. I raised this question in the estimates committee when we were dealing with North American defence matters and was referred by the chairman of that committee to the minister and his estimates. The matter has to do with defending this continent in ways that are expensive against the arrival of nuclear devices by sea, air or otherwise. I think all members will certainly agree that the Department of National Defence has made a tremendous effort in this regard. However, the possibility does exist of nuclear devices arriving in this country and being planted in a strategic area by a method not already counted by existing defence measures. I refer to the activities of saboteurs and persons of that type. Without wishing any breach of security, I would appreciate some comment from the minister as to what the activities of the mounted police are in that regard.

Mr. Fulton: I can only answer the second question in a rather general way. We are aware of the potential danger in this regard and that is one of the aspects of the duties of the security and intelligence service of the police, namely so far as possible to identify and keep close track of the movements of potential enemy agents in Canada. In this way we hope to be able to identify any pattern that might develop along the line to which the hon. gentleman refers.

There is also a constant exchange of security information with the security agencies of other friendly countries. In that way we would hope to be informed of any developments or plans to move agents into Canada or any plans that may come to their attention. Further, of course, we are in communication with the armed services of Canada with regard to any information coming to their attention. About all I can say is that we are aware of the potential danger, are taking what steps we can and believe we are taking adequate steps to safeguard against it.

With regard to the matter of savings initiated since we took office in June of 1957, we have reviewed the purchase policy in all fields but particularly with respect to automobiles and also our policy with regard to the use and life of automobiles. While I am unable to give my hon. friend any particulars because the factors here are difficult to isolate with particularity, we believe we have been able to effect substantial savings as a result of the new policy.

Mr. Badanai: Many thousands of visitors to Canada travel hundreds of miles for the one express purpose of seeing our Royal Canadian Mounted Police, only to return to their countries sadly disappointed because they did not have the privilege even of catching a glimpse of what they recognize is the finest and most colourful body of men in the world. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why these young men are the object of special attention by so many young ladies who are not slow in laying siege to capture them. Here we have a situation not so much of a force that gets its man but of the dear ladies capturing members of the force.

Pictures of mounties are found on postcards, souvenirs and government advertising folders and literature urging visitors to come to Canada. No wonder they are disappointed when they do not see these men. We in Canada should feel proud that our country has become favoured because of many reasons, not the least of which is the fact that we can point with pride to the finest group of men in the world upholding law and order in the land.

It seems to me, therefore, that all should see to it that there are enough of them so that every visitor will be able to return home with the satisfaction that his trip to Canada was made more enjoyable and exciting because he actually saw a Royal Canadian Mounted policeman. We are anxious to relieve unemployment. What more beneficial method could we adopt than to build up the strength of our mounted police force to a point where we would be assured of having one or two mounted police officers at each point of entry into Canada. I am only asking the minister if he will tell the house whether or not an increase in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is contemplated? I trust the minister will give this some consideration.

Mr. Fulton: I am very glad to assure the hon. gentleman that we are giving constant consideration to this problem because it is one of the real problems which which we are faced, not so much in the discharge of the duties of a working police force as in what I might call the incidental fields. This is a real and continuing problem. One of the things which give me and all the members of the force, from the commissioner down, very real satisfaction is that people want to see the full uniform, that is the red coat of the mounted police, because it does typify in the public mind the character and reputation of that force. But my hon. friend appreciates that it is not possible to discharge the real day-to-day work of a police force in that uniform. Our first essential is to do the job of a police force. If we do not do that, then it would not matter how splendidly the force was dressed or how colourful the uniform, the reputation would not be there. Every officer and man of the force also appreciates that. Our problem, therefore, is to reconcile the necessity of carrying on the ordinary everyday duties of a police force, and yet accept the numerous requests that come in, such as the one made by the hon. gentleman, that we should have a man in full dress uniform at border crossing points.

Every time we accept one request we find it lands us in greater difficulty because someone else will say, you have done it for them so now you have to do it for us. We have had to restrict, therefore, to a minimum the number of occasions and areas in which we provide a man in a scarlet uniform, tunic and breeches, for what I might call display or parade purposes. I do not decry, for a moment, parade and display when properly used, but we have to keep it under control. It is only at such points as Ottawa, certain provincial capitals and one or two other places, where we make this concession to the desire of Canadians and tourists to see mounted police constables in bright uniforms.

However, as I have said, we are giving consideration to meeting these requests, and wherever a request for a special appearance appears a reasonable one we do our best to comply with it. We have a problem right now with regard to the strength of the force. We are by no means overmanned. Indeed, I believe if there is anything in that way it lies in the other direction. We are unable, therefore, to comply with the suggestion the hon. member makes. It could be that one day when we are fully manned and feel we have reached a strength where every duty can be complied with and still leave some men over for the type of appearance that the hon. gentleman has in mind, then we would be glad indeed to supply the largest number of men we could under the circumstances to which he has referred.

Mr. Badanai: May I ask the minister if the force is now at full strength? If so, what is the number of men in the force?

Mr. Fulton: It is as close as we can get to full strength. The hon. gentleman will appreciate that from day to day the number varies, but to all intents and purposes it is up to full strength. The authorized strength is 5,376, and as of the date of the last report we were within 30 of that number.

Mr. Howard: When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was speaking earlier he made some reference to some of the relationships he said the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had with information from the mounted police. May I inquire of the minister whether in the operation and functions of the R.C.M.P. with respect to proposed immigrants from other countries those people who intend to come to this country are investigated from a security point of view?

Mr. Fulton: The position is that the mounted police are the security advisers of the government. Therefore, in any case or in all cases where security considerations are a relevant factor, whether it be in the field of immigration or otherwise, it is our responsibility to advise the government with regard to the acceptability or otherwise from a security point of view.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that. I wonder if such investigations were made from a security point of view with respect to the immigrants who came from Hungary, particularly, within the last two or three years?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. We are getting a little close, I think, to the area of responsibility of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and some of these matters may better be discussed on her estimates. However, I can answer the question.

The hon. gentleman will recall that with regard to the Hungarian refugees a calculated risk was taken. It was recognized we did not have facilities for making the normal examinations, either of health or of certain other factors with respect to these refugees, such as we insist upon with respect to immigrants moving through the normal channels. In so far as possible, health and security checks were carried out. This is within my knowledge because I was, for a while, acting minister of that department. The percentage of error, if I may call it that, in both respects was remarkably and satisfactorily small. It is, to a certain extent, true that the strict requirements of security and health checks were waived or lowered; this policy was accepted by the former administration and continued by us.

Mr. Regier: May I ask the minister whether, when the Prime Minister of Canada visits other countries or when members of the cabinet visit other countries or are in attendance at the United Nations, they are accompanied by members of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Fulton: Not the present Prime Minister, and I do not believe the members of the cabinet ever were.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

157. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada, $592,290.

Mr. Roberge: I do not want to take up too much time of the committee but there are a few observations I should like to put on the record. They have to do with the administration of justice in general in this country and especially with the appointment of judges of the superior courts as they are called, in the province of Quebec or judges of the supreme court of the other provinces and also the judges of the court of Queen's Bench.

There are a number of systems, as I know, with regard to the appointment of judges around the world. In some countries students, when they take law, decide that they want to become judges. They therefore direct their studies especially to that end and the government of the country—and I think this is especially true for France—appoints those students as judges when they have completed their studies. I do not think this system should be applied to Canada. I think that the system as it is now in this country is sound and good. It is true that the criticism is sometimes made that the government of this country—whether the former government or this one—appoints political partisans to the bench. I have no objection to that procedure, and I am not saying that because I am a lawyer and may be aspiring to an appointment to the bench; I am quite sure that I will not be appointed during the next four years. However, it is true that the government appoint lawyers to the bench, especially lawyers who have had a very active practice and at the same time a very active political career. In my opinion it is a good thing that this is so. There is no other field in which one can learn so much of human nature as can be learned by engaging in politics. This is the place where we meet more people and where we can learn more of the human character. It is also true that those lawyers who have extensive practices are better qualified to be good judges.

There is a particular problem that affects the citizens of this country in general and also, of course, the citizens of Quebec. I do not agree with the statement of the premier of Quebec that here in Ottawa we are elsewhere. I think we are in our own country whether we are in Ottawa, in Quebec or anywhere else in the country. I make this suggestion to the minister and in doing so may I say that I appreciate the fact that the matter is not entirely in the field of jurisdiction of this government. The federal government do not establish the number of judges in the provinces. That is true especially, I am sure, for the province of Quebec; it is a matter which appertains to the premier of Quebec. I refer to the determination of the number of judges of the superior court. I know that not enough judges are appointed in the province of Quebec and I also know that not enough are appointed in some other provinces either. I know that, Mr. Chairman, because your father is the chief justice of the province of Quebec and he is complaining every year that the number of judges is not commensurate with the number of cases to be heard.

In my own district which was established in 1956 there are over 100 cases on the list and not one that has been inscribed there since July 1, 1956 has been heard. As far as I know this situation prevails all over. It is not right that the citizens of Canada who want to put their cases before the court should be confronted with the situation that it takes a year, a year and a half, two years, or maybe three years to be heard. The witnesses may no longer be there. Sometimes they are dead. They may have moved out of the district. It is extremely hard for our clients to come before the courts three years and maybe four years after an accident has taken place; I am referring to automobile accident cases especially. I suggest that some step should be taken, either by correspondence or otherwise with the provincial authorities, to appoint more judges.

I should like to make another suggestion, namely that more consideration be given to the appointment as judges of lawyers who are practising in the country rather than in the cities. I congratulate the Minister of Justice because I know he appointed in the province of Quebec at least two or four who where lawyers practising in small cities and in the country. I have nothing against lawyers practising in big cities but they are more or less becoming specialists in some cases whereas those who are practising in the country—and the minister knows this—are obliged to carry on a wider practice.

Those were the few remarks I wished to make. I am sure that in the future, as has been the case in the past, the Minister of Justice who has the responsibility of recommending the appointments, will appoint judges who will discharge their duties in the best way possible and always with great honesty.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, before considering the estimates of the Department of Justice in detail, may I be allowed to make a few remarks of a general nature, which I consider germane to the debate just begun. As I do not wish to obstruct the business of the house, I shall try to be clear, brief and accurate.

First of all, I want to tell the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) how happy we have been to learn these last few days, that he had entrusted some lawyers with the study of a report published last spring by the commission on restrictive trade practices, with regard to the purchase of pulpwood from our farmers, and, if there is ground, to take legal action as provided by statute. Having been among the first, during this session, to stress the importance of the matter and the urgent need of government action, I now ought to tender my most sincere congratulations to the hon. minister. His attitude, which is that of the government, eloquently proves that, in this country, there is only one law for all citizens, that before the law nobody is too great or too small, nor too powerful or too weak, and that anybody who does not observe it can incur punitive action, which the courts are authorized to impose.

Moroever, during the last few days, the hon. minister informed this house that in September, he would invite the attorney generals of all the provinces to Ottawa to discuss with them the report of the Fauteux commission and to determine any legislation which should follow upon that report. As everyone knows, some findings of the report call for various changes in the way justice is now administered by the provinces. Rather than take the initiative of legislating alone, the Conservative government has chosen to consult the provinces so as to base its action on their views in this matter, if necessary. This action contrasts with certain unilateral practices of which the former government was so fond. It shows the concern for the constitution, which now obtains, as well as the concern for the constitutional powers of the provinces. It is such as to create an atmosphere of mutual confidence and contribute efficiently to the maintenance of national unity. The Minister of Justice and the government of the country deserve congratulations and thanks on that score.

This Fauteux report has reference to social and legal problems in which anybody who has anything to do with social services or the administration of justice must take an active interest. Among those who, in the district of Quebec, have always been interested in this, there was Hon. Justice Oscar Boulanger, who died suddenly a few days ago and whose memory it is appropriate to recall here. He sat in this house as member for Bellechasse from 1926 to 1940 and had a particularly active and fruitful parliamentary life. He has left the memory of a parliamentarian imbued with the purest patriotism, a patriotism rooted in the soil of the constituency of Bellechasse where he was born and where the land has remained the great provider not only on a strictly material basis but even more so on the moral and intellectual level.

In 1940, he abandoned politics for the bench. Having had many an occasion to plead before him, I came to appreciate his legal knowledge, his acute sense of justice, and his perfect integrity. He rose all the more in the estimation of litigants because his conscience dictated an equitable approach to the sometimes overstringent requirements of the law. It was through this balanced formula that he sought justice, and strove to assure it of victory.

He had two other bêtes noires: perjury, and misuse of French. The newspaper L'Action Catholique, in its issue of 22nd July last, recalled this aspect of his temperament as follows:

> Though not a purist, he readily took up the cudgels, on behalf of the French language, against habitual users of incorrect terms and anglicisms, especially in cases having to do with automobile accidents. He would indignantly flay, sometimes with bitter irony, witnesses oblivious of the solemnity of their oath, bent on toying with the truth.

The career of Hon. Justice Boulanger once again leads to the conclusion that, in principle, there is no reason why magistrates should not, at times, be selected among lawyers who have been in politics. To his legal training, to his experience as a practitioner, to the integrity which is the first requirement to his admission to and maintenance in the bar association, the parliamentary lawyer generally adds a degree of psychology, of knowledge and of broadmindedness which can be acquired only here and which will be of great assistance to him in untangling the tragedies of which court proceedings are but the outcome.

In a speech made in 1853, protesting against the suggestion that the Master of the Rolls be ineligible to the House of Commons, Lord Macaulay said:

(Text):

> I believe that there is a close connection between the functions of the law-givers as between anatomy and surgery. Would it not be the height of absurdity to lay down the rule that nobody who dissected the dead should be allowed to operate on the living?

(Translation):

Et plus loin:

(Text):

> Who can be so well qualified to make laws and to mend laws as a man whose business is to interpret laws and to administer laws?

(Translation):

Without going as far as Lord Macaulay, and without holding the view that it would still be appropriate for a man to be at one and the same time a judge and a legislator, the fact remains that this reasoning could then be justified by experience going back several centuries.

Far be it from me to suggest that magistrates should invariably be chosen from among lawyers who have been in politics! All I am trying to emphasize is that there is no objection in principle. In a remarkable work, The Machinery of Justice in England, Professor R. M. Jackson hits the nail on the head when he states:

(Text):

There has been no apparent connection in the last hundred years between the political antecedents of judges and the decisions of those judges. The point is primarily one of public confidence, that people may feel sure that those on the bench have been appointed for legal eminence and suitability and not for political reward or by way of disposing of an embarrassing political colleague.

(Translation):

Regardless of whether he has a political background, the magistrate of our time and place surely receives great help from his guarantees and privileges: he is shielded from governmental influences by his irremovability; he is protected from the snare of his own ambition by lack of promotion; and he is guarded from abuse of duty by his fixed salary and widow's pension. It was Sir Robert Walpole, that great leader of men, who defined gratitude as "the hope of new favours"; and he added that men "are less concerned with what they've got than with what they're going to get". That is just it; once a judge has been appointed, he has no further goal to reach out for. There is only one final reward which he seeks and which he can hope for, and that is the satisfaction of having done his duty—thus participating in that nobly social work that is the administration of justice.

Such, Mr. Chairman, were the thoughts that came to my mind when I reflected on the premature demise of the Hon. Justice Oscar Boulanger. My heartfelt sympathy goes out to his family, to his former electors in Bellechasse, and to those in this house who knew him and shared my feelings for him. Let there be no doubt that he will forever remain, for us, a shining beacon of example and inspiration.

(Text):

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two things I would like to discuss under this vote and I think I will deal with them individually.

In the past few weeks there has been quite a bit of comment in the Canadian press to the effect that the Minister of Justice may have some thoughts in mind as to how he proposes to deal with the narcotics situation in Canada. There has been so much in the way of guesswork and surmise that I believe we would all appreciate any information the minister feels he can give us at this time on the narcotics situation in this country, in particular any views he may have as to the treatment of addicts.

I believe we all recognize the seriousness of the situation and I understand from the reports of the commission on narcotic drugs in the United Nations that it is estimated there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 5,000 addicts in Canada, of whom it is estimated over half are on the Pacific coast.

I believe we all recognize not only the seriousness of the narcotic addiction situation itself but the enormous cost that is involved, the millions of dollars spent on the illicit trade and also the millions of dollars involved because of the need of the addicts to get money in order to buy their supplies, to obtain which they resort, in most cases, to crime. I have always been somewhat intrigued in reading the journals of the commission of the United Nations on narcotic drugs to note how in so many countries they do not have the same type or degree of narcotic situation as we have here in Canada. I have one of those reports before me now, and it is interesting to note that in the United Kingdom, where I believe they have a population of some 45 million, they have a record of only 335 addicts, and all those addicts, so the report states, are receiving their drugs from licit sources by licit means.

This should give us some reason to pause and think. I will not say that I believe I know the answer. I know that a study of this situation was made by a committee of the other house a couple of years ago which brought down a comprehensive report. That committee had its views on the subject, but I am not going to say I agree with those views. I know that we have what is called the English system, and some people believe in it and others do not, including one high authority in British Columbia. I know, also, that something else was tried in the United States which has been approved by some and discounted by others. I am not going to put myself up as any kind of authority, but I have been interested in this problem, as was my late father, for many years, and there must be an answer somewhere.

At least we should be trying something new. Surely, we cannot continue any longer with the situation which exists at the present time. On one issue I am very definite. As far as the pusher is concerned, I believe he should be treated with all the severity of the law. By "pusher" I mean the pedlar, the man who makes a profit out of the narcotic hunger of the addict. I have no hesitation in saying that as far as these people are concerned I would go even further than the present law prescribes as to penalties.

An hon. Member: Capital punishment?

Mr. Winch: No, you are not going to catch me on that. I will go right up to life imprisonment. I also feel strongly that we would have some semblance of control if we could take the profit motive out of the illicit trade, and the only way to do that would be to recognize that addiction is an illness, and treat it as such. I have been interested in reading about the methods used in the majority of the countries of the world. In most cases, I find there is no compulsory registration of addicts nor is there compulsory notification of addiction. There is not even compulsory treatment of addiction. I find this rather strange, and I do think that perhaps we should give serious thought to requiring the compulsory notification of addicts, and registration of addiction so that there may be a record and so that cases of addiction can be followed up in order to try to persuade these people to take proper treatment and become rehabilitated. I do not see how this can be done unless there is some system of registration.

I am not going to say that there should be free drugs, because I admit I am a little afraid of the principle of free drugs, but I do say there might well be free treatment of addicts and this would mean the establishment of addiction treatment centres. As I said before, I have nothing conclusive in mind, nor is my mind set in any distinct channel as to how to make the best approach to this most serious problem in our country, but in view of the fact that I have read so many articles in the press of recent weeks commenting on the subject or trying to guess what is in the mind of the minister, I feel that he must have some thoughts on the problem at this stage and that even if he has not yet decided on any final policy he might now be in a position to give some interim information to the committee and make some recommendations as to how we might deal with this difficult problem.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps at this point I might reply to some of the observations which have been made in the committee today. I should like to express appreciation of the spirit of the remarks made by the hon. member for Megantic. He will recall the comments he made with regard to the appointment of judges and the choice of the best possible men to fill those positions. I also agree that there are certain areas in Canada where there is heavy pressure of work on existing judges and some definite indication that more appointments are required. He will recall that there is a resolution now on the order paper for an amendment of the judges act to appoint additional judges in Ontario and New Brunswick, which are among the provinces which have made requests for increases. British Columbia also made a request for an increase, but I felt that since there had been the appointment of a new chief justice there it was desirable to let him have some time to assess the situation and make a report to us on the additional requirements.

With regard to Quebec, as the hon. member himself admitted, it is not possible for us to make appointments until the provincial government has provided for the positions. I would remind him, however, that the province did last year pass an order in council which enabled us to appoint four additional judges of the superior court. He will also recall it was the intention of the premier and attorney general to provide a special intermediary appeal court with six judges. This measure did not receive its final passage because I believe the premier indicated that he wished to consider it further, but I think it is a fairly clear indication that it is in the mind of the premier and attorney general of Quebec to increase the number of judges and make additional appointments in the province.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the aptness of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) and I thank him for the kind words he had for me. I fully share his opinion that lawyers elected to this house make a real contribution to good public administration and to the business of this country. To my mind, many of our laws would not be as good or as efficient if lawyers had had no hand in their preparation.

(Text):

I appreciate very much the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I know of his concern with this problem of narcotics and of the contribution and study that he has made to it. I wish that I could comply with his request for a definite statement. I will be as definite as I can but I am unable to be as definite as I would like to be as to our policy.

I can tell him, however, that the studies are progressing. We are not letting the matter drop, nor are we slackening in our intent or our desire to arrive at a solution, at least at a solution in our minds which we can present to parliament. I think with him that it is going to be very difficult for anyone to say that he has the complete answer even after he studies it. We must arrive at a decision, yes, but even then we would not want to be dogmatic about it. But we agree, I think, that we have to try something different when the present system is not working. Studies are proceeding on an informal committee basis between my own departmental officials, the R.C.M.P. and the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I hope, at any rate,—and I do not think it is too much to say—that we may be able to present a series of amendments or proposals to amend the Criminal Code next year. I hope it is not too much to say that we shall be able to present a proposal with regard to narcotics. At the same time, I would like to make one thing clear with regard to suggestions that I myself have made from time to time as to one possible solution of this problem.

I want to emphasize, first, that I have never gone beyond saying that this is one possible solution that we should look at. I have never said that this is the only solution, but I have referred to a possibility of establishing clinics for the treatment of convicted addicts. To judge by newspaper comments, some have taken from my remarks the idea that I was suggesting that we should establish institutions for the free distribution of drugs. This is the furthest thing from my thoughts. I think it would be a retrograde step. The idea of a convicted addict coming in and getting drugs handed to him to be taken by him, or taken away and used by him, without supervision, I never had in mind. I am quite sure that, as far as we can go, if a solution along this line is to be adopted, is to establish clinics.

There, as part of the condition upon which he may be released from penitentiary, the convicted addict might come in and be administered the minimum required dose under the supervision of a properly established and staffed medical clinic.

That, I think, would go a long way, if it is found to be feasible, toward this objective which the hon. gentleman and I, and I think everybody, have in mind. That is, taking the profit out of the drug traffic and also putting on a scientific and social basis our attitude toward addicts who, as the hon. gentleman says, are—while they may have committed crimes to obtain drugs and nearly all addicts have been guilty of crime—unfortunately ill. They are not only criminals, they are also ill.

But I think I must say to him that it would not be possible, as I see it, for this parliament to go beyond setting up those clinics for the treatment of convicted addicts. We could have no jurisdiction whatsoever to set up clinics to which persons who are self-confessed addicts might come. That would require action on the part of the provincial governments, or possibly some joint action between the dominion and the provinces. We ourselves have no jurisdiction to take power to treat people in this field, as I see it, unless it is as part of the criminal law.

Therefore, we cannot just set up clinics to which anyone could come who was not there because of his connection with crime or our jurisdiction over him under criminal law. I realize that may not be going as far or be quite as definite as the hon. gentleman would like me to go or to be; but, as I have said, for the reasons I have given, I cannot go farther. I want to emphasize again what I have said about the examination of this clinical treatment. It is only one of the possible solutions that we are studying.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, could I make one comment with respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the reply of the minister and say that I appreciate very much the attitude expressed just now by the minister. I know it is the one that he has had for some time. I also express the hope that when his studies and the studies of the officials of his department with respect to the matter of narcotic addiction have jelled and he is in a position to present to the house a plan for dealing with the question of narcotic addiction it will move in the direction of finding a solution.

I think personally that society's approach to narcotic addition in years past has been too static. We have not been attempting to assess the full implications or attempting to deal with the problem completely. I wish to express my sincere appreciation to the minister on the attitude he has taken before, and also the one that is expressed now, and wish him every success. I hope that when the plan is developed and into operation, whatever it might be, it will have every possibility of success so that those unfortunate people who because of some mental illness are addicted to narcotics will be able to fulfil some role in society and make some contribution to society which, unfortunately, because of our attitude now they are not able to do.

Mr. Winch: There is another matter under the administration vote which I would like to raise. I want to do it on the basis of the principle concerned and not the individual concerned although, of course, there will be a reference to an individual. It is on the basis of the principle that I am referring to the matter about which there were a number of questions on the order paper at the present session dealing with the cancellation of the parole of William Munavish in Vancouver.

As I say, I am going to use the individual to get to the principle. Here is a man who was convicted as an habitual criminal. Since he was convicted he must have been a pretty dangerous man.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. gentleman permit a suggestion? If we could carry the first item, which is the general vote, we would find that the very next item has to do with the remission service, which is the proper place to discuss this and we would at least have passed the first item.

Mr. Winch: Yes.

Item agreed to.

158. Remission service, including $50,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies as may be approved by treasury board, $319,194.

Mr. Winch: You were determined you were going to get the first vote through by 4.30 were you not? We are very glad to co-operate at all times. As I say, here is a man who must have been a dangerous criminal because he has been with the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Howard: The Minister of Justice?

Mr. Winch: I do not mean it in that sense. Yet, he must have reached a point of rehabilitation that was of a high standard because the remission service saw fit to release him on a ticket of leave.

In the penitentiary he was trained as a shoemaker. In Vancouver he started to work as a shoemaker. One day he was arrested on the ground that his ticket of leave had been cancelled. I am not going into the particulars. He was released because of a technicality which the Department of Justice and the remission service took care of within a couple of days and was promptly rearrested. This time there was no technicality and the man is now back in the penitentiary.

However, Mr. Munavish and his counsel maintained at that time that he did not know how he had broken his ticket of leave but the important point is that he had no opportunity to defend himself against the charge that he had broken the terms of his ticket of leave. Hon. members will recall that when this matter was raised last on the orders of the day the Minister of Justice informed the house that he doubted very much that the man did not know how he had broken his ticket of leave but he would see to it that he was informed. I want to say right now that the Minister of Justice certainly kept his word in that regard because a representative of the remission service on the west coast went to the penitentiary and informed Mr. Munavish why his ticket of leave had been cancelled.

Here is the principle, Mr. Chairman. First of all, under instructions from the Department of Justice legal counsel for Mr. Munavish was informed that only Mr. Munavish would be told the reasons why he was charged with breaking his ticket of leave and the instructions were such that not even the warden was to be present. The man's legal counsel was not to be present nor was permission given for any written statement of the charges which resulted in the ticket of leave being rescinded. Nobody but the remission service agent and Mr. Munavish knows what went on between them and we have to take the word of the one or the other.

Since that time I have received from the counsel for Mr. Munavish an affidavit made and sworn to by Mr. Munavish in which he denies all the allegations as they were given to him by the agent of the remissions branch when he met Mr. Munavish at the B.C. penitentiary on instructions of the Minister of Justice. He denies everything and says that he wants the opportunity to be able to defend himself.

Under circumstances of that nature what do we do? The Minister of Justice will admit that the only thing I could do when I received the affidavit from the man in the penitentiary and advice from his counsel was to raise the matter as I am now doing as an example of the principle of a man not having a right to a trial, shall I say, a right to be heard in his own defence when his ticket of leave is cancelled and he is returned to what could be, although we hope not, a life term in a penitentiary of this country.

To me there is something wrong. I know the view of the Minister of Justice and I want to thank him publicly for having invited me to his office, spending considerable time discussing this case and giving me information which I am not allowed to disclose because I was taken into the confidence of the minister. But having all that in mind, to me there is something wrong when a man, having been released on the authority of the remission service, has his ticket of leave cancelled without reasons being given, without an opportunity to defend himself, particularly when by affidavit he denies every charge made against him, and there is no procedure whatsoever that I know of unless the minister will use—is it sections 14 and 15?

Mr. Fulton: Sections 11 and 12 of the Ticket of Leave Act.

Mr. Winch: Sections 11 and 12 in order to give a hearing. I feel strongly that something is required under circumstances of this nature. Of course, the matter is not all one-sided. If the man demands such a hearing and the hearing is held and he is found guilty, then I think he will have to recognize that his rehabilitation in prison may take that much longer. But in the interests of justice I feel that fresh consideration should be given to the whole principle and policy as now carried out. I would not have spoken on this matter except that I did not dare lose this opportunity, particularly when there perhaps may be something in the new parole bill of which notice has been given to the house. As it is now getting very close to 4.30 perhaps I had better sit down so that the minister will have time to say whether or not he is going to do anything along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, again I appreciate the hon. gentleman's interest in this case and the point of view from which he approaches it. It is a point of view with which I have every sympathy but I think I can say, and I hope I will be able to convince him, that it is a point of view that is not applicable to cases of parole or ticket of leave as it is now called. It is not applicable because what the hon. gentleman is asking for is a formal charge and a formal trial. He said that if the man is convicted he might be sentenced to penitentiary for a further period of years and then everybody will know and it will be justified.

But the reason I say that the principle of the right to a trial enunciated by the hon. member is not applicable here is that the man is not charged with any offence. He is not charged with an offense for which he can be tried. What has happened is that the parole authority, in the conscientious discharge of the duties of its position of supervising this man who was out on ticket of leave, has reported that in its opinion the circumstances are such that the interests of society, and in this case I can also say the interests of the man, require his recommittal to penitentiary. It is not that an offence had been committed but that it felt, and the knowledge in its possession was such, that if the man were left at large another offence would be committed.

Remember that parolees—I will call them that although, strictly speaking, they are not to be called that until the new bill goes through—are not persons whose sentences have been commuted. They have not been made the subjects of diminution of their sentences by exercise of an act of clemency. Their sentences are still in existence. Suppose their sentence is 12 years and they are paroled at the end of 6 or 7 years. The sentence is not commuted but still has 5 or 6 years to run, as the case may be. It is simply that it is found that they are able to serve the balance of their sentences outside the penitentiary on condition that they submit to the supervision of a parole officer and report from time to time with varying degrees of frequency.

It is a licence. It is not a shortening of the sentence. The sentence is still there and all that happens is that if the parole authority has reason to believe that the interests of society or the welfare of the man demand it, it so reports and the man may then be recommitted to the institution for the purpose of investigation, first of all as to whether in fact his parole should be suspended or revoked.

In this case, an investigation has taken place, and for the time being this parole has been revoked. This does not mean that the man may not be released on parole again.

There is, I know, more to say about this, Mr. Chairman, but what I have tried to do is state the broad principles upon which parole proceeds. I see it is now 4.30.

The Chairman: Shall item 158 carry?

Mr. Winch: I thought we were going to get more detail.

The Chairman: Does the minister wish to go into more detail on item 158?

Mr. Fulton: No, I do not wish to do so. Unfortunately, perhaps, I am not able to tell the reasons why this man was re-committed. I think I am confined, therefore, to stating the principles applicable with regard to the method followed in his recommittal. I have no reason to ask that the item stand.

Mr. Winch: I have some other matters I want to raise about parole.

Mr. Fulton: They could be discussed further on the parole bill.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to have those matters discussed on the parole bill?

Mr. Winch: No, under item 158.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader of the house could throw some additional light on next week's business?

Mr. Green: There is a supply motion on Monday, and if we should get into supply on Monday we will continue with the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: The same would apply to Tuesday?

Mr. Green: No, if the supply motion carries over into Tuesday and we get into supply before the end of the day we would like to go back on the Excise Tax Act and then the Customs Tariff resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it the intention of the government to go on with the budget resolutions? It would be very helpful, particularly to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, if he could know.

Mr. Green: Probably, although I cannot be sure. I think there will have to be a request for interim supply.

At 4.35 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 1.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PASSAMAQUODDY POWER PROJECT

Question No. 170—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has a report been submitted to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, or any other department of government, as an outcome of studies recently made by Canada and the United States, through the international joint commission, in reference to the possibility of harnessing the ebb and flow of tides in the bay of Fundy, referred to as the Passamaquoddy power project?

2. If so, can the house expect such a report to be tabled before the end of the present session?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

Pensions and other benefits—

620. Government's contribution to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pension account—further amount required, $388,728.

APPENDIX

CHICAGO DIVERSION—AIDE MEMOIRE FROM CANADA TO UNITED STATES

Useful conversations between United States and Canadian officials were held in Ottawa on July 7, 1957 on the subject of the sanitation problems which gave rise to proposed legislation for a three-year temporary diversion of 1,000 cubic feet of water per second from the great lakes system and on the subject of studies to be carried out under the proposed legislation.

The Canadian government understands that if such legislation is enacted these sanitation studies will not be limited to evaluating the effects of dilution but will also include consideration of all possible measures for dealing with waste disposal facilities at Chicago. Such measures would include:

(a) complete separation of storm sewers from the domestic sewerage system or expansion of the existing treatment facilities to serve a total combined flow;

(b) treatment of organic wastes in industrial plants before discharging these effluents into the sewerage system;

(c) chlorination of effluent before discharge into the Illinois waterway; and

(d) artificial aeration of the waterway.

The treatment of sewage in the Chicago area is, of course, a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the competent legislative bodies within the United States. It is understood that present treatment of waste represents a vast improvement over conditions which existed in former years and that under the present day uses of the water the waste is more a nuisance than a menace to the public health in the area.

In considering the economics of alternative methods of improved waste disposal, it is assumed that full consideration will be given to the economic harm which may be done to navigation and hydro-electric generation in both countries by extended use of dilution methods.

It is not possible to give a firm undertaking to provide flows of a particular volume through the existing Long Lac and Ogoki diversions to the great lakes basin during the three-year period envisaged by proposed United States legislation. However, if it were possible to offset part of the effects of the Chicago diversion by inflows from the Albany basin in Canada, it would be equitable that an equivalent amount of water should remain available for use in hydro-electric power generation by the Ontario interests at St. Marys falls, Niagara falls and in the international section of the St. Lawrence river until the effects of the proposed temporary diversion will have ceased to be felt in the great lakes system.

All rights under the provisions of the boundary waters treaty of 1909 are specifically reserved.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, August 4, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCHILL—DENIAL OF CERTAIN NEWSPAPER STATEMENTS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet first.

Mr. Pickersgill: A question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I recognized the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Churchill: I am rising on a question of privilege in connection with various newspaper reports containing alleged statements attributed to me. These statements are without foundation. The Ottawa Journal of August 2 published an article by Richard Jackson with a subheading in quotation marks reading as follows: "Breach Civil Service Propriety". This statement I did not make. It is without foundation. Then there follows this paragraph in quotation marks:

"There is no doubt but that unauthorized access was allowed to the department's confidential files", said Mr. Churchill, "for the quotations from the report are both very copious and quite accurate."

That statement, Mr. Speaker, is without foundation. Further down in the article I am alleged to have said that I intend to run this thing down. The words "run this thing down" are in quotation marks. That statement is without foundation. Toward the end of the article occurs the following paragraph:

Mr. Churchill made it plain that while his investigation would be "thorough"—

The word "thorough" is in quotation marks.

—it would not be actually "tough".

The word "tough" is in quotation marks. That statement, Mr. Speaker, is without foundation. The Toronto Telegram of August 2 carries an article written by Peter Dempson. The third paragraph of that article reads as follows:

Trade minister Churchill summed up his reaction to the leak in one word "violent"—

The word "violent" is in quotation marks. That statement is without foundation. Further on I am alleged to have said:

"Well I guess they are authentic all right"—

That statement is without foundation. The Globe and Mail of Monday, August 4, carries an article by Clark Davey in which he attributes to me the following statement which he puts in quotation marks:

"There is no doubt about it", he said, "the newspaper report is based on the actual report".

That statement, Mr. Speaker, is without foundation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS—MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 15(3), the business and procedure on Monday, August 11, 1958, and on every Monday thereafter until the end of this session, shall be as for Monday (government day), and

That on Monday, August 11, 1958, and on every sitting day thereafter, until the end of this session, this house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and in relation thereto that the provisions of standing order 2(1) shall be suspended.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): So far as the first part of this motion is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the official opposition will not object to it. So far as the second part of the motion is concerned, the extending of the time of sitting as from Monday, August 11, so that we will meet every morning, including Saturday morning, we do take objection.

It will be recalled that a short time ago the leader of the house introduced a resolution extending the hours of sitting, and we did not object. In fact we supported it on the ground that we were, so we thought, approaching the end of the session and perhaps some provision should be made for extending the hours of sitting. The provision that was made on that occasion did not interfere with the work of the committees, at least to any alarming extent, so we supported it.

We now have a motion before us which would make committee work very difficult, if not impossible, in the sense that the committees could hardly meet except during the hours when the house is in session. Some committees have just begun their work and others are in the middle of their work. The committee on external affairs has just begun its work. It was meeting this morning, and it is now suggested that it should meet this afternoon also.

We object, therefore, to this second extension of the hours of sitting because of the effect it will have on our committee work. Perhaps by next Monday we would be in a better position to make an estimate of how the committee work is getting on and when it is likely to finish. Perhaps we would be in a better position then to relate the extension of hours to the work of the committees than we are at the moment.

We object also to this motion because it provides for parliament meeting morning, afternoon and evening, except on Wednesday and Saturday, for an indeterminate period. I suggest it certainly is indeterminate because we have no idea what legislation the government is going to introduce. So far as we know there has been no planning of the work for the remainder of the session. There is some important legislation forecast in the speech from the throne which is not yet on the order paper. We do not know in what form it will be on the order paper, and we do not know what length of time will be required to complete it. We may be here for weeks, and that is not a prospect that anyone contemplates with great pleasure, I am sure.

Until we get some indication as to the planning of the work ahead, the legislation which has to be passed this session, surely it is not right to ask the house to meet morning, afternoon and evening, with the exception of Wednesday and Saturday, especially when the committee work is continuing. This is the way we approach this particular resolution.

We have done our best on this side, by inquiries we have addressed to the leader of the house and the Prime Minister from time to time, to get some specific information on the planning of the work ahead. There have been occasions this session when at 10 o'clock at night we have asked about the work ahead and it has not been possible to tell us definitely and with assurance what would be done even the next day, let alone two or three days or a week or two ahead.

I recall—and I mentioned this point the other day when I was talking about this matter—how the former leader of the opposition, Mr. George Drew, used to rise in his place day after day and attack the government in vigorous terms because the government of that day, so he said, did not give the opposition sufficient advance notice of the work to come before parliament and did not plan ahead.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that on the order paper today there is no evidence of planning ahead. Until we get some notice of what we are going to have to do and how long it may be necessary to stay here to do it, and until we get further information as to the work of the committees and when that work is likely to be completed, it is not possible for us to support that part of this resolution.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we now have before us a motion moved by the government. It can be broken down into two principles. In the first section the principle means that starting next Monday, that day until the end of the session shall be government days. In the second section the principle is one which is going to quite radically change the hours of sitting of this house.

I desire to open my remarks in this way. Within your view, Mr. Speaker, I am going to hold in my hand, as I now do, a copy of the standing orders of the House of Commons, an edition which as revised came into effect in the year 1955. That revision of the standing orders was not introduced into the house until there had been a lengthy study by a committee representative of all parties of this house; and if my memory serves me correctly, it was brought in as an almost unanimous recommendation on the changes in standing orders. I am certain that Your Honour will remember the necessary resolution which was brought into this house and the speeches that were made at that time as to the meaning of the revision. It had a recognition of the responsibilities of government and a recognition of the responsibilities and the rights of minorities.

In particular I draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that when this revision of standing orders was introduced, the protection of minorities not only referred to minority groups in this house but also referred to minority rights in this house and minority rights in a number of particulars affecting the majority of the members of this house, namely the rights of private members irrespective of whether they sit on the government side, in the official opposition or in any other group in this house. Mr. Speaker, I should just like to refresh your memory, although I do not think it is necessary, and the memories of those who were here in 1955 and who now sit on the government side as to the fundamental meaning of standing orders. Keeping that in mind, and not forgetting what was said in 1955, we now have before us a motion introduced by the government to once again during this session—I repeat once again—ask this parliament to take action notwithstanding something which is contained in the revised standing orders of 1955, which we were told was put there basically for the protection of minority parties, and most certainly for the protection of private members.

The first part of the motion is to remove any possibility after next Monday of a private member having any right whatsoever in this house, for the balance of this session, so far as bills or resolutions are concerned. Without reference to any record whatsoever I think I could make quite a speech on that subject, but I do not intend to do so. I am going to take a leaf out of the Conservative book while that party was the official opposition in this house, and will also refer to some things which have been said since that party has formed the government.

In referring to the record, Your Honour, I am going to ask the government and, since he seems to be so interested, the leader of the house, to answer a question when I have completed my remarks. Is there a difference so far as the government is concerned in the responsibility of the government and the responsibility of the official opposition, once that opposition takes office? If the government party is the party of principle and believe in what they said for over 20 years while they were on this side of the house, why do they this afternoon completely deny every expression of principle on an issue of this nature, about which they were so vociferous for over 20 years—

An hon. Member: Twenty-two years.

Mr. Winch: —and in particular during the past five years?

I do not often indulge in a great deal of quoting, but in respect to this motion I intend to do so; and every word I am going to quote will be taken from the official record of Hansard. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that I have the volumes in front of me and my references will be to the remarks of the former leader of the Conservative party, Hon. George Drew, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, hon. members should be very careful, because I have books under the desk in case any hon. member over there thinks he is being overlooked.

I desire to introduce this question of principle by means of what I believe is a most important statement, because it was made by an hon. gentleman who previously had the honour to sit in your place, Mr. Speaker, namely Mr. Speaker Fauteux. Both he and Dr. Beauchesne spoke on this subject. I wish to read a very short excerpt from the remarks of Mr. Speaker Fauteux, made with the assistance of Dr. Beauchesne, who at the time in question was clerk of the house, when they presented a report to the House of Commons in 1947. This can be found in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1948. It is found on page 10, and this is what it says:

> The mere object of shortening sessions must not be the aim of any revision of our rules.

In view of what the Leader of the Opposition said a few moments ago I ask that he take note of that. I continue:

> The duties of a representative parliament are too important to be performed in a hurry. No question should be decided until it has been fully discussed. Yet no member of the house wants delays based on rulings or practice which may have been necessary when they were established centuries ago but which have no reason to exist at the present time. Conditions have changed. Although every effort ought to be made to economize time, every shade of opinion has the right to find expression and members who desire to give their views should not be prevented from doing so.

That statement, sir, as I pointed out is found in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1948, a submission made by Mr. Speaker Fauteux and Dr. Beauchesne. I say that this in itself negates the principle outlined in the first section of the motion now before us because this is a motion to deny from Monday next any opportunity for a private hon. member of this house, irrespective of whether he sits on the government or opposition side, to pursue any motion, resolution or bill that he now has on the order paper.

Having used that authoritative introduction, I wish now to take the minds of hon. gentlemen, who sit on the government side of the house, back just a couple of years or so and review what was said by some of them when they sat in opposition. I intend to refer them first to some remarks made by Hon. George Drew, who for many years was the leader of the Conservative party in opposition in this house. I refer hon. gentlemen to Hansard of February 3, 1954, at page 1728. Referring to the Liberal government that was then in power, Mr. Drew said on that occasion:

> I hope the government will not suggest to us that private members can make no useful suggestions which they themselves have not already thought of. If they were to take that position it would surely be strangely inconsistent with the arguments which have been made in support of other measures still before this house for consideration. No; the government must, in view of the argument they have been making, support the argument that they believe that private members have an important place here and that private members have much to contribute.

I hope there are many hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think there are, who have much to contribute; because on reading the order paper I find that there are many motions standing in the names of hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of the house. I continue:

> They have been urging that private members have plenty of time—

May I repeat that phrase, "plenty of time"—

> —to devote to the study of problems and, presumably, to the making of suggestions here in this house which would help the government. These motions, the private bills or the public bills are not put forward merely for the personal satisfaction of any individual member. They are put forward here as part of the legitimate and proper business of this house.

On page 1729 Mr. Drew went on to say:

> —this is the time to change the trend and to get back to a position where private members in this house are afforded the opportunity to assist the government by placing before parliament suggestions which are in keeping with the status of members as emphasized by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his remarks in this house on at least two occasions.

What I have read indicates that when Mr. Drew was leader of the Conservative party in opposition he held very definite views on this subject. He had even more than that to say. I should like to refer hon. members to Hansard of April 28, 1952, at page 1639, where Mr. Drew is reported as having said:

> This motion will have the effect of further limiting the rights of private members, which already have been limited greatly. During the years of war and immediately after the habit grew of setting aside the rules; but surely now we have reached a time when we can abide by the rules.

That was Hon. George Drew, sir, speaking on April 28, 1953. Let us bring it a little more up to date. Let us not deal just with a former leader of the Conservative party in opposition; let us deal with a former leader of the Conservative party in opposition who is now the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker). I refer you to Hansard of July 12, 1955, at page 5989, where the present Prime Minister in discussing a motion of a similar nature said:

> The hon. member who preceded me mentioned the decline in the power of private members. That is all too true.

That is how he felt when the Liberals tried to curtail private members' days and rights, but he had a bit more than that to say. At page 5990 of Hansard of July 12, 1955, we find this statement:

> One thinks of the Lauriers and the Bordens, and one could name other great speakers of that time who carried on debate for weeks on end, as a debate was recently carried on, for whenever the privileges and traditions of parliament are invaded parliament should be vocal.

The house may think before I am through that I am being a little bit vocal, but I am taking the advice of the Prime Minister who, when he was leader of the opposition, said that when there is a motion to change a standing order and remove the rights of parliament, members should be vocal.

Now, sir, can we not all remember the righteous indignation of the present Minister of Finance when he sat on this side of the house, and what he had to say when the Liberals had the unmitigated temerity to try to remove any of the rights of the opposition and of private members, or to change a standing order that would affect us? Well, sir may we at this time just remind the Minister of Finance what his opinions were not so long ago, as recently as July 12, 1955, as found at page 5999 of Hansard:

> This house cannot function without rules. The rules should be broad and fair.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance to listen to the next sentence.

> Their purpose should be to safeguard particularly the rights of minorities in the house.

I hope the minister will not be disturbed because I gave only one quotation from him, but there are so many others of import that must be noted that I should like to refer to another stalwart of the rights of opposition minorities, and "do not change standing orders", and that is the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: We are all in this, apparently.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, all we on this side of the house are asking for now is that the Minister of Justice, as a member of the government, shall give the present opposition the justice that he demanded when he was in opposition. What did the present Minister of Justice have to say on January 27, 1955?

Mr. Fulton: What were we discussing then?

Mr. Winch: He had this to say.

Mr. Fulton: What were we discussing?

Mr. Winch: He said—

Mr. Fulton: What were we discussing? Will the hon. gentleman tell us the occasion of the debate?

Mr. Winch: A matter similar in nature to what we are on now.

Mr. Fulton: Was it not the revision of the rules? I would be interested to know.

Mr. Winch: Wait and hear it.

Mr. Fulton: The voice of doom.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps I was unfair to the Minister of Finance in giving him only one quotation; I have two for the Minister of Justice:

> Very often—and perhaps more so on this side than on the other—we members object to the way in which the government seeks to control parliament, and to the way in which it ignores parliament.

You have the page number if you wish to check it. Or course you know, sir, when you ask for a suspension of standing orders to remove the rights of private members you are ignoring parliament. As I said, I have two quotations from the Minister of Justice but there are many more. My next quotation is found on page 5564 of Hansard of July 1, 1955, and reads as follows:

> As a matter of fact, in connection with this whole matter I think the proper approach is that the rules are not a party matter. The rules do not belong to any party in the house and should not be changed by a majority vote of any party in the house.

This is a very important statement.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit an interruption? Is it not a fact that what was being discussed there was a change in the standing orders themselves, a change in the form of standing orders, a revision of the rules; and that in speaking of a change in the rules or to suggest that a change having permanent effect should not be imposed by a majority vote is very different from suggesting that a temporary suspension of a standing order be made without changing the rules, as is being done here?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, what was being discussed in the House of Commons on July 1, 1955 was the second report of the special committee on procedure and consideration in committee of the whole.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, a revision of the rules.

Mr. Winch: That is right, but in my hon. friend's discussion of the rules he made this definite statement:

> The rules do not belong to any party in the house and should not be changed by a majority vote of any party in the house.

If that principle is correct, Mr. Speaker, then we ask, on what basis does the same principle not apply to the changing of standing orders at the whim and the will of the government of which he is now a member? It is the same principle.

Mr. Fulton: There is no change in the standing order.

Mr. Winch: Yes, there is.

Mr. Fulton: There is a temporary suspension.

Mr. Winch: The government is now going to make a change for their purposes in standing orders so that, starting next Monday, there will be no rights and privileges of private members in the house as far as their resolutions and bills are concerned. In other words the discussion of private members' resolutions and bills is off as far as their rights are concerned.

I have a couple of more quotations. I am awfully sorry that the hon. member for Greenwood, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell) is not in his seat, because he was a fighter for the rights of minority parties and of private members. I hope the Postmaster General is not going to leave because I have a honey for him. I have always had great admiration for the hon. member for Greenwood, that wonderful person, outspoken and, I think, sincere. He had this to say on January 26, 1955, as found at page 559 of Hansard, when he was on this side of the house:

> I stress again that what has happened is an almost complete negation of this principle. It is a kind of erosion of parliamentary rights. If we look at it clearly it is really a conspiracy against the principles of our constitution, and the Free Press is quite correct in what it states. We are told there is to be a further invasion of the rights of the minority. We are told that the rules are to be amended so that the rights we have had in the past will be drastically cut down. If this is attempted I can only hope that every member of the opposition, to whatever party he belongs, will resist to the utmost. I agree with facilitating the business in a sensible manner, but I think we should be astute to resist strongly anything which savours of merely cutting down the rights of the opposition, and I think we should do our very utmost to make the general public feel how important this is.

That was the view of the hon. member for Greenwood when on this side of the house at the time the standing orders were revised. I ask what is his position now, when we are faced with a further cutting down of the principles in the revised standing orders so far as the rights of minorities and of private members are concerned.

There is one more reference to the hon. member for Greenwood which I think is important. On February 8, 1955, as found on page 943 of Hansard, the hon. member for Greenwood said:

> Let us remember this, with regard to ourselves in the opposition, that often we call ourselves watchdogs. But watchdogs should be able to growl and to bite. And if we are slipping into a situation where we do not growl and bite so well, then we ought to be very much on our guard, indeed.

We in this group, Mr. Speaker, are on our guard indeed in view of what we were told by the Prime Minister and other cabinet ministers when they were in opposition and defending minorities and private members against the taking away of rights by the Liberals who now sit on this side of the house.

I also said there was one other minister whom I desired to quote, and that is the Postmaster General. I like him very much but I think, sir, that if I were to use the words he used when the Liberals were taking away certain rights you would call me to order promptly. But I am not going to take that chance; I am going to quote from Hansard, which puts me completely in order. In view of the stand the Postmaster General took at that time, and in view of the position that as a member of the government he is taking now, I am going to ask him now whether he has the morality of an alley cat which he said the Liberals had when they tried to restrict the rights of private members.

An hon. Member: An alley rat.

Mr. Winch: "Alley cat" was the term. As found at page 788 of Hansard of February 2, 1955, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace had this to say:

> Under the British system, which is the one we follow in Canada, such cabinet tyranny can be cloaked in many ways. It will depend largely on the cleverness of the party in power in dissimulating its intentions and misleading the public as to whether or not the people generally realize the dangerous course their government may be following. When you have a government—

I am quoting, sir.

> —that has the political morality of an alley cat and the lust for power of a Genghis Khan, it behooves those of us—and that includes all of us Conservatives on this side—who hold democracy precious to be on guard for all the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Winch: —I have tried to review not only the debates that took place in the house when the standing orders were revised in 1955 but also within the limits of time and to the best of my ability to review the statements as found in Hansard of such eminent men when in opposition as the former leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Drew, the present Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Justice and the Postmaster General to indicate how they felt when the then Liberal government endeavoured to take away any of the rights of minority parties under the standing orders or the rights of private members as related to the powers of the cabinet. In all my studies, Mr. Speaker, I have found that when on this side of the house members of the Conservative party were the champions of the maintenance of the rights of parliament, the rights of minority parties and the rights of private members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: I think I have been quite honest in the quotations I have made, and I should like to ask those on the government side who applaud the stand the Conservative party took when in opposition how they, with their terrific majority, can support the introduction of a motion which will take away certain rights and certain days provided for private members under the revised standing orders of the house. There is also a second part to the motion, but I am not going to go into any detail at the moment.

An hon. Member: Hurrah!

Mr. Winch: Well, if you get funny and challenge me I will.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: I refer to the stand taken by the Conservative opposition with regard to the difficulties of trying to do two jobs at one time, and the fact that the work of parliament should not be hastened.

I can remember, sir, and I know you can too, those speeches made on this side by Conservatives to the effect that our responsibilities did not have any time limit, and if we made laws they should have the proper consideration given to them.

Now, sir, I try to keep very closely to the record. I ask hon. members to consider what we have given them from the record. We ask also that the government give consideration to the withdrawal of the motion. But just in case they do not I should like to move an amendment. We will work extra hours if we have to, but we cannot go any further with the removal of the rights of parliament. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier):

> That all the words beginning with "That notwithstanding" and ending with "as for Monday (government day), and" be struck out.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I had the privilege of following the same two hon. members who have spoken today in a similar debate. At that time I endeavoured to point out to the Leader of the Opposition—there was no need to point it out to the hon. member for Vancouver East—that one of the great assets to being effective in opposition was to have something to whine about. Now, a few weeks later, we find that he has not learned that lesson.

As for the hon. member for Vancouver East, I have heard him make many dramatic and melodramatic speeches, but never more so than the one today, and never did he have less about which to be dramatic. If he used this same force and this same flow of words in support of a worthy cause he might get somewhere. But listening to him today, with all this torrent of words and all these quotations which had to do with an entirely different type of motion, one realized how little he needs protection in so far as the right to speak in the House of Commons is concerned. Certainly no member, whether he be a member on the government side or a private member in either of the opposition parties, has so little to complain about in so far as taking the time of the house is concerned. I have no doubt that whether the house lasts for another three weeks, as we hope, or for another three months, the hon. member for Vancouver East will have his full share and more of the time that is spent in debate.

Mr. Winch: Not on bills and resolutions, if this motion goes through; no.

Mr. Green: The amendment he has moved sets out so clearly just what the real feeling is across the way today. The last thing the members of either one of these parties across the way desire is to have the wishes they have expressed verbally carried out. They are more anxious than we are to get out of this house.

Some hon. Members: Don't look at us.

Mr. Green: Some of those people who are shouting at me now have already told me that privately.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister tell us what he has been told privately by his own backbenchers?

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) wants to get down to Newfoundland and sail his boat.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unhappily, the minister is out of date.

Mr. Green: He has been wishing to get down there for weeks. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) wants to go back to Montreal to get started in his law practice. The Leader of the Opposition wants to get across the country mending fences, and that is a real job. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) wants to go to the Middle East and settle all the trouble there. I could go on—

Mr. Winch: After listening to all this, you cannot say that.

Mr. Green: Oh, sit down; you had your say. I could go on with member after member in the Liberal party and the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Pickersgill: You have not answered my question.

Mr. Green: Your question was not worth answering, like most of the questions you ask.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister mean to say they have such an effective gag that the backbenchers do not even dare say what they feel?

Mr. Green: I do not know of anybody in the house who would benefit more from a gag than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. It would increase his prestige immensely and at once.

Just look at the stand taken by these two parties, and this phony appeal they are making today. The Leader of the Opposition says, "Oh, it is quite all right to make further Mondays in this session government days; we have no objection." He is not worried about the rights of parliament or the rights of private members or the rights of anyone else when he is discussing the first part of this motion which is before the house today. He is objecting to sitting in the morning. The Liberals do not want to sit in the morning. Then we get over to the upper corner of the house—

Mr. Argue: We are opposed to both.

Mr. Green: They do not object to sitting mornings.

Mr. Argue: Oh, yes, we do; we do not like any part of it.

Mr. Green: Well, why did you move this amendment?

Mr. Argue: We will explain that.

Mr. Green: This is going to take quite a lot of explaining.

Mr. Argue: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Vancouver East moves an amendment to delete only part of the motion which provides that further Mondays from now on will be devoted—

Mr. Winch: This debate is not over yet.

Mr. Green: —to government days. One group does not want to sit in the morning, and the other one wants to have a chance to deal with private members' motions. The hon. member for Vancouver East made several statements about these private members' Mondays which were not accurate and which really shake the whole foundation of his argument. He said that if you took away these private members' Mondays, the private members would have no more rights; they could not bring in bills; they could not bring in motions, and he left the inference they would not even be able to talk.

Mr. Winch: I did not.

Mr. Green: What are they fighting against? Private members' rights to bring in bills will not be interfered with in any way if this motion is carried.

Mr. Winch: I did not say that.

Mr. Green: Wait a minute; give me a chance. Private members still have the hour on Tuesday and Friday.

The only business which could be dealt with on a Monday if that day were to remain available to private members would be "Notices of Motions"—

Mr. Winch: That is what I said; that is all day.

Mr. Green: —which appear on page 15 of today's order paper. As the hon. member knows, there are a number of these notices of motions on the order paper. That is the case in every session. Many of them are put there originally with the intention that they will get a little bit of publicity, but the members who put them there know very well that there will never be a debate on them.

Mr. Winch: Not ours; ours are for debate.

Mr. Green: Already there have been five days devoted to private members' notices of motions in this session which has not yet lasted three months, and that has not been doing too badly. All that could have been discussed if these three remaining private members' Mondays had been made available would be the first three notices of motions now standing on the order paper at page 15.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: These motions can be discussed by the members when the estimates are up for consideration. For example, the first motion has to do with shipping Canadian goods through Canadian ports. There could be wide open discussion on that subject by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Morris) if he wishes to discuss it when the estimates of the Department of Transport are before the house. The second one has to do with aid for education. That matter can be discussed when the estimates of the Department of Finance are under consideration, and I have not the slightest doubt that it will be discussed at that time and at great length.

Mr. Pearson: That is right.

Mr. Green: The third one has to do with setting up a system of credit facilities for agriculture and for fisheries. I believe that matter has already been discussed during the debate on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and it can be discussed further when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are before the house. Those are the only three resolutions which could come up even if there were three more private members' Mondays. When the hon. member for Vancouver East tries to make out that the government is riding roughshod over the rights of parliament and the rights of private members by the motion brought in today, he is just talking a lot of nonsense. The very fact that the Leader of the Opposition agrees that this is a reasonable course to follow I suggest makes the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver East look very weak.

Mr. Winch: Because they have not any resolutions; we have.

Mr. Green: Then as to the morning sittings, may I say this. I am heartbroken about one statement made by the Leader of the Opposition. He said that the house leader was not giving him and the other members of the Liberal party reasonable notice of the business that was to come up in the house.

Mr. Pearson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: I hear them saying "hear, hear" to that statement, Mr. Speaker, particularly the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. May I say that I have told him secrets all through the session. He has had more inside information than anybody else in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister had better be careful about what he is saying.

Mr. Green: Why the hon. member should be shouting "hear, hear" today is more than I can say, except that he has acquired the habit. We have tried to give the opposition parties advance notice of the business that is to be brought before the house. I think in his heart each member across the way knows that is what we have been doing. I was the house leader for the official opposition for some years while Hon. Mr. Harris was the government house leader. We got along splendidly, just as do the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and I.

Mr. Chevrier: Wait and see. Don't speak too soon.

Mr. Green: If the hon. member has the nerve to rise in his place and accuse me of not letting him know what the business is to be, then I can say in advance that he will be talking through his hat.

Mr. Winch: Read some of your own speeches that you made when you were over here on this side.

Mr. Green: The hon. member did not quote my own speech. I do not think he has one.

The Leader of the Opposition has commented on the fact that committees are still sitting. He will agree, I am sure, that most of the committees have already reported. I do not believe that better committee work has ever been done than that which has been done in the present session. We took a new course. We have referred the estimates of nine different departments to standing committees of the house. This is something that has never been done before. I do not believe there have ever previously been more than four or five departments whose estimates have been referred to committees. From my observation the members of the house serving on those committees, no matter to what party they belong, have done a splendid job. I believe this has been one of the finest accomplishments of the present session. It has been done in spite of the fact that a large proportion of the members of the house have had very little experience in parliamentary affairs.

It will be noted that we are not interfering with the committees during the whole of this week. The proposal is that the house start to sit on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday mornings next week, not this week. By that time all the committees will have reported, perhaps, with the exception of the public accounts committee and a special committee which will have to be set up to consider broadcasting legislation and possibly the committee on external affairs, although they have already had several sittings and I am hoping that they will be able to get their report in before the end of the week. We have very carefully deferred calling morning sittings until the work of the committees would be practically completed.

I do not believe there can be much real complaint about that course. Hon. members will notice further that we are not asking for a sitting on Wednesday evening. That time would be free even should this motion carry. I am sure I am expressing the belief of the majority of the members of each of the three parties in this house when I say the responsibility of this House of Commons now is to get the business of the session concluded just as quickly as possible, thereby letting the members get back to their constituencies.

This is not a regular type of session, as I pointed out on another occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: Oh, I do not suppose we shall ever have a regular type of session as long as the hon. member is here. We hope to get the House of Commons back on a basis where a session can be called early in the new year and can deal with the business for that year before July 1. I see no reason why that could not be done in 1959.

I am hoping in spite of this debate today, which I know is not a debate from the heart so far as those across the way are concerned and, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has just said, neither is it a debate from the head—he said that, I would not have said it—that we can get down to business this week and finish everything off within the next three weeks. That would give members the opportunity to get home a week or ten days before—

An hon. Member: Before the snow flies.

Mr. Green: —before the first of September. And I think it would be in the interests of every member and of the country as a whole if this were to be the result.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the house was quite wrong when he said a while ago that he did not think I would rise to protest the motion which has been made by the government as set out in the notice of motion now before the house. I am not rising to protest against the first part of the motion but certainly against the second part and to give my reasons for so doing.

The first part of the motion has to do with the amendment of standing order 15(3), and the house leader has indicated why he thinks there would be no objection to that. I believe I gave the house leader the reason for that decision on an earlier occasion; but my purpose in rising now is to protest—and to protest as vigorously as I can—that it is unconscionable, in my opinion, to begin sitting during the mornings, afternoons and evenings when the house has not before it a detailed plan of what the business is going to be from now until the end of the session. Are we going to sit for three weeks or six weeks under these conditions.

I think before this motion is passed we are entitled to know what the business is going to be. I am surprised that the house leader would refer to some of the private conversations which have taken place between us but, since he has done so it gives me an opportunity to refer to one of those conversations. Some time ago I said to the house leader, "What is the legislation which now remains to be dealt with before the end of the session", and without divulging his reply in detail he said there is this item and there is that item; in other words, two items. I jotted them down, but a little later on he came back and said "I forgot; there are two more" and I jotted those two down. Still later he came over to my desk and said, "Oh, I forgot another one." That makes five.

What, then, is the position? I think it will be agreed that, when the hon. members who are sitting on the other side of this house now sat on this side and asked the then leader of the government what the business of the house was under circumstances such as these, the then government leader put the business on the record in Hansard, so that we knew what it was. It is one thing to say "Everything that is in the speech from the throne" is the remaining business; and quite another to detail what that legislation is to be.

As I say, I think before we are asked to approve this motion we should be told item by item, what the motions and these bills are to be, and we should not be told in a general way, such as we have been told by the Prime Minister when he was asked this question by the Leader of the Opposition, that "it is everything contained in the speech from the throne". We are entitled to greater detail than we have been given.

The leader of the house began by stating that we on this side of the house had nothing to say, that we were whining. I do not know of any greater whiner than the leader of the house, particularly when he sat on this side of the house.

Mr. Green: Oh, but it was good whining.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not do him the discourtesy of referring to what a former colleague of mine ascribed to him, because while I think the words fitted him accurately it would none the less depart from the general spirit of this debate to do so. I will however refer to something else, because the house leader has said as part of his great oration that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wanted to get back to his ship. He does not have a ship; he has lost it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not all he has lost.

Mr. Chevrier: He has also said the hon. member for Essex East wants to go to the Middle East. I do not know whether or not that is true, but I do know one thing; if he did go there he would do an excellent job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: He as also said the hon. member for Laurier wants to get back to his law practice.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Stinson: That would be a good idea.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall not comment on that other than to say that one of the friends of the house leader told me one day "You know this man Green does not want to get out to his constituency at all. He likes the house so much he wants to sit here morning, afternoon and evening. There is nothing he loves better than the House of Commons. Why should he go back to his constituency?" I am beginning to realize now that this friend of his was quite correct when he made that statement, but let me tell the leader of the house that we on this side of the house are prepared to stay here as long as it is necessary to do the business of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: Furthermore, much as I would like to get back to my practice which I have not looked after now for many, many months, I do not wish to do so until the business of the house has been terminated. Let me further tell the leader of the house that if we knew that from now until the end of the session we would have certain definite pieces of legislation to face and exactly what was going to be brought down, then I think it would make our position much easier and much clearer with reference to this motion.

This we have not been told. Our position the other day with reference to the first morning sittings was entirely different from our position today, because we then saw that the end of the session was in the offing. Now that we are getting nearer to the end of the session, surely we should be told what is the business of the house. That is why we on this side of the house protest the second aspect of this resolution and will continue to do so until we know the business of the house.

Furthermore the leader of the house said something about the work of the committees. I am not in a position to know what is the progress of that work. The house leader has not told us. All he did was make a sweeping statement that the work was proceeding well, but I do not know that I can agree with him.

Mr. Green: Most of them have reported.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I can agree with the statement he has made that this new idea is working out so well. As a matter of fact I do not think it is, and I may say that I hope he will not repeat the mistake which I respectfully suggest was made in submitting the estimates to the committees. I do not want to go into the details of what happens in some of those committees, but

I do not think they are doing efficient work. I think if the estimates had remained in the house and if ministers had been here to reply, rather than having their officers reply in their stead in committee it would have been much more efficient, and I believe the work of the house would have proceeded much faster.

The house leader has said that he has taken us into his confidence and repeatedly told us what the business would be. Yes, he has, for one or two or sometimes three days, but I cannot remember—and in this I may be mistaken—one occasion during this session when he has given us notice of what was going to take place for one week in advance. That was something which often was done by the former minister of finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: Over and over again.

Mr. Chevrier: I say without fear of contradiction that when I sat on the other side of the house the previous minister of finance repeatedly gave the business of the house for a full week in advance. We are now being denied knowledge of what the business will be from now until the end of the session. We are told for one day and two days and we are often told, as the house leader has said, to use his own words "I will give you notice for Monday and Tuesday, but I do not know what it is going to be on Wednesday". It is difficult enough for a group such as we are in the opposition to get ready for the business with a week's notice in advance. How much more difficult is it going to be when we have only one or two days' notice?

I conclude by saying that before this motion passes the house is entitled to far more information on the business that lies ahead of us from now until the end of the session than it has received up to the present time; and until it gets that information I submit, as others have stated, that this motion should be withdrawn.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I feel that this motion is wrong in two aspects. If it is passed it will wipe out three private members' Mondays, and will also call for morning sittings every day. We have been asked today whether or not the arrangements for the various committees of this house are working well. There have been slated for this afternoon meetings of the committee on external affairs and the committee on agriculture, while the house is meeting. As long as the government has a great many committees meeting while the house is sitting I submit it is impossible for hon. members to do an efficient job in the committees as well as in the house. The practice now being suggested makes a farce not only of the committees but also of parliament itself.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech by the Minister of Public Works, who is a most entertaining speaker. If the Prime Minister has an understudy in terms of his particular method of speaking, an understudy who has learned his part well, it is the Minister of Public Works. By making use of his excellent sense of humour and by displaying his wide smile when he is really putting it to you, the Minister of Public Works is apparently able to argue effectively on both sides of the question.

When he started to roast the members of the official opposition he said, "Ah, I know why you are in favour of the first part of the motion. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wants to go sailing a boat, the hon. member for Laurier wants to go back to his law practice and the hon. member for Essex East wants to go over to the Middle East"—for the hon. member for Essex East to be going to the Middle East seems strangely fitting—"and the Leader of the Opposition wants to go on a political tour that is very much needed." The Minister of Public Works was making extremely important points in his humorous fashion.

When he came to the other part of the matter and explained why the government was doing this, what did he say? He said it is the responsibility of the government to get the session concluded as quickly as possible so that hon. members could get back to their constituencies.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that I said it was the responsibility of the members.

Mr. Argue: That is not the way I took it. The minister may feel it is the responsibility of the members, but here we have a motion which has been introduced by the Prime Minister and which has been spoken to by the house leader. The motion bears the stamp of approval of the government, and its purpose as explained by none other than the Minister of Public Works is to enable hon. members to get back to their constituencies, and to help the four hon. gentlemen in the Liberal party to whom he referred with such humour to do the very things he was scolding them for wanting to do.

Mr. Green: You want to get back too, do you not?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, my first interest here, as I believe is the first interest of all hon. members of the C.C.F. group, is to see that we do our part in promoting legislation which we believe is in the best interests of the ordinary people in this country—

Mr. Pallett: The C.C.F. members are great promoters, all right.

Mr. Argue: —and in conducting the affairs of this house efficiently and in accordance with the rules. In order to efficiently conduct the affairs of the nation in this house it is not necessary that we put on a steamroller in order to wind up the session within two or three weeks. No less an authority than a former speaker of this house who has already been quoted said, as reported in the Journals of this house for December 1947, that a two-month session if it is mismanaged is more wasteful of time than a six-month session during which no time has been lost.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who said that? Was that the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. Argue: No; Mr. Speaker Fauteux, who was the speaker of this house at that time.

I was exceedingly disappointed in the official statement made by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that his party would not object to that part of the motion which would eliminate the three private members' Mondays. The right of private hon. members to present motions under the heading of notices of motion and to expect a substantial number of these motions to come up during the course of a session is a tradition of long standing in this house. This is the first session in my memory when it has apparently been the official position of the government to talk out all private members' motions. We might be able to deal with more than three motions before the session concluded if the house leader did not take the attitude he took this afternoon, that only three motions could be dealt with on three further private members' Mondays.

Although this government has the greatest majority that any government in the history of this country has had it is apparently more terrified than were governments in the past of having motions or bills introduced by private members brought to a vote. No matter what the motion may be, no matter how innocuous its wording may be, no matter if it comes from a government supporter, the official position of this government is to put on one Conservative speaker after another to talk out the motions. That is the situation no matter how government members may attempt to paint it.

The greatest folly of all is that the government by this device is seeking to take away from the House of Commons the right of private hon. members to three private members' Mondays, a right which is embodied in the rules of this house. I was amazed and disappointed at the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice to the effect that the government is not taking so much away because this does not represent a revision of the rules. It is certainly to be hoped that this is neither a revision of the rules nor a precedent, because hon. members of the government as well as many hon. members of the Liberal party in this house know that over the years there have often been more than six private members' Mondays or two private members' Thursdays, and that the rule in the rule book today was placed there because it was the recommendation of a committee of this house representative of all parties, which met in 1955. By agreement and unanimous vote the committee decided that it would be better to provide for a fixed number of private members' Mondays than to leave it to chance.

What is the government attempting to do? The government is introducing a motion to take away the right of hon. members of this house to three further private members' Mondays. This motion interferes with an important right of private members. Something the government should avoid like the plague is any suggestion that the cabinet is dictating the rules of procedure and the rights of this house. The motion before us this afternoon is more than a motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister. This motion is the result of a cold, calculated decision on the part of the cabinet to eliminate three private members' Mondays.

I say to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and to the members of the government that standing order 15 has become the plaything of the cabinet; that the whole rule book and our whole procedure in this house are in jeopardy.

I had thought the Minister of Public Works, when he made the strong statement which he made when in opposition, would carry those beliefs into the cabinet, but apparently they were to be just statements from the sounding board of the opposition, and once the party has landed in the seats of the mighty then the means by which they obtained power cease to have little concern, because the Minister of Public Works is doing now precisely what he condemned for so many years. I think it goes even farther than that.

I think the minister indicated this afternoon that he does not know exactly what is in the rule book because he said that as far as this is concerned all it will do is wipe out three private members' notices of motions. Well, of course, that is not all it does because the fourth, fifth and sixth Mondays are different from the first, second and third Mondays. They are different in this respect. In addition to the notices of motions for the production of papers on the fourth, fifth and sixth Mondays, private bills are next in the order of precedence. Therefore, the government is not, as the minister says, merely taking away the motions of three private members.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, may I point out these are not bills introduced by private members; these are such things as charters to private companies, as the hon. member well knows. A private member cannot bring in a public bill under that provision.

Mr. Argue: The minister said that this was the only thing that was being affected by these rules. He said all that was being affected were the motions of three members. Of course, the motions of private members and private bills are different; but "B" of the standing order states that for the fourth, fifth and sixth Mondays there shall be private bills in advance of notices of motions. Therefore, what the Minister of Public Works is doing is taking away those three days for private bills, for such things as pipe line bills or extension of charters for church organizations or insurance organizations.

Mr. Green: You are not worrying very much about that, are you?

Mr. Argue: I am not worrying about a lot of the pipe line bills, although the minister may be worrying about them; I do not know. I am just suggesting the minister was not nearly as careful as he should have been in the language he used when he introduced this motion when he said that all it did was to take away the motions of three private members. He has taken away the possibility of three full days' debate on the Trans Mountain pipe line bill. I am not opposed to that bill being defeated but even if I am opposed to the measure passing this house, the rules of the house should be maintained. If in the maintenance of the rules a private bill passes this house to which I am opposed, then that is the way it should be. I do not think we should have any back-door methods or any shortcuts by either blocking the things which we are opposed to or taking away private members days.

When the Minister of Public Works sat in another position on this side of the house he said this on March 23, 1954, as reported on page 3216 of Hansard:

> The Progressive Conservative party stands for the supremacy of parliament. That has been one of our fundamental beliefs down through the years. We believe in parliament being supreme rather than the cabinet, and we believe that only in that way can we have a free parliament in Canada.

Mr. Green: We still do.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Public Works speaks of parliament being free but this motion was presented to parliament following a cabinet meeting. Is that the way to keep parliament free, to destroy the rule book, to destroy our standing orders, because the cabinet has decided that the first responsibility of members should be to get back to their constituencies. I think that is an untenable position; I think the government is making a grave mistake in presenting this motion at this time.

In spite of the statement which was made hurriedly by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Pearson), I suggest that the official opposition will be sorry indeed in the days that lie ahead if on this day they share with the government the responsibility of taking away some of the fundamental rights of this parliament as incorporated in the motion of the Prime Minister brought in at this time. The only position for any opposition group to take is to say that the rule book by which members' rights are guaranteed shall not be tampered with except by agreement, except by unanimous consent. But when any party or any members object there should be no motion of the cabinet to turn on the party whips and force such a motion through the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister has been most eloquent in his stand in opposing closure, and I agree with him. I think a motion to abolish closure is one that should be put through this house and become part of our rules; but if it were possible to apply a closure motion to a private member's notice of motion it would not kill the motion, it would not destroy it; it would merely say that at one o'clock in the morning following the day of debate the vote shall be taken. But this motion which is now before us places private members' motions in a much inferior position. Closure is not being applied which limits debate and brings on a vote. This kind of closure is an eradication of the debate; it is a removal of the notice of motion on the order paper.

In an important publication entitled "Parliament and the People", issued by the Progressive Conservative party national headquarters, 141 Laurier avenue west, Ottawa, Ontario, the following quotation is found on page 9. It is entitled "No Pipe Dream" and reads as follows:

> I have seen the progressive restriction of the supremacy of parliament in the last 10 years. I have seen parliament bludgeoned, and I say that is no pipe dream. Bludgeoned by a majority. I have seen the hands of the cabinet directing members and disciplining them into an abject servility.

That is the Prime Minister. I ask him to take off the party whip, to remove from the motion that part of it which eradicates three private members' Mondays, and therefore helps destroy the very foundation of the House of Commons, namely our rules and procedures.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to take only two or three minutes to deal with one aspect of this problem which has not been mentioned to date. I might say briefly that after listening to the Minister of Public Works this afternoon I think he has become quite skilled in the use of the axe, the shovel and the rake. No wonder he is Minister of Public Works.

Other members of this group have dealt with the constitutional, the procedural and the legal aspects of the loss of the rights of parliament in this motion doing away with private members' days. They have all done very well indeed and I am not going to repeat what they had to say, but I do want to say that as far as my experience in this house is concerned over a period of 13 years it seems to me that the parliament of Canada has been in existence for 91 years and to date has failed to organize its business and its work in a logical and satisfactory manner.

With respect to the hours, I want to make two points. The lengthened hours of the sitting of this house make it impossible for members to attend to their duties properly, to give satisfactory attention to legislation on the order paper, legislation that may come forward or to the estimates. I think this argument is of double force, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that at the present time we still have a number of committees sitting and one or two of those committees are sitting two or three times a day while the house is sitting.

But I rise, particularly, Mr. Speaker, to say that those lengthened hours over a long number of weeks are particularly unfair to the staff of the House of Commons.

The disorganized manner in which our business is being handled means that the staff of the House of Commons have had their holidays completely disorganized. Many of them are without the opportunity to enjoy summer holidays with their children during the months when their children are on holiday from school. Other members of the staff are required to put in unnecessarily long and unfair hours, but before resuming my speech I want to mention particularly the strain that these very long days impose on the Hansard reporters. We all know that repeatedly they are required to stay here until after midnight preparing the typescript so that Hansard can be published the next day. In addition, it is very unfair to what I term our Hansard angels, the ladies who type for the Hansard reporters. These young ladies find it a very difficult time because of the lengthening of the hours over a long period. I do think that in future sessions we must consider the welfare of the staff of the House of Commons. Finally, I hope that the situation that exists today and the debate we are having will result in better organization of the business of the House of Commons in the future.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the house that I too will only be a limited number of minutes. However, I think this is a vital matter. The last time a motion extending the hours of sitting was presented I think the reason was possibly understandable. However, the present motion invades the rights of private members with respect to notices of motions and I feel that the opposition would be failing in its responsibility if it did not sound a warning.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) claims that he knows the wishes of the opposition members and that those wishes are identical with the wishes of other members, that opposition members also would like to reach an early end to this session. If such is the case I must ask the Minister of Public Works why he did not consult with the opposition before the government made the decision it obviously has made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think that was done.

Mr. Regier: No, it was not. The opposition was advised of the decision of the cabinet. The opposition was not consulted before the cabinet made its decision. If there must be amendments to our standing orders I feel that there should be rather wide consultation because they are very important rules in our parliamentary institution. There should be such consultation before the cabinet makes up its mind and not consultation afterwards.

I was also very alarmed by the statement of the minister, which I hope was made inadvertently, that at the most three resolutions would be dealt with. If he meant what he said it indicates that the government has made up its mind that it is going to use the weight of a political party in the determination of what is to happen to private members' motions. I cannot fail but be alarmed when I see in country after country, even in Canada, the growth of power of political machines. I think we should watch that very carefully. I know that the Conservative party is not alone in having such a fault. I think it obtains in all political parties in Canada. A belief is developing that the party in power and the party machine and organization must have their way and in my opinion that is regrettable regardless of where we find it. The minister's statement that we could take only three resolutions in three days is an indication that the government is also afflicted with the power of the party concept.

The minister made a considerable point of the fact that we can discuss these problems when the estimates are dealt with. With reference to federal aid for education he said that he did not doubt at all that we would be taking a good deal of the time when discussing the estimates of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to discuss federal aid for education. If the minister is sincere in his contention that all these subjects can be amply aired on the estimates, then I must ask the minister why we need this motion at all because it is obvious that the number of motions we will be able to deal with will be limited by the mere fact that only three more Mondays are available. Yet if the minister is inviting members of the house to speak on the subject matters of all the various motions when considering estimates I can assure the minister that he will lose far more than the three days he is now hoping to gain. Surely if he says to members of the house that the government is going to take away three days but members can spend all the time they like on the estimates he is not arguing very successfully for any progress in the direction that it is indicated is desirable.

I should like to point out to the house that the subject matters of these motions are important indeed. The government introduces its ideas in the speech from the throne and other members of the House of Commons should have a chance to air their views. I have looked over the list of notices of motion and most of them deal with very vital matters that need airing. Federal aid for education is only one. Others include pensions, the difficulties of the textile industry, the need for further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, human rights, conservation of our natural resources, highways, the marketing of coal, a coast guard service, industrial decentralization, the elections act, the dumping of foreign agricultural products on our markets, Canada's one hundredth birthday, a municipal loan fund, lotteries and the employment of men over the age of 45.

Finally, I must remind the house that this year the house sat for the first month, January, and then reconvened in the middle of May. If the minister's wish is realized it will end about the middle of August. This adds up to a total of four months. This urgent need to complete the business of parliament and get home is not going to be looked upon very kindly by the people of Canada when they realize that we were at our job in parliament for only four months of the whole year while still collecting our pay for 12 months. I can quite understand that when the house begins to sit in the first month of the year, members then work for seven or eight months and the end of July is passed and we reach the middle of August, as has happened before, members should feel that they should end the session and go home for a while to consult with their people. However, when we have only spent four months here and there are so many urgent matters needing the attention of parliament as indicated in these notices of motion, then I feel that we are neglecting our duties.

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. member for Skeena permit a question?

Mr. Howard: I will permit any question you like except that I have not said anything yet.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The hon. member for Timmins.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, most of the matters I intended to deal with have already been covered and as a result I am going to make my remarks very brief. However, there were two points raised in the remarks of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and also intimated in the remarks and interjections of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) that I believe give rise to some cause for concern.

Those remarks were to the effect that the matter raised today is not exactly similar and so does not fit in with their remarks when they were in opposition. Are we to believe from that, Mr. Speaker, that they were only interested in the rights of parliament as they pertain to a certain subject? Does their belief in the rights of parliament cover the whole field? If would seem that is the only assumption we can draw from the remarks of the minister today.

I noticed also that the minister, first of all, made remarks to the effect that the Liberals were apparently no more interested in the rights of parliament now than when they sat on the other side of the house. However, in the next breath he said that this resolution must be all right because the Liberals supported it. This is a contradiction of views which I find it difficult to understand. It appears that the major reason for this resolution today is that it is not convenient to carry on with the rules as they apply to private members' days for the balance of this session. Perhaps members on the government side will be horrified at being compared with the gentleman named in this press clipping, but I should like them to stop and think for one moment about how big a step they are taking along the road outlined in this clipping by the present resolution. This press clipping is from Lisbon and reads:

> Portuguese dictator Dr. Antonio de Oliveria Salazar in a recent televised speech here said that "it is not convenient to have an opposition party."

I will grant you that no member on the government side has suggested or even contemplated that it is not convenient to have an opposition party now. However, I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that we have taken the first little step along that road when we say it is not convenient to have private members' days during the balance of this session.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I believe that if the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) speaks he will close the debate and I would therefore like first to make two very brief observations. We voted against the amendment because, among other things, we felt that by voting for the amendment we would have been implying that we were in favour of the second part of the proposition which is that part of which we have an unalterable objection. It seemed to us, therefore, that we would have looked rather ridiculous to vote for the striking out of one half of the proposition leaving the other.

So far as the main proposition is concerned—the second paragraph of the motion—we continue to be thoroughly opposed to this at the present time. It may be that before the end of the session it will be appropriate to do as was done when we were in office at a point where it was really possible to see the end of the session, and that is to ask the house to sit on every morning of the week.

We do, however, have many items of major legislation, according to all the indications, which have to be introduced in this house; items of legislation which, if the government carries them out, certainly ought to go to the committees to receive very careful consideration. That would mean that this session will continue four or five more weeks, at the very least, if we are to do our duty conscientiously. It would seem to me quite ridiculous, therefore, to ask the house at this very early date to do something which the previous administration did only at the very end of the session when virtually nothing remained to be dealt with but the estimates.

As the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said, we do not even know what legislation the government intends to introduce and I hope the Prime Minister will, if he speaks, give the house a detailed account of that legislation. Unless the government is going to throw overboard practically its whole program, I still think it is far too early in the session to be asking us to undertake hours of this kind and I hope the Prime Minister will indicate to us what legislation is still forthcoming and that he will leave no doubt in our minds that this session will not be closed without the implementation of the report of the royal commission on the revision of the terms of union with Newfoundland.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have just one slight comment to make—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Listen to the applause. After listening to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken I have come to the conclusion that while he may not be learning very much from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) with respect to whining—and there is no doubt that the minister is the greatest possible teacher we could have in that respect —he is certainly learning from the minister how to wiggle out of what might be an embarrassing situation—and again the Minister of Public Works is the greatest teacher we could have in that regard.

I merely want to say, however, that this is one more indication of a changed attitude. We do not have a Progressive Conservative party on the other side of the house, we have a party developing in this country which is changing from what it was to merely a party of defectors.

Mr. Pallett: A party of what?

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this has been a most interesting debate, one that has revealed many intriguing facets of the beliefs of the parties opposite with respect to parliament and the manner in which parliament should discharge its responsibilities.

I am not going to go into a great deal of detail, but I would like to say that I would have placed before the house at the very beginning the entire legislative program but, before I was in a position to rise—and there is no criticism inherent in these words I am about to utter—the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) rose and commenced his address.

I must say, however, that as I listened to the hon. gentlemen sitting to your immediate left—the members of the C.C.F. party and in particular as I listened to their authorities on the constitutional system of this country quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch)—I thought how applicable were the words of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) when he inferentially referred to inconsistency. I could not help but recall, while the hon. member for Vancouver East was enunciating those great principles of parliamentary government, a speech he made on November 10, 1943, in which he said when they get power they are going to "scrap the British North America Act".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And when it was suggested to him that he may have been misquoted, he made it very clear that he had not been misquoted. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) spoke of the few days during which parliament had sat and how much there was to do. The reason why I rise to deal with that particular matter is that I do not want to allow the people of Canada to conclude that parliament has not been sitting very continuously since October 14 last, or that there has been any neglect of responsibility on the part of parliament. Even making due allowance for the election and the campaign of several months which intervened, of the 295 days since October 14, 1957, parliament has sat on 142 days. That answers the hon. gentleman who tried to leave the impression that parliament had but one concern, namely to go home, when as a matter of fact I doubt that there has been any period of 295 days, except during wartime, in which parliament has sat for 142 days.

It has been very interesting to listen to my hon. friends to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, for they have endeavoured by constant repetition to delude the people of Canada into believing that they are in fact the true opposition because each and every one in that group speaks on each and every occasion and opportunity. I realize the difficulty of my hon. friends over there. They speak of how difficult it is to attend the various committee meetings but certainly we cannot accept the responsibility for the diminution in the degree to which the representation in that quarter since March 31 does not permit membership on all the committees of the House of Commons.

I was so much surprised to hear the suggestion made that the committee system was not working out very well. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said that but whether he was going into the question with the same degree of care that he usually employs, I do not know. All I can say is this. In my experience—and while I did not come to this house as early as did the hon. member for Laurier—in the time I have been here I have never seen any group of parliamentarians apply themselves with a greater care and attention in the committees of parliament than I have seen this year. As a matter of fact, I speak as one who is not a very good committee man. Over the years I have more or less cast out on the efficacy of the committee system. However, others whose experience is wider as committee members than is my own were able to convince me that the committee system could indeed be incorporated into our system without borrowing anything from the constitutional position of the congress of the United States. I think the committee system has worked out very well.

My hon. friend said that if we had not had the committees on estimates we would have discussed these things in the house. I would point out that there has never been any delay here. There has never been a day on which parliament has not been in control of the order paper. There has always been legislation and there have always been the necessary estimates available from the very beginning of the session. When the Leader of the Opposition speaks about organizing parliament, all I can say is that if there has been any lack of organization it has not been on this side. We have had legislation available and ready for the house at all times. We have had the estimates available. It has been difficult I know in connection with the estimates to put into one session almost the complete estimates of two years but always there has been a legislative program. When the hon. member for Laurier said that in the past we used to know a week in advance what was coming, I can only comment that I do not think I was here in those days.

Mr. Chevrier: I was and I remember it quite well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all, all that anyone asks is that he knows reasonably well, within a matter of two or three days, the general program and that course and that objective have been the objective and course of this government. It has not been due in any way to indolence, a lack of diligence or a lack of placing the legislative program before parliament that in a period since October 14 we have sat in session 45 per cent of the actual sitting days.

I know there are changes that could be made in parliament. The hon. member for Vancouver East referred to a speech that I made in the House of Commons on July 12, 1955. That was when the special committee on procedure was before the house for discussion. We were dealing with the necessity of preserving under general rules the conduct of parliament in a proper way. I pointed out on that occasion, and I am not going to say today that I have changed my views in that connection, that it is difficult with desks before us to achieve that degree of perfection in debate, cogency in argument and lack of prolixity which is so necessary for effective debate. We are all guilty. I know that someone will say if I did not have a desk before me at this moment I should not be able to have these two books before me.

The fact remains that one of the major reasons the British parliament has been so effective is that there are no desks before the members of that house that permit of an extensiveness in extemporaneousness aided and abetted by manifold documents on a desk. They speak there after preparation. They have no space on an individual desk before them on which to lay voluminous notes or great volumes. When a speaker has to bend every now and then in order to remove books and papers from under the seat upon which he was sitting prior to his rising to take part in the debate he is less inclined to have copious reference to voluminous documents.

When my hon. friends to the left of the Speaker say that the rights of parliament are being interfered with because each and every one of them will not have the right to speak over and over again, may I invite them to take a look at the parliament at Westminster and realize the degree to which that parliament has a wide complexity of subjects with which to deal and also realize the fact that there in debate a number are chosen of those who will speak on the basis of the motion of the Speaker after discussion with the Whips and there is no unnecessary repetition or redundancy. There are no 40-minute speeches. And yet the gentlemen in that parliament in the course of a session get through a tremendous amount of legislative enactment and discussion.

If it is to discharge its responsibility parliament must be more than a place where repetitious utterance masquerades as wisdom. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the suggestion of my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition that we can do much to reorganize parliament to make it effective. There is much that all of us can do in this regard for if we really give our testimony truly not all of us are free from being offenders. We can make this house more effective not by extending to the point of view of having parliament sit throughout the entire year but in another way.

I believe that consideration might be given at the next session, after consultation, to adding to the changes that were made in 1955. On the basis of experience, without in any way interfering with the freedom of speech which must remain in parliament actually as theoretically, we might achieve an increased degree of efficiency through reorganization along the lines I have suggested to bring this parliament and the discussions of this parliament generally in consonance with the experience and practice of the mother of parliaments. There the voice of freedom has never been silent as a result of that political experience which is peculiarly that of the British and which ensures the maintenance of freedom through speech while at the same time preventing unnecessary repetition which can only lengthen the sessions of parliament without in any way contributing to the benefit of legislation.

I think some effective changes were made in 1955. I just look back at some of the remarks I made at that time. There was a time in the old House of Commons when members spoke for four or five hours. They did not by speaking at that length really add too much after the first 20 minutes to assist in the solution of problems. Some hon. members will recall that in 1912 a very famous member from the city of Montreal spoke for 11½ hours. Then he said, "Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the essence of what I want to place before this house." Those were the happy days. In 1885, at the time of the rebellion, great debates took place in the old House of Commons. As I recall it—and I am speaking entirely from recollection—the first four or five who spoke took no less than four hours each. That did not make parliament any more effective.

When the discussions took place at the time the rules were changed to provide for speeches of 40 minutes as a maximum for members other than those designated, there were many who said that this was a grave interference with the freedom of parliament. Again, a couple of years ago, when speeches in committee were reduced to 30 minutes, there were some who might have felt that the reduction would make some difference in the solution of our problems; but in the light of experience I do not think that has been found to be so.

When hon. members say that parliament has not had a chance to speak and that we have changed since we came over here I simply give this answer once more. There have been 295 days since October 14, and parliament has sat 142. When they say that it is really terrible, the loss of private members' days, I say that there have been five so far and there were private members' days last fall as well. Members of the opposition were perfectly willing at that time to reduce the number of private members' days. As I recall it, the hon. member for Laurier said that it was only late in the session that similar motions were made before. I have the record here. In 1956, morning sittings continued from July 16 to August 14, four weeks and two days. I think, generally, that has been approximately the time at which the adoption of morning sittings has been accepted by the house.

I have been asked to say something in regard to the program in general. I am not going to read over the list on the order paper, except to say that the items on the order paper will be taken up and, I hope, passed by the house. With regard to those matters that appear in the speech from the throne, in view of the degree to which there has been some controversy in northern Alberta as to the site of the railroad to Slave lake, we feel further consideration should be given to that and will not have that legislation in respect of the building of a railway before the house at this session.

What is the remainder of the record? There is the bill of rights, the bill to amend the broadcasting act, the legislation respecting agriculture in general and the South Saskatchewan dam, the bill to provide for the building of the Campobello and Maine bridge by sharing among the United States government, the province of New Brunswick and the government of Canada; the bill to amend the Customs Act in one detail referred to in the budget speech; and, of course, a bill respecting supply in 1957-58, in pursuance of the undertaking given by myself during the recent election campaign, as well as an amendment to the citizenship act.

Now, sir, good progress has been made—

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the government not contemplating implementing the report of the royal commission?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I noticed by the manner in which the hon. gentleman interceded in the debate that that was a matter which greatly concerned him and I intended to come to that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the Prime Minister's pardon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; I appreciate being asked the question because sometimes one forgets what one intends to do. In that connection I can say that consideration is being given to the matter and as yet there has not been that final decision which will enable me to give to the hon. gentleman the answer which will conclude the matter one way or another. I realize his interest in this and the interest of the people of Newfoundland. I can assure him that the fullest and most careful consideration will be given to the recommendations as well as to the question as to when this legislation should be brought before parliament.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) says, in addition to what I have referred to there will be further supplementary estimates. In view of the general recital and the fact that on past occasions there has been generally accepted by the house the necessity of morning sittings, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to join with us in this. I do not want at any time even to appear to be trying to press the House of Commons. I realize, with the division that exists today, one could act arbitrarily. That is not the spirit in which I try to see parliament conducted. I want to see parliament effective, efficient; I want to see freedom maintained. Having regard to the experience of the past, I ask the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition to join with us in supporting this motion. No one knows better than I do how tiring the onerous responsibilities of being a private member are, as one goes from a committee to the house and from the house to a committee and how, during the last few weeks of the session, that tired feeling comes over one, not dictated by a desire to get over the responsibilities that are ours, but simply resulting from the fact that there are no directed hours of service as a member of parliament.

We do not have any 10-hour days or 8-hour days or 12-hour days if we discharge our responsibilities. I realize how difficult it is for members to be able to do these things but I am saying, with regard to the experience of the past and the fact that the rights of parliament have been assured and maintained, that a record of 142 days out of 295 gives the answer to those who prate—

Mr. Winch: And this is a new parliament.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: —of how they love the House of Commons and how the House of Commons is being denied rights. When the question of organization is raised by certain members of the opposition, my answer is, "physician, heal thyself", and arrange that one or another will have a knowledge of the subject and deal with it. That will assure the presentation of every viewpoint and it will remove one thing that is a subject of discussion today in every one of the free institutions in the free world, namely how to maintain that degree of freedom for parliamentary institutions without at the same time denying progress because of prolixity.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was agreed to on the following division:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1958 not exceeding $330,623,000 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1959; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principle amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $307,493,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $307,493,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CONVERSION LOAN ADVERTISING

Motion No. 28—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Benidickson):

Inquiries of the Ministry

For a copy of all contracts or agreements, or letters related to contract between the government or the Bank of Canada and advertising and promotional agencies, relating to the advertising and promotion of the conversion loan plan.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who makes this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in his absence, that there are no papers or documents falling within the scope of this motion. I therefore suggest that he drop it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure that course would be agreeable to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this order be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

MRS. A. E. WOODMAN

Motion No. 31—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of all correspondence since June 21, 1957, exchanged between the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or any officials of the department, and any other persons concerning the employment by the government of Canada of Mrs. A. E. Woodman, of Jasper, Alberta.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

PUBLICATION OF ALLEGED EXTRACTS FROM "CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he could comment on the accuracy of certain excerpts from a report of his department "Canada's Economic Outlook for 1958". He was not able to do so the other day. I am asking now whether he can comment on the accuracy of the excerpts printed from that report?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I judge this is the question which the Leader of the Opposition asked me on Saturday. His question was:

If so, can he say whether these excerpts are accurate?

My reply on Saturday was as follows:

My attention has been drawn to a report in the Toronto Star in regard to what the headline calls a secret report. I have made no further examination of the alleged excerpts quoted in the Star, as to whether or not they are from some secret report of the department.

That answer holds at the present moment.

Mr. Pearson: I have a supplementary question. Am I to understand from the minister that he has not yet checked the accuracy of these excerpts with the report in question?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the Toronto Star story to indicate what report of the various reports that I receive was being referred to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of the statement he made earlier today on this matter of the secret report, whether or not the distinguished newspaper man from the Toronto Globe and Mail, Mr. Clark Davey, is correct in what he attributed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce as reported in the issue of the Globe and Mail this morning?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I judge that I dealt with that matter, unless the hon. member has some specific reference to make.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did my hon. friend give an interview to Mr. Clark Davey with regard to this matter on Friday or Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do I understand that the minister states that he did not talk to Mr. Clark Davey who wrote in today's Globe and Mail that Trade Minister Churchill on Friday had told reporters that the newspaper stories indicated they were based on direct quotes from the report. Is that an accurate quotation?

Mr. Churchill: That is without foundation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then Mr. Clark Davey is not telling the truth, according to the minister?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question which I believe is supplementary to the one asked by the Leader of the Opposition. Does the minister know what the report referred to in the Toronto Star is when it is referred to as a report of Canada's 1958 economic prospects? Is that report known to the minister?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I receive quite a number of confidential reports from time to time from members of my department with regard to Canada's economic prospects.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Is there a report in the hands of the minister entitled "Canada's 1958 Economic Prospects" or "Canada's Economic Prospects, 1958"?

Mr. Churchill: Which one would you like, now?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not very clever.

Mr. Argue: Has the minister in his hands a report entitled "Canada's 1958 Economic Prospects".

Mr. Churchill: I will check the reports in my possession to see if any one of them bears the title mentioned by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister receive more than one report from his department entitled "Canada's Economic Prospects, 1958"?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I will have to look at the various reports which I received to see if I have one that is in accordance with the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he gave a statement to the Toronto Telegram concerning the report which appeared in the Toronto Star?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, I gave no statement to the Toronto Telegram.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. With respect to a press clipping under the title "Government violent at leak in security" as published by Peter Dempson of the Toronto Telegram as follows:

Trade minister Churchill summed up his reactions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is quoted as saying that his reaction to this report was violent and I ask the minister if he denies making that statement.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member was in the house at the beginning of today's sittings when the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt with a number of reports in the newspapers—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Including that one.

Mr. Speaker: —and as I recall it his remarks covered the one to which the hon. member is now referring.

Mr. Chevrier: I was here, Your Honour, and I listened very carefully to what was said by the minister when he made a denial, seriatim, of those articles in question. I have now asked him if he in fact made this statement to the Toronto Telegram and he said he did not so I was following this up with a supplementary question as to whether he had used the word "violent".

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could tell me whether his previous statement covered the question now asked.

Mr. Churchill: I thought, Mr. Speaker, that the answer I made earlier covered this question. I do not normally use the word "violent" and I have no recollection of having used it in this connection on any occasion whatsoever. It is not a word of which I make use.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Did the minister use the word "violent" in referring to "The Canadian Economic Outlook" for 1958", as reported in this article.

Mr. Churchill: I did not use the word violent.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Could I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he makes a distinction between the words "without foundation" and "is not true"?

Mr. Green: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the only proper questions which may be asked on orders of the day have to do with urgent matters. Many questions have already been asked with which the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt in his statement on privilege and now he is being subjected to cross-examination. There is no provision in the rules for conduct of this kind.

An hon. Member: You mean he is in trouble.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order just raised by the Minister of Public Works, it is true that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as a matter of privilege, denied the stories but the questions which have been put today do not in any way contest the right of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to rise, as he did this afternoon, on a question of privilege. The questions put thus far simply asked the minister if he gave interviews to certain gentlemen of the press and the minister has denied having given these interviews. Surely we are entitled—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to ask—

Mr. Nowlan: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Don't make so much noise.

Mr. Nowlan: Who is making noise?

Mr. Chevrier: You are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —whether or not he has given these interviews so that we may be in a position of having, on the one hand, the assertions of gentlemen of the press that they did have these contacts with the minister and, on the other hand, the minister's statement that he did not give any such interviews at all. Then the house will have to judge and the country will have to judge which is correct.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I will have to ask the hon. member for Essex East to confine himself to the point of order—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly my point.

Mr. Speaker: I thought he was making a statement about the country judging something and so on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The point is whether or not the questions which are being asked at this time are in order and I shall hear him on that point.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on that point—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I would like to hear the Minister of Justice next.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce rose when the sitting opened this afternoon and made a statement of privilege in which he dealt with a number of alleged quotations appearing in press reports. As I recall it, he referred to some half dozen such quotations and in each case he said that the quotation and the statements surrounding it were without foundation.

On at least two occasions hon. gentlemen opposite, by purporting to ask questions on orders of the day, have raised matters which directly challenge the accuracy of the statement of the minister when he said the statements and quotations were without foundation. I submit, sir, that such a line of questioning is completely out of order because it clearly indicates that the word of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, given in his place in this House of Commons, is not accepted; and no hon. gentleman has the right to pursue that line of questioning.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, no one is refusing to accept the word of the Minister of Trade and Commerce but the minister got up this afternoon on a question of privilege and denied certain statements attributed to him by the press. We are now asking him whether or not he in fact had interviews with these particular pressmen from these particular newspapers in regard to the matter about which the newspapers reported and surely, sir, we are entitled to the denial of the minister on our questions as to whether such interviews in fact took place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Normally scope is given for supplementary questions in order to clarify answers given but I do not think any minister is required to be subjected to cross-examination under the guise of questioning.

An hon. Member: It is not cross-examination at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order. For that reason I allowed the questions to continue, thinking they were asking for points of fact which had not been covered by the minister's statement. I think the house will appreciate, however, that if members are unable to elicit a clear answer by four or five questions that is about as far as the matter can be pursued at this stage of the proceedings.

I would like, however, to clarify something which I have said. I may have done the Minister of Trade and Commerce an injustice when I said "if an hon. member had been unable to elicit a clear answer." What I intended to say was "an answer satisfactory to the questioner." I was not trying to judge whether or not the answers of the minister were clear and I am sorry.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could direct a somewhat different kind of question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to ask the minister if he has received from the officials of his department a report or document entitled "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958"?

Mr. Speaker: My recollection is that that is the same question that was asked earlier.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) asked about a report or document with a somewhat different title. I believe an examination of Hansard will show that.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I should like, if I may, to give a supplementary answer—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, surely before the Minister of Justice replies we ought to have some comment in answer to the question.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not know there was any proper question before the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I submit there is a proper question before the house.

Mr. Speaker: It is not a point of order that a minister does not answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is common decency to answer.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East will have to withdraw that expression.

Mr. Chevrier: Why should he?

Mr. Argue: The minister claims he does not know if there is a report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said I should withdraw my comment. I say that any minister to whom a question has been put should know that the house deserves to be treated with the same respect as that expected by members who put questions.

Mr. Speaker: All hon. members know they have the right to ask questions but they cannot insist on answers and if they cannot insist on answers they have no right to comment on the presence or absence of a satisfactory answer at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Pickersgill: But there was no answer at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was not only comment but an improper comment from the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I said that if a question has been put to a minister the minister owes it to the house in decency to give a reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what you said at all. You are wriggling now.

Mr. Speaker: That is why I took exception to what the hon. member for Essex East said because that is just what he is not entitled to do.

Mr. Pearson: With respect, Mr. Speaker, the reason the question was put in this form is because the minister himself commented on the form in which it had been put previously and quibbled over the exact nomenclature of the report. That is why we are trying to get the exact truth in this matter without quibbling over the title.

Mr. Speaker: The question was asked. If the minister does not see fit to answer it, no comment can be made on it.

Mr. Harkness: It is mere repetition.

[Later:]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether it is true that he has ordered an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the story which appeared in the Toronto Star on Friday, to which previous questions were directed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, sir.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask a supplementary question, sir. Can the minister say whether or not he gave an interview on this subject to Mr. Mackie of the Winnipeg Free Press?

Mr. Churchill: No, I gave no interview to Mr. Mackie of the Winnipeg Free Press. He phoned to ask me if he could have a copy of a report and I said no.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the minister not tell Mr. Mackie that he had ordered an investigation?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that to Mr. Mackie and did not order an investigation.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

ANTIBIOTIC DRUGS—REFERENCE TO POSSIBLE PRICE FIXING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister been notified that the United States federal trade commission has charged six major drug companies with fixing the prices of the so-called wonder drugs at arbitrary, artificial, non-competitive and rigid levels? As some of the companies named are major distributors in Canada of antibiotics, will a study be made to see if similar illegal practices are being followed in our country?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The report referred to by the hon. member has not as yet been drawn to my attention but I will make inquiries in the department to see if it has come to the attention of my officials; and if the report discloses anything which indicates that it is desirable that the matter should be followed up in Canada I can assure the hon. gentleman that that will be done.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I continue with the statement I attempted to make earlier. Information has come to my attention since I answered the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). I understand that certain inquiries have now been instituted by the director of investigation and research into the question of antibiotics which was raised by the hon. member earlier.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT ON PROTEST OVER VIOLATION OF CATHOLIC SHRINE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) as to whether or not the government had received an appeal from Canadians of Polish descent through the Canadian-Polish congress of Canada, and had protested to the Polish government concerning the violation by their police of the holy Catholic shrine at the monastery of Czestochowa.

A communication dated August 1 has been received which reads as follows:

Toronto, Ontario
August 1, 1958.

Right Honourable John Diefenbaker,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Profoundly moved by the information received about the search of the monastery of Czestochowa, July 21, and recent campaign against the Catholic church in Poland, we appeal to you on behalf of the 250,000 Canadians of Polish descent to raise on behalf of the Canadian government and in parliament a most serious protest against the brutal attack upon the most holy shrine of Poland and religious freedom by a totalitarian and godless regime.

Head Executive board,
Canadian Polish Congress.

News reports indicate that since Saturday and also during the previous few days discussions have been carried on between the state of Poland and the church authorities in Warsaw and that certain agreements have been reached. Naturally this action by the Polish police is disturbing and the appeal that is directed to me is one that has my utmost sympathy. However, in view of the fact that this matter is now being considered as between the authorities to which I have referred the Canadian government does not propose to take any action which might have the appearance of interference with the arrangements which apparently have been made or are about to be arrived at. Naturally, too, the government wants to be assured that there shall be no impairment of that degree of tolerance and truce that has prevailed between the church and state in Poland in recent months and we hope that as a result of these communications that are passing between those I have mentioned, the state and the church, the future result will be a maximum degree of religious freedom.

I feel that at this time any action taken by this government by way of protest would add nothing to the solution of the problem when a solution is apparently being arrived at in consequence of deliberations as between the interested parties.

LEBANON—STATEMENT ON LANDING OF FURTHER UNITED STATES REINFORCEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask if he could inform the house about the nature and strength of the United States troops which have landed in Lebanon within the last 48 hours.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on Saturday morning I assured the house that I had, as is the customary practice in the diplomatic field, addressed a question through our embassy in Washington with respect to the nature and scope of the forces that had been landed in Lebanon by the United States within the last three days. This afternoon we received with respect to this matter information to the effect that the landings are regarded by the United States government simply as part of the original planned movement of troops and equipment. At the time of the initial landing by air in Lebanon of units of United States forces there were dispatched to Lebanon, by sea, men and material to support those units. Some of these have arrived in the past few days. They are considered part of the original program and their arrival does not indicate any recent decision to increase the strength of United States forces in Lebanon. I am very happy to report that to the house.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether or not Canada is opposed to this kind of continuing addition to United States troops in Lebanon?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make. I have given my answer.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT ON DISPOSITION OF CANADA HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on July 31 as reported at page 2891 of Hansard of that date the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker) asked me the following question:

> Is it the intention of the government to sell the house now occupied by the premier of Newfoundland, known as Canada house?

My information is that Premier Smallwood will shortly be moving into a house of his own and accordingly Canada house which is rented to the government of Newfoundland will be turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ACTIVITIES TO HALT VIOLENCE IN INTERIOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) but, in his absence, perhaps he can take it as notice, when it is drawn to his attention. Can the Minister of Justice make a comprehensive and detailed statement regarding the activities of the R.C.M.P. and of the United States coastguard, as those activities relate to certain incidents which are reported to have taken place in Prince Rupert over the week end?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Is that not a matter for the estimates of the Department of Justice, if my hon. friend wishes to bring it up?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance had been following the news reports he would not have raised that question.

Mr. Speaker: There is not enough information in the question to indicate what it is about.

Mr. Howard: If I may rephrase it now that the Minister of Justice is here, I just inquired whether the minister could make a detailed statement regarding the activities of the R.C.M.P. and the United States coastguard and the twice reading of the riot act by the mayor of the city of Prince Rupert, with respect to certain incidents which happened there over the week end, which the minister is quite aware of?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the R.C.M. Police, as the house is aware, has contracts with eight provinces in Canada, and under those contracts and arrangements pursuant thereto they are also responsible for the policing of some 120 municipalities. I think that normally it would not be expected that the Minister of Justice here would enter into detailed replies on the orders of the day with regard to incidents in connection with the policing of a municipality which is governed by the contract in effect in that regard. However, in this particular case, because of the unusual nature of the incidents, I think it is appropriate that I should give an answer.

I am informed that the strength of the R.C.M. Police in Prince Rupert, as governed by the terms of the contract, is 18 men from April 1 to September 30, and 16 for the remainder of the year. That is the number of men devoted to municipal policing. Saturday, August 2, marked the windup of the British Columbia centennial celebrations in Prince Rupert. I should also say I am advised that the fishing fleet was in harbour. Altogether, according to my advice, there were some three or four thousand visitors in the city on that day. During the evening, some 10 arrests were made by the police, and with the final two arrests for drunkenness and fighting a crowd of some 800 gathered and started to throw bottles and stones at the police. This uproar continued and a crowd followed the police to the police station and the city hall area. They continued to demonstrate there and to shout and throw stones. At 1.15 a.m. on Sunday, the third of August, the mayor read the riot act. It had no effect. He read it a second time, with apparently the same results.

In the meantime the crowd continued to shout and throw stones and bottles which broke windows in the city hall, in the police station and in some of the stores. At 1.30 in the morning the police, feeling that further action was necessary, moved in with tear gas. At about 2.30 in the morning, as a result of this action, they had managed to get the crowd dispersed and the situation under reasonable control. In the course of those incidents some policemen were injured, but only two in any serious fashion. There were also two people amongst the crowd that had taken part in the demonstration who were hurt sufficiently seriously to be hospitalized. I am advised, however, that they were not seriously injured.

In the course of these incidents 22 people were arrested for unlawful assembly and I am advised that the prosecuting attorney is now drafting charges. I am further advised that conditions today are quiet and have been ever since the crowd was dispersed. I am further advised that the city council met in emergency meeting immediately after the riot and fully endorsed the action taken by the police.

Now, with regard to the alleged activities on the part of the United States coastguard, I am advised that the U.S.S. Balsam had brought the mayor and some other dignitaries from Ketchikan, Alaska, to take part in this final day of the celebration. The ship was in harbour at the time but it is not clear, on the basis of the most recent information I have been able to obtain, whether the shore patrol from the Balsam were engaged in their normal patrol activities regarding the supervision of their own personnel who were on shore or whether in fact they participated, or were requested to participate, to any greater extent in controlling the outbreak. I would therefore prefer not to make any further statement on that matter until I have more detailed reports.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO NAMING OF NEW LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in connection with a letter which appeared in the Saturday edition of the Ottawa Citizen. Is the government contemplating naming the newly created lake in the St. Lawrence seaway in the near future? If so, is the suggestion contained in the letter to the editor to be considered? If the house would allow me, I should like to read the letter.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is not necessary. Perhaps if the hon. member would indicate the name suggested it would complete the question.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the letter. If the hon. member will send it to me I will study it and give him an answer.

Mr. Badanai: The name suggested is lake Chevrier.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is he now in a position to reply to the question I put to him last Wednesday, as to whether he is in a position to intervene with his colleagues so that regard may be had for the bilingual character of this country and that, accordingly, answers to our questions may be obtained in the two official languages of this country?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall see to it that the wish of my hon. friend is fulfilled in the future.

(Text):

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK"—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT ON CONFIDENTIAL ADVICE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the last occasion under the rules when we will have the opportunity on this side of moving a motion before we go into supply criticizing the conduct of the government in some particular respect, and I hope that in rising in my place on this occasion I will be able to avoid those repetitious utterances which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) warned us against this afternoon.

Mr. Fulton: We hope so too.

Mr. Pearson: Indeed, as he spoke this afternoon I could not help but think that one part of his remarks was very reminiscent of the kind of friendly, admonitory observation that occasionally used to come from the Right Hon. C. D. Howe who also did not like, and perhaps with better reason than my right hon. friend, repetitious utterances. As he spoke this afternoon I thought he might be directing some of his advice in that regard to the members of his own party in connection with their statements on private bills and resolutions in this chamber. Like the Prime Minister, I do not believe that repetition is necessarily refutation but with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will take a certain amount of time this evening to deal with the matter I have on my mind.

The Prime Minister also made some very interesting observations this afternoon about changes in the atmosphere, in the procedure, in the physical facilities of the chamber which might speed up our debates and make them more effective, and for that purpose he thought that there was perhaps something to be said for taking away our desks. He was good enough the other day to offer me, and perhaps one or two other privileged members, loudspeakers in our offices so we could do two jobs at once, the work in the office and the work on the floor of the house, but I hope he is not making that offer on condition that if we accept it it will be a kind of compensation for losing our desks. I confess with some mild depression, Mr. Speaker, that a good many of us in this party lost our seats recently but I hope we here are not going to lose our desks now or at least until we lose our seats.

I know, of course, as the Prime Minister pointed out, how tempting it is to pile up book on book on our desks but I assure my hon. friend that the books I have piled up here are for the purpose of making my notes a little easier to read and not to quote from. I will do my best on this occasion to reconcile what he called the necessity for progress with the temptation to prolixity, and my right hon. friend speaks, I think, with some authority on that matter.

I was, I confess, tempted in introducing this motion, to talk about something which is of longer range importance perhaps than some of the subjects which have been troubling us in the last week or so in the house. I was also tempted, I confess, to bring up the question of one, Mr. Walter Mitchell, who has been charged in this house with criminal conduct by a member of the government without having had an opportunity, and this is the real principle involved, of appearing before any investigating body or agency or committee of the civil service to defend himself or find out what he was charged with.

But the events of the last day or two seem to me to make it necessary to discuss on this occasion, and in due course I will move a motion in connection with the matter, the hidden report, Canadian economic prospect, 1958. That report has not been tabled and the government refused to table it when the matter was brought up in the house but some part of it, with every appearance of accuracy and authenticity, has now leaked into the press. When this happened at the end of last week the reaction of the Prime Minister according to the press, and he can correct me if this press report is also inaccurate, was "good for them".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I will correct that immediately. The only observation I made was: "I haven't seen the story so there is nothing more I can say."

Mr. Pickersgill: Another misquotation.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when I rise on a question of privilege and say that is the entire statement I made I do not want to hear my hon. friend—

Mr. Chevrier: You will just have to abide by the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —endeavour to read into the record what he desires to in order to make his case, having nothing else upon which to make it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just said that he has not read the story which he denies as being accurate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I did not say that. Even my hon. friend should keep within the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never made any such statement.

Mr. Speaker: In order that I may be clear on this matter, I understand that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) refers to a press quotation attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Speaker: —and the Prime Minister, rising in his place on a question of privilege, says that he did not make that statement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a story that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of August 2 saying that the Prime Minister's initial reaction to the newspaper story was "Good, good for them". The Prime Minister has denied and, of course, we accept his denial, that he made any such observation on this occasion. That is one additional denial to add to the number we have already received in the house this afternoon. When this matter came before the house on Saturday last the Prime Minister did say, as found on page 3007 of Hansard for August 2, 1958:

I think the hon. member for Vancouver East answered himself when he said there were "alleged excerpts in the press".

He went on:

If on every occasion alleged excerpts in the press were made the basis upon which privilege could be raised in this house, privilege would be an almost daily occurrence.

So he does not accept the accuracy or authenticity of the excerpts. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) took the same position on page 3008 of Hansard where there is the following:

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a supplementary question? May I ask the minister if they are or if they are not?

He was referring to the question of accuracy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I have not made a point of reviewing all the conjectures that appear in the Toronto Daily Star. That would be a full time job.

The Minister of Finance, who must have been interested in this story because it had a very direct bearing, as I hope to point out later, on his budget speech and the indices from which he drew his conclusions at that time, surely would have been interested enough to have had a look at this story which purported to quote from this report. But he indicated that he had not read it or bothered to read it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), who has, I think, obtained a graduate degree in the house this afternoon as a master of misquotation, whether these excerpts were accurate. Saturday he said he did not know whether or not these excerpts were accurate, and today he indicated he knew nothing about not only the excerpts but he had no knowledge of the report itself, a report with which we are all quite familiar and so is the minister, from the Department of Trade and Commerce. When the minister feigned ignorance this afternoon about this report, he will perhaps forgive us if over here we did not take his ignorance very seriously. On July 18 of this year on pages 2410 and 2411 of Hansard, when we were dealing with the trade and commerce estimates, I asked the minister what about the report for this year? Is it in a different category? I was talking about this report, "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958". The minister replied, and this is in Hansard:

The economic survey for 1958 will be studied very carefully, and has been studied very carefully, and the government, in its judgment, will act in accordance with that report, as we thought the former government should have done.

This afternoon the minister indicated he did not know anything about this report.

Mr. Churchill: I said no such thing.

Mr. Pearson: There is only one conclusion that can be drawn from the words the minister used this afternoon. He was trying to give us the impression, when we asked him about this report to get information about it to which we were entitled, to find out whether or not the excerpts from it were accurate, that he had no idea what report we were talking about.

Mr. Fulton: You were not very clear yourselves.

Mr. Pearson: We were clear enough that if the minister had wanted to take this house into his confidence, and I say this with respect, as it was entitled, he would have answered the question. He knew all about the report to which I referred in Hansard. Indded, this report has been referred to previously in Hansard. On June 18, 1958 there was a notice for the production of papers concerning it. At page 1391 of Hansard for that date the Prime Minister had this to say:

> Mr. Speaker, the government finds it necessary to oppose this motion, on the ground that "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", is a confidential document.

Presumably the Prime Minister knew something about it, and so did the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when on July 18 he made the statement to which I have referred. If, indeed, there is no such report, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce tried to indicate this afternoon—

Mr. Churchill: I must raise an objection to that remark. It is quite untrue, and I hope the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) will withdraw that remark.

An hon. Member: What a laugh!

Mr. Pearson: There were questions asked about this report.

Mr. Green: Which you had no business to ask.

Mr. Pearson: We had every right and duty to ask them. I know it may be disagreeable to my hon. friends opposite to be pressed in this way in connection with a matter with which they are not anxious to be concerned at the present time. We had every right to ask those questions. When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) asked questions on this very point earlier today the minister preferred to remain silent. He did not even rise in his place and give him the courtesy of a negative reply. I think we are entitled to say, in the situation in regard to this matter of the report itself and the excerps from the report, that now confusion is worse confounded.

It is certainly incumbent upon the government at this time to make this report public, the whole report public. I think it is regrettable that this should have to be done in the interests of clarifying this situation. In the past these reports have been considered as confidential, secret documents from expert civil servants to their ministers. For many years, they were treated as such. In the past, the previous government had not made these reports public, and for very good reasons. But certainly now the circumstances are very different. There have been excerpts published, with at least the appearance of accurary, which have not been denied as being accurate by any representative of the government. There have been excerpts from this report in the press; there has been speculation and misunderstanding created by the attitude of the government in connection with the appearance of those excerpts. Surely in those circumstances the only way in which this matter can be cleared up is by making public at this time the report in question.

Mr. Speaker, how can they in common decency keep this report secret, in the light of the stand taken and the words used with terrific vehemence by the Prime Minister on January 20 last? The attitude of the government in respect of this particular report, and in respect of the excerpts from that report which have appeared in the press within recent weeks, demonstrates beyond any shadow of doubt the spurious, hypocritical, and purely partisan nature of the Prime Minister's attack on the previous government last January, and to an even greater degree during the election campaign. We remember the vehemence and vigour with which that attack was pressed on January 20 against the former administration for not disclosing the 1957 report. This attack was on the basis of carefully selected excerpts from that report of 1957, which were produced in the house—

Mr. Harkness: This vulgar abuse does not take the place of facts and reason.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friends had their day on January 20. They howled with glee on that day. Perhaps tonight they will only howl.

Mr. Harkness: I say this vulgar abuse does not take the place of facts and reason.

An hon. Member: Facts or whining?

Mr. Pearson: There were two charges levelled in connection with this 1957 report. The first one was that we did not take the report into consideration when we were producing our budget in 1957.

Mr. Green: You have never even read it.

Mr. Pearson: That charge, Mr. Speaker, has no basis of truth or, to use words popular today, no foundation in fact at all. Not only did the previous minister of finance take this report into consideration, he studied it and the government studied it.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did he not say in the house he had never even read the report or seen it?

Mr. Pearson: No. If the minister makes that statement, will he point to any reference in Hansard where I said it?

Mr. Green: I thought that I heard you say it.

Mr. Pearson: The minister should not make interjections of that kind on the basis that he thought he heard me say something.

Mr. Green: Will the hon. member answer the question? Did you read it or did you not?

Mr. Pearson: Of course, I read it. I have read that report from beginning to end, and so did the other ministers of the cabinet.

Mr. Green: When?

Mr. Pearson: The minister of finance took that report into consideration when he drew up his budget. He did not take certain excerpts from that report to prove a particular case; he took the whole report into consideration. I have wanted to say this for a long time, Mr. Speaker. The excerpts which the Prime Minister carefully selected from this report gave a completely inaccurate and distorted picture of what the report contained. The second charge was that we hid it. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) who I do not think is in his seat at the moment, rose in his place a few weeks ago with some indignation to say that that charge had never been made during the election campaign; that all that we were accused of —we in this party—was of not using the report in the developing of our economic and financial policies and in our budget of 1957 we thereby deceived the people because we did not use this report for that purpose. But there is abundant evidence to show that the main charge levelled against us in this house on January 20 and all over the country during the election campaign was that we hid the report, that we concealed the report. It became famous as the "hidden report". I do not want to say that without putting on the record some evidence to prove what I am saying. I now quote from Hansard of January 20, 1958. The first quotation is to be found at page 2536, when the Prime Minister said this:

—but I put it to the hon. members opposite—every one of them in the official opposition—that they hid the facts; they concealed the record; they did not let the Canadian people know what was taking place.

Then again at page 3527, the Prime Minister said:

We were on the slide,—

He was talking about the economic picture a year ago last spring.

—really on the slide,—

There are a great many people in this country at this moment who would like to be on that slide today.

—when they left power on June 21, and now, for political purposes, having concealed this document, they have the effrontery to pretend to the Canadian people that we are responsible.

Then again at page 3528 we find that the Prime Minister had this to say:

Why did hon. members opposite, in the idealistic vein of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, not reveal these facts?

And again:

Mr. Speaker, why did they not reveal this? Why did they not act when the house was sitting in January, February, March and April? They had the information.

Later, as found in that column:

Warned in March of 1957, what did they do to meet that? Silence gives the answer.

Then he went on to tell how we had kept this report secret and as reported at page 3529 of Hansard he ended up by saying this:

Did they give us such information?

That is the information in this 1957 report on economic prospects.

They had it in the report but they did not give it to parliament.

And again at page 3530:

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Prime Minister did not hear my question. Has this document which the Liberals concealed been tabled? If not, will the Prime Minister table it so we can all see it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know that it has been. I would take it that it has, surely. If it had not been tabled my hon. friend has added one more example to the record of concealment by my hon. friends opposite.

Surely that is enough, Mr. Speaker, to prove beyond any shadow of doubt that the main charge levelled at us in connection with this important matter was that of concealing or hiding what became known as the "hidden report". The Prime Minister made a great deal of that point during the election campaign, especially in a speech he made in Edmonton.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are you not making the same speech you made in the election campaign?

Mr. Pearson: No.

An hon. Member: None of the ministers can observe the rules of behaviour.

Mr. Pearson: On that occasion—and I am quite sure the Prime Minister will not accuse me of misrepresenting what he said—he attacked us very vigorously indeed for hiding this report from the Canadian people. He went on to say that not only had we hidden it but that not a member of the cabinet had even bothered reading it. Then he concluded his observations—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where do you get that statement?

Mr. Pearson: From the Edmonton Journal. I am looking for it now. I thought I had it on my desk. Perhaps I will find it in time to read it to my hon. friend. He will remember it, of course; and I am sure he is not going to deny that because that speech must be very clear in his mind. He accused us of not only having concealed it but not having read it. Perhaps he will remember that statement. Then he went on to say, "When I tell you the facts, they are the truth". The facts on that occasion, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the 1957 report are that this report was treated as every such report had been treated since these reports were instituted in 1946; that the cabinet had read it; and that the cabinet had used it as a basis for economic and financial policy. However, that kind of attack served its purpose. Nevertheless, I suggest that the people are not likely to be fooled again—in the light of what has happened in the last two or three days—by such mock and manufactured indignation as the Prime Minister displayed on January 20 last and during the election campaign in respect of this matter. I know some of my friends on the Conservative side say that this matter was all decided in the election, that we were badly beaten in the election and have no right to talk about such matters; that it is all finished. The events of the last few days, Mr. Speaker, have shown that it is far from finished because now we have another report, namely the report for 1958 from which excerpts have appeared in the press.

Mr. Harkness: How do you know?

Mr. Pickersgill: Are they or are they not excerpts?

Mr. Pearson: It is a very simple matter to decide. All the minister has to do—or any one of the ministers—is to read the Toronto Star, and then to say that the excerpts are inaccurate and are not from the report.

Mr. Harkness: Your only stock in trade is the Toronto Star and newspaper stories.

Mr. Pickersgill: They would do it quickly enough if they were not correct.

Mr. Harkness: Without the Toronto Star you would not have a word to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: We would always have the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members on the right will have their turn.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend should be greatly relieved that I am not talking about Walter Mitchell.

Mr. Harkness: I should be delighted if you would talk about Walter Mitchell. You have nothing to talk about there.

An hon. Member: Judge and jury.

Mr. Pickersgill: The lord high executioner.

Mr. Pearson: We have had these excerpts from this report Mr. Speaker, and not one member of the government, not one member on the treasury benches has risen in his place and said that these excerpts are not from that report, or that they are entirely inaccurate. We have a right to assume then that they are accurate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: This afternoon we asked the minister whether they were accurate and he refused to answer. I will give him a chance right now. If he will tell us that there is not a word of truth in any of these excerpts that have appeared in the press, I shall be glad to give him the opportunity to do so.

An hon. Member: Put up or shut up.

Mr. Pearson: In the face of this shrieking silence, Mr. Speaker, there is only one way to find out; and it is regrettable, as I said before, that this is the thing that has to be done. This report should now be tabled; it should be published. I think that is regrettable, as I have said, because these reports are secret and confidential to a minister from officials and they should be kept as such. But the publication of these excerpts which have not been denied by any member of the government certainly prompts certain observations and certain reflections. The first of these—and it is important—is that, by this publication and by the reaction of the minister to this publication, at least as it appears in the press and making full allowance for his denial this afternoon, this publication has brought the whole civil service under suspicion. That is the most regrettable aspect of this regrettable business and it is, I suggest, made worse by the statements attributed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding searching inquiries, investigations, et cetera. These alleged statements, some of which the minister denied this afternoon—and we accept his denial—

Mr. Pickersgill: Some he did not deny.

Mr. Pearson: —are made all the more damaging because of other observations made in this house by hon. members of the party in power respecting the impartiality and objectivity of the civil service. Therefore, in the light of those statements some of which were made in this house the other night, the situation in regard to this report is bound to be misread, misunderstood and to be related to these earlier criticisms. I suggest that they will have a bad effect on the morale of the civil service and this matter should be cleared up.

So far as the origin of the leak is concerned, there has been a good deal of speculation and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the house have had no access whatsoever, direct or indirect, to this report or to any of its parts before these excerpts were published in the Toronto Star.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: So far as we are concerned the report remains a hidden report and all speculation on that score can be silenced.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question. Has he seen the report since its publication, so-called, in the Star?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that I have not seen the report before or since the publication of these excerpts and furthermore I have no desire to see it until it is made public now in the proper, official way, because of the circumstances surrounding it.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a supplementary question; have any of the hon. member's colleagues seen the report?

Mr. Pearson: I have discussed this matter with my colleagues and none of them have seen this report.

I do not know how this report got out—there is a good deal of interesting speculation in the press that it might have come from one side or the other, from political sources or from official sources, and by political sources I include cabinet ministers—this is all speculation. I recall that a friend of mine some years ago left the civil service to join the cabinet and after he left his first cabinet meeting he was accosted by one of his friends high up in the civil service who said to him "remember, from now on you are not an official source, you are a cabinet leak".

But far more important than that is something of a very important and serious nature. More important than how the leak occurred is the fact that the events of the last few days, when they are related to what happened on January 20 last, mean that economic forecasting by officials in Canada, to which the Canadian governments have become accustomed and upon which they have come to rely, has now for all practical purposes been weakened and prejudiced.

These annual reports, which as I said earlier have been made without interruption since 1946, have proved to be most valuable to the Canadian government in the elaboration of their proper economic and fiscal policies. From now on I am afraid the government will have to define its policies and determine its budget without nearly as much useful and objective independent expert assistance as they have secured in the past.

Mr. Fulton: Why do you not blame the Toronto Star for that?

Mr. Pickersgill: The person to blame is right there.

Mr. Pearson: The usefulness of this kind of report has been prejudiced. In view of what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has just said by way of interjection it must be quite clear, or it must be made quite clear, that the person who must bear the greatest share of responsibility for the weakening and perhaps even the ultimate destruction of this most valuable government economic service is not the man who was responsible for the leak—reprehensible though that might have been—but the Prime Minister himself because of what he did last January.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Because of the improper use he made of the so-called hidden report last January and during the election campaign, he now has to accept the responsibility for the most regrettable fact that Canadian official economic forecasting which has been a confidential, valuable, and independent service to the government during the past 10 years have now become or are in danger of becoming a political football, hot news. As a result of that action of January 20 it looks as if leaks are far more likely to happen in the future. I remember at that time, and perhaps the Prime Minister will also remember, that I among others warned him that the consequences of his action might be serious.

My final comment is that if these excerpts are accurate—and there is no evidence that they are not 100 per cent accurate because the government would have given us their assurance if this had not been so; they are certainly under an obligation to let us know if these reports are inaccurate after the discussions this afternoon—then there are substantial and important differences between the comments made by the Minister of Finance during his budget speech and these excerpts from the hidden report on the Canadian economic situation. These differences have to do with very important matters such as the probable gross national product, prices, employment and unemployment. The minister said that this really had nothing to do with him because he is the man who takes the responsibility for making the decisions in regard to his budget and his budget speech—and that is perfectly right. That, however, is not the position taken by the Prime Minister when he accused us of not basing our budget in 1957 on selected excerpts from the report of 1957. It is quite true that the minister makes his own budget speech and takes his own responsibility for it but it is also true that any minister of finance should take into consideration whatever expert advice he can get and this report is one of the most important sources of such advice and was used as such by his predecessor.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has seen this report. The Minister of Trade and Commerce may not have seen it, but has the Minister of Finance seen it and did he use it in the calculations for his budget statement? It will be very interesting indeed if, the Minister of Trade and Commerce having expressed a rather cavalier attitude of ignorance with regard to this report, the Minister of Finance in another department than that in which the document originated had studied it very carefully before he prepared his budget. I would like to ask the minister if he would be interested in answering whether this was the case, whether he had access to this report before he drafted his budget statement. Perhaps he will answer during the course of this debate.

There are, however, some very important discrepancies between the excerpts from the report and the statements of the Minister of Finance with regard to these important matters I have mentioned. These discrepancies have a most important bearing on the present situation in Canada with respect to economic and financial questions, I think we should be told in order to clear up doubts and uncertainties as to where we stand in regard to these differences. We were in a great deal of doubt last spring because we had had no national accounting or any indication concerning the budget. We are rapidly approaching a period of doubt, uncertainty and confusion now because of the contradictions between the excerpts from this report and the statements made by the Minister of Finance in regard to some very important matters. For instance, the Minister of Finance—and I am quoting from his budget speech—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Page?

Mr. Pearson: I do not have the page numbers of all of these quotations but surely the hon. member must remember this speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were 20 pages of it you know. It might be helpful to have the page numbers.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: I am paraphrasing at the moment and if the Minister of Finance objects—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can tell my hon. friend right now that I will object to his paraphrasing. He has access to the record of my speech and he should use the exact words and not resort to paraphrasing.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the minister will let me proceed. The Minister of Finance said that once again the latest figures are encouraging, showing a rapidly narrowing gap in the percentage of unemployed as compared with a year ago. I am sure the minister will agree that that is an accurate indication of what he said, but the trade and commerce report forecast average unemployment during 1958 would be up 67 per cent over 1957.

Mr. Diefenbaker: From what is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. Pearson: The minister's budget speech.

Mr. Fulton: What report?

Mr. Pearson: I am quoting from excerpts of the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce which appeared in the Toronto Star and which have not been denied as to their accuracy by any member on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister has read the Toronto Star report and if he has read the trade and commerce report itself will he now rise in his place and tell me that those excerpts are inaccurate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not read the Toronto Star.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Finance in his budget speech said there are hopeful signs that we have reached the end of the recent decline. Moreover, he added, the problem has moved more clearly into the domestic field. The excerpts from the report in the press with relation to this point indicated that the key weaknesses underlying the present contradiction seem likely to persist for the current year and probably beyond.

The Minister of Finance said, and I am sure he will remember this portion of his budget speech, that assuming normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events he was basing his revenue forecasts on a gross national product of $32 billion which is about 2 per cent above the level achieved in 1957. I take it that that is an accurate statement of what the minister said. But the report from the Department of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Green: In the Toronto Star.

Mr. Pearson: —in the excerpts that appeared in the Toronto Star and which have not been denied by members of the government forecast a gross national product rise of only .7 per cent or $350 million less than that forecast by the Minister of Finance.

The minister in his budget speech said he expected that in the absence of immediate inflationary pressures there would be no general increase in prices during the balance of 1958. He estimated that the cost of living would remain stable during the current year and on that assumption he based his budgetary calculations and his deficit while the trade and commerce report as it appeared in the excerpts in the Toronto Star indicated that the cost of living index is still edging upward with no indication of an early change in this trend in sight. These are important differences in regard to vital indices governing economic and financial calculations that will be made by the government during the current year and if the appraisal in the excerpts from this report prove to be right—

Mr. Green: From the Toronto Star.

Mr. Fulton: Alleged excerpts.

Mr. Pearson: Excerpts that appeared in the Toronto Star from the alleged report of the Department of Trade and Commerce which after three days have not brought forth a word of denial from any minister.

Mr. Harkness: Why not save time by citing the Toronto Star?

Mr. Fulton: Alleged excerpts.

Mr. Pearson: If these excerpts are accurate in the face of no denial from any member of the government or if no member of the government has been sufficiently interested in this very important press report to check the excerpts against the original report to be in a position to inform us whether they are accurate—

Mr. Fulton: We do not attach the same importance to the Toronto Star that you do.

Mr. Pearson: In either case, Mr. Speaker, the government is condemned for gross negligence in a matter of the greatest possible importance to the economic and financial situation in the country.

Mr. Harkness: Condemned by the unreliable Toronto Star.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friends keep returning to that point—condemned by the unreliable Toronto Star—but no hon. gentleman on the other side of the house has denied the report and it is interesting to note that during the dinner hour they did not get the Toronto Star, read the press report and check it against the original report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Why did they not do that?

Mr. Harkness: Was there ever a time when the Toronto Star did not condemn us?

Mr. Pearson: The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in the absence of any denial on the part of the government concerning the accuracy of the press report the people of this country will accept these excerpts as genuine and accurate, and the fact that they contradict in some respects the economic and financial prospects for 1958 made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech is going to cause a great deal of uneasiness in this country. I suggest that it is time for the government to clear up this matter. I repeat that the only way this can be done, the only way the government can show it has good faith and can brand these excerpts as inaccurate, if it wants to, is by tabling this report. I have said it twice before and I will say it again. It is regrettable because this is not the course that should be followed in connection with a report of this kind, a confidential and secret report from government officials to their ministers. But I also say once again that the person on whom the blame must rest for the fact that the report should be tabled and that it should be done in this way and for the fact that the whole system of economic reporting is now prejudiced is the Prime Minister himself.

The damage was done last January, Mr. Speaker. It was done for partisan, political purposes when carefully selected excerpts from a confidential report which had not up to that time ever been made public were read by the Prime Minister in this house. The foundation of confidence in the procedure that had existed over the years was weakened as a result of that. What followed since January 20 was a depressing but natural development stemming from that original misdeed. And the result of that, has been that a system of economic reporting confidential, admirable, essential for the formulation of economic policy has been weakened, I hope not beyond repair. The entire system of economic reporting has now been prejudiced. That, Mr. Speaker, is the main burden of our attack on the government in this matter. That underlines their irresponsibility.

It was easy for the Prime Minister last January 20 to pick up this report and remove the cover which was marked confidential and take out a few excerpts to prove his particular points and thus make contents of the report public. He knew perfectly well—and if he did not he should have known it—that this was a report that was not meant to be made public. He knew perfectly well—and again if he did not he should have known it—that it was a confidential report used by the government in making its economic calculations. If it was right for the Liberal government to maintain the confidential character of the 1957 report at that time it is right for this government to maintain the confidential character of the 1958 report. But if the Liberal government erred—and that is a mild word—and if the Liberal government is to be condemned and castigated for not making the report of 1957 public, what can we say about a government that in the light of all the existing circumstances and in the light of all the speculation, misunderstanding, uncertainty, doubt and confusion that has been caused by the excerpts that have appeared in print from this report refuses to make the original report public; when the members of that government deny any knowledge of the report let alone any excerpts in the press from it? And so, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier):

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the actions of the government in connection with 'The Canadian Economic Outlook' have seriously weakened the value of confidential advice from civil servants with resultant damage to the proper formulation of economic and fiscal policies."

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, history repeats itself. Those who sat in this house on the 20th day of January cannot fail, I am sure, to recall the complete similarity of circumstance that we are confronted with at this moment, a roaring, volcanic speech from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and behold, the amendment, a puny, forlorn, ill-begotten runt.

Is your mind not transported back, Mr. Speaker, to the 20th day of January, the Leader of the Opposition making his maiden speech in the house after his election at the Liberal convention the week before, leading charge after charge against the treasury benches, charge after charge? Then, Mr. Speaker, you remember that he followed it up with an amendment that was so extraordinary that he could not even keep a straight face himself in reading it to the house. And, Mr. Speaker, what we have seen in this house tonight is a repetition in kind of that sorry spectacle.

You will remember that amazing episode, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition—and those of us who have known him a long time were hoping for something better on that occasion, in fact, something a whole lot better from him, and then to everybody's chagrin—and I am sure most of all to the chagrin of his friends and followers—what was brought in, that monumental amendment to a supply motion just like today, Mr. Speaker, in which he asked that:

His Excellency's advisers should, in the opinion of this house, submit their resignation forthwith.

Mr. Speaker, he made constitutional history that day and it was not very good constitutional history, either, and what he has done today is not very much better. We have heard from the hon. gentleman this night statements that would, if taken seriously by anyone in this house,—and I am sure they will not be—condemn this government fore and aft, foot, horse and artillery, everything, and yet, Mr. Speaker, does he say that His Excellency's advisers should submit their resignations as being unfit to hold office? No. That one apparently is taboo now. That one is not to be repeated since the 20th day of January. The effects that time were not of a kind to be desired ever again by the hon. gentleman. One would have thought that there might at least have been room in the amendment for some denunciation of His Excellency's advisers after the cascades and torrents of, I shall not say abuse but at least of invective, invective hurled at the head of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), hurled at the government. Mr. Speaker, it was a great opportunity for the hon. gentleman to match his brave words and his accusations with something at least manly and courageous in the amendment. But what do our disappointed eyes behold? This is the squib:

This house is of the opinion that the actions of the government in connection with "The Canadian Economic Outlook"—

This is in quotations, Mr. Speaker; there is no date given to it. I continue:

—have seriously weakened the value of confidential advice from civil servants with resultant damage to the proper formulation of economic and fiscal policies.

This is so forlorn it is obviously a product of a combination of disappointment, frustration and fear, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman drafted this. It looks again like the handwork of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I have a question of privilege. I deny the authorship, and the hon. gentleman knows what the rules are with respect to denials; but I would like to ask the minister a question. What would be the effect of the passage of this motion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I withdraw from the hon. gentleman the credit that I was giving to him for at least having the confidence of his leader to draw an amendment.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, since the minister is seeking the author of this amendment, I may tell him that I am the author and it is a vote of no confidence in the government. What more does he want?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is interesting to have the assurance of the Leader of the Opposition that this is intended to be a vote of want of confidence in the government. I tell you it would take somebody reading this with a fine tooth comb and a magnifying glass even to guess that it was a want-of-confidence motion in the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in the course of time when hon. members opposite adjust themselves to the realities of the situation, that when they come to draft motions of want of confidence in the government, they will speak out bodly and let everybody know that they have no confidence in the government, and have the courage at the same time to set forth the reasons why and not, as we have seen tonight, to start off with bold charges running east, west and north and then finish up with a poor little squib headed south.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister now permit a question? I should like to now ask the minister whether it is a fine tooth comb that the Minister of Trade and Commerce uses when he reads his reports?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, many times in this house I thought a fine tooth comb would be of great assistance to my hon. friend.

Mr. Pearson: That is not a very good retort.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would accept an ordinary comb.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this ill-begotten and almost fatherless amendment refers to the Canadian Economic Outlook. It puts it in quotation marks but it does not identify it; it does not say it is a publication; it just says:

> —the actions of the government in connection with "The Canadian Economic Outlook"—

Mr. Pearson: Don't you know what it is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. members opposite seem to have some trouble identifying this and I suppose it is another thing to be taken on assumption. I do recall that there was a Canadian Economic Outlook that was referred to in the debate on January 20, and I can only assume—

Mr. Pickersgill: Also on June 18.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that the Leader of the Opposition is referring to that. I can well understand, Mr. Speaker, why the Leader of the Opposition sought, however vainly, to fight Waterloo over again. Waterloo is still Waterloo, Mr. Speaker, and the 20th day of January, 1958 is still Waterloo to the Leader of the Opposition, and all of this refighting, this sham battle that has been fought by the Leader of the Opposition tonight, the charges that he led over the field, do not change the fact of Waterloo, or what Waterloo meant to the Leader of the Opposition on that day. When at the end of the day he looked about over the stricken field and when—

An hon. Member: He walked alone.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —he walked out of this house alone there was not one of his followers who even stood by him as he walked out of the house that night.

Mr. Pearson: Cheap.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am talking about what we saw. It is unfortunate—

Mr. Pearson: Very cheap.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no flag.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —chose to make the stand that he did that day but he has not succeeded in refighting the field.

Mr. Crestohl: Why don't you deal with the facts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Waterloo remains Waterloo.

Mr. Pickersgill: You said that before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman said at the outset of his remarks—

Mr. Winch: Why don't you get down to the point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that this was the last motion to resolve the house into committee of supply at this session. That is true and I am beginning to think that hon. members opposite must heave a sigh of relief that this is so when they have to go and scrape the bottom of the barrel, as the Leader of the Opposition did today, to find something to form a motion that he says is intended to be a motion of want of confidence in the government. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman wishes to pursue the tactics that have become so familiar during this session of seeking to fight the battles of the election all over again, I suppose we will have to do that as long as supply motions last in succeeding sessions.

Mr. Regier: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought this was a place of free speech. I thought the government was permitted to speak but apparently those hon. gentlemen to your left, Mr. Speaker, are making the rules of order and trimming down the rights of free speech in the house.

Mr. Winch: How about that report?

Mr. Speaker: If there is any point of order, will the hon. member please rise and state it.

Mr. Regier: I am very pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker. I have listened to the hon. member for 14 minutes, I believe, and he has not mentioned the report which is the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I hope someone will provide the hon. gentleman with an alarm clock. What we were asked to reconsider, to revise in the light of history, indeed, to rewrite history in connection therewith, was the introduction on the twentieth of January into this house by the Prime Minister of a report. That is the issue that has been raised here this night.

Mr. Winch: No, it isn't.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We were told by the Leader of the Opposition tonight that the former minister of finance had read that report. Mr. Speaker, that is the issue that arose at that time and it will not be forgotten that in the debate on that occasion mention was made of the fact that the minister of finance at that time had, in introducing his budget speech, made a statement as follows:

I come now to consider the economic prospects for the coming fiscal year. On the present evidence—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What page?

Mr. Pickersgill: What page?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I continue:

—I think we can expect a continuation of the current high level of economic activity throughout the coming year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What page?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was the statement. You will find it in Hansard of March 14, 1957 and it was quoted in the debate on January 21, 1958, at page 3568.

Mr. Pickersgill: What page is it in Mr. Harris' speech?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. gentleman can still read he will find it in Mr. Harris' speech of March 14.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister do us the courtesy of giving us the page reference so that we can see the context?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. gentleman will come to my office at ten o'clock I will be glad to look up the page for him—

Mr. Pickersgill: I can look it up long before that myself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —if he has lost all ability to look it up himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have it. It is page 2216.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have found it now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What do you make of that? Isn't he foxy, Mr. Speaker? He had it there all the time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I rather anticipated this red herring.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, but he is bright! Mr. Speaker, we are told by the Leader of the Opposition that such reports are confidential and should not be disclosed but in the face of having said that he now says that the proper course is that some report, which he does not identify in this amendment but which he kept talking about in his speech at times, should be tabled now.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. That is an entirely inaccurate statement. The report which I said should be tabled now is the report which I identified as "Canadian Economic Prospects, 1958".

Mr. Pickersgill: Outlook.

Mr. Pearson: "Outlook", and the reason I said it should be tabled now is that it has already been given out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is too bad that the hon. gentleman cannot still make these amendments that he has in his mind but his own motion has not identified the document about which he is talking. Let us have this perfectly clear. I do not believe this house will ever hear a more extraordinary example of self-contradiction than it has heard from the hon. gentleman tonight who says that some document or other about which he talks should not be disclosed because it is confidential and then spends half of his time arguing for the disclosure of some document.

Mr. Pearson: After it has leaked out to the press.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I want to make this abundantly clear. We on this side of the house are quite prepared to meet the attack that the hon. gentleman has made on the budget forecast in the course of his speech but not in his amendment. Mr. Speaker, the thing that irks the hon. gentleman and his followers in connection with the budget forecast is that it was not pessimistic enough. You see, Mr. Speaker, the whole speech that the hon. gentleman has made tonight in essence simmers down to this, that if the budget forecast had been very pessimistic there would have been no occasion for him to make a speech tonight. There would have been nothing for him to talk about. His objection is that the budget forecast was not pessimistic enough.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what the Prime Minister said on January 20.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the whole story. As we said to the hon. gentlemen opposite a few weeks ago in the course of the budget debate, which they evidently wish to start all over again, in their whole attitude and in their remarks they are prophets of gloom and their words are calculated to do harm to the best interests of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pickersgill: All we want is the truth.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to talk about the basis of the charge that the Leader of the Opposition has made. He has resorted to a newspaper report, a report in a newspaper not renowned for its accuracy nor animated by any desire to be fair to anybody who calls himself a Conservative. I will tell you at once, sir, that I have a very soft spot in my heart for the Toronto Star. When I was in municipal life in Toronto they always gave me solid support but the moment I went into federal politics in 1945 and became a Conservative candidate the editor told me very frankly that they would support me no longer. I had not changed. I was the same individual that day as the man they had supported the day before, but it was because I was a Conservative candidate and therefore the support they had been prepared to give me was automatically withdrawn.

All right, Mr. Speaker, that is fair enough. If a newspaper wishes to follow a party line this is a free country and that is perfectly fair. But I hope that when the house is called upon to vote condemnation in the government and to find a foundation for the kind of arraignment that has been delivered tonight by the Leader of the Opposition the house will have something better to base it upon than the overdrawn assumptions that have been made tonight by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: Do you deny the report?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I deny the right of any responsible member of this house to base condemnation of the government on an assumption of the kind to which he resorted tonight.

Mr. Pearson: Do you deny the report?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I might as well relieve the minds of hon. gentlemen now. You see, he has been trying by these cute little tactics all afternoon and this evening to draw out of members on this side of the house some reference to a document, something that can be used by him to found an argument to you, Mr. Speaker, that we had, somehow or other, referred to some document or other, and then of course he would demand the tabling of it. I do not intend to have the rules of this house wrenched around that way to suit the whims and convenience of the hon. gentleman. I do not propose, therefore, to make any comment upon these things that the hon. member keeps talking about, and about which he wants someone on this side to make a comment, so he can then say, produce the thing that he keeps talking about. I wish to make it quite clear to him that if he wants to base a motion for the tabling of some document or other that he apparently is especially anxious to see, he will have to go about it in a frank, straightforward way, and in doing so face the fact that such a motion would be out of order, and would have been put out of order by the fancy stratagems of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is a little more sensible than some of the others, yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister if he was not in the house when we passed a motion this afternoon wiping out private members' time and taking my motion off the order paper?

Mr. Pearson: Just ignore that, too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When my hon. friend talks about "wiping out", I think he had better come a little closer to the meaning of the expression he uses.

Mr. Pearson: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There have been several statements made by the hon. member and other hon. members opposite which I propose to wipe out now. The responsibility for the fact that this question had not been submitted to the house for a decision during this session rests with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

On June 18 this hon. gentleman, in his eagerness, introduced a motion under the heading "Notices of Motions for Production of Papers", in which he asked for a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as published by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I do not know whether this is the document that is referred to in the amendment now before the house, but if it is—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is certainly the document referred to in the Toronto Star.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —then the responsibility for the question not being determined by the house rests upon the shoulders of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. It will be remembered by those who wish to remember the facts, and here I offer this reminder by way of contradiction to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Prime Minister did not refuse to table the report referred to in the notice of motion of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. What he said is recorded at page 1391 of Hansard for June 18, 1958, and then he was interrupted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and prevented from completing his statement. The Prime Minister said:

> I was going to say we will produce it immediately after this year ends. It is a current report, publication of which would be detrimental until January, 1959.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the minister would permit a question? Just to clarify the record, would he mind reading the whole answer on that occasion, starting at the first. It is at the top of page 1391.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

> Mr. Speaker, the government finds it necessary to oppose this motion, on the ground that "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", is a confidential document.

Then, there was an interjection from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and he raised a point of order. He sought to prevent the Prime Minister from even making a statement of his position.

Mr. Pickersgill: From making a statement to which no reply could be made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has been the practice of this house, as the hon. gentleman knows, to permit a short statement to be made.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) wants to raise a point of order, as I understand it.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it was a question of privilege. I had asked the minister to read the Prime Minister's answer, and he then proceeded to read another part of the Prime Minister's statement in answer to my request. Hon. members in the house were being led to believe that he was reading the answer of the Prime Minister on that occasion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am certainly leading the house to believe that what I am reading now is the statement of the Prime Minister on that occasion, for which I thought the hon. member for Ottawa West had asked. I am going on to read the balance of that: I went right to the beginning of the Prime Minister's statement at the top of the page. If I had not done that my hon. friend would have been jumping up and stating that I had not started at the beginning. I am starting at the beginning, and I am going to give him full value so he might as well possess his soul in patience because he is going to hear the whole thing.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had jumped in and tried to stop the Prime Minister from speaking. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that his interjection on this occasion is longer than the three short remarks which, in the aggregate, the Prime Minister was permitted to make amongst the various interruptions by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, it was a point of order to which the hon. gentleman used to pay some attention.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, when we were raising points of order they were serious, and not these silly, vapid points of order that are raised nowadays by hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was never suspended by the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the minister proceed with the speech he intended to make. The exchange of points of order is becoming too rapid for me to keep up with them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the statement of the Prime Minister:

> Yes, I was just following the course that the hon. gentleman himself followed on January 20, 1954, when he set forth the reasons for his objection to certain productions. I was going to say we will produce it immediately after this year ends. It is a current report, publication of which would be detrimental until January, 1959.

That, Mr. Speaker, was all the Prime Minister was permitted to say on that occasion. Then, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate sought to exercise what he said was his option of having this motion—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —of having this motion transferred—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman is now embarking upon a subject upon which Your Honour made a ruling on that particular day. I believe it is against the rules of this house to discuss Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that a reference to the action of the government with respect to the report is pertinent to the amendment, and I cannot stop that.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the hon. gentleman was embarking upon his version of what I had done.

Mr. Speaker: As long as he does not question what the Speaker did, it will be all right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not questioning what anybody did. I simply wished to put the record straight, and hon. gentlemen opposite with it. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is no reader of my mind, I can tell him, if he thinks I am embarking upon some sea of his choosing. It was at that point he demanded the right to exercise his option to have this motion transferred to private members' notices of motion. This right you accorded to him, and that is the reason the house was deprived of the opportunity to make its decision on that motion. It was at the instance of the hon. gentleman that that motion was transferred to notices of motion, and his instance alone.

Although the hon. gentleman opposite has chosen to base his attack upon conjecture, since in one of his fleeting references in the course of this phantom speech of his he talked about the budget and the bases for the budget forecast, I propose to meet him on that ground. With apologies for trespassing upon its patience, I shall ask the house patiently to recall what were the bases of the budget forecast and to judge whether the house and country were given a fair, reasonable and straightforward foundation upon which to base their views with regard to the budget forecasts that were submitted to this house by the government.

An hon. Member: The answer is no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall ask the house to have regard to the tenor of the speech and not the individual sentences wrenched out of context by my hon. friend or others, nor to be guided in their judgment as to what were budget forecasts or bases by statements that have been distorted beyond recognition. What we ask for is that the house consider all of the budget forecasts and all the bases upon which those budget forecasts were founded.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh yes; ten more.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister tell us which statements he said had been distorted?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will wait and exercise that patience which I, with apologies, asked of him, I think he will have an ample answer to his question. I do ask him, a generous if somewhat foxy member of the house, not to ask for the conclusion before he has heard the evidence. We on this side of the house believe in presenting evidence, not conjecture.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Agriculture does not understand what evidence is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the budget speech the budget bases, the bases of the budget forecasts, are all there in Hansard at pages 1230 to 1250. It is very plainly written. In addition, let me remind the house that all the pertinent statistics upon which the budget is based are recorded in something like 100 pages of statistics in the white paper. How can any serious and responsible member of this house talk about being misled? If he is misled, it is because he has not taken the elementary precaution of doing what is the simple duty of any member of this house, namely to inform himself on the facts, the statistics, which are a matter of record here,—

Mr. Pickersgill: And were in Mr. Harris' budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —so that he will then be in a position to bring an intelligent opinion to bear upon the issues.

Mr. Pearson: Why did you pillory your predecessor? He had the same information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The previous minister of finance will stand responsible, in the light of his statement as to what was the outlook on the basis of what he said was all the evidence, when if all the evidence had entered into his budget forecast it would have been a very different story and the people of this country would have known that which the former government did their best to prevent the people of Canada from knowing.

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And what is more, this house then would have had the opportunity which hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in the government, sought by their most strenuous efforts to deny to the house; the house would have had the opportunity of assessing the utter failure of hon. members opposite to prepare for a condition of unemployment and recession which that report warned that government was coming if they took no steps to prevent it.

Mr. Pickersgill: And which the Minister of Labour said in December did not exist.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the issue that the people of this country fully understood on March 31. All this talk tonight on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite is not going to change that fact. The people of this country are intelligent people. They are not going to be misled by statements of the kind made tonight by the Leader of the Opposition into thinking that they misjudged the situation. The people of this country judged that situation clearly, fairly and thoroughly and I do not think they are going to relish being told now by the Leader of the Opposition that they made a mistake and that they did not know what they were passing on. The people of this country are still masters of this country. Our responsibility is to them.

Mr. Pearson: Why don't you deal with the issue?

Mr. Pickersgill: Until the next election your responsibility is to this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let us look at what it is that we are accused of. You see, Mr. Speaker, this whole show that was put on here tonight, like the show that was put on here this afternoon by hon. gentlemen opposite, was just a bogus exhibition. It would have done credit to a side show in some of the exhibitions that will be opening within the next three or four weeks.

Mr. Pearson: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This demonstration in the house I am sure will convince no one, not even those hon. gentlemen themselves. What they seek to do, Mr. Speaker, was somehow or other to say things that would, by one means or another coax out of this side of the house the production of some document or other or some reference to some document that would enable them to say, "Well, you have referred to it and now you must table it". It therefore was just a smokescreen.

Let us deal with the issues that have been raised here, Mr. Speaker. We are told, for instance, that we did not give the people of Canada sufficient pessimism in the budget forecast. Here is the story, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen can judge now, in the light of the assumptions that were referred by the Leader of the Opposition tonight, whether this budget forecast was based upon a sound estimate of all the factors at work in the Canadian economy on June 17 when the budget was delivered in the house. For instance, as found at page 1231 of Hansard, I began with this reference in the four pages of review of the economic situation to be found at pages 1231 to 1235. I began, Mr. Speaker, with this statement:

> During the past eighteen months Canada shared with most of the rest of the world some slackening in the pace of economic growth. Business activity declined in the United States, and the rate of expansion slowed in western Europe. In Canada unemployment emerged as a serious problem and declining business capital investment as a significant developing tendency. Nevertheless, it would be a mistake to forget that there were solid achievements on the economic side and developments which augur well for the future.

Will anyone say that is an unbalanced statement or that the government turned its back upon the less favourable features in the economic situation as of that time? Then further along on the page I refer to the fact that the rate of economic growth slowed noticeably during 1957. Then as found at page 1232, I said:

> The most important change which emerged during 1957 was the decline in the importance of business capital investment as a dynamic force in our economy, particularly investment in our resource industries.

Yet the Leader of the Opposition tonight has the temerity to say that the Minister of Finance in his budget speech did not take account of the decline in the amount of business capital investment in the economic life of this country. It is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman did not read the speech but contented himself with reading some excerpts from my speech that were quoted in the Toronto Star. If he is talking about excerpts, why does he not read the full document that was open to him to read? He has given an example here of a man who is very selective about excerpts when they serve his purpose. Again, Mr. Speaker, as found at page 1232 of Hansard, I said:

> Early in 1957 many commodity markets moved into a position of over-supply.

And again:

> By mid-1957 the value of large capital projects being started began to run behind the value of projects being completed.

Then again I make this reference:

In 1956 capital expenditure rose by 20 per cent and together with increased inventory accumulation accounted for almost one-half the very large increase in total demand. In 1957 there was a much more moderate rise of nine per cent in capital expenditure. More important was the fact that during 1956 capital expenditure was rising at a rapid rate while in 1957 investment outlays as a whole first levelled out and then declined slightly. The slow-down in the rate of capital investment was accentuated by the inventory liquidation which developed toward the end of the year. This reduction in inventories continued into the first quarter of 1958, which has meant that to some extent the demands for goods is being met out of stocks rather than giving rise to new production.

And again:

Although business capital investment ended the year on a weaker note than it had begun,—

And again:

Consumer expenditure was an important sustaining force in 1957, and at the end of 1957 was running about four per cent higher than a year earlier. Expenditure on durable goods, however, showed practically no increase over the previous year, reflecting in part the slower growth of incomes but also the rapid expansion in 1955 and 1956 which was based upon large increases in consumer credit.

And again, Mr. Speaker, at page 1233 we find the following:

The combination of somewhat less favourable employment opportunities with a rapidly expanding labour force resulted in an increase in unemployment. As employment was higher through 1957 than through 1956, so also was unemployment.

For 1957 as a whole the average number of persons without jobs and seeking work was 254,000, an increase of 75,000 over 1956. As a percentage of the labour force, unemployment in 1957 averaged 4.3 per cent, equalling the rate in 1954.

Again in the second column on page 1233 I said:

Corporate profits declined by 11 per cent as costs rose and markets became more competitive.

And again:

Personal saving was down about 5 per cent—

Does this suggest that in this budget presentation we ignored the less agreeable facts of the situation? Does this suggest any attempt to gloss over the unfavourable factors? On the contrary, I believe it shows that the assessment of the forces at work in the Canadian economy was fair, balanced and frank. It was not the kind of assessment which the hon. Leader of the Opposition was tonight trying to persuade the house to believe it was but, of course, he was selective. He was not looking for any opportunity to give a balanced presentation—

Mr. Pickersgill: How could one?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —or a fair presentation of the budget speech to this house. He sought to approach the matter with an extraordinary degree of selectivity—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Always for my dear friend the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In respect to the forecasts on which my hon. friend planned his budget my recollection is—and I would like to be corrected on this—that the hon. gentleman made no reference to the unemployment situation as it would develop in the period ahead in so far as he was able to ascertain the evidence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not attempt to catalogue month by month the course of the estimated figures on unemployment because I did not think anybody could possibly be persuaded to look at such a forecast as having any very great accuracy. The people of this country, after all, had had some experience with the hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect. They remembered, for instance, that at the Liberal national convention last January my hon. friend from Essex East, the Leader of the Opposition and others were bandying about fantastic figures which were never true figures of unemployment in this country. The most recent accurate figures were 380,000 and they were bandying around the figure of 800,000 unemployed which they were talking about as though it were a fact. I know how they arrived at this figure. What they did was a simple arithmetical process. They took the most recent authentic government figure and multiplied it by two and then, for good measure, they added 40,000. The budget speech gave the facts to the house and I know my hon. friend opposite would apply the same arithmetical formula to any figures put forward. I suppose he will do the same thing as long as he is in opposition.

To pursue the subject of giving a balanced presentation in the review of the budget, however, with respect to the factors at work in the Canadian economy I should now like to continue quoting from the bottom of page 1233 of Hansard for June 17 last:

Thus, the consumer price index, which began to rise in mid-1956, continued upward until last October, and experienced another short period of increase in the first four months of this year. Wholesale prices, on the other hand, reached a peak in January, 1957, declined 1.4 per cent during the succeeding 10 months, and have risen again moderately since November. The rise in consumer prices offset about half the increase in average wage rates so that advance in real income during the year was about two per cent.

Does that sound in the ears of any responsible member of this house like an attempt to gloss over the disagreeable facts of the situation? I think on the contrary that to any fair-minded Canadian it is evident, even on this incomplete review of the budget speech, that the Minister of Finance bent over backwards to give to the house and to the country a balanced presentation of the facts, whether they were agreeable or disagreeable. That being so, I have no apology to make; I make no apology that this was a balanced presentation. I make no apology to the hon. gentlemen opposite that, after weighing the unfavourable factors against the favourable factors, I came to the conclusions which were set forth in the budget speech. It is evident that hon. gentlemen opposite would have been happier if the Minister of Finance in his budget speech had limited himself and had confined his speech simply to the unfavourable factors in the Canadian economic situation and had not at the same time sought to give a balanced presentation which included the favourable factors as well. The people of Canada have shown what high esteem they have for the honourable prophets of gloom opposite.

I wish to say a word on the subject of the selectivity practised by the hon. gentlemen of the opposition. I have said that I think it is the responsibility of the minister to give a balanced presentation; I have already referred to a number of statements which I took from the four pages of the budget speech containing the review of the present economic situation in Canada but I did also say in approaching the conclusion of that review—and I put this before the house in the interests of balance—as recorded at page 1235 of Hansard for the same date:

> The policies of this government are assisting the growth in housing and social capital. The expanded role of social capital is illustrated in the 1958 Outlook for Private and Public Investment published by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The hon. gentlemen opposite should have jumped to their feet and asked for the tabling of that document—

Mr. Pickersgill: It has been tabled.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has been tabled. They are right but, Mr. Speaker, see how foxy they were. This report has been tabled. It is evident that they have not read it because they have not absorbed any of its contents. What is the use of placing reports before them when they approach the reading of them with such selectivity? Here is a document which was tabled and which should have been read by these gentlemen but they apparently do not know very much about its contents. The contents certainly did not appear in any of their speeches in the budget debate.

And then I proceed:

> Present investment intentions of business for capital outlays in 1958 are about 11 per cent below the 1957 level. Planned outlays for housing, government departments and institutional services on the other hand are 14 per cent higher.

And now, Mr. Speaker, again in the interests of balance I would turn to a later point in the budget speech by way of emphasizing the pains that were taken to put before the house and the people all of the facts whether favourable or unfavourable. I read from page 1243 of Hansard:

> —the main factor in bringing about the slackening in our rate of expansion has been the decline in the export demand for some of our basic resources.

And further:

> To go still further into deficit financing at this time could create conditions in which overt inflation of a degree very difficult to control might re-emerge. Indeed even now we have the somewhat paradoxical situation of simultaneous symptoms of both recession and inflation. If we go too far in the measures we take to combat what is, after all, a fairly mild recession, we might find that we had planted an inflationary time bomb which might later go off with a dangerously explosive effect. Admittedly, it is not an easy matter to judge just the right degree or balance in these matters; but in the present circumstances, it seems to me that we have, for the time being at least, a fairly sensible balance of fiscal policy, investment policy and income maintenance policies.

Mr. Speaker, was there any suggestion there of trying to bring the house down on one side of the question or to make the house think that all the factors facing the Canadian people and at work in the Canadian economy were favourable? No. I think that fair-minded hon. members will appreciate that this was an attempt to state to the house and to the Canadian people all of the factors that are at work in the Canadian economy. I hope it will not be forgotten that I ended my budget speech on—

Mr. Pearson: A note.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —a note that blended confidence with stern warnings.

Mr. Pickersgill: It certainly is not forgotten.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here were the words I used in my concluding remarks, Mr. Speaker as reported at page 1250.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, spare us!

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said:

> Moreover, I confess my concern over costs of production and prices in Canada. Only by keeping our costs of production in line with those of our competitors can we hope to achieve expanding employment and progressive improvement in our standard of living.
> We are in danger of becoming a high cost economy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Four and one half per cent bonds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I continue:

> Such a prospect is particularly perilous in the case of a country like Canada which must sell so much of its production in markets abroad. Moreover, Canadian producers are encountering increasing difficulty in retaining their domestic market in the face of keen competition from abroad. Many of them under these circumstances turn to the government for a solution of their cost problem.

In a free society there is no simple formula by which the government can maintain stable prices and there is a limit to what governments can do to assist producers to hold down their costs of production. A wise government can, of course, help to promote an environment which is conducive to price stability and this government gives a high place to that duty; but to an important extent prices are the result of competition among the various economic groups which compose our nation, each striving for a greater share of the national product. I echo the warnings issued by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to all sections of the Canadian people in appealing to all, whether employers, employees or self-employed, to have regard for the general interest in the returns they seek for their services and products. In a free society there is no omnipotent arbitrator who can set prices and wages at stable levels. One must depend upon the sense of responsibility of free men and women not to demand more than their fair share of the national income. As I have said on other occasions, increases in incomes can be justified by increased productivity and by increased productivity alone.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. Is it not contrary to the rules of the house to quote at length from a debate on a subject that has been concluded?

Mr. Harkness: It took you half an hour to find it out.

Mr. Speaker: I was hoping that the minister who has the floor would not find it necessary to repeat the entire budget address in order to make his point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is evident that my hon. friends opposite did not absorb some of the things that were said in the budget speech; otherwise they would not have been making distorted statements such as have been made in this house today by the Leader of the Opposition. I am reading these excerpts—

Mr. Pearson: You are repetitious.

Mr. Pickersgill: Pure narcissism!

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton):—not because I derive any particular satisfaction out of it and I am sure all intelligent hon. members of this house are well aware of the contents of this speech, but rather for the sake of my hon. friends opposite—

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question. I listened very carefully to what the minister said just now concerning the appreciation of the contents of his speech on the part of intelligent hon. members of this house. Would the minister tell us now that he will file the report that is under discussion so we can also have an understanding of it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You see, there it is again, Mr. Speaker. Hon. gentlemen opposite are so coy and foxy, but we on this side of the house propose to follow the constitutional course in these matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit one question. I have not before broken in on his very interesting, repetitious and prolix statement. If we cannot get any information about tabling the report would the minister tell us if the excerpts from the report are accurate?

Mr. Green: What excerpts?

Mr. Hees: Yes, what excerpts?

Mr. Pearson: The excerpts that appeared in the Toronto Star.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows full well that if I were to accede to his request I would be required to table all the documents he is asking me about and I have just no intention of accommodating that wish on his part.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, just to clear up that matter I would be glad to forego that right if the hon. gentleman will only answer the question.

Mr. Green: Why do you not table the Toronto Star?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How is the investigation coming along?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is one more paragraph in the budget address which my hon. friends badly need to hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am serious about my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I find it difficult to take you seriously.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is ten o'clock. I will deal with the point of order in the morning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, you are not going on tomorrow, surely.

On motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I presume we will continue this debate tomorrow?

Mr. Hardie: What do we do on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, after we finish this debate we are going to take item No.

4 on today's order paper, the act respecting the taxation of estates; then item No. 13, the Loan Companies Act which is to be referred to the banking and commerce committee; and then item No. 14, an act to amend the Trust Companies Act which is also to be referred to the banking and commerce committee; and then the resolution concerning the Customs Tariff amendments.

Mr. Chevrier: What numbers, please?

Mr. Green: That is item No. 22. And then we will take item No. 6, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act; item No. 15, second reading of the act to amend the Financial Administration Act; and item No. 11, second reading of an act to amend the Income Tax Act. We hope to finish all of this tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: What does the house leader intend to do on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: On Wednesday we have to ask for interim supply and then we would take any of these measures I have mentioned which had not previously been dealt with.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, August 5, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Fifth report of standing committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Dinsdale.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the the seventh report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May we have this report read by the Clerk, Mr. Speaker?

And the Clerk having read the report:

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that this report is not in accordance with the findings of the committee. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the evidence as found in the minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 6, of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, for Tuesday, July 29. On page 231 of that report we find this:

> The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry? We will have a show of hands.
> The Clerk: Six in favour, eight against.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should consider Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 322, which says:

> It is not competent for a committee to reconsider and reverse its own decision, but if the house resolves that such reconsideration is necessary, the correct procedure is for the house—

House is spelled with a capital letter.

> —to give the committee instructions which will enable it to consider the whole question again.

It is my contention, therefore, that you, Mr. Speaker, have one of two alternatives; either you declare this report out of order or you recommit this matter to the committee. There are many references which show this house has the power to recommit a problem to a committee, in which case the committee would then be clear of the decision reached at an earlier meeting.

This morning, Mr. Speaker, the committee met, and without any further ado and despite objections and warnings raised, simply reversed a decision it had made the other day. I should like to call your attention to citation 325 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. The first paragraph says:

> When the report does not contain any resolutions, recommendations or other propositions for consideration of the house, it does not appear that any further proceedings in reference to it as a report are necessary.

I should like to underline the words "are necessary".

> Every session, select committees make reports of this description, containing a statement of facts, or of the evidence on the subject of inquiry; but as they do not contain any proposition which can be agreed to by the house, they are simply printed for the information of the members.

The next citation, namely citation 326, I believe is very clear when it says:

> 326. The report of a standing committee should be considered final only when it is adopted by the house, because, until then, the house can refer it back to the committee with instruction to amend it in any particular.

If you wish other evidence out of Bourinot or May I am willing to produce it, Mr. Speaker. It is for these reasons that I submit that this report should be declared out of order by Your Honour or should be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I think a word of explanation here would be in order. The preamble of the bill, which had been carried, reads as follows:

> Whereas Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company has by its petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

It has thus been approved in principle. It would have been to negative this action by killing the first clause. There is only one clause in the bill. The feeling of the committee was that there had not been enough discussion. At that time a number of the members put their hands up indicating that they wished the discussion to continue. Also, Mr. Speaker, I understand that if there is any dispute of any kind or disagreement in a standing committee in a case of this kind, the members at that time should have immediately disagreed and asked that it be discussed further or that a vote be taken.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask one question of the hon. member who presented the report. Was the report as presented approved by the committee?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the report was approved this morning by the committee.

Mr. Regier: Further to the last point, Mr. Speaker, I should say that the decision of the committee in the first instance is evidenced by the minutes of proceedings and evidence which the chairman did not deny this morning when asked about it. The committee took a vote; it was a vote by count of the clerk, and clause 1 did not carry. However, the hon. member raised the point of immediacy. This is the first time this matter could be raised in this house, Mr. Speaker, as I think you will agree. However, even in the meeting of the committee, when apparently there was some confusion, there is noted at page 231 a comment or a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg South when he said:

> Does the vote on clause 1 settle the matter or is it to go on indefinitely?

I contend that he answered himself when he said "or is it to go on indefinitely?" Definitely, according to the rules whereby a committee may not reverse its decision, it would have to go on indefinitely, for the meeting to continue. Then, following that, the hon. member for Winnipeg South said, "We should now adjourn." There appeared to have been a number of members of the committee who understood at that time that the matter had been settled and the bill had been defeated in committee. However, the chairman said, "I asked our clerk if we could go on and he said yes."

The hon. member for Peterborough now makes the point that the preamble was endorsed. From all my reading of the rules, when you endorse the preamble you have satisfied yourself that all the conditions necessary for the consideration of the bill have been met; that is the endorsation of the preamble. I have always taken it, and have so been advised by others, that clause 1, which in this case is the one and only clause and the operative clause, is in effect the principle of the bill. The preamble only assures to us that it is right and proper that the committee do now consider amending a certain act at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point of order may be in effect an appeal from the chairman's ruling. Perhaps the best course to follow, as this is not a matter of immediate urgency, would be to allow me to consider the point of order which has been raised and to hold the item, which would normally go to the committee of the whole, until it has been disposed of.

Mr. Regier: I thank you, Mr. Speaker; and while you are considering it would you also consider the gross discrepancy which appears as between the evidence on page 231, recording this vote, and the minutes which say at one stage that the chairman asked whether the clause would carry and, "on a show of hands the committee decided to continue the discussion".

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if when you are considering this matter you could also consider the point that the vote on page 231 of the report was, in my contention, a nullity. I would refer you to page 354 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, where it says:

> All questions before committees on private bills are decided by a majority of voices including the voice of the chairman; and whenever the voices are equal, the chairman has a second or casting vote.

Then under citation 491 on the same page it continues:

> 491. (1) The names of the members attending each committee are entered by the committee clerk in the minutes; and when a division takes place, the clerk takes down the names of the members, distinguishing on which side of the question they respectively vote; and such lists are to be given in, with the report, to the house.

There was merely a show of hands vote, Your Honour. Accordingly it is my contention that the vote was a nullity and that therefore we were in order in carrying on the meeting.

Mr. Regier: The second vote was exactly the same.

Mr. Drysdale: And in addition, Your Honour, the matter was referred to the committee and I think that is the place where the appeal should be made; and I know Beauchesne does refer to that as the proper practice rather than appealing to the house. The committee unanimously decided that it was correct.

Mr. Speaker: I will take the matter under consideration. It may be that it should be disposed of in the committee itself.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—EQUIPPING OF R.C.A.F. WITH ATOMIC WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he cares to comment on the report in this morning's newspaper to the effect that the Minister of National Defence is in Washington to ask the United States to provide atomic weapons for R.C.A.F. aircraft co-operating with U.S. aircraft in North American aerial defence.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was in telephone conversation this morning with the Minister of National Defence, who is in Washington, and he stated very emphatically and without qualification, with respect to the report to which the Leader of the Opposition refers, that he did not at any time say that Canada plans to request nuclear warheads for the Canadian squadrons under NORAD.

In reply to a question which was addressed to him by a reporter—and this is to be found in the press reports—he said this might be an item at the first meeting of the joint consultative committee, the establishment of which was announced by the Prime Minister and President Eisenhower during President Eisenhower's visit to Ottawa.

FINANCE

NOVA SCOTIA—RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON RURAL CREDIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I have given him notice. Has the government given any consideration to recommendations of the Nova Scotia royal commission on rural credit, which in 1956 urged amalgamation of the Canadian farm loan board and the Nova Scotia land settlement board?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The report of the Nova Scotia royal commission on rural credit was received some time ago and this, along with all other pertinent material in relation to the whole subject of agricultural credit in Canada, is under study at the present time.

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT ON FLUORSPAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has received the report of the tariff board on fluorspar and, if so, when the report will be tabled.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not yet received the report.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"—INQUIRY AS TO TELEPHONE DISCUSSION WITH NEWSPAPERMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did the minister discuss over the telephone with Mr. Bruce Phillips, Ottawa correspondent for the Southam Press, the report in the Toronto Star of August 1 with excerpts from "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958"? If so, did he state (1) that his reaction to the leakage was violent and, (2) that an investigation or inquiry into that leakage would be instituted?

Mr. Speaker: I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce to have dealt with that precise question yesterday, dealing with the word "violent".

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: It was dealt with yesterday.

Mr. Pearson: No, it was not. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I submit that no question in regard to this point has yet been asked in this house.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he dealt with that yesterday?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I recollect being asked questions yesterday concerning both these matters. The only new aspect to the question is the introduction of the name of a member of the press gallery.

Mr. Pearson: Having just studied Hansard, Mr. Speaker, I think it is correct to say that no question was asked yesterday with regard to an alleged discussion between a representative of the Southam Press and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it is that particular discussion which has been reported in the press about which I am inquiring.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this whole question was canvassed at considerable length yesterday and it developed into what was nothing more than a cross-examination or a fishing expedition.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: Today the Leader of the Opposition comes into the house with a similar question in which he refers by name to a member of the press gallery, and he wants to conduct a further cross-examination in regard to this particular member of the gallery. If the hon. member can do that he can do the same thing with regard to every individual member of the press gallery. I submit that questions of this type are entirely out of order when we are considering orders of the day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, a report has appeared in more than one newspaper in Canada under the byline of Mr. Bruce Phillips of Ottawa commenting on a conversation which he had with the Minister of Trade and Commerce on this particular matter, which is of very considerable importance, and this particular interview was not referred to by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the Leader of the Opposition that what I am concerned about is the propriety of the question, not the circumstances which gave rise to it. We did have an extended inquiry of the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday as to his conversations with various members of the press, and as the matter was in the course of his public responsibilities I allowed the question and a number of supplementary questions.

If the hon. member's question today is a new inquiry about a new situation or involving circumstances which were not inquired about yesterday, I would be disposed to permit it, but I am not disposed to allow the minister to be cross-examined by a great many supplementary questions. We are in the middle of a debate involving this whole matter, and it seems to me that hon. members will be able to air their views sufficiently there. It is only a search for limited information which can be permitted.

In so far as the question relates to the use of the word "violent" I rule it out of order, but I am disposed to let the other part of the question stand.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I could rephrase my question in this form. Is the statement made in the Hamilton Spectator of August 2 and attributed to the minister, to the effect that he was conducting or had ordered to be conducted an investigation into the leakage of the report "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1958", accurate?

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister answers that question, may I say that I do not think a question of that type is permissible. If the hon. member will refer to Beauchesne he will find that he states quite positively that a question simply directed to the verification of a statement in the press is not in order. If the hon. member wished to ask the minister whether he had a conversation with the gentleman in question I would consider that a proper question, but not the one that he put.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you for your suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I will now ask the minister whether he had a telephone conversation with Mr. Bruce Phillips of the Southam Press regarding this alleged leakage and an investigation that was being conducted into it?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it was Mr. Bruce Phillips who, as I recollect, first informed me that there would be a story appearing in the Toronto Star.

Mr. Habel: You knew about it.

An hon. Member: Make what you can of that.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, since he admitted last night that the extracts in the Toronto Star were based on "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", if the government will now table that document?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that question involves a subject before the house in debate at the moment, and the hon. member might defer his question until the debate is completed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I also point out on a point of order that the hon. member has quite improperly smuggled into what purports to be a question something which he alleges to be a statement of fact and which is not a statement of fact, never was and I think never will be.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assume, Mr. Speaker, since the minister has raised a point of order, that you will hear me briefly on it. I would direct Your Honour's attention to yesterday's Hansard, page 3083, the second column, where the minister referred to "statements that have been distorted beyond recognition." He was referring to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition only quoted two documents. One was the budget speech, and the minister took no exception to the quotations from the budget speech—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Who says that?

Mr. Pickersgill: —so it is perfectly obvious that the statements that were distorted beyond recognition were from "The Canadian Economic Outlook". You cannot distort something you have not seen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: What silly nonsense!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member is happy now that he has made his point but, as I said originally, it is simply argument which should take place in the debate.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONCLUSIONS OF RECENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if in view of the statements made by the premier of Manitoba as to the necessity of getting plans ready to meet the urgent unemployment situation, and if in view of the conference recently held between the Minister of Labour and his opposite numbers in the provinces and the representatives of labour and management, the minister is prepared to announce government policy regarding the recommendations of that conference; or is it a fact that the government has not yet given consideration to the recommendations made by the conference?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such statements made by the premier of Manitoba, but I did make inquiries regarding the report of this conference as late as this morning, and I was told that the final report would be ready toward the latter part of this week. After that the report will be presented to the cabinet for consideration, after which time, and only after which time, the government will be able to adopt any policy it sees fit in order to alleviate the situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister allow me to send him a report from the Winnipeg Tribune of Friday last dealing with the statement of the new Conservative premier of the province of Manitoba?

Mr. Starr: I shall be very glad to read whatever the new Conservative premier of Manitoba had to say, because I know they will be words of wisdom.

NON-OPERATING RAILWAY UNIONS—INQUIRY AS TO CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him if he could indicate to the house whether the railways or the non-operating personnel of the railways have advised him of their acceptance or rejection of the report of the conciliation board which was made public on Wednesday last?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): In answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, I must advise that I have not received any word on that report from either party.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I realize that the Chicago water steal is an old threat to the welfare of great lakes communities, but it has new urgency now because of the water needs of the St. Lawrence seaway and Niagara power. The increased diversion of lake Michigan water for Chicago sewage purposes will raise the cost of Niagara power and endanger the St. Lawrence seaway. I am wondering if the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made a protest to the United States government concerning the bill that would authorize the additional Chicago diversion.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Representations in writing were made to the United States state department in an aide memoire which appears as an annex to Hansard for August 2, 1958. I may add that this aide memoire was conveyed to the committee of the United States Senate considering the proposed legislation on diversion of water at Chicago. It was presented to that committee on July 28. The committee was made fully aware of our interest and concern in this matter.

In addition to the written representations there have been discussions taking place both in Washington and Ottawa between officials emphasizing the particular interest and deep concern of Canada and the joint interest of both countries in the development of power and in the success of the St. Lawrence seaway.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES—DEDUCTIONS FOR EARLY CLOSING DUE TO HEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on July 25 the Minister of Finance replied to a question of mine respecting prevailing rate employees being allowed to go home early during the summer months under conditions of intense heat and humidity. I wonder if I could direct another question to the minister along that line and ask, in order that prevailing rate employees may be placed in the same category as permanently appointed civil servants, if the minister will undertake to ensure that if and when prevailing rate employees are sent home due to heat and humidity there be no deduction from their wages for such absences.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take it from my hon. friend's question that the employees in question are in the case he puts permitted to go home because of prevailing conditions of heat or humidity?

Mr. Howard: That is right, Mr. Speaker. When prevailing rate employees are allowed to go home because of heat and humidity, as are civil servants in the same areas, will the minister undertake to ensure that there will be no deduction from their wages for such absences?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think my answer on the previous occasion covered the point fully, but if there is any doubt I shall re-examine it and deal with it further.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DEATHS AT GARRY LAKE, N.W.T.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The minister will recall that during the discussions of the committee on mines, forests and waters I asked a question regarding the death of a number of Eskimos at Garry lake in the Northwest Territories, and was informed at that time that autopsies were being performed on the bodies. I wonder whether the minister could make a statement at this time, if he has received the report.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to take that question as notice and give an answer tomorrow. I have seen a report, but I would rather look into the matter and answer tomorrow.

BRIDGES

NIAGARA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF DOMINION CHARTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. At a meeting held in Niagara Falls last Friday it was decided that the go-ahead would be given to a new bridge over the Niagara river from Lewiston, New York, to Queenston, Ontario, joining the New York throughway to the Queen Elizabeth highway. Has a dominion charter been granted for this new bridge?

[Mr. Howard.]

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the matter, but I will check with the officials of the department and answer later.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO SUGGESTED CHANGES IN CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his role as one of the commissioners of internal economy of the House of Commons. Have the commissioners given consideration to the changes in the physical structure of this chamber suggested by the Prime Minister yesterday, and have they also given consideration to bringing the estimates covering the House of Commons before the house this session in order to provide an opportunity to debate the suggested changes?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a point involved here on which I should ask you to give some direction. According to my understanding of the situation, the proper source of information concerning the activities of the commissioners of internal economy is the Speaker of the house, who is chairman of that body, and not any individual member of it.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, from checking past records I would suggest that there is no clear definition, that sometimes the Speaker has spoken and at other times the Minister of Finance has been the spokesman with regard to such matters.

Mr. Speaker: I would think the proper place to raise the matter which the hon. member has in mind would be on the legislation estimates when they are before the house.

IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION BY SONS OF FREEDOM TO EMIGRATE TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I could put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government received any application from the sons of freedom or any group of the sons of freedom for financial assistance to emigrate to Russia?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me to answer that question. News reports have been brought to my attention in which it is said that a statement has been issued on behalf of the sons of freedom sect of the Doukhobors that they wish to return to Russia provided certain conditions are agreed to by governments, from which I take it they mean the government of British Columbia and the government of Canada.

I have not actually seen an authentic copy of the statement purported to have been made, but since the matter may be related to discussions which have been taking place between this government and the government of British Columbia concerning a solution of the Doukhobor problem, and in which I have taken part, I have communicated with the premier of the province indicating that it would be desirable if he could let us have his views and let us have an indication as to what the government of British Columbia desires to do with respect to the specific solution of the problem which has been under discussion between us.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUMMIT MEETING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): May I be permitted to ask the Prime Minister a question. What is the present position of the proposed summit meeting?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the only information that is available today is contained in a message received by the President of the United States from Mr. Khrushchev, in which Mr. Khrushchev asks that an extraordinary meeting of the United Nations assembly be convened, and I think the wording is, for the purpose of considering the question of the withdrawal of United States troops from Lebanon and British troops from Jordan. He is asking for an extraordinary meeting, and has obviously changed his attitude in the last few days or certainly in the last two weeks.

I have no observations to make on this change, with the exception that it has all the appearances that, Mr. Khrushchev having himself been faced with the reference of the summit meeting to the security council which was available to him, is now seeking means to delay the meeting of the security council which was proposed with a view to alleviating the situation in the Middle East. It is a change of front on his part, and one that indicates a great detour from the course he has been requesting for the last several weeks.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, August 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK"—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT ON CONFIDENTIAL ADVICE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Last evening, Mr. Speaker, I had dealt in an introductory way with some of the corrections of which the Leader of the Opposition plainly indicated he needed to be reminded in relation to the budget speech. I had, I know, disappointed him by not being gloomy. Indeed, the whole burden of the complaint of the Leader of the Opposition was that the budget speech was not pessimistic enough; and to establish his case, such as it was, he proceeded to wrench out of context things that were said in the budget speech, and to ignore completely many things that have to be taken into account in gauging the whole tenor of the speech.

The hon. gentleman has had a good deal to say about quotations and about excerpts. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is notable that in dealing with the budget speech last night, and in all his references to it, the Leader of the Opposition did not make one direct quotation. If he is going to make references I should think when the record is plain for all to read the least that might be expected of him under such circumstances, when he is making the kind of complaint he is, is that he should make direct quotations. It is interesting, also, that in his selection of excerpts from the budget speech he did not follow any consecutive course. The selection and sequence of the excerpts taken from the budget speech are to be found in the Toronto Daily Star.

Mr. Pickersgill: How do you know; you said you had not read it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member opposite will sometime or other perhaps, Mr. Speaker, understand the meaning of plain language, but as yet he has given no indication of being able to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I address a question to the minister; I am rising on a question of privilege. The minister has called my accuracy into question. I ask him if he did not tell us yesterday he had not read the item in the Toronto Star?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have taken careful note, Mr. Speaker, of the references to the budget speech in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. I am going to deal with them in relation to the quotations ascribed to the budget speech in the Toronto Daily Star.

Mr. Pickersgill: That does not answer my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nobody could answer such an utterly foolish and childish question.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is quite simple; did you read it or did you not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition chose to make four references to the budget speech. I note, Mr. Speaker, in the references to the article to which he directed our attention in his speech last evening, that the excerpts he has referred to are those appearing in the Toronto Daily Star, and in that order. He did not even have enough originality to change the order. He did not have enough originality to turn to the budget speech itself. Apparently it is enough that reference is made in the Toronto Daily Star, so he starts from there.

I should like to say a word or two about those references to the budget speech. The first reference in which the Leader of the Opposition indulged is found on page 3076 of Hansard for August 4, 1958. This is an accurate one, because here he departed from the language of the Toronto Daily Star—

Mr. Pearson: Which you did not read.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and which I have had an opportunity of checking against the references to it by the hon. gentleman in his remarks last night. First he talked about my reference to the rapidly narrowing gap in the percentage of unemployed as compared with a year ago. Yes, the Leader of the Opposition was correct in that reference, but the Toronto Daily Star was not.

He referred farther down on page 3076, Mr. Speaker, to a statement I had made, and which appears on page 1235 of the budget speech, where I said that "there are hopeful signs that we have reached the end of the recent decline". The Leader of the Opposition correctly quoted that one.

The next one, however, provides an interesting contrast. This is the third reference of the Leader of the Opposition to the budget speech. Here his remarks are in rather striking contrast to those appearing in the Toronto Daily Star, which was his guide. What I said is, I think, not to be confused with what the Toronto Daily Star has said on this subject as attributed to the budget speech. What the Toronto Daily Star has said—and this will be a fair guide, I think, by which to test the accuracy of this article—is this:

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

> Mr. Fleming forecast the 1958 gross national product—the value of goods and services produced —would be up two per cent over 1957, or $32 million.

What I said, Mr. Speaker, and this will be found at page 1235 of Hansard, is:

> Assuming normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events, I am basing my revenue forecasts on a gross national product of $32 billion, which is about 2 per cent above the level achieved in 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what is here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says, "That is exactly what is here." "Here" must mean somewhere in the recesses of his mind, because it is not what the Toronto Daily Star said. You see, what the Toronto Daily Star did was to omit entirely the governing words where I said:

> Assuming normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events—

This is interesting, Mr. Speaker. I suppose one should not expect too much in the way of accuracy from the Toronto Daily Star, Mr. Speaker, but you will notice that the Toronto Daily Star says that a 2 per cent increase over 1957 is $32 million. It says:

> —would be up two per cent over 1957, or $32 million.

What I said was that I was basing my revenue forecast on a gross national product of $32 billion, but apparently the difference between millions and billions makes little impression upon the mind of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Leader of the Opposition did not say that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am drawing attention to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has followed slavishly the selections from the Toronto Daily Star, and he has asked the house and the country to believe that the inferences which that paper seeks to draw with respect to the budget speech are correct when you see the sort of inaccuracies that appear in them now.

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order. The minister is challenging the accuracy of what I have said in relation to his budget speech and is basing his own remarks on something I am supposed to have said about the Toronto Star.

Perhaps I had better read exactly what I did say. It is to be found at page 3076 of Hansard. This is what I said, and I commend it to my hon. friend.

> The Minister of Finance said, and I am sure he will remember this portion of his budget speech, that assuming normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events he was basing his revenue forecasts on a gross national product of $32 billion which is about 2 per cent above the level achieved in 1957.

There is no mention of the Toronto Daily Star in connection with that statement at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Reference to the Toronto Daily Star ran all through the Leader of the Opposition's speech and was the whole basis of his selections. The whole sequence of his speech was based on the Toronto Daily Star.

An hon. Member: Be honest.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a point which is perfectly plain and unchallengeable on the part of the Leader of the Opposition. I am going to have something to say a little later about the nature of the emphasis of the Leader of the Opposition.

What is the basis of the budget forecast? Mr. Speaker, the basis of the budget forecast appearing in the budget speech of June 17 was advice based on conditions existing right up to the time of delivery of the budget speech. It was not based upon reviews of conditions in January. It was not based upon reviews of conditions in February. It was not based upon reviews of conditions in March. It was not based upon reviews of conditions in April. It was not based upon reviews of conditions in May. It was based upon—

An hon. Member: Speculation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —the most up to date indicators at the date of the delivery of the budget on June 17. When hon. gentlemen opposite want to restrict the government in its consideration of what are sound and reliable economic indicators to situations long before the budget date, I wish to tell the opposition—and I know it will bring them no joy—that the Canadian economy in the early days of this spring had showed very great strength. It was in the light of the conditions of strength that were shown in the Canadian economy in the spring right up until June 17, when the budget speech was delivered, that the budget was based upon those conditions and an up to the minute review of them.

That was the basis of the budget indications. That was the basis of the budget speech. Timing apparently means nothing to hon. gentlemen opposite as long as they can live in and create an atmosphere of gloom. These gloom mongers are doing no service to Canada. The strength of the Canadian economy shown this spring was a matter that brought no joy to members of the opposition. The strength which the economy showed served to abate a great deal of the uncertainty that had existed in earlier months, and to impart to the whole of Canadian business and Canadian activities of all kinds a more confident tone than had existed. Mr. Speaker, it was on this basis, the basis of the latest economic indicators with the best advice available in Canada to a minister of finance, that this budget was based and all its forecasts.

I took the responsibility with my colleagues of weighing those up to the minute indicators. I accepted them. I believed them. On them I based this budget. Those economic facts are there in the white paper for all to read, for all who will take the trouble to read; but we have not seen much indication on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that they have taken the trouble to peruse the incontestable facts appearing in the white paper.

I have this further to say, Mr. Speaker. If there are any persons who might seek to indulge in the baseless suggestion that the Canadian people were not led along factual bases in the budget forecast in appraising the economic forces at work in Canada at the time, may I say that no such complaint lies in the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite. They cannot complain that there was any misleading because they, in their budget speeches, showed that they took a divergent attitude.

I took the trouble yesterday to look up the record and to see again what the Leader of the Opposition himself had to say in his own speech on the budget. It will be found in Hansard of July 3, and I am referring particularly to pages 1902 and 1903. This is from a member of this house who now undertakes to say that there were divergences between the budget forecast and something else, and says evidently that he thinks the something else was sound and the budget forecast was wrong. This is supposed to be something new. The hon. gentleman would have the house and the country believe that he has found something new. It is a very old story, Mr. Speaker. It is a month old. It is stale in the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition. Here is what he said in his own speech on the budget, as reported at page 1902 of Hansard:

—I am quite sure that any observations I am going to make will result in my being accused of spreading doom and gloom—

Mr. Churchill: Precisely.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Precisely; that is correct. That is exactly the line the hon. gentleman followed then and is following now. He was not satisfied with the budget prediction that we were going to have a budget deficit this year of $648 million. He was going to improve on it. So he said the deficit will likely be over $1 billion. Those are his words as found at page 1902 of Hansard. Can anybody who said that a month ago complain that he was misled by the budget forecast?

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, he talked yesterday about the gross national product and my forecast of a gross national product for this year of 1958 of $32 billion, on three given assumptions. But the hon. gentleman had this to say as reported at page 1902 of Hansard of July 3. Speaking of what he called the optimistic deficit figure, he said this:

—it is based on a forecast of a gross national product of $32 billion which is, as I have said, a 2 per cent increase, assuming there is no significant rise in prices and assuming normal crops. After what we have heard this afternoon about the situation in the west, that is a somewhat risky assumption to make.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that on July 3 the Leader of the Opposition was a little hesitant about building any case on assumptions, but when August 4 came along he was so desperate, he was so hard put to it for something to say on the final supply motion of this session, that he based his whole case on the riskiest kinds of assumptions and on nothing else. Then his remarks continue:

However, that is his assumption.

There he refers to the assumption of the Minister of Finance, and then he continues:

He also leads us to believe that he is basing that estimate on the 1958 investment outlook, this assumption of a 2 per cent increase.

Then the hon. gentleman dwells on the subject of the gross national product and he continues, as recorded further down the page:

—and it seems to me difficult to understand how the minister can reconcile a 2 per cent increase in our gross national product with a 3 per cent decrease in total capital outlay without any price rise and with agricultural prices remaining normal.

He proceeded later on, after his review, to sum it up in these words:

—which justified, I think, our caution in this regard.

Then he went on to say the following:

That figure—

The figure he referred to was the figure on the gross national product of Canada published by the dominion bureau of statistics, and listen to this, Mr. Speaker, if you will, in relation to a man and coming from the mouth of a man who is an hon. member of this house who has said there is something hidden which this house ought to have:

The most recent piece of evidence we have—and the minister must surely be acquainted with it—is the figure published by the dominion bureau of statistics on the gross national product for the first quarter of 1958. That figure is $31.7 billion which, seasonally adjusted at annual rates, shows an increase of only 0.7 per cent over the comparable adjusted figure for the last quarter of 1957.

Yet in his speech yesterday the Leader of the Opposition tried to raise a hue and cry by saying that the gross national product estimated by the Minister of Finance at $32 billion with an increase of 2 per cent over 1957 had misled the country, because some other source had said the increase was going to be only 0.7 per cent. This was a brand new discovery. The Minister of Finance had misled the country because he had not given the figure of 0.7 per cent. One month ago the same figure of 0.7 per cent was put on record before the final vote was taken, and before the house resolved itself into committee of ways and means on the budget resolutions.

Mr. Pearson: From a different source.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was something which was put before the house. The 0.7 per cent was based upon a government record issued by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Whose estimates were better than yours.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This just illustrates how really silly and misleading was the case which the Leader of the Opposition tried to make out in this house last night. It was misleading because he tried to make it appear that something had been hidden; he tried to make it appear that he had discovered something new, something which the government should be called upon to answer. Mr. Speaker, this was answered in the course of the budget debate; this was all put before the house, and the house passed its judgment on that kind of statement on that very night in question, July 3, following the speech of the Leader of the Opposition.

Therefore let there be an end to this kind of hollow pretence, to this sham play on the part of the Leader of the Opposition. He talked last night about hypocrisy, which he attributed to a right hon. member of this house, but I would say to him that he is the last person in this house, in view of his performance last night, who should be talking about hypocrisy on the part of any other hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member has accused me of hypocrisy on the basis that I used a figure in my budget debate speech from a report which indicated that the increase in the gross national product had been merely 0.7 per cent, and therefore, having said last night that this report had been hidden, I had been hypocritical. The report I was talking about, or the excerpts from the report to which I referred last night, was an entirely different report from that from the Department of Trade and Commerce, which had no relationship whatsoever to the first report. It happened, however, to come to the same conclusion as this Department of Trade and Commerce report, namely that the increase was 0.7 per cent. These are two separate and distinct reports and one had no relation to the other, which the minister of course knows.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is not amiss for me to point out that in speaking as he did last night the Leader of the Opposition, unless he has completely forgotten the facts and unless he has completely forgotten his own argument on July 3, could not have failed to mislead the house if he had succeeded in making the house believe that there was something new, something hidden, something heinous about there having been no disclosure of the figure of 0.7 per cent. The dominion bureau of statistics put out that figure and the Leader of the Opposition was aware of it and put it on the record in this house away back on July 3. If what has been said by the Leader of the Opposition was not hypocrisy, then I think the hon. gentleman will have to amend his conceptions and his definitions.

Something was said by the Leader of the Opposition last night about unemployment figures and forecasts, as though we had asked the house to believe that unemployment in Canada was going to follow some figure we had put before the house. In the budget speech I did not put a figure before the house as to what unemployment was going to be. There cannot be any suggestion that this house was misled by any figure given; far from it. But listen, Mr. Speaker, to what the Leader of the Opposition said on this subject on July 3 and match it with that bogus display we witnessed here last night, when he tried to make it appear that the country had been misled and that unemployment is going to be even more severe this year than indicated in the budget forecast. Did he accept the estimate in the forecast? This is what the hon. gentleman had to say as recorded at page 1902:

> Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for us to accept this optimistic conclusion of the minister because the evidence seems to us to point in the other direction, and if that is the case surely the minister should be taking this into consideration in the plans and policies which he must be preparing at the present time.
> But even if we assumed an increase of 2 per cent in gross national product in 1958, what would be the employment outlook for the current year? The hon. member for Essex East—

And we know that hon. member is probably the least reliable guesser on the extent of unemployment in Canada—

> —made his projection this afternoon, and I think, without going into the details he went into, that if there is this 2 per cent increase in the gross national product and if there is the same ratio between that figure and employment which has existed over recent years, it would mean we would have an increase of about 1 per cent in employment in this country in 1958 as compared with 1957. If there is an addition to the labour force of 2.5 per cent we would have considerably more unemployment next year than last year, and the peak figure would be far too high. I am willing to leave it at that.

The Leader of the Opposition last night tried to make it appear that the house had been misled by statements and forecasts appearing in the budget speech. These are his own words before the close of his budget speech. He challenged these budget forecasts, so how can he now pretend, even to himself, that there was anything in this budget speech by which anyone was misled? He dismissed that subject with a passing reference to the mathematics of the hon. member for Essex East and this additional sentence:

> The implications with regard to unemployment are serious, but the implications with regard to inflation are just as serious.

The hon. gentleman then went on to deal with the dangers of inflation in, I think, somewhat the same terms as I had dealt with them in my budget speech, and all this adds up to is this—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, are we debating the budget all over again or are we debating an amendment of my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Speaker: That is not an easy question to answer. The amendment which was moved at the end of the address by the Leader of the Opposition was much more restrictive in character than the Leader of the Opposition's own remarks, and in his address he dealt with much the same subject matter as the Minister of Finance is dealing with, so I do not think I should restrict him in his reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I complete this portion of my remarks with the conclusion that there can be no complaint from hon. gentlemen opposite that they were misled by anything in the budget forecast, because it is plainly apparent from their own remarks that they did not accept them and that they disagreed then with the budget forecast.

Mr. Pickersgill: But the public was misled.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And there is no shadow of substance in their statement now that something has been discovered today, or within the last four or five days, which throws doubt on the budget forecast. They threw every possible doubt on those budget forecasts before the conclusion of the budget debate, and the house has passed its judgment on those doubts in the decision that was taken in the vote on July 3.

It was on the basis of remarks like these that the Leader of the Opposition last night proceeded to draw some extraordinary conclusions as to the way in which he alleged the whole fabric of government had been shaken. At page 3075 of Hansard he undertook to say that "economic forecasting by officials in Canada, to which Canadian governments have become accustomed and upon which they have come to rely, has now for all practical purposes been weakened and prejudiced".

By what authority does the Leader of the Opposition make a statement of that kind? I say to him that that statement has not one single tittle or scintilla of truth in it. Nothing has been prejudiced in the relations between the government's officers in the civil service and the government. But the hon. gentleman last night did everything that lay within his power to create that kind of condition between the government and the civil service of which he complained. If there is anything that is prejudiced in this debate or in public discussion of recent days in relation to the position of the civil servants in this matter it is attributable to, and lies at the doorstep of, the Leader of the Opposition. Nothing has happened to come between the government and its advisers in the civil service, and to suggest that there has been some prejudice created by the course of action of the government is to deny the facts and to substitute for facts something that is really not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister a question. Is it not true that since January 20 the deputy minister of trade and commerce has resigned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should not have thought the hon. gentleman would have sought to make political capital by descending to that kind of remark in a situation of this sort. The deputy minister of trade and commerce exercised the right of any member of the civil service to resign in order to take up a position outside the civil service. Did no deputy minister resign during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite? Of course they did.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Chevrier: Not under those circumstances.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What circumstances is the hon. member for Laurier talking about?

Mr. Chevrier: If I get an opportunity to speak this afternoon I will indicate to you in what circumstances.

Mr. Pearson: You just stop talking.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition is endeavouring to enforce closure—

An hon. Member: But we have no flag.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not believe I am subject to his command with regard to the speech I make. I did not pretend in the first place that what I was going to say was going to please him, and if he expects that the balance of my remarks are intended to have that effect let me disabuse his mind at once. The Leader of the Opposition finished up last night, before he proceeded to give birth to this misshapen amendment, by summarizing his conclusion in the following words at page 3077 of Hansard—

An hon. Member: Talk it out, Don.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sure that no amount of talk or intelligence around here would be able to pierce the outer covering of the hon. member's cranium.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the house that there are too many collateral debates going on. If hon. members would not interrupt, and if the hon. member who has the floor would not pay any attention to interruptions, we could get on faster.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was the conclusion reached by the Leader of the Opposition last night as reported at page 3077 of Hansard; "The entire system of economic reporting has now been prejudiced. That, Mr. Speaker, is the main burden of our attack on the government in this matter".

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those were heroic words, Mr. Speaker, but there is not a word of truth in them. The government has access on the frankest terms, on terms of mutual confidence, to the views of the advisers in the government service, and it was on the basis of that kind of relationship that the budget was assembled, the government taking full responsibility for the budget proposals, the content of the budget speech, and the budget forecasts upon which the budget is based. That budget was delivered in the house some six weeks ago but, Mr. Speaker, we believe that if it was given again now it would be in almost identical terms.

Mr. Pearson: It would take longer the second time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps if hon. members opposite had paid some attention to it the first time and did not, as they have since attempted to do, distort it and misrepresent it and wrench things out of context and give a false impression of the budget speech, it would not have been necessary to remind them of the facts in this regard in the course of my remarks yesterday and this afternoon.

The true test of this budget forecast is, I am sure, going to be the test of time itself. That will be the test, taking due account of all the factors which enter into the budget speech and the budget forecasts. I am going to ask the house simply to consider what has happened in this respect since the 17th day of June. Let the house measure the accuracy of the budget forecasts by what has happened at any rate since the 17th day of June, when the budget was delivered. Here let me be brief. Let us take a few of the more important economic indicators of interest to all Canadians.

On July 31 the crop year closed in Canada. Our marketings of wheat in this country are of tremendous importance to the well-being of the whole Canadian economy. In the crop year ended July 31, 1958, Canada's exports of wheat totalled 312 million bushels. The export figure for the previous year, the crop year ended July 31, 1957, was 50 million bushels less than the total exported during this most recent crop year.

Mr. Argue: What about the prices?

Mr. Pearson: Gifts and loans did it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, is the Leader of the Opposition now finding fault with the fact that to assist sister nations of the commonwealth we extended the scope of the Colombo plan aid in this respect? We have extended loans to India to help her buy Canadian wheat to assist in meeting famine conditions in that country. Is that a matter of which the hon. member wants to make fun now?

Mr. Pearson: We have already approved of that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then why does the Leader of the Opposition now try to play this snivelling partisan game in this house?

Mr. Pickersgill: Why do you distort the statistics?

Mr. Argue: What about the price of wheat in that year?

Mr. Green: One at a time.

Mr. Robichaud: Why not talk about the amendment that is before us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the price reflects the very great efforts on the part of the Canadian wheat board and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to get for Canadian wheat the best price for wheat in all the world.

Mr. Argue: The lowest in ten years, and you should pay a deficiency payment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The best price that is being paid for wheat in all the world.

Mr. Argue: That is not true. That statement is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is true. The best price that is being paid in all the world where there is a free market.

Mr. Argue: That is well qualified now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the hon. member not believe in free markets?

Mr. Argue: No, I believe—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Evidently he does not.

Mr. Argue: I believe in the Canadian wheat board and not in free markets.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Have I the permission of the hon. member for Assiniboia to continue my speech? I thank him very much. The hon. member for Assiniboia nods his head, so I take it he is agreeable to my continuing my speech.

Mr. Chevrier: Don't be so arrogant.

Mr. Argue: You are up to 100 minutes now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. member's gesture. When the hon. member for Assiniboia nodded his head I thought he had given me permission to proceed.

Mr. Argue: Don't be so condescending.

Mr. Robichaud: Are you trying to establish a marathon record?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition last night, referring to the budget speech, had something to say as well about the cost of living, as found at page 3077. He chose to make reference to the Toronto Daily Star, and he said I had said that the cost of living would remain stable. Let us look at what I said and then let us examine the facts. In the budget speech on June 17 as recorded at page 1234 of Hansard I said:

> In the absence of immediate inflationary pressures I would not expect any general increase in prices during the balance of 1958. But this is not something we can take for granted.

You see, Mr. Speaker, this is the part the Leader of the Opposition completely omitted and glossed over. I continue:

> But this is not something we can take for granted. It is the duty of all groups and classes in our society to ensure that the prospects for a sound recovery are not dimmed by a spiralling of costs or that efforts to stimulate recovery do not lend strength to a new inflation. Inflation remains a very real danger against which we must remain on guard.

What are the facts since the 17th day of June? Between May and June the consumer price index in this country remained unchanged, and between June and July the consumer price index in this country dropped four tenths of a point from 125.1 to 124.7. Is the government to be condemned on that score?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. And as for the wholesale price index, Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition will refer to the daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics for July 4 he will find there that the wholesale price index has dropped also.

But we attach great importance in this country to the volume of our exports. What is the record of exports from this country since June 17? In the first half of the year 1958 Canada's exports reached an all-time record for the first half of any year, an all-time record. Does this sound like leading the Canadian people to accept an altogether too optimistic view of Canada's prospects when we budgeted on the basis of an increase of 2 per cent in the gross national product? Exports of Canadian goods in the first six months of 1958 were valued at $2,338 million, 2.2 per cent higher than in the corresponding period of 1957.

In weighing the extent of this increase it is well to bear in mind that the increase in the second quarter of 1958 grew faster than in the first quarter. In the second quarter of 1958 Canadian exports increased by about 7 per cent in value compared to that quarter of 1957 and thus went up at a sharper rate than in the first six months as a whole. I think those are significant statistics.

I do not say, however, that everything has gone up. Here is the index of industrial production. The latest figure is for May 1958. The seasonally adjusted figures on the basis that the period from 1935 to 1939 equals 100 are as follows: The figure for May, 1958 was 278.7 as compared with a figure in January, 1958 of 275.8 and a figure in May, 1957 of 286.7. Labour income seasonally adjusted and expressed in millions of dollars showed the following figures. The latest figure is for April, 1958, $1,304 million. In January, 1958 it was $1,283 million. In April, 1957 it was $1,263 million.

Let us examine the average hours worked per week in manufacturing, seasonally adjusted. The figures are as follows: May, 1958, 40.3; January, 1958, 39.5; May, 1957, 40.6. With respect to manufacturers' shipments in Canada the figures released by the dominion bureau of statistics on July 10 show that in the first five months of 1958 our figure was within 3 per cent of the figure in the same period of 1957.

Let us look at housing, Mr. Speaker. The figures on housing construction in Canada, for those who are prepared to take a realistic and not just a pessimistic, gloomy view like hon. members opposite, are indeed gratifying. The outlook is for the construction in Canada in 1958 of a record total of 150,000 housing units. The previous record was in 1955, 138,000 units. In 1956 there were 127,000 units and in 1957, 122,000 units.

In June, when there was a marked increase in employment in Canada, a strong advance occurred in forestry and construction. It accounted for about 60 per cent of the employment gain. Construction employment reached almost 500,000, about 30,000 higher than a year earlier. The recovery in the housing industry has been largely stimulated by a record-breaking house building program. The year to year increase in new housing units started was smaller in June than in preceding months. The six-month total, however, is 66 per cent higher than the comparable 1957 figure. I am sure these figures are much too favourable to bring any comfort to hon. gentlemen opposite.

There is a very interesting report in this morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette which reads as follows.

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 1.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is headed "Construction at Record High, Up 21.2 Per Cent in first seven months". The first paragraph in this article reads as follows:

> Another record has been established by Canada's surging construction industry. For the first time the total cumulative dollar volume of construction contract awards for the first seven months has passed the $2 billion mark.
> Figures based on information collected by Hugh C. MacLean Building Reports show that the 1958 seven-month cumulative total is $2,000,887,900. This is an increase of $360,672,400 or 21.2 per cent over the same period in 1957, and $5,295,800 above the figure for 1956, the previous record year. This trend in dollar volume has now been maintained for the past four months of 1958.

These are figures which I am sure will bring satisfaction to all Canadians who do not take a jaundiced, political, partisan view of their country's outlook. They will not, of course, bring comfort to hon. members opposite. This gratifying increase points to a record construction program which will ensure a high level of employment in both the construction industry and in the industries supplying building materials.

The function of the administration in reference to the National Housing Act is worthy of comment. N.H.A. loan requests received during the first 30 weeks of 1958 compared with 1957 are as follows: 1957, the first 30 weeks, 15,562, and the first 30 weeks of 1958, 28,264. Yet we are asked to believe that the outlook for Canadians is gloomy.

One could go on, Mr. Speaker. I think I might make mention of the latest employment figures. The latest figures are those as of June 21 issued on July 21. These are the official figures compiled jointly by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics. They show that on June 21 the number of Canadians who had jobs was 5,794,000. That figure was an increase of 129,000 over the figure for one month earlier and it is only 40,000 less than the figure of one year earlier.

These are significant figures, Mr. Speaker. They are not to be brushed aside after the fashion of hon. members opposite. If they had referred to the actual release to which I have referred they would have seen that the estimated number of persons without jobs and seeking employment decreased by 46,000 during the month to 320,000, representing 5.2 per cent of the labour force compared with 2.7 per cent a year earlier. The number of persons with jobs who were laid off for the full week declined another 4,000 to 15,000. These figures indicating the decrease in unemployment are, I think, figures that fully bear out what I had to say in the budget speech when I said, as found on page 1233:

> Once again the latest figures are encouraging, showing a rapidly narrowing gap in the percentage of unemployed as compared with a year ago.

On June 21 the gap was down to 40,000 out of a total labour force of approximately six million.

So, Mr. Speaker, the government is quite prepared to stand by the budget. The government is quite prepared to stand by the forecasts upon which the budget was based. The government takes its responsibility in doing so. The government had access to the best and very latest advice in the country available at that date.

The budget was not born in an attitude of black pessimism. It was not born, on the other hand, of any Pollyanna attitude of disregarding the existence of facts in the economy that are unfavourable. The budget was based upon a realistic and factual appraisal of all of the factors at work in the Canadian economy at June 17, whether favourable or unfavourable, and that basis of budget writing has not been called into question by anything that has been said in the house by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). In writing budgets we do not intend to follow the example of hon. gentlemen opposite who glory in gloom and who are unhappy in the face of the strength of the Canadian economy.

We witnessed a demagogic display last evening on the part of the Leader of the Opposition put on for what were thought to be the partisan interests of the official opposition. Evidently it did not matter to him that he might in the course of his irresponsible remarks be doing damage to Canada's credit or shaking confidence on the part of Canadians, if there are any who pay any attention to anything that the Leader of the Opposition says. After what he said last night it is perfectly clear to all Canadians that the opposition does not want improvement in economic conditions in Canada. What they want is a condition of affairs under which they can derive some partisan advantage, and so if there is not room for gloom, if there is not occasion for gloom, they are not going to be happy unless they create gloom.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is talking demagogically now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are realistic people. They look facts in the face, not just some of the facts but all of the facts—

Mr. Pickersgill: When they are allowed to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and the budget was based upon that Canadian approach to problems. It looked all of the conditions in the face, whether favourable or unfavourable.

Mr. Pearson: Except this report.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The proposals to the house in the budget are based upon a realistic review and estimate of all the factors at work in the Canadian economy and, Mr. Speaker, we are quite content to be judged by the test of time on the accuracy and fairness of those budget forecasts.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) make a speech that took almost two hours, a lengthy speech with a great deal of repetition in which the minister failed entirely to deal with the point under debate, namely—

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: —whether or not excerpts in the Toronto Star are from a report on Canada's economic prospects for 1958.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not the amendment at all.

Mr. Argue: That is what the debate is about and that is what members have been talking about. Nevertheless the Minister of Finance spent two hours talking and succeeded in avoiding the question. I think he should be awarded some kind of prize or laurels by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) because in my opinion it is not by accident that the Minister of Finance entered the debate at the time he did. He has a reputation of being the most longwinded speaker in the house and the government knew that all it had to do was to put up the Minister of Finance and he would warm over the budget.

Mr. Fulton: He is not half as boring as you are.

Mr. Argue: He quoted it at great length last night with one eye on the budget and one eye on the clock, never asking himself whether or not long quotations from a previous debate were in order.

An hon. Member: A new form of closure.

Mr. Argue: But who are the ministers mainly involved? I suggest there are two, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and the Prime Minister. Oh, how the Prime Minister ridiculed the former government for having hidden this very report of one year earlier and accused them of misleading the Canadian public. There is no doubt that that hidden report, that secret document, the suppression of which was made to appear a nefarious act on the part of the former government, had something to do with the huge majority which the government has and the very small numbers in the opposition.

Oh, what a wonderful thing from the standpoint of the government that the election is over and they do not have to face the Canadian people now to be confronted with having done the very thing that they condemned the former government for having done—

Mr. Grafftey: Have you seen the recent Gallup polls?

Mr. Argue: —and having done it under circumstances where parts of the report have already appeared in the press undenied by the government in spite of the castigation of the former government by the Prime Minister for the attitude it had taken. We want to hear in this debate from the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is responsible for this report. I should like to hear from the Prime Minister. I notice that the Prime Minister has a very excellent way from his standpoint of dealing with debates.

When he thinks he has the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) over a barrel, as soon as the Leader of the Opposition sits down the Prime Minister rises and attacks, and with what glee. But if the Prime Minister is not certain of his ground, if he needs time to do some homework, if he is on the spot, he puts forward the Minister of Finance who will talk louder and longer on any subject than any other member of the cabinet is able to do. It is no wonder to me we have not heard from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Churchill: You will.

Mr. Argue: If any cabinet minister was ever in a mess, it is this cabinet minister. He is in trouble not only in the house—

Mr. Fulton: The longer you talk, the less trouble he is in.

Mr. Argue: We like to hear from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) too. He is the smart boy who is not allowed to get into debates very often. He is deliberately kept at the far end of the cabinet benches in this house because there is not going to be any competition with the chosen few. However, when there is any difficulty, he moves up. He sits beside the Minister of Trade and Commerce so he can whisper fine, legal and technical points in his ear and keep the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if possible, from putting his foot in it, from getting into trouble. On page 3064 of Hansard for yesterday, the minister had this to say about the report:

> Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the Toronto Star story to indicate what report of the various reports that I receive was being referred to.

Here is what the Toronto Daily Star says in part:

> The trade and commerce department's hitherto secret report on Canada's 1958 economic prospects—

Does that identify anything?

> —is considerably more pessimistic than the budget forecast of Hon. Donald Fleming, finance minister.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce does not know what the report is on Canada's 1958 economic prospects. He said there is nothing in the article to identify the report.

Then, in the next paragraph the Toronto Daily Star reporter, Mark Harrison, has this to say:

> The report—which the government has consistently refused to table in the House of Commons—

Does that identify the report? Has it anything to do with the statement of the Prime Minister when he would not allow the motion of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to pass? But, no, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has his head in the sand. He said there is nothing in this article to identify the report. Then, the article goes on:

> The report, made annually to the government by its top economic advisers,—

That does not identify the report; not at all.

> —is normally one of the main factors upon which the finance minister bases his budget calculations. Last spring, prior to the election, the Conservatives accused the Liberals of ignoring the 1957 version of the report in framing the budget for that year.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce says there is nothing in the Toronto Star article to identify the report. Who does he think he is trying to kid? Then, he goes on to say that he could not say whether the excerpts, as produced in the Toronto Star, came from this report. The minister did not know to what it referred, so he did not make any inquiries at all. Whenever we have talked about the report it has sometimes been called a report, sometimes an outlook, sometimes prospects. There is no hard and fast description of this report, apparently, and even the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not think so because on July 18, at page 2411 of Hansard, the minister said this:

> The economic survey for 1958 will be studied very carefully, and has been studied very carefully, and the government, in its judgment, will act in accordance with that report, as we thought the former government should have done.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce identifies the report very loosely as the economic survey. Yet, he says there is nothing in the Toronto Star story that would indicate to him what the report is. In order to permit the Minister of Trade and Commerce to do a little homework, may I say that I have in my hand Sessional Paper No. 227, Monday, January 20, 1958, which, without any evidence to the contrary, I take is the 1957 version of the document under discussion. On the first page under the heading "Foreword", we find this:

> This report continues the regular series of statements on the economic outlook prepared for the use of the federal ministers and civil servants concerned. The purpose of the report is to appraise the influences operating in the economy as they are likely to affect the general level of economic activity in 1957. This report was finalized before the presentation of the federal budget.

I would have thought that was sufficient identification to suggest to the minister that the Toronto Star was talking about this report, its 1958 version. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce really think that the members of this house will agree with him, will take at face value his statement that there is nothing in the Toronto Star story to indicate to which of the various reports he receives reference is being made? The very fact the minister makes this statement, the very fact the Minister of Finance has failed to deal with this report, demonstrates to me that the evidence that is accumulating proves the Toronto Star was on the right track; that it had the report and the excerpts, in general, if not in toto, are correct.

To what great lengths has the Minister of Trade and Commerce gone to deny subsequent reports in the press of interviews with him. Bruce Phillips' report is apparently inaccurate, but he talked to the minister. It would be nice to hear from the minister about this report. Yesterday the minister said the story by Richard Jackson in the Ottawa Journal was without foundation. He is a very excellent and competent reporter, but his story is again without foundation. Then, Peter Dempson, who has been in the press gallery for years, his story in the Toronto Telegram is without foundation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that Clark Davey's story in the Globe and Mail is without foundation. The Minister of Finance says that if it is in the Toronto Star, it is suspect. It is a bad newspaper because it supports the Liberals. But he cannot say that about the Globe and Mail, and I agree it is a fair newspaper.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order; may I interrupt at this point?

Mr. Robichaud: Oh, he is speaking.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is, by inference, casting doubt on my statement made at the opening of the house yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: I think what the minister says is correct. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) should be careful not to question the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his place yesterday, on a subject within his knowledge.

Mr. Argue: I am not questioning what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. I am saying that on one side we have what the minister says, and on the other side we have the statements of four important pressmen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do not forget Mr. Mackie.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member if he does not believe that that very comparison is a challenging of the statement made by the minister?

Mr. Argue: We have to accept the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; the minister who is known as the minister without foundation. What has been the attitude of the government in recent weeks so far as the press is concerned? One cabinet minister will stand up and say the press is all wrong. There were 20 at an interview, but they are mistaken. Mr. Paul Henri Spaak at a press conference says that NORAD is not a part of NATO. But the press are all wrong; he did not say it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Argue: Somehow or other it is incorrect. May I say that I am prepared to accept the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much for your change of attitude.

Mr. Argue: That is part of the rules of this house. But I would suggest that there should be a meeting, in the light of all these events that have taken place, of the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is about to say what he appears to be leading up to, I suggest that if he wants to make a motion to question anything—

Mr. Fulton: Let him have the courage to make a motion of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: —in the conduct of the minister, that is all right; but as long as the minister's statement stands in the house, I ask him not to skirt around it and question it and challenge it. He knows that is contrary to the practice of this house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I should be very happy to consider a substantive motion if I knew of some way of getting it on the order paper. But since notices of motions will disappear four days from now and have no validity after the guillotine motion of yesterday, it is impossible for me to move such a substantive motion. But what I was going to suggest was not that we bring the Minister of Trade and Commerce to such a committee but that we should bring to the committee the members of the press gallery who have been referred to in order to see what has happened to them that they have forsaken—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, you have already pointed out to the hon. member that he should not follow up this line of argument.

An hon. Member: Stop whining.

Mr. Green: I suggest that if the hon. member will not follow your ruling, Mr. Speaker, he should sit down and keep quiet.

Mr. Pickersgill: More closure.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Green: He had no right to do what he is doing. This matter was dealt with yesterday on a question of privilege and he is trying to get around what was done yesterday.

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Finance has just spoken for two hours. During most of that time he could hardly have got farther away from the amendment than he did. During that time he challenged the patriotism, the veracity and everything else of myself and other members of this party. You quite rightly gave him a good deal of latitude because of the nature of the debate and of the amendment. I suggest that the same latitude should be extended to my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Fulton: I rise on the point of order that has been referred to, namely the attempts made by my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia to bring into question statements made and the word given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend should not be allowed to hide behind the camouflage he has just tried to throw up with regard to this not being capable of being put on the order paper in the form of a motion of privilege. If my hon. friend has the courage to back up the words he has used, may I point out to him that a motion of privilege can be entertained at any time. If my hon. friend has the courage of his convictions then let him not try to hide behind what was done yesterday with regard to amendment of the rules. I say this because I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that the hon. gentleman should not be allowed to proceed, to talk and to indicate that he does not accept the word given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday. If he does not accept that word, then let him have the courage of his convictions and bring in a motion based on privilege and we will meet him on his own ground.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say a word on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice. It seems to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point of order is that further objection was taken to what the hon. member for Assiniboia was saying. It is clear what course he is directed to follow by the rules and by custom. The question is a very narrow one at the moment, namely whether he is trespassing again.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely the point to which I desire to address myself. I was listening very attentively to the hon. member and it seemed to me that he stated quite clearly that he accepted the word of the minister and that he was about to say that he thought there ought to be an investigation of the press gallery. Surely he is not going to be restricted in making that kind of an argument.

Mr. Speaker: That is the way the matter appealed to me and that is why I allowed him to proceed. I am not sure that it was not a left handed way of approaching the matter. Will the hon. member proceed and try to keep within the directions which are amply clear?

Mr. Argue: When I am speaking I think my left hand works about as well as my right hand. But I would suggest that the Minister of Justice did not increase his stature when he raised this point of order, with the language he used about hiding behind a camouflage.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is now disposed of. We are debating an amendment, if I may read it again for the benefit of the hon. member. Perhaps I do not need to read the amendment. As I said before, the debate is much wider than the terms of the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that in view of the relatively large numbers who sit on the opposite side, it is necessary for us in the opposition to take every advantage of the practice of this house to state our views. The Minister of Justice tried to refer to the hon. member for Assiniboia as an hon. gentleman in this instance lacking in courage.

Mr. Fulton: No; I did not; I said if he had the courage of his convictions he would make a motion of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely he is not to be denied the right to defend himself against the aspersion made by the Minister of Justice. There are many things which the hon. member for Assiniboia does and says with which I do not agree. But no one can fairly accuse him of lack of courage.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to prevent the hon. member for Assiniboia from replying to any such aspersion. That was said in the course of a discussion on the point of order. I was hoping that we had disposed of that point of order and were back on the debate now.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I was not trying to raise another point of order because I am not so thin skinned in this debate as apparently are some other hon. members. But when the Minister of Justice raised this question which he said reflected on the Minister of Trade and Commerce I was saying that in raising that particular question he reflected on me by saying that I was endeavouring to hide behind a camouflage, and he questioned my courage. I do not ask him to withdraw. He can leave that on the record, as far as I am concerned. I am willing to meet him in this house in debate on the merits of the subject and I do not have to whimper about his remarks.

Mr. Fulton: I was merely suggesting—

An hon. Member: Sit down, buttercup.

Mr. Fulton: I was merely suggesting that the hon. gentleman raise the matter in the proper way so we could meet on the issue. The words I used were that if he had the courage of his convictions he would raise it in the proper way.

Mr. Argue: I think I am raising it in the proper way; and I tell the Minister of Justice that I have the courage of my convictions and I ask him to enter this debate and to let us see how he can account for himself.

An hon. Member: He can account very well.

Mr. Argue: A few days ago, in the city of Montreal, I had an opportunity to say in a public way something I should like to repeat now. I feel that generally speaking the members of the press and the members of the press gallery in this house are gentlemen of honour who report the proceedings of this house in a fair and reasonable manner. That is why I have suggested that this committee might meet in order to see whether or not they had departed from what I believe has been their customary practice. As to the references to the press gallery, may I say that if at times they overlook some of the things I say, and perhaps in their wisdom, I do not complain. I do not ask them for any quarter. However, I think the members of the press gallery have earned a reputation in this house that has not been helped by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member again that we are not debating the reliability of the press gallery in this motion.

Mr. Argue: We are not debating it, Mr. Speaker, but I have been trying to say that it is a fact. I know that in the committee on external affairs and in other committees of this house many ministers and members rely a great deal on the newspaper reports.

Mr. McGee: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he aware that one of his colleagues made a statement last week to the effect that the press of this country is incompetent?

Mr. Argue: I am not too sure to which member the hon. member refers.

Mr. McGee: The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Argue: I do not know to what the hon. member is referring, but I think the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) can take care of himself.

An hon. Member: That is more than you can do.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member can take care of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee).

Mr. Argue: I am sure the hon. member for Port Arthur is able to take part in any debate in this house and to defend himself regarding anything he might have been reported as having said.

Mr. Speaker, I had thought that we were talking about this hidden report, but the minister has warmed over his budget speech, he has made a lot of extravagant statements today as he did yesterday, many of which he made in his budget speech. He made one statement which was not extravagant and which is correct, namely that Canada's exports of wheat have gone up by 50 million bushels. I asked him about the price and he said it was the highest price in the world; when I questioned him further he said, "The highest price in a free market". Why is it lower than the Chicago market price by 20 cents? I have in my hand the most recent edition of the international federation of agricultural producers publication, the IFAP News, which reports the prices of wheat paid in eighteen countries, and I see that Canada has the distinction of paying the lowest price.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Surely, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend realizes we are talking about wheat in the export markets.

Mr. Argue: I said that the farmers were getting the lowest price since the end of the war. The minister has said it is the highest price in a free market, which is not true; that just is not true. The prices start with Canada having the lowest price of $1.40 per bushel, the United Kingdom $1.50, just 10 cents more, Argentina, $1.52, Australia, $1.63, and so on, up and up and up, until you come to Turkey with a price of $4.46 per bushel.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What are you talking about?

Mr. Argue: The nub of what we are discussing and the thing which I think bothers Canadians most at this time is that this government is now prepared to hide a report which it accused the former government of having hidden. Although this government used a roundabout and tortuous way of gaining votes on March 31—which they did gain—now, when they are faced with identical circumstances they run away and they are not consistent. They will not disclose this report, but for the Canadian people one of the most interesting and important aspects of the matter is that when the Liberal government was advised that we were in for tough times and that unemployment would rise, they did little or nothing. When the same group of economic advisers in the same government department advised this government that we were in for tough times and that the economic prospects were not good, that there would be only a 0.7 per cent increase in the gross national product, that business investments would drop by about 10 per cent in 1958 and would be likely to continue to drop in 1959, they did nothing about it either. They painted a glowing picture and all they have done is to state they are going to reconvert Canadian bonds and to increase the interest rates in order to get back to the high interest rate policy which they condemned the former government for having so long followed.

The Minister of Finance this afternoon talked about increasing unemployment figures and he took satisfaction—and this is what amazed me—in the employment figures for June, which he said were only 40,000 less than one year earlier. Just 40,000 worse than when the Liberals were in power, and the Conservatives painted such a terrible picture of conditions when the Liberals formed the government in Canada. Now that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are in charge of the administration, however, the prospects for employment are worse, to say nothing of the existing unemployment situation. In June, instead of 162,000 persons without jobs and seeking work—as there were last June when this government took office—after the Minister of Finance has brought in his budget, after the government has read, studied, digested and concealed this report, unemployment is twice as great.

There is only one statement of the minister's which struck a somewhat sympathetic note with me, and that was when he was speaking of the rather weak amendment from the official opposition. If that amendment was a bit anaemic we hope to give it a blood transfusion, and it is my pleasure at this time to move:

That the amendment be amended by adding the words:

"and further that its action in ignoring 'The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958' as indicated by the reported and undenied excerpts from it, has prolonged the recession and has caused suffering for thousands of Canadians because of unemployment."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rubbish.

Mr. Argue: There are two things involved in this debate. One is the attitude of the government which says, "If the former government did something it is wrong, but if we do it, it is right." Secondly, the attitude of this government in having failed to act on this very important set of recommendations in order to provide full employment and a buoyant economy in 1958.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, under our form of administration in Canada the anonymity and the integrity of the public service is essential for the maintenance of good government and that is the principle behind the amendment moved in this house last night by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). We have now been confronted with another amendment and I have just had an opportunity to glance quickly at its terms. My immediate reaction is that it would be difficult to fully accept its terms unless the Prime Minister is prepared to do what the Leader of the Opposition asked last night, namely to give us the opportunity of knowing precisely, in its full form, the nature of the economic survey which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated a few weeks ago would be made available only at the beginning of 1959.

We have had a defence of this attitude from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I would have thought, however, that in accordance with the position he holds, both as leader of the house and as the Queen's first minister, the Prime Minister would have regarded it as his duty to make a statement on Saturday last, or certainly not later than Monday, with regard to what is alleged to be the disclosure of a document which, in accordance with his own language and view as stated in this house a few weeks ago, is of a confidential character and is one which would not be made available to parliament until the beginning of 1959.

Instead we have had inadequate replies to our interrogations by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), and the defence of the government has been made by the Minister of Finance. But not a word has been said regarding the charge implied in the speeches which have been made on this side of the house or as to the terms implicit in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition. It was, rather, for the Minister of Finance who, notwithstanding the fact that he delivered the longest budget speech in Canadian history—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to think it was of such value that within two months it ought to be repeated again, in the same chamber where originally delivered.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You invited it—you and your leader.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The question before us is this: are we to regard as legitimate the practice that our public servants and cabinet ministers should have the right to disclose to parliament or to other agencies, or to the nation at large, documents prepared for the confidential use of members of the government? How are we going to be able to carry on government in a country such as ours, and on lines such as are the practices and traditions in the United Kingdom, if public servants, selected on the basis of merit, for their training, and their competence, are going to have their anonymity destroyed; if they are going to be placed in the position of knowing that on some occasion the administration, or a member of the administration, may disclose to the public information given confidentially to a minister or to the government as a whole? That is the serious issue involved in this particular amendment, and it does not warrant the adjectives or the characterization given to it by the Minister of Finance who has acted, during the past two hours, in a most irresponsible manner. He is the recipient, as is the Prime Minister, of confidential documents from time to time which have to do with the conduct of government both on the domestic and international level. What the Leader of the Opposition has done has been to bring home to the government and to the house the importance of maintaining the principle of public service integrity and anonymity.

But this principle has been violated in this instance by an alert and ingenious newspaperman who was able, apparently, to provide for his newspaper certain excerpts from a document which has been denied this house. In asking that this document be tabled, the only reason why we are doing so is because of the fact that publication has taken place outside this house, and the only way to clear up this matter is, as the Globe and Mail said this morning, for the government to table the whole document so that this practice will not be repeated. I say now to the Prime Minister that if he wishes to live up to the implications of his reply the other day he should take the course suggested by the Globe and Mail, a newspaper which, generally, is not unfriendly to him and to his government.

But this whole business did not begin within recent days. It began on January 20 last. That is the situation, and I know it is one that greatly disturbs the Prime Minister at this very moment. That is why he did not rise and speak at the beginning of this debate; that is why he did not, as Prime Minister, rise on a question of privilege on Saturday last and take a course which a prime minister under our constitutional tradition and practice should have taken, and which has been taken by his predecessors on other occasions.

He was precluded from taking that course by two inconsistent positions; first, that taken in answering a question put to him a few weeks ago, when he was asked to table the report by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), and then by his own action on January last. His action and his utterances on January 20 last are now well known to this house and to the country. The previous administration, he argued, was responsible for unemployment. This government, of which he, the right hon. gentleman, is Prime Minister, was saddled with a legacy left to it by the previous administration. "Why do I say that?" said the Prime Minister. "I say so because I have here a document which records the fact that the former administration knew that the economic situation which now confronts the nation would eventuate." This was a document which the Prime Minister admitted, after persistent questioning by the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, was marked "confidential". Of course, he would table the document readily, having been requested to do so by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did not the hon. gentleman say he must table it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Quite correct—that the hon. gentleman must table it, having already read it. Under rule 217, the Prime Minister had no other recourse. But he should not have waited for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to suggest that the document be tabled. What did the Prime Minister do? He read excerpts from this confidential document and did the very thing which the Minister of Trade and Commerce now says the reporter of the Toronto Star should not have done.

Here is what the right hon. gentleman said at page 3522 of Hansard for January 20, 1958;

> I intend to establish as clearly as the printed word will make possible that during the months of March, April, May until June 10, my hon. friends concealed from the Canadian people the facts. They know that.

I well remember the force and the fervour which accompanied the use of those words by the Prime Minister. And then, even stronger, at page 3526 of Hansard for the same date he said:

> Today one looks back and realizes that these men who were in power did not do that of which my hon. friend spoke in such colourful terms the other night. He said we must not conceal facts, but I put it to the hon. members opposite—every one of them in the official opposition—that they hid the facts; they concealed the record; they did not let the Canadian people know what was taking place.

The Prime Minister argued that this economic survey of 1957, marked "confidential", prepared for the private use of members of the government by officials in the Department of Trade and Commerce, should have been made known, should have been tabled, should have been revealed to the Canadian people before the 21st of June, 1957. That is what the Prime Minister was arguing. He attacked the new leader of the Liberal party that night with vehemence, and used a method that I do not think has very often been employed in this house, particularly by one who holds the high office of Prime Minister. He said, in effect: what does it matter if this is a document which was prepared by the public service for the confidential advice of a minister of the crown? It will suit my political purpose. I will vanquish the Leader of the Opposition if I simply reveal this document in a dramatic way on the occasion of his first speech as leader of the Liberal party. I will satisfy my followers; I will gain votes in the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what he did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says "that is what he did", and he is right. And I would think, in view of the attitude taken by the Prime Minister with regard to the 1958 survey, that that is not a very proud achievement for the hon. member to recall on this occasion.

Mr. Hodgson: You fellows hid that report for 20 years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it was right for the previous administration to take the people of Canada into their confidence with regard to the report of 1957—and I say the government was justified in not revealing a document that had been prepared by the public service under the circumstances I have mentioned—if it was right and if it was the duty of the government to lay this information before the Canadian people and before parliament, I ask the Prime Minister now, urging him to take part in this debate, to tell the house, having in mind the record in this matter, having in mind the way in which he used the 1957 report on January 20 last, and having in mind what he told the Canadian people about the way the previous administration had kept and withheld secrets from the Canadian people, how in the parliament of our country he can possibly justify refusing at this time to do what the Leader of the Opposition has requested, to do what the Toronto Globe and Mail urged this morning should be done, and table that document so we can find out whether or not the partial publication of this in the Toronto Star was taken from the economic survey of 1958.

No amount of debate, no amount of histrionics, no amount of subterfuge or irrelevancy in debate by the Prime Minister who is a past master at it will be able to provide a justification for not answering the question which I now put. Why will he not in the month of August 1958 in connection with a report prepared for this year table that report when he urged that a similar report prepared for 1957 by the same people and under the same auspices and for the same purposes be tabled?

The Prime Minister receives young visitors in his office frequently and tells them about the history of parliament, and about our free institutions and I really think he is to be commended for that because the people of Canada must look to their prime ministers for exemplary conduct. But I ask him in this instance as man to man, does he not realize that having taken the position he did the only way in which he can live up to the high standards he has set for himself and so properly is to take the same course as Prime Minister in 1958 that he took in the month of January prior to the general elections which resulted in his return to office? That surely is a request based upon an unanswerable argument. There can be no question about it. The only reason the Prime Minister can have for not revealing this information is that it bears out exactly what the Leader of the Opposition said last night and which some of us said during the course of the debate, and that is that the budget prepared by the Minister of Finance was not in harmony at least with the economic report prepared for 1958 by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The Minister of Finance says he has other sources on which he must rely, the Bank of Canada and his own official advisors of the Department of Finance. That is true, of course, but now that this document has been partially revealed and in my judgment only for that reason we are entitled to have the full report so we can ascertain whether or not the conclusions of the Minister of Finance with regard to the future are in harmony, at any rate with this one particular report.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You did not accept those conclusions anyway.
