Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that I do not accept those conclusions but that is not the question. The only question before us is whether or not this government, having refused to table a document which it said we should have tabled in 1957, is prepared to exercise its responsibilities in accordance with our law as provided in the Official Secrets Act. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) will, I hope, give careful consideration to what I am now going to argue.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce denied yesterday that he had said to any newspaperman that he was "running this thing down" to use his own words as contained in his statement of privilege yesterday. I have before me the Ottawa Journal of today in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is reported as having told Mr. James McCook of that newspaper, one of the most reliable men in the press gallery—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad that hon. gentlemen opposite applaud newspaper people because this government yesterday and on other occasions, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has reminded us, has not always acknowledged the objective treatment given by members of the press gallery with regard to its policies and statements. Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce is reported by Mr. McCook to have said yesterday after this debate:

> Mr. Churchill told the Journal outside the house that he had taken only these steps when informed of the article published in Toronto:
> 1. Asked for the number of copies of the confidential report issued and the distribution list.
> 2. Asked for the names of those who prepared the report.

And then the article goes on in these words:

> The minister said that the next step, if any, by the government or himself had not been decided.

Does the government not regard the publication of even a partial report as a development that is of the utmost concern to it as a government particularly in the light of the fact that the Prime Minister said, notwithstanding what he had said in the month of January, that this economic survey for 1958 could not be made public now in the interests of the nation, to paraphrase his words, until some time at the beginning of 1959? Is there no responsibility on the part of the government to pursue this matter? Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce done nothing more than to ask for the names of those who prepared the report and asked about the number of copies of the confidential report that were issued? Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce now deny that this report goes to every minister of the crown? Did he have to inquire who prepared this report? This report goes to him first and presumably after he has perused it it goes to the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and other members of the government.

Is this the extent of the investigation being made by this government with regard to a document which the Prime Minister said in the interests of the nation could not be given to the parliament of Canada and to the people until the beginning of 1959? Is that the extent of the investigation? Is this matter of no concern to the Minister of Justice? Has it not concerned the Prime Minister? I would call the attention both of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to section 4 subsection 4 of the Official Secrets Act to be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, volume III, chapter 198 which reads as follows:

4. (4) Every person who

(a) retains for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state any official document, whether or not completed or issued for use, when he has no right to retain it, or when it is contrary to his duty to retain it, or fails to comply with any directions issued by any government department or any person authorized by such department with regard to the return or disposal thereof; or

(b) allows any other person to have possession of any official document issued for his use alone, or communicates any secret official code word or pass word so issued, or, without lawful authority or excuse, has in his possession any official document or secret official code word or pass word issued for the use of some person other than himself, or on obtaining possession of any official document by finding or otherwise, neglects or fails to restore it to the person or authority by whom or for whose use it was issued, or to a police constable; is guilty of an offence under this act.

That is a very important statute. If one looks at the most recent discussion in the house based on that act he will find that in introducing amendments to the act the government of the day postulated as one of the reasons for the legislation that the public service could carry on under our system of government in a way that would preserve its integrity and not invade the anonymity which public servants under our system have a right to expect. It is the duty of the government not to make the halfhearted investigation indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, after the fourth day, now says, "I will find out how many copies there are, I will find out the name of the men who wrote the report", notwithstanding that the two authors, if the papers are correct, are well known officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce of which the minister apparently is not so fully cognizant at least in so far as this particular is concerned.

Is the matter to stop there? Has the Prime Minister asked his colleagues how this document left the secret compartment that it was supposed to have until the beginning of 1959, according to his revised version of how a government should treat this confidential and secret document prepared for the use of the administration by the public service, this post-election version as the Leader of the Opposition mentions. Has any inquiry been made of his colleagues? Was it given out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith)? I do not believe it was. Was it given out by the Minister of Justice? Was it given out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself? It would be hard to believe that it was given out by the Minister of Finance because he said he had not seen it. Apparently he prepared his budget without referring to it, without knowing anything about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What are you talking about?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking the Minister of Finance, did he give it out?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, you made a statement and not a very reliable one, either.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the Prime Minister did not. Did the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) inadvertently give it out?

An hon. Member: He does not give anything out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Other ministers are not here. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) is not here. His seatmate is not here. I cannot ask them. The Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) looks at me so genially that I wonder whether he could have possibly given it out. I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) would not. I think he would be too prudent to allow himself to do that. At any rate he was engaged in the interests of the nation at a conference outside this country at the time, I presume.

Mr. Starr: In January?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, this document was given out only within the last few days.

Mr. Churchill: How do you know?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because it only appeared in the Toronto Star on Friday.

Mr. Churchill: You have some information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I like to see the Prime Minister jump at that last remark. I know him so well and I simply want to anticipate the Prime Minister. I simply want to say to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did you have it? Come clean.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that I forewarn him that I knew nothing about the document and if I did—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Come, come!

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the Prime Minister would have been the first to know about it, as he knows.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) and my genial friend who sits next to him looking at me so affectionately at this moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't kid yourself.

Mr. Fulton: You are doing us a lot of good, Paul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the importance of our mineral wealth, did he decide to give it out? Perhaps he does not know the newspaper or the reporter in question. But there are at least 18 or 20 members of the government, every one of whom has a copy of the document, and they may well rise in their places and tell us whether they can say "Mea culpa, mea culpa" or "Mea maxima culpa."

Mr. Churchill: That is what you say.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The reason I say they could easily have given out this post-election version is that they gave out the earlier one. The Prime Minister himself gave it out when on January 20, 1958, he said, "I have no hesitation; here is the confidential document that reveals the state of the nation and which is responsible for the situation that now confronts us." On the basis of that kind of reasoning, why should the Prime Minister not have given out this particular version? I am not suggesting that he did but why should he not have? He had no hesitation in doing so in the month of January in a debate in the house.

The Minister of Finance seeks to escape the terms of the amendment before us by drawing a red herring and telling us again about the classical words and the great thoughts involved in his monumental budget. I say to the Minister of Finance: What we are anxious to find out and what the people of Canada are anxious to find out is whether or not the Minister of Finance, in the framing of that budget, took into account this particular report because according to the report there are some very serious variations between the position taken by the Minister of Finance and the position taken in the report as it appeared in the Toronto Star.

Here is what the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, as found on page 1235 of Hansard:

> —with due regard for the resourcefulness of the Canadian people and the determination of this government I have no hesitation in budgeting on the basis of a resumption of the rise in incomes and production.

The Toronto Star version of the economic survey for 1958 reads as follows in this particular, to quote from Mr. Harrison's article:

> There is little basis for anticipating the renewal of any significant upward trend in over-all production and employment before the latter part of the year at least. In view of the downward momentum now present in the economy it is questionable whether any firming trend in the latter part of the year would be sufficient to bring over-all production for 1958 as a whole up to the level of the preceding year.

I do not know whether or not that was contained in the report but what I do know and what the Minister of Finance knows, notwithstanding his diversionary tactics today and last night, is that that is alleged to be taken from the economic survey for 1958 which presumably was considered by the Minister of Finance in the formulation of his budget. If that is the case, then the Minister of Finance did not tell the Canadian people what some of his advisers had urged him to consider in the formulation of his policy. He tried today to substantiate his prognostications for the future. He referred to the increase in export trade and he referred to certain other indices. What he did not do was to tell the house that unemployment today in this month of August, a period of traditional recovery, is double what it was this time a year ago. The Minister of Finance did not indicate today or in his budget—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are just guessing again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —nor did he give any reasons this afternoon—my hon. friend says I am guessing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have done a lot of guessing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There can be no doubt that the Minister of Finance has disregarded the advice of his constitutional advisers, of his financial advisers—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Such nonsense!

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and has painted an economic picture that is not in harmony even with the facts as they are now known.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), has he consulted certain other government departments? Has he asked them what they consider will be the level of unemployment in the month of September? What it will be in the month of October? I have made certain projections that are now appearing in the Monetary Times, indicating that in the month of December we will possibly have as many as one million men and women who will be unplaced applicants.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope they realize how unreliable you are as a prognosticator.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask the minister to remember these words when, at the end of six months' time, we confront one another in this house and are able to see whether or not his optimistic view was in harmony with the prognostications he gave in his budget speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were a great exaggerator last January.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I well remember the statement my hon. friend made when we asked him to reduce the excise tax on automobiles last fall. He said there was no serious unemployment in the automobile industry. Today he gets up in this house and talks about the economic picture of our country as though there were no unemployed people. In my own city of Windsor today, in the month of August, there are almost 12,000 men and women out of work.

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit a question? He has made a statement that the number of men out of work at this moment in Windsor is 12,000. I wonder what action he and his government took when the unemployed in the city of Windsor numbered 11,220 in July, 1954 and 10,432 in 1956?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a very fair question. What did the government of which I was a member do? This government courageously pursued a policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that put men and women to work in this country, with the result that during the time when Mr. St. Laurent was prime minister we had the highest level of prosperity in Canadian history.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You never once opened your mouth to advocate a decrease in the excise tax on automobiles.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friends say we are conveyers of doom, and I want to pursue that statement. I would remind my hon. friends of what the former leader of their party, Hon. Mr. Drew, said on March 29, 1955, as recorded at page 2498 of Hansard:

> I regret that anyone would suggest that a discussion on unemployment is an attempt to undermine confidence. If there is any attempt to undermine confidence on that basis, then of course it must come from the agency of the government which gives the figures. The figures that have been used are given by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Then he went on to say it was his duty in opposition to point out the situation as he saw it to the government. Now, that is why we have done the same thing. I say again, as I said during the budget debate, that the Minister of Finance should indicate unequivocally whether or not this report was used; whether or not he has lived up to the advice given him on all fronts by those in the public service whose duty it is to advise the Minister of Finance and the government as a whole.

Why should the government take this pious attitude which the Minister of Finance has taken when noting that in the Toronto Star it is alleged that there are certain excerpts from a genuine government document? Why should the Minister of Finance, in fairness to the country and to the responsibilities of his office, not say, yes, unfortunately this document has been revealed in part. Now that it has been revealed, there is only one course open and that is to place it on the table so that we can settle this matter once and for all. That would be a courageous attitude for the Minister of Finance to take. Then we would know where we are at. Then, having done that, the Minister of Finance could also take this position: Let us now decide never again to do what was done on January 20 last by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Green: You did not like it, did you?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I certainly did not like it, and I am surprised the Minister of Public Works, a member of the government of Canada, should say that he liked his Prime Minister revealing, for the purpose of an election advantage, a document that was marked "Private and Confidential". The Prime Minister has said, "Oh, no, I cannot give this document for 1958; I have the heavy responsibility of government, and I must discharge my responsibility in the light of our traditional practice. I cannot tell parliament, I cannot tell the nation what my advisers tell us about the economic conditions—

An hon. Member: Certainly not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "Certainly not", and yet in the month of January last the Prime Minister did that very thing. Last night mention was made of the Prime Minister's speech at Edmonton, as reported in the Ottawa Journal. The Leader of the Opposition was challenged to refer to this. I now have the clipping and here is what the Prime Minister said in Edmonton when he was confronting the public and complaining about how we had withheld important information from the Canadian people. I can see the hon. gentleman speaking to 5,000 people in Edmonton, and telling them exactly the opposite to what he told us only a few days ago when he said he could not reveal this document. The article states:

"They concealed", he said of the Liberal cabinet ministers.

"They covered up. They hid. They knew but they did not act. They were warned that a serious situation was developing in this country . . . in effect the beginning of a recession".

All of the Liberal cabinet ministers had received the report, he said.

"None of them read it. All of them hid it."

Those are the words of this great saviour of human liberty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —who went the length and breadth of this country revealing the contents of a document which he says now he cannot give to this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the same speech you made during the election campaign.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend says that is the same speech I made during the election, and my friend is right. The only difference between my speech during the election and the speeches which were made by the Prime Minister is that his—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Were successful.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —because they were so attractive in deception, were able to capture support which will never again come to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will my friend permit a question? When he talks about deception, will he tell the house why it was, in his billboards and publicity during the election campaign, he did not use the word "Liberal"?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a very good answer. First of all, I am well known as a Liberal. Secondly, I was in Prince Albert once during the election campaign and I saw the committee rooms of the present Prime Minister. There was not one reference to the word "Conservative", or "Progressive Conservative"; it was called the "John Diefenbaker Committee".

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What was your majority?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Using the foregoing as my arguments, I urge the house to accept this amendment.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): After listening to the attempts of my hon. friends opposite in both the official opposition and the C.C.F. to work this house up into a state of righteous indignation over what they allege are the misdemeanours of this government, and after observing how lamentably short they fell even of the objective which they have set themselves, one can understand why it is they are driven back to the subterfuge of attempting to induce the government to do the very thing which they themselves say should not be done.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): For the reasons given.

Mr. Fulton: One can understand also the skill which hon. gentlemen opposite have achieved in this sort of game when one remembers the numerous holidays they used to take when they were in power on the occasions when they went fishing. What we have seen here is the most gigantic fishing expedition that it has ever been the pleasure or the misfortune of the House of Commons to see in my history.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is still very young.

Mr. Fulton: What we have seen is from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) down an attempt to inveigle this government into a position where it would have no recourse but to do the very thing which hon. gentlemen say should not be done, namely to table a document which they themselves say is confidential and should not be tabled.

Mr. Pearson: Because part of it you have already given out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly is.

Mr. Fulton: If one were to take my hon. friends opposite seriously—but they themselves have precluded us from doing that by their own remarks—one would simply have to read back to them the remarks they themselves have made in this debate in order to dispose of the motion and the amendment they have used. This righteous indignation, this attempt of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and especially of the Leader of the Opposition last night to suggest that this document should be tabled is seen for the narrowest, meanest and poorest disguise in which any opposition ever attempted to close a motion. Let me read to my hon. friends some of their remarks. On no fewer than three occasions the Leader of the Opposition said this sort of document should not be tabled. Last night he said this:

I think it is regrettable—

He was referring to the possibility of tabling the document; what document they refer to, I do not yet know.

—that this should have to be done in the interests of clarifying this situation. In the past these reports have been considered as confidential, secret documents from expert civil servants to their ministers. For many years, they were treated as such. In the past, the previous government had not made these reports public, and for very good reasons.

That is the Leader of the Opposition speaking, as reported at page 3072 of Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister tell us what his own attitude is to the tabling of these documents?

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member would identify the documents.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. Fulton: I did not know there was more than one document under discussion at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice—and I say again "these documents"—what his attitude is to the tabling of the Canadian Economic Outlook for 1957 and the Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958. Does he think there is one rule for one and another rule for the other? I should like to have a plain answer.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman has asked a plain question, Mr. Speaker. You might almost call it a simple question. It is a simple question because the answer has been given over and over again. The economic report of 1957 was tabled in January of 1958.

Mr. Pickersgill: And your leader said it should have been tabled in June of 1957.

Mr. Fulton: My leader said no such thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: He said it over and over again.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend is not content with asking innumerable silly questions which get him into more trouble than if he remained silent but he even interrupts while he is sitting down. My hon. friend obviously cannot understand the meaning of plain English. If he will go back and read the speech of the Prime Minister on January 20 of this year he will find that what the Prime Minister accused my hon. friends opposite of was of having concealed the facts. At no time did the Prime Minister say that the government should have tabled the document.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did he not?

Mr. Fulton: On only one occasion did the Prime Minister say that the government had concealed the document. At no time did he say that they should table it. He said the government had hidden the facts. He said that the government had misled the Canadian people.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are seven pages there, starting at page 3523.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friends will permit me to make my own speech I should be obliged to them. Theirs were rather poor. I beg them not to spoil mine.

Mr. Pickersgill: That would be impossible.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends will find that the Prime Minister as recorded at page 3525 of Hansard of January 20 of this year said this:

They did not realize the situation or if they did so they concealed the facts from the Canadian people;—

And at page 3526:

—they hid the facts; they concealed the record; they did not let the Canadian people know what was taking place.

Then at page 3527:

But they did nothing during the session to bring about changes in legislation to meet the situation of which they had been warned.

Then again:

They kept it from the Canadian people.

Here is the only one I have been able to find with reference to concealing the document:

—and now, for political purposes, having concealed this document, they have the effrontery to pretend to the Canadian people that we are responsible.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman read a few words before that?

Mr. Fulton: At page 3528 we find this:

Why did hon. members opposite, in the idealistic vein of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, not reveal these facts? Why did they not act on them, even if they did not think fit to reveal them?

Then at page 3530:

You concealed the facts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Let me conclude this part of my remarks. I would ask my hon. friend to allow me to do that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All right.

Mr. Fulton: The whole tenor of the Prime Minister's remarks was that the hon. gentlemen then in power concealed the facts from the Canadian people; that having been warned of the economic situation and of the dangers in the economic climate which then were known to their expert advisers and which became evident in their results about June 1957 and July 1957,—

Mr. Pickersgill: Which the Prime Minister denied in November.

Mr. Fulton: —in spite of these danger signs, hon. gentlemen opposite concealed them and introduced a budget which flew in the very face of the warnings they had received from their economic advisers. That was the sense of the Prime Minister's charge.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member read to the house the exchange between the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the Prime Minister as found at page 3530 and following in Hansard?

Mr. Fulton: I have read it. I do not think it is necessary to read it again in detail.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I have said that I do not think it is necessary to read it in detail again. The then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked whether the document had been tabled and the Prime Minister said:

> If it has not been tabled my hon. friend has added one more example to the record of concealment by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: And we could not table it after June 21.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Go on to page 3531.

Mr. Fulton: We find this:

> As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it was hidden away so well we just found it.

Those were the words of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course that statement was not correct.

Mr. Fulton: From what I have read, Mr. Speaker, it becomes obvious that the tenor of the Prime Minister's charge in January of 1958 was that my hon. friends had concealed the facts from the Canadian people and in their budget had taken a course which was revealed to be a course of folly and of recklessness in the light of the facts that they had, in the light of facts of which they had been warned as far back as January of last year. The very great difference between the situation then and the situation now is that the economic report of which my hon. friends allege extracts have appeared in the Toronto Star is a current document and for the reasons which the Prime Minister gave last January or earlier in this session should not be tabled at this time. My hon. friends admit that it should not be tabled. They say that these documents should not be tabled when they are current because they say that the anonymity of civil service advice should be preserved. Yet on the other hand they turn around and do their best to trap us into such steps as will then enable them to demand the tabling of the document.

Mr. Pickersgill: A trap of your own construction.

Mr. Fulton: That is the type of fishing expedition in which my hon. friends have been engaged. But however attractive the bait, it has not been successful; and may I say that the bait was not very attractive; it was a little bit old; it was a little bit worn. Those of us, Mr. Speaker, who may engage in angling as distinguished from fly fishing know how sometimes when the worms have been on the hook for a while they do not look too appetizing. The efforts made by my hon. friends opposite to bait their hook remind me of this kind of old, waterlogged, worn-out wormy bait that we have seen occasionally on these fishing expeditions.

Mr. Pearson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: He can end this argument at once or this fishing expedition. Will he now deny the accuracy of the excerpts from these reports that have appeared in the press?

Mr. Pickersgill: If they are denied, you do not have to produce them.

Mr. Fulton: That bait is getting more tired and disgusting looking on every occasion it is used. It is the same bait with which he tried to bait his hook last night, but it did not work.

An hon. Member: Why don't you deny it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because you are caught on a hook.

Mr. Fulton: Because that fishing expedition has been so unproductive my hon. friend, the member for Essex East, then urged the government to go out on a witch hunt. "Why," he said, "look at the Official Secrets Act." And he held the book in his hands which were trembling with indignation and he said that the government should use the Official Secrets Act and that these civil servants, the anonymity of whose reports he had been so anxious to preserve, should be pursued by the government. He said, "You should go after these civil servants, turn the police on them, use your powers under the Official Secrets Act and go on a witch hunt."

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And after the cabinet ministers.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend indicated an astonishing degree of awareness as to how this report came into the hands of the Toronto Star.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest there is a very simple solution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

An hon. Member: Fishing.

Mr. Fulton: I submit there is a very simple solution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. One or other hon. members will have to sit down and I take it that the hon. member who has the floor does not wish to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have asked the minister if he will permit a question.

Mr. Fulton: Not at this stage, if my hon. friend will permit me to continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not surprised.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Essex East, in view of the astonishing degree of awareness he indicated as to just how this alleged report, if in fact a report did come into the possession—

Mr. Pickersgill: You said report.

Mr. Fulton: Just how it got there. All he has to do is to ask the newspaper reporter and I wonder if my hon. friend has asked that reporter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will answer the question right now. I will deal with it. My hon. friend has said that was the report—

Mr. Fulton: I said you said it was a report.

Mr. Pickersgill: You didn't say that at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will say right now that I have never seen the report and I know of no one who has seen the report except every cabinet minister in this house.

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Every one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister will now permit my question.

An hon. Member: Let's get it over.

Mr. Fulton: This one will be about as good as the other one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I correctly understand the hon. gentleman to say that someone on this side of the house—and these were his words—reached the Toronto Star, thereby admitting that what the Toronto Star had was the report?

An hon. Member: That is exactly what he said.

An hon. Member: That is really fishing.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think I said that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You had better look in Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: All I said was—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are caught in the web of your own inconsistency.

Mr. Argue: Baby, you really slipped.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend opposite has been fishing for so long that he does not know the difference between the bait and the real thing. What I said was that the hon. member for Essex East revealed an astonishing degree of awareness about this whole thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh no—about the report.

Mr. Fulton: About the report that is alleged to be—

Mr. Pearson: About the report.

Mr. Fulton: About the report that he alleges—

Mr. Pickersgill: No—there was no "he alleges".

Mr. Fulton: About the fact—

Mr. Pearson: You are wiggling.

Mr. Fulton: I have not said the excerpts published in the Toronto Star were extracts from any report in the possession of the government—

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh yes—and so did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) yesterday.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends crow and they shake their heads wisely, but they well know that to be the case. I have at no time said that any extracts in the Toronto Star came from a report in the possession of the government, but what I did say was that the hon.

member for Essex East revealed an astonishing awareness of how the Toronto Star came into possession of whatever had come into its possession—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: —from which it took extracts. And if he wants to settle the matter all he has to do is to ask the reporter where he got the inspiration for the article he published, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has asked this reporter. I ask this question of the hon. gentleman who indicates such a great desire to find out how the Toronto Star—

Mr. Pearson: Be careful.

Mr. Fulton: —got the source—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Careful.

Mr. Fulton: —how the Toronto Star came to print the extracts it says it printed. I wonder if my hon. friend has asked the reporter. Does he indicate a desire to answer my question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course I did not, but may I ask this question of the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Fulton: Oh no, the hon. gentleman wanted to—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely I have the right to direct a question to the Minister of Justice as the minister—

Mr. Fulton: Oh no, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. gentlemen that I cannot hear either of them.

Mr. Fulton: It is obvious—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did the minister ask the reporter that question?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman is the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who constitutes the government over there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Official Secrets Act?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member we see revealed—has made no attempt to answer my question and so—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order Mr. Speaker. I think I answered that question. I said I had not asked the reporter but I ask the Minister of Justice did he ask the reporter where he got the report.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman reveals his usual ability to ignore the rules and do what he should not do on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Official Secrets Act?

An hon. Member: A bunch of schoolboys.

Mr. Pickersgill: The schoolmaster speaking.

Mr. Fulton: Since the member for Essex East admits that he did not care to ask the Toronto Star reporter about this matter, we therefore see revealed the extent of the sham of the hon. gentlemen opposite when they say that we should go on a witch hunt and find out just what has happened and the sham when they ask us to table this report because they are not even interested enough to ask the newspaper reporter what it was that he had in his possession from which he printed excerpts.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is the responsible minister in the government.

Mr. Fulton: This government will exercise its responsibility and as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has pointed out—

Mr. Pickersgill: Utter irresponsibility.

Mr. Fulton: —has exercised its responsibility in the white papers it has tabled in connection with the budget and in assuming responsibility for the economic forecasts upon which the budget is based. If my hon. friends will possess their souls in patience I expect they will find the economic forecasts made by the Minister of Finance will, in fact, turn out to be accurate. I expect at that time, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends will be left without very much to say because it has become increasingly apparent in the course of this debate that, apart from the fishing expeditions, apart from the desire to see us out on a witch hunt, what they are really trying to do is to paint a picture of gloom and to persuade the Canadian people that the economic forecasts of the Minister of Finance are not accurate and that some other fancied report, which they admit they have not seen and which they take from unconfirmed pages in a newspaper, and which contains forecasts which they say are gloomier than the forecasts of the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Pickersgill: Why do you not deny it then?

Mr. Fulton: They say that these forecasts should be taken and that these forecasts are the forecasts upon which this government should build its program. They would love to see us—

Mr. Pickersgill: Why does the minister not deny it and end the whole debate?

Mr. Fulton: The gloomy picture which the hon. member for Essex East has been attempting to paint—and that is their whole attempt during this debate—is an attempt which stood them in very bad stead last March and will, I suggest, stand them in very bad stead as often as they attempt to repeat it. There is one thing to which I would like to refer—

Mr. Pickersgill: You concealed the facts.

Mr. Fulton: —in the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I refer to his attack on the denial of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) of the accuracy of the quotations which were attributed to him earlier. I am not going to go into the merits or demerits of that denial but what I do wish to deal with directly is the suggestion of the hon. member for Assiniboia that he was precluded from bringing forward the matter by means of a motion if in fact he did not accept the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Argue: I said I accepted them and that is on the record.

Mr. Fulton: I said that he said that—

Mr. Pickersgill: "I said that he said that you said"—be careful.

Mr. Fulton: I said that if he had the courage of his convictions he would have founded a motion upon the allegation he was attempting to make and the hon. gentleman said I had made an unjustifiable attack upon him because, by inference, he said we knew very well that he could not bring forward a motion at this stage of the session.

Mr. Argue: The minister is not doing too well.

Mr. Fulton: I must admit that I am dealing with a pretty poor argument made by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Chevrier: You are putting forward a worse one.

Mr. Pickersgill: It should be all the easier for you, in that case.

Mr. Fulton: I cannot do very well on the basis of that material.

Mr. Pearson: Then why are you struggling so hard?

Mr. Fulton: I would like to impress upon the hon. member that if he thinks there is anything of any nature whatsoever, from what he has heard, which he thinks is inaccurate or unjust, then he could bring it before the committee on privileges and elections. Without answering what was said or attempting to give evidence as to what was said, the hon. gentleman has a right at his hand, and I read from citation 105 of Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 96:

> It is the practice in the House of Commons to bring up a question of privilege after prayers, and before the house has taken up the orders of the day. Only in very aggravated cases, requiring the immediate interposition of the house, will any business be suddenly interrupted. May says, that the proceedings of the house may be interrupted at any moment, save during the process of a division, by a motion based on a matter of privilege, when a matter has recently arisen which directly concerns the privileges of the house, and in that case the house will entertain the motion forthwith. Bourinot quotes an ancient authority as saying: "Whether any question is or is not before the house, and even in the midst of another discussion, if a member should rise to complain of a breach of privileges of the house, they have always instantly heard him."

It is perfectly clear that had the hon. gentleman intended to raise as a matter of substance the matter which he raised by inference in his speech this afternoon and if, and I said this afternoon, he had the courage of the convictions on the basis of which he made those statements, it is open to him at any time to bring forward a motion of privilege and in that motion of privilege to state what it is he has in mind. The house would then, according to the citations I have read, have to take it into consideration immediately, in my submission, and I therefore suggest once again that hon. members should have the courtesy to accept the assurances of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to his statement made yesterday. If they do not, there is only one course open to them which in decency they should take, and that is to raise the matter directly on a question of privilege so that the matter can be dealt with in the way in which it should be dealt with, and in these circumstances there is no doubt what would be the outcome. I suggest, therefore, that the hon. member for Assiniboia, apparently not being prepared to take that course, should admit that what he said about the Minister of Trade and Commerce was quite unjustified, and not that which he would like to see remain on the record.

It has become increasingly evident that this thing is a fishing expedition. All hon. members opposite want to do is to have us table a report which they themselves say should not be tabled at this stage in the House of Commons. The answer to the whole situation is that circumstances here are entirely different from the circumstances when the report was produced and tabled in January of this year. That was a report on the economic forecast for 1957. The budget had been based on it; the budget had been brought in and passed, and, some 12 or 12 months after that report had been prepared it was tabled by the Prime Minister as part of the record; part of the record which should have been placed before the Canadian people to show the extent to which the previous government had, for political advantage, disregarded the warnings of its economic advisers and attempted to convince the Canadian people that all was rosy when, in fact, they knew it was not rosy.

In this case, any economic report made for 1958 would have been made a matter of a few months ago. The budget in all its stages has not yet been concluded and no attempt has been made, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, to do other than lay the economic facts before the Canadian people, balancing the prospects for good against indications which may not be so attractive. There has been no attempt to mislead the Canadian people as there was in March 1957—

Mr. Pearson: That is untrue.

Mr. Fulton: —and in so far as the report is current it should not be tabled now. In January, 1958, however, that report was a dead issue—

Mr. Pearson: Not politically.

Mr. Fulton: —in so far as economic events were concerned. It was far from being a dead issue politically as far as hon. gentlemen opposite were concerned. They are still smarting, now, under the recollection of those events and today they are attempting to retrieve a little of their lost fortunes by seeking to drive this house into following a course which they themselves know should not be followed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does the minister think that reports and documents of this kind prepared by civil servants for the confidential use of ministers should be made public at any time in any circumstances?

Mr. Fulton: I take it there is party solidarity over there. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that his leader has just asked that this report be tabled. They are the ones who are asking for its publication. We are refusing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will repeat my question—

Mr. Pearson: Because you have given it out.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the minister for the minister's views, not for mine.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the house has been treated this afternoon and last evening to two lengthy asides by the Minister of Finance who spoke at great length last night and again today—not to deal with the amendment that is before the house but to deal, as has been said by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) with his own budget speech made earlier in the year.

There has been a great deal of cross-fire this afternoon. I will attempt to speak with as much calm as it is possible for me to do in the circumstances. But before I rose I had thought that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) who is so loquacious during the question period and at other times would, at least, have risen in his place to speak on the amendment. Thus far he has chosen not to say a thing. I hope that after I have completed my remarks he will rise and tell us what his position is with reference to the amendment which is now before the house, because the Minister of Finance has said not a word about the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought I said quite a bit about it.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has refused to deal with it. He has ignored the amendment and, instead, has gone to great lengths to put on record in Hansard matters which are entirely extraneous to the subject which is now before us.

Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance rose to speak last night, our minds went back to the première of the performance he was trying to give. We all remember January 20 very well; the star performer was none other than the Prime Minister, and while I stated on that occasion that his performance was evidence of great weakness, I must admit now that it was a performance which had a certain technical competence. But last night when we saw the under-study attempting to repeat that performance it descended into burlesque and—I can assure the Minister of Finance—poor burlesque at that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are quite a good judge of that.

Mr. Chevrier: So we had no difficulty in understanding why the hon. gentleman was not successful in getting the leadership of his party—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: What about the hon. member for Essex East?

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: And, as I am able to speak in the other official language of this country, I should like to tell the minister, in French, that the speech he delivered last night reminded me of La Fontaine's fable about a frog which, one day, wished to bloat itself bigger than an ox. The Minister of Finance, failed, last night, in his attempt to do likewise. He could not manage, by his speech, to inflate himself to the size of the ox, and he had no more success than the frog.

(Text):

Why was the minister so angry last evening?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was not a bit angry.

Mr. Chevrier: Why was he so vituperative? When he sat on this side of the house, of course, he spent a great deal of time engaging in personal attacks on those of us who were on the other side of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Poor fellows, my heart bleeds for you.

Mr. Chevrier: We had scorn, vituperation and personal attacks poured on my leader last evening but not on the amendment, however, because as I said earlier the minister refused to deal with it and ignored it completely.

Mr. Pallett: How can you deal with nothing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought I said something about it.

Mr. Chevrier: By his conduct the minister revealed that he has little or no respect for the civil service. That is clear from the manner in which the members of the civil service have been treated. It seems to me, sir, that the report, their advice to the government and the manner in which they have treated the report has undermined the value of confidential advice from the civil service. Here we had the position of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) last year tabling not a confidential report as has been stated in this house but a secret report—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, that is nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says that is nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was stamped "secret" on the face of it.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me say to my hon. friend that minister after minister in the former administration rose in their places here and said that in their copy of the 1957 economic report there were four pages on which the word "secret" had been stamped and that somebody had torn the four pages off and the report instead of being secret was now confidential.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Gardiner produced the full copy in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) reminds me that the Right Hon. Mr. Gardiner produced a full copy of the report.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You would be well advised to have a better source from which to quote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Look at Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have it here and it is marked "confidential".

Mr. Pearson: That is the report with a new cover.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is completely unworthy of you.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is one with the cover torn off.

Mr. Chevrier: Let us examine what the Prime Minister said. When I spoke in that debate I held in my hand the original which had been tabled in the house and it took me many hours before I was able to get it—the original which the Prime Minister had had in his hand at the time he spoke—and in that original it was clear that some pages had been torn out because the tabs had been left on. I was not able to say at that time and neither am I able to say now that it was the Prime Minister who had torn them off and I am not even suggesting he did but the statement I made then and the statement I make now is that the four pages that were marked "secret" had been torn off by someone. Of that I think there is no doubt. The remaining pages were marked "confidential".

In any event here was a report, secret and confidential, which was tabled contrary to the practice and the tradition of this house and I venture to say to the Prime Minister with all respect to the position he now occupies that I doubt very much if his predecessor in office—

Mr. Pickersgill: Or any of them.

Mr. Chevrier: —or indeed any of them would have done any such thing as that which was done on the occasion of that debate.

May I return to the Minister of Finance and that very sarcastic, violent and vituperative speech of his which he made last night. The minister in his budget speech did not even indicate that he did not take into account the report concerning the Canadian outlook for 1958. Because of the attitude now taken the whole civil service is damaged. That, of course, is typical of the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How ridiculous can you be?

Mr. Chevrier: The minister says how ridiculous that statement is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I asked you how ridiculous you could be and now you are going on to prove it.

Mr. Chevrier: Last January in announcing additional grants to the provinces the Minister of Finance did not even use the advice of his civil servants in making the calculations as to what the amount should have been.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How do you know?

Mr. Chevrier: I presume he did not because he rose at a later date and had to change and amend the amounts which he tabled at that time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Another assumption. Why not get some facts once in a while?

Mr. Pickersgill: Ask the minister if he did.

Mr. Chevrier: My facts are certainly as accurate as some of the facts which the Minister of Finance put on the record last night and I hope that if he ever finds time to read his speech he will observe what inconsequential statements he made over a period of several hours.

Let me come back to what I was saying to the minister. He has shown the same attitude here with reference to this discussion. He has failed to appreciate the importance of the contributions of his advisers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why not make a speech instead of reading it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Look who is talking about reading.

Mr. Chevrier: He displayed the same attitude which caused him not long ago to slap down the governor of the Bank of Canada. That is exactly what he did. He tried to play the same record which the Prime Minister played last January and I can assure the house that that record fell pretty flat last night and even flatter this afternoon when the minister sat down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Even flatter now, eh?

Mr. Chevrier: That indicates to me that what has happened was that the members of the government were not prepared for this amendment. They expected an amendment which was other than this and I believe I can say with some degree of accuracy that what was expected on the other side of the house was a demand for the production of the 1958 hidden report. Hon. gentlemen opposite were ready to argue that point. And the interesting thing about it is that the Minister of Finance was caught off base. He expected something in the amendment which was not there. He was caught off base and instead of dealing with the amendment as he should have he proceeded to re-read his budget speech over and over again, a speech which was very monotonous when he read it on budget night and still more monotonous when he gave it to us again last evening.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I expected a manly amendment, not that puny excuse for an amendment.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall deal with the amendment in a moment when I get to it but what I am doing now is dealing with the speech of my hon. friend and the expressions he used in referring to my leader.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, before I return to what I was discussing when the house took recess at six o'clock I should like to say a word concerning the subamendment of the C.C.F. party. When the hon. member for Essex East spoke earlier in the debate he indicated that at first glance he was not disposed to support the subamendment and I can say as well that when I looked at it I was not, at first glance, disposed to support it either. If the government would table the whole document we would then wish to consult the document before basing any vote upon its contents but all we have are excerpts published by the Toronto Star. They indicate that the Minister of Finance disregarded the advice of the experts and in the light of what information is available to us we feel we should vote for the subamendment.

Returning now to the discussion that took place earlier, upon the reading of Hansard, I was somewhat surprised, when I was dealing with the secret document, at the intervention made by the Prime Minister. He said of me, "This is completely unworthy of you."

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, no. Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and I were talking back and forth. The Leader of the Opposition made some observation and I made an observation which had no reference to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). There was a cross-fire between us.

Mr. Pearson: I am the guilty one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know what the statement was.

Mr. Chevrier: I am very happy to hear the Prime Minister say that it is not I who is unworthy. In any event, I want to come back to the discussion earlier so that there can be no doubt about the nature of the report that was under discussion on January 20 because there certainly seemed to be some doubt in the Prime Minister's mind as to exactly what it was. I should like to refer to the debate which took place on January 21, 1958, page 3559 of Hansard. At that time I had made the following comment:

I have another remark to make with reference to this document, Mr. Speaker. The document I hold in my hand is marked "confidential", but something has been taken from it. I make this statement not because I was a member of the government, since I have not been a member of the government for the last three years. But look at this document. A page has been torn from it, and those who have torn the page off here left a fragment of it there and on the back of it is a blue portion indicating it has been tampered with. I am informed by my former colleagues that its covers were blue; and that part of the report which normally indicates . . . that it is a secret document. Therefore, I ask this question. Why was this tabled and marked "confidential", whereas the rest of it is secret? Where is the rest of it? Where are the other pages which should be attached to this?

I should like to quote from a statement in the same volume at page 4199 attributed to the Right Hon. Mr. Gardiner as follows:

When I got my copy on March 29, 1957, I made a note on it to send it west. I took it out west and read it. Of course, I had to get it back again and that document is marked, right on the front page, with the word "secret". Of course, I did not read it to the press and to my constituents out west at election time. And then on the second page it is marked "secret" again and, of course, I did not read that document to others.

I simply desired to put those two quotations on Hansard so that there might be no doubt about the statement I made earlier as to the fact that this document was not so much a confidential document as it was a secret document. Now, I presume from the agitation I saw the Prime Minister display earlier that he will take part in the debate and I hope that he will as I also hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will take part in the debate. After all, this document was prepared by officers of his department. They are the ones who prepared both the 1957 and 1958 documents. He has made certain statements challenging the accuracy of press reports and it would seem to me that certainly he, of all ministers, should take part in the discussion.

We were wondering, therefore, just at what stage the Prime Minister will enter the debate. This afternoon he indicated that he intended to contribute to the discussion. He threw the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) into the debate last night and then today the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton). The Minister of Justice was doing so poorly before six o'clock that he was scratched before he had a chance to finish his speech.

All this, it seems to me, points to a speech by the Prime Minister in an effort to prop up the sagging prestige of the government in this debate. But knowing the Prime Minister as I do and having a great deal of respect for his ability and skill, I have a feeling that when he does enter the debate he will indicate in no uncertain terms that if he tabled this report it was at the request of members on this side of the house. I am referring, of course, to "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1957" report. I should like to say here that during the course of that debate the former member for Winnipeg North Centre challenged him to produce the document and I believe that my colleague, the hon. member for Essex East did likewise.

What I think the house should not forget, and what I think the house should have uppermost in its mind, is that the Prime Minister cannot get away from the fact that he was asked to table this document by these two hon. gentlemen, in accordance with the rules. During the period prior to six o'clock on January 20, 1958, he read at great length from the secret document. In fact, I believe he quoted some 26 excerpts from the document. He charged that it had been concealed by the former administration. He made charges that the former administration was responsible for the condition in which the country was at that time, and had concealed the evidence. After having read from that document for a period of at least two hours —I remember the speech quite well—and quoting extracts from it at great length, under the rules of the house there was no alternative for him but to table the document.

I may wish to come back to this in a moment, but now I should like to say something about that loquacious, sarcastic, vituperative speech made by the Minister of Finance. This speech, sir, divides itself into two parts. In the first part, he poured out ridicule and scorn upon my leader without, I submit with deference, dealing with the substance of the amendment before the house. In my opinion, that speech was unworthy, if that expression can now be used by me, of the Minister of Finance. Then, too, there is another thing to which I should like to take exception, and it is that during the course of my remarks earlier today I made some reference to the Minister of Finance and from the other side of the house came the charge, "Cheap". Well, sir, there could have been nothing cheaper than that which came out of the mouth of the Minister of Finance than the reference which he made to my leader, dealing with his speech on January 20, when he stated that after that speech the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was alone and walked out of this house without anyone accompanying him. If ever there was a cheap assertion, that was one which came from the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: It is true, though.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not true because I say here, on my responsibility as a member of parliament, that I sat beside the Leader of the Opposition and I walked out of the house with him on that occasion. But I will add this, however. Last night, after the flat speech of the Minister of Finance nobody accompanied him; no one came up to his seat save the loud-mouthed Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness).

Mr. Stinson: That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: We remember the day the Minister of Finance walked out alone, too.

Mr. Stinson: That is not true.

Mr. Chevrier: This business of cheap assertions is a double-edged sword and can be used by both sides of the house. It would have been a great deal better if the Minister of Finance had never used it.

Mr. Ricard: Hit where you can, below the belt.

Mr. Chevrier: Hon. members opposite do not like this. I am not surprised they do not like it. They do not like any part of this debate. They are in difficulties, and about that there can be no doubt. If they are not in difficulty, why do they not table "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958"?

Mr. McPhillips: Parlez en français.

Mr. Chevrier: That remark from the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips) indicates the truth of my statement that members on the other side of the house are upset by this amendment; that members on the other side of the house not only do not like this amendment but find themselves considerably embarrassed. Why do they not tell us what is in the report?

Mr. Small: You will get the business in a few minutes.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no doubt that in a few minutes the Prime Minister will rise and give us an example of his skill in this kind of debate. However, no matter how skilful he is he will never be able to get out of the embarrassment in which he has placed not only himself but his followers on the other side of the house.

Mr. Small: You will come out of your trance.

Mr. Chevrier: If he were not embarrassed he would allow the Minister of Trade and Commerce to rise in his place and tell us what his position is. Why does not the Minister of Trade and Commerce speak?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Because you are talking too long.

Mr. Chevrier: He has no hesitation about getting up and making changes in press statements as he did earlier today and yesterday, but as yet he will not say a word. He is tongue-tied today, and that is surprising for that loquacious minister. At least, he should tell us what the position is. But no, they call on the Minister of Finance and on the Minister of Justice. Of course, without doubt, the Prime Minister will close the debate after a little while.

But I am being taken away from the subject matter of my remarks. I wanted to refer, sir, to the second part of the speech made by the Minister of Finance. The second part of his speech dealt with the economic situation in 1957, utterly disregarding the report, "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958". Really, to use his own expression, it was a runt of a speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friends say "Oh", but I am using exactly the same words the Minister of Finance used. If they are applicable to the amendment, let me say that they are equally applicable to the speech made by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Benidickson: More so.

Mr. Chevrier: The attitude of the Minister of Finance shows that he is completely irresponsible or that he has not understood the amendment which is before the house. I should like to deal with the amendment, which can be divided into two parts. It reads as follows:

> "this house is of the opinion that the actions of the government in connection with 'The Canadian Economic Outlook' have seriously weakened the value of confidential advice from civil servants with resultant damage to the proper formulation of economic and fiscal policies".

Those are the two points contained in the amendment. First, we believe that the conduct of the government has seriously weakened the benefit of confidential advice from civil servants. If this charge is justified, and the Minister of Finance did not establish that it was not, then it means that the relationship between the government and the civil service has deteriorated and has worsened. A good relationship between the two is essential in a democracy and under the rules such as we have them in this house. It is evident that the situation between the civil service and the present government has worsened and has deteriorated considerably. No one is more capable of telling us about that than the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Grafftey: Irresponsible.

Mr. Chevrier: Just listen to this to see how irresponsible it is. Let me tell the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) that at least ten members of the civil service who resigned—

Mr. Grafftey: You resigned yourself.

Mr. Chevrier: Several of those were members of the civil service in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member who has the floor is finding difficulty with so many people interrupting. I am not sure whether he is having more difficulty from behind or in front, but from all parts of the house there seem to be constant interruptions. I would ask hon. members to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that there has been a deterioration between the government and the civil service. That fact is evidenced by the resignations that have taken place, no less than a substantial number of them—I believe four or five—from the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day, dealing with that subject, said they all had good reason to resign and that they sent letters of resignation giving the reasons therefor. I am quite sure that they had good reasons to resign. I believe the minister as well as I believe the reasons given by those members of the civil service for their resignations. The point I am making is this. I am convinced in my own mind and in my own heart that these men would still be in the civil service if the former administration were still in office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Then we have had attacks made upon the civil service by members of parliament before this report leaked out as well as since that time. These charges have been renewed without any evidence yet to justify the charge. I need only refer to the editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail and which dealt with the alternatives which could have happened in this leak. May I quote from the editorial under the name of Mr. Robert Duffy which appeared in the Globe and Mail of August 4, 1958:

> That may be generally true, but in this case Trade and Commerce Minister Churchill was already on record with an admission made outside the house, that the newspaper extracts from the report were perfectly accurate.

In fairness to the minister, I must say that statement was denied by him earlier.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you.

Mr. Chevrier: I continue:

> If the ministers were merely confused, however, there was a more interesting reaction from some Conservative backbenchers. The quick suspicion was that some official had passed the secret report to the Liberals, who passed it on to the newspaper, in order to create an issue embarrassing to the government.
> It may have happened that way, but there is another possibility. Conceivably, some government supporter may have disclosed the document, in pursuit of his own ends. There are rivalries within a government as well as between political parties. And as a general rule most government departments feel that the Finance Minister and the Treasury Board are not giving them enough money to spend.

That gives some indication of where the leak might have come. Then there is the attitude of the no less arrogant Minister of Agriculture who fires a member of the public service and makes criminal accusations against him which are absolutely without foundation. There is a well-known rule of law that a man is presumed innocent until found guilty. The minister reversed the rule, however, and found him guilty without trial.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would remind the hon. member that that matter was discussed at considerable length in a previous debate and is not relevant tonight.

An hon. Member: And his time is up.

An hon. Member: You hope.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, as always I accept your ruling and I bow to it.

If I may, I should like to return to the arrogant Minister of Finance who has now come into the house. In his absence I was telling him that the amendment which he ignored completely dealt with a number of things, the things in particular that should have been drawn to his attention. I had arrived at the second point made in our amendment which is derived from the first and which is to the effect that the value of confidential advice from the civil service having been seriously weakened, great damage has been done to the formulation of economic and fiscal policies. We all know that in the preparation of the budget and in determining what are going to be the levels of public expenditures and taxes for a given year the government cannot escape the responsibility of making some kind of assessment of what the over-all economic outlook and the over-all economic situation is going to be for that year. The Canadian people have the right to expect that procedure. The Canadian people have been accustomed to that procedure. The government must in fulfilling its responsibilities take the advice of its senior civil servants, get the best possible advice it can in the preparation of the budget; it should have not only the best expert advice but the best system, the best method of assessment of the economic situation, otherwise, if that were not the case, serious mistakes could be made when the estimates of public expenditure and taxes are prepared, with the result that Canadians would not benefit from the most effective policies designed to cope with any possible undesirable economic situation.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance in dealing with his budget quoted from a white paper prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce entitled "Private and Public Investment for Canada; Outlook for 1958". What he did, was to refer to that document in dealing with the composition of the gross national product, which is made up by government expenditures, exports minus imports, investments and consumer expenditures. Those added up equal the gross national product. He used the figures which are to be found at page 7 of this "Outlook for 1958". As can be found at page 1235 of Hansard, he said this:

> The expanded role of social capital is illustrated in the 1958 Outlook for Private and Public Investment published by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Present investment intentions of business for capital outlays in 1958 are about 11 per cent below the 1957 level. Planned outlays for housing, government departments and institutional services on the other hand are 14 per cent higher.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, having followed the course of the debate in its entirety, there are some matters which I feel might be dealt with at this time in order to remove some of the smoke screen which has been brought into the discussion by members of the opposition.

As I listened to my hon. friend the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) when he spoke of the civil service I could not but be in agreement with him. There is no disagreement with respect to the fact that our civil service makes a contribution worthy of the finest traditions of public service, but he went out of his way to say that because of the fact that a number of civil servants in high positions had resigned this must have been because of some disagreement with the government. He should have looked to his right and to his left—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is diversion No. 1.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He should have looked at his leader at his right and to the pick of the pack on his left.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is diversion No. 2.

Mr. Pearson: We resigned to go into a government not to leave one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ah, they are starting to explain. Let me say to my hon. friend the hon. member for Laurier that some resigned from the civil service to get a better job in government than they would have had outside of it and in that respect I am sure he will require no identification; some resigned from the civil service or the public service in the expectation of greater rewards in government.

So there they sit, three of them who have at one time or another resigned from the civil or public service of Canada and have found their way into parliament. I do not think there is any argument that it is to the credit of civil servants who find they can improve their positions—and they certainly can, especially those in the higher areas of the civil service and indeed all areas of the civil service have before them at all times the magnetic attraction of far greater advantages, monetary and otherwise, than the civil service can offer—that they stay in the civil service and give to our country the benefit of their wisdom and advice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Anyone who endeavours to bring into this discussion the veiled suggestion or even the suspicion that the members of this government have a lesser regard for the civil service of Canada than have the members of the opposition should be reminded that the answer to such a suggestion is immediately apparent. I witnessed the crocodile tears of the hon. gentlemen opposite—oh, how they love the civil service, but they waited until this government came to power for the increases which we eventually brought in for former civil servants.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a noble argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend, the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) would acquire an even greater reputation for wisdom if he could for once maintain silence.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, when I require instructions from the Prime Minister I will ask him for them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When some members first come into the house they feel, and this is quite natural, that the contribution to this House of Commons is measured by the number of interjections, but the hon. member has had experience both in the civil service and also in parliament and I am sure that he has learned long before this that these interjections are never interpreted as evidence of statesmanship.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman ought to know, he has lots to his credit.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Returning once more to the tremendous feeling of members of the opposition for the public service, I have here a speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a day or so before the end of last March in which he scored the Conservatives for the reign of terror in the civil service and he said something should be done.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, I never at any time during the election talked about any reign of terror with regard to the civil service and I challenge the Prime Minister to quote anything to prove that I did so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is the best answer, my hon. friend says he did not say it—

Mr. Pearson: Well, read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I have here an article headed, "Pearson Scores Tories' Reign of Terror in Civil Service". My hon. friend says he did not say that and this is the best argument one could possibly evince as to why no reliance should be placed on the type of thing upon which the opposition is placing so much reliance at the present time, namely, an expurgated, an imaginative press report—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made the allegation that I said there was a reign of terror in the civil service. I asked him to read any statement attributed to me in which I am supposed to have said that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have just read you the heading.

Mr. Pearson: Never mind the heading, read the statement.

Mr. Benidickson: Read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall go on, I shall read it.

Mr. Pearson: Read it.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: And this after their record—after all, the gentleman was a member of a government which refused to do anything on behalf of former civil service employees.

Mr. Pickersgill: Another diversion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And refused to do anything—

An hon. Member: Answer the point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to ease the actual hardships suffered by civil servants superannuated under the old law of pre-pay-raise rates. Why did they not do this?

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order. Would the Prime Minister read from that statement in which I am supposed to have said there was a reign of terror in the civil service or will he withdraw his allegation.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member to say he had made no such statement and following that assertion the Prime Minister accepted assurance of the Leader of the Opposition. It was therefore not proceeded with.

Mr. Pearson: Someone has said, apparently that I said this—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member said he did not say it.

Mr. Robichaud: Where is this reign of terror?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just like January 20, bits and pieces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All this chattering indicates guilty consciences.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend said he did not say it. This was an article written by Richard Jackson, headed "Pearson Scores Tories' Reign of Terror in Civil Service", and I accept my hon. friend's denial.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the Prime Minister cannot get away with that. I asked him to admit that there is no reference to a statement of mine that there was a reign of terror. Would he please read the article in which I am said to have said this or withdraw his statement.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is reading it for him.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member raised a point of order that he had not said the words which were read by the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister has accepted his statement. That, it seems to me, closes the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: The words are not there, it is just another fabrication.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, the Prime Minister has said that the article says I stated there was a reign of terror in the civil service. I ask him to read the article to prove that I made that statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should ask the Prime Minister to read a statement which contradicts him.

Mr. Pearson: Then he should withdraw it.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister has already accepted the statement of the Leader of the Opposition that he did not use the expression "reign of terror" and I do not think it is in order for the Leader of the Opposition now to ask the Prime Minister to read the report which the Leader of the Opposition contradicted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have accepted the denial and that is the end of it.

An hon. Member: He can't read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will come back to this; with all that deep solicitude and heartfelt yearning for the civil servant, why did they not do something when they were in office—

Some hon. Members: We did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —with regard to the ex-civil servants who over and over again were asking for assistance?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

An hon. Member: He won't permit a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the purpose of this. They realize I have only a few minutes, and they spend their time like this.

Mr. Pearson: You took two hours this afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Laurier spoke disparagingly of the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and also of the speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) because, he stated, they did not have any regard to the amendment. I ask gentlemen opposite to read their speeches and see how closely, beginning with that of their leader, they have any reference to the subject matter of the amendment. Here this afternoon they have been using the same arguments. Indeed, I have before me almost identical speeches which they used in the campaign. Over and over again they dealt with this subject. Even the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) did so in a pompous manner in a couple of speeches, and let me say this: the people of Canada realized what the issue was; they realized it was a fact that for a period of a year and a half, conditions being what they were, members of the present opposition and members of the government of that day had placed before the people of Canada self selected statistics.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is untrue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They concealed the facts. They hid them, as they know, and if today we had some exhibition of repentance on their part we could at least say that forgiveness might be given. But as they return to this amendment, trying to restore life to a subject matter long since dead, one that they have gone over again and again, there is a sense of guilt and realization that they did what we said they did; they hid the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the Prime Minister's speech to the federal-provincial conference five months after?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the more the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate tries to speak, the more he gives one a realization of something I have never been able to understand—that every time he speaks it is always a member of the other side who is elected.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh. Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: It concerns the statement made by the Prime Minister—

Mr. Churchill: Take it and like it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question of privilege is this: The Prime Minister stated that wherever I spoke the candidate on the other side was elected. I spoke 30 times in Bonavista-Twillingate and got 76 per cent of the votes.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

An hon. Member: They had sooner elect you than listen.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister has very little time and I ask that he be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sorry I made that earlier statement. Evidently it took him 30 speeches to win his constituency. To return to the point I was making. With that conscience that pricks them for having concealed the facts, frustrated in their souls, overcome because of the fact that the depression which they predicted during the election campaign with such avid and vocal anticipation has not been achieved, they realize that the people of Canada know clearly from the facts that they have concealed the evidence—

Mr. Pickersgill: What has happened to the facts now?

Mr. Harkness: Restrain yourselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —of a situation—

An hon. Member: Give 'em hell.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that was dangerous to the welfare of the Canadian people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the last couple of days they are clad in sack cloth and ashes. They wail their lamentations; they beat their breasts—

An hon. Member: That sounds like Billy Graham.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Leader of the Opposition came out with a fighting speech,—a speech of pulsating prophecy finally terminating in a pusillanimous amendment similar in nature to that which was introduced into this house on the twentieth day of January last. What do they say? They say we should bring to the house a document of which they allege sections abstracted therefrom have been published in a newspaper in this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do you deny it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: They raise their voices and say that a confidential document should never be brought to light, that it should never be revealed. Their guilty conscience was shown a little while ago by the hon. member for Laurier who said: I know that the Prime Minister will say we forced him to table the document. That was a fine example of prevision. This was the Janus-faced position they took.

Mr. McIlraith: You are the one who revealed it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If you would make your position clear in debate, the people of Ottawa would appreciate it.

Here is the position they take. They say the document should not be produced because it is confidential. Then, in a state of synthetic indignation, they demand that we table—

An hon. Member: Secret report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the British House of Commons documents designated as confidential and secret have been produced. And on the twentieth day of January last, as the hon. member for Laurier admitted, it was as the result of a demand on the part of the opposition that this document—

An hon. Member: Secret report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This reminds me, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member makes his point of order, may I remind him that his last question of privilege was not a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think my point of order will be found to be a point of order, and my point of order is that when an hon. member cites a document it is the rule of the house that it be tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Essex East as well as the former member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have had a good education.

Some hon. Members: Dictatorship.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must hear the hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman said it was as the result of a request of mine. I made no such request. At page 3531 of Hansard for January 20, 1958, the hon. member said:

> If the house desires it I will be very happy to do so.

At that point I interjected and said that he must do it under the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to hon. members that whenever they disagree with what was said by another hon. member who has the floor, a point of order does not arise. Explanations can be made and may be made at the end of the speech but not by interrupting the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are just attempting to take up the Prime Minister's limited time.

Mr. Chevrier: That is exactly what you did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: Do not be so innocent because you are not innocent, you know.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, you have stated that the point of order that must be made must be stated at the time.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, a point of order must be made but I have just indicated that these are not points of order. If an hon. member disagrees with what is said by the hon. member who has the floor and wishes to make an explanation he should reserve it until the hon. member has finished.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) has no right to lose his temper.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Public Works is really enjoying this debate.

Mr. Harkness: You know no more about points of order than you do about anything else.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must insist on some order so that this debate may proceed. It has only eleven minutes to run.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that any argument I could advance would do nothing other than hurt the souls of hon. members opposite. Reports have been produced before on a number of occasions and see the position in which the opposition have placed themselves. They say that documents such as this shall not be produced.

An hon. Member: Three times.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They say that is the rule. I answered that by referring to the practice in the British house. Secondly, they say that in this case because they believe that the secrecy of the document has been violated by publication in the press—

Mr. Pearson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —therefore they have a right to expect the production of this document in the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, that stand is one that has no logic about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just common sense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It suggests this: a document is secret, a document is confidential, a document shall not be tabled in the House of Commons; but if some newspaper somewhere in an article states that there is some secret or confidential document and purports to make a quotation from that document—

Mr. Pearson: Which you will not deny.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —then, by reason of that situation, the document must be placed before the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just to state that proposition, Mr. Speaker, is to indicate the ridiculous nature of the proposition. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) said that if another government does anything like this it is wrong and that if we do it it is right. That doctrine is far removed from the facts of this case and I am going to detail them now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I brought the matter before the House of Commons on January 20, 1958.

Mr. Caron: Wrong again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was able to show the utterly hypocritical attitude of the former government.

Mr. Habel: The same attitude you are displaying today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was able to do this simply by taking the same document, quoting from it, and producing it at their request.

Some hon. Members: Oh no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You produced it under the rules of this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The reason that they now endeavour to howl me down is this.

Mr. Habel: We want honesty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are afraid of an argument meeting their contentions of today and yesterday. Let us examine what I said on January 20 last. I refer hon. members to page 3534 of Hansard where I am reported as having said:

> It is of a confidential nature and it has to do with events immediately ahead in the economic field and for that reason documents of such a type have naturally not been tabled in the past. This, of course, is because if there is going to be a rising economy according to such a document then that encourages business interests but if it says that in a certain area there is going to be a reducing economy then that inevitably would have a detrimental effect.
> However, the point I made was that they did have that document and they did not act upon it but, instead of acting upon it, they actually placed before the House of Commons at the time of the budget a picture of a buoyant economy, hopeful for the future—

And then an interjection occurred when an hon. member said "We were scuttled".

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is not true, of course, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) knows it.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not so.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister knows that is not true and I should be very glad to quote from Mr. Harris' speech in support of my contention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue:

> —and assured the country that it would be continuing as they said it was.

Canadian Economic Outlook

And then again on the following day, January 21, as reported at page 3550 of Hansard, I said:

I would say it would not be in the public interest to table any reports that are coterminous with the time of application of such reports.

I wish to make it clear that we have no objection to the production of the economic report for this year provided it is not as I said last spring, and as the authorities state, coterminous with the year during which the report has application.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said it was already out of date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that we will produce the report for 1958 immediately after this year ends. It would be detrimental until January 1959. That has been the attitude in the past. That has been the practice in other parliamentary institutions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the stand which we take in regard to this document.

Mr. Pearson: You did not take that stand in January.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Next January, if there is any request—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: No, sit down.

Mr. Green: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: He said no.

Mr. Pickersgill: He has only to say no.

Some hon. Members: He did.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the Prime Minister say no?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If there is any request for the tabling of this report—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate cannot proceed unless the hon. member yields the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the Prime Minister if he would permit a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If in January 1959 there is any request for the production of this document it will be made available and then my hon. friends opposite examining that document in the light of the economic events that have occurred in this country from May and June of this year on will be able to determine whether or not the policies as enunciated in the budget had some regard to the economic and financial prospects of this nation. The production of the previous report that was made in the house at their request—

Mr. Pickersgill: Under the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do not misstate the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —concerned a report referring to the year 1957. The production of the document occurred in 1958. The reason why they are so disturbed, Mr. Speaker, is this. The production of that document in the year following its preparation told the story in this house of the conjured fantasies of the terrible economic conditions they said we were responsible for and laid the responsibility on their doorstep.

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is totally untrue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the contribution at all times in argument of my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is that the other person does not tell the truth.

Some hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: Particularly in this case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is perhaps the most intelligent contribution that the hon. member can make to the debates of this house. It is a simple one but it seems to be about the measure of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): And he is a sailor too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Mr. Speaker, we are concealing no document from the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: Is it marked "secret"?

Mr. Chevrier: Is that true or false?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are following the practice followed in other parliaments.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, in Russia.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And, next spring, in January, February or March when parliament assembles we shall gladly produce that document and my hope is that the prophecies made by the Minister of Finance will then be found in keeping with the facts rather than with the picture of black despondency that characterizes the opposition. Do you know what is wrong with them? They hoped that things would be worse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They do not understand the fact, as put on the record by the Minister of Finance today, that our trade is increasing. They do not understand the fact that our wheat marketing has shown unusual powers of disposal.

Mr. Robichaud: Unemployment is increasing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is one of the hardest things for them to take when today, for the first time in 30 months, there was the largest reduction in the cost of living in any one month. They raise these arguments, Mr. Speaker. I have got the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition here. Job was supposed to be the greatest authority on lamentations until the Leader of the Opposition came along.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Jeremiah.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Jeremiah, as my hon. friend who sits beside me says. Job was the patient one. That is my position. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say this. They said all these things only a few months ago. They wailed, they used weasel words like those they used today. They brought in smoke screens. Today they bring in the civil service and the press.

Mr. Robichaud: You brought in a red herring.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what it is. My hon. friend knows that they brought in protestations about the press. I am one of those who have been in politics for many years and I have always said—I am not saying it just today or for this occasion—that the press, except for slight errors and mistakes that naturally creep in, has always occupied to my way of thinking a high position in the finest traditions of this country. I have always said that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But they bring in the press in order to becloud the issue. They bring in the civil service; they bring in all these things. Do you know why they have said all these things, Mr. Speaker. Well, I have never placed too much reliance on Gallup polls but on March 31 last we had 54 per cent of the vote of the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: That was an accident.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Since then they have been saying all these things and telling the people how terrible things are but in the last report the figure is 60 per cent, the highest in history. I do not know who the advisers of the Leader of the Opposition are but I understand that he has recently brought in the same people he had during the election campaign. I am glad of that. They have used this type of argument and not attended to the discharge of responsibility as an opposition; they have befogged the situation on a matter such as this at a time when they say conditions are serious. When the opportunity came to them to deal seriously with economic conditions prevailing in Canada, the United States and elsewhere, conditions which are improving more rapidly in this country than in any other, they brought up a subject such as this which they know is simply a case of having a guilty heart and returning once more to something that revealed to the people of Canada the utter duplicity of the policies they put into effect in 1956 when they knew better or should have known better.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A pretty poor defence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, sir, I think you have indicated that my time is up. There are other matters I could have dealt with but I want to make one thing clear. There are two sides to their position. The document is secret. It must not be produced. They have to say that so they will be consistent with what they said last January. Then they say that the situation now is different because a newspaper purported to copy something which is only alleged so far as anyone is concerned and therefore the document has to be produced.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.06 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4(d) of standing order 56, to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendment or amendments now before the house.

FINANCE—CONVERSION LOAN, EFFECTS OF HIGHER INTEREST RATES

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a grievance which I feel I must raise at this time because it deals with a matter which is not subject to a decision of the house in the normal course of events in that the government has undertaken an action for which, according to the authority vested in it, it did not have to ask the permission of this house. The action was taken within recent weeks as a decision of the government. I am, of course, referring to the bond conversion deal of the Conservative government, which is part of the new vision in the field of Canadian finance.

I want to be fair before I make my complaint by listing the only two advantages which I can see in this bond conversion deal so far as the people of Canada are concerned. In the first place, it is anti-inflationary in that it makes out of short term securities long term holdings and thereby removes from the potential buying power of the Canadian economy as much money as is being converted. The other advantage is that it clears the decks of the money markets of an overloading of short term securities, an overloading which was flooding the money markets.

I believe, and I say this sincerely, that on the whole this government has not yet made many serious mistakes. Its sins have been mostly sins of omission. In my opinion, however, this is the first major blunder, the first major sin committed by the regime of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). The move is unprecedented in that it involves the conversion of from 40 to 60 per cent of the national public debt, depending upon the figure you take as being the real national public debt. It involves an unprecedented $6,400 million. It involves a rise in interest rates on government bonds from the 3 per cent which is now being paid to a high of 4½ per cent on the converted bonds. The Tory party is here really revealing itself as the traditional high interest party which it has always been in the entire history of Canada.

It is unique in that it converts callable bonds into non-callable bonds. It is unique in that every effort is being made to see that as far as possible all conversions should be into 25-year bonds. The conversion is also unique in that it is a conversion of bonds which are as yet unmatured into bonds carrying a higher interest rate. Many governments of Canada have in past years converted or called in unmatured bonds; they have called them in for the purpose of converting them to bonds carrying a lower interest rate. However, this government, for some reason that it has not yet explained to the country, is calling in bonds, in some instances many years before the date of maturity, and offering a higher interest rate if the holders will accept the new long-term bonds.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) also announced a uniquely high rate on a short term loan when he announced that the government had arranged for $400 million until the fall at 2½ per cent. That also is new as far as interest rates go for this type of money. I have read the budget speech of the Minister of Finance and I am going to say that on June 17 he did not contemplate the move he had undertaken since June 17, because throughout the budget speech the implication was very clear that the most the minister was expecting to have to convert and borrow on the money market this year was $3,400 million. I can come to only one conclusion: This deal is so unheard of and so unreasonable that the minister found, after announcing his plans in the budget, that he was unable to get the $3,400 million that he expected to raise this year; $1,900 million to meet the victory bonds that were maturing, some $700 million to carry the deficit and another $800 million, roughly, to cover what are commonly called contingent liabilities.

And it is my conviction that the people who have control over the investment resources of Canada have held a gun to the heads of this government and have forced the hand of this government into converting the whole of these victory bonds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Utterly ridiculous.

Mr. Regier: The government only had to convert $1,900 million worth of bonds, because that is the total that were falling due this year, and I fail to understand why the government could not wait until next year before converting the issues falling due next year, and so on. Why did they have to convert $6,400 million worth of bonds? I must ask this question: who is the boss of Canada? Is it the government which the people elected on March 31, or is it the boys on Bay street and St. James street? I ask, furthermore, if this is the pay off for the election funds of the Conservative party—a 50 per cent increase in the pay of the money lenders of Canada. I wonder what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) would say if the school teachers, the civil servants or the farmers, or any other class of people in Canada, were to ask for a 50 per cent increase in their take home pay? Yet this is exactly what the Minister of Finance has told the money-lenders of Canada they can receive.

Not only is a bonus being paid to these people, but the government has been lavish in the commission rates which it is paying to the money-lenders for the conversion of these bonds. In addition, I notice the government has embarked on a very extensive and national publicity campaign and has inserted full page ads in every little weekly from one end of Canada to the other. The cost of the publicity of this new approach in the financing of the public debt is bound to be enormous. What the whole thing will cost, only the years can tell. I have made a very rough estimate, and I believe that over the 25-year period, assuming that the whole of this issue will be converted, and assuming that the rise in interest rates on other borrowings in Canada is going to amount to approximately three times that of the increase on the bonds, we get a gross cost to the Canadian people of $10,000 million over the next 25-year period.

This deal is already affecting other interest rates in Canada. There are many lending institutions attached to the federal government whose interest rates are directly allied to whatever interest rates the federal government agrees to pay on its long term bonds. I refer to money that is being borrowed by the people of Canada under the Central Mortgage and Housing Act, or National Housing Act loans; I refer to money being lent to the farmers of Canada by the Canadian farm loan board, and so on. There are many other institutions in Canada through whose assistance people borrow money from government agencies, and whose interest rates are going to be very directly affected. Interest rates on provincial government obligations are bound to rise; interest rates of municipal governments, hospital boards, and school boards are also going to rise, and if these rates do not rise, these institutions will have to pay through the nose in the other way by having to sell debentures at less than par.

It is going to affect the rates at which Canadian commercial undertakings will be able to borrow money and, in addition, affect the rates which the ordinary individual will have to pay on his private borrowings. After all, why should any lending institution be very interested in lending money to an individual at 5 per cent, 5½ per cent or 6 per cent if it can lend to the federal government on a 25-year non-callable basis and be assured of a return of 4½ per cent? The total price that the people are going to be asked to pay for the privilege of having a Conservative government will be fantastic; the whole scheme is bound to work hardship on the ordinary taxpayers and consumers of Canada.

Why do I feel so keenly about this? Let us look at what is happening to one individual—and I am going to take as an example someone I know—someone who in wartime scraped and denied himself of many things he would liked to have had. However, he knew he was supposed to help the government to ward off inflation; he was urged to buy victory bonds to help win the war and, like the good old soul he was, he invested $2,000 of his hard-earned savings in victory bonds. After the war he found that rents had climbed sky high, and felt obliged to buy a new home. So he decided to sell his victory bonds. He took them to the bank, and what did he get? Did he get 100 cents on the dollar as the banks and insurance houses are now getting? This particular man got 93 cents, and lost $140 of his investment right there. Those who bought those bonds at a discount are now the holders of the bonds. It is estimated that only one out of ten or possibly one out of 12 of these victory bonds are now held by individuals in Canada as individuals.

Mr. Pallett: According to whose estimates?

Mr. Regier: By far the most of them, approximately 85 per cent or more, are in the hands of institutions and the like.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true. Why not inform yourself of the facts and stick to the truth?

Mr. Regier: Will the Minister of Finance deny that our reputable financial newspapers and magazines in Canada are wrong when they say that only one out of ten, one out of eleven or one out of 12 bonds are held by individuals as individuals? If so, I should be very glad to have him put that on the record.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I deny about 95 per cent of the nonsense the hon. member has been speaking tonight.

Mr. Benidickson: Which 95 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He is making very harmful statements and is speaking a lot of rubbish.

Mr. Regier: I notice, Mr. Speaker, that every time I hit the minister where it hurts the minister immediately replies by charging that everything I say is nonsense. I have grown used to that over the years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What the hon. member is saying is worse than nonsense. It is extremely harmful and mischievous.

Mr. Regier: I know that millions of Canadians were forced by the exigencies of the situation to cash in their victory bonds and were required to accept 92 and 93 cents on the dollar. It was an inflated dollar they received. They are not inclined to look kindly upon the move whereby the government says, "We know you investment people paid only 92 or 93 cents on the dollar but we will give you 100 cents on the dollar. What is more we will pay you a cash bonus and a commission for converting the bonds which you yourselves hold and what is even more we will give you a new bond by which you will be assured an interest rate from 4½ per cent over the next 25 years involving not only this generation but the next generation of taxpayers."

If ever there was a case of "To him who hath shall be given and from him who hath not shall be taken even that which he hath" this is it. The people of Canada who held these victory bonds and who hated to have to sell them at a discount a few years ago are going to remember this sell-out of the welfare of the common people, of Canada on the part of the Conservative government. The Canadian people remember the slogans, "Ward off inflation," "help win the war," "be patriotic," "save your money and do not buy a car or a house or washing machine or frigidaire that you need so badly".

Had the government of the day told us of the sell-out that would take place once the war and the immediate post-war period was over the Canadian people would have hesitated before investing their money in victory bonds. The rise in the interest rate surely was not an effort the people of Canada expected this government would employ when it said it would relax the tight money policy of the former Liberal administration. If the Canadian people had had any inkling that the Tory government was going to relax the tight money policy by giving a 50 per cent raise in pay, as it were, to the money-lenders of Canada, I believe the election results would have been entirely different.

This represents a gift, a handout to the money-lenders of this country. In my view it speaks louder than any words of the Minister of Finance or of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) concerning where the allegiance of the Tory party lies. It lies today where it has always lain, with Bay street and with St. James street which in this case were able to finance a larger advertising campaign and put on a bigger show than the Liberal party was able to do and that is why the Tories are in office at the present time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is not a word of truth in that.

Mr. Regier: Is that all you have to say?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is all that rubbish deserves to have said about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister not going to reply?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

259. General administration, $4,089,027.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

383. Departmental administration, $282,666.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government leader what the business will be for tomorrow.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we intend to ask for interim supply and then take the resolution which is No. 23 on today's order paper, concerning a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make certain capital expenditures. I do not know if it will be possible but perhaps that could be put through all stages tomorrow. Then we will go on with the list of legislation which I mentioned last night.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader if he could tell us what will happen on the three remaining days of the week?

Mr. Green: After all the unkind things the hon. member for Laurier said about me in my capacity as house leader yesterday afternoon I am not at all certain whether it is wise to give him this information.

Mr. Chevrier: I thought I was extremely courteous in my references to you.

Mr. Green: I did not see that part of your address.

Mr. Chevrier: The only person of whom I was not courteous was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) but I am afraid I had reason to act that way.

Mr. Green: Oh, what you said to him does not matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It rolls right off.

Mr. Benidickson: He does not budge a bit.

Mr. Green: We may have to take some of the measures I have listed for tomorrow on Thursday if they do not go through but the plan is to take the estimates of the Department of Justice and of the Secretary of State and then the items coming under the description of legislation for which His Honour the Speaker is responsible.

On Friday we intend to take the estimates of the Department of National Defence and of Defence Production, both of which have been through the estimates committee. On Saturday we intend to take the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. If that is not telling the hon. member for Laurier the business of the house a long way ahead, I do not know what more I could do.

Mr. Chevrier: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that for the first time this session the house leader has projected his mind so far in advance that I am satisfied.

Mr. Fulton: What nonsense. You are dizzy.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader when we are going to reach item No. 2 on the order paper. I see no reason for it being delayed. I am sure there is unanimity in the house and I know that in a certain part of the country there is an interest in seeing it become law.

Mr. Green: We cannot take estimates on Monday or Tuesday without a special motion and we wish to avoid another foolish debate like the one we have had in these last two days. There will be legislation called on next Monday and Tuesday and I hope we can cover this particular item on one or the other of those days.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTION TO RECOMMIT BILL

Mr. Speaker: It may be appropriate at this time to deal with the point of order which was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam which, as hon. members will recall, was raised when the hon. member for Peterborough presented to the house the seventh report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

The point of order was to the effect that this report was not in accordance with the findings of the committee, and it was suggested by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that the Speaker should either declare the report out of order or recommit the matter to the committee. Since the point was raised yesterday I have considered the matter at some length, and have had the benefit of the assistance of the Clerk of the house.

The report of the committee was as follows:

Your committee has considered the following bill and has agreed to report it without amendment:

Bill No. S-6, an act respecting Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company.

This report was duly signed by the chairman as having been approved by the committee; moreover, it appears to meet every requirement of our practice in regard to content. It is suggested that on the face of it the report must be accepted as being in order.

The point of order is in effect an appeal to the house from a ruling of the chairman on a proceeding in a standing committee. The regularity of this course is open to question. The only known precedent in this regard arose in 1956 when the chairman of the standing committee on banking and commerce reported that his ruling had been appealed in the committee and he submitted the question to the judgment of the house. As recorded at page 6388 of Hansard for July 24, 1956, the then Speaker in part dealt with the question as follows:

I have to rule now that the appeal from the chairman's ruling should be settled in the committee on banking and commerce and not reported to this house.

Many hon. members who are here today will remember that incident. The Minister of Justice took part in the discussion and supported the view which the Speaker announced, as did a former member, Mr. Stanley Knowles, and as did Mr. Walter Harris and others. I think, in fact, all who spoke to the point of order were in agreement that the chairman's ruling in committee should not be brought to the house by way of appeal but should be settled in committee.

On the other hand, if the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam wishes to appeal to the Speaker rather than to the house it must be stated that there is no known precedent wherein the Speaker of the house has acted either as arbitrator or as judge in connection with the regularity of any proceedings in any committee of the house.

Without passing judgment on any proceedings in committee on this bill, I suggest that it would be dangerous to follow this point of order as a precedent and thus allow members to call into review any or all proceedings in standing and special committees. Such a course would inevitably involve numerous and interminable discussions which could seriously impair and impede the business of this house.

I find, therefore, that it would not be practicable for the Speaker, nor would it be competent for him, to review a ruling upon the regularity of a proceeding in a standing committee. This decision, of course, does not interfere with or deprive the house of its jurisdiction over its standing committees and their reports.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in view of your ruling and comments with respect to Bill No. S-6 which has just been dealt with, I think it will be quite in order for the house to deal with the question of recommitting the bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; and if I am in order in doing so at this time I should like to move that Bill No. S-6, in respect of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, be recommitted to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. The motion will be seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier).

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member draft his motion and submit it? While the hon. member is preparing this motion I should be glad to hear any hon. member who wishes to comment on the regularity of these proceedings. We are now engaged in routine proceedings under motions. The motion which is proposed by the hon. member for Skeena is one relating to a bill which has already been introduced into the house, and under standing order 41 notice of such a motion is not required.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): If I may say so at this juncture, I think perhaps it would be useful to the house if the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Peterborough, were to explain exactly what took place. I must say that although I am a member of the committee I was unfortunately not able to be present in the house yesterday because of other work, and while the hon. member did make a statement earlier it was a brief statement of the facts, and I think it would be useful if we were given a brief résumé of what has taken place.

Mr. Speaker: Without disagreeing with the hon. gentleman, I suggest that the regular course would be to accept the motion if it is in order, as it appears to me to be, after which, the motion being debatable, an explanation could be made before the house decides whether or not to recommit the bill to the committee.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): On the question of whether or not notice should be given of this motion, standing order No. 41 reads as follows:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

And so on. Does that not mean that in a case of this kind there should be notice given? It does seem only reasonable that notice should be given to hon. members of the intention to move a motion of this kind. After all, it is interfering with the ordinary business of the house, and it would seem unreasonable that a debate should be precipitated on a question of this sort without some notice being given.

Mr. Speaker: Does anyone else have a comment on rule 41?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, on this particular point of order, I believe what the minister has omitted is that if the house does not take action without the notice required under ordinary circumstances, the bill could very well reach the committee stage of the whole house and even third reading before those 48 hours had elapsed. Therefore I submit that Your Honour is perfectly right in thinking that the motion is proper at this time. Your Honour in your remarks previously indicated that it is up to the house to decide on what to do with actions that have taken place in a committee set up by the house.

Mr. Speaker: I have given some thought to this present matter because of the ruling which I made earlier today. I considered what control the house would have over the matter if it did wish to recommit the bill for any purpose, whether to correct an irregularity, or with instructions, or for any reason whatever. It seems to me in reading rule 41 that the motion would properly be made at this stage of the proceedings. Even though it is a debatable motion it is one of those motions about the routine business of the house which presumably would be disposed of quite expeditiously.

The rule itself requiring notice, standing order 41, as I read it, expressly excludes a notice of motion relating to bills after their introduction, or to private bills. It seems to me this is that kind of motion, and I am disposed to accept the motion and to put it to the house.

It has been moved by the hon. member for Skeena and seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam:

That Bill No. S-6, an act respecting Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, be recommitted to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to make a comment or two with respect to our reasons for moving this motion, and in explaining it make reference to some of the material which appears in the evidence and in the minutes of the committee of Tuesday, July 29, which incidentally were attached to the report of the committee of yesterday.

I would point out to the house first that our desire to deal with it in this fashion is merely in order that the committee may deal with the question in a regular manner.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order. If Your Honour says I should have raised it earlier I must accept your ruling, but I was pondering the matter. I wonder whether in accepting Your Honour's ruling that such a motion could be made without notice—the motion that is now before us—there is not still the additional question of the occasion on which it should be made. I raise the question as to whether it should be made when the bill is again being discussed in the committee of the whole house, at which time I suggest, in light of Your Honour's ruling, the hon. member could move the motion without notice.

I am wondering whether the hon. member by moving such a motion can bring forward a matter for consideration at a time when it would not normally be considered. As I understand it, bills of this nature are normally considered in the hour from five to six o'clock on Tuesday and Friday evenings. My suggestion is that the proper time and the only time the motion could be made would be when it comes up during the course of those hours.

In the light of Your Honour's ruling I accept the fact that a motion can be made without notice, but I think it could only be made at that stage, and that therefore it cannot be made here under motions, which would in effect mean that the bill was being dealt with at a time when it would not normally come before the house.

Mr. Speaker: There may be some force to what the hon. minister has just said. This is a novel matter, as far as I know; at least I recall no precedent at the moment for this sort of motion. I think it would be open to the house to appoint the time when the motion should be dealt with. If the house will allow me a minute I will consult the Clerk on the point just made.

Mr. Fulton: If I may be permitted to elaborate, my point is the normal proceedings and routines of the house should not be interrupted. They are appointed by the rules, and a definite time is set out at which bills of this nature come before the house. I submit that it is not, therefore, proper for a member to move at this stage a motion which would have the effect of interrupting or changing the normal procedure of the house, the normal routine of the house, when in fact he can raise it at the time the bill will be bound to come before the house again.

It is not as though he would lose his right to raise it if he does not raise it now. I am merely arguing that that is the proper time to do so; otherwise we find the routine business is interrupted and the normal business of the house is interrupted. I suggest that that is not normally permitted, and especially not permitted when the matter can be dealt with in the ordinary way at the ordinary time.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, may I have a word on the point of order that has been raised. The chairman of this committee has reported, and I think the hon. member for Kamloops will agree that in effect that report is a motion even though no formal motion is moved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Regier: Unless immediate action is taken in opposition to that motion, then on any following day the obvious ruling of the Chair would have to be that any objection to the acceptance of this report should have been made at the time the report was accepted by the Chair and in effect adopted by the house. Therefore I feel that this is the only time the hon. member for Skeena might have made this motion. Had he made it one day or several days later he would have been advised that this report had been accepted by the house, in that there was no contrary opinion or motion at the time.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I point out that the hon. member for Skeena has made a motion, and the very fact of that having been done avoids the eventuality which is worrying the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. In other words, this motion is before the house; therefore the house could not proceed to deal with the bill section by section while this motion is outstanding. I suggest that the proper time, the reasonable time, to have the motion of the hon. member for Skeena considered would be during the hour from five to six o'clock on Friday; otherwise the result will be that government business which has been set for today may be interfered with for the whole afternoon, and certainly the intention of the rules was that questions arising out of private bills should be considered during the time for private bills.

So long as no other proceeding can be taken in regard to this bill in the meantime, I suggest to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam his fears will be met if the motion which has been now moved by the hon. member for Skeena is put down for consideration on Friday from five to six o'clock.

Mr. Regier: So long as the motion is accepted.

Mr. Speaker: May I offer this for the consideration of the house. As the Minister of Justice says, it is a matter that would come up with the report of the committee, but this report does not have to be adopted by the house. Under standing order 20(1)(c) the reported bill is referred to committee of the whole in due course so there is no further motion with respect to this report other than the motion that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on this particular bill. This procedure would take place on a Tuesday or a Friday at the appropriate hour. It is not a debatable motion, and therefore could not be amended at that stage, so it would be impossible for the house to express the wish, if it wanted to do so, that this matter be recommitted to the standing committee. This is not, therefore, the answer to the problem which the hon. member who makes this motion wishes to raise.

It seems to me that if the motion were allowed to stand it would block consideration of the bill, when it came to committee in its turn, until some disposition was made of the motion. The appropriate thing, therefore, is to dispose of the motion now. I express my view that this is a procedural motion and, while it can be discussed, it certainly should not be discussed at any length. It should be resolved almost immediately, and in that way not interfere unduly with the business of the house. There are other motions that must necessarily interfere with the business of the house, as hon. members know. For example, there is a motion on privilege or for discussion of the privileges of the house. My best judgment is that this motion is in order and ought to be disposed of expeditiously.

Mr. Howard: It is certainly not my intention to delay the house for any length of time, but I think it would be worth while if I were to make a few brief explanations arising out of the evidence presented along with the report in order to give to the house the events which in our opinion make the passage of this motion a necessity.

I would point out that on page 231 of the evidence with respect to this bill, as taken on Tuesday, July 29, 1958, there appears the following:

> The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry? We will have a show of hands.

After the show of hands the clerk said:

> Six in favour, eight against.

He indicated that clause 1 had not carried. Subsequent to that there was some doubt in the minds of members as to just what it meant, and at a later meeting a point of order was raised with respect to it. I would point out, in addition, that there is an inconsistency between the transcribed proceedings which I have just read and the minutes of the committee. You will recall I read a portion showing that the chairman had asked if clause 1 would carry and calling for a show of hands. On the show of hands it was found there were six in favour and eight against. In the minutes of the committee we find the following:

> At one stage the chairman asked whether clause 1 carried. On a show of hands, the committee decided to continue the discussion.

Now I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the question posed by the chairman, as reported in the proceedings at page 231, was not, shall we have any further discussion; was not shall we consider this further, but was shall clause 1 carry. There is an inconsistency between the transcribed proceedings and the minutes themselves in that the proceedings show the chairman asking whether or not clause 1 shall carry and indicating the vote was in the negative by eight to six, whereas the minutes show that the committee decided to continue the discussion. This is another aspect of the matter that should be given consideration.

We appealed in what we thought was a reasonable fashion to the committee, stating that once the committee had taken a decision as indicated on page 231 of the proceedings not to carry clause 1, it should not then at a subsequent time have the right to reverse that decision. The committee should have reported to the house accordingly and asked that the bill be recommitted, as we are doing now in order that the proceedings may be regularized.

As you know, the committee cannot reverse its decision. I understood that in your ruling with respect to a point of order raised yesterday—I am not trying to put words in your mouth, sir, but merely giving my understanding of what you indicated—you indicated that the regularity of the proceedings in the committee was open to question, and that is just what we are attempting to do. We are merely attempting to regularize the proceedings of the committee so that the conduct of the committee in considering this particular bill will be in accordance with the rules.

I submit that while there are certainly other matters which could be raised, and while there may be some discussion later, the only thing the house can do now is pass this motion in order that the committee may deal with the bill in accordance with the rules.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Since the committee has absolutely nothing to hide, and has been trying to be as fair as possible with the members and the company which appeared before the committee, I may say I have no objection to this bill going back to the committee. I should like to say, though, that the hon. member for Skeena, after the show of hands had been taken, moved that the committee adjourn until the minutes had been printed so they could get further information. I have nothing to fear in the committee, and if it is the wish of the house the committee could meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

GEORGE P. LEBLANC—ALEX P. BOUDREAU

Question No. 33—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Were George P. LeBlanc and Alex P. Boudreau dismissed from the Cape Breton Highlands national park effective June 10, 1958?
2. How long had each of these employees been employed by the national park?
3. What was the reason for dismissal in each case?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder, in view of the fact the minister's estimates are called for this week, if it might be possible for him to furnish the answers to these questions before his estimates come up for consideration?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I will try, but I cannot promise to do so. I inquired about this matter two days ago, but they still had not all the information they needed.

Question stands.

CAUSEWAY CONSTRUCTION, ST. LAWRENCE RIVER-ILE DES SOEURS

Question No. 37—Mr. Cardin:

1. By what authority and under whose responsibility was a causeway built recently between the north shore of the St. Lawrence river and Ile des Soeurs (Ile St. Paul), Verdun?
2. What was the cost of the said causeway and who defrayed the expenditure therefor?
3. For what purpose was the said causeway built?
4. Having regard to the site and to the construction of this causeway, what steps have been taken to avoid the worsening of the water pollution problem and of increasing the risks of flood due to ice drift in the city of Verdun and surrounding municipalities?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): In reply to part one, I may say that the authority for the construction of the causeway and bridge, now to be known as Champlain bridge, was contained in Appropriation Act No. 6, 1956, such act providing that the work was to be under the jurisdiction, management and control of the national harbours board.

In respect of part two, a unit price contract, in the approximate amount of $273,500, has been let by the national harbours board.

Part three pertains to the purpose of the causeway. Its construction was made necessary to assist in the construction of the new bridge from Nuns' island to the south shore and in the construction of the bridge piers between Nuns' island and the city of Montreal. When it has served its temporary purpose the material will be used as permanent fill for certain portions of the bridge.

In reply to part four, I might add that large diameter pipes have been inserted so that a sufficient quantity of water will always flow and thus prevent water pollution above the causeway. The design of the causeway and the pipe installations were approved by the health authorities of the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. The top of the causeway is at elevation 40 feet, and since ice always forms above this elevation the causeway should have no effect on ice drift.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED UN SPECIAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Having regard to the fact that the security council of the United Nations, of which Canada is a member, is meeting tomorrow to discuss this matter, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would give us the views of the government on the proposal to hold a special assembly of the United Nations on the Middle East as an alternative, apparently, to the small, informal, confidential summit meeting under United Nations auspices which we had hoped for and which we on this side of the house think would have been a more constructive procedure at this time for practical consideration of this important question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as the government is concerned the attitude has been clearly set forth, that we felt there should be a meeting of the security council and that following opening statements on the part of members of the security council there should then be a meeting in private of the four or five powers concerned under the chairmanship or with the assistance of the secretary general.

That attitude we pressed for throughout and it received as I saw it, during the course of the recent debate on external affairs, the general approval of the house. However, Mr. Khrushchev has not fallen in line with the generally accepted view of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. In view of the reported acceptance by the United Kingdom and the United States of the suggestion now made by Mr. Khrushchev it is apparent that this will be accepted as the alternative to that which was generally acceptable up until two or three days ago by the nations in question. That being so, we can only hope that the assembly will be able to deal with the question. The first of the inscribed resolutions is that by the United States. The second will be that of the U.S.S.R. In view of the fact that the matter will be discussed in the security council, I do not think I should go further at this time to indicate what technique would be acceptable, except to say that all of us have a desire to attain that medium of discussion in the United Nations which will diminish the tensions existent in the Middle East. The United States had already asked for a special session, and now that has been re-emphasized in the Khrushchev letter. It is an alternative—and apparently the one that is going to be generally accepted—and while we would have liked to be able to secure a security council meeting, the security council being seized of this question, we feel that any discussion in that direction at this time would be purely theoretical and would be of no practical reality.

Mr. Pearson: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister confirm or otherwise, if he thinks it proper to do so, that the United States government had preferred a full and public meeting of the security council on this matter and did not favour a small, confidential meeting of certain members of the security council?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman, with his experience, will realize that discussions that have taken place in that direction should not be revealed. The very fact that the hon. gentleman was fair enough to couch his question in the manner he did indicates that is the answer he would have expected.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry to pursue this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I have one further supplementary question. I wonder whether the Prime Minister himself proposes to attend this special assembly session when it is held.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Until the question has been determined, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to engage in hypothetical considerations in that regard. The matter will immediately receive attention when the decision is reached.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REFERENCE TO TELEVISION PROGRAM "DEATH WEARS MANY FACES"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, as he is the minister responsible for the C.B.C. Has the minister had complaints regarding a television program entitled "Death Wears Many Faces" which was broadcast on the C.B.C. television network on the evening of July 30? I have had many telephone calls and letters complaining about this program, and I am transmitting one of the letters I received to the minister. I will just read a few words and not take up the time of the house by reading it all.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is seeking information. He asked this question. I think he should leave it at that.

Mr. Gour: I want the minister to know that my people have complained about this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may send the letter over to the minister if he wants to do so, but I cannot allow him to read it.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any letters which I have received in connection with that particular program. It is possible that I have received some. As a matter of fact I get scores of letters about C.B.C. programs, commending some and criticizing others. It has been my practice to send them all over to the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for their attention. I will check my files, will also check with the C.B.C., and will answer the hon. member within a day or two or probably not until the first of next week, because I will not be in the house.

Mr. Gour: I thank the minister, and I will send him over the letter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REPORTED SALE OF VESSELS TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The press this morning carried a report to the effect that the Canadian National Steamships have disposed of or are considering the disposal of their ships to Cuba. Recently we received a report that they were being sold to Panama. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to bring us up to date and tell us whether or not the ships have been sold, and what is the present position?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The management of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships have received a number of proposals dealing with the sale of the ships. They have been considered. I expect that this matter will be concluded shortly.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is now in a position to table the report of Dr. Clark with regard to the investigation of the old age and survivors system in the United States?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister be able to table that report so it can be discussed in this house before the conclusion of the session?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am unable to state definitely, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not the report will be tabled before the end of the session. I can only repeat what I have said on previous occasions when the same question has been asked. The report is progressing very favourably.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister asked Dr. Clark whether or not he could present his report to the minister and consequently to the house at a time which would permit discussion in this house, and also give the government an opportunity to formulate its policies in accordance with the assurance given to the people of Canada.

Mr. Green: When are you going away?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It was intimated to Dr. Clark, Mr. Speaker, that the report is requested as soon as possible.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Could the minister tell the house why the report has been so long delayed beyond the four months' time of inquiry stated in this house earlier by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have already answered that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the answer?

(Translation):

COAL

DOMINION COAL COMPANY SURPLUS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister tell the house when we may expect him to table the documents concerning the agreement entered into some time ago by the federal government and the Dominion Coal Company about surplus coal stockpiled during the year?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) for having given me notice of his question. My answer is that the information requested will be conveyed to the house in a few days.

(Text):

ROYAL VISIT

REPORTED VISIT OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN IN 1959

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister any comment to make on the report appearing in the press yesterday that plans are under way for the visit of Her Majesty the Queen to Canada next year?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that when Her Majesty spoke on television last October she expressed the hope that she would be present at the opening of the St. Lawrence waterway in 1959, and she said at that time she hoped to include in the discharge of that responsibility provision for a visit which would permit her to travel more widely across the country.

The government is about to set up a special committee to look after the arrangements, but no itinerary in that regard has been submitted to Her Majesty and, at her request, none will be submitted to her before October next. I am therefore not in a position to say any more in regard to the press report except that there is the expectation that she will be here for the opening of the St. Lawrence waterway. I know that Canadians as a whole will look forward with loyal anticipation not only to her visit on this historic occasion but also to her presence in other parts of Canada. We all express the hope that she will be able to make an extensive visit when she is here in connection with the opening of the waterway.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure all members of the house and indeed all Canadians will welcome the news which the Prime Minister has been good enough to give us, that the expectations are that Her Majesty and the Duke of Edinburgh will visit Canada next year to open the St. Lawrence seaway. I might perhaps say that this invitation was initiated by my predecessor, Mr. St. Laurent. I am sure that when Her Majesty and the Duke of Edinburgh arrive in Canada they will receive the same kind of warm welcome which they have received in the past and which Her Majesty's sister is now receiving during her visit to this country.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—STATEMENT ON REPORT ON DEATHS AT GARRY LAKE, N.W.T.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mackenzie River yesterday asked a question concerning some Eskimos, and in reply at that time I said I would be able to give him some sort of answer which would be more or less official today. I now wish to advise the hon. member that the official report has been received by the department and that the deaths of the 14 Eskimos at Garry Lake during the past winter resulted from starvation and exposure.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wonder if the minister could tell us whether or not the official report is the coroner's inquest report, or does it consist of an autopsy report?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This official report is an autopsy report, and there were 14 Eskimos involved.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder if the minister could table the autopsy report?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): At the moment I see no objection to so doing.

Mr. Hardie: Has there been an inquest into these deaths?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Not of the usual character.

Mr. Hardie: Not of what?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There was an investigation but not the usual coroner's investigation such as we have in the provinces.

FINANCE

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"—COMMENT BY MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I apologize for not having given him notice, but I am sure members of the house want to know as soon as possible the date of a certain anticipated historic event. At page 3104 of Hansard for yesterday the minister is reported as having indicated to the house that we would hear from him on "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958". Could he inform the house when we can anticipate that oratorical treat?

Mr. Speaker: I have never heard hon. members asked on the orders of the day when they proposed to speak and I doubt that this is a regular question.

Mr. Fulton: How could he anticipate an event which is described as historic?

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPORTATION AND STOCKPILING OF PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it true that 50,000 tons of 24-inch pipe is being imported and stockpiled north of Toronto for projects not yet ready to proceed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. The answer is that a small tonnage of large diameter pipe, including some 24-inch pipe, is now being delivered to Toronto in fulfilment of a contract entered into two years ago with suppliers in the United Kingdom.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Several weeks ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced that he would shortly be paying a visit to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation section of the pipe line. I assume he has made that visit, and I wonder if he could give us a report on the general progress in connection with labour conditions along that line?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to visit that line on Monday and Tuesday of this week, but other commitments prevented me from doing so.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $615,999,671.59 being the aggregate of

(a) one-sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959 laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament except items 200, 362, 409 and 513 for which the proportion is one-twelfth and items 106, 108, 111, 439, 443 and 502 for which no proportion is granted hereby;

(b) five-twelfths of the total of the amounts of items 76, 268 and 296 of the said estimates;

(c) one-quarter of the total amounts of items 94, 216, 359 and 497 of the said estimates;

(d) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 139, 161, 182, 185, 186, 197, 198, 199, 201, 203, 207, 211, 212, 270 and 394 of the said estimates;

(e) one-sixth of the total of the amounts of items set forth in the supplementary estimates of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959 as laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except items 545, 546, 547 and 627;

(f) one-sixth of the total of the amounts of items 635 and 654 set forth in the said supplementary estimates, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959.

He said: Mr. Chairman, this is the third of the motions for interim supply during the present session. On the first motion, the committee provided supply for the months of April and May. On the second appropriation it provided supply for June and July. Supply is now about to be exhausted, and the committee is now being asked to approve a resolution which will provide the requirements of supply for the months of August and September, the ordinary two months' vote of supply.

Interim Supply

The simple fraction that is applied with respect to nearly all the items in the estimates —and there are over 650 of those items in the estimates and supplementary estimates— is two-twelfths. As to a few items, however, and they are the ones that are specifically designated in the resolution which you, Mr. Chairman, have read, there are special circumstances and an additional appropriation is being asked. The work involved in these items is of a special nature; in practically every case it is summer work and, accordingly, a larger than proportional vote is now required than is the case with respect to those items which permit of expenditures being spread evenly throughout the 12 months of the fiscal year.

In no case is the committee asked to approve any proportion in excess of eleven-twelfths of the item, and accordingly the committee retains its full opportunity to discuss any item. In this respect I give the usual undertaking that the passing of this resolution and the bill to follow will not prejudice the rights and the privileges of hon. members to criticize any item of the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee of supply, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights will be respected and will not be restricted or curtailed in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate those items which go up to eleven-twelfths?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That, I think, is obvious. I gave the hon. gentleman a copy of the details of the proposed vote yesterday. If he will look at clause (a) of the resolution he will see that we are not asking for any additional vote of items 106, 108, 111, 439, 443 and 502 because the committee has already provided eleven-twelfths of those votes. In the case of items 200, 362, 409 and 513 the house has already provided ten-twelfths, and in respect to these four items we are asking only one-twelfth instead of two-twelfths of the vote.

In clause (b) of the resolution we are asking in respect of items 76, 268 and 296 for five-twelfths of the vote which would bring those items up in each case to eleven-twelfths. The three-twelfths which we are asking in clause (c) will bring item 94 up to the proportion of eleven-twelfths.

Then further with respect to clause (e) in reference to the supplementary estimates, we already have eleven-twelfths of items 545, 546, 547 and 627 and accordingly no additional vote is asked with respect to those items.

Those are the items, complete, Mr. Chairman, with respect to which the committee will if the present resolution and bill are carried have voted eleven-twelfths of the item.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, on a motion of supply such as this it is my understanding that we can deal with almost any matter arising from the general estimates, which leads me to a subject which certainly is due for a little more scrutiny than it has received up to date.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member would permit me, I should like to raise a point and appeal to him. I have given an undertaking that the passing of this resolution and the bill to follow will not curtail the right of any hon. member to raise any matter that is pertinent to any item when the estimates come before the committee of supply. The purpose of giving that undertaking is to avoid duplication of debate. If it were to become the practice of the house to indulge in extended discussion of any subject on these motions for interim supply we would simply be duplicating the function of motions to resolve the house into committee of supply, or the work of the committee of supply on the items of the estimates. For many years it has been the practice of this house to pay attention to the undertaking which is given, and which I have again given today, and in that way to avoid duplication of debate.

If all hon. members chose, on motions for interim supply, to discuss any matter which occurred to them it would be impossible to obtain a vote of interim supply. We are on the point of running out of money, and we need this interim supply. I may say also that the next matter before the committee today is likewise a very urgent matter. Approval of the next measure is very urgently required, for the very same reason, with respect to Canadian National Railways. Therefore, I appeal to the hon. member, without asking him to curtail any of his rights as a member of this committee, to make his observations, whatever they may be, on the relative item of the estimates in committee of supply.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask a question at this point? Did the Minister of Finance give the usual undertaking?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh yes. Very clearly.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Further to the remarks of the Minister of Finance, I was one of the many millions of Canadians who heard all about the rights of parliament and how they were guaranteed; and we had an excellent example last Monday of just how they are guaranteed. On that basis I think the fact that the government wants to preclude even one speech from being made at this stage is just a further example of the spirit shown here last Monday.

The point I should like to deal with is one that is of urgent importance to this country at the present time. That it is a matter of particular interest is evident by reading newspapers from coast to coast, both daily and weekly newspapers, which have devoted parts of their editorial pages and news pages to discussing the subject. I am referring, of course, to the unprecedented bond deal we have seen in recent weeks.

I should like first of all to refer to an editorial taken from the Fundy Fisherman of Wednesday July 20, 1958 which devotes a lengthy editorial to this important subject. It is entitled, "Costly, Unnecessary and Unwise" and I should like to read the first paragraph of this editorial:

> The large debt refunding plan, amounting to around six and one-half billions of dollars, which has been placed before the people of Canada and is now being carried out by the federal government, should be examined most carefully by all citizens of the country. The terrific cost of this colossal refunding scheme is going to be felt by every man, woman and child throughout Canada. Not only will this cost be felt at the present time, but for the next generation to come.

Mr. Pallett: Are you opposed to municipalities getting money?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, one of the most significant things about this plan is that it is going to be of benefit to very few but it will represent a cost to very many. I wonder if that is what the Minister of Finance wants. It is generally agreed across the country that the bonds to be converted are held by very few, in fact by as little as 10 per cent of our population. They are going to benefit to the extent of 50 per cent. But who is going to pay? Any person who suggests that this is a "something for nothing" deal is nothing short of a false prophet. There is nothing for nothing in this country. Whatever you get someone has to pay for. If you do not pay it someone else does. If it does not cost you anything it costs someone else double before you reap any benefit. The common ordinary individual in this country, the man on the street referred to by this editorial, at the present time holds about 10 per cent of the bonds that are about to be reconverted based on the best estimates the authors could obtain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Poppycock; that is utter poppycock.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I see that the Minister of Finance is making the same contribution today that he made last night.

I should like to quote a few shining examples of his contribution to the debate last evening. At page 3136 of yesterday's Hansard the Minister of Finance interjected in the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam:

That is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are out of order.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I continue:

Why not inform yourself of the facts and stick to the truth?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Surely we can have some adherence to the rules of order. The hon. member is clearly out of order. There was discussion of this matter last night on another motion entirely. That motion was carried and the matter that was raised as a grievance and the discussion of it ended. Now the hon. member is treating this matter today as though it were a continuation of yesterday's discussion. Today we have an entirely new item of business. Surely it is not to be treated as a continuation of a debate that occurred yesterday on an entirely different matter. In my submission the hon. member is completely out of order.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, may I say a word on the minister's point of order. I made no reference to his remarks yesterday until such time as he made an interjection today similar to that which he made last night. It was the minister who gave rise to that aspect of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, how silly can you be?

The Deputy Chairman: It is quite true that a matter that has been before the house and disposed of cannot be brought up again.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Surely we have not reached the point that this kind of attitude should be taken. The Minister of Finance has raised a point of order which to my mind, and with respect to you, is completely erroneous. On a matter in which supply is being discussed and we are being called upon to vote interim supply surely the hon. member can discuss a matter concerning bond conversion. I respectfully suggest he is in order.

The Deputy Chairman: I was referring to the hon. member for Timmins referring to what the minister said yesterday and I was not referring to what he is discussing now. That in my mind is quite in order except that he should not be reading what was said last night in the debate. That is the point to which I was referring.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry if I misunderstood you.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I shall be very glad to abide by your ruling. I should like to refer again to the editorial in the Fundy Fisherman with respect to the question as to who owns the other 90 per cent of these bonds. The editorial poses the same question and answers it in this fashion:

It is estimated, and quite rightly we believe, that around 90 per cent are owned by insurance companies, chartered banks, trust companies, non-financial companies, savings banks, corporations and other loan companies, co-operative groups, etc.

Whether or not it was the intention to do so the fact is that to a certain extent we are penalizing 90 per cent of the people in this country for the extreme benefit of the other 10 per cent. The question that arises in my mind, of course, is why are we doing this? It seems to me that this 10 per cent of the population was quite happy with the previous rate of interest. Otherwise I do not see why those people should have acquired the bonds. If they were not satisfied with the 3 per cent previously paid why did they collect these bonds?

An hon. Member: There was a war on.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I heard an hon. member interject that there was a war on. I should like to remind the hon. member that the war has been over for approximately 12 or 13 years. As was pointed out on another occasion the majority of people who bought these bonds to help the war effort have since unfortunately been forced to let them go at a loss in order to make necessary purchases or investments. As I said, 90 per cent of the people of this country will receive no benefit from this conversion deal. It will mean for them nothing but an additional cost to the present costs they have. It is estimated that this additional cost will amount to nothing less than $1 million per week.

Another point that should be given close scrutiny is that no opportunity was provided to this parliament to discuss this proposed conversion deal despite the fact that perhaps two or more weeks ago prior to the announcement of the proposal the Minister of Finance had ample opportunity to take the house into his confidence with respect to the proposed plan affecting these bonds. Added to that is the fact that we have unfortunately seen demonstrated on too many occasions how extremely thin skinned the Minister of Finance is and it puts one in mind of the old story we used to read in books about the Middle East to the effect that Allah was the true Lord and Mohammed was his prophet. In this case it would appear that John is the true Lord and Donald is his prophet and no one must question either one of them.

I have another question I should like to have answered. What is going to be the effect of this deal this autumn when the regular sale of savings bonds goes into effect? Is the public to be expected to go along for the same deal they got last year or will they expect a better deal like this conversion bond proposal? I personally believe that the public, and perhaps with some justification, will expect a much better deal in the light of these recent events but the question is, will they get it?

Another matter that arises is this. How will this affect provincial debt and financing? On March 31 last it was estimated that the direct and indirect debt of provincial governments was $4,638,327,000. A one and one-half per cent rise in interest rates would mean an additional cost of $70 million a year. How is this new deal of a 50 per cent increase in interest rates going to affect provincial debts? How will it affect other matters? For example, how will it affect the financing of the South Saskatchewan dam, that project which we hope now is going to reach completion and which we have waited for with bated breath for so many years in the past? How is it going to affect the balance of the St. Lawrence seaway project? How is it going to affect present and future operations of the Canadian National Railways? How is it going to affect the educational program, which members from all sides of this house have agreed we must expand and stimulate in the years to come? How is it going to affect the hospital building projects which the various provincial hospitalization plans are going to bring about over the next few years? How indeed is it going to affect the small business program which, as the government has expressed, is even of interest to this group? They have expressed their amazement and surprise that it is of interest to this group. On many occasions this government has expressed their friendship, interest and concern for the small businessman. How is this project going to affect small businesses?

Another matter that causes me some surprise, Mr. Chairman, particularly in view of the program outlined in the last election, is that the Liberal party has not shown some interest in this matter.

Mr. McIlraith: They have shown very great concern.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): In the last campaign they advocated that one of the best ways to stimulate business was to cut taxes. I am sure all hon. members realize that this particular project is going to increase taxes in the long run. It can have no other effect. Our taxes are going to be very seriously affected both by the record deficit of our government this year and the bond issue which is going to raise costs by another enormous amount. It is confined not only to the federal field. The federal base rate of interest is the base rate for the country, and all other operations will rise accordingly and probably to the same extent at least. It is going to affect provincial borrowings and municipal borrowings and through them it is going to affect rentals. It is going to affect the cost of groceries and our cost of living. The result is that the taxpayers and particularly the 90 per cent who are not going to benefit—possibly the 10 per cent can afford to meet those added costs—will find their costs rising. What about the 90 per cent who are not going to benefit in any way from this? They are going to be caught three ways. First, they are going to be caught by the 50 per cent increase in the federal field. Then, they will be caught at the provincial level and at the municipal level and then through their rent and groceries and all down the line.

Above all, Mr. Chairman, there is one question that has not yet been answered and I think it needs to be answered and that is, what was the need for this? We can understand the need for the $1.8 billion that was needed to refinance the bonds coming due this year. We can understand that and in fact we can commend the fact that it is to be on a 25-year basis and it will act as a deterrent to inflation; but that does not apply to the total of $6.4 billion. The only reason that we can see for that large conversion at the present time is that there must be some terrific pressure some place that forced such an unusual measure in the period of two weeks from the time that the Minister of Finance presented his budget in this house and the time that he made his unprecedented announcement.

There is another aspect also that is going to affect this country considerably. How is this going to affect the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar? At the present time the Canadian dollar is at quite a premium over the United States dollar and it is, to put it mildly, possibly a mixed blessing. It may benefit certain sections of our country but in the main I think the majority of the people of this country feel that it is possibly as much a curse as it is a blessing. In the same editorial of the Fundy Fisherman this very point is dealt with, and I should like to quote the following extract:

However, as long as these usurious rates exist in Canada we shall continue to mortgage our birthright outside our country. Again, when American money is borrowed in this way it has to be converted into Canadian funds, which greatly increase the demand for the latter. This continues to raise the price of Canadian money in comparison with the value of American money and, of course, places an obnoxious heavy tax upon exporters at a time when exporters should be encouraged—for imports have to be paid by exports and, at present, our imports far exceed our exports.

There is another matter on which I should like an answer from the minister. I wonder whether there is any guarantee? Is the government in any way assuring that notices are sent to all bondholders? I am sure it is not too difficult to send notices to the 10 per cent of the people who hold 90 per cent of the bonds, but what about the other 10 per cent? I realize that the government has embarked upon a terrifically expensive advertising campaign to convert those bonds. Whether that is necessary or not I do not know. I sometimes think, Mr. Chairman, it might be far cheaper if individual notices were sent to those 10 per cent of the people—

Mr. Cathers: They are unknown.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I think it could be done at far less cost than the costs that we seem to be incurring in full-page advertisements across the country, and so on.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I think I can do no better than to read from the last paragraph of the same editorial to which I referred on two or three occasions. It reads:

> We have the resources, which are the foundation of prosperity, but a faulty monetary policy that is not constructive, can and will be destructive to our national and individual well being.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we have had considerable discussion on this matter of the conversion of our bonds and we have heard many charges and very little reply by the minister to those charges. I think his remarks on this subject in previous debates and in the present debate have held in contempt the Canadian people and I suggest that if the Minister of Finance wishes to make no reply to those charges he should resign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regier: It is important enough.

Mr. Peters: It might happen in other countries; I am not expecting it to happen here. I make the suggestion that I think the situation warrants it.

Certain elements of the Canadian public have been very impressed and very happy about this matter of the conversion. It has been generally understood that it is going to cost the Canadian people over a period of years a great many billions of dollars in added interest charges, which the people are going to have to pay, and you and I, the taxpayers of Canada, are certainly not going to be happy about the situation.

An article which gives an indication that the Tory party has again become the Tory party, something which it has not been for six or eight months, appeared in the Leader-Post of July 15, just after this conversion was announced.

Mr. Hanbidge: Where is that published?

Mr. Peters: The article is written by the Canadian Press business editor. The first sentence is as follows:

> Investment houses gave a roaring welcome to the government's announcement of a mammoth $6,400,000,000 refunding operation.

Certainly, they should. The majority of these bonds is held by very few people.

Mr. Pallett: You should read the whole article, not just part of it.

Mr. Peters: I am only referring to part of it. If the hon. member wishes to read the rest of it, I suggest he take part in this debate. There is considerably more here. This may be an opportunity for the hon. member to speak for the first time during this session.

As I say, for many years Bay street and St. James street have dictated the financial policy of Canada, and those people will be very happy about this conversion. When I say the minister is irresponsible, I am referring to the fact that less than $2 billion in bond conversion would have met the situation with which the minister was faced. I agree that some conversion was necessary at the present time, but there was no need to ask all these bondholders to convert their bonds. Some of them did buy victory bonds because they were asked to do so for patriotic reasons. They have not changed their minds. They agreed to lend that money for that length of time at that rate of interest. I submit that they are not the people who are interested in this conversion. Most of them have already converted their bonds and they were forced to sell them to banks and lending institutions for $92 or $93. They seldom got $100.

This conversion has interfered with the whole structure of the interest rate, and completely upset the law of supply and demand which, in the past, this government has said they were interested in maintaining. If they were only interested in maintaining the interest rate, then they could have converted only these $2 billion instead of the $6.5 billion that they have put up for conversion.

In my opinion, this will have a great effect on resource development in Canada. Why should someone who is looking for an investment put his money into resource development when he can put it into government bonds which will now carry a fairly high rate of interest? In my opinion, this is going to eliminate a considerable amount of the expansion capital that we have received from some of these people in the past. They will now buy long-term government bonds.

Another aspect of the matter upon which this conversion will have an effect is municipal financing. It has been said in this house that the conversion will not interfere with provincial or municipal financing, but that does not appear to be the fact. I have an article here and I venture to say that the situation outlined in it will be repeated thousands and thousands of times in municipalities across this country when they try to raise money. This article is from the Port Alberni newspaper, the Twin Cities Times, of Wednesday, July 18. It is under the heading "Council Accepts Bid for Municipal Bonds."

> The announcement Monday in Ottawa of the government's new bond conversion plan has affected the price this city will obtain for its municipal building debentures. Monday night council accepted the bid of Ames & Company Limited of 98.67 per hundred for $150,000 debenture issue. The tender was received in a wire amending a previous bid of $99.138.

This is a change in the offering from something like $99.138, which was the original bid, to $98½. This occurred within a day following the announcement of the conversion. We find that municipal institutions are already in trouble with their debentures because of the government announcement. The article goes on to say:

> City clerk H. D. Thain translated the amendment as a result of the policy set up in Ottawa.

These municipal building bonds carry an interest rate of 5.5 per cent and mature over a 20-year period. Here is a municipal council which within one day of the announcement of the conversion is faced with a problem in connection with its debentures, debentures which bear 5.5 per cent interest and are for a 20-year period. They rightly lay the trouble on the doorstep of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) because of the increase in interest rates which has resulted from this conversion. Why should any investment organization put their money into other investments when they can buy government bonds? I feel this is going to have an adverse effect on municipal finances.

We only have to look at some of the municipalities on the outskirts of the city of Ottawa to realize that prior to this election they were in difficulty in trying to raise any type of municipal debenture. One of these municipalities is in very straitened financial circumstances at the moment. As a result of this conversion, many of these municipalities will have to pay at least one more per cent in interest rates. If the government was going to make this change, why did the Minister of Finance not say so when he was campaigning throughout the country? Why did he not say that we were going to raise the interest rate on our bonds, or that we were going to convert them on this large scale? This was not done, although it must have been in his mind, because the Canadian people would not have accepted it. The Minister of Finance, therefore, has not the same respect from the people that he had when he was campaigning before this matter came up.

I suggest this situation illustrates the need for the establishment in Canada of a national investment board. The time must have arrived by now when the Canadian people should not depend on Bay street and St. James street to decide what interest rates are going to be. On a number of occasions we have seen the Canadian people buy government bonds for various purposes. They have always done that. They did it during the war, and they did not need any full-page advertisements in all the newspapers across the country to urge them to do so. These advertisements must be costing anywhere from $50 to $50,000. I think that rather than be driven into these investments by pressure, by advertisements, we should set up a board which will decide where our investments need to be made, and the type of investment for which money is available. We should not be governed by stock manipulations and by other transactions that take place on Bay street or St. James street. We should not be guided by these things in our financial program. I think, therefore, the Minister of Finance has lost touch with the Canadian people and now is the time for a new Minister of Finance. I strongly suggest it.

Mr. Howard: I just want to deal with this question that has been raised as it relates probably more particularly to the province of British Columbia and more generally to provincial governments as a whole across the nation and to the effect that it will have on projects of those governments and on projects planned by various municipal governments. I do not think there is any doubt—nor can the minister dispel that doubt regardless of how he many express himself—that this will have no other effect on the interest rates of municipalities and provinces who wish to borrow money for much needed public works projects than to increase those interest rates. We all know that maybe one per cent or one and a half per cent, the figure itself, may look rather small and may not mean very much; but over a long term period of 20 years or 25 years one per cent or one and a half per cent means a terrific additional burden on the taxpayers in those provinces and municipalities when it comes to retiring that debt and paying the interest on it. I am sure that with this increased interest rate on borrowings that provincial governments and municipalities will have to undertake—unless of course the federal government is willing to step into the field of providing a revolving fund for such projects at decent interest rates—if municipalities and provinces step into them as they had intended to do, based on projects that have been on their books for some time, it will mean an additional burden. Either that, or in the light of the increased burden that it will mean to these provinces and municipalities, in the light of the extra money they will have to find to retire the debt and to pay vastly increased interest rates, they will curtail some of the projects they had in mind. This government should know, if it does not, that any curtailment on the part of provincial governments and municipalities at this time in the field of public works will not do our economy any good. The federal government should realize that fact if they do not.

I take just one instance as an example, that of the Columbia river development project which would mean so much to the province of British Columbia in terms of low-cost hydro electric energy. A conservative estimate—and I say that with a small "c"—puts the cost of this project somewhere in the neighbourhood of $300 million and well worth it, I believe, if we will enter into that project and develop it as a public power project. But a one and a half per cent increase in interest on it will mean no less than an additional—and I emphasize the word "additional"—$4½ million per year in interest rates which is the burden which will have to be borne by the taxpayers out there in British Columbia.

The Minister of Finance may know that we in British Columbia have not quite reached the stage where we can afford to have a full time minister of finance. We have one who couples his duties with those of the premier. That person, well known I am sure to the Minister of Finance here, has been travelling in many parts of British Columbia recently complaining most bitterly about this bond conversion program of the federal government.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you agree with Bennett?

Mr. Howard: About his complaints, and the attitude of this federal government?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes.

Mr. Howard: Yes; I do. This is one of the very few things I agree with him about. I will tell you something that our provincial government does that I do not agree with and I am sure this government does not agree with. In the process of the part time minister of finance that we have there travelling through the province complaining about this question or the effect this bond conversion program will have on the affairs of the province and relating the structure of that province's debt to the people of British Columbia he is not giving a correct picture. We know that Premier Bennett in his capacity of minister of finance is a great artist at juggling books, at keeping two sets of books in order to be able to present a fairly rosy picture to the general public there. From the attitude or approach of the present Minister of Finance for Canada I think he is probably taking lessons from finance minister Bennett in juggling books and in not giving to the general public a true account of the effect this bond conversion program or victory loan conversion program will have on the future economy of this country.

In British Columbia we are supposed to be able to retire all our debt completely within the next two years so that we shall be a debt-free province. Of course all of us who are from British Columbia know that that is not the truth. We know the approach of keeping two sets of books by our provincial government. We hope that this federal government is not going to enter into that sort of an arrangement in an effort to hide the true picture from the people of Canada. The dominion bureau of statistics of this government of Canada establishes the correct picture to the general public so far as the debt of the provinces are concerned and that we have two kinds of debt. We have a direct debt and we have an indirect debt. Regardless of how much some people may try to say that the indirect debt does not count and is not a true reflection of the indebtedness of the province, I submit that the situation is no different than that within a family if the wife goes to the store and buys a refrigerator on time, charges up as an indebtedness to that store may be $200 or $300 for the balance of payments on the refrigerator and then for the husband to turn around and say, "Oh, that is an indirect debt; I am not responsible for it". We all know full well who is going to pay for that refrigerator just as we all know of this indebtedness that is kept on separate sets of books, who is going to pay for that. British Columbia's direct and indirect debt totals more than $450 million at this time. That is a terrific indebtedness for one province to carry.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, that you are looking at me occasionally and wondering whether I am not wandering far afield in dealing with that question of debt by the province of British Columbia. But I submit that I must do that in order to draw the relationship between the effect that this bond conversion program of the federal government will have on the province of British Columbia and on the bond projects that they had in mind. I submit that I must establish the complete and true picture of the total debt of that province in order to compare and to relate what the effect will be if we proceed and attempt to borrow money on the market inasmuch as we are already heavily in debt. That is all I am attempting to do in establishing that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was going to ask the hon. member whether the premier of British Columbia did not say the day before yesterday that next year he expected that his public debt would be paid off.

Mr. Howard: Far be it for me to try to explain what the premier of British Columbia means, but that is precisely the point I am making. We have two types of debt. We have the debt kept on one set of books which is classified by the premier of that province as direct debt. Then we have debt on the other set of books which he classifies as indirect debt. The reference to retiring the debt relates only to one small amount in one set of books which is indicated in the dominion bureau of statistics publication entitled, "Financial Statistics of Provincial Governments for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958,, funded debt, direct and indirect." It is indicated in that publication the difference in British Columbia between the direct debt and the indirect debt and shows that the direct net funded debt after deducting the sinking fund amounts is $86,482,000 and that the indirect funded debt, after deducting sinking fund amounts is a total of $382,161,000. I submit that Premier Bennett's comments as they related to retiring the debt completely applied only to that portion which is classified as direct debt and did not apply to this second set of books that he keeps out there.

We then have in British Columbia a province heavily in debt to begin with, a province which I think has hopes of expanding into public works projects, a province which will have to borrow additional money for those projects and will set them up on the second set of books so that the general public does not really know what is going on. However, the people who lend them the money, the finance houses and bond dealers, know what is the debt position so far as British Columbia is concerned and they also know the ability of the people of that province to pay. Looking at the tremendous debt we have at the present time in that province, direct and indirect, and comparing it with the added interest rate which will occur out of this bond conversion program, the province and the municipalities of that province are going to have a great deal of difficulty in borrowing the money they need in order to proceed with the projects they have had on their books for some time.

A 1½ per cent increase in the interest rate, which is a very, very conservative estimate, will mean an additional $7 million per year in interest rates to that province and I submit that to be entering into this program will be placing an additional tax burden on the people. There are, of course, other ways of dealing with the finances of this nation but I am sure my friend the Minister of Finance will want to consider only the tried and true methods of his party and of the previous government and will not wish to get into other methods of dealing with the finances of Canada but will do nothing but lay an additional tax burden upon our people.

An hon. Member: We have heard all that before.

Mr. Howard: Yes, you have heard it all before and you will hear it again. If you are sick and tired of hearing it already I am sure the people about whom I am talking like to know that you are getting sick and tired of listening to the fact that they are going to have to pay more taxes because of the ineptitude of this government.

Mr. Pallett: You are the past master of ineptitudes.

Mr. Howard: I say to the Minister of Finance, do not enter into the field of juggling the books in the way we have witnessed in the province of British Columbia; do not hide the facts from the public; make a clean breast of it and tell the public what will be the effect of this conversion program on the general public of Canada, in particular on the provinces and municipalities.

Mr. Regier: I hesitated for a moment because I thought the Minister of Finance would surely have something to say by now. I cannot, however, let his interim supply resolution go through without making some further effort to elicit a little information from him.

I can assure the minister that the recommendation made to him by the hon. member for Timiskaming that he answer some of these very, very serious charges which have been made should be seriously considered or that the minister should leave his office. As the minister knows, the implications of what he has been engaged in since the introduction of his budget into this house are of such significance that they will affect every individual Canadian and I must ask the minister at this time a number of questions.

Firstly, why was this announcement not made part of his budget presented to the house on June 17 last? I am sure that the minister should have had, even if he did not have, some thoughts on what was the rating of the Canadian government on the money markets of this country and of the world when he made his address in presenting his budget. Why was nothing said and no inkling given that a major portion, if not the major portion of our entire national public debt was going to be refinanced? If he had done this on June 17 this House of Commons would have been given a clear eight days in which to consider all the implications of the announcement but, no, nothing was said at the time of the budget. There was rather a simple announcement made without warning which caught the members of the opposition completely off guard because it was so unheard of and so unprecedented. They reserved their judgment at the time, at least my house leader did, when he said that he would first have to look at the terms of the announcement. I ask the minister how much money is the government going to spend? This very much relates to the present interim supply bill.

I would also like to know how much is the publicity in connection with this conversion deal going to cost the Canadian taxpayers? The minister has not explained, either at the time of or since the announcement, why he has chosen to offer non-callable bonds at an exceptionally high rate of interest rather than callable bonds. What assurance has the minister that eight or nine months hence money rates will not be exceedingly low and that we will not be tied, with respect to roughly half our national public debt, to this exorbitant 4½ per cent interest rate? Why did he make it a non-callable deal? Why has the minister no answer? He was very lavish yesterday in using such terms as "Rubbish" and "Rot", and I do not know what was the rest of it. What is the percentage of these bonds which are held by individuals as individuals? The minister has not given any indication of that.

The effect of this deal on public enterprises in the dominion has been indicated by several members who have already spoken. The implications on even such a relatively small undertaking, finance-wise, as the South Saskatchewan river dam, is that the minister by his announcement has added to the annual carrying charge of the cost of that dam no less than $3 million, which is going to put a very heavy burden indeed upon a population of less than one million in the province of Saskatchewan.

If the minister was really in difficulty, and I am the first to admit that maybe he had no other way out—maybe he was forced to adopt this method—why then did he not take the people of Canada into his confidence and appeal to them rather than kowtow to the dictates of the money lenders in this country? We have won wars before and have emerged from those wars in a better financial position than when the wars began simply because the government of the day appealed to the people in the national interest. If the Minister of Finance had really found that he was being dictated to or that any attempt of that kind was being made, why did he not resort to an appeal to the people of Canada to help him out? I am sure the people would have responded equally well to an appeal to help this government win the peace as they have on several occasions responded to appeals to help their governments win wars.

An hon. Member: What is he doing now?

Mr. Regier: No, the Minister of Finance did not appeal to the people of Canada to help him out of the difficulty in which he found himself. He saw fit to kowtow to the dictates of the money lenders of this nation. The Minister of Finance is attempting to brush all this off as irresponsible. May I refer him to the Financial Post of July 19 last? In it there is an article which says that the $6.4 billion conversion loan which the government announced could, first of all, start a new round of inflation. I pointed this out last night. Secondly, it could raise borrowing costs for everybody, and I mentioned that this is what is happening right now. Third, it could weaken bond and stock prices. I agree that has already happened, and that it is going to happen during the weeks and months ahead. Fourthly, says this article, it will strengthen our dollar, making imports cheaper and exports less profitable.

This is at the hands of the government which was going to overcome our unfavourable trade balance. They have, by this one action alone, taken a very significant move toward raising the premium on the Canadian dollar, thereby encouraging imports into Canada, adding to unemployment in Canada and reducing our exports. The fifth point put forward in this article claims it will bring about higher taxes, and there is no doubt at all about that, because all our levels of government must pay higher rates of interest. There is only one source of this interest money; it will have to be found by raising the taxation levels of the Canadian people. The concluding paragraph of this article states:

> The terms of this new conversion loan make it unlikely that Canadians will receive any tax reductions in the near future.

To show further that we are not alone, the hon. member for Skeena has already indicated that the premier of British Columbia is out on a campaign and has soundly and roundly condemned this action by the Minister of Finance in his bond conversion plan.

I have here a Canadian Press dispatch from Saskatoon which appeared in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of July 19 indicating what the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan has to say about it. He says:

> All benefits of the scheme will go to the banks and investment houses which hold most of the old victory bonds.

The report continues:

> Mr. Fines said the higher interest rates the federal government promised on its new bonds in return for the old ones will force up capital interest costs throughout the country.

Well, that is happening right at this moment. I have quotations here from various other financial analysts in the dominion, but I do not think I need place them all on record. I am sure the Minister of Finance has been watching them from day to day.

The minister has several times attempted to indicate on the orders of the day that his bond conversion plan is not going to cause a rise in interest rates. If this is the case, and if this is not a handout may I ask him this: why was it that on the morning after his announcement Canadian government bonds rose on the stock market by a fantastic amount? I have one excerpt here, in particular, which indicates what I mean. I understand from this particular article that some Canadian government bonds rose as much as $4.50 on a $100 bond. This very clearly shows that the minister's valuation of what the new interest rate ought to be was not realistic; in other words, that it was a handout, otherwise folks would not have been prepared to pay $4.50 more on the morning after the minister's announcement than they would have been prepared to pay the day before.

Again in the Financial Post of July 19 is further support for the contention I am putting forward. It says:

> Just before the announcement was made of the Canada conversion loan, Canada 3¼ per cent bonds due October 1, 1979, were selling to yield 3.88 per cent. A United States treasury bond of comparable interest and maturity yielded 3.26 per cent.

Note that our bonds were already yielding .62 per cent more than United States bonds. Then it goes on to say:

> Tuesday, the Canada 3¼'s of '79 went to 3.92 per cent yield.

The minister's action has had yet other influences. It is going to encourage more foreign investment in Canada, especially United States investment, and that is going to accentuate the problem that this Conservative party said it was going to meet if it was given a chance to form a government. Raising interest rates and thereby extending an open invitation to more foreign capital with its effect on our high cost economy and the valuation of the Canadian dollar is certainly not one of the the ways to meet this problem. I also submit that this action of the government has seriously affected the desire of Canadians to invest in Canadian enterprise insamuch as it has lessened the value of Canadian investment in Canadian industry. There always has to remain a fairly comfortable margin between the yield on stocks and the yield on government bonds. If the government guarantees for a 25-year period a return of 4½ per cent the minister cannot expect Canadians to be very interested in investing their money in Canadian industrial enterprises which may earn only a very little more than that guaranteed 4½ per cent. I feel the minister has done serious harm to the future industrial expansion of the Canadian economy by the action he has taken.

The steps he has taken have had a depressing effect on the Canadian stock market. For instance, to consider one particular case, the British Columbia public utilities commission was recently authorized a 9 per cent increase—I believe that was the figure—on the tariff that might be charged for hydro power in British Columbia. In normal circumstances this would have caused shares in British Columbia Power to have risen immediately on the market. They would normally have risen quite substantially. However, almost simultaneous with the announcement that they were able to collect 9 per cent more for their power came the announcement by the Minister of Finance with regard to this almost unheard of guaranteed interest rate on federal government bonds, and as a result there was no noticeable difference whatsoever in the price of the shares of the British Columbia power corporation.

All the crocodile tears which the minister used to shed while in opposition on behalf of municipal government are now to be seen for what they are. How he threw out his chest the other day at the time of the budget when he announced that his amendments to the excise tax act were going to relieve municipalities to the extent of $5 million. In my estimation he has by this move added a burden of $45 million to the shoulders of the municipalities, and I am being conservative in that calculation, allowing for only a rise of only 1½ per cent in the charges the municipalities will have to pay on their debts.

The Minister of Finance said last night that my statements were extremely harmful and mischievous. I can assure the minister that I am fully aware of the fact that he has already successfully converted over half of the bonds he wishes to convert and I am not advising individual Canadian citizens to hang on to their victory bonds. I know these bonds are being called in and any Canadian who holds his bonds beyond the beginning of September ceases to receive interest on them. The minister should know that all hon. members in this house are advising all Canadians who hold victory bonds to take advantage of this offer and I believe that any Canadian who has a victory bond will accept that advice not wanting to lose any interest earnings.

If the minister thinks this is rubbish, to use the word he employed in referring to my remarks last evening, I can assure him that the provincial debt of the province of British Columbia is so high that the extra $7 million we shall have to pay on our public debt is not going to be lightly taken. That money is sufficient to buy annually for us 350 additional new class rooms and a new 350-bed hospital. These are things on which we would much rather be spending our tax money than on higher interest rates. I fail to see how the minister thinks he can get away with labelling the statement of these facts as utterly ridiculous, harmful, mischievous, rubbish and so on.

Even if the Minister of Finance does not yet understand the significance of the bond conversion deal the Minister of Public Works does. A few days ago I asked the Minister of Public Works, whereas interest rates under the National Housing Act are allied to interest rates on long-term government bonds, if the Minister of Public Works would assure the house and the country that there would be no immediate increase in interest rates chargeable under the National Housing Act. The Minister of Public Works knew immediately what I was talking about. He did not see fit to label it as rubbish. He assured us that the government was not considering allowing any increase in interest rates on individual homes purchased under the act. There are many institutions of government engaged in the business of lending money to the Canadian people including Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Canadian Farm Loan Board to name but two and there are countless other ways in which the Canadian people can take advantage of government guaranteed loans. All of these loans by law of the land are attached and allied to the interest rates on long-term government borrowing. I wish the Minister of Finance would assure the house that as long as there is a Conservative government in office the interest rates charged by these various government agencies will not be raised thus placing an additional burden on the average Canadian citizen.

I feel that the Minister of Finance was most unwise in not announcing this deal at the time of the budget. I do not yet understand why he did not do so at that time and unless the minister explains this we can come to only one conclusion. When the minister announces to the people of Canada he is going to borrow $3,400 million and only a few weeks later tells us he is now borrowing $6,400 million, he was converting bonds that were not to mature for several years and the only conclusion we can come to is that when he went to Montreal and Toronto and attempted to borrow $3,400 million he was told what he had to do and that was that he would have to pay off those institutions that had helped the Conservative party in the past.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak briefly on this resolution. The minister has indicated it is an urgent one and I certainly am not going to hold it up because I believe it is of a pressing nature and that this matter should be passed without delay. However, in view of the matters that have been raised by my hon. friends to the extreme right of us and to the immediate left of the Speaker which are of great importance to us on this side of the house, I think I should say at this stage that we do not propose to discuss it now other than to reiterate what has already been said by some of our members that the matter is of extreme importance.

We believe that the discussion of this subject relating to the reconversion of bonds should take place on another occasion and we also believe that there is more than one occasion upon which the subject can be discussed. There are other reasons, too, why I do not propose to debate the question now. I simply wanted to put our position on the record so that it may be known that as soon as another opportunity arises, perhaps during the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Finance, we do propose to enter into a discussion of this matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there have been a number of suggestions and criticisms presented this afternoon to the Minister of Finance with respect to this matter. I wonder if this would not be an appropriate time for the minister to make some comment on them because in my opinion they were certainly far-reaching enough not to be accepted silently.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Howard: I take it that the minister would then accept the criticisms as being valid?

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, the sum of $615,999,671.59 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-46, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1959.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time? Now, by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, by this bill the House of Commons is being asked to provide a very large sum of money to provide for the public service of Canada for approximately the next two months. It is the historic right of the house at every stage in voting supply and appropriating public money to air grievances and to seek redress of injustices. Within the last two weeks the official opposition in committee of supply have attempted to secure certain information concerning the injustices being carried out by the government against certain Canadian citizens. The injustices to which I refer are exemplified in the action of the government in the Walter Mitchell case. So that there will be no doubt in anyone's mind as to what I propose to raise I may tell the house that I know nothing about the Mitchell case other than what appears on the records of the official debates of this house.

What I am concerned with here is not primarily the question as to whether or not Mr. Mitchell should have been dismissed. I do not propose to rehash that subject. But what I am concerned with at this stage and what I should like to bring to the attention of the house again, Mr. Speaker, is the injustice done to any man who is accused of having committed a crime by a minister of the crown without being given an opportunity to be heard before any impartial tribunal whatever and without the minister who accused the citizen of having committed the crime producing any evidence to the house to support the criminal charges that he has made against the citizen.

It is simply a case of the minister being accuser, private tribunal and the person making the conviction without a hearing, without adducing any evidence to the house and without applying any of the elementary principles of justice which we so appreciate in this country and which were inherited from the mother country. I could elaborate at some length on the principles involved, about a man being found guilty and convicted without trial, about a man being accused and convicted without the charges against him being told to him. One could elaborate a great deal on that but at this stage of the bill when the minister, I know, is anxious to have the bill dealt with quickly, I will not digress because I have enough appreciation of the minister's knowledge as a practising lawyer to know that he understands those principles even while I am criticizing him and the government sharply for not having adhered to them.

It seems to me that surely the Canadian parliament has not come to a point in its existence where we can be asked to vote supply to a government which will so violate those elementary principles of justice as is inherent in the stand taken by the Minister of Agriculture in the particular case to which I referred earlier. Under our system, since we have collective responsibility of the ministry, the whole government must stand convicted by that action of the Minister of Agriculture.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without saying more, having put the matter before the house, I intend to do what we have the right to do under the rules, namely move an amendment to the motion for second reading which would, if accepted by the house, have the effect of delaying the passage of this bill until justice has been provided for. We have no desire, as I said earlier, to rehash and revise the detailed debate on the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture which took place a few days ago, but we are desirous to insist that justice be done to citizens and that a minister of the crown can no longer accuse and convict persons of criminal offences without trial. The accusations of the minister concerned were accusations that this citizen had committed criminal offences. I would like to get the verdict of the house on this question. I therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget):

That this bill be not read a second time until the government has disclosed to the house the precise nature of the accusations and the evidence and has undertaken to make provision for an impartial hearing in cases of public servants accused by it of criminal offences for which they have not been tried or convicted in a court of justice.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member any authority for an amendment of this kind which is unconnected with the bill?

Mr. McIlraith: I think I can refer you briefly to the citation used the other night on the excise tax bill, namely citation 382 in the fourth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. I would remind Your Honour that this is a supply motion voting supply for all the government's administration and the amendment states a grievance dealing precisely with the action of the government and merely delays supply until the government makes provision for the removal of an injustice.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): If I may be allowed to say a word, Mr. Speaker, there is a broad principle in this connection that there should be no supply granted to Her Majesty without redress, and this is the occasion upon which our redress can be obtained. The amendment which is being moved is similar in character to that which was moved on July 30 last to the Excise Tax Act, which amendment was declared in order by Your Honour. The authority for this amendment is based on citation 382, as already indicated by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). This citation reads:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

This is exactly what this amendment seeks in connection with the bill which is now before the house, that the bill should not now be read a second time until the government has disclosed the details of certain accusations and the evidence in connection with those accusations. The amendment goes on in that vein which, I submit to you with deference, sir, is entirely within the four corners of this citation. As a matter of fact, I think the citation here is much broader than the scope of the amendment and for that reason it would seem to me it is quite in order.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is unnecessary for me to repeat to you the argument I made on the occasion to which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has just referred, namely July 30. I submit to you that most of the arguments which I directed to showing the amendment on that occasion was out of order apply here as well. It is not open to me to take issue with the ruling you made on that occasion. I say, with great respect, that I did not share your opinion on that occasion, but that is not the point now. The point is that the grounds I argued on that occasion as to relevancy it seems to me have equal application here if you do not consider yourself bound by the ruling you made on July 30, on which the discussion is to be found on pages 2864 and following of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: This bill, as hon. members are aware, is for the granting to Her Majesty of certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1959. We are on second reading of that bill, and it is a debate on the principle of the bill. The circumstances surrounding this proposed amendment are quite different from those which surrounded the amendment to which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has referred. On that occasion there was a motion for second reading of a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act, and the principle which it has sought to declare by the amendment related to the subject matter of the bill. But today, I am asked to accept an amendment which, it is true, declares a principle but it is quite unrelated to the bill.

The bill is one for granting money. The principle declared in the amendment has to do with the treatment of public servants. Unless, as the hon. member for Ottawa West said, grievances which may be presented and should be dealt with before the house grants supply, can be purged at any stage of the proceedings for supply, I would think that this amendment is out of order. I am testing the amendment on the basis of the normal principles that apply to an amendment on second reading, notwithstanding that it is a money bill. If there is any different consideration that applies in the case of a money bill, and which would change my view, I should like to have the authorities now before I come to a final conclusion.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it has been an historical principle of British and Canadian constitutional practice that supply should not be granted until redress has been given or at least requested in connection with any incidents that may be brought before the house. In this bill we are asked by Her Majesty's ministers to grant supply. We are suggesting that the conduct of Her Majesty's ministers in respect of the matter of this amendment has been such that we should not grant supply until this conduct has been corrected. This is a hallowed provision of our constitution that grievances should be corrected before supply is granted. We are basing our amendment on that provision that there should be no supply granted without redress as well as on the rule cited by my hon. friend. We are asking for redress in connection with the conduct of Her Majesty's ministers, and we think that this matter should be decided before supply is granted.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has missed the point. Certainly, when the government asks the house to vote supply it is within the right of any hon. member to air a grievance; that is an undoubted and established right of a member of the house. This right has been exercised by the hon. member for Ottawa West this afternoon. However, that is a very different matter from moving an amendment to the second reading of a supply bill. I believe that is the point the Leader of the Opposition has completely missed. Grievances may be aired, but there is nothing, in my respectful submission, that takes a motion of this kind out of the ordinary rules by which the validity of an amendment to second reading of the bill should be tested. There is nothing in that respect to put this type of bill in a different class from any other bill.

The rules in regard to those amendments that may be offered to motions for second reading of a bill are well known, and the grounds are very narrow, Mr. Speaker. Unless this particular motion can comply with these well established rules, then this amendment can derive no higher virtue because of the fact it is related to a grievance. The airing of grievances is a very different matter from the moving of amendments to a motion for the second reading of a bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I just add one word on the point raised by the Minister of Finance? It does seem to me the minister is, of course, right that the grievance of one member should not stop supply. What we are asking to do here is something which it is impossible to do in committee of supply. We are simply seeking the verdict of the house on this grievance. This would seem to be the only stage at which we could do that. It would also seem that this motion is declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress.

We are expressing our view, not that the bill should not pass but that it should not pass at this stage. Its progress should be delayed, just as we asked the other day, until a verdict of the house has been taken on the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West. There would not appear to have been any other stage at which the sense of the house could be taken, and that is what my leader referred to when he referred to the airing of grievances. If the house will not support the hon. member for Ottawa West, then the government gets its supply.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for assisting me in connection with this rather interesting proposition which the hon. member for Ottawa West has raised. It is quite true it is an historic privilege of the house to present its grievances and complaints against the conduct of the government, and ask for redress, before granting funds. But there is ample opportunity for doing so. In fact, we have a rule which provides for six motions to go into committee of supply which are precisely devoted to the airing of grievances. I have not been given any authority which would warrant me accepting the proposition that the rule of relevancy is different for second reading of a money bill than it is on any other bill.

I consider this amendment to be irrelevant and consequently rule it out of order. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I believe at this time it is possible to raise general grievances and since the schedule covers—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I set the hon. member right. We are on the second reading of the bill and it is relevant only to deal with the principle of the bill.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I shall be only too pleased to raise the grievance when we go into committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A and B agreed to.

On schedule C:

Mr. Fisher: Under schedule C we have an item for legislation in the House of Commons. The item gives me an opportunity to make some remarks upon the suggestions that were raised in the House of Commons the other day by the Prime Minister in relation to prospective changes in what might be called the make-up of the chamber. I just wanted at this time to express some of the difficulties I think these changes will create. For one thing, if we turn the chamber into one like the British have with benches, there will need to be a great reduction in the size of this chamber; that is if we are going to keep it in relation to the British example. I should like all members of all parties, before they become too enthusiastic about this idea of the Prime Minister, to think about the relative discomfort of the benches. Any of you who have been in Westminster and have observed the activities in the British House of Commons will recognize that their attendance in the House of Commons is no better than ours, if as good; that it is only on major debates that you get a crowd; that ordinarily there is a mere handful in the house. Despite all the reverence that many people feel toward the mother of parliaments, I would suggest that in many ways they do a rather different kind of work than is done by the members of the House of Commons in this particular country.

Furthermore, one of the marked differences between the British House of Commons and the Canadian House of Commons stems from their whole parliamentary set-up. The next step which the Prime Minister may be suggesting is to cut us out from any offices because in Britain they do not happen to have offices. About the only thing a British member of parliament has is a little locker to hang his hat in. If he wants to interview any constituents, he does so out in the corridors, in the lobbies or in the public rooms. You can let this love for British tradition and British set-up take us a little too far. I should not like to suggest by these criticisms of the British system as they relate to Canada that I think their system is wrong. I think it is fine for them. It suits their particular kind of country which has a unitary form of government that is highly centralized, and in which the centre of the government is so close to the people in terms of distance and time. But I would suggest that in our country our terms are very much different.

But on the main point of the Prime Minister with regard to introducing benches, I should like to point out again that benches are very uncomfortable and they lead to the display, as any of you who have watched proceedings in the British House of Commons will know, of a great deal of masculine leg. I would suggest it is much more undignified than what we Canadians are used to. I feel that we are very strong on dignity and decorum. If any of you have ever seen the exposed lower legs of Winston Churchill or some of the other gentlemen, you would recognize that it is not an aesthetic display at all. I do not feel that we need to go that far in order to do what the Prime Minister wants to achieve, that is to shorten the debates in this House of Commons. It was delightful of the Prime Minister, to suggest that the debates needed shortening, to admit that he was himself guilty of being prolix at times, but I do feel that before this idea gets very far at all, every one of us from a non-partisan point of view should go over it very carefully.

I would make this suggestion. It might apply to many of you and certainly would apply to myself. I would be uncomfortable in speaking if I did not know that I had something to lean on, something to prop myself up against. If I were exposed in a much smaller amphitheatre, more like a bull ring and closer to the swirl of battle, it might often mean that we would be closer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in a much reduced ring, and that with our rather different temperaments and different ideas of sportsmanship and gamesmanship from those which the British have it might lead to fisticuffs or something like that if we went too far in altering the chamber. So I just wanted to make the point that I think this is one change or suggested change or trial balloon in connection with the House of Commons that every member wants to be very careful about considering.

There is one other point that I wanted to make under schedule C. It has to do with mines and technical surveys, surveys and mapping branch. We were given assurance by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) last year, when his estimates were before the house, that every effort was made to see that there was not any overlapping between the provincial efforts in the geological mapping field and the federal efforts. Yet is was just several weeks ago that Mr. Rickaby, who is an official of the Ontario provincial government devoted to work in this field, came out with the statement that the crying need in this particular field was federal leadership to wipe out what he called overlapping and a complete failure to get a plan. Mr. Rickaby made the same point as did Mr. Brown who works for Spartan Air Services before the Senate land use committee, that we have no plans at all for mapping our geological resources, not in a way that compares with what the Russians have already done. Both those gentlemen talked in terms of two and three decades behind the Russians. In the light of the minister's statement last year that there was not any overlapping and that there was consultation, I feel that this is one problem in connection with this particular department in connection with which we need a new approach and at which we need a new look.

One of the difficulties in connection with a geological survey, a land use survey or a forest aerial survey is that there is a great deal of overlapping. One of the most interesting developments in connection with the work is that now photographic interpretation experts can look at aerial photographs and not only draw conclusions about the stands of forests that may be there but from the stands of forests and the vegetation picture they can come to very definite conclusions about the type of soil and the whole environment. Because of this interrelationship of the geological aspect, the mineral aspect, the soil aspect and the forest aspect which fit in; and because our Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is supporting by subsidy provincial efforts in this photographic field as far as forestry is concerned; and because each one of the provinces is undertaking geological surveys and aerial mapping and because our federal Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is doing that, it seems to me that we should have what Mr. Rickaby called for, namely a meeting of the minds involved and some attempt to give us a co-ordinated program that would finally lead to the kind of survey giving us the kind of information which we need for land use in Canada and which we do not have at the present time.

It seems to me that this kind of concrete program should have formed one prominent corner of the vision or, as the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) would call it, the mosaic. In any event a corner of the mosaic should, I think, be a co-ordinated program related to mapping and geological survey work. This, in my opinion, would be most worth-while.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1958 not exceeding $330,623,000 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1959; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $307,493,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $307,493,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this resolution contemplates the introduction of a bill which is of an annual nature. As the house is aware, the Canadian National Railways borrow from the government to meet their financial requirements; they borrow to meet their capital budget requirements and in those years when they have need of financial assistance, to meet their operating budget they also borrow for that purpose from the government.

The capital budget is reviewed and passed on by the government as a matter of course, but all of these budgetary requirements of the Canadian National Railways, indeed all their affairs, are submitted to the house and for many years it has been the practice of the house to appoint a special committee to review the operations and the financial affairs of the Canadian National Railways system. It is an annual accounting to parliament. It is the equivalent in the procedures attaching to corporations that are not of a public nature to the annual shareholders' meeting.

At this session such a committee was appointed and it held meetings, lengthy meetings, on July 14 and 15 last. The president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon, and other officials of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, and Trans-Canada Air Lines were present with representatives of the auditors of the system. They gave their testimony and answered questions covering the whole broad field of the operations of the associated companies. In the course of those proceedings the committee also reviewed the budget of the company.

This bill follows, in accordance with the annual practice of the house, that review, that accounting from the company before the special committee. The bill itself, in accordance with the annual practice in such matters, covers the financial requirements of the company for the current calendar year of 1958. The fiscal year of the company is the calendar year, but because of the arrangement with respect to the sittings of parliament it is necessary in these bills also to make provision in advance for the estimated financial needs of the Canadian National system for the first six months of the following calendar year. Accordingly, this bill makes provision not only for the financial requirements for the year 1958 but also for the first six months of the calendar year 1959 of the Canadian National system.

The bill, as is indicated in this resolution, provides for authorizations, guarantees and loans; it also provides, although this is not part of the resolution, for the appointment of the auditors of the company.

As I indicated earlier this afternoon, there is very great urgency attached to this bill, and if it meets with the approval of the house, without asking any hon. member to curtail any of his rights, we hope that this house may be prepared to facilitate the passage of the measure through all stages today. That suggestion was put before the house last night by the leader of the house.

The reason is simply that because of the fact that the session is so much later than usual this year the bill is coming before the house somewhat later than normal according to the calendar, although it is well up in the business of the session in terms of the sessional calendar. It could not have been brought forward, of course, until the committee had completed its review of the needs of the Canadian National system for the funds which this bill will permit the Minister of Finance to loan to the company. It is extremely urgent at the present time—extremely urgent—that this bill be passed through all stages in both houses and receive royal assent not later than the first day of next week unless the company is to be compelled to resort to bank borrowing. This would not be desirable and I think the house will realize the urgency of the situation which I have endeavoured to put before the committee at this time.

The bill simply takes the usual form; it is a bill well established in form and purpose and the procedure followed with respect to the review and the consideration of the provisions of the budget by the special committee established by the house for that purpose is the established procedure. I trust that having regard to the fact that the need is urgent, that the procedure followed is a time honoured procedure, and that the form of the bill is the well established form of a bill that is annual, the committee will see fit to give it speedy passage.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, my remarks on this resolution will be brief. I agree with the first part of the minister's remarks, that this resolution precedes an annual bill to refinance the operations of the Canadian National Railways. It is true that following the usual practice after the establishment of the committee on railways and shipping in the House of Commons, that committee does hear evidence about the operations of the railway, and members of that committee are given the opportunity of considering, discussing and examining the witnesses who come before it.

However, I will point out to the committee that this is only one of the opportunities hon. members have of discussing matters concerning the Canadian National Railways. There are many other opportunities, and I am sure that those members on this side of the house who will wish to take advantage of those opportunities will propose not to do so on this occasion, and that is the reason why I find myself in complete disagreement with the minister in so far as the last part of his remarks are concerned.

Before I come to that, there are on this resolution, a number of things which I believe can usefully be discussed; the financial condition of the railway, the position in which it finds itself concerning the volume of traffic, the freight, which is declining to a marked and sharp degree, as was told us by the president of the railway during the hearings of the committee, the lay-offs of certain employees in the various shops from one part of the country to the other, pensions—as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River so well points out—an increase in which had been promised by the government when it was in opposition and during two election campaigns and so on. I might add that the Minister of Transport said the other day the government was still giving consideration to this matter, but no action has been taken.

I do not want to delay the passage of this resolution by discussing these matters, but I do want to object strenuously to this resolution and the bill which follows going through all stages at this time. We on this side of the house are going to protest that, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course, that could only be done by unanimous consent. The suggestion was made last night by the leader of the house, but if the hon. gentleman is not willing, all we can hope to do today is to have the resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier: We are not willing, and I think the Minsiter of Finance should know why we are not willing. We are not willing because if this committee had been established at the time it should have been established it would not have been necessary to ask for the passage of this bill through all its various stages at this time. What I mean is this—and I say it with all respect to the Minister of Transport—I believe that on at least three occasions he told the president of the C.N.R. that a meeting would take place on such and such a date. The meeting never took place, perhaps because of reasons over which the Minister of Transport had no control or, perhaps, for reasons over which the government had no control. But certainly if that meeting had taken place at the proper time when it was first called these matters could have been given consideration and the bill would have gone through long before this day. That is one of the reasons why we on this side cannot consent to the passage of the bill through all its stages today.

Then, again, there is a very important reason, namely that some, nay many, of the activities and operations of the Canadian National Railway are likely to be discussed at the bill stage, so I do not want to present the appearance of trying to hold up the resolution. That is not my purpose. I realize that after the operations of the C.N.R. have been discussed in committee it is right that the annual bill should be passed thereafter, but on the other hand the advantage and the privilege of members of parliament are such that when any of the stages of a bill come before the house it is up to them to determine whether or not they will take part in the discussion. For that reason we on this side do not propose to allow the bill to go through all its stages at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. gentleman agreeable that the resolution should pass today so that we can have the bill distributed tonight?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there will be any objection to that from this side.

Mr. Fisher: In connection with this resolution, one of the reasons we intended to discuss this matter was because of the evidence which was presented by Mr. Gordon before the committee, evidence which raised serious questions especially in connection with labour and, in particular, in relation to a statement that when central traffic control was established there was the possibility that the running trades would be reduced even further.

I think everyone in the House of Commons is aware of the difficulties which exist at the present time with regard to dispensing with the services of firemen on diesels. With the prospects of central traffic control it seems to me we are rushing very quickly into an extremely difficult labour problem, and we have a responsibility here to discuss this question and face up to it. It is about time the House of Commons gave some leadership rather than that it should again be presented with the spectacle of the Minister of Labour hopping around, I would say in a not too dignified fashion, in an attempt to avert a nationwide strike—efforts which would end up, in their final phase, in the Prime Minister's room. If any hon. members thought that the brotherhood of railway firemen have put up an effective fight and have raised a lot of issues—irrespective of whatever view one happens to take—I can assure hon. members that the brotherhood of railway trainmen is an even stronger and more formidable organization. What Mr. Gordon hinted at in his report spells labour trouble of as intensive a kind as we have had in Canada during the last few decades and for that reason the whole subject merits a great deal of discussion at the next stage of these proceedings.

Mr. Tucker: In Newfoundland we appreciate what the C.N.T. is doing to improve the telegraph service, and I should like to see the budget of the C.N.T. increased in order that it may further speed up and modernize the system.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-47, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1958, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ESTATE TAX ACT

NEW BASIS FOR ASSESSMENT OF SUCCESSION DUTIES

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-37, respecting the taxation of estates.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the minister would outline to the committee the changes that have been made as a result of the committee discussions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should not have thought that this was the point at which to attempt an outline of the various amendments that the committee on banking and commerce has proposed in the bill. There were actually about half a dozen of such amendments scattered throughout the bill. I can, if the committee wishes, indicate the amendments that were made. They are individual amendments to individual clauses of the bill and do not conform to any particular general pattern. Perhaps I could place the proposed changes on the record for the assistance of hon. members although I trust that hon. members have availed themselves of the opportunity of reviewing the proceedings before the banking and commerce committee which have now been printed and available for some days. The changes proposed by way of amendment are as follows:

1. Strike out line 35 on page 10 and substitute the following:

"the War Veterans' Allowance Act or section 64, 78 or 112"

2. Strike out line 19 on page 16 and substitute the following:

"38, be determined as provided in that section."

3. Strike out lines 39 and 40 on page 17 and substitute the following:

"(5) The minister may at any time assess tax, interest or penalties under this part or notify in writing any person by whom any return is filed that no amount is payable as tax under this part in respect of the death of the deceased, and may"

4. Strike out lines 1 to 6 on page 18 and substitute the following:

(i) the date of an original assessment or notification that no amount is payable as tax under this part in respect of the death of the deceased, or

(ii) the date any property is disposed of under a disposition or agreement described in paragraph (1) of subsection (1) of section 3, in any other case, reassess or make additional assessments, or assess tax, interest or penalties under this part, as the circumstances require."

5. Strike out lines 19 to 21 on page 27 and substitute the following:

"that belonged at that time to the deceased shall, unless it is established that the deceased and such one or more other persons were persons dealing with each other at arm's length, be determined for the purposes of this part as though each such share so belonging to the deceased formed part of a group of shares"

6. Strike out lines 21 to 24 on page 32 and substitute the following:

"effected on the life of the deceased or payable under an annuity contract in respect of the death of the deceased, and any policy of insurance or annuity contract in which the deceased had an interest shall be deemed to be situated in the place"

7. Strike out line 39 on page 43 and substitute the following:

"(b) prescribing the nature of the evidence required to establish facts"

In addition, in reprinting Bill No. C-37 as passed by the House of Commons, a comma should be added after the word "guardian" in line 13 on page 46.

Those are the amendments that are recommended by the committee on banking and commerce. I should like to pay tribute to the committee for the very thorough work of review they did on this bill. The committee had extended sittings on the bill and did a very thorough, competent, and workmanlike legislative service in relation to the entire bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as the minutes of the committee on banking and commerce will indicate, I took rather strong exception to what I thought was a too fast process in proceeding with the discussion of this bill without adequate knowledge among the people in the country who were concerned about the issues involved. I believe that as events developed my contention was not improper because only after we were concluding our deliberations did we receive from the outside public representations on the new bill, Bill No. C-37, that developed from Bill No. 248 which was so commendably presented to the public by the minister at the last session of the House of Commons.

I wish to say to the minister that my views as expressed as a member of the parliamentary committee on banking and commerce are all the more confirmed when I realize that last week if the minister felt that this had priority among his budget legislation he could have put it at the top of the list. He did not do so. He told the committee that this was a matter of urgent necessity. He said it was something that would have to go to the other house where public hearings were likely to take place and his excuse was that there was extreme urgency. I just remind hon. members of this committee that two or three weeks have gone by now and in the interim I have seen nothing that confirms the view of the minister about the urgency of debate on this particular subject in the parliamentary committee.

I protested the committee sitting a day or two after the presentation of the bill; I said that we were hasty. I protested that a great number of serious-thinking people across this land who had given time and thought to the former draft of the bill, Bill No. 248 of the 1958 session, did not know that we were seriously as a House of Commons considering the new draft. I attempted to make the point that while the Minister of Finance had said that he and his officials had looked over this situation very carefully at great length and had pondered it and were satisfied that this was in the public interest, there were manifest amendments between Bill No. 248 which was presented and the bill we have now and I suggested that this indicated that public attitudes on a matter of this kind were worthy of consideration and should be welcomed.

Despite all those protests we hurried into a discussion in committee stage in the banking and commerce committee of the bill which was referred to the committee by the House of Commons. I still regret that situation. I think that so many suggestions could have been suggested to the minister after first reading was given to Bill No. 248 that he should have had equal respect for the opportunity of the public to look at and perhaps criticize his revised version which we now have before us. I know that this bill will go before the Senate committee. I just hope that they will not be so stultified in their thinking that they will refrain from listening to the people from outside who might tell us something about it.

The minister knows that those associated with him at the moment are the same people that I took great pride in having had some association with in the recent past. It is instinctive in my thinking that sometimes it is possible that simplification on the part of those drafting a bill means simplification for them and not necessarily for the general public.

This is the first session of a new parliament. Large numbers of the members of the banking and commerce committee had never before attended a meeting such as we were attending. I want to say that it gave me a great deal of delight and a thrill indeed to find that after—but this was too abrupt, too quick—certain presentations were made in this committee the new members of the House of Commons realized that they had a great opportunity on an occasion such as that to amend a bill such as the one we have before us now if, in their opinion, it was not necessarily in the public interest. I admire very sincerely the attitude taken by some of the members of the banking and commerce committee who had never sat on a committee of this kind before. They heard certain representations from reputable bodies which could not be quoted directly but had to be quoted by a member of the committee for the record in criticism of the view of the administration that simplification is of the essence. I admired particularly the attitude of some of the new members of the House of Commons when they recognized that under the new bill we have not got a definite discharge of liability for an executor. They rallied to the cause; they persuaded the minister that the bill was not perfect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend will be fair enough to say that the minister was quite prepared to accept amendments, and did accept actually seven amendments, and offered some of them himself, by way of improvement of the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, that is perfectly true, Mr. Chairman, but it just confirms my point when I say that this bill was advanced to the committee stage in unseemly haste.

I want to say that the public at large was not aware that this was under discussion. At least even some members of the committee had not the opportunity to have criticisms of the new bill, although they had, of course, criticisms of the bill introduced in January.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will my hon. friend answer this question? What member of the committee did not have opportunity to criticize this bill in any way he chose?

Mr. McIlraith: Six o'clock.

Mr. Benidickson: My point is this. If the minister looks at the evidence of the banking and commerce committee,—this is just guesswork—if he looks at the representations that doubtless he has received in the last few days, as I have, he will find that many people did not know that the House of Commons was sitting in the committee stage to consider this bill and did not know anything about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have received some very high compliments from very high sources on this bill in the last few days.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader whether there is any change in the announcement of the business last night? Perhaps I should ask the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Public Works and I were having a conference.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall commence with the second reading of the bill to provide for the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railway Company; then, we shall take the estimates of the departments of justice, secretary of state and legislation.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

FINANCE

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"—FURTHER INQUIRIES OF MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he could tell the house whether or not the following quotation from an article published in the Ottawa Journal of August 4, written by Mr. James McCook, is without foundation. The article—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Yesterday I disapproved of a similar question. If the hon. member has a further question than that which he has asked it may be in order, but simply to ask a minister to verify the correctness of a quotation from a newspaper is not in order at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank you for your very valuable and helpful correction, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say whether or not his attention has been drawn to an article in the Ottawa Journal of August 4, which reads as follows:

Mr. Churchill told the Journal outside the house that he had taken only these steps when informed of the article published in Toronto:

1. Asked for the number of copies of the confidential report issued and the distribution list.

2. Asked for the names of those who prepared the report.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has not modified his question. He has simply asked the minister whether his attention has been drawn to the article—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if his attention has been drawn to this article—

An hon. Member: That is the same thing.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, this whole issue was dealt with in a debate on Monday and Tuesday of this week, and the hon. member for Essex East has no right whatever to raise it again on the orders of the day. This period is reserved for asking urgent questions. This is nothing of that kind; it is simply an attempt to follow up the debate concluded two days ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is true that the general subject matter was discussed, but this is a report in a newspaper which appeared on the second day, and I am now asking the minister if his attention has been directed to this report, and I am also asking whether or not the investigation which was to be made, according to that report, has been made by him.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not addressed himself to the point of order. He has modified his question, but as he asked it the second time I would consider it not to be an appropriate question. I do not say the hon. gentleman does not have the right to direct a question based on the report, but both the questions he asked were, in my opinion, not questions that should have been asked. Had the hon. gentleman asked whether a certain investigation referred to in the report had been carried out I would have considered that a proper question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then I ask the minister whether the investigation referred to in the report has been carried out and whether he would advise the house of the result of his investigation to date?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not consider that that constitutes other than a routine inquiry I have made of my officials with regard to several confidential reports.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister say what the result of that inquiry has been?

Mr. Churchill: I received the information for which I asked.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Could the minister tell us what are the other confidential reports that he is investigating?

Mr. Churchill: I do not think I am obliged to inform the hon. member with regard to confidential reports from officials of the department which pass month by month over my desk.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if with regard to another portion of the interview he is in a position to advise the house of further steps the government is taking with regard to this important matter, as indicated by him in the interview as the government's intention to pursue?

Mr. Speaker: If the matter is to be pursued in this way I will have to consider it in the light of the objection taken by the Minister of Public Works, namely that this whole matter was the subject of a debate and an amendment which have been dealt with by the house, and unless there is something completely novel which was not included during the course of that debate I feel hon. members should not pursue the matter in the way they are now doing.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a question which is based on a newspaper report which appeared in yesterday's Toronto Star and therefore, as Your Honour has suggested, it is subsequent to the debate. I am wondering whether the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or of the Prime Minister has been drawn to what are stated to be further excerpts from "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1958", as reported in the Toronto Star yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: Has either minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. While the newspaper report may be subsequent to the debate the subject matter is precisely the same, and I think what I said with respect to the question of the hon. member for Essex East relates to what the hon. member for Assiniboia has said. I would ask hon. members not to pursue this line of questioning unless they can convince me it is proper to reopen a matter which has been dealt with by the house. I ask hon. members if they wish to pursue the matter to address themselves to the point of order before asking any more questions.

Mr. Argue: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, when we questioned the Minister of Trade and Commerce about the original report by Mark Harrison the minister informed this house that there was not sufficient indication in the press report to inform the minister as to the document from which it might have been taken. Since this is a different press report, since it has been published in the newspaper, following the appearance of the other extracts, since it includes what it alleges are other and more substantial paragraphs from the report, I submit it is in order to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether his attention has been drawn to this press report and whether or not the published excerpts purporting to be taken from a departmental report are sufficient to indicate to him that they are taken from "The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1958"; and I would direct that question to the minister.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was a debate in the house on Monday and Tuesday concerning a hypothetical report, shall I say.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Green: This subject was debated from top to bottom, inside and outside, and the whole field was canvassed at that time.

Mr. Pearson: Not at all.

Mr. Green: Now my hon. friends across the way are attempting to come back and raise the same debate again, and furthermore they are seeking to conduct a cross-examination. Questions on orders of the day were never designed for cross-examination.

An hon. Member: Cry baby.

Mr. Green: I respectfully submit that the question the hon. member for Assiniboia is now attempting to ask is not in order.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the implication of the position taken by my hon. friend is that instalment after instalment purporting to come from this confidential report of the Department of Trade and Commerce could appear in the Toronto Star, to the point where we could read the whole report, yet we would be precluded from asking questions here to ascertain its accuracy or otherwise. Surely it is important, because of the subject matter of the report, that the accuracy of excerpts be established or denied. That is all we want to find out.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may add another word on the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works. As I understand the rule directed against raising a debate that was concluded, it is clear that hon. members cannot raise in a new debate something on which the house has taken a decision in a former debate. That is a very sensible ruling which we all agree should be maintained. But I would submit that is quite a different thing from raising a question on the orders of the day merely asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question about a press report which appeared subsequent to the date of the debate and which, as far as I have been able to ascertain, is completely new. I believe this question is in order, and the government would be doing itself credit if it answered the question forthwith instead of having hon. members on the government side of the house rising on points of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand the question which the hon. member for Assiniboia has asked it is whether or not a reported extract appearing in the Star on a date subsequent to the debate is true, or whether or not the extract as contained in the paper is a true copy of the document that was under consideration in that debate.

That question offends in two respects. It offends in the respect that it is simply asking the minister to verify a newspaper statement. That is all the question is asking. It is also reopening a matter which was discussed for two days in this house at very considerable length and in very considerable detail. This is not the time to engage in debate. A proper search for information as to what a minister has or has not done is in order, but these questions are not of that kind, and I rule them out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I just make one comment on what you said, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: What are you so frightened about?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am simply pointing out to Your Honour, for whom I and all members of the house have the greatest respect, the implications of Your Honour's observations. The implications are so far-reaching that I wonder whether, in the face of the great interest in this matter on this side of the house, Your Honour would not want to consider the desirability of postponing possibly until tomorrow or another day the full implications of the ruling you have made; because it would mean, as my leader has said, that we on this side of the house could not ask of the treasury benches questions relating to a matter of such importance. We would be precluded from pursuing a line of questioning regarding a matter of such importance, and I would think that would raise a question involving fundamental rights of members of this house. I wonder whether Your Honour would not think in the circumstances that it would be desirable to act on the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Green: May I point out that Your Honour has already given a ruling on this question, and now the hon. member for Essex East is simply endeavouring to get into a position where he and his colleagues can go on asking questions of this kind day after day. I submit that in the first place he has no right to question Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Essex East is prepared to accept the ruling I have made, as he has indicated. As hon. members know, I have no desire to curtail in any way the right of members of the house to obtain information from the ministry. It will be my objective to maintain and enforce that right. We have disposed of the particular questions. I am not prejudging any issues that may arise again. In view of the feeling of the members of the opposition I shall look over the questions again and also confirm my own view about these particular questions. They are disposed of, and I hope hon. members will accept that as final.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN NEGOTIATIONS FOLLOWING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister in a position to indicate to the house the progress of negotiations between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the three unions on the west coast as a result of the British Columbia Coast Steamship Service Act which we passed a few days ago?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The only report I have, Mr. Speaker, is that a mediator is on the scene endeavouring to negotiate between the two parties, but no progress report has been submitted to me as yet.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF MEASURES FOR REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I am sorry I did not send him a previous notice, but he can take this as notice. Will the Prime Minister inform the house when he intends to implement his electoral promise to reform the Senate?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am glad to see the interest of the hon. gentleman in this subject. I realize that he has more than a personal interest in the reformation of that body.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, inspired by feelings of the purest humanitarianism, may I ask the Prime Minister will he be in a position shortly to announce the appointment of parliamentary assistants?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think I have answered that question on a number of occasions, and in the case of my hon. friend I do not believe he is one of those who is interested.

FRUIT

NIAGARA PENINSULA—DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CHERRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, of which I have given notice. According to a press dispatch the Niagara peninsula cherry growers have asked the provincial and federal governments to buy surplus cherries. They blame the surplus on the large quantity of imports from the United States. What action does the federal government intend to take in this matter, and why was there not a support price on cherries?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me notice of this question. No request has been received from the Niagara peninsula cherry growers or any other organization for assistance to cherry producers under the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

LIVESTOCK

ONTARIO—REPORTED OUTBREAK OF NEW DISEASE IN SWINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister care to comment on the reported outbreak of a new disease in Ontario swine? Can the minister say whether the disease has been diagnosed, to what extent it is prevalent, and what steps are being taken to control it?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I thank the hon. member for notice of this question, particularly as it is of a technical nature. The swine disease to which the question refers was first reported in the fall of 1957. Since then both Department of Agriculture animal pathology laboratories and the Ontario Veterinary College have been engaged in research on it. It is a disease of young pigs, generally under 10 weeks of age. It resembles transmissible gastroenteritis of swine, but because of certain variations in the clinical symptoms it has been called vomiting and wasting disease of suckling pigs.

Research to date has not been successful in isolating the specific organism causing the disease. Study of the disease is being continued actively by the department and the veterinary college, both in the laboratories and in field investigation of reported outbreaks.

While the disease is serious and can result in a fairly high mortality in young pigs, investigations by veterinary staffs do not indicate that it has reached proportions which would have serious economic effects on the swine industry. Up to the present the condition appears to be confined to Ontario. When the disease has occurred in a herd, the surviving piglets and the nursing sows appear to develop immunity. There is no specific treatment known. Antibiotics seem to have little effect.

Mr. Argue: Has the government given consideration to the payment of compensation when there have been losses, or is it giving consideration to such payment in the event of an extension of the outbreak?

Mr. Harkness: No consideration has been given yet to that phase of the matter because, as I have said, the disease is not yet really widespread, and not sufficient is known about it to be able to come to any definite conclusions with regard to it.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, who is having quite a run of questions at the present time. Would the minister please advise if he is yet in a position to table a copy of the agreement respecting the South Saskatchewan dam, which was signed on July 25?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): That agreement was tabled several days ago. I do not know the exact date, but it was several days ago. It was the day after the hon. gentleman asked the same question last week.

[Later:]

Mr. Harkness: With regard to the tabling of the agreement on the South Saskatchewan dam, may I say this. If the hon. member will look at Votes and Proceedings for Friday, August 1, at page 343 he will note therein under "Returns and Reports Deposited with the Clerk of the House" that the first is this agreement with Saskatchewan on the South Saskatchewan dam.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SLAUGHTERING OF ANIMALS—LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): May I ask the Minister of Justice if he intends to carry through at this session his bill pertaining to the humane slaughtering of animals?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are having a look at the legislative program to see what the position is in that regard.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, during this session I have asked the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce on a number of occasions when the government would be in a position to make an announcement on deficiency payments. On July 31 the Prime Minister indicated that an announcement would be made at an early date. I am wondering whether the Prime Minister can say when the government will reach a final decision on the very important question of deficiency payments on western grain.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can add nothing to what has already been said. The whole question of an agricultural program to meet the situation of agriculture in the western provinces as well as in other parts of Canada is still under full advisement.

I am hopeful, as I said recently on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman has made reference, that an announcement can be made and will be made before the end of this session. Further than that I do not want to go at this time.

TRADE

SEED GRAIN—EXCLUSION OF CANADA FROM U.S. MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he is aware of the fact that the House of Representatives in Washington has passed a bill excluding Canada from the seed grain market in the United States, a market in which Canada sells several million bushels per year. If the minister's attention has been drawn to this measure, is he in a position to say what representations are being made by the government in the matter?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am having a report from my officials with regard to that matter. I am not at this moment prepared to make any further statement.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES—DEDUCTIONS FOR EARLY CLOSING DUE TO HEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Finance with respect to prevailing rate employees and whether or not he could arrange that there would be no deduction from their wages for absence when they were sent home owing to conditions of heat and humidity. The minister's answer was that he thought his answer on the previous occasion covered the matter. I wonder whether he has anything further to add.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on reviewing the answer I gave to the house on an earlier occasion I think the answer covered the question completely, but this aspect of the earnings of the employees was not included in the question. I am glad to deal with it now.

The conditions of employment of prevailing rate staffs, unlike those of classified civil servants, are determined by reference to the practice of good private employers. The treasury board and its advisory committee on prevailing rate staffs have found no evidence that good private employers release the equivalent of the prevailing rate employees of the public service from duty before normal closing hours on account of conditions of heat or humidity. The prevailing rate employees' general regulations, which are founded on the general principles stated above, consequently make no provision for leave with pay for prevailing rate staffs in the public service of Canada when conditions of excessive heat or humidity lead the civil service commission to authorize the release of classified civil servants.

It may be observed that a majority of the prevailing rate employees of the public service, unlike classified civil servants, perform their duties out of doors, where the effects of heat and humidity are not ordinarily as oppressive as in the case of clerical staffs working in confined areas.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question. Does the minister not think it would be wise, in view of the fact that there are apparently only a relatively small number of these people involved, to show the lead to private industry and treat prevailing rate employees in the same way that permanently appointed civil servants are treated?

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-47, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1958, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with this matter. I hope that sufficient funds are supplied so that one class of employees of the C.N.R.—and I refer to the employees of Canadian National Telegraphs in many Newfoundland communities—may receive better salaries.

An hon. Member: Speak up.

Mr. Granger: It is quite notorious that many of these operators who must put in a week of 48 hours receive very small salaries. There are many instances of extremely low salaries which may be quoted.

An hon. Member: We cannot hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member goes too far may I say that I think perhaps we should try to confine our remarks to the scope of this bill. We are on second reading, which involves the principle of the bill. It is a bill to provide moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system. I am not disposed to be too strict as to what are capital expenditures, but I do not think the bill opens up a free ranging debate on the operation of the Canadian National Railways system. If any hon. member has a contrary view I shall be glad to hear him, but as presently advised it seems to me that the question before the house is whether it is desirable to provide the Canadian National Railways with funds for precise capital expenditures which are to be authorized and are set out in the bill.

Mr. Granger: I will leave all the detailed arguments until another time, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to mention this—

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member that there will be an opportunity to discuss the details of the administration of the C.N.R. when the estimates are before the house for consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. Is it not true that there is not an opportunity on the estimates to discuss the C.N.R.? It being a crown company, I think it has always been understood in this house that it could not be debated in the committee of supply. I think it was for that reason that my friend the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador desired to make a few observations about certain capital improvements which he hoped could be made by virtue of the provision to be made in this measure.

Mr. Speaker: I perhaps should not say there is an opportunity on the estimates because I am not sure of that position. Perhaps some hon. members can help me on that matter. I have no desire to limit the hon. member in dealing with capital improvements for which this money is provided or which he thinks should be covered by this provision. I just did not want him to get into a discussion of conditions of employment and that sort of thing at this time.

Mr. Fisher: I hope to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador has the floor.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Port Arthur is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Fisher: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly what I want to get into from this point of view, namely that the capital program of the Canadian National Railways for this year includes a very large expenditure.

That is going to reduce employment in certain centres in certain areas. Because that capital program is involved in that way I feel this is an opportune time to bring up the whole question of the labour policies and the labour relations of the Canadian National Railways, in the very broad view. That is what I have prepared for, and I would certainly think it is quite in order since most of the ideas I have come from my attendance in the special committee dealing with the annual report. It is out of that knowledge that I wish to speak on this bill before us. If one does not have an opportunity at this time to go into the matter I cannot see when one can touch that subject within the framework of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I shall deal with the hon. member's problem when it arises, but in the meantime I feel that this debate should be directed toward the lines of capital enterprise of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to make a suggestion. While some of the remarks that the two hon. members indicated they had intended to make at this stage may be out of order in the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill, on which after all hon. members are confined to the principle of the bill, it may be that their points relate to the clauses in the bill and should be raised at the committee stage. I do not know whether or not they do so; we shall not know that until we know more about their remarks. However, it occurs to me that perhaps that may be the way in which the problems that have been raised might be met.

Mr. Granger: As much as possible, Mr. Speaker, I shall confine my remarks so they will come within the minister's suggestion and your ruling. I do not think the amount of money paid to these Canadian National employees is consistent with the amount of money voted for the operation of this telegraph system. I was about to say that salaries as low as $87.50 per month are not unusual.

I do not need to belabour the point that such salaries are low because they speak for themselves. It has been customary in the past, where possible, to combine the position of postmaster and Canadian National telegraph operator, which sometimes enables better salaries to be paid as a result of combined operations. I mentioned this before in connection with the post office estimates. I hope that system can be reinstituted.

I should like to mention also the need for a new steamer for the Labrador service. I hope sufficient money will be provided so consideration can be given to the construction of a new steamer with refrigeration to replace the S. S. Kyle. The Kyle has supplied excellent service for many years, but now she is a very old ship and needs replacing by a ship with more modern facilities. There should be, as I have said, an extension of the Canadian National steamship service to Labrador and a continuation of the service each year until the month of November.

Another suggestion I should like to make is concerned with the provision of better railway stations at many places in Newfoundland. There are quite a few places where the railway stations are not at all the type of building which should be owned and operated by an institution like Canadian National Railways. An example of such a railway station is the one at Gander, which is the real gateway to Canada. Today that railway station is not at all in keeping with what I might call, if I were to make a pun, its station. I would suggest that new stations should be provided at Gander and other places where antiquated buildings are made to serve.

While I am dealing with the railway station at Gander, I should like to point out that the railway no longer delivers express parcels from this station because the town has been moved away from the station. When Gander airport was extended and a new townsite built, the town was moved several miles away while the railway station remained where it was, right at the edge of the airport. The railway will no longer deliver express parcels to the town, and this is the cause of great annoyance and inconvenience to the people.

I should like to suggest, too, that the Canadian National steamers on the Labrador coast and along the northern part of Newfoundland should add to their ports of call instead of bypassing so many of the smaller settlements. I hope Canadian National will increase the number of ports at which their steamers call and bring their very valuable service to these smaller centres.

In conclusion I should like to say a word of appreciation of the very fine services, which over many years now have become traditional, performed by the captains, officers and crews of the Canadian National coastal steamers operating along the Newfoundland and Labrador coasts.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): The president of Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon, made a great impression upon most of the members of the special committee on railways and shipping. When I say "a great impression", that does not define it specifically. Certainly the impression he made on some of us was different from that which he made on others. However, he brought home to all of us the many problems in connection with this largest single enterprise in the Canadian nation. The Canadian National Railways has been close to my interests for many years because I was brought up in a Canadian National Railways family and worked myself for the railway for a time.

Furthermore, the railway itself has always been of interest to my particular political party, the feeling being that as a government-owned enterprise it should be and could be a model for the country. Many of the things I hope to say in connection with this bill will indicate that we in this group approve of the principle of the bill, but feel there are certain aspects of the capital expenditures that open up problems and difficulties which we believe have very important application in labour matters and in the future financing of the railway.

In a speech which Mr. Gordon gave to the Canadian and Empire clubs in Toronto on April 1, 1958, he said, among other things:

> The capital expenditure of one billion dollars since 1950 needs to be put into perspective, particularly so in light of the fact that it does not by any means complete the job. First we should recall that the period in question has been a high cost period and that a technological revolution has added larger units of machinery to our complement of equipment and has, as well, greatly enlarged the use of labour saving devices. Moreover, because of inflation, a depreciation based on original cost has fallen far short of meeting current replacement costs. That is one of the major reasons for the increase in our fixed charges. However, you may be interested to know that our net capital expenditures expressed as a percentage of the total property investment of the system have during the past ten years averaged only 3.4 per cent annually.

He went on to state:

> On dieselization from 1950 to the end of 1957, we had spent approximately $250 million on the locomotives and the necessary facilities. Our present estimate of the remaining cost to completely dieselize our operation is roughly $268 million, to be spent over the next four or five years.

No doubt the capital expenditures that will be approved by the passage of this bill will go for further dieselization, and quite a bit of these expenditures will go for the establishment of central traffic control on a considerable portion of the Canadian National Railways system. These two phases of expenditure have opened up very real labour problems. The Railway Age, a United States magazine that deals very generally with railway problems in North America, has pinpointed the importance of the industrial dispute that has raged between the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen and the Canadian Pacific Railway, as well as the other aspects of that dispute that have now arisen with the Canadian National Railways and over which we are likely to have further labour troubles.

I suggest in this regard that the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways are putting quite a number of men out of work, and will put even more men out of work in the future. This will be a subject of discussion at divisional points across the country. There is no point in refusing to recognize that these things are going to happen. Perhaps they need to happen, but we are in a position where, very often, the labour organizations are not prepared for these particular situations in connection with the changes such as central traffic control or dieselization will bring.

Mr. Gordon had this to say in the committee. I had asked him whether it had been the thesis put to him by union men that in regard to the dieselization program which has resulted in great savings to the railway and great increase in productivity, in terms of labour, this particular point has never been recognized by the railways in labour negotiations. I asked him if he would care to comment on that statement. Mr. Gordon was very glad to comment, and he said:

> We have in the course of our presentations before various conciliation boards dealt with that point again and again. I have no hesitation in saying that in regard to the improvement in our efficiency brought about by dieselization, labour has now received its share of that improvement.

Then he went on to say:

> I feel that labour has received more than its share. In other words, the capital investment has not produced for us the result that we, as management, feel we are entitled to.

You can certainly see the sharp and definite position being taken by the president of the railroad. He went on to say:

> This question of productivity is another one of those easy economic terms that is commented on loosely and which is very seldom understood.

Then, after elaborating on that, he went on to make this recommendation:

> I do feel there is a great need for a thorough economic analysis of what is true productivity in terms of labour. If we could get that analysis, plus the other indexes we have, then we might be able to talk to labour on a much more sensible basis than we are able to do now.

And he went on to say that he is thinking in terms of a statistical study of the situation by a department such as the dominion bureau of statistics. I should like to take this opportunity to suggest to the government that now is the very time to go to work on such a study. As these capital expenditures unfold they are going to cause more and more dislocation and trouble. There is a labour problem developing, as I indicated yesterday, in connection with the introduction of central traffic control, which means cutting down what might be called the tail end crews. In the record at page 96 of the committee proceedings—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have let the hon. member deal with operational problems to some extent, but I think he ought to consider whether he is not doing more than illustrate his point by going deeply into operational problems. After all, this bill has nothing to do with that. It is to authorize the payment of money for capital purposes to the Canadian National Railways system, and there is no principle in it as far as I can see which would permit a general discussion of operational problems.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the capital expenditures, as you will note in perusing the bill, are to an appreciable extent intended for equipment. Part of those expenditures will be accounted for by the dieselization program and provision for centralized traffic control. Surely the whole question of labour and labour relations could come under this.

Mr. Speaker: Only incidentally and by way of illustration. I would not have objected to a discussion of the effect of the provision of certain types of capital equipment, but to make that the substance of comments on the bill seems to me to be getting off the track.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps I could get more on the track by referring to the financial problems which the Canadian National are facing at the present time. The railway had a deficit this year and it is going to have a deficit next year, or at least that is the prediction. This capital expenditure program is certainly extremely necessary but there are a number of suggestions one could make at this time which, if carried out, might put the railway in the position of not needing such a large capital investment program.

One of the points that was made by the president of the railway at the time of the sittings of the committee was that the railway does not seem to be getting its fair share in relation to the express and mail set-up. They carry the mail at the present time for the government, and that mail is competitive with their express service. One of the other points Mr. Gordon made in connection with unprofitable services was that there are a number of lines and sections in the Canadian National Railways system that need to be dropped, from the point of view of profit. One of the other points he made was that the raising of freight rates has to be done on a more realistic basis if the railway is to continue to meet its financial obligations. I am trying to suggest that all these points have validity in relation to capital expenditure, and I want to take this opportunity of referring to them.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member referring to the proceedings before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Has that committee reported yet?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I see a meeting is scheduled for Thursday, August 7 at 10.00 a.m.

Mr. Fisher: This is a separate committee, on railways, air lines and shipping. One of the other problems Mr. Gordon raised in connection with capital expenditure is how far the C.N.R. should go in getting into the truck business and piggyback business. The hand of the Canadian National Railways has, to a certain extent, been forced by developments in the C.P.R., which has built up an extensive relationship with trucking interests.

This is one of the points with regard to which Mr. Gordon would not go into specific details, because he suggested that would be revealing his company's hand. I should like to hope that part of the capital expenditure involved under this bill will go for that purpose, namely to extend the piggyback service and tie in various truck lines with the service and give this diversification aspect of the C.N.R. more room to operate.

One of the other points made by the president of the C.N.R. in the committee which relates to this question of capital expenditure is the difficulty the two railway companies have had in working out pooling arrangements. Ever since 1933 an act of parliament has required the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. to work in a pool arrangement in certain sectors. We all know the sectors between Montreal and Toronto, and Ottawa and Toronto. Evidently discussions which have taken place between the railways themselves have been completely unsatisfactory.

Neither side will blame the other but this, it appears, is another place where direction by the government in relation to certain expenditures in connection with this bill might possibly lead to the C.N.R. being put on a better competitive basis as compared with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I certainly got the impression from the president that this is what he wanted, and he certainly feels that if his company were put in a better competitive position it would soon give the lie to all those Jeremiahs who are always going around pointing to this deficit and saying, "See what private enterprise can do and public enterprise cannot do".

I see the hon. member for York North nodding his head and expressing approbation. I wish he had had the educational opportunity to hear Mr. Gordon, in which case I am sure he would have reached the conclusion that the C.N.R. could do much better if it was given the opportunity.

One great capital expenditure of the C.N.R. in the last few years has been directed toward the improvement of maintenance of the permanent way, equipment and yard operations. There are a number of big electronic yards being built. This is a form of automation which is going to cut down employment, yet on the other hand it will lead to a much smoother type of operation, and we think the C.N.R. should be commended on going ahead.

One of the significant things in connection with expenditure on maintenance of way equipment is that it has cut down employment along the sections to a tremendous extent. Specialized machines now lay the ties, put in the spikes and so on, and you no longer need the number of people along the lines you formerly needed. Of course, this improvement is not something that is instinctively or easily understood by the people who lose their jobs.

I hope to come back to this particular point in greater detail when we are on a specific part of the bill. I confess I feel a certain amount of guilt in attempting to conduct a general discussion of the operations of the Canadian National Railways in the light of what was said, and in view of the most munificent offer of the Minister of Finance, which at first struck me as being completely out of character for him. Perhaps I do not really appreciate the character of the Minister of Finance as yet.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations on the second reading of this bill. In the first place, I feel I would be failing in my duty to my constituents if I did not protest on their behalf the fact that some of this capital expenditure is going to purchase radio-telephone equipment to replace the ordinary wireless telegraph sets which have served our needs in Newfoundland so very well for many years. I know the feeling is very strong in my own riding about this decision, and personally I feel it is a most unwise move; because we all know from experience that this type of equipment breaks down frequently and in isolated communities such as ours it takes weeks before a maintenance man can go to the place to effect the necessary repairs. During the interval the messages are either not transmitted at all or else are transmitted on a clear channel so as to make it possible for them to be picked up by all the household radios within range.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The people in my riding consider this a backward step. It is an ill-advised move because it provides a service which in many respects, as far as privacy is concerned, is inferior to what we have enjoyed for the past 50 years. I know it is going to create a great deal of discontent and ill will among the people who have to put up with this type of service. Although it may save a few dollars it is putting the consideration of money before the consideration of the people.

I should also like to express the hope that some of this expenditure will be used to provide express offices in my riding. At the present time there are 250 communities in my riding and about 80 of these are ports of call for C.N.R. coastal steamships; but despite this number of ports of call only two communities have the services of an express office. There are many large communities which should be provided with this service, and it could be established at very little cost.

I wish also to bring to the attention of the house and the Minister of Transport the hope that this service will not be delayed much longer. It would be my hope that these expenditures will be utilized in such a way as to provide the maximum amount of winter employment. This could be done in my province and in my riding if the program were to be drawn up well in advance so the contracts for telegraph poles could be let soon enough for the people to know that this work would be available in the winter months when there are very few opportunities available to them to earn a livelihood.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, if it is in order I should like to know if any of the bond issue of the C.N.R. guaranteed by the federal government has been sold.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there was an issue of C.N.R. bonds last January to the aggregate of $300 million bearing the guarantee of the government of Canada.

Mr. Forgie: May I ask what was the percentage of the yield, the premium or the interest coupon?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The coupon rate was 4 per cent. The issue price was $97 to yield 4.2 per cent to maturity.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would be able to give us a breakdown of the amount of $146 million-odd representing road property by region and by district. I do not want to delay the procedure and the committee could proceed to another clause if the information is not readily available.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I could give a breakdown of the figure, but I understand my hon. friend wished to have it broken down on a regional basis. I am not in a position to do that. I can give him a breakdown by nature of the properties affected, but not by regions.

Mr. Bourget: Could the minister obtain that information later on? I could wait. He could do it even tomorrow. I should like to have a breakdown by region and district.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would my hon. friend indicate if he is speaking of regions in terms of the operation of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Bourget: Yes. I think there are four or five including the western region, central region, Atlantic region, etc.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to endeavour to obtain that information for my hon. friend from the Canadian National Railways and communicate it to him.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, clause 3 includes $117,294,000 for equipment. According to the information given us by the president, of that amount approximately $11,205,000 has to do with the introduction of a central traffic control. This is a continuing program, which I gather is going to cover 10 years. The effect of this particular program upon sections of my constituency lying along the Canadian National Railway is going to be considerable. It could mean the halving of the population of almost all those particular communities, and it is certainly going to affect such things as real estate and the problems of school and community organization in a very bad way.

At the present time there seems to be no satisfactory plan that can be presented to those communities to inform them what their future is to be as a result of these expenditures on central traffic control. It would be ridiculous for any of us to object to those expenditures. I think they will go far in modernizing the railway in that part of the country and enable it to compete better with shipping and give a better service. But I want to make the point that the expenditures in connection with central traffic control are going to cause and are causing dislocation in our part of the country.

This is a point which I think the government should take note of. Because the Canadian National Railway as a corporation feels that it cannot go far enough to accept the responsibility for the dislocation and the effect this dislocation is going to have on labour mobility in the whole future of those towns, it is the responsibility of the government.

In that particular regard there is a study before the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects on the probable effects of increasing mechanization in industry. There are quite a number of points I would like to present in relation to that matter, but perhaps I can just give the concluding points to enable this bill to move along more quickly. The man who perhaps knows more than any other about the effect of automation and mechanization is Mr. Diebold, who has a book on "The Changing Picture of Automation". He is quoted at page 67 of this report as saying:

> It seems to me that there is, at this point, only one useful way of collecting, organizing and analysing the information necessary to such a study as that which I have proposed:—

That is, a study of the factors involved in such things as central traffic control. This is the point that I want to make to the government:

> —a detailed case by case approach to a number of specific industries which are regarded as typical of the several kinds of automation practised today.

This is typical of a certain kind of automation which is being introduced here. With the Canadian National Railway we have an excellent chance to do a real case study. Mr. Diebold goes on:

> The schedule of industry and labour spokesmen to be witnesses to these hearings—

These were hearings in the United States:

> —indicates, it seems to me, that the members of the committee also consider such an approach valuable.

In other words, this expert on automation and its effects is plumping for case study wherever you can possibly get it in order to determine the effects. I submit that as a result of expenditures by the C.N.R., when authorized by this bill, we will have this problem right across the country, but specifically at four divisional points in the constituency of Port Arthur. I would certainly like the minister to tell me something about it so we can get some idea of the effect of this expenditure upon our whole employment pattern and even on the social life in those communities in the future. Referring to the Canadian scene this particular report concludes:

> But we must all resist any temptation to postpone action "till all the facts are in." They never will be. They never can be, not even with all the giant computers working full time. Too many different things are constantly happening too fast and all together. We must investigate and study and plan; but we must also act, and act promptly, on the basis of the facts we have and the new facts as they come in.

I suggest that these changes and the new equipment which has been introduced and is being introduced by the Canadian National Railways by these expenditures here and the gross capital expenditures are creating just the kind of problems that are talked about here. I think it is of fundamental importance that we do some planning and more study of it now. I know the Minister of Finance who is shepherding this bill is not the person in the government who is most directly involved, but the whole problem will appeal to him as something that can be faced with a view to bringing these particular points before the government. If the government does not move within the next two or three years to handle the particular problems on that basis I think we are going to be faced with the danger of some of the dirtiest strikes and some of the greatest bitterness that this country has ever had.

Mr. Garland: I notice the item of $12,510,000 for branch line construction. Can the minister give the details of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are five new branch lines which are contemplated under this item, aggregating $12,510,000. The first is Hillsport-Manitouwadge, $60,000; then Beattyville-Chibougamau-St. Felicien, $7,300,000; Bartibog-Heath Steele Mines, $200,000; Sipiwesk-Thompson, $4,500,000; Optic lake-Chisel lake, $2 million. That is a total of $14,060,000. Then there is one sum to be subtracted as a subsidy to Beattyville-Chibougamau-St. Felicien of $1,550,000, leaving a residue of $12,510,000.

Mr. Garland: Are there other branch line projects receiving consideration?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that there are other proposals that are constantly before the railway and under consideration. These are the ones that are embraced in the plan of capital expenditure for this year.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 11—Auditors.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister will tell us why he is changing the auditors of the Canadian National Railways system?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I can probably answer this, as it is on my recommendation that the auditors be changed, since the Canadian National Railways come under my jurisdiction. It is simply this. The firm of George A. Touche and Company have done the auditing for the past 23 years. This government is against monopoly; we are fundamentally opposed to it, and believe that in the interests of the free enterprise system various business firms should have opportunities from time to time to do work of this kind. It is for that reason that the auditors are being changed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister how you overcome monopoly by simply substituting one monopoly for another. Only one firm is involved in doing the auditing work of the C.N.R., and I just do not follow the logic of the minister's statement that he is doing away with monopoly when he changes the monopoly from one auditing firm to another.

Mr. Hees: It is very simple. One firm, the firm of George A. Touche and Company, has had this audit for the past 23 years. They have carried it out each year for the past 23 years, and we believe it is a good thing for first class auditing firms to have a chance to carry out an important task of this kind. It is for that reason that a new auditor is being appointed at this time.

Mr. McIlraith: I understand they are being appointed on the recommendation of the minister. Did the Minister of Finance concur?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a government bill. My hon. friend realizes that this is a government bill, and the government is asking parliament to make the appointment contemplated in clause 11. There was a time when the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways system was made by the minister. That was the situation until 1932. Then the law was amended to provide that the appointment should be made by resolution of the two houses. Then the legislation was amended in 1935 to provide that the appointment should be made annually by parliament, that is to say in the form of a statute.

It was the practice in the intervening years down to 1954 for a separate bill to be brought in each year for the appointment of auditors. Sometimes there have been debates on that question. Those who were in the house in 1947 will remember the very vigorous challenge delivered by Mr. James Sinclair, M.P., against the appointment proposed in the bill. But since 1954 it has been the practice, as the hon. member for Ottawa West will recall, to include the provision for the appointment of auditors in the annual C.N.R. financing bill, and in that period it has taken the form of a clause in the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Transport tells us that the auditors who are being released have been doing this work for the last 23 years. Would he give us his authority for that statement? It is not in accordance with my knowledge of the facts and understanding of the matter.

Mr. Hees: I would be very interested to hear what the hon. member's authority is. It is my understanding that these auditors were appointed by the Liberal government in 1936 and that they have carried out the audit every year since. If he has any other information I will be interested in hearing it. I have discussed this matter with Touche and Company and that is the information they give me. I should think they would know who has been doing the audit.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister will consult the statutes of Canada, 1934, he will discover that George A. Touche and Company were appointed as auditors in that year by the government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

Mr. McIlraith: And in all the previous years of his government and also back to 1923.

Mr. Hees: Perhaps the executives of Touche and Company do not know when they were appointed.

Mr. McIlraith: I think it is the minister who does not know.

Mr. Hees: However, Mr. Wilson, the president of the company, told me that they were appointed in the spring of 1936 and have done the audit consistently ever since.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Ottawa West have overlooked the fact that the Clarkson firm was appointed in 1935. The Touche firm was appointed again in 1936 and has been appointed annually since.

Mr. McIlraith: And was appointed before 1935.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, they had been the auditors for a time prior to 1935.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right, since 1923. Therefore the information given the house by the Minister of Transport is quite inaccurate.

Mr. Hees: No, the information given the house by the Minister of Transport was 100 per cent accurate. I said that George A. Touche and Company had been appointed in 1936, as they were, and had done the auditing for a straight 23 years. I believe the Clarkson Company did the auditing for one year before that and Touche and Company for a number of years before that, but my statement was that Touche and Company had done it continuously for 23 years, and that statement is correct.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister give us any other reason he has for discharging the Touche firm, bearing in mind all the experience they have had in auditing the books of the railway company since 1923 with the exception of one year? Would the minister explain to the committee just what benefit is to be gained by throwing away all that experience in favour of a new auditing firm?

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to do so. After 22 years of continuous Liberal government the people of Canada overwhelmingly decided that a new party should have the job of running the affairs of the country. I believe that after 23 years of continuous auditing, or 35 years out of the last 36, whatever it was, it is a good thing to give other firms the opportunity to do important work of this kind instead of conferring a monopoly on any one firm.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, since this appointment is made on the minister's recommendation I should like to ask him whether the fact that this monopoly has been given to one of the defeated Conservative candidates in the city of Montreal has any bearing on the qualifications?

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to answer that cheap, political question. The fact of Mr. De Lalanne being a defeated Conservative candidate has had no effect whatsoever upon this appointment. In fact, what has had more effect on the appointment is the fact that his colleagues in the chartered accountancy business did him the honour this year of choosing him to be president of the Canadian chartered accountants' association, thereby showing that they hold him in very high regard as a colleague.

Mr. McIlraith: So that it will be available in Hansard I should like to question the wisdom of the minister in making a change of accounting firms for the reasons or lack of reasons stated by him at a time when expenditures of taxpayers' money on the railway system are fairly substantial. I would point out to the committee that the Auditor General does not have any part in the auditing of these accounts, and it is a pretty serious thing when the taxpayers' money is involved that the appointment of auditors should become merely a matter of patronage at the whim of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think that remark should be allowed to pass unchallenged. This is not something done at the whim of the Minister of Transport, and that has been made abundantly plain. I wonder what my hon. friend had to say in 1936 when a change was made.

Mr. McIlraith: A change was made to revert to the auditors who had audited the accounts of the railway system under both Liberal and Conservative governments. I would point out that the Minister of Transport has repudiated the action of the Conservative government in the period 1930 to 1935.

Mr. Hees: I would be very much interested in hearing the opinion of the hon. member for Ottawa West regarding how long he believes a firm of auditors should be continued on a job of this kind. Once they have started does he believe they should be continued for 45 years, 68 years, 85 years, 99 years or how long?

Mr. McIlraith: The answer is very simple. They should be continued as long as they continue to do a thoroughly efficient job, and as long as the committee of the House of Commons that examines their financial statements can find no fault with them and does not find any weakness in their auditing system. In other words, the period of time is to be gauged by the efficiency of the service and the competence of the service they perform and not merely by the number of years.

Mr. Fisher: On this particular point most of the questions I wanted to ask have been asked. I just wanted reassurance from the Minister of Transport as he is the spokesman in this matter. There was not any particular question of inefficiency as to the Touche Company and there was not any particular question or feeling that there was political patronage involved with this company having had it for such a long period of time?

Mr. Hees: I am very glad to answer those two very sensible questions. It is nice to hear sensible questions for a change. The answer is that there were no political considerations in this case whatsoever, as I stated earlier, and there has at no time been any question as to the ability or the efficiency of the George A. Touche firm.

Mr. Pearson: Why discharge them?

Mr. Fisher: After that very complimentary answer, I can only say that I want to compliment the minister for his indication that he is now anti-monopoly and I might say a trust buster. We hope to see him out with the Minister of Justice skirmishing with the large corporations and making sure that monopoly does not flourish in Canada and that we can get back to genuine free enterprise.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

158. Remission service, including $50,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies as may be approved by treasury board, $319,194

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 158 carry?

Mr. Fisher: I do not want to speak on this item but I wonder whether the minister would be agreeable to allowing us to come back to it in a few minutes. In the meantime I shall get in touch with the hon. member for Vancouver East who, I understand, wanted to raise some questions in connection with it.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 158 stand by leave?

160. Administration, $131,238.

Mr. Hardie: I have not the page in front of me, but I think this item deals with the Northwest Territories. I am wondering whether the minister can tell me whether there are two kinds of inquests in Canada, one for the Northwest Territories and one for the provinces.

Mr. Fulton: I think the position is that the form of inquest and the requirements and procedures to be followed at inquests are regulated by the various provinces; and certainly inquests to be carried out in the Northwest Territories and the forms and procedures are settled by the relevant ordinance of the Northwest Territories council.

Mr. Hardie: In the case of an inquest, who would appoint the coroner?

Mr. Fulton: I have no knowledge of this matter but I believe the appointment of coroners would be settled by the commissioner. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that details in that regard would properly be sought under the estimates of my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources who has responsibility in parliament for reporting on these matters. We in the Department of Justice are responsible only for the administration of justice in the courts of the Northwest Territories and the matter of appointment of coroners would, as I understand it, be an administrative matter not related to the jurisdiction of this department with respect to the administration of the courts.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister quite satisfied that what my hon. friend is asking about would not be covered under item No. 161?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. Item No. 161 covers the Northwest Territories territorial court. My hon. friend will see "Northwest Territories territorial court". There is a statutory item "Judges' salary and travelling allowance" et cetera. Then item No. 161, "Administation, including administration of justice—Northwest Territories". As the set-up in the estimate goes, I think it will be found that that refers to the administration of the Northwest Territories territorial court.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, it does not mean the administration of justice in the sense in which it is used in section 92 of the British North America Act? Perhaps I could make my point in another way to the minister. Is the minister the attorney general for the Northwest Territories or is someone else the attorney general for them?

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Justice is the attorney general for the Northwest Territories. However, I am also informed that the Northwest Territories Act governs matters such as the appointment of coroners in the Northwest Territories. For instance, I am quite certain that I do not appoint coroners in the same way that I recommend the appointment of judges. As I understand it, that is a matter of administration which falls under my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister could give us the assurance that this matter could be discussed in an unrestricted way on the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, I imagine my hon. friend would be quite satisfied.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand the position, there would be no way in which discussion could be limited,—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is to say, whatever discussion is proper.

Mr. Fulton: —apart from the rules of the house. I am not familiar with the detailed information of the Northwest Territories. Therefore my answer cannot be taken as meaning anything further than what I say. I understand that will be the proper place to discuss the matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 160 carry?

164. Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, $79,120.

Mr. Howard: I think it would be well to be able to discuss the general questions arising out of the operation of the restrictive trade practices commission and the office of investigation and research which is in the next vote under this item because the two votes overlap. I wonder whether that procedure would be all right with the minister, if we should wander a little bit far afield. I am suggesting that there are two votes here, one dealing with the restrictive trade practices branch and the other with the investigation and research branch, and I am wondering whether it would not be well to have them overlap in our discussions?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howard: With respect to the Combines Investigation Act itself, which, in my opinion, is one of the most important pieces of legislation in Canada, I may say that it has been revised periodically and probably should be revised again in the light of developments over the past few years. I should like to have the minister, if he would, give the committee an indication of the scope of the operations of the administrators of these two groups which are established under that act, particularly in the light of an article which appeared in the Financial Post about the middle of June of this year, I believe it was, which indicated that there may be a change in view on the part of the officials administering the act or the government concerning the rules applying to mergers, combines, monopolies and other similar organizations.

I wonder whether the minister could indicate, in a general way at first, the effect of the operations of the act, and especially whether there is any change in attitude of the administrators or the minister as indicated in the article which appeared in the Financial Post.

Mr. Fulton: I think I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the article was one which reflected the views and opinions of the writer, not of the minister or of the department. I have said, I think in the house since taking office and elsewhere, that we are making a study of the general scheme of the combines legislation as it is in effect in Canada today. My hon. friend will appreciate that there have been alterations to similar legislation in other countries, notably in the United Kingdom in recent years. I think it behooves any government, especially one taking office for the first time after a good many years, to make a study of matters of this kind and especially of matters of this kind which are so inextricably interrelated with questions of economic policy. It is in that sense I have, on the various occasions when I have spoken, indicated that we are making a study of the combines legislation, and of its impact on Canadian economic interests. I used the words "economic interests" as applied to the nation and not as applied to particular individuals.

It is in that light we are studying it. We are making particular studies, of course, of particular aspects of it, such as those which arise under section 34 and under section 412 of the Criminal Code which present particular problems within the over-all study to which I have referred. Having said that, I come back to the statement I made at the beginning. I can take no responsibility for the views expressed in the article in the Financial Post.

Mr. Howard: If I could elaborate a bit there, I might say that from what I can recall from reading this particular article, it arose out of a report of the restrictive trade practices commission on yeast. Apparently there was an opinion expressed in that report—I am not trying to interpret the report but merely to relate my remembrance of it—relating to the detriment, if any, to the general public of this particular merger in the yeast industry, or the acquisition of one company by another. In earlier reports of the commission dealing with similar types of mergers there was no reference to the degree of effect that it would have on the general public, so this report was taken to be a departure from the approach in the past.

Mr. Fulton: As I recall there was no departure in this report from what has been the practice in the past. The act itself now, and for many years, has authorized the procedure under which, if the commission itself is of the opinion that there is no evidence of an offence or nothing in the subject that they have investigated which warrants further action, then they may so report and recommend to the minister that no further action be taken; that provision has been in the act for some time.

[Mr. Fulton.]

In the case of this particular inquiry into yeast, the commission found, as I recall, that there was no evidence of an offence. There had been, in fact, a merger, but it was not a merger which brought the companies concerned within the terms of the legislation which requires evidence of detriment to the public. In effect, they found that the company, while effecting a merger which did give an increased measure of control, that measure of control had not proceeded to the point where it was likely to be detrimental to the public. It was inherent in their findings, if it was not explicit, that any further activities of this sort, any further mergers or acquisition of other companies in this field would, however, be very likely to bring the whole situation within the territory where there might well be an offence under the act.

Mr. Howard: If I understood the minister correctly with respect to that last part of his comment—his comments related to the yeast industry, did they?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howard: If there were any further acquisitions or mergers by this company, then it might come within the ambit of the legislation?

Mr. Fulton: I think to put it correctly, that would represent circumstances warranting a further investigation to establish whether or not, in fact, that further acquisition did not constitute an offence under the act.

Mr. Howard: Of course, we might get into the question of whether or not monopolies, by themselves, are detrimental, and what action can be taken with respect to them. From what I can recall of this yeast merger, Standard Brands, I believe it was, was the large company which acquired the control or bought out some other company. This, in effect, gave Standard Brands 100 per cent control over the production of one type of yeast and 85 per cent or 80 per cent control over the production of other types of yeast in Canada. Only one other company was left in the yeast producing business, and that was confined to the province of Quebec. In effect, therefore, the acquisition by Standard Brands Limited of this other company placed them in a position of having a virtual monopoly in the production, distribution and sale of yeast in Canada, with the exception of the province of Quebec.

If that situation is correctly stated or if a similar situation arose, in what position is that monopoly with respect to the legislation? Would these facts, by themselves, constitute an offence?

Mr. Fulton: In the case of a merger the requirements of the act under section 2 are that the merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interests of the public, whether consumers, producers or others. The commission, in this case, found that the facts disclosed on the inquiry led to certain conclusions.

Firstly, that no monopolistic intent was shown on the part of Standard Brands and, secondly, that the price paid by Standard Brands for Best Yeast was not shown to be excessive, nor was Best Yeast pressured to sell but, on the contrary, the approach came from Best Yeast. As I recall it, Best Yeast was in a strong financial position. They made the approach. They said: if you will pay us a reasonable price we would rather sell out than continue in operation.

Thirdly, the reasons given by Standard Brands for the acquisition, that is to provide needed expansion of capacity and reduce freight costs by having better located plants, appear to be sound business reasons.

I might elaborate on that a little. If you have a business or an enterprise, such as many are in Canada, where very large sums of capital are required to get into that business, then anything whereby competition is lessened, or competitors are acquired, naturally tends to place the person acquiring it in a very powerful monopolistic position. But where you have a form of activity with regard to which no great sums of capital are required in order to be able to enter, and where the channels of distribution are relatively open and free so that entering into that business is, on the face of it, not terribly difficult, the mere acquisition by one company of a competitor does not, in that field, place the company in a very powerful position. That is what the commission had in mind in referring to this factor.

They further found that the slight increase in the price of Best Yeast to the jobber which apparently resulted from the merger may have been accompanied by an improvement in quality and cannot be said to involve detriment to the public.

On the basis of these factors the commission found there was no creation of a monopoly to the detriment of the public, but they did, as I say, warn that this merger has considerably narrowed both existing competition and the opportunity for competition in the industry, and that it has strengthened what may be called Standard Brands monopoly position.

I would sum up as follows: In the result, the commission was not convinced that the public interest had been so affected as to justify it recommending action to dissolve the merger. Its concern at the reduction in competition and the possibility of long term injury arising from the near monopoly position created led it, however, to express the opinion that Standard Brands should not be permitted to acquire either Lallemand's, of which there was no immediate suggestion, or any new competitor that might enter the present field.

It amounts to a finding that there was no evidence sufficient to warrant a finding of a monopoly operating against the interest of the public, but there was evidence which warranted the commission keeping a close eye on the situation and issuing a warning that further activities along these lines would immediately result in further investigation.

Mr. Fisher: Following along the same line, and referring to the question of the press in Canada, especially the daily press, we have no particular monopoly except in specific towns and, in a sense, these monopolies make sense because a competitor could not make a go of it with any reasonable financial chance. But there has been a considerable growth of newspaper chains in this country which is tending toward a monopoly and there has also been the development of a co-operative press organization, the Canadian Press, which in effect means that a member of the Canadian Press is in a perfect position in competition with anyone who may intend to get into the business but who does not belong to the Canadian Press, and according to the Canadian Press regulations as they are presently set up it is almost impossible for a new enterprise to get going in that field and to be accepted by the Canadian Press.

With regard to this question of the development of chains in the newspaper area and the control of this system of sending press information across the country, is the combines investigation branch watching developments in this particular field at all?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think it has become public knowledge that we are looking into one particular case of a mutual arrangement made between two newspapers in Canada, and we are aware of the position of the Canadian Press in the sense in which the hon. gentleman refers to it. If any specific case comes to our attention whereby the existence of this agency were used to foster a monopoly by one newspaper or any combination of newspapers, we would, of course, be prepared to investigate.

Mr. Fisher: I have no particular case to refer to, but I wanted to make sure the minister was watching it because in the lakehead community, which in a sense is a unit, we have two newspapers and the owner of one of them has died recently. There was a certain fear expressed on the part of some people, including myself, that the chain which owns the paper in the other town is trying to purchase, and if it should do so it would leave us in that area without any competition at all, which is the cause of some concern. But, of course, we cannot ask the combines branch to take any sort of a priori action.

One of the points I wanted to raise in connection with combines—and the minister will remember that last year I raised the same point that was raised by the hon. member for Skeena today,—was this new policy towards which the department is working, and there are a couple of other points I wanted to deal with also. I want to ask the minister whether he can comment on an article called "Anti-combines and Injury to the Public," written by Mr. George W. Wilson, which reads, in part as follows:

> In recent years certain business interests, lawyers, and professional economists have been insisting that the Combines Commission be required to demonstrate more than an "undue lessening of competition" to obtain a conviction under the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. What is being suggested is that the commission prove that the economic consequences of the anti-competitive business practices complained of are less desirable from the public point of view than they would have been in the absence of such restrictive activities.

Is that one of the points on which the minister and his officials are trying to determine policy, or are they prepared now to say that do not agree with this general criticism put forward?

Mr. Fulton: It is too early to give an opinion on that, because we have not formed a conclusion. But that is one of the more significant aspects of the jurisprudence which has been developed as a result of recent cases, and it would be foolish of me to deny that there are various elements in the country which regard that aspect with a great deal of concern. They have brought it to my attention; we have said we will look into it and say whether in our view there is any change to be made in the jurisprudence in that respect.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister assure us that the policy when it is enunciated will not be based purely on economic considerations, but that political and employment considerations will come into it?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, indeed, and I suppose, to be frank, I should admit that no one in my position could make any decision divorced from political considerations—certainly not a provision of that kind.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Howard: There is a provision with respect to monopolies and it relates to research into monopolies and their effect upon the economy, is that not so?

Mr. Fulton: There is section 42 of the act which authorizes the commission to institute inquiries of its own motion into trade practices generally. Perhaps I should read it. Section 42, subsection 1 of the Combines Investigations Act reads as follows:

> 42. (1) The director upon his own initiative may and upon direction from the minister or at the instance of the commission shall carry out an inquiry concerning the existence and effect of conditions or practices having relation to any commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce and which conditions or practices are related to monopolistic situations or restraint of trade, and for the purposes of this act any such inquiry shall be deemed to be an inquiry under section 8.

Mr. Howard: What is the position of the court, if it gets to the court, with respect to prosecutions and penalties against monopolies themselves as differentiated, if there is a differentiation, from combines?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the hon. gentleman means would there be any difference in the position if charges were laid as the result of an investigation started under section 42 or whether they are laid as the result of an investigation commenced in another way. I think if charges were laid then the courts would be in exactly the same position no matter what had been the occasion of the commencement of the investigation. But I should say the purpose of section 42 is rather to conduct the sort of inquiry which might lead to the consideration of recommendations for changes in legislation rather than to laying charges in court.

Mr. Howard: That is what I had rather expected was the situation, that this was primarily for research purposes and that arising out of it some change in legislative approach might develop with respect to monopolies themselves. I imagine there has been some research along these lines of monopolies and their effect. Could the minister indicate what the results of these inquiries and that research have been with respect to monopolies?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that there are four in process, one in the field of automobile insurance, one in the field of antibiotics, one in the field of discriminatory pricing and the fourth in the field of tires, batteries and accessories. These inquiries are in process. There are two before the commission now, the one relating to discriminatory pricing and the other relating to automobile insurance. These inquiries are completed as far as the director is concerned and are before the commission for consideration and recommendation. The other two inquiries have not yet been completed by the director. When we receive the report of the commission we will then be in a position to make some further assessments as to whether, and if so what changes in legislation might be indicated as a result of these inquiries.

Mr. Howard: At the present time, though, apart from what the commission may report, in the minister's opinion at the moment, without taking into account what may be in the report, could he give us any indication what his views are with respect to the legislative program as it would apply to monopolies. Are there any in that field?

Mr. Fulton: I do not think I can give any indication of that. The whole field is being studied and my first responsibility is to make my own conclusions and then draft a set of recommendations and present them to my colleagues in cabinet. Until that is done and until cabinet has accepted, rejected or modified any recommendations that may be made I do not think I am free to hint at what my own views are.

Mr. Hanbidge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if there has been any investigation with regard to fixing the price of fish on the Pacific coast. I should like particularly to know what is the present status of any investigation that has been carried on.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is such an inquiry and it has been referred to on several occasions in this house. It is well advanced. The taking of evidence has been completed and the evidence is now being compiled so that a statement of the evidence can be laid before the commission.

Mr. Hanbidge: I am referring particularly to the united fishermen's organization.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. As far as I am aware that is the only inquiry into the field of fish prices that is under way and it was to that inquiry that I had reference in my previous answer.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the minister has one particular case in relation to combines investigations that spills over, as it were, surprisingly enough into the field of agriculture and comes under the purview of the Department of Agriculture.

As the minister probably knows there has been a fairly strong demand in certain parts of the country that there be support prices established for pulpwood. That demand has been especially strong in the maritimes and Quebec and it is present to a degree in eastern and northwestern Ontario. There are a number of difficulties involved in the government establishing a floor price on that commodity. One of the main difficulties is the fact that there is a report concerning the purchase of pulpwood in certain districts in eastern Canada which would dynamite the establishment of any sort of a fair price because, if the information in this document is correct, it would indicate that a fair price has not been paid up until now. This means we are rather chasing our tail in this particular regard. We are not going to get a floor price until we can get something definite in terms of what the floor price should be. We have not had a just market price if the report is correct so how do we get out of the difficulty and arrive at a fair floor price? That is a problem for the Minister of Agriculture but I should like to know what the Minister of Justice could do in speeding up the matter and what are his opinions on it.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, as the hon. member himself has said, the question of a floor price for pulpwood is a matter for the Minister of Agriculture. There are, I think, other difficulties in the way in addition to any difficulty that may arise as a result of this report and any prosecutions that may result. There is the fact that in many cases pulpwood is not grown by farmers but is grown by others. How do you in fact set a support price for pulpwood?

In so far as the situation may be affected by this report and action taken thereunder, as I have informed the house the matter has been referred to counsel in the city of Montreal with instructions for prosecution and I can assure my hon. friend that although these cases being complicated, difficult and technical always take a surprisingly long time, nevertheless we do not anticipate any excessive or undue delay in disposing of this matter.

Mr. Fisher: Could the minister say from talking with his commissioner that the combines commission should be in a position to give the Department of Agriculture advice as to what a just market price would have been if it had not been for the restrictive trade set-up that was in operation? In other words, if the Department of Agriculture has to get information and establish a fair price, is the combines investigations commissioner in a position to advice the minister what a fair price might have been?

Mr. Fulton: No. I think it would be quite improper for the combines commission or the restrictive trade practices commission to enter into that sort of field at all, but information might be obtained from the report itself and from the facts disclosed there. We are not concerned with the detail of whether this or that particular price was too low or too high. Our responsibility is to assess whether prices have been affected by the activities of the companies concerned on the one hand, and also whether the activities of those companies, or whether there is evidence that the activities of those companies, constitute an offence under the combines legislation. We are not qualified, nor is it any part of our responsibility, to make recommendations as to what the price actually might have been or should be.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, one other matter in connection with combines; I have here a copy of a letter from the general manager of the garage operators' association in Ontario which was sent to the minister on May 29, 1958. The substance of the letter is contained in three paragraphs. These paragraphs read:

> The governors and directors of the garage operators' association are greatly concerned by a practice of the oil companies in Ontario which the association's legal advisers have instructed is perhaps both contrary to the combines act and also contrary to the Unfair Competition Act, and in fact and law is likely in restraint of trade.
> This practice of the oil companies involves gasoline price wars where prices are reduced by one station serving one type of gas across a community and the gas station attendant is sponsored and recompensed by the gas company and still will go on for some time, one company bettering the offer of another and then suddenly the war comes to an end on the last day and oddly enough the price of gas ends up being the same as it started on the same day for every company in the community and at the same level.
> Although for obvious reasons this may be amusing to the oil companies, it is a great injustice to the public and to the small operator.

That is the end of the paragraphs that I feel carry the meat of the complaint. Whenever one raises questions in regard to this he realizes that perhaps he is prodding into areas that would be just as well left unprodded until some definite action is taken. Since this particular complaint is such a pertinent one right at the present time when gasoline wars are going on in various parts of the province of Ontario,—and I gather also out in Manitoba—can the minister indicate the scope of any possible action in connection with this? Does it look as though it is worth while proceeding on the basis of complaints that have been received so far?

Mr. Fulton: The complaints allege matters which, if substantiated, would warrant investigation with regard to discriminatory pricing contrary to section 412 of the Criminal Code. That was the allegation made by those who brought it to our attention. As a result of this complaint the director interviewed two of the officials of the associations bringing them to our attention, and he has consulted with them as to the specific nature of the complaint, and the situations complained about are under study in the branch with a view to making a more formal inquiry or investigation as soon as staff is available who are now engaged on other inquiries. Until the inquiry is launched and more specific facts are ascertained we could not give any indication of the direction in which the inquiry may lead us.

Mr. Fisher: What is the staff situation in your department at the present time to handle what may be an increasing amount of business? Have any attempts been made in the past year, let us say, to extend the scope of the activities and has the minister the men to do it?

Mr. Fulton: At the present time the staff is normal in comparison with past years. There are always some vacancies but we are carrying out a competition at the present time with a view to recruiting staff in the category of inquiry officers. If there should be any increase in the numbers of inquiries to be undertaken we shall be in a position to deal with them. The staff has also increased but are fully engaged, particularly the director personally, in the studies and discussion which I have indicated which are taking place with regard to a general review of combines legislation.

Mr. Howard: I have a question arising out of the minister's last comments with respect to staff. Can he indicate whether there is a backlog of cases to be inquired into and whether he finds when a complaint is raised either by six people or by an order given by the minister, or the director on his own initiative decides to make an inquiry, these things pile up because of a lack of staff members?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed there is always some backlog of cases under inquiry at the end of a fiscal year. On March 31, 1958, the close of the last fiscal year, some 30 inquiries were waiting to be proceeded with as against 20, the average of the previous fiscal years. That is one of the reasons why we have conducted this competition for the selection of further junior officers.

Mr. Howard: How many officers are there?

Mr. Fulton: I believe I said 30 inquiries awaiting attention; a more accurate phrase would be proceeding, as against an average of 20 at the close of previous fiscal years.

Mr. Howard: How many junior officers were you conducting this competition for?

Mr. Fulton: We would fill up to five vacancies as a result of the competition.

Mr. Howard: If my memory serves me right the minister indicated that there were five vacancies in January when this question was last before the house. I think it was January when the estimates were last before the house. There were five vacancies then and there are five vacancies now. Is that the same five? Have they not been filled since that time?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that of those five vacancies one has been filled, but another member of the staff has left so we still have five vacancies. The competition was in process last January when I spoke. Civil service competitions do not always get finished as early as one anticipates. But the director tells me that the competition—I am not sure of the technical term—the date for applications has been closed and the civil service commission is in the process of compiling the eligible list now from which the selection will be made.

Mr. Howard: According to the details on page 244 of the estimates book, 53 employees are listed under the office of investigation and research. In actual fact, that would mean less five, would it? Five of those 53 are potential employees?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, the figures shown here would be the establishment. Therefore there would presumably be 48 actually on strength at the present time.

Mr. Howard: I do not know what qualifications you look for in these individuals or what salary structure is offered to them but in view of the qualifications required for such a position, which I appreciate must be fairly high, is the minister of the opinion that the salary structure is sufficient to attract capable people or would more capable people be attracted by higher salaries?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman will notice that the starting salary for combines investigation officers is $5,400 and rises through various grades to $11,000 for combines investigation officers and $12,500 for senior combines investigation officers. I am informed that the salary ranges compare reasonably with the rest of the public service in similar categories of skill and qualifications and that our experience in recruiting staff at these salaries is about the same as other departments.

Mr. Howard: I am going to suggest that in all probability the staff is far too small and that if it were larger the branch, merely by being larger, would be in a better position to conduct many more inquiries than are being conducted at the moment. I am sure the minister will probably agree there are many conditions existing across the country involving organizations on a nationwide basis or smaller groups in provinces or municipalities that require investigation because these organizations are in fact operating contrary to the provisions of the act. If a larger number of people were employed on the staff to investigate these cases there would be a far more beneficial effect on the economy and the general public than there is at present.

I am going to make a suggestion arising particularly from what the hon. member for Port Arthur said with respect to gasoline price wars. I have also heard comments from four or five individuals in cities across Canada that price fixing arrangements are entered into between gasoline retailers in those cities similar to the situation which existed in Vancouver a few years ago but that no action is taken to deal with them. It may well be the reason is that the matter has not been brought to the attention of the director in one way or another. In any event, if these conditions were brought to his attention and if all the other illegal practices being followed which have not come to his attention were brought to his attention the present staff would be even less able to cope with such cases than it is at the present time. I suggest that there should be an ample increase in the numbers of the staff in order to police the provisions of the act properly.

Extensive amendments were made to the act in 1952 and I suggest that since then individual corporations, feeling that it is beneficial to their business from a profit point of view to operate combines for fixing prices or to restrict distribution, markets, warehousing or anything else in order to ensure control of a certain market and the highest possible income, are finding ways and means of escaping the eye of the director. In past years it has been indicated in reports of the commission that one way in which evidence of illegal combinations came to light was through extracts from correspondence between companies with respect to how they were going to carve up markets and fix prices. However, in order to overcome that they are writing fewer letters and there are more telephone conversations with respect to price fixing and other illegal acts. Therefore it will become more difficult to ferret out and discover evidence leading to the establishment of the operation of a combine, which is what is required if we are going to be able to cope with the problem.

Even though the minister may not now have any clear idea of what changes will be made in the legislation, and I hope he will not be too long in making up his mind about necessary changes, I hope that he will indicate now that there will be an increase in the staff for the administration and policing of the Combines Investigation Act in order to ensure that under our society the interests of the public will be served.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think I should let those remarks go without comment. Possibly the hon. gentleman might be interested in this general statement of the activities of the branch as at the end of the fiscal year, March 31. Sixteen new inquiries were commenced during the 1957-58 fiscal year. The number of formal investigations of possible contravention in progress at the end of the year was 30 compared with 20 in progress at the end of the previous fiscal year. The number of general inquiries in progress was 4 against 3 at the end of the previous fiscal year. Four prosecutions were successfully concluded during the fiscal year and one prosecution was commenced. The total combined staff of the restrictive trade practices commission and the director of investigation and research was 51 at the end of the 1957-58 fiscal year compared with 50 at the end of the previous fiscal year. The staff of the director included 16 investigation officers compared with 15 at the end of the previous fiscal year. There is also the competition to which I have referred which will result in an increase of anything up to five. This would be an increase of 33⅓ per cent in the investigational staff in the office of the director which would, of course, be a very substantial increase.

Therefore I do not think there is real justification for the comments made by the hon. member. With respect to the existence of the fact to which he refers, namely that companies are finding ways and means of escaping the eye of the director, I can assure him that this is far from the case. If he sat at my desk he would know about the benevolent but watchful or should I say watchful but benevolent eye that the director keeps on the activities of these companies and he would know of the feeling of business in Canada that the director is a man who is remarkably able to exercise the supervision which it is his responsibility to exercise under the legislation under which he is appointed. Therefore I do not think the hon. member need have too much fear on that score.

Mr. Howard: I am sure the minister was not trying to construe my remarks as casting any reflection upon the director.

Mr. Fulton: No. I took the hon. member as saying that he questioned whether the director had an adequate staff to carry out his responsibilities. I can assure him that the experience of those concerned is that with comparatively small staff they do an enormous volume of work and exercise a very remarkable degree of surveillance over the field for which they are responsible.

Mr. Fisher: The only remark I wanted to make in connection with salaries is this. It seems to me that if most of these officers are going to have legal training there might be a special adjustment in the salary scale. I know the House of Commons has a great many lawyers in it. I know that here they get $10,000 a year approximately. Yet I understand from talking to almost all of them that this is a tremendous come-down. If we assume that lawyers in the House of Commons are average lawyers, it would appear that the wages paid to investigation officers are rather poor for people with that particular training.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend will appreciate that while the starting salary as reported in the blue book of estimates is $5,400, the next grade up is $7,500 and the next one is $8,300, the next $10,000 and so on. These, as they start, would be lawyers, economists and accountants who would normally be quite recent graduates from their respective professional schools. It therefore is not a case of our trying to get men who are earning large amounts in their profession and getting them to come in at small salaries. We recruit them as fairly recent graduates and then train them through the department with the increase in salaries shown here.

Mr. Fisher: My only comment is this. The fact that members start and finish at $10,000, unless they are lucky enough to become parliamentary assistants, may be the unfair part. On June 10 the minister is credited with having said in Vancouver in a speech to the retail merchants of Canada that his department is carrying out investigations into two fields, an inquiry into loss leader selling of cigarettes, electrical appliances, hardware and jewellery trade and a study of whether some types of grocery stores receive unfair price preference from the supplier; it is reported that in this address the minister said that steps are being taken to remove "artificial" obstacles to small business in Canada. This general or rather—I must be fair—slight indication of what was the meat of the minister's argument on this particular occasion I am sure would interest all of us at the present time.

As the minister is aware, across Canada—and usually out of a local marketing situation—small merchandisers are wrought up over the fact that, for example, the big chain is able to offer cigarettes so much more cheaply. The appeal of the small retailer and the small merchant is a very powerful one, as the minister himself has remarked. What is his general thinking with regard to the way in which this particular problem can be attacked by the combines investigation branch? With the number of officers that was mentioned that they had, surely it is apparent that they cannot attack this problem on a continental scale; that their way of attacking it has to be based upon picking some specific market and trying to use that as an example right across the country. I wonder just how effective that approach would be. Perhaps that is not the approach that the minister had in mind when he announced this matter. I would appreciate hearing his comments in regard to this problem.

Mr. Fulton: To mention some of the inquiries that have been instituted, inquiries into cigarettes or practices with regard to cigarettes have been instituted both in Edmonton and Toronto and also Ottawa and Hamilton; and with regard to electrical appliances in Vancouver. With regard to discriminatory prices in the grocery trade, that inquiry is a general inquiry which will take in the whole of the country.

With regard to the availability of staff to carry out these inquiries, as I have pointed out there are 30 formal investigations of possible contraventions and 4 general inquiries under way at the present time. As to what the restrictive trade practices branch might do to help small business, of course the completion of these studies will give us an indication of what should be done. If in fact it is shown that the section regarding unfair trade practices is not an adequate protection then we will know whether we require additional legislation. I might say that the most universally expressed desire of small businessmen in so far as matters in our field is concerned is for the repeal of section 34. These men say that they have lost the protection against the big chains which the resale price maintenance system formerly gave them. They say that they are now at the mercy of unfair selling practices, loss leader practices and so on. It is to give us a fresh starting point or a starting point to assess what action we can take in this department that will be helpful that these inquiries are under way.

My remarks at Vancouver referred also to the proposal made by the government to set up a small business section within the administrative machinery of government to which these men might bring their problems. Ours is only one of the aspects of the problems with which small business is faced in the field for which this department is responsible.

Mr. Fisher: The minister by his comments indicates that he is aware that there is a paradox in this whole problem of small business. The position of small businessmen and the sort of rat trap they have got themselves into appeals to us because we like the idea of the small businessman having an opportunity, especially in the line of competition. Yet to save the small businessmen in a sense we have to wipe out the advantages that very large organizations are able to obtain through competitive means. I wonder whether the minister can express an opinion or his views on whether, if the small businessmen or the small merchants are given the kind of legislation that will enable them to get away from this unfair advantage that they feel the big companies have, we will be getting ourselves into the situation where we are actually denying the whole essence of the legislation itself which is to encourage competition.

Mr. Fulton: I think I must say that the hon. gentleman has put his finger on the very problem that we have to wrestle with. I do not know that I can do much more than put the matter in that way. It is certainly the policy of this government, as I understand it, to encourage the maximum degree or the maximum number of independent enterprises. The traditional way of putting the matter is, of course, whether you want to see the small independent corner grocery maintained or whether you want to see people served by a chain store. To reconcile the steps which may be required to be taken to protect the small independent operator on the one hand with the desire to maintain the maximum of competition on the other hand is the problem with which we are faced. That is one of the thorny problems towards which this study is directed. It is not an easy one to solve. That is why I make no forecast as to when I will be in a position to make a recommendation beyond saying what I have said, namely that we hope we can resolve our thinking on this and other aspects of the matter in time to make recommendations for next session.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to leave this question by making these two points. I had a conversation the other day with a gentleman who told me several years ago about a combine that was operating in the fine papers business. As the minister knows, proceedings were taken. There was an investigation followed by some prosecutions. The information he gave me was that so far as he was concerned, and he is in the specialty field dealing with retailers and wholesalers of paper, the combine is just as strong as ever despite what may have taken place. I asked him to give me this information in printed form with signatures so that I could use it. He refused because he said he was thinking of his own protection. I just wanted to make that point. This gentleman felt that this particular situation still exists despite the activities of the combines branch and the prosecutions that have been undertaken.

I believe I mentioned this other point last year. It has been brought to my attention again by a man in the automobile business who refused to put his name to a sheet of paper because he is involved with one of the big automobile manufacturers. He insists that there is a system of kickbacks arranged so far as the financing of automobiles is concerned, depending on the volume of business done. In other words a man who is selling cars and who has a very large volume of business is able to arrange for certain kickbacks with the acceptance corporations at the beginning of a year's financial operations which give him a much better margin on which to work in selling the cars on credit than the smaller dealer is able to obtain.

As I say, I asked this man to put these facts on paper but he said if he did he would just get himself into trouble since most of the people about whom he would be complaining were in the business with some of the acceptance corporations and some of the large automobile companies. I should like the minister to have his commissioner take an interest in this problem, if possible, to ascertain if there is any substance to this charge.

Mr. Fulton: I can assure the hon. gentleman we will be very glad to do that. I can assure him also that if any person feels a reluctance to reveal his name or put the matter in writing, if he calls at the office of the director he may be seen personally and the interview will be entirely confidential. It may well be that if information is given which results in a prosecution, at that stage witnesses might have to come forward. Certainly, however, in the preliminary stages, until we get the matter advanced to the point where a decision as to further action has to be taken, an interview can be entirely confidential.

Indeed I see no reason why the name of an informant should not be confidential throughout until it becomes a matter of gathering evidence. As I said a few moments ago, it would seem to me that the gathering of that type of evidence would not involve revealing the name of the person who first gave the lead to the inquiry. I think it would be safe for me to assure my hon. friend that he can tell his informant that if he cares to come to the office of the director of research and investigation there can be a discussion there that can be kept confidential.

Mr. Fisher: Last year I had an interview with the director, and he was kind enough to give me some advice in connection with pulpwood prices. As you know, if you can get six people to request an inquiry it has to proceed. I was supremely confident that I could get six people. I landed home in my constituency and went canvassing, but I have to be quite frank and say I was only able to get two names, although I could get dozens of people who would agree with the general complaint. It is for this reason I know that particular section of the act does not work too well in initiating investigations. I am hopeful that the commissioner will not hesitate at all to act on his own initiative in following these leads. We welcome the assurances that have been given that the minister gives his whole-hearted support to these activities.

Mr. Howard: May I ask one other question? The other day the minister, in response to a question of mine, indicated that Mr. Meighen in the city of Winnipeg—

Mr. Fulton: Brandon.

Mr. Howard: —in the city of Brandon, had been retained to study the evidence relating to the acquisition of Manitoba Sugar Company by B.C. Sugar Company, and to proceed with a prosecution if he felt there was sufficient evidence. Could the minister indicate what the position is with respect to that matter at the moment?

Mr. Fulton: The counsel named is studying the evidence. He was instructed on July 10 and we have not had a report from him as yet. It is a little early to expect one.

Item agreed to.

165. Office of investigation and research, $446,321.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if the director of investigation and research, under the Combines Investigation Act, either independently or through the royal commission on patents, has made any recent study to ascertain whether the Canadian patent system has been used by the holders of Canadian patents in a manner that might be considered to be detrimental to industrial growth in Canada?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that the office has not made any study of patents, as a general study of inquiry. Patents do come up incidentally in connection with our cases and are then dealt with on an ad hoc basis.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries—

167. Administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries, including $60,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, as may be approved by the treasury board, $518,701.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Fulton: Would my hon. friend permit me to interrupt a moment? We allowed item 158 to stand, remission services. Before we go on to penitentiaries, may we either revert to that or carry it as part of the department itself?

The Chairman: Shall 158 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winch: On 167 again, then, may I say that I realize the present minister has only been in this post since June of last year. I am wondering whether or not it is possible now for him to give a review of his study of the penitentiary situation since he has taken office, and what he has in mind for the future with reference to that type of institution. I know that we will have before us in a few days a motion for second reading of the parole bill, so I am not going to discuss that phase of penitentiaries. Only a few days ago the minister announced that he hopes, within a period of the next two months, to have a meeting between his departmental officials and the attorneys general of the provinces concerning the major sections of the Fauteux report. Even although these announcements have been made by the minister, could he give us a little more information as to just what he has in mind with regard to the penitentiary system itself, and the inmates who have to be in these institutions. I have not visited all the penitentiaries in Canada, but I have been through some.

An hon. Member: For how long?

Mr. Winch: O.k., smart boy, as an M.P., I got in and got out. I hope I always will be able to get out. I hope the Minister of Justice will not mind if I draw to his attention the fact that penitentiary buildings in Canada are hopelessly outdated and antiquated. One has only to visit them to know that.

So my first question to the Minister of Justice is this, and I address it to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman: how can you, as Minister of Justice, believing, as I am sure you do, in modern penology, in particular from the point of view of rehabilitation, hope to achieve any success with completely outdated and antiquated institutions? And we have as yet had no pronouncement of any policy of change with respect to the capital structure of the penitentiaries themselves.

Go to Kingston, and visit that institution. I am not questioning the work of the warden, his deputy or his officers. I think they are trying to do a wonderful job. But how can they do the job they are expected to do? How can you, as Minister of Justice, obtain the results you hope you can obtain by a new approach when you have an institution so antiquated and outdated? I hope the minister can give us at least some indication as to his thoughts along this line with respect to the modernization of these penal institutions so that they may coincide with modern penology and its thinking on the subjects of supervision, treatment and rehabilitation.

Further, when we think of penitentiaries—and this is not a nice subject—we have to study those who are in these institutions, and I was disappointed when I read the report of the commissioner of penitentiaries for the period ending March 31, 1957 to note that 12.94 per cent of the population represented people under 21 years of age and that of the 703 persons who were under 21 years of age at that time only 232 were in prison for the first time. Thus, of those in the penitentiaries in the year under review the majority even of those under 21 years of age were recidivists. That should make us ask ourselves whether our penitentiary system is working out satisfactorily with respect to these young people.

At the same time as I studied the report of the commissioner of penitentiaries I read for the same period, the report of the warden of the Okalla jail in British Columbia which deals with the same subject. I note that the warden says in his report at page BB9:

> The increase was made up partly from the growing numbers of teenagers who, for lack of adequate alternatives to delinquency, and a deficiency of preventative services in the community, are not being dealt with in time to avoid the inevitability of sending them to prison.

And in this report—I am speaking now of the report of Warden Christie, who, I think, is outstanding in the field of penology in Canada—it is pointed out that there is a need for facilities for those awaiting trial, for proper segregation and for psychiatric treatment and psychological advice.

I should like to return now to the report of the commissioner of penitentiaries in which it is pointed out that 12.94 per cent of the prison population were under 21, and of the 703 people represented by that percentage approximately 400 were recidivists. I know how deeply the minister feels about this problem; I know he has a bill on parole coming before us, and I know he is arranging this meeting in two months time with the attorneys general and his officials, but in view of the seriousness of the situation and in view of the outmoded capital structure of our penitentiaries I wonder whether the minister could give us an indication of his views and of the progress of his investigation and, possibly, his hopes and aspirations as to what may be achieved in the not too distant future.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister replies, I wonder whether he could also say what the situation is with respect to Newfoundland where I believe there is not, in fact, a penitentiary.

Mr. Fulton: I think I should explain at the very beginning with regard to what I must say in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East that I must sound a note of caution, since any program I outline, tentative though it may be, is not one which I could say would be fulfilled in the near future.

I think we are confronted with a major task here in bringing the penal system into line with the best thinking as to what a panel system should be. An enormous amount of capital expenditure must be made if the plans which we are developing now are to come to fruition. I think that for this reason, as well as for the reason that it is going to take time to train staff and that we may well have to assume responsibility for a very substantial increase in the population, both the physical and the financial implications of this program may well dictate that it be carried out in stages, perhaps three separate stages of, maybe, five years each.

Perhaps I should deal at this point with some of the things which are now being done. The hon. member has stated that our penitentiaries are antiquated as buildings. Perhaps they are not quite as antiquated as that bald statement, accepted without modification, might indicate, because I am informed there has been a substantial rebuilding program over the past number of years in the institutions themselves, quite apart from any new building program. In Kingston, for instance, to mention one example, three shop buildings have been completely rebuilt since 1954. And, to speak of new institutions, a new federal training centre was opened at St. Vincent de Paul in 1952. That is a completely new building, as well as a new departure.

Mr. Winch: Is that Collin's Bay?

Mr. Fulton: No, that is the federal training centre at St. Vincent de Paul in Montreal. The new institution at Joyceville was started last year in 1957. Its construction is well on now. We have a small number of people there and hope it will be ready for full occupancy in the summer of next year.

In addition there is a completely new building—it will almost be an institution in effect—to be started again at St. Vincent de Paul the authority for which is given in the supplementary estimates this year. An appropriation of $800,000 is being asked for to start the building of that new institution at St. Vincent de Paul.

There is at the present time a substantial building program both recently completed and in progress but we recognize that this building program has been designed and is designed to take care only of the present penitentiary population and to some extent the anticipated increase in penitentiary population under the present division of responsibilities between ourselves and the provinces. We recognize, therefore, that this new building program is designed only to take care of that portion of the penitentiary population for which we are responsible now and even then we know we shall soon have to be starting new buildings in addition to those I have mentioned just to take care of our own responsibilities. It becomes obvious then that if and when we accept responsibility by agreement with the provinces for a very considerable increase in the number of prison inmates, namely all those sentenced to terms of over six months, our capital requirements for building are going to be vastly increased. It is a question of whether we can meet that problem in part at least by taking over some of the provincial institutions in which these men are now accommodated or whether we are going to find we have to provide entirely new buildings for them and until, therefore, our discussions with the provinces are completed we will not know the full extent of our building requirements in this field although we are aware, as I say, that in order to meet the expansion of our own present responsibilities, owing to increased population and so on, we are still going to have to continue with a building program.

What are the sort of things then that we have in mind as other measures of reform? I have said we are fully conscious of the need for new buildings and new types of buildings and our problem is the contemplation of the implementation of that program although, as I say, it is going to have to be stretched out over a period of years. Therefore, what we have to do is design a program.

What about some of the non-physical aspects of our thinking? There are such matters as the training of staff in connection with the line of thinking we are now following with regard to parole, for instance, which is designed to return as quickly as it is possible to do so the maximum number of prisoners to lead a useful life in society outside the walls of a prison rather than inside. In order to make that program workable and realistic and to ensure that it serves the best interests of society we are going to have to have considerable increases in trained staff so the parole system will be an advantage rather than a disadvantage. That is a matter involving both physical as well as financial outlays as well as administrative problems in recruiting and training staff and problems of consultation with the various institutions, universities and so on where a good deal of the initial training, schooling or education of that type of staff should take place. Schools of social work will be involved.

Then there is the question of the type of facilities which will be provided. There are the recommendations of the Fauteux commission in this respect, of course, as to segregation of types of offenders. That, of course, if carried out increases the number of institutions that may be required and so it involves both an administrative as well as a financial problem. Then there is the other important recommendation for reception centres where prisoners might be classified before they are committed to the final institution in order that they may be sent to the right type of institution where the right type of rehabilitation training designed to suit the needs of that prisoner would be available. In a country as wide as Canada it might be impossible to have only one reception centre. We may have to have more than one and I believe the ideal objective would be a number of reception centres adjacent to the pentientiaries so that the transportation costs and delays might be cut down. The reception centres in turn would require classification staffs, men or women trained in the assessment of prisoners, in assessing their need and the type of rehabilitation they require so they may be properly assigned to the proper institution when the proper institution is available.

I say these things in order to indicate the line of our thinking. We are attempting to develop a scientific and socially adequate system of penology in Canada, one designed to serve the best interests of society and designed to keep our prison population to a minimum —that is, the population inside the prison walls—and to ensure that men committed to prison receive the type of consideration, education, handling and rehabilitation training that they need and which is designed to return them as quickly as possible as useful members of society rather than as continuing enemies of society.

I would conclude this summary of the sort of program we have in mind by saying it must be realized it is going to be an expensive one in terms of dollars. I doubt very much—and I think this warning should be sounded and sounded now—if we are going to be able to point to savings in terms of dollars. Our population is growing. Probably the numbers coming into prison for the first time will continue to increase. What we want to cut down on is on the number coming back to prison. This is indeed going to be an expensive program and, as I say, we probably will not be able to point to savings in terms of dollars. But I believe that when it is established on the basis we envisage we shall be able to point with pride in Canada to the fact that we have brought our system up to date and to the fact that we are achieving substantial savings in terms of social and sociological results.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, before the minister concludes would he comment as to what special attention is now being given to the very serious problem I mentioned of the high rate of recidivism amongst penitentiary inmates under 21 years of age. There appears to be a serious problem when we read that 12.94 per cent of those in penitentiaries are under the age of 21. According to the last report out of the 703 under that age 471 were recidivists. Is there any special attention being given to that problem now?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. Along with the attention being given to the problem of recidivism generally I think a proper reading of the figures referred to by my hon. friend would establish that while the figure refers to those under 21 who have previously served jail sentences they may not be recidivists in the sense that they have served a penitentiary sentence but may have been in some other form of prison.

Mr. Winch: They have been in jail or reformatory?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, that is right. This is a problem, of course, and perhaps in part it will be solved by a more adequate parole system. As my hon. friend knows one of the things we are working toward is a national system of parole. Under that system we may be able to cut down the rate of recidivism particularly on the part of young offenders. As my hon. friend also knows there are only two provinces at the moment in which there is any parole system so there is a great gap across this dominion where there is no system of parole which involves in part the training and rehabilitation of young offenders. I would hope that the new parole system might have a substantial influence on the rate of recidivism, or the rate of repetition on the part particularly of young offenders; but I should say also we are very much concerned with and very much aware of the rate of recidivism generally on the part of penitentiary inmates.

Mr. Winch: Almost 80 per cent.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; recidivism in the penitentiary, that is, those who have served previous penitentiary terms, is something in the neighbourhood of 40 per cent, but it is true, that some 80 per cent of the total population of our penitentiaries have served previous prison sentences, reformatory sentences, and so on.

Mr. Winch: It is a real problem, then.

Mr. Fulton: It is, indeed.

I would like to answer the question of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The arrangement we have with Newfoundland is that those from that province sentenced to terms which would ordinarily involve going to a federal penitentiary are accommodated in jails of the province within Newfoundland, under an arrangement whereby we pay a per diem per capita cost. The number so accommodated has gone down in the last 10 months from 48 to 31 at the present time, so that we are happy to say, and I am sure my hon. friend is proud to say, that the number of penitentiary sentences coming from Newfoundland is not great.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure it is the most law-abiding part of Canada, sir, but I wonder whether the minister can say a word about women prisoners; are there any?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed there are no women prisoners from the province of Newfoundland who have been sentenced to two years or more.

Mr. Crestohl: Under the same heading, will the minister inform the committee what steps have been taken or are being taken, or what consideration is being given to the problem of juvenile delinquency? I particularly address myself to Bill No. C-20 which is on the order paper and which was introduced by the hon. member for Bellechasse. I wonder whether the minister would facilitate the passage of this bill which is a private member's bill?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not really think that the question of juvenile delinquency is relevant to the consideration of this particular problem. I would be glad to answer the hon. member's particular question and say that I am looking forward to the opportunity of discussing his proposal with the hon. member for Bellechasse. I think there are some implications to it that we would both like to discuss before accepting it fully, as I have indicated to him already. There is much in what he has said and we are discussing the proposal with him.

Mr. Winch: I have one question. I am trying to decide how to put myself in order and ask it. The only way I can do it is this. I refer to the question of capital punishment which comes under the Criminal Code and therefore under the Minister of Justice. If the minister could give us some information on this I would be interested to hear it. When a person is sentenced to capital punishment it takes place in a provincial jail and not in a penitentiary. I ask the question for one reason. We have come to the point where capital punishment is under the Criminal Code and therefore under the Minister of Justice, but the sentence is carried out in a provincial jail. As long as as we have this most vicious system, is there any way by which the Minister of Justice can see that it is not carried out within the confines of the jail itself, with the consequent disruption and heartbreak of the inmates and the employees? As the minister knows, that is the situation in British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: There are a number of considerations which I think indicate or argue in favour of confining the person under sentence of death to jail in the province. For instance, there is the matter of appeal. It is necessary for him to be in constant communication with his lawyer whether the appeal be through the courts or whether ultimately appeal be to the governor in council in the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. In addition, there would be the occasion of the last visits from relatives and friends of the sentenced person. I think all of these considerations argue in favour of the retention of that man in jail close to his home.

Mr. Winch: Is it possible for the minister in his capacity of Minister of Justice and almost the court of last resort as to whether a man dies or not, to say that as long as we have capital punishment it will not be carried out within the confines of the prison, as is the case in British Columbia. There it is carried out right in the confines of the main building itself, which means—I will not describe what it means—that all the inmates know that a man has died, the staff know that a man has died right inside the confines. There was the recommendation of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons that if you have to retain it, it should not be done inside the jail.

Mr. Fulton: I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend on that point. I remind him that, as he said, it is difficult for me to keep in order. When he raises this matter under this item I think he is getting dangerously close to the margin.

Mr. Winch: I had to have some way of doing it.

Mr. Fulton: I think I can only answer in this case by saying that inasmuch as the responsibility is that of the provincial authorities, then the acceptance of the recommendation depends on their views in that regard. I am quite certain that they would be impressed by the recommendation of the committee and that as and when they find themselves able to do so they may consider instituting that reform.

Item agreed to.

169. Construction, Improvements and Equipment, $2,817,305.

Mr. Bourget: Just a moment ago the minister said that the department was going to depart on a new construction program. He will recall that when the Minister of Public Works was in opposition he often recommended to the administration of the day that all construction be transferred to the Department of Public Works. I am asking the minister whether any discussion has taken place between the Minister of Public Works and himself looking to the transfer of construction of penitentiaries to the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, no discussion looking to the transfer of penitentiaries construction to public works has taken place, but when I was acting minister of citizenship and immigration we did have discussions with regard to the construction of Indian schools. Certainly, changes were instituted in that regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: That had already happened.

Mr. Fulton: No; changes were instituted in that regard while I was acting minister. With respect to penitentiaries, the technicalities involved do not make it desirable from that point of view.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

169. Construction, improvements and equipment, $2,817,305.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee was interrupted we were considering item 169.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: We are discussing vote 169.

Mr. Winch: On this item I wish to ask the Minister of Justice one question. This vote is for construction, improvements and equipment. Could I ask the minister if this is the entire vote that is required by his department, or is there any additional vote under the Department of Public Works for any construction whatsoever.

Mr. Fulton: The vote for construction under the penitentiaries branch is entirely within this department. We have, however, a supplementary estimate, so this main item is not the only one we have. But nothing in this respect comes under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Winch: No vote of any kind under the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Winch: May I ask that the Minister of Justice should maintain the principle that this vote always remain within his department, and not come under the Department of Public Works? The treasury board has, of course, power to transfer it. Here, he has always got the money.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to ask the minister a question under the same heading. In constructing or repairing penitentiaries does the department use its own architects, or does it engage the services of architects of the Department of Public Works, or does it invite independent architects to do the drafting and make suggestions.

Mr. Fulton: In connection with penitentiaries generally, the policy is that because they are specialized institutions they require a specialized type of construction and so on, and we have therefore developed within our own department, and within the penitentiaries branch a specialized staff of architects and engineers for this purpose. With respect, therefore, to the preparation of plans for the design of institutions, our own staff exclusively are engaged on this work, and we do not retain the services of outside architects or engineers. However, with respect to some special projects—I could mention the sewage disposal plant at Joyceville as one example —which are to some extent not of a peculiarly penitentiary aspect, we do, I think, retain the services of outside consultants with regard to the preparation of the plans.

Mr. Crestohl: I can understand that the designing of a penitentiary may be best done by men who have specialized in that work, but with regard to the discharge of plans and specifications, specifications particularly, I should think that is within the scope of work of the architects employed in the Department of Public Works and that their services might be utilized in the interest of economy.

Mr. Fulton: I think if the hon. member were to ask the Minister of Public Works, he would be told that the staff of his department is fully engaged on the department's present construction supervision and engineering projects. We have, as I say, developed a specialized staff within the department and it would therefore seem to me, at least at present, to be a duplication if, having prepared the plans and being familiar with their requirements and specifications, we should then turn the work over to another department for supervision and construction when our own staff is qualified to do this work.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to Alberta. As the minister knows, a person who is convicted in Alberta is sent to the Saskatchewan penitentiary at Prince Albert. I should like to ask the minister whether there has been any discussion with the provincial government of Alberta, in the light of the Fauteux report, with the object of working something out about the setting up of a penitentiary in Alberta.

In my early days in Calgary, I got to know something about the jail situation in that city, and I said some years ago, and I think it bears repeating, that if John Howard were to walk in and see the jail situation in the city of Calgary he would be just as shocked as he was at conditions 200 years ago, because they only have 19 beds and on many occasions they have 50 customers. Some arrangement should be worked out between the federal government and the province with regard to a penitentiary. I might also mention that Drumheller is in the Bow River constituency, but the chamber of commerce is most anxious that if there is going to be a penitentiary built in Alberta it should be just outside of Drumheller.

Mr. Fulton: I understand the question to be this: have there been discussions between my department, or the penitentiaries branch and the government of Alberta with regard to the construction of a penitentiary in that province. I think the answer must be that I have discussed this matter informally with the deputy attorney general of Alberta whom I met shortly after I was appointed Minister of Justice. I discussed with him some of our problems in connection with penitentiary construction and some of the problems arising out of the Fauteux report. The deputy attorney general indicated to me that they themselves had certain plans in contemplation for the construction of provincial jails, and said that it would be helpful if we could give an indication of whether or not we were prepared to accept the Fauteux committee recommendations regarding this government accepting responsibility for provincial sentences to terms of over six months, since this would help them to finalize their plans. I explained the difficulties we had in making a final decision, some of which I have referred to earlier, such as the physical and financial obligations we should have to assume if we accepted such a responsibility, and I explained our general plan of making a study in our own department after which we would communicate with provincial attorneys general and call a conference.

I know that the government of Alberta, together with governments of other provinces, is anxious to have this conference. We have now arranged for it to take place some time in the month of September of this year. But apart from this informal and personal discussion I am informed there has been no correspondence between this government and the government of Alberta on the subject.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, with your indulgence and that of the committee I should like to first pose a problem and then suggest a remedy. In my riding in British Columbia there is a small city called Fernie. During the past year this city has been hard hit by the closure of the coal mines in that area. Fernie was a one-industry town. We are now seeking a means to bring back the stabilization of the economy of Fernie. One means by which this could be accomplished would be through the establishment there of a penitentiary. There are several points in connection with the establishing of a penitentiary in or near the city of Fernie which I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. minister.

The city of Fernie is an ideal location for a penitentiary. We have two roads, one eastbound and one westbound in the same location. Air, rail and bus transportation facilities are available. Not far from the bus transportation there is a plot of land consisting of 1,600 acres which could be available for the construction of a good-sized penitentiary in the area. I would respectfully request the hon. minister to give full consideration to the possibility of locating a penitentiary in this area.

It has been brought to my attention that there is a tendency on the part of the Department of Justice to centralize penitentiaries across the province. Hon. members will agree that many of the larger industrial concerns in Canada have found that it does not pay to centralize too many departments or plants in one area. I suggest that decentralization of penitentiaries should be taken under consideration by the hon. minister and his department.

I have heard it stated that a problem exists with respect to a lack of opportunities for the rehabilitation of prisoners after they have left a penitentiary. In the city of Fernie and in the Kootenay East area opportunities are available for the rehabilitation of released prisoners. I have been advised that the residents of the lower mainland of British Columbia do not wish to have a penitentiary constructed in that area. There is in Fernie a considerable amount of arable land which is potentially good farm land available in my area for the construction of a penitentiary. In several places the available land would amount to several hundreds of acres.

Although the city of Fernie would be close at hand to the site of any penitentiary that might be constructed in the area and would provide attractive homes for the employees of the institution there would be no danger of the city encroaching on the penitentiary area as has happened in many other areas where penitentiaries have been constructed. The city of Fernie offers every facility offered by a well-established community. It has a golf course, an ice skating rink with artificial ice, and has available ice curling on artificial ice, swimming facilities, skiing facilities complete with tow rope and offers opportunities for hunting, fishing and other sports.

Mr. Winch: Is that part of the penitentiary area?

Mr. McFarlane: The establishment in Fernie of a penitentiary would have the effect of bringing people into the area and providing the personnel of the penitentiary with an attractive community in which to reside. We have a modern gymnasium with badminton facilities, churches of all denominations, modern schools, a modern hospital and medical centre, a good library, theatres and closed circuit television. The establishment of a penitentiary in this area would also help to revitalize and stabilize the economy of the city of Fernie which has been damaged as a result of the closure of the mines and it would have an equally beneficial effect throughout the Kootenay East area. The proposal for the establishment of an institution in this area has been supported by the chamber of commerce, the service clubs and various organizations throughout the province of British Columbia.

This morning I attended a meeting of the committee on external affairs where I observed that we were prepared to spend over $35 million under the Colombo plan. May I say to the minister that charity begins at home. Before closing my remarks may I also point out that in the area of Fernie we have water and power facilities and all the other things required to provide an ideal site for what could be one of the best penitentiaries in western Canada. I would urge upon the Minister of Justice consideration of the proposal to establish a penitentiary in the city of Fernie thus bringing about the revitalization of the economy of that area.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I appreciate what has been said by the hon. member for Kootenay East and to assure him that I am well aware of the interest of the city of Fernie and the district surrounding it in the establishment of a penitentiary there. I wish to assure the committee that the hon. member for Kootenay East has been most assiduous and has left no stone unturned in bringing to my attention the desire of those in that area for such an establishment and the reasons which occurred to them why it would be a suitable area for the location of a penitentiary.

I have discussed the matter with the hon. member personally and, as he knows, I have had correspondence from the mayor of that community which I have also discussed with him. I can tell the hon. member now, not having had an opportunity to do so before this, that earlier this morning I was in telephone communication with the chairman of the industrial development committee of the Fernie board of trade. The interest of the area in such an establishment there is well known to myself and to the officials of the department and particularly those of the penitentiaries branch.

I have tried to be as frank in the matter as I can. Knowing the economic situation in that area I felt it would be grossly unfair to hold out any hope or expectation which might not be possible of fulfilment. I have therefore had to explain some of the considerations which would have to be taken into account in determining where a penitentiary will be located. There are, of course, two aspects to this problem. The one is related to the establishment of a new penitentiary under our present responsibility in which case certain considerations would have to be borne in mind which I have communicated to the hon. member, particularly with respect to the desirability of having reasonably available and adjacent to such an institution the facilities for a rehabilitation training program. I have also pointed out that with respect to any new building program which may be dependent upon an agreement with the provinces for the assumption of the extra responsibility referred to in the Fauteux commission report, namely the assumption by us of responsibility for those receiving a sentence of more than six months, there may be some different types of institutions to be built or provided by the federal government. I assured them that with respect to both the extension of the existing and present penitentiary building program and the construction of new types of institutions which might be made necessary after the provincial conference and as a result of any agreement arrived at we will bear in mind to the fullest extent the interest of the Fernie area and I can repeat that assurance here.

However, I do not think it would be fair for me to go beyond that assurance because until we know just what it is we are going to have to provide we ourselves will not be able to determine what building program we will have to undertake and therefore it would not be sensible for me to indulge in speculation now as to what locality we will select to establish any new institution.

In addition, of course, I must in fairness to all the other municipalities and areas interested point out that ever since it has been indicated that we are eventually going to embark on the construction of new institutions in western Canada some 100 or more municipalities or areas have pressed upon the department the peculiar suitability of their area for such an institution.

We will have to survey the whole available field and, in fairness, I think I must say that when we make a decision it will have to be made in accordance with what seems to be the best program of building that we can devise.

I close, however, by assuring the hon. gentleman that in making that decision we will bear the interests and the facilities of his area fully in mind.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, before we approve the final vote I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to let me put a question to him under vote 162. I understand that item has been agreed to. In putting my question to the minister it is not my aim to modify the vote. My question has to do with judges' salaries.

Mr. Fulton: That takes us back to the departmental item. Vote 162 relates to the administration of justice in the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Crestohl: There is a "S" following it.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is statutory.

Mr. Fulton: That is a statutory item.

Mr. Crestohl: I know. My question is not aimed at modifying the vote. I want to ask whether recently any consideration has been given to the question of augmenting judges' stipends?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that matter is before us at the present time and is under consideration but I indicated earlier in the house, I think, that we did not expect to be able to do anything about it at this session, but we have it under consideration for future action.

Mr. Herridge: The minister has replied to the hon. member for Kootenay East with respect to his request and I listened to his reply with great interest. In view of the fact, I understand, the proposed sites in Kootenay West are not considered suitable for a penitentiary, of which I was advised some two years ago, I want to support the representations of the member for Kootenay East. We in the Kootenays must stick together. We have been very concerned about this for a long time and he knows the circumstances very well, both the geographic, the physical and the economic, and I am sure the minister does. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems a bit ironic in this civilization that we have to propose the building of a penitentiary to provide employment for those outside the penitentiary looking after those who are inside. That is a fact. However, Mr. Chairman, if finally the government cannot see its way clear to build a penitentiary in the location suggested by the member for Kootenay East I do hope, having by that time a full knowledge of the desperate circumstances which exist in Fernie owing to the closing down of the coal mine, it will bring in a national coal policy which will in another direction solve this economic problem.

Mr. McLennan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay East and the hon. member for Kootenay West are talking about a penitentiary which is now situated in the centre of the city of New Westminster. It is not often that a city wants to move an institution which has a payroll and a purchasing power such as that of the British Columbia penitentiary; but as far as the city of New Westminster is concerned, it will be very glad to get rid of it because it is situated in the centre of the city.

I predict that within 20 years it will be situated in the centre of the greater Vancouver area. We in the city of New Westminster feel that the penitentiary is located on a spot that is unsuitable for that purpose. It is situated in the centre of a growing district, one of the most populous districts in the province of British Columbia. I would ask the minister for assurance that within the next five or 10 years the penitentiary will be moved. I would support the request of the hon. member for Kootenay East to have the penitentiary moved to his riding or to his district of Fernie, if that is suitable, or to any other district that is more suitable for a penitentiary rather than leaving it in the centre of a great area like the greater Vancouver area.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies may I say I am sure that the hon. member for New Westminster is quite right in predicting a wonderful future for this area. I would hope that some thought would be given to the taxpayers who bought this land on which the penitentiary rests and that the land would not be sold but would be retained by the crown so that the rents would help to alleviate our taxes.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman knows that he is speaking of policies which are beyond my responsibility; that is, the policy with regard to disposal of property if the penitentiary is moved from New Westminster. But I think we are all getting a bit beyond ourselves because no decision has been made in that regard. I can only say that I am fully aware of the interest of the city of New Westminster in the matter and that due account is being taken of it and will be taken of it in connection with our building program as and when we are able to finalize that program.

A—Department—

566. Departmental administration—further amount required, $50,800.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay unduly the passing of the estimates of the Department of Justice, but I should like to take advantage of this opportunity this evening to congratulate the Minister of Justice who, I know, is laying the groundwork of some kind of strategy for a more effective struggle against obscene literature by those who are responsible for public morality and order. I know that the minister realizes the seriousness of the problem and that he is prepared to solve it. It is more than ever urgent that some effective legislation be enacted as soon as possible. Let us hope that the following steps will be taken:

1. Include in section 150 of the criminal code a "practical" definition of the word "obscene";

2. Amend the criminal code to make it possible to serve a summons, as is now done in Great Britain, upon the newsdealer or bookseller who has been found in possession of publications considered obscene, so that he might put forward his objections, if any, to a court order for the destruction of the said publications;

3. Prevent publishers from making "package" deals that is to say from forcing newsdealers or booksellers to take "all or nothing", as is currently done at the present time;

4. Extend the charges under the act to the publishers of obscene literature.

As long as the above-mentioned steps are not taken, groups now campaigning against obscene literature will be hampered in their activity. I realize the difficulties of the problem. It is a matter of getting rid of obscene publications without interfering with the freedom of the press. This calls for a precise definition of the words "obscenity" and "freedom".

At the present time, our courts base their interpretation of "obscenity" upon a judgment rendered in 1868 by a British court and according to which "the criterion of obscenity consists in deciding whether the matter charged as obscene tends to deprave or corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and in whose hands such a publication might fall." That definition is not so bad. It would be a matter of deciding whether a publication is such as to cause moral prejudice. Mr. Raoul Mercier, crown attorney for the county of Carleton has used that definition with some success already.

Nevertheless I will go along with the Minister of Justice when he states that it could well be more "practical". Personally, I would prefer a provision which would prohibit publication and distribution of any or all literature whose chief characteristic is the exploitation of one or several of the following subjects: sex, crime, immorality, horror, cruelty and violence.

With regard to the freedom of the press, it should be remembered that liberty is not synonymous with licence. The press is not "free" to corrupt and deprave morals, even under the guise of "information". That is the basic principle upon which the minister should guide himself if he wishes to amend the criminal code.

I would most heartily approve of any of the above amendments, especially those aimed at prohibiting "block sales" or "package deals". There are publishers now who require a dealer to buy objectionable publications if he wishes to buy the others. That is an intolerable practice. It is really deplorable that a certain number of publishers and newsmen should attempt to make money by the exploitation of the basest instincts of their readers. Some specialize in detailed description of crime. They plunge their readers in the blood of the victims and in the dark inner recesses of the murderer's heart. Others exploit sex for all it is worth. Finally, there is a third class of objectionable and nefarious publications. I have reference here to those committed to the spreading of rumours, to scandal-mongering, and muck-raking. They fling mud right and left, and especially up.

Most professions have boards which impose proper ethical standards upon their members. There should be such a disciplinary body among newspapermen, who could assume on their own behalf the defence of the genuine freedom of the press by the elimination of corrupting undertakings that are a menace to this fundamental social freedom.

How are we to deal with the widespread circulation of this large number of objectionable publications which corrupt the minds and hearts of our people?

1. Amend the criminal code;

2. Encourage people to refuse to buy filthy publications;

3. Promote good reading by urging educators to encourage appreciation of good literature by young people.

Finally, I ask the hon. Minister of Justice to amend the Criminal Code as soon as possible so as to do away with unwholesome publications. It is urgent. Obscene literature is to a great extent responsible for juvenile delinquency which is a burden for the state and costs huge sums to governments. A tide of juvenile delinquency is sweeping over our cities. It is the most accute problem of our age, next to atomic weapons.

I urge promoters of all morality campaigns to keep up their good work.

In the diocese of Joliette, there is, as at L'Assomption, a committee against bad literature. I congratulate these people and encourage them to continue their struggle in co-operation with municipal associations and authorities. I would be very happy if the hon. minister could in the near future, amend, if possible, the Criminal Code in that sense.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, allow me to say a few words in support of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), about obscene literature.

I have no doubt that the minister has trouble finding ways to eradicate that cancer that has crept into our literature. I therefore believe that we should give him our support in his effort to find, as soon as possible, an appropriate definition of obscene literature either through an amendment to the criminal code of by some other way, so that our people might be saved from that scourge.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) and the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) for their kind words.

I thank particularly the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) for his constructive suggestions. This subject is being studied right now, and I can assure him that special consideration will be given his suggestions.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, for over forty years the Kootenay country has suffered from lawlessness and various forms of violence which in recent days have been extended to the Okanagan. This matter is of most serious concern to the people residing in the interior of British Columbia, possibly of more concern than ever before in our history and, of course, of serious concern to all in Canada who are concerned with this social problem. In past years we have suffered the burning of schools, the burning of houses, the bombing of railroads, the bombing of power lines on repeated occasions, recently the bombing of a bus station and the bombing of a good number of other sites throughout the Kootenay district.

The latest apparent evidence of the continuance of this lawlessness is the number of forest fires lately which are considered by the forestry branch of the province of British Columbia as having been caused by persons who set them deliberately. Anyone who has lived in our district knows what it means in a dry period such as the last two months to fear the starting of forest fires by arson. So the situation is very serious indeed and in some respects tense.

I have refrained so far this session from making any comments on the matter because I was of the opinion that while discussions were going on between the representatives of the government of Canada and representatives of the government of British Columbia no good purpose would be served because this is far too serious a matter for anyone to attempt to make political capital out of it or take any political advantage. I was hopeful that the minister's visit to British Columbia, his discussions with certain persons there and his later correspondence with the premier of the province would result in some co-operation between the federal and provincial governments to formulate a program to deal with the problem in a constructive way not only in the immediate future but in the days farther ahead.

I am not underestimating the difficulty. Before proceeding, may I say that I have discussed the matter personally with the minister on a number of occasions and I am fully aware of his keen interest, his great concern and his willingness to co-operate with the province of British Columbia and with other persons who want to do something to remedy a situation that has existed for so many years. However, Mr. Chairman, time is flying. It is now some weeks since discussions first commenced and I understand that the government of British Columbia made representations to the federal government for assistance in this matter. Apparently no program has been established to date as the result of co-operation between the two governments and so violence and lawlessness continue.

You can well understand the attitude of the residents of the district, municipal officials and other authorities. They are becoming increasingly concerned about what appears to be the failure to design a constructive program as a result of federal-provincial co-operation, and I am of the opinion that it is going to take close co-operation between the federal and provincial governments as a result of agreement to meet this very serious situation effectively. The situation is such that the people of the district I have the honour to represent are demanding that concrete evidence be given that there will soon be an adequate program to meet it.

I am not going to take the time to go into all the details. The minister is very well informed because he has kept in close touch with the situation through his officials in Ottawa, through the R.C.M.P. and no doubt through correspondence with the government of British Columbia. However, I want to ask the minister two questions. In view of the seriousness of the situation and the concern of the people directly affected, being the people of Kootenay West and at the present time the Okanagan—I trust this social disease will not spread any farther—will the minister inform the house of developments to date with respect to the government's response to the application from the government of British Columbia for assistance and with respect to any agreement that has been arrived at to date or that they expect to reach in the near future?

I want to ask another question. In spite of the fact that the Sons of Freedom have publicly stated only recently, in the most concrete form to date through Mr. Moljelsky their leader, that they are willing to emigrate to the Soviet union on certain terms—and I think the minister no doubt has read the dispatch—would the minister inform the house of this government's response to this latest, shall I say, official offer from the acknowledged leader of the Sons of Freedom for that body to emigrate to the Soviet union provided certain terms are met with respect to expenses, transportation and citizenship.

Mr. McFarlane: At this time I should also like to take the opportunity to support the hon. member for Kootenay West with respect to the situation in west Kootenay. This has been a problem to us in east Kootenay as well as west Kootenay for a number of years. I wish to bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the seriousness of the situation in that area.

Mr. Fulton: With the concern of the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Kootenay East over this problem there will be genuine understanding and agreement, Mr. Chairman, because those gentlemen reside in the areas most directly concerned. I appreciate the approach made to the problem by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I appreciate his statement that he knows I am concerned with it on behalf of the province from which I come and particularly on behalf of the residents of the province most affected. He has asked me two specific questions. The first one was would I inform the house of developments with regard to the response of the government of Canada to a request from the government of British Columbia for assistance in dealing with the problem. The second one was, in view of the fact that the Sons of Freedom sect have recently made a statement indicating their willingness to return to Russia—in fact their wish to do so—on certain conditions, would I make a statement as to the position of this government. I think I must answer those two questions together.

I went to British Columbia in response to a request originating with the provincial secretary on June 9, taking with me the deputy minister of justice and the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. We met there with the premier of the province, the assistant commissioner of the R.C.M.P.—that is the officer in charge of the division of police in British Columbia—the deputy attorney general and the provincial secretary. We discussed in general the whole aspect of the Doukhobor problem. Then our discussion moved on to consider a specific proposal put forward by the province. I am not at liberty at the moment to divulge the nature of that proposal because discussions are still taking place, but I can say now by way of anticipation that I expect that a decision will be reached in the course of the next few days.

After we had these discussions and after my return I put the position of the British Columbia government, both generally and with respect to the specific proposal, before my colleagues here in cabinet and, as a result of our consideration of the request, I wrote to the premier of the province on June 21 indicating the view of this government with regard to the general situation and also the attitude of this government with respect to the specific proposal which had subsequently been discussed and indicated to the government of British Columbia how far we were prepared to go in co-operating and in adopting that proposal as a solution to the problem.

I received a letter from Premier Bennett dated July 3 discussing in part the general situation and then referring to the specific proposal and saying that this answer to our letter of June 21, indicating how far we were prepared to go and the co-operation we would extend, would be forthcoming in the near future. I did not have any further correspondence with or communication from the province on that matter until the evening before last when I received two telegrams from Premier Bennett dealing in detail with the specific proposal on which he had said on July 3 that he would let me know further. In other words, I received his further answer the night before last, which would be August 5. At the same time, or about that same time the Sons of Freedom sect issued their statement with regard to their wish to migrate to Russia on condition that certain specific assistance would be given by the government of British Columbia and the government of Canada.

All I can say in addition, I think, is that I have had discussions, first of all with my departmental officials and the R.C.M. Police and then with my colleagues in cabinet here with regard to Premier Bennett's telegrams of August 5, and I had a telephone conversation yesterday with the attorney general of British Columbia in which I indicated to him that we expected within the matter of the next few days to be able to let the government of British Columbia have a definitive reply to their telegrams of August 5. The whole matter, of course, is being considered in the light of the statements made on behalf of the Sons of Freedom at about that time with regard to their possible movement to Russia.

With regard to the details of the discussions between ourselves and the government of British Columbia I cannot say more until the conclusion of our negotiations. As soon as any agreement is arrived at I expect that it would be embodied in a joint statement issued on behalf of the two governments. Until that time I think the discussions must remain confidential.

I am hopeful that an agreement can be arrived at which will represent a step forward in dealing with this problem or at any rate in isolating it so that constructive solutions may then be arrived at. I am sure that my hon. friend will appreciate that since these discussions are actually current and exchanges of telegrams and telephone conversations are continuing, I could not say more at the present time.

Mr. Herridge: I appreciate that fact.

Mr. Fulton: However, I can assure the hon. member that we are as aware of the urgency of the problem as he is. We hope that the current discussions will result in a statement and a joint approach by the two governments which will be useful and constructive in arriving at a solution.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should just like to ask the minister one brief question about his statement. I would assume that if an agreement were reached between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia in this matter before the session is concluded which would involve any expenditure of money, some provision would have to be made for that expenditure, and that procedure would give us an opportunity to discuss the matter here in the house. If, however, that result was not possible but the agreement was reached before the end of the session I would hope that the government would endeavour to make it possible for us in some way to discuss any arrangement that is arrived at in a matter as important as is this one.

Mr. Fulton: I, of course, cannot give the hon. gentleman any specific assurance at the present time because no agreement has been reached. However, I think I can meet him in the spirit in which he puts forward the proposal and say any solution which involves an expenditure of money by this government would properly have to be presented to parliament, and it would be our desire to do that during the current session if we could reach an agreement in time to make that possible.

Mr. Caron: Can the minister tell us exactly what are the duties of the Solicitor General?

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will read the statutes which create the office and with statutory authority for the appointment of the minister who has the title of Solicitor General he will see the general basis for his position. In addition to that there is an order in council passed shortly after this government assumed office which sets out in detail the duties of the Solicitor General. I cannot recall from memory the provisions of that order in council or the duties embodied in the order in council, but it was duly reported in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Caron: My reason for asking this question is that I have looked in the index to this new book issued by the Secretary of State entitled "The Organization of the Government of Canada", and there is nothing about the Solicitor General. A person of this importance in the government of Canada should at least appear in the index.

Mr. Fulton: If there is an omission from the blue book, we will be glad to rectify it. As I say, if my hon. friend will consult the proper authorities, namely the statutes of Canada and the Canada Gazette, he will find there an official description of the position and duties of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Pickersgill: I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that we should discuss this question on the first item of the estimates of the Secretary of State. However, this publication was brought into this house the other day by the Secretary of State as the latest official information on the government of Canada, published by the government of Canada. As the hon. member for Hull has pointed out, it seems to have a very glaring omission.

Mr. Balcer: As I am the subject of this discussion, I just want to say a word to the hon. member for Hull. If he will look under the Department of Justice he will see that the second name in the Department of Justice is that of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Caron: I accept the opinion of the Solicitor General that he is the helper of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will take the trouble and the courtesy to read the statute he will see that that is the position created by the statute and not by this government.

Mr. Caron: I read the French version of the statute, and in French it says—

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps if my hon. friend would read the blue book then he would present to the house the full picture rather than a partial picture he is now presenting.

Mr. Caron: The French version of the statute says:

(Translation):

An official appointed by the governor in council to assist the Minister of Justice in his functions.

(Text):

If this is the correct definition, then I accept what the Solicitor General said, that he should appear under the heading of the Department of Justice as the minister's helper.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one very brief question upon which I may wish to make some comments later. Has the minister considered any amendments to the Criminal Code or to any other statute in order to strengthen the law against sedition?

Mr. Fulton: Certainly not at this session; I think the Prime Minister intimated yesterday, or possibly Monday, the additional legislation which was to be introduced in this session. The list did not include any further amendments to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister reasonably satisfied with the present state of the law in that regard?

Mr. Fulton: The minister has this matter, along with other matters under his responsibility, constantly under review. At any time it occurs to him or is brought to his attention by his advisers that changes are necessary or advisable, he will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: The reason I ask the question is that I have in my hand three press clippings. The first one is from the Toronto Telegram of April 30, 1948 in which the present Prime Minister, then the member for Lake Centre, was quoted as having told the University of Toronto old boys at their annual dinner at the Royal York, and this is in direct quotes:

> We should consider amending the Criminal Code in respect to communists who shoot off their mouths against the state, and our way of life. I say those whose sole desire is to undermine should either go behind the iron curtain or be behind iron bars.

That is the end of that quotation. Then, in the Toronto Telegram of September 10, 1948, the Prime Minister was reported as having made a demand that "real teeth"—and that is in quotation marks—be put into the law so that communism can be effectively curbed.

Then as recently as March 19, 1954 the Prime Minister, speaking to the Ottawa public schoolteachers institute, said that a change should be made in Canadian laws of treason, and I quote, "To meet the changing conditions that the kremlin has brought about." It did seem to me, sir, in view of the very pressing nature of the problem as envisaged by the Prime Minister, that the government would perhaps by this time have given consideration to this matter.

Mr. Fulton: I might point out that the hon. gentleman is so hard up for subject matter with which to delay the house he had to go back ten years, to 1948.

Mr. Pickersgill: To 1954; that is not so long ago.

Mr. Maloney: I am glad to have this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to put forward for the consideration of the Minister of Justice, within whose jurisdiction these matters come, a few suggestions that would involve amendments to the Criminal Code—

Mr. Winch: Would the hon. member speak up? We cannot hear him.

Mr. Maloney: —to the Canada Evidence Act and to some other related federal statutes. I have no doubt that at the next session of parliament the Minister of Justice will be bringing forward some amendments to these statutes and I should like to think he would bear in mind the suggestions I am about to make, with a view perhaps to including these among any amendments he might then propose to introduce. I do not boast of any particular qualifications to discuss these matters other than the experience I have had in the process of law over a number of years, and particularly my connection as counsel for the defence in a number of criminal cases.

Arising out of that experience I think I have had an opportunity to see something of the need for the changes I am about to suggest to the minister and which I hope he will bear in mind. I want to speak very briefly first about our habitual offender legislation. With reference to the legislation now applicable to habitual offenders, section 660 of our Criminal Code which provides for their preventive detention classifies a person as being a habitual criminal if:

(a) he has previously, since attaining the age of eighteen years, on at least three separate and independent occasions been convicted of an indictable offence for which he was liable to imprisonment for five years or more and is leading persistently a criminal life, or

The experiment with preventive detention for habitual criminals began in this country in 1947 and we, therefore, have the benefit of 11 years' experience with its operation. It had been recommended in 1938 by the royal commission on the penal system of Canada known as the Archambault commission.

The habitual offender in Canada is not treated very much differently from the ordinary penitentiary inmate and is not housed in a separate institution. The total number of persons presently undergoing preventive detention in Canada as habitual criminals is 53. The distribution of these individuals among provinces is as follows: British Columbia, 13; Alberta, 5; Saskatchewan, 5; Manitoba, 10; Quebec, 2; Ontario, 13; New Brunswick, 1; Nova Scotia, 4; Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, none. The majority of individuals now undergoing preventive detention as habitual criminals were convicted of offences against the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act—in British Columbia, 7; Alberta, 4; Manitoba, 9; Ontario, 11 and Quebec, 1—making a total of 32.

Our Criminal Code provides for a review by the Minister of Justice of each case every three years, the idea being to determine whether or not the person undergoing preventive detention should be permitted to be at large on licence. It is open to the minister to conclude that he should not be released and it is, therefore, quite possible that such an individual would spend the rest of his life in prison.

Once an individual has been found to be an habitual criminal he is permanently removed from the jurisdiction of the courts. He has no right to be represented by counsel at the time of these periodic three-year reviews by the minister. The minister is not required to give any reasons for his refusal to grant a licence and there is no appeal from his judgment. If a man is released he can be rearrested and taken back into custody without resort to the courts or without the protection of a public trial. As I have already pointed out, the number of persons proceeded against as habitual criminals and found to be such since 1947 is 53.

It goes without saying that large numbers of individuals now at large and never proceeded against under this provision of the Criminal Code could properly be found to be habitual criminals. The main reason why proceedings are not initiated against such persons is the perfectly understandable reticence of the majority of permanent crown officials to invoke proceedings the effect of which could be to doom a man to a possible lifetime in penitentiary. This is a reticence with which I have every sympathy and I do not wish to be taken as meaning that wholesale prosecution under this legislation should be instituted against everyone now at large who could be found guilty.

However, the fact remains that the legislation in its application has been inexcusably discriminatory. Only 53 persons have been selected out of a much larger number to be proceeded against in this way, to be removed forever from the jurisdiction of the court, to become subject to the whims and fancies of particular police officers, crown officials and others. All this strikes me as being alien to some of the most ancient and sacred principles of our criminal law.

When this legislation was first introduced into parliament the then minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley, was far from being positive about it, for at page 4685, column 2 of Hansard for that year, he said:

While legislation of this kind was recommended by the Archambault commission, the government has no wish to be dogmatic about the necessity for it, and while recommending it, is prepared to give careful consideration to any views which may be expressed by members of the house regarding it.

It is interesting to read the contributions to the debate at that time of some of the hon. members of the house. I think that our experience over the last 11 years confirms the apprehensions that were voiced by some of them at that time. For example, the present Prime Minister, had this to say as recorded at page 5058 of Hansard for 1947:

Criminal law being what it is, it should be uniformly enforced in all parts of the dominion without regard to the wishes of individual attorneys general. In this section there is a marked departure from the uniformity which should be aimed at. This section means that for the first time in the history of our criminal law there will be a departure from uniformity of application in all parts of the dominion.

And further on, the present Prime Minister said in the same context:

I urge upon the minister that this introduces into our criminal law a lack of uniformity, in that a person in one province may be prosecuted as a habitual criminal, whereas if the same person committed a crime in another province he would not be subject to prosecution.

The hon. member for Cartier at that time, Mr. Hartt, put it rather aptly in my opinion when he said:

I am wondering whether we are not committing a crime against criminals.

It strikes me now in the light of our long experience with the law that the objections of the various members of that day were well taken and they showed a foresight which the subsequent administration of the law has tended to confirm.

There has been a complete and utter lack of uniformity in the application of the law. The frequency of prosecution has varied from province to province. Specially appointed federal prosecutors in cases under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act have been far more prone to resort to the use of this legislation than have the ordinary crown attorneys of the various judicial districts. When one considers the crushing effect of an indeterminate sentence and stops to realize to what extent a man's freedom for the rest of his life is subject to the whims and fancies of a few police and prosecution officials, and when you further consider that the Criminal Code already provides adequate penalties for all of the offences contained in the Code, it seems to me that it is now time to consider that the experiment with this legislation has been a failure and that it should be abolished.

Dealing with the right of crown counsel to cross-examine a prisoner on his previous criminal record, the practice today as prescribed in section 12 of the Canada Evidence Act, permits crown counsel to cross-examine any witness—including an accused person who gives evidence on his own behalf—about any previous conviction for a criminal offence.

There is no limitation whatever on this right. When an accused person is tried by jury the law imposes upon the trial judge an obligation to caution the jurors where evidence of the criminal record of the accused has been adduced in cross-examination, that such evidence is relevant only to the credibility of the accused witness, and he must also admonish them against using it as evidence that he is the sort of person who would be likely to commit the offence for which he is on trial.

Speaking from a long experience I think I can safely say that the prejudice created by disclosure of a criminal record is overwhelming, and no amount of caution by the trial judge in conformity with the rule I have mentioned is adequate to disabuse the jury's mind of its harmful effects.

The prospect of being cross-examined on a criminal record has dissuaded many accused persons from giving evidence and in my opinion over the years large numbers of accused men have been convicted either because of the prejudice resulting from a disclosure of their criminal record or from their failure to testify by reason of it. They might, if neither of these factors had existed, have been acquitted.

I recall so well in personal experience the case of an accused person whose criminal record consisted of eight previous convictions for serious offences. On the occasion on which I was acting in his defence he was charged with the murder of his brother. The account he gave to me of the circumstances, which was to some considerable extent confirmed by two other witnesses, ordinarily would have furnished him with a good defence of self-defence. If such a defence were to have prevailed he would have been acquitted but because of his criminal record it was unsafe for him to testify in his own defence because of the prejudicial effect that disclosure of his record on cross-examination would have had. A conviction for murder might well have been the result. He was duly convicted of manslaughter and notwithstanding the jury's recommendation for extreme leniency the trial judge imposed a sentence of fifteen years imprisonment.

I am in the fortunate position of being able to say that the recommendation that I am now putting forward received the unanimous endorsation of the Canadian bar association at its annual meeting held in Ottawa in September 1955. In that connection the bar association urged that section 12 of the Canada Evidence Act be amended so that as amended it would provide that while the right of cross-examination on the record of a person charged and called as a witness would not be abolished it would be greatly curtailed. For example, it could be brought out that a previous conviction had been registered against the accused witness if proof of that conviction were relevant to prove the guilt of the offence with which he was charged; and also if he personally or by his advocate asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to establishing his own good character; or if he gave evidence of his own good character; or if the nature of the conduct of the defence were such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution; or if he gave evidence at the same trial against any other person charged with the same offence; or if he had previously been convicted of perjury. The bar association recommended that this unlimited right as it now exists which I submit is an unfair right should be curtailed.

It will be observed that this change does not and is not intended to interefere with the present practice of proving the criminal record after a conviction has been registered for the purpose of assisting the magistrate or judge to determine the appropriate sentence. It is my belief that this change is long overdue.

The next change for which I feel a serious need exists arises out of section 624 subsection 2(b) of the Criminal Code. This section reads as follows:

> The time during which a convicted person
> (a) is at large on bail, or
> (b) is confined in a prison or other place of confinement pending the determination of an appeal by that person, does not count as part of any term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to his conviction, but paragraph (b) is subject to any directions that the court appealed to may give.

As you can see from the provisions of the section I have just read, where a convicted offender exercises his right to appeal his conviction, no part of the time that it takes to bring the appeal on for argument counts as part of his sentence in the event his appeal is unsuccessful unless a special order directing that it should count is made by the provincial court of appeal.

I can recall in Ontario that up until about eight years ago invariably the court of appeal, which had dismissed the appeal of a convicted offender, would direct that the time served in custody pending the appeal should count. It was only very, very rarely that such an order was refused. We grew to expect it as a matter of course. Then an abrupt change in this practice occurred for reasons that were really never made very clear and the exact reverse became the rule. Since then, in the great majority of cases where an appeal is unsuccessful the court will refuse to direct that the time served should count and the prisoner's sentence therefore does not commence to run until the date upon which the appeal has been disposed of.

This certainly has had the effect—a highly undesirable effect in my opinion—of reducing to a very exceptional degree the number of criminal appeals brought before the court of appeal. The fear that there may be delay in prosecuting his appeal and that his appeal might fail has tended to dissuade many a convicted offender from going to the court of appeal to have his conviction and the trial proceedings that lead up to it reviewed.

I have often felt that if a practical method could be worked out every conviction—certainly for a major crime—should be reviewed by an appellate court. I cannot help but think that if the conviction of everyone serving a sentence in our Canadian penal institutions were today reviewed the result would be to flush out of prison large numbers of inmates either by virtue of some irregularity at trial or for some other reason. In saying this I do not wish to be taken as meaning that our prisons are filled with innocent persons. The point I am trying to make is that, in my opinion, there are many persons serving sentences as a result of trials which an appellate court would, on review, find had not been conducted according to law.

Delay in proceeding with an appeal is not ordinarily the fault of the accused man. The delay is usually occasioned by the delay in receiving from the court reporter the transcript of the notes of evidence taken at the trial. It will often be the fault of the counsel for the defence and sometimes the fault of counsel for the crown, and on occasions—especially when judgment is reserved for a lengthy period of time—the fault of the court of appeal itself. It does not seem right that a prisoner should be penalized by reason of a delay for which he was not responsible.

The present law works a hardship also in the case of convicted offenders who are unable to furnish bail pending the hearing of an appeal. In the case of a first offender whose crime has not been one of violence, or of exceptional gravity, it is usually possible to secure his release on bail. He suffers therefore no hardship by the present operation of the law, but the first offender, who is poor and is unable to furnish bail, is thereby discriminated against. As one who believes that the court should constantly be developing, applying and interpreting our law, I find a good deal of difficulty in accepting a policy such as the one that now prevails which in its application discourages appeals. I strongly urge, therefore, that the Criminal Code be amended so as to provide that time served in custody, pending the hearing of the appeal, should count as part of the sentence as a matter of course.

Finally, I would like to say a word in respect to minimum sentences. There are certain offences in respect to which the magistrate or judge has no discretion. He must impose a minimum mandatory penalty. For example, theft of anything from the post after it is deposited in the post office and before delivery is an offence under section 298 of the Criminal Code for which a term of imprisonment of not less than six months must be imposed. So also in the case of second and third convictions for driving while one's ability is impaired or for drunk driving and so also in the case of offences under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, and indeed for a number of offences under other federal statutes as well.

We all read in the Toronto press some months ago of the case of a young woman charged with theft from the post—theft of an ordinary letter—as a result of which she netted nothing except a few pennies and the magistrate was reluctantly required to impose the minimum penalty of six months in a case in which it was apparent he felt suspended sentence would have been the proper dispositon. It is true she was quickly released on ticket-of-leave but all others are not so lucky.

In cases under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, any person in possession of a drug must be sentenced to a minimum mandatory period of imprisonment of at least six months. I have personally witnessed the application of this provision in the case of a helpless drug addict for whom suspended sentence and treatment would have been the answer. It was the case of a gentleman who, with the assistance of his wife, had over a period of about two years by the most enormous exertions of his will succeeded in overcoming his drug addiction. As a result of an altercation in which he had become involved he was rendered unconscious and brought to a hospital, whose authorities of course were unaware of the history of drug addiction and drugs were administered to him to ease the pain and in consequence the former appetite which he had succeeded in overcoming was revived. After a period of about six months he was arrested and charged with illegal possession of narcotics. Medical evidence that was called at his trial, where he pleaded guilty, established that he was capable of cure and that he had been responsive to treatment and that he should be permitted to continue this treatment. I can still recall—notwithstanding the eloquent efforts of crown counsel to obtain the severest possible penalty—how much anxiety the trial judge felt when he imposed that minimum sentence of six months. His personal desire was to place the accused man on suspended sentence and probation to enable the course of treatment to be followed but his hands were tied by a law which, in my respectful opinion, was and is iniquitous.

When they receive their appointments our judges and our magistrates are deemed to have common sense and good judgment and, in my opinion, they should be given the power to use this judgment unfettered by statutory rules concerning minimum sentences. I would ask the minister, Mr. Chairman, to bear in mind the suggestions I have just made. Thank you.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the remarks of so eminent and qualified an authority as the hon. member for Parkdale should be allowed to go unanswered or without an expression of appreciation and tribute. Very few members of this house are better qualified by background, experience or aptitude to speak on the subjects to which the hon. member has just addressed himself and I assure him that I personally and the officials of my department both appreciate and will study closely the suggestions he has made.

With respect to two of them, I think I can dispose of the matter quite shortly by saying that we are fully prepared to—and to some extent may almost have anticipated the desire of the hon. gentleman—have those matters looked at.

With respect to habitual criminals, we are certainly prepared to admit the necessity and the desirability of having a look at the provisions to see what, if any, modifications should be made in those provisions.

With regard to the right to cross-examine an accused on his criminal record, the same thing applies. We are prepared to have a look at this, to study this in the light particularly of the recommendations of the Canadian bar association. It is my impression, based on recollection only, that at the present time the matter is before the commissioners on uniformity of the law, criminal section, for study.

With regard to the matter of time spent in confinement pending the hearing of an appeal, the hon. gentleman certainly makes a very powerful argument, although I am not quite certain I would accept every aspect of the case he has made. However, I respect his great knowledge of the subject, particularly in so far as appeals are concerned.

Mr. Winch: The man is in jail.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I know that, but I may say that not all aspects of the argument made by the hon. member should be accepted. I am not prepared to debate them at this time because, as I said, the hon. member has made a very powerful case and one which we are going to look into.

With regard to the question of minimum penalties, here again there is perhaps some room for difference of opinion and the difference of opinion can be maintained or retained with respect for the opposite point of view. There are, however, I believe only three sections of the Criminal Code which provide for minimum penalties at the present time although there are, it is true, other federal statutes which have minimum penalty provisions. I do point out to the hon. gentleman that if there is a clear example of a case where the minimum penalty results in a sentence which is in excess of that which is appropriate under the circumstances, then the provisions of the Ticket of Leave Act, administered by my colleague the Solicitor General, do afford in general a ready remedy for that situation and, as was the case of the woman recently convicted in connection with theft from the mails, that course was followed and there was an almost immediate exercise of the prerogative under the Ticket of Leave Act. The reason I make this point with regard to minimum sentences is that I think there is a good deal to be said for the requirement of minimum sentences in some cases in order that necessary measures of rehabilitation, reform and training may be instituted.

I admit that those sentences could perhaps be left to the discretion of the court and if it appeared to the court that the circumstances of the particular offender necessitated or justified a longer sentence in order that reform or rehabilitation methods could be instituted, then the court should adjust the sentence accordingly. But, under the present state of the law and of the training of staff and in the absence of a system—we have to admit its absence—of pre-sentence reports; in the absence of a scientific and complete system of pre-sentence reports so that one can be certain that every aspect regarding the circumstances of the convicted man are drawn to the attention of the trial judge there is, I submit, an argument in certain cases for minimum sentences and justifiable, I think, only on the basis I have suggested, namely that it may be necessary in some cases in order to permit of necessary reform and rehabilitation training to be instituted.

But having said that, I still admit to the powerful argument made by my hon. friend. I do not say this to detract from his argument and I assure him that this matter also can and will be looked into in connection with the study which it is anticipated we shall have with the attorneys general arising out of the recommendation of the Fauteux committee with respect to this matter of the bringing about of uniformity in the sentencing practices of the court. This is one of the matters up for study. Therefore, it may well be found that once the uniform practice and the pre-sentence report system have been developed, this argument I have made in connection with minimum sentences will no longer be adequate. If that can be done, then I think it would be better to leave it to the discretion of the court. That whole matter will be studied and developed at the forthcoming conference.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Justice.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

383. Departmental administration, $282,666.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Has the minister any statement to make?

Mr. Courtemanche: No.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, at the outset may I take this opportunity on behalf of myself and my colleagues to offer my best wishes to the Secretary of State on his birthday. I know the position he is in this evening, this being the first time he has presented estimates to the House of Commons. I wish him well in his office, as I have done before on other occasions. This is the first opportunity I have had to say how relieved we were that in the recent accident in which he was involved he came off without injury and we hope that his very charming wife is having a rapid and happy recovery.

There is one thing that is unfortunate so far as discussion of these estimates is concerned. I refer to the fact that we do not have the reports of the different departments administered by the Secretary of State. They have not been printed and that makes our position a little difficult in questioning the minister if we have to take each item and ask for comparative figures corresponding to the report we have on hand, that up to March 31, 1957. Knowing that these reports are not at hand I trust that the minister will supply as much information as possible from his own records and will not have to be requested for details on each item from this side of the house.

The Secretary of State administers a great number of departments including, of course, one of the most important, the civil service commission. I hope that his tenure of administration will be long enough so that he may acquaint himself with the problems of the civil service and the commission. After all, the government of Canada is a very large employer and depends upon its employees to carry out the various functions of government. I hope that the minister will always consider himself the champion of his employees and be willing to answer at all times on behalf of the employees of the government. If at any time some hon. members feel inclined to deride or criticize some of the employees in the civil service, who have no opportunity to defend themselves, I hope he will rise in his place, ask for particulars and defend those who are responsible to him and the government.

I also hope that he will take great interest in the revision of the Civil Service Act. We have heard very little about the revision of the act but I understand from press reports and statements made by civil service commission officials that a study of the act has been going on for some time, something which is long overdue. Of course, the Civil Service Act was drafted many years ago at a time when the relationship between the employees and the government and the number of employees were much different from today. I think the system has been established now that the appointment of servants of the crown should be done on a fair basis, should be done by examination, by merit, that promotions should be by merit and that all relationships between employer and employees should be the best and above the standard existing in ordinary industrial and commercial enterprises.

I think we all have reason to be proud of our civil service. I have said before, and I am sure all members agree, that the civil service of Canada is the best in the world. Our civil servants are efficient, loyal and as hard working as any other group of employees in commercial undertakings anywhere. If there is any fault involving a small number of employees it is just as negligible as in any other big business.

The problems, as I have outlined before, are mainly those relating to promotion, wages, appeals and working conditions. I hope that in drafting the new act the powers of the commission will be properly defined. In my opinion it is not clear in the minds of members of the house exactly what are the powers of the members of the civil service commission. There is always a doubt that there is some other power exercising a greater authority than the civil service commission in important matters relating to employees of the crown. Of course, I know that treasury board has to have that control which is necessary in approving expenditure and that the size of wage increases has to be subject to approval by the cabinet. But in any event I think the new act should make clear what are the powers of the civil service commission in selecting and promoting employees, hearing appeals from employees and suggesting wage scales. Once that has been established I think the government should insist that all matters within the powers of the civil service commission should be decided by the commission and that employees should have the right to appeal to the commission and be heard before a proper board with respect to any matters on which the commission grants leave to appeal.

I am not at all satisfied that at present the right of appeal with respect to promotion is satisfactory. I hope that the system will be revised. I am not satisfied either that when civil servants are dismissed with or without cause a proper appeal is provided that is satisfactory to both parties. I have had a great deal of experience in this city with civil servants and I must say, having in mind the rights granted to members of unions working in commercial establishments, that our civil servants have been very reasonable and I think they should be granted more privileges under any new act than they have been granted in the past.

I also think that the civil service commission should have the right to make more effective recommendations as to working conditions. Those of us who have lived in or around Ottawa for some time know that our establishments are not the most suitable and that, for example, objections involving ventilation, light, heat and cold are made with regard to almost all the buildings where civil servants work. I do not give credit to any former administration for having done any better but I hope that in the future the civil service commission will have the right to have a voice with respect to the new buildings which will be constructed for the government, and will have a say as to the type of equipment, ventilation, light, the size of offices et cetera so that our civil service will have working conditions which are suitable and, as I would hope, the best of any.

Sometime ago we heard that a study would be made with respect to wage increases in the civil service. I understand that at this time the civil service commission has completed its study and has transmitted it to the cabinet. I cannot hope that the minister will tell me that the wage rate has been set or that the wage increase has been granted or refused; however, I would hope that he could tell me that the civil service commission has completed its study and that it is now up to the government to decide whether any wage increases are to be granted or whether the matter is to be studied further.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words to the Secretary of State about bilingualism. It is incumbent upon him in his new functions to see that bilingualism is respected in government documents and publications. It is also incumbent upon him to see to it that the civil service commission requires respect for bilingualism in appointments when such is required.

I should particularly like to remind him that a French-speaking candidate should not be called upon to fill only a position where the knowledge of French is required if, in addition, he can speak English. Not only should he be eligible for any position offered by the civil service commission but he should be given some preference in view of the fact that he speaks both languages fluently. The minister has expressed his opinion on this matter in the past and, now that he is a member of the cabinet, I hope that he will bring the same attention to this problem and protect the interests of those candidates.

It is not my intention at this moment to go fully into the other branches of the Secretary of State Department. However, I should like to know if the minister will report to us on the commission under the Inquiries Act, to inquire into the working of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Designs Act, and other related legislation, as well as on the trade mark service.

(Text):

As I said before, I only want to make a few remarks at this time and shall reserve other remarks on the items which will be called individually.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, at the outset, may I say to the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) that we are happy that though he is celebrating his birthday today this does not appear to have aged him in the least. We wish him very many happy returns of the day.

Mr. Denis: But not as Secretary of State.

Mr. Caron: No, even though he is an extremely genial gentleman that we all like to meet. I would also like to extend to his wife my best wishes for a prompt recovery.

I have no intention of detaining the house for any length of time nor to create trouble for the Secretary of State in any way. He is a most genial gentleman, that we all appreciate. I was happy at his appointment and I know that this is the first time he is bringing down his departmental estimates, something which is always difficult and somewhat unpleasant. I hope that he will not get into that habit for too long before he is replaced and that he will make good use, on this side of the house, of the experience he has acquired where he is sitting now.

As the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) said a moment ago, a very important feature of our life here in Canada is our civil service. Our civil service is made up of highly competent persons, appointed after examinations designed to determine their fitness for the particular job concerned, and with no political interference. I know that at this time there is some uneasiness within the ranks of civil servants. This uneasiness has been brought about by certain members who, having made some rather inconsiderate promises, have been attacking civil servants and accusing them of meddling in politics. These people are in a most uncomfortable position at this time. As far as the great majority of them are concerned, they certainly do not deserve to be called by the names they have been called.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caron: I hear laughter. It must be the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) who wants to take the floor.

Mr. Denis: He is a nervous man.

Mr. Caron: I cannot speak as beautiful French as he does, but I am better aware than he will ever be of the civil service problem, and with his dull wit, his lack of serious learning, he will never be able—

Mr. Denis: Back home we call these people "smart Alecs".

Mr. Caron: Yes, "smart Alecs", but I know some of those "smart Alecs" which are much cleverer than that one.

I was speaking about the civil service, a matter which the hon. member for Roberval cannot grasp, because of his dull wit. I was saying that some members—and perhaps he is one of them, but I am not accusing him of being one of those who could do such things—have aroused some ill-feeling in the ranks of the civil service. I believe the Secretary of State should give some assurance to civil servants that they will not be molested without at least being given the opportunity to defend themselves. If the civil servants are guilty of meddling in politics or of any other activity inconsistent with their duties, I think they should be punished as anyone else, but I believe they are also entitled to be heard and to have their case defended.

I feel that the charges which were levelled against a federal civil servant without his being afforded an opportunity to defend himself constituted an act of dishonesty on the part of the person who preferred those charges. I feel that the Secretary of State, who is a serious and able person, should take the bull by the horns and act in this matter, even if cabinet colleagues of his be the ones who abuse their power to crush certain civil servants. He should say to them: "At least, if you have any charges to make against a civil servant, you will do so in such a manner that he will have an opportunity to defend himself, to be fairly tried, as any other person should be fairly tried". The Secretary of State knows this is no exaggeration. I suggest he do what is required so that such people may be heard and may, if necessary, have some one take up their defence.

I have no intention of detaining the house too long, but I wish to talk of another department which comes under the Secretary of State, the printing bureau.

I said a moment ago that there was uneasiness in the civil service and I now say that there is also uneasiness in the printing bureau and that is due to the fact that one man, believing that ministers go but that he stays on, behaves in a high-handed way with the staff. I am referring to the queen's printer.

It is high time this man learned that even the humblest of his employees is entitled to some consideration. I have received several complaints from civil servants whose names I will not mention, for fear of reprisals. The employees are dissatisfied, but are afraid to say it openly, and I think the Secretary of State would act creditably in launching an impartial inquiry, where people could speak freely, knowing that their statements would not be repeated to the czar of that department, and I feel sure that this inquiry would uncover startling things.

I am even convinced that the Secretary of State has never been informed by the queen's printer of the many complaints made about the cafeteria. Yet, he was made aware of many complaints, which have remained in his files. Indeed, I believe that some doctors have said that the food there was unfit for consumption and that, if the employees want to stay alive, they should go and eat somewhere else.

I believe that an investigation should be made about that situation. It would be very important that such an inquiry be carried out in such a way that the complainants would not be identified. I always fear for them, since there are many ways of dismissing an employee, and if their names were known, they might not be dismissed for what they have said but some way would be found of laying them off later on for some insignificant slip. I would therefore suggest that the Secretary of State make this inquiry so that an understanding may be reached.

I know the Secretary of State means well and that he will consider the case of those employees with sympathy. If an employer or high official heading a department—because the employer is always the State—does not always act as he should towards his employees, he should be put in his place and told of his duties and responsibilities towards people under him.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a few remarks on the same general subject as that dealt with by the two gentlemen who have preceded me. I have always abhorred the wording for the classification "civil servants". I do not care for the title. I think it is rather a degrading way of making reference to those people who work in the service of Canada. I rather hoped that we could find some other classification or category for the people in the public service. However, inasmuch as there is no other category perhaps in my remarks I shall have to make reference to the people in the public service in an effort to avoid the use of the phrase which I do not care to use. I do not believe this phrase adds much to the stature of the individuals, those people collectively, who work in the public service of Canada in so far as their relationship with their employer, in this instance the crown or the government of Canada.

I hold the same ideas in this respect that I have held for quite a number of years and which were expressed in my own province with respect to the same group of people who work for the provincial government. We in the C.C.F. are somewhat of the same opinion as the hon. member for Ottawa East, who spoke earlier, in so far as the relationship of these people with their employer is concerned. We believe a channel should be provided, somewhat similar to that which exists for other groups of employees, by means of which grievances in connection with working conditions may be settled. Employees working for private companies, and for some crown companies in this nation, are provided with means whereby these grievances may be settled. Employees in the public service who have grievances arising out of what they may consider to be improper cause for discharge, questions of wages, hours and working conditions, should not have to adopt a cap in hand attitude to their employers. They should not have to say, please, we would like to have an adjustment in wages, or we think it is necessary for these reasons, or we would like to have a change in our working conditions, and these are our arguments for them. They should not have to say, we think that such an individual or group has been dealt with incorrectly and we think some redress should be given to them. These employees should not have to go on bended knee, as it were, and I am not being critical of the attitude of the government in this respect but merely of the relationship between employees and the crown or the government itself.

These people in the public service should be treated in the same manner as other groups of employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction. They should have the right, as some have now, not only to organize into unions representative of their type of work, but they should have the right to apply for and receive a certificate of bargaining authority. They should be in the same position in approaching their employers with respect to negotiation as are the employees of the Canadian National Railways, which is a publicly-owned corporation. They should be able to sit down, within a certain time limit, and bargain with their employer, in this case the federal government, in connection with all matters which they consider to be subjects for negotiations.

On the other side, the government would be in precisely the same position of being able to negotiate with representatives of these employees with respect to matters that the federal government felt needed changing. May I call it ten o'clock?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there any change in the program for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: No, we shall take the estimates of the departments of national defence and defence production tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: And Saturday northern affairs?

Mr. Green: I am not sure whether or not they would be called first. We may go on with the estimates of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Pickersgill: There would not be any other department? I think it would affect the plans of some on this side of the house if there were any change.

Mr. Green: If we were to finish these estimates, we would then take the items under legislation.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATO CONTROL OF U.S. FORCES IN CANADA

Question No. 164—Mr. Fisher:

1. Are United States forces in Canada governed by the NATO status of forces agreement?
2. If so, were any members of the United States forces in Canada charged in service courts in 1956 and in 1957, under paragraph seven, subsection 2a of the Visiting Forces (North Atlantic Treaty) Act, 1951?
3. If so, how many?
4. Were any members of the United States forces charged in the civil courts of Canada in 1956 and 1957? If so, how many?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The disposition of all cases tried by United States service courts in Canada, where the right to exercise jurisdiction is concurrent, is reported to the attorneys general or their local representatives in the provinces in which these cases are heard. The United States forces do not maintain statistics of the reports made to the attorneys general of the provinces and the Department of National Defence has never requested the provincial authorities, who are responsible for the administration of criminal law in Canada, to keep the department informed on this matter or on the number of United States servicemen tried in civil courts in Canada.

4. Trials in civil courts are provincial matters and the federal government has not asked the provinces to provide returns.

INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT—CATERING REGULATIONS

Question No. 174—Mr. Boivin:

1. Has the international air transport association made regulations concerning the serving of sandwiches in lieu of meals to passengers on board aeroplanes flying to or from overseas countries?
2. If so, when were such regulations made?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. The international air transport association made regulations which prohibited the serving of meals and, in lieu, permitted only the serving of sandwiches. These regulations were made to apply only in air transportation services across the north Atlantic and in "economy" class accommodations at "economy" fares.

2. The regulations in question were adopted at the association's traffic conference meetings in November 1957 and became effective April 1, 1958, after having been approved by all the goverments concerned.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Fourth report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Stanton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S.—PROPOSED JOINT CONGRESSIONAL-PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the fact that the Senate foreign relations committee of the United States yesterday passed unanimously Senator Aiken's proposal for a joint congressional-parliamentary committee to consider United States-Canadian relations, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any action has been taken at this end to co-operate in that most important and desirable initiative?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): With the closing words of the Leader of the Opposition I am, of course, in entire agreement. Throughout the years, and particularly since the first occasion in 1942 when a gathering took place in the city of Ottawa of the empire parliamentary union to which seats were allocated as observers to representatives of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, it was well shown, both on that occasion and in the subsequent meetings that took place informally, what advantages can flow from a degree of consultation between private members of parliament and members of the congress of the United States.

I am very pleased to learn that the motion in question by Senator Aiken has been passed by the United States Senate, and I will bring to the attention of the house in the next few days something of a suggestion along similar lines after consultation with my colleagues and, of course, within the limitations which our constitutional system provides and requires.

With the objective I could not be more in agreement. As to the means whereby we can co-operate in this regard, further consideration must be given. I would very much appreciate any expression of views on the part of the Leader of the Opposition and other interested members, such as the hon. member for Assiniboia, in this connection so that the action taken will command the general approval of members of the house as a whole rather than being a matter of a government measure.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Speaking for this group, Mr. Speaker, I am sure we appreciate the remarks of the Prime Minister. We are completely in agreement with the sentiments he has expressed, and we hope such a joint Canadian-United States legislative committee may be set up and begin to function at an early date.

Having in mind the different constitutions of both countries, I feel that such a committee would have very great benefit for Canada in particular and also no doubt from the United States point of view. I say to the Prime Minister I am sure that we would support the early convening of such a committee and would support any proposals to have it convened, if it were necessary, before the next session of parliament.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NOTICE OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Votes and Proceedings of this morning carries a notice in the name of the Minister of Transport that there is a new piece of legislation to be introduced having to do with the Railway Act and the regulations concerning the grade crossing fund. When there was a discussion of this matter on Monday and the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister what was the business of the house for the remainder of the session he outlined, on page 3061 of Hansard, what that business was to be, and there was no mention of this legislation at all.

I am not objecting to the fact that perhaps this is important legislation, but in my opinion it is so important that I doubt whether it should be brought down in the dying days of the session.

I noticed that the Prime Minister desired to rise. I do not know whether it was to interrupt me or to interrupt others, but in any event I am asking now whether it is the intention to add any more legislation to that which has already been announced, and how this has come about.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know there was nothing inherent in the question in the nature of a whining attitude, as somebody mentioned a moment ago. I am sorry I omitted reference to that legislation. As a matter of fact I had it on my list, and as I went down the list I inadvertently omitted reference to it, and it was the only omission I made. I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to permit that legislation to be proceeded with this session, because it will be generally beneficial in the matter of employment as well as removing a serious cause of accidents in this country, namely the degree to which grade crossings contribute to the death lists. I hope he will be able to permit the legislation to be proceeded with, realizing that sometimes one does slip up in details. I do not think it is a very serious omission, but I ask that he allow the legislation to be dealt with.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can assure the Prime Minister that there will be no objection to the principle of this legislation. I have looked at the nature of it and on its face, without the details before us, it seems to be good in principle. I have a supplementary question. Is this, together with what was announced on August 4, all the remaining legislation which will be brought down from now to the end of the session?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as I am concerned the answer is yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Which may be brought down.

TRANSPORT

WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO HEARINGS ON TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the current intense interest in the question of tolls or no tolls on the Welland canal, can the minister indicate whether there is a chance only for a reduction in these tolls following the hearings, or whether there could be a decision not to have tolls at all?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, hearings are going on at the present time on this matter. When they have been concluded a report will be made to me by the president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I shall consider the matter at that time, and will probably discuss it with my cabinet colleagues.

SHIPPING

REPORTED RESCUE OF CANADIANS BY U.S. ICEBREAKER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government. I am not too sure whether it should go to the Minister of Transport or the Minister of National Defence. According to a press report this morning it appears that a United States icebreaker has gone to the rescue of some Canadians in northern waters. Why is it necessary for a United States icebreaker to go to the rescue of these men?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not gone into the details. I saw a reference in a morning paper, and I would assume that if a United States icebreaker has gone to the rescue of these men it is because it was the nearest ship available for that particular task.

Mr. Chevrier: Could I ask a supplementary question and put it this way. If the C.G.S. Labrador, formerly H.M.C.S. Labrador, had remained under the Department of National Defence would it not have gone to the rescue of these men, since at this time of the year it would be in northern waters?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if the Labrador had remained under the Department of National Defence it could not possibly have known where this accident was going to occur, and it might or might not have been the nearest ship.

TRADE

GRAIN—REPORTED STATEMENT ON RESTRICTION OF CREDIT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the statement made by the chairman of the Canadian wheat board, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of August 5, represents government policy? Mr. McNamara is reported as having said that credit sales of Canadian grain should be confined only to Colombo plan countries. Does that represent government policy?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think one would have to examine the report of the agriculture committee to see exactly what Mr. McNamara said on that occasion. Credit sales have not been confined entirely to countries under the Colombo plan, because credit arrangements have been made with Poland and Israel.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I say this to the minister in the friendliest spirit.

Mr. Hees: Watch out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would it then be correct to say that there is no foundation for this report?

GRAIN

PROGRESS OF INQUIRY INTO ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the great interest in having the box car inquiry report made public as soon as possible in view of the new crop coming on the market in the next few weeks. Can the minister say when the report may be received and whether it will be during this session so that item No. 16 on the order paper, the resolution to provide for a transport controller, may be proceeded with if that is necessary?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the report is in the process of being written now. It may be available before the end of the session, but I cannot be sure of the exact date when it will be made public.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. If the legislation standing in the name of the Minister of Transport for the extension of certain powers for the control of transport of goods is not proceeded with, will it be possible to appoint a transport controller?

Mr. Churchill: I shall take that question as notice and investigate.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON DEATHS AT GARRY LAKE, N.W.T.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Will the minister table the report he referred to the other day with regard to the investigation into the death of a number of Eskimos in the Garry lake area?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is being done.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

220. To provide for the Canadian Forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including costs incurred in the participation of the Canadian forces in the United Nations emergency force and contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $130,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,158,845,866 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,350,597,670 will come due for payment in future years), $1,630,377,196.

Mr. Pearkes: The estimates of my department which are now before this committee, Mr. Chairman, have already been examined in detail by the members of the standing committee on estimates. Of course this in no way limits the right of members of this committee to ask any questions they may wish. However, at the numerous meetings of the committee on estimates which were held during the course of the past two months, my department endeavoured to present as full a picture as possible of Canada's defence effort. The hard work performed by members of the committee deserves my thanks and appreciation. The conduct of the proceedings reflects credit on the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Calgary South. I can assure the house that a careful study will be made, both by myself and by the officials of the department, of the recommendations submitted by that committee. Many of those recommendations are most helpful, and are in line with present thought in the department.

These estimates which this committee is asked to approve were prepared a year ago, and they mark the final phase of a program which was originated to meet the conditions which existed at the time of the Korean war. You will recall that at that time the Department of National Defence increased substantially the strength of our three services, and undertook an extensive building program.

The period which began in 1950 is now coming to an end. The construction program is in the final stage, and a number of steps have been taken in connection with the reorganization of the three services.

We are now entering a new era in defence, an era when the threat of the manned bomber is being supplemented by the threat of a missile. The government will take measures to meet this new threat to our security. It is significant that during the past year attention has been focused on Canada's growing role in world affairs. In the Middle East, Canada contributes a major component to the United Nations emergency force now serving in Egypt. In this force there are over 900 Canadian army personnel and some 100 members of the R.C.A.F. The members of our armed services serving in that area deserve the highest praise for the work that they are carrying out, work which is done under extremely trying conditions.

In addition, we are taking part in the United Nations supervisory organization in Palestine, and have recently increased the number of Canadian personnel serving with the observer group in Lebanon. We are able to provide these personnel to the various United Nations missions without impairing the operational element of our services. The fact that Canada has fulfilled these requests for assistance may be an indication that in future we will be asked to accept further commitments to help maintain peace in troubled areas. If Canada should again be asked to send a force on some mission such as UNEF we have a stand-by battalion in readiness for such an eventuality.

With reference to our contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization the fourth Canadian infantry brigade is presently stationed in Germany as part of the shield forces of NATO. The nuclear concept of war postulates the possibility that our major ports and lines of communication could be severely damaged in the initial enemy attack. Hence there is some doubt as to whether or not formations on this continent could reach Europe during the early and critical phase of the war. Canada, however, remains committed to furnishing the balance of an infantry division to NATO in the event of hostilities, but the portion of these forces stationed in Canada is now regarded as a strategic reserve. In order to rotate our brigade in Europe and maintain forces for the defence of Canada we have three brigade groups located respectively in the western, central and eastern areas of Canada. Each of these groups contains troops especially equipped and trained for operations in northern Canada.

In the light of new weapons developments, some major re-equipping of our army cannot long be delayed. Intensive study is now being given as to the new weapons which should be procured.

Canada's first air division with its 12 squadrons of interceptor aircraft is also in position in Europe as part of our NATO commitment, and it provides an important component of the fourth allied tactical air force under SACEUR. In addition, the Royal Canadian Navy has a number of ships earmarked for the NATO supreme allied commander, Atlantic, in the event of an emergency.

I would like to emphasize the importance of the anti-submarine role of our navy. With the advent of nuclear power and the knowledge that missiles can be fired from submarines far from our shores, our seaward defences take on increasing significance. The latest destroyer escorts now coming into service are effective weapons against the modern submarine.

In view of this changed concept of modern war at sea, there is no longer a requirement for a cruiser component in the Royal Canadian Navy. H.M.C.S. Quebec has been taken out of commission and placed in reserve at Sydney, Nova Scotia. Our other cruiser, H.M.C.S. Ontario, has been carrying out the role of training ship to the fleet. It has been decided now to decommission the Ontario and declare her and the Quebec surplus to requirements. The training functions which have been carried out by the Ontario will be transferred to an operational frigate squadron. The training received in the ships of this group will be based on the requirements of the present fleet.

Some economies will result from these changes. These include the cruiser's annual running cost amounting to $1,600,000, and the not inconsiderable cost of maintaining these ships in reserve. The officers and men now serving in the Ontario are required to man the new destroyer escorts now being completed.

One recent acquisition to our anti-submarine forces has been the Argus, a long-range patrol aircraft now coming into operational service. This aircraft, capable of sustained flight for in excess of 20 hours and armed with the latest anti-submarine weapons, increases the effectiveness of our maritime defence.

In Canada we are also making a major contribution not only to the defence of the land mass of our continent but, through our radar lines, to the alerting of the retaliatory forces of the west. It has been obvious for some time that the defence of this continent is the joint concern of both Canada and the United States. The establishment of the joint air defence command has already received the approval of parliament, and this agreement will undoubtedly strengthen the defence of this continent. The recent announcement, following the visit of President Eisenhower to Ottawa, of a joint ministerial committee on defence will also add to mutual co-operation.

I have already referred to the high cost of new weapons. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the air. Over the years we have built up on this continent, with our United States allies, radar warning systems. It should be made clear that these systems —the DEW, the mid-Canada and the Pinetree lines—were constructed to give warning of manned bombers. They were not meant to deal with the intercontinental ballistic missile and are not capable of so doing, but they are effective against the known capabilities of the present day bomber. However, steps are being taken to improve the method of processing the information received through these radar lines. Automatic systems of control and of passing information must be introduced as aircraft with increased capabilities come into operation.

With the rapid advancement in weapon development the importance of carrying on research is obvious. In these estimates this committee is asked to approve the sum of $82,525,000 for the defence research board. To give members an idea of the functions of this board I might quote what I said to the standing committee on July 8 last, as follows:

> The main tasks which have been assigned to the defence research board are: Defence against the ballistic missile, particularly in the field of radio propagation in high altitudes; submarine detection and anti-submarine defence systems; operational research studies of weapons systems with emphasis on the joint air defence of North America; studies of nuclear propulsion of ships; responsibility for a large part of the Canadian contribution to the international geophysical year; research in man's ability to survive in such environments as high altitudes, great speed and extreme cold; development of communications and navigational systems; improvement in conventional weapons; development of new rocket type weapons; research in the field of atomic, bacteriological and chemical warfare; research on data processing and the ever-widening use of electronics; research on propellants and explosives and scientific advice to civil defence authorities.

I might add that research into bacteriological warfare is conducted entirely as a defensive measure against the possibility of the use of bacteriological attack by hostile forces.

Before concluding I would like to say a word about the need for a high standard of officer in our armed services. This requirement is being met in part by graduates of our service colleges. The recent decision to grant degrees at the Royal Military College at Kingston is an indication of the recognition of the high academic standards required.

In so far as the role of the reserve forces is concerned, this subject was covered in the committee. Suffice it to say that each service has an important part to play and that the members of our reserves, whose role has changed in the light of modern warfare, are adapting themselves to their new tasks with admirable spirit. The emphasis on the forces in being and the cost of equipping such forces with modern weapons has of necessity called for firm reappraisal of the allotment of available funds, but within the limitations imposed there is a continuing requirement for our reserve forces.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the introduction of the minister's estimates gives members a chance to discuss, at least on this item and in a general way, defence considerations and strategic concepts, indeed the international situation which makes it necessary for the government to bring forward defence estimates of this magnitude in the year 1958. I propose to take advantage of this opportunity to make some observations of a general character based to a large extent on the work of the committee and on the contributions made by the minister in the committee, to our knowledge of defence matters, and in this respect I have particular reference to those of us who served on the committee. I also propose to comment upon one or two things the minister has said this morning.

The minister stressed, quite rightly, that we are entering into a new era of defence, that we are now facing new defence problems —new even in the sense that they were not with us two or three years ago—and that new methods and new steps are required to meet these new problems.

Before I deal with these more general subjects, however, I would like to join the minister in paying sincere tribute, not to the work of the committee because I sat on that committee and I therefore cannot do so, but to the contribution of the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Calgary South who presided over our work with efficiency and fairness. I think we are all most indebted to him for the way in which he conducted the work of the committee. I believe also it will be found by the house that the report of the committee will make a valuable contribution to the work of the Department of National Defence. As the minister has pointed out, the recommendations will be given careful consideration.

As a member of the committee I was interested to note that the power given to the committee to call for persons and papers was not exercised, and that the proceedings before it were conducted, in so far as witnesses were concerned, very much in the same way as they were conducted in the defence committee two or three years ago. Various proposals were made which the minister has pointed out, in addition to many recommendations in connection with a variety of matters. Perhaps the best way in which we on this side of the house can proceed with respect to those recommendations, if we have any comments to make upon them, would be to bring forward those comments when the particular items concerned are under consideration.

One suggestion was made with which I most heartily agree, and that was that the Department of National Defence should return to the practice of previous years and produce an annual report and a white paper on defence. The minister did submit to the committee when he appeared, a very detailed, comprehensive and useful report on defence policy. Perhaps, however, it would have been more helpful to the committee and might even have made the work of the committee somewhat more effective if the kind of report which the minister produced for the benefit of the committee had been available earlier so we might have had a chance to study it in advance, in which case perhaps our questions would have been even more intelligent than they were.

We are being asked to vote a very large sum of money for defence. It is interesting to note that the minister has found, no doubt with the best will in the world, that the international situation is such that it is not possible—and I certainly do not quarrel with him on this score—to reduce our defence expenditure, and that the direction of his department and the conduct of affairs in that department and in the services has been such as to make it impossible to reduce the amounts required through the elimination of any waste or extravagance in the department itself.

The reason we are being asked to vote this amount—and it is a very large amount indeed, and a very high proportion of our total budget—is, of course, that the international situation is such that we have to pay a very high premium for defence insurance, a premium of well over a billion and a half dollars. This emphasizes once again, if emphasis is required, that when our foreign policy fails—perhaps I should say, rather, when it does not succeed, together with the foreign policies of other countries, in establishing security in the world—then our defence expenditure becomes more burdensome, and in that sense diplomacy is a very important part of defence. If diplomacy had succeeded better, perhaps we should not have to spend $1,600 million for this kind of defence.

We have before us at the present time a good example of the failure of diplomacy which in its turn will have its effect on the contribution which the Canadian people will have to continue to make toward defence. I am thinking now of the failure to bring about greater stability in the Middle East and solve some of the immediate and some of the more far-reaching problems there.

I think one could say in that regard that recent diplomatic developments in that area, which in turn will have their effect on defence policy and expenditures in Canada, leave one with a feeling of discouragement and almost, at times, of despair. When action was taken in Lebanon and Jordan a few weeks ago which was considered by those taking the action to be necessary, and which was taken only after invitations from the governments concerned, it seemed to some that not only would it be possible to bring that action to an end on terms which would be satisfactory to the countries concerned and remove any danger of conflict in that area, but it seemed also to some that we might be able to take advantage of this critical situation to seek the roots of the difficulty and do something about the problem which brought about this intervention in the first place. I have felt, and so I know have other hon. members, that an opportunity was given us in that regard.

To me it was a surprising opportunity when the head of the Russian state invited the United Kingdom, the United States, France, India and the secretary general of the United Nations to what he called a summit conference which he himself said would be under the auspices of the United Nations in the sense that it could report back to the security council of the United Nations. This was to be a summit conference which, from the western point of view, would have the kind of representation which could hardly be improved upon.

But we know what happened. That original invitation was not accepted in a form which would make possible the convening of this meeting, and diplomatic negotiations began which resulted in the conference becoming a public meeting of the security council. Those of us who have been at the United Nations know what such public meetings can be. When that proposal did not finally commend itself to the head of the Russian state another proposal was put forward for a special assembly of 81 nations, also to meet in public.

So instead of having a small, informal meeting which might have done something to provide a solution to these Middle East problems, and a meeting which could have reported back to the United Nations, we were left with the alternatives of a propaganda meeting of the 11 members of the security council held in public, or of an even more propagandist meeting of the 81 members of the assembly.

That is the situation we are facing now, and I suggest that the only way in which we in the west can really accomplish something in the face of the diplomatic manoeuvres that have been going on is by putting before this assembly some constructive proposals on economic and political planning in the Middle East of the kind that might possibly have been placed before a smaller meeting. Unless we can use the assembly for that purpose—and there is not going to be much time—this assembly will deteriorate into a propaganda jamboree with charges and countercharges of aggression, direct and indirect, and it will not make much of a contribution to the solution of this problem. And unless we do this we will probably find that next year our defence estimates will be just as large as, if not larger than, they were this year.

The minister pointed out in his statement and in his report to the committee that Canadian defence policy is based, as it has been for some years, on the acceptance of various obligations. The first obligation on defence policy is, of course, the defence of our own territory, but we have other obligations which also involve the defence of Canada by action outside Canada. The minister has mentioned as one of those, our obligations under the United Nations; and in dealing with these responsibilities he pointed out what Canada is doing at the present time to discharge those obligations through the Department of National Defence. He paid tribute to the work Canadian servicemen are doing in the United Nations emergency force and in other far places of the world in the interests of peace, a tribute in which I should like sincerely to join. Not only is the United Nations emergency force operating in the Middle East, but observation groups are playing a useful and indeed a valuable role in preventing trouble in various parts of the world. There are missions in Indo-China. There are Canadian observers in Pakistan, and there are now many in Lebanon. As the minister has indicated, this international activity is a concept which I think must affect Canada's defence policy in the years ahead.

What can we do on our part to make a contribution to international police activity, which if it can do nothing else might prevent small conflicts developing into world destructive wars? There is one concept which governed our defence concept in the past which I suggest is now obsolete and should have little if anything to do with defence planning. That is the concept that we should make preparation in Canada for sending an expeditionary force overseas, as we have had to do twice in our lifetime. It does not seem to me to be realistic to contemplate that kind of contribution by which over the months and years we would be sending troops across the Atlantic to the battlefields of Europe.

Because it is an indication that the government does realize that this is pretty much out of date in the nuclear age I was glad to hear the minister say that even our NATO obligation to bring our brigade up to divisional strength in case of conflict overseas—and that is an obligation we have undertaken—is perhaps of less importance than it was, and of less importance than some of the other obligations which face us at this time. I was also very glad to hear him say that in the discharge of this new kind of obligation to contribute toward international forces—not to win a war but to prevent a war—the department had now a battalion well equipped and available on short notice as Canada's contribution to this kind of activity. I believe that is very important, especially in the light of the possibility that in the months ahead we may be asked to make that kind of contribution along with other countries.

I am inclined to repeat here what I have said in the house before and in committees of the house, that if this kind of contribution is to be made effective—the international police force and the international observer group idea—we have to make this kind of preparation for it in advance. We have to set up a kind of permanent defence organization at United Nations headquarters and the countries who are willing to make this kind of contribution, and Canada is one of them, should let the organization in New York know in advance what they will have available and ready for any particular emergency that may develop.

I believe Canada has played a highly imaginative and constructive part in this concept. Not only did we make forces available years ago at the time of the Korean crisis, but at that time we said the forces should be made available, a brigade, subject to parliamentary approval, for any United Nations action which might be required in the future, and I think that decision still holds.

I grow a little impatient when I hear the great powers say they do not want to do this kind or that of thing, or having done it, say: "We should like to get out of it; if only the United Nations will move in and take over our responsibility we will withdraw". That is what they say in time of crisis or emergency. But when the emergency is past and we go down to the United Nations and make a proposal for the establishment of some kind of permanent machinery which might make it unnecessary for them to intervene in the future, they can find all kinds of reasons for hesitation and delay. This would be a good time, labouring as we are under the fear of this crisis, to press ahead with this kind of international force to which Canada is now pledged to make a contribution in the future along the lines of the contributions we have made in the past.

So much for our United Nations defence obligation. We have, of course, very important defence obligations—and the minister mentioned them here and in the committee—under NATO. It is not easy for someone who does not attend the NATO meetings to ascertain exactly what is NATO strategy at the present time in the face of the new developments about which the minister has told us. It was considered, and perhaps it is still basic NATO strategy, that there should be built up in Europe balanced collective forces under a NATO commander of a strength sufficient to hold the attack well away, if possible, from the Rhine and western Europe; forces that would be strong enough not only to hold the attack away but to hold it long enough to make it possible for massive retaliation, for the deterrent to go into operation.

I recall attending the NATO council meeting in Lisbon some years ago. The military chiefs at that time said that 95 divisions would be required for that basic NATO strategy. I remember, and I am sure the minister will remember, the government of that day was very strongly attacked by the C.C.F. party in connection with that report because they said we had sold out to the military, who had demanded an impossible total for defence purposes. Well, it is interesting to recall that in the space of a few years—because that Lisbon meeting was not very long ago—the objectives that are now considered required for this basic strategy have been reduced and reduced in terms of military contributions until—I do not know exactly what they are, but they have been reduced greatly. I do know that the NATO commander in chief—and I am not betraying any secret in saying this because he made a public statement about it—did request the NATO defence ministers at the last meeting to raise the number of divisions from 15 to 30 as the minimum which was required to carry out this basic concept.

[Mr. Pearson.]

But there is another concept of basic NATO defence, and I know these matters are now under consideration by NATO committees, though I do not know if the consideration is completed. The other aspect of NATO defence is that the main function and indeed the only defensive function of NATO land and air forces is to identify an aggressor. This is the trip-wire theory of defence about which the minister knows, and only a very small force is required for identification purposes. Once an enemy has been identified and the aggression as such has been identified, then the deterrent goes into operation at once and you have your massive retaliation to defend Europe by the strategic air command of the United States going into operation from its bases.

It seems to me that the weakness of this concept is that if it is assumed by the people in the NATO countries that our only defence against aggression is massive retaliation by the strategic air command of the United States with nuclear bombs, the people of those countries will not be too anxious to make the kind of sacrifice in terms of local defence which is required because they will leave it all to massive retaliation. Because of that fact—and there is some indication that this concept dominates public opinion in some European countries—and because of the consequent weakening of our conventional defence position in western Europe and elsewhere, the massive retaliation deterrent has to get stronger, and as it gets stronger and stronger you do less in a conventional way, so you get into a vicious circle which does not seem to me to be a very satisfactory basis for collective defence.

There is no doubt—and it is one of the things that is most frightening in the present situation—that we are relying now largely on the nuclear deterrent; that this deterrent is now nuclear power of which both sides—not only one side, as was the case six or seven years ago—have more than enough in the form of missiles and bombs to blow our planet to pieces, or at least to destroy those who are inhabiting it, and yet they keep on piling bombs on top of bombs. I have never been able to understand the military reasoning which requiries 100 hydrogen bombs if 50 on each side can destroy the world.

I am informed—and on good authority, because the information comes from a United States official source—that there is enough fissionable material being produced in the United States alone each year now to make 30,000 to 40,000 atom bombs of the old-fashioned type which killed 86,000 people in Hiroshima in one explosion. I am also informed that if this fissionable material, which is still being produced, goes into the more modern, refined hydrogen bomb there is enough material for almost a million Hiroshimas. That is the foundation of power, unbelievable power, on which our nuclear deterrent rests. We rely now for peace primarily on that deterrent.

I was reading the other day a paper by a former admiral of the British navy, Admiral A. W. Buzzard. He was chief of naval intelligence; perhaps the minister knows him. He was making a very strong attack against this reliance for our security, this sole reliance, or at least reliance to too great an extent, on this policy of massive retaliation through the nuclear deterrent. He had this to say in this paper, and perhaps the committee will forgive me if I put it on record:

> This policy of massive retaliation was adopted by NATO as an emergency measure eight years ago, at the time of Korea, when we suddenly realized that we were faced by an aggressive and heavily armed communist empire, and had nothing but America's atomic bomb with which to defend ourselves. It seemed an acceptable policy to most people at the time, because the atomic bomb was then virtually an American monopoly, the Russians having very few of them and no aircraft—let alone ballistic missiles—which could reach America in retaliation.

How that situation has changed.

> But now that Russia, too, has an effective nuclear deterrent—grown to megaton proportions—and she can deliver it into the heart of America, the situation is very different. For whatever we may say, the communists must increasingly doubt—

I suggest that the present situation in the Middle East is a very good illustration of this worry.

> —whether America would in fact commit suicide for a serious local threat in, say, northern Scandinavia, Greece, Yugoslavia, the Middle East, southeast Asia or Korea. Thus, our nuclear deterrent, greatly increased in its severity, has been greatly decreased in its certainty of application, and the "all or nothing" school often forgets that a deterrent, to be effective, must be reasonably certain of being applied, as well as being severe in its consequences. Indeed, it is better for it to be only reasonably severe and certain to be applied, than for it to be disastrous in its severity and uncertain of being applied.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, that is a position which does not inspire a feeling of comfort or security in anyone who contemplates our defence strategy at the present time, when we are relying to such an extent on a nuclear deterrent of such power that we cannot be sure it will be applied because the consequences of the application, or which if applied to meet local and limited aggression, would convert a local limited aggression into world war III, which would end the world.

Because of that dilemma—and it certainly is a dilemma—we may well now find that we are not facing this kind of aggression which is going to bring about this kind of retaliation. The potential enemy, knowing perhaps that an Anglo-Saxon power will hesitate before it drops a nuclear bomb which will convert a limited aggression into world war III, knowing our hesitation in that regard, may concentrate more on direct aggression in a limited way on the periphery of the Soviet empire, or in indirect aggression, economic and political, in a big way.

That means, if it means anything at all in our defence policy, that now not only do we have to maintain a nuclear deterrent, because we have to do that, but we in the western world also have to develop enough tactical defence strength to meet this kind of aggression in various parts of the world without relying on the kind of nuclear weapons I have been talking about. That makes the task of defence policy—defence policy, of course, for the big powers, but also defence policy for all powers—a dual task; to participate in the nuclear deterrent, as Canada is in one sense, and participate also in the building up of conventional collective forces of the kind which might be required because the nuclear deterrent cannot or will not be used.

That is the second concept of defence, Mr. Chairman, the NATO concept; and the third, the one which is of most direct importance to us, is the concept of continental defence, defence of our own territory and defence of our own air, the detection and the destruction of an attack on Canada, which attack would likely be only through the air, or more likely an attack on the United States over Canada. Here is something that the minister has pointed out on more than one occasion. Here is the situation in which Canada is vitally and directly concerned and with which we cannot deal except in the closest possible association with the United States of America. That association, the importance of it and the closeness of it, has been recognized in the formation of the North American defence organization, NORAD.

I only wish—that is all I am going to say about NORAD—that this continental defence organization could be even more closely associated with NATO than the minister said it was associated now, namely in a somewhat indirect and loose way. I suggest that in respect of this aspect of defence policy, the continental aspect, there have been some vitally important changes in the situation in the last two or three years, some very important changes since the decision was made just a few years ago to construct three radar detection lines and to develop and build the CF-100 interceptor. Those changes require changes in our defence policy or modifications of that policy in the light of the necessities brought about by the changes in methods of attack.

The other day I was reading the transcript of the hearings before the Senate armed services committee, and that of the House of Representatives, the two armed services committees of the United States congress last December and last January, and it certainly bears reading. There are some 3,000 pages of printed evidence. The experts who were called before this committee—we do not do that sort of thing in our committee, and I think we are right in our procedure—were of every kind, military, scientific, civilian, business, and they went into those matters in the greatest possible detail. The evidence was scrutinized for security reasons, and some of it was left out. But in appearing before that committee—I think it was the Senate committee though I am not sure; it may have been the House of Representatives committee—the chief of the United States air force said that air defence of the North American continent now required as an important first priority the extension of the DEW line and its improvement, and improved radar detection systems generally.

He said, and the minister repeated this in his evidence before our committee, that the DEW line is now reasonably effective against even the latest bombers but that the Pinetree line is not completely effective even against present bombers. The minister also said this morning that one of our tasks in defence in the year ahead will be to improve radar detection services. The third objective or requirement put down by the chief of the air force as of immediate and first priority was progress in anti-ballistic missile detection, a ballistic missile early warning system, which the minister mentioned this morning as something with which the Canadian government is concerned and into which investigations are proceeding.

In his evidence this general—I think it was General White—and others indicated what this means not only in terms of expenditure of energy but in terms of expenditure of money. They talked in terms of hundreds of millions of dollars for the building of this new radar and ballistic missile detection service and then, having spent hundreds of millions of dollars, we would not have complete security because complete security in these matters is absolutely impossible.

Perhaps I might put on the record some of the statements made which indicate the magnitude of the problem, inasmuch as this is of very definite and direct concern to us because we will be asked, as we have been asked and no doubt are being asked today, to do our part in the development of these new forms of defence. Before the House of Representatives armed services committee last January one member said:

> The Russians will have an I.C.B.M. capability some time during the fiscal year 1959.

That was a question designed no doubt to show the urgency of the problem, which will not brook delay. The reply to that question by General Putt, the senior officer of the air force in charge of research and development, was yes, that they will have I.C.B.M. capability in mid-1959. Then he went on to say that at the moment there is no effective defence whatever against this kind of missile attack.

We recall that when the minister was dealing with this matter in the committee he attempted to reassure us by pointing out that it will be some time before this kind of attack can be made in any strength against the North American continent, if anybody should be mad enough to begin aggression of that kind, but also that these missiles would not take the place of manned bombers against which we have not a perfect but a fairly effective defence at the present time, because continental missiles cannot be directed with any degree of accuracy to a particular target. Of course the No. 1 target on the North American continent is not our industrial complexes, not our great cities, but the air fields from which the nuclear deterrent force would take off; therefore we do not have to be quite as anxious about missile attacks as we would be if these attacks were by manned bombers, because missiles cannot search out and drop on an airfield from which the retaliatory bombers would take off.

Perhaps that is true. No doubt it is true now, but I do not get very much comfort out of it because surely that kind of pinpoint accuracy is not required in the case of continental ballistic missiles with nuclear warheads which, if a few of them dropped on an area, certainly would destroy that area or if dropped on one city would destroy that city. But if the time comes, and perhaps it will come because the Americans and others are working feverishly in this direction, when these missiles achieve the kind of accuracy which will enable them to put the retaliatory bases out of business, then where are we? We are told in this evidence that it is only a matter of minutes from the time these missiles are launched until they reach their objective. We are also told that it would take 15 minutes for a retaliatory squadron to get off the ground.

All this means that air detection is now more important in our defence policy and strategy than ever before and that Canada, I am quite sure, will be asked—perhaps we will not have to be asked—to make a bigger contribution to this kind of defence than we have been making in the past and then at the end find ourselves without the assurance that we will have anything like 100 per cent protection.

There is a good deal more evidence before these United States committees to which I might refer but I am not going to delay the committee by putting it on the record at this time. However, I want to sum up this part of my statement by saying that we are directly concerned with all this. It means that Canada must have new and more powerful radar detection lines. It means new ground controls. It means participation, as the minister has pointed out, in some form or other in semi-automatic ground environment. Surely it must also mean the introduction into our air defence forces of ground to air guided missiles such as the Bomarc, which we do not yet have but which in the future will perhaps become a major weapon in our air defence, and which has already become a major weapon of the United States squadrons earmarked for continental defence. Apparently 120 of these are required for each squadron, and they cost about half a million dollars each.

They will, of course, have nuclear warheads, and that brings up a very important question in connection with our defence policy which I should like to mention at this time. I am not suggesting that the introduction of Bomarc missiles into our squadrons will mean that they will take the place of the manned interceptors, at least for some time, but they will certainly be supplementary to the manned interceptors. Are we going to use them for that purpose? If so, if we are going to direct our defence planning to the introduction of these missiles, what effect will that have, first, on the CF-105 and, second, what is our position in securing the nuclear warheads from the United States for the Bomarc.

May I say a word first about the CF-105. The minister has pointed out that this particular manned interceptor, which is perhaps the last word in the world in aeroplanes of this type, is of no use whatever and was not meant to be of any use against missiles, though I think he said this morning that it is reasonably effective against even the latest type of Soviet bomber or any type of Soviet bomber that we know anything about, just as radar defence is now reasonably effective against these bombers.

In the planning and development of this aeroplane, which began before the present government took office—the decision was made by the previous government—the government has already spent, as the minister pointed out in the committee, about $220 million and that has resulted, I think, in two aeroplanes having been tested. In the estimates we are now considering there is an item of $178 million to continue the planning and development in the current year of an aeroplane which will perhaps cost something over $4 million. We are not sure. A figure of $4 million to $4½ million has been given. This will presumably take these plans and developments up to the point where we may have 37 of these planes by the end of this period.

What do we do now? By "we" I mean parliament, which will have to provide the money. Do we continue the development and production of this particular manned interceptor at this cost? We will have spent by the end of this year about $400 million on the development and planning of this aircraft, and we will have about 37 to show for it. A decision now has to be taken as to whether or not go ahead to the point where these planes will be introduced into our squadrons along, perhaps later, with the Bomarc missile; or do we abandon this project in the light of developments in the last two years which seem to be emphasizing the importance of other forms of air defence, which may not replace but will certainly have to supplement the CF-105? Do we try to do both? The report of the committee before us contains a reference to this matter. I have not the exact words, but I can get them. At page 365 of Votes and Proceedings for August 6 the committee has expressed its concern in these words:

> —the committee does express its concern in the government entering into any subsequent weapon program of this magnitude without first negotiating for some cost sharing agreement with either NATO member countries or the U.S.A. under the NORAD agreement.

I agree that if we are going to do this kind of thing we should try to do it collectively as part of balanced, collective forces. However, I believe we will have very great difficulty indeed in getting any NATO country to participate in the cost of the development of an aircraft and missile program in Canada, in the light of their own defence costs. I think we may have great difficulty in getting the United States to participate in any of these Canadian developments, in view of the fact we will be reminded that they are spending $40 billion on defence this year, an amount which was just passed the other day.

It does raise the question whether Canada can afford this kind of participation in collective defence. This question becomes all the more urgent when we realize that when we do produce this kind of plane through the planning and designing of our own experts—it is a great credit to them and shows we have an aircraft industry in this country that can do this kind of thing as well as any industry in the world—there is practically no opportunity for operating on a continental but only on a Canadian basis.

The minister has been in Washington, and perhaps he has been trying to do something about this. I know also from my own experience in the past that when we tried to get the United States interested in the CF-100 some years ago, at a time when the CF-100 was admitted in Washington to be certainly the best all-weather fighter on this continent, we made no progress at all. The aircraft industry down there was not going to allow any interference with its own right to produce its own aircraft for its own government. I believe the minister will be having the same trouble with the CF-105.

If co-operation is to extend to the point where we integrate our air forces, then co-operation should also extend to the point where we integrate our resources. If Canadian industry can produce a weapon as good as or better than a United States weapon, then we should try to get the United States to recognize the importance of co-operation by encouraging this kind of development in Canada, not on a national but on a continental basis.

Then there is the other aspect of this question. If we are going to have the CF-105 in operation, if we are going to have the Bomarc in operation, how can we contemplate a situation where Canadian squadrons, armed if you like with the Bomarc missile—I am thinking now of the years ahead—and operating off the same air base with United States squadrons under the command of an integrated headquarters commanded by a United States commander with a Canadian deputy commander, when the Canadian squadrons would have missiles without nuclear warheads and the United States squadrons operating along with them would have nuclear warheads? It is taken for granted in the evidence I have read at congressional hearings that to be really effective to the maximum possible extent for defence purposes you should have the nuclear warheads on these particular missiles.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not advocating that there should be manufactured in Canada any kind of nuclear weapons, nor am I departing in any way from the proposal I made the other day that those countries which are now manufacturing nuclear weapons for mass destruction should agree that they will not manufacture them in the future. However, that is something very different from having access to a country which does manufacture these weapons for defence purposes—I am now talking about tactical weapons—and with which we are co-operating in an integrated continental defence scheme. Under legislation passed by the United States congress these weapons cannot now be made available to a country with which it is working on continental defence. I suggest this is a situation which in the long run will not be considered tolerable in this country. I know there have been changes made in the United States atomic energy legislation during the last two or three months which deal with this matter, but it is not dealt with in a way which gives me very much satisfaction.

In these amendments the United States has singled out the United Kingdom for preferential treatment, on the ground that the United Kingdom is already in the atomic weapons business. Under the amendment to section 144 (c) of the atomic energy act, if a country can prove it has made progress in the field of manufacturing nuclear weapons it qualifies for this kind of assistance. So far as I can make out Canada does not get that kind of assistance unless it can make a separate agreement with the United States under another provision of this act.

I should like to ask the minister, when he replies in this general debate, exactly what the situation is in regard to this matter, and whether or not steps are being taken to bring about that kind of agreement which would put Canadian defence forces and United States defence forces, operating under the same command, in exactly the same position in regard to equipment.

The other day we heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Canadian government was not asking for this kind of agreement now. We heard him say also, and it was an important statement, that there is no question about storing nuclear warheads in Canada. Then he went on to explain that this perhaps was not necessary because a quick decision could be made in Washington—he added even perhaps too quick—which would make available these nuclear warheads in time of emergency.

If they are not stored in Canada, if we have no agreement which puts them under the control of Canadians before the emergency, and if the decision has to be taken in Washington which would result in them being moved to Canada in an emergency or moved from a United States squadron on Canadian soil to a Canadian squadron, I suggest that is not good enough; because when an emergency of that kind occurs, if it ever does, there will not be time to make these arrangements. This question ought to be cleared up before the emergency occurs.

I come then, Mr. Chairman, to the final part of my statement. I have talked about our UN obligations, our NATO obligations and our new and more extensive obligations in regard to continental defence. The question inevitably presents itself to us, as it must present itself in an even more immediate form to the minister himself, how can Canada, with its resources and with what is needed for development in other fields in this country, do all the things in the future that may be required under these three sets of obligations? I would like to quote what the minister said before the committee on June 10:

> No country, particularly a country of limited means—both financial and in manpower, can be expected to promote a balanced force of all the different services.
> They can concentrate on the type of production, the type of arms . . . most adaptable to the conditions of the country.

I suggest that that is exactly the principle upon which we have to operate, and that it is the application of that principle which is going to cause the difficulty. A great power—for instance, the United States of America—cannot afford to take a gamble of this kind. They have to concentrate on every possible form of defence, and there is no escaping that fact because they are a great power. They have to keep on developing and building new weapons, however quickly they may become obsolete; but surely there should be a limit to what a country like Canada does or is asked to do in this field of development for defence purposes. Surely our country should not have to keep up with every move—and these moves are being made very quickly today—in respect to methods of defence, strategic and defence planning and so on, which require the production of new types of weapons.

I am certainly not attempting to be dogmatic in this regard because I know how difficult it is to come to any conclusions, but perhaps in this kind of situation, with changes taking place so swiftly and devastating with respect to methods of attack and methods of defence, Canada may have to wait before, for instance, entering into the field of rocket and missile construction. Perhaps we will also have to adopt a system of priorities of a different kind from that which we have adopted in the past with regard to defence by confining our defence efforts, or at least devoting the major part of our defence efforts, to matters particularly concerned with questions of immediate interest to us such as radar defence, integration of ground equipment and ground control, in order words the kind of activities which, if we do not undertake them, the United States of America will ask for permission to undertake on our behalf and on their own behalf on our territory.

It may indeed become more and more necessary for us to take over the maximum responsibility possible for defence activity and facilities on our own soil, even if that means—and this is a decision which naturally no one would make very quickly or easily—some reduction in our commitments abroad under NATO. Perhaps that would be a sound national policy without, I suggest, prejudicing in any way our obligations for international co-operation and defence.

It seems clear to me, and the minister may comment on this point when he replies, that soon the major, if not the sole, instrument of air attack will be the missile, and that this will require a complete revamping of defence strategy and defence policy. It seems to me, and I speak without any expert authority in this matter, that to counter this method of attack the manned jet interceptors will one day—perhaps a day not too far distant—be as obsolete as the old BE2C of the R.F.C. in which I learned to fly, and that these manned interceptors will be replaced, at least to a large extent, by the pilotless interceptors.

That poses a question directly to the government. Are we going to go into the production and planning of these new planes and missiles, or should we not leave the production of this kind of weapon under the concept of division of tasks in a balanced collective defence strategy to the United States and concentrate our efforts in Canada, not exclusively but mostly, to ground environmental control and early warning systems against missile attack? That will give Canada a major responsibility in continental defence; it will give her great responsibility for the construction, control and maintenance of facilities on her own soil.

These are important questions which I throw out to the minister, which he will perhaps be able to answer when he replies. I want to tell him that when I ask him these questions I know it is much easier to ask than to answer them. I also want to tell him that I appreciate the dilemma in which the government must be in relation to these questions with respect to developments in the realm of defence which may or may not take place in the future. It seems to me there are many difficulties in doing these new tasks at the expense of the contribution to defence which has proved to be most effective from our point of view in past years and which, until these new developments take place, is still essential. I know this is a very serious dilemma and that it is inescapable.

My only suggestion is that which I have outlined; that in order to resolve this dilemma perhaps we could take a greater share of responsibility for those activities upon our own soil, even though it might mean a reduction to some extent—and I am not thinking of those United Nations, activities which are very minor in terms of expense—in some other activities outside this country. I suggest it is all the more important that we approach defence in this way, because if we do take responsibility for this kind of activity in Canada it will have very important civilian implications. It will help to develop our north country and prevent that development from being not taken over, but from falling too much into the responsibility of our friend and neighbour the United States of America. This point has been very well illustrated in a recent article by Mr. John Walker, special Washington correspondent for Southam Press, which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator under the heading, "U.S. May Soon Take Over Canadian Arctic Research and Patrol Work" and which reads as follows:

> The United States government may soon be taking over a significant field of research and patrol work in the Canadian Arctic, unless the Canadian government takes a more active role in Arctic development.
> The Americans will not be doing this by design, but the fact that Congress has approved a bill to authorize construction of a nuclear-powered icebreaker points up the prospects that within three years the U.S. may have such a craft in operation.

The article goes on to say that this craft will be used for Arctic work, and concludes with this paragraph:

> If the Canadian government continues to keep the Labrador out of real Arctic action, and does not move actively on nuclear or other powered icebreakers, it is hard to see how Canadian military and scientific men can avoid calling upon the U.S. to do the chore, perhaps by 1961 in a brand new atomic icebreaker.

I hope, therefore, that the government will be able to reconcile these two things, the desirability of playing the right part in defence and the desirability also of playing a part which will help in our development in other fields than that of defence.

May I conclude by coming back to the point at which I began, namely that no defence policy and no defence expenditure, however massive, no weapon however modern, however powerful or however new, will really give us the kind of security we must have in this world unless we can build up alongside that policy the other kind of defence policy which rests upon an imaginative, constructive, collective and powerful diplomacy. We may have in the western world more, more and more power; we are in fact building up more, more and more power, but so are those countries behind the iron curtain.

It is quite clear, however, that this policy alone will not save us, even though without it we may be lost. Power without wisdom will avail us little. Determination and imagination in diplomacy are as essential as what the Americans call a good defence posture. Canadian defence policy, then, and indeed defence policy for the whole western world must be based on both kinds of power—military power, and political and diplomatic power.

Mr. Peters: In speaking on the defence estimates I wish to join those who have congratulated the hon. member for Calgary South on the able manner in which he handled the estimates committee. Whether this was a new type of committee I do not know, but he did handle that committee in a very able manner and is to be commended on having done so. The Minister of National Defence is also to be complimented on the manner in which both he and the witnesses he presented were able to testify to the extent requested by the members of the committee.

One of the problems about discussing national defence is that of remaining within the necessary bounds of security while obtaining information which appears always to be available through many other sources, and bearing this in mind I think the committee which considered the estimates of this department did very good work in bringing to the attention of the general public some of the problems which confront the Department of National Defence and which face all Canada in its defence procedures. However, I believe the committee might have gone a little further than it did in advising the Canadian public that though we were not able to recommend any reduction in national defence expenditures, for the simple reason that each item, taken individually, has to be justified only with regard to that particular estimate, when the situation was examined more broadly it became immediately a matter of government policy and was, therefore, not completely open to question. Thus, although the items in the estimates were not related to each other they were, I think, well discussed individually, and in this respect the committee did a good job.

I believe that a number of the committee's recommendations are worth repeating and bear some relationship to what our new military policy must be. One of the recommendations which interested me concerned the question of integration. It seems that for a long time there has been competition among the various services, though perhaps not to so great an extent as in some countries close by. But we have had competition among the various services, not only for recruits but with regard to the type of contribution each service could make. There has been a certain rivalry among the army, the navy and the air force; and while in some cases it has been good rivalry it has in others led to inefficiency. I understand that the recommendations of the committee with respect to this matter of integration are to receive consideration, particularly with regard to auxiliary services.

Another matter which in my opinion will bear a great deal more scrutiny than the committee was able to devote to it is the question of the relationship between the civil service on the one hand and military personnel on the other. It has been said that it takes two civil servants to keep every military man in the field. I am not sure that that relationship has been maintained or that it was a good one in the first place, and I question the statement that has been made on a number of occasions that it costs more to keep military personnel in the field than it does to support civilians.

This is open to question, but it was pointed out to the committee that military personnel were established on a quota basis, in other words that a certain fixed number of people were allotted to the army, the navy and the air force, a number which could not be exceeded. The tendency, therefore, would be to increase the number of civil servants whose establishment was not affected by such a restriction. I think further consideration should be given to this question, because I do not think it was proven to the committee that it is more advantageous to employ people who are in permanent positions as civil servants as against military personnel who can be retrained, reclassified and transferred if necessary in the interests of the nation.

Now this department is asking for $1,168 million, which is a very large sum of money; and when the committee—and it was a large and conscientious committee—examined each item of these estimates it was not able to recommend any reduction in this amount. I think the committee should have gone a little further than it did in considering policy and discussing how the various components which made up the estimates as a whole would fit into the over-all policy.

There has been a great change in our thinking as far as military defence is concerned. In the last few years we have discarded the old concept of using an army with auxiliary services classed as the navy and the air force. The advent of sputnik and the intercontinental missile have made necessary a complete change in our thinking on defence, and we are now faced in Canada with a great many problems with which we were not faced before.

I think it was for this reason that the committee did include in its report a statement that expenditure on defence was not likely to decrease, but rather that we could expect such expenditures to rise rapidly if the developments now contemplated are to take place within the next few years. I think this is borne out by many of the things the Leader of the Opposition said so capably today. If we are to change our concept of military defence and at the same time maintain some of our more traditional defence measures, there will be a need for a great deal more expenditure on defence.

Before I leave this subject I should like to mention that I personally, and I think the country as a whole, was very disappointed that General Simonds was not called before the committee; and while I agree that it would have meant discussing questions of government policy which might not have been within the purview of the committee, the Canadian people might well have realized some advantage from the knowledge and experience which General Simonds has acquired over the years.

Had General Simonds appeared he might well have been able to give the committee an insight into the developments which are likely to take place within the next few years, in the light of his experience and the information available to him. The other side of the argument could have been capably advanced by Air Marshal Collins and also our own Minister of National Defence. The result would not have been merely a rehashing of many ideas that have been newspaper copy for many months, but we would probably have arrived at a clearer picture of what steps must be taken with this type of consideration.

We in Canada are faced with the problem of a defence system that is now completely out of date. The radar chains are generally considered to be not sufficient for present day needs. We are developing and installing many new units that are going to be advantageous, but these are costing a great deal of money and are difficult for us to finance. The British scientists are devoloping a microwave amplifier called Naser which will track planes 1,000 miles away. According to my information this is a great deal superior to what we have at present. This is only one of many new developments taking place which we will have to incorporate in our national defence system if we are going to be up to date.

When put into effect our radar chains perhaps were not sufficient for our needs but represented the best we had at the time and were considered adequate. They are no longer adequate and will have to be replaced. But even if we replace the radar chains with a radar device like Naser we will not be able to track things like intercontinental ballistic missiles. We shall have to enter that field which is more expensive than any we have previously contemplated.

The matter which has been discussed on a number of occasions, of integrating Canadian defence production with that of the United States, has caused a great deal of apprehension. Already official thinking suggests that integration of defence production and the United States and Canadian economies must shortly follow integration of air defences. The reasons are clearly apparent. Canada's air defence system based on the present radar screens and the subsonic CF-100 fighter is now admitted to be out of date. The present air defence system was designed some years ago to defend the country against the primary offensive weapon then available to the U.S.S.R. namely the non-jet TU-4 bombers. But much faster turbo-prop and jet planes such as the Bison, the Soviet's intercontinental jet bomber, as well as supersonic jet bombers now being developed, make this air defence system obsolescent.

This is one of the reasons why the United States government has been given permission to conduct the survey announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons on May 21. It is almost a foregone conclusion that this survey will result in the decisions to introduce the United States semi-automatic ground environment weapon known as Sage into Canadian air defence. This system is being installed in the United States, and it has been felt for some time that the same would have to be done in Canada if successful air defence integration of the two countries is to be achieved. Sage, an electronic computer capable of making 9,600 mathematical calculations per second, will automatize ground control operations. An integral part of the Sage system is Bomarc, a ground to air guided missile capable of being fitted with an atomic warhead. With the co-ordination of Sage and Bomarc it is considered possible to employ mass interception against a mass raid by jet bombers.

Canada is faced with a twofold problem. The Sage-Bomarc system will impose a tremendous financial burden on this country as well as make it even more dependent on the technological and production skills of the United States. On the other hand, this system provides no defence whatsoever against intercontinental ballistic missiles. Therefore in order to prepare against manned jet bombers and at the same time prepare against attack's from I.C.B.M.'s, both the Sage-Bomarc and some other as yet undeveloped anti-missile system must be developed. Canada is incapable of developing either system by herself.

There is no question about Canada's ability to manufacture a Sage computer based on the United States design. However, the drawback is that according to defence experts the cost of production of a single computer in Canada would be about double the estimated cost of $25 million in the United States. Then there is the recently developed high powered, long range radar now in production in the United States. These sets will have to be installed along Canada's side of the Pinetree defence line. Again these are too costly to manufacture in Canada and will have to be bought in the United States.

The implications for the Canadian economy are becoming increasingly apparent. It is reported that defence officials have come to the conclusion that Canadian industry will have to manufacture component parts for United States assemblies. The future pattern is clear. Canadian industry, if it is to get any share at all in the production of the new and complex equipment needed in the air defence of Canada, will have to content itself with participating as subcontractors in large United States production programs.

Canada is continually being faced with the problem of raising money for defence, and certainly the present requirement of over $1½ billion is not a small amount. But these units cost $50 million each, and large numbers are necessary. Canada finds itself subjected to participating in the program of defending the North American continent. That is one of the reasons why we in this group opposed the entry of Canada into the NORAD agreement.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before lunch we were drawing attention to the fact that the committee had stated that the expenditures had become increasingly large over a period of years, and the tendency appears to be continuing. If we follow the same line of reasoning that we have followed in the past the economic burden is going to put us closely in the shadow of the United States. It is precisely because of this seemingly inevitable tie-up with the United States on the economic level that it is of great importance to avoid putting ourselves in a politically subordinate position to the United States.

While we cannot avoid becoming more and more dependent on the United States if we are to meet our air defence requirements, we can avoid making it bilateral. It is one thing to surrender sovereign rights in a multilateral treaty to such a body as NATO or the United Nations; it is an entirely different matter to surrender sovereignty to a single country in a bilateral agreement. In the case of Canada it is the latter which is accomplished in the exchange of notes affecting a form of integration of the air defences of North America. It would seem imperative from the point of view of the loss of Canada's political sovereignty to a single nation that ways and means be found to make the North American defence organization directly responsible and subordinate to the NATO command. This point of view has been ably set out in Le Devoir, which comments as follows:

> Canada, as a member of NATO, shares in the defence of western Europe. Would it not be wiser and more logical to place the defence of our tremendous territory in the north in the framework of the Atlantic pact? The protection of our Arctic region is important not only for the United States but for the whole Atlantic coalition.
> To instal radar posts in the north, we have negotiated directly and only with the United States. The D.E.W. line is already out of date, for its equipment cannot disclose ballistic projectiles travelling at a high altitude. Probably therefore this network will have to be amplified and improved which will accentuate the intervention and authority of Washington on Canadian soil.
> For our air defence, we have negotiated an agreement which is already in force, it seems, and in this system installed at Colorado Springs there is an American commander who has authority over the air forces of the two countries. Are we in the same way going to negotiate directly with Washington a bilateral pact for bases of nuclear projectiles.

This is a reprint from the Ottawa Journal of May 26, 1958.

Because of our economic structure we are continually having to compete with and assist and in some cases supply the auxiliary services which are necessary not only for the defence of our own country but of the United States. It would appear that if this is continued over the years it will mean not only the economic bankruptcy of our country but also the loss of our sovereignty to the United States, if we continue to enter into bilateral agreements such as NORAD.

If the defence of Canada is continued for the next few years at the same rate and in the various fields I have outlined, Canada is going to reach the position it has now reached, I would suggest, with the CF-105. The CF-105 was built not at the insistence of this government but at the insistence of the previous government. In my opinion, and I am only one of many, the CF-105 is a remarkable aircraft. It probably brings us into a position equal to that we reached by building the Mosquito bomber at the end of the last war.

Relatively speaking this plane compares favourably with, if it is not better than, any other plane of its type in the world; but I wonder whether the Canadian people can afford this type of luxury. While it is true we have developed the CF-105 at a cost of something over $200 million, the total program which is already blocked out will cost something over $1 billion. I am wondering whether the Canadian people are in the position of being able to enjoy the luxury that they appear to have effected for themselves in the building, the designing and the development of this particular type of aircraft.

I agree with the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition this morning when he said the committee also endorsed the idea that there should be no expansion program of this type ever undertaken by the Canadian people again without consultation with, and without getting orders from and the approval of, other countries interested in this particular field, and particularly the NATO countries. I think the CF-105 points out as well as anything does the position that Canada is going to find itself in if it looks at the situation in terms of our old line thinking on defence.

There have been suggestions made in other fields which I think are going to be endorsed, such as an investigation into civil defence. I think the committee was of the opinion that civil defence should be put back into this department under the Minister of National Defence. I am not sure that he wants it there, but I think that is where it belongs. Greater reliance must be put on the role of civil defence in the case of an atomic attack. In this field the militia can be very advantageous if they are fitted into it and do not become supernumerary to the authorities who will be controlling civil defence.

Over the years the C.C.F. have advocated a decrease in the expenditures on national defence. Today we are spending very close to one-third of our income to pay for defence which is inadequate, which cannot by any stretch of the imagination protect our major cities from attack by an enemy agent. Therefore we should look very closely at those expenditures. We suggest that greater reliance must be put on other phases of defence. In the United Nations Canada, as a middle of the road power, should take the lead and speak for disarmament. While there are many obstacles—and we have heard them all—there are many advantages in disarmament on an international scale. We could better the lot of the Canadian people much more by spending a few million dollars on aid to other countries that need aid and helping the world to bring about disarmament in a reasonable manner so that we could, as we must, reduce our expenditure on defence, which is a wasted asset no matter how we look at it.

Finally, I suggest that the minister should give very careful consideration not only to participating in bringing about disarmament but to giving leadership to the world in that regard. In the past we gave a lead in setting up an international police force, and we have been quite successful in our approach in that field. I think Canada can accomplish a great deal more by helping the world find a way to permanent peace than by developing such programs as the CF-105. If we are going to spend, let us spend in a field that will produce peace rather than war.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, if there is no more discussion on general policy perhaps I should take a minute or two to answer some of the questions that have been raised. First of all may I, without any qualification at all, express my appreciation to the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member who has just spoken for the very helpful contributions they have made to the discussion of the general problem of national defence. I could not agree more heartily with anybody than with the Leader of the Opposition when he referred to the close link that exists between defence policy and foreign policy. The two go together, and until some complete and effective system of inspection and disarmament has been worked out amongst the nations of the world we have to maintain a reasonable defence. As soon as the powers get together and decide that wars will be no more then, as one who has taken part in two wars and seen something of the disturbed conditions since, that achievement will not be welcomed more heartily by anyone than by me.

To answer some of the definite questions asked and problems raised by the Leader of the Opposition, may I say that first of all he referred to a white paper and an annual report. As I pointed out this morning, we are really finishing up a program which had been under way since 1950, and as annual reports usually are rather out of date by the time the estimates are discussed and as there is no statutory requirement obliging us to produce an annual report, I thought it was unnecessary to go to that expense this year. Next year we will have to start to get ready for this new era of defence, and I assure the committee that we will then prepare at least a white paper which will spell out our proposals in detail.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the dilemma which exists. He pointed out the problems which have to be solved. I am not in a position today to put forward a solution to these problems. I am not quite certain on what horn of the dilemma I must rest. We have to collect more information before we make a decision which will affect the security of the country and mean the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars over many years. As I stated in the committee, before the end of the year a decision will have to be reached in respect to many of these very difficult problems. They are with me every day and pretty nearly 24 hours of every day. Solutions will be reached and will be presented to parliament in due course.

With regard to the change of emphasis in connection with the idea of expeditionary forces, as both I and the Leader of the Opposition have pointed out the situation has changed. We are not planning to send any large expeditionary forces overseas in the early days of a war. But we do believe, and I think the Leader of the Opposition agrees, in the necessity of retaining what are frequently referred to as conventional arms. I see a growing need for contributions to be made to United Nations organizations, whether on a permanent basis or whether on an ad hoc basis of sending such forces when the need arises. We have to be ready to make our contribution to the preservation of peace, perhaps in many far distant parts of the world. I have that very much in mind, and it will be mainly conventional arms which will make that contribution.

But we do not have to maintain all the conventional arms as of old and, as I indicated last year, we have discontinued divisional headquarters and many of what are termed the divisional troops of the last war are not being maintained by Canada. I indicated in my remarks this morning, and I think this shows how we are progressing and not trying to maintain old establishments, that we have decided to decommission two cruisers. In the past these cruisers played a very important role in the defence of Canada, but conditions have changed and we are now going to declare these two grand vessels, which rendered great service to Canada in the past, surplus to our modern requirements.

Mention was made of the Bomarc. I should like to point out that the Bomarc is not in operation yet. If we wanted to get a Bomarc today we could not get one. Hon. members will have noticed in yesterday's paper that reference was made to what I think is the first experiment linking the Bomarc with a firing by remote control of one of these missiles now in the course of development. We are watching the development of this missile with great interest.

The Leader of the Opposition asked some questions regarding expenditures made in connection with the CF-105. The correct figure is that some $220 million was expended in the research and development of this aircraft prior to this year. In these estimates we have allocated $175 million for the further development of this aircraft which, if it is proceeded with—and we have the right to discontinue it at any time—will carry on development until March 31 of next year.

Reference was made to the proposal for further integration between the logistic and administrative services of the armed forces. The committee recommended that there should be further unification between such services as the chaplain service, medical service and provost service. We are moving in that direction. We have within recent months authorized that all the definitive hospitals should become tri-service hospitals. We have meetings scheduled for the immediate future to see whether it will not be possible to make further progress in the integration of the medical services. Some aspects of the provost services have already been integrated. So far as the chaplain service is concerned, we are seeking authority to appoint a chaplain-general, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, who would supervise that service for all three services.

I must point out to the committee, however, that while there will be some economies effected and I think simpler administration, this integration cannot provide any very significant reduction in the over-all budget. But we are seeking every possible way of saving even small amounts of money.

I cannot agree with the hon. member who spoke on behalf of the C.C.F. group that our defences are completely out of date; that is not so. We have an adequate defence to meet the possible attack of today. We are trying to keep our defences up to date and improve all the time, so we will be able to cope with the means of attack in future years. It would be disturbing and quite incorrect to allow a statement like that to go across the country. It would shatter confidence throughout the land, and I am quite certain that is not correct.

In so far as the cost-sharing of production is concerned, that is more in the realm of defence production than it is a question for the defence department. But I am inclined to agree that we should give very careful consideration, if ever again we go into the production of some complete weapons system, to this aspect of the matter. I do not believe the hon. member speaking for the C.C.F. party was very consistent, because at one point he referred to Canada possibly becoming a subcontractor for the United States in future developments, yet at the same time he agreed we could not go into the production of one complete system. I would hope that it might be possible at some future date, provided we can carry out the research which is necessary and get in on the ground floor, that we might as partners, not as subcontractors, work together in some future production program.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

223. Civil Pensions, as detailed in the estimates, $2,457.

Mr. Peters: Do these pensions apply to the armed services?

Mr. Pearkes: No, this does not refer to the armed services.

Item agreed to.

504. To authorize in the current and subsequent fiscal years, under such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council prescribes, a capital assistance loan to the Town of Oromocto, New Brunswick, to be covered by town debentures, for the purpose of assisting in the completion of the physical development of municipal works and the further development of the town's assets, $2,000,000.

Mr. Peters: I do not know under what section it comes, but I should like to ask the minister if he has given any consideration to this matter of insurance for armed service personnel while they are not on duty? This matter has been discussed in the past, and I was wondering if any further consideration had been given to it. I refer to the possibility of a soldier in Germany, while on active service but on leave of absence or off duty at night, meeting with an accident or being killed.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, there are some very difficult cases which arise in that respect. It is sometimes quite difficult to draw a line between when a soldier is on duty and when he is off duty. This matter is receiving the consideration of departmental officials.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

78. Departmental administration and payments to Canadian Commercial Corporation and other corporate agencies for services provided in connection with defence purchasing and production, $7,232,086.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a statement in connection with his estimates?

Mr. O'Hurley: I rise today for the first time, Mr. Chairman, to present the estimates of the Department of Defence Production. I had not thought of making any lengthy statement. I made a detailed statement in committee which I distributed to the members of the committee. In rising I wish to extend, as the Minister of National Defence has done, my thanks to the members of the committee on estimates for the splendid work they have done. I should like also to extend my thanks and appreciation to the chairman of that committee for the preparation made and the manner in which discussions were conducted.

I should like, right at the beginning, to deal with the recommendations which were made by this committee on estimates. In dealing with these suggestions I should like to offer certain explanations which I think the members of this committee should have.

(Translation):

Hon. members of the committee, as this is the first time I am submitting the estimates of my department, I want first of all to ask the hon. members' indulgence. Also, I would like to comment, right at the beginning of my remarks, on the suggestion and advice given by the committee on estimates, where I appeared some time ago.

This is the first time I am presenting my estimates, and I hope to have the opportunity to submit many more in the years to come. This is just a wish I am expressing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): For three years.

Mr. O'Hurley: I shall now explain in English the decisions taken by the committee on estimates and give the reasons for certain statements. You may be assured that my officials and I are most interested in studying any comments that were made and in making such changes and improvements as members of the committee saw fit to suggest.

(Text):

In dealing with the destroyer escort program the report of the standing committee on estimates raises three questions, as follows; first, the importance of establishing the final unit costs of an individual ship soon after its completion; second, the desirability of introducing in shipbuilding a target plus incentive type of contract; and third, the importance of giving the shipbuilding industry increasing opportunities to suggest ways of cost reductions.

These three points discussed in committee are well taken. I would, however, like to comment upon them and to offer the assurance to this house that the Department of Defence Production has taken action on each of them.

In determining the final cost of a ship in the destroyer escort program it must be recognized that we are dealing with a program of 14 identical ships under various stages of construction in seven different shipyards. The determination of final unit costs is influenced by the program characteristics of this construction rather than by the completion of any single ship.

Of the material going into the ships, about 95 per cent is procured centrally and not by the individual shipbuilder. This includes the main engines, boilers, gearing, armament, electronic gear, turbines and related equipment. The total production of these major components extends over the life of the program. Accordingly the determination of final unit costs for such components can be precisely established only after the entire requirement of 14 ship sets is complete. As a result it is possible that the material costs of an individual ship are not likely to be known until the production and cost of components for the entire program is complete.

It would be possible to determine the costs independently of each ship set of components as it is delivered. This, however, would distort the individual shipbuilder's costs. In other words, the first unit of production would bear all the pre-production expenses incurred to that time. For this reason the unit costs of material are averaged over the ships in the program, and can be defined with precision only after all such material costs are known. At the present time eight ships of the destroyer escort program have been accepted. It will not be before the end of 1959 that all the remaining ships in the 14-ship program will be finally accepted.

This delay in the determination of final costs will be reduced in future programs where the development expenses are not significant and material is procured on the basis of a firm price or a variation of the firm price. Although there are other factors which contribute to this delay, I shall not attempt to deal with them at this time. The basic contributing factor is that already discussed.

This department recognizes the difficulties inherent in the cost plus contract. As a result of such experience there was introduced in our last major shipbuilding program for coastal minesweepers a target plus incentive type of contract. By this and related measures substantial savings were realized in ship construction. By way of illustration, the man hour expenditures on this minesweeper program of six ships were reduced on an average by 30 per cent of those for a previous program for corresponding minesweepers.

In the new destroyer escort program the planning and contractual techniques developed in the minesweeper program referred to will be applied. I am confident that the results will demonstrate substantial economies over our earlier experience.

On the question of improving the liaison with the Canadian shipbuilding industry to the end of achieving reductions in cost, I am in accord with the recommendation of the estimates committee in this connection. In recent years there has been maintained the closest and most intimate liaison with the shipbuilding industry. My department has at all times studied, with units of the shipbuilding industry, problems of scheduling, planning, procurement and production. This has been done not only with individual shipbuilders but also with the Canadian shipbuilding and ship repairing association, by means of committees, consultation, exchange of technical data and other measures. This has at all times had as its objective improved efficiency and lower costs. I would go so far as to say that in few if any branches of industry has there been a more effective exchange of ideas and liaison than the exchange which exists between the Department of Defence Production and the Canadian shipbuilding industry.

Considerable thought has been given to the question of accepting performance bonds and/or pay and performance bonds to secure Defence Construction (1951) Limited contracts. A decision to change to a system of accepting performance bonds has not been reached but is now under review. The considerations affecting the use of such bonds are, first, both the Department of Public Works and Defence Construction (1951) Limited are subject to the government contracts regulations under the Financial Administration Act, which call for security deposits in the form of a certified cheque or government bonds; second, the possibility that general introduction of surety bonds would increase the cost of construction to the crown; third, it is not clear that the use of performance bonds would have as desirable an effect on the satisfactory completion of the work—for example, the incentive to complete the work by a release of cash would be absent—fourth, fear of unwieldiness of this practice because of the introduction of a third party to contend with in the event of disputes and difficulties in the administration of the contract; fifth, inequality of tendering opportunity, the likely difficulty on the part of small contractors in remote areas in obtaining insurance coverage.

I shall make other comments on the crown assets corporation and other recommendations which have been made by the committee as time progresses.

Mr. Chevrier: I would like to ask the minister one or two questions, if I may, but before I do so I am sure the house would want me to extend to him congratulations upon this, his first presentation of the estimates of the Department of Defence Production, and to extend to him best wishes in the performance of his duties in that department. He will be, or so I take it, presenting the estimates of the department for the remainder of this parliament, though I think he will allow me to dissent with his view that that situation should continue after this parliament.

The questions uppermost in my mind are these; first, what ships are entrusted to the minister's department for construction? While I heard him make a statement a moment ago, it was difficult to follow the nature of that statement as he made it and I am interested in knowing which ships now under construction by the government are entrusted for construction to the Department of Defence Production. A statement was made by the Minister of Transport at Kingston some time ago—in fact, to be more exact, during the election campaign—as to a number of ships allocated to various yards prompts me to put this question. Was this done through the Department of Defence Production or through the Department of Transport?

My second question is with respect to the allocation of these ships. How does the department proceed? Is it by way of tender? Does the contract go to the yard submitting the lowest tender, or how?

My third and last question is, are contracts of a fixed nature allocated by the minister's department? I have in mind contracts for a fixed price; are there some cases of a nature not contemplated in the ordinary course of construction in other departments which warrant the granting of a ship contract at a fixed price and, if so, would the minister be good enough to tell the house of any example or examples of which he may know of such case or cases?

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Laurier, I wish to first thank him for his good wishes, though he did not extend them in respect of future parliaments and in that, of course, I cannot concur. In reply to the first question, the Department of Defence Production generally builds only naval ships for the Department of National Defence. We do not do any building for the Department of Transport. We build the ships that come under national defence. The second question dealt with the allocation of ship contracts to the different shipyards. This is done on the recommendation of the maritime commission. With regard to the third question, contracts for the building of small naval vessels have been awarded on the basis of a fixed price, but the target plus procedure is followed with regard to larger vessels.

Mr. Chevrier: Do I understand that this commission recommends not only the yard but also the allocation of a fixed or contract price as well? Or is that done in the minister's department.

Mr. O'Hurley: No. The maritime commission recommends a shipyard. They make a report that a certain yard should have a certain contract at a certain time perhaps because it is out of work and has no contracts on hand. Other yards might be more suitable, but possibly they would have a number of contracts on hand.

Mr. Pearson: I have a word to say about the recommendations of the estimate committee to which the minister has already referred. I take it from the minister's remarks that he has some doubt about the validity or value of recommendation 1(a) on the destroyer escort program, and that in so far as recommendation 1(b) is concerned he believes that the shipbuilding industry has in the past been given full opportunity to consult with the department in respect of ways and means of keeping the cost of ships to a minimum and, that therefore the recommendation in that particular paragraph has already been carried out. I also gather that with regard to the recommendation as to the desirability, which we all share, of making sure that the work for which the department is responsible should go wherever possible to Canadian industry, that the minister is not opposed to this recommendation, of course, but feels that along with the others it is already part of the policy of the department, and that it is in that sense only that he finds they are unacceptable.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the Leader of the Opposition I would say I agree absolutely with his remarks. It is the policy which has been followed, and we are still following that practice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just have a brief question to put to the minister, and one comment to make. On June 30 of this year the minister made a reply in answer to a question which I put to him previously in writing, question No. 101. The return is to be found at page 1791 of Hansard for June 30. My question was:

1. Has the government, through the Department of Defence Production, recently awarded contracts for the purchase of trucks from the Ford Motor Company of Canada and from Mercedes-Benz Limited?
2. If so, how many from each company, and what was the amount of the respective contracts?

The minister was kind enough to reply, and without going into the details of that reply I may say it showed that $592,976.14 was spent in purchases of trucks from a Canadian company, the Ford Motor Company of Canada, and an amount of $363,817.63 for trucks purchased from a foreign corporation manufacturing this product outside of the country and in the country of origin, the company being Mercedes-Benz of Canada Limited.

The minister will understand my concern about this return in the absence of satisfactory explanations. I have in the constituency which I represent, and in the community from which I come, two of the large automobile plants of Canada. It is a community in which, as the minister knows, there continues to be a high level of unemployment at the moment, and it is somewhat difficult in the absence of a satisfactory explanation to understand why there should be these purchases from abroad, particularly when the articles purchased are not intended to be used by Canadian citizens as such but by officials in the employ of the crown in the right of Canada.

I understand that the argument made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whom a comment was directed some time ago on this subject when his estimates were under consideration, was to the effect that it was necessary to have some balance between what a country bought and what it sold, but it seems to me that at a time like this with so much unemployment it could confidently be argued that we ought to be careful about making purchases of this kind.

The minister will note that in the report of the committee a reference is made in a general way not to this particular matter but to the character of the problem involved. In recommendation 3(2) it is urged by the committee that the Department of Defence Production should distribute purchases as broadly as possible in Canada. Under the rules of the house it was not possible to frame a question in such a way—so I was informed at the time—as to elicit information of a general character which would show whether or not there had been other purchases of this character at that time or since.

I understand that the Department of Defence Production acts simply as a purchasing agent, and it is not a question now of allocating responsibility or blame. But as the minister made this reply I hope he will be in a position to explain to the committee why, at a time when there is so much unemployment, particularly in my area, it should have been found desirable and necessary to purchase trucks and other motor vehicles in the proportions indicated in the reply made to me.

It may be argued that since there are Canadian troops overseas there was more to be gained by purchasing products from a company operating in the area where Canadian troops are located, in the interests of economy, in the interests of saving time and for the sake of efficiency generally. But on examination of the items I find that some of the vehicles purchased from both the Ford Motor Company of Canada and the foreign corporation are of the same type. For instance, on January 24 some 120 3-ton dump trucks were purchased from the Ford Motor Company in the amount of $384,197. Then on April 22 five of the same kind of vehicles were purchased from a foreign corporation, and likewise on May 21 more trucks were purchased. I should be very grateful to the minister if he would give us an explanation of this situation, possibly informing the committee what the practice is going to be in the future.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Essex East may I state that I know the recommendation made by the committee in this connection was that the department was to purchase as much as possible in Canada. After consulting my officials I am pleased to report to the members of this committee, first, that the vehicles bought during the past year in Europe were bought essentially for our troops overseas. One of the reasons for this given by the officials of my department concerns economy with respect to repairs to the vehicles and the obtaining of parts. If the vehicles are purchased there they can be readily serviced and parts are easily obtainable.

I am greatly in sympathy with the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East. Together with my officials I shall study this question when I have an opportunity to examine matters of this kind. Our policy is to encourage all industry in Canada. I think perhaps there might be some change in this policy of procuring vehicles for our troops.

The statement I wish to make to the committee in answer to the question with respect to our purchasing in Canada is that it is clearly desirable on economic and strategic grounds that defence production purchases be distributed as widely as possible throughout the country. I assure hon. members of the committee that we have considered and shall continue to consider this factor in awarding our contracts within the general context of distributing our purchases for defence production as widely as possible in obtaining supplies and services. I assure the hon. member that my officials and I will certainly study the question.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, there is only one point I should like to make, and that is with reference to the comments of the minister concerning performance bonds in defence construction contracts. This matter has given me some concern because of the rather frustrating and bitter experiences I had representing as a solicitor the suppliers of materials and subcontractors for defence projects, where perhaps a general contractor had gone bankrupt or had become involved in certain financial difficulties because of the fact that it is impossible under law to file and maintain a mechanics lien against this type of crown property. It leaves the contractor, the subcontractor and the supplier in a rather difficult position, and one which is much inferior to the position they enjoy when carrying out normal commercial construction.

It may be said this is a calculated risk the contractor or supplier takes; but I would put it to you, Mr. Chairman, that if a contractor or supplier is going to take a calculated risk on this sort of thing he is going to protect himself in some measure by a price increase. I am wondering if the effect of the practice is not to increase the cost to the crown of some of these defence projects by reason of the fact that there is no way through a pay and performance bond or even a straight performance bond of achieving protection.

I would prefer to see established a pay and performance bond. I have seen the effect of such bonds in construction in my own province, and the recommendation of the committee certainly has much to commend it. I have seen the experience of ordinary performance bonds in construction carried on by other departments of the federal government, notably the Department of Public Works. Recently in Edmonton there was a very unfortunate bankruptcy during the construction of a federal building, and if it had not been for a performance bond the Department of Public Works would have been in a most difficult situation and the building program would have been held up for some considerable time.

Fully appreciating the thoughts expressed by the minister as to the value of a cash deposit rather than a performance bond, I would point out that while either answer is neither totally correct nor totally wrong it does not represent a complete answer. In the case of a cash deposit the contractor must put up 10 per cent of the value of the tender. As we all know, some of the defence contracts are rather extensive and the large sum of money represented by the cash deposit is tied up for some considerable length of time. The contractor has to borrow that money and pay interest on it. The interest is charged to the crown through the tender price.

I am wondering whether the crown is getting as good a deal as it would if it adopted the policy of using pay and performance bonds or ordinary performance bonds. Admittedly the contractor will charge up the premium, but due to the fact that moneys are held on deposit for long periods of time interest must be paid during this time, and I feel an examination would suggest that there might be a greater element of cost to the crown as a result of the practice of requiring a cash deposit by the contractor. I recommend to the minister that most serious consideration be given to the alternatives rather than adhering to the policy of requiring a cash bond. I believe the committee has made a worth-while suggestion in this respect, and I would commend it to the minister.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Edmonton West, as I said previously public works and Defence Construction Limited are subject to the Financial Administration Act. The comments made by the committee are very worth while. I am informed by my officials that it is not really the responsibility of defence production but it should be a recommendation to the treasury board. I am informed that they are studying the question of performance bonds at the present time.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

83. Administration and operation, $1,800,000.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the minister would mind explaining what appears from the form of the estimates to be a new item, No. 83. I understand it is largely a matter of form, but I should appreciate having the minister explain it to the committee.

Mr. O'Hurley: I shall be glad to do so, Mr. Chairman. In previous years, because much work was being done in the factories of Canadian Arsenals Limited, we did not require this item, vote No. 83. Since the beginning of this year production has constantly been going down, and we do not conceive of there being much amelioration in the months to come. That is the reason this vote is necessary.

Vote 83 is the one I singled out as showing a marked change from last year. These are the comments I made in committee. I should explain that since its establishment in 1945 one of the responsibilities of Canadian Arsenals Limited has been the maintenance in serviceable condition of certain facilities which were developed under crown ownership during or prior to world war II and which the government wished to conserve.

In the company's early years costs related to this custodial responsibility were defrayed by parliamentary votes. Later, with the development of the defence program because of the Korean crisis, the volume of production work became adequate to meet expenses out of sales and thus a nominal figure of $1 a year was submitted to cover operating costs.

Based on studies during the past several years the company estimates that a minimum economic volume of about $40 million in sales is required each year to permit the company's functions to be carried out on a self-supporting basis. According to the orders currently on hand, a probable sales volume of only $30 million is expected in 1958-59, or 25 per cent less than the above mentioned economic volume. On this basis, the company anticipates a manufacturing loss of some $2,300,000, which is expected to be reduced by miscellaneous revenue of around $500,000, derived mainly from services and rentals, thus producing the net possible requirement for the current year of $1,800,000 as shown in the estimates.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister mind telling us what plants of Canadian Arsenals are inactive at the moment?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am informed that none of our plants is out of operation. All of our plants are operating. We keep them all operating as much as possible but on a much lower schedule than before, but all of our plants are going to be kept in operation.

Item agreed to.

541. To provide capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by Crown Plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by Crown Companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board—further amount required, $1,200,000.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I have no questions to ask under this item, but since it is the last item of this department I think it should perhaps be put on the record that in the last hour or so we have passed estimates amounting to almost $1,750 million. The reason that we have been able to pass these estimates with such speed should be made clear on the record of Hansard. These estimates have been previously examined by a committee which has worked many hours going into them in detail; otherwise, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, we would not have been able to get them so quickly. Perhaps that should be on Hansard.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

383. Departmental administration, $282,666.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, last night at ten o'clock I had started to make some remarks with respect to the relationship between the employees of the federal government and their employer, namely the federal government, and was suggesting that those employees who, as I said, I would like to call public employees rather than the degrading name of civil servants, should be placed in substantially the same position as are employees of private industry, or as employees of any of the crown corporations particularly. They should have the right to organize into a union of their choice, which apparently they have and, following that, be allowed the same privileges, rights and responsibilities as are employees of crown corporations, in that the organization that they may join can apply for certification of bargaining authority under the federal labour act and be in a position to enter into negotiations with their employer, the federal government, in somewhat the same manner as do employees of crown corporations, such as the C.N.R. You might expect that the ultimate result of negotiations conducted in this fashion, if no satisfactory settlement is reached across the bargaining table, or with the assistance of a conciliation board, would be either a strike by or a lockout of our public employees. I am sure that many of them do not want to extend this type of relationship to the point of there being the possibility of a strike or a lockout.

There is a general understanding prevalent in the country at the moment, I think, that public employees and employees of the federal government do not have the right to walk out on strike. I would submit that that same impression was prevalent with respect to the British Columbia government employees up until last year when the organization of the British Columbia government employees, because of the difficulties they got into and because of their inability to get any satisfactory answer or solutions from the government of that province, decided that they would go out on strike. They did not reach the stage of ending up in a strike but nevertheless we now realize that in so far as the province of British Columbia is concerned, the employees of the provincial government of that province do have the right to strike. I assume the same situation exists with respect to the federal government but I am not suggesting that the establishment of some sensible negotiating procedure for our public employees in the federal field should extend to that end, and I am sure that they would not want it to extend to that end, either.

We can look at the position of firefighters employed by municipalities. In effect those employees as firefighters are in no position different from that of the employees of the federal government except that their employer is a different person. Firefighters work for a municipality and are therefore in the public service. Federal government employees work for the federal government of Canada and they are in the public service. I might add that other municipal employees are likewise in the same position. They have had established for them a procedure somewhat similar to that which I am suggesting at the moment. There should be a change in our attitude toward public employees and we should give them the same rights, responsibilities and privileges or substantially the same rights, responsibilities and privileges, I should say, in labour-management relations as have employees working for crown corporations, municipalities or private employers.

I know that this approach has been advanced in years past just as it is being advanced now. I submit that there is just as much validity to the argument in favour of this type of arrangement as there has been in any of the years in the past, and I hope the minister will undertake to express an opinion in this regard and announce some policy that will allow employees in the public service of Canada the right to conduct their discussions relating to wages, working hours, dismissals and grievances and so on, in a fashion that will permit an amicable solution to be found.

I submit that generally speaking there is no channel for finding solutions for some of these problems. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that in recent days there was a discussion respecting the discharge of an employee in the Department of Agriculture working in the Montreal area. That is merely one case which has been discussed and it points up the necessity of providing some channel through which sensible discussion of these matters can take place. If there is failure after such discussion takes place then these matters should be placed in the hands of an outside tribunal to make a decision not only with respect to grievances arising from discharge but with respect to other conditions of employment.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to thank hon. members who were kind enough to express to me their good wishes on the occasion of my birthday. I was indeed touched by their kind words in wishing a prompt recovery for my wife. I can assure my hon. friends that their gracious consideration and kind words are much appreciated.

I will make a statement to the hon. member for Skeena when we are discussing the civil service commission but I should like to answer the remarks that the hon. member for Ottawa East made yesterday. In the course of general remarks which the hon. member for Ottawa East made in the house on the seventh instant with respect to the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State, the civil service commission, the office of the chief electoral officer and the department of public printing and stationery, the hon. member inquired as to the progress of the work of the royal commission on patents, copyrights, trade-marks and industrial designs.

Hon. members will recall that on June 10, 1958, pursuant to an inquiry directed to me by the hon. member for Ottawa East, I tabled the commission's report on copyrights. I am now pleased to announce that the commission's report on industrial designs was submitted to and accepted by the governor in council on the seventh instant and will be deposited with the Clerk of the house today. As to the commission's next report, which will deal with patents of invention, it is not expected to be submitted before some time next year, in the spring, it is hoped.

It has already been explained many times in the house that the assignment of the royal commission was of considerable magnitude and complexity and that the members of the commission can devote only a part of their time to this assignment as they have to continue the discharge of their normal functions. I should perhaps add that inquiries of this sort in other countries, in the United Kingdom, for instance, have usually extended over a considerable period of time.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer special thanks to the hon. members for Hull (Mr. Caron) and Ottawa West (Mr. Richard) for their kind words on the occasion of my birthday.

I also want to say how much I appreciated their courtesy in mentioning my wife who is now in hospital, but who, I hope, will very soon be able to come home.

As my department groups four different branches, I shall gladly answer all questions asked as each division comes up for discussion.

(Text):

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I am very happy that the report on industrial designs will be tabled today. Is the personnel of the commission the same or have any of the members resigned? I noticed that the minister did not indicate anything about trade-marks.

Mr. Courtemanche: We do not know yet if we will have anything on trade-marks but I would say to the hon. member that the members of the commission on industrial designs are the same. One man has resigned but has acted until the completion of the report.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate the comment of the minister that probably questions relating to public employees should be dealt with under the vote for the civil service commission. I had intended to deal with the matter under that vote except that it was raised last night and I thought it might be well to have a continuity of comment. I should like to suggest that the minister should consider one other matter with regard to the relationships between the federal government and its employees and perhaps he might comment on it on the civil service commission vote. I understand that so far as some of the employees of some of the crown corporations are concerned a system has been developed of establishing wage rates and relationships between wage rates which is commonly referred to as a job evaluation program or a co-operative wage study as it is known in other circles.

While I do not intend to give blanket endorsation to every type of job evaluation program that has been developed, most of them in private industry, nevertheless I feel that if a job evaluation program is developed by negotiation between employees and employer and is established on sound, scientific principles for determining wage rates and differences between categories it may be most beneficial both for the employees and the employer, in this case the federal government. I suggest that we should consider the establishment of a job evaluation program for federal government employees. I do not mean that it should be developed by the government and then imposed on the employees as a fait accompli. The government should not say, "Here is the plan that we have developed." I do not think that is a sensible way to develop such a program.

But if the federal government is desirous of entering into such a job evaluation program, and I commend the general idea very highly although not all types of such programs, then it should be done only by negotiation and discussion with the organizations representing the employees in the manner and spirit of collective bargaining so that the manual or base on which the program works will be agreed upon mutually first before it is put into effect. I would say also that such a program requires a fairly large degree of acceptance, probably 75 to 80 per cent of the employees affected, if the plan is to be of any great benefit. I reiterate that if the government is going to go into the field, and I suggest that it should, a plan should not be imposed upon the employees but that it should be negotiated with their representatives and, second, that there should be a pretty high percentage of acceptance by the employees themselves. This is one other facet of the question, in addition to that of the procedure of negotiation, with which I dealt earlier, upon which I hope the minister will comment when the civil service vote is under consideration.

Mr. Fisher: I have some specific questions I want to ask concerning the chief electoral officer and the civil service, but there was one general suggestion that I wished to make. I could make it to the Minister of Justice, the Minister of National Revenue, or the Secretary of State. I make it to the Secretary of State because he is the one who filed the answer to a question I asked about those books which, in the past year, had been banned from Canada because the people in the Department of National Revenue felt they were not up to the proper standard.

This whole question of the censorship of books, especially obscene literature, is one that is very much to the fore. It has been mentioned by quite a number of members. The suggestion I wanted to make to the Secretary of State was this. The list I received only covered the books that were banned within the last year. There is a much more extensive list, possibly covering 500 books. In the short list I received there were several books that I had read, some of which were out and out smut and had no business being in the country. Their literary merit was nil. This is my opinion, of course, and I expect it could be challenged by other people.

Since it is likely there will be legislation introduced next year concerning this question, I thought it might be a good idea for the Secretary of State to make arrangements to obtain copies of all of those books that have been banned by our so-called censorship authorities, not for general reading at all, but so that members of parliament could look at what has been decided in the past as being improper or unfit for Canadians to read. We would, in this way, get a much better idea of how the system has worked in the past. There have been many complaints about the system; that it has been a hit or miss affair; that it has been applied by men without any literary judgment, and so on. It seems to me that by adopting this suggestion we would bring home to members of parliament just what has been considered dangerous or bad reading for Canadians. It would give us a chance to assess, quite frankly, some of the various degrees of pornography, some of which are interwoven with aspects of literature.

I believe the Secretary of State would be the minister to do this because he tends to interrelate the activities of a number of departments in an official way. I would not make any official recommendation as to what should be done with the books after legislation has been introduced and after members of parliament have read them. I am not making this suggestion that the books be acquired in order to get members of parliament to read them, although I am sure they will show considerable interest in the rather delightful batch or miscellany that will be produced.

The points I want to make in connection with the civil service are highly derivatory. There are some suggestions made by Dr. J. J. Deutsch in an article entitled "Some Thoughts on the Public Service", which appeared in February, 1957. There are several good suggestions in this article. This gentleman worked for the public service for over 20 years, and is at present engaged by the University of British Columbia. The point that appealed to me most was his feeling that one of the prime difficulties with the civil service was that really exceptional talent did not rise to the top quickly. In his article he says:

> Alongside this problem of machinery there is the matter of selecting and bringing along outstanding talent. It is my impression that this is not being done early enough or fast enough. There is too much of what the Germans call Gleichschaltung—too much holding back to the pace of the average. It is the common complaint of those who consider the civil service for a career that advancement is too slow. There may not be much substance in this complaint in the general case, but in the case of exceptional ability it is very important.

I have noticed that the gentlemen who come into the civil service with a background of Rhodes' scholarship rise with remarkable speed to the top of the public service. I have no derogatory comments to make about

Rhodes scholars in any way or about their background. One of the points that I would make is that the reason they do advance so quickly lies not only in the talent that they have but through their prestige and status, given by these scholarships. There is a label on them when they go into the public service to the effect that these boys are good, so they get somewhere. I have the feeling that many people who go into the public service may have ability and talent, but because they have not that little prestige label they do not advance so quickly. I believe this particular point is worth some consideration by the civil service commission.

Mr. Deutsch goes on to give this expression of opinion:

> On the other hand, I do not believe there is anywhere a more impersonal organization than the civil service. The individual cannot locate anywhere the heart and conscience of the organism. There is no proprietor or general manager in the usual sense. The employee has to fall back upon rules and regulations, and, in his collective capacity, upon the passage of resolutions directed to the governing authorities and the general public. For the general body of the service there are no employee unions in the sense in which they exist in private industry. Consequently it is necessary to develop special machinery. The establishment of the national joint council has been a very important step. It is vital that the work of this council should be successful.

Then the author goes on to suggest that within departments personnel officers be given a much higher status in order that they could begin to breathe a bit of heart and personality into the machine to give the people within the service, to whom it is exceptionally impersonal and mechanical, a feeling that human considerations are very much to the fore. I would imagine that if hon. members and the minister have not had an opportunity of glancing at this piece of writing it would be worth while if the Secretary of State were to look at these general suggestions, bearing in mind what the hon. member for Skeena did bring to his attention as well as to the attention of the civil service commission.

Mr. Courtemanche: The hon. member's suggestion that certain books banned by the Department of National Revenue be acquired by the library of parliament is one for consideration of the joint committee on the parliamentary library.

So far as the civil service commission is concerned, I would deal with this matter when the estimates of the department are called.

Mr. Fisher: I am a member of the joint committee on the library of parliament and I was going to make the suggestion there, but I felt that if these books were acquired we would be leaving ourselves open to the appearance of suggesting that they become a permanent part of the book stock of the library of parliament. Obviously, most of them should not be given house room in any library. However, I think the members of parliament should have an opportunity to judge these books, and that is why I made the suggestion to the minister.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to congratulate the minister on the way in which he has managed to slip out of becoming the custodian of pornographic literature as well as the custodian of enemy property.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I have just one remark to make in respect to the statement of the hon. member for Port Arthur in which he advanced the proposition that people in the public service should advance in accordance with their ability. The hon. member for Port Arthur some days ago had occasion to remark that the proposition I put to the house contained some pretty good socialism, and I would like to say to him, through you, Mr. Chairman, that the subject about which the hon. member has been speaking seems to me like pretty good free enterprise.

Mr. Howard: The indication of the remark of the hon. member who has just spoken is that he thinks that is the situation. That is self-explanatory.

An hon. Member: It's a good thing he thinks —a lot of you fellows don't even think.

Mr. Hardie: I would like to suggest very briefly to the minister that in the case of the civil servants in the Northwest Territories we find that the housing supplied to employees of most departments, with the exception of—

Mr. Courtemanche: If the hon. member will pardon me, I will have the officers of the public service before me in a moment, at which time I will be able to answer this question. The officers before me at this time have to do only with the Secretary of State branch.

384. Companies division, $115,535.

Mr. Fisher: I have two questions concerning straight information which I would like to ask of the minister on this item. With respect to the companies division, I would like to know how much income accrued to the minister's department in this financial year from the activities of the companies division?

Mr. Courtemanche: $572,950.46.

Mr. Fisher: That is a fair amount of income. I suppose it would be possible to determine just how much surplus is embodied in that figure, although I think it would be difficult to assess the costs of this division. In the opportunity afforded to me by the minister to spend some time in this particular division I formed the impression that this branch could be more money-making or profitable to the government. I do not mean that there should be a deliberate effort to make a profit, but it does seem to me that the service extended is a very complete one in the light of the fees charged and I was wondering whether the change in procedure in notifying companies in default, which is now being introduced, and about which the minister has informed us, will require much more money in terms of staff and time than was previously the case. If so, has any consideration been given to a further charge being made?

Mr. Courtemanche: The report was tabled in this house on May 22 and the member will find at page 7 that the expenditure for the companies division will be $107,285.98. In connection with the work in respect to companies in default a temporary staff of three typists only will be required for a period of a few months.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to make a suggestion to the minister in respect to the practice which has, I believe, been to put all records on microfilm after the passage of five years. I suggest that it might be even cheaper to use this microfilm process after one year. I am sure the minister is far more aware than I am of the lack of file space. Perhaps one year might be too short a time, but I think very shortly after the lapse of 12 months many of these records could be put on microfilm, which would increase the available space.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed by my officers that the files are kept for five years because they are required for that length of time.

385. Trade-Marks division, including a contribution of $3,800 to the international office for the protection of industrial property, $190,645.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): My remarks on the trade-marks division will not be extensive because I realize that the minister on another occasion—perhaps next year—will be able to answer more fully the type of comments I would make with respect to the law. I would say, however, that it has been the experience under the new trade-marks law that delays, statutory and otherwise, are very long and that the average company requiring registration of a trade-mark finds that it takes a very long time before it can ascertain whether this application will be granted and before it can receive a certificate.

I do not think of course that it is the time to raise the question as to whether the law should be changed, but I had hope that the royal commission would have taken another look at the Trade Marks Act. I realize that this is a fairly recent act but in the light of the operation over a few years I had hoped that there would have been an investigation in order to discover whether or not it was serving its purpose and whether the public at large and our commercial enterprises in particular were satisfied with the way in which the act is working.

More specifically, I understand that we have not at hand the report of the Secretary of State for the year ending March 31, 1958—

Mr. Courtemanche: It is available. It was tabled on May 22.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Thank you. Then, would the minister advise for the record as to the net revenue of the trade-marks office for 1957-58? That will suffice for the present moment.

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes, the hon. member will find the figure at page 7. The revenue was $273,557.89.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Am I correct in saying that during the previous year the figure was $260,000?

Mr. Courtemanche: That is right.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): So that there is not much variation in the net income to that branch but it is a paying branch at the present time.

Mr. Courtemanche: That is right.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): The only comment I wish to make is that I hope the minister will impress upon the royal commission the desirability of making a report on the Trade Marks Act. I say this particularly because the commission spent a great deal of time in investigating the trade-marks office and I am anxious, as I am sure all those lawyers who attend before this office are anxious, to find out whether we have the proper type of act and also whether from an administration point of view the act is being well handled.

386. Bureau for translations, $1,462,120.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the strength of the bureau of translations has been increased by one, from 294 to 295, and that the number of translators within that bureau has been increased by the same number. I think we all are very conscious of the importance of this bureau and of the necessity to secure translations of official documents with the minimum of delay. Sometimes when delay occurs, as it is bound to occur, the fault is not in the bureau but in the fact that there are not enough translators there to do the work which is required and to do it as quickly as we would like. I want to ask the minister if he thinks that the strength of the bureau, which has now been increased by one, is sufficient to deal with the work required and to deal with it at reasonable speed.

Mr. Courtemanche: It has been increased in the supplementary estimates by 11 employees.

Mr. Chevrier: May I follow that up with another observation. It has been noticed in this house from time to time that there are some publications which are not translated into the French language and the question which occurs to me at the moment is why this should be the case. Further, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, there are instances where though the reports and publications are translated they are not translated concurrently with the English version, and I presume, although I do not know, that this is so because of the lack of translators. The Secretary of State has just said that in the supplementary estimates another 11 translators will be added. Does he think this number will be sufficient in view of the questions I have asked and in view, also, of another measure which is on the order paper, namely, the measure having to do with simultaneous translation? Is that a matter which will be the responsibility of the Secretary of State? Will he be charged with the responsibility for the specialized translators who will be required for this work, because I am sure that the Secretary of State has been at the United Nations and has seen the very highly specialized work that this entails. It is work of a difficult character, as he knows, and the question which arises in my mind at the moment is whether this will be his responsibility and, if this is the case, whether he is giving some consideration to this matter which all of us in this committee will agree is one of great moment.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that the translation bureau is a service of the house. The bureau translates only when it is asked to do so. It does not come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. Each minister can ask for translations, and translations are made when the bureau is asked to make them.

Mr. Chevrier: What about the other questions I asked?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that eight interpreters are training at the present time and they will be ready pretty soon.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that eight out of the eleven?

Mr. Courtemanche: Eight out of the eleven.

Mr. Chevrier: May I pursue this question a bit further? What are the qualifications which are going to be required of these translators—I say specialized translators but perhaps I should not use that expression, but I presume a great deal more will be required of them than of the others—over and above those required for the present translators in the department?

Mr. Courtemanche: Their qualifications are a knowledge of English and French, a knowledge of the procedure of the house and of the terminology used.

Mr. Pearson: I take it from what the minister has now said that the additional strength of the bureau of translation to deal with the work which has been normally done by this bureau in the past is four, because eight out of the eleven provided for in the supplementary estimates will be doing simultaneous translations in the house, I take it also from what the minister has said that he considers this number to be sufficient to deal with the requests which are made to the bureau for translation services, and we know how important that work is and how valuable it is. The eight who are being provided for the simultaneous translation service of the house will be covered, I take it, by the supplementary vote we are coming to. The total amount of that vote would indicate, however, that the average salary to be paid to these simultaneous translators would be somewhere around $5,000. This is very skilled and very difficult work to do accurately, as those of us who have been at the United Nations realize, it is a very important kind of work. I know, as perhaps the minister may know, that in New York they have not found it easy to get qualified simultaneous translators although the amount that is provided as salary down there is about double that provided for in the supplementary estimates. I mention this matter to the Secretary of State because it will be important that these men should be highly qualified. I hope this is being taken into consideration in training people for this work.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that the department has recommended having six more translators for the translation bureau. The amount provided in the supplementary estimates is only for nine months, and the rate of salary will be around $7,000.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask another question dealing with the matter I brought up earlier in connection with those publications or documents of the house which are not translated into the French language? The minister gave the formal reply which is that his department translate what they are asked to translate, and I have no fault to find with that. But does the minister not think that he should go a bit further, since he has the translators at his disposal in his department, and say that when it is brought to his attention, as is being done now, and as has been done from time to time in the house, that there are publications which are not being translated into French or publications that are not being translated simultaneously with the English version when it appears such, does he not think that he should bring this to the attention of his colleagues in an endeavour to see that the English and French documents are tabled simultaneously?

Mr. Courtemanche: I will be very glad to deal with this matter.

Patent and copyright office—

387. Administration division, $144,650.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, once again I speak about these reports. The minister said a while ago that the report had been tabled in May—

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): For 1957-58. I wish I had a copy. In any event my first comment on patent administration is that I am aware of the fact that there is a royal commission investigating the Patent Act and I quite appreciate that it will take some time before we have a final report from the royal commission in this regard. I appreciate also that it will take some time before we have the final report of the royal commission in that regard.

One thing that very quickly strikes the eye of one who looks at these reports is the fact that generally speaking the number of applicants for patents who are Canadian citizens is very small compared with the total number of applications filed in any one year. In the period 1957-58 there were 22,257 applications for patents filed of which I believe 1,154 were Canadian. If my figures are correct they indicate that something in the nature of 5 per cent are applications from Canadians. One might say immediately that we in Canada are maintaining a patent system for people who reside outside of Canada, if one wanted to make that kind of statement. I have no real objection to the fact that applications for patents are granted to citizens of other countries. That is the system that has always existed and unless for some good reason of which I am not aware at present the commissioners decide to recommend otherwise I suppose it will continue.

My point is this. I am interested in knowing what is the effect on Canadian trade of granting patents to so many people outside of Canada. That is why I put those questions to the Minister of Justice and once to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I will also ask the Secretary of State to ascertain whether within the royal commission itself there have been or will be any inquiries to find out in what manner the Patent Act affects trade in Canada. It is very evident that all important patents except perhaps those granted to the research council and the atomic energy commission and a few others in this country are granted to foreign citizens. The holding of patents can restrict trade and control prices. My main request of the minister is that he direct the attention of the royal commission to this fact and insist upon a better study of the working sections of the Patent Act, that is those sections which require that a patent shall be worked in Canada. I am afraid that too few people realize the monopoly which is created in foreign hands by the use of our patent system. With these few remarks concerning that feature of the Patent Act I shall leave the subject.

I would point out to the committee, however, that over the past few years the department has shown a deficit in income which decreased from $95,000-odd in 1953-54 to $279,000-odd in 1956-57. I do not have the comparative figure for 1957-58 immediately at hand but in any event it also shows a larger decrease. The crux of the matter is this. The deficit is due to the expenditure incurred in the printing of patents. The department incurs a large deficit because it prints its patents and that expense will recur from year to year. I should like to have the comments of the minister as to whether in light of these facts he still considers that our system of printing these patents is in the public interest and of sufficient value to warrant the expenditure. There is very little income through the sale of copies of patents. The total income in 1956-57 through the sale of copies was $86,000-odd according to the figures I have and the net loss was about $650,000. It is a matter that bears some investigation. As far as the printing done by the printing bureau is concerned it is of an excellent quality and involves complicated technical work. The actual cost of the printing is comparable with the cost of work done in outside firms and I am merely questioning the principle of whether we should continue having a loss charged to that department which, as I said, amounted to $650,000 in 1956-57.

I feel that my remarks should be brief but, of course, I should like some comment from the minister as to whether he feels the technical staff is sufficient for the administration of this act and as to whether he has received any suggestions from the commissioner of patents concerning improvements.

Before taking my seat I must not forget to deal with one of my main bones of contention and that is the fact that the patent office has been moved to No. 8 temporary building near the experimental farm. If any hon. members have had to deal with patents in the past I know they will agree with me that this was a great mistake initiated by the previous government, I hasten to admit, but confirmed by the present government. There is no reason why this office should be bandied about from one place to another. It is the only place of record of Canadian inventions in this country. It is an important office where the public deals with the government from day to day and there was no valid reason for moving it from the centre of the city. The minister is not responsible for this but I suggest he could make a name for himself in the future by insisting that one of the initial projects undertaken by the Department of Public Works be the construction somewhere in the centre of Ottawa of a building to house the patents, trade-marks and copyright office.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the matter raised by the hon. member for Ottawa East about the deficit, I should like to say that a deficit is inevitable if the fee which is now $60 per patent is to remain the same. The high cost of printing and salaries are the principal reasons for the deficit in so far as expenditures are concerned.

Our deficit for 1957-58 is about one-third of our revenue whereas the deficit of the United States patent office for the year ending June 30, 1957 is more than 140 per cent. It may be of interest to state that in the United Kingdom where the fee is as high as $370 per patent including annual fees the deficit for 1956 is slightly less than 5 per cent of the income. In any event it is felt that no attempt should be made to eliminate or reduce our deficit through an increase of fees or through a decrease of our expenditures which would involve a radical change in our present system until the commission has submitted its recommendation. There are at present 11 vacant patent examiner positions three of which will be filled shortly, and since the recruitment period is now over very few additional patent examiners will be recruited during the balance of the current financial year. These vacant positions are often used to meet needs that were unforeseen when the estimates were prepared before the start of the fiscal year. For instance, some of those vacant positions of patent examiners are presently being used for students hired as assistant patent examiners for the summer.

As far as the building is concerned, I am informed that in the near future we will have a new building.

621. Bureau for translations—further amount required, $58,800.

Mr. Chevrier: Are these the 11 translators the minister referred to earlier?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, before the discussion on this item is concluded, I would like to make a slight correction. Last night, I said that the food in the printing bureau's cafeteria was tasteless. I must say that the complaints that had been made to me went back to before May 1st. I have been told since that there has been a change of concessionnaire and that things are now much better. I therefore ask the hon. Secretary of State to ignore the complaints I brought to his attention last night. If I have any new ones, I shall submit them to him.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) for his kindness.

Civil service commission—

77. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $3,434,161.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word at this stage about the civil service commission. I need not point out to the Secretary of State that he has jurisdiction over a very important group of employees of the government of Canada and that, apart from those who come directly under him, there are a very large number of federal employees who, while not coming under the minister's jurisdiction, nevertheless benefit from the provisions of the Civil Service Commission Act.

During the present session and even before, some of the Secretary of State's colleagues have been making very unkind remarks with respect to members of the civil service. Indeed they stated that certain civil servants were lazy and did not acquit themselves of their duties. They also made other statements which I do not intend repeating here for fear of detaining the committee. I did feel at the time however—and I think that a large majority of the members of the House of Commons as well as the Secretary of State himself must have shared that feeling—that those statements were altogether unfair and should never have been made. Under the circumstances, it seems that the question which must be put is this. Aware as he is of the statements made, does the Secretary of State feel they are true? If so, what action has he taken to ascertain the truth, if any, of those remarks? If they are inaccurate, as I have every reason to believe, would the Secretary of State be so kind as to make a statement on the matter?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) for raising that point. Yesterday evening three other hon. members referred to the civil service commission and since their remarks were made in English, the hon. member for Laurier who is perfectly bilingual, will allow me to give my prepared statement with regard to the civil service commission in the same language.

(Text):

Before commenting on the observations on the civil service which were made last evening by the hon. members for Ottawa East, Hull and Skeena and this afternoon by the hon. member for Laurier, I feel I should say a few words in reference to the relationship of the government in general and the Secretary of State in particular to the civil service commission. Confusion on this subject continues to persist in many quarters.

Under the law, the civil service commission is responsible not to the ministry but to parliament. The Secretary of State in no sense administers either the civil service or the commission. He is simply the spokesman designated by the government to report to parliament on the commission's behalf and to act in the capacity in which I am now acting, namely to present to parliament the commission's annual estimates of expenditure and to recommend their approval on behalf of the government. This independence of the civil service commission is at the heart of the arrangements established by the Civil Service Act of 40 years ago. It is essential to the preservation of the merit principle on which the Canadian service is based and to which this government attaches the highest importance.

Both the hon. member for Ottawa East and the hon. member for Hull, and this afternoon the hon. member for Laurier, spoke of the high quality of the civil service of Canada. The present government is fully appreciative of this fact and the Prime Minister and other colleagues of mine have had many occasions, in and out of this house, to pay tribute to the loyalty, devotion and efficiency of the great body of men and women who have made their careers in the direct service of the nation. This, however, is not to say that improvements cannot be made in our law and practice with respect to civil service matters and it is with this in view that the government asked the civil service commissioners to make their current thoroughgoing review of the present act, regulations and procedures. Incidentally, their report is expected to be in the government's hands by the end of the year.

The hon. member for Ottawa East made a number of suggestions in connection with this current review, such as a clearer definition of the commission's powers and duties, its relationship to the financial controls exercised by treasury board, improved procedures for selection and for appeals on promotions. He also spoke of the commission's role in regard to working conditions. I can assure my hon. friend that these questions are now under very active examination by the commissioners and that they will take seriously into account his observations on these and other topics in preparing their recommendations to the government.

With regard to salary and wage levels in the civil service, as hon. members will know the recommendations which under the law the commission is required to make to the government are made not through the Secretary of State but through the Minister of Finance.

The hon. member for Ottawa East made a reference to the value in a Canadian civil servant of a knowledge of our two national tongues. He felt that such knowledge should be taken into proper account in selecting men and women for appointment. As he cannot fail to know, I share warmly his views in this respect, and I am informed that the present commissioners have a lively appreciation of the value of bilingualism in the service.

The hon. member for Hull referred at some length to what he described, I think, as a "malaise" prevalent among certain civil servants. He seemed to imply that there was an impression abroad that under the present government civil servants were subject to unfair attack and had some sense of insecurity. He said a good deal about the duty of the minister to be the champion and defender of civil servants. Such fears, if they exist, are wholly without foundation. As I have already said, the present government respects and supports, and intends to continue to respect and support the independent status of the civil service commission and a civil service selected and administered on the basis of quality and merit. There will be no change in these respects in any legislation that will be introduced into parliament by this administration.

In reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena concerning the extension to the public service of a greater voice—incidentally, I cannot share his distaste for the traditional and honourable term "civil servant" —I can do no better than to quote as I now do what the Prime Minister said on this subject in an address he delivered on May 1 of this year to the civil service association of Canada:

> I believe that civil servants, through representatives of their organizations, should have a greater voice in the process of determining civil service salaries. There should be a more systematic method of bringing your views and your information to bear in the application of those principles of salary policy on which there is already a wide measure of agreement.
> I think this improvement can be achieved within the general framework of institutions and laws which we have already. What is needed is more opportunity and better arrangements for your representatives to sit down at a table with officials representing the government and with officers of the civil service commission, having the essential facts and figures before them, to discuss in detail the comparisons between civil service salaries in various classifications and the pay for similar work in private employment. From this I would hope a common understanding could emerge; and will provide for a better understanding.
> Several of my colleagues are working now on this question, as is the civil service commission, and I hope that it will be possible to proceed with improvements along this line in the near future.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think the house will welcome the statement the Secretary of State has made. I am sure it will have the effect of relieving to a large extent many of those who have felt embarrassed by some of the incidents that have been taking place in the house within the last short while. I do not want to go back to those incidents and certainly I do not want to discuss any individual case at this stage, but I should like to go a step further and discuss the matter in a general way.

I think the minister was in the house the other day when there was put on Hansard the practice of the house down through the years with reference to political patronage and the dismissal of employees of the civil service, both the outside service and the inside service. That policy was outlined by former leaders of the House of Commons including the late Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Mackenzie King, Lord Bennett and others. The practice which was established during those years was that a member of the civil service should not be dismissed from public office without a certificate of a member of parliament, in other words, without a member of parliament stating that of his own personal knowledge he was aware that a member of the service had taken part in political activities.

While I put that on the record at the time I did not in any way condone it. On the contrary, I think my remarks indicated that I did not condone that kind of practice and I am wondering whether the minister has given any consideration to the changing, indeed, the modernization of that practice which has become obsolete and which in fact is so unfair, having regard to the circumstances under which we live today, as to demand immediate change. I believe there is no other way in which I can bring this up in the house than under the estimates of the Secretary of State, whose department is responsible for this group of employees.

I think that the time has come to give consideration to the changing of this policy, this old resolution, this tradition which has grown up over the years and to substitute in lieu thereof something more in keeping with our day and age, certainly to substitute in lieu thereof a public hearing or an inquiry by an impartial tribunal when charges of this kind are made. It seems to me to be entirely unconscionable that we should be dealing in 1958 with dismissals from the public service, be it the civil service of Canada or the outside service, of those who are prevailing rate employees, of those who are casual employees or who benefit from the advantages of superannuation, sick benefits according to this obsolete practice.

It would seem to me that the time has come when this outdated and outmoded practice should be brought to an end. The point I should like to make now is that if the minister has not given the matter consideration I believe he should, and I believe that it should be determined how in the future the services of any civil servant, any member of the public service of Canada who is accused of political activity or against whom any other accusation is made in the performance of his duties, might be dispensed with. I trust that the minister is not one of those who would condone conduct whereby an employee of the public service would lose his employment and thereby his livelihood without proper consideration being given to the circumstances of dismissal, without an impartial tribunal being charged with the responsibility of hearing the evidence pro and con so that a fair decision, having regard to all the circumstances, might be rendered.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate very much the comments of the Secretary of State, especially his quotation from the address by the Prime Minister which in a general way sounds very good. But I should like to make some inquiries with respect to specific procedures. I would point out that submissions have been made by the civil service federation of Canada through the civil service commission regarding improvements in the act and the regulations. Incidentally, this material was just given to me and I find on looking through it very quickly that it coincides with the suggestions I made earlier regarding negotiation procedure.

I wonder whether we could not have a clearer indication of the attitude of the government because even though, as he says, the minister acts only in the capacity of reporting to parliament on the estimates of the civil service commission, the Civil Service Act comes under the authority of the cabinet which makes suggestions in so far as changes are concerned. I would appreciate, and I am sure the civil service federation and other federal government employee organizations would appreciate, knowing what the attitude of the government is with respect to their specific suggestion about negotiation procedures; their suggestions with respect to outside tribunals dealing with grievances for which no satisfactory settlement is reached. I think we should have a clearer understanding of the attitude of the government in this regard, rather than a reiteration of the general statement of the Prime Minister.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks we made yesterday, the minister seems to have understood that we wanted him to intervene directly with the civil service commission. If we gave him that impression, we regret it. For my part, at least, I meant exactly the contrary. I am convinced that the civil service commission is independent and that it should remain so. What we requested was that the minister, who is responsible for the adoption of the estimates of the commission by this house, act also as the protector of the civil service commission and civil servants who depend on him when they are attacked unfairly.

Some hon. members—I am not talking about the minister personally, who has always been very tactful with civil servants—but some hon. members—especially one whose name I do not remember and whose constituency I would not dare mention, but who comes from the far west—attacked civil servants in an exceedingly violent fashion, so much so that at one point the Prime Minister had to step in. Other hon. members, without making direct remarks, indulged in interjections in some debates, by shouting and saying that it was true or false, according to the way they felt about it. That, I think, is what creates a certain uneasiness, especially when a minister takes it upon himself to dismiss a civil servant and to accuse him in this house of being guilty of irregularities, if not of plain dishonesty, then refuses to produce evidence of the civil servant's guilt, all this without ordering an inquiry where the man could have had an opportunity to defend himself. This uneasiness is all the greater for having been created by a member of the cabinet. That is why I urge the Secretary of State to ask his cabinet colleagues to safeguard civil servants' rights to defend themselves when they are attacked.

As I said yesterday, if they are guilty, they should be dismissed. I am not in favour of keeping in the civil service people who do not deserve to hold a position in the public service, but it is necessary that they be granted a serious and impartial inquiry where they would have a chance to defend themselves, in order to find out whether or not they are really guilty.

I would have liked to deal with the matter of promotions. I know however that the commission is carrying out a very thorough study of this matter. In fact it is probable that early next session we might review the whole Civil Service Act. Any lengthy remarks in this regard would therefore be premature. We know that, at the present time, when an employee has applied for promotion, the rating given by the department involved might reverse the decision taken by the commission on the basis of the promotion competition. Needless to say, this can at times give rise to unfairness because of certain particular and personal considerations involved between certain applicants and the responsible official of the department concerned, and the civil service commission cannot interfere.

I will leave it at that. I bring up the matter so that when the legislation comes up for review, we will be able to deal with that aspect of the question.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, when I said that certain hon. members seemed unaware of the fact that I am merely spokesman for the civil service commission, I did not have the hon. member for Hull in mind. He is too politically wise to be credited with such intentions. I made the statement, in a general way for the benefit of hon. members, especially the new ones, who had the impression that I was in charge of the civil service commission. I wanted to make it clear to them that I am merely spokesman for the commission.

As I have no wish to overstate the point, I will answer the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) in French. Though the hon.

gentleman did not refer to any specific case, as the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) had done, he did make certain remarks which enabled us to guess what he had in mind. Now I understand that the case familiar to everyone does not come under the civil service commission.

I am told that this particular employee did not come under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission which is governed by a very clear section as regards political activity by any of its employees.

Section 55 states that an employee of the civil service commission has no right to meddle in politics.

The hon. member for Laurier will understand that, after having administered and studied that department for two months, I am not yet familiar enough with the situation to carry on a long discussion, but I am informed that, in the case under discussion, when the minister—this has always been recognized—when the minister is in possession of an affidavit stating that this or that employee of this or that department has meddled in politics, he is empowered to dismiss him. Well, in this case, that individual had meddled in politics, and I would not like—

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty pursuant to standing order 15 (3) to leave the chair in order to allow the house to proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: As there are a number of private bills standing for consideration in committee of the whole, is it agreed that they be referred to the committee in one motion?

Mr. McIlraith: Is that all of the private bills?

Mr. Speaker: Items 42 to 107; they are all divorce bills except Bill No. S-6, respecting Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Howard: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, did I understand you to say item 107 also?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Would it not be more agreeable to the house to deal with all the divorce bills in a group, and with the others separately?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable that all divorce bills be referred to the committee in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask that the bills be considered separately.

EILEEN ROSE BROWN PORTEOUS

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-154, for the relief of Eileen Rose Brown Porteous—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: We in this group have for a number of years opposed the passing by this House of Commons of these bills as private members' bills. We feel that a great deal of responsibility is being placed on members of parliament and that in many cases when the cases are dealt with en bloc they are not given the scrutiny which I am sure this house would wish to give them. We do not agree that this House of Commons, in the first place, should have anything to do with the passing of these bills, but in view of the existing situation we feel that there must be some understanding of this matter before we are asked to pass these private bills. I am sure that the chairman of the committee which has examined these bills would be quite happy to answer certain questions and, in the particular case under discussion, I would like to ask if this is the proper section under which to ask whether the petition for the relief of Eileen Rose Brown Porteous was contested?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the petition was not contested.

Mr. Peters: Was the evidence in this particular case obtained by private detectives?

Mr. McCleave: The evidence was obtained from two private detectives named Messrs. Charron and Nelson, among other witnesses.

Mr. Peters: Did the alleged adultery take place on commercial premises, that is to say in a hotel, motel or other public place?

Mr. McCleave: The respondent in this case was caught in the apartment of a woman. I presume the answer is no.

Mr. Peters: Was any photographic proof of adultery presented? We understand that some of the courts in some provinces accept photographic proof, and upon reading the evidence in this case we think it would be advantageous if there were more definite proof of adultery.

Mr. McCleave: The answer once again is no. The only photographic evidence was a photograph of the respondent.

Mr. Peters: In this case did the respondent appear before the Senate committee hearing the case?

Mr. McCleave: The respondent was called but he did not appear.

Mr. Peters: Was it established that the petitioner met the requirements of the residence clause?

Mr. McCleave: I presume my hon. friend is referring to domicile, Mr. Chairman. I believe the evidence in this case is that the husband had lived in the city of Montreal. It would take but a moment to refer to the evidence if the house will give me that privilege. The only evidence in the case is that the couple were married in 1943 when the respondent was living in Montreal and that he has since lived in that city.

Mr. Peters: When was the petitioner married?

Mr. McCleave: The parties were married on or about July 10, 1943.

Mr. Peters: How long is it since the petitioner has lived with the respondent?

Mr. McCleave: The parties separated six years ago, in 1952.

Mr. Chown: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think the house should know that the hon. member who is obviously speaking in an attempt to delay the passage of these bills—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chown: —was a member of the committee concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: I will have to ask the hon. member to state his point of order.

Mr. Chown: The point of order I am raising is that the hon. member was a member of the committee which dealt with this matter. He assented to these bills in committee, where he could have asked any questions he wished about the case in question. I can read nothing else into his actions than a desire to delay the passage of these private bills when he uses the tactic of coming before this house to ask questions which he could have asked in committee.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think that is a point of order. I do not see why any member who wishes to ask questions of the chairman of the committee in question may not do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, are there any children of this union?

Mr. McCleave: There are no children.

Mr. Peters: As a result of the passage of this bill, would the woman in question be destitute?

Mr. McCleave: I believe not, Mr. Chairman. The evidence is that they have been separated since 1952 and that the woman has worked steadily since the separation.

Mr. Peters: Has the committee satisfied itself that there is or is not any possibility of reconciliation between the parties involved?

Mr. McCleave: I think the answer to that probably involves the reasons the parties separated in the first place. The evidence of the wife was that the husband drank quite a bit and stayed out at nights and that they did not get along. She said they argued a lot and the point raised by the hon. member was important to the Senate committee when considering these matters. In this particular case, as in other cases, the gentlemen from the other place satisfy themselves by asking questions as to the possibility of reconciliation between the parties. The evidence in this case is that there was no such possibility.

ANITA DUGUAY BRAIS

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-155, for the relief of Anita Duguay Brais—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It has been said by an hon. member that the hon. member for Timiskaming was a member of this divorce committee. I also was a member of that committee, but I think it is readily recognized that we are not only members of that committee but, fortunately or unfortunately, we are members of other committees which do meet at the same time. Owing to the rush of business during the current session the committees have also had to meet at various times when the house has been sitting, and as a result I for one have found it absolutely impossible to give to these divorce bills the necessary care and scrutiny we are honour bound to give to them.

I have noticed with respect to these bills that various matters arise which are of a general nature and I have endeavoured in the short time available to discover whether there is any clear-cut system of dealing with these bills. I must say that at least to date I have been unable to complete any kind of a survey of these matters that would lead to any answer as to the pattern, so that in future I think that possibly we should take these matters under consideration and take some of these bills and ask questions to see how much study other people have given to them that we have not been able to give.

An hon. Member: Who are you?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I see the hon. member for Winnipeg South is up to his usual contribution to this committee. I should like to have a few answers with regard to this particular bill because I do not believe I was at the committee which dealt with it. Was this case contested?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the answer is no.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Again, was the evidence obtained from private detectives, or from what have been referred to in some of the committees as professional witnesses, or was it by private witnesses in this case?

Mr. McCleave: The answer is that it was not obtained by private detectives. One of the witnesses of adultery which occurred in the common residence was the wife, and another was a theatre manager.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Was the evidence obtained in a hotel, or in what kind of establishment?

Mr. McCleave: I have just answered that question. The evidence was obtained in the parties' own home. The woman returned home unexpectedly.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Are there any children involved in this case?

Mr. McCleave: There are no children involved.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have one more question. Has any provision been made for the woman in this case or is she going to be placed in an embarrassing financial position?

Mr. McCleave: Ordinarily these are matters which are outside the jurisdiction of parliament. The aggrieved party goes to the courts of the province of Quebec. I do not see in the evidence, nor have I in my study of the evidence noted, that there was any such agreement in this case, but it may possibly be there.

SYDNEY LESSER

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-156, for the relief of Sydney Lesser—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins.)]

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Thank you for the applause. I feel rather let down because I did not get as much applause as some hon. members on the other side. Thank you. That is better.

I have no intention of reiterating the general comment which my hon. friend had to make, except to say that the more applause I get the more convinced I am that I am doing the wrong thing. I may say that any time the Conservative party begins to applaud me I am sure I am on the wrong track. There are some things here that should be dealt with in a serious vein, and the applause and desk thumping before this was not serious but facetiously entered into.

An hon. Member: So were the questions.

Mr. Howard: Someone says "so were the questions". That shows how serious he is.

An hon. Member: Read the evidence.

Mr. Howard: We have some questions to ask. We should like to know if the petition was protested.

Mr. McCleave: The answer is no.

Mr. Howard: We are trying to establish a pattern to this, in order to bring it to the attention of the public, and I should like to determine whether the evidence in this instance was obtained from private detectives.

Mr. McCleave: The evidence was obtained by two public detectives, Wiseman and Wiseman.

Mr. Howard: Was the scene of the alleged incident, the alleged adultery, on commercial premises, and, if so could the hon. gentleman describe generally what it might be?

Mr. McCleave: The scene of the alleged adultery in this case was the Campus Hotel which I understand is in the downtown part of Montreal. The parties had been followed there.

Mr. Howard: In this instance was there any definite proof of adultery having taken place, or any admission of adultery or was it by implication that adultery was established?

Mr. McCleave: I believe the fair answer was that it was by implication. I presume the question really means: was the adultery inferred from the situation in which the couple were found. The answer is that the adultery would be inferred.

Mr. Howard: Are there any children, and if there are, do you know in whose custody these children are to be left and what is the financial position with respect to them?

Mr. McCleave: This is a somewhat unusual case. There was a child concerned, but not the child of the two people. The wife had custody of this particular child but they themselves did not have children.

STELLA RACHEL CATER HARRIS

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-157, for the relief of Stella Rachel Cater Harris—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Regier: This particular bill has one rather serious feature and that is that these people were married on October 8, 1955 and the lady is alleged to have left her husband less than one year later. Both parties are relatively young, and it seems regrettable that people who were married in 1955 and who were parted some eleven months later should now already be the subject of a bill before the parliament of Canada in which there is a request for a release from their marriage vows at least as far as the law is concerned.

I should like to point out that it is very often said that we grant divorces to these people in the parliament of Canada. We do no such thing. We do not recognize divorce. In taking these actions all we achieve in effect is to relieve the petitioners from being liable to a bigamy charge should he or she remarry.

We relieve them of their legal obligations. That is altogether different from the granting of a divorce although it may be recognized as such. In light of the fact that these people lived together only 11 months, may I ask the chairman of the committee if there is any possibility of a reconciliation and if he knows what efforts have been made toward obtaining a reconciliation?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, if the evidence in this case is properly reported in the report of the committee of the other place, we have here a marriage in which the woman —I was going to say was in her autumn years but it would be impolite to refer to a lady's age in that fashion—was in the late summer of life. In other words, these people were not youngsters when they married. The hon. member is perfectly right when he pointed out they did live together less than a year. In that time apparently they could not strike accord. The evidence was that the husband was drinking and on one occasion she entered the front door and he went out the back door with another woman. I suppose they established their incompatibility early. The standard question about reconciliation was asked in this case and what I perhaps could describe as the standard answer was given to the effect that she did not feel it would be possible to reconcile with him.

I do not know what efforts are made in these cases to effect a reconciliation. In this case the evidence does not say that a minister or friend of the family was called in to assist this couple to get together. That might have happened but it does not appear in the record.

Mr. Regier: Were there any detectives in this case? If so, how many detectives were there? Who were they?

Mr. McCleave: There were detectives in this case; once again the firm of Wiseman and Wiseman.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks made by the sponsor of the bill. I realize something of the difficulty he has when as the sponsor of these bills he has to spend so much of his time reading all the information that comes to him in order to properly discharge his responsibility. The evidence contains the following question:

> How long did you know your husband before you married him?

As recorded at page 10 of the evidence the reply was as follows:

> I went out with him for about a year before we were married.

The hon. member is perfectly right when he says these people were no longer young. The woman is 40 so she must have been about 36 or 37 when she began going out with this man. She went out with him for a whole year and then she married him and almost immediately they found that married life was extremely difficult. I should like to call the hon. member's atention to page 11 of the evidence where Senator Thorvaldson asked the woman the following question:

> You couldn't take what, his late nights, the fact of him coming home late?

The reply was as follows:

> Carrying on with other women . . . I couldn't live with a man who was going out with other women and carrying on.

This indicates a continuing process of misconduct on the husband's part. It is most unusual that this should be referred to as a continuing error or transgression. She had known him and gone out with him for a year before the marriage and less than a year after the marriage she referred to his behaviour in this fashion. Again she was asked the following questions and gave the following answers with respect to the possibility of a reconciliation as reported at page 11 of the evidence:

Q. Is there any chance of a reconciliation?
A. No.
Q. Would you forgive him?
A. No.

I wonder if the hon. member would care to comment on whether it is possible in his province and in most provinces of Canada to obtain a divorce when there has been little effort made toward reconciliation?

Mr. McCleave: Before answering the question, Mr. Chairman, may I point out the danger of discussing these cases in this house, in doing so we are using people's names and placing them on the public record whereas if we dealt with these matters in committee it could be done behind closed doors where some of these problems could be threshed out.

In reply to the hon. member's question I have found that the cases are very much the same in provincial courts in my experience. The hon. member wants to know if there is any machinery requiring efforts at reconciliation. In these cases from time to time you will find a man or woman who has encountered marital difficulty because the other party has been unfaithful and yet in a decent desire to preserve the marriage the individual enlists the aid of a minister, social worker, close friend or sometimes a psychiatrist to attempt to get to the bottom of the problem and find out what is wrong but there is no compulsion on people to do so. If people want to disagree they cannot be compelled to agree and live out their lives fighting with each other.

SAMUEL JACK GOLDBERG

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-158, for the relief of Samuel Jack Goldberg—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two brief questions on this bill. I appreciate that it may not be a good practice to place people's names and incidents on the public record but I am more particularly concerned about the question of the evidence and the surrounding circumstances relating to the acceptance of these by the committees of the other house. My questions will follow the same pattern as before with respect to the acceptability of the evidence and the manner in which it was collected in an effort to ascertain if there appeared to be some organizations or individuals who make their entire livelihood out of appearing as professional witnesses in these cases. Was the evidence in this instance obtained by what we classify as private detectives and, if so, would you indicate who they were?

Mr. McCleave: In this case there was one private detective named Etheridge who appears quite frequently in divorce cases before committees of the other place. There must always be corroborating evidence under the rules of the other house and in this instance the corroborating witness was the husband.

Mr. Howard: Was the scene of the alleged adultery on commercial premises and, if so, would the hon. member care to comment on this?

Mr. McCleave: No, the scene in this particular case was the correspondent's apartment.

Mr. Howard: With respect to the evidence was it as a result of some one witnessing an incident or by reference from the circumstances surrounding it?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the answer to that is that the detective and the husband burst into the correspondent's apartment at a very early hour in the morning. I am a little reluctant to, but I will if I am compelled to, give some of the details. In this particular case, which was a contested case, and which was therefore very thoroughly before the Senate committee, what they found, as the hon. member will find in the evidence, is that the wife was caught in one of the rooms of the apartment in a state of undress.

Mr. Howard: I will not press any farther on that. Are there any children? If so, in whose custody do they remain? What are the financial circumstances so far as caring for the children is concerned?

Mr. McCleave: There is one child who will now be approximately two years old. I would have to refer again to the evidence. I do not have it immediately at hand. There is some support given by the husband to the wife in which case I assume it is for the child's interest, although that is only an assumption.

I would have to go further into the evidence of this case to give the details.

BEATRICE CLAIRE CARMICHAEL GLAS

The house in committee on Bill SD-159, for the relief of Beatrice Claire Carmichael Glas —Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Peters: In this case I notice that the Wisemans are again involved as private detectives. I also notice that there are some discrepancies in the evidence. Did the Senate give any consideration to this matter of private detectives and the value of their evidence? I think it is safe to say that if any collusion or agreement was arrived at before this divorce, obviously the House of Commons cannot pass this bill. It would at least cause suspicion to know that the Wiseman partners have been in three of the bills that we have been discussing in the last few minutes. It is also surprising, when you read their evidence, to find out how similar the circumstances are in each case. It would appear to me that evidence given in this manner by professional witnesses should be supported certainly and strongly in other respects than just the testimony of those detectives, because, as the witness says, this is the way he makes his living. The similarity is quite pronounced, Mr. Chairman, when the same detectives act in various cases. I should like to know whether consideration was given to this type of evidence in the Senate committee?

Mr. McCleave: First, I never thought that in the House of Commons I would be defending private detectives, but I think there is probably a simple explanation why the name is brought in, in cases which come so close together. This was probably Wiseman day in the subcommittee of the other place that heard those cases. As hon. members know, they do not appear in an unusual number of cases, although they do appear in a fair number of them. However, I believe it is the practice, since the transporting of detectives from Montreal to Ottawa must be one of the expenses borne by the parties, to bring those cases on at the same time. We do know that they have other expenses as well. They probably arrange to bring up several cases in the subcommittees of the other place involving those particular firms of detectives. I think you will find that pattern. You will get a few cases in which another firm of detectives plays a prominent role.

The hon. member has referred to what he calls discrepancies in their evidence and then he says that their evidence is very much of a pattern. In reviewing the case I did notice that there were some minor variations in the evidence of the two detectives, which I think would normally be expected in the circumstances. This happens to be a motel case. They were not in the motel for any great length of time.

Mr. Peters: When I mentioned discrepancies this is what I had in mind. First he said that it was at the Royal motel in Montreal. Then, he went on to say that they proceeded to cabin No. 12, and then a little later he said something about a hotel room.

Mr. McCleave: That may be the geographical layout of this particular motel.

Mr. Peters: In this particular case, may I ask what was the evidence that would constitute adultery? As I read the evidence, it talks about certain stages of undress, and there is the insinuation that the bed had been slept in and two pillows had been rumpled up. In your opinion, Mr. Chairman, does that constitute adultery, or is further proof necessary?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether my own particular opinion would be very helpful to the committee but I can give you the methods that the courts use to determine whether adultery has been committed, and, of course, the committee of the other place has tended to adopt the practice as laid down in the standard divorce practice of the courts in provinces which have divorce jurisdiction. In the 250 cases that I have read this session and in some 150 that I read last session it was very rare that the couple were caught in the actual act of adultery. Of some 350 to 400 cases, the evidence of which I personally read, I cannot recall at the moment more than five in which the couple was caught flagrante delicto. The committee, I think, take the position that if all the circumstances of the case can be read one way, on the balance of probability that it is more probable that the couple committed adultery than that they did not, then that is their finding. They do not require that the evidence adduced in those cases go as far as the same burden of proof that is required in criminal cases; that is, proof beyond a reasonable doubt. It must be not overwhelming evidence; it must be strong evidence that points more to the probability they committed adultery than that they did not.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in this particular case was there any request for further proof, or was the burden of proof satisfied?

Mr. McCleave: No. The evidence, Mr. Chairman, outside of the two detectives, was the evidence of the woman herself, which, of course, could not go to establish adultery. It simply went to establish what kind of life they were having together—I am not going to say enjoying together; this was certainly not the case in this particular action. For example, the husband stayed out week ends and over night and when asked his whereabouts he told her to mind her own business and tend to her affairs as a mother and he would look after his own business. He was very brutal. He hit her and struck her and even went so far apparently as to hit a child with a steel poker, and he tore her hair. That was some of the evidence of the disgruntled wife about conditions with her husband.

Mr. Peters: In all these cases there has been a similarity, particularly where professional investigators are employed. In no case are they ever asked for a search warrant or are they ever denied right of entry. Surprisingly enough, in every case they are allowed to enter the room without much objection. Has it not come to the attention of the members of the other place that this is not normal procedure to follow in a case of this nature, particularly where there is a chain on the door or something of that nature? Is it not surprising that no warrants are ever used or needed in cases where private detectives are employed? It appears to me that in a number of these cases there is collusion. I think it is very significant that in no case has a search warrant been used.

Mr. McCleave: I will answer the point about search warrants first. It is extremely difficult to track down adultery and you seize upon evidence if you are lucky enough to get it. In such circumstances it would be extremely difficult to obtain a search warrant if you suspected something was going on at a certain place. By the time you went through the legal procedure of obtaining a search warrant the motel would have been readied for another customer.

With respect to the second point about collusion, I am going to be frank about the matter. I know that any judge in a provincial court dealing with these matters goes through a great deal of mind searching and I am sure the same is true of hon. members of the other place. You are bothered all the time by these things. That is not true of all cases but in a fair proportion your suspicion is aroused. If you could only take one case and pin the thing down so you could say that you knew it was wrong that would be one thing but you do not get quite that far. You can say that you have looked at a case and you think there must be something wrong but the difficulty is that you are not sure.

There is another rule of thumb which is followed although probably it should not be. Those who consider these matters look into the circumstances of the case and if the wife has been badly abused by the husband and it is better that the divorce be granted for that reason they perhaps do not inquire too much further. They are satisfied to accept the motel or hotel formula and give the woman the relief she is asking for.

FRANCIS ALLAN QUINN

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-160, for the relief of Francis Allan Quinn—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: I should like to know with respect to this bill whether the corroboration was provided by private detectives and who they were.

Mr. McCleave: The answer is no. In this case the wife had lived with another man for nine years and evidence of neighbours was brought in to support the application.

Mr. Howard: Was the same evidence—I would not call it proof—of adultery given as in the other cases dealt with so far, namely, that it was a matter of implication from the facts? I take it that in this case the lady had lived with the gentleman for some period of years and that you would normally expect adultery to have taken place under those circumstances.

Mr. McCleave: I have marked this case down as one of the simplest types. The lady leaves her husband and lives with another person. While no direct evidence of adultery is usually given in such cases, there is little reason to doubt it when they have lived together as man and wife for nine years, and the situation was so regarded in this particular case.

Mr. Howard: Are there any children in this instance?

Mr. McCleave: No issue of this marriage.

Mr. Fisher: There are a couple of specific questions I wish to ask.

An hon. Member: Twelve minutes to go.

Mr. Chown: An insincere filibuster.

Mr. Bigg: Friends of the people.

Mr. Howard: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his remark relating to insincerity.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think that is a parliamentary term and I will have to ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Chown: I am very glad to do so. I was referring not to an individual but to the group.

Mr. Bigg: Would you like me to withdraw my remark? I said you were friends of the people.

Mr. Fisher: I think the gentleman in question has quite merited in the house the nickname I understand he has in his own particular area. In connection with this bill I should like to ask the chairman of the standing committee if the suggestion was made in the other place that there has been a change in the arrangements in Quebec whereby the wife is now permitted to obtain what I believe amounts to a separation certificate when adultery is a factor in the same way that a husband can. Would this open the way for people from the two provinces involved to present such certificates and thus enable divorces to be granted through parliament without the necessity of evidence being presented to the other place or this house?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I will have to ask the hon. member to come back to this particular bill.

Mr. Fisher: I am coming to it now. In connection with this bill or any other bills in this group was such a certificate presented or has such a certificate been presented in the past?

Mr. McCleave: I believe that has happened in a few cases although not in this one. Actually I believe it is the separation agreement itself which is presented but unless parliament or the subcommittees of the other place decide to change their modus operandi such certificate could not properly be received in evidence as proof of adultery.

Mr. Fisher: I gather from examining the records of the other place in connection with divorce bills that it has not been the custom of members of the other place who are practicing Roman Catholics to take any part in the activities of these committees. In connection with this bill and the other bills has the chairman of the standing committee noticed this same situation or have members of the committee taken part in its activities regardless of their religion?

Mr. McCleave: I have made it a point never to inquire into a person's religion, so I cannot answer that.

JAMES ROSS MACLAREN PAUL

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-161, for the relief of James Ross MacLaren Paul—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: I believe that the chairman of the committee who has had these divorce bills in charge has demonstrated his knowledge of these bills, so I think we are quite prepared to allow the remainder of the bills to be reported, with the exception of the Klasman case, which we would ask to stand.

Mr. McCleave: Since that case is a contentious one, I admit, I have no objection if it stands.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the unanimous consent of the committee that the balance of the bills be considered together, with the exception of Bill No. SD-129, which shall be allowed to stand?

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, before the bill carries I wonder if the hon. member for Timiskaming would permit a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the question relate to the bills?

Mr. Drysdale: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Timiskaming says no.

Mr. Drysdale: I am very surprised. I thought they were always ready to answer any question.

Mr. Broome: I think the house owes a debt to the C.C.F. party for having gone rather thoroughly—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I shall ask the hon. member to please resume his seat. We are on clause 1 of the divorce bill.

Mr. Broome: I have a few questions to ask on this group of bills. I should like the chairman to tell me whether in any of the group there are any children involved, and in which cases there are children involved. I shall have further questions to ask.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee agreed to take these bills all together. I think it would be impossible for any person to give an answer on all these bills.

Mr. Broome: On a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: If the committee did not wish to take them together, they did not have to agree to it.

Mr. Broome: The committee agreed to take them all together, but that does not prohibit a member from asking questions with regard to the bills, simply because they are considered en bloc.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member should say as to what bill he is asking the question.

Mr. Broome: I have. I am asking if there are any children involved in any of these bills in this bloc before the committee.

Mr. McCleave: The answer to that is yes.

Mr. Broome: In which cases?

Mr. McCleave: Next year, Mr. Chairman, if I am invested with this responsibility, when I appear before this committee I am going to bring a chart which will be subdivided into these 14 or 15 points on which members seem to be interested. If the committee wanted, I could go through them all and point out those cases in which children are involved, and I would find that out by looking at the evidence which, of course, anyone else is at liberty to do.

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. member for Timiskaming refused to answer a question, so I should like to ask it of the chairman of the divorce committee. Reference was made to the fact that photographic evidence was permitted in certain provinces. I wonder if the chairman could advise me as to what provinces photographic evidence is permitted, and what is the nature of the photographic evidence?

Mr. McCleave: I think the short answer to that is that the hon. member who raised the question should consult one of the standard authorities on divorce, such as Mr. Kent Power. I am not a divorce expert. I do not know the evidentiary laws of the provinces in Canada. When I practised at the bar of Nova Scotia, it was sometimes difficult to find out the particular evidentiary laws of that province.

Mr. Drysdale: Does the chairman know whether or not photographic evidence is permissible, because the hon. member for Timiskaming referred to the fact that there were several provinces which permitted photographic evidence in divorce cases. I was wondering if the chairman was apprised of any province that permitted this particular type of evidence?

Mr. McCleave: I must raise a point of order on this question concerning the practice in provincial divorce courts. I do not think that is something I should answer.

Mr. Drysdale: I think it has a great deal of importance because the hon. member for Timiskaming put on the public record the statement that certain provinces allow this type of evidence.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to remind the hon. member that the divorce cases which come before this committee come from only two provinces, and have nothing to do with the other provinces in Canada.

Mr. Drysdale: In that case, I think there should be some clarification as to whether or not these two provinces permit this type of evidence. An implication has been left by the hon. member that insufficient evidence is being adduced to justify these divorces. If, of course, photographs are not permitted, and I do not think they are, then I think there is an unjustified implication that the members of the divorce committee are being too lax in allowing these particular divorce bills through. I think that point should be clarified on the record, since hon. members to your left seem to be quite anxious to get these matters on the record.

Mr. McCleave: Perhaps I could answer that. I thought that the hon. members had asked me a particular question with reference to a couple of cases to find out if there had been any photographic evidence in those cases. There has been none produced in these cases of which I am aware, except pictures of the erring wife or husband. I cannot recall any particular case in which there was an attempt to produce other photographic evidence which was discussed by the committee of the other place.

Mr. Creaghan: I wonder if the chairman of the committee would indicate to me how many of these bills originate in the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. McCleave: I think the answer is about four or five. There were two at the last session, and I think there are four of five at this session.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Civil service commission—

77. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $3,434,161.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a few words in connection with the civil service and its relationship to members of parliament.

During recent weeks there have been a number of misunderstandings between the civil service and members of parliament, which I feel is a great shame because we are dependent on each other to a very great extent, perhaps more than most people realize. I think perhaps the people in the government service do not realize the influence they have on the life of a member of parliament. So far as the public is concerned, every action taken by a member of the government service, every letter written and every decision made, is laid right on the doorstep of the member. A curt letter written on a hot summer day, poor judgment exercised by an official or an inspector, long delays in answering inquiries, an impatient or perhaps supercilious manner of treatment of a member of the public who has a complaint, all fall back on the member concerned who has to take the brunt of any of these indiscretions and the difficulties which may arise as a result thereof.

Members of the government service may not at times realize the importance of their actions to the members concerned. To the public the government is one being; it does not matter whether a cabinet minister, deputy minister, inspector, secretary in the office or a member of parliament is concerned; everything done on behalf of the government is done by one body. That is why I feel that an efficient government service is so very necessary to members of this house.

I would like to carry this thought one step further. Every minister of the crown is responsible for every person in his department; he must be able to rely upon everything done by such people and he must, I believe, feel that those in his department are loyal to him and to the people who have elected him.

I would like to say a word about the criticisms that civil servants have been loafing on the job. Examples of such people can no doubt be found in any large organization including the government service—that is inevitable. But in all fairness, I wonder how many of these people who have nothing to do are in this position because they have not been given anything to do. This may be because their immediate superior is away and perhaps much of this mushrooming in the government service over the war years has probably resulted from similar conditions. Until such time as the service gets back to normal I have no doubt that there will be many people who have nothing to do but who are nevertheless willing to work.

With respect to the effort made in past years to prevent government servants from becoming politically influenced, this has created an artificial barrier between members of parliament and the government service and I think it has gone too far. It has created too many difficulties and something should be done to remedy this situation. I think it is fair to say that at the moment a good many government employees—and this probably applies in the civil service commission—feel that members of parliament are meddlers who are trying to find positions in the government service for people whom they wish to help for political reasons. In many cases the member of parliament is actually the only person who knows those involved, but this problem has reached the stage where many members of the government service are afraid to be seen talking to a member of parliament unless he happens to be on official government business.

I feel that this whole situation is not political, it is not a question of a member of parliament belonging to one party or another, but it is rather a case of an organizational difficulty brought about by a desire to prevent undue political influence. This method of handling the situation has actually created an even greater difficulty. I think in cases where government employees have occasion to deal with individual members they find us to be fair and reasonable people and on the other hand members have found individual public servants to be sincere and anxious to do a good job. As groups, however, we do find a barrier between us, whereas we should be working together for the good of Canada.

It is, of course, true that the civil service is in a difficult position. Generally speaking, people employed in the government service are professional men and women. They are employees of the crown and they must be loyal to the department by which they are employed and they often find it very difficult to go outside of that department for assistance with respect to their difficulties. It is for this reason that I think it is important that civil service organizations and associations should present their difficulties and problems to the government in the very strongest way.

In closing, I would like to read a quotation from the national defence employees' association news letter of July, 1958, which contains the following statement on this problem:

> However, federation president F. W. Whitehouse indicated the willingness of federation representatives at all times to meet with members of parliament or a select committee to assist in maintaining the efficiency of the public service.

I think this is the spirit in which we should attempt to iron out the difficulties which have arisen. There is no doubt that there is justification for the things which have been said, but at the same time there are reasons for those things having been said. I would urge the government to give consideration to the problems and suggestions I have outlined.

Mr. Lambert: I have a few remarks to make on the qualifications required by the civil service. In this connection I have received a number of representations before and since I have been a member of parliament concerning the difficulties experienced by a number of men in this country with respect to qualifying for the civil service because of what is felt to be a rather narrow restriction under the veterans statutory preference.

Now there is no denial that the men in the armed services who have come back from war should have every opportunity to rehabilitate themselves, and undoubtedly the principle of rehabilitation must be given very serious consideration when we are selecting candidates for the public service of this country. However, one realizes that during this past war there were hundreds and thousands of men who because of no fault of their own since they were instructors or because they were retained for one reason or another did not go beyond the confines of this country. If I am correct in my interpretation of the statutory preference they are in a second category and cannot qualify.

I feel that perhaps the commission in reviewing the civil service framework might now consider enlarging the scope of the statutory preference to include these men, who have a lot of skills which they could offer to the public service of this country. After all, we do not find this restriction imposed by most—I cannot say by all because I may not have all the information—of the provincial and municipal governments. The effort of the men who served in this country was in many instances just as efficacious in prosecuting a victorious campaign during the last war as that of the men who proceeded overseas and I feel they should have an opportunity to serve the public of Canada in the federal civil service. Why there should be any differentiation between the federal civil service and any provincial civil service I have yet to discover. I offer this as a suggestion. There may be arguments which would indicate that the present policy is the correct one, but I offer this for serious consideration.

In addition, for the past number of years there has been a large number of immigrants to this country, people who have come from the British Isles and other allied countries and who, in many cases, have served along with our service men. Many are professional people of various kinds; they have many skills, and I believe they would be eminently qualified in many cases to serve in the public service of this country but, again, they are excluded, although they are accepted in the civil services of the provinces and of the large municipal governments. I would again suggest that these men who come to this country should have the opportunity to qualify for the federal civil service, and I commend this proposal especially to the commission when considering its recruiting policy.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to say a few words on this question of the civil service before the vote is carried. I begin by referring to some of the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Edmonton West in his suggestion to the minister and to the civil service commission that perhaps the question of veterans preference should be carefully examined in the light of the conditions that have developed since the end of the war.

I recognize, as I am sure do all hon. members, that he has raised a problem which is of some importance. This question of veterans preference with regard to the civil service is, of course, a diminishing one because so many of the positions have age limits attached to them and veterans are getting older. But I certainly hope that in any consideration given to this problem the legitimate interest of veterans and especially of disabled veterans, who certainly deserve every kind of preference they can get, will not be interfered with. Of course, I do not suggest for a moment that the hon. member had such a thing in mind when he spoke.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka had some interesting things to say about the civil service generally. If I venture to follow him and speak on this matter it is not only because of my position in the house but because I had the honour of working in the civil service for 20 years, from 1928 to 1948, in which year I left the civil service, not for the reason indicated by the Prime Minister the other night but for the very opposite reason.

Speaking, then, as a former civil servant I think I can say that the civil service of Canada has gained a reputation second to none among the civil services of any free country in the world for integrity, efficiency and loyalty. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said that if there is loafing —I think that was the word he used—in the civil service it was due to the fact that insufficient work was being passed on to those particular civil servants affected by this disease. It certainly does not affect any of us in the House of Commons this year. In my own experience of 20 years in the government department over which I later had the honour to preside, we did not suffer at all from the disease of loafing, indeed if there was anything which was wrong with that department it was that the officials were more often overworked than they were underworked.

The hon. member also mentioned the fact that a barrier sometimes develops between members of the public service and members of parliament. That may well be true, and it is not surprising, I think, that there should be a feeling of that kind in the minds of some members of parliament because officials, if they are loyal to their obligations, have to be careful in their relationship toward members of the political service. My own experience in the department over which I once presided—and I think it is an experience which has been shared by other ministers—was that members of the public service must be very careful to help members of parliament in any way they can, irrespective of the party to which those members belong, in respect to the giving of factual information, but there is always a difficulty developing when a member of the public service is asked to express opinions, even privately, or to give information which may go a little beyond the factual. Perhaps I am not the person who should emphasize that possible danger because it should not be one which could cause any harm to any member of parliament on the opposition side. But there is that possibility and because of that I think there always will be a species of official barrier between the civil servant and—if I may call him that—the political servant.

Mr. Chairman, in 1950 I had the honour of speaking to the professional institute of the civil service of Canada and if I may I should like to place on Hansard some of the words I used at that time because they describe exactly the way I feel now. In addressing them I said:

> In selecting persons for employment in the service of the Canadian government we have sought—

And I am sure the same situation prevails now—

> —to secure not only the highest standards of efficiency and competence but also the highest standards of integrity. Because we have, with surprisingly few exceptions, found for our service people who possess this quality of integrity, we are confident that they are capable of withstanding the temptations to which people in positions of official trust are peculiarly subject.

I proceeded to say:

> But however efficient the civil servant may be, however industrious, however underpaid,—

In relation perhaps to the salary he could command if he were not in the civil service—

> —I do not suppose you will ever be able to erase completely from the limited minds of some people the distorted picture of the "bureaucrat" as an indolent person, conceived in influence and born in politics, who fattens at the public trough; and works a couple of hours a day winding and unwinding red tape.

I concluded with these words:

> I have, of course, had some experience with the strangling effect of a literal and cautious observance of all the fussy niceties and formalities of official procedures. But I have also learned that, at times, there is one thing far more delaying and destructive than red tape; that is misguided and premature efforts to cut across wise and well established administrative rules. You can, I suppose, get more toothpaste more quickly by squeezing the top of the tube. The result is messy and wasteful.

I said then, and I feel the same now:

> I do not, therefore take seriously the recurring joke about the complexities and delays of public administration, and I know that we have every reason in Canada to be proud of our public service.

One reason for which we can show pride in our public service is the loyalty of its members to the government of the day which is the very basis of the existence of a non-partisan civil service, its obligation of loyalty to the government of the day whatever government may be in power. That means not being loyal to one political party or to a group of persons who may come and go but to the state itself as represented by the government of the day. I am quite sure that Canadian civil servants will recognize that obligation in the future as they have in the past.

The civil service has obligations under the Civil Service Act but it also has rights under that legislation. One of the rights it possesses under that act is the right of independence from political pressure. One of the obligations it has under the act is to give loyal and devoted service to the government in power. It also has the right under the act, I believe, to hope for promotion in accordance with merit.

One of my hon. friends to my right raised some questions this afternoon about the promotion policy inside the civil service. I recognize that that is a very important matter in connection with morale which in turn is important in terms of efficiency. The hon. gentleman was basing his remarks in part on the observations of Professor John Deutsch who himself was a distinguished civil servant for many years. He thought perhaps promotions were not quick enough for those who were young and gifted and that this might in a sense militate against the hope that all civil servants have for a successful career. In pursuing that argument the hon. member made some remarks about the advantages Rhodes scholars seem to have in the civil service. I shall say nothing about that for I am quite sure that the Rhodes scholars will be defended efficiently and vigorously in this house by the two hon. members of the cabinet who, if I am not wrong, were once Rhodes scholars themselves. However, I do agree that unless there can be established and preserved the feeling and hope in the civil service that promotion is open to all based on merit and one that will not be held back by any consideration except that of efficiency, it will be bad for morale inside the service. I can only close this portion of my remarks on this subject by expressing the general hope that the civil service will operate in the future as in the past and I can say nothing better about it than that.

Before taking my seat I should like to ask the minister a question. I understand that a rather comprehensive reorganization of the civil service commission is being undertaken at the present time by the chief of the civil service commission who, if I may say so, I am very glad to see on the floor of the house tonight in his third capacity in recent years. I should like to ask the minister if he could give the house some information as to how that reorganization which will be an extremely important one indeed is proceeding and in particular I wish to know whether in that examination consideration is being given to the possibility of separating the foreign service in some respects from the civil service and bringing it under a foreign service act.

When I say that consideration might be given to this I am not thinking, of course, of taking the foreign service out of the civil service in the sense that it should not be maintained as a professional service outside politics. I do not want anything like that to happen to it. Whatever may be its control I think it must remain as non-partisan as is the civil service. However, I happen to know from experience that conditions which govern the operations of the foreign service, especially of those members of it who have to work abroad, are so very different from the conditions which govern work and service in Canada that very often the regulations which are right for a civil servant working at home are not applicable in any reasonable way to a civil servant working abroad. Therefore this matter which I know has been brought up once or twice in the past is an important one. The question is whether or not we should have a foreign service act governing the operations of the foreign service based on the same principles as the Civil Service Act. Perhaps the minister might have something to say about that when he replies. Meanwhile I shall simply repeat what I said a moment ago that I am very privileged to be on my feet this evening paying my humble tribute to the work of the Canadian civil servant.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss a question which has been a problem in the Department of the Secretary of State for a number of years but before embarking on that I should, in view of the rather curious remarks that have been made by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that the government of this country represents the state, point out that I have always believed the constitutional position to be that the crown represented the state.

In regard to the hon. member for Edmonton West I may state that I know from my personal experience he has maintained a continuing interest in the welfare of veterans. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that his remarks this evening were fully in keeping with this traditional keen interest in the welfare of the veterans of this country.

The point I wish to raise is one that has been drawn to my attention by labour union officials in my constituency concerning a situation which causes them grave concern particularly in the winter months. They have advised me that some of the civil service personnel and armed forces personnel in Saskatoon have been taking employment in their spare time as painters, carpenters and work in other fields with the result that the regular employees in these trades have lost job opportunities. The union officials have also pointed out, Mr. Chairman, that this practice tends to depress wage rates in the trades affected; they say it has enabled some unscrupulous employers to undercut regular rates of wages and contracts.

These moon-lighters can and do work at less than regular rates of pay. They can do this because they already have jobs for which they are paid out of the public treasury. In some instances, no employer is involved because in some cases the contract is taken up directly by the civil service personnel or the armed forces personnel with the householders to do painting, carpentry work, and so on. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this matter should be looked into in order that ways and means may be found to prevent regular workers being placed at this disadvantage. In this connection I hope that the experience that the department has had in other years with this problem will not prevent them from taking a new and realistic look at this particular problem that is being raised here.

I certainly agree, Mr. Chairman, that there is a problem of conflict in that it is thought that the government of Canada should not interfere with the private lives of individuals it employs and it is a difficult problem to reconcile those opposing points of view. It is my hope that the Secretary of State will inquire into this matter to see what can be done and also to bring it to the attention of the Minister of National Defence in order that some sort of satisfactory solution can be worked out so that regular employees in those trades will not suffer the disadvantage I have mentioned.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I heard the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) say that he was not responsible for the civil service commission but that he was the spokesman of the house to the civil service commission. I take note of his statement and, if it is true that he is the spokesman of the house to the civil service commission, I am sure that he will ask the officials of this body to kindly take under careful consideration the suggestions made by hon. members.

For years, the Conservative party, as well as the Liberal party, have had nothing but commendation for the civil service commission, its higher as well as its minor officials. I believe that everyone recognizes that the civil service commission is well administered and that civil servants behave as they should. As it is, by some strange coincidence, no sooner did the Conservative government come into power that certain decisions of the civil service commission were no longer quite in accord with past decisions. In fact, some time ago, I put a question to the Secretary of State concerning applications for employment. The Secretary of State knows about it since I have discussed the matter with him on several occasions. I feel keenly about this problem and I am anxious to see it solved for I feel that this new decision will prevent hundreds, if not thousands of people who would like to work for the civil service commission to put in an application and to take the required examinations, thereby losing a chance to get a job with the civil service commission.

That situation is all the more important as it affects more particularly the electors of the Secretary of State since, according to the reasons he has given for the implementation of that new policy, people living in far away and isolated localities could suffer the most from that change of policy on the part of the civil service commission.

This has to do, as everyone knows, with the applications made for a competition which may be held in 5, 6 or 8 months. The Secretary of State has told us that such applications are returned to candidates who are informed that they are no longer accepted unless a competition is open and that they may learn about the date of the next examination by reading the newspapers or looking up the advertisements posted in public buildings.

Thus, if six or twelve months go by before an examination is held, that means the poor candidate has to buy the newspaper—La Presse, or whatever other newspapers interest him particularly—just to make sure that he does not miss the advertisement when it appears. The hon. Secretary of State surely knows that the civil service examinations are not advertised in the weeklies of Labelle constituency—unless the Secretary of State's influence has penetrated that far. It is only rarely that such advertisements appear in the Echo de la Lièvre or the other weeklies so well known to the Secretary of State.

The hon. Secretary of State replied that they stopped publication because there were too many applications, 40 per day; yet, on the other hand, he claims that he wants to improve the standard of the commission's work, and thus to make the personnel more productive. Well, I can hardly think of a more important service to the public than giving them this information, and making it easier for them to compete in all these examinations.

The hon. Secretary of State extricated himself in a vague way by saying that the applications are often of a general nature. But it is not these that are involved—rather it is a question of applications of a specific nature, such as when a candidate applies for work as a postman in the Post Office Department. What is the cost to the civil service commission in terms of work, or services, or literature, or correspondence to file the application and reply to the applicant: "Dear Sir, I have received your application, and you will be notified when the examination is to be held". The civil service commission is well aware that there are slips, all made up in advance which are sent to the applicant, and when the examination is held, the candidate receives a notice and has only to report for examination at the place and time mentioned in the notice.

I am wondering therefore why this public service has been eliminated. If it is true that 40 people apply for jobs every day and that those applications are returned, it means that by the end of the year a total of 14,600 will have unsuccessfully applied for a position with the civil service commission, and I say this is an insult and an injustice to these people. What will happen is that when competitions are held, there will not be enough candidates, and it will indeed be difficult to fill all the vacancies because you must not forget that, for the Post Office Department alone, when a competition was held, out of 400 people approximately applying during the year, only about 200 of them succeeded. These people were put on an eligible list; the ones on top of the list were hired first and then the others in order, until the list was exhausted. What is easier, fairer and more logical for the applicants? You take it from me that the next time the Post Office Department holds an examination, there will not be 40 applicants. Indeed, nobody will be aware that a position of clerk is open at the Post Office, and you will have to hold examinations monthly to obtain an adequately sized staff to give the efficient service the public is asking for, the kind of service it is entitled to get from the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department.

We are told this is done in order to save the salaries of one or two grade I clerks at $2,000 each or a total of $4,000. But these two employees still cannot be dispensed with, as they will now be busy answering applicants whose requests cannot be accepted. Therefore this will not reduce the expenditures of this department. As a matter of fact these $4,000 will help in all fairness the 14,000 persons who apply for work at the civil service commission; besides, a period of unemployment is hardly the time to reduce the staff.

Has the hon. Secretary of State, like his colleague the hon. Postmaster General, the intention to replace labour by electronic machines? The Secretary of State should not expect two mail deliveries a day, as promised by the Postmaster General when he was in the opposition. You will have only one delivery a day, as in the past, because the election is also a thing of the past. Moreover, as the riding of Labelle is somewhat far away, the announcement of a competition will arrive one or two days late, because there will be no second mail delivery, whatever the hon. Secretary of State may say.

As to the notices posted in public buildings you hardly imagine, Mr. Chairman, that a would-be applicant living in Ste. Anne du Lac would walk 32 miles every two or three days to the Labelle post-office, in order to see whether there will be a competition, so that he may file his application. With all due respect, I submit that such conditions are nonsensical; this is cheese-paring economy. I will even go further and say that it is not an economy, since you will keep the same personnel. In fact, the number of employees has increased. This is no time to cut down staff, especially to deprive the public of one of the most useful services.

I suggest that any Canadian has a right to seek employment in the civil service, and if an applicant must rely solely on ads published in the newspapers or notices posted in public buildings, it makes no sense. That decision taken by the civil service commission is bad; it is mere cheese-paring economy

What will be the result of such a policy? The hon. Secretary of State will get hundreds of letters from people who want a job in the civil service, and he himself will have to establish files for all those people who wish to become civil servants.

Mr. Ricard: There won't be any lack of candidates, in such a case.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the spokesman for the civil service commission has heard the hon. member for St. Denis speak clearly enough for the commission to know that nobody likes such changes and that a year from now, or with the least possible delay, the commissioners will correct this unfair practice with regard to some fifteen thousand Canadian citizens who want to apply for work at the civil service commission.

(Text):

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few brief words on the subject of age. In this country today, as in most other western countries, we are facing a real social problem in the employment of what might be called middle aged citizens. It is ironic that in an effort to provide greater security at the end of life pensions plans brought into industry have made it very difficult for persons over 40 to secure employment. I just want to express the hope that when the commission investigates plans for reorganization of employment they will take into account the very serious question of making employment available to more older persons who may have come on the labour market through no reason of inefficiency and the possibility of their applying for employment in the civil service. One applicant came to me who had been turned down on account of age. The employer, he said, wanted someone with a master's degree, 20 years of experience and not over 23 years of age. That is an exaggeration, of course, but the problem does exist. I hope that the commission will take it into account in their planning.

Mr. Fisher: Before the minister answers the hon. member for St. Denis I should like to raise a question having to do with the reply that the minister made to the hon. member on July 2, as found at page 1832 of Hansard. I was particularly interested in the English translation of the last remark made that day by the minister when dealing with the question of the hon. member. The Secretary of State is credited with saying:

> It is a commission which was instituted by the former government, and I have to suffer the consequences.

I discovered this a short time ago and it does not seem to jibe with the statement made by the minister this afternoon which I looked at in the Hansard office. I wonder whether he would explain the change which seems to have taken place from the statement of July 2 to the one he made this afternoon.

Mr. Courtemanche: No, I did not change my mind. I should like to say that if the hon. member for St. Denis has some difficulty I have the same difficulty, but I am not responsible for the difficulty he has. The civil service commission is carrying out its own job and if we have some difficulty I am not responsible and neither is the hon. member for St. Denis. That is the explanation I gave on that date.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: May I ask the Secretary of State who is responsible for that situation? He tells us that he is the spokesman for the civil service commission. If he is the spokesman for the civil service commission, and if there is nothing he can do, he should not take it upon himself to present and explain the estimates of the civil service commission. Moreover, he says that the civil service commission was instituted by the former government. I believe the Secretary of State makes a slight mistake. The civil service commission was created more than 22 years ago. If the Secretary of State remembers well, the civil service commission exercised its authority throughout the country when the Conservative government was in power. The answer of the Secretary of State, besides being inaccurate, is far from being gratifying. After all, he says that as it is the work of the former government, we must suffer the consequences. If, for instance, the number of unemployed people has doubled, are we to suffer the consequences? You made the whole election campaign by promising that you would improve the situation. Well, improve it.

Mr. Courtemanche: The hon. member for St. Denis says 22 years. I shall go further and I tell him that the civil service commission was set up in 1918.

Mr. Denis: Yes, for Ottawa but not for the nine provinces.

Mr. Courtemanche: I have never suggested anything else. It was formed in 1918 and the two governments have always respected the authority of the civil service commission. It was purposely made free from political interference and if the day should come when this situation no longer obtains, this to my mind, would be most unfortunate.

Mr. Deschatelets: Could the Secretary of State obtain from the two officials sitting in front of him the exact date when the commission changed its policy with regard to those examinations? I would also like to know if, before adopting this new attitude, the civil service commission had communicated with the then secretary of state?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that the commission changed its method of receiving applications about three months ago. Now, if that new procedure proves inefficient, the commissioners will come back to the former method. I am told that the civil service commission receives more than 13,000 applications per month. As a general rule, such applications are classified so as to be kept for later reference. If a competition is open, it is easy for the commission to notify the applicants.

Mr. Denis: So as to clarify that matter, may I add this: I am not talking about a person sending a general application but about a person applying for a particular position in a given department, a position for which that person would be called upon to compete if there was an examination. The Secretary of State has been a private member of parliament and he knows that the Post Office Department hires about a hundred persons in a year. If a competition is advertised for three or four days only in the newspapers, not enough candidates will apply. What will happen is that, instead of having four hundred candidates, you will have about 40 and out of these perhaps as many as 20 or 25 will fail. This means that for the Postmaster General there would be only fifteen qualified applicants and that, in a month's time, new notices would have to be sent out and new examinations held. This is very dangerous in a different way. In fact, when an examination is about to be announced by the commission, civil servants themselves and their relatives are the first to know about it. If this new policy is kept up, in twenty years' time the civil service will be solely a huge family affair, made up of so and so's cousins and his sisters and his aunts, for those would be the only ones to know that a job is open and an examination is to be held.

In my opinion, it would be in the general interest that this decision be reconsidered. The Secretary of State said that he is only spokesman for the commission; consequently, he can admit with me that this decision is a mistake. It is human to make a mistake. It could be that all this was only an experiment. In that case, I think the experiment has already lasted long enough.

I have here seven applications that were returned. I am sure that when a further competition is held those applicants will not be notified or, if the competition is advertised, they will forget to read the papers. You cannot ask these people to scan the newspaper for months on end, so as not to miss their chance to compete for some job. This applies to all hon. members. Everyone of us receives applications that we have to put on file. If we have to do the work of the civil service commission so as to save work for two clerks who, in any case, have to answer the would-be competitors that their applications are declined, it is hardly worth the trouble. In fact, the commission is not saving a cent. Not only does it fail to serve the public, but it is doing an injustice to thousands of people.

Mr. Deschatelets: A few moments ago, the Secretary of State did not answer the second part of my question. Did the civil service commission communicate with the Secretary of State before introducing the new procedure?

Mr. Courtemanche: The answer is no. I can however tell my hon. friend from St. Denis, after consulting my officials, that they are willing to reconsider the case he mentions and that they will see to the matter.

Mr. Gour: I congratulate my good friend the hon. member for St. Denis on having raised this matter. In the constituency I have the honour to represent, there are about 12,000 civil servants. In my opinion, this decision of the commission is contrary to its usual good administration. Prior to that, the civil service commission was beyond reproach. I think the increase in the number of applications is mainly due to the great number of unemployed now in Canada. I congratulate the Secretary of State on having consulted his officials and I believe their decision to reconsider this question goes to prove that they are intelligent and willing to try again after having realized they made a mistake.

I admire the Secretary of State who had the courage a moment ago to reaffirm that he will brook no political interference in the civil service. At present, as far as I am concerned and as far as I know—and I believe that I know much about it—we do not, in my opinion, give enough political freedom to civil servants. I am not in favour of having 150,000 employees in the civil service, either in the Department of Public Works or elsewhere, who are all intelligent men or women, and who cannot tell whether they are Conservatives, C.C.F'ers, Liberals or anything else. We live in a democratic country and if we want true democracy, it is not reasonable to prevent our civil servants from freely expressing their political opinions.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to give you an example. I have waged five electoral campaigns. Each time, at least 400 or 500 civil servants, from the Department of Public Works or from crown corporations, have spoken against me, against the party and even did organization work for my opponent. I have never denounced any one of them. There was even a civil servant who ran against me on behalf of another political party. He was a very likeable young man and the only thing I told him during the campaign was that, after the election, if he needed my assistance to get his job back, I would be glad to help him.

He came again to me and I made him the same offer.

The sister of one of the candidates, a woman who held a job as clerk grade III at the experimental farm—and a very competent one—campaigned against me for two months. She was holding down her job in the civil service and, in her spare time, she travelled around campaigning on behalf of her brother. After the election, several of my supporters came to me and requested that I report those people so they would lose their jobs. What did I say? I asked them if they themselves would like to lose their farm, their store or their job. They replied that they wouldn't like it. Well, I was surely not going to make them lose their job.

Civil service employees are entitled to their opinions. Naturally, I would not wish a civil servant to cry out on the roofs that he worked for such and such a department and that certain things go on in that department which he could unmask; his audience might believe these statements, even though he might be lying. I admit that civil servants have no right to go that far in politics; but, outside that, I have never caused anybody to lose his job. I have always said that if those were their ideas, they were free to come out in favour of one party or another.

What happened? All those people which my hon. friends wanted me to get discharged voted for me at the next election. I could tell new members that if they think they can make a civil servant lose his job because he did not work for them during the election campaign, they would be doing an injustice to that man. And if they make him lose his job they will lose a hundred votes or more at the next election.

I would therefore advise the ministers not to pay too much attention to the new members. As far as the new members are concerned, may I tell them not to pay too much attention to their organizers who could very easily make them commit very serious mistakes in this regard. Even though I have succeeded in business, I have been active in politics for several years and I will admit that there are some intelligent people among the Conservatives.

Mr. Ricard: They are all intelligent.

Mr. Gour: If you are among those who are intelligent, that means you are a Liberal.

Mr. Ricard: If they are not bright, we do not keep them.

Mr. Gour: I will not go on any longer, convinced as I am that you will reach an understanding with the civil service commission so that it may continue, as it has in the past, to announce competitions in the newspapers and to accept applications for employment.

Mr. Chairman, may I say to the Secretary of State that, in his constituency, just as in my own, farmers no longer get their mail at the post office. People in villages no longer go to the post office. They hand the postal box key to one of their children or to someone else who goes and fetches the mail. As people in towns no longer go to the post office, they are not in a position to see the advertisements except in the newspapers. Or they will go to the post office for a couple of months and then they will forget about it and the time limit for the competition will pass, which will cost money and will not give satisfaction.

Now then, I am sure the civil service commission which is made up of as honest and intelligent people as we can wish will see to it that justice is given to everybody.

We live in a democracy and civil servants have the right to believe that they would be better off under the Conservatives than under the Liberals or under the C.C.F. than under the Conservatives or the other way around. And it would be a great injustice to try to prevent one or all civil servants who are just as intelligent as the members of the House of Commons, from expressing their opinion. They should have freedom of thought except in cases of extravagance or in cases where these employees would not do their job in a satisfactory way. In such a case their immediate superiors are capable of dealing with the matter.

I am sure the Secretary of State will take these few remarks in good spirit and that he will be careful not to rely too much on the recommendations of new members, also that those new members will not be too enthusiastic in having those who may have worked against them in the elections dismissed. If too many civil servants are dismissed, Conservatives will all be swept off at the next election.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the remarks just made by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) and also with regard to the question I asked the Secretary of State before six o'clock, I must say that I am not at all satisfied with the answer he gave me. I am not satisfied because his answer was based on an individual case, the one which was discussed in this house. I was not referring to that case at the time, but to political interference in general, and particularly to a resolution passed in this house at one time. I am simply asking the Secretary of State if he thinks that this resolution and this practice, tradition, or custom is not rather obsolete nowadays. That was all I asked him to do. I will also appreciate his opinion as to how we should deal now with people guilty of political interference.

Mr. Courtemanche: To reply to the question of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), I must confess that this is more a matter of internal policy of the government, and that it would be very much out of order for me, as a minister representing a department, to outline a policy which should be entirely a governmental one. It is for this reason that I shall venture no further in telling him what my policy would be. I steadfastly maintain that it is a matter of internal policy of the government, a policy which must be outlined only by the leader of the house or by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Chairman, I know that the Secretary of State will understand my begging to differ. Far from being a matter of internal policy, it is a matter which was approved by both parties and which was put into effect, to a large extent by the person who was responsible for the civil service commission—namely, the Secretary of State.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that in this case, since it is almost 50 years ago that this outdated policy was established, the hon. Secretary of State should give serious consideration to the advisability of changing the policy in this respect. I think that the day has passed when you could dismiss a federal civil servant merely because a member of the house certifies that he has been guilty of interference in politics or of some political activity. I therefore ask him whether it might not be in order to consider the matter very seriously with a view to incorporating the requisite changes in that policy which has been followed for at least fifty years.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I could not agree more with the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I quite understand that we must change with the times. I do not contend that the present policy is the best, but I can tell the hon. member that I have no objection to taking the required steps nor to discussing with my colleagues the changes that could be made in that direction.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make another remark. I do not know whether or not the matter has already been raised by other hon. members, but if so, the hon. Secretary of State can tell me, and I will resume my seat. Many times, especially during the last election campaign, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) gave the impression that Canadian government employees would receive a salary increase. Is the government now considering the matter? Have they decided to increase the salary of federal civil servants?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I will not go as far as to say that the government has, or has not, made a decision on the matter, but in a statement I made this afternoon I said that this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Finance. I said that when his estimates come up for consideration, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will then be able to answer this question more accurately.

Mr. Caron: In this way we can reserve our questions about salary increase for federal civil servants till we come to the estimates of the Department of Finance. I hope that we will not then be told that we should have put our questions to the hon. Secretary of State who is responsible for that matter. I wish to be sure about that, for it happened that we were told: "You should have asked that question at such and such a time". I am glad that the statement of the Secretary of State to the effect that this question comes directly under the Department of Finance has been set in the record so that we may, when the time comes, bring it to the attention of the Minister of Finance, should he tell us that the question should have been put to the hon. Secretary of State.

Mr. Courtemanche: The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) can be assured that when he asks the question of the Minister of Finance, he will not be told to put it to the Secretary of State because I have been careful to consult my colleague before giving that answer.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask another question. With regard to competition notices published in the newspapers, it was said a moment ago—I refrained from asking any question at the time—that about 13,000 applications for jobs had been received monthly. In view of this new policy having been established three months ago, has the number of applications decreased?

Mr. Courtemanche: Not to the knowledge of the civil service commissioners.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, since the only reply given to the candidates is to read the papers, which has not diminished the work of the employees of the civil service commission, in my opinion, it would be quite reasonable to revert to the former policy which was agreeable to everybody. As the hon. Secretary of State says, I think the civil service commission would be well advised to revert to the former policy since the administration costs are in no way less than they were before.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Several weeks ago there was a certain amount of discussion in the house arising out of statements made by Mr. Stewart Bates of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It was taken by the hon. member for Ottawa West and others that Mr. Bates' statement raised questions as to the efficiency of the civil service since it appeared that he was able to slash the strength of this particular agency while at the same time providing a service which was at least as good as it was before and, perhaps, even to extend that service.

We know that the government has this particular question under active consideration; at least we were given that assurance in the house. What I should like to know from the Secretary of State is what interest the civil service commission is taking in this issue and whether it is making any study of the developments in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to see whether there are some advantages in the organization of this corporation that could apply to other branches of the civil service.

Mr. Courtemanche: The commission is aware of the facts in this case and they are following the progress which is being made and are ready to conduct themselves according to the situation that developed.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the civil service commission has noted a column by the defeated Conservative candidate in Ottawa West which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of August 6. There was one particular paragraph which, I think, might be interesting to the commission since it seems to imply that there has been very little change in the conditions which this particular defeated candidate thought quite unsatisfactory.

> Patronage dead! Well, if it is, there's a prevailing wind with an awful hang-over from past years, and, as far as my experience goes, it's almost impossible to get a door open and let in a breath of fresh air.

I wonder if the minister is able to comment on that particular remark.

Mr. Courtemanche: I do not think I can make any statement myself, but I can tell the hon. member that the doors of the commission are always wide open.

Mr. Hardie: I think the Secretary of State realizes that in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon and in other areas of northern Canada civil servants working for various departments are not being treated in the same way, particularly with respect to housing. In the case of the Department of Transport, the department supplies the house, the furniture, cutlery and so on. In the case of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources a house and furniture are supplied, while I believe the Department of Fisheries follows the same practice as the department of northern affairs. In the case of the Department of Fisheries it was only last year that employees of that department in the Northwest Territories were provided with housing, and last year, also, Post Office Department employees were finally brought under this scheme, two houses being provided in the Northwest Territories for two postmasters, one at Fort Smith and the other at Yellowknife. I asked the Postmaster General a question on July 26 concerning this discrimination between the treatment accorded employees of the Post Office Department as compared with the treatment of employees of other departments, and he told me at that time that an investigation was being carried on by the government with regard to employees of the civil service in the north. I wonder if the Secretary of State can tell me how this investigation is progressing. As a matter of fact the investigation began a couple of years ago, and it is about time some conclusion was reached. I hope the minister will take the case of these post office employees into consideration and ensure that they are treated in the same way as people working in other departments of government are treated.

Mr. Courtemanche: This matter is the responsibility of each department concerned, but I am informed that the civil service commission is interested in the matter and reviewing the facts which have been put forward.

Mr. Hardie: Oh yes, but the civil service commission was very interested in the matter in 1956 when I spoke on it. It is now 1958, and I am wondering if we are going to get any results.

Mr. Courtemanche: The civil service commission has no authority.

Mr. Hardie: No authority to look after the interests of the people who work for them, the civil servants of the public service in Canada?

Mr. Courtemanche: It has no authority to settle questions about housing or anything like that. The authority is only a co-ordinating one, no more than that.

Mr. Hardie: Could the minister tell me if there is any difference in what is provided by the Department of Transport for their employees in the Northwest Territories as compared with what is provided by the department of northern affairs, or by the Post Office Department for its employees with regard to housing, furnishings, services, including fuel, oil, electric light and the rest of it? Is there any variation in the amount that is deducted from the remuneration of employees of each of these branches of the service?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, in order to hurry this item along I would be prepared to give the hon. member for Mackenzie River the information he wants on my estimates.

Mr. Hardie: For post office, fisheries and transport?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. There is an interdepartmental committee which, as the hon. member knows, has been holding meetings for two years. There is some evidence that they are getting closer to agreement. I will give the hon. member the most recent information that is available on my estimates.

Mr. Hardie: You will give me the information I asked for just a few moments ago in regard to what services are being provided for persons working for the Post Office Department as opposed to those working for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Department of Transport, et cetera. Can you give me that information?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I will try. I believe I have it all. I have seen the minutes of the interdepartmental committee and I think I can get it.

Mr. Hardie: I would hope the minister would provide me with that information at the time his estimates are before the house now that he has had notice of these questions.

[Mr. Hardie.]

Office of the Chief Electoral Officer—

57. Salaries and expenses of office, $77,705.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I have a number of questions to ask on this item and I wonder if we could wait until the minister has his officials before him.

The first question I want to put before the minister is this. I think he will recognize that his role in relation to the office we are now concerned with is more immediate to himself than is his role in relation to the civil service commission. In a sense he is much more responsible for these activities. He must be aware that his party in previous sessions of the house took a very strong position in connection with the constitutional regard toward the whole question of redistribution. The then leader of the opposition who is now the high commissioner in England was particularly vocal in this regard. When we had before us this session a bill that would have effected redistribution two hon. members on the government side of the house from the province of Quebec spoke on this matter. I want to ask the minister what are his views.

The Tremblay report, for example, sets out to some degree the views of Quebec on constitutional matters and insists that on questions of redistribution each of the provinces should be consulted in any readjustment of boundaries. That has not been observed, particularly in the last two or three redistributions. I want to ask the minister what are his views and what is the viewpoint of his government in that regard in the light of statements by the former leader of that party and statements by hon. members on the government side of the house from Quebec who within the last two or three months in this house expressed the opinion that the whole question of redistribution, when it comes to boundaries and drawing up constituencies, should be taken to the provincial authorities for consultation. That is my first question. Would the minister care to comment?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to refer the hon. member for Port Arthur to the answer I gave to him on June 25 in respect of this question as reported at page 1610 of Hansard of that date:

> In view of the very heavy program of legislation on the agenda for this session I can only say at this time that the government has given consideration to this problem, and intends to refer the study of the Canada Elections Act to the committee at a later date.

Mr. Chevrier: What committee is that?

Mr. Courtemanche: The standing committee on elections.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, this has nothing to do with the Canada Elections Act. It is a constitutional question relating to the interpretation of the British North America Act. Although it is something that may be discussed by the committee on elections it must be decided at a much higher policy level and in consultation with the provincial authorities. I asked about it in order to get an idea as to the pre-thinking of the minister on this subject.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, that is a question concerning government policy. I can say nothing more than what I have said because the government, and not the minister, must decide this question.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I am right in my interpretation of that part of the discussion. It is not a matter of consulting provincial governments, but the constitution provides simply for an electoral redistribution based on the number of seats ascribed to the province of Quebec. At first, the province of Quebec had 65 seats and the other provinces a proportionate number of constituencies, according to their population. Then, the government changed the pattern by increasing the number of constituencies in the province of Quebec while keeping the same proportion in the other provinces. Is that correct?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I will simply point out that the law was amended, if I remember correctly, during the years 1950-51—

Mr. Caron: 1951.

Mr. Courtemanche: —1951, yes, and instead of taking 65 seats as a basis, as was done formerly, a certain proportion of the population was taken into account. Now, that change cannot be made before a census has been taken to assess the increase in population. The last census having been made in 1950, I do not believe that there can be any redistribution before 1960.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, without making any electoral redistribution, if some changes do occur in a riding, is it necessary to wait for a redistribution to add territory to a constituency? I will give an example. The area of the city of Hull has been extended. To add that part of the city of Hull which was formerly in the federal riding of Gatineau and the provincial riding of Hull to the federal riding of Hull, do we have to wait for a redistribution, or can it be done in the meantime?

Mr. Courtemanche: We should wait for a further redistribution of all federal ridings.

Mr. Caron: But this will change the limits of only two ridings. It will in no way affect the number of ridings in the province of Quebec. I am sure that if we modify the number of ridings there, redistribution is necessary throughout the country, but in the case we are dealing with, it is only a question of changing the limits of two ridings, as a result of expansion of one municipality.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, there can be expansion in one part of the province, and contraction in another. You have to restore the balance and, if I remember rightly,—unfortunately Mr. Castonguay is not here with me tonight—

Mr. Chevrier: You have Mr. Anglin, who is very able.

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes. I had the opportunity of talking to Mr. Castonguay, but at the last moment another official was sent to assist me. I am told that if we had a general election now, Ontario would have two more members, and Quebec would lose one.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a short question with reference to the period of elections? I have heard it said in the house repeatedly over the years, and I have heard it said by members on both sides of the house, that the time between the issue of the writ and the election itself is too long. I am wondering whether, under the present method of registering voters, it is possible to shorten the time of the election?

Has the minister or his officers given any consideration to this period which of necessity must elapse after the issue of the writ and what, if anything, has been done to shorten that period? These are the two questions on which I would like some enlightenment.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that it cannot be done with the present form of enumeration.

Mr. Pearson: What would be required in the way of changing the present form of enumeration to make a reduction of this period possible?

Mr. Courtemanche: A permanent list.

Mr. Chevrier: Will it require legislation?

Mr. Courtemanche: Absolutely, yes.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, did I understand the Secretary of State to say a while ago that there would be a redistribution next year, that there would be a committee formed for that purpose?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, the committee will be set up to study the matter of redistribution and the various items of legislation which have been introduced during this present session suggesting amendments to the Canada Elections Act. However, with regard to the redistribution of seats, this can only be done after a census, and this cannot take place before 1960.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, unless I am mistaken, the census will take place in 1961.

Mr. Courtemanche: I must say to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) that this is not a matter coming within my jurisdiction. This is special legislation entitled the Representation Act 1952, and it does not come under my department.

Mr. Caron: Still, we must ask the Secretary of State for information in this regard, since he is responsible for this matter before the house. This means that redistribution will be carried out after the 1961 census, so that this cannot take place before 1962 since we must have the census figures before providing for redistribution.

A moment ago the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) stated that the Tremblay Commission report had suggested that the provinces or certain provinces be consulted before any changes are made. To my mind this suggestion is altogether opposed to the very principles of the constitution. As long as we retain the same formula, based on the number of electors per Quebec constituency, I feel that we remain faithful to the spirit of the constitution.

Mr. Courtemanche: I will answer that question by asking the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) if he has had occasion to read the Tremblay report? Personally, I did not have the opportunity.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, while we are examining the Canada Elections Act, might not the Secretary of State ask the Chief Electoral Officer to clarify the section of the Act which deals with the employment of persons permitted to work for candidates? As I understand it, a section of the act stipulates that a candidate may not employ—or, rather, pay—more than one person for every 500 electors. While I appreciate that there are such posts as clerical assistants, clerks and so on, there is nothing in the act about representatives in the polls.

The hon. Secretary of State knows that the various candidates are allowed two representatives per poll on election day. But the law does not tell us if they are allowed to pay these people. As I see it, it is important that the Chief Electoral Officer should clarify this matter, so that we may know whether or not we are entitled to pay these representatives, for if we maintain the limit of one paid person for every 500 electors, then we cannot retain the services of a representative and pay him; otherwise, first he loses his voting right, and secondly we are not allowed to pay him.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that to provide for that the law should be amended. However, a candidate is authorized to spend $500 for various representatives.

Mr. Caron: Will the committee to be entrusted with a study of the Canada Elections Act next year have to deal with all those matters?

Mr. Courtemanche: Certainly, yes.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: There has been discussion in a language which I unfortunately do not understand very well on what I brought up, namely redistribution. I just wish to ask the minister what he had to say about the Tremblay report? I know he said something.

Mr. Courtemanche: I answered the question that I have not read the Tremblay report and I told the hon. member that he was lucky to have read it.

Mr. Fisher: I have another question in connection with redistribution. In view of the fact that this parliament, not at this session, will have to face this problem, what steps has the chief electoral officer taken, or what steps is he taking, or does he plan to take steps to advise parliament on this particular task?

Mr. Courtemanche: The chief electoral officer has nothing to do with redistribution; it is up to parliament.

Mr. Fisher: That may be true in the technical sense but I think the minister is aware that in effect he has a chief adviser on that particular matter who spends a great deal of time and takes a great interest in this particular topic. He has a considerable file of material on the whole question of redistribution. I was just wondering how far he was going in his lining up of information, especially in relation to the size of constituencies, the population of constituencies and calculations projected ahead as to the number of seats provinces were going to gain or lose.

Mr. Courtemanche: I have nothing to do with that. The government will deal with that at the proper time. Even if the department of the chief electoral officer comes under his jurisdiction, the Secretary of State has nothing to do with that and neither has the chief electoral officer. Parliament will decide.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask just one question following what the hon. member for Port Arthur has said. I understand from what the member for Port Arthur has said that he is under the impression that there will be redistribution before the next election. I understood the minister to say a moment ago, unless I misunderstood him, that there would not be. Now, which is it?

Mr. Fisher: That depends upon the Prime Minister, but there has to be a redistribution in 1962.

Mr. Courtemanche: The next census will take place in 1962 and nothing will be done before that.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: In referring to the statement of the Secretary of State about the amendment to the election act in connection with representatives, I take it that the act allows a candidate to spend $500 to this end. For those who have 300 polls in their riding and who wish to employ two representatives in each poll, you have 600 people. If we vote a total appropriation of $500, this leaves us with a sum of about $1 per representative. You might just as well leave the act unchanged as to try to hire people for $1 a day, not to mention the fact that they must, in addition, pay for their own meals. I believe that the sum of $500 mentioned by the Secretary of State is far from adequate. This is 1958, and the cost of living and of labour have gone up by more than $1 a day.

Mr. Courtemanche: Which goes to show that it is necessary to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Denis: The Secretary of State mentioned $500 for each riding. I feel that falls far short of the mark.

(Text):

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say how many returning officers have been appointed throughout Canada in the last 12 months?

Mr. Courtemanche: I cannot answer. We do not have the figures here.

Mr. Garland: How many such appointments are currently pending?

Mr. Courtemanche: From recollection, only two.

Mr. Garland: In view of the fact that the minister has not got the information, would he undertake to give it to me at the earliest possible date?

Mr. Courtemanche: I will get the figures and I will be ready to answer the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: In the same vein, how does the chief electoral officer arrive at the choice of the returning officer?

Mr. Courtemanche: The chief electoral officer has nothing to do with that matter. They are appointed by order in council.

Mr. Fisher: Does the minister mean that the chief electoral officer gives no advice as to appointments?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps the minister could explain what channel it is that determines these matters.

Mr. Courtemanche: The law is that if a man is over 65 years of age or sick the Secretary of State is advised and an order in council is passed.

Mr. Chevrier: Under 65.

Mr. Courtemanche: Over 65.

Mr. Fisher: How many charges were laid in the courts following the last two elections as the result of action by the chief electoral officer in carrying out the provisions of the Canada Elections Act? What were the charges and what results did they have?

Mr. Courtemanche: We will have this information later and I will be able to answer the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: Maybe I can ask this question. Has the minister final cost figures on the 1957 and 1958 elections?

Mr. Courtemanche: The cost of the 1957 election was $7,351,789 and the cost of the 1958 election was $9,051,300.

Mr. Fisher: Is any study under way or is it known now what it would cost per poll to extend advance polls in a more general way?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am told that the question is a little too broad to answer.

Mr. Fisher: Let us put it this way. Is any study under way to check on the cost? I raise the question because when one advances the idea of more advance polls or advance polls open to a broader classification of voters or for more days the point is always made that it would increase the cost so much but it is very difficult for us to discuss the matter unless we can be presented with some idea of the cost. The province of Ontario has gone ahead and extended its advance poll provisions in a certain way and I was wondering whether the chief electoral officer had gathered any cost information from the province. There would be quite a similarity.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that it is pretty hard to answer this question because it is too broad a one. They do not have any figures.

Mr. Caron: Is the cost of an advance poll lower or higher according to the section of the country where it is held?

Mr. Courtemanche: The answer is yes. We have some variation.

Mr. Caron: Could we get an average figure of the cost of such polls. I do not want an exact figure, just an average.

Mr. Courtemanche: The only answer is that normally the cost is less in rural districts than in urban ones.

Mr. Caron: But as between two cities, say Toronto and Montreal, is there a difference in the cost?

Mr. Courtemanche: No.

Mr. Caron: What is the approximate cost in Montreal?

Mr. Courtemanche: It depends on the number on the list because the tariff is the same everywhere.

Mr. Caron: What is the tariff?

(Translation):

Could the Secretary of State tell me what tariff he is talking about?

Mr. Courtemanche: The tariff fixing the cost of the poll, the rental of the premises and the salaries of the returning officers.

(Text):

Deputy returning officer, for all services, $18; poll clerks, $12, and rent, $20.

Mr. Caron: Is there not usually a constable?

Mr. Courtemanche: That depends. If you have a constable you will pay for him.

Mr. Caron: What would be the cost for a constable, $7 or $8.

Mr. Courtemanche: Ten dollars.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: I should like to ask the Secretary of State if in the province of Quebec the provincial police seen around polls on election day are paid by the department?

Mr. Courtemanche: I will not attempt to discuss this matter with the hon. member this evening.

Mr. Dupuis: Is this practice encouraged by the department?

(Text):

Mr. Courtemanche: I should like to correct something for the record. In rural districts a constable is paid $6 but in urban districts a constable receives $10 a day.

Mr. Kindt: I should like to ask the minister a question on the subject of disability. How many civil servants have been forced to leave the government service during the past ten years because of disability?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would mind sitting down. We passed the civil service item. We are on item 57, office of the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Fisher: I want to come back to the question of the cost of advance polls. I realize that the question is perhaps too broad. I regret that Mr. Castonguay is not here at the present time to indicate whether he has been working in this field.

I understood that he had been, and I wondered if the minister would advise the chief electoral officer that information on this particular point would be useful. We should have a concrete idea how much it would cost to extend advance poll privileges.

I think there has been fairly general agreement amongst the members of the house that we would like to see advance poll privileges extended, but one of the stumbling blocks to getting definite action is this question of cost. I understand that the experience in Ontario has not been a happy one. There has not been a resultant increase in the vote following an extension of the advance poll which, according to many people, would compensate for this extension. We need to know the answer to this sort of thing before we go ahead. Perhaps we will not be able to raise this question until the minister's estimates are considered next year, but I do hope he will advise the chief electoral officer to put some work on this particular feature.

Mr. Courtemanche: I thank the hon. member, and as soon as the chief electoral officer returns I will give the question consideration and be ready to answer.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder if the minister can tell the committee why it is that although we have people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon who would qualify for voting at advance polls, there is no such thing as an advance poll in these areas?

Mr. Courtemanche: The answer is that it has never been asked for before.

Mr. Hardie: The minister had better go back and look at Hansard. I asked for it two or three years ago.

May I refer to a problem which we encountered during the last election campaign. On the evening of the election the Edmonton radio station in Alberta was giving the results of the Alberta polls, as well as the various polls across the country east of Alberta, and in one portion of my riding it was six o'clock so the result could not interfere with the bandwagon jumpers—as it happened there were not too many of them—but in the other half of my riding they were an hour behind. The same situation would hold good in the Yukon, where they have Yukon time, and they are still another hour behind. Although they get very poor radio reception in the north, there are times when as a result of freak reception the people in the Yukon could get the results of the polling from Newfoundland to Alberta two hours before the polls closed.

Mr. Courtemanche: Could the hon. member tell me how many votes were cast in that advance poll?

Mr. Hardie: I am not speaking about the advance poll. I am speaking of the announcement by radio stations of the returns as they are received from the provinces. As I said, in the last election the radio station in Edmonton was booming out the results of the polls from Newfoundland to Alberta an hour before the polls in my riding closed, and two hours before they closed in the Yukon.

Mr. Pratt: It happens everywhere.

Mr. Hardie: It does?

Mr. Pratt: Yes.

Mr. Hardie: Oh, that is why the bandwagon jumpers were jumping this last trip.

(Translation):

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct only one remark to the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche). I should like to draw to his attention a situation which is always embarrassing for outgoing members and for the government. It is that election papers outside the province of Quebec and some constituencies in Manitoba are, according to law, printed in only one language. In the past, outgoing members have been blamed because the act is not very clear on this point and, to prevent such criticism in the future, I would suggest to the Secretary of State that he request his officials to prepare an amendment which would provide for the publication and printing of election papers in both official languages of this country for bilingual constituencies.

Mr. Courtemanche: I will certainly draw this matter to the attention of the responsible officials.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to discuss this matter at any length because all federal documents are supposed to be bilingual just as postal stamps and currency must be bilingual.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that the election act will have to be amended because it was not provided that outside the province of Quebec and certain provinces such as Manitoba, these election papers be printed otherwise than in English. I will certainly make the required recommendations.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: I have one complaint in connection with the operations of the election act during the last election. I raised the question in the house in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but was not able to obtain the information I needed. The situation is this. The election act forbids any sort of radio or television performance in support of the parties or dealing with the election for the period from Friday midnight until the polls close on Monday evening.

On the Sunday before the election a number of radio stations across Canada carried a broadcast sponsored by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which featured Mr. Grant McConachie, the president of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines. The burden of the message was an exhortation to the people to get out and vote, but the part to which I particularly objected was one of his concluding remarks to the effect that if you do not get out and vote you are likely to have a socialist government or that is how socialists get in power. I want to make the point that we happen to be a socialist party, and we are recognized as such. I feel this was a breach of the elections act. Unfortunately we are not in a position to get hold of the tape, since the C.B.C. requirements seem to have lapsed in this particular regard. I am not going to ask the minister to investigate the matter now, but I should like him to advise the chief electoral officer that in future elections he should be more watchful of this particular type of action. I do not believe political broadcasts should be taking place during this period.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business will be for tomorrow, and when the house leader is dealing with that I wonder if he could tell us what will take place on Monday?

Mr. Green: We shall continue with the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State tomorrow; then, the estimates of legislation, northern affairs, labour, mines and technical surveys, and post office.

On Monday we will commence with item No. 18 on today's order paper, which has to do with the simultaneous translation system for the chamber; then the resolution concerning the federal district commission, which is item No. 21. Then we will take item No. 1, the house in committee on the act to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners; item No. 7, consideration of Senate amendments to an act to amend the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921; item No. 9, second reading of an act to amend the Indian Act; item No. 8, an act to amend the Penitentiary Act; item No. 12, second reading of an act to amend the Criminal Code; item No. 17, the resolution concerning the national parole board, and item No. 20, the resolution concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

On Tuesday we intend to take the various items standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, commencing with item No. 3 on today's order paper, an act respecting the taxation of estates, and then to go on to the Customs Tariff resolution, which is item No. 22 on today's order paper; and then item No. 5, which is an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. The other finance measures will be considered after that.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on July 14.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The house met at eleven o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Tenth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McCleave.

VACANCIES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ISSUE OF WRITS AND DATE OF POLLING

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce to the house that writs have been issued for the election of new members for the electoral districts of Grenville-Dundas in Ontario and Montmagny-L'Islet in the province of Quebec, and that the date of polling has been set for Monday, September 29, 1958.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BURMA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce that agreement has been reached with the government of Burma for the exchange of diplomatic representatives. We have welcomed the proposal of the Burmese government to accredit to Ottawa their distinguished ambassador in Washington, His Excellency U Win, who will be concurrently ambassador to Canada and to the United States. The Canadian government has been pleased to send as its first ambassador to Burma Mr. Arthur Menzies, our high commissioner to Malaya. Mr. Menzies will also hold these two appointments concurrently. He will maintain his residence in Kuala Lumpur, but he will visit Rangoon from time to time in order to establish the close relation which we are anxious to maintain with the Burmese authorities and the people of that country. It is not intended to set up an office in Rangoon at this time, but we hope that when we have overcome the present strain on our resources of personnel we shall be able to maintain an office in Burma.

Canada's relations with Burma in the United Nations, in the Colombo plan and in many other international organizations have always been particularly warm and friendly. We have a great admiration for the gallant way in which the people of that country have struggled against the ravages of war and civil strife to create a stronghold of the democratic way of life in Asia. We look forward to even closer relations by reason of our exchange of ambassadors.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will welcome this announcement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs which now gives Canada the first opportunity of having a diplomatic mission in that part of southeast Asia. Have the minister and the government given consideration to having missions accredited not only to Burma but as well to some other countries, perhaps through the appointee in Burma, such as in Viet Nam, following a practice which has been pursued by Australia for some time?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group also welcome the announcement by the minister. We believe it is a further indication of Canada's growing stature in international relations as well as a recognition by the government and parliament of the increased need for developing our relations in southeast Asia. I express the hope to the minister that following this important step Canada will take action to recognize China at an early date and set up diplomatic services for Canada in that country. We welcome this move as a further step toward improving Canada's relations with this increasingly important part of the world.

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED UN SPECIAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if it is the intention of the government that the Canadian delegation attending the extraordinary session of the assembly of the United Nations, scheduled for Wednesday morning next, will be headed by a member of the government. Is it the intention of the minister himself to head the delegation? Is he in a position to state to the house now, or prior to that meeting, what will be the attitude of the government of Canada, particularly in view of the statement made yesterday by the secretary general?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to attend the emergency session of the general assembly to be held on Wednesday morning next. I intend to leave Ottawa on Monday afternoon.

With respect to the second part of the question, in so far as it related to the observations that were made yesterday in the pro forma meeting of the general assembly, I would make these observations in general first, and then in particular. The discussions yesterday and the conclusions reached, and the statements made by the president of the general assembly, Sir Leslie Munro, and the secretary general, augur well for a session that will not be too inflammatory in character. There is some foundation for what I designate as a hope in that regard.

The secretary general did bring into the discussion yesterday afternoon a helpful statement. He expressed ideas—I cannot go any further than this—which are not unknown to the Canadian government. He expressed, to quote his own words, "some of the basic needs for action in the region", touching on the need for a formula for non-interference by the states of the region in the affairs of their neighbours and some co-operative approach to their common economic problems, thus drawing attention to the evident truth that the key to the problems of the region rests largely in the hands of the states of the area themselves.

The secretary general refrained from going into details of his ideas at this time, but I am informed he will elaborate upon what he has in mind at the meeting of the emergency session of the general assembly. However, he did give a lead that should enable the general assembly to concentrate its attention on those problems that lie at the root of the Middle East trouble.

The atmosphere which he and others have created, as I said a moment ago, lays the foundation for some hope that the meeting next week will not be entirely of an inflammatory nature. In so far as the general assembly addresses itself not only to the immediate problem but to this basic problem, Canada will support that approach.

LEBANON—REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF U.S. MARINE BATTALION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of a newspaper report appearing on the front page of the Globe and Mail of this morning indicating that the United States plans early next week to withdraw a marine battalion from Lebanon. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on what appears to be a substantial indication of a very welcome reduction of tension in this area. Is this move also designed, in the opinion of the minister, to assist in the mediation of outstanding disputes in this area?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no official knowledge of the information given in the press report to which the hon. member refers. I would express the hope, however, that it may portend an action on the part of the United States which would indicate that some measure of stability has already been established in Lebanon, enabling them to take this step.

WATER RESOURCES

MANITOBA—TABLING OF COPY OF REPORT OF ENGINEERING SURVEY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on July 23 I announced in the house that the government had received reports on measures for the control of the waters of lake Winnipeg in Manitoba, and that I would be tabling copies as soon as they were available. I take pleasure now in tabling two copies of the three volume report, and in telling the house that copies of the first volume have been sent to members from Manitoba ridings and that additional copies are available, on request, for any other hon. member who wishes them.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister whether those reports are available in both official languages?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Railway Act to permit certain grants to be made from the railway grade crossing fund; to credit to the railway grade crossing fund in each fiscal year the sum of five million dollars to aid actual construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of crossings; and for certain changes in connection with the administration of the fund.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

REPORTED MEASURES TO MEET SOVIET ECONOMIC OFFENSIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. My question is based on the following Canadian Press dispatch dated August 8:

> Qualified Canadian sources said today prospects have brightened considerably for a huge marshalling by the western powers of gold and currencies to fight the Soviet economic offensive.

In view of the general interest in and importance of this statement, in relation to the maintenance and expansion of Canada's overseas markets, can the Prime Minister give the house any further information at this time?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything to the statement I made in the house on July 25. When dealing with the question of measures that might be taken in order to meet the Soviet trade offensive I pointed out and suggested that in so far as the international monetary fund is concerned, an increase in quotas of 50 per cent would bring about an additional $3,000 million in gold and useful currencies, the result of which would be to substantially increase the liquid assets backing world trade, and also that in so far as the international bank is concerned, if there were an increase in the guarantee by the participating countries from 80 per cent to 160 per cent of national capital subscriptions, that would provide an increase in the bank's borrowing power by several billions of dollars, and could be made to further assist any uncommitted countries.

That was the general suggestion. That was the suggestion referred to, as my hon. friend knows, in the Canadian Press article. But having regard to those considerations which I know will immediately occur to the hon. gentleman, I would not want to add anything further at this time other than that the suggestion I then made is one that I hope will receive consideration.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question on this very important statement by the Prime Minister. Can we take it from the statement the Prime Minister has now made that Canada will be putting forward this proposition at the New Delhi meeting?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to say at this time what will be put forward at that time, but certainly the statement I made represents the viewpoint that will be generally advanced and is being advanced by the Canadian government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

MARINE ENGINEERS—INQUIRY AS TO CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Having regard to the announcement made this morning respecting the conciliation board report in the dispute between the national association of marine engineers and the great lakes shipping association, can the minister say what is the content of the report, and has he any comment to make on it at this time?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we received this report several days ago. It was a unanimous report by the conciliation board. We transmitted it to the parties concerned, and so far we have had no reaction from them.

NATIONAL PARKS

JASPER—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO KILLING OF YOUNG GIRL BY BEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I am sure the minister is aware of the tragedy that occurred in Jasper yesterday, when a young girl was mauled to death by a bear. Can the minister assure the house that the fullest possible investigation will be undertaken immediately?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I should like to thank the hon. member for handing me a copy of this question as I came into the house. I heard a radio report this morning, and I can assure the house that the usual investigation will take place as is conducted on such occasions. At the same time I express the sympathy of all of us to the people associated with this dreadful tragedy.

I point out that the question of mauling, damage and death by bears in our national parks is a problem that seriously engrosses the attention of the department. We have engaged in an educational program to try to make the tourist population aware of the danger of these half-wild bears, but the educational program is only effective to the degree that people listen to what they are told and read the signs that are posted. However, I shall find out about the matter and make a full report if it is requested.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—REQUEST FOR FURTHER REPORTS ON DEATHS AT GARRY LAKE, N.W.T.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources was good enough to table the report of an inquest into the death of a number of Eskimos at Garry lake in the Northwest Territories, actually in response to my request of a few days ago. In the sessional paper that was tabled yesterday I find that the R.C.M.P. and the Department of National Defence, through the R.C.A.F. which is flying in that part of the country, did certain work with regard to—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hardie: You will get the question right now. First, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if the R.C.A.F. at Fort Churchill have made any report to his department with regard to the starvation of the Eskimos at Garry lake, and I also want to ask the Minister of Justice if the R.C.M.P. at Baker Lake have made a report.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would ask one question at a time, please.

Mr. Hardie: If so, I want them tabled.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I shall be pleased to make inquiries in the department to see whether or not such a report has been received.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may now ask his question of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Hardie: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has received a report from the R.C.M.P. in the field at Baker Lake, in regard to the starvation of Eskimos at Garry lake.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I personally have not received a report, but I shall make an inquiry to see if the commissioner has any information.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

NEWSPAPERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of Justice a question in connection with a report that under the anti-combines legislation he is looking into one particular case involving two newspapers in Canada? Is the minister able to inform the house when this investigation is likely to be completed, and whether a report of the findings will be made available?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I am not able to say, Mr. Speaker, with any certainty when the investigation will be completed. During the course of the discussion of my estimates I indicated the number of such investigations that are now under way. With respect to the second part of the question may I say that the tabling of the reports is governed by the provisions of the act, and we will comply with those provisions.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—AVAILABILITY OF MORTGAGE FUNDS OUTSIDE LARGE CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Since most of the money lent by this government through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the construction of small homes has gone to the large cities—and I think the best example of that fact is Toronto, which has received 37 per cent—what action is the government taking to ensure that a greater percentage of these funds will in future go to our people living outside these great metropolitan centres?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago steps were taken to have letters written to the mayor or reeve of every centre in Canada with a population of 1,500 or over, pointing out the availability of mortgage funds by direct loan from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. With these letters were sent various pamphlets. In addition, similar information was sent to the newspapers in all these smaller centres in Canada. The results to date have been very satisfactory. A far larger amount of money is being lent in the centres under 55,000 than was the case previously. I heartily agree with the hon. member that this is a highly desirable change.

Mr. Garland: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Do I understand that this sort of campaign is directed to all the centres under 55,000 in population?

Mr. Green: To all centres from 1,500 up to 55,000. One of the suggestions contained in the letter was that officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would be glad to go to any particular centre and explain what type of assistance could be given. Advantage has been taken of this offer in a number of cases.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

BEAM STATION ROAD, TERRACE AIRPORT, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On July 7 a motion was passed calling for the production of certain papers with regard to the beam station road. I wonder whether the minister could indicate what progress is being made with respect to the preparation of those papers?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will check up on the matter and give the hon. member an answer on Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he is in a position to comply with the request I made on Wednesday that the answers should be given today to the two starred questions standing in my name on the order paper, because of the fact that his estimates are coming up for consideration later this day.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet in my possession the information requested.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister whether he has noted that it is purely factual information that is asked for, and that the questions have been on the order paper for 19 days?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Public printing and stationery—

321. Departmental administration, $612,876.

Mr. Fisher: There are several questions I want to ask in connection with this particular department, Mr. Chairman. There was a sessional paper No. 133(a) filed last session in answer to some questions I asked as to whether there were any orders for outside printing placed by the queen's printer in that year and, if so, what was the value of these orders in each of the provinces?

This type of information is old hat to some of the members who have been around the house for a long time, but I think it might be worth pointing out that Ontario obtained $2,849,987 in outside contracts, and that Quebec obtained $1,452,562. After that the closest province was Manitoba, with $55,000 worth of contracts. I was wondering if the minister could tell us what attempts the Department of Public Printing and Stationery is making to spread these outside printing contracts over the area beyond the Ottawa-Montreal-Toronto region, where they seem to be concentrated at the present time, and if he would outline any difficulties in the way of letting some of these contracts out to the more distant parts of the country.

Mr. Courtemanche: The main difficulty is due to the distances which would be involved. I would also point out that a city such as Toronto or Montreal is better equipped to do this work than are some other places.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not wish to let that pass without comment. This problem has interested me from time to time, and this interest dates back to a period before the present Secretary of State took office. I think it will be found that there are many printing establishments outside the cities of Montreal and Toronto which are equipped to do much of the work now done by the queen's printer. In my community in Windsor there are a number of establishments which are capable of doing this work, and I know that from time to time they have sought to impress this opinion on the proper authority. I strongly support the implications of what has been said by the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Fisher: I cannot accept that explanation, Mr. Chairman. I have discovered that in some of the smaller towns, in my own constituency, there are a number of printers who turn out weekly newspapers and take on jobbing work, and they feel that they are quite capable of undertaking some of these orders, though they find it difficult to discover just what work may be available and how it can be secured. We know there are a great number of printing plants in Canada, and that the minister could not canvass all of them, but we do feel it is important that the opportunities should be more widely extended.

We often hear from people in other provinces that Ontario and Quebec get far more than their share in most matters, and the figures I have just quoted indicate that after these two provinces the next on the list is Manitoba, with $55,000 worth of contracts. Then jump back all the way to Quebec, with $1,452,562. It would seem as though this particular department in its thinking is dominated by Ontario and Quebec. I may be an Ontario member, but with all due respect, I think some opportunity should be given to areas beyond Ontario and Quebec.

I refuse to believe, for example, that in Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina and similar cities there are not establishments which have almost every facility which is needed to do this kind of printing, though I am aware that some of the modern presses equipped with the latest improvements may tend to concentrate in the eastern cities. However, much of the government's printing is very simple and involves the production of forms.

One of the other arguments I have heard advanced to explain why the contracts are so concentrated is that it is done on account of the low cost. That again bothers me, because it seems to me that certain parts of the country, for example Port Arthur, have mills turning out fine paper which is used right across Canada for printing. There are other paper establishments on the west coast turning out this quality of paper, so from this point of view of material availability there is no reason why printers in such places could not compete for some of this work if given an opportunity.

I suggest to the minister that we would appreciate it very much if when his estimates come before the committee next year we could see these orders which are now concentrated in Ontario and Quebec spread out into other provinces. Action by the department along these lines would be reflected in help being given to small printers in areas where such help is really needed.

One other point I wanted to make in connection with the operations of the queen's printer concerns the number of orders placed without competitive bids. This is a sheet running to 19 pages, and these lines are not double spaced. These pages list all the orders that were placed without competitive bids being sought between April 1, 1956 and March 31, 1957. We can appreciate that the queen's printer must do quite a bit of this, but the spectre that always arises is, how are these orders placed? I mean, what are the rules?

In leafing through the list I came to several conclusions. Perhaps the most important one is that again too many of these orders seem to be placed right in the Ottawa, Hull and Montreal area, and not enough in other places farther away. One is able to recognize that there might be a slight difference in cost, but I cannot see that it would be very great, especially when such orders are frequently for standardized products; and it seems to me the only extra cost would really be in writing letters to some of these firms.

I should like to know what the queen's printer is doing to spread more widely across the country these orders that are not placed by competitive bids. I should also like to know something of the ideas the queen's printer has in placing these orders. We would like to be assured that there is no question of patronage involved in this particular portion of the estimates of the department.

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the hon. member for Port Arthur for the kind remarks he has made. I have taken his remarks into consideration, and will strongly recommend to the queen's printer that these contracts be more widely spread across the country outside the two central provinces, and will try to correct the situation in the future.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like some information arising from some previous questions I asked relating to the daily check list published by the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. I had asked what was the value of free distributions in the last financial year with respect to full depository privileges and selections depository privileges for various libraries. I was told that the full value was $35,000. This seems unbelievably small to me and I should like an explanation of it. Is that only for a partial year? It does not make sense because an institution like Queen's University has had full depository privileges for years despite the fact that the check list may have come out recently. I should like some information on that point.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that the amount of $35,000 was for the whole year.

Mr. Fisher: If $35,000 covers the cost of all government publications sent to institutions over the course of a full year I should like to know how the figure is arrived at, because it is fantastically low in the light of the amount of publishing the government does. If you have 469 institutions which have selection privileges and approximately 32 institutions which have full depository rights, over a year they are accepting a tremendous number of government publications. If the value is only $35,000 I want to know something more about how the value is arrived at.

Mr. Courtemanche: Except for 34 libraries which automatically receive all publications, the other institutions or persons authorized by law to receive them must make a special request for the publications.

Mr. Fisher: Let me get this point clear. Take Queen's University, for example. It has full depository privileges. There are approximately 32 institutions in the same position. If the total value is $35,000, then according to this Queen's University would receive roughly a little over $1,000 worth of government publications a year. Even according to the value stamped on government publications in the government catalogue that is an incredibly low figure. Just think of every publication from the dominion bureau of statistics. They have a value of anywhere from 10 cents to $2, and that library will receive all of them. We all know the amount of publishing the bureau does. My point is that this figure is extraordinarily low, and I should like a fuller explanation as to how it is arrived at.

Mr. Courtemanche: The total amount represents all the publications that are distributed free but charged to our department at cost. That is the only part of the question I can answer.

Mr. Fisher: Have some charges made to government departments for printing work let to outside contractors been challenged by the departments concerned, and has the queen's printer reduced the charge to the said departments and covered the loss by charges to other departments or by drawing on the revolving fund authorized by parliament? I have specific reference to complaints from the Post Office Department in the past few years.

Mr. Courtemanche: May I ask the hon. member to repeat his question?

Mr. Fisher: Have some charges made to government departments for printing work let to outside contractors been challenged by the departments concerned, and has the queen's printer reduced the charge to the said departments and covered the loss by charges to other departments or by drawing on the revolving fund authorized by parliament? I have specific reference to complaints from the Post Office Department in the past few years.

Mr. Courtemanche: The answer is no.

Mr. Winch: The answer is no? Mr. Chairman, has the minister at no time read the Auditor General's report or his statements to the effect that this has occurred with particular reference to the Post Office Department; that in very recent years the post office was given a charge on something that was let by the queen's printer on a contract and they challenged that, and the queen's printer according not only to the Auditor General's report but to other information did reduce the price below that which the queen's printer actually paid the outside contractor? Surely the minister would like to reconsider his answer when he said no.

Mr. Herridge: Neophyte in the woodpile.

Mr. Peters: Fire the officials. Poor answer.

Mr. Courtemanche: Can the hon. member tell me the amount involved? I am informed that it was a case that happened two years ago, and my officials do not remember the details exactly. If the hon. member can refresh my memory I may be able to answer.

Mr. Winch: No, I cannot do that on the exact amount involved. I did not expect this question nor the answer of the minister but certainly, sir, the evidence in the report and statement of the Auditor General shows that he is very much disturbed over this practice of the queen's printer.

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that it is not the practice. It may have happened two years ago, but it has not happened this year.

Mr. Fisher: My next question is in the same general area and has to do with the reply I received to another question I placed on the order paper. The question reads:

What criteria does the queen's printer apply in deciding on the selling price of a publication sponsored by a department?

The answer I received was:

Cost of printing.

Now, this is rather an oversimplification, and I want to point up the oversimplification by reading the answers I received to two other questions. The other questions were:

What arrangements are made with departments for rebates or alteration of price charged by the queen's printer where publications have a larger sale than anticipated through the queen's printer?

The answer to that question was "None".

My next question was:

If a publication does not sell up to its printing, how is this failure reflected in charges to the department concerned?

The whole problem here relates to the cost charged to government departments for the printing done by the queen's printer. The people who brought these complaints to me I think have very good reasons for feeling that they do not get the kind of service they want from the queen's printer, but that is not the point at issue here. As far as I am concerned I do not like the set-up of the charges; they are very fixed and definite. Some people may say that it does not matter, it is all part of the government whether it is a department or the queen's printer; but I think a department should know much more accurately than that the exact cost of what is printed for it by the queen's printer. If a department comes up with a best seller or something that has a very wide sale or distribution it should be reflected somehow to the department's credit. There is no reason at all why it cannot be.

The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has put out an occasional work that has had a good sale, and I hope in future it will put out more that will have an excellent sale. I cannot see why this particular aspect should not redound to the credit of the department; instead of that we get just a flat answer, "Cost of printing". Costs vary tremendously, obviously, according to the number of copies of the particular edition, the type of lay-out, the pictures, the whole set-up and quality of the magazine or publication, as the case may be. Just the flat statement, "Cost of printing" does not have any regard at all for the aspects I have mentioned. It suggests that within the queen's printer's department there is a brittleness and an inability really to give cost figures that are in relation to the volume of printing and the amount of sales.

In this particular regard I think the queen's printer should make very strenuous efforts to provide departments with some sort of scale of charges so that if they produce something that sells well it is reflected in the charges to them. I would appreciate hearing a comment from the minister in that regard.

Mr. Courtemanche: Details as to cost are given to each department only on request.

Mr. Winch: May I ask one question to clarify an answer given by the minister a few moments ago. Do I understand the minister's reply to mean that irrespective of what may have happened in the past, if in the past year any department sent a request for printing to the queen's printer and this government agency was not able to fill it, because of being overburdened with work or for other reasons, and let that work out to an outside firm somewhere in Canada and then they billed the department concerned for the cost to the queen's printer; and that if an objection was received from the department to the price on the basis that it could have been done cheaper by the queen's printer himself, no adjustment was made with the department at a loss to the queen's printer? Is that the definite policy now, and how long has that been in effect?

Mr. Courtemanche: There is no change in policy. The policy is to charge the cost of publications, whether printed by the queen's printer or outside.

Mr. Winch: Then, Mr. Chairman, we come to a very important point. The minister has now said that there has been no change in policy. The report of the Auditor General was most critical of one phase of the work of the queen's printer. I refer now to the Post Office Department. Work was done for that department by contract let by the queen's printer. The Post Office Department queried that cost and an adjustment was made by the queen's printer at a price that was lower than the cost to the queen's printer on that contract that was let outside.

In view of the minister's statement now that there has been no change in policy, are we to understand that it is still the policy of the minister's department that on challenge they will reduce their own actual cost and recover the difference in some other field of endeavour?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that it was an isolated case that happened two years ago, and since that time it has not happened again.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron (Hull): Can the Secretary of State tell us the total number of publications issued for sale by the queen's printer during the year 1957-58?

Mr. Courtemanche: Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, we do not have this information at hand just now. However, we can supply it a little later.

Mr. Caron: Strange that the total number of publications issued by the queen's printer's department cannot be supplied. Are most of those publications charged to the various departments?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: Are there any which are not charged to various departments?

Mr. Courtemanche: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: Is the number of copies to be printed determined by the departments?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

Mr. Caron: Does the bureau print, in all cases, the exact quantities requested by departments, or can the queen's printer decide on his own to print larger runs?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, the queen's printer may print extra copies for sale to the public.

Mr. Caron: Does he often do so?

Mr. Courtemanche: In most cases he does, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: Now, what were the queen's printer's receipts in 1957-58 on the sale of these publications?

Mr. Courtemanche: About $750,000.

Mr. Caron: "About" $750,000! We are given only approximate figures! The Auditor General was right when he said that there should be changes at the printing bureau with regard to publication.

Mr. Courtemanche: The exact figure is $760,595, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: And now, Mr. Chairman, could the hon. Secretary of State tell us what amount has been recovered by the queen's printer on waste paper sold to various firms like the Florence Paper Company Limited, and others of that kind?

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, waste paper is not sold by the printing bureau, but by the Crown Assets Corporation.

Mr. Caron: At all times?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes, Mr. Chairman, in all cases.

Mr. Caron: Were there large quantities of unsold publications that had to be disposed of as waste paper in 1957-58?

Mr. Courtemanche: There were none in 1957-58, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: Were there any in 1956-57?

Mr. Courtemanche: Nor were there any in 1956-57, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make rather extended remarks on these estimates, but as the public accounts committee is sitting and we have a most able colleague on that committee the many questions I would have asked on this subject will be asked by my colleague there. I am quite sure that when they are answered the result will be about as bad as it was in the case of the questions asked in that committee with respect to the building of the printing bureau.

However, I wish to support the hon. member for Hull in the remarks he made the day before yesterday, I believe, complaining about the situation in the printing bureau. Prior to his remarks and since I have had telephone calls from employees of the bureau saying that they heartily support what their member says, that conditions are most unsatisfactory, that the terms of employment are unsatisfactory, that the method of examination is unsatisfactory and the method of promotion is unsatisfactory.

I would judge from what I have been told by people who have visited me and in telephone calls since the speech by the hon. member, who has received a great deal of support, that apparently there is very low morale and a great deal of dissatisfaction in the printing bureau, and I hope this question will be thoroughly explored in the public accounts committee, as well as working conditions in the building at the present time.

I want to confine my remarks this morning to one question. Some time ago I asked the Secretary of State a question to this effect: Did he know of any senior civil servant who had performed very little service for many years and had been on full salary? I will say frankly that one of the persons I had in mind was the deputy queen's printer. I asked that question on the basis of reliable information from persons very closely associated with the printing bureau. However, some days later the Secretary of State answered that he had not been able to discover any such condition. I want to ask him this question. Did the former deputy queen's printer resign a few days before the minister answered my question in the house?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that he was sick for the past two years, and was obliged to leave because of illness.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister mind repeating that?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am informed that he resigned because of illness. He was sick for the past two years. He did not resign; he was transferred.

Mr. Herridge: To what department was he transferred ?

Mr. Courtemanche: He was transferred to the civil service commission.

Mr. Herridge: He is now a paid civil servant employed with the civil service commission.

Mr. Courtemanche: That is right.

Mr. Herridge: Is the minister quite sure that this sickness had only extended over a period of two years?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: And before that he performed his full duties? He attended his office regularly?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Be careful about your answer.

Mr. Caron: Was not his sickness due to overwork imposed upon him by the queen's printer?

(Translation):

Mr. Courtemanche: I do not feel qualified to answer that question.

(Text):

Mr. Caron: Can the queen's printer not answer that through the minister?

Mr. Courtemanche: My answer is the same.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this subject is departed from, as a former minister who was in charge of the bureau at the time this gentleman was performing his functions I should like to say that I never encountered anywhere in the public service a more devoted or hard working person than this gentleman.

Mr. Herridge: I quite appreciate the comments of the former minister. I want to ask the Secretary of State a further question. Is the same treatment that was accorded the deputy queen's printer accorded all civil servants? Are they permitted to have two years' absence on full pay because of sickness?

Mr. Courtemanche: He was away from the office for about nine months. When he came back he was unable to fulfil his duties, and that is why he was transferred.

Mr. Caron: What was his salary as assistant to the Queen's printer?

Mr. Courtemanche: It was $12,000 a year.

Mr. Caron: What is his present salary?

The Deputy Chairman: I think that question is out of the realm of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Caron: I want to show that he never asked for the transfer but that the transfer was arranged by the queen's printer. He was not transferred in accordance with his wishes, and the queen's printer must know what has happened to that man after he left.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister explain whether it was just by a strange coincidence that after two years of illness—and we will not go into that, but I think it is going to be investigated—within a number of days after the question was asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West the transfer was arranged? Then the minister gets up and says he cannot find anyone in the position set out by the member for Kootenay West. Will the minister explain this most strange coincidence?

Mr. Courtemanche: The question was asked one month ago, and I can assure the hon. member that the day I was appointed I was advised of the illness of the deputy queen's printer.

Mr. Winch: My question was, when was the transfer arranged? Was it not after the question was asked, so as to enable the minister to give an answer that would not be embarrassing?

Mr. Courtemanche: This transfer had been under consideration for the previous four months.

Mr. Argue: On what date was it made?

Mr. Courtemanche: It was made on August 1.

Mr. Herridge: That is just the point. My next question is, do the other employees of the printing plant receive the same consideration from the queen's printer with respect to leave of absence on full pay, in this case $12,000 a year, that has been received by the deputy queen's printer? Is this a common practice? Let us have fair play for everybody, no matter how humble they are.

Mr. Courtemanche: His leave of absence was all because of illness.

Mr. Herridge: My point is, do other employees of the printing plant receive exactly the same consideration in connection with leave of absence for illness?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes, as does any civil servant.

Mr. Winch: Would the minister be prepared to make available the record of leave of absence for illness of this same individual for the last five years, the record of illness or the record of being away from the job during the past five years?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes, it will be tabled.

Mr. Caron: After killing himself on the job I am told that the man who was transferred has had his salary cut to half what it was when he was assistant to the queen's printer?

Mr. Courtemanche: I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. Winch: If the man was too ill to carry on his responsibilities, what was the basis for his transfer to another position; illness?

Mr. Courtemanche: He was transferred to a job that he was able to do because he was no longer able to carry on the work of assistant queen's printer.

Mr. Caron: It may help the minister if I tell him that the man is very happy since he has been away from the printing bureau.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if the minister could provide us with the proportion of printing, both inside and outside, by the queen's printer that is in English and in French. I want a ratio such as 70 to 30 or 65 to 35.

Mr. Courtemanche: We have no information about the amount spent for French or English publications.

Mr. Fisher: My question is not directed to the amount in terms of money, it is the amount in terms of volume or lineage. Surely the queen's printer has some idea of the ratio of printing done in English and printing done in French.

Mr. Courtemanche: They do not have any record because some printing is in English and some is in French and some is done in bilingual establishments.

Mr. Fisher: Has it been the case within the last year or two that orders for printing in English, that is publications printed in English, were placed in printing shops in Quebec, what you might call French printing shops? In other words, has the queen's printer had French printers printing English publications?

Mr. Courtemanche: There is no discrimination. They use the printers able to do the jobs, that is all.

Mr. Fisher: It seems to me there is an important point here. I should like to put it this way. As I said before, you have $2,800,000 worth of outside printing in Ontario and $1,452,000 in contracts going to Quebec, but almost nothing in the other provinces. I should like to know why more of the printing of publications in English cannot be done in the other provinces. We realize that bilingual printers in Quebec may have some advantage in connection with French publications or publications that contain both French and English within the one cover, but it seems to me in all fairness that if the publication is purely and simply an English one, then that contract should go to English-speaking Canada. And if it is purely and simply a French publication, then it should go to Quebec. I know the line cannot be drawn too tightly, but I suggest the minister consider this particular point.

Mr. Courtemanche: I answered this question a few minutes ago, and as I have said, in the future we will try to spread the printing of publications outside of the main provinces.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot allow that last statement to go by without some comment. I wonder if the hon. member for Port Arthur realizes just how serious the statement is that he has made. He is reiterating in effect what has been said so often, that those who reside in the province of Quebec should be relegated to that province and no place else. I know that is not his intention, but when he makes the statement that English publications should be printed in English Canada and French publications in the province of Quebec, I think that has pretty serious implications.

After all, there are in the province of Quebec printing establishments that could print pamphlets and the like in both languages. Some of these firms are composed of French speaking people who can, with competence and efficiency, print publications in the English language as well as in the French language. I am sure the hon. member —and I want to say this in fairness to him —did not have that intention in his mind. I certainly could not sit here and allow that statement to go by without challenging it in some form. I am sure it is not the intention of the printing bureau or of the minister that printing should be allocated in that way. There are in my opinion in the province of Quebec, as well as in the province of Ontario certain establishments such as Le Droit—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And La Feuille d'Érable in Windsor and Tecumseh.

Mr. Chevrier: —and La Feuille d'Érable in Windsor and many others which could do equally good jobs in the English language and in the French language.

Mr. Bourque: As a retired printer, having spent my entire life in the printing industry and having published some of the best, the handsomest and the most deluxe books in Canada, I say this hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. In the province of Quebec we print English, French, and any other language as well as it is done in any other province in Canada or any other place on the American continent.

Mr. Fisher: I made no reflection on the quality of printing in Quebec at all. One of the pleasing things about Quebec is that they have managed not only to print quite a number of private publications but also have managed to sell enough of them to pay for it. I am quite complimentary in that regard. If I indicated that I thought French printing should be confined just to Quebec and English printing just to the rest of Canada, I made a mistake in my expression of opinion. What I meant was this; let us put it this way. If you have a document that is appearing only in English, naturally I feel that you should go to an English printer, if you can define an English speaking establishment; and if you have a wholly French document, then you should go to a French printer.

Mr. Courtemanche: As I said a few moments ago, we ask for tenders, whether in French or English, if they are able to do that.

Mr. Regnier: I should like to tell the hon. member for Port Arthur that in St. Boniface we can print in French, and across the river in Winnipeg we can print in English, Ukrainian, German and any other language you want.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to point out that if the minister is interested in seeing printing done in St. Boniface, some arrangement might be made with the queen's printer by the Secretary of State. Obviously from these figures not much printing is getting far away from Ontario and Quebec.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 321 carry?

Mr. Bourque: I think that what the hon. gentleman who spoke previously has said is entirely wrong. When I was in the printing trade—I retired in 1952—in the establishment I was with, and it was a French establishment, more than 75 per cent of our staff was English. I know of other places, English establishments, that have French staff. For instance, I am thinking of the Gazette in Montreal, one of the very best printing plants in Canada or on the American continent. I might say that I am sure their staff must be about 50 per cent to 60 per cent French in the printing department.

326. Printing and binding the annual statutes, $35,000.

Mr. Fisher: I want to ask some questions in connection with the annual statutes. In addition to the full depository privileges accorded to libraries, would they receive these statutes automatically?

Mr. Courtemanche: Distribution of the statutes is made only by order in council after a list has been established.

Mr. Fisher: In others words, a library that is one of the approximately 400 that have full selection privileges or full depository privileges does not have the right to the annual statutes. Is that correct?

Mr. Courtemanche: Not as such, but if it is on the list established by decision of the cabinet, it is allowed to obtain a copy of the statutes.

Mr. Fisher: What list is this?

Mr. Courtemanche: I am told that the officials are ready to send the hon. member a copy of the order in council. The situation is as follows. Free distribution of the revised and annual statutes of Canada is regulated by the Publication of Statutes Act, chapter 230, R.S.C. 1952. Regulations governing the free distribution to authorized categories are contained in order in council P.C. 1953-609, dated April 27, 1953, as amended by P.C. 1953-1661, dated October 28, 1953, which also provides that the recipients may automatically receive a similar number of semi-monthly editions of the Canada Gazette, part II, printed in the same language.

Mr. Fisher: My point in connection with this matter is that the revised statutes plus the annual statutes to bring them up to date cost a considerable amount of money. There are a number of libraries—for example, I know of one that has been fairly recently established—that have selection and depository privileges now, but for such retroactive purchases they are up against quite a bill. I want to know the difficulties that will be in the way of such an institution acquiring these back files gratis in the way they acquire current publications.

Mr. Courtemanche: That would have to be done by decision of the treasury board in every case.

Mr. Fisher: On each individual case?

Mr. Courtemanche: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 326 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I probably should have asked this question on vote 624, but perhaps the minister would not object to my asking it now. I should like to know what revenue has been received from the sale of publications in the most recent period.

Mr. Courtemanche: Last year the amount was $853,171.95 less $93,462.02, which was for advertising.

LEGISLATION

The Speaker of the Senate—

181. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

The Deputy Chairman: This item may be found at page 37 of the blue book, with the details at page 266.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know whether I am in order at this stage, but I think before I proceed I should say that it is a pleasure to have the Speaker of the house in a position where we can perhaps speak to him with more authority than we can when he is in the chair. I am sure none of us would wish to do other than treat him with the same equity that he metes out to us when he is in the chair, and my understanding is that as a rule the estimates of the Speaker do not take a long time to consider. But there are a number of points I should like to raise, if I may.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As long as they are not points of order.

Mr. Chevrier: One has to do with a matter which came up for discussion in the house some little time ago, and that was the admission by the Prime Minister that he had installed a loudspeaker system in his office. When I say he made an admission, I should add that it was mentioned first in this chamber by another hon. member. The question I should like to ask is whether this matter had been discussed with Your Honour. Perhaps I could reserve the second question until I have received a reply.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should answer that question by indicating how the loudspeaker system in the House of Commons originated and how it is operated. I think hon. members will recall, and certainly the hon. member for Laurier will recall, that in 1950 or 1951 a committee of the house was appointed under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker Macdonald to deal with the question of sound amplification in the chamber, which had been under discussion for some time, and the committee reported to the effect that a system similar to that in use in the United Kingdom parliament should be adopted.

Following the authority given in that way by the house, the installation and operation of the equipment was undertaken by the Department of Public Works and has been carried on by that department ever since. So there is nothing in the votes now before us which relates to this system. Obviously, however, it is a matter which is under the direction and control of the House of Commons. I am not sure what was the question which the hon. member asked me—

Mr. Chevrier: The question was, did the Prime Minister discuss this with Your Honour at all?

Mr. Speaker: No, the Prime Minister did not discuss it with me.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should make the position a little clearer. I am not complaining about what has been done in itself. I think the duties of the Prime Minister and his obligations and responsibilities to the country are such that there are decisions which perhaps he has a right to take in certain circumstances, and I am not complaining of this decision. What I am complaining about is the fact that it was not first discussed in the house, having regard particularly to another point; that this is a matter which concerns parliament, not the privy council or the Prime Minister. His Honour the Speaker has said it was not discussed with him.

The next question is this. Does the Speaker, in view of the responsibilities he holds, and in view of his position, think this matter should have been discussed with him before it was done and announced in the house?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that I should express an opinion of the kind the hon. member invites me to express. I agree that the control of the amplification system is a matter for the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I know that the actual expenditure comes under the Department of Public Works, but this goes far beyond that. It is matter affecting the rights of members of parliament, because if this were pursued to an extreme, I suppose every hon. member would have the right to demand the same privilege, which would be ridiculous, I agree at once.

The point I am trying to make is that while the expenditure and control and installation of the public address system are matters for the Department of Public Works, surely the other aspect, whether a member should take it upon himself to make this extension, either rightfully or otherwise—I am not discussing that in itself—is a matter with regard to which the Speaker should be consulted. Surely the Speaker, who is the first commoner, should be advised, and he should be the one to announce it to the house rather than the person—rather than the Prime Minister—who did so on this occasion. What I am complaining about is not the decision itself, not the principle, but the fact that we were not told about this prior to it being done.

Mr. Herridge: I rise to support the protest which has been made by the hon. member for Laurier and his approach to the situation and his expression of his understanding of what should have been the proper procedure.

I understand that when the Prime Minister was replying to a question I raised in the house on this same subject some weeks ago, he mentioned that Prime Minister Macmillan in the United Kingdom House of Commons had a similar device. I presume he got the idea when Prime Minister Macmillan was visiting Canada. However, I understand the matter was raised in the British House of Commons and that it was the cause of some jocular comment, as is very usual in the British House of Commons, possibly because they have a greater sense of humour there than some of the rather stodgy people who inhabit this chamber.

Be that as it may, I think the hon. member for Laurier has established a sound proposition, and that the Prime Minister should have brought this matter to the attention of the house so that objections might have been raised or assent given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to say a word or two on this matter. As the hon. member for Laurier has mentioned, all of us fully appreciate the heavy responsibilities which rest on the shoulders of whoever is charged with heading the government of our country. We all sympathize with the present Prime Minister, who is faced with the very heavy tasks attached to his office. And I am sure that every one of us, wherever we sit, would wish to extend to him any facility which would permit him to discharge those responsibilities in the easiest possible manner.

But I think that would have to be conditioned by the rights which are attached not to individual members of parliament alone, but to parliament as a whole; rights which have their roots in rich tradition and history; rights which have been respected over the years and which are recognized by all who subscribe to our concept of parliamentary government. It should be noted that the effectiveness of parliament may be determined by adherence to practices and privileges which can come only from parliament.

The hon. member for Laurier asked the Speaker whether or not he was consulted by the Prime Minister before the latter decided on the employment of the particular device about which comment is now made. The Speaker in reply said he had not been consulted by the Prime Minister, that there had been no communication between himself and the Prime Minister. I believe, however, that the question goes much further than a mere consultation between the Speaker and the Prime Minister, and certainly further than a mere declaration by the Speaker of what might have been decided upon assuming that there had been consultation.

I would think if the Prime Minister had consulted the Speaker it would be a matter of obligation for the Speaker to advise the house, and in some form to obtain the permission of the house. We all have the greatest confidence in His Honour, but I am sure the Speaker would not regard as his prerogative a decision of that kind. It is a decision that would have to be made by parliament itself.

The hon. member for Kootenay West was quite correct. When Her Majesty's Prime Minister in the United Kingdom decided to employ an electronic device to enable him to be in more continuous contact with the House of Commons the matter was brought to the attention of the house prior to the device being installed. Hon. members who are familiar with the parliament at Westminster will recall that in the dining room and in at least one of the commons rooms

hon. members are enabled to meet with constituents and visitors while out of the chamber, particularly at the dinner hour, and through a ticker tape device or similar mechanism that is employed there they have an opportunity of knowing what is being said at that moment by a speaker in the house.

There is a debate to be found in the British Hansard on that very subject. A committee had recommended that this technique be employed, but it was decided upon only as the result of a common agreement entered into by the members of the House of Commons. We should not be misunderstood, then, in our comments this morning. No one has complained about the desire on the part of the Prime Minister to keep in close contact with this house through the device employed; but the Prime Minister, who has in the past been so jealous of the rights of parliament, will be the first to recognize that in so far as the rights of parliament are concerned, Prime Minister or no Prime Minister, his rights are not any greater than those of the most recent acquisition to the membership of this house. Every hon. member of parliament standing before Mr. Speaker has the same privileges and the same obligations.

I am sure the Prime Minister would recognize that because, as I say, so much of his time in the past in this house and outside has been spent in reminding us and the nation of the richness of our heritage symbolized by this form of parliamentary government. In his zeal to preserve the traditions and liberties of this house he would be the first, I know, to condemn with the rest of us any change in practice that would in any way destroy those traditions and privileges.

Mr. Speaker will recall that when in the throne speech debate I complimented him, as other hon. members had done, on his election to the speakership, I mentioned the observation of Mr. Harold Nicholson who had said the Speaker was, after all, the custodian of the rights of parliament and of the rights of minorities in parliament. I would suggest to the Speaker that in the prudent way in which he does these things he will want to give consideration as to how this particular matter can be brought back into a proper setting in accordance with our traditions and rights. If something is not done what is to prevent—I do not say through the Prime Minister but through some other person—by the electronic devices which in this modern day and age we have decided to set up, finding ourselves, notwithstanding a decision of parliament, in a position where our words might some day be beamed across the wires and used by radio stations, just as is the case in the province of Saskatchewan where it is done by permission. In the instance I am postulating one can conceive of all sorts of uses that might be made of electronic devices or of some indirect method of broadcasting the debates of this house because of the precedent that has already been established by the Prime Minister.

Are the deliberations of the committees of this house broadcast into the office of the Prime Minister? I do not know. If they are that would be likewise a matter that would have to be considered by Mr. Speaker, and certainly by hon. members of those committees and by the house.

In raising this matter this morning in the responsible and dignified way he did the hon. member for Laurier has, I believe, rendered a service to parliament, and has given us an opportunity of reminding ourselves once again of the traditions and privileges of this house. He has underlined in a way the appreciation we all have for civil liberties; of those things that are protected and guaranteed in a bill of rights and are inherent in law not codified. A bill of rights and all the concepts that accompany it is important, but it is important, too, that those who sponsor these things and advocate them should not themselves be among those who are counted as the first violators of what a bill of rights is supposed to protect.

I speak in this debate not as an older member but as one who has been in the house for a long time and who speaks of these things, I think, with some feeling and I should also like to think with some appreciation. I want to express my gratitude as a member of this house, as a House of Commons man who is jealous of its traditions and who wants to see them preserved, to the hon. member for Laurier for raising this matter in the way he did today, and I commend his words and those of the hon. member for Kootenay West and my more modest contribution to His Honour the Speaker.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I can see no real argument against the principle that when action of this kind is being contemplated the house itself should be asked to make the decision. However, in fairness to the Prime Minister I want to say that although he might have had this device installed in his office and not in the offices of any of his colleagues or the offices of the opposition personnel, he did not hesitate to tell me very soon after it had been installed that he did have such a loudspeaker, and he invited me to go to his office to hear it in operation, which I did. I might say there was quite a large delegation in his office when we arrived, so I did not stay for any length of time, but it seemed to be in good working order, and there were controls on the device which made it possible to raise and lower the level, or shut it off.

If permission had been granted by the house, and if the device were in the Prime Minister's office because of that permission having been granted, I for one would feel that even that might have been a mistake. I realize how very busy the Prime Minister is, and no doubt in the future the calls on his time will be greater than they have been in the past. It will be more difficult for him to spend long hours in the House of Commons in the future, but I would think that for the best carrying out of the functions of his office there is no substitute for attendance in the House of Commons itself.

So far as the deliberations of this house are concerned, the opinions of the government members as well as the opinions of the opposition members and the sense of the atmosphere itself are necessary to the proper conducting of the affairs of government; and the members of the government, and the Prime Minister in particular, should be here.

I do not think anyone believes that when the Prime Minister is in his office he has this device on all the time. I would not think so. I think it would be very distracting, and that it would be almost impossible for him to carry on his other work. Certainly when he has delegations coming into his office the loudspeaker in his office would have to be closed off, so that in practical effect what is happening is that the Prime Minister directly hears very little of what goes on in this chamber.

I am wondering whether someone else has been detailed continually to listen to what is going on in this house so that if something breaks, something that would appear to require the Prime Minister's attention in the house, he is informed that this matter is being debated in the house.

Mr. Dinsdale: The whip can do that.

Mr. Argue: I think that is the job of the whip. I think it is the job the whip should be doing, and I think that is the proper way it should be done.

Then, as the hon. member for Essex East has said, this type of system lends itself to additional or expanding use, and it would be a very simple step to record from that loudspeaker the words used in this house so that if some very important contribution was being made to a debate and the Prime Minister was unable, because of very important other duties, to listen to the loudspeaker at that moment, then the important excerpts of the debate might be played back for his benefit and, with this knowledge, he could come into the house and take part in the debate.

I have very sincere feelings on this matter. I have spent many years in the House of Commons, all of the years when the former prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, was occupying that position. Members who were in the house at that time will know that the former prime minister was a faithful attendant and spent a large part of his time in this house.

I often asked myself the question; how can the prime minister take so much time to be in his place in the house and spend many hours here? Evening after evening the former prime minister, if he was not in his own seat in this house was nevertheless in the chamber. If one of his ministers was conducting departmental matters the former prime minister would be probably in one of the back rows listening very carefully to what was going on.

I think those many long hours that he spent in this house were not a waste of time. They enabled him to conduct better the position of prime minister. I hope our Prime Minister of today will read the remarks that have been made in this debate, if he is not listening to them, and will give them a great deal of attention. I should hope that he would consider whether or not such a device was in fact helpful to the conduct of his office as Prime Minister.

It would be my opinion that a prime minister who occupied his seat in this house for long periods of time would gain a far greater sense of what was the feeling of the House of Commons on any given subject and would, because of his extended attendance in the house, be able to discharge his all-important duties more efficiently than he can by attempting to discharge them in some other way.

Mr. Fisher: I wanted to make some remarks and ask questions in connection with the library of parliament. I suppose I can ask my questions on this particular item.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 191 is the general administration item.

Mr. Fisher: I just thought it would be like the other estimates and we could take it up on the first item.

The Deputy Chairman: We are really on the Senate now.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Argue.]

183. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to ask the Speaker what his views were in connection with the possible expenses for air travel, if that should be introduced. We have members' travelling expenses under this particular item at the present time. I wondered whether, if there be developed a discussion in relation to extending this privilege, the Speaker would have any views as to whether those expenses should come in this particular area or whether they should come under the Department of Transport. Further, I should like to ask whether he has had any consultation in connection with this particular question as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can answer the question after one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: We were on vote 183. Shall vote 183 carry? I would point out to hon. members that the general administration item is 185. Shall vote 183 carry?

Mr. McGee: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Broome: With regard to item 183, just before one o'clock the hon. member for Port Arthur spoke about providing air transportation for members whose ridings are a long way from Ottawa and I should like to support what he said.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would wait until we get to vote 185, the administration item.

Item agreed to.

185. General administration—estimates of the Clerk, $1,873,265.

Mr. Broome: I should like to support what the hon. member for Port Arthur said with regard to air transportation. If we were to remain silent our silence might be interpreted as meaning we do not support his viewpoint. Hon. members from British Columbia in particular do support his viewpoint. When I was at the parliamentary conference recently in Rio de Janeiro I was interested to learn that members of the United Kingdom parliament are provided with air transportation between their constituencies and London as they require it. I do not think anybody is asking for a wide open pass system but I believe that consideration should be given to the issuing of a limited number of passes, preferably to those members whose constituencies are such a great distance from Ottawa as in the case of those from the far west and perhaps those from Newfoundland. The matter has been brought up time after time and I wish to state that I stand wholeheartedly behind the request that we be given this type of transportation.

Mr. Chambers: I should like to ask a question regarding the numbering of the offices in the building. Is any consideration being given to improving the system so that visitors may find our offices and, for that matter, so that new members may find their way home each evening?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to join wholeheartedly in what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said. I have been around this building for 20 years and I have never yet been able to figure out what the numbering system is. I doubt if anyone else has.

Mr. Speaker: I am glad to state that a study is being made of a more intelligible numbering system. That study was instituted two or three weeks ago, I believe, and was sparked by a letter from the Postmaster General who complained about the same matter, I understand, in previous sessions. I believe that a much more understandable system is being devised. As a matter of fact, I know that a much better system has been devised and it now remains to secure the agreement of the Senate and the Department of Public Works in order to put it into operation. I take it that it might be put into operation most conveniently when a new directory is issued. The matter is well in hand and I hope we shall have a system which will help explain itself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Talking about systems, I know that this matter does not come under the Speaker but I make the suggestion through him that the government might consider the desirability of transferring to the Speaker authority over the refrigeration system which is now non-existent in the house. Reasons have been suggested why it has not been functioning in recent weeks. I do not expect the Speaker to reply to what I am saying because obviously he must be a disinterested party, but I am wondering why all matters pertaining to the house do not come under the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: In spite of the opportunity to remain silent which my hon. friend gave me, I should like to say that I have been as concerned as he has with the inefficiency of the air cooling system which, as he knows, was installed in 1947. With the approach of hot weather recently I took it upon myself to ask the Minister of Public Works, whose department is responsible for the heating and cooling of the building, to see that we got a better system. I know there are some difficulties which it may not be possible to overcome this session but I shall not be content unless we have an efficient system before another session.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I was the first person who brought this subject into the open in this house. I was quite unsatisfied by the technical explanation given to us by the Minister of Public Works that the election of 200-odd Conservative members had increased the hot air so much in the chamber that the cooling system would no longer work. I thought the minister was exaggerating the power of hon. gentlemen opposite. But lest there be any misapprehension about the matter I would point out that in happier days in previous sessions, as I mentioned, the system seemed to work perfectly.

Mr. McGee: With reference to the remark just made by the member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may I say that a report is circulating throughout the building that the engineers found that the cooling system broke down under the impact of so many Liberals in the house in the past. I should like to support the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver South as it represents the wishes of all members of the house whose ridings are a considerable distance from this city. I support their request for a limited and reasonable number of air passes.

The reason I rose was to inquire about the number of free copies of Hansard allotted to each member. I understand that comes under this item. This matter is the cause of one of the many difficulties I have encountered in representing a constituency with over 200,000 people. I believe the number of copies of Hansard is 16 and there are at least 16 newspapers servicing various parts of the riding in which I live. If I were to designate that these free copies of Hansard be sent to these newspapers I would not be covering the ground. I wonder whether the Speaker might have some suggestion with regard to what I know will be the general agreement of members of the house to provide for the relief of McGee in this matter.

Mr. Speaker: A similar question was asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur. The present arrangement was approved by the house on May 28, 1948, and the order of the house will be found in the Journals of that day at page 490. The order authorized 16 copies to be sent free on the nomination of each member and hon. members are familiar with the arrangements by which that is done. The free copies are not charged specifically but are charged generally against the printing vote which is one of the items in the legislation estimates. The queen's printer is paid for the printing of Hansard and these copies are simply taken out of the supply that is printed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I cannot claim that there are 16 newspapers published in my constituency because actually there is not one, and perhaps it is almost unique in Canada in that respect. But I think those of us representing constituencies where there are very few or no newspapers available have an even greater need of Hansard to inform our constituents of what is going on than those who have the good fortune to have newspapers circulating in their constituencies. I find that I have to spend a good deal out of my own pocket to provide for what I believe are the legitimate desires of representative citizens of the constituency who want to be informed about public affairs.

Perhaps I should not trespass upon Your Honour's time by bringing this up at this moment, but I do feel that perhaps the commissioners of internal economy might give consideration to making a recommendation to the house which could increase this allowance somewhat.

Mr. Herridge: I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for York-Scarborough mention the sending of free copies of Hansard to 16 newspapers. I have a number of newspapers in my constituency of the same free enterprise type, but they are willing to stand on their own feet and pay for their Hansards. In addition to that, I was very surprised to hear this representative of the capitalist class asking for an increase in federal expenditure for providing his constituents more free Hansards. I am a poor little socialist living in the backwoods, and I send out a lot of Hansards to my constituents, but I am quite willing to pay the shot because I believe in that type of free enterprise.

I rise particularly to express the appreciation of this group for the services, courtesy and work of the staff of the House of Commons, particularly in view of the long hours they have had to put in in recent weeks. I am referring to the protective staff, the messengers, some of whom have to travel many miles on rather ancient legs; the page boys and the other members of the staff, including the nurse, whom I attended upon for the first time yesterday and who was able to bring me back into action this morning, for which I am very grateful. I should like to mention also the Hansard reporters and the ladies to whom I refer as the Hansard angels, who have to take dictation from these reporters. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, while there is some excuse for the unusual length of this session, that in future this house will be able to arrange its work to the better advantage of the members and to the better advantage of the staff, so that neither the staff nor the members are denied the opportunity of spending some of their time during the general holiday season with their children, their grandchildren or in some cases their great grandchildren.

Before concluding, I want to make a special plea for what I understand are officially known as the cleaning ladies. I arrive at this house usually between 7.30 and 7.45 in the morning. I am constantly meeting delegations with various complaints. I understand that in recent years, under a previous Speaker, certain changes in the rules were made with respect to their hours. I am told that many of these ladies are married and they have to get here very early in the morning. One lady told me she got up at 4.30 to get here in time to undertake her work. I understand that the ruling now provides that they must stay here until 8.30. I find on arrival that the great majority have already completed their work, and in many cases they have to sit around for an hour or more until close to 8.30 when they can go down and punch the clock to go home.

Now, I feel this is entirely unnecessary. I have observed it for a good many months, and I think it is completely unnecessary that these people, who can complete their work within a certain time, should not be allowed to go when their work has been completed instead of being required to stay around for an hour or so until 8.30.

Mr. Hardie: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: Other members say "hear, hear", so I am sure they have had the same experience. I raise this question because these people have not much opportunity to speak for themselves. I do feel that consideration should be given to the matter so that when their work is completed they would be allowed to leave or at least allowed to leave at a reasonable time and not required to simply stay around for an hour or more in order to comply with this regulation. They have to go home and do their housework, attend to their children and so on.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Before we leave this item, I should like to add my support to the views expressed by the hon. member for York-Scarborough on the matter of distribution of free Hansards. I can quite understand the reluctance of the hon. member for Kootenay West in wanting to see these circulated because if there were enough copies circulated, and enough people read them, not only the Social Credit party would be eliminated but his group as well.

Mr. Herridge: I send Hansard out to anyone in my constituency who asks for one.

Mr. McGee: I hope the hon. member for Kootenay West had his tongue in his cheek when he made reference to the poor, starving socialists. Unfortunately, I do not happen to live in a country estate in the mountains, I live in a small house in suburbia. I cannot afford to pay out what would amount to more than $2,000 over a normal session. I had requests from constituents immediately following election in June for something over 120, and they are still on the list. As I say, I am a poor starving capitalist who lives in suburbia, and I cannot afford that amount of money.

Mr. Fisher: I wanted to ask if Your Honour could define for us the rules in relation to what happens to the clerical staff at the end of the session. There was a certain amount of confusion after dissolution as to what our rights were with regard to the use of clerical help. There may be some question immediately after this session closes. I know some members want to leave immediately, but I wondered what the rights were of the members who desired to stay for a few days and possibly use a secretary to complete some work.

Mr. Speaker: In my brief experience, Mr. Chairman, with the administration of this essential service to the members, that is the secretarial service, the only principle I have followed was to try to give to the members all the service that they required within the capacity of the staff and the money. We have a vote which provides for some 38 permanent stenographers and 140 sessional stenographers. The immediate problem is service at the end of the session and I can say that, as at the end of past sessions, any member who wants secretarial service for a few days or a reasonable time after the end of the session to complete his arrangements, can be assured of having that service.

There is also a secretarial pool here during the recess, and members who come here during the recess can call on the stenographic services available. Although they may not be able to have their customary secretary, there will be a competent secretary from the pool available. There are some of these secretaries on a continuous basis who are assigned definitely to local members who can carry on their constituency correspondance the year round because they live near Ottawa. Obviously, that is not possible for distant members.

Mr. Speakman: I should like to ask Mr. Speaker if he would look into the difference in salaries received by the House of Commons messengers as against salaries received by messengers in the other place whose duties are considerably less, whose time is required considerably less, but who I believe are getting considerably more.

Mr. Garland: I should like to pursue very briefly, Mr. Chairman, the matter with which we were dealing prior to lunch, that is the matter of the installation in the Prime Minister's office. As a result of that I am wondering whether we are correct in assuming that these wires can be tapped without Mr. Speaker's permission.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is talking about the physical possibility, I would say that I do not inspect them and that I do not know whether they have been or are being tapped. I think the point was fairly well dealt with previously when it was discussed and I do not think I have anything to add.

Mr. Garland: I make no apology for raising the matter again because Mr. Speaker is the first commoner and there is no one else to whom we can turn for protection in a matter of this kind. When Mr. Speaker said that he was not consulted prior to the installation, I wonder whether he could say if he has been consulted since the installation. I have two or three points in mind. The first is this. Can he say precisely to what use this service is being put at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: I can say that I have had no requests from any members of the house for the extension of the loud speaker service beyond the chamber.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps Mr. Speaker misunderstood my question. The question I asked was this. Can he say precisely to what use this service is being put at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: No. It is not within my knowledge. Before the adjournment I expressed my view that this amplification system, which was authorized initially by the house, is a matter for the direction and control of the house. As Speaker, of course, I am only the servant of the house and I do as I am authorized and directed to do by the house.

Mr. Garland: What assurance have members of the house that other installations of a similar nature are not in effect even at this precise moment?

Mr. Speaker: I shall make inquiry to see whether there are any others and will inform the hon. member of the result of my inquiry.

Mr. Garland: Can he perhaps say at the same time whether any other installations are being contemplated at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: I have dealt with that matter in the previous answer.

Mr. McGee: There is one other matter I wish to mention concerning the arrangements in the building. It has come to my attention that there have been a considerable number of visitors, both from the United States and Canada, and it is my understanding that of late there has been a larger percentage of Canadians visiting the building, a fact which adds some force to my suggestion. Frequent comments have been made to me and they come indirectly from others to the effect that the hours when tours of the building are available to visitors of the building are rather restricted. I would suggest that Mr. Speaker give consideration to extending the facilities or extending the hours and, if necessary, to hiring college students or high school students to assist the staff who are already rather heavily burdened in this matter. I have one further suggestion concerning the arrangements in the house. It would seem to me that it might be desirable to have some pamphlet giving a brief description of the house and possibly some historical background available free to visitors of the house and not to have the procedure presently in effect, as I understand it, by which they must purchase this information. I would greatly appreciate it if these matters could be considered.

Mr. Speaker: I shall be glad to give consideration to these suggestions. In fact, I have already done so. The number of visitors to the parliament buildings is increasing each year. Last year the number was 50,000 more than the year before, to a total of 350,000. The Sergeant at Arms informs me that at the present time there are approximately 3,000 visitors a day to the parliament buildings. I think the hours are not out of line. I believe that an attempt was made to keep the buildings open in the evenings and it was found that there was really no call for it. It also complicates the other arrangements. We have an excellent guide service, I believe. Hon. members will have observed and heard the protective staff taking parties about the parliament buildings. I think they do a good and courteous job. If more are needed, of course they will be added. We are in a state where our visitors are increasing and we may be obliged to change the present system or alternatively to add to it. It may be that the number of visitors will interfere with parliament itself and some restriction may have to be put on if we become any more popular than we are at the moment.

Mr. Peters: Some mention was made a few minutes ago to Hansard. A United States visitor was over here a few weeks ago and he dropped in to see me. He commented on the fact that copies of our Hansard were not as difficult to obtain as were the records of the United States congress. He does considerable work in the legislative field there and was interested in this matter. He pointed out that the people who visit here—and there are thousands every day—are not readily exposed to the fact that they can buy Hansard if they wish to do so, and that it is a factual record of the house. I should like to make the suggestion that we put a rack in the lobby of the House of Commons where Hansard is displayed. If it were thought fit to give copies away, that would be fine but if it were not thought fit to do that, they might be available so that visitors could purchase them at the regular price. We could probably encourage a great deal more interest in the House of Commons and in the debates that take place here if the people were to know that this type of information was available at the very low price we charge for it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should say just one word on that matter and on the suggestion of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. We sell some souvenir booklets, as hon. members know, at the base of the elevator to the peace tower and that sale is handled by the protective staff. That is a matter which has recently come under my notice and I have been considering whether or not we have the best possible method of supplying the essential documents to tourists. It was suggested that we give a booklet. We have a booklet with which all hon. members are familiar. It is a little booklet published by the queen's printer. I think we pay ten cents for it. It is an illustrated booklet and it tells how parliament works. It is a very good short summary in a convenient size. If we gave this booklet to each of the tourists this year, for example, at ten cents apiece it would cost us $30,000. I do not know whether parliament is prepared to go into that kind of expenditure. The books are available to those who want them at fifteen cents. I have been considering the possibility of a free distribution but I am not convinced that it would be the best use of the money. The tourists seem to get what they want and they are ready to pay for it. However, I am interested in what the hon. members say and I shall be glad to have their representations from time to time.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps this might be an opportune or appropriate time to pay a compliment to Mr. Speaker for the excellent presentation he made on television the other evening with regard to this aspect of the matter.

Mr. Aiken: There is one matter which several visitors have mentioned to me. It concerns the sale of pamphlets at the base of the peace tower. Some of the visitors felt that after they have had a very nice tour of the building and were ready to depart, pamphlets were being hawked to them at the entrance to the memorial chamber.

This was earlier in the year. I did mention the matter to the Clerk, and I think the situation is much better now in that they are not being pushed. But I think we should give serious consideration to how far the protective staff should go in presenting these pamphlets so that it shall not appear that the public is paying for the privilege of the tour by buying a book.

Mr. Bigg: With the development of the north country an added burden is imposed on those members who serve this vast territory. We are not able to move around our constituencies without aeroplanes, because there are no roads and no railroads, and I simply point out that no special allowance is available to members who are obliged to use aeroplanes for this purpose. The problem does not affect a great many members, but it does impose a great burden on those who are concerned.

Mr. Hardie: Since the hon. member for Athabasca has brought up this subject of air travel and the difficulties experienced in covering these northern constituencies adequately, I must say I agree with him—I think this view would be shared by hon. members representing Meadow Lake, Peace River and other similar constituencies—that it is extremely difficult for a member of parliament to serve these northern constituencies to the same degree as urban constituencies are served by those who represent them. In my constituency, for instance, since this session will go on possibly for another two or three weeks, I understand—

Mr. Argue: A month.

Mr. Hardie: —maybe a month, or six weeks, then. In any event, the people in the northern half of my riding expect the same services of me as those who live in the southern area. Freeze-up comes any time after September 3, which means that if I am to cover that riding I must leave here before the end of the session, arrive in Yellowknife, and charter an aircraft, which costs between 55 and 75 cents a mile, in order to reach these people in the north. I have to leave before the end of the session so that I can cover this part of my constituency on floats, take an aircraft that is equipped with pontoons and fly into the northern half of the riding before freeze-up. I think this would also apply in constituencies such as Athabasca, Peace River and Meadow Lake.

As I say, I feel the hon. member for Athabasca has raised a very good point. We are expected to serve our people to the same degree as other hon. members here. I heard the hon. member for York-Scarborough talking about the distribution of Hansard. Hansard may be mailed from here every day of the week, but copies only arrive once or twice a year in some parts of the constituencies which certain hon. members represent. Since the subject has been brought up I feel some special arrangement should be made whereby hon. members who represent constituencies such as mine should be allowed travelling expenses above and beyond those which are provided for by the legislation which now exists.

Most members of this house could, I am sure, cover their ridings by putting a full tank of gas in the car and driving around. But in my case—and I am sure this experience is shared by a number of hon. members opposite, both to my right and to my left—this is far from being possible. I return from here to Yellowknife, which is the central point. There I have to charter an aircraft costing, as I said, between 55 and 75 cents a mile. I leave Yellowknife and, if I want to do it the short way, I go to Hay River, Fort Providence, Jean Marie River, Fort Simpson, South Nahanni, Fort Liard—

An hon. Member: This is a travel logue.

Mr. Hardie: If I had so little to talk about as the hon. member for Vancouver, wherever it is—

An hon. Member: South.

Mr. Hardie: Well, it is south of nowhere, I will say that. If I have to cover my riding—and I have the same privilege in regard to the expense account as are allowed to other members of this house—I must go Hay River, Fort Providence, Jean Marie River, Fort Simpson, South Nahanni, Fort Liard, Fort Wrigley, Fort Norman, Fort Franklyn, back to Norman Wells, Good Hope, Arctic Red River, Fort McPherson and Aklavik, and along the coast from Aklavik to the radar station at Tuktoyaktuk, or, maybe, I would take the long route and back to Yellowknife.

Even in that case I would only have covered half of my riding, and I would have covered about 5,000 miles at a cost, as I have said, of between 55 and 75 cents a mile.

Someone may say: why don't you go by boat? I tried that in 1955 or 1956. I tried going by canoe. I started out at Hay River, thinking I would cut down my expenses and be able to serve my people properly. I left Hay River in a canoe, went to Fort Providence, Jean Marie River, Fort Simpson. There was a problem at Jean Marie River so I went back there, and then on to Fort Simpson, Fort Wrigley and Norman Wells.

This was in August. It rained for nine days. I do not think any hon. member in this house would expect me, or the hon. member for Athabasca or the hon. members for Meadow Lake and Peace River to sit in an open canoe when it is raining every day. Every once in a while you decide you had better dry out, so you pull into shore, build a fire and get about half dried out, and then you say: "to hell with it; back in the canoe." And then you move along the river again. One hon. member mentioned rain—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are all wet.

Mr. Hardie: I was just going to say to the Postmaster General that even in those nine days of rain from Hay River to Norman Wells I never saw so many crocodile tears as I have seen in this house—the whining and crying of the government every time—

The Deputy Chairman: I wish the hon. member would stay with the question of travelling expenses.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I have been endeavouring to stick to the question of travelling expenses but since the Postmaster General, who drives around in his constituency in a car—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I walk.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought the Postmaster General used the street cars.

Mr. Hardie: —interjected I thought I should comment on it. I shall proceed from there. On August 12 that same year it snowed.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must ask the hon. member to stick to travelling. We are not discussing weather. I request the hon. member to confine his remarks to the problems of travelling without discussing weather.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order you have raised surely it has always been recognized that weather is ancillary to travel.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I was just going to bring that point up. Let us ask the hon. member for Meadow Lake about this. If he travels by air from Meadow Lake to Uranium City in August or September to perform the duties expected of him by his constituents and because of rain or snow he is required to stay in Uranium City for, let us say, five days, does he get that free? I should say not. He pays a waiting charge. He must pay waiting time on that aircraft. If the aircraft company says it cannot fly from one point to another, perhaps a distance of 20 miles, he gets it free but if he engages an aircraft to take him from one point to another and on reaching his destination he is delayed, he must take his chances on that and pay waiting time.

In any event hon. members from northern constituencies are handicapped in serving the people they represent because they have to travel by air. A private hon. member told me that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Minister of Transport were going to make a tour of my riding. I must say I have not been asked by these hon. gentlemen to take them around my riding nor was I offered a free ride in their aircraft. I am sure I could take the Minister of Transport on an interesting tour of the country. I could introduce him to the people in my riding who have problems and who would very much like to speak to him and his colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I will not prolong this debate any further—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hardie: "Hear, hear", they say, all these fellows—

Mr. McFarlane: Hon. members.

Mr. Hardie: Well, all these hon. members who when they go home whether it is on June 1 or March 21 or March 31 simply fill up the gas tanks of their cars and cover their ridings; "Hear, hear" they say, but what do they say about the hon. member for Churchill, the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Athabasca and other hon. members when they discuss this problem in caucus? I wonder what goes on in the caucus of the Tory party? I wonder if the hon. members for Churchill, Peace River and Athabasca—and I almost forgot the most important one, the hon. member for the Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Leave me out of this. I get around quite well.

Mr. Hardie: I am glad the hon. member mentioned that because the Liberal government built all the roads he is driving on when he is in his constituency.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish. I use an aircraft.

Mr. Hardie: Oh, no, you don't. There are only two polling divisions in your riding and you do not have to use aircraft.

Mr. Nielsen: Fifty-six.

Mr. Hardie: Two polling divisions. Ross River and Old Crow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is Old Crow a polling division?

Mr. Hardie: In any event I wonder what goes on in the caucus of the Tory party.

Mr. Ricard: Lots of things.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder what is said when the hon. members for Churchill, Meadow Lake, Athabasca and Peace River stand up and say "We want a better deal". These fellows say, "Hear, hear" but I can just imagine what goes on in the caucus.

An hon. Member: Why not listen in? It is tapped.

Mr. Hardie: If I could have it tapped and piped into my room as the Prime Minister does I would find it most interesting to know what goes on in the Tory caucus. Possibly I could even tell you now. In any event, Mr. Chairman, I do think—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You do? That is surprising!

Mr. Hardie: If I were to go back through all the pages of Hansard that have been filled by the Postmaster General I would say he did a hell of a lot less thinking than I have ever done.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hardie: In fact, he did not do any.

An hon. Member: Correction stands.

Mr. Hardie: And he certainly has not done any thinking since he took office. I urge that the Speaker whose estimates we are discussing at the present time consider the possibility of extending to hon. members from northern constituencies an extra travelling allowance to cover the cost of transportation in their constituencies where transportation by air is the only means of transportation.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the previous speaker and other hon. members who spoke concerning extra expenses incurred in properly looking after the interests of their constituents in northern constituencies. My constituency begins in central Newfoundland, at the south, and continues north to the northernmost tip of Labrador. If I am to get around my constituency at all I must do so by air. There is a string of settlements extending up that long coastline all of which have a right to be visited by their parliamentary representative and certainly he has a duty to visit them and acquaint himself with their problems in order to properly speak on their behalf. If one attempted to do it by any means other than air one would probably have to spend the whole 12 months of the year travelling. The result is that one must use aircraft.

All hon. members can appreciate that travel by air is much more expensive than by other means. One has the double handicap of long distances and high costs as compared with normal travel in smaller constituencies. I urge that Mr. Speaker take into consideration the question of making allowances for the travelling expenses of hon. members from constituencies where the only means of transportation is by air.

Mr. Speaker: I will just say this about travelling expenses. They are entirely statutory and it is up to the House of Commons to do whatever it wants to do.

Mr. Hardie: Will you recommend it, though, sir?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might ask the first commoner why there is a reduction of $10,000 in the contribution to the retirement allowance of members of parliament. The estimate for this fiscal year is only $55,000. I understand that members' contributions are matched by the government. I have made a rough calculation. There are 265 members, and 265 times $240 comes to $63,600, which is $8,600 above $55,000.

Mr. Speaker: I have here the annual report of the fund. The variation may be accounted for in the fact that members have the right to pay up arrears, and the act provides for matching those payments as well as the current payments. I will get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: Has the Speaker noticed certain comments in newspapers by members of the press gallery about the conditions in the press gallery, and has he taken the whole question of the cramped quarters and the rumours of cockroaches, rats, and so forth in that particular area into consideration and does he intend to report on the conditions which have been referred to as slum conditions in that particular area of the house?

Mr. Speaker: I have only this to report. I have had no complaints from the press gallery this session or the previous session. I know that periodic fumigation takes place and I am sure that the best is done with the space we have. All of us must realize that we are cramped in this building and even the members have to put up with restricted quarters as do the press in their operations until some solution is found to that problem.

Mr. Regier: On vote 185 I should like to call one little matter to the attention of the Speaker, if I may. It is normal practice, as the Speaker well knows, for the average worker in Canada to look forward to working not more than a five-day week. There are many employees in the House of Commons who, when the house is sitting six days a week, are requested to work six days a week. While I realize that at times it might be advisable for the house to be meeting six days a week, I would imagine that most members of the House of Commons would be able so to arrange their work that as few of the employees as possible would have to work six days a week. The ones I have in mind are our office help. We have a lot of research work to do, and so on, and I think we could well arrange to be doing this on Saturdays and Sundays. I believe arrangements could be made whereby members would not need the help of their stenographers except possibly the odd one down in the pool for emergency purposes. I think those people would greatly appreciate that. As we all know, when the summer months come many residents of Ottawa move out of the city and live out in the various summer cottages. They have made arrangements as to how to get in and out of Ottawa on regular week days. However, when we impose upon them the added Saturday, it just imposes a considerable hardship on a goodly number in that they are suddenly faced with this rather serious transportation problem. I was wondering also whether the Speaker had given any consideration to exempting those employees from work on the ordinarily accepted statutory holidays such as July 1, Her Majesty's birthday, and so on?

Mr. Speaker: Within the time at my disposal since being elected Speaker, and there has not been very much of it, I have been trying to familiarize myself with the conditions of work of both permanent and sessional employees. As I understand our system, in 1955 we did adopt the five-day principle, and everyone working here works on the basis of a five-day week. Now it is true in fact that they work six days while we are working six days, but they are paid additional for the extra day, and I am not sure that that is not a welcomed extra pay. When we are not in session, the employees of the House of Commons do enjoy some privileges which other civil servants and employees of public and municipal authorities do not enjoy, such as earlier closing hours. The extra time in which they work on Saturday and statutory holidays is made up to them as a holiday with pay in the case of the permanent staff. That may not be the answer; I do not think it is but, in any event, we are trying now to compensate all of our staff on the basis of a five-day week, giving them either the equivalent time off with pay or paying them for the extra work when they are sessional employees.

I do appreciate the hon. member's suggestion that members of the house should co-operate as much as they can to alleviate the situation which exists in the holiday period, and the hot weather, which necessarily arises out of our sitting at this time.

Mr. Fisher: In connection with the salaries for parliamentary assistants, I notice that the allotment has been doubled. I wonder what the explanation is. If parliamentary assistants should be appointed, will they be given a grant for the whole year, or will it be on the pro rata basis for the amount of time they actually put in in the year?

Mr. Speaker: I can only answer that nothing is being paid now under that vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: I confess I was greatly puzzled to see that the vote indicated for last year in the estimates was $28,000, and this year it is $56,000. It seems to me there must be some technical explanation for this because obviously the provision was made for 14 appointments originally, and I do not think it has ever been changed. If my arithmetic is correct, 14 times 4 would be 56 and not 28. I notice the same thing with regard to the allowance given to the incumbent of the chair at the moment, which I am sure was $2,000 in times past but this says $1,000 for 1957-58. I am sure there is some technical explanation of it, and I wondered what it was.

Mr. Speaker: The normal vote is 14 times $4,000. I cannot give offhand any explanation for the estimates of last year which, of course, are not now under consideration, but I will be glad to obtain the information.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am reluctant to think, sir, that the Minister of Finance has made another mistake in arithmetic.

Mr. Hardie: It has been rumoured around the corridors that out of the estimates of the Speaker there is a possibility of a trip into my own constituency of Mackenzie River and into the Yukon Territory this session. I am wondering whether the Speaker, rather than spend this money on a trip for hon. members, could not divert some of this or make possible all of it going to the members I spoke of earlier this afternoon and leave the financing of the proposed trip to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Speaker: I have no power to change the purpose of a vote. As the hon. member will see, there is an item of $20,000 for expenses of committees. That is available for expenditure by committees in the pursuit of their duties.

Mr. Hardie: I am sure that the Speaker is very interested in seeing that the hon. members I have mentioned should have the opportunity to cover their constituencies properly. Although this money is available for committees I would hope that the Speaker would make such a recommendation to the government. I am sure the government would listen to the Speaker. I would hope that the Speaker, as the first member of the house, would recommend to the government that if these moneys now allocated to committees are not going to be used, they should be made available to look after the members for Churchill, Meadow Lake, Peace River, Athabasca, the Yukon, Labrador and the Northwest Territories.

Item agreed to.

186. Estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms, $859,599.

Mr. Regier: I have one minor complaint to register under this item having to do with parking space for cars of members of the House of Commons. With the growth in the number of visitors to parliament hill, members of parliament are finding it increasingly difficult to find accommodation for their cars in the spaces allotted to them. An ever-increasing number of cars are using these parking spaces without proper authorization. I hope that the matter can be looked into at the next session. I know that if one arrives at the house a little later than the opening it is very often completely impossible to find a parking space. I have walked along the line of cars and have seen that less than half of them have the proper authorization to park their cars where they are.

Mr. Speaker: I am quite conscious of the difficulty. As a matter of fact, a survey was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms on Saturday last and something like 24 or 30 of the 80 odd spaces available for members, outside of the ministers' parking area, were found to be occupied by cars that were not authorized to park there. There is no policing. I am studying the problem with the Sergeant-at-Arms and the commissioners and we are trying to find a solution so that all members with cars will have their spaces available to them. However, the solution requires a good deal of co-operation by members as well as policing of the area.

Item agreed to.

189. To provide hereby, notwithstanding anything contained in the Financial Administration Act or the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to each member of the House of Commons appointed by the governor in council to be a parliamentary assistant (which appointment shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) to assist a minister of the crown in such manner and to such extent as the minister may determine and to represent his department in the House of Commons in the absence of the minister therefrom, a salary of four thousand dollars per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $56,000.

Mr. Regier: This vote calls for the payment of parliamentary assistants. I believe the Speaker will agree that it is not wise to ask for more money than can possibly be used in any one financial year. At the end of this month five months of the current fiscal year will have elapsed. The vote calls for $56,000 representing pay for a full year for 14 parliamentary assistants. We may have had that many but I doubt it. In view of the fact that five months of the current fiscal year will have elapsed at the end of this month, I am wondering whether the Speaker might not like to reduce this amount by making it only seven-twelfths of the amount listed.

Mr. Speaker: As was said earlier, the normal estimate is 14 times $4,000 or $56,000. The amount spent has varied a great deal from year to year depending upon how many parliamentary assistants there were and what time they were appointed. The unexpended part of the $56,000 has ranged from $4,000 in 1956-57 to $28,000 in 1945-46. No money is lost by leaving the vote as it is. It just means that it is an over-estimate as it stands.

Mr. Regier: The reason I ask for a reduction is that I believe some members have actually been acting as parliamentary assistants since March 31, if not in an official capacity then possibly in the capacity of expectation. I do not know how to put it.

Mr. Hodgson: Erstwhile.

Mr. Regier: If the vote is left as it is it might lead to parliamentary assistants being appointed and their remuneration being made retroactive. That could cause considerable difficulty. In order to ensure that all parliamentary assistants, once they are appointed, will be treated on an equitable basis, I believe that this amount should be reduced in proportion to the period of time that has elapsed. Therefore I move:

That the amount of vote No. 189, $56,000, be reduced by five-twelfths of that figure.

That would leave the vote at $32,666.67.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sure the government could not accept this amendment. This money has been provided. If it is spent it will be spent. If it is not spent, then in the ordinary course of events the money will just lapse.

Mr. Regier: On that point, I am sure that the Minister of National Defence will remember very well how members of his party used to criticize most severely any item in the estimates of the previous regime that obviously would not be needed for the ensuing year. At that time his party put forward the idea that it was wrong in principle to vote more money to any government than it required.

All that legislation provides for is that parliamentary assistants be paid an additional $4,000 per annum. I am sure the minister cannot really have considered the argument that he has advanced that we ought to vote more money for a purpose than is allowed for that purpose.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I think before we on this side decide exactly what we should do about this question, we ought to give the government an opportunity to explain what it intends to do about parliamentary assistants. The hon. member who has just taken his seat is quite right. Those who occupy the treasury benches, when they were on this side, were insistent that there should be a proper relationship between estimates and expenditures. There is not much sense in providing an estimate unless the government intends to carry out the purpose for which the estimate is made.

Several months have gone by now and parliamentary assistants have not been appointed. The day before yesterday the Leader of the Opposition interrogated the Prime Minister as to his intention in this regard, and the reply given by the Prime Minister was certainly not informative. No one perhaps can say whether or not parliamentary assistants will be appointed, except the Prime Minister. During the course of the session the Prime Minister did indicate that parliamentary assistants would be appointed. Here we are coming to the end of the session during which a parliamentary assistant is expected to perform his major functions. Now it is not difficult for the Minister of National Defence, speaking for the government, to say that he could accept this amendment, but that is not sufficient. The hon. gentleman is too intelligent to expect us to believe it is adequate.

We should be told by the government whether or not they intend to appoint parliamentary assistants for the balance of the period or whether the institution, initiated by the previous administration, is going to be dropped. If it is dropped, of course, there will be great disappointment in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite because—I was going to say there are many hundreds but that would be an exaggeration—there are certainly well over a hundred on the other side and in the overflow on this side who are sitting here day after day in expectation that each is going to be preferred. Knowing something about what that expectation is like, I feel that I should speak for these unnamed individuals who aspire to sit in the seats of the mighty. The government has an opportunity to relieve them of the tension which has pursued these aspirants over a period of five months; it has an opportunity to interfere with careers or move careers along. We should be told today. I do not know of anyone who can tell us more effectively than the Minister of National Defence. He has the ear of the Prime Minister, as I am sure no other minister has—

Mr. Pearkes: That is absolute nonsense, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the Prime Minister, who undoubtedly hears me at this time, does not think it desirable to enter the chamber at this particular moment, surely the Minister of National Defence will find it desirable to tell us whether or not the Prime Minister is going to appoint parliamentary assistants.

If not, then obviously this money should not be voted. If the government intends to appoint parliamentary assistants, we should then respect the government's wishes in the matter. Before we make up our minds on this question either the Minister of National Defence, who now shows a measure of reluctance, the Minister of Agriculture, who seems to be eager, or the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should reply on behalf of the government. It would not be fair to ask Mr. Speaker, who has views, but no authority.

Mr. Pearkes: It must be remembered that these estimates were prepared a long time ago, and provision has been made for the appointment of parliamentary assistants, as and when it is the desire of the Prime Minister to appoint those parliamentary assistants. The work of the parliamentary assistants does not end at the end of the session. As the hon. member has just said, he does not know whether or not there are going to be parliamentary assistants appointed. How then can he say he will reduce the sum by a certain amount? Obviously, we should leave the amount in the vote, and if that amount is not spent in the way that parliament has authorized it be spent, it lapses in the ordinary course of proceedings.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise to support what was said by the hon. member for Essex East. I can remember when he was appointed among the first parliamentary assistants—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): After a long period of expectancy.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as he himself has said, after some time spent in hope. I can never remember any occasion in any parliament when the appointment of parliamentary assistants was left to the end of the session. It would appear to me if these appointments are not made during the session it would be an abuse of the vote and an abuse of the rights of parliament to appoint parliamentary assistants almost on the day of prorogation and pay them for a period when they obviously would not be serving in the way in which they would be serving during the session. Therefore it would seem to me, unless these appointments are made almost at once in contemplation of three or four more weeks of session, this money will not be needed until next January.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman in moving his amendment has not moved to reduce the vote enough. One thing is perfectly obvious, this money cannot be spent for April, May, June, July or nine days in August. It is, therefore, quite ridiculous to ask us to vote $56,000 when it is quite apparent more than one-third of that money cannot legally be spent in any case.

Mr. Argue: It is quite true, as the Minister of National Defence has said, that these estimates were prepared many months ago. I would think that the people, in preparing these estimates, assumed parliamentary assistants would have been appointed long ago. It seems a rather strange theory of government that an item placed in the estimates is so sacrosanct that, even although it is obviously not needed, parliament should not move to reduce the amount. As the hon. member for Essex East has so well said, many members of the government when they were on the opposition side of the house were most careful to point out to the former administration that this was a very bad practice and should not be followed.

I do not want to say anything to prejudice the position of parliamentary assistants or to put any blocks in the road of the many hopefuls to whom reference has been made. As a matter of fact, I have had a great deal of sympathy myself for these hon. gentlemen during this session. It has caused me a good deal of concern that so many capable young members were being bypassed, overlooked and given no consideration because these vacancies have been allowed to remain. Not only is it a disappointment to hon. members of this house who may hope to be appointed parliamentary assistants but I think it is rather degrading to the office itself. There will be going abroad the feeling that if in this session —with the tremendous amount of work that is being done; with estimates that are the largest in the history of this country; and with probably the heaviest work load we have ever seen in any peace time session—we were able to operate without parliamentary assistants in this streamlined fashion that has already become the vogue on account of the hurried up, 3½ month session, then perhaps it is an office that is superfluous to the efficient working of this house.

But in opposing any reduction the Minister of National Defence would seem to have in his mind the possibility that if these gentlemen are appointed to their positions they can be given 12 months' pay for 7 months' service. I am not nearly as expert an authority on what is legal and what is not in a vote such as this as is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. But with the wording of vote 189 as it is, and realizing that it is just an item in the estimates and is therefore not statutory, I take it that it might be possible to give them all of this pay for very little work. I would hope that thought is not in the mind of the Minister of National Defence.

For a government that has expressed so much desire for economy in administration this would seem to be a very obvious motion to support. It is really not going to take away from any person anything that he has earned but is merely bringing the estimates in line with reality. Some hon. members may feel that the appointment of certain parliamentary assistants has become something of a political plum, and that some of the offices are not necessary. I do not express that opinion. However, I say that it has been a mistake to allow this session to come nearly to a conclusion without parliamentary assistants being appointed. That has been a strange procedure for the government. The attitude of and the statement made by the Minister of National Defence at this time are even more strange. In keeping with the beliefs of members of the government in the past I would appeal to the Minister of Public Works and to the members of the government to accept this motion in order to tidy up these estimates so that they will be more in keeping with reality.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the $56,000 estimate to provide for the salary of certain parliamentary assistants, I must say that I regret that the government has not yet seen fit to make the necessary appointments. Does this mean that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has been unable to discover any qualified members to fill those vacancies? I can hardly believe that. Could this be a sword of Damocles hanging over the heads of our friends opposite in order to make sure of their presence in the house at all times? To my mind that is another possibility.

Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that we are being asked to vote $56,000 for the appointment of parliamentary assistants. Even though the Prime Minister has stated more than once that those appointments would be made in the near future, the session is running out and we still do not know who those gentlemen might be. I could, of course, suggest some names to the Prime Minister, but I am convinced he knows of them better than I do. Then, too, I wonder though if he is not somewhat uneasy about appointing any from the ranks of Quebec members, since the famous natural gas scandal. I feel that the Prime Minister is being most cautious indeed, lest he appoint parliamentary assistants who, one fine day, could be "gassed", directly or indirectly.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think the government should explain the matter. The theory I have put forward represents a distinct possibility. Natural gas has had damaging effects far beyond those generally assumed. The Prime Minister should explain why, at this very late stage of the session, he still refuses to appoint parliamentary assistants.

(Text):

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this amendment goes to show what sitting for many days in the heat of an Ottawa summer will do to some of the hon. members of the house.

An hon. Member: Including you.

Mr. Green: Here we have the C.C.F. moving this amendment, supported by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Essex East; and may I add that from neither of those two hon. members do we expect very much—

[Mr. Argue.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: —particularly on such occasions. However, here is an attempt by two opposition groups absolutely devoid of any real issue on which to attack the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Who is whining now?

Mr. Green: Hon. members can groan and grunt all they like but that is the fact.

An hon. Member: Just a cheap political stunt.

Mr. Green: Here we have them drawing another red herring across the trail.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely a parliamentary assistant is not a red herring.

Mr. Green: This is another good example of their standard of statesmanship. The vote under attack at the moment is to provide for the pay of parliamentary assistants. You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that it is not calculated on the basis of a certain number of parliamentary assistants. This is one reason why these specious arguments advanced from across the way fall so flat. It may be that the number of parliamentary assistants appointed under this vote would be more than 14. Whatever is done hon. members of the house, including members of the government party, may rest assured that the move made by the Prime Minister will be one which he considers to be in the best interests of the country. There is never any doubt about his decision being made on that basis. This attempt to come in here today and to shed crocodile tears for all the private members on the government side of the house because they have not all been appointed parliamentary assistants—

Mr. Argue: The minister is extremely touchy.

Mr. Green: —is very touching and all very amusing on a Saturday afternoon in Ottawa. But may I point out to the hon. members of these two opposition parties that we are not fooled by this amendment or by this attempt made to stir up trouble in the hearts of some of the members on the government side. It was hoped that some of these members would have their egos affected. Oh, the hon. member for Assiniboia has made his speech; he made the most he could out of nothing for five or ten minutes. Let him just keep quiet until I have finished.

We are always very grateful for suggestions as to ways in which the efficiency of government in this country can be improved, but this is not one of those suggestions—it is just a leg-pulling amendment which has been moved by hon. members of the C.C.F.

They sit up late night after night trying to figure out amendments of this kind.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose the minister is speaking from experience.

Mr. Green: And they nearly always take the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate into their camp because he has that kind of mentality. But after he has paid a visit to his adopted province of Newfoundland and met a few of his constituents in some of the post offices we have built there perhaps he will come back in a more sensible frame of mind. We are not gullible enough to fall for an amendment of this kind, and we hope that before the end of the session members of the two opposition parties will be able to come up with some suggestions which are a little more statesmanlike than the one they have made this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I had intended to vote for the amendment before the Minister of Public Works spoke, he has given me a much better reason for doing so now because he has drawn attention to the fact that something has now been omitted from this vote which in earlier years was there.

When Mr. Mackenzie King first introduced the system of appointing parliamentary assistants and put this vote into the estimates, I think it was in 1941 or 1942, there was a limitation to 14 contained in the vote. Parliament was told without equivocation that the number would not be greater than this. Now the leader of the house has said that perhaps the Prime Minister would appoint more than 14. Perhaps an effort has been made to deceive parliament in order to appoint more than 14, in other words, perhaps there is an intention to increase the number appointed as compared with what has been done in the past by increasing the expenditure of public money on members of parliament which, except for this vote, would be contrary to the Senate and House of Commons Act. I think the committee should be told how many assistants, as a maximum, are to be appointed. There was never any doubt about this in the past and I must say I had overlooked the omission of the limitation to 14 in reading this vote hastily, but having read it hastily while the minister was speaking, it appears that there is no limitation as to numbers in this item and it seems to me that this is a very serious departure from established practice and that we should not be asked to vote this money until the government gives us a positive assurance that it is not going to appoint more than a certain number.

I agree with my hon. friend for Essex East that these appointments should have been made long ago, and I think it would be a scandal, as I said earlier, to make them in the dying days of the session, because the very term parliamentary assistant surely means that the assistance for which this extra money taken from the taxpayers is to be used is mainly for assistance in parliament.

Going back to the amendment itself, I want to repeat that it does seem to me absolutely contrary to the kind of thing that the minister used to argue from this side of the house and from what the Minister of Agriculture and Minister of National Defence and many other ministers used to say about voting more money than was going to be spent, to vote money for April, May, June, July and nine days of August. On one point I do not think the hon. member for Assiniboia was correct, because the item says "pro rata for any period less than a year", so I do not think there could be any dating back. But it does appear that more than 14 people could be appointed, and if the government has no such intention they should come clean and tell us and not try to slip it in surreptitiously as the Minister of Public Works has suggested they were trying to do. Before we vote on this item I hope the Minister of Public Works or someone else speaking for the government will give us an assurance that we are not going to use this money late in the session to appoint 25 or 30 or 40 parliamentary assistants and then divide up this $56,000, as the minister suggested could legally be done once we pass this vote.

Mr. Green: Perhaps we could appoint 175 and pay so much a head? How would that suit the hon. member?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps you could. That is precisely the point. The government should not be so sloppy in drafting these estimates, nor should this committee be so careless about passing them as to leave that possibility open to the government and it seems to me that our duty—and this is especially true of those of us who were elected to oppose the government—is to see that the government does not get away with practices of this kind. It is not good enough that the law should make possible a practice of this kind even if it is not the intention of the government to indulge in it.

The minister spoke about leg-pulling. I do not really believe that even this government would appoint everyone of its supporters who was not in the ministry to be a parliamentary assistant for a few weeks, though some of their friends in one or two of the provinces have appointed so many people to their governments, and as assistants to ministers that the situation has reached a point where nearly everyone in the legislature—and I am thinking in particular of one of their close friends—has office of some kind. But I do not think we want to see this kind of practice followed in the national field.

It seems to me that it is no laughing matter, though it may be that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was, perhaps, just having a little good clean fun. But we now seem to have found out from the minister that perhaps there is some intention to appoint a lot more assistants than there were before and I think we are at least entitled to be told whether it is the intention of the government to do this or not.

Mr. Green: The short answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is that the number would be limited by the amount of the vote, which is $56,000. If it should be decided that this total is not required there would be that much money saved, but there is a ceiling, namely the amount of the vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, but unfortunately with people only appointed for one month it would not be much of a ceiling—it would be a case of the sky being just about the limit. I suppose that even the Minister of Public Works would not know what to do with more than, say, five parliamentary assistants, but if there is to be no limit put on this he may find himself in that embarrassing position some day in January or February or March before this vote expires. The minister talks about the necessity of not reducing this item. He was not in the committee when I directed a question earlier to the Speaker and, I think, not very properly to him, about why the estimate showed only $28,000 for last year. It seems to me there is something wrong there. Either there is something wrong with the estimates or there is some explanation.

Mr. Speaker: I have obtained an answer. There was no vote last year. As the house will recollect, the estimates were not passed. The actual expenditure was $28,000 and that was authorized by governor general's warrant. That is why it appears as an estimate of last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: As hon. members will recall Mr. Chairman, I said I felt there was some kind of explanation. I did not think it was negligence on any one's part not to have the explanation at hand. But that very fact does show that no hardship would be done to any one by reducing this vote by the number of months that have already passed for which it cannot possibly be used. I would think in view of the contemplated deficit of the Minister of Finance that hon. gentleman would be very happy to join with us in reducing this estimate by the number of months and days that have already passed in this fiscal year so that to this extent at least his estimates would be smaller than they otherwise were.

Mr. Gour: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring to the attention of the house leader a very important consideration. When the Prime Minister decides to name the parliamentary assistants I urge that he not forget eastern Ontario. We used to have two cabinet ministers from eastern Ontario. One of the best qualified ministers represented the French-speaking population in that part of Ontario. Also, there was a most competent and capable minister who was English-speaking. At the moment eastern Ontario is not represented in the cabinet. My good friend the Minister of Agriculture requires a parliamentary assistant and I would like to suggest that the appointment be made from among hon. members from eastern Ontario. I have two neighbours, one English-speaking and one French-speaking. The hon. member for Carleton is a fine fellow. If he were appointed as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture it would be better than nothing. At least eastern Ontario would be represented in the cabinet and the problems of agriculturists in that area could be made well known to the government. It would cost no more or less to appoint this hon. gentleman to that position than it would to appoint any one else. I would hope that eastern Ontario would be represented in the cabinet by at least one parliamentary assistant and there should be representation through both an English-speaking and French-speaking parliamentary assistant. In any event at least one parliamentary assistant should be named from middle and eastern Ontario. That is all I have to say on that question. I think it has been a grave mistake on the part of the Prime Minister to delay these appointments for such a long time. There are at least 200 hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house who cannot sleep at night because they are in suspense as to whether they will be appointed parliamentary assistants. Surely in that overwhelming majority on the other side of the house the Prime Minister can find 14 hon. gentlemen who could fill positions as parliamentary assistants.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I join again with my colleagues who have just spoken because the Minister of Public Works who leads the house was not here when the main arguments were put forward by those on this side of the house who respectfully urged the government to take some positive line and give the house some indication which has not yet been forthcoming. The government is asking that we vote certain moneys in respect of an institution which has served its purpose during the period from 1941 or thereabouts up until June of 1957. We are now coming to the end of the session and no parliamentary assistants have been appointed whatsoever. In the absence of a statement from the government it does seem rather unusual that the government should ask us to appropriate moneys when it does not give any indication that it is ever going to spend the money it is asking parliament to vote.

The Minister of Public Works as the senior member of the government next to the Prime Minister, I presume, without knowing all of the undertones in the hierarchy, surely should be able to tell us what is the intention of the Prime Minister and the government. I addressed myself on this question rather respectfully but with perhaps too much force to the Minister of National Defence as one who certainly had the ear of the Prime Minister. I asked if in the absence of the Minister of Public Works he could give us some definite information as to what were the intentions of the government but for some reason the Minister of National Defence was not able to answer. As the hon. member for Russell pointed out there are many anxious individuals in this house—

Mr. Pearkes: Including you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —on all sides, on this side and down at the end, who are awaiting expectantly for every move made by the Prime Minister and, may I say by way of a compliment, for every move made by the Minister of Public Works who undoubtedly has great influence in these matters. The Minister of Public Works ought to be able to tell the committee if any parliamentary assistants are going to be appointed. We are not asking whether the old ones are going to be reappointed. We are not asking whether the principle of rotation will be observed so that in successive years each man will be given an opportunity to serve as parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Pearkes: We should have to be in power for a long time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We ought to have some statement from the minister on this question. There is a great deal of levity in the committee this afternoon—

Mr. Green: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and that is understandable at this stage in the session but there is also a great deal of seriousness involved in this question. It was the hon. member for Russell who directed our attention to the grave aspects of this problem. Every cabinet minister but one comes from one section of the province of Ontario. Every minister comes from the Toronto district or the Hamilton district with the exception of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The province of Ontario with a population of six million people is the largest province in Canada and all of the cabinet ministers are congregated in one area, the city of Toronto. Toronto is a fine and important city but there are other important cities in Canada including my own city of Windsor, the city of London, the city of Sault Ste. Marie and many others. And while I do not share the political convictions of my two colleagues from Essex county I want to say that if you have to select a Conservative government I do not think you could find any better, in so far as the Conservative party is concerned than what you have in the person of my two colleagues from Essex county.

Mr. Argue: All for Paul and Paul for all, eh?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In any event there is no one in the cabinet representing any section of Ontario other than Toronto and Hamilton except the Minister of National Health and Welfare who comes from the city of Stratford. There is no one from northern or eastern Ontario and no one from a rural area.

Mr. Green: What about the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Secretary of State for External Affairs comes from an area that is almost Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Almost Toronto.

Mr. Harkness: He comes from Hastings, just east of here.

Mr. Green: Your geography is poor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And you should not forget the effect of the battle of Hastings, incidentally.

Mr. Harkness: One of the most fruitful battles in English history.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I well recall how hon. gentlemen opposite used to complain about the fact that the city of Toronto had no representation in the last government except during the latter period of its tenure of office. In view of that I ask hon. gentlemen if my argument today is not a very valid, sound and justifiable one. Obviously the Prime Minister is not going to remove from his cabinet those hon. members who come from the city of Toronto and neighbouring regions. That would not be an easy thing for him to do and I am not going to urge that he make changes of that kind at this stage in the history of this parliament but the way he could meet the need for a more balanced representation with respect to other sections of the province of Ontario would be to give representation on the lower ministerial level in the form of appointments as parliamentary assistants. That is an excellent suggestion which I make to the serious minded Minister of Public Works who undoubtedly has a lot to do with cabinet making in the present administration. If he wishes us to pass this measure I ask him to rise in his place and tell us whether or not we are going to have parliamentary assistants.

Is this vote just a pro forma thing to hold dangling between sessions before expectant junior ministers the possibility of their appointments? If that is what it is, then obviously we should not support the amendment. The Minister of Public Works has it in his hands now to clear this matter up at once and to say, yes, the government is going to appoint parliamentary assistants. He does not need to tell us it is going to be done tomorrow or at the end of the session, but that it is going to be done within a very reasonable period and length of time. If this is done, then the minister will give us a satisfactory answer, and he will demonstrate what I know is really the case, namely that he has great power and influence in the present government.

Mr. Green: Get thee behind me, Satan.

Mrs. Fairclough: I really cannot allow the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East to go by.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I apologize to the hon. lady. I know she comes from Hamilton, and I know I should not have said she came from Toronto.

Mrs. Fairclough: You certainly should not. While I am on my feet, perhaps I should say I am sure my colleague, the Minister of Labour, feels as badly as I do about the appellation which has been applied to us. I can assure the hon. member for Essex East that there are some 300,000 people in the city of Hamilton who feel just as I do.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, first of all I wish to assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I was not attempting to amuse either the committee or myself in moving this amendment. I do believe the amendment involves a matter of principle. However, I have another comment to make. I listened with considerable interest and, I must say, with a good deal of concern, to the assurance of the Minister of Public Works to members of his own party when he indicated to them that in his own good time the Prime Minister would take such actions as are in the best interests of Canada. It seems to me there is a rather serious implication there. Parliament established those offices some years ago and now, simply by leaving them vacant, they apparently do not exist. When we ask, and I am sure the members of the minister's party ask, when will these traditional offices be filled, we have the Minister of Public Works assuring us that in his own good time the Prime Minister will decide what is best for us. No longer will parliament decide. We are to go home from this session and rest assured that in his own good time the Prime Minister will decide what is best for parliament and, presumably, for the government of Canada.

I must agree, Mr. Chairman, at this time this whole debate seems a little bit like a phantom debate in that we are all really arguing against the existence of or against the argument of someone who is not here and yet who hears us. It is a rather weird atmosphere that seems to prevail. One member from the opposition rises and appeals to the Minister of National Defence who he thinks has influence with this non-existent personality who hears but who cannot be seen, and asks him whether he will use his influence. Then another member of the opposition appeals to the Minister of Public Works and asks will he please use his influence. I know it is very hard for us in the opposition to use our influence upon someone who can hear us but whom we cannot see. He cannot even see our facial contortions to know whether we are speaking in levity or in seriousness.

I must point out that the amount of money being asked for would, according to the wording of the vote, enable the appointment of 24 parliamentary assistants at the end of August. If they were appointed at the end of this month, the amounts that they would be entitled to for the remainder of the fiscal year on a pro rata basis would be $2,333 each, I believe. If we divide the vote of $62,000 by $2,333 it would permit the appointment of 24 parliamentary assistants. What the Minister of Public Works actually is asking is the right to appoint more parliamentary assistants to cabinet ministers than there are cabinet ministers with portfolios. I feel that this is introducing a new approach and something is being asked for which was never intended when parliamentary assistants were first established.

The Minister of Public Works referred to this amendment as a red herring. All I can say is that almost the whole of his speech, besides referring to the mystic personality, was a green herring pulled across 14 vacant seats.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 71.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Item agreed to.

190. To provide for an allowance to the Deputy Chairman of Committees, $2,000.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, on this vote I would at least like to recommend to the government, or to the Speaker particularly, that this vote be taken into further consideration. As a matter of fact, I see no justification for the fact that parliamentary assistants should be allowed $4,000 a year and the Deputy Chairman of committees, who has in fact a year-round job if he wants to be well-informed, and especially in his initial year it must be a terrific mental load to inform oneself of all the rules of years gone by, should not get the same amount. I fail to see why the Deputy Chairman of committees should not be granted at least as much as a parliamentary assistant.

Item agreed to.

Library of parliament—

191. General administration, $354,205.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the Speaker, in the sense that he is the spokesman for the library of parliament, on the recently issued pamphlet dealing with the use of the library and the various facilities that are available to members. I hope he will convey the appreciation of the house to the librarian and his staff for the preparation of this document and the general service they have rendered. I should like to ask the Speaker whether he can give us any information with regard to the head of the library and his retirement. I understand that he is beyond the actual retirement age and I was wondering whether the Speaker could tell us if he is going to continue to the end of the year or longer, whether any consideration has been given to another appointment and what the general situation is.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I cannot say more than that I believe Mr. Hardy expects an early retirement. I cannot say the exact date. I have not personally had any cause yet to consider the question of a successor but I believe that it will have to be dealt with very shortly.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member will permit me, may I suggest that he direct his question to the leader of the house because the office of parliamentary librarian is a crown appointment.

Mr. Fisher: I am quite aware of that and I want to go into that now. We would appreciate it if the Speaker would bring to the attention of the house leader that several years ago the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in his ministerial capacity shepherded a bill through the house in relation to the library of parliament that struck a few sparks from the Conservative ranks. They objected quite strenuously to the bill and its general ramifications with respect to the library of parliament.

I might point out that Dr. Blair, who is gone from the house, the hon. member for York-Humber, the present Minister of Transport and a number of other leading lights of the Conservative party at that time objected quite strenuously to what was involved in the legislation and made some strong suggestions with respect to it. I should like to remind the house leader and the Speaker that since this retirement is pending now would be the time for the government to take action with regard to the matter. If they dislike the legislation as much now as they did when it was passed by the house this would be the time for amendments to be made and it might be reasonable to postpone the appointment of a new librarian until the government has taken the whole question into consideration. I can assure the government that from the point of view of the group in this part of the house we would be very strongly in favour of amendments to the act in line with the general position taken by this party in the debate several years ago.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other Benefits—

192. Pension to the unmarried sister of the late Colonel Harry Baker, M.P., $700.

Mr. Regier: Could the Speaker give us the history of this vote?

Mr. Speaker: I can say very little more than what appears in the vote. The hon. member is speaking of the pension to the widow of the late Colonel Harry Baker, M.P. He was a member of the House of Commons and was killed on active service in the first war.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He lost his life.

Mr. Speaker: He was killed on active service in the first war.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is the unmarried sister, not the widow.

Mr. Speaker: Provision was first made for this pension in the supplementary estimates of 1918-19 and I assumed it was the widow.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the item refers to the unmarried sister and that Your Honour overlooked it inadvertently.

Mr. Speaker: All I can say is that this dependent of the late Colonel Baker is still living at an advanced age and is receiving the benefit which parliament first voted in 1918.

Mr. Regier: The reason I asked is that there have been increases in pensions, awards and incomes for almost everyone in the country. I know that this is only one of a number of such pensions found here and there throughout the departments but I wonder whether the government has ever given any attention to the possibility of allowing these people a reasonable increase to compensate for inflation.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know the circumstances of the lady in question but I will take the hon. member's suggestion under consideration and will perhaps be able to give more information next year.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates under legislation.

Mr. Speaker: May I thank hon. members for their consideration and also for what they have said about the staff of the legislative branch who are unable to speak for themselves and I am sure will appreciate the kind things that have been said about their services.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now take up the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

266. Departmental administration, $731,410.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am waiting for my staff to arrive.

Mr. Howard: We just wanted to make sure that the minister's staff got here. We know that the minister is itching to get to his feet to make a comprehensive statement.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources were considered by the standing committee on mines, forests and waters at 14 meetings extending over a period of 25 to 28 hours. The minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee are extensive. I think those members who attended the committee meetings will realize that a great deal of information was advanced which I hope was of value to them. Then, on the supply motion some two weeks ago I spoke at some length on the principles behind the development program in so far as the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is affected.

At this time I should like to pay my respects and express my gratitude to the members of the committee which met so many times. I might tell hon. members that the average lost time due to late arrival was only five minutes. I think that is remarkable in view of the fact that out of a committee of 35 we had an attendance that varied between 18 and 25 and many days the committee met at 9 o'clock in the morning, including Mondays. At this time members of the committee of supply have a right to ask any questions they like, and I am sure the department will be very happy to provide any information we can that will be of assistance in helping members to pass these estimates.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, although the committee on mines, forests and waters did study the estimates of this department, we expected that the minister would make a far more comprehensive statement for the benefit of other members of the house than he made in the short time he was on his feet. There were a great number of questions that were not asked in the committee, and the reason I submit they were not asked is that it was felt, I am sure by most hon. members of the committee, that there was little information supplied in connection with the Northwest Territories administration and lands branch. As a matter of fact, there was a motion moved in the committee that we pass all the items. At that time I said, knowing full well that the committee was going to pass this motion, that I would ask the questions I had in mind when the estimates reached the House of Commons.

Of course, we heard a great deal in that committee from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources concerning the vision of the north; the inventory of our resources in Canada; the problem of transportation, and other subjects relating to the material development of the north. I do not intend, at this particular time, to spend too much time on this material development because I have before me evidence relating to the human development of the Northwest Territories. I bring to the attention of this house today a very sad picture, a picture that dims that great vision of the minister and the government which was proclaimed during the last election campaign and since. The minister has stated inside this house, in committee and outside this house, the great need for development of the north in a material way. He has mentioned also the human development of that area. He has referred to the development of mines, minerals, oil, gas and all the rest of it, but he always mentions in connection with that the human development of the area.

The other day I asked the minister if he would table the evidence taken at an inquest that was held at Baker Lake in the Northwest Territories in the month of July into the starvation of 14 Eskimo people. Yesterday the minister was good enough to table the evidence taken at the inquest. He was also good enough to give me a copy of the autopsy report made by Dr. Wallace of Winnipeg on the bodies of these Eskimos who died at Garry lake. At that time the minister felt that the autopsy report should not be tabled. I communicated with him by telephone this morning and suggested that the autopsy report had been submitted by the R.C.M.P. officer at Baker Lake as exhibit 1 in the inquest, and for that reason I thought that, although this report had been given to me in confidence, I could not agree that the minister should not table it for the perusal of the members of the house. He agreed at that time to table this document and intimated to me I could use what was in it in this debate.

In 1956, Mr. Chairman, I spoke in this house concerning the serious depletion of caribou in the Northwest Territories. I should like to go back and quote from what I said on February 27, 1956, as it appears in volume 2 of the Hansard reports of that session. I was speaking of this serious depletion of the caribou, and I said this, as reported at page 1603 of Hansard for that date:

> At the rate caribou have been depleting in numbers, six years from now there will not be one living caribou in the Northwest Territories.

I went on to say, on the same page, and I was speaking of conservation at that time, suggesting that conservation measures would have to be adopted by the government in order to save these animals which are the lifeblood of the people who live in that area:

> If the natives do not take those caribou—and of course if we are to follow sound conservation policies we shall be obliged to restrict the number of caribou they take—something must be done to feed these people.

I said that something must be done to feed these people if we are to restrict the taking of caribou. These inland Eskimos of the Northwest Territories, as you know, are entirely dependent on caribou. They cannot grow anything in the soil. There are lakes to fish. We do not know how may fish there are. There has never been any survey to ascertain the number of fish. The caribou is the only—not the only, but the prime source of food for these people, and that is what I said at that time. I said also at page 1604:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, I would say to this house that caribou mean no more to the average person in Canada, and I could talk until I am blue in the face, than the buffalo did before the railroads went west. But in my part of the country they are the very lifeblood. We eat this animal. Something has to be done.

What has been done? You have all read newspaper articles which have appeared during the past winter—these I have are from the Winnipeg Free Press, and here is one headed "Starvation and Freezing kill Nine Eskimos". There are a number of them, all on the starvation of Eskimos. The government of the day was warned in 1956.

The government of this day has been warned by the reports of the Canadian wildlife service with regard to caribou in that area. A survey has been going on for two years with regard to this serious depletion. When I spoke in 1956 there were 338,000 caribou according to the estimates of the Canadian wildlife service officers in my area, which was 320,000 less than what the population was five years previously. I said at that time—and I repeat it—that in six years, with the way the caribou were being depleted, there will not be a living caribou within the Northwest Territories.

What happened this winter? This winter at Garry lake, at Chantrey inlet and Pelly lake in the Northwest Territories we had, according to newspaper clippings, people dying of starvation. I have had information from Baker Lake indirectly that last August 3 the missionary at Garry lake went into Baker Lake and reported that there were no caribou and very few fish. To most hon. members this probably does not really mean anything. Caribou are taken not only for meat but for clothing. However, it was reported on August 3 that there were no caribou. On August 16 an aircraft went into Pelly and Garry lakes and dropped off food but we do not know what food. I understand it was the family allowance food. With prices at Baker Lake, you know just about how far the family allowance would go. I have no evidence of how much food was left there on August 15.

In December the same report was made: No caribou; very few fish; the people in dire circumstances; near starvation. On December 15 another aircraft went out and dropped off food. I might say that it dropped off food without contacting the Eskimos. It dropped it off on the trail or in some building between Pelly lake and Garry lake, in a cache, in a building, without contacting the Eskimos. What happened? On December 15 they got this food. The newspaper articles, all written in April, May and June, report there was starvation amongst these Eskimos.

The other day the minister, when I asked him whether an inquest had been held, said that there was no formal inquest, not as they are held in the provinces, but that some sort of inquest was held. From the sessional papers I find that there was an inquest. I do not see any reason why inquests should be any different in the Northwest Territories from what they are in the provinces. As a matter of fact, this is the first time I have ever heard of one. But in this evidence, which is very vague I might say, we find that the coroner took charge of this inquest. He named the people who died. Then the R.C.M.P. constable at that post gave a statement which, as far as the evidence is concerned, started on April 24. I think I should read into the record the evidence of this inquest. In this evidence there are only two people who have statements. That is all we have. The first witness is Corporal V. D. R. Wilson. The report reads as follows:

Corporal V.D.R. Wilson, R.C.M.P., Baker Lake detachment of the said Northwest Territories being sworn, saith:

On April 24th, 1958, I patrolled to Pelly lake airstrip in aircraft CF-GOV. At Pelly lake I met Tinark E2-304 and Kokshout E2-302.

That number is the one on the tag that they put on all Eskimos in the Northwest Territories.

These men told me that a number of Eskimos in the Garry lake area had died of starvation in February and March and that most of the Eskimos were hungry. Tinark told me that the building containing food supplies had burned down in February with the loss of all supplies remaining in the building. I obtained a list of the names of people who had died. I returned to Baker Lake in aircraft CF-GOV.

On April 26th, 1958,—

That is two days later.

—I patrolled to Pelly lake airstrip in aircraft CF-MPP.

That is an R.C.M.P. aircraft.

I took in a supply of food and left the food with Tinark and Kokshout. I obtained further evidence from Tinark about the events of the winter. I returned to Baker Lake in aircraft CF-MPP.

On May 6, 1958,—

Which was ten days or more later.

—I patrolled to the Garry lake area in an R.C.A.F. Otter aircraft. With the assistance of Tinark I located the bodies of twelve of the deceased persons. On June 1st, 1958,—

Which was just about a month later.

—I patrolled to the Garry lake area in an R.C.A.F. Otter and arranged evacuation of the twelve bodies to Baker Lake.

On June 5th, 1958, a preliminary inquest was held to view the bodies of the deceased persons. On June 6th, 1958, post-mortem examinations of the bodies were made by Dr. A. C. Wallace, M.D. I have received a copy of report written by Dr. Wallace and I hereby submit this as Exhibit One. In this report Dr. Wallace states that all of the deceased died of starvation and/or exposure; he could find no other likely cause of death.

Then he goes on to say what happened at that particular time in June. With regard to the finding of the bodies he said this:

The body of E2-356 Peewa was found at the Pelly lake airstrip: It was in a small building covered over with a number of mattresses. It was bare from the waist up; there were no shoes on the feet. Arnaoyuk was a small baby.

In this he is referring to each one of the people who had died of starvation.

This body was found in a small cardboard box on a hilltop behind an abandoned Eskimo campsite. The body of E2-326 Kadluk was found wrapped in a mattress cover on a hilltop back of an Eskimo campsite. The body had been placed in the cover after death. The bodies of E2-328 Akkikunga, E2-329 Tutiktok, E2-412 Igupta, E2-453 Poongook and E2-537 Korschout were found in a snow house. The first two named were on the sleeping platform, the others had been buried in a hole dug in the sleeping platform in the snow.

If any hon. member has ever been in an igloo he will know that inside the igloo they build a platform of ice or snow blocks to lie on. Those first three men were reported to have been buried in this platform. They had apparently died first. The other two men died on top of them.

The bodies of E2-327 and E2-507 Kowetalik were found in the abandoned mission building at Pelly lake. They were on a bed covered with a sleeping bag. The body of E2-353 Itteroyuk was found on the ice at Garry lake. It was face down in the snow and completely clothed. He appeared to have died while walking.

I imagine this means he had apparently died while he was out walking.

The body of E2-277 Nearkook was found on a hilltop near an Eskimo camp site where it had been placed by other Eskimos. The bodies of E2-590 Sibviark and E2-571 Sirkrinerk, both small children, were located near Garry lake by the special constables.

This was the evidence of the R.C.M.P. at the inquest. The only other evidence was given by an Eskimo whose number is E2-304 Tinark—the man who was referred to in the police evidence—the man with whom the food was left on April 24. He said this:

During the winter of 1957-58 I lived on the shore of Garry lake south of the R.C. mission building. There were not many caribou during the winter and the fishing was not very good. There was a supply of store food in a building at Pelly lake and I looked after this food although I was not at the building all the time.

Apparently he was the caretaker and the man in charge of this food.

Because there were few caribou and the fishing was not good the food in the building was used up quickly. All the people were hungry. They were not sick, except with colds. Our clothing was not very good.

The plane brought us food in December and this food lasted until February. It was stored in the small building at Pelly lake. Everyone got food from this building. If they had fox skins, they bought food and left the skins as payment. If they had no fox skins, they took the food they needed and left no payment. Sometime in February the building with the food burned down. There was not a lot of food left in it but there was tobacco, tea, fat, ammunition; also food belonging to the R.C.M.P. at Baker Lake and some dog food. I was told that Peewa had come to the building for food and had stayed in the building for two nights. He tried to light a make-shift gasoline stove in the building and the stove blew up. The building burned down. Most of the people died after the building burned down; during March they died.

I would point out that this Eskimo says that when the building was burned down there was very little food, only tea, tobacco, fat and ammunition.

Near the end of March the plane brought food to Pelly lake and all the Eskimos came in from the camps to get it. The plane came again in April and brought more food because the caribou had not come and the fishing was still not good.

Of course, this was after they had all died—after the starvation period.

During the winter Kadluk had foxes and he got food from the building. He and his family came to my camp in January and February and I gave them food. After the fire Kadluk and his family had all died. They were hungry and could not walk far.

This was the evidence at the inquest. This is all. There were no questions. But I want to know how much food was left in December, the last time contact was made with the Eskimos? Was the amount of food left in December considered enough to last until March 22, the next time they would contact the Eskimos, bearing in mind that the caribou had been decreasing year after year? The people concerned had been warned about it. What plans did they make? Is this the sort of planning that was made for the people who live entirely off caribou? I want to read some of these autopsy reports to the committee: I am not going to read them all: it makes me too sick. Here is one. It refers to the Eskimo Kadluk. He was the man referred to by the Eskimo who had died along with his whole family. We do not know how they died—hunger, I suppose—but as far as the evidence goes, they just died. This is the autopsy report of Dr. Wallace, the clinical history of E2-326 Kadluk:

Clinical history: This 50 year old man was the first of an entire family to perish in the Garry lake area. He is said to have eaten a large amount of dog meat and also some time near the end of February to have fallen in the water. He apparently escaped from this accident and got home successfully. The following day he is said to have had oedema of the arms and legs but complained of no other symptoms. He died a few weeks later. No other history is available of his illness, except that his entire family is said to have been sick from eating dog meat.

External appearance: length 5'3", weight 107 lbs. The body is that of a fairly stocky but somewhat emaciated male Eskimo. His outer clothing is missing except for his boots. A full suit of inner caribou clothing is present and in addition a woollen sweater and an underwear vest is worn. There are no mitts. There is a pair of inner and outer caribou boots and in addition a pair of canvas boots covering these. No marks of violence of any type are seen externally. There is practically no subcutaneous fat anywhere and the retro-orbital tissues consist mainly of fibrous watery material. In spite of the lack of fat the body appears fairly muscular. Small white pimples are present on the arms.

They are all the same. It is criminal.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I shall not read all of this report but I wish to choose a few excerpts to illustrate how serious this matter is. I ask hon. gentlemen of this committee to consider this thought. Let us imagine that 14 people in this chamber occupying seven seats were to starve to death. That does not sound very serious, does it? It is a simple statement of fact to say that 14 people have starved to death. But we in Canada have little personal experience with death as a result of starvation. We speak of people starving to death in the Far East or in the Arctic and there is no real or personal association in our minds. But if 14 people in any part of Canada other than that part which I have the honour to represent were to die of starvation the entire country would be aroused in indignation that conditions of this kind could exist in our society at this stage of the development of our country.

I wish to quote again from a report describing the circumstances under which a small child died. The report reads as follows:

Akkikunga or Putulik (Female Infant)—E2-609.

The identity of this child appears in some doubt, but Putulik E2-609 is listed in the nurse's notes as being the son of Kadluk. This is a female baby, also identified to my understanding, as one of Kadluk's family.

History: The nurse's notes give the birth date of Putulik as September 2, 1957. The R.C.M.P. notes give the birth date of Akkikunga, which may be the correct identification of this child, as January 1958. The baby is only loosely wrapped in tarpaulin and measures 18 inches in length. The history is that the mother Kabluk had insufficient milk to feed him.

The External Examination: Weight is only four pounds. The baby appears extremely small, wizened and devoid of fat. This child was not examined further; the extremely low weight of the child makes survival even under ideal circumstances a very precarious thing. Under the circumstances prevailing it is concluded the child's weight and nutrition would be incompatible with survival.

In each of these cases the doctor has found that there was no fat on the bodies of these people, no fat even behind the eye balls, and in practically every case the clothing was gone. For instance, in the case of the man who had gone to the food cache to light the stove it is reported that he escaped without his parka. He went to another building in the area because he did not have sufficient clothing to protect him from the cold. It must be remembered that all of these people were in the same position without heat or food. It is stated that he crawled between two mattresses in the shack and he was found frozen there wearing nothing from the waist up. He wore two or three sets of trousers but no footwear. When the minister tables this report it will be available for every hon. member to read. In every case the autopsy reports indicate that nothing was found in the stomachs and intestines of these people except caribou hair. In almost every case it is reported that at the time of death the people were not wearing their caribou clothing which is necessary in that country. I can therefore reach only two conclusions. Either some one removed the clothing from the bodies of these people in order to clothe themselves or the people who died had eaten their clothing, their boots, parkas and the caribou rugs on which they lie in an effort to keep themselves alive.

There is another disturbing aspect to these incidents and to illustrate it I shall refer to the case of the death of Peewa. I have already read the evidence of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police constable who testified that the body was found in a small building covered over with a number of mattresses. It was bare from the waist up and there were no shoes on the feet. The autopsy report refers to Peewa by the name of Arnardjuar, case No. E 2-356. It is the same man because he was in the warehouse fire. Under the heading "External Examination" the autopsy report reads:

All reports agree that this man was frozen following the warehouse fire in February. His age is given as somewhere between 18 and 21 years in various reports. He is said to have been in the warehouse when it took fire and got out but without his parka. He crawled into some mattresses in a nearby building and was later found frozen.

External examination reveals an adult Eskimo measuring five feet three inches in height and weighing 105 pounds. No mitts or gloves are worn and no footwear is present. No clothing is present from the waist up. There are two pairs of canvas trousers, one pair of pyjamas, one pair of tweed trousers and one pair of under pants worn. No caribou clothing was present whatsoever. The left foot has been amputated probably post mortem. The appearance suggests that either wolves or dogs have caused this lesion . . . No other sign of violence are seen and there is no clear evidence of frost bite.

The autopsy report indicates that the left foot was amputated probably after death whereas the Royal Canadian Mounted Police report says there were no shoes on the feet. What happened between the time the R.C.M.P. discovered this man frozen to death between the mattresses and the time the body was removed? The autopsy report suggests that either dogs or wolves caused the lesion and there were no other signs of violence.

This is a matter on which I could speak at considerable length. We have heard the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources speak about the great vision of northern development in terms of both material and human potentiality. It disturbs me that in Canada we should see posters, hear radio announcements and television commercials inviting the people of this country to subscribe to an organization called CARE which looks after hungry people in other countries often showing photographs of children with bloated stomachs and protruding ribs when at the same time in our country conditions exist such as those I have placed before the committee this afternoon in which 14 people starved to death.

Do not forget that. This is only one instance; this is Garry lake. What happened all over that area last winter? The minister is smiling. He is going to have an answer for this, I suppose. It does not matter to me what the answer is, no matter what he says we are not going to bring back those who have died. When we are planning for development I think we should do something about these people. I want to read from the evidence given when the estimates of the department were before the committee on mines, forests and waters. In regard to this matter the minister said this, as reported at page 152 of the evidence and proceedings of the committee on mines, forests and waters:

If an Eskimo is in trouble in any part of the territory, no matter how remote, this is our responsibility right here in Ottawa.

I will leave it at that. First, we have to realize and we do realize, and the minister realizes as well as I do, that the development of northern Canada has to take in human development. It has to look after the problems facing our native peoples in that area. Some planning should be done. As I said in 1956, if there are no caribou in that area, why leave the people there? Move them to an area where they can live. If there are no caribou and they cannot live off the land, move them to where there is something on which they can live, namely fish or white whale or whatever it might be. But do something about this vision and do something for the poor people of the country so that they will not die from starvation, cold and lack of clothing or because the caribou have not come.

Just imagine yourself out a thousand miles from nowhere, with no food, and building a snow house and nothing in it to eat, no light, nothing. Put yourself in their position. Finally, you have to start eating the caribou hide that you have to lie on and your parka that you have to wear in order to live. This, Mr. Chairman, is a serious matter. It is a matter that should be looked into. It should have been looked into before. The minister knows that I have read speeches of his in which he has talked about the decline of the caribou. As I said before, we have to plan to look after not only the material development of our north country but also the human development.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I think the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie River express what has been said on several occasions before by various members of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources about the seriousness of adjusting the few hundred Eskimos who live in this vast area of Keewatin to the fact that the caribou supply has almost finished, if it is not finished for all practical purposes.

Just three weeks ago, at the opening of the Northwest Territories council meeting here in Ottawa, the commissioner of the Northwest Territories told this whole sombre story to the members of that council and outlined to them some of the things that we had in action and some of the things that we would have to do. I think the committee will be pleased to learn that this matter has not gone on without full awareness and heartburning on the part of the members of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think I made very clear to the members of the committee on mines, forests and waters that the human resources of the north must be preserved not only for the material advantage that would come from their proper use but also because we are dealing with our fellowmen.

When I look over the story of what has been accomplished I know it is but a small beginning, but I will let the committee judge whether this matter of the starvation of people, which is a recurring thing in the north, has gone unnoticed. I might add a personal note. If any person wants to read the diaries of Samuel Hearne, the first white man who went through this area, of his three trips to Coppermine, he will find the same story of privation and starvation is told there.

Mr. Hardie: I hope the government has done something since Hearne's time.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member for Mackenzie River made a very moving speech, and I sat here and made no interruptions. The whole committee listened attentively because their hearts were moved by the story he told. I would like a chance just to say something, without any appeal to the emotions, on what has been done. Last year the department set up a team of biologists and wild life experts to follow the remaining caribou herds, for several reasons. One was to let the Indians and the Eskimos know where the migrations were moving, which would give them a better chance to intercept them at the crossing places over the rivers and other places where they go. Second, they are trying to find out what is the cause of the drop in the number of calves each year as opposed to the normal drop.

Then there is a second type of activity which was carried on last year, and which is still continuing. The three prairie provinces, the government of the Northwest Territories and the federal government have been meeting and working out some form of co-ordinated program to make certain that what is left of the caribou herds is reserved as much as possible and, as well we can possibly manage, for the use of those who rely entirely on the caribou. These are the two things that were started by the department last year for dealing with the shortage of caribou at the present time.

There is a list of six or seven things that I should like to mention. I think everybody in the committee realizes that the area dealt with by the hon. member for Mackenzie River, generally speaking, concerns the Keewatin area, which is the area west of Hudson bay and extending through the tundra to the forest lands close to the Mackenzie. In this area there are only a few hundred Eskimos, who are nomadic people, and who have existed and survived there with the greatest of difficulty for many centuries. Only a few have survived, and it is one of the great stories of mankind that the human mind and the human body can stand what they have stood. But they are there. Their traditional food, which is caribou, is disappearing.

These are some of the things that we are doing to meet the situation as outlined by and which is inherent in the remarks of the hon member for Mackenzie River. The first thing that I have on my list is that we are moving them into settlements where we can look after them. The newest one is at Tavani on the west coast of Hudson bay. In the first stages it will only look after 100 of these Eskimos but it is a start. The matter of moving buildings in there and of getting people to man the staffs is a problem of the department and we are meeting it.

The second thing is that we have arranged with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the last few weeks to co-ordinate their patrols of the area with our northern service officers. The third thing is that we are trying to arrange at the present time for an extra aircraft which can be devoted to going to the relief of these nomadic bands of a few families who move around looking for the caribou and fish that are available. The fourth thing that we are moving toward is the setting up of caches of food. These will be supervised caches because I think the house will recognize that if we set up unsupervised caches these nomadic people would live on the caches and, of course, that would destroy the very thing we are trying to maintain, namely their traditional independence and their ability to look after themselves. I will come back to the actual details of Garry lake in a moment.

The fifth thing we are doing is a federal responsibility and there is no sidestepping it. At their last meeting the Northwest Territories council did something which I think is commendable. They have taken steps in the Mackenzie river delta area to set up a co-operative program whereby the Indians and Eskimos, traditional enemies of the north, will work together to share trapping areas in the district. The sixth thing on the list is the question of providing people to supervise and look after these vast areas with so few inhabitants.

When the hon. member for Mackenzie River spoke in 1956 and complained about the lack of action of the previous administration there were two northern service officers in this area. Last year we got the number up to three. This year the house will be glad to know that we are getting two more and if we did not get so much opposition at times on the question of a deficit I would hope that we could extend that step by step and make certain that there are trained officials in the area who can handle the problem. The increase in staff I have just mentioned does not include other departments such as the R.C.M.P. which has eight constables in the area. We are hoping with this slight increase in staff, with co-ordination between ourselves and the R.C.M.P. and with the help of local people such as missionaries and fur traders in the area to set up caches in various parts which will be supervised and which the Eskimos will be aware exist. With such caches under the jurisdiction and control of people who will represent us in looking after them we hope that the starvation which occurred in two or three places in the Northwest Territories last winter will not be repeated.

But I should like to tell the house that we have no assurance whatsoever that in an area which the hon. member has described as a thousand miles from nowhere that we can completely prevent the starvation of family groups in that area. Family groups can exist just 20 miles from a cache of food and still starve. The person who has control of that cache, whether it is a Roman Catholic missionary as it was at Garry lake or somebody else, will have no awareness of what is going on just a few miles away if there is not this connection between the two.

I might mention that at the present time the department has no planes of its own. We have to use planes of other departments and we have their co-operation. I might also mention that a northern service officer in this district has provided his own plane to try to serve these people better and I think that demonstrates the dedication of these few, gallant men of our northern service who are trying to meet these tremendous problems. We do pay, of course, a gasoline allowance for the plane.

I think I have given a survey which illustrates very clearly that we are moving to meet the problem raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie River. I should like to repeat that the problem has not been kept secret. When you read the speech of the commissioner of the Northwest Territories to the council meeting here on July 14 and realize that out of 12⅓ pages over 8 pages deal with the very difficult problem of the Eskimos, for which the Northwest Territories council accepts full responsibility for the handling of this matter on behalf of the federal government, I think you will realize that the department, to the very limit of the human resources of the department, has tried to meet this situation.

It is true that in this vast area, and having regard to the sum of money we are allowed to spend, there have been serious episodes like the one we heard described in such a harrowing fashion. I can only assure the house that the department will do its level best to make sure that this type of thing will not happen in the future.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I had the privilege this year of serving on the committee that dealt with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and first of all I should like to say what a pleasure it was to work with that committee. As was pointed out by the minister, the attendance of members showed the interest that they had in the committee. I should also like to remark at this time on the enthusiasm for his department that is so apparent in the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. He appears to be completely dedicated and certainly seems to have really tied into his job in an endeavour to do it to the best of his ability. In fact, I think it became quite obvious to various members of the committee that the minister was indeed the creator of the vision that we have heard so much about in the last few months. I believe we can give him full marks for being the one who sold it to the Prime Minister who propounded it across the country with such vigour and, indeed, such success.

However, during the quite lengthy statement that the minister made at the first meeting of the standing committee we also saw something else, that apparently the minister and the department have a very clear view of the problems facing the department with respect to northern development. It was quite apparent from his statement, and I intend to make several references to it, that they recognize just what is the big and important problem that we face. But, of course, to recognize a problem is not to find a solution and I must say that where I have to differ with the minister and the government is with respect to the solution they propose with regard to northern development. To illustrate what I have said about the minister recognizing the problems, I should like to refer to page 11 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters where I find the following in the minister's statement:

> To be very blunt about it, if you go back to the experience of the second world war you will find that the American government was very much concerned about the rapid depletion of their strategic resources and there was set up a presidential committee in that country to examine into this matter. This committee reported in 1952 and their report is known as the Paley report. The Paley report says in plain English that the resources of the United States of America are not unlimited and that, at the present time, they are in a deficit position so far as total resources are concerned to maintain their industrial economy. Naturally they have to seek out reserves both of energy and mineral resources in every land.

That was a very clear recognition of the fact that our neighbours to the south, in the very short period of approximately 50 years, will see the end of their vast natural resources. We go to the next page, where the minister points out, and I quote:

> —we are the nation on the northern half of this continent and we want to make certain that the interests, not only of the present generation, are protected, but that the interests of generations unborn will also be preserved.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, that is one of the very important and very grave responsibilities which this government has today. We have to think not only of ourselves, but we have to think, as has not been done unfortunately in the past, of generations that will come after us. The minister continues:

> —so that we can work out an attack on this problem of building a nation of from 50 millions to 100 millions of people based on a concept which I think I would like to call the conservation concept.

There, of course, is the key to the whole situation. In this country we have to embark on a program of conservation such as this North American continent, unfortunately, has not seen in the past. He goes on:

> If I might interrupt my thoughts for a moment to suggest that if the American people had to relive the nineteenth century over again knowing what they now know about their economic history, they would not have had to wait until the turn of the nineteenth century to start these great conservation methods that their nation has now embarked upon.

In other words if they, in the United States, had realized, as we have the opportunity of realizing today, what the situation was they would not be locking the door after the horse had been stolen but would have, as we have a chance to do, taken some precautions before the theft took place. I continue to quote from the minister's remarks:

> We in Canada, whether because an act of grace, or because of our geographical location, or simply as a result of inertia, have not had our resources depleted so widely as the American resources have been depleted, without plan.

Now, there is a strange statement to come from a Conservative cabinet minister. Generally we look for a statement of that nature from the so-called planning socialists. I should like to compliment the minister once more on his grasp of the situation. He said:

> We may have, either by the grace of God, or by our own inertia, been saved from having misused our resources.

Certainly there again we find a recognition of what is happening and what we have seen happening south of us over the last number of years. Then, the minister said:

> I would like to go back to our own country. I do think that if the people who now live in the central provinces, particularly in Ontario, had to relive the last 100 years, knowing now what they knew then, great changes would be made in the planning and use of resources. There is no question of attaching blame for this at all. It is simply that we have a determination to avoid these mistakes, if possible, in our country as far as the future development and efficient use of those resources.

We do not have to go very far beyond this capital city of Ottawa to see a striking example of that very thing to which the minister has referred. We had at one time, within a distance of 200 or 300 miles, one of the greatest stands of white pine possibly in the world. Today, like the caribou of the north country, this white pine is practically extinct. Surely that is a shining example of something we cannot afford to have happen in this country. There was a time possibly when the resources of this country were believed to be unlimited. We could permit people to go through and ravish the countryside for miles and miles, and what did it matter? There was lots of undeveloped country farther along. Certainly we have had it demonstrated to us that that is not the case. At one time the people of the United States thought the same thing, that their resources were unlimited; that it was quite all right to allow people to run riot across the country because there was always the horizon beckoning them farther along. Certainly, that is not so and I, for one, am pleased to see that the minister realizes it is not so. He goes on to say:

Because we have great reserves of minerals of all kinds, Canada is a great centre of interest in an economico-political way. For that reason, some consideration and logic had to come in respect of exploitation of these resources.

Mr. Chairman, I say it is about time we got some reason and logic into the use and exploitation of our resources in this country. On page 20 of the report we find the following remarks:

—there is no use in doing all this work if there is not some thought given to a long range conservation concept of the most efficient use of those resources.

A little farther down, in the second paragraph, he said:

—I want to make it clear that unless we formulate a plan for the use of our resources we may lose the long range strategic necessity of having control of those resources in our hands, either for world use, or for people over the world, or most effective use in the North American economic picture.

In these remarks of the minister which I have quoted, as I said at the start, he appears to have a true and complete grasp of the situation. The problem is recognized but then, Mr. Chairman, we come to the question of a solution. In the remarks of the minister, and in the further discussion that took place at meetings of the committee, I am afraid the only indication of a solution offered by this government was that the taxpayers of this country should put up the money to open up this country, and then we should turn it over to the same people described in the minister's remarks who ravished the resources of the country to the south. Is that a solution? In the process of the depletion of the resources of the United States in the last number of years, at least these people developed the country themselves. These people who made the mistakes that the minister pointed out so well, mistakes that we cannot allow to happen in this country, will be the ones who will develop these resources here. According to the minister's plan we are going to develop the country, open it up, and hand it over to them on a silver platter with no curbs or checks whatever to prevent them doing the same thing as we have seen them do to the south of us.

I refer to the remarks of the minister on page 19:

And if we, in our planning can put certain facts and figures before the people of Canada either in the form of energy figures, the willingness to build roads, or railways, or sea routes, or water routes, or air routes, then we are providing for these capital goods within the function of government—power, communication and transportation—to allow private enterprise to go in and develop these resources.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is that a solution? This government has done an excellent job on facing up to what the problems are, but what is the solution? This vision of this northern development, as outlined by the minister so well and so enthusiastically to this committee, could be, if properly handled, the greatest boon that this country has ever seen. The proper precautions should be taken to prohibit the same thing happening that he pointed out had happened in the country to the south of us. If, on the other hand, the taxpayers of Canada are going to have to put up the money to open up this country and hand it over to the same people to do the same thing as they did in the country to the south, then I am afraid I will have to say that would be the biggest sellout that this country has ever seen.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not want to enter into a debate of this kind on the relative merits of private enterprise and socialism. However, I think the hon. member for Timmins has been very kind to me and I think he would appreciate it if I just say one word that I think would add a little bit to his understanding of what I said in the committee. I made it very clear that I considered it to be the responsibility of government to provide those capital goods such as railroads and power which are the type of things that seem to fall under the category of things that should be provided by the government. But I also made it equally clear that any time we open up any country and any successful operation developed that we have a very heavy tax in this country called the corporation tax which takes half the profit. I pointed out the merits of the idea. If you spend $5 million or $6 million of the taxpayers' money which will trigger off several hundred million dollars worth of investment of private enterprise backing and so on for opening up our natural resources and if that operation is successful and if they make a profit, we would get half the profit through the corporation tax. I pointed out my strong belief that for every dollar the taxpayer is asked to spend in opening up this northern country, all the rest of Canada would benefit many times over.

The second point in my reply is purely political and not designed to stir up any trouble or anything like that. I happen to come from the province of Saskatchewan and I have seen the group of people who form the government there move into the development of resources with a socialistic attitude at the beginning. Then, because the experience they were obliged to face up to brought a difference of conditions from those that existed previously, they have changed their thinking around entirely. I should just like to point out that the premier of the province of Saskatchewan is on public record with a letter to all the oil and gas companies saying that his government would never think of expropriating or taking over the oil and gas companies if they come into Saskatchewan. The provincial treasurer, Mr. Clarence Fines, is also on public record as saying that he would not stay in a government which took any part in the development of natural resources and that this matter should be left to private enterprise.

The third subsection of this political answer which I hope does not stir up a political argument is that these people who are very sincerely interested in bringing in social enterprise in Saskatchewan are withdrawing from the crown corporations for the very simple reason that experience has taught them that it is very difficult to go into competitive business. I may say quite frankly that I appreciate their very practical nature in adapting themselves to conditions as they are and not as they hoped they would be. I hope that this answer has not precipitated an academic debate on this subject. I just wanted to make it clear that we were not using the taxpayers' money to open up a great resources area in order for a few people to exploit them. The profits will come to all the people of Canada. I think I made it abundantly clear in the house when I spoke that the people in the central parts of Canada will be the chief beneficiaries of this development program at the first stages.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If I may, I should just like to say a word. I hope that the minister did not get the interpretation that I was advocating that the federal government should go in as a national industry and open up these resources. What I was advocating merely was that some provision be made or some control be kept in order to prevent the same thing happening here as has happened in the United States because apparently these measures that the minister outlined have applied in the United States and have not prevented it from happening there.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think we are in agreement on that point. We will use the regulations as we have them and they are being amended. They are also amended in so far as gas and oil regulations are concerned. We are now starting work on the quartz mining regulations. All these resources will be looked at in the light that we are merely looking after the resources in the Northwest Territories as a public trust for the people who will live in that part of the country in the future.

Mr. Granger: I should like to ask the minister whether his department assumes the same responsibility for the Eskimos' welfare in the provinces as it does in the territories?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am informed that in Newfoundland the situation is a little bit different from that in the rest of Canada. I am informed that at the time of confederation with Newfoundland special arrangements were made with the new province whereby financial considerations were given in return for the province of Newfoundland looking after the Eskimos as well as the Indians. However, in the province of Quebec and to a limited degree in the province of Manitoba the federal government has responsibility for the Eskimos.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador would permit me to ask a question.

Mr. Granger: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister to give a little bit more consideration to the answer he has given and to give a more extended answer the next time his estimates are up for consideration.

Mr. Granger: If I may, I should like to follow that question with another question. I wonder whether the minister can tell me what proposals he has received from the province of Newfoundland with regard to particular roads to resources? I think that is a fair question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The policy position that I took in the committee is one that I should like to keep here, namely that when an hon. member asks me about a particular road, I will give him the information if it has been approved and agreed upon between the two parties. But if it has not been agreed upon and it is still a matter of discussion between the two governments, I think it would be better not to say anything about it.

Mr. Granger: I should like to thank the minister for his answer. That is fair enough. As it is practically six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I may call it that before I continue with my oration.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the house leader would be good enough, for the convenience of hon. members, to indicate again the order of the business for Monday so that it will be in today's Hansard and whether, at the same time, he could give an assurance that none of the finance bills will be taken up until Tuesday.

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I shall be glad to give that assurance. It is the intention to go on with the items standing in the name of the Minister of Finance on Tuesday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Regardless of the progress made on Monday?

Mr. Green: Yes; I think so. On Monday we shall start with items Nos. 18 and 21 on today's order paper, both of which stand in the name of the Prime Minister, the first having to do with a simultaneous translation system and the second with the federal district commission. Then we shall take item No. 1 on today's paper, which has to do with the setting up of a lakehead harbour commission; then item No. 7, which is a minor Senate amendment to the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921, and stands in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources; then item No. 9, second reading of an act to amend the Indian Act, standing in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; then three items in the name of the Minister of Justice, namely Nos. 8, 12 and 17, one being an amendment to the Penitentiary Act, the second an amendment to the Criminal Code and the third a resolution concerning the national parole board; then item No. 20, which is a resolution concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, August 11, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR RESTORATION OF PRIVATE BILL TO ORDER PAPER

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South) moved:

That Bill No. SD-199, entitled an act for the relief of William Harrison Terry, the preamble of which has been reported as not proven, be placed on the order paper for consideration at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Winch: Explain.

Mr. Chown: Mr. Speaker, since this bill was considered by the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills further consideration has been given to it by certain members of the committee who feel now that they would like to hear further evidence, particularly of the co-respondent, in order to satisfy themselves that there will not be a gross miscarriage of justice.

In addition, some of them wish to discuss the bill, and they have indicated to the chairman and others on the committee that they wish to discuss it and the evidence thereon on its merits and, for this reason, pursuant to a precedent in the Journals of 1931, at page 552, I have made the motion to have it put back on the order paper.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, we ask that you give a decision as to whether we can consider something the preamble of which is not proven.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. Since I was advised that this motion was to be made I have considered it, and there is precedent for a motion to restore a bill to the order paper which, if accepted, would restore the bill and bring it up for consideration with other private bills.

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): With respect to the answer the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just given regarding oil, I would ask him if he would speak to the Secretary of State about a question involving somewhat the same form of interrogation which has stood in my name on the order paper since May 16 and has not been answered.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that I have left unanswered any question addressed to me on May 16. I shall look into the matter.

FINANCE

MOTION TO APPROVE EXPENDITURES AUTHORIZED BY SPECIAL WARRANTS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to approve certain expenditures authorized in respect of the fiscal year ended on March 31, 1958, including those provided for by the special warrants issued by the Governor General pursuant to orders of the governor in council of August 16, 1957 (P.C. 1957-1111), August 19, 1957 (P.C. 1957-1134) and February 7, 1958 (P.C. 1958-222), but not including the expenditures authorized by appropriation acts for that fiscal year; and to authorize the application of certain amounts in the accounts of the said fiscal year.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RESOURCE ROADS PROGRAM, ONTARIO

Motion No. 15—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Benidickson):

For a copy of all correspondence since September 1, 1957, between the federal government and the province of Ontario respecting cost sharing of a roads to resources program.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, will you have this motion stand? The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has asked that it stand each time he has been here, but he is not here today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite willing to have it stand until the hon. member is here.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO DESIGNATION OF NO. 11 HIGHWAY FROM NORTH BAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the Department of Public Works completed an agreement with the province of Ontario to share the cost on more than one route designated as the trans-Canada highway? If so, is No. 11 highway from North Bay to Cochrane, Kapuskasing, Hearst and Geraldton included in the agreement?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): No, there is only one road covered by the agreement, and in that part of Ontario it goes roughly along the north shore of lake Superior.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister not aware that a year or so ago the provincial minister of highways promised the people in that area that two trans-Canada highway routes would be designated in that district, one along lake Superior and the other through Chapleau and on to the lake?

Mr. Green: No, I was not aware of that fact. This may have been some of the complicated work done by the former federal government.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, it was not. It was done by the provincial government and announced by the provincial minister.

TRADE

OIL—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REMOVAL OF U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press report of a letter written by Congressman Coffin to President Eisenhower urging him to remove United States restrictions against the importation of Canadian oil? Has Canada made further representations subsequent to the publishing of this letter, and can the minister say whether progress is now being made toward the lifting of these restrictions?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I desire to express my thanks to the hon. member for sending me a copy of this question. In reply I can say that my attention has been drawn to the text of that letter, and I have read it with great gratification. I am glad to be able to say also that it is very closely in accord with the views of the Canadian government. With respect to representations, the latest occasion on which the government put its views in this matter before the government of the United States was in a note dated June 23, 1958. The matter was also raised during President Eisenhower's visit to Ottawa in early July. It is our hope that the representations we have made on a number of occasions and the support which our views have now been given by Congressman Coffin will lead to the removal as soon as possible of United States import restrictions against Canadian oil.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

JORDAN—INQUIRY AS TO EVACUATION OF CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs anything to say about the announcement by the United States government that it has requested citizens of United States nationality to leave Jordan? What preparations or arrangements are being made by the government of Canada for Canadian nationals in Jordan?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has no official representation in Jordan. Precautions taken concerning the protection of Canadian citizens in Jordan and their possible evacuation in times of emergency are:

1. They were requested some time ago to register with the British mission in Amman.

2. Warnings to leave given by the British mission would include the nine registered Canadians and other British subjects in Jordan.

3. Advantage could be taken by Canadians of both British and United States facilities for evacuation.

The decision for evacuating Canadians and other British subjects from Jordan rests, as far as we are concerned, with the United Kingdom ambassador in Amman, and does not depend upon warnings issued by the United States authorities to its nationals to leave the country.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs not realize that the hon. member for Essex East will soon be in that area, and that every effort should be made to protect him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rather, every effort should be made to protect that area.

PUGWASH, N.S.—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I regret having once again to disturb the equanimity of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on a Monday morning by asking him a question. According to a Canadian Press dispatch dated August 10, Premier Robert Stanfield of Nova Scotia welcomed 14 British and United States "thinkers" at the opening of a conference, called by Cyrus Eaton, at Pugwash, Nova Scotia.

Can the minister inform the house if any "thinkers" from his department received an invitation to attend, or are any of his departmental "thinkers" attending as observers at this conference?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would urge the hon. member not to be too worried about disturbing my equanimity on a Monday morning. With respect to this conference, I can say that we have no knowledge of the holding of the conference, and therefore we have not received in the department any invitation for any representative of the department to attend. Now, there is nothing in this reply, Mr. Speaker, that could be taken to suggest or imply that there are no "thinkers" in the Department of External Affairs.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—STATEMENT ON ACTIONS TAKEN BY R.C.A.F.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last the hon. member for Mackenzie River asked if the R.C.A.F. had made any report with regard to the starvation of Eskimos at Garry lake.

I am now informed that following a request received from the R.C.M.P. on May 30, an R.C.A.F. Dakota based at Winnipeg airlifted a doctor from Fort Churchill to Baker Lake southeast of Garry lake. Subsequently this aircraft transported some 50 surviving natives from Garry lake to Baker Lake. The operation was completed on June 2. The R.C.A.F. also brought out some of the bodies from Garry lake to Baker Lake so the doctor could perform autopsies in an effort to ascertain the cause of death of the 16 Eskimos.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): As a supplementary question, may I ask if the minister has a report, not of the events taking place from May 30 up to sometime in June, but with regard to a trip the R.C.A.F. made on March 22 to Garry lake?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I have no report on that.

57071-3—210½

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

BEAM STATION ROAD, TERRACE AIRPORT, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): On Saturday the hon. member for Skeena asked me if I could give some information regarding a motion for the production of papers which was passed on July 7 concerning the beam station road. Since correspondence with the provincial government of British Columbia was involved, among other things, we wrote to that government after the motion was passed asking their concurrence in the tabling of this portion of the correspondence. No reply having been received, we have now sent a further follow-up letter asking for a reply. This, however, is the reason for the delay in the production of papers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO APPROVE INSTALLATION OF SIMULTANEOUS TRANSLATION SYSTEM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house do approve the installation of a simultaneous translation system in this chamber and that Mr. Speaker be authorized to make arrangements necessary to instal and operate it.

He said: For quite a number of years, Mr. Speaker, from time to time there have been representations made on behalf of the establishment in this chamber of a simultaneous translation system. This goes back some years, and I recall that in 1952 or 1953 there were rumours, which apparently had a sound basis, that consideration was being given to action in this regard. However, nothing was done during the intervening years, though on more than one occasion various members advocated the necessity of the establishment of such a system, to the end that members in the house would be able to follow and understand everything that was being said by the member who, at the moment was speaking. As you will recall, on November 25, 1957, the then hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of setting up a special committee of parliament for the purpose of considering the establishment of a system of simultaneous translation—

Various hon. members spoke on that occasion. The essence of the motion was that a committee of parliament give consideration to the establishment of the system in question.

As all hon. members know, simultaneous translation has been in effect in the United Nations since that body was established, according to the information I have, as well as in this chamber in the autumn of 1957 when the international postal congress met here. With regard to the latter experience I am going to say nothing. That matter was dealt with at length during the course of the debate to which I have referred and which took place in this house respecting the setting up of the committee. It was dealt with at length by the then postmaster general, who pointed out the benefits of the plan and also some of the inherent difficulties that were experienced by that conference.

As far back as May 22, 1956, the junior chamber of commerce in a brief delivered to the then speaker of the House of Commons, advocated such a system as well. I have before me an extract from the department of public information of the United Nations in which there is a general summary of the technique applied in that chamber. It says:

> The official languages of the general assembly—and of the United Nations—are Chinese, English, French, Russian, and Spanish; the working languages are English, French and Spanish.
> A system of simultaneous interpretation is used in the general assembly auditorium, council chambers and most of the committee rooms. Listeners are provided with earphones which they may tune in to any one of the five official languages.

However, it says this also:

> An interpreter does not translate literally; he renders into another language the ideas and arguments of the speaker, in the speaker's order.
> At meetings where the traditional consecutive method of interpretation is used, the speaker's remarks are translated after he has completed his speech.

Even there, as was pointed out during the debate last fall, it has been found difficult to secure the necessary technological skill in translating ability which will permit of simultaneous translation taking place. Because of that fact and in order to assure that if this motion is passed those who will be appointed to discharge the duties and responsibilities in connection with translation may be qualified and trained accordingly, action to this end has been taken. Such action, however, is on a provisional basis pending the outcome of the motion before the house.

Mr. Speaker, as one who through the years has tried to develop some facility in speaking the French language, though without what might be called mediocre success, I have come to a point where I can, speaking generally, follow debates in French provided there are not too many interruptions and dependent also upon the velocity with which the speaker delivers his speech. I can fully understand the position of French speaking members who, I think I can say with entire truthfulness, have on many occasions expressed their feelings on this subject in the course of speeches in this house. They have explained their difficulties in fully expressing themselves in the English language, which course has been made necessary by the large percentage of English speaking members.

There is general agreement that this assembly, now considering this motion, is under our constitution entirely bilingual in character.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is, therefore, no reason why the presenting of this motion should have been so long delayed; and the adoption of this motion will be belated recognition of the equality of the two basic languages of this country as related to discussions in this chamber. The motion cannot but benefit all members, in that its adoption will assure that no matter what their language might be, all members may from now on speak with assurance in either English or French, knowing that regardless of the knowledge of the language in question on the part of other members, their views can be completely presented and understood in this house.

I also believe this motion will provide belated recognition of the fact that under our constitution this basic right has been secured and will be maintained as part of our constitutional freedom, and will be regarded as unchangeable and unchanging. This view, I believe, is of the essence in the maintenance of unity within our country. After all, our very confederation came about as a consequence of the partnership between those of French and English origin. Because of that fact everything we can do to ensure the preservation of those basic constitutional rights and the equality of those rights of language should be attained and implemented.

Having said that, I am not going into a general discussion of the benefits that will accrue. I have referred to them in a general way. I believe there has been a very widespread wish and desire on the part of hon. members in this chamber and on the part of members of preceding parliaments for the establishment of this system. For that reason it was considered by the government, following representations that were made from the very first days when we took over the administration of this country, that at this, the very earliest opportunity, action should be taken in this regard.

Therefore on behalf of the government, and I hope with the support of hon. members in all parts of the house, I am placing this measure before the house to the end that by its achievement we will be actually symbolizing the constitutional provisions of the British North America Act and giving to them within this chamber the authority of this house so that hon. members in general will be able to make an even more complete contribution to the debates of the house than has been previously possible. Instead of reiterating those things and once more covering the ground and arguments that were advanced for the setting up of the committee, I simply rest the case with what I have stated.

(Translation):

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in supporting this motion.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, in the absence of simultaneous translation perhaps I had better say that I have just announced my support of this resolution. May I add that this resolution, if it is adopted, will represent a change in the procedures under which we conduct our debates in this house and an alteration of the facilities of the house for such purpose, and I suggest this is the proper way to proceed in a change of this kind.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that hon. members over the years have spoken of their wish for the adoption of a simultaneous translation system, although no formal consideration was given to the matter in this house. As far as I am able to determine, the first time it was placed on the order paper was in the session of 1956, when a resolution dealing with simultaneous translation was put forward by the then hon. member for Roberval, Mr. Georges Villeneuve; but at that time it was not debated. However, as the Prime Minister has indicated, a similar resolution was put on the order paper by the then Liberal member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, Mr. Maurice Breton in 1957. That resolution which was debated and carried by the house, called for a special committee to study simultaneous translation in this chamber and also in all parliamentary committees of the house. That study has been made, and this resolution represents the proposed action of the government in respect of it in so far as simultaneous translation in the House of Commons is concerned.

I do not intend to delay action on this matter for any great length of time, because in the discussion which took place on this question on November 25, 1957, in this house beginning at page 1456 of Hansard for that date, I expressed my views on this matter the report of which commences at page 1475. I do not think there is any need for me to repeat those views at this time, because I made my own position perfectly clear then.

I hope this resolution will commend itself to all hon. members of the house. It is not only of a practical importance but also of importance in the sense that it recognizes the absolute equality in this house of the two official languages of parliament. That we can all welcome. But it is also a recognition of the disability under which some hon. members of the house labour—and I confess I am one of them, Mr. Speaker—the disability of not being completely fluent in both languages. Perhaps like the Prime Minister, and given a few minutes' notice, I can express myself in if not classic perhaps understandable French and, like him, I have reached the position where I can understand in a general way most of the speeches in the French language in this house. Nevertheless the fact that we have a resolution of this kind on the order paper is unfortunately a recognition that we are not all equally fluent in both languages.

I hope the time will come and that it will not be too long in coming—because I think we are making progress in that direction—when simultaneous translation will not be needed and the facilities for that purpose can be taken out of the house as not needed and moved over to the museum or the public archives. At the present time, however, it will be helpful to have them in the house in that it will enable all hon. members who suffer the disability I have mentioned to follow the debates of this house in the language other than that in which they are fluent. Perhaps it will even add to the progress in bilingualism which is being made in this house.

I have not been here as long as some hon. members, but anyone who has been here for a number of years must have been struck by the fact that very great progress has been made in that regard. The installation of these facilities may also help in that connection, because when a speech is being made in English it will help us to get the French translation if we do not agree with what is being said in English. I am sure we can benefit ourselves through listening to what is being said through the translation.

As the Prime Minister said, a simultaneous translation system has been in operation at the United Nations almost since its inception. It is essential to that organization, and the translation is made in five languages. One thing we have learned at the United Nations, and this was mentioned in the debate last November, is that simultaneous translation is no easy thing to do. Simultaneous translators have to be men of great skill. They have to be trained and indeed to have great knowledge of the two languages. The value of this change if it is made, as we all hope it will be, would in part at least be nullified if steps are not taken—and I assume they are being taken—to get the right kind of simultaneous translators with the right kind of training.

I recall, Mr. Speaker, that at the United Nations—and this practice began in the United Nations itself—some of the simultaneous translators have been so well trained and are so successful in this art that they can make a person sound infinitely better in another language than his remarks sounded in the language in which it was made. Perhaps that will be our happy experience in this house. If that is the case, perhaps those of us who make speeches would wish to circulate the French translation.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to express my own support and the support of our party for this measure of practical value, of political symbolic importance, a measure which was introduced, I am proud to say, last November 25 by a Liberal member of this house and which is now being embodied in the motion put forward by the government.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. are very pleased to support the motion that is now before the house. Over the years we have recognized bilingual rights in this country as set forth in our constitution. We feel that in a further aspect this is merely fulfilling those parts of our constitution. Simultaneous translation, as has been said, has been operating for a number of years at the United Nations. It has been operating effectively and well. While it is a five-language translation in the United Nations, it will be a two-language translation in the Canadian House of Commons.

I believe it is recognized by every member in this house that Canada's stature in the world has been growing year by year. I think one of the reasons, among many others, is the fact that English speaking Canadians and French speaking Canadians have been and are building a strong nation from the unity that has been created by those two great races. The motion that will be passed today, I am sure with unanimous support in this house, will be a further indication to all peoples in the world that Canada is a tolerant nation. While there may be differences, there is respect and good will.

In this motion members of parliament have recognized important aspects of our constitution, as I have said, and political parties as such are taking further steps to recognize the bilingual nature of our nation.

The C.C.F. party recently had a national convention in the city of Montreal. At that convention we had the use of simultaneous translation, and I believe we were the first political party in Canada to use simultaneous translation as it will be installed in this house, namely earphones and a translator in a booth, the same type of simultaneous translation that is used in the United Nations. This is a further indication that the C.C.F. party recognizes the bilingual nature of our nation.

I might say that the city of Montreal gave our convention a very warm welcome. Some of us were honoured to be entertained by the mayor of Montreal, Senator Sarto Fournier. Members of the convention were invited to a reception arranged and sponsored by Mr. Gerard Picard, president of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and Mr. Roger Prevost, president of the Quebec federation of labour. All our experience in the city of Montreal indicated to us the essentially bilingual nature of our nation and the importance of making a further step as we are doing today.

I do not expect, Mr. Speaker, that this will be the last step in this direction that will be taken by the Canadian House of Commons. As a matter of fact I for one thought we would be making another step, probably during this session. I thought that would be done because of the debate that took place during the last session and the vote that was taken subsequent to the debate on the proposition that cheques issued by the federal government should be bilingual. Hon. members will recall that that vote was almost unanimous, being 167 in favour and only 9 opposed. I suggest to the Prime Minister with great respect that early consideration should be given to progress in this further direction.

Over the years the C.C.F. has recognized the need for further symbols and emblems of the nature of our Canadian society.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the date of that vote?

Mr. Argue: The date was January 31 of this year. It was a vote on a bill which was presented by Dr. Poulin, an independent member of this house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who opposed it?

Mr. Argue: I will not get into the political aspects of who was opposed to the motion, but I think the vote indicates that generally the propositon had full support in this house, because I would suggest that since only nine members opposed it, and it was not opposed by any political party, such a proposition should receive full support at this time.

I was saying that the C.C.F. believe that as the years go by there will be further steps taken to demonstrate growing Canadian unity and I would hope, along the lines of a motion I presented in this house during last session, that steps will be taken soon to see whether we cannot reach general agreement on a design for a distinctive Canadian flag, which a growing number of Canadians are coming to believe should be adopted.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I want to support and agree with the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition where he said that more and more members of this house are learning the French language, and some of us who have made some start in that direction should continue our efforts. All members who do not now speak French should give consideration to learning the French language.

We have had the good fortune of having Professor Edouard Peloquin come to the House of Commons from the city of Montreal. He is able to stay in Ottawa two days during every week for the purpose of providing lessons for members of parliament. I express the hope that the government and Your Honour may consider whether it might be possible to have a bilingual teacher on the staff of the House of Commons available to members so that instruction might be taken by members any day during the week. It is not possible for all of us to attend when these lessons are given because of the great calls made on our time by other things we have to do. I think the government should consider having available a fully qualified bilingual person to give instruction in the French language and also the English language, if there should be need for that to be done, because I believe such a service would be most valuable and would receive full support from members of the house.

We are proud to unite at this time with the Conservative and Liberal parties in supporting a motion which we believe in its very essence is Canadian, and which will receive the overwhelming support of Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, as the simultaneous translation system is not yet installed perhaps I might try to say a few words about it in my poor English. The matter has been studied for quite a few years, and I want to thank the government for making the system a reality. It will be of great advantage to many French speaking members of the house who will be able to play their full part in discussion of the business before the house.

There is one thing that may be bad, because up to now the French speaking members in particular have had to make an effort to try to learn a little English to be able to deal with matters brought before the house. Even if what the hon. member who has just spoken has suggested is done it will require effort on the part of those who want to learn a second language to be able to do the work needed for that task, but I hope more people will try to learn a second language.

I know that such systems have been installed at the United Nations and at NATO. Such a system is in effect in Belgium where more than one language is spoken and in Israel, where four or five languages are spoken. All these countries have statesmen and representatives who speak more than one language. When I attended a NATO meeting a couple of years ago I noticed that the representatives of England, France, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, Italy, all the countries represented there, were at least bilingual. They could speak their own language and French, or they could speak their own language and English. I remember that the English representatives could listen to French and answer in English, and did not have to make use of the earphones.

I hope this will become the case in Canada. I hope we will take advantage of the opportunity to learn a second language or speak it better than we do now, so that in future years, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, the translation system may perhaps not be used very much. I know one thing; with such a system you have to have translators who are very good. I remember that I was speaking French one day in the house and the hon. member for Vancouver East asked me to go a little slower so he could try to follow me. I know when I speak in French I forget myself and speak very rapidly. I hope the translators will be able to follow those who speak French rapidly, so that English speaking members will have a good idea what we are saying when we are speaking on a particular subject. Therefore I am very happy to support the motion, and I hope the system will be in operation in the very near future.

There is another point I should like to mention, and that is the possibility of extending the system to the galleries of the house. I know that many French speaking Canadians come here and complain of the fact that the proceedings are almost wholly in English, and they do not understand English enough to be able to follow what is going on. At the United Nations an earphone is attached to every seat in the gallery. The only thing you have to do is turn a button in order to hear the language you want to hear, and thus you are able to follow the debate.

If this is possible at the United Nations, where four or five languages are spoken, it would be much easier to instal similar facilities in the galleries of the house so that those French speaking persons who do not understand English and are visiting parliament will be able to follow the debates. That applies also to those who speak English; when speeches are made in French they will also be able to follow the debate. They are the people who will be paying for it. The money does not come from our pockets. It will be paid for by the Canadian public, and I hope when the public visit Ottawa they will have the same opportunity as hon. members to follow our debates in French or English.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, when he put on the order paper a resolution in favour of simultaneous translation, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) carried out one of the promises contained in the speech from the throne.

I want to commend him publicly in this house for introducing a bill that will help lead representatives of the two great races in our country, that is all hon. members, to better mutual understanding and appreciation. Thus English-speaking members will be able to follow speeches delivered in French by their French speaking fellow-citizens, and vice versa.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this system of simultaneous translation might well prove the greatest step towards national unity since confederation.

I know that, with simultaneous translation, all hon. members in this house will be able to understand one another better. I feel it will impart a new and greater sense of unity. And if Sir John A. Macdonald were living today, I am sure he would support this proposition. I would even say that, if simultaneous translation, if that system, had existed at the time of confederation, I am certain that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, and all the fathers of confederation, would have favoured its use in parliament.

May I recall at this time part of a highly inspiring address made in this house in 1890 by the most illustrious of all the fathers of confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald, when he defined in these words the spirit of the pact of 1867:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other; I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is conquered country is à propos de rien. Whether it was conquered or ceded, we have a Constitution now under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having equal rights of every kind—of language, of religion, of property and of person. There is no paramount race in this country; there is no conquered race in this country;

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, in moving this resolution, promotes, and somehow gives a more concrete form to national unity. I would say that in doing so the right hon. Prime Minister follows the doctrine of Sir John Macdonald. In a word, he favours national unity.

In the past, briefs had been submitted to the former government in favour of simultaneous translation. Need I mention here the brief submitted by the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Canada, with a membership of 25,000. According to a report in the Montreal Gazette, on May 23, 1956, the Junior Chamber of Commerce submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons, then Mr. Louis-René Beaudoin, a request for the installation of a simultaneous translation system in this house.

The principle of national unity will thus be reinforced, and all hon. members of this country will be able to appreciate and understand each other better.

When listening a few moments ago to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), who had risen in support of this project, I was thinking of his speech in this very house when he said, as can be seen on page 510 of the official record of this house of December 1st, 1953:

> That is why I do not agree with the suggestion that there should be established in this chamber a system of translation similar to that which they have at the United Nations. Such a system would tend to stop efforts to speak the second language. I hope such a system will not be installed in this house.

Well, the House of Commons is not a school for the teaching of French or English. It is a forum for the discussion of all the problems of the Canadian nation. If a member wants to hear a speech in French, or in English, all he will have to do will be to put on his earphones and he will be able to follow what is being said in the other language.

I congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada who is the symbol of national unity. I congratulate and thank him on behalf of the people of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length about this motion. The leaders of the different parties represented in this House of Commons have just expressed their views and it is now a matter of record that the three parties in this house support the motion for the establishment in this House of Commons of a system of simultaneous translation.

Mr. Speaker, this measure will extend considerably the official recognition of bilingualism in Canada. I have just heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) make one of his typical statements to the effect that this is the most important legislation since confederation, a 100 per cent Duplessis phrase. I have no intention of following him in that vein.

Since all parties are agreed on the basic principle of simultaneous translation here, in this house, I would like to recall also, as was done by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), that Mr. Maurice Breton, distinguished predecessor of the hon. member who just resumed his seat, was the first to advocate the installation of a system such as this, in this house.

(Text):

I should like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition, who started his speech in French this morning. May I express the opinion that the installation of this new facility will not prevent hon. members who speak English or hon. members who speak French from studying the use of the other official language which is not well known to them. We should use this system to improve our knowledge of both languages and not make it an excuse for our failure to learn the other official language of this country.

(Translation):

Following the hon. members who have spoken, I wish to thank the government for this beneficial piece of legislation.

I know, Mr. Speaker, the problems that face members who live in parts of Canada where only one language is spoken. For those who were born far from the province of Quebec and who, for many years, have heard only the English language, it is surely difficult to learn French. It is quite gratifying to see that many members of the House of Commons, are now taking courses in the French language. They are making considerable efforts to master that language. On the other hand, the same applies to Canadians born in the province of Quebec and living in communities where French Canadians are the majority, since they must make great efforts if they want to learn the English language.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of this motion. We will all support it in the hope that it will foster national unity in Canada.

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency in the House of Commons, I have particular reasons for congratulating the government for the concrete step it is taking with regard to the French and English languages, by setting up here a simultaneous translation system. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was right in reminding us a moment ago that the British North America Act recognizes both French and English as the two official languages of this country.

The Prime Minister also recalled that, in past years, several members of the house had requested the setting up of a simultaneous translation system. I am happy to note, Mr. Speaker, that this project is now taking shape under the guidance of the present government and that the motion for the setting up of this system of a simultaneous translation has been introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister, who is from Saskatchewan.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that so excellent a proposal is being put through.

I wish my hon. friend, the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), were in the house this morning, for I mean to reply to a question he put to me during one of his speeches, expressing surprise at the fact that, in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I had described the Prime Minister as the saviour of confederation. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to point out to hon. members that the present right hon. Prime Minister is not merely a man of words, but of deeds when it comes to giving practical effect to the spirit of confederation.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed delighted that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has decided to propose the setting up of a simultaneous translation system in this house. What a fine, splendid, achievement! We are most gratified at the proposal, Mr. Speaker. However, it is regrettable that in this way we might lose the desire and incentive to learn the beautiful French language. It is unfortunate because in being free to listen to either of two languages at the same time, there is no longer any incentive to learn the language other than our own.

However, Mr. Speaker, both great races in Canada have much in common especially a shared feeling of being part of the same team in the service of the same Queen, humbly working for the same ends.

Mr. Prime Minister, I thank you and congratulate you.

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in saying a few words this morning on the motion put forward by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr.

Diefenbaker), about the adoption of a simultaneous translation system in this house.

We know that several hon. members have trouble making out what is being said in English, while a great many others are practically or altogether unable to follow what is being said in French. With simultaneous translation, hon. members from anywhere in Canada will be able to follow the debates with greater interest, to understand them better and to take part in them with constructive suggestions.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to suggest that seats in the public galleries be likewise equipped with a listening device for this system. A study of the debates on this matter, which took place on January 22, 1957, shows how deeply the former member of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had studied the question. Incidentally, he said that the cost of earphones for gallery seats was in the neighbourhood of $15 each and, as the galleries seat 626 people, this item cost $9,300.

What is $9,300 for the government of Canada, if it will help visitors get a better understanding of what is going on? Admittedly, many of the visitors understand English only, and many others understand only French. With two-way interpretation, visitors will be able to follow the debates in their own language, understand what is being said and therefore take more interest in the debates.

Recently, I had visitors who do not know English or know very little; I took them to the galleries while an English speaker was expressing his views on a certain problem. Back in my office, those people asked me what the hon. member had said, and what he was talking about. If we had had simultaneous translation in the galleries, those people would have known what the hon. member was saying and requesting for his riding.

It will also be remembered that, some time ago, when that suggestion was first made of introducing simultaneous translation in the house, a brief to that effect was submitted to the previous speaker by the Chamber of Commerce of Canada. I am happy to see that this suggestion, which was initiated not so long ago, is already being implemented, since we are called upon today to pass this motion. As a matter of fact this morning the leaders of the three parties supported the measure and I am convinced that every member of this house is going to support it.

(Text):

Even though I am a French speaking member, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my opinion in the English language. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Rosedale who expressed himself in the French language. I should like to congratulate all the members of this chamber who are trying to study the French language. They can be sure that all the French members are doing their best to speak the English language, so that all the members can get along and meet together. If they want to learn their French, they will speak in French; and if we want to learn English, we will speak in English. It will then be a great day for all the members.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to dwell unduly on the matter. Everyone seems to favour the resolution, and I am convinced that it is a step forward in the promotion of better understanding between the hon. members of this house and that it will help them make an effective contribution to the business of the house.

Mr. Roland English (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, having had an opportunity to speak last year in this house on a similar resolution, I would be remiss if, on my own behalf and on behalf of the electors of my riding, I did not rise to express my most sincere thanks to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Mr. Speaker, we are starting out today on daily morning sittings and I contend this is a memorable occasion, because the hour we are spending here this morning will long be remembered in the history of Canadian government.

It is good to see the three parties of Canada, and our two great races, join in thanking the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, and that we all recognize the use of both official languages in this house.

There is no point in blaming any government. There is no point in reviewing the past; rather should we unite in looking at the present and in facing the future. It is indeed gratifying to realize that all agree at last in recognizing that there are two great languages in this country, and it is fitting that the parliament of Canada be provided with a system of simultaneous translation.

Several English-speaking members can speak French; most French-speaking members can speak English. However, when an English-speaking member rises to speak in this house, it is quite natural that he should feel more at home in his mother tongue, as would a French-speaking member in his own.

Again, I thank the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. May I also thank and congratulate the representatives of every political party in the house for joining hands in providing this house with a simultaneous translation system.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to take this opportunity of thanking the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for his initiative. During the election campaign, and ever since, I have always said that my riding of Brome-Missisquoi is like Canada, on a smaller scale, made up as it is of people of both great races, of both great cultures. That is why I have always contended that my constituency is a little Canada.

On behalf of my electors, as well as on my own behalf, I thank the right hon. Prime Minister. I draw the attention of the house to the fact that I am one of the first English-speaking members ever to be elected in a riding where a majority of the population is French-speaking. That is why I want to take this opportunity of thanking the right hon. Prime Minister on behalf of the electors of Brome-Missisquoi.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, very briefly I should like to say this. Largely because I am one of the first English speaking members of this house elected by a district of whose people approximately 75 per cent speak the French language, I should like to profit by this occasion to thank the Prime Minister for inaugurating this legislation. I have always said, and I repeat now, that my district is really a little Canada. Its population is mainly made up of people speaking the two languages and having two cultures. In addition we have representatives of all those new Canadians who, of course help to form the real glory and force of Canada. In the name of my electors I would like to say thank you once again to the Prime Minister, and to tell the house how very much this legislation will be welcomed in my district.

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): I should also like to thank the Prime Minister for introducing this legislation. St. Boniface is also a little Canada, but in my area the division between French speaking and English speaking citizens is about fifty-fifty. We also have representatives of the other nationalities who have settled in Canada.

I believe this is a great step toward Canadian unity, and that it will help all Canadians realize that our leader is a true friend of national unity. I would also like to thank the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia for the support they have given to this measure.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia has stated, this is but one step in the right direction. I know that other measures will be passed in due course to accomplish a real unity within our country. No one could ever say that this government favours one section of the Canadian people as against another. We are all completely equal, we respect one another and we get along as a single nation though we do speak two basic languages.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to thank the Prime Minister for having introduced this measure, and to express my pleasure at the support given by this house.

I would like to mention one other matter, however, which I feel might be taken into consideration in relation to the change we are now making. I notice in this connection that the Prime Minister himself sometimes wears one of the small earphones which I have also used on a number of occasions and which I have noticed other members using from time to time. I was wondering whether an extra box could not be added to the simultaneous translation box so that we could still plug into the amplifying set. I have found this set to be useful on many occasions, and I think if just another section could be added it would be advantageous to other hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Following the example of the Leader of the Opposition, I do not think I could possibly do better than bring this discussion to an end by saying the following.

(Translation):

In conclusion, I wish to thank all hon. members for their contribution to this debate.

(Text):

Having said that, I would like to mention that over the years—and this goes back for more than 40 years—I have consistently read the French classics, including the works of Moliere, Bossuet and Racine. While I have been able to read and understand them, I have never been able to convey my thoughts spontaneously and without notes in the French language.

I think the house may be interested in an event which took place recently. Henri Laurier, the grand-nephew of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, knowing my interest in Moliere, made a presentation to me of the complete works of that author. This edition was in both the French and English languages, the French work appearing on the one page while on the opposite page appeared the English translation. The interesting thing was not the fact of this presentation but the fact that on the forepage it bore the notation that the volume came from the library of Sir John A. Macdonald. On another page was revealed the fact that it came to the donor from the estate of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, his grand-uncle, who apparently had received this work after the passing of Sir John A. Macdonald.

That is quite an interesting bit of history. First, Sir John A. Macdonald followed the course of having both English and French works in his library; and second, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who through the years bore with great distinction the title of Prime Minister of Canada, was never above referring to the great contribution made by Sir John A. Macdonald to confederation and to the people of Canada.

I would like to thank hon. members in all parts of the house for their kind personal references in connection with this motion. While this question has been discussed over the years, for some reason or other there have been continuing delays, and the fact that we have changed our opinions has been illustrated today by the excellent contribution, if I may say so, of the hon. member for Hull. He indicated that he possibly had held some fears that the installation of this system might result in a diminution of the desire on the part of hon. members—or at least might lessen the possibility of achievement—to obtain facility in both languages.

I very well recall a speech the hon. member made in this House of Commons in the year 1953 with reference to this subject. I looked up this speech and it is recorded at page 510 of Hansard for December 1, 1953, that he said the following:

> —I do not agree with the suggestion that there should be established in this chamber a system of translation similar to that which they have at the United Nations. Such a system would tend to stop efforts to speak the second language.

That was the considered opinion of the hon. member at that time, and today he very clearly pointed out that he fears the system may have the effect to which he referred in 1953.

With respect to the question as to who first brought this matter before the House of Commons, it would be a valueless pursuit to attempt to ascertain the identity of that person; but in recent years one hon. member who has most strongly brought forward this matter has been the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne). In a speech recorded at page 953 of Hansard for February 7, 1956, for instance, he outlined various grievances, as he called them, and said the following:

> I come from a French speaking riding and when I come here I should like to speak in French. I feel there should be translation facilities in the house which would permit every member to hear me in English simultaneously when I speak in French, just as they have at the United Nations.

That the system will be successful I have no doubt. As the hon. member for Hull mentioned, such a system is used in the Israeli parliament, and I had an opportunity to witness its operation in that body. I found this to be a most revealing experience, for in that parliament there are only four or five Arab members, as I recall it, yet the speeches were simultaneously translated into the Hebrew and Arabic languages to the end that all hon. members could readily understand the proceedings.

I am not going to deal with other steps that may be taken in future to assure the complete recognition of bilingualism under the constitution of our country, but I can say that in taking this step we in this government believe that while it is easy to talk about the subject of Canadian unity, in bringing in this motion a major step toward its achievement is assured.

I thank all hon. members again for their references to my stand in this connection, which is not a new one, and I thank all of them for the degree of support which is apparent for this motion.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

CONSTITUTION OF COMMISSION—REPEAL OF PRESENT LEGISLATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the development and improvement of the national capital region and in relation thereto:
> 1. To provide for the constitution of a national capital commission and to repeal the Federal District Commission Act;
> 2. To provide for the objects, purposes and powers of the commission; and
> 3. To enact such financial provisions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, possibly it might be well for me to outline generally what has taken place with respect to the question of setting up a national capital commission, repealing the Federal District Commission Act, and to outline generally the plans of the government as contemplated by the legislation to be introduced for the development and improvement of the national capital region.

You will recall, sir, that on April 8, 1957, the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, as reported at page 3274 of Hansard of that date, introduced a resolution in terms similar to those of the resolution now before us. The resolution was passed and the bill in furtherance of the resolution received first reading. Mr. St. Laurent on that occasion said, as reported at page 3276:

> It would be this government's intention, if it is returned to office, to introduce a bill at the first session of the new parliament.

On the same page, making reference to the non-partisan spirit of support for the measure for the improvement of the national capital, he added these words:

> —whoever happens to be constituting the government when parliament reassembles will, I am sure, be appreciative of any suggestions which in the meantime are sent to the privy council office, with the object of improving this bill in order that when it is brought forward again it may be the best legislation which those responsible for considering it here and in the other place can possibly devise.

The reason for giving the bill first reading was simply to assure that interested parties should have the opportunity of making their suggestions with a view to ensuring that when introduced the legislation would contain all the beneficial changes believed to be necessary.

As the house knows, in 1956 a joint committee of the House of Commons and the other place made recommendations which are set forth in the minutes of proceedings dated August 1, 1956. In summary and in effect the plan was to enlarge the national capital region from the present area of 900 square miles to an area of 1,850 square miles. I am not going to read to the committee the various recommendations set forth in this report, but I do recommend their consideration by hon. members. The committee sat for a considerable period of time, with 32 sessions for the hearing of evidence, and made its recommendations which were generally and unanimously accepted. However, I should refer to the general purport and purpose of the setting up of the committee, as appears from the report in question at page 1049:

> Since the time of the last report the most significant event in the history of the federal district commission was the completion of the national capital plan under the supervision of M. Jacques Greber. We have received no evidence to suggest that plan should be abandoned. Since ours is the first committee to have it, we desire to say we believe that, from it, a national capital worthy of this country and of its people can be fashioned. We believe that when it is implemented it will be a monument around which and within which the historical and cultural interests and activities of our people can be developed.

The various matters connected with the setting up of the plan were discussed, and part V of the report at page 1052 sets forth in general the recommendations of the committee. In first position is set out the recommendation that a project of basic importance to be undertaken and completed in the national capital area should be the elimination of the causes of pollution of the Ottawa river. Another project of importance set out is the completion of the ten-mile section of the essential elements of the Queensway within the city of Ottawa. It suggests that the federal district commission is to be commended for the action it took to establish rail-freight facilities in the Walkley road area, thus completing the first stage of the railway relocation program. It refers to the bridge facilities across the Ottawa river as being inadequate in the downtown sections of Ottawa and Hull. It recommends the setting up of a green belt, which it suggests could be better described as the intermediate zone between the urban and rural areas, comprising a strip of land approximately one and one-half miles wide extending from the outer limits of Ottawa and Hull.

It states that the green belt area was originally contained in the national capital plan in 1950. It deals with the Gatineau park in the province of Quebec, and observes that provision for that park forms an important part of the national capital scheme.

Finally, after those recommendations with respect to policy, it recommends that the name of the act, which is the Federal District Commission Act, be changed to the national capital act. Then there are further recommendations of a technical or routine nature.

Some weeks ago I announced the establishment of the green belt as Ottawa's planned future urban limits. The green belt was advocated for some 10 years, and in the form in which it is set up about three fifths will be in the township of Gloucester and the remainder, except for about 1,000 acres within Ottawa, will be in the township of Nepean.

The act which the bill to be submitted will repeal, and for which the present bill will be substituted if parliament passes it, is the Federal District Commission Act of 1926. The bill upon which this bill is founded, as I said a moment ago, was introduced by Mr. St. Laurent on April 8, 1957, as Bill No. 417. The present bill is in large measure a repetition of the terms of the earlier bill, changed only to the extent of suggestions made to the privy council for consideration and decision by the government.

If this bill becomes the law of the land I hope we shall be able more effectively to continue the concept of successive prime ministers and parliaments since 1926, whose general desire was to assure that the capital city of our country shall be one that will be a pride to all Canadians and will become an ever-increasing mecca to Canadians. They will be able to see here a symbol of the nation's greatness, a capital so constituted and so planned as to quicken the pulses of Canadians in the pride of Canadian achievement, a capital that will give to Canadians the inspiration that comes from the arts, a capital that will epitomize the principles upon which this nation is founded. In short, we hope we shall achieve in the city of Ottawa, as well as in the contribution being made to the national district plan by the city of Hull, the surrounding areas of Hull and Ottawa, a city which will be a monument to the national unity of our country, to the greatness of our past and to the vast potentialities of our future.

In this city I would like to see a retention of the monuments of our past. It is too late now to raise this matter, but I do so merely by way of illustration of the kind of thing that I hope will be discountenanced by Canadians in this and in future generations. I refer to the destruction of the old supreme court building. I feel that that building, with all its tradition, should have been preserved, not in the location in which it was, if change made removal necessary, but in some part of this city. I doubt whether anywhere in the world there could have been found such a monument to jurisprudence and to the orderly interpretation of our constitution as that building represented; for in that building successive prime ministers of Canada had argued their cases. At least seven of the 13 prime ministers of Canada at one time or another appeared in that court in that building.

I cannot think of any other building in this nation which was more representative of the history of this country and which contributed more to the building of our national traditions in jurisprudence than that building. It went its way in April and May of 1957. Criticism today of its removal has no place. My hope is that in the days ahead Canadians, not only in the city of Ottawa but everywhere in Canada, will display an interest in their historical past and will take measures in addition to those which have been taken in the past, great as they have been, in connection with the work of the historical monuments society, to the end that those devices which have in their custody the traditions and history of our past shall not lightly be removed and be forgotten.

The planning that was done in the past by Mr. King, Mr. Bennett and Mr. St. Laurent had a greater, more profound and majestic concept of a national capital. One of those contributions to which all of us can pay our tribute and at the same time on this occasion do our part to bring about is to see that their traditions and their ideas of this great capital city will become in greater measure than has been so in the past the dedication of Canadians as a whole. It is in that spirit that I open the discussion on this question, which somewhat more than most legislation introduced in the house is of the spirit that one must never forget that the greatest impetus and inspiration for a great future of a country are the profound and great past.

There is nothing more inspiring to succeeding generations than to be able to look back on the monuments of their nation, on the achievements of their national capital. No nation can look forward to a great future without having behind it an illustrious past, whether within that nation or in consequence of tradition and heritage. I hope that hon. members generally will be able to support the resolution. When the bill is introduced fuller and more complete details will, of course, be available as to the changes that have been made, which cannot be discussed now in committee.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak to the resolution I do not propose at this time to follow the Prime Minister on the subject of the desirability or otherwise of having torn down the old supreme court building because for one thing I do not think that matter is affected by the terms of this resolution. But I do agree with him that a country which has before it such a great future should be very careful to preserve the monuments of its past, not only in Ottawa but wherever those monuments may be in our country.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the second measure we have considered this morning which should be and I think is of a non-partisan and non-controversial character, concerning as it does a resolution which is important to all of us and to all Canadians in its bearings on the "development and improvement", to quote the words of the resolution, of the national capital plan. We know that the plan and the ideas and the vision behind it go back a good many years to the time when Jacques Greber was appointed. He and his associates under previous governments initiated and assisted in the development of the plan over the years. It was a plan that was very close to the heart, mind and interest of Mr. Mackenzie King when he was prime minister. In fact he took almost a fatherly interest in the development of Ottawa into a beautiful and worthy national capital.

That interest and support were continued by Mr. St. Laurent. The work begun in those earlier years was continued and expanded after world war II, but over the years I think experience did show that perhaps the administrative set-up for the carrying on and completion, if it ever will be completed, of the work under the national capital plan was not completely adequate to cope with the new problems that arose out of the proper development of a national capital. Some hon. members will recall that a joint parliamentary committee was set up in 1954, and made a report. Another joint parliamentary committee was set up in 1956 to study, as indeed it did study and in great detail, this whole problem. It reviewed the over-all situation and made recommendations. The committee had a great number of meetings and heard a great deal of evidence from many interested individuals and associations. Perhaps I might mention that the hon. member for Villeneuve was joint chairman of that committee.

Out of its recommendations made in 1956 came the bill to which the Prime Minister has already referred, entitled an act respecting the development and improvement of the national capital region. The Prime Minister has indicated that the bill was prepared by the former government. It was presented to parliament on April 8, 1957, but was not proceeded with at that time. A general election was held, and now the present government is taking the action recommended by the joint parliamentary committee and embodied in that earlier resolution, the terms of which were exactly the same as the resolution now before us on the order paper.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, and I think I can speak on behalf of the members of my own party, may I express our gratitude for the devoted, intelligent and unselfish work done over the years by those Canadians who accepted the responsibility of serving on the federal district commission. Their work has been a fine example of national service in the best meaning of the term.

I think all Canadians will agree that the federal government has a special responsibility for and should take a special interest in the development of the capital so it can become a worthy symbol of our nation and one of which we can be proud; to use the words of the report of the joint committee, which have already been used by the Prime Minister, so that it can become "a capital worthy of our country and worthy of its people".

While the 1956 report, which is the basis of the resolution before us, makes a strong plea for the achievement of that objective, one which we all support, it also points out, as mentioned by the Prime Minister, some of the specific problems and difficulties. There is not only the question of the green belt which has been mentioned and which is of great significance in the development of the national capital plan, but we must also not forget that inside the green belt in Ottawa itself there is still a great deal to be done to carry out the ideas and the vision of this report.

I think particularly—I believe the Prime Minister mentioned this—of the very difficult problem of water pollution and the problem of adequate bridging of the river between Ottawa and Hull. If these problems are to be solved, then irrespective of the kind of federal machinery we set up to solve them this will require the closest co-operation among all three levels of government, the federal government, wherein lies our responsibility, the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec and the municipal governments of Ottawa and Hull. With the new machinery which will be set up if the resolution and the bill carry, I am sure that co-operation can be achieved and we will have a national capital in the years ahead of which all Canadians will be proud.

I think we have a very good illustration of what can be done in this matter through national effort in the development of Washington, where I lived for some years. Certainly the city of Washington has none of the natural advantages that Ottawa has in its location, because of which Ottawa should and will become one of the most beautiful capitals in the world. Washington was a swamp when it was chosen as the capital of the United States. It was put far enough up the Potomac river, at a point where the river was shallow and the banks were swampy, so the British navy could not get at it too easily, though they did achieve that objective once in American history in revenge for American action against Toronto. Nevertheless, largely because of the planning of that capital by a distinguished town planner of his time from France, Major L'Enfant, and in spite of the swamp, "foggy bottom" as they still call it in Washington—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; it is a few minutes past one.

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry; I will finish in a few minutes. I will get right off Washington. In spite of the natural disadvantages of Washington they have made of that capital one of the most beautiful in the world. With the advantages we have over Washington we ought to be able to do as well, indeed we ought to be able to do better.

We on this side of the house will vote in favour of this resolution, especially since it is in exactly the same terms as the resolution which was put before the house by Mr. St. Laurent a year or so ago.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, the C.C.F. members of this house welcome most heartily this resolution that has been introduced today by the Prime Minister. This resolution, as we understand it, forecasts a strengthening of the authority of the government of Canada in the many efforts that are being put forth in the establishment of a national capital in which we hope all Canadians will be able to take a great deal of pride. In addition to forecasting a strengthening of the authority of the federal government to attain our objective it also, to our mind, forecasts an additional willingness on the part of the national government to share the responsibility for that task with the other levels of government, provincial and municipal.

I am extremely pleased to note, in listening to the hon. members who spoke previously, that the development of our national capital is and has always been regarded as a non-partisan effort. We realize, Mr. Chairman, that the national capital belongs to all the Canadian people regardless of whether they are represented by the government side or whether they adhere to one of the opposition parties in this house.

At this time I should like to refer to the introduction by the Prime Minister of this matter on June 18 when, as found at page 1381 of Hansard, he said:

> The government has now decided to recommend to parliament the necessary measures to make it possible for the crown to acquire ownership of what is known as the green belt around the nation's capital, so as to do what is possible to ensure that the development of the capital area over the long-term future will be in accordance with the national importance and significance of this city.

We appreciate that statement of the purpose of the resolution which the Prime Minister gave to the house at that time. We are a little concerned lest that sentence of his indicates that limitations are going to involve the new commission that is to be established. We sincerely hope that the functions of the commission are not going to be limited to the matter of acquiring and holding some jurisdiction over the green belt. The main tenor of my remarks is to emphasize that there is a need in other fields as well as in the acquiring of the area immediately around the cities of Ottawa and Hull.

I should like to point out that when the Prime Minister was speaking this morning he referred to the findings of the joint parliamentary committee on this whole problem of the national capital several years ago, and he listed two major matters that were mentioned in those findings. One was the acquisition of territory to be found in the proposed new green belt. The other major problem indicated in the report by the committee was the problem caused by the pollution of the Ottawa river.

So far, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister has not indicated, either on June 18 or this morning, that any action is being contemplated toward a solution of the problem of the pollution of the Ottawa river. Knowing the interest which the Prime Minister has shown in this house over many long years in the subject of the pollution of rivers, I hope the omission of this specific aim was inadvertent and that the Prime Minister is going to see to it that the legislation is of such a nature that the problem of river pollution is going to receive some attention.

I noted especially the comment of the Prime Minister when he remarked that the problem of establishing a national capital has been the subject of parliamentary debate for the past 32 years. I believe he indicated the year 1926 as the initial year in which action was taken. When I consider what progress has been made, Mr. Chairman, toward the attainment of our aims in the past 32 years, I cannot help but be reminded of the words used by the Leader of the Opposition this morning—and here may be the major responsibility, as I see it, that is now facing us—when he said, if I have his words down correctly, that inside the city itself a great deal has yet to be done.

I agree at once that this naturally involves the closest co-operation on the part of all three levels of government. I can think of no finer time for that degree of co-operation to prevail than the present time. With a Conservative regime in Ottawa, a Conservative regime in Toronto and another Conservative regime in Quebec, and with the city fathers of Ottawa as they are, I fail to see why there should be any lack of co-operation in the immediate years ahead.

I would immediately like to sound a note of warning. We are asked to vote millions of dollars for the acquisition of land for the green belt. I hope people will be paid a fair price for any real estate expropriated, and that no one will be done out of the hard-earned life savings which they may have invested in real estate in this area. At the same time I hope that prices will not be paid to anyone based on anticipation of what they might be able to realize on present holdings or upon holdings which they might acquire before the federal government gets around to expropriation, and that no money will be paid on an assumption of what values might be in the years ahead. I have particular reference to holdings of real estate by brokers and others interested in real estate around the city of Ottawa. I trust that a very special watch will be kept upon such holdings, particularly of that real estate which may be in the hands of people associated with political movements.

The problems with respect to the development of our capital are not easy to solve, because the rights of local citizens are involved. The newspapers have indicated that on one occasion I endorsed the establishment of a federal district commission with the extensive powers which obtain in Washington, D.C. I must say at this time that such has never been the case. I believe the only member of this group who has ever advocated the establishment of such an authority is a gentleman who was at one time a member of the C.C.F. but who, during the latter years, has been a member of the Liberal party. I refer to a former member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. It has never been C.C.F. policy, however, that the residents of Ottawa should lose their civic rights as a result of the development of our national capital. I believe a halfway point could be established, as the result of which greater responsibility and authority might be taken over by the federal government, yet at the same time the local residents would be allowed to have their say in matters which would ordinarily be their prerogative. We in this group do not think there should be any reduction in local privileges or relaxation of local responsibility. We have, however, a responsibility as the parliament of Canada, and we have a right as the representatives of the taxpayers to express opinions upon the nation's capital.

The newspapers indicated some time ago that there might be some people in Ottawa who would take the position that we, as members of parliament, ought to mind our own affairs and allow the Ottawa civic officials to determine what happens to the capital city. That is a view in which I cannot concur. When we speak in this house of slums and fire traps in the city, I believe we are only exercising our responsibilities and our rights in voicing our opinions. We are not alone, and to illustrate this point I would like to read from a newspaper clipping of some years ago, which is headed, "Deplores Ottawa's Lack of Alleys". It reads as follows:

> What Ottawa needs is more back alleys, Senator W. M. Aseltine, (P.C.—Saskatchewan)—

Who, as we all know, is now the government leader in the other place.

> —said Tuesday night as he took a verbal jab at the capital's "eyesore" garbage cans.
> Until he came to Ottawa he'd never seen "a city without alleys", he told the Senate. Because there was no out of the way place for them to be stowed, the cans lined the streets each morning.
> That's what he saw when he took his morning walks—"really an eyesore".

I could not concur more heartily with the comments of the government leader in the other place when he refers to this line-up of garbage cans upon our sidewalks in the mornings as an eyesore. It is an eyesore in the most unsanitary way imaginable.

On June 18 last my house leader referred to the slums, and I believe fire traps, in this city and shortly thereafter the mayor of Ottawa replied through the newspapers. The mayor said, "We have no slums" but several days later he amended that statement, saying that city council was engaged in several slum clearance projects. I think he supplied his own answer there; the city council admits the existence of slums in that they are undertaking measures referred to by the mayor as slum clearance projects. In regard to fire traps and slum conditions he mentioned that I ought to remember the quotation from the Bible, "The poor ye have always with you." He made the observation that Ottawa looks after its poor, but I have seen a little more than I would have wished of how Ottawa looks after its poor.

One has only to recall the houses which ought to be condemned by the electrical and health inspectors of the city, but which the city council prefers to keep in operation for its welfare cases. If allowing a home to burn, if allowing "mere pensioners" to burn to death is the way in which Ottawa looks after its poor, and if the city council pats itself on the back by saying, "The poor ye have always with you", then that is not my idea of the attitude which should be taken in respect of the development of the national capital, about which we love to brag to our people and in which we love to ask the people to take pride.

We believe that slums are no longer necessary in our cities, least of all in our national capital, which has a history of employment of its citizens in the civil service. Ottawa does not have an industrial history, nor does it have a history as a waterfront city. It has no background which could excuse some of the conditions which exist. I would like to refer some of Ottawa's leading citizens to the city of Saskatoon, the municipality of Burnaby and the city of New Westminster. These are cities which by their very nature must work for a living at all times by means of industrial activity, yet in those cities you find much less in the way of slum conditions than is to be found in Ottawa. Over the years there has been much money expended by the taxpayers of Ottawa to develop the national capital, and other taxpayers when they visit this city have a right to expect it will be a little above the average as Canadian cities go.

One hon. gentleman in the other place referred to the lack of alleys. The other day I visited a new housing subdivision in Ottawa and observed that it had been allowed to proceed without provision for alleys where garbage and ash cans could be picked up and homes could be serviced by oil trucks and other services. I wonder just how much headway has been made in the development of the national capital.

I have a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of June 7, 1952, reporting on conditions in Ottawa as revealed in the last national census in 1951. I appreciate that the conditions reported upon will have changed somewhat in the intervening seven years, but I wonder to what degree progress has been made. The article reads as follows:

1. There are 4,815 bathless dwellings.
2. There is no piped water supply in 2,120 homes.
3. There are 1,955 dwellings that have only the "Chic Sale" type of toilet facility.

We in the west do not even know what that means. I continue:

4. In 6,570 houses or apartments, there is cold water only.
5. There are shared bathrooms in 2,560 dwellings.
6. A total of 4,205 homes or about 9 per cent of Ottawa's total are in need of major repairs.
7. In 910 Ottawa homes, residents have none of the following conveniences: telephone, radio, automobile, vacuum cleaner or washing machine. In addition there is neither refrigeration nor the old-fashioned ice-box in 1,710 dwellings.

Certainly this report does not indicate that we nave in Ottawa a capital city in which Canadian citizens as a whole can take any measure of pride.

Let us turn to the subject of roads in Ottawa. There is only one modern thoroughfare in the city. It seems to begin somewhere around the airport and appears to end somewhere in the vicinity of Rockliffe. It seems specifically designed to provide famous visitors to Ottawa with a beautiful view and the lovely scent of flowers along the roadway. We have, of course, the driveway and Sussex street, the latter leading to the area known as Rockcliffe where the millionaires and dignitaries live.

Someone mentioned Vancouver. I might say, that in Vancouver we have Broadway,

Main, Fraser, Victoria and a number of other modern thoroughfares. They are models for the world of modern streets. We even found sufficient money to provide for the relocation of buildings as large as six storeys high. However, in the national capital, outside of this one roadway apparently designed for famous visitors, there is not one adequate road on which an ordinary visitor to Ottawa can travel. Ottawa does not even have such a simple, modern convenience as synchronized lights on its major thoroughfares. At present you see four or five lights in succession going on and off at the same moment.

Recently Ottawa embarked on something which most cities which have employed it wish they had never begun. I refer to the installation of parking meters. They serve no useful purpose except to enhance the coffers of the city. An interview with the city fathers in places where these meters have been installed will reveal the general feeling they share that they wish they had never become involved in that racket.

Where can a modern parking lot be found in Ottawa? The only parking facilities here are a few vacant lots which are temporarily used for off-street parking in order to permit the tenants to earn a small livelihood. Where are the green and open spots that it is the responsibility of those at the city hall to provide? Outside of the parks provided in the heart of the city by federal district commission there is no place where the residents of Ottawa can sit down to relax and enjoy a breath of fresh air. What about the inspection of buildings that is looked upon as being so essential in modern cities today? What about health inspectors and fire inspectors? Does the welfare department tell these boys to lay off, lest there not be sufficient room for the welfare cases in Ottawa?

Since first speaking on this matter in the house I have received many letters from Ottawa citizens, all in commendation of what I had to say. I wish that some time the civil servants of Ottawa would come to feel they have every right of citizenship, and need not hesitate about signing their names to their written opinions. What I did not like was the large number of anonymous letters I received. I like to think every Canadian feels at liberty to sign his name to an opinion he wishes to express in writing.

Another feature about the capital city that is simply unheard of in Saskatchewan and B.C. is a lack of hospital facilities. The waiting list here is very long indeed. Unless you are a member of parliament and are immediately whisked to hospital at the first sneeze for a quick look-see, you, as an ordinary citizen of Ottawa, will have to wait a long time, in most cases, before you gain admission to hospital.

Some of the eating places in the city are splendid, and magnificent efforts have been made to establish fine restaurants; but in other instances it is obvious that the health inspector has not paid a visit for years and years.

I am pleased that Hull is a part of our national capital development plan. It ought to give the people of the province of Quebec a feeling that they and their province are a part of Canada. However, with respect to some of the conditions I have mentioned as obtaining in Ottawa, almost the same could be said for the Hull section of the national capital.

We welcome this move most heartily, but we hope the measure will mean more than the buying of several thousand acres on the outskirts of Ottawa. We hope an investigation will be undertaken by those who will be responsible for the plan concerning improvements for the city. As the Leader of the Opposition said in his remarks, I also hope the authorities will ascertain what is required in the heart of the city, which is the core of the national capital. I wish to propose to the Prime Minister a serious implication arising from the recent announcement from the city hall in Ottawa to the effect that everything possible is being done to obtain industrialization of our national capital.

I see a serious conflict of approach. Here are the city fathers who want to obtain more revenue and who are therefore anxious to invite almost any kind of industry into the city which will add to their tax rolls. Yet at the same time we want to make it into a beautiful city, a city that we will be proud to call our national capital. I feel that either one or the other of the two approaches is going to win out, and I hope the city hall is going to cease and desist from its announced program of filling the city with the smoke-belching chimneys which are usually associated with the industrialization of a city.

The year 1967 will see the 100th anniversary of our nation. That is only nine years hence. At that time I have no doubt we shall have hundreds of thousands of visitors to our fair national city. I hope that within those nine years we shall take such measures as will enable us to invite people to a real national capital to join in the celebration of our 100th anniversary.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this resolution, introduced this morning by the Prime Minister, represents an historic advance in national capital planning. From the outline the Prime Minister gave this morning it is evident that this legislation will give a new impetus and a new momentum to the realization of the goal of a truly symbolic capital.

At the outset of my remarks, I wish to thank the Prime Minister for the vital and decisive interest which he has displayed in his first year of office in the development of this city and area and for the constructive achievements already undertaken under his direction as the responsible minister, notably the decision to acquire the green belt, the action taken to permit the assembly of industrial land, and the assistance to the Bronson avenue bridge.

The Prime Minister and the committee, will recognize that he who represents Carleton has a very special interest in such matters; for, as the committee knows, Ottawa has a dual distinction. Not only is it the capital of Canada but it is the shire town, the county town, of the historic county of Carleton. Approximately 75 per cent of the population of the electoral district of Carleton reside within the territorial limits of the city of Ottawa, and under this bill practically the whole of the county of Carleton will be within the national capital region.

Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam have mentioned that in the determination to make of Ottawa a great national capital there are no partisan differences I hope, sir, that will always be so. All parties and all members from all sections of Canada I believe are of one mind in this matter. We may have differences about details, differences about techniques, but there are none about objectives.

In order to keep to the main track of my remarks I am going to resist entering into a discussion of the digressions into which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was carried.

I used the term "symbolic capital" and the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, in speaking this morning, spoke movingly of Ottawa as the symbol of the nation. I submit that the first objective of all national capital planning must be to make of Ottawa a true and living symbol of a distinctive, vibrant, Canadian nationality, a genuine symbol of our national unity and our national cultures.

Most of the great capitals of the world have in fact attained the role of symbols of their nations. Old London is of the very essence of Britain. To all Frenchmen Paris is a national shrine; and so Rome, Athens, Vienna, all the great capitals of the old-world countries, exist as symbols of those countries. That Ottawa can and will attain such a place and role in the hearts of Canadians as have these ancient cities in the hearts of their nationals I firmly believe, and that must be our objective.

I am one of those who believe that God favoured this valley of the Ottawa on both sides of the river with a natural beauty and a distinctive aesthetic charm equal to that of any part of the globe. To take full advantage of that beauty and natural charm is the whole purpose of the national capital plan.

In its conception and in its latest delineation before the joint parliamentary committee in 1956, so ably presided over by the hon. member for Villeneuve, that plan is a bold and imaginative design for the future. What is now needed, and what I hope this legislation will represent, is a firm, clear-cut declaration of faith in that national capital plan and a call to action in its rapid and progressive implementation.

The problem of planning the national capital, sir, is stated simply, succinctly and effectively in a brief presented to the Prime Minister by the national capital region branch of the community planning association of Canada in May, 1958, from which I would like to quote very briefly:

> Any procedure which is developed must take into account:
> 1. The urge to have a capital city as a symbol.
> 2. The authority to enable this to be effected.
> 3. The ability to create the symbol.
> It is from federal sources that the stimulus for a national capital can be expected. The authority to enable planning lies with the provinces. Co-operation between the federal and provincial governments can provide the inspiration and authority. The detailed task of planning lies with the municipalities. There is a role to be played by each level of government. Through good will and co-operation the best result can be achieved.

This quotation, sir, points up precisely what is the major problem of national capital planning. In the past there has been a serious lack of co-ordination of planning activity. There has been project planning, fine project planning, some of the finest project planning that has gone on in any part of the world, but no comprehensive, integrated, co-ordinated planning of the whole national capital area; a plan, yes, but planning, no.

In those six words, Mr. Chairman, I think is a simple statement of the very complex and difficult problem which does exist. To too great an extent the existing planning authorities, federal, provincial and municipal, have worked in compartments, have failed to achieve real co-operation and real understanding. Perhaps the best illustration of compartmentalized planning is the total absence of an official plan for Ottawa or for any of the neighbouring municipalities pursuant to the planning act of Ontario, despite the fact that the final Greber report was presented more than eight years ago. All that exists today is an official highway plan.

The federal district commission is now contributing to the preparation of an official plan or plans, and I hope we shall have such before the tenth anniversary of the Greber report. I mention this, sir, to illustrate my view that, faced with our problems of constitutional jurisdiction, the first requisite to success in national capital planning is a co-ordination of the activities of the federal district commission, now to be replaced by the national capital commission, and the planning authorities of Ontario, of the city of Ottawa and of the area municipalities, particularly on the Ontario shore the townships of Nepean and Gloucester and on the Quebec shore the city of Hull and the town of Aylmer. The opportunity for full understanding, the opportunity for complete co-ordination and full and continuing liaison, exists today as it has not existed at any time previously. This, I submit, is the psychological time to achieve a unity of purpose in all our planning activities.

The solution of the vexed green belt issue makes the immediate co-operation of Nepean and Gloucester possible. As long as that green belt issue existed, as long as it continued unsettled, the whole national capital plan could not get beyond a stalemate. As I have already said, the government and the Prime Minister in particular are to be congratulated upon the decision to acquire the green belt. This, in my view, is the most significant decision taken in many years, and upon it hinges the solution of many other vital problems of planning.

But with this I should like to couple a word of warning. The basic purposes of the green belt will not be served if an uneconomical, undesirable sprawl development takes place just outside it. Development could simply leapfrog over the green belt and fringe settlements of an unplanned type take place. What is needed? I suggest to the new national capital commission that what is needed is assistance to Nepean and Gloucester in planning, the encouragement of hamlet development particularly at Blackburn Corners and Bells Corners, the encouragement of planned development of existing satellite communities such as Manotick, Richmond, Stittsville and Carp. I suggest that these are essential concomitants of the green belt plan. To the satisfactory adjustment of these fringe problems Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation can contribute as much —if not more than the new national capital commission.

Within the city of Ottawa itself virtually all significant advances are dependent upon the establishment of a union railway terminal company. Even the Queensway cannot be planned and carried out to its western terminus until provision has been made for the joint operation of the railways within the city limits. Negotiations with the railways have gone on for months, indeed for years. I venture respectfully to suggest to the Prime Minister that the time has come for the government to ask the railways in unmistakable terms to conclude an agreement, and to do it within a deadline period not too far distant.

The project of a union railway terminal company governing the operation of all railways within this community is inevitable. The faster it is achieved the better it will be for all concerned and the cheaper it will be for the government of Canada and for the railways themselves. From the date of the completion of such an agreement for the union operation of railways within the city to the completion of the immediate plans which are dependent upon such an agreement is a minimum period of five years. These include, for example, the abandonment of the C.P.R. Sussex branch in the constituency of the hon. member for Ottawa East, and the abandonment of the C.P.R. main line from Bells Corners to Ottawa West in the constituency of Carleton.

As I have said, completion of Queensway planning—and I want to emphasize the word "planning"—is dependent upon this railway agreement. We may get some comfort from seeing bulldozers at work on stage one of the eastern sections of the Queensway, but I think all those who have made some study of the situation in this city will realize that the Queensway is needed today, not four or five years hence. The fact is that the national capital is choking to death with traffic today. Based upon traffic projections which I have seen it will be brought to an almost literal standstill before the Queensway and other arterial roads and bridges are completed.

A speed-up in completion of the Queensway is urgently needed. Under the deal among the federal district commission, the Department of Public Works, the province of Ontario and the city of Ottawa, construction is under the direction of the province of Ontario. I want to appeal publicly to the new minister of highways of Ontario, Hon. Fred M. Cass, a distinguished son of eastern Ontario, to allot a larger amount of the highway budget to the Queensway in order to speed up its completion as an essential part of the national capital plan.

National Capital Commission

I turn now, sir, to deal with the driveway system, for I am one who believes that the driveway system has been perhaps the greatest contribution of the federal district commission and its predecessor, the Ottawa improvement commission. But, as a distinguished journalist of this city has pointed out repeatedly in the Ottawa Journal, there has been very little construction on the Ontario shore in the last 20 years. All the land, or virtually all, for the proposed Ottawa river parkway and the east-west parkway has been acquired, and for this major advance I want to congratulate the federal district commission sincerely.

But I cannot refrain from pointing out the significance of the lack of construction on the Ontario shore in recent years. The concept of the Ottawa river parkway from Lazy bay, a short distance above the falls upstream from this building, to Britannia is magnificent. It will be an almost revolutionary addition to the parkway system of the national capital. To the capital I believe it will give a new character. No other project can have more immediate significance. The estimated cost of the Ottawa river parkway is $2½ million.

My urgent hope is that the new national capital commission, in consultation with the other planning authorities, will make an early start on this project. In my opinion it has a priority close to top level, and I should like to add that it should be constructed immediately adjacent to the magnificent Ottawa river shore and not some distance back therefrom as in the existing short stretch from Island Park drive to Churchill avenue.

Under the new commission I venture to suggest that there should be established a strong, active architectural consultative committee. I am not satisfied that some of the more recent government building is adequate architecturally for the nation's capital. A speech which I made outside this chamber has already been quoted on a couple of occasions this session, but I believe that in this capital aesthetics should not be sacrificed to pure utilitarianism. Some of the new government buildings are less attractive than the new industrial plants in my riding, and in my opinion that should not be so.

Equally, as the Prime Minister pointed out this morning, we must preserve our historic buildings. The Prime Minister mentioned the destruction of the old supreme court building to make way for a parking lot which in my view, sir, was nothing short of an act of vandalism. My blood pressure rises every morning when I pass by the site of the old supreme court building. Fortunately the projected destruction of the west block was halted. I know the Prime Minister will be our protector in this respect, the protector of the unsurpassed architecture of parliament hill.

To the new national capital commission will be entrusted many problems, the completion of plans for the magnificent Gatineau park, federal assistance to the badly needed new bridges, particularly a bridge downstream from the present interprovincial bridge and a bridge at Deschenes rapids, federal assistance in the ending of the pollution of the Ottawa river, a matter to which the house gave considerable attention a few weeks ago, and another matter which was mentioned on Saturday, assistance in solving the problem of parking on parliament hill to prevent this, the nation's shrine, from having all the appearance of a used car lot and none of its charm.

These, sir, and some of the other national capital problems require a strong, active, vigorous and articulate national capital commission. I hope and I know the government will, in connection with any new appointments, seek men and women of outstanding merit who will accept appointment as a national duty and on a non-partisan basis.

Successive chairmen of the federal district commission have been men of great talent, distinction and public spirit. This morning the Leader of the Opposition mentioned that this community is greatly indebted to these men, Hon. Thomas Ahearn; W. E. Matthews; Hon. Fred Bronson; Duncan K. MacTavish, and the present chairman, Major General Howard Kennedy. This whole area, as I say, owes a debt to each of them, as it does to the able, effective and gentlemanly present general manager, Alan K. Hay, regrettably soon to reach the age of retirement. But I do not let my high regard and great respect for some members of the present commission obscure my belief that the present commission needs strengthening by the appointment, on a non-partisan basis, of vigorous new members.

Many of the problems to be undertaken will require parliamentary approval of substantial expenditures. We may as well make up our minds, I think, that many of the proposals will cost more money if they are delayed. They will be proceeded with eventually; they will be achieved and they will be paid for, but the longer we delay the more they will cost. From the many chats I have had with new members of this house I am certain that the government can count on enthusiastic support from all sections of the house for vigorous action in the completion of the national capital plan.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

The natural advantages of Ottawa, the achievements to this date, the concepts for the future, all these can make of this area a national capital symbolic of a genuine Canadianism. Planning, imagination and boldness; these are the keys to the future. All Canada will then be as proud of Ottawa, its national capital, as we in Carleton are of Ottawa, our shire town.

Mr. Dumas: I am sure there will be agreement on the part of every hon. member as to the desirability of adopting a resolution such as the one which was introduced this morning by the Prime Minister. As both he and my leader mentioned, the wording of this resolution does not differ from that of a resolution introduced in this house on April 8, 1957, by the former prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

This resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the development and improvement of the national capital region and in relation thereto,
> 1. To provide for the constitution of a national capital commission and to repeal the Federal District Commission Act;
> 2. To provide for the objects, purposes and powers of the commission; and
> 3. To enact such financial provisions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

However, the fact that both resolutions are exactly the same does not mean that the measure which this resolution precedes will conform in all details with the text of Bill No. 417 which was introduced on April 8, 1957, and given first reading. In his concluding remarks, part of which were mentioned by the Prime Minister this morning, previous to the introduction of Bill No. 417 the then prime minister said this, and I quote from page 3276 of Hansard for April 8, 1957:

> We hope that by having the bill read the first time now it will be available for distribution, not only to hon. members but to those of the public who are interested in the activities of this commission. That is why I am stating that whoever happens to be constituting the government when parliament reassembles will, I am sure, be appreciative of any suggestions which in the meantime are sent to the privy council office with the object of improving this bill in order that when it is brought forward again it may be the best legislation which those responsible for considering it here and in the other place can possibly devise for the purpose of realizing this important objective of further establishing the national capital of a country which is going to last for a long time, which is rapidly increasing in population, in industrial and commercial activity, and also, I hope, in the activities of the mind or those concerned with the aesthetic side of human nature.

It is possible therefore, Mr. Chairman, that since April, 1957, some recommendations for amendments might have reached the privy council office or that of the Prime Minister, and it may be that the measure which this resolution precedes will, therefore, in some parts of the context differ from Bill No. 417. I am confident, however, that the new bill will, as did Bill No. 417, encompass most of the amendments suggested to the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons in 1956, and that it will also make possible the implementation of the recommendations outlined in the report of that committee.

The activities of the Ottawa improvement commission, which was set up in 1899 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the splendid work accomplished by the federal district commission since 1927, reflect the contribution of this country toward the practical improvement and beautification of the capital city, more recently of the national capital region. These works reflect also the interest of parliament and the people of Canada in creating a national capital which will be a source of legitimate pride and inspiration to all Canadians.

As was explained by the Prime Minister, the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was appointed in 1956 to review and report upon the progress and program of the federal district commission in developing and implementing a plan for a national capital. This committee, as was mentioned this morning, reported to parliament on August 1, 1956. Amongst other recommendations, the joint committee in part VI of its report recommended that the Federal District Commission Act be revised so as to bring the definition of the powers, duties and responsibilities of the commission in line with the development of the national capital area.

Judging from the resolution which has been introduced by the Prime Minister we can feel confident that most, if not all, of that part of the recommendation contained in the report of the joint committee of 1956 will be implemented. For the benefit of those who were not here in 1956 I wish to say that each and every member of this joint committee had a keen and genuine interest in what was being done to try to create a national capital which would be the pride of all Canadians. I had the great honour of being co-chairman of this committee. I think I can say without fear of being contradicted that the members of this house and of the other place who acted on the joint committee worked very hard and did an excellent job.

The committee held 35 sessions of which 32 were entirely devoted to the study of briefs submitted by the federal district commission and by representatives of civic and public bodies including the city councils of Ottawa and Hull. The joint committee also heard from the Auditor General of Canada, the officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; the director of the division of sanitary engineering of the department of health of the province of Ontario and Mr. Jacques Greber, distinguished French town planner and consultant for the federal district commission. The co-operation of all those who appeared before the joint committee was of an extreme value to it. It helped in laying the foundation for the preparation of what I would describe as a very constructive report.

In reviewing the progress and programs of the federal district commission in developing and implementing the plan of the national capital, the members of the joint committee considered that the most important event in the history of the commission was the completion of the national plan under the supervision of Mr. Jacques Greber, with whom was associated a group of prominent Canadian planners, architects and engineers. The members of the committee thought that from this master plan a true national capital could be fashioned. They were of the opinion also that, when implemented, the national capital would be a monument around which and within which the historical and cultural interests and activities of our people could be developed.

In city planning language, the master plan is the form in which the whole project is generally first given out to the public. It shows the anticipated development of the community over a certain period, sometimes as long as 50 years or 75 years. The project shown on the plan is general as to location. It is intended to serve the purposes of a guide plan; it is elastic and easily changed. In city or town planning practice, the experts, with good reasons, always emphasized the fact that the character of the master plan should be clearly explained to the public so as to avoid the misunderstanding that this long-visioned plan is intended for full accomplishment in the immediate future at great and unusual expense.

So it should be and so it is with the national capital plan as prepared by the advisory committee headed by Mr. Jacques Greber. In brief, the master plan was designed to guide development of the capital's urban and suburban areas over the next half century. It is a flexible instrument and within its framework it is capable of adjustment to meet new requirements and changing conditions.

Members of the joint committee were very much interested in what was being done in the sphere of planning in the national capital region. They were conscious of the fact that the national capital plan should be developed as far as possible without infringing upon either provincial or municipal prerogatives, without imposing undue or unreasonable burdens upon activities of either jurisdiction, but also without assuming obligations proper to the provinces or the municipalities concerned. As there is no single authority in control of planning and development, rural or urban, within the national capital region, it can be easily appreciated that the realization of a national capital plan implies the co-operation of federal, provincial and municipal authorities.

For this reason, in formulating its recommendations in 1956, the joint committee was of the opinion that the over-all or master plan should be submitted to both the Ontario minister of planning and development and the Quebec minister of municipal affairs. It was felt that if agreement was possible, this should be regarded as the background against which details of the master plan should be dealt with as they arise.

It was thought advisable also that an appropriate representative of the government of Canada should consult with the above mentioned provincial authorities with a view to determining ways and means of implementing the plan, and it was felt that this objective could be achieved in such a way that it would be fair to all concerned.

I am convinced myself that if this procedure is followed the official adoption of the national capital plan would be possible. This would be a definite declaration of intention to carry out the different projects of the master plan; it would give them strong legal status; and it would more or less crystallize the use of land affected thereby. Then it would be an easy matter, in fact a matter of formality, for the municipalities within the national capital region to enact comprehensive and up to date zoning bylaws.

A few minutes ago my friend the hon. member for Carleton mentioned that he was very much in favour of the federal district commission going into the project of buying the necessary land for the green belt, but he said that we would have to be careful so that developments would not leap-frog outside of this green belt. He mentioned a few municipalities. He mentioned one municipality which would be in the green belt, namely Bells Corners. I think he is right. I think there should be a severe and clear zoning bylaw that would govern construction within those municipalities, especially within those municipalities which are within the green belt.

In the interests of a proper development in the national capital region zoning bylaws should also be enacted by the municipalities outside the green belt. In order that those municipalities would be in a position to enact fresh bylaws I think that we have good reason to say that there should be co-operation between the three levels of government, namely the federal, provincial and municipal; and the province of Ontario in this case should be approached and the master plan brought to their attention. They should approve the plan so that in the future those municipalities involved which are located within the national capital region would be able to pass the necessary bylaws so that construction and development could be proceeded with in good order and in accordance with the plan prepared in advance.

In the annual report of the federal district commission, for 1957, I was pleased to read the following paragraph at page 8. The paragraph is entitled "Liaison with Municipalities" and it reads as follows:

> Discussions and negotiations between the municipalities within the national capital district and the federal district commission, on both policy and technical levels, have had a mutually beneficial effect for such municipalities and for the over-all development within the national capital region.

I hope that such close liaison between the commission and the municipalities within the national capital region will be maintained. It is to be hoped, also, that similar progress may be achieved on the provincial level. The officers of the federal district commission are to be congratulated for the very excellent form used in the preparation of their annual report for 1957.

In reading these reports those who are interested in the progress of the federal district commission will be able to note that emphasis has been placed on those subjects which were classified in the report of the joint committee of 1956 as top priority projects. It is true that a relatively slow start is being made with respect to these projects but I am of the opinion that the federal district commission, if it is invested with the proper authority and if it is given the necessary funds, will do its utmost to see that there will be a realization of these plans within a reasonable period of time.

It was indicated in the report of the joint committee that under the provisions of the national capital plan of 1950 some portions of the central plan appeared to be of more urgent character than others. Those projects which involved the expenditures of very large sums of money and which were given special consideration by the joint committee are to be found in part 5 of the report as follows: Firstly, the elimination of the causes of pollution of the Ottawa river; secondly, the completion of the ten-mile section of the Queensway within the city of Ottawa; thirdly, the completion of the second stage of the railway relocation program; fourthly, the construction of a new interprovincial bridge; fifthly, the establishment of an intermediate zone between the urban and rural areas, commonly called the green belt; and sixthly and lastly, the acceleration of the work in the Gatineau park.

Of those six projects we can say that only one is really the sole responsibility of the federal district commission, and that is the work which has been and will be undertaken in the future in connection with the Gatineau park. Two others, namely the elimination of the causes of pollution in the Ottawa river and the construction of an interprovincial bridge to help alleviate the traffic problems between the cities of Hull and Ottawa, are really provincial and municipal projects. When I say that, I do not mean that the federal government, through the federal district commission, should not try to resolve these problems or to carry the projects to completion. The construction of the interprovincial bridge is to cost $10 million, and this is strictly the obligation of the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec as well as that of the municipalities of Hull and Ottawa. If the federal district commission can help in building, let us say, the approaches, so much the better; if it can help in the construction of the bridge, we will all be very pleased, because it is urgent that the bridge be built.

This is, however, first of all a provincial matter, and we must not forget that in respect of the pollution problem, even if we work hard to try to eliminate the causes of pollution which come from the cities of Ottawa and Hull we are still a long way from having cleaned up the Ottawa river. Work in this connection would have to start from the headwaters of the river, from as far away as lake Timiskaming. Work will have to be done in many municipalities up the river and along the river and, of course, much work must be done in our local sector comprising the cities of Ottawa and Hull, the town of Aylmer, the town of Gatineau Point, the village of Deschenes and the surrounding small municipalities. Both the provincial governments of Quebec and Ontario will have to accept responsibility in this connection, and it is very gratifying to note that the government of Ontario is going ahead through the organization within the department of health to try to eliminate these causes of pollution. We are also very glad to see from the newspapers that the city of Ottawa, also through this provincial organization, will probably start immediately to build a sewage disposal plant at Green creek and will also build necessary tunnels and sewer lines to connect all the sewers of Ottawa to that sewage disposal plant.

I understand the federal district commission will contribute to this work up to a certain amount and that the commission will help the city of Ottawa to acquire a site at Green creek. This help may not be sufficient; the federal district commission may also have to help in the construction of these tunnels and sewer lines. We have heard mention of the amount of $11 million, but we know this project will cost $43 million and maybe more. It has been said that the federal district commission may contribute the amount of $11 million, and I am in favour of this, but even if this is done the city of Ottawa and the city of Hull still have a responsibility in this connection.

The city of Hull, has an obligation to go to the government of Quebec and to force the premier of that province to do something about the Ottawa river on the Quebec side. The city of Hull should also force the provincial government to share in the cost of construction of an interprovincial bridge across the river but, more particularly, if the city of Hull has the responsibility to make clear to the provincial government that it has an obligation to share in the costs of these projects, and even if the federal district commission assists the Ontario side, that is not enough. Assistance will also have to be rendered to the Quebec side. If the federal district commission is to contribute to this work in Ottawa I do not see why it should not also contribute to the work on the Quebec side, more especially to the work within the limits of the city of Hull.

Those two projects are mostly provincial and municipal in nature, but there is another project which is also of a provincial and municipal character, and that is the construction of the full length of the Queensway, which is 22.8 miles, about 10 miles of which will lie within the city of Ottawa. I feel that the federal district commission has a responsibility with respect to those 10 miles and it has subscribed a large amount to this project, so that it has rights in that connection. I understand the total cost of the Queensway will be between $50 million and $60 million, and that the estimated cost of the first stage is $32 million. The federal district commission has already indicated it is ready to supply the right of way which is valued at $8,500,000 and it is ready also to take care of improvements after the Queensway is built. These improvements are estimated to cost $300,000. That takes care of the Queensway.

We also have another project which is a federal responsibility although in this case the federal district commission has to work in co-operation with both railway companies, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railway. I refer to the relocation of railways within the limits of the cities of Ottawa and Hull. The first stage of this relocation is completed and the second stage has already been commenced. We hope the commission will be given the proper authority to proceed with the second stage. This is an extremely important project and is at the base of the master plan. Not many years ago one could see a number of miles of railway tracks and crossings within the limits of the cities of Ottawa and Hull. Great progress has been made in their elimination but much remains to be done.

I see that my time has practically elapsed and there are a number of things which I should like to mention. Nevertheless, I think I have given a fair résumé of the recommendations made to parliament in 1956 by the joint committee. I am happy to see that the Prime Minister is following in the steps of his predecessors in office in taking a keen and determined interest in the national capital of this country. I hope that the bill which is preceded by this resolution will contain all that was contained in Bill No. 417.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Dumas: May I have just one moment in which to conclude, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member permission of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dumas: However, if some practical recommendations in the form of amendments have been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister I hope he will include them in the new legislation. We want the new legislation to be such as to permit the national capital commission to do a good job. I am sure the Prime Minister realizes that even if we give the commission authority we still have to supply the necessary funds and I am confident he will see that the required moneys are provided to the commission so that it may carry on its work. There are certain projects such as that concerning the Ottawa river, the Interprovincial bridge and perhaps others that are not strictly projects that are the responsibility of the federal district commission. I feel the government should participate in these project to the extent it can. There are also projects which are entirely the responsibility of the commission and these should proceed as fast as possible.

One hon. gentleman proposed that the planned parkways in the city of Ottawa should be built as soon as possible. Other hon. members from various parts of this district might also have projects they would like to see built as rapidly as possible. I can think of the Gatineau park project. The parkway from lake Fortune to lake Phillips should be built as soon as possible. The federal district commission is doing a wonderful job in the parkway. It has built the lake Fortune parkway which is very beautiful and is now building the link between the outskirts of Hull and the parkway in lake Fortune which should be completed by the middle of next summer. The section north of lake Fortune should be built as soon as possible and there are many other such projects which we would like to see completed rapidly. Every hon. member of this committee wishes to see created a national capital of which we may be proud and I am convinced there is not an hon. member who would oppose the resolution proposed this morning by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to observe that the Prime Minister is in his seat while I make my few brief remarks on this resolution. The other hon. members of our group who have spoken dealt more with the general so far as the federal district commission arrangements are concerned and I shall avail myself of the opportunity of speaking about the particular. I intend to tread for a few moments where some parliamentary angels fear to tread. I intend to romp in the Elysian fields of the country estates owned by heads of states, governments and prominent persons since the time of Solomon. I believe history proves that persons burdened with responsibilities in government and in affairs of state have found it necessary to seek solace and refreshment in solitude with nature usually near water, an oasis, a river, a lake or a sea. My reading indicates that Solomon took 13 years to build his town house and later a summer estate in the forests of Lebanon. Socrates had a retreat in the hills of Greece. The Caesars had some of their private baths away from Rome. Napoleon had a hunting lodge which I understand was near Fontainebleau and perhaps it was there he had his vision. The early Georges had their country estates at Eastbourne and Exeter and the prime ministers of Great Britain have been fortunate in having Chequers since 1921 owing to the generosity of Lord and Lady Lee of Fareham. President Roosevelt had his retreat and the former Prime Minister Mackenzie

King, of course, had Kingsmere. The present Prime Minister inhabits a retreat at Harrington lake but I should not like it thought for an instant that I begrudge him that.

As a matter of fact, my first knowledge of the Prime Minister's visits to Harrington lake came when a waggish neighbour asked me if I knew that John the Baptist had gone into the wilderness. Then, he explained to me the newspaper account of the Prime Minister's going to Harrington lake. I said, "With the burdens that the Prime Minister has to carry today I do not blame him wanting to get the advantage of forest, water and solitude."

However, Mr. Chairman, my reading of history indicates that in the past the title of occupancy of those residences has been established by law or as the result of private ownership. So far as I can judge—and I have not had an explanation yet—this has been the cause of quite a lot of, not caustic but, interesting comment that is always aroused by this type of topic.

The present occupancy of the residence at Harrington lake, as I understand it, is based on rather slim legal foundations. The Prime Minister, coming from the west, may have thought he was living in the pioneer days and that the old squatters' rights still exist. In effect, it may be possible that he took the lead of some of the dictators of ancient Europe who occupied properties by what was known as the right of eminent appreciation, or possibly the federal district commission may have permitted a sort of trial occupancy until the owners, through parliament, decided what the terms of occupancy would be. We do not know what those terms of occupancy are. However, Mr. Chairman, I do think the procedure seems to be irregular and that is all I am going to deal with. I do not envy the Prime Minister one bit enjoying such a place. In fact, any tendency I have had during my lifetime of envying those in prominent and high positions has always been mellowed on remembering these lines in Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard":

> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Anyway there is a possibility of a future cabinet with less rectitude than is exhibited by the government in power putting into effect without an order in council and without a bill being adopted by this parliament something along the same lines. The Minister of Transport—I see him here—could occupy a disused wharf shed, as a fishing camp. A minister of justice could occupy an empty penitentiary as a baronial castle. The minister of defence could use some decommissioned destroyer as a private yacht and a postmaster general might use some antiquated post office mail van as a travelling trailer to spend his holidays in Canada. I can see the minister of public works in some future day making a house boat out of an obsolete dredge, and the secretary of state using the basement of the printing bureau as a private swimming pool. There are infinite possibilities, Mr. Chairman, for a cabinet that has not the conscience and rectitude that the present ministers of the cabinet have.

While everybody recognizes the need for an official country residence for the Prime Minister, this group and some members in other groups, some members in every party and some people in the country think it so necessary that it should be established by law and as a result of legislation in this house.

I want to refer to the bill that was adopted with respect to the official residence of the Prime Minister, and I am very glad that he has an offical residence. The act is entitled, "An Act to provide for the Operation and Maintenance of a Residence for the Prime Minister of Canada." Clause 3 states:

> The minister of public works shall furnish, maintain, heat and keep in repair the buildings situated on the lands described in the schedule, and the federal district commission shall maintain and, from time to time as required, improve such lands.

By this bill the federal district commission have the authority of parliament to do certain things in connection with the residence of the Prime Minister. I do not know how the present Harrington lake house is being maintained or whether there are any expenditures by the federal district commission for that purpose but, so far as I can find out, there is no actual provision by order in council or by law. In contrast with that, I want to draw briefly to the attention of the committee the remarks of the present Minister of Finance when the bill for the operation and maintenance of the Prime Minister's residence which I have mentioned was under discussion. I find at page 3346 of Hansard of 1950 the Minister of Finance, who was in opposition at that time, had this to say, and I expect in his usual, vigorous, lambasting manner;

> I think it is time, sir, to face this situation very clearly. What the government has done is this: Without asking for specific approval of parliament, without bringing before the house last fall, as it should have done, a bill to set aside a particular property, if they thought that was the best property, they made an announcement in the house without mentioning anything of that idea. They proceeded by order in council to set aside a house that had been acquired by the government several years before by expropriation for a purpose that we did not then know,—

Of course, this house was acquired by the federal district commission by expropriation several years ago.

All that was said in the house on that occasion, on September 30, by anybody who spoke in the house was that the idea that the government should provide at the expense of the country an official residence for the prime minister was approved; but no one went beyond that. Whatever has been done in regard to selecting this property, whatever has been done in the way of expenditure of vast sums of money upon it to try to modernize an ancient house, has been done solely on the responsibility of the government and without any approval on the part of this house.

Then, later, on the same page he had this to say:

What did the government do, entirely on its own responsibility? I have said in the first place that by order in council they set aside a government-owned property for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to contrast the words of the Minister of Finance and his attitude to the problem and his chastising the government, as he said, for setting aside a property as a residence of the Prime Minister of Canada by order in council only with what has been done with respect to the Prime Minister's summer estate. I know the Prime Minister has a great appreciation of history, tradition and the customs of the past. I know that from experience. I am going to tell a little story with respect to the Prime Minister. I was going out of the house some five or six years ago and the Prime Minister was then in opposition. The session had ended. I might explain that the Prime Minister had gone down toward the Chateau Laurier. He will remember this. I was behind him. He turned around and walked back to the front of the building, had a look at it, and then walked away again. Do you know what he said to me? The Prime Minister will remember it. He said to me: "I had to come back for another look at the old building. I love it. It stands for such great traditions in Canada." That is why I know the Prime Minister thinks a great deal of history, tradition, practices and customs.

While I am only a humble member of this group, being quite content to leave the major issues, such as the distribution of box cars and the shape of Churchill's legs to other more brilliant members of the group, I do notice these little things.

I am somewhat lacking in intelligence, have a somewhat meagre education and humble background. I often go by instinct and I know from instinct that the Prime Minister of Canada has a great respect for these things. I know his approach to problems. I can almost visualize his mental processes, and I am quite sure that he will recognize what I am saying is correct. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in concluding my brief remarks I do suggest that because we all realize that an official country estate is necessary for a person carrying the burdens of the prime minister's office in this country the occupancy should be regularized by the introduction of a bill such as was introduced in connection with the official residence; first to avoid any unnecessary criticism and, second, to avoid any unpleasant public clamour on the part of the owners, who are the people of Canada and, shall I say, using that good old Anglo-Saxon phrase, for the quietening of title to provide for quiet possession by the Prime Minister himself on all occasions and future prime ministers.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in concluding this rather rambling statement of the legal problem, which is somewhat beyond my capacity, I urge the Prime Minister to give this matter consideration and introduce a bill at the next session of parliament somewhat after the form of the bill that was introduced by the former government so that he and his successors will have an official summer residence to enjoy. In doing so, Mr. Chairman, he will put himself in the long line of succession from Solomon to the present day by following the historic practices, traditions and customs of all those who sit in the seats of the mighty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, one cannot but congratulate the hon. gentleman for the degree to which he has engaged in research.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, is the Prime Minister closing the debate?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. This is an interlude of humour brought into the discussion of a serious matter. I could not allow the occasion to pass without congratulating the hon. gentleman on the degree to which his research might well be described as love's labour lost because in point of fact there has been no such establishment. Throughout the period of some seven years since the property was acquired the federal district commission has made arrangements from time to time with private individuals, and at no time has it been established nor is there any reason for its establishment as a country home for the Prime Minister.

I understand that there are two pieces of property, one given to the state by Mr. Mackenzie King. I understand that that is being occupied today by one of the officials of parliament. There is no occupancy on the part of the Prime Minister of the place in question. Unoccupied as it is, I have spent few week ends there. If the hon. gentleman had got in touch with me he would have saved himself a tremendous amount of heart-searching and examination of history. I tell him now that it has not been and will not be established as the Prime Minister's country residence as far as I am concerned. As I see it, there is no purpose in that regard. This place was occupied from time to time in the summers by one official or another, and if my hon. friend feels that grave wrong has been done let me tell him that he is as astray as it is possible for anyone to be.

The property was unoccupied except for periods of a week, ten days or two weeks in the last three years. Being unoccupied, I did not think there would be anyone who would search the recesses of history in order to make a facetious speech with regard to something that has no foundation. I have great respect and regard for the hon. member and I think his researches into the fields of history could have been exercised in a better cause.

As far as I am concerned, there is no country home established for the Prime Minister and it is not my purpose to have one so established. The place was unoccupied except for short periods when various officials were there for week ends. I do not want to understate the matter but the total amount of occupancy on week ends—I may have to correct what I said earlier—does not extend altogether beyond five or six days. If my hon. friend has any criticism to make under these circumstances I should like to hear it.

Mr. Herridge: Let me say that I have none under the circumstances but I have given the Prime Minister the opportunity to correct the false impression caused by some press reports. I may say further that these ideas were formed because I could not sleep early this morning.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief. I am certainly in agreement with the statement of the Prime Minister regarding the improvement and development of the national capital area. I am sure we all agree that the capital, as he said, should be worthy of Canada and its people. My reason for rising at this time is to endorse the Prime Minister's views regarding the preservation of records of the historic past throughout our great country. In my own city of Moose Jaw we have some historic links with the past which we are attempting to preserve through the voluntary efforts of a museum committee of which I have the honour to be a member. The museum has been housed in a school building and has drawn a great many visitors. Now we have been told that we have to vacate because the space is required to accommodate the growing population of school children.

That is a local problem for us, of course, but I think it emphasizes the point I am trying to make, the need for greater encouragement by all levels of government to local areas to preserve their historic relics so that, as the Prime Minister states, the traditions and history of the past shall not lightly be removed or forgotten. I realize, as I said, that this is mainly a local and provincial problem and we receive some assistance from those sources, but I would hope that when the country's capital is being enlarged and its historic background preserved for all time the federal department in charge of historic records would also give greater encouragement and assistance, if that is possible, to the preservation of local history in other areas. I should like to endorse the principle of preserving historic records implied in the resolution presented by the Prime Minister and directly referred to by him in his remarks.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this proposed resolution, which is of the very greatest importance in so far as the national capital is concerned, I think I should rise at this time to express the feelings of the great forgotten men on the Quebec side. In fact, over the years, the Quebec side of this area has been looked upon as something of a gangway leading to the lovely Gatineau area, so that people from the national capital may enjoy scenic beauty without parallel in the world: a national park like that one, only a few minutes drive from the capital itself.

I might say that the city of Hull, founded several years before the city of Ottawa, did not have a railway station until 1901. In that year, the authorities condescended to build a station and to make the city a train stop. However, the station was not called Hull, but Beamer. There again, the name of the first town built, in this area, on the banks of the Ottawa river, was being overlooked.

When it came to putting up buildings other that those absolutely required for administrative purposes, the city of Hull was forgotten for years. True, on my representations, a new post office was eventually erected; but that building was most urgently required indeed. The old structure was actually falling to pieces and could no longer accommodate the parcel post department, either for incoming or outgoing items. The building was not completed until 1956.

It is true that the new printing bureau was also built in Hull, but unfortunately certain people, just because this happened to be on the Quebec side, have indulged in what I consider unseemly criticism. I propose to deal with this matter later on, in some other debate.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) speaking of buildings, stated —and rightly so—that due regard must be had for aesthetics. Nobody will quarrel with this, but aesthetics in architecture can vary according to people's tastes.

At salons or art exhibitions, for instance, you will see people raving over a Picasso who are quite unmoved by a Millet. It only shows that tastes vary and that different people see beauty in entirely different things. Just the same, I agree with the hon. member for Carleton, and I think we could preserve in the area some of the architectural style found in the parliament buildings, or the Confederation and Justice buildings. They give Ottawa its particular cachet. I also think that we should think of Hull as the possible site for other buildings in this sector of the national capital. It should be remembered that while the Quebec side covers a larger part of the area of the national capital than does the Ontario side, Hull gets only a small portion of the favours granted in this field.

As for representation on the commission—this is a point I wish to emphasize—it will be noted that the Hull or Quebec side representation was made up of only two members, namely, the mayor of the city of Hull and Mrs. Fontaine who, for a number of years, had been representing the Quebec side. On the other hand, the Ottawa side had eight representatives on the commission. There was the chairman, Major General Kennedy, an Ottawa resident, Mr. Charles Camsell of Ottawa, Mr. Ewart of Ottawa, Colonel Fraser of Ottawa, Mr. Lawrence Freiman of Ottawa, Mr. A. J. Major of Ottawa and Dr. R. A. Valin of Ottawa. Moreover, there was the then mayoress of Ottawa, the present mayor of Ottawa, whereas Hull had only two representatives, namely the mayor and Mrs. Fontaine.

I think that, considering the area of the national capital which is on the Quebec side, the Hull representation on the commission should include at least three Hull citizens, namely one for the rural part of the Hull constituency, one for the Gatineau part and one for the Pontiac part.

If the appointment of these individuals should create difficulties, we could always fall back on the metropolitan council which comprises about all the municipalities on the Quebec side interested in the national capital. We have, for example, East Templeton, the municipality of Templeton, the village of Templeton, North Templeton, West Templeton, the town of Gatineau, the city of Hull, the village of Pointe-Gatineau, the municipalities of East Hull, West Hull and South Hull, Wakefield, the township of Wakefield, the municipality of East Wakefield, St. Cecile de Masham, North Masham, Eardley, the village of Deschene, the town of Aylmer, South Onslow and North Onslow as well as the village of Quyon. These municipalities on the Quebec side are all members of the metropolitan council and council officials could be asked to name representatives of the different sections, that is one for the rural parts of the constituency of Hull, one for the Gatineau section and one for the Pontiac section; I am sure that the people who would be appointed by that council could not be accused of intending to introduce politics in the commission since we do not know in advance what representatives the metropolitan council could appoint. Contrary to what the hon. member for Carleton said a moment ago, not only the cities of Hull and Aylmer are interested in a national capital; in fact, a good number of other municipalities are just as much interested if not more.

Another remark I wish to make has to do with bilingualism. I congratulate the federal district commission on that score. During the two years when I was a member of the commission, I advocated bilingualism. For a number of years, they had forgotten to put up bilingual signs even on the Quebec side.

I am quite prepared to believe it was not intentional; it was merely an oversight; and you know how easily human nature can cause people to forget certain things. At all events, I think I repeated my objections when we appeared before the committee which examined the federal district act in 1956. I asked the committee to refer the matter to the federal district commission, and urged them to have proper regard for bilingualism in the federal field. In this connection, I am heartened by the words of the Prime Minister this morning when he revealed to us the bilingual policy of the federal government.

Now, the federal district commission is part of the federal government. Also, I want to congratulate its members, inasmuch as for some time past they have agreed to use bilingual notices. This simplifies things, and it shows foreigners coming here that, on a federal plane, we are a fully bilingual country.

Quite a few people came to give explanations and descriptions of the areas at the sessions of this committee of inquiry. As the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) has just reminded us, we heard, first of all, Major General Kennedy, formerly chairman of the federal district commission. We heard Mr. Marcel Couture, chief accountant; Mr. Jacques Greber, internationally known town-planner, who directed the commission's work for a good many years, and who now acts as their advisor; Mr. D. L. McDonald, director of planning, preparation; Mr. Allan K. Hay, general manager; Mr. Walter Walker, public relations director. We heard Mr. Stewart Bates, chairman of the Central Mortage and Housing Corporation; Dr. A. E. Berry, sanitary engineer of Toronto, who spoke of water pollution; Mr. Quipp, president of the western Quebec metropolitan commission; the representations of the city of Aylmer, through Mr. Proulx, its alderman. The city of Hull was represented by its mayor, Mr. Moncion, who was assisted by the city clerk, the legal advisor, the treasurer, the engineer, the assessor, the buildings inspector, the police director, in addition to the Hull chamber of commerce, the junior chamber of commerce, the retail merchant's association, and several other associations from Quebec. All those associations were asking, on behalf of the Quebec side, a better share, as far as representation is concerned. And they were right. That is why I believe that now that we are about to revise the act, that we are considering it as a whole, it is time that those anomalies be removed.

Some might ask: "Why did you not say these things when the Liberals were in power?" Well, I said so, I made those requests and still request those things, and if I believe that our representation in the past was not in keeping with the one we should have had, I repeat that a new wrong does not right a past one. At the moment we are not looking at the past; we are concerned with the present and I urge the Prime Minister and ask all those who are in his confidence to see to it that this anomaly which exists in our area through the poor Quebec representation in the federal district commission, be removed.

We have here a bridge which is a real disgrace. For many years we have been asking for a new bridge, and the federal government has always been and still is ready to remedy the situation. The government of Ontario has given its assent but the Quebec government is holding back saying that since the bridge is for the federal capital district, it is up to the federal government to build it. I do not want to enter into a controversy on the subject, but since we are amending the national capital act, we could also decide this matter, as such a disgrace cannot go on indefinitely. When we see traffic held up sixty or seventy-five minutes during rush hours, it is time something was done.

We have spent $20 million on the so-called green belt. Now, a green belt is essential for several reasons. First of all, it is not so much a green belt as an intermediate zone between rural and urban areas. However if we are able to spend $20 million to establish and maintain a green belt around a city with industrial plants—it is, indeed, necessary where there is industry—surely we can also spend over the next few years several million dollars to make the bridge practicable and eliminate the present ghastly conditions.

I respectfully request that, when we come to vote the estimates for the new national capital, we might some time include certain amounts for the building of a bridge.

Much has been said about water pollution. This water pollution has been presented like an evil mainly due to industry. I heard that matter discussed by Dr. Berry and, more recently still, we heard an expert from the Eddy Company, a chemical engineer, produce evidence to demonstrate that the industries were not the main causes of pollution. Though he admitted that they were responsible, to a certain degree, he held that such pollution for which they could be held liable could not really affect the purity of the water. He added that the great cause of pollution is the fact that sewage is poured into the river by the city of Ottawa, the city of Hull, the towns of Aylmer and Gatineau and surrounding municipalities. That problem must be settled. I am convinced that this is far beyond the means of the municipalities concerned. I will go so far as to say that this even goes beyond the capacity of the provincial governments that are quite incapable, by themselves, of assuming full responsibility in this regard. The federal government then, through the commission which is about to be set up, should hear experts representing both sides—those who claim the factories are largely responsible and those who claim that municipal sewage is mainly to blame—and attempt to determine where, exactly, this responsibility rests.

Of one thing I am sure and that is: municipal sewage is really the cause of considerable pollution. It follows that the government will have to come to an agreement with the municipal governments to help them build sewer systems and purification plants so as to make the Ottawa river what it was years ago, that is a fine place for canoeing or boating and even for swimming.

This brings me to the green belt question. I know that, especially outside this house, many have criticized the spending for the purchase of lands for the maintenance of this green belt because, so they say, this will become lost land and the cost is, so to speak, exorbitant.

If they had heard the experts telling the commission dealing with this matter that a green belt girdling a great city is as essential to it as trees are to the countryside, so as to maintain moisture in the soil and purify the air, they would certainly wish the good work to go on.

I am convinced that the policy followed in the past, and being adopted now, must be continued, so that we may not only cleanse the air around us but also brighten the picture both for residents and for visitors to Ottawa.

Another thing. While there are many lakes in the national capital area itself, there are not enough fish in them to make them reasonably attractive to anglers. I feel that the federal district commission, or rather the national capital commission should set up a fish breeding station in order to stock those various lakes, making it possible for visitors to this area to fish those waters.

A few years ago I was in Granby. The mayor of that town has publicized it in every imaginable way. He has even set up an artificial lake which is stocked with fish, and visitors were being invited to fish from a little bridge across that pond. This is a wonderful attraction for out-of-town visitors. If our lakes have been fished out to a large extent, it is because the fishing done out there by our people has been carried out in an unreasonable way, and even, on occasion, illegally. If we could manage to have a fish-breeding station, we could supply our lakes and it would profit the national capital.

Now, the French version of the title reads: "Commission de la capitale nationale", while the English version has it: "The national capital commission". Now, I think this title is not quite comprehensive enough. It seems to apply solely to the city of Ottawa, which is the national capital. In my opinion, we could change this without much difficulty because, today, initials rather than full titles are used. If it were called the regional commission of the national capital, or the metropolitan commission of the national capital, this would indicate that its area extends well beyond the city of Ottawa and would tend to please the people on the other side of the river, who have always had misgivings about the federal district commission. The word "district" seemed to give the impression that the intention about the national capital was to set up a district along the lines of the district of Columbia and people on both sides of the river were strongly opposed to this.

They wanted to remain themselves, and to go on running their businesses. We know that residents of the district of Columbia, U.S.A., consider that district to be the greatest fiasco in the world; we do not want that to be a pattern for Canada. Let me add that I appreciate fully that nothing was further from the thoughts of either the former prime minister or the present one and his colleagues, but who knows that someone might not one day wish to turn this place into another district of Columbia? And so, in order to rid ourselves of that apprehension, would it not be expedient to change the name to "regional commission of the national capital", or metropolitan commission of the national capital"?

There you have, I think, the kernel of my thoughts for today. When the bill itself comes up, we will examine it with an open mind and hope to be able to suggest amendments. For we are not pandering to party politics, but acting as the servants of a community; and it is up to all the political parties holding office in the future to respect the common accord on which we shall be asked to set our seal during the next few days.

It is my hope that, once the resolution has been adopted, this bill will be introduced as swiftly as possible, so that we may have a few days at our disposal to examine it and to cast the amendments we shall judge appropriate.

Mr. Campeau: Mr. Chairman, rising as I do, for the first time in this house, may I be allowed to express first and foremost to the citizens of the riding of St. Jacques, all my thanks for the confidence they kindly put in me when they entrusted me with the representation in the Canadian parliament of one of the oldest counties on the island of Montreal.

As a professional town-planner, I would like, Mr. Chairman, to commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for his happy thought when he gave us the guarantee that the major elements of the general national capital plan would be carried out in the near future.

As a matter of fact, the bill that has been introduced is, without any doubt, one of the most important ones submitted to date on the national level with regard to town-planning.

One of the main tasks of the federal government today in the field of town-planning is, indeed, to give to the nation a national capital of which all Canadian citizens may be proud.

The speech from the throne, at the beginning of May, announced federal legislation designed to insure a long-term functional development of the national capital. The legislation now before the house is designed to reorganize the federal district commission so as to insure the carrying on of the embellishment program of Ottawa and its environments, as well as to endow the whole nation with a capital city in keeping with its progress. One of the main provisions aimed at by this embellishment program is the protection of the green belt provided under the capital development plan.

The federal government will put several million dollars at the disposal of the commission to expropriate lands included in this green belt.

The federal district commission has sought without success to prevent construction in that green belt. So that, after due consideration, it was resolved that the best means of achieving this green belt was not by zoning, but indeed by expropriation. By experience, I can state that such a decision is sound and, moreover, the only practical one.

The aim is to keep that area as a reserve for future extensions and to make sure that, in future years, the capital shall not have to spend money through various public services for districts laid out in a haphazard way.

It is expected that the population of Ottawa will reach about 600,000 by 1980; it is now about 230,000. Water and sewer services have been anticipated for that figure and a faster growth would mean an alteration of plans prepared at great cost. The federal district commission has already invested many millions of dollars in the present program of municipal services.

The green belt will serve as a barrier, maintaining the metropolitan area within the limits of 600,000 inhabitants. New districts could be built outside it but would have to be serviced by suburban municipalities.

When he announced the bill, the Prime Minister indicated that the crown would buy those properties and would lease them, with the reservation that all necessary restrictions to carry out the objective would be applied.

The Prime Minister added that areas to be included in the green belt, and the limits with regard to the use of the lands therein, would be settled and submitted to the approval of the government by the federal district commission after consultation with the interested local authorities. The government wants to be assured that the views of the local people interested in the matter with regard to detail will be considered.

As the Prime Minister rightly indicated in this parliament, experience has shown—and my own experience as a town-planner cannot but confirm it—that if efficient control is not exercised in this respect, cities tend to draw themselves out into suburbs. The result is what we can call ribbon development, which cannot be reconciled with long-term programs that are essential if the capital of Canada is to be preserved and developed so as to justify and rouse the pride of present and future generations.

The Prime Minister also mentioned the need for implementing a number of other development and improvement projects for the national capital.

We are convinced that, through the understanding the Prime Minister has always shown with respect to city planning, and owing to his energy, the national capital will, before long, be a true symbol of the greatness of the Canadian nation. As a town planner I cannot but wish, Mr. Chairman, that the legislation now before the house will be passed as soon as possible.

(Text):

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think it has been made clear from the speeches thus far that practically all members in this house welcome this resolution. I must say that I am very glad it has now been brought forward.

It is rather interesting to note the development over the years of this whole concept. The first commission was known as the Ottawa improvement commission and as the country and the capital developed, the name was changed and the powers under the legislation were also changed and enlarged. From 1927 on the commission was known as the federal district commission. We are today taking one more step through the resolution we are now discussing and which, as I understand it, proposes among other things to change the name of the commission to the national capital commission.

When one considers the whole subject and what has been done thus far, he cannot but admire the foresight of the persons who dealt with this matter in the early days, when it was not a popular subject which gained universal support in all parts of the country. For my own part I would like to acknowledge the foresight of the politicians in all parties back as far as the late 1890's and in the years since. One cannot but feel indebted to these politicians for their work which, in relation to their times, was of very real importance. I would also like to say a word of appreciation for the work done by the members of the various commissions and by the employees of those commissions. Such work, especially in the case of the commissioners, who receive no compensation, and the employees who have received inadequate compensation, deserves acknowledgment and commendation. I wish to express my appreciation to them and have it placed on the record.

The resolution stage, I suppose, is the stage at which questions on this subject should be asked but before asking some questions I should like to make one or two more general remarks which I think must be borne in mind when considering this proposal. A great deal has been said about the non-partisan nature of this measure. At the risk of being somewhat repetitious I should like to reiterate those words and point out that there is a real need for approaching this matter in a non-partisan way. That genuine need arises for two main reasons altogether outside of this house, one of them being a need for having what is achieved in national capital development appreciated by Canadians from all parts of the country regardless of their political outlook or affiliation.

There is also another very practical reason —and in dealing with legislation we have to be practical—and that is that it is inevitable with regard to this subject that we come up against the problem of provincial and municipal jurisdiction. Indeed, in some of these problems I confess I am not quite clear where federal jurisdiction ends and provincial jurisdiction begins and where municipal jurisdiction begins and ends. In any event as a practical matter it is important that any real work that is done be accomplished with the concurrence and approval, tacit or otherwise, of all three levels of government in the particular areas concerned. We must bear in mind the number of municipalities involved, the difficulties local in nature that these municipalities have, the common financial difficulties with which they are all faced and the underlying question of provincial jurisdiction in this whole matter. When one considers these matters one appreciates the necessity for always seeking to treat this resolution and the measures that will follow it as non-partisan measures.

I must be frank to admit that this does involve some problems. It very often means that one has to forbear when one would perhaps like to differ a bit concerning some small, relatively unimportant phase of a matter that is brought forward for discussion. One must refrain from stepping in to strongly attack an individual concerning some question of policy. But I believe the forbearance from taking a partisan approach is worth while and will eventually lead us all to realize more quickly the end which we have in mind and hope to achieve through this legislation.

I have always felt that it is particularly fortunate that Ottawa was chosen as the capital of this nation. Lest some hon. gentlemen think I say that merely because at the moment I happen to have the honour of representing a part of this capital city I hasten to assure them that is not my reason for stating that view. The truth of the matter is that the concept of this great country and its history is very accurately expressed through the idea of a capital city with its government buildings located on top of a cliff overlooking a magnificent river. In the case of Ottawa the parliament buildings are high on a cliff overlooking the beautiful Ottawa river across which there is the magnificent panorama of the hills of another province. I have always had difficulty expressing in words my concept of the background and history of Canada but that concept is symbolized and given eloquent physical expression through the present location of the capital buildings being located on the Ottawa river with more poignancy than any words of mine could depict. I find my own ability with the English language wholly inadequate to express my ideas in this regard. Nonetheless I adhere to those ideas and seek on occasions where I can to lend my support to any measure that will perfect the concept the material expression of which found reality through those who chose this city as the site of the capital of Canada. I hope that over the years all Canadians will come to regard the site of their capital in that light.

It has been interesting to observe the development that has taken place in the national capital even within my own time as one taking an active interest in this matter. It is fascinating to note how the development of Canada is reflected in the growth and development of its capital city. Indeed, as the nation has developed over the years the capital has kept pace with that development. It seems to me it does not grow much faster or much slower than the country as a whole but almost at the same pace.

The implementing of the national capital plan is a continuing operation. I hope no hon. member here today will regard this resolution as embodying a few items of public works that are to be accomplished in any given time. The work of improving the capital of Canada must never be finished. It must be continuing and continuous and I hope it will always be viewed in that light. Having said that I must comment that we are now at a stage in the development of the plan where we are taking steps to ensure the continuity of action in this regard. When the Prime Minister enters the chamber I should like to ask him one or two questions which in my opinion are strictly relevant to the resolution before us.

Perhaps before the Prime Minister returns I might make one or two observations which I trust he will appreciate and not misunderstand. I address these comments to him as the person through whom the commission will report to this house. My observations relate firstly to the green belt area which represents a very large expropriation of lands through the use of public funds. When this vast amount of real estate is expropriated its management and operation will tax the capacity of the commission and I would hope that as the pressures of management on the commission grow, the Prime Minister will not allow that to crowd out and overshadow the proper activities of the commission in other respects. That is, I hope he will not let the practical things arising out of the demand for the management of this vast acreage of real estate crowd out the attention that needs to be given, and will require to be given over the years to the development of the rest of the national capital itself.

The same observation applies to the park area. We have now a vast park area in the Gatineau hills, a far-sighted policy in acquiring those lands, that has been carried out. The state now owns that land. I hope that the pressure for development of that vast and wonderful parkland will not be such as to divert the attention of the commission from the development of the capital itself. There is always the danger of that because, in the art of politics and the administration of government business, as I suspect the Prime Minister has found out, it is only possible to make so much money available each year. It is never as much as those of us who are particularly interested in any particular scheme would wish, and it has to be used as best it can be used. I hope that the Prime Minister will keep—if I may use a somewhat slangy expression—his eye on the ball in this, and keep always before him the idea of the development of the national capital. Then, these other very important and very good projects in the scheme, which I speak very highly of, will fall into their proper places and not displace the main objective.

Since I have some general questions having to do with the resolution, perhaps I can state them now and the Prime Minister can answer them either one at a time or later if he sees fit to do so. Perhaps if I state them now it will be the best way for me to do it. I know the Prime Minister cannot deal with the individual sections of the bill, but I should like to ask him at this stage whether there are any main aspects or main principles on which this bill differs from the previous bill introduced by the last government on, I think, April 8, 1957?

Then, what about the method of financing the new commission? Will the Prime Minister say something at this stage about the method of providing the financing; that is, the necessity for funds which will be in the nature of capital and which will not lapse at the end of a financial year and the provision of the operating funds for the annual maintenance work. What I have in mind is the type of problem that arose in June, 1948, when the national capital resolution was before the house. I think the Prime Minister is probably quite familiar with the debate at that time. He will recall particularly the speech of the Prime Minister of that day, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, when he was bringing the resolution before the house, approving certain capital grants to be expended through the federal district commission for the national capital development. Does he envisage under this legislation the same sort of thing? Is it going to require a resolution of that sort, or what form will the financing take?

Then I should like to ask him about the commission itself. He will notice that when the previous bill was introduced by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, in 1957, a good deal was said about the operations of the commission itself; that is, how it was proposed to be set up. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would feel free to tell the committee just what he envisages in that respect?

There was some discussion about an executive committee, the size of the commission and that sort of thing. That raises the question of the chairmanship of the commission. Always, until the very last few years, the chairman of the federal district commission received no compensation whatever. The work of the commission has become so onerous now that it is getting to be a full-time job requiring the time of a thoroughly competent, full-time man. Can the Prime Minister tell us what he envisages in that respect? What are the plans?

Then there are some smaller matters, but it seems to me this is the proper place to raise them. There is the very important matter dealt with by the committee, namely the pollution of the Ottawa river. I may tell persons who do not know and who think it is a dirty river that it is a wonderful river. It is dirty in this area because we people have polluted it. It is actually a very clean stream, and I myself have caught Quebec red trout in the Ottawa river not very far from here. In areas where there are no towns to pollute the river it is naturally very clean; it is a magnificent river.

A good deal of discussion, with which I was familiar at the time, went on with the former government about sewage disposal in the city of Ottawa and the part of the federal government in that. The subject is very much a live issue again at the municipal level, and action is being taken. If the Prime Minister is in a position today to tell us—I do not know whether he is or not—I would ask him to tell us what he can about the participation of the federal government in that scheme. If he is not in a position to tell us I will understand because I know that these things require some negotiation. I think he will also appreciate my interest to get on with the scheme as quickly as possible and have this pollution stopped. I could express myself in very strong language on that but perhaps there is no need for it. I think all hon. members share the same view as I do on that matter and when I was sitting here this afternoon I could not help but recall the views expressed by the late Dr. Blair on the subject. For my part, I wish that he was here today to encourage the government to do all it can to speed up the solving of that problem.

There are some other smaller matters. When this work was carried on by the Ottawa improvement commission, at one stage it was thought that the south boundary of the city was in what is now the centre town section and the driveway system, which we are all proud of now, extended along what is now Clemow avenue and Monkland. That was under the Ottawa improvement commission but it is now under the jurisdiction of the federal district commission. Owing to some legal technical difficulties it is very difficult to have that removed from the jurisdiction of the federal district commission and put back under the jurisdiction of the city where, I think, most persons concerned with the maintenance of those streets agree that it belongs. As I see the legal problems, the way to clear them up is by provincial legislation and I would hope that the Prime Minister might find a moment in his busy days to draw that fact to the attention of the appropriate provincial authorities so that the necessary provincial legislation can be enacted to put the matter under the jurisdiction of the city.

There is also a small thing that somewhat alarms me. I understand that it is proposed to put parking meters on Wellington street immediately in front of parliament hill. I am not absolutely sure of my facts but I understand that is so. If there is anything in it I hope the Prime Minister will use his office to see that it is not done or even have his Minister of Public Works do what he can to see that it does not take place.

Mr. Green: It has nothing to do with me.

Mr. McIlraith: I think I can help the Prime Minister a little bit here. I think there may be some work done by the Department of Public Works or some spending of the taxpayers' money. There used to be and I would ask the minister to check that closely. I know it is a small thing but I find that the combination of small things can interfere with something much bigger. I hope the Prime Minister does not mind me mentioning these smaller things at this time.

There are other matters but there will be an opportunity to ask about them in more detail later. I should also like the Prime Minister to tell us what main projects he has in mind requiring a substantial expenditure of money in the immediately foreseeable future. These things take time to develop fully. I am particularly interested in aspects. In 1947 expropriation proceedings were started with regard to properties along the Ottawa river with a view to completing the driveway system along the river in a westerly direction from the centre of the city. The expropriations are completed and the big expenditures have been incurred. It is now a matter of developing the driveway itself. I am very keen that this should be done. I think the timing is right now to proceed. When there was a post-war housing shortage it was not desirable to go into the area and evict people for a development of this kind and the expropriations took somewhat longer than normal for that reason. They have now been completed and I would hope it would be possible to get on with the project.

Work also requires to be done to develop the driveway system along the south and southeast shore of the Rideau river. I hope that project will be among those undertaken at an early date. Then there is the matter of expropriations in the Sussex street area. I would hope it would also be possible to develop that project rapidly. The sites I am talking about so arouse my enthusiasm that I find it difficult to use moderate language in describing them. I hope that among hon. members there are those who like to walk or, indeed, to drive if they must drive, on those days when we are not fully engaged here and who will examine the areas about which I am talking for themselves. If they do I think they will share my enthusiasm for the site chosen by our forebears as the national capital of Canada. I hope that in the years to come the commission we are now establishing and its successors will continue the good work so very well undertaken by the Ottawa improvement commission and the federal district commission.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, it is indeed expedient that this committee should consider the adoption of this resolution which provides for the improvement and enlargement of the national capital area. I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister particularly on his initiative and I am sure, as hon. members who have spoken so far have indicated, that in this undertaking he has the unanimous support of members on both sides of the house. While at this stage we are planning for the future greatness of our capital city, I believe it is not entirely uninteresting or inappropriate to look back into the past to see how our capital city has evolved from a very humble beginning and how its development has been influenced by a multitude of chances and events that none could have foreseen.

This site, of which some members have spoken so eloquently and which today is the site of our great capital, was known for unrecorded centuries by succeeding tribes of Indians who travelled the majestic river of which we are so proud, a river that in the days of the Indians was known as the Grand river and in Indian bore the name Kit-chi-sippi. For many centuries before the dawn of the history of North America the Indians looked at these cliffs and hills and certainly they never thought that some day the great capital city of a growing power would be situated on these hills.

To come closer to our own time, we are familiar with the voyages of Samuel de Champlain who bivouacked not far from here and who, indeed, was the first to note in his records the natural phenomenon of a spray or curtain from which the name of the Rideau river originated. It is in memory of his journeys that on Nepean point in this city we have a bronze statue to that great explorer and founder of New France and of Canada. After Champlain there followed wave upon wave of explorers, traders and missionaries who knew the Ottawa river and who also no doubt admired the wonderful scenery presented by what is now the hill of parliament.

Later, military men surveyed the sites and in 1791 the legislature of Canada recommended the forks of the Ottawa and Rideau rivers as the site of a future military fort or a fortified city. Then came the Napoleonic wars and the American revolutionary war, and as a result the Ottawa river area became known as a great source for white pine timber. It was truly this quest for timber that opened up the Ottawa valley, and it was the succeeding generations of lumbermen, lumberjacks and farmers that opened up this valley.

After the union of the two Canadas, Mr. Chairman, Ottawa came, by mere chance I would say, as a result of the bickering of other cities, older and more famous, who claimed to have a greater right to become the capital city of the new nation that was to be born, to be chosen as the capital city. It is interesting to read from the proclamation of Queen Victoria on December 31, 1857, with reference to Bytown:

> —as in the judgment of Her Majesty, combining more advantages than any other place in Canada for the permanent seat of the future government.

Indeed, when Queen Victoria fixed her choice on Ottawa as the future capital many of the inhabitants of the older cities of Canada sneered. As a matter of fact, a certain gentleman from Toronto, who was known as a gentleman philosopher, commented that this sub-Arctic lumber village was suddenly converted, by royal mandate, into a political cockpit. Despite the unpopularity of the choice of Ottawa, nevertheless in 1860 the then Prince of Wales, who afterwards became King Edward VII, laid the cornerstone of the new parliament buildings of the nation of Upper and Lower Canada. It was only in 1865, almost eight years after its choice, that the public services were finally moved and housed in the new buildings erected for that purpose in Ottawa.

Since those primitive days the sub-Arctic village certainly has progressed. It was in 1896 that the then prime minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, envisaged, I believe for the first time, the future greatness of our nation and of this capital city. He referred to Ottawa in those days as the new Washington of the north. It was in 1899 that the first improvement commission, to which the hon. member for Ottawa West referred, was founded. From then onward the city progressed with amazing rapidity; so much so that in 1938 the Jacques Greber plan for the improvement of the capital area was adopted by the national government. This plan provided particularly for confederation square and the enlargement of Elgin street into the wide boulevard that we know today. In 1945, the federal district commission was enlarged, as well as the federal district area until it comprised an area of some 900 square miles.

Today we are again taking stock of our capital and its resources. We are again looking towards the expansion of the national capital area, and we are doubling this area. I submit that when we do so, we should do so in the light of the greatness that appears to be promised for our country; in the light also of modern conditions and modern methods of communication. Today the entire world has shrunk and distances no longer mean anything. If we consider modern technology and so on we can, and this is certainly no dream, look forward to the day when Ottawa will be one of the great cities of the world. It is fitting that it become one of the great cities of the world because it is destined to be the capital of one of the great countries of the world.

I feel that we should plan accordingly. We should plan for that greatness. We should plan for the future, and that is why I am in agreement with this resolution, with the planning and foresight that the Prime Minister has shown in introducing it to the house. Hon. members have spoken of the great technical problems that are connected with the future growth of this city. These problems include the mastery of the vexing question of pollution of the waters. They include also an increase in the number of bridges across the Ottawa river. For many years a new bridge across the Ottawa river has been requested by all the authorities. I should like to join with all those who have fought to obtain this bridge, and I feel sure that with the right job of planning we will have it in the near future.

I am thinking also of the green belt area and of Gatineau park. I mentioned earlier that methods of communication have been revolutionized; that distances no longer mean anything. I think future residents of this capital would certainly appreciate a scenic driveway outside of Ottawa that would cover more than the few short miles that can be travelled today in minutes. We should plan for a long scenic driveway out of the city of Ottawa. When I speak of scenery, I naturally think of the Gatineau hills and my own constituency of Pontiac. I think that following the adoption of this resolution much thought should be given to the establishment of a beautiful, scenic driveway along the Ottawa river, along that great, historic and majestic river which was known for so many years before the dawn of our own era, and which was a great artery of travel many years ago.

In order to create a driveway, we must extend the capital area for 60 or perhaps 100 miles along the north and south shores of the Ottawa river. We should plan also for future bridges so that the inhabitants of our capital will be able to drive out to these beautiful places and have the necessary accommodation to enjoy them.

That means good roads. It also means stopping places along the road, parks and so on. These facilities have been begun but so far they are only a beginning. We must continue to expand them so that really and truly our capital city will be not only a city but a great area of beauty, a fitting tribute to the nation that we all know Canada is destined to be; and that it will also be a place to which diplomats from foreign countries and notable visitors may come, may relax and may enjoy something that is typically Canadian,—because it has scenery which is different and cannot be found anywhere else in the world,—is typical of our own country and of our sort of people. In doing that I think we are planning the future course of Ottawa. That is the way in which I like to look forward to the days ahead; to Ottawa, a great city, the capital of a great country.

In closing I should just like to read this quotation from the Scriptures. I may be something for our planning fathers to remember. I read as follows:

> Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

(Translation):

Mr. Gour: Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to commend the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for having introduced this resolution in the house. However,

I wish he had submitted it during the 1957 session. Yes I am very pleased it has been done during the current session.

At the same time I cannot but congratulate the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent for having appointed, in 1956, a joint committee of the higher and lower houses and the federal district commission, the fruits of which will soon be harvested. I also cannot but recall here former prime ministers like the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, the Right Hon. Mr. Borden, as well as one of the greatest men who contributed to the forming of our country, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. They all have very efficiently contributed to the development of Canada's national capital, of the region of Hull and of surrounding districts. I remind hon. members of these names because I am afraid that a number of new Conservative representatives have been thinking that before the session which began on June 10th last year, nothing had ever been done in our country. Indeed, they seem to believe that our country was not born until then. If those people discovered our country only on June 10th last, I may say that they made a fine discovery.

While I am handing out bouquets, may I be allowed, Mr. Chairman, to pursue in the same vein. I have always been interested in the federal district commision, as it was called. We now call it the national capital commission. I want to commend the various successive chairmen of that commission who have all been worthy of this honour, as all interested in the commission, as I have been for a long time, could see for themselves.

My friend the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) refers to it, in English, a "new development"; I do not call it a "new development", in French, but rather a continuation of what was done previously. In fact, it is merely a continuation of what was already started. I am glad to know that we are in a position to carry on the work. I therefore take pleasure in congratulating all who have contributed to the work of the commission previously known under the name of federal district commission.

My good friend from Carleton, according to a report published in the Ottawa newspapers, has claimed that the federal district commission had done nothing. "Nothing was done", he said. I am somewhat nonplussed at a statement like that because I thought he was very well informed. I should like to tell him that no city has achieved so great development, in so short a time, as the capital of Canada, the city of Ottawa. Anyone who reads the history of any country—I do not know how you say it in English, but, in French, to those who complain that things are not going fast enough, we answer that Paris was not built in a day—will realize that the capital of Canada is bound to continue to develop with time. I congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) who said a moment ago that the development of the capital of Canada will not be completed this year but will go on as long as Canada continues to exist.

I congratulate the distinguished town-planner, Mr. Jacques Greber, who has drawn the plan of the federal capital. I was able, during the meetings of the committee in 1956, to ask him whether he believed that Canada and the city of Ottawa would develop at the same rate as during the past ten or twelve years, and his answer was: "Not at all, in my opinion, the city of Ottawa grew 10 years sooner than I expected". I was glad to hear that admission on the part of such a qualified man; that was when the Liberals were in power and, consequently, they had been the promoters of that fast development of the capital city. It has been said repeatedly that Ottawa will be a fine city; I would prefer however that my good friends admit that it is not only the finest city, but also one of the finest capitals that can be found.

Of all the capital cities I have visited—and there are at least seventeen of them—I have never found one as lovely as Ottawa, taking into account, of course its population and the number of years it has been the capital of this country.

I have been to the capital cities of the United States, England and other countries, but of all the cities I have visited none is as beautiful as the city of Ottawa. I have travelled almost the length and breadth of the United States, England, France and Italy, I have been to parts of Holland, Switzerland, Spain, Belgium, Egypt and Greece. There is no finer city, anywhere, than Ottawa, and I do not care who says otherwise! And that is not only because of its parks and buildings, but because of the sterling qualities of the people who live here. Whatever their race, or creed or class, they all live in harmony. Nobody will convince me that tourists are not well received in Ottawa.

I am sorry that one hon. member heard from another hon. member that there were garbage cans on the sidewalks. I have been to other cities and I can say to this gentlemen that he could very well begin by looking to his own city. He would probably find garbage cans right in front of his own house. Why go around saying in newspapers that there are a few garbage cans on the sidewalk or that some houses should be rebuilt? Obviously, there will always be some obsolescent housing and, forty years from now, houses that are new at this time will have to be replaced.

I would therefore urge the Prime Minister to ask that enough money be voted, because it takes a lot of it, and besides this, it will give jobs to the unemployed.

So, I hope, first, that the green belt matter will be settled as soon as possible while at the same time justice is done to the property owners of this area.

Care will have to be taken also that the commission does not pay exorbitant prices to some individuals who have purchased land for the mere purpose of speculation. Some profiteers who have purchased land in this area should not make excessive profits on the land to be purchased or expropriated by the federal district commission. Furthermore, some owners should be prevented from raising the value of their properties.

Nowhere in Canada, I believe, is there a riding where you will find more expropriation than in mine—for purposes of national defence, public works, the Department of Transport, and the federal district commission, whose representatives are most likeable. It is precisely because they are so likeable that all has gone well, and I hope it will continue that way.

I would like to see the earliest possible development of the federal capital. Let land be purchased by expropriation or otherwise, provided these people are left free to do as they wish with their property. But we must act now.

I hope also that people living outside the green belt will be able to obtain loans from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

(Text):

Perhaps if I speak in English I might be better understood by the Prime Minister and other members of the house.

In connection with the green belt and also the areas outside of the green belt, I think the people of my constituency are entitled to fair play and in this connection I am quite sure that the federal district commission is doing a good job. I have no criticism to make of that body, which is non-political in character.

The commission, of course, has had to face a lot of trouble. There have been problems caused by the fact that they have had to deal with so many municipalities, city councils and also with the two provinces. These bodies, however, have represented their people and have tried to do their best for them. One cannot blame them for introducing a little politics; that is natural. If the reeve of a township or the mayor of a city is concerned, for instance, he will want to do his best to protect his people and to get for them perhaps a little better consideration than that given to others. There is no harm in that and such people cannot be blamed. In the same way we try to look after our constituents and we are not above using a little politics for their benefit.

I find, therefore, that during the relatively short time during which the commission has been in existence it has done a first class job. It has not pleased all my people—oh no, one should ask my electors about that. Some of them think they should have had twice as much as they have had, but that is natural, too, and you cannot blame them. The main point is, however, and I am sure they would agree if they were asked, that they have been well used. They were looked after in the past and I am quite sure this government will continue in the same way as the Liberal regime.

I would ask that if possible the building of the bridge between Ottawa and Hull should be expedited. I am happy to know the relocation of the railways is to take place as soon as possible and all these things are to take place, at least in part, in my riding. The land is to be bought by the federal district commission and there will be ample opportunity to use the railways and also the new Queensway. The Queensway, in particular, will be a most suitable means of crossing from one city to the other and will also be a very pleasant road.

The next thing I would like to urge upon the Prime Minister is that as soon as he can get enough money something should be done to clean up the Ottawa river. I represent a riding on the Ottawa river and I am well informed on this subject. I have a little peanut shack on the river and I like to go there whenever I have a chance. Last year I had a bad time in this connection in view of what happened in this country in connection with the election and it was not much better this year. However, I do think it would be a good thing if something could be done quickly. This project, in addition to the construction of the bridge and the Queensway and so on will provide work for the people who need work and I am sure all the people of Canada are in favour of these measures.

I would like to pay tribute to all the members who have sat in this house since 1945, members from Vancouver to Halifax. Regardless of political opinion, they have all been very willing to co-operate in the making of the capital of our country the most attractive capital it is possible for human beings to create. I would also like to pay the same tribute to the new members, for I am sure in this respect they are just the same as those who have preceded them. They, like their predecessors, raised no objections to the spending of money in order to beautify Ottawa. Ottawa is their own capital, just as it is the capital of every Canadian. It is reported that more than 50,000 additional tourists came to Ottawa last year and, to be materialistic for a moment, that means something for our country, that is a big thing for our country.

There is one more request I would like to make and that is with respect to the many attractive spots in my riding which might, in my opinion, be made into beautiful parks. I have in mind such places as Manotick. There are many more, but I am sure that the federal district commission will do everything in its power to develop such places.

Having had extensive dealings with the men who form this commission, I must say that I could not ask for people more devoted to their duties. They will do their best for my riding, for Quebec and for Canada, and it is not a question of having friends in the right place. They are doing what should be done and they are doing the most necessary things first, without being bothered by us. If there is a change to be made or something to be done, I am sure, as pointed out by my friend the hon. member for Carleton, that no question of politics will be involved. We Liberals chose the chairman of the federal district commission. He was not a Liberal but he was a fine man, possessed of great ability. If a man was chosen to be chairman of the commission and if, twenty years ago, he was a Liberal, he could still be a good man for the job, and he would do just the same as he would were he of any other political opinion. This is because we in the Liberal party make no distinction and as we all know the present chairman, who is not a Liberal, is a great man and a very able man.

I do not think I have any more to say at this time except to reiterate that I hope everything that can be done will be done as soon as possible and that if the Prime Minister finds that he needs more money I am sure if he comes to the house he will find he will receive our support. I will support him for the good of the capital, for the sake of the future and for the benefit of the people of this country.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few words to what has been said by previous speakers. I wish also to congratulate the Prime Minister for bringing this resolution before the house. I believe it has been brought forward as soon as possible following the findings of the committee in 1956 and the introduction of the bill in 1957. I hasten to say, too, that it is gratifying to observe the general agreement that obtains in this house on the subject matter of this resolution. To those who think it was always thus I only want to say it is especially gratifying at this time because it was not always this easy to discuss a proposal involving the expenditure of such large amounts of money for the development of a national capital in the way we are now.

I as a citizen of Ottawa believe I echo the feeling of every hon. member of this house when I say that Ottawa is a beautiful city, a wonderful capital. The citizens of Ottawa have as much interest in making Ottawa a beautiful city as other citizens have in their respective communities. The citizens of Ottawa have done their best and have done their share at all times in making the city an efficient community with all the adjuncts of an advanced city with services on a par with those in other communities in this country.

I say this because it is easy for any of us to find fault with any community. I do not believe Ottawa has been lax in its development. I believe it has been as progressive as has any other community in Canada. Although contributions have been made by the Ottawa improvement commission and the federal district commission let us remember that the citizens of Ottawa through paying their taxes have contributed a great deal to the development and beautification of this city through projects that are not projects that would be encountered by cities that were not capital cities.

We have much to be thankful for. There has been splendid co-operation between the federal district commission, the city and the provinces. For example, in my own riding we have Sussex drive which is well known to the Prime Minister, the bridges over the Rideau leading to the falls and the new city hall. The cost of these improvements was contributed to by the federal government but we are also indebted to the citizens of Ottawa for their contribution. The people of Ottawa are grateful for the improvements that are being made. They want a beautiful capital and have always been prepared to make their contribution through the payment of taxes and in other ways.

I could enumerate the projects mentioned by my good friends the hon. members for Carleton, Ottawa West and Hull but I shall desist. However, I wish to urge on the Prime Minister consideration of the bridge about which we both spoke in the last election campaign on opposite sides of the river. I know he is sincere about it and appreciates the necessity for it but I honestly believe the only solution is for the government of Canada to make up its mind to build the bridge on its own as quickly as possible and consider it a national capital bridge. The federal government contributed much to the Chaudiere bridge, and built the Champlain bridge and I believe the time is very distant when we could expect contributions from others toward the construction of a bridge across the Ottawa river.

I am endeavouring to conclude my remarks before six o'clock so I shall not deal in detail with some of the proposals before us but I urge upon the government consideration of the removal of the railway tracks at Sussex street and the speedy erection of suitable government buildings on that beautiful site. I believe the Prime Minister appreciates as much as I do the beautiful locations that are available along Sussex drive for the construction of public buildings. There is not a better site in Ottawa. I personally hoped that the policy of a previous minister of the former government would have been carried out and a museum and building to house offices of the Department of External Affairs constructed on Sussex drive to follow the general pattern of develoment in that area. However, whatever may be located there I hope the Prime Minister will exert his influence to see that the area is properly developed. This is one of the finest locations in the district and was neglected until the time of the inception of the federal district commission which body took it upon itself to acquire the necessary property along the Ottawa river to make sites available for construction of buildings for the government of Canada.

The bill foreshadowed by this resolution will, I hope, provide the federal government with an agency which will have greater powers than the federal district commission. We have been asking for a revision of the Federal District Commission Act for a long time and this revision came about as a result of the report of the joint committee. We asked for a permanent chairman. We are satisfied with the present chairman and staff but I believe the staff has been insufficient just as the financial assistance given in the past has been insufficient to enable the commission to carry out the projects recommended by the committee.

I shall say no more because my time has nearly expired and I merely close by expressing my warm support of this resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest to the hon. member for Ottawa West that the questions he raised could be answered immediately after the bill is presented. I know that when it is presented he will find the answers to many of his questions. I wish also to express appreciation to all hon. members who have participated in this debate. May I say their contributions have been helpful and their suggestions will receive the most serious consideration. I believe the contributions that have been made by hon. members today have been in keeping with the responsibilities of parliament to assure that the capital city of Canada shall be a reflection of the greatness of our country and I thank hon. members in all quarters of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I asked the Prime Minister some questions that are proper questions at the committee stage of the resolution because they concern finances but would be out of order at the committee stage of the bill. I would hope that when we come to that stage he would be willing to answer them then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no objection.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Diefenbaker thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-48, respecting the development and improvement of the national capital region.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LAKEHEAD HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION FOR MANAGEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF HARBOUR

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-26, to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: The house in committee on Bill No. C-26, to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners.

Clauses 1 to 25, inclusive, agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I think the speed with which you moved through these clauses is a credit to the chairman of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and I just want to speak both for myself and the hon. member for Fort William, who unfortunately cannot be here, and express again our approval of the bill and to compliment the minister on working on it. All I can say to him now is that we shall take the pressure off him and begin to press the Minister of Public Works for the great manifestations which are going to come from this bill in the form of a lakehead terminal and warehouse set up.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LAKE OF THE WOODS CONTROL BOARD

AMENDMENT ALTERING CONSTITUTION OF MEMBERSHIP—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-25, to amend the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister tell us what the amendment is all about?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the other place feels that their phrasing is better, and I agree.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING NAMES ON INDIAN REGISTER

Hon. George H. Hees (for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Indian Act.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this bill is in precisely the same form as the bill which was passed by both houses of parliament at the last session and which failed to become law only because the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was in a hurry to dissolve parliament and did not arrange for royal assent beforehand. I see no useful purpose to be served by repeating the debate that took place on January 30, last, and which will be found in Hansard of that day.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RETIRING AGE OF SENIOR OFFICERS

Hon. George H. Hees (for the Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to conform with the Public Service Superannuation Act. If I am correct, this act provides that any civil servant who contributes to the pension fund—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I am not too sure that the hon. member for Megantic has the right bill. This is a bill to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member is talking about the right bill. His remarks are completely in order.

Mr. Roberge: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if you read the explanatory note of this bill we will see that the purpose of the bill is to remove subsection 2 from the statute and by doing so the tenure of office of the commissioner and of the deputy commissioner can be extended if at any time this is considered to be advisable. Provision for retirement age and for extension may be made by regulation under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

I see that under section 12 of that act, which is chapter 50 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, a contributor to the fund has to be removed from office at the age of 65 but that the chief of the department, in this instance the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) as far as the commissioner is concerned, or the commissioner as far as the deputy commissioners are concerned, can take action to extend the tenure of office beyond 65 years one year at a time for a period not exceeding five years.

I am sure that we on this side of the house have no doubt as to the integrity and capacity of the gentlemen who now occupy these posts but perhaps the Minister of Justice would like to tell us their age and why he wishes to continue them in office. From the bill itself we cannot see why this is being done. We might suppose that it has something to do with item 17 on the order paper. It may be that the gentlemen who now occupy the posts of commissioner and deputy commissioners will be appointed to the parole board to be created by that legislation which we will consider later. I think this house wants to know why this legislation is before the house.

Under the Interpretation Act, which is also referred to in the explanatory note, all civil servants are appointed during tenure of office or during bon plaisir. We would like to know from the minister exactly what is behind the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister tell us if this bill is part of the recommendations of the Fauteux report and to what extent?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the bill itself is not part of the recommendations of the Fauteux report but I can explain to hon. members who have asked about the reason for the bill that, as they will appreciate, the Fauteux committee in its recommendations put forward a number of suggestions of far-reaching import which will take considerable time to work out. The commissioner of penitentiaries now holding that office is an experienced, skilful and able penitentiaries officer and we are anxious to retain his services so that when the very important discussions with the provinces take place which are to start after September 16, his advice may be available and, more importantly, so that when any program which will result from these discussions and from the agreements that may be arrived at is being implemented—which will take a number of years—we may have available the services of the present commissioner of penitentiaries. If we do not make this amendment so that he may continue to hold that office after the age of 65 we will lose his services in just over a year's time. That is the reason why we are asking that the clause requiring his retirement at 65 be deleted, in order that we may retain his services for whatever period may be desirable after he reaches his sixty-fifth birthday.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS ADAPTING SUMMARY CONVICTION APPEALS TO SASKATCHEWAN SYSTEM

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-9, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister say a word?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make an amendment to the Criminal Code which has been requested by the province of Saskatchewan. That province, in the session of the legislature held earlier this year, amended their act to change the constitution of their district court. They had previously, as I recall it, 21 judicial districts of the district court of Saskatchewan and by legislation introduced this year they changed that system and provided that there should be one district court for the whole of Saskatchewan to which the various judges of the district courts will have to be appointed subsequently.

Since under the Criminal Code the relevant provision which we are amending here is framed by reference to the present constitution of the district courts of Saskatchewan, it is necessary for us now to amend the Criminal Code to bring it into conformity with the revised district court system in that province. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I understand the minister's explanation, it is purely to bring one statute into conformity with another.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct, yes, and in line with the request of the province.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

REPEAL OF TICKET OF LEAVE ACT, ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD, ETC.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a board to be known as the national parole board; to provide for the remuneration and expenses of the members of the board; for the appointment of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the board; to provide generally for the administration of the act; and further for the repeal of the Ticket of Leave Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister going to say something?

Mr. Fulton: The purpose of this resolution, Mr. Chairman, is to ask authority of the house to bring in a bill to set up a national parole board. This is perhaps the most important recommendation of the Fauteux committee. Indeed, the purpose of the constitution of that committee was to study the administration of the remission system in the Department of Justice. It was from that study that there grew the larger study which the Fauteux committee undertook and which resulted in its report, with the very far-reaching series of recommendations that they made.

As will be appreciated, one of the provisions of the bill to be introduced if the resolution carries is to amend the Ticket of Leave Act, and, in effect, to substitute a new parole system administered by a national parole board for the present system under the Ticket of Leave Act administered by the remission service of the Department of Justice which reports to the Solicitor General. The present Ticket of Leave Act authorizes the governor general, on the advice of the appropriate minister of the crown who is now the Solicitor General, to grant to an inmate of a penitentiary, jail or other public or reformatory prison a licence to be at large in Canada during such portion of his term of imprisonment and upon such conditions as may be fixed. This statute is the authority under which the parole system of Canada is presently administered by the remission service.

As hon. members will recall, in 1953 the then minister of justice appointed a committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Gerald Fauteux, to make the inquiry which I have outlined. The purpose of the bill is to implement this particular recommendation of the Fauteux committee, that is the recommendation having to do with the parole system.

I should perhaps, in view of the interest that has been aroused in the matter, say a word or two about the system of parole itself. Parole is a well recognized procedure which is designed to be a logical step in the reformation and rehabilitation of a person who has been convicted of an offence and, as a result, is undergoing imprisonment. It is a procedure whereby an inmate of an institution may be released before the expiration of his sentence, so that he may serve the balance of his sentence at large in society. While serving the balance of his sentence at large he is under appropriate social restraints which are designed to ensure, so far as possible, that he will live a law-abiding life in society. Parole is, therefore, a transitional step between close confinement in an institution and absolute freedom in society. The sanction that is imposed for failure to live up to the conditions that govern the release is the return of the inmate to the institution.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that at this stage, as I read the temper of the house, the opinion of the house and of the country at large, it is not necessary for me to enter into a detailed statement or defence of the grounds for a parole system. I referred at some length to this matter on my estimates less than a week ago, at which time I referred in general terms to our tentative program for the reformation and modernization of the penitentiary system, and expressed it as a fundamental goal of that program to ensure the return to society of persons who have undergone prison sentences, as useful and fruitful members of society, in the shortest possible time that can be done consonant with the obligation on the government and those who administer the prison system to protect society from any potential or possible recurrence of crime on the part of those who have undergone prison terms.

The parole system which is contemplated under the bill to be based on this resolution, is an integral part of that approach to the problem. As I have said, the present national parole system in Canada is carried on by the remission service of the Department of Justice under the Ticket of Leave Act. This act was passed by parliament in 1899 and it has not been amended in any substantial way since that time. Of this act the Fauteux committee said the following:

> That this legislation was never designed to meet the complex problems of modern corrections, is quite apparent from the difficulties that are encountered in its administration under present-day conditions. We are astonished that such satisfactory results have been obtained in recent years by the service under this antiquated legislation, and much credit must be given to those who are charged with the administration of it.

I should like to echo those words of the Fauteux committee, both with respect to the personnel of the remission service of the department and with respect to the present minister, the Solicitor General, who is in charge of that administration. I know that that same feeling has been shared by former administrations with respect to the work done by the remission service in the department.

It might be useful for me to outline briefly the way in which the present Ticket of Leave Act operates, and to make a short comparison with the system which will be brought into effect by the bill. The governor general, acting on the advice of the appropriate minister of the crown, now the Solicitor General, may grant to any person under sentence of imprisonment in a penal institution for an offence against the criminal law of Canada a licence to be at large in Canada during such portion of his term of imprisonment and upon such conditions as may be indicated in the licence. Under subsection (2) of section 3 of the act, that is the Ticket of Leave Act, the licence may from time to time be revoked or altered. The sentence of imprisonment is deemed to continue in operation even though the licensee is at large; that is to say, the licensee serves the balance of his term of imprisonment by satisfying the conditions of the licence. The licence may contain any conditions that the governor general, on the advice of the appropriate minister, sees fit to apply to the licensee.

If the licensee is convicted of any indictable offence, the licence is forthwith forfeited by operation of law and the licensee must return to the institution to serve the balance of his sentence that remained unexpired when the licence was granted. If the licensee is convicted of a summary conviction offence or in any way fails to abide by the conditions under which the licence was issued, it may be revoked by the governor general, again on the advice of the appropriate minister, and thereupon by virtue of subsection (3) of section 8 of the act the licensee is to be returned to the institution to serve the balance of the term that remained unexpired when the licence was granted.

The licensee is required to notify the local police authorities of his place of residence and of any intention he may have of changing his place of residence. Male licence holders are required to report to the police authorities once each month. Female licensees are not required to report. A licensee is required to carry his licence with him and to produce it when required to do so by a judicial officer or a peace officer. Any peace officer is entitled to arrest, without a warrant, any licensee whom he reasonably suspects of having committed any offence or who, it appears, is getting his livelihood by dishonest means.

The Fauteux committee suggested a number of fundamental principles that should be kept in mind in determining what method of parole administration would be best for Canada. The committee said that the system should take into account, among other things, the large size of Canada, in a geographical sense, and its relatively small size, in terms of population. The committee said that the system should also take into account the division of legislative power between one federal and ten provincial governments.

With these matters in mind, the committee suggested that Canada's parole system should be developed in accordance with the following principles:

(a) it should provide for continued uniformity of parole administration, but at the same time avoid undue rigidity of practice and procedure;

(b) it should take into account local conditions which may vary in different parts of the country;

(c) it should be designed to assist in the development, as far as possible, of probation services, specialized penal institutions and after-care agencies;

(d) it should, as far as possible, be a simple but efficient system; and

(e) it should be built up from the present system during an appropriate transitional period and not instituted by any sudden, wholesale abandonment of the present system.

We are firmly of the opinion that the parole authority for Canada should be a quasi judicial body rather than as is presently the case, a minister of the crown acting in an exclusively administrative capacity. The parole authority, we believe, should not be one that is liable to be subjected to the external and internal pressures which are, inevitably, brought to bear on ministers of the crown. We have no reason to believe that such pressures exert any influence in connection with the granting of tickets of leave at the present time. However, we do believe that it is in the best interests of Canada that the parole authority should, at all times, be in a position to say that its judgments can only be based on the merits of the particular case and that it is not open, in any way, to influence by extraneous considerations.

The bill to which this resolution relates is designed to give effect to the principle to which I have just referred.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely regret that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) who was to express the views of the official opposition on this proposed resolution, is ill at this time. I feel sure that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), will join me in extending to the hon. member our best wishes for a prompt recovery.

The Minister of Justice referred to the Ticket of Leave Act. I think I should remind the house that this act was incorporated into our statutes in 1899, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

(Text):

In 1938 the Right Hon. Mackenzie King appointed the Archambault commission and this matter was also taken into consideration by the committee presided over by Mr. Justice Fauteux. At this time I want to say that we on this side of the house are in agreement generally with the principles of the resolution to institute a national parole board and also to provide for the framework of that new act which will be passed by this house, I suppose.

I want to commend Mr. Justice Fauteux who was chairman of that committee and also those able men who worked with him for a number of years and who brought down the report we now know as the Fauteux report from which the Minister of Justice quoted during the few minutes that we have listened to him. In general, implementing the recommendations of the Fauteux report will certainly be an improvement in the parole system or in the way to give leave from penitentiaries. I know that the minister advised the house the other day that there will be a conference of the attorneys general of the provinces during September or October. I hope that all these gentlemen will be able to arrive at some understanding in order to improve the parole system in our country and therefore in all the provinces.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I started my remarks in French and I intended to continue them in French but, because of the difficulties we have had with the loudspeaker system, I switched to English without really noticing it. Perhaps this is a novel method of simultaneous translation.

Mr. Chairman, all hon. members will agree, I am sure, that civil servants now working in the remission service under the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) are making commendable efforts, that they willingly assume their responsibilities and that they do a fine job of it.

(Text):

Mr. Deschatelets: I understand five commissioners will be appointed on a full time basis. I should like to know whether a French-speaking commissioner will be appointed according to this resolution.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, at present all I want to comment on are matters affecting the resolution stage itself. We in this group most heartily commend the Minister of Justice for the introduction of this resolution which is the forerunner of a bill for the establishment of a national parole board. With all of the changes that have taken place in penology over the years it seems rather strange that we should on a federal basis hope to administer an act which fundamentally has not been changed for, I believe, in the neighbourhood of 60 years.

We in this group were very appreciative of the action of the previous government in establishing a commission to make a thorough study of the entire question of parole. We feel they did an excellent job and brought in a good report. We are very happy this evening to find the implementation of the first move being brought about as part of the recommendations of the Fauteux commitee. A great deal, of course, could be said on this resolution stage, but it is the decision of this group that at the present time it is not appropriate to go into the entire field relating to this question. We feel that the efficiency of parliament would be better served by waiting until we actually have the bill before us, complete with all its principles, its implications and its sections.

All I am now doing, therefore, on behalf of our group is to commend the government for bringing in a resolution leading up to the establishment of a national parole board and at the second reading, after we have had a chance to study the bill and to see exactly what the government has in mind, we will make our comments.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate very much indeed the attitude of the committee towards this resolution, which I think illustrates the striking degree of unanimity in principle on the general approach to this problem. There may be details with respect to administration and so on about which we will differ, but I do think it is quite an interesting illustration of the extent to which there is in this house and in Canada generally agreement that our system does require overhaul in this respect.

I join with those who have spoken in expressing appreciation of and tribute to those of my predecessors who have made the Fauteux report possible, and to the committee itself which had made possible the resolution now before us.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked a specific question with respect to the number of the members of the board and as to whether there would be appointed a French-speaking member. I can assure him that it is our intention to appoint to this board the best possible representatives who can be found, bearing in mind their interests, experience and skills in this particular field. In appointing these members of the board, due regard will be had for the racial and geographical composition of Canada.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fulton thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-49, to provide for the conditional liberation of persons undergoing sentences of imprisonment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND APPLICATION AND INCREASE AMOUNT

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to extend its application to the years 1959 and 1960 and to provide for a twenty-five per cent increase in the amount of assistance for the years 1958, 1959 and 1960.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: I wonder if the minister could make a statement on this resolution?

(Text):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposes to extend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1959 and 1960 and to provide for a 25 per cent increase in the amount of assistance for the years 1958, 1959 and 1960.

In presenting the Canadian budget for 1958 on June 17 last, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, outlined the government's program of assistance to the gold mining industry. He referred to the serious problems of adjustment confronting this industry since the war, which problems had adversely affected those northern communities which are dependent upon the gold mining industry for their survival.

I would like to supplement the remarks made by the Minister of Finance by briefly reviewing the history and the operations of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and by making a few comments on our gold mining industry and its problems.

At the beginning of the war, the industry was making notable headway and this was continued through 1941 when Canada's gold output reached an all-time record of 5.4 million ounces. By this time, however, the urgency of the war effort was making it increasingly necessary to divert all available labour and supplies to the production of munitions and related activities and, as a consequence, gold mining production declined steadily to a low of 2.7 million ounces in 1945. Although our gold mining production reversed this trend and steadily increased from 1946 through 1950, it has never reached the peak output of 1941 and was still considerably short of that peak in 1957.

The drop in the price of gold in terms of Canadian dollars from $38.50 an ounce in 1940 to $35 in 1946, the difficulties of rebuilding the depleted labour ranks and the rapid rise in the costs for labour and supplies caused some mines to close down and a number of others to operate at a loss. This brought hardships to many northern communities and our development of the northland was materially slowed down. This was a very disturbing situation which led to the introduction of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in 1948.

Over the years the gold mines have made very commendable and successful efforts to decrease their operating costs by making use of every improvement in mining and milling methods and techniques. In recent years these improvements had reached the point where very little more could be done while costs, on the other hand, have continued to mount. This severe situation has been further complicated by the adverse exchange rate when applied to the sale of gold at the Canadian equivalent of the fixed United States price of $35 an ounce.

It is proposed, therefore, not only to extend the period of application of the act to the calendar years 1959 and 1960, but to increase the amount of assistance payable under the present formula by 25 per cent. The increased assistance would apply from January 1, 1958 to the end of 1960.

In this connection I should explain that the payments which the gold mines receive under the act are based on a formula which has been changed on occasion in order to meet new conditions which arise. The essential features of the formula are the rate of assistance and the number of assistance ounces. The assistance to any one gold mine applies to two-thirds of the number of ounces it produces in the year concerned and no assistance is given unless the average cost of producing an ounce of gold exceeds $26.50. The assistance payment is determined by multiplying the number of ounces eligible for assistance by two-thirds of the amount by which the average cost of producing an ounce exceeds $26.50.

Only those mines whose output of gold is 70 per cent or more of their total output are eligible for assistance payments. Also, a mine must produce more than 50 ounces of gold in the year concerned.

A mine may request assistance on a quarterly, half yearly or yearly basis. Applications are given an initial check and the advance payments, amounting to 80 per cent of the approved assistance payable, are made. The 20 per cent holdback is paid after the final audit of the company's books by the office of the comptroller of the treasury.

A company may submit an application for cost aid up to six months after the end of the year. Consequently, final figures for payments made in respect of the year 1957 are not yet available. However, it is anticipated that they will amount to $9.4 million. Total payments for the years 1955 and 1956 amounted respectively to $8.9 and $8.7 million. It is anticipated that the amount of assistance payable for the year 1958, including the proposed increase, will be approximately $12 million.

The cost aid under the act applies to placer as well as to lode gold operations, lode gold mines being those in which the gold occurs in veins. Forty-three of the 52 lode gold mines in production in 1957 were eligible for cost aid. The output from these mines, plus the 69,000 ounces derived from placer operations, amounted to 2.5 million ounces. These 2.5 million ounces on which assistance payments were made, represent 57 per cent of all the gold produced in Canada in 1957.

By the end of March 1958 payments under the act had reached a grand total of $108.8 million, this being for a total period of ten-years. Canada's production of gold from all sources during that period was 42.8 million ounces and cost-aid payments were made on 31 million ounces, or about 73 per cent of the total.

The $108.8 million paid out since the act came into force does not appear at all excessive when it is realized that in 1956 alone the gold mining industry paid out a total of $117 million in salaries and wages, fuel, electric power, and supplies and equipment. It provides direct employment for 17,000 and it is the main support for 80,000 people who reside in the gold mining communities.

I stated earlier that the gold mines have made every effort to decrease their operating costs. In this respect they have done well. The average ounces of gold produced per year per employee was 53 per cent higher for 1956 than in 1948. Also, the average number of tons of ore hoisted per underground worker was 35 per cent higher in 1956 than in 1948. However, despite the improved efficiency, the cost of production per ounce of gold has continued to rise.

A continuation of the cost aid beyond 1958 and the proposed 25 per cent increase are needed to prevent irreparable damage to a large segment of the gold mining industry. Actually, from a survey of the situation by officials of my department it seems likely that 20 gold mines would have to close down after a two or three year cleaning-up period should assistance payments be discontinued at the end of 1958. These mines would very likely remain closed permanently and numerous other gold mines would be adversely affected to a varying degree.

The effect this would have on the dependent communities need not be stressed, for it can be readily visualized. It is hoped, therefore, that the proposed extension of the act and the additional assistance will serve to extend the life of our northern communities, to provide assurance of good conservation measures in our gold mining operations, and to maintain the level of our gold production, an all-important sector of Canada's mineral industry.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take very much of the time of the committee at this stage of the proceedings. However, I wish to express the hope that the resolution just introduced by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will be supported by all hon. members of the house. Speaking on behalf of this party I may say that we will wholeheartedly support the resolution which is in these words:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to extend its application to the years 1959 and 1960 and to provide for a twenty-five per cent increase in the amount of assistance for the years 1958, 1959 and 1960.

This is a very simple amendment. The formula which has been applied for approximately the last four years will remain the same and in calculating the assistance the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys will simply add 25 per cent to the assistance paid. This is a substantial increase and I am happy to congratulate the minister and the government for having decided to amend the act in this way.

As was stated by the minister in his introductory remarks, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act first came into force on June 15, 1948, and was applicable to the full year 1948. Since the inception of the act it has been amended and extended and, as was mentioned by the minister, the total amount paid under the act since 1948 is $108.8 million. It is interesting to see how much the government paid for all the gold it bought from 1948 to 1957 and how much the government paid for gold it bought between 1938 and 1947. Between 1948 and 1957 the gold mines in Canada produced 42,722,000 ounces of gold. I presume that the bulk of this gold was bought by the government. If we take the average price for the years 1948 to 1957 we arrive at a total amount of $1,500,320,000. If we add to that the cost to the government for assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act we arrive at a total amount of $1,610,466,000 or an average price per ounce of $37.70.

And again, if we take the average price for 1937-48, we come to a total amount paid by the government, assuming the government bought all the gold, of $1,515,466,000, or an average price of $37.43 an ounce. Therefore, between 1937 and 1948, when there was no assistance paid to the gold mines, the government paid an average price of $37.43, and during the period between 1948 and 1957, when the government paid a total amount of roughly $110 million in assistance to the gold mines, the cost per ounce to the government was $37.70, a difference of only 27 cents per ounce to the government. Therefore, by studying these figures, we realize that after all the cost to the government in keeping the gold mines in operation during that period of 10 years between 1948 and 1957 amounted really to only about $12 million. I think it was a wise move that the government made and I think it is a wise move which is being made now by the present government in amending the act to extend the act not only for two years but to increase the assistance by 25 per cent.

I myself firmly believe—and I am not the only one—that eventually the price of gold will be increased. If the price of gold were to be increased, let us say, in a month or two months, in a year or two years, it does not matter, the government would be in this position. It has over $1,200 million worth of gold in the vaults of the Bank of Canada and if the price of gold were to be increased by 50 per cent hon. members can appreciate the enormous profit that would be made by the Canadian government as compared with the very little assistance given to the gold mines in the past. I understand the situation. I know that if the government were to keep on paying subsidies to industries sometimes it would not be a good situation. Let me tell hon. members that the industry itself does not like to receive this assistance. It takes the assistance because it needs it.

I would like one hon. member to tell me of one commodity, the price of which has not increased or did not increase during the last 10 or 15 years. Gold is the only commodity, the price of which did not increase. Not only did it not increase but it went down between 1948 and 1957. In 1948 the price of gold was around $38 an ounce. Today the price of gold is below $34 an ounce. In fact, I hold in my hand a list showing the average price of gold between 1938 and 1947. This is the mint price. The average price was $37.43. The average price of gold between 1948 and 1957 was $35.12, a decrease of $2.31. The average price during 1955 was $34.52. In 1956 it was down to $34.55 and in 1957 it was down to $33.45 an ounce. For the first six months of 1958, the average price of gold per ounce was $34.08. The average price during the month of June, 1958, was $33.67, and that price did not vary very much during the month of July. Therefore, this is one commodity the price of which not only did not go up but went down. Therefore, I say between 1948 and today the Liberal government were justified in paying that assistance to the gold mines.

Sometimes we hear some, I will not say irresponsible persons but persons who do not stop to think of the great difficulties experienced by the gold mines say, for instance, that the gold mines are not paying the same wages as the base metal mines. Let me tell hon. members that the gold mining industry did not do too badly even during those depressed years for the industry. In 1948, the average weekly wages for gold miners was $49.64; the average for 1957 was $73.30. Of course, we admit that those weekly wages are below the weekly wages paid by the base metal mines; but we must realize that the industry is facing a great deal of trouble. The industry is competing with the base metal mines not only for ordinary miners but for engineers, technicians, managers and accountants, and hon. members know how difficult it is today to hire highly qualified engineers, geologists and experts to work in the mines.

In this country the production of base metal mines and other mines has increased tremendously. The total value of production in 1957 was more than $2 billion. There was a large increase in the activities of the uranium mines. Therefore, the gold mines have to compete with those base metal mines which were hiring men at higher wages. However, the fact remains that since 1948 more than 50 per cent of the assistance paid by the government to gold mines went for increase in salaries and wages. Even if the gold mines are experiencing some trouble today, they are paying heavy federal taxes, provincial taxes and municipal taxes. I am told that taxes paid in some of the gold mining camps exceeds 40 per cent of the assistance which those mines are receiving from the federal government.

Last year when the Canadian metal mining association came to Ottawa to present the problems of the gold mines they outlined the principal factors which had contributed to the marked deterioration in the past year and which have caused the current critical conditions in the gold mining industry. They are as follows:

1. The sharp and steady decline in the mint price of gold. I have mentioned that over the last two years the average price per ounce for gold was below $34.

2. The increase in costs of operation incurred through increases in basic wage rates combined with a shorter working week. This has been another burden which has had to be absorbed by the gold mining industry.

3. The loss and scarcity of manpower, especially trained miners as well as technical and professional personnel. I mentioned a few minutes ago that the base metal mines were getting the cream of the technicians because they were paying high wages. They were short of technicians and miners and they were coming to my own constituency to hire miners who wanted to move from a gold mining camp to a uranium mining camp such as Blind River.

4. The Canadian metal mining association mentioned the increased cost of certain items of supplies and equipment and some services. We know that the price of materials has been increasing all the time. The price of supplies to the mines has been increasing for the last ten or twelve years and in some cases provincial taxes have also been increased. In the province of Ontario the tax on the mines has been increased, and I do not have to mention again that so far as the price of the commodity is concerned the mines have to take the price quoted each week by the Department of Finance. We know very well that due to the fact that the Canadian dollar is at a premium and with the price of gold being based on 35 United States dollars per ounce the price has always been below par during the last three or four years.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to extend the debate at this stage of the procedure. However, there is one thing I should like to mention. I was very surprised the other day when I read in Hansard that the Minister of Finance—I was not in the house when he said it—had said, as found at page 1849 of Hansard of July 2, when replying to different members who had spoken in the budget debate:

> I have one final comment of this preliminary nature. It is with regard to gold. No hon. member of this house has yet said a word expressive of even the slightest measure of disapproval of what we have proposed by way of an increase in assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. But among those who have importuned the Minister of Finance—

Note this, "importuned the Minister of Finance."

> —in the last year on this subject have been the hon. member for Villeneuve and the hon. member for Timmins. Did they express joy that the government had moved to increase assistance by 25 per cent?

> No, they were withholding their comment. They were not going to be heard as expressing approbation. All I have to say on this subject is that I hope their constituents will take note that this increase in the assistance under this act apparently kindled no enthusiasm or appreciation in the minds or the bosoms of their respective members.

I did not hear the minister say that but I read it in Hansard the following day. This was on July 2 and on June 25, as found at page 1617 of Hansard, I had this to say with respect to the proposed amendment of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act:

> I was very happy to hear the Minister of Finance's statement with regard to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. This 25 per cent increase is certainly welcome, and the retroactive effect which the government intends giving to that legislation will compensate, to a certain extent, the considerable losses which the industry has suffered because of the premium on the Canadian dollar.

I was not blaming the government for the premium on the Canadian dollar. Then I said:

> This government program, involving the amendments which I have just mentioned, was welcomed by everyone in the gold mining industry, including the miners themselves, whose livelihood and that of their families is in that industry. The government is making no mistake in accepting, in part at least, the representations of the leaders of the industry itself and those of the municipalities which quite recently sent an impressive delegation to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.
> I do not mean to act the part of a chronic grouch—

Then I said that I thought the act could be extended for three years instead of two years. I think the minister was not fair in his remarks on July 2 when he said that we were not appreciative of what the government was doing for the gold mines. I was surprised because the Minister of Finance knows the situation of the gold mines. The Minister of Finance knows the work I have done in the house pleading the case of the gold mines. I pleaded the case of the gold mines not because I wanted to plead the case of the companies operating the mines. They certainly deserve a lot of credit. As was mentioned by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, the mining companies did all they could to increase efficiency in the mines. The gold miners co-operated with the management so as to improve efficiency. Every time I pleaded the case of the gold mining industry I knew I was pleading the case of the people living in the constituency of Villeneuve. I have 10,000 miners working in the gold mines and base metal mines. About 50 per cent are working in gold mines and 50 per cent in base metal mines.

With regard to the comparability of the wages paid by the gold mines and base metal mines, let me say this, Mr. Chairman. We have seen many gold miners leave Malartic to go to Sudbury, for instance, where they could get a few cents more an hour but many times they would come back to Malartic within a few months and say, "We like to be in Malartic; even if we get a few cents an hour less the cost of living here is less". I do not mean to imply that Sudbury is not a good place to live. It is one of the nicest places in northern Ontario. It is a very important base metal mining camp and certainly one of the outstanding mining communities in northern Ontario. Nevertheless, the cost of living is higher in Sudbury than in Malartic and these miners who left Malartic for Sudbury in order to get a few cents more an hour were pleased to come back to Malartic and work in the gold mines. After all, these men are not obliged to stay in a gold mining camp. They can move to a base metal camp. It has been done in the past and they always come back. Why? Because they are happy and the differential in salary is not very large.

So, let me conclude by saying this, Mr. Chairman. We are happy that the government has seen fit to extend the act and to make it retroactive to the 1st of January, 1958. The amount will be small. The act could have been amended, possibly, so that the increase to the gold mines would have been larger. However, we understand the situation. It is not so easy for a government, faced with a deficit during the current year, to be too generous. This is a good investment, and if the price of gold could be increased by this government I think it should be increased. However, if we were to increase the price of gold it would simply be in the form of a subsidy because the international price for this commodity is established by the United States price of $35 per ounce.

I have heard some members mention that the price of gold should be $75 an ounce. So far as I am concerned, the price of gold could be $100 an ounce, and I would be very happy. However, it is useless to talk like that, and I think it is useless to say the price of gold should be this or that because if the price of gold were to be set by the government at $75 an ounce it would simply mean a subsidy of $40 an ounce.

I see that my time has run out. I say that I am happy that these amendments have been brought forward by the government and I hope that within the next few years we will see an increase in the price of gold so that there will be no further need for this subsidy and we will see the government make a great profit on the gold reserves they have in the vaults of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We have heard the case for the gold mines, Mr. Chairman, presented very well by the hon. member for Villeneuve. I think in fairness to all concerned I should devote the major portion of my remarks to the case of the gold miners. I find it a bit unfortunate, in view of the spirit of good will and mutual co-operation that has abounded in this chamber today, that this particular matter had to be raised because I think we have been setting records all day long. The spirit has been very good. We have not torn each other apart today.

It so happens that I have found it very difficult to get my teeth into this gold mining assistance act. When I came down here last year as a new member I hoped to have the opportunity of dealing with this matter. I waited until the estimates came up and after much patient waiting I found when they did come up that we could not deal with the matter because it was statutory. We had the same experience when the matter came up in the committee on mines and technical surveys this year. We hit the same snag, that it was statutory and could not be debated there. Fortunately today, as a result of this amendment to the act, we have an opportunity to deal with it at some length now.

I had intended to raise the very point the hon. member for Villeneuve raised in regard to the remarks of the Minister of Finance. I think it is always necessary to protect oneself against implications, so I should like to quote from page 1626 of Hansard for June 25, 1958, what I said in the throne speech debate:

> I should like to take this opportunity to compliment the Minister of Finance on giving some assistance to the gold mining industry. However, before going too far in that direction I should like to have some assurance as to just what form the assistance is going to take.

I should like to say, however, in view of the remarks of the Minister of Finance, that I would welcome him if he were to visit the town of Timmins. I would welcome his appearance on television up there, and I would foot the bill if he would present his side of the case for this gold mining assistance, after which I would present the side I am going to present now. As he mentioned, we would then leave it up to the voters at the next election. I am quite willing to stand on the ground I take today in regard to this matter because I do not believe there is a riding in this great country of ours that is so completely and totally dependent on the production of gold as is the riding of Timmins. There are certainly large gold mines in other areas, but I do not think there is any area as completely dependent on this industry as the riding I have the honour to represent.

The Minister of Finance did not explain too clearly the purpose of this act in his budget address on June 17. In one place he mentioned that it was for the purpose of assisting the gold mining communities and in another place he made reference to the fact it was to maintain the present standard of production and in this manner assist the gold mining communities. I hope to point out today that that is not necessarily one and the same thing. They certainly could be related but there is no guarantee that the maintenance of the present production, by itself, is going to benefit the gold mining communities.

We had a very good example of that. I believe that negotiations between the gold mines and the miners started last September, or thereabouts, in the Timmins area, and were still continuing when this increase in assistance was announced. The negotiations followed the usual various stages, and when the announcement was made by the Minister of Finance some of the mines were at the conciliation stage. When it was announced that the emergency gold mining assistance had been extended for another two years and in addition had been increased by 25 per cent retroactive to the first of this year a question was asked at the next conciliation meeting as to what share the miners could hope to receive of that additional 25 per cent. The answer was very brief, and very flat—nothing.

I believe that in order for hon. members to obtain a picture of the situation as it pertains to gold mines and gold miners and the community in which they live, I should go into some detail tonight. I should like to try to present to hon. members here a picture of this emergency gold mining assistance as it is seen through the eyes of the miners. In order to do that, we have to realize that the gold mine operators today are amongst the few, if not the only people in this country who still refuse to accept the fact that there should be labour unions. They recognize them in some places only up to the extent that the law compels them to do so.

The gold miners feel that they are subsidizing this industry twice. They feel that they are subsidizing it in the first place through the taxes they pay, the same as are other Canadians, and of course from these taxes comes this subsidy back to the industry. They feel that they are subsidizing it in the second place by the much lower wages in the gold mining industry than those in other industries of a similar nature. They also see that the same mines or many of them which are receiving this subsidy or assistance have built vast empires in other places through the money that they have earned in these very gold mines. I can give you no better example than the huge iron ore industry in Ungava bay which was handled mostly by the Hollinger gold mine, the biggest mine in the Timmins area. I will give you another example. I understand that McIntyre Porcupine Mines, Limited have bought out the major portion of Algoma Steel.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I am endeavouring to bring to hon. members this picture as the miners see it. They have seen these gold mines spare no money in fighting the unions right down the line. Back in 1953 we saw a strike of about 9 of the 11 mines in the Porcupine area that went on for a period of 8 months until the men could go on no longer. It appeared that no bill of expense was too high in order to keep the unions in their place. They have seen unions in there fighting for their very life for the last ten years or more but they still have no security whatsoever. They see where gold miners—men whose occupation is possibly just as hazardous a way of making a livelihood as there is in this country—have no pension. They work a longer work week than does the rest of recognized industry across the country. Heaven knows, if there is any one industry that should have a short week, it is the mining industry where the men work thousands of feet underground. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, they have seen so many of their fellow workers who appear to have received a rather raw deal as a result of industrial accidents. I realize that that is a matter of the provincial compensation act, but to the ordinary person in the street sometimes it is rather difficult to differentiate between provincial governments and the federal government, especially when the federal government is paying a subsidy into this industry.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should just like to read two short letters in order to put one particular case on the record and to illustrate this particular point. This is one particular file on one accident that a man had. I am certainly not going to read all the letters but I should like to read two pertinent letters in this regard. One is from one of the three big mines in the Porcupine area. It is headed "To Whom it May Concern". I will not use the name of the employee but will call him "Mr. X". The letter reads as follows:

> Mr. "X", an employee of this company since 1931, was injured at work on March 9th, 1954. After long treatment and hospitalization, Mr. "X" returned to work of a less arduous nature. After ten days his foot and ankle, which became more swollen each day, reached a condition which prevented Mr. "X" continuing at work.
> We were unable to place Mr. "X" on work suited to his lame condition and still are unable to do so.

Then here was the letter that Mr. "X" received from the compensation board:

> The board, at the present time, is considering a small award for permanent disability which will pay you a pension of $7.75 a month for life. Before making this award, we would like to point out that information on file indicates that you are in debt to the town of Timmins for relief to the amount of $185.30.
> No doubt you will wish to reimburse this amount out of your pension and, therefore, for this purpose we are attaching hereto an assignment form for the purpose of refunding the amount owing.
> Yours very truly,

I could cite many more cases like that one, although I will grant that this is the worst one I have seen. However, there are many others which are almost as bad. In the short time that I have been down here in this House of Commons I have received many similar letters. Of course, as I said before, these people do not realize that these matters are in the main more provincial than federal by nature. To them the government is the government, regardless of whether it is Queen's park or Ottawa. But that is the reason that I do not feel that this measure, as good as it might be, would necessarily receive the reception that it should receive among the gold miners of the north. I wonder whether there is not some way in which this government may find a more equitable and better method of assisting the gold miners and the gold mining communities in which they live.

Last year, Mr. Chairman, I raised a point in this house recommending that this government set up a committee consisting of representatives from the federal government which are paying the subsidy to the industry; from the provincial government which administers the labour laws, the compensation laws and so forth under which the miners and of course the companies operate; the municipal officials which of all three government levels are the most keenly interested in this problem; representatives from management and representatives from the union. I suggested that that committee, composed of the five interested bodies, should go into all aspects, of not only the good mine but also the problems of the gold mining communities. In the years gone by I am sure this government has had many delegations from the mine operators. They present their side of the case. The unions come down and present their side of the case. The municipalities come down and present their side of the case. I think we all realize that when any delegation go on a mission to Ottawa they present as rosy a picture as they possibly can of their own particular side of the problem. I think that is only natural. Before this government can get a really true picture of the problems and of the measures we can take to solve them I think that a committee of this nature is necessary.

For example, just as a suggestion, I think that half a million dollars or possibly much less spent in building the road from Sault Ste. Marie to Timmins could possibly do far more for the municipality of Timmins than even the $5 million or $6 million or $8 million, whatever the Porcupine share of this subsidy is going to be. That is as far as the municipality itself is concerned, it could open up a tourist industry that at present and for years to come would possibly mean far more than an increase of 25 per cent in the gold subsidy. Maybe this gold subsidy is not the answer at all. Maybe there is some other solution that would be better. Maybe as a federal government we should look at the possibility of assisting with secondary industries that eventually are going to have to take over and supply these towns when the gold mines will be expended, as they will be expended some day, whether it is 25 years from now or 100 years from now. The gold mines are an expendable proposition which is not going to last forever, regardless of how much subsidy might be paid.

I am certainly going to support this measure because it is a step in the right direction—at least I hope it is—but I would feel a great deal better if I were sure that it was the best measure this government could introduce. In the circumstances which exist today I am not sure that this is so.

I remember the Minister of Labour expressing himself last fall in connection with this matter and I was very impressed with the attitude he adopted at that time. He seemed to have a firm grasp of the situation, and I hope that he will use his influence in the cabinet ranks with respect to the setting up of this committee in order to ensure a complete picture being provided to this government, upon which it might act. I would like to be assured that, whatever money this government invests in this particular industry, the miners and the communities in which they live will, above all, receive the priority which they deserve.

Mr. Peters: I would like to add a word of appreciation to those of the two other members from mining communities who have just spoken in support of this resolution. I would like to point out also that half of the members of this group at one time or another have worked in gold mines, and that three of us represent gold mining communities at this time. Someone has remarked that we must be rich, and if it were back in the days of the depression I would agree with him, but at the present time this is just not the case. This lack of prosperity, I am sure, is one of the reasons why the government has seen fit to offer this increase in assistance to the gold mines.

In moving this increase in and extension of the gold mining assistance legislation the government has perpetuated the original act which was set up for the purpose of solving an emergency problem which developed at the end of the war. The gold mines in years gone by have done a great deal to develop Canada, not only in northern Ontario but in other parts of the country. All areas, in fact, have benefited from the operations of the gold mines. It has been pointed out many times that 200 or 300 factories are necessary in order to produce goods essential for the operation of the gold mining industry, and these factories exist over a great portion of our country. The work created as a result of this industry has greatly assisted in the maintaining of our economy, even though it has not always been a buoyant economy and during the depression periods this has been particularly apparent in that it has enabled some people to at least make a living.

The gold mining industry, in my opinion, has been the initial stage of development in the part of the country from which I come, namely northern Ontario. We are very sympathetic to the vision of the development of the north, but we feel that the visionary part of our development has already taken place and that we in northern Ontario have reached the stage where we must either go back or go forward in a different way. We might go back as did the town of Cobalt when the price of silver dropped very rapidly. Cobalt folded up and overnight became a ghost town, although it now produces a great volume of silver once more. At that time, however, it was left to its own resources and its economy virtually disappeared. The same thing has happened and now appears to be happening with respect to the gold mining industry and we would be very well advised to read the words of the present Minister of Finance when the legislation was originally before this house for renewal back in 1956. As reported at page 4972 of Hansard for June 12, 1956, he said:

> I have emphasized, sir, that this measure is no solution of the deep-seated problem of the gold mining industry. The difficulty and the flaw in measures of this kind is that they often lull the government and lull parliament into thinking that the problem has been solved, or at least the problem has been met for the time being. No hon. member should delude himself into thinking that this measure is any solution, even on the short-run basis, of the needs and the problems of the gold-mining industry. These problems are going to require much more farsighted solutions than are offered by the hand-to-mouth, stop-gap type of assistance that we have in the present measure.

I am in complete agreement with that statement. While it is necessary to continue the emergency gold mining assistance and, because of the rising cost of living, to increase it, it is no solution in the long run to the problems we have to face. Some communities, in fact, have finally decided they must take a look at the situation. The hon. member for Villeneuve spoke very strongly in favour of the mining industry and I might say that the previous representative of Timiskaming, who sat in this house during a previous parliament, also spoke very strongly in favour of the gold mining industry. That hon. lady has been fairly well rewarded by that industry and is now secretary of their association. These communities, however, have suddenly decided that they can no longer speak as partners of the industry but that they must speak for themselves, because their views and their needs are not necessarily the same as those of the industry itself.

Over the past few years the industry has faced new problems and has taken some of the money it has accumulated and has reinvested that money in other industries. It is no longer promoting the gold mining or other mining industries in many cases. For instance, as the hon. member for Timmins pointed out, the $60 million reported to be in the profit fund of the McIntyre mines is now being used to buy steel companies and is to a very large extent being invested in airplane companies, railways, etc. The mining industry is no longer looking after the development of the mining areas or the industry itself; it is quite happy to take its money and apply it in other places. This leaves the communities to look after themselves.

I am quite happy to see that the town of Timmins, in particular, and mining communities in general have joined hands in presenting to the government this year a booklet entitled, "The Gold Mining Community", which is a study of the problems of the economic growth of these communities. This booklet is by William Lougheed Associates, consulting economists, located in the Temple building, Bay street, Toronto, and it is a very interesting document. Every member of this house has now received a copy and I suggest we should all read it. I suggest this particularly because the measure before us does not solve the real problem and it is necessary that we take a look at the situation in the industry in order that we can implement a measure to provide the measures necessary for its survival.

This booklet goes on to point out some of the problems that are faced by the mining industry. In the first place there is a debased price which does not remain constant at the base price of $35. Because of the premium on the Canadian dollar the base price decreases on sales to the United States and less than $35 is received. This appears to be a responsibility of the federal government for two reasons. It has the power to determine the price of gold and it can decide what the premium on the Canadian dollar may be from day to day.

We in this group have supported the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act because we felt it would be of some benefit to communities that so desperately need it. We have also looked for other solutions to this problem as have the municipalities themselves. The municipalities have seen the price of materials in the industry go up and the cost of living has gone up. The municipalities are entirely dependent on the people who live there as a source of tax revenue. The mines which are mostly located outside the town limits pay very little taxes. In finding moneys for the building of schools, sewers and all the necessary services of a community the municipalities must tax the value of the property owned by the townspeople. The industry is of little service to the community in this way.

The municipalities are also faced with the problem of having had the more highly skilled miners locate elsewhere. I worked in the mines for many years. When I left that employment in 1956 the base rate I received as a highly skilled workman was $1.19. Workers in the uranium fields today receive at least $1 more than that. Some receive as high as $2 or more for the same kind of work. It is not surprising that many miners have left Kirkland Lake, Timmins and other communities to settle in Blind River, Elliot Lake, Geko and other base metal fields where the industry is paying a fair and reasonable wage.

We have all heard stories of the wages received by the miners in Timmins and Kirkland Lake during the depression years. If the mines are making a profit today in view of the increased wage structure and increased cost of equipment they have to buy and in view of the selling price of $35, imagine the kind of profit they must have made in the days when they paid workers like myself 58 cents an hour. If one considers this one cannot feel very sorry about an industry that is always depicting itself as poverty stricken. In my own opinion the industry has cried wolf once too often for me to have much sympathy for it but this does not apply to the people who are dependent on the industry for their livelihood. If we are to maintain the industry, and I think we must at the present time, we will have to pay sufficient money so the miners will receive a decent wage and in turn can provide the municipalities with sources of revenue from which they can supply the necessary facilities in the mining communities. I suggest to the minister, and I may very well move an amendment to this effect, that in giving this money to the mining companies we add the stipulation that a portion of it will be given to the workers in the form of wage increases.

Let us consider the situation in one mine. The Financial Times of November 22, 1957, points out that Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Limited was recently paying a regular quarterly dividend on company's stock of six cents a share, plus an extra dividend of 20 cents a share. Distribution on the stock in 1957 represented a total of 70 cents a share with extras of 20 cents a share in March and six cents a share in June having been paid in addition to the regular six-cent quarterly disbursements. It also points out that for the five-year period from 1952 to 1956 distributions on stock of 25 cents a share yearly were made. The dividend last year was 22 cents and the profit was $1,093,260. The assistance paid by you and me through the federal government was $530,424.21. It is obvious that the mine also should have been able to pay their workers higher wages to provide them with a better standard of living than that which they now enjoy. The company could also probably have introduced a pension plan so that when an employee is no longer able to work he would at least be able to hold up his head in the community and live like a decent human being instead of hanging around a sanatorium with silicosis waiting to die.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I presume we go on first thing tomorrow morning with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Could the house leader give us the business for tomorrow and also for Wednesday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot meet the wishes of the hon. member for Essex East in this regard. Tomorrow we shall start with item No. 3 on today's order paper, which is the house in committee on a bill respecting the taxation of estates; then the Customs Tariff resolutions which come under item No. 22 on today's order paper; then item No. 5, house in committee on the act to amend the Excise Tax Act; then item No. 15, second reading of the act to amend the Financial Administration Act; then item No. 13, second reading of the act to amend the Loan Companies Act; then item No. 14, second reading of the act to amend the Trust Companies Act; then item No. 11, second reading of the act to amend the Income Tax Act; then the resolution appearing under "government notices of motions" on today's order paper which will precede a bill having to do with supply; then the three items under the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs; and the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Transport, which is No. 23 concerning the railway grade crossing fund.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: On Wednesday we may take estimates or we may have to deal with some of these legislative items. If we take estimates we shall commence with those of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and then take those of the Department of Labour and the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And finish this week?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—DISMISSALS

Question No. 109—Mr. Rouleau:

1. Have any employees been dismissed from the national film board since June 10, 1957? If so, how many?

2. How many were technicians, producers, department heads?

3. Have any employees been appointed since June 10, 1957? If so, how many?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

National film board:

1. Yes, two.

2. None.

3. Yes, from June 10, 1957 up to June 30, 1958, 78 persons have been regularly appointed in continuing positions; 24 have been engaged on a term basis and 30 on a contract basis.

UNION RAILWAY TERMINAL, OTTAWA

Question No. 166—Mr. Fisher:

1. Are negotiations presently being conducted between the federal district commission, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway to establish the joint operation by a union railway terminal company of the railways in the national capital?

2. If so, what stage have these negotiations reached and when is it expected they will be concluded?

3. What rearrangement of railway facilities is dependent upon the successful conclusion of these negotiations and what is the anticipated year of completion of each stage of such rearrangement subsequent to the conclusion of the negotiations?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister):

1. Yes.

2. Substantial agreement has been reached on the physical rearrangement of facilities and methods of operation required by the formation of a union terminal company. Agreement has yet to be reached as to financial arrangements. It is expected that final agreement will be reached during the calendar year 1958.

3. The following rearrangement of railway facilities is dependent upon the successful conclusion of these negotiations and the anticipated year of completion subsequent to the conclusion of negotiation is as shown:

(a) Connection west of Bells Corners between C.P.R. Carleton Place subdivision and the C.N.R. Beachburg subdivision. (1959)

(b) Connection at Walkley diamond between the C.P.R. Prescott subdivision and the C.N.R. Walkley cut-off line. (1959)

(c) Connection at Ellwood diamond between the C.P.R. Prescott subdivision and the C.N.R. Beachburg subdivision. (1961)

(d) Construction of additional trackage at Walkley yard to permit removal of C.P.R. switching yard at Ottawa West. (1960)

(e) Connection at Ottawa West joining the C.P.R. Prescott subdivision and Montreal and Ottawa subdivision. (1960)

(f) Construction of a new double-track high level bridge over the Rideau river at Hurdman. (1961)

(g) Realignment and elevation of existing trackage west and east of the Rideau river at Hurdman to provide for joint operation of railways and to provide for grade separation crossings of the Queensway and other important traffic arteries. (1961)

(h) Construction of a passenger train turning loop west of the Rideau river. The location of the Queensway will be on the existing wye turning track and the new loop will do away with the necessity of constructing grade separation structures. (1961)

(i) Installation of additional centralized traffic control signal equipment and communication lines to control train movements as a result of new connections and joint operation of both railways' trains. (1961)

The aforementioned items will permit the removal of C.P.R. passenger and through freight traffic on the Carleton Place subdivision through Britannia and Ottawa West. All through traffic of main line trains will be routed from Bells Corners on the C.N.R. Beachburg subdivision to the switching yard at Walkley or to Union station. This will permit the removal of rail traffic from the Interprovincial bridge (Alexandra bridge).

(j) Connection at Hawthorne between the C.P.R. Montreal and Ottawa subdivision and the C.N.R. Alexandria subdivision. (1962)

(k) Elevation of a portion of the C.P.R. Prescott subdivision between Ottawa West and Walkley diamond to permit the construction of grade separation structures at major street crossings. (1961)

(l) Construction of freight shed and track facilities at Hurdman for the C.P.R. to replace their existing facilities on Broad street. (1965)

(m) Abandonment of C.P.R. Sussex street subdivision from Bank street to end of track at Sussex drive. This can only take place when a suitable industrial area is provided to relocate existing industries now on this track. Present plans are for the establishment of such an area in the Russell road-St. Laurent boulevard part of the city for all industries who are displaced by the railroad relocation plan. The federal district commission has suitable land available. It is expected that this matter will not be completed before five years or when existing leases on railway land in the Sussex street area have expired.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, August 12, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE OF VESSELS TO CUBA

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that the management of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited has today announced that an offer to purchase its eight vessel fleet made by the Banco Cubano del Commercio Exterior, Cuba's foreign trade bank, has been accepted. The purchase price is $2,800,000.

The ships will be operating under Cuban registry by Flota Maritima Browning De Cuba, a Havana shipping firm, which already has a contract with the bank to operate six other ships now being constructed for Caribbean service. The firm plans to place the eight C.N.S.S. vessels in service as soon as possible between Canada, Cuba and the West Indies, using the ports of Halifax and Montreal.

The sale agreement will be signed by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited and Banco Cubano del Commercio Exterior, a subsidiary of Cuba's state-owned national bank, Banco Nacional de Cuba. The approval of the shareholders of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited has been provided by the governor in council, acting in the capacity of majority shareholder of the company.

In addition to the foregoing announcement, I wish to inform the house that the offer accepted was by far the best of any of the purchase offers submitted. Seven purchase offers were submitted for the entire fleet, while some nine others involved a purchase of a part only of the fleet. The offer accepted was not only the highest offer but the only offer providing sound security for the balance of the purchase price.

May I also inform the house that all the officers of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited were offered transfer and employment in the marine services of the Department of Transport. A few decided to retire because they were eligible to accept retirement, and a few decided to accept other offers of employment. The others are now employed in my department's marine operations. The pension rights of all concerned have been protected.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give any indication—perhaps he did in his statement, which I was not able to follow—where these ships will be operated by the new purchaser?

Mr. Hees: They will operate between the West Indies, Cuba, the Caribbean area and Canada, using the ports of Halifax and Montreal.

Mr. Chevrier: What are the terms of purchase?

Mr. Hees: The terms are payment of 20 per cent now and the remainder in five equal yearly payments, which are guaranteed by the Bank of America.

Mr. Chevrier: Does this mean that the minister has presided over the liquidation of the Canadian merchant fleet?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker. The minister has simply made an announcement of a transaction which has been successfully and well completed by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that the Canadian government is giving consideration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether hon. members would defer their questions until the orders of the day.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): A question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister inform the house about the condition of the ships whose sale he has just announced and where they will, perhaps, be spruced up?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the ships will require a certain amount of reconditioning before they are fit for service, and I have asked the management of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited to ask the new owners if they will give every consideration to having the reconditioning done in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport the following question. In view of the fact that the Canadian maritime commission has recommended that the size of the Canadian ocean-going fleet should at no time be less than 750,000 deadweight tons and since the sale which was announced this morning reduces it to less than one-third of that figure, what does the government propose to do about restoring the fleet to the size recommended by the Canadian maritime commission?

Mr. Hees: As the hon. member knows very well, all possible considerations were taken into account in trying to keep this fleet intact and operating under Canadian registry. Unfortunately it was found impossible to do so, and it was therefore found necessary to dispose of the fleet.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that the minister said consideration has been given to every aspect of this problem, I wonder whether, before arriving at this decision, he consulted with the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the proposal that is being made for a ship to be provided by Canada to the West Indies federation for interisland service under a principle analogous to the Colombo plan, which is being considered by the Department of External Affairs; or was the minister not aware of this consideration that was being given by the other department?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member was not in the house when those questions were asked on, I think, at least two former occasions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was.

Mr. Hees: And on both occasions I replied that this matter had been taken up with the West Indies federation. The ships belonging to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships were not suitable for their purpose.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the minister seen the evidence of the recent meeting of the external affairs committee where it was suggested that possibly that was not the case?

Mr. Hees: I have not read that evidence, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed another question on this subject and if the minister has not the information at hand perhaps he can give it to the house at a later date. I was wondering how many officers and men on these eight ships will be affected by the sale, and how many of them have found employment in the Department of Transport, as he suggested?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have not the exact figures here; I do not think the hon. member would expect me to have them. As I outlined to him, everyone who did not wish to retire or take employment elsewhere is now in the employment of the Department of Transport. If he wants the exact numbers, and they are of some significance to him, I shall be glad to give them to him privately.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: I did indicate to the minister—perhaps he did not hear me—that this information may not be available to him at the present time, but I would like to get the exact number.

Mr. Hees: I shall be glad to get that information for the hon. member.

ROYAL VISIT

PRINCESS MARGARET—MESSAGE ON DEPARTURE FROM CANADA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will be interested in the following message which I received this morning from Her Royal Highness the Princess Margaret. It reads as follows:

> Thank you so much for very kind message on my departure from Canada. I am filled with sadness at having to leave after the most exciting and enjoyable month visit to your great country. I was deeply moved by the wonderful reception I was given everywhere I went and by the unfailing kindness of everyone I met during my tour. Please pass on my most sincere thanks to all who contributed in any way towards the successful organization of my visit. I am delighted and proud, Mr. Prime Minister, that the principal mountain range on Axel Heiberg isle is to bear my name. I am delighted with this and it sets the seal on a visit which I shall never forget for its happiness and interest.
> Margaret

With regard to the naming of the mountain range, I may say that the geological survey of Canada, which is now working on a survey of the far north, advised that a name was needed for the principal range of mountains which form the backbone of Axel Heiberg island, the large island immediately west of Ellesmere island. This mountain range is the principal feature of the Queen Elizabeth islands and forms the larger part of that island. It was with pleasure that my colleagues and I decided that the visit of Her Royal Highness could best be commemorated permanently by naming that mountain range the Princess Margaret range.

I think I can add, with the approval of members in all parts of the house, that the visit of Her Royal Highness endeared her everywhere, and that the broadcast last night over television and radio was deeply appreciated by Canadians and touched a chord in their hearts in their regard for the royal family.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S.—PROPOSED JOINT CONGRESSIONAL-PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I should like to refer to a matter that has received consideration generally in the house. During the past several months discussions have taken place, both here and in the United States, respecting a means of providing an opportunity from time to time for those who are engaged in the legislative aspects of government in the two countries to meet together and examine common problems, to exchange views and possibly make suggestions to their respective governments arising from these deliberations.

It is my understanding that action in this regard is going forward in the houses of the United States congress with evident support from all shades of political opinion. I have here the Congressional Record of July 17 containing a speech by United States Senator Neuberger with respect to this matter and the resolution which he introduced. This resolution provides for close relationship between the legislators of both countries, and section 7 says:

> This resolution shall become effective, and a joint committee established, upon receipt by the president of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of notification that a committee with similar functions and terms of reference has been established by the Canadian parliament.

It appears from the record that the proposals had the approval of the executive of the United States and of the President, who under the constitution is responsible for the conduct of foreign affairs.

I have been informed that in this country consideration has been given to this matter in the other place, and that a motion of this nature has there been looked upon favourably. I am not going to quote the resolution that was passed, except to say that it welcomed the recent suggestion of the Prime Minister of Canada for the establishment of joint parliamentary committees between Canada and the United States, and the opinion was that if such a committee were set up it would be of great benefit in improving relations between the two countries. The other place offered its co-operation toward this end.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) both indicated on August 8 that they would give support to proposals along these lines. This morning I consulted with each of them by telephone, and it is my understanding that they are in accord with the procedure I am about to propose. If the house generally indicates its agreement, I would suggest that we proceed along the following lines.

My proposal is that I should request the Speaker of this honourable house, in consultation with his colleague in the other place, to establish a committee of members of both houses and of all parties for the purpose of exploring jointly with appropriate representatives of the executive and legislative branches of the government of the United States the means whereby increased systematic discussions between legislators of the two countries on problems of common concern may be provided.

I would suggest that such assistance as may be appropriate and required for the purpose of implementing this proposal, if generally acceptable to this house, should be provided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) from his department, with co-operation from other departments of government as may be needed from time to time.

I feel that if this general proposal is accepted we shall be making an advance that will prove beneficial not only to the exchange of ideas as between legislators of our countries, but also that in their deliberations suggestions will be forthcoming which will be generally helpful and will assure that the best of relations continue in the years to come.

This is the first time that anything of this nature has come before this house in so concrete a form. I hope it will receive support. The other day when I was speaking I mentioned the occasion in 1942 when representatives of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States met here in room 16. It was the first time representatives of the United States had been present at a meeting of the Empire Parliamentary Association, as it was then known. The hon. member for Laurier will remember very well the deliberations that took place at that time and the extent to which, out of the community of counsel, agreements in principle as to courses generally beneficial to both countries and also to the commonwealth as a whole were arrived at.

Subsequently the hon. member for Laurier, Mr. M. J. Coldwell, Senator Vien and I went to Washington and there met with representatives of congress for a couple of days. Those were the first occasions on which the United States had at any time had representatives of congress meeting, as I said, with either Canadian legislators or representatives of the commonwealth. This course has since been followed to the manifest appreciation of those who have belonged to the several delegations, and also to the material benefit of our relations.

Canada-U.S. Joint Committee

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before saying a word about the important matter which the Prime Minister mentioned in concluding part of his statement, may I just say this with regard to the visit of Princess Margaret. I am sure that members of the house will have heard with great satisfaction the message she has sent. I can only add that I hope she derived as much pleasure out of her visit to Canada as those who had the honour and the privilege of meeting her derived from that meeting.

The decision of the government to name a mountain range after her was original and imaginative. Judging from Her Royal Highness's message, the fact that the mountain range is on Axel Heiberg island, which is some distance from the more settled parts of Canada, does not seem to have interfered with her appreciation of that unique distinction.

So far as the important statement made by the Prime Minister regarding what I hope will be the establishment on a continuing basis of contacts between the legislators of the United States and Canada is concerned, I might say that we in this party most warmly support such a move. I have personally felt for some time that the official contacts which have now been well established for many years on the executive and diplomatic levels between the two governments should be supplemented, although they could not of course be replaced, by this kind of joint legislative committee. That this should be done is particularly important, though it may add to our difficulties because of the fact that under the constitution of the United States the legislative branch does play a very important part within that country in a rather different way from that played by the parliament of Canada with respect to the development of foreign policy, in that in the United States the role of the legislative branch is almost, although not completely, an independent one.

I have found from personal experience in that field that the contacts between our two countries on the diplomatic and executive levels are not adequate to meet all the problems involved in relations between us. At the same time this will have to be worked out very carefully, because our formal and regular contacts will remain those between the executive branches and through the diplomatic channels of our two countries. I have also had some reason as a result of personal experience in this connection to appreciate the fact that in Washington efforts made on the diplomatic level to establish regular and more or less formal contacts with congress sometimes meet with a little suspicion from other branches of government.

However, the Prime Minister has put forward proposals which would be very helpful in reaching this very important end. We think they are practical proposals for getting a start made on the Canadian side and, as I have said, we warmly support them.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On behalf of this group, Mr. Speaker, and in response to the gracious message of the princess which was read by the Prime Minister, I want to say that we in the C.C.F. realize that the princess brought much happiness to many Canadians in her visit to Canada, a visit which was carried out with such charm, such distinction and such grace. We are also very pleased to hear that the government has decided to name a range of mountains in the Arctic after this most distinguished citizen of our commonwealth.

The leader of this group will deal with the other question raised by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was kind and considerate enough to telephone me this morning with regard to the resolution he has placed before the house. I want to say that the C.C.F. are very pleased that this move is being made. We feel that such a joint committee representative of both houses of parliament and, as the Prime Minister has said, representative of the executive and the congress of the United States is something that could achieve very great things for both our countries. We feel that in the matters of trade, tariffs and export policies generally there is room for discussion; we believe that from those discussions might come subsequent agreements which could result in the freeing of trade and an increase in the standards of living of both our peoples.

In respect to international affairs generally, we in this group have very often felt that we could not wholeheartedly follow the leadership, in certain instances, given to the western world by the United States. We realize, too, that the Canadian government very often questions some of the moves that are made in Washington. I am certain that this type of prior consultation will result in a more forward look and a more realistic policy being adopted by both our countries. We have had joint associations in the past which continue today; for example, the commonwealth parliamentary associations and the association of the members of the various parliaments connected with NATO. Now we have this further advance, and with you taking the leadership, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the House of Commons, we are certain that the results will be excellent and that this committee will be well launched.

If I may say so at this time, I hope similar committees may be set up in the future for an interchange of representatives with other major powers in the world. Even though we may disagree, as we do very violently, with policies that are adopted by countries outside the western world, nevertheless this kind of interchange of ideas among people who are acquainted with governments and, in our instance, people who are responsible in our democratic nations, could do nothing but good.

We welcome this motion wholeheartedly and I am sure that in the country, as in this house, it will receive the overwhelming support of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the next item I take it that the Prime Minister does not propose any more formal testing of the opinion of the house than the proposal he has made, which has been concurred in unanimously by the leaders of the parties. I believe that he and they have expressed the unanimous view of the house in this matter.

COMMUNIST CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO SEATING AT UNITED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I wonder whether I may ask this question of the Prime Minister. In the light of the growing influence of red China in international affairs and the apparent increase in support in the United Nations for the seating of red China at the general assembly, can the Prime Minister say whether any consideration has been given to Canada's policy in regard to China, particularly in regard to the seating of red China at the United Nations assembly?

Mr. Speaker: Of course, if the Prime Minister wishes to accept the question I have no objection, but I would point out that this is a question which has been raised from time to time, and it is a matter of policy which I assume the government, when it came to a conclusion, would announce.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on that point this, of course, is a matter of urgency in view of the fact that the United Nations assembly will be meeting tomorrow and this may be the first item on the agenda.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition answered the hon. member for Assiniboia. It is a hypothetical question. It is only anticipation, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, and certainly in these circumstances it has not yet become a matter that should be the subject of a question on the orders of the day.

COAL

DOMINION COAL COMPANY SURPLUS—TABLING OF PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the information requested by the hon. member for Villeneuve on August 6 with regard to the Dominion Coal Company.

ATOMIC ENERGY

U.S.-CANADA—EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION FOR MUTUAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether any negotiations have been initiated or are contemplated with the United States government with regard to the exchange of information on atomic matters for mutual defence.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): There have been departmental discussions on this matter, and any exchange has been made on a "need to know" basis.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question arising out of the reply he gave me a few minutes ago. In view of the fact that any exchange of atomic information on defence will be subject, I assume, to the limitations of the United States atomic energy act, is the government negotiating an agreement under that act which will remove those limitations in so far as exchange of information on defensive tactical military weapons is concerned?

Mr. Pearkes: The government is not negotiating any such agreement at the present time.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—REQUEST FOR FURTHER REPORTS ON DEATHS AT GARRY LAKE, N.W.T.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the Royal Canadian Air Force headquarters in Ottawa received reports from Royal Canadian Air Force personnel based at Fort Churchill in regard to trips made by the R.C.A.F. to Garry lake in the Northwest Territories on March 22 and May 6 of this year? If so, will the minister table the reports?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it would be only routine reports which have been received. There was a trip made on March 22 in response to a request from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. An Otter aircraft flew with blood plasma to Chesterfield inlet, where there was a seriously ill native, and subsequently to Baker Lake, where it picked up a Royal Canadian Mounted Police constable and a quantity of food for transportation to Garry lake, and from Garry lake the aircraft returned to Fort Churchill. This is the sort of work the R.C.A.F. are doing continually, and they do not submit any definite report on each trip made.

[Later:]

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Justice in a position to answer the question I asked him on Saturday last?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me on Saturday whether the Minister of Justice had received reports from the R.C.M.P. in the field at Baker Lake in regard to the starvation of Eskimos at Garry lake.

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police advises me that he has received a number of reports from the non-commissioned officer in charge at Baker Lake concerning this matter. The reports, however, are in the nature of routine reports from a junior officer to his senior, and as such are not the type of reports which it is normal to produce in the house. They are administrative reports.

It is my understanding, however, and I am having this checked, that there is nothing in the reports that would add to or detract in any way from the evidence given by the R.C.M.P. at the coroner's inquest, which was discussed here on the estimates of my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on Saturday last.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STELCO—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN STRIKE SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I know this is a matter primarily under provincial jurisdiction, but I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has been asked to take part in negotiations for the settlement of the Stelco strike?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, and I do not expect I will be asked.

FRUIT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is what I would call a spur of the moment question I have not had the opportunity to send the minister notice, but I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of his statement in the house to the effect that he would make an announcement with respect to deficiency payments for the British Columbia tree fruits crop year 1957, can the minister say whether the statement in the press this morning with respect to that question was made by him, and where?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, I think, statements as to payments being made under the stabilization act are made by the stabilization board, and they issued a statement yesterday in connection with the payments to be made as far as British Columbia apples are concerned.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION ON WESTERN REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is in a position to say if the government has yet reached a decision to grant deficiency payments to farmers as requested by the interprovincial farm union?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is the same question that has been asked here on numerous occasions, and I can only give the same answer. This is a matter which is still under consideration, and when it has been decided an announcement will be made.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF ATOMIC POWERED ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Transport bring the house up to date on his department's consideration of the possible use of atomic powered icebreakers?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. The matter of utilizing atomic power for icebreaking is and has been under active consideration by the Department of Transport since I first announced this last January. A committee was set up to review progress in this field in other countries and also progress made by Canadian commercial companies. Positive progress has been made in line with the desire of the government to achieve nuclear powered icebreakers for Canada without spending millions of dollars to duplicate research in this field otherwise available to us. The government is fully aware of the value of this new form of ship propulsion for the development of our Arctic region.

ESTATE TAX ACT

NEW BASIS FOR ASSESSMENT OF SUCCESSION DUTIES

The house resumed, from Wednesday, August 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-37, respecting the taxation of estates—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we did not get very far when the committee last considered this bill. That was on August 6, and the debate can be found on pages 3166 and 3167 of Hansard. It makes it difficult when one's remarks are interrupted, particularly at this stage of the game when it is the desire of all, I think, to avoid repetition. I do not want to repeat the remarks I made then. I did say that we had before us, as I think all will admit, a better bill than Bill No. 248 introduced at the last session, which was made available to the public for criticism. It just goes to show that advice from outside bodies and members of the general public expert in the fields of law and accountancy is of considerable value.

The bill was discussed in the standing committee on banking and commerce, and I think there will also be agreement that the amendments now before us and which will be moved as we proceed, particularly two of them, greatly improve the bill. However, I said in the committee and previously in this debate that the bill could still be improved. Of course that is true of all legislation, but I felt that this bill particularly could be improved if it were to be examined by the same people who commented on Bill No. 248 of last session, and that it would have helped us if we had received their comments before we were forced to hurry along with the consideration of the bill in the banking and commerce committee.

The house knows, of course, that the bill will now pass to the Senate, and I have no doubt that the Senate will refer the bill to its committee on banking and commerce. If outside organizations want to make representations I hope that committee will not deny them the opportunity. Therefore there is still the prospect that further recommendations concerning the bill may reach this house.

Since the banking and commerce committee concluded its consideration of the bill I believe we have all received a brief from the Canadian federation of university women. I told our banking and commerce committee that it was obvious that these people would like to make representations. They have taken a great interest in estates legislation over the years. I told the committee that the Ottawa officers just happened to be on vacation during the two or three days when we were having double sittings of the committee with respect to the bill, and that I quite believed they were not aware that we were sitting.

This particular brief brings some very important points to our attention, matters that have greatly exercised the women of the land with respect to estates for some years. Of course they readily agree that speedier and less expensive appeal procedures before the income tax appeal board will likely contribute to the settlement of estates within a shorter period of time. They also indicate that some simplification in the assessment of tax will make it possible for estates to be settled and distribution to be made much earlier than was possible under the succession duty act; but they still point out that the fundamental effort they have had in mind over the years is not given much recognition in the bill.

I should like to quote one or two excerpts from their brief. The Canadian federation of university women have this to say:

> We are distressed to note that in spite of repeated submissions by thousands of Canadian women, no recognition has yet been made of the marriage partnership. We reiterate that "one-half of a deceased marriage partner's estate should, if it passes to the surviving partner, be considered for tax purposes as earned by the surviving partner and not therefore subject to estate taxation."

They go on to say with respect to this point:

> Today the number of working wives is constantly increasing. These women contribute, in dollars and cents as well, to an estate which is still considered for purposes of taxation as belonging solely to the husband. Of course a few of these women are interested in building estates of their own and keep their earnings separate for that purpose, but the large majority feel, and rightly so, that such an accounting negatives the partnership in which they are proud to participate.

They go on to refer to some of the new provisions with respect to exemptions, as have many of the bodies that have made representations. They even champion the position of the widower. They say:

> Under Bill C-37 an exemption of $60,000 is allowed in the case of a deceased male person survived by a spouse. For the exemption of $60,000 to apply, however, in the case of a deceased female person survived by a spouse that husband must not only be infirm but the deceased must also leave a dependent child.
> This provision, of course, again denies the principle of equality in the marriage partnership—a principle which must work both ways. We are also at a loss to know how the placing of an invalid husband in a worse position than a healthy wife can be justified on any grounds whatsoever.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman reading the brief to indicate his support of it, and does he in fact, support the representations therein made?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, and when we come to the clause in relation to fair value I thought I might further expand my reasons for supporting it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does that include all paragraphs of the brief my friend has read?

Mr. Benidickson: In addition, I believe further consideration should be given to this very important matter because, of course, it is the practice in the country to the south of us, the United States.

Only two or three days ago, I believe, the Canadian tax foundation sent out its printed comments with respect to this bill. I gave the banking and commerce committee some excerpts from what was likely to be in that publication. Again intending to be brief, I should like to quote the final paragraph of the report of the Canadian tax foundation to its membership who, of course, are lawyers and accountants who specialize in that field of taxation. These are the concluding comments of the Canadian tax foundation with respect to this bill, and I quote:

> Scattered throughout the above description are indications that certain of the provisions of Bill 248 against which strong representations were made remain unchanged in Bill C-37. Many important concessions were granted but several points of grievance remain. To sum up, these include:
> 1. Inclusion of foreign real estate.
> 2. Taxation of death benefits, pensions and annuities under both estate tax and income tax.
> 3. Rules of situs which in some instances conflict with common law principles.
> 4. In the case of valuation the provisions that no account shall be taken of future income tax liability and the general rule that the property shall be valued only at the time of death.
> 5. The period during which tax may be paid on an annuity or interest in expectancy, which remains at six years, nor is there any change made in the establishing of tax liability under these conditions.

The study concludes with, I think, these prophetic words:

> These and other omissions suggest that the Minister of Finance will continue to receive representations for changes in his new measure long after it has become the law of the land.

I have some further remarks, of course, to make as we reach the various clauses of the bill. I do, however, want to co-operate with the committee and not unduly prolong its consideration of these matters at this time, first because the minutes of the banking and commerce committee are available to all where this bill was given clause by clause study by the members who sat on that committee; second because I realize that the Senate committee also will have an opportunity to consider the bill. I assume they will do so shortly and I have every confidence that if members of national organizations having an interest in this legislation wish to appear before the Senate committee that committee will not refuse them this opportunity.

Mr. Godin: It may appear proper that another lawyer should follow the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in saying a word on this very important bill now before the committee concerning the difficult position and the rights of widows and orphans. Some of my remarks may pertain to the problems and rights of widowers, although I realize that this matter may more properly have been discussed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who has just left the chamber.

There is no doubt that the principle underlying the amendments brought forth by the committee is to increase certain exemptions for certain classes of people, and second to pay some attention to the problem with which the administration is faced in connection with the rights of the widow or widower in certain properties of the deceased spouse. I feel, in connection with both these matters, that although it may be true that the problems of devolution and benefits accruing to beneficiaries are more properly within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and no doubt the provinces have enacted certain laws to protect beneficiaries so far as devolution and distribution are concerned, such as the devolution act and the dependents' relief act, here we are interested in the taxation of these properties as they evolve in the death of one spouse.

I feel that the amendments quite clearly signify the protection this government no doubt wants to bring about so far as the unity of marriage and the values of ownership which spouses may have in the property they own in this country are concerned. I am very surprised to realize that in increasing the exemption for the widow to $60,000, no reference is made to a widow who receives this property or the benefit of the goods left by the deceased husband. The amendment to clause 7 more specifically refers to the fact that it is the wish of this government that everyone should receive a benefit if he is a beneficiary, whether or not he is a spouse of the deceased person. I feel this brings about a situation whereby the government may lose certain taxes where the exemption is not properly or should not be properly admitted.

For instance, this brings about a situation whereby a man who has been separated from his wife for years may die and under his will may give the major portion of his estate to a total stranger. The stranger would receive the benefit of the exemption, whereas no doubt the intention is that the widow should receive the exemption. I feel that if the act were amended to grant the exception only in those cases in which there is a widow and dependent children, that would be more satisfactory and more in line with the wishes of the citizens of this country.

However, it may be said that there is some attempt to find a better solution to the problem of the difficulty, after the death of one spouse, of ascertaining just what was his property and what part of the assets may properly be the property of the surviving spouse. It is true that the wording has been changed to a certain extent but I do honestly feel, Mr. Chairman, that the change does not go far enough to protect the partnership which is created by marriage.

I feel that possibly in the smaller estates this problem arises more specifically. I read a short time ago comments to the effect that the increase now granted in the exemption, though it may affect 35 per cent of the estates, will reduce the income to the government by barely 6 per cent. It is true that in smaller estates the attention required is not given by the husband or the wife to the problems which may occur after their death. In recognition of the rights of the remaining spouse in the property left by one who dies, I would suggest that possibly in estates of $100,000 and less, half be automatically considered as the property of the surviving spouse, thereby bringing about a proper and true exemption.

I should like to say one word on another matter, namely the exemption permitted for the benefit of surviving children. I feel that this brings about a problem where a father dies leaving very young children. It is true that the act provides certain exemptions of up to $15,000 per child, but it states that all that is considered by the department is the fact that the child is under 21 years of age. In other words, the exemption is the same for a father who leaves three children ranging from say 16 years of age to 20 years of age and a father leaving three children whose ages range from 2 years to 5 years.

I feel that necessarily as this exemption is given to help overcome the burden of bringing up the children who are left fatherless, the exemption should vary and be increased as the age of the surviving children decreases. In other words there should be a scale whereby if a man dies leaving children who are very young, the exemption will be greater than in the case where the children may be requiring some assistance for a year or two only before they mature.

Although the act brings about certain assistance which the citizens necessarily require, I feel that in its essence and principle it does not pay enough attention to the partnership which is created by marriage. In the second place, I think it is wrong in the sense that the government will be losing the benefit of taxes in those cases where all the benefits of an estate may go to strangers although a wife may survive the deceased.

I mentioned earlier that possibly there is no real principle whereby a surviving husband should benefit from the exemptions only if he is infirm or an invalid. It seems to me that there is no justification for this limitation, though I realize that it may not be the most important of my comments. I feel that the act should pay greater attention to the ownership of the assets of a married couple upon death, especially with the full intention of assisting the smaller estates where often the people concerned do not pay all the attention which may be required to provide for the future if some misfortune should happen in the family. Also I feel that greater exemptions should be given to these very young children who are left without fathers early in life.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Persons domiciled in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: I simply want to point out that, as the minutes of course elaborate, we have heard much of some of the reductions in taxation, particularly as to the foreign real estate item. Under this clause and clause 3 certain types of property which had hitherto escaped succession duty or estates taxation now come under taxation.

Clause agreed to.

Estate Tax Act

On clause 3—Property included.

Mr. Benidickson: I should also like to point out that I think this clause is much improved as a result of the reconsideration by the government of the briefs that were given to it by some of those national organizations of which I spoke earlier. In Bill No. 248 there was indication of an intention to tax certain forms of disposition that have occurred longer than three years from the date of death. However, much of this, in fact probably all of it, has now been altered.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is an extremely complicated bill, as you know. Each clause has a number of paragraphs and those paragraphs in turn have subparagraphs. Clause 3 (1) has subparagraphs numbered from (a) to (m). I wanted to make a comment—but I had to turn the page—with respect to clause 3 (1) (1). This provision again is taxing something that hitherto had not been taxable under estates taxation. I referred to this matter in the committee. I still think this voluntary gift by an employer to a dependent of a deceased is something which it is extremely difficult to justify taxing. This is a class of property to which the deceased had no right. The estate could not claim anything against the employer. I do not see how something of that nature can be considered to be part of an estate. As such a contribution or receipt on the part of a dependent would be open to income tax, it seems to me that is a quite adequate tax under the circumstances.

Mr. Hanbidge: To what section is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Benidickson: That was clause 3 (1) (1), subparagraph (i):

> under any disposition made voluntarily in recognition of services rendered by the deceased as an employee of that person—

In other words, it is something that not he nor the estate nor his dependents have any right to claim in a legal way, and I just do not see how that can be considered to be part of an estate.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend will appreciate the great difficulty that will arise if such a provision is not contained in the act. We have had a similar provision in the Dominion Succession Duty Act, in the old clause 3 (1) (g). This is not a new principle. It is a matter of trying to carry a principle to its logical conclusion, and also to close what is an obvious loophole in the existing legislation.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Benidickson: This is a new form of tax. You did, of course, tax receipts by dependants, widows or children, which were in the nature of fringe benefits, something the deceased himself knew he was entitled to from his employer. When that benefit is received the recipient pays on it not only income tax but an estate tax. Sometimes, as we discussed in the committee, this payment involves considerable hardship. I know the difficulty of the minister where it is a pension that a man has made part of his contract of employment, but this particular death benefit is completely voluntary on the part of the employer after death. This one is completely voluntary, and there is no right of action with respect to it. I just do not see, therefor, that it is the property of the deceased.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Property not included.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I realize that it will take longer, but I wonder if you could follow through this bill by quoting the subheadings when we come to a long section such as clause 3. Would the committee not agree to say clause 3, subparagraph 1, subparagraph 2, and so on.

The Chairman: Is it agreed by the committee that I quote paragraph by paragraph and subparagraph by subparagraph?

Mr. Benidickson: In fact, Mr. Chairman, each of these items indicated by letters are sufficiently important to almost justify your calling (p), (q), and so on. We will go through them very rapidly, but I think there would be less attempt made to go back and less feeling of frustration if you were to go down the page and simply call major headings, paragraph 3, subclause 2, and then (a), (b), (c), (d), and so on.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the house to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it that my hon. friend is confining his suggestion to the long clauses and not clauses such as Nos. 5 and 6.

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 7—Amounts deductible in computing aggregate taxable value.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I have already indicated that subclause 1 of clause 7 is the clause which has elicited a great deal of interest by the public, and this is the clause to which the women of our land have perhaps directed most attention in their briefs.

Since the banking and commerce committee concluded its sittings I have received additional communications about this matter as to what is a proper value. I realize this is a very difficult decision for the administration. There is an increase, but it must be pointed out that when the exemption of $50,000 was determined it was as far back as 1951, and there has, of course, been a considerable erosion in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar since that time.

One must also consider that today, even at a period when interest levels are comparatively high, the income of a widow who has been left $100,000 is not very substantial. I was given some illustrations of what, under present day circumstances with these relatively high interest rates, would be the return upon an estate of $100,000 and upon one of $150,000. I have in my hand one figure calculated by an experienced trust officer whom I do not wish to name, unless my hon. friend insists upon my doing so, because he is speaking in his personal capacity and not for the company he represents. He points out, however, that if one takes a typical estate trust of $100,000, let us say that the residence value amounted to $15,000 and the value of the car perhaps to $2,000, the value of the furniture to $1,000; then that is $18,000 off the $100,000. The funds available for investment, therefore, would be $72,000.

He outlined to me what I believe to be a normal and very creditable portfolio of securities, which he said the trust company had already used for purposes of investment. I will not go into the details, but he ends up by saying that $72,000 invested in bonds at relatively high rates today would bring in a gross income of $3,689. He tells me that administration and collection charges of the trust company would amount to $328, and the difference, therefore, would be $3,361. He estimated the income tax at $114, so the disposable income from this $100,000 would be $3,246 or $270 a month. He pointed out that this was not something which should be regarded as great wealth or high income for a widow trying to maintain a home in these days. Therefore, while the exemptions admittedly have been raised, there is justification for giving further thought to doing something better in the very near future with respect to these exemptions.

The committee may be interested to know that only about 1 per cent of our national revenue comes from this sort of taxation. This same informant has done some further arithmetic for me, as a result of which he makes the assertion that if there were an exemption of even up to $150,000 for all estates the loss of revenue would be only one quarter of that 1 per cent which I indicated was received from this form of taxation. He stated further that if we exempted all estates below $100,000 the government would lose only 15 per cent of the 1 per cent indicated as received from estate duties.

Consequently one must consider the importance of this form of taxation in the lower brackets to the total receipts by the government and the desirability of giving further consideration to these exemptions because of the relatively small income which can be produced today by normal investment—not necessarily cautious investment, but normal investment for an estate of either $100,000 or $150,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I think many a Canadian man and woman, especially husbands and wives, will have reason to complain about clause 7, as any testator, or a husband or wife but especially a testator, may will a large portion of his or her fortune and property to a perfect stranger who will nevertheless benefit from the exemption of $60,000, though the wife survive. If the husband survives—I am thinking here of paragraph (a) (ii)—the wife may leave her property to a stranger, and that stranger will nevertheless benefit from the exemption.

I realize, as the minister stated at the committee on banking and commerce, that this is contrary to the spirit of the tax on the bulk of the succession. But the fact remains, and should be kept in mind, that the family is the basic unit of our Canadian economy.

I think husbands and wives in this country will not like this clause, in its present form. I therefore suggest that some time, if not at this session at least during some future one, the government consider the advisability of setting this matter right.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have just a brief word to say in connection with the remarks which have been delivered by the two hon. gentlemen who spoke last.

It may well be that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and I do not mean quite the same thing when we talk about estates of smaller value. He seems to argue that the benefits of this bill should be more widely extended and that there is room for further extension within estates of smaller value. Mr. Chairman, this bill brings benefits to estates of smaller value on a scale not matched by any previous legislation enacted in this parliament. When the Dominion Succession Duty Act was enacted in 1941 it exempted estates of $5,000, and there was provision for further exemption in cases where a widow survived. In 1948 provision was made for exempting an estate up to $50,000; not a provision that there should be a $50,000 exemption on all estates, but that all estates under $50,000 should be exempt.

This bill goes much further in extending the principle of exemption. In the first place, it carries forward the provision that no estate under $50,000 will be taxed. Now there is also provision in connection with estates up to $53,056, as will be seen on page 14. This bill clearly retains the principle that no estate up to $50,000 will bear any tax at all. Quite apart from this, we have also introduced exemptions that apply to all estates. There is a basic exemption of $40,000 for every estate. That is new. There is a basic exemption of $60,000 in every estate where the deceased is a man survived by his widow, and the same exemption applies where the deceased person is the widow and the surviving husband is infirm, that is, unable to pursue normally a gainful occupation and where there is a dependent child.

There are also here provisions for additional exemptions in the case of dependent children—$10,000 for every dependent child —and, where the child is an orphan, $15,000. These are substantial exemptions, and there can be no doubt that this bill does bring very great benefits to all estates of smaller value.

I have earlier given an instance of the estate left by a deceased person with a surviving widow and four dependent children. Of that estate $100,000 will be exempt under this bill, a clear exemption of $100,000, and there has been nothing in previous legislation which it is possible to compare with that. It is because of provisions such as this that the Canadian Tax Journal, at page 269 of its issue, to which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred earlier, has said of the changes we have made as compared with the old Bill 248:

> Several of the changes go to the fundamentals of death taxation and are more sweeping in their effect than most of the innovations in the first measure. On the whole the taxpayer has come off quite well. Of a dozen or so major changes most are to his advantage.

In Bill 248 introduced last session the basic exemption provided was $30,000. That has been increased under this bill to $40,000. It will therefore be seen that provision has been made to lighten the burden of estate taxation on anything which could reasonably be called a small or smaller estate.

As to the remarks of the hon. member for Megantic, let me say this. We have in this measure strictly respected the constitutional jurisdiction and the constitutional preserves of the provinces, and we have not trespassed on the field of property and civil rights in the provinces, which is exclusively assigned by the constitution to the legislatures of the provinces. The law of succession is strictly provincial in its constitutional incidence, and there is ample opportunity for the provinces to exercise such jurisdiction, and in most cases they have done so, and make such provision as is required in favour of the widow.

We merely make provision for this tax exemption, and it remains within the jurisdiction of the provinces to see to it, by whatever laws they choose to enact, that the claims of the widow in such an estate are provided for. If the will does not make adequate provision for her, there is nothing to prevent a province from passing legislation to override the terms of the will, making adequate provision for the widow. Indeed, many of the provinces have done so; and there is, as well, legislation dealing with the devolution of estates of intestate persons where provision for the widow is earmarked by statute.

In this bill we have in this respect simply recognized the constitutional rights of the provinces, and within that principle we have applied the principle of the estate tax.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister makes reference to the province of Quebec. I have, of course, no intimate knowledge of the law in that province, but it is a fact that if the spouses held community property in that province half of the estate of the deceased spouse would be considered as belonging to the survivor and would not be subject to tax under this bill, regardless of its size.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The law in this respect recognizes the legal results of the acts of the parties. In the case the hon. gentleman has cited, the parties themselves have entered into a contract the effect of which is to create community of property. Now, there is nothing in the common law of the other nine provinces which would prevent spouses from creating community of property if they so chose and so acted. But, equally, there is nothing here which imposes upon or creates, in the absence of an act by the parties themselves, a community of property which is not created by the provincial law, and that is the essential difference.

We have gone further in this bill than federal legislation has ever gone before in permitting the creation of joint tenancies, the holding of property in joint tenancies, that will be exempt, providing the gift in joint tenancy on the part of the husband was made more than three years before the date of death. This bill is much more generous to the taxpayer in this case than the Dominion Succession Duty Act has ever been, and if any spouses in any of the provinces of Canada, whether common law provinces or the civil law provinces, choose to create community of property between them as to all their property or as to any specific portion of it, this bill will take account of that legal fact. But it leaves it for the parties to create that result, and does not by this measure attempt to create it. We believe that there would otherwise be a trespass on the jurisdiction of the provinces over property and civil rights.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend has referred to contracts entered into to establish community of property in a province other than Quebec, but if that was done, and the source of funds belonged to only one spouse and the contract was entered into within three years of death, the same exemption would not apply with respect to half the estate, would it? In addition, if a contract of that kind with respect to community of property were entered into, and it was of a substantial amount and was solely that of one spouse, the income tax people would want a gift tax with respect to the gift of half, would they not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend knows we have gone some distance in an amendment to the Income Tax Act this year in exempting gifts made by a spouse to his wife where the gift is of an interest in the home they occupy.

Now, as to the estate tax, Mr. Chairman, the only limitation that is placed upon the right to create the joint tenancy and to exempt property thereby created from the estate tax is the three-year rule. So far as it is a gift, then the gift must take place more than three years prior to death in order to give rise to the exemption.

Mr. Benidickson: In a province other than Quebec, but in Quebec the establishment of the community of property does not have to take place within three years of death?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In that case there is not a gift.

Mr. Godin: I followed very carefully the remarks of the Minister of Finance. I do not think his remarks replied to the problems which were presented by the hon. member for Megantic and myself. It is true the devolution of property is a provincial matter. Relief assistance is also a provincial matter. We are here taxing estates in various provinces of Canada, and we do feel it is right to do so, and in doing so we are bringing about certain exemptions which we also feel it is our right and duty to do.

Now, the step the government is failing to take is to bring about a measure of understanding that those exemptions will be applied in a satisfactory manner, and that is the complaint I have to make and undoubtedly the hon. member for Megantic has to make. The Minister of Finance seemed to suggest that we will indicate exemptions, but we will leave it to the provinces to deal with them as they see fit under their own laws. The contention of myself and of the opposition is that in granting exemptions we do not take into consideration certain benefits which no doubt it is not the intention of the government to grant.

An example has been given, but the minister has not explained why this government should grant an exemption of $60,000 to a total stranger just because a man died leaving a wife who was practically unknown to him, and who was possibly presently living in Vancouver while the man lived in Ontario, say. That is the purpose of the amendment of clause 7, and it is difficult for the opposition to see the value in it, and why the government should take on itself the responsibility of granting exemptions but will not indicate to whom they may properly apply, leaving that problem to the provinces. This applies to the ownership in partnership by parents of certain goods.

This has been explained by the Minister of Finance in the sense that it is very difficult, especially in smaller estates, to realize what assets may be those of the wife or those of the husband. It is most difficult, and it is felt that if the act provided for a minimum exemption which would take into consideration the livelihood of those people, one of whom unfortunately has died, and considered a certain amount as the normal value of the share that the surviving spouse contributed in obtaining those assets, it would be a great help.

I do feel that this could be explained further. Let us say that one half of $100,000 could be considered as a fair share which may have been contributed by the surviving spouse in making up the assets but, upon the death of the husband, it may not be possible to ascertain exactly who has the interest and exactly who is the owner. I realize that the wording is slightly changed and that it now reads that the department is to ascertain the interest which the deceased may have had in certain property, but that is very difficult to ascertain also. I think in Canada especially we realize the community in marriage, and

I feel it would be proper in a small estate to have the wife left in a position that upon the death of her husband she will be considered as owning one half of the property up to a certain amount.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause deals with exemptions and exemptions only. Every estate is exempt to the extent of $40,000, regardless of circumstances, and in the case my hon. friend has referred to, the case of a man dying survived by a widow, in that case there is an additional exemption of $20,000.

Now, my hon. friend raises the question as to why this additional exemption should apply whether or not the deceased has made a gift to that extent to his wife under the will; or, in the case of intestacy, whether or not the wife has received a benefit to that extent. It is regrettable that my hon. friend did not come to the meetings of the banking and commerce committee where this matter was discussed. I believe he is not a member of that committee but all hon. members, of course, whether members of the committee, or not, are perfectly entitled to attend. I commend to him the reading of the proceedings of the committee where this matter was discussed, as well as other matters, at some length. A good deal of time was spent on the subject of the exemptions and the bases of the provisions in clause 7 of the bill.

This clause illustrates the essential difference between the Dominion Succession Duty Act and the estate tax act. In the case of the succession duty regard is had to the succession of property from the deceased to the successor. In the case of an estate tax, regard is had to the mass of the estate, and the tax is laid upon the estate in the aggregate. In the case of succession duty the tax is laid on the succession from the deceased to the successor.

If the estate tax principle is sound—and this house has approved it—then, Mr. Chairman, I submit there is no ground for introducing into the estate tax principle the succession duty principle as well, and that is what my hon. friend is arguing for. But even though the estate tax principle is to be followed, he wishes us to go further and apply the old succession duty principle to the estate tax.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to do that in that one case, where is the line to be drawn? We will be asked to do it in all manner of others, and what are you going to do? What is the net result in that case?

The difference is a $20,000 exemption. There will be a $40,000 exemption anyway, and I think virtually every province has enacted legislation to protect the rights of the widow in a case where her deceased husband has not made provision for her. In the province from which my hon. friend and I come that right of the widow is clearly protected by the dependents' relief act. No husband can be generous with others before he is just with his own dependents, including his widow.

There is another aspect of this matter that I commend to the consideration of my hon. friend. What about the case of the children? If you are going to make provision that the exemptions created by this clause, in cases where there are surviving dependent children, are dependent upon the benefit going to the child, how are you going to calculate the extent of the benefit? Suppose the deceased has left $5,000 to a dependent child. What are you going to do there? This bill will provide an exemption of $10,000 where there is such a child and $15,000 if the child is an orphan, but how are you going to break this down? Are you going to have some pro rata treatment of the exemption, in the case where the deceased has made provision for the child, to the extent of part of the amount that is provided here by way of exemption?

These illustrations are put forward to indicate how confused and unsatisfactory a situation you can create once you depart from the estate tax principle and, Mr. Chairman, I do not know where you are going to draw the line.

Therefore we have proceeded on what I think is sound ground. This is an estate tax. The house has approved the estate tax principle. We are proceeding on that principle, and I think we can safely leave it to the provinces to ensure that the rights of the widow will be sufficiently protected in the estate of the husband in relation to succession.

Mr. Godin: Not being a member of the committee I have read what was said by the minister on July 21, as found on page 60 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee. Although he may have given some explanation, I feel he has not shown that the dependents' relief act of Ontario gives protection to a widow who for some years has not been living with her husband. Therefore the benefit of the exemption would go to a stranger in any event in Ontario, and possibly in other provinces also, where the widow is not considered to be entitled to the benefit upon the death of her husband. The dependents' relief act only applies in proper cases where a wife living with her husband under proper circumstances would normally be entitled.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend will agree with me that parliament has no power over the succession. Parliament can only tax in relation to the succession. The passage to which my hon. friend referred is not the only passage where this matter was dealt with in the committee. It was dealt with also on pages 14 and 15 on an earlier day when we were dealing with the broad features of the measure. But there is the principle, Mr. Chairman. The house has approved the principle, and I think the provision is quite clear.

Mr. Godin: I took it for granted that the passage to which I have referred contained the full extent of the ministers' remarks on the problem, since he ended his remarks by saying:

> I think I have said enough or perhaps too much on exemptions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the minister be good enough to point out how the legislation deals with this problem? A man can deplete his estate by a gift of $10,000 under the Income Tax Act in every province except the province of Quebec. In the province of Quebec his estate will always be stuck with the additional $10,000, whereas husbands in other provinces can reduce their estates by a gift to their wives. The way I see it, we still have not brought the same measure of relief to the province of Quebec as in the case of the other provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my friend is reviving or perhaps I should say exhuming the somewhat lengthy discussion we had on the resolution respecting amendments to the Income Tax Act earlier this session, and I do not think it touches the matter we have before us, estate taxation.

Mr. Crestohl: Indeed it does. Here we are talking about exemptions, and estates in all the other provinces except Quebec will be reduced. There will be exemption of the $10,000 that the husband has given to the wife, but estates in the province of Quebec will not be able to benefit from that exemption.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend has overlooked the fact that the advantage so far as the taxpayer is concerned is much stronger in Quebec than it is in the other provinces by reason of the creation of community of property, and the recognition here of the ownership principle in relation to joint property. This bill goes further than the law of the country has ever gone before in recognizing the ownership principle in respect to property jointly held. That applies to property held under the rule of community of property in the province of Quebec, so that far from taxpayers in Quebec being under a disability in this respect they actually have an advantage—

Mr. Benidickson: Some do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —where community of property exists.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to clarify in my own mind the matter that was under discussion a moment ago. Before doing so, may I say that I was rather interested in the minister's explanation to the hon. member for Nickel Belt. He based his whole defence of the point at issue in the legislation on the fact that he had followed the principle of survivorship as opposed to the principle of exemption based on succession. I would point out to him that his argument was not wholly logical, because in the very section he has drawn a distinction between types of survivorship, survivorship by the widow and survivorship by the widower. He has already drawn that distinction. The point raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt was that he should move the line of distinction to a different place.

However, that is not the main point I want to raise now. If the minister will bear with me for a moment, I should like him to clarify my understanding of the significance of this section. I take it that the amount of the exemption is based on the relationship of the survivors. In other words, where there is a surviving widow and a certain number of surviving children, by that very fact the exemption is larger than it would otherwise be. But I think it should be clearly understood that one of the consequences is that the exemption is larger in an estate of a man dying in such circumstances, that is leaving a surviving widow and a number of surviving children, than it would otherwise be, and that larger exemption obtains even although the man dying gives the whole of his estate under his will to a total stranger.

I think that is a correct statement of the law. What I want to do is point out to hon. members how far-reaching that is, and what a substantial departure it is from any principle of taxation I have been aware of in the Canadian parliament. Its implications are very far-reaching, and I have grave doubts in my own mind as to its propriety. I am of the opinion that the minister, or whoever holds his office from time to time, will be back with amendments to this section before very long.

It is a principle that I, for one, cannot condone and which I cannot approve. I do not believe it is necessary in following the main principle of seeking to tax the estate as opposed to taxing the succession.

Clause 7 (1) agreed to on division.

Clauses 7 (2) to clause 9 (7), inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 9 (8)—situs of property.

Mr. Benidickson: On clause 9, subparagraph 8, we had quite a discussion in the banking and commerce committee about these changes that are made in the rules that hitherto have been applied with respect to situs of property. There are provinces that collect estate duties, and they are obliged to follow the common law. Practically every organization that submitted a brief to the minister with respect to his proposals for changing the situs with respect to certain types of property felt that this was very undesirable, even though they admitted that it perhaps provided some efficiency from the federal point of view.

It was pointed out that the provinces were obliged to accept the common law in so far as the situs of various types of property was concerned. They felt that in a country where we had people subjected to both provincial estate duties and federal estate duties, it was very undesirable to have two rules with respect to situs, and until there could be some unanimity they did not approve of these changes the minister recommends in this bill.

I realize that we had evidence on this point and the evidence was probably somewhat convincing that the rules here, in some instances, seemed to be more natural and perhaps more efficient. But it is establishing a conflict with the provinces that either now or in the future will be collecting succession duties and establishing situs of property, and as in the committee on banking and commerce I feel I would have to say "on division" with respect to this section.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The matter of situs arises, it is true, under clause 9, subparagraph 8. It arises also much more extensively under section 38, and that is the place where I think the matter could have been more properly discussed. It is the place where we discussed it in committee.

I shall make this observation and content myself with it, Mr. Chairman. The common law rules in regard to the determination of situs of various classes of property are difficult. Anyone who has had experience in determining questions of situs of property in relation to succession and in relation to succession duty knows how difficult those rules are.

In this bill, in the clauses I have mentioned, we have introduced a number of statutory definitions. In the main they follow the common law. They clarify, and they will make it easier for the parties concerned to know, the rules on situs that will be applicable in the determination of the estate tax. I think, Mr. Chairman, this is one of the improvements the bill has brought about in the existing law, because it has laid down in clearer terms than existed in the case books the rules that are to govern. Substantially they follow the common law rules. There are divergences, but I think in those cases the divergence is sound and is to be desired in the interests of clarification of the law and a clear understanding on the part of those who will be governed by the law.

Clause 9 (8) agreed to on division.

Clauses 10 to 14 (6), inclusive, agreed to.

On Clause 15 (1)—Instalment payments.

Mr. Benidickson: On 15 (1), Mr. Chairman, I have a very brief comment to make. I noticed, I think it was 10 days ago, that the United States House of Representatives developed a bill with respect to taxation generally. It was in several parts. They provided some relief with respect to income tax, but in the same bill they were amending their rules with respect to estate duties. The only amendment I noted in the bill that had relation to estate duties was that they felt obliged to alter the term for instalment payments to 10 years. I commend that to the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause, Mr. Chairman, goes further than any federal legislation has gone before. The previous rule in the Dominion Succession Duty Act was payment in four annual instalments. This provision allows payment in six annual instalments.

Mr. Benidickson: And it is an improvement on Bill No. 248, is it not?

Clause 15 (1) agreed to.

Clauses 15 (2) to 20 (3), inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 25—Irregularities.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I have some remarks to make on clause 25. Perhaps we can call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Clauses 25 and 26 agreed to.

On clause 27—Listed securities.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, one does receive representations from the public when a committee proceeds rather hastily in examining a bill of this kind, and the question of value is, of course, very important. I think some improvements have been made in the bill, not only in committee but also previously, but I have one or two suggestions I would like to make to the minister at a later stage, some of which have been made by the specialized insurance counsel. The particular suggestions I have in mind do not relate to this particular clause, however, so I shall defer my remarks until we reach the appropriate clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 28 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 32—Shares of controlled corporation where beneficiary of insurance policy.

Mr. Benidickson: I would just like to make a comment on this clause, in that I feel it received a pretty fair overhauling from Bill No. 248, which was presented last session. I believe the members of the banking and commerce committee were gratified that that had happened because the protests in connection with Bill No. 248, as originally drafted, were pretty strong.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 33 to 37 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 38—Situs of property.

Mr. Benidickson: Clause 38, as amended, still does not meet with the approval of some members of the committee. This, of course, deals with the situs of property and we referred to this matter this morning. The clause, of course, gives in detail the situs of property which henceforth will be statutory and will not have to be determined by common law. I must say, as I said in connection with the earlier section, that we oppose the adoption of this clause.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clauses 39 to 41 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 42—Person leaving Canada or removing property.

Mr. Benidickson: This is one clause of many in the bill where we see to the right in the explanatory notes that this is something new in so far as the collection of estates duty is concerned, and the explanation has been given in the other clauses, and is now given here, that this clause is similar in part to sections of the Income Tax Act.

These to my mind are new administrative privileges which are being asked for with respect to enforcement and so on. I think they may provide simplicity to the administration, but one has some hesitation in extending to this type of property the same type of strong-arm authority on the part of administration which might now be provided under the Income Tax Act.

We discussed this question in the banking and commerce committee and the officials indicated, usually, fairly sound reasons for asking for this extension of privilege and authority. I may say that it was a member of the government on that committee who, I think very wisely, made an interjection that not every member of either the House of Commons or the committee was satisfied that it was enough to say that because it is in the Income Tax Act it is justified in being in the Estates Tax Act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman said "a member of the government".

Mr. Benidickson: A member of the government party, I should say. A member of the government party very wisely said that he had never been satisfied that some of the administrative provisions of the Income Tax Act were perfect, and therefore it was not, in logic, good enough to say that a section was similar to something in the Income Tax Act.

I have heard hon. members opposite, when they were sitting on this side, complain very bitterly about some of the provisions of the Income Tax Act, and if they have those feelings I hope that as time goes on they will urge the minister to relax some of the authority that is contained in this bill generally —not especially in this clause—an authority which makes it less open to the taxpayer to argue and assert his point of view.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 42 agreed to.

On clause 43—Lien for taxes.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister tell us what effect this clause would have upon a mortgage, or upon a purchaser?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 43 creates a lien in respect to the amount payable as tax, interest or penalties on the real property of the deceased that is situated in Canada. There is one new provision in this respect. The provision in the present succession duty act which applies in this situation is section 25, subsections 3 and 4, and that provision creates a lien on the property of the deceased of the same nature as the lien created by clause 43 now under discussion, except that section 25 applies to the real property situated in Canada of only those deceased persons who died domiciled outside Canada. The one change this clause makes is to extend this lien to apply to all persons whether they were at the date of death domiciled in Canada or domiciled elsewhere. That is the change this clause makes.

In an ordinary case there is no requirement in the legislation of most of the provinces respecting registration of deeds for the registration of the release that is issued by the dominion succession duty authorities. In the provinces which still collect their own succession duties, provision is made prohibiting registration of any instrument affecting a title to land after the death of a person having an interest in that land without a specific release in respect of that property being obtained from the provincial succession duty office. Provision has been made, and will continue to be made in this new legislation, for the issuance of releases by the estate tax authorities in respect to specific assets of the deceased, and because of the existence of this statutory lien created by clause 43 it will be the responsibility of persons dealing with property in which a deceased person had an interest, where his successors or personal representatives are issuing instruments affecting the title, to take the responsibility—and the purchaser will have the same responsibility cast upon him for his own protection—of making sure that the estate tax has been paid; and of course the best evidence of that would be the production of the estate tax release in respect of that particular asset.

Mr. Drysdale: I do not intend to labour this point, because I have already raised it with the Minister of Finance, but we in British Columbia operate under the Torrens system of indefeasible certificate of title. In my opinion this method of imposing a lien has jeopardized our position as far as title registration is concerned, and I should like to suggest what I have already told the Minister of Finance privately; that consideration be given—not immediately, but within the next year—to putting into effect a system providing a time limitation on the filing of the lien, or else making a provision whereby the lien must be filed within a stated period of time, otherwise it would expire.

In British Columbia we have a situation at the present time, under the 1941 succession duty act under which a person searching a certificate of title, before relying on the title, must search back to 1941 in order to ascertain whether or not the estate has been released from its tax obligations and, in the case of the old act, whether the deceased was domiciled outside of Canada.

The situation at present is that there is no assurance that the government may not step in at some future time to recover the lien on the estate, maybe in five, ten or even 20 years time, and I would suggest a limitation to say six months from the date of death, or from probate. I draw this to the attention of the minister because the matter is of particular importance to British Columbia.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has discussed this matter with me very earnestly. It is a subject that was touched on briefly in the banking and commerce committee, and I should just like to say a word about it.

One can appreciate the desire of persons who hold a certificate of title under the system of land tenure and registration prevailing in British Columbia and some other provinces to maintain all the features of the title to which the certificate purports to testify. On the other hand we are making no change in the law in this respect. This is simply re-enacting, in essence, the terms of the succession duty act as they have been in effect since 1941. The only change this section makes in the existing law is the inclusion of property in Canada owned by persons who, at the date of death, were domiciled in Canada.

My hon. friend speaks about a time limit. There is provision here for the registration of a caution. My hon. friend spoke about the registration of a lien. The section, of course, creates a statutory lien that can be followed up by the registration of a caution if that were thought by the enforcement authorities to be desirable. These matters, of course, are always under consideration, and we shall be glad to give continuing study to it.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, that in the certificate of title that is issued under the same system of land tenure and registration in some other provinces there are statutory exceptions. Normally they are mentioned in the certificate of title. They are not enumerated but reference is made to them, so that any person taking or acting on a certificate of title is on notice that there are some statutory provisions that will substract something from what might otherwise be regarded as an indefeasible and absolute title.

I do emphasize, Mr. Chairman, the fact that this clause does not carry the principle of the statutory lien any further. It applies it in one more case, but it does not carry the principle as such any further.

Mr. Drysdale: In fairness to the minister, I may say that in British Columbia we have a section in the land registry act, section 38, which deals with the specific exception to which he refers; but, on the other point, he said there has been no change in principle or in the law from the 1941 succession duty act. I would point out to the minister that I do not agree that the principles in the 1941 act are correct.

Mr. Benidickson: May I just say that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond was one of those who, as a new member, took quite an interest in the sittings of the banking and commerce committee and contributed to some of the amendments that I think were generally satisfactory. Quite a few members realize the opportunities that are open to them when we do have a chance informally to consider a bill in one of our standing committees. I think those who participated in the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee and criticized some of the provisions of the bill as originally presented will feel fairly satisfied in their own minds that they were fulfilling a worth-while purpose.

They will remember that at the opening of the sittings with respect to the estate tax bill the Minister of Finance made some reference to an analogous situation when the income tax revision was referred to the House of Commons banking and commerce committee in 1948, and he referred to the analogy there in so far as procedure is concerned; but may I say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond that while we were discussing the Income Tax Act in 1948 I took a position very similar to that which was taken by several members supporting the government in the recent sittings of the banking and commerce committee, to the extent that he will find on page 716, the final meeting of the committee, a considerable compliment paid to me by one of the senior critics of the opposition, namely the late Senator John Hackett, because I did not choose to be a rubber stamp in connection with a matter of that kind. Mr. Abbott, of course, was piloting the bill, and just as an encouragement to the hon. member may I say that I ended up as parliamentary assistant to the minister at a later time.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 44, 45 and 46 (1) inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 46, subclause 2—Offence.

Mr. Hanbidge: I was not a member of the banking and commerce committee. Is there a section in the act under which an executor or an administrator can obtain a clearance certificate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman; this new act does not carry forward the old provision for the issuance of a certificate of discharge.

Mr. Hanbidge: Is there no way for an executor or administrator to get clear of the debt?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, there is provision that he is in effect automatically cleared when the tax had been paid. As to specific assets, it will be his responsibility to obtain his release in respect of particular assets. As to his liability, payment of the tax will discharge him from his liability, but there is no provision for issuance of a certificate of discharge now.

Mr. Hanbidge: Then it is not possible to get an order from the court discharging the executor or administrator without a clearance certificate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. The court has no status in such circumstances to make a finding or order that an executor has discharged his liability in respect of the tax.

Mr. Benidickson: As an executor or administrator can he get it cleared by the court? Under the old succession duty act he could not; the court had no jurisdiction, under our rules, to give a clearance certificate, or at least to discharge an executor or administrator without that clearance certificate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The court has no status, as I indicated a moment ago, to make a finding. No court that I am aware of has the status to make a finding in such circumstances that the executor has or has not completely discharged his liability in respect of tax. That is a matter between him and the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Benidickson: Of course under the old bill it was possible to get a certificate of discharge. This greatly exercised members of the committee, particularly, I must say, members of the legal fraternity who are supporters of the government. I think the minister and his officials should now, in their leisure, having regard to future opportunities to amend this bill, give this point very serious consideration. I am sure this particular void in the legislation was the subject of as much general discussion during the banking and commerce committee hearings as anything else, and I suggest to the minister that while we were pushed pretty hard, two sittings a day, to get through this bill—and it is a long one—I think if we had gone about it a little more leisurely we would have been able to arrive at something that would be an adequate substitute for the present certificate of discharge which is available to an executor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That matter was fully considered. It was fully considered before the bill was brought to the house, because representations were made about it. It was fully discussed before the banking and commerce committee, and the committee was fully informed as to the representations that had been made on the subject. I do not think the impression should be left that the committee hurried over this bill. The committee did not hurry over any feature of the bill. As a matter of fact the committee proceeded very deliberately and as one who has had, I think, a fair amount of committee work here in the last 13 years may I say I do not think any committee has ever done a more thorough piece of work on any piece of legislation than the banking and commerce committee did on this particular measure.

In case the hon. member for Kindersley has not reflected upon it, I might draw his attention to the provisions of clause 12, subclause 5 (b) at the top of page 18, where he will see that there is no power on the part of the Minister of National Revenue to reassess after four years from the date of an original assessment or the date any property is disposed of under a disposition or agreement as described.

Mr. Benidickson: That was one of the worth-while amendments as a result of the committee discussions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. That was an amendment made by the government as compared with Bill 248 before Bill C-37 was introduced.

Clauses 46 to 50 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 51, subclause 1—Offences.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not have the succession duty act in front of me, but I am sure the minister or his officials through the minister will be able to indicate to what extent there have been changes in the penalties. What are the differences in minimum penalties between what is provided in clause 51 and the penalties that have been applicable hitherto? I note in the explanatory note that this clause is new in part. Perhaps the changes might be pointed out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The relevant provisions of the succession duty act are sections 52 and 53. Section 52, subsection 1 provides:

> Every person failing to deliver the statement required by section 16 is liable to a penalty of $10 for each day of default which elapses after the time limited for delivering such statement, but such penalty shall not in any case exceed $1,000.

The second subsection provides as follows:

> Every person failing to complete the information required on the forms prescribed by the minister for reporting the particulars required by section 16 is liable to a penalty of $10 where the aggregate net value of the property the subject matter of the succession does not exceed $50,000, and to a penalty of $100 where the aggregate net value exceeds $50,000.

It is also provided in section 53 as follows:

> For every default in complying with the provisions of section 18 and section 20—
> [Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]
>
> Those are the sections pertaining to furnishing information on demand or producing documents required by the minister.
> —the persons in default are each liable on summary conviction to a penalty of not less than $25 for each day during which the default continues.

My hon. friend will see that the penalty created by clause 51 (1) of the present bill is a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $10,000. That, of course may be an increase over the penalty now prescribed by the Dominion Succession Duty Act. Then in subclause 2 of clause 51—

Mr. Benidickson: I was concerned only with the minimum penalties.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In subclause 2 the penalty is a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or both fine and imprisonment, and there is a saving provision in subclause 3.

Mr. Benidickson: It was my understanding that there had been a minimum penalty of $10 per day under the equivalent of 51 (1). I can imagine that could become quite a sum under certain circumstances. Under the former statute was there some method of remitting the fine under proper circumstances, or was it absolute?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The statute itself did not make provision for remission. It simply provided in section 52, subsection 1, that the person in default should be liable to a penalty of $10 a day for each day of default, but I am told that the penalty was applied only in clear cases.

Clauses 51 to 59 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 60—Coming into force.

Mr. Benidickson: On the matter of coming into effect, the minister cannot, of course, predict the result of further processes with regard to this legislation, but is it his intention to have the legislation proclaimed as rapidly as possible after passage through parliament?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. This is a statute with respect to which we think adequate warning must be given to the public. It is highly important that the public should have ample warning and notice of the intention to bring the bill into effect. I pointed out on previous occasions that the bill has not been drawn so as to provide for the repeal of the existing legislation, the Dominion Succession Duty Act. That act will continue on the statute books and will apply to the estates of all persons dying prior to the date on which the new legislation is brought into effect in pursuance of clause 60 now under discussion.

When the present bill is proclaimed it will have effect with respect to the estates of persons dying after that date, but it will not have any application to the estates, whether partly assessed or partly administered, of persons who die prior to the date on which the new act comes into effect. We will certainly have in mind the importance of giving ample warning to the public of the intention to bring this legislation into effect.

I should like to make this statement as to the effect of the new tax in relation to existing wills. Under the succession duty acts, provincial and federal, liability for duty falls on the successor. Many testators provide in their wills that such duty be paid from the mass of the estate as a general charge like a debt. Such wills should require no change. However, wills without such a provision require alteration if the new tax is to be charged against all the successors rather than only against those who succeed to the residue of the estate. If this is the testator's desire he would have to provide instructions to his executors to apportion the amount of the tax as he wishes after payment has been made by the executors as required by the act.

I would therefore urge all persons to examine their wills with the new tax in mind to ensure that when it comes into effect their testamentary intentions will in this respect be carried out. To provide an adequate period for this to be done, the new act will not be proclaimed for some months.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a little inconsistent, as I see it. When the minister appeared at the first meeting of the banking and commerce committee he was arguing that we had to be in a rush. For one thing, he wanted the legislation to be advanced to the Senate. He also took pride in the fact that he had given the public an opportunity to examine his draft Bill No. 248 of January, 1958. In his remarks on financial matters in December, 1957, and again in his budget speech, he certainly threw out his chest considerably about the savings that would be available to people, particularly in the lower income tax brackets, as well as the lower duties that would be operative under this statute as compared to the succession duty act.

We were told, as I understood it, in the banking and commerce committee that the advertising through regular channels of the contents of this bill was so complete that we did not need to hear from members of the public any criticism of it. Now it appears that any beneficence in this bill is not likely to be operative in the very near future.

I raised this very point that people had to consider their wills, and that was one of the reasons I said that I did not want to see two laws with respect to the situs of property, because it might make it difficult for people making wills. This argument was dismissed as not very consequential by the majority of the committee.

I think for the minister to say that this act will not become operative for some months after he informed the Canadian public on December 6, 1957, that there were tax benefits amounting to some $7 million coming to them, and when he said again on June 17 that this was of great benefit to the people who had relatively small estates, he should be more specific as to the appropriate time he thinks he could recommend that it be proclaimed by the governor general.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have been very specific on this matter as to the considerations that have to be taken into account. I have been very frank and forthright with the committee in this respect. I would deplore it if the impression were left by my hon. friend's remarks that there was any rush to get this measure through the committee. I assert very firmly, Mr. Chairman, that there was no rush that this matter be put through the committee. The committee proceeded very deliberately, and had five lengthy meetings on this bill. There was no attempt to rush the matter through the committee but the committee did choose, and I think very wisely, to have for itself the benefit of a consecutive study of this bill.

I am sure hon. members who have had very much experience with committees around here know how easy it is for committees, when they are meeting once or twice a week, to lose the thread of a study. This measure is an entity; and one of the factors, in my opinion, that contributed most to the effectiveness of the very intelligent scrutiny to which this measure was submitted in the banking and commerce committee is that the committee did not spread its meetings out over a period of weeks. The committee met each day. The committee had a meeting on the first Friday, then Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and I think Thursday. In that way we maintained continuity in the review of the bill.

I think that was wise. I believe the committee made a sound choice in the first place in that respect, and I think the committee, as it proceeded with the bill, showed in its deliberations that that decision had been beneficial in assuring the members who attended the committee that there was no loss of continuity from meeting to meeting.

So far as the date of proclamation is concerned, I cannot be more specific. We believe there are benefits to be had from this measure.

We believe it is a good bill. It is not a perfect bill, and in any new measure of this kind I am quite sure there will be opportunities as the years pass for making improvements in it. But we believe this is a good measure. It is an improvement, and we do not intend to delay any longer than is strictly necessary, having in mind the factors I mentioned earlier, the bringing into effect of this measure and the benefits we believe it will bring to the Canadian people.

Mr. Benidickson: I was not going to bring back the argument as to whether or not this committee had proceeded too quickly in its deliberations. I said that at several stages, and that was not the point I really wanted to emphasize, though I believe it very firmly. Since the minister has reintroduced this subject I just want to give my own experience.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was my hon. friend who introduced it.

Mr. Benidickson: Probably I did not emphasize properly the point that was impressing me. The point that was impressing me was that the minister in December last, and in his budget, emphasized the advantages of the tax reductions that would result from this legislation. Now it appears that we have no assurance that this bill will be rapidly proclaimed, despite all the virtues the minister has claimed for it.

I think the minister was fair. I do not recall in the banking and commerce committee he ever chastised the former government for not bringing in its announced changes in connection with the overhaul of the succession duty act or introducing a substitute for the succession duty act. I have heard him say we were dilatory in changing the act after, I think it was, as far back as 1954, Mr. Abbott announced that he was giving this matter very serious consideration.

I know some of the difficulties that arose. There was controversy about such a radical change in the form of taxation, that it would go from succession to the quantum of the estate. But I am by no means satisfied with this thought that the government do not believe that this measure, which they advertised as being so beneficial, should be proclaimed at an early date.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is usually very fair. I hope he is not leaving on the record or in the mind of any member of the house the impression that we said there were going to be tax reductions brought about by this measure in this present year. If my hon. friend will look at the budget speech of June 17 he will see that, as found at page 1245, in reference to this matter I said this:

> The proposed new estate tax is definitely a tax-reduction measure. On an annual basis the yield from this revenue field will be less by about $7 million.

Then in giving the house a detailed estimate of the effect of this tax on the revenues for the fiscal year 1958-59, if he will look at page 1249 of Hansard he will plainly see there in table IV that I show that the estate tax would bring about a tax reduction in a full year of $7 million, but that I did not estimate any tax reduction from this source for the fiscal year 1958-59; nothing.

Mr. Benidickson: Now we see the nigger in the wood pile.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reason for that is two-fold. First there is the necessity of having the legislation passed and proclaimed. The second is that revenue under a measure of this kind makes itself felt only after a period of about six months. If this measure were brought into effect today it would not have any perceptible effect on the revenues for six months, because it takes six months for payment to be made in each particular case. I think my hon. friend can see very plainly that no matter when this measure is brought into effect, there would not be any effect on the revenues for a minimum of six months. That is why, in what was said, no effect was attributed to this new measure on the revenues for the fiscal year 1958-59, this present fiscal year.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am very much disappointed in the Minister of Finance. I heard him on two occasions when he made major financial announcements in this house, namely on December 1, 1957 and June 17, 1958, and on both occasions he took pride in announcing to the house that he was introducing a measure that would reduce taxation for those that might be interested in the residue of an estate, which reduction would amount to a cost of the treasury of $7 million. Now we find that he will give us nothing definite as to when these much heralded, much advertised benefits will actually accrue to those who are interested.

After reading his speeches in December, 1957 and June of this year, I think we can expect more than that from the minister. He made some reference to some complication in getting proclamation of an act of this kind. I do not want any Hansard reader to think there is anything important in that matter. One who is interested, as a member of the government in getting an act proclaimed, can do so fairly quickly—in a matter of hours, sometimes—by appeal to the Governor General. I therefore do not want anybody to think that the proclamation in itself is a complicated bit of red tape. I am surprised that this form of tax relief which the minister has talked about is to be left aside or shelved for an uncertain time. He will not tell us when it may likely become effective.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, fair comment will be welcomed at all times, but any statement of the kind the hon. member has just made is no correct paraphrase of anything I have said this afternoon. To talk about shelving this measure is to do violence to anything that has been said here this afternoon. What I did Mr. Chairman, was to take into account matters that any responsible government must take into account in relation to proclamation. If this measure were proclaimed next month, next month being September, it would not have one copper's effect on the revenues from the estate tax for the balance of this fiscal year for the very reason I have mentioned, namely that it does not have any effect on revenues for at least six months.

There is no ground whatever for any suggestion of shelving. We brought this measure forward because we believe in this measure. We have not brought it this far, let me assure my hon. friend, only to have it shelved or bypassed. We believe in this measure. We are going to see it through. It will be brought into effect when, having regard to all the circumstances, it can be brought into effect with due notice. I am sure no minister can do more than that.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the matter of the six months is simply a red herring. One knows that six months will apply in the same way if this act is not proclaimed until six months from now. In the meantime the government receives revenues based on the old act. I hope that is not what has motivated the hon. member because, as I say, he has said so much in favour of the importance of providing these reductions in estate duties.

In so far as a comparison with other taxing statutes is concerned, we all know that of the resolutions which are before us and which we still have to complete, some of them became effective June 17 budget day, so far as the Income Tax Act was concerned and some of the proposals that resulted from the minister's budget of June 17 were even made retroactive. They apply back to January 1 of 1958.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only when it is a matter of relief; when they are relieving sections.

Mr. Benidickson: Those considerations are not impediments in so far as the minister is concerned. In conducting the program now, after this bill passes the Senate, if it does so, and comes back to us for approval and is passed, nothing prevents the minister, if he will recommend it, from having it proclaimed so the taxpayers whom he says will benefit to the extent of $7 million will get that benefit.

Mr. Crestohl: Before passing from the discussion for proclaiming the measure, may I say that I think there was one feature which surrounded the bill as it went through the banking and commerce committee which the minister might perhaps still remedy. It is true that we sat almost consecutively. Some might have felt that, being a new measure, it was quite cumbersome. It had 60 sections, with a great many subsections and a great many subparagraphs. Despite the fact that we sat almost consecutively it was not a very simple measure to digest. I think we should have had the benefit of hearing from the public at large. Large national organizations familiar with this type of legislation, such as the tax foundation, chambers of commerce and others like them should have come before the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the council of women.

Mr. Crestohl: Yes, and the council of women. We should have heard from these organizations. We should have had the benefit of their views. Even though the minister was anxious to pilot it through—and it is a good piece of legislation; we do not deny that completely; it is well drafted—I feel that from my point of view it could not have been given the full and cautious study that a new piece of legislation like this should have. I should like to recommend that the minister—I do not know how he can possibly do it—give every encouragement to the other place when they go through the legislation to notify the people to appear before them in committee so that at least we might have there the benefit of the points of view of these organizations and the Canadian public at large.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The points of view of these organizations were fully put before the committee on banking and commerce. The briefs of the national organizations were before the committee, and something was done that I do not recall being done previously in my 13 years' experience in the house. As we came to section after section upon which we had received representations from these national organizations, where we did not under the new bill give full effect to the representations the minister and the officials reviewed for the information of the committee the representations that had been submitted. So that the committee had full knowledge of the relevant representations before it proceeded to pass any of the clauses—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This was a most undemocratic procedure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this was done for the instruction of the committee. The committee had the briefs before it and as to any further representations which came in while the measure was under consideration in the committee, those likewise were placed before the committee. The committee therefore had all the information before it as to the views of these national organizations.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the minister not admit that it is very much more helpful to us to have a witness before us whom we can question on the various representations made, so that we may hear the various points of view on all such suggestions rather than resorting to the cold print of a typewritten memorandum. I am sure these organizations would have been delighted to have been heard and to have given us the benefit of their viewpoints.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on this point I just cannot allow the minister's remarks to remain where they have been left. I quite agree that when asked he and his officials did reply very courteously as to what such and such an organization had to say to them in criticism of this bill. The minister, however, overlooks the fact that generally speaking it was necessary for a member of the committee to be acquainted with the briefs and it was necessary also to ask in each case what representations had been received.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no, that was volunteered.

Mr. Benidickson: Only after one trust company president, who was not named wrote—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all. That is not true.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Benidickson: We have not concluded our discussions on resolution No. 2 relating to zinc and zinc products. In the meantime, I think most hon. members have received a report under the Combines Investigation Act in which it was alleged that there was a conspiracy against the public interest in the matter of the distribution in Canada, having regard to equitable prices and fairness to all customers, of natural zinc products of this country.

The combines investigator in his report made a very unusual recommendation; he recommended the removal of the Canadian customs import tariff on refined zinc, the metal from which zinc oxide which was the subject of the commercial controversy is produced. This has developed since we last discussed this item, and I wonder if the Minister of Finance has received an appeal from the Minister of Justice, whose officers made this report, and whether or not he would inform the house of the developments which have taken place in the meantime.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the report of the restrictive trade practices commission recently circulated among members concerning the production, distribution and sale of zinc oxide has, I think, no bearing whatever on the changes proposed in resolution No. 2.

So far as the resolution itself is concerned, the significant changes which are recommended here are those on zinc strip and sheet and zinc dust. There is a change also with respect to zinc alloys. However, the report of the restrictive trade practices commission concerned zinc oxide and refined zinc and as to those two products, I might say first, with respect to zinc oxide, this item is dutiable under tariff item 242, which is one of the tariff items included in the chemical reference now before the tariff board for study and report. The chemical items in the customs tariff have been included in that particular reference which has for some time been awaiting a place on the very heavy schedule of the tariff board.

The other commodity was refined zinc, and in that respect the tariff board in its report on zinc and zinc products reported that none of the Canadian fabricators had suggested any change in the tariff applying to zinc in primary forms.

We shall, of course, give consideration to the recommendation of the restrictive trade practices commission that customs duties on refined zinc be removed. It could be that in the course of tariff negotiations such a reduction might prove to be a useful bargaining item.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister say what are the present rates on zinc in primary form?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is item 345a. The hon. member will see the rate in effect at the time of the bringing in of the budget under that item.

Mr. Benidickson: Is my hon. friend saying that the item which the combines investigator thought should not receive protection is in fact at present receiving no protection?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. My hon. friend will see that the rates have always been ¾ of a cent per pound British preferential and 1 cent per pound most-favoured-nation.

Mr. Benidickson: I was looking at tariff item 345a. I see it is 345a. The imports, I think, are referred to in the tariff board report which brings this item before the committee for discussion today. So far the imports of zinc or zinc products as outlined on page 24 of the tariff board report are of relative insignificance compared with the total production of zinc concentrates and refined zinc into this country.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, the resolution reads; 'that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff—" and so on. There are many phases of this resolution with which we agree; there are other phases to which we take exception, and other members of this group will have some remarks to make on the specific matters that are recommended when the detailed items are up for consideration.

However, in the main, on the principles of the resolution, I can say that the C.C.F. believes that it is essential that we endorse the highest possible level of international trade. Much of the prosperity of our people in Canada depends on a high level of international trade, and this applies with special force to western Canada and I have in mind in particular my own province of British Columbia. The Canadian economy is very vulnerable indeed to any changes in the level of international commodity prices and, therefore, any amendment to the Customs Tariff is of vital concern, especially to the primary producers of this country.

Now, the ideal of the socialist, naturally, is eventual world wide freedom of trade. However, we recognize that the world in which we live today is not an ideal world and that this worthy objective and ideal cannot immediately be obtained; it may not be obtainable in our lifetimes even. Among the present limitations on world wide free trade are the varying standards of living of the workers in different countries of the world, and this has to be recognized. We cannot allow Canadian labour to be forced to compete with the wages that are being paid in many other countries.

There is another handicap which prevents the realization of our ideal of world free trade in the immediate years ahead, namely that various national policies have helped to establish industries in many countries of the world where such industries ought never to have been set up in the first place. When I think of the heavy burden that many European taxpayers have to pay at the present time in order to subsidize the growing of wheat, for instance, I believe I have an example which is worthy of some consideration. It is obvious that the best place in the world to grow the finest type of wheat for the least money is in our Canadian west, yet for national reasons of their own many countries in the world have over a long period encouraged their people to engage in the production of wheat, though they should be doing something else. Right here in Canada we have had governments which over the years, for reasons valid or otherwise, have encouraged the establishment of a cotton textile industry here, an industry which is not natural to the Canadian scene. And yet we cannot attempt to abolish this industry at this time because hundreds of thousands of Canadians would suffer serious hardship if that attempt were to be made.

What we need in order to obtain freer world trade is the raising of the living standards of the workers of all countries to a point where they are at least as high as the living standards of our own Canadian workers. If we were to do that, many of the goods which are produced abroad would no longer offer any unfair competition to our Canadian workers.

We also need a policy whereby the government, rather than entrenching further those things which ought not to exist on the Canadian scene would, rather, pursue a policy by means of which, if those industries have to be sacrificed, no hardship would be involved by those who are now earning a livelihood in these fields.

One of the most important handicaps to a fair exchange of commodities between the various nations of the world is the handicap of currency, and we need to exert much greater efforts toward making possible a freer exchange of the currencies in existence in the world. I would much rather have seen the government engaged in some vigorous action directed toward making possible a freer exchange of currencies than to be discussing an amendment to the Customs Tariff.

High tariffs, low tariffs, or even free tariffs are not the answer in the world in which we live today. High and low tariffs are a game that the Liberals and Conservatives have played in Canada ever since the time of confederation, and I was hoping that those two parties would have become adult by now and grown out of playing such games. Whether tariffs are high or low, it will not solve our problems; it does not even meet the problem. And free tariffs at the present time are not practicable.

We are afraid—and I think that succeeding speakers are going to voice some of the reasons for our fears—that the tendency in this proposed new measure of the government is toward higher and still higher tariffs, and that in this, as in many other respects, the Conservative government is again repeating the history of the Conservative government we had from 1930 to 1935. The days when the tariff was looked upon as a sort of revenue for the minister of finance ought to be gone. I believe they are gone, even in the mind of the Minister of Finance. He no longer looks on the Customs Tariff as a source of revenue. I believe even he has got round to the point when he considers that the Customs Tariff is an instrument by means of which a government either encourages or discourages certain sections of Canadian enterprise, and that any revenue flowing to the treasury is merely incidental.

The Deputy Chairman: I have been waiting for the hon. member to get back to the second resolution and I find that he has been talking on the principle of customs tariff. We are now discussing resolution No. 2, which refers to certain specific articles. I would ask the hon. member to bring his remarks back to those specific articles.

Mr. Regier: I am sorry. I presume that resolution No. 1 was passed at the time of our national convention and I did not realize that it had carried. However, just to summarize in one sentence what I meant to say, we feel that a new approach is necessary. We advocate that we line ourselves up with the modern, progressive nations of the western world and that we begin to plan as they do and use the instrument of the customs tariff for the welfare of our people and that we establish export and import boards which will regulate customs so as to supply the maximum employment to all Canadians.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the second resolution carry?

Mr. McIlraith: Did you say the second resolution?

The Deputy Chairman: Resolution No. 2.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it you are dealing with zinc?

Resolution 2 agreed to.

3. Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 355*b*, 377, 377*a*, 377*b*, 377*c*, 377*d*, 377*e*, 377*f*, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 385*a*, 386, 387, 387*a*, 387*b*, 387*c*, 388, 388*a*, 388*b*, 388*c*, 388*d*, 388*e*, 388*f*, 388*g*, 389, 392*a*, 395, 395*a* and 438*f*, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Tariff Item	—	British preferential tariff	Most-favoured-nation tariff	General tariff
355*b*	Metal alloy strip or tubing—not being such strip or tubing as accords with the definition of "steel", in paragraph (1) of subsection (1) of section 2 of the Customs Tariff—containing not less than thirty per cent by weight of nickel and twelve per cent by weight of chromium, for use in Canadian manufactures.....	Free	Free	20 p.c.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall resolution 3 carry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On resolution 3, as is indicated in the amendments which were placed on Votes and Proceedings of July 28, there is an amendment of the first item, namely item 355b. The amendment which appears in Votes and Proceedings runs to this effect:

That resolution No. 3 of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom item 355*b* and by substituting therefor the following:

Tariff Item	—	British preferential tariff	Most-favoured-nation tariff	General tariff
355*b*	Metal alloy strip or tubing—not being steel strip or tubing—containing not less than thirty per cent by weight of nickel and twelve per cent by weight of chromium, for use in Canadian manufactures.....	Free	Free	20 p.c.

I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, to move this amendment.

Mr. Pearkes: I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I presume we shall have a general discussion on opening up resolution No. 3. Then, I would like the minister to explain the reason for his amendment of item 355b. Mr. Chairman, this deals with basic iron and steel items which were referred to the tariff board for consideration. They were referred, of course, by the previous administration. Mr. Harris, the then minister of finance, wrote on May 19, 1955 to the tariff board under the act directing them to conduct an inquiry into the subject of the various tariff items that he outlined in his letter, and I should like to quote just the odd excerpt from this letter of Mr. Harris. He said:

I have received representations from Canadian primary iron and steel producers to the effect that the provisions of the Customs Tariff relating to their products have become out of date. They request that these provisions be revised to take account of the expansion that has occurred in the Canadian industry, the changes that have taken place in production techniques, in trade usages, and other developments.

He went on to say in his letter:

I would request the board to prepare a revised schedule of tariff items, with recommendations—

I believe the minister may either request recommendations or simply request a report as to the general situation in the industry. In this case Mr. Harris asked for recommendations as to rates of duty covering primary iron and steel products, and to include a proposed schedule in the report. The then minister of finance said that in preparing its proposed schedule of rates of duty on primary iron and steel products the board should:

I would expect that the board would have regard to the rates now applicable to more highly manufactured products of iron and steel.

In drawing up a revised schedule it is recognized that certain adjustments in margins of preference may be involved. In this regard, however, it is not the intention that there should be any general change in preferential margins and the board should keep in mind the obligations of the GATT in this respect.

The tariff board, carrying out that suggestion, did report to the minister on February 28, 1957. My hon. friend will know the climate and timetable of that time. A budget was due within a very short time afterwards and following that there was a general election, so that the recommendations that we have here are the recommendations of the new administration, having regard to this particular report, reference No. 118 of the tariff board.

Now, I found this extremely interesting. It is a very long report but it is extremely interesting. On pages 4 and 5 of the report the tariff board outlines a summary of the industry's proposals. They show the counterbalance between seekers of tariffs and the reaction of the users of the industry's product. I was very interested to see such strong evidence of public interest, in that they also have a heading "Representations by Non-Steel Interests", the non-steel interests, representing the public which decided to take the initiative to come before the tariff board and express their views, included such people as the interprovincial farm union council of Canada, the British Columbia lumber manufacturers association, the plywood manufacturers association of British Columbia, the British Columbia loggers association, the truck loggers association, the Canadian federation of agriculture, the Canadian association of consumers, the united steelworkers of America, the Canadian pulp and paper association, the air industries and transport association of Canada. This, I think, indicates to all members of the house that tariff changes affect many more than those who are directly concerned in either producing or buying the products that are under review for the purpose of establishing a fair and proper tariff.

This industry is a relatively important one in Canada. I do not want to labour this in the committee but on page 11 of the report I found it interesting to read, and I think other members of the committee will find this interesting, that:

> In 1900, practically no steel industry existed in Canada; production of ingots and direct steel castings in that year amounted to 26,406 tons. In the next 10 years steel-making capacity increased manyfold; by 1910 annual production exceeded 800,000 tons. This was further increased by additional million tons over the next eight years, so that, by the end of world war I, production amounted to 1,873,000. This level of production was not reached again until the years of world war II, when the annual output exceeded 3 million tons.
> In the years since world war II, production has expanded each year with the exception of 1954 and in 1955 reached new record levels in excess of 4½ million ingot tons.

The report does not go beyond that but I have inquired and, gratifyingly, I find that production increased since the time of review by the board. I find that on a similar basis production of basic iron and steel, according to the bureau of statistics, amounted in 1956 to 5.3 million tons. In 1957 there was a slight reduction but the figure was still ahead of 1955 when the board was reviewing these matters. Production in 1957 was slightly in excess of 5 million tons although something less than the year before.

At this stage of our consideration of these proposed tariff changes I do not propose to go into great detail as to the reasons for increases in tariff with respect to this important industry, having regard also to the large list of consumers in the country who took a very great interest in the hearings. As between myself and the minister I would prefer, while we are discussing these items at this stage, to have him indicate to me why he has departed in certain instances from the recommendations of the tariff board.

In the first instance I would refer to something that I cannot find in the resolution, a reference to the item that would be encompassed in recommendation No. 10 of the tariff board. I find that they made a recommendation but I cannot see that there is an item, among the 20 or so to which we have to give consideration to, that seems to relate to recommendation No. 10. Perhaps the minister will be so kind as to give me the facts in that regard. The resolution stage is largely an opportunity for fact finding in committee. A day or two subsequently we will then have a bill presented to us based on this resolution and at that time a little wider scope is probably available for discussion of general public interest and conflict of interests. But before we look at the items seriatim I would appreciate it very much if the minister would indicate to me why the tariff board recommendation was departed from in that no change was made relating to recommendation No. 10 when the tariff board recommended a change.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, first of all may I say that it is quite erroneous to picture the numerous tariff changes proposed in these various resolutions as some major upward revision in the Canadian tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not say that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, another member did. Largely these are revisions that arise out of studies made by the tariff board having regard to the need of modernization of the tariff. A number of the tariff items referred to the board by my predecessor were items that had stood in the tariff for many years in that form and there have been many changes since in techniques and in the descriptions of articles and commodities of the kind embraced here.

In connection with resolution No. 3 respecting iron and steel, may I point out that there are 113 items in the existing tariff which the board reviewed and some 92 of those items have been boiled down by the board to 38 items by a process of consolidation and revision. In this resolution there are, as we saw in the previous one, some increases and some decreases, but the principal purpose was to modernize the tariff in the light of modern needs.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asks about the reason for departures from specific recommendations of the tariff board. May I remind the committee that after the tariff board made its recommendations it was necessary for the government, under the provisions of GATT, to initiate negotiations with the United States, it being the principal country in whose favour these items had been bound. In the course of these negotiations it was impossible to expect that we would come out with the recommendations of the board in their entirety. There was some give and some take and these recommendations are in the form in which they now appear following negotiations with the United States under the established procedure.

In some other cases we have received representations, and as a result of our inquiries we found that the situation had changed somewhat from the time the tariff board had made its report. Naturally we reviewed all recommendations and the resolution now before the committee is the result.

My friend asked in particular as to what had been the outcome of recommendation No. 10 of the tariff board. The board recommended that an item be set up providing duty free entry under the British preferential and most-favoured-nation tariffs for strip steel less than four inches in width with rolled or milled edges. A number of representations were received objecting to the provision of duty free entry for this material which is now being slit in Canada. In these circumstances it was not considered appropriate to introduce a statutory duty free rate on this material. Hoop steel used in the manufacture of barrels or kegs is not available in Canada and continued duty free entry for this material has been provided under tariff item 382a by order in council until January 31, 1959. My friend is familiar with that provision of the Customs Act that permits the governor in council to reduce the tariff rates applicable to materials that enter into the manufacture of a product in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend has referred to something that he suggests exists now, the slitting of this material in Canada. On page 110 of the tariff board report, reference No. 118, the board pointed out that this item was of interest to the cooperage business, people who make barrels and so on. It has been a free item hitherto both from the United Kingdom and from most-favoured-nations under our tariff arrangements. Naturally there is anxiety about the temporary nature of an order in council, particularly when it expires on January 31, 1959. The board said that this is not an item that is produced in Canada to any extent and they felt that the end cooperage user should not be dependent upon an order in council and recommended that a permanent item be put in the tariff which would continue entry on the basis of free; free; 15 per cent.

When there is avoidance of a recommendation by the tariff board, there is apprehension, especially when the minister says simply that they have temporary coverage under an order in council which expires on January 31, 1959. I understand that if that order in council were not renewed instead of the rates for these products for the cooperage industry being free British preference and, most-favoured-nation, free; it would become 10 per cent British preferential and 15 per cent most-favoured-nation.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution No. 3 as amended carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I would ask the committee if they would not think that each and every one of the enumerated items must be called. I think that is in accord with past practice. I do not ever recall that these tariff items were dealt with simply in bulk. There are many of them, I want to assure the minister, upon which I have no questions to raise at the moment because, so far as I can see, they are in accord with the recommendations of the tariff board. On the other hand, there are some 20-odd items in which it appears there have been changes from the recommendations made by the tariff board. I think we could not make real progress in the committee unless we called each item by its numeral in the tariff schedule.

The Deputy Chairman: Then, item 355b, as amended:

Customs tariffs 355b Metal alloy strip or tubing—not being such strip or tubing as accords with the definition of "steel", in paragraph (1) of subsection (1) of section 2 of the Customs Tariff—containing not less than thirty per cent by weight of nickel and twelve per cent by weight of chromium, for use in Canadian manufactures; British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend asked for an explanation of this amendment. There is no change in substance between the item as now proposed and that proposed at the time of the budget. The only change is that the wording between the two dashes has been simplified. The item is being amended to make it clear that strip or tubing which contains more than 50 per cent iron is to be classified as steel strip or tubing and not under this item as an alloy.

Item agreed to.

Items 377 and 377a agreed to.

378. Iron or steel, semi-finished, namely: blooms, slabs, billets or sheet bars: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, five per cent; general tariff, ten per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: This item is not in accord with the recommendations of the tariff board. I think the pertinent recommendation is No. 3 in their report No. 118. I wondered if the minister would give us some explanation. Hon. members will notice with respect to item No. 378, that now the British preferential tariff is changed. I think our chief concern is with respect to the most-favoured-nation tariff. The tariff board recommended that the most-favoured-nation rate be $3 per ton. The administration has seen fit to change that to five per cent. I think hon. members will easily recognize that this could have a very important consequence, according to the value of the product that was being imported. I believe that it would involve a substantial increase in tariff on any item imported of this kind if the value were over $60 a ton. Can the minister explain why he did not see fit to accept the recommendation of the tariff board in this respect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 378 covers semi-finished steel in several forms. Formerly, this product came in under various tariff items, and the rates proposed, on balance, probably mean some increase in the margin of preference. The tariff board recommended two divisions of this item, one covering semi-finished steel for pressing or rolling into bars, with a British preferential rate of free and a most-favoured-nation rate of $3 per ton. The other division was for processing, other than into bars, with a British preferential rate free and a most-favoured-nation rate of five per cent.

It was not considered that the operation of processing into bars warranted setting up a special end use item, and consequently a single item, No. 378, is proposed, covering semi-finished steel regardless of the end use, with a British preferential rate of free and the most-favoured-nation rate of five per cent.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Benidickson: I am asking about the technique of this thing. I do not imagine the minister, any more than myself, is very well acquainted with the actual manufacturing processes involved here. But the tariff board considers all these matters, hears all parties interested, the producer, purchaser and the fellow in the middle. After many days of laborious hearings they produce a report that goes to 315 pages. Generally speaking, I believe we have confidence in the tariff board of this country. They suggested that a rate of $3 per ton, regardless of the value of the product and having regard to the quantity of imports, would be adequate and fair to all concerned. Now what happens? Who advised the minister that they know better and he should not adopt this report of the tariff board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend, from his experience in the Department of Finance, knows how these matters are processed from the time they are before the tariff board until the time they reach the house. Earlier I outlined the factors which accounted for the changes between the form of the tariff board recommendation and the form of the resolution now before the committee. It is well to bear in mind that the tariff board report on iron and steel was signed on February 28, 1957. It is a year and a half old now.

When the recommendations of the tariff board came in they were submitted to study and to negotiation. As I have indicated to the committee already, the differences between the recommendations of the tariff board and the resolution in its present form may be attributed to one or more of three factors: First, the process of negotiation with the United States; second, changes in the situations regarding the manufacture and supply, and then representations. In this particular case, as in others, the difference between the tariff board report and what appears in the resolution is the product of one or more of these various factors that I have mentioned. It is not just a matter of somebody in the department having an idea that he has something better to recommend than the tariff board. There are representations being made to the department all the time, as my hon. friend well knows, and when the report of the tariff board on this matter as well as on others was made known there were brought to the attention of the department representations and changes in conditions which had occurred since the tariff board was taking evidence on these matters.

There have been many situations, we have found, in which there have been changes in manufacturing, changes in supply and in Canadian needs with regard to many of these items. We have so many items that are embraced within the scope of these particular tariff board references, most of which were directed by my predecessor, that since the reports were issued we have received a great number of representations drawing to the attention of the department that there have been changes since. There are a great many changes going on in the technique of manufacturing and in regard to the development of Canadian supply to meet Canadian needs.

Mr. Benidickson: It seems to me a great deal of flexibility has been introduced into this item that might involve a very radical change in the tariff impost. I indicated that if the value of the product was about $60 a ton, it made no difference. I am told that under this item one might import a fair amount of specialty steel which I do not think is manufactured in any direct way in Canada. But if the specialty steel was valued at several hundreds of dollars per ton and the rate per ton instead of being $3 became 5 per cent, my hon. friend can realize that the change in the duty from the recommendations of the tariff board is substantial indeed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I think my hon. friend is mistaken in saying that this is a drastic change or anything approaching a drastic change. Actually this is a very minor change for all that it does is to achieve a minor simplification. There are Canadian sources of supply in this field, I may assure my hon. friend, that perhaps he was not aware of and that others were not aware of previously. This is a minor change.

Mr. Benidickson: Could my hon. friend indicate the sources of supply for specialty steel that might be valued at several hundreds of dollars a ton?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think I want to mention specific firms, Mr. Chairman; but I shall be glad to indicate to my hon. friend privately these Canadian available sources.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether it is a fact that where changes have been made in the items under this resolution from the recommendations that came to the minister from the tariff board, those changes have been upwards in the sense of more protection?

Mr. Benidickson: On the steel item.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, on the steel item. If that is the case, surely one factor which the minister gave as bearing on the desirability of change, namely the process of negotiation with the United States, would not operate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is quite mistaken. There are nine changes. Five of them are downward changes and only four of them are upward changes. I therefore suggest, with respect, that my hon. friend is quite mistaken in saying that the broad effect of these changes is to increase the tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: Just on that point may I say this. This matter is extremely complicated to those of us who have been out of touch with it for some time; and even when I had the good assistants whom the hon. gentleman has in front of him at the moment. I confess I always found it extremely baffling. The minister has indicated that there were nine departures from tariff board recommendations. Can he, with reference to the enumerated items that we have in front of us, say which ones are departures from the tariff board recommendations that involve increases and which ones involve decreases?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The four increases are 378, 380, 381a, 382(5); the five decreases are 380a, 382(7), 384, 392a (2)—

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend and I are not talking about the same thing. I started off by indicating to him that at this stage my concern was to establish in committee reasons for departure from tariff board recommendations. I quite admit that with respect to 378a there is an increase as proposed by the minister when one compares that with the recommendation of the tariff board.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no 378a.

Mr. Benidickson: I mean item 378. But when my hon. friend starts to give the reductions in tariff, they are reductions that were recommended by the tariff board.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. My hon. friend is quite mistaken. I am speaking about reductions that have been introduced in this resolution as compared with recommendations of the tariff board.

Mr. Benidickson: Just in order to put me on the track here, let us look at item 381 which the minister instances as a reduction from what was recommended by the tariff board. Where does that come in? My quick checking indicates that the resolution was in accord with what the tariff board recommended.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I suppose we can jump around in this way, Mr. Chairman; but I thought my hon. friend was asking that we take these items individually.

Mr. Benidickson: That is quite right. But we had a broad statement that there were five reductions and four increases. I just wanted to make sure that my hon. friend and I are not comparing oranges with grapefruit.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would it not be better to deal with these items as we come to them. I gave the numbers of each of those items. Would it not simplify the procedure if we dealt with each of these items when we come to them?

Mr. McIlraith: The point can be cleared up. There was a little bit of confusion as to the numbers which the minister was calling out at this point. He was interrupted and he turned to clarify the numbers. If he would again just clarify the numbers that were reductions and the numbers that were increases I think we could dispose of the point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I gave the correct numbers, Mr. Chairman. I will go over them again.

Mr. McIlraith: I would ask the minister to do that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The increases are in items 378, 380,—there are two parts there; just take it as 380—381a, 382 (5). Those are the four increases. The five decreases are these: 380, 380a, 382 (7), 384, and 392a (2).

Mr. Benidickson: And which would not show on our papers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right.

Mr. Benidickson: This is an item where my hon. friend says there is a decrease from the recommendations of the tariff board.

Mr. Pearson: An increase.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 380 is one where there were both an increase and a decrease.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, that is how I understand it. Would the minister explain that? Would he give us the rates recommended by the board and compare them with the rates proposed in this resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tariff board recommended in their item No. 4b that all wide-flange beams more than 10 inches in depth be duty free under the British preferential tariff and dutiable at $5 per ton under the most-favoured-nation tariff.

Tariff items 380 (2) and 380 (3) differ from the tariff board recommendations in the following respects: First, wide-flange beams more than 18 inches in depth will be free of duty under the most-favoured-nation tariff as long as they are not made in Canada, instead of being dutiable at $5 per ton. That is the decrease.

Second, wide-flange beams more than 10 inches in depth, when they are made in Canada, will be dutiable along with other such structural steels at the British preferential 5 per cent and the most-favoured-nation 10 per cent instead of being duty free under the British preferential tariff and dutiable at $5 per ton under the most-favoured-nation tariff as recommended by the board. That is the increase.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, the place where we find the change is in the wording of 4b. The resolution itself says "when not made in Canada" and that distinction was not in recommendation No. 4b of the tariff board.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Customs tariff—381a. Plate of iron or steel, flanged or dished: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I would like to ask the minister to explain his reasons for departing from the board's recommendation in this respect. From reading the tariff board report I gained the impression that the average value on the product with which we are concerned here is a value of approximately $200 per ton. The board made a tariff import recommendation much below what the duty would be under the proposal of the minister and I wonder if he would give us an explanation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tariff board recommended in their item 6b the rates of $5 per ton British preferential and $8 per ton most-favoured-nation. The rates formerly in effect were: British preferential 5 per cent and most-favoured-nation 22½ per cent.

Following the publication of the tariff board report the government received strong representations from Canadian producers of flanged or dished steel plate, objecting to the tariff board recommendations. They pointed out that the effect of the tariff board recommendations would be that their raw material, namely steel plate, would be dutiable at 10 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff, whereas the duty on their finished product at $8 per ton would be substantially less than the 10 per cent. Since the most-favoured-nation duty on steel plate is being reduced by 2½ per cent it was considered that a similar reduction in the duty on flanged or dished steel plate would be appropriate and consequently the most-favoured-nation rate of 20 per cent is proposed. The British preferential rate of 5 per cent formerly in effect remains unchanged.

Mr. Benidickson: Just assuming that the value of this product is $200 per ton, one can readily see that a 20 per cent tariff, in so far as the most-favoured-nation rate is concerned, amounts to $40 per ton, and under the proposal of the tariff board the rate would have been $8 per ton. There is therefore a very substantial increase in the cost to the purchaser. The reference behind the recommendation No. 6b is to be found at page 107 of the report, where the tariff board, after looking at the situation said:

Plates of iron or steel, flanged or dished, per ton, $5, $8, $15. This recommended sub-item is intended to replace that portion of existing item 380(c) dealing with flanged or dished plate. These forms of steel are not produced in Canada by basic steel producers and normally must be imported by steel fabricators, particularly in the larger sizes, for incorporation into pressure vessels etc. The recommended rates of duty would permit the importation of these important components for pressure vessels at rates considerably reduced from those at present in effect.

I just cannot reconcile that with the explanation of the minister concerning the Canadian product.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would remind my hon. friend that the report of the tariff board was signed on February 28, 1957.

Mr. Benidickon: Just a year ago, or a little over.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a year and a half ago, and we received these representations from Canadian producers which brought to our notice some information additional to that contained in the report of the board.

I also point out that what is involved here is a reduction in the present tariff rate. While the British preferential rate remains unchanged, nevertheless there is a reduction of 2½ per cent in the most-favoured-nation rate, and I am told that this means $5 per ton, approximately.

I can tell my hon. friend that if any situation arises—and he is familiar with the way in which these situations do arise in connection with procedures in the department—where it is found that there is some material which is not available in Canada and that some Canadian processor is faced with a tariff on his material, we will be glad to look into such a situation and if warranted arrange a temporary reduction. However, we are satisfied that these products are available in Canada and that the proposed reduction is fair and realistic.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we have here a forthright statement by the tariff board that after investigation, which of course applied to the time at which they submitted their report, they found that these forms of steel were not produced in Canada by basic steel producers.

I am quite familiar with the kind of information which the minister has in front of him. When I was on the official side I had the privilege of receiving memos and summaries with respect to situations of this kind from some officers of the departments. I think some of the same officers were in fact in office at the time when I was assistant to the minister of finance, and in those notes an indication was always given as to who were the Canadian producers. This information is also invariably given to us in the tariff board reports, so I do not see why there should be any secrecy on the part of the minister and why he should not say that in the last 18 months, for instance, so-and-so and so-and-so became producers of these products and thus need extra protection. I would have been prepared to have given such information from the notes that were provided me in the days gone by.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the information has come to us from a number of Canadian producers; it is not a matter of one or two, and I can also tell the hon. gentleman, with all respect to the tariff board, that we are satisfied that the information upon which the tariff board based the finding which he read was certainly not as complete or as up to date as the information which has been made available to the department in the interval.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the minister would consider having this item stand over, with the pipes and tubes item. I think that would expedite matters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. gentleman misunderstands. You have called item 382, paragraph 4, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, I see, I was thinking of item 384.

The Chairman: Item 382 (5).

Mr. Benidickson: Here again is a departure from the recommendation of the tariff board and, indeed, it is rather a substantial increase with respect to British preference. As I remember it, the tariff board recommended that this particular item, so far as Great Britain is concerned, should be imported free, and notwithstanding the forthcoming commonwealth trade negotiations the administration has seen fit to suggest 7½ per cent. I wonder if the minister would give us some explanation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item relates to coated sheets not otherwise provided. On this product the tariff board recommended a British preferential rate of free, and a most-favoured-nation rate of 10 per cent. These proposed rates are significantly lower than the rates recommended by the tariff board for the other coated sheet. Experience has shown that it is not wise to have the basket item, that is to say the n.o.p. item carry lower rates than the other items covering similar materials and, consequently, the rates proposed here are British preferential, 7½ per cent and most-favoured-nation, 15 per cent, which are the same as the rates recommended by the tariff board for galvanized or zinc coated sheets, and the same as the most-favoured-nation rate recommended by the board for tinplate or sheet coated with vitreous enamel, and 2½ per cent less than the British preferential rate recommended by the board for these two coated products.

Mr. McIlraith: Following that reason, why is the general tariff item lower.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For this purpose, the general tariff rate has very little significance.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the minister for a frank answer to that question.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has said that experience has shown in the department that it should be done this way, but I take it that the same experience is available to the tariff board, who decided it could not be done.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again, the tariff board, when it conducted its hearings in 1956 proceeded on the evidence before it and the basis of the studies made at that time. Those hearings were carried on in 1956, the report was made ready early in 1957, and it was signed at the end of February. This is now a year and a half ago.

I can tell the Leader of the Opposition also that I have been impressed with the wide range of items which have, naturally, demanded attention in the light of the numerous reports of the tariff board with which I have had to deal during the time I have held this office, as well as the number of changes which are taking place in Canadian industry, with more Canadian sources of supply becoming available.

Mr. Pearson: I may be wrong, but I gather from the minister that he was dealing with a principle in his explanation of this matter, the principle being that as indicated by experience a basket item, as I think he called it, of this type should not be at a rate lower than other items in the same category, and that because of this experience they had taken a certain action with regard to the recommendation of the tariff board. The question I asked was: did the tariff board not have the same experience, and yet it did not bring them to the same conclusion.

Mr. Benidickson: There is another item which arouses my curiosity with regard to this particular matter. I am looking at page 137 of the tariff board's report. I am quite sure there is a good explanation for this, but I recall that when I was trying to pilot legislation of this type through the committee I invariably referred hon. members to the three columns on the left, which were the proposed rates, and the three columns on the right, which were the former rates or the operative rates at the moment. The minister will note here that it is suggested that until this is made effective the most-favoured-nation tariff rate was 12½ per cent. But on page 137, with respect to item 383 of the existing tariff schedule the tariff board report says this:

> The most-favoured-nation rate was reduced to 10 per cent in 1948 under GATT.

Is that arrangement still in effect and if so why would we not see 10 per cent rather than 12 per cent on the righthand side of that page?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is just a matter of numbering. The rate figures which the hon. gentleman sees here, 5 per cent, 12½ per cent and 15 per cent as the rates in effect prior to this budget are the rates that were in existence under item 383(e). He will find that at page 138 of the report of the tariff board. They quote 383(e):

> Sheets, plates, hoop, band or strip, of iron or steel:

B.P.	M.F.N.	General
5%	12½%	15%

Mr. Benidickson: On this item this is what the tariff board had to say:

> The recommended rates for this item are very similar to those proposed for uncoated sheet and strip. The reason for this relationship is that such coatings—as paint—as are applied in Canada do not advance the metal greatly beyond the rolling stage. On the other hand, many of the other more complicated coatings are not applied in Canada and the product must be imported. There are, therefore, sound reasons for not recommending rates greater than those applying to hot- or cold-rolled steel.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say again that as to any particular situations, if there is a situation where a Canadian manufacturer cannot obtain in Canada a material, that is mentioned here, for use in the production of his product, then we will certainly be glad to give consideration to any such situation and deal with it on the usual temporary basis for production in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps; but he went to his government board, which was the tariff board, and probably spent a fair amount of money to make his case. I think this involves, does it not, some stove manufacturers who did not want an increase in the cost of their product, but it is this alteration from a report of a board before which they have appeared, and sometimes I imagine there are certain compromises in a hearing of that kind, and businessmen go away thinking that they have made the best bargain possible and then they find that the tariff board recommendations are not accepted and altered here on budget night to their surprise and chagrin.

Item 382(7) is another of those items. A former item involved an increase from recommended free to 7½ per cent under the British preferential for whom my hon. friend is always very vocal in saying that he wants to increase trade. This is another item where the tariff board felt that when coming from Britain it should be imported free. Notwithstanding the commonwealth conference, my hon. friend has seen fit to recommend that the tariff be 5 per cent. I wonder whether we can hear something about this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend may not be aware that under the tariff board report, had it been implemented, this item would have come in under sub item 2 of item 382 as cold-rolled sheet and at a higher rate than is proposed under 382(7), under most-favoured-nation tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: Was the old item under 385c?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The old item was 386p.

Mr. Pearson: My information is that the item under which the recommendation was made by the tariff board was 7(g), as appears on page 97 of their report, and reads as follows:

> Hot- or cold-rolled, not more than .025 inch in thickness, containing not less than 2.90 per cent of silicon, coated or not, for use in the manufacture of electrical apparatus or parts therefor.

Under that particular item as enumerated there would have been no duty on British imports.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, but I am afraid the hon. gentleman has erred there. He is talking about something different; it is a different item.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this not recommendation 7(g) of the tariff board?

Mr. Pearson: At page 97.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not in the present wording but is it not the same type of thing? It is goods for making electrical apparatus; it is very expensive, many hundreds of dollars a ton.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I read the recommendation of the tariff board in this matter? It is on page 97, under section 7(g) and it reads as follows:

> Hot- or cold-rolled, not more than .025 inch in thickness, containing not less than 2.90 per cent of silicon, coated or not, for use in the manufacture of electrical apparatus or parts therefor.

Does this particular recommendation not correspond to the one we are now discussing, and is it not true that under that recommendation British imports would have been free?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer is that it does not correspond.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not quite understand why the word "free" is printed under "British preferential tariff" in the resolution as existing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because it used to be 386p, which was free under British preferential.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely, under this item, 382(7) we are dealing with the tariff board reference on page 145 of the report. They said this:

> It is doubtful that there is much Canadian production in the high-silicon range covered by the item.

Has that situation changed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps quite a natural thing that there should be a misapprehension here, since this is a little complicated, but I draw attention of hon. members to the fact that the tariff board, at the bottom of page 97 of its report, in recommending the item that was read by the Leader of the Opposition, has recommended it in "g" with respect to:

> Hot- or cold-rolled, not more than .025 inch in thickness, containing not less than 2.90 per cent of silicon,—

I am told this is a very different product from hot- or cold-rolled with silicon content of .075 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: But my hon. friend and his predecessor were seeking simplification in the number of items in the tariff schedule and for that reason the board recommended that all such items could be included in their recommendation 7(g).

Item agreed to.

Items 383 and 383a agreed to.

> Customs tariff—384: Skelp, plate, sheet or strip of iron or steel, hot- or cold-rolled, when imported by manufacturers of pipes or tubes, for use in the manufacture of pipes or tubes: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. McMillan: This is an item which relates to items 397 and 399. I am wondering whether the minister would give consideration to standing item 384 over to be considered at the time we are considering items 397 and 399?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this question was asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West. Frankly, I do not see the point. I wish to be reasonable about this. We have to deal with this item on skelp at some point, and it is part of resolution No. 3 on iron and steel products.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, may we dispose of the point before five o'clock. The suggestion is made to prevent duplication. The item must inevitably be referred to in the discussion of the items having to do with pipes and tubes and if we discuss this item now we must discuss pipes and tubes, and then discuss them again when we come to the item on pipes and tubes. I think we can eliminate that duplication of discussion by having the full discussion on pipes and tubes.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, to leave the chair in order to allow the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to standing order 15 (3).

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Before the assistant clerk reads the first order, I have been informed that the house will consider giving consent to dealing with some of the items on the order paper which can be handled expeditiously before dealing with other items that may be contentious. If that is the case, may I suggest that we proceed with the second readings of divorce bills. As hon. members will note, there are four series of second readings of divorce bills on the order paper. Is the house agreed that we proceed with these second readings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN WOMEN'S PRESS CLUB

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-8, to incorporate Canadian women's press club.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Have we had an explanation of the bill? I am sure the house would be very anxious to hear the hon. and charming lady.

Miss Aitken: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is just as the preamble states, to incorporate the Canadian women's press club so as to give statutory recognition to something that has been in existence for 54 years. The Canadian women's press club was formed in 1904. I think there were 14 members originally and there are now 600 with 15 branches across Canada. They simply want parliament to allow them to incorporate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course I know the answer to this question but others may want to know if there are any male members of this organization.

Miss Aitken: No, there are not.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

WILLIAM HARRISON TERRY

Mr. Speaker: The third item mentioned to me is the last item under the heading of private bills, order No. 124, consideration of Bill No. SD-199, an act for the relief of William Harrison Terry. Has the hon. member for Winnipeg South leave to move a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before we give agreement I should like to ask if this bill is being sent back to the committee with instructions to hear further evidence in this particular case.

Mr. Chown: The motion I have worded is explanatory in that respect. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browe):

That Bill No. SD-199 entitled "an act for the relief of William Harrison Terry", be recommitted to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills for the purpose of hearing evidence.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed that this motion may be moved now by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

KALJO KLASMAN

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-129, for the relief of Kaljo Klasman—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, on many occasions the house has been most concerned about the method followed in these proceedings and the form of evidence presented in some divorce cases. This case is a contested case, and in my opinion it has been presented very strongly and defended very poorly. It is a contradiction of another case we have been discussing which was presented very poorly and defended very strongly. The case received considerable attention in the committee and in looking over the evidence it is my opinion that we are asked to stretch the bounds of credulity too far when we are asked to rule that adultery was committed.

There are a number of things that are odd about this case and I should like to refer to some of them. One of them is the evidence given by the co-respondent. The second is the evidence given by two witnesses, Mr. and Mrs. Fournier. Mr. and Mrs. Fournier claimed and repeated in the evidence on a number of occasions that they were very close friends of the defendant. They pointed out that they had known Mrs. Klasman for some length of time. It was pointed out that Mrs. Fournier and Mrs. Klasman were very close friends but when subpoenas were issued to Mr. and Mrs. Fournier they presented themselves with no apparent reluctance and testified in a manner which in my opinion is not in keeping with close friendship.

The evidence points out a number of things. First, we should point out that there were two alleged acts of adultery and one of them, not being proven before the Senate, was dropped by agreement. They proceeded with the second charge. In this particular case the story is that the lady went to this party at the Fournier's establishment. Mr. Umblia came to that party later. After considerable drinking, Mr. Umblia and Mrs. Klasman left the party. The next morning Mr. and Mrs. Fournier drove to Mrs. Klasman's house where they were to pick the people up to go for an outing that day. At that time Mrs. Fournier knew where Mrs. Klasman lived. They drove to that address but Mrs. Klasman was not there.

It seems significant that Mr. Fournier testified that he did not know where Mr. Umblia lived but Mrs. Fournier was quite familiar with the address. They went to that address. It was not proven by Mr. Fournier, but only by Mr. Umblia and other witnesses, that they ever arrived at the Umblia apartment. When they arrived there Mr. Umblia, according to the evidence on page 25, said he had been drinking a great deal. He was asked when he arrived at the Fournier's apartment and he said about midnight, but then he added, "I don't remember".

Mr. Umblia testified he had been drinking very heavily on the night in question. Mrs. Fournier testified that when she arrived at that apartment Mrs. Klasman was not fully dressed, to the extent she did not have her shoes on. Mr. Umblia was asked how he was dressed, and he said he was not dressed, but he had his stockings and shoes on. The evidence reads:

Q. You remember that?—A. I wasn't well dressed.
Q. Did you have your pants on?—A. Pyjama pants on.

The implication was that he was not fully dressed and that Mrs. Klasman was there and she was putting on her makeup. In my opinion the evidence that was given in this case is not the type of evidence that proves adultery. It does not even indicate that adultery took place. The woman herself testified very definitely that no adultery had taken place. Although Mr. Umblia testified that it had, he also admitted that he was drunk and on a number of occasions when cross-examined he said he did not remember. He also pointed out that on a number of occasions he drank very heavily on Saturday nights. A question was asked of him if he got drunk. On page 25 we find this:

Q. Do you often get drunk on Saturdays—A. Sometimes, if it is a party.

He did not say he just drank, but he said he got drunk. I submit his testimony is not the kind of testimony you would expect from somebody who would be involved in this kind of case. Mrs. Fournier's evidence does not appear to be what you would expect from a friend testifying against another friend. There is an implication that there might be some agreement between the parties concerned to get this divorce, particularly Mr. and Mrs. Fournier and Mr. Umblia. These people gave evidence because they were subpoenaed, but they gave the type of evidence you would not normally expect friends to give.

I think this is a case in which adultery has not been proven, has not even been intimated. The allegation of adultery is only borne out by one witness who implied it from the state of dress or undress and the condition of the apartment. The implication was that the two parties had spent the night and early morning in this apartment. I would suggest that this is a case where the adultery has not been proven, and I do not believe the divorce should be granted.

Mr. McCleave: Perhaps some of the remarks of the hon. member deserve an answer. I would first want to correct a statement he made, I know it was unintentional, to the effect that the second charge of adultery was not proven and was dropped by agreement. There was no attempt, after one initial attempt at introducing a letter, to prove the other act of adultery that was alleged in the petition and so it does not come before us.

[Mr. Peters.]

In this case there were no professional witnesses. The hon. member mentioned that two friends of the respondent came and gave testimony which was rather damning to her, and he expressed surprise that these people would come in and give evidence which he felt was not in keeping with friendship. I would suggest to the committee that this is a very dangerous point to make. If witnesses cannot be expected to come in to court or into the committee of the other place and tell the truth under oath, whether it hurts their friends or helps them, then the whole system of law would fall into disrepute.

In my opinion the strongest evidence of adultery in this case was contained in a statement brought out in cross-examination of Mrs. Fournier that Mrs. Klasman, the respondent in the case, had admitted that she had slept with Umblia and that she wished to have a baby by him. The other evidence was primarily that of the co-respondent himself.

As the hon. member properly pointed out, the statement that he did commit adultery was denied by the respondent. Perhaps the members of the committee will consider that these two statements cancel each other out. There is no evidence, in the first place, to show that Mrs. Fournier, and she was cross-examined thoroughly, had any unfriendly feelings towards Mrs. Klasman that would cause her to come before the Senate committee and tell the story she did. I think that is a very significant point that the committee must consider. We have the statement of an independent witness who finds the parties in an apartment in the early morning, one in a state of partial dress and the other one making up her face, which I understand is part of the lady's toilet in the morning and which was indicative of the fact she had spent the night there.

There is no attack on Mrs. Fournier as to why she should go before the committee of the other place and make these statements. I think that is perhaps the most important part of the case.

Mr. Peters: On the matter of the two allegations, at page 28 of the evidence before the divorce committee of the Senate we find the following:

The Chairman (Senator Croll): You have made two allegations in your pleadings, Mr. Hume.
Mr. Hume: I would move to amend the petition, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the second allegation. If we have proved one adultery, that is sufficient.
The Chairman (Senator Croll): You appreciate the difficulty in that respect. An allegation has been made and there is a record of that allegation. The person involved might be entirely innocent, and it seems to me a very dangerous practice to make these allegations without bringing some proof.

Mr. Metrick: I object to the amendment.

Mr. Hume: I felt that the proof of one adultery was sufficient and that is what I came prepared to present. Before I came to that conclusion I had advice that that would be in order and that is why at this time I would move an amendment to the petition, to strike out that portion of paragraph 5 which refers to a date in November—

I refer to that matter only because it appeared in the evidence given in the Senate divorce committee beyond the original petition.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member is correct in that statement. You will frequently find in these cases that the parties allege all sorts of things and then strike them out. As I indicated, there was one letter adduced to support the second allegation and the parties went no further.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): In these matters of divorce, with the limited experience I have had in this committee, one of the things that bothers me most of all is the matter touched on by the hon. member for Timiskaming, namely the ability of the counsel in presenting these cases either for the one who is suing for the divorce or the one who is answering the charge or who is contesting the divorce. I sometimes wonder whether we in this house, with all the duties that we have, are fully qualified to deal with this matter. As mentioned by the hon. member, we have the examples of two particular divorce cases on two particular days, and in those two cases the roles were completely reversed. On one day we had an excellent presentation on one side and an extremely poor presentation on the other side. On the next day the roles were completely reversed. I am not saying that was the reason that any particular decisions were made in those two cases but I say it is something to which this committee handling these matters must give particular consideration, namely whether cases of this kind are not decided on the merits of the case itself but rather on the ability of the advocates who present the various sides of the matter.

I think one thing that we must keep in mind at all times is that it is our duty to ensure, if at all possible, that there is no miscarriage of justice. Of course that statement applies both ways. On the one hand we must try to ensure that we do not have a miscarriage of justice by granting a divorce where it is not justified; and equally important, we must on the other hand try to ensure that we do not refuse a divorce if, in fact, it is warranted and by so doing have a miscarriage of justice. I think it is of special importance, owing to the position in which we find ourselves, particularly in this session in which, as I am sure all hon. members will agree, we have not too much time in which to concentrate on any one particular subject. I believe that cases of this kind need the ability of a committee to devote its full attention to the matter and not possibly be thinking of a bill that is coming up next, some speech that may have to be made that afternoon or indeed any one of the other duties we have to face in this particular session.

In this particular case the hon. member for Timiskaming raised some of the points that I intended to raise. I will try to avoid repetition by speaking to others that I recall. I say "that I recall" because of this circumstance. I had my particular copy of the bill and the evidence submitted in respect of that bill. I had it marked in readiness for this occasion and I found that I had mislaid it. I therefore must rely to a great extent on memory.

One point that has not been dealt with yet is the statement given by the co-respondent, Mr. Umblia. I will admit it was not sworn testimony under oath.

Mr. McCleave: Where was it given?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It was made under oath by the other party but not on the part of Mr. Umblia. This is a statement taken sometime prior to the case. When he was asked if Mrs. Klasman had been at his apartment, he said yes. When they asked how often, he said on one or two occasions. They asked what the reason was. He said that at one time he had sprained his ankle and she had visited his apartment to administer first aid and so on and so forth.

As has been pointed out, in these cases it is seldom that we get actual proof. In other words, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax who is the chairman of this committee, you must weigh the evidence; and if the weight of evidence is one way or the other, you must govern yourself accordingly in coming to your decision. When that is the case, you must look at all other factors. As one hon. member pointed out, you must see whether there is a certain pattern of conduct which has developed over the months or over the years that the people have known each other. You must also study or try to understand the matter of motives, namely the motives of the one who applies for divorce and the motives of the one who may be contesting it and indeed the motives of the various witnesses who appear. This certainly is one factor that has also bothered me a good deal about this case.

As mentioned by the hon. member for Timiskaming, we must consider the motives of the two main witnesses in this case, namely the Fourniers and in particular the motives of Mrs. Fournier in the evidence that she gave in this case. I think that we might all agree that the most damning evidence in this case was given by Mrs. Fournier. I think that if the evidence of Mrs. Fournier was not taken into account, not very much of a case would be left. One point that I think could well be of great significance is the fact that during the testimony given by Mr. Fournier it was clearly indicated that on the occasion of the trip out to the zoo or the fair or whatever it was in Magog, or wherever it was, when they called to pick up Mrs. Klasman and Mr. Umblia it came out in evidence there that while Mrs. Fournier knew the address of the apartment of Mr. Umblia, her husband did not. As I say that matter might or might not be significant. But in the search for motives and in the endeavour to look at all aspects of a case of this kind, a matter of that kind could indeed give serious food for thought in regard to the evidence submitted by Mrs. Fournier. As I say, Mr. Chairman, without that particular evidence I do not think there would be very much of a case in respect of this particular bill.

TRANS MOUNTAIN OIL PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. S-6, respecting Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line company.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—subdivision of shares.

Mr. Regier: I would like to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Vancouver South. In taking this bill into consideration we have only one major concern, namely will the passage of the amendment that is sought be in the public interest? I notice from the last annual report of the company that these $10 shares had earnings in the five years of operation as follows: In the first year,—and this was only part of the year, only one-quarter of the year while the company was in the process of getting under way,—there was a loss of 31 cents per share. In the second year, 1954, there was a loss of 84 cents per share. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that these losses per share are after a deduction for depreciation which, in 1954, amounted to $3,245,000. In the third year, 1955, the net earnings per share were $2.05. In 1956, the net earnings per share were $4.65; and in 1957, the net earnings were $5.52 per share. In other words, in the last three years, the net earnings per $10 share have been $12.22. In the first two years there was a total loss of $1.15 per share, so that over all, in the entire history of the company, every $10 share has earned a $11.07.

The point has often been made in the past that when a company's earnings become exceptionally high the company then loves to dispose of those earnings in other than the standard method, which is paying out the dividends earned. One of the ways in which a company can make its earnings appear less, and therefore a little less embarrassing, is for the company to engage in what is called share-splitting so that the net earnings per share do not appear to be so excessive to the general public.

This pipe line is a utility engaged in the transportation of oil from Alberta to the lower mainland of British Columbia. It is a monopoly in this field, and therefore it is up to the members of parliament to be very careful of the public interest. I know the hon. member for Vancouver South has spent many long hours and has been associated with the affairs of this company over a long period of time, I believe, even reaching back to its original organization, and I believe that he would have a more adequate answer to the question I ask than the officials were able to give either to the committee of this house a year ago or to the committee of this house this year. I have read all the evidence that the officials of the company have given so far and they have not yet been able to convince me. I am not sure that at this time I have made up my mind on the position I intend to take on this bill, but I do feel that once and for all we should have on the record a satisfactory explanation of how the public interest will be served if this committee agrees to the request that is contained in the bill sponsored by the hon. member.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few minutes to reply to the question asked me; but the contention in regard to the spliting of this stock is that first of all there will be wider distribution of the stock, and that has been the past history in stock splits. Further, the wider distribution of the stock will be an aid in the stabilizing of the price of the stock and it will not be so subject to market manipulation, if you want to put it that way. The extra shares in the treasury of the company will permit the company to stand on its own feet in future financing. The company is taking this course on the best financial advice that it can secure. The idea is that Trans Mountain will require something like $200 million in future financing to keep ahead of the possible demands upon their capacity.

In their past financing they were carried by five or six major oil companies who guaranteed bonds and interest on the bonds. In the future, according to the management of the company, and according to their financial advisers, they propose to raise the extra money they require through the sale of securities and of stock. Their advisers—and they are pretty good advisers in the field—have told them that if they split the stock and have a stock in the range of between $10 or $20 a share they can go out and sell this stock to the Canadian public. The company is not listed with the S.E.C. in the United States. It is not on the United States stock exchanges and the intention would be, and the result would be, that a majority of this stock would be owned by Canadians.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I do not know just how significant this point is, but possibly the hon. member can explain it. In the submission to the royal commission on energy, a copy of which was handed to all hon. members last week to assist us in understanding this particular company and all its aspects, is a reference on page 1 to one of the wholly-owned subsidiaries of the Trans Mountain Company called the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Corporation, which owns and operates a system in the state of Washington. On page 2 there is a further reference to this company. The company has three wholly-owned subsidiaries called the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Corporation incorporated in the state of Delaware. I was wondering whether there is any significance in this or what the reason is that the subsidiaries of this company should be incorporated in one state and operating in a different state altogether. Is there any significance? If so, what?

Mr. Broome: I do not think there is any significance outside of the fact that companies perhaps find it easier to incorporate in the state of Delaware. I am not a company lawyer; I do not know. But I do know it is not unusual for companies to incorporate in Delaware and that they do not have to incorporate in the state in which they operate.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Customs Tariff—384. Skelp, plate, sheet or strip of iron or steel, hot- or cold-rolled, when imported by manufacturers of pipes or tubes, for use in the manufacture of pipes or tubes: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I asked the minister if he would agree to considering item 384 together with items 397 and 399 because I think it is impossible to discuss item 384 without some repetition of debate. However, since he has not agreed may I say that I have been aware for a long time that representations—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the suggestion was first made this afternoon by the hon. member for Ottawa West. I have no particular objection to it. A request was made earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that we should take these items one at a time. I only wish to accommodate the committee, and if there is a strong wish on the part of my hon. friend to take them that way I am not going to offer objection.

Mr. McIlraith: I think it would save a lot of repetition of debate if 384 could be allowed to stand over and be discussed when we are on 397 or 399, as the minister wishes.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that resolution 384 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Item 385 agreed to.

Customs tariff—386. Plate or sheet of iron or steel, rolled from ingots, blooms or slabs of Canadian origin, when imported by the manufacturers of the said ingots, blooms or slabs (this item expires effective January 1, 1961): British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: In reading the left-hand column table and comparing it with the right-hand column one might assume a reduction from $10 per ton under the most-favoured-nation tariff to free. Am I right in thinking that these products are now admitted under order in council at rates similar to those proposed in the resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Old item 385b is an order in council item.

Mr. Benidickson: I was talking about 386.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The new proposed item 386 is the old item 385b which is an order in council item.

Mr. Benidickson: I am concerned with the words that appear after the description of the item, "this item expires effective January 1, 1961." I did not understand that that was part of the board's recommendation. Has the minister some comment to make on that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is correct in pointing out that to the recommendation of the tariff board with respect to the rates this resolution has added the proposal that the expiry date be January 1, 1961. The purpose of adding this expiry date is to provide an opportunity to reconsider at a later date whether or not it is in the best interests of the Canadian economy to provide duty free entry for plate or sheet which has been rolled in a foreign country from semi-finished steel made in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Items 387, 387a and 387b agreed to.

Customs tariff—387c. Railway intersection layouts, intersections, switches, crossings, frogs, guard rails, of iron or steel: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not find a reference to this in the tariff board schedule as recommended. What is the situation here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Items 387b and 387c were not in the tariff board reference and the change at this time simply represents a renumbering of the former items.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—392a (1). Forgings of iron or steel, hollow, rough-machined or not, not less than 12 inches in internal diameter; all other forgings, solid or otherwise, rough-turned or rough-machined or not, of a weight of 20 tons or more: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: On this item there is a deviation from the tariff board recommendation. I take it that the administration has decided to make two classes. I think they have accepted the tariff board recommendation and rates with respect to forgings 20 tons and under and have made an additional class of those over 20 tons. Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tariff board recommended an increase of 5 per cent in both the British preferential and most-favoured-nation tariff on forgings over 20 tons in weight. Since forgings over 40 tons are not available in Canada this item is being proposed to retain without change the rates of duty formerly in effect on the large forgings over 40 tons.

Item agreed to.

Item 392a (2) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed with resolution 4 and let this one item stand?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have allowed item 384 to stand, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Then we shall let item 384 stand and take it up when we reach item 397.

4. Resolved, that schedule B to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out items 1005, 1006, 1007, 1009, 1015, 1023, 1025 and 1045, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of drawback of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of drawback of duty:

Customs tariff—1004. Steel when used in the manufacture of files: payable as drawback, 60 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: We are now dealing with three items of the drawback category. Am I right in thinking that in all respects these comply with the tariff board recommendations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Items 1005 and 1006 agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

5. Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 396, 396a, 397, 398, 398a, 398b, 398c, 399, 399a, 399b, 399c, 400, 410b, 410d, 410g, 410z and 848, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Customs tariff—396. Pipes or tubes of cast iron, whether or not coated or lined: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: We are now on a new section dealing with tariff board reference No. 119, pipes and tubes of iron or steel. This too was submitted by the former minister of finance to the tariff board on September 14, 1955, I believe. As everyone realizes, there is quite a correlation between the two references. The material that the pipe and tube industry utilizes is involved in the section we have just considered. I think the reports were made by the tariff board to the minister more or less simultaneously, is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the two reports bear the same date, February 28, 1957, and were submitted together by the board.

Mr. Benidickson: Basically, of course, this involves a conflict of interest between our manufacturers of pipes and tubes and particularly our new and expanding resource industry engaged in the development of our petroleum resources. Shortly after his budget speech I think the minister received a protest from the Canadian petroleum association. I have not seen a copy of the protest, but perhaps the minister could give us some information about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have no recollection of receiving a protest from the Canadian petroleum association.

Mr. Benidickson: I am quoting from the Edmonton Journal dated June 28, and which indicates that the Canadian petroleum association felt that not only in respect of certain income tax matters but with respect to—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the date of that?

Mr. Benidickson: June 28, after presentation of the budget. I am quoting from an article in the Edmonton Journal, and they state that while the tariff boosts unfavourable to them were perhaps not large, that is was not a big tariff boost, it was felt to be enough to add to oil exploration and production costs at a time when the industry is cutting corners everywhere in an effort to weather a very difficult period in their experience. I have not a copy of the brief, but I thought the minister might outline it to us. The minister says he is not familiar with the brief?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have been discussing this with the officials and I will check further, but no one seems to have any recollection of receiving any submission from that source on that subject. I might suggest to my hon. friend that the matter he is discussing does not seem to be item 396, in any event.

Mr. Benidickson: No, I am thinking of making remarks which I think are appropriate at this time when we are introducing discussion of this new resolution dealing with a group, namely the pipes and tubes group. As I indicated when we were discussing former sections, I find some deviations in the resolution as proposed by the minister and the recommendations of the tariff board. With respect to this tariff board report No. 119 I am concerned about recommendation No. 2. Where is recommendation No. 2 to be found in the enumeration of tariff items that we have in front of us at this moment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is under item 400.

Mr. Benidickson: In different wording and somewhat altered from the recommendation, is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to say just a word on this particular item, Mr. Chairman, though it really is pertinent to the whole of the resolution. The schedule of recommendations proposed by the tariff board is, I gather, followed in the main. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to let the committee know, as he did this afternoon, where these recommendations are departed from and whether the departures represent an increase or a decrease in protection.

The minister said in his budget speech that the changes proposed in this resolution would involve some reductions and some increases. Later, I think he said in the same speech that the major result of these changes will be to make more effective the protection which is afforded to Canadian producers. We must assume, therefore, that the increases are more important than reductions. Perhaps the minister might, on that other point I mentioned, be good enough to do what he did this afternoon and which we found helpful in the discussion of these items, that is to indicate where there are departures from the tariff board recommendations and whether they are departures upward or downward from those recommendations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, gladly, Mr. Chairman. Here again, as was the case with the recommendations of the tariff board respecting the iron and steel items in the tariff, what is being brought in here is a modernization of the tariff. Speaking of making it more effective we had in mind the elimination of a number of end use items.

The resolution, as compared with the report of the tariff board, contemplates increases in three items and decreases in six. The three items increased as compared with the recommendation of the tariff board are 399, 399a and 400. The six items in which the resolution proposes a decrease as compared with the recommendations of the tariff board are as follows: 397, 397b, 399, 410b, 410g and 410z.

Mr. Pearson: Did the minister say there was an increase in the change recommended in 399, and then go on to say there was a decrease in that same item?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct. If the Leader of the Opposition will look at the columns under the heading "Rates in effect prior to rates proposed in this budget", he will see that there are various rates there and the effect is to reduce some and increase others.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps if the minister would indicate his amendments now, it might be helpful.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, only when we come to 399, perhaps.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the only amendment is with respect to item 399.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—397. Pipe or tubes of iron or steel, n.o.p., with plain or processed ends, whether or not coated or lined: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. McMillan: I have been aware for a considerable time that representations were made to the former minister of finance in connection with the customs tariff relating to basic iron and steel products as well as iron and steel pipes and tubes. These matters were referred to the tariff board under reference Nos. 118 and 119, and certain recommendations were made by the tariff board in connection with pipe. The city of Welland happens to be a pipe manufacturing centre, so naturally I have looked at these proposed items with a view to ascertaining whether or not these tariff items might add to the large number of unemployed we have in that area now.

Under tariff item 384 the duty on skelp for use in the manufacture of pipes has been increased. The British preferential tariff has not been increased, but the most-favoured-nation tariff has been increased from 5½ per cent to 7½ per cent, and the general tariff has been increased from 5 per cent to 15 per cent. I am told that very little skelp comes in from Great Britain or the United States. The pipe mills in Welland are not integrated and they must buy their skelp. The fact is that the increase in the most-favoured-nation tariff of 2½ per cent on skelp will in all likelihood increase the price of skelp, whether it is bought in the United States or at home in Canada.

I notice that the tariff board recommended one tariff item which would be the main or basket item relative to pipes or tubes of iron or steel. It would cover, wholly or in part, such pipes and tubes as come under 15 or more existing items. The recommendation of the tariff board was not to differentiate further in the size of pipe. The old item 397a had to do with pipe up to 10½ inches and item 397b with pipe over 10½ inches.

With the amendment brought in by the Minister of Finance the other night, he has in effect continued to make this differentiation against the advice of the tariff board. The new item 397 in the budget includes about 15 or more existing items and item 399 nullifies most of the protection given under item 397 for pipe 10½ inches in diameter and larger, where the pipes or tubes of iron and steel and fittings and couplings are used in the transmission of natural gas to points of distribution, or in the transmission of crude oil.

I am told that all the pipe made in Welland by Welland Tubes Limited and much of the pipe made by Page Hersey which is in excess of 10½ inches in diameter will come under the new tariff item 397, but this particular item will be largely nullified by item 399.

Having in mind the increase in protection given to skelp, I have prepared some tables showing the decrease in protection given to pipe under 10½ inches in diameter and also pipe over 10½ inches in diameter. I will give them in the three figures, namely British preferential, most-favoured-nation and the general tariff. Under the old rates they were 15, 22½ and 30; under the present budgetary proposals they are 12½, 20 and 30, so that the net tariff reduction is 2½, 2½ and zero. If we take into consideration the 2½ per cent of raw material increase,—after all, the raw material, the skelp that the pipe mills have to buy constitutes about 65 per cent of their cost of production—instead of 2½ and 2½ and zero we would have 5, 5 and 2½ as a reduction in protection. If we take the tariff board recommendation of 12½, 22½ and 30 we have a net reduction of 2½, 5 and 2½ when we take the present budgetary proposals. Hence our manufacturers are worse off under these new proposals for pipe under 10½ inches in diameter.

It is interesting to compare the proposed budgetary rates with the tariff board proposals and the old tariff rate on pipe of 10½ inches in diameter and larger. The tariff board proposal was 12½, 22½ and 30; the budget rate is 10, 15 and 30. Hence the budget rate is under the tariff board proposal by 2½, 7½ and zero. In both cases there is a 2½ per cent increase in the price of skelp, if skelp is sold in Canada up to the amount of the protection that is given. The old rate on pipe—I take it under 397b on pipe of 10½ inches in diameter or larger—was 10, 15 and 20. This budget rate is 10 and 15, so that it is zero and zero. The present budget rate, of course, allows charges of 2½ per cent on the skelp which would increase the raw material in the larger pipe so that in both cases we have these budgetary proposals which are detrimental to the manufacturer of pipe both under 10½ inches in diameter and over 10½ inches in diameter in Canada.

Taking into consideration, as we must, the 2½ per cent increase in the tariff on skelp, the tariff board proposals give the best overall protection to the pipe industry; the old tariff the next; and the present budgetary proposals the lowest. The amendment announced by the minister has the effect of having one duty for pipe up to 10½ inches and another for pipe over 10½ inches in diameter when it has certain uses. This is contrary to the recommendation of the tariff board.

I understand that items 397 and 399 will apply to the great volume of pipe admitted into Canada. Without the amendment to item 399 I think our pipe manufacturers in Canada might have had fairly tough competition from foreign producers. Manufacturers of the larger pipe will not be as well off as they were before. I know that in Welland under the old tariff item it was difficult enough for the pipe manufacturers making large pipe to get orders. The new Welland Tubes Limited plant which was established under the former government cost many millions of dollars and makes all large diameter pipe. Page Hersey Tubes Limited also makes considerable pipe over 10½ inches in diameter. I hear rumours that the former plant is to close down for a period of six months. I am not against a lower duty on pipe but I am against a lower duty on pipe when this government is at the same time raising the cost of production of pipe. The whole matter seems to be haphazard and discriminatory to my mind.

It seems to me that those who build oil and gas lines have monopolies in their particular fields and regions, but they are given very favourable consideration under item 399. I feel that this will put many Canadian workmen now working out of work. The pipe manufacturers claimed that they should have the same protection on all sizes of pipe in order to develop the industry. I know that much of this larger pipe has been admitted into Canada from the United States, Great Britain and Germany. I understand that Germany comes under the most-favoured-nation tariff. I do not know how much more pipe will come into Canada because of this decrease of duty on the smaller pipe and also because of the increase in duty on skelp for the larger pipe but I think in the city of Welland this will tend to increase the number of unemployed. The manufacturer of the larger pipe involves a new industry which is just getting started. I would personally like the government to adopt the recommendation of the tariff board rather than to reduce these duties, particularly since this might put a number of our men out of work. I would much prefer to see our men employed rather than having much of the pipe imported while our men are walking the streets and in Welland we certainly have a number of unemployed men, and this applies to the pipe industry. Granted, Page-Hersey has recently been working steadily because of the new pipe lines coming into operation in Ontario, including the trans-Canada pipe line. However, I understand that the larger mill making the big inch pipe might have to close down for six months for lack of work. I do not for one moment mean that if they got an order they would not start operations right away, but the future does not look very bright for the large pipe manufacturers.

I would like to ask this government not to increase the cost of production of pipe, particularly when a blanket or across the board tariff for pipes of all sizes is not apparently being considered.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks on this item. As one who has had occasion to appear professionally before the tariff board in connection with reference 119, I wish first of all to express the view that the work of the tariff board in connection with that reference and also in connection with reference 118 deserves the commendation of this house. It was thorough and was spread over a period of months; the board was painstaking and heard the representations of the industry and all those who might be affected by the subject matter of the reference before it; it also heard any other persons who cared to appear, and the report of the board was most interesting.

I would, however, like an explanation from the minister on what to me is the most interesting aspect of this matter, because I confess that having attended the hearings, having read the report and studied the resolution before us, I am unable to understand exactly what is the policy of the government on this matter. I say this because the tariff on the raw material for the pipe manufacturer in Canada is being increased under the most-favoured-nation classification from 5 per cent to 7½ per cent. The tariff board had recommended that that increase be to 10 per cent. Notwithstanding that 50 per cent increase in the tariff on the raw material the pipe items with the exception of oil country goods are subject to a sharp reduction.

I wonder if the minister could tell the house why this industry is being singled out by having its raw material duty increased and its finished product duty lowered. Perhaps I should make clear to the committee the history of the old section, which I believe was 397a and which governed nearly all pipe. Each time the Canadian mills increased their capacity to manufacture pipe of larger diameter the language of the tariff item was changed in accordance with that increase. This aspect of the matter is dealt with at page 43 of the tariff board report, which says:

> It appears to have been the policy of succeeding governments in Canada to alter the diameter specified in the main item, 397(a), as Canadian production came into being—from two inches and smaller in 1897, to 10½ inches as at present.

I must say that that sentence perhaps deserves a little further explanation. There was an increase in the size of pipe manufactured in Canada from 10½ inches to 12¾ inches in 1934 and there was a further increase in the size from 12¾ inches to 16 inches in 1950. Those were the only two increases until the time of the tariff board reference in 1955. At the present time all the sizes are manufactured up to 36 inches and the tariff board has said that under the board's proposal item No. 3 would include all ranges and practically all kinds of pipes or tubes of iron and steel. That is to say, they proposed following the practice of governments over the years of changing the description in the item and the language of the item as the capacity of the mills to manufacture larger diameter pipe developed. Therefore their recommendation No. 3 recommended duties of 12½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 30 per cent. In the proposal now before the committee the percentages, namely 12½ per cent, 20 per cent and 30 per cent, almost follow the recommendation of the tariff board but there is a limitation in the description of item 397 as recommended by the tariff board, with the result that a large part now falls under new proposed item 399, with the rate of 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 30 per cent.

The effect is that the tariff board's recommendations are being ignored as to the language of the items affecting pipe. There is a substantial departure in this item from the recommendations of the board, which would have the effect of bringing all pipe under the main item. The larger pipe, which is 10½ inches and more, would have the same duty as pipe under 10½ inches had before the tariff board hearings while the raw material used in production of the pipe will be subject to a 50 per cent increase in duty under the most-favoured-nation rate.

It seems to me that there are involved very serious implications for the industry and I would like to know from the minister what is his explanation for such a sharp departure from the recommendations of the board in so far as they relate to the Canadian pipe mills, both in respect to the language of the items as proposed and in respect to the rates of duty to be imposed.

I should also like some explanation from the minister concerning why the dimension 10½ inches or more was chosen for the proposed amendment to item 399 because in the pipe manufacturing business the variation comes at 16 inches and not at 10½ inches, and I am uncertain why that latter figure was chosen unless it was in the old item which was before the tariff board for consideration and with regard to which they made such a definite recommendation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The discussion seems to have dealt with items 397, 399 and 384 together, and perhaps it would be better if, for that reason, I dealt with all three together in my remarks.

The tariff at the present time has two relevant items; 397a, pipe not more than 10½ inches in diameter, and the rates are B.P. 15 per cent; M.F.N. 22½ per cent; general, 30 per cent. I may say at once to the hon. member for Ottawa West that that is the origin of the 10½ inch diameter which is mentioned in the amendment which will shortly be introduced on item 399. The other item in the present tariff is 397b, pipe more than 10½ inches in diameter, and the rates are B.P., 10 per cent; M.F.N., 15 per cent; and general 20 per cent. It is important to bear in mind that there has been a drawback of 50 per cent provided in the case of pipe used for gas transmission lines.

Mr. Benidickson: There has been; that is being abolished by this legislation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I will deal with that. In addition, remissions have been granted on pipe used for the construction of oil pipe lines. That is the situation as we find it at the time of the tariff board inquiry. Now the tariff board conducted its inquiry and made certain recommendations. As has been suggested already, the resolution contains certain departures from the recommendations of the tariff board and, I submit, for good and sufficient reasons. It should be borne in mind that these are items which, under the terms of GATT, had to be negotiated with the United States, and try as we might we had no chance of coming out of these negotiations with the recommendations of the tariff board inviolate.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate what he did trade, finally, in that respect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not customary to indicate the various stages in the bargaining. We might have to bargain again with the United States at some time, and I think the hon. gentleman will realize that the practice in this respect is a sound one—not to attempt to retrace the various stages in the bargaining. But we did the best we could in the course of the negotiations and I think that in the event, having regard to the fact that there were bargaining and negotiating on both sides for quite an extended period, the result, though not entirely of our choosing, can be regarded on the whole as reasonably satisfactory to both sides.

To turn now to item 397 in the resolution which covers pipes or tubes of iron or steel not otherwise provided, with plain or processed ends whether or not coated or lined, here I intend to confine my comments to the rates under the British preferential and the most-favoured-nation columns because the general rates have, I think, only academic interest. The tariff board's recommendation with respect to pipes and tubes of iron or steel was British preferential, 12½ per cent; most-favoured-nation, 22½ per cent. The resolution now before the committee contemplates the following rates: British preferential, 12½ per cent; and most-favoured-nation, 20 per cent.

It will be seen that we have emerged from these negotiations with the same British preferential rate, and a reduction of 2½ per cent in the most-favoured-nation rate. I am going to make a comment a little later about that 2½ per cent. Perhaps I might just say now before I return to the item on skelp, that this reduction of 2½ per cent as compared with the tariff board's recommendations is offset by the 2½ per cent reduction in the rate on skelp under the present resolution as compared with that recommended by the tariff board.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the minister leaves item 397—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not left it yet. Under the general purpose pipe item, 397, the British preferential rate proposed is that recommended by the tariff board, that is 12½ per cent. I wish to make that quite clear. And I have stressed the fact that the reduction on the skelp item—the material—of 2½ per cent offsets the reduction of 2½ per cent in the most-favoured-nation rate on the pipes and tubes under item 397. The effect of our proposal as compared with the recommendation of the tariff board is, first, to increase the effective margin of protection under the British preferential tariff and, second, to retain the effective margin of protection under the most-favoured-nation tariff. That is the net result of the change.

That is all I propose to say on item 397 and now, perhaps, the hon. member for Ottawa West might wish to ask his question.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that the minister does not, of course, suggest that the 2½ per cent difference on skelp between what was recommended and what he has brought in under the resolution is the equivalent of 2½ per cent duty on the finished article? I am sure he will not want to leave that impression.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not entirely, and not in terms of dollars and cents. Nevertheless I think the hon. gentleman will agree that basically it maintains the difference that exists between the rate on the incoming material on the one hand and on the finished product on the other hand, in a tariff sense.

Mr. McIlraith: Before we leave item 397, I have just one other question. The minister has not dealt with the change of wording. What he has said by way of explanation of item 397 is weakened by the fact—and I would ask him to comment on this—that the item is no longer applicable to the vast majority of the pipes and tubes, because of the language used in item 399. Formerly, item 397 included oil pipe lines, but it no longer does.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 399, as I will say in a moment, sets up a new and special item for pipe lines, and pipe lines alone.

Mr. McIlraith: No; on 397, what I had in mind—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On 397 I thought, from the way in which the hon. gentleman started out, that he was going to talk about the change in wording in relation to fittings—

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —because they are dealt with now under item 400.

Mr. McIlraith: My point was that he compared it with 397a, which previously covered a large percentage of the total tonnage of pipe manufactured in this country. Because of the changed wording, it will now cover a relatively small percentage of the total pipe manufactured in Canada. That is the point I wish to make. Item 397 is no longer applicable to pipe used in oil pipe lines; whereas formerly it covered all oil pipe lines.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is true. That is the point I was dealing with. Item 399 is the new item which now deals with pipe for pipe lines. Item 397 remains the basic item dealing with pipes or tubes of iron or steel not otherwise provided, and we have taken out of the general description the tubes or pipes, fittings and couplings, in 399 used in the transmission of natural gas to points of distribution or in the transmission of crude oil.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think I am making myself clear to the minister. What I want to get at is this. The effect of changing the language in item 397 as compared with the former item 397a is to make this item, which the minister spoke of as the basic item, no longer the basic item. As it existed, the basic item covered a very large percentage of the total pipe manufactured in this country. Under the new language it has become applicable to only a relatively much smaller percentage of the total pipe manufactured in Canada. That was the point I wished to establish.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, item 397 covers all the pipes and tubes—

Mr. McIlraith: Not otherwise provided for.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that the former tariff items 397a and 397b covered, with the exception of the pipes or tubes now proposed to be covered in 399. Items 397 and 399 cover the totality of pipes and tubes as did 397a and 397b under the old tariff.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is correct. Going on from there, the point I want to establish is that under the old item 397a there was this higher tariff that the minister concerned himself with a moment ago. Item 397b was a lower item which, as I indicated, until very recently covered the pipes and tubes not made in Canada. That was the effect of it. By changing the language of item 397 the minister has now made it applicable only to certain limited pipes and tubes; whereas formerly it covered a very large percentage of the total pipe manufactured in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, my hon. friend and I were on common ground that 397 and 399 in the resolution cover the totality of pipes and tubes as did 397a and 397b in the old tariff.

Mr. McIlraith: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now without going too far off the line of argument or remarks that I was about to follow, let me just say here and now, Mr. Chairman, that in the amendment I am proposing to ask one of my colleagues to introduce to item 399 the rates will be for pipes or tubes of iron or steel more than 10¾ inches in diameter, and fittings and couplings therefor, B. P., 10 per cent; M.F.N., 15 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent; whereas, under the old item 397b, which covered pipe more than 10¾ inches, the B.P. and the M.F.N. rates were just the same, namely 10 per cent and 15 per cent respectively. Therefore, we have retained in item 399 in the amended form now proposed the hitherto effective B.P. and M.F.N. rates with respect to pipe more than 10½ inches in diameter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having said that, perhaps I should go on with the remainder of the explanation of item 399. Item 399, Mr. Chairman, as you will see, covers pipes or tubes of iron or steel and fittings and couplings therefor, for use in the transmission of natural gas to points of distribution or in the transmission of crude oil. These are the pipe lines, whether for transmission of gas or crude oil. The tariff board made a recommendation here, Mr. Chairman, and associated with the rates they recommended a proposal for a 50 per cent drawback. They recommended a B. P. rate of 12½ per cent and an M.F.N. rate of 22½ per cent. If you apply to that the drawback of 50 per cent which they recommended, you have effective net rates recommended by the tariff board of 6¼ per cent B.P., and 11¼ per cent M.F.N.

The budget proposal is that the rates be 10 per cent B.P., and 15 per cent M.F.N., so that the hon. member for Welland must see that what is recommended in the budget proposal is an effective increase in the effective tariff rates on the gas pipe lines recommended by the tariff board. I think, if I may say so to my hon. friend, what he overlooked in his argument was the existence of the drawback recommended by the tariff board as well as the fact that there has existed until now a 50 per cent drawback on pipe lines used for gas and a remission on pipe lines used for transmission of crude oil.

With respect to oil pipe lines, Mr. Chairman, the tariff board recommendation was for tariff rates B.P. 12½ per cent; M.F.N., 22½ per cent. The budget proposal is as follows: B.P., 10 per cent; M.F.N., 15 per cent; and on both B.P. and M.F.N. accordingly there is a reduction proposed in the resolution as compared with the tariff board report.

Just to recapitulate as briefly as can be, Mr. Chairman, as to pipe for pipe lines, the situation is as follows: On pipe used in gas pipe lines the tariff board recommended the continuation of the 50 per cent drawback of duty which was formerly in effect. On pipe used in oil pipe lines the tariff board made no specific recommendation in reference to drawback. However, on substantial quantities of pipe used in oil pipe lines, remission of duties has been permitted under the Financial Administration Act. That has been going on now for years.

Tariff item 399, as introduced in the budget, proposed a British preferential rate of 10 per cent and an M.F.N. rate of 15 per cent on all pipe used in gas or oil pipe lines. Since the budget was introduced, representations have been received from the pipe industry pointing out that—this is the pipe industry that the hon. member for Welland was referring to—the item as introduced would cover pipe of all diameters. It is with those representations in mind that I am putting forward the amendment to item 399 in order to limit the item to pipe over 10½ inches in diameter. I remind my hon. friend that the 10½ inches diameter comes from old tariff item 397b. It is now a well-established point of differential in the diameters of pipes for this purpose. The effect of this change will be that all pipe 10½ inches or less in diameter will be dutiable under tariff item 397 which, as I have explained, retains the effective margin of protection between the rates of duty on pipe and on skelp recommended by the tariff board under the M.F.N. tariff and somewhat increases the effective margin of protection under the B.P. tariff.

With respect to pipe over 10½ inches in diameter used in gas and oil pipe lines the British preferential tariff will be 10 per cent and the most-favoured-nation tariff will be 15 per cent. Under the tariff board's recommendations on gas pipe lines the effective rates would have been British preferential, 6¼ per cent, and most-favoured-nation, 11¼ per cent on most of this pipe, so that the item now proposed represents substantially more protection than would have resulted from the tariff board's recommendations. I think the hon. member for Welland must recognize that. On pipe used in oil pipe lines it would be difficult to resist requests for remissions of duties to the extent provided by the drawback item recommended by the tariff board on pipe for gas pipe lines, in which case the rates now being recommended would again provide significantly more protection to the pipe industry.

I have tried to make clear the effect of items 397 and 399 and perhaps at this point it is appropriate that I should say perhaps a brief word about skelp which is the basic material in item 384.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one or two questions I want to ask. Would the minister prefer me to ask them now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will finish this up quickly and then take my hon. friend's questions. On skelp the tariff board recommended a most-favoured-nation rate of 10 per cent but since the rate of 22½ per cent on the finished pipe recommended by the tariff board was being reduced as a result of the GATT negotiations with the United States to 20 per cent it was considered appropriate to reduce the rate on skelp from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent to provide the offset that I have mentioned to the manufacturers of pipe.

The last thing I should like to mention is the amendment to item 399. I have indicated the effect of the amendment so perhaps I might read it now and then ask my colleague, the Secretary of State, to move it. The motion is:

That resolution No. 5 of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom item 399 and by substituting therefor the following:

399. Pipes or tubes of iron or steel, more than 10½ inches in diameter, and fittings and couplings therefor, for use in the transmission of natural gas to points of distribution or in the transmission of crude oil: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Perhaps my colleague, the Secretary of State, would move that amendment.

Mr. Courtemanche: I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: As the resolution is in Votes and Proceedings may I dispense with reading it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one or two questions arising out of the minister's remarks. I understood him to refer to the measurement 10½ inches in diameter as the well established differential between the two types of pipe. The tariff board made a finding on that which I interpret very differently. As I read their finding, they said it was merely a historical point at which the Canadian mills developed the capacity to manufacture pipe of that size, and in effect their finding was that the old items, 397a and 397b, had been changed in accordance with the changed capacity of the Canadian mills. I gave the reference to that a few minutes ago, page 43 of their report.

In their report they recommended that we go further than that because a substantial change from 16 inches to 36 inches in the capacity of the Canadian mills took place during the tariff board hearings. No government prior to the hearings would have made a change in the tariff item because the capacity of the Canadian mills had not changed.

Coming to the drawback item applicable to the minister's argument, I take it that he was referring to 1018a. I think that is right. I wanted to point out one or two facts to the house that I think are relevant. The first is that that drawback item was only applicable to pipe 16 inches or more in diameter. That means that in effect it was only applicable to pipe not made in Canada. They could just as easily have used the language, "of a size not made in Canada", because 16 inches was the largest size made in Canada in 1955 when that drawback item was put in the tariff, as I understand it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, I think my friend is in error there. If you look at page 40 of the tariff board report you will see that under 1018b the size of more than 16 inches in diameter applies only to pipes or tubes electrically welded. It was confined to that.

Mr. McIlraith: That is my whole point. The type of pipe used in the transmission of gas is electrically welded and the limitation of 16 inches is the same as saying, "of a size not made in Canada." That was my whole point. The drawback item was specifically made applicable to a size not made in Canada, and that is my understanding of the matter.

That does not deal with the other type of seamless pipe which is used as oil country goods. That same argument was not applicable to it. It did not have that limitation which was equivalent to "of a size not made in Canada." I should like the minister to address himself to that point. If you follow through the drawback item you will find that as to 1018a there was no corresponding drawback item on the raw material going into pipes of that size if they had been made in Canada but that in 1018, which dealt with oil country goods or seamless pipe, there was a corresponding drawback item in the raw material because they were made from a different raw material.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is much I can add to what I have said with regard to the diameter of 10½ inches. It was well established before under the old tariff as a point of difference between large pipe and smaller pipe. Following our negotiations with the United States, and I have indicated the difficulties we encountered there, we have simply reverted to the existing definition with respect to pipe more than 10½ inches in diameter and the rates which have hitherto been applicable thereto.

As I understand it, the hon. member for Ottawa West is arguing that there should be more protection for Canadian manufacturers of pipes and tubes than is available to them under the resolution.

Mr. McIlraith: No, that there should be the same protection as was recommended by the tariff board.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does my friend take objection to what we are doing on the ground that it provides too much protection or too little? I thought my friend was following the same line of argument as the hon. member for Welland, that Canadian manufacturers of pipes and tubes were now being left without as much protection as they should have.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not believe the minister and his advisers have properly utilized the value of this tariff board report No. 119. The tariff board went into this matter very thoroughly, and I realize that some of the ministers best advisers have to be all over the world at various times of the year and cannot consistently and steadily study some of these problems. You will find in the middle of page 43 of the report that it says:

> It appears to have been the policy of succeeding governments in Canada to alter the diameter specified in the main items, 397(a) as Canadian production came into being—from two inches and smaller in 1897, to 10½ inches as at present.

I do not know why the administration is sticking to 10½ inches as a criterion. After the tariff board has given careful study to this matter, you will find this reference—this is after examining all the people interested in the industry—at page 43, and I quote:

> —pipes of the seamless type are now made in Canada by Page-Hersey up to and including seven inches in diameter; pipes welded (by various processes) actually are manufactured at present up to 16 inches and in the near future will be produced up to 36 inches in diameter.

My question is, if the tariff board attempts to give advice why do we stick to the old nomenclature in so far as some of these changes and departures from the tariff board recommendations are concerned? That is one point.

The other point that prompted me to rise was that we are dealing with item 397. It is inevitable that in dealing with 397 we would also have to consider 399 and, with the consent of the committee, we also held up item 384 in the basic iron and steel group. I do not think it will prove, in the end, an inadvisable step because we will pass them in a group. But with respect to 397, which is covered by recommendation 3A of the tariff board report I was going to raise a question as to where fittings and couplings might be found. The board recommended that these be included with pipes and tubes at the same rate.

I recall the minister, in his budget speech, reviewed some of the activities of the tariff board respecting these and other tariff item changes. He said that the recommendations that would come to us at this time would involve a simplification and consolidation of a great number of tariff items that probably were no longer needed in the quantity that existed in that big tariff schedule. The tariff board referred to this particular item and said that since the proposed item provides for no distinction as to the diameter of the pipes to be admissible thereunder it will not be subject to varying rates on the basis of that criterion as is the situation at present under the many tariff items which, in the event of the adoption of item No. 3, will disappear from the schedule. In other words, the public would receive a much more condensed and simplified tariff schedule, but the minister has not accepted that recommendation. I rise, therefore, to ask, where do we find fittings and couplings? I think the minister, in his very helpful expositions tonight indicated that that will probably be found in item No. 400 rather than as the board recommended—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is found there.

Mr. Benidickson: —in 397. But I raise this question. If fittings and couplings had appeared in 397 as recommended by the tariff board, the British preferential rate would have been 12½ per cent, whereas under 400 it is 15 per cent. I say this is another insidious form of increasing tariffs against the importation of goods from Great Britain prior to a time when we are asking these people to get together with us on commonwealth trade agreements. I just wonder if the minister would explain why he did not accept the recommendations of the tariff board and why he has, as in so many other items of this schedule, rather insidiously increased here and there the tariffs against the British.

Mr. McMillan: I just want to ask the minister one question. What would the duty and drawback be, if any, on electrically welded pipe of 12 inches in diameter? The minister referred earlier to the fact that because of a decrease of 2½ per cent in the duty on skelp, it was a write-off for the most-favoured-nation duty of 20 per cent on that item. I suppose he meant a decrease from the tariff board recommendation, is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I deal with the last point first, the point raised by the hon. member for Welland? There is no change in the present resolution with respect to the rate on electrically welded pipe of 12 inches in diameter for the transmission of gas.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no drawback now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No drawback, not at the present time. The rates remain at British preferential, 10 per cent, and most-favoured-nation, 15 per cent.

Dealing with the point raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on 397, may I say that this is the basic pipe item and has no limitation in it at all with respect to the diameter of pipe. It applies to all pipe, regardless of diameter, except the pipe that falls under item 399. It is quite clear that the British preferential rate is 12½ per cent and the most-favoured-nation rate is 20 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: If it comes under 400 it will go up to 15 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am coming to 400. The only item that takes any pipe out of the general scope of 397 is 399; that is perfectly clear. There is the only place where the limitation is drawn in respect of diameter. I do not know what more I can say in regard to this diameter that was chosen. It is true that Canadian mills are capable of producing pipe and are producing pipe in excess of 10½ inches, but in the larger diameters, Mr. Chairman, you are then into pipe for pipe lines. This is an item which had to run the gamut of negotiations with the United States, these GATT negotiations. I think we have done quite well to hold this item in the form in which it appears in the resolution.

As to the origin of the 12½ inch diameter—

Mr. Benidickson: No, 10½ inch diameter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, 10½ inch diameter. I have already pointed out that its origin lies in the former tariff items 397a and 397b.

I should say a word about couplings. These are dealt with under item 400 and, as has been observed by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the rates are British preferential, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation, 20 per cent. There is no difference in the most-favoured-nation rate as compared with item 397. There is an increase of 2½ per cent in the British preferential rate over that provided in item 397. The explanation simply is that we had very strong representations from Canadian manufacturers with regard to the harmful effects they would suffer if the rates on couplings were reduced to 12½ per cent. They were just the kind of representations that have been received by the hon. member for Welland, which he has put before the house tonight, and the same kind of views as those put before the house by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. McIlraith: There is just one point I wish to make. In referring to item 399 I think the minister used the expression that he wanted to hold the line on oil pipe transportation lines and that the rate of duty was now going to be the same as it was under item 399.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As amended.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; as amended. If he is going to hold the line in that way, I would point out that what he has done is not to hold the line for the persons concerned with oil transmission but he has put an increased tariff on the raw material. That is a matter of some concern when we start increasing the cost of production. Under item 384 we have put an increased tariff on the skelp going into the manufacture of the pipe covered by item 399. Hence if the minister was holding the line—and I am using the expression he used—he should have gone a little bit further and said that he was having the pipe companies hold the line but that he was not having the holding of the line done by anyone further down in the manufacturing business, such as the primary steel producers. I wonder whether he would care to comment on that point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the rate on skelp is concerned, it is true that there is an increase of 2½ per cent proposed here in comparison with the existing rate. But what we are proposing here is nonetheless 2½ per cent less than the tariff which was recommended by the tariff board.

Mr. McIlraith: The point on which I am picking the minister up is as to the reason why he kept item 399 as it was. He said he was holding the line for the oil industry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To continue, Mr. Chairman, I might have added to what I was saying in reply to my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River with regard to couplings under item 400, that when he points out—I was about to say "complains", but I am not sure whether he is complaining about it—

Mr. Benidickson: At this stage we are trying to get information and reasons for departure from the tariff board recommendations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He points out that the B.P. rate that is recommended, which is 15 per cent, is 2½ per cent above the rate recommended by the tariff board, but nevertheless it represents a substantial reduction as compared with the rate hitherto in effect.

Mr. Benidickson: But the board took that into consideration.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The B.P. rate on couplings has been 20 per cent. What we are recommending now is a B.P. rate of 15 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I have just one other question. It arises from the observations that the minister made when we were discussing drawbacks, to which we shall probably come later. I think item 1018 referred to a drawback only with respect to pipe for transmission of natural gas. There were many debaters who followed the minister in the meantime but did I understand him to say that, notwithstanding the fact that the drawback item was restricted to gas transmission there had been a practice of remitting under another provision of the law the import duties paid by those that are engaged in the transmission of, shall we say, oil? I was not aware of that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what I indicated.

Mr. Benidickson: That equalizes the situation which, when I was looking at these documents, I thought was not equalized.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The remission was made under the Financial Administration Act.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 397 carry?

Mr. Caron: I just wanted some information on item 396. I think there was a duty of $5 per ton under the B.P. tariff and now it is 7 per cent on a certain type or pipe. What would be the difference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would my hon. friend care to indicate what particular type of pipe he has in mind? This item 396 contains a re-grouping of two former items with various rate. Would my hon. friend care to be more specific as to the type of pipe he has in mind?

Mr. Caron: I personally do not know anything about pipes. The only thing that surprised me was this. There was a duty of $5 per ton and it has been changed to 7½ per cent. Suppose we take as an example a pipe of any type and compare the price of it previously and the price it would cost today to get it in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that this change might mean a slight increase, but not a great difference.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the tariff board report indicated that the products under this item have a value of—and of course that is two years ago—between $130 and $160 a ton.

Item agreed to.

Item 397a agreed to.

Customs tariff—397b. Corrugated metal culvert pipe, quoted or not: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: This item has no reference to the tariff board report. Am I right in thinking that? This is just a rewording of some kind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; it has not any reference to the report.

Item agreed to.

Item 398 agreed to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps this would be an appropriate point at which we might carry item 384 which was held over from resolution 3.

Item 384 agreed to.

Resolution 3 agreed to.

Items 398a, 398c, and 399 as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—399a. Pipes or tubes of iron or steel, commonly known as "oil country goods", being casing or tubing and fittings or couplings therefor, for use in connection with natural gas or oil wells: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. On this one I want to ask what prompted the minister to recommend a most-favoured nation tariff rate of 10 per cent instead of 7½ per cent as recommended by the tariff board? He has explained some of his difficulties in negotiating, by reason of GATT obligations, with the United States. But this seems to be a new impost against the United States. How did he get away with that at the same time that he found the U.S. people were being rather hard with him on some other items under negotiation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to item 399a applicable to what are known as "oil country goods", the tariff board recommended an M.F.N. rate of 7½ per cent. Following the publication of their report strong representations were received from the Canadian industry urging that this type of pipe be made subject to the rates of duties recommended for pipe generally, namely B.P. of 12½ per cent and M.F.N. of 22½ per cent. The item that is proposed in the resolution represents an increase of 2½ per cent in the M.F.N. rate recommended by the tariff board, with no change in the B.P. rate.

Mr. Benidickson: This was a bound item, was it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this was not a bound item previously, and I think my hon. friend will appreciate that is probably the reason—

Mr. Pearson: —you got away with it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We made the change.

Item agreed to.

Items 399a, 399b, 399c, 400, 400a, 410b, and 410d agreed to.

Customs tariff—410g. Articles for use in the metallurgy or smelting of iron, namely: machinery and apparatus for sintering or nodulizing iron ore, concentrated or not, or flue dust; machinery and apparatus for use in the construction, equipment and repairs of blast furnaces for smelting iron ore, such machinery and apparatus to include hot blast stoves and burners, blast piping and valves connecting the blowing engines with the furnace, scale cars, charging and hoisting apparatus, blast furnace gas piping, cleaners and washers; parts of the foregoing, not including structural iron work, valves ten and one-half inches or less in diameter, nor pipes of iron or steel:

British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 5 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Now we are back to the utilization of dimensions and another differentiation from the recommendation of the tariff board; is that consequential?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This diameter applies not to the pipe but to the valves; valves 10½ inches or less in diameter.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, but the tariff board was prepared to recommend an item without diameter being specified. Why is this restriction inserted. The minister's answer could also deal with 410z.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer applies to 410b, 410g and 410z. In these items the only change from the tariff board recommendation is that valves 10½ inches or less in diameter will continue to fall under these items and the effect of the tariff board recommendation would have been to exclude such valves from these items with a consequent increase in the rates of duties up to 20 per cent in the case of brass valves and 10 per cent to 17½ per cent increase in the case of valves of iron or steel.

The other machinery item, 410d, differs from the tariff board recommendation in that the item proposed will continue to cover machinery and apparatus of a class or kind not made in Canada but used in connection with the maintenance and testing of gas and oil wells.

The tariff board had recommended that these words be dropped since they were largely inoperative because of the existence of item 848 (1). To a large extent that is true, but to retain the coverage of the item for those goods not coming under item 848 (1) these words are being retained in item 410d.

Item agreed to.

Items 410z, 848, 848a and 848b agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

6. Resolved, That schedule B to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out items 1017, 1018, 1018a and 1028, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of drawback of duty set opposite each of those items.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister just put on record the change in the tariff rates which will result from the elimination of the 50 per cent drawback, which hitherto applied respecting items 1018 and 1018a. In other words, assuming that we pass all these items, what was the old rate after drawback and what will be the new rate for the items affected?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that the required answer to that question would be extremely complicated and detailed. My friend will have some idea of the nature of the necessary reply if he will refer to page 36 of the report of the board where he will see that some ten different headings are involved. Perhaps if it is his wish—

Mr. Benidickson: I am prepared to let it pass at the moment. It did seem to me, however, that I had worked out the amounts but I cannot find my calculation. I think that between now and the presentation of the bill it would be possible for the minister to inform the house as to the nature of the change in the effective rate on gas transmission pipe.

Resolution agreed to.

7. Resolved, That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff item 554b, the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty set opposite that item, and by inserting therein the following item, enumeration of goods and rates of duty.

Customs tariff	—	British preferential tariff	Most-favoured-nation tariff	General tariff
554*b*	(1) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, n.o.p.	20 p.c.	27½ p.c.	40 p.c.
	and per pound,	20 cts.	30 cts.	35 cts.
	Provided, that the total duty leviable shall not be in excess of per pound	60 cts.	.....	.....
	(2) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair and weighing not less than twelve ounces per square yard	20 p.c.	27½ p.c.	40 p.c.
	and, per pound	15 cts.	30 cts.	35 cts.
	Provided, that the total duty leviable shall not be in excess of per pound	55 cts.	.....	.....

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, with regard to item 554b, I thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for accepting the tariff board's recommendation of a slight increase in the rates of this item. I also very greatly appreciate his stating, in his budget speech of June 15 last, his intention to amend the definition of the term "dumping" so that the value of the price of foreign products shall include production costs, and a reasonable margin for sales costs, carrying charges and profit.

As the present discussion relates to the textile industry, I take this opportunity of commending the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) on adding 40 more assessors to the staff of the various customs offices in this country.

To come back to item 554b, I may say to the Minister of Finance that the increase, slight as it is, applies particularly to the British preferential tariff. We also note that there has been no increase in the most-favoured-nation rate nor in the general rate.

I therefore ask the hon. Minister of Finance to give further consideration to the possibility of increasing those rates in the interests of our textile industry.

(Text):

Mr. Wratten: Mr. Chairman, I feel I should make a few brief comments under this item with respect to the textile industry and the effects of the tariff upon one of the big mills in my home city of Brantford. What I have to say is in no way a criticism of the minister, because I am sure the changes are the result of tariff board recommendations, but I do wish to draw to the attention of this house some of the problems faced by the textile industry in my constituency—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Wratten: There are wide differences in the rates of wages—

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to stick right to item 554b, which has to do with woven fabrics. We are dealing with specific items and cannot talk on the principle of the bill at all.

Mr. Wratten: Under item 554b the British preferential tariff has been increased from 50 cents to 60 cents, while the others are not changed. I would suggest that British competition is not the reason for the difficulties in the textile industry in my city, but that it is rather the imports from such countries as Italy and Japan which are playing havoc with that industry. Such countries are not affected by the changes in the tariff, and my point is that the wages paid in those countries differ widely from those paid in Brantford. The average wage in our textile mills—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I must bring the hon. member back to the item.

Mr. Wratten: These figures are very pertinent to what I am trying to bring out and certainly the number of employees—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but I cannot allow the hon. member to bring in figures of employees or anything of that nature. We must stay with the specific item.

Mr. Wratten: I would like to ask the minister, and through him the government, if the government would ask the tariff board to go over the tariff regulations so far as the most-favoured-nation classification is concerned. I believe this comes under GATT. My purpose for this request is to see whether they cannot bring in another recommendation to increase tariffs against these foreign countries so that our home factories will be able to continue operations and keep their employees at work. I would point out that if these factories are not kept in operation we will have a considerable number of men out of work—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Wratten: These men in the textile industry—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Wratten: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but that is the point I wanted to bring out, but if I cannot speak of the number of men who are going to be out of work if these factories are closed down there is no point in my saying anything further.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I made some reference to this item when I spoke in the budget debate. The minister introduced it in his budget speech of June 17 and he said this was just a weeny bit of a tariff change. The Financial Post, in an article, subsequently estimated that the effect would only be to add perhaps three cents a pound to the cost of imported British cloth. But I pointed out at that time that to me the significance of the item was that it indicated a trend, a desire and an intention. I said that beyond that, and maybe more important than that, it would probably cast quite a chill on the forthcoming commonwealth conference because we were in this very small way adversely affecting an export from Great Britain—an export which happens to be Britain's principal export to Canada.

We had a visit from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. I heard all members of this house, and particularly members on the Conservative benches, cheering and applauding the Prime Minister of Great Britain when he came to this North American continent and was beyond everything else advocating that we should have economic interdependence, freer trade and lower tariffs. It was just four days later that the Minister of Finance brought in this somewhat chilling trade item—the budget papers in so far as this very important customer of Canada is concerned. As I see the change, it is not something particularly significant in itself—three cents a pound on cloth. I cannot for the life of me see how that would give anybody here a "fighting chance", as some people have said, for survival. As a matter of fact the tariff board itself looked at this, as we imagine they would, very carefully. They had previously considered it, but the new government forced them to look at it again. I just want the committee to be very clear about exactly what the tariff board had to say with regard to the possibilities open to them in this area. On page 42 of their report, with respect to wool fabrics, the board says this:

> Whether or not the Canadian taxpayer should further assist by increased tariff protection the domestic wool cloth industry is debatable, unless, of course, it be on the grounds of national security.

This is the point I want to make. The tariff board recommended this rather nominal increase more or less under pressure from the government to give the matter reconsideration. I said the increase was not significant in itself, but it is very obvious in reading the report of the board that a policy with respect to protection or otherwise for this industry having regard to Canada's other advantages in trading of other products is doubtful, and the board, in its report on page 43, says this:

> Apart, however, from the question of security, in respect of which cost to the taxpayer in peace presumably would not be a prime consideration, the matter of the maintenance in a healthy state of a wool cloth industry in Canada seems essentially one of high policy.

In other words, a decision of this nature rests upon the government. It is the government which must decide whether or not a three cent increase per pound is to be followed by a further increase of substance which might prevent the perhaps inevitable erosion that was predicted not only in this report of the tariff board but in the former report also.

I am simply going to say that I think there has been considerable ineptitude in the timing of the government in its attitude toward this question. They profess to be the party which has the highest regard and consideration for imperial preferences and for special conferences and trade within the commonwealth. We all recall that there was a bit of a muff just prior to the Mont Tremblant conference last autumn when this reference to the tariff board respecting woollen goods was made within a few days of the discussions between members of this government and their counterparts who came here from Britain to discuss the opportunity of widening trade.

Now we are again to have a commonwealth trade conference held in this country, and it is a great honour to have it here. But our government has attacked a trading item with Britain which happens to be that country's biggest export, and I suggest that this is an item worthy of very serious consideration by this committee and by the government.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman may I be allowed just a few words to call the attention of the house to the fact that the constituency of Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm is one of Canada's largest textile centres. In so far as that industry is concerned, the city of Joliette is one of the most important centres in this country. Indeed Pinatel Piece Dye Works and Consolidated Textiles Limited operate large mills in this community, employing large numbers of workers.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance for having raised the tariff on woollen imports from abroad. This will substantially assist the textile industry of this country. I urge him to continue that policy in order to encourage the textile industry and, of course, the workers themselves. As it is, the textile industry has been defined as an ideal industry for this country since, (a) it is at least 50 per cent Canadian owned and (b) it employs the largest number of workers over the winter, thereby reducing seasonal unemployment, (c) it provides goods of a highly necessary character, (d) it may be set up in areas which are not as highly developed as others and, finally, it uses Canadian raw materials.

Once again I congratulate the Minister of Finance for the step he has just taken with respect to woollen goods from abroad.

(Text):

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that it was necessary to adhere strictly to the tariff changes, and I had prepared what was to have been my maiden speech in defence of the woollen industry in the district of South Waterloo. However, I would agree with the ruling of the chair, and withhold my speech until a later occasion when I will be able to deal with the subject matter in a more extended way.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the Minister of Finance indicate what representations he has received from Great Britain since he announced in his budget speech that he had this present intention? We have certainly read some interesting comments in newspapers of importance in Britain, and they did not seem to think that it was a very promising inauguration or preparation for the conference on trade that is about to take place in Montreal.

Such important journals over there as the Financial Times, the Yorkshire Post, the Economist and others have commented upon the minister's intentions very bitterly, inasmuch as an opportunity is obviously being cut off for consultation on the lines of improving trade between one country and the other.

I do not wish to reiterate some of the things which are already on record in Hansard, but I think the hon. member for Mount Royal during the budget debate contributed some very important quotations from some of the most influential journals of the United Kingdom, and it is obvious that they are not taking this in good spirit. I wonder if the minister would indicate just what representations the government has received, and his view as to the extent to which it is likely to contribute to good feeling and effective bargaining at the commonwealth conference we are to have in Canada next month. This is likely to reduce the effectiveness of good feeling and bargaining at the conference that we are to have soon, in fact next month.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief because I hope the committee will allow the remainder of these resolutions to pass tonight in order that we may have the bill introduced tonight and circulated.

There is no need, I think, to resume the debate that we had on this subject during the course of the budget debate. There is nothing new. If the effect of the increase is as slight as my hon. friend has indicated, then it is true to precisely the same degree that any complaints that have been made in any newspaper in the United Kingdom must correspondingly have very slight grounds to justify them.

Mr. Benidickson: Their language does not suggest that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect to discussion between countries, I know my hon. friend does not expect these to be disclosed. These are communications between governments. We do not expect this slight increase to impede in any way the negotiations that will be taking place at the commonwealth trade and economic conference. The position on both sides of the water is clearly understood and I think it is realized that this is but an extremely modest increase that the tariff board has recommended.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about this and I am afraid that what I have to say will take more than the five minutes that are left.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Could I make a suggestion to my hon. friend? Would the committee be willing to sit past ten o'clock, if necessary, so that my hon. friend could complete his remarks and have the bill introduced tonight, or would my friend be willing to make his remarks on the bill, either on second reading or on the appropriate clause of the bill when we have it introduced? He would have the same freedom on that clause in the bill.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the difficulty about that is that we are opposed to this particular resolution and since we take that position we wish to establish the reason why we are opposed to it, and I do not think that can be done in the five minutes that are left tonight. This I think is the place to do it, Mr. Chairman, because we have already been informed this session that if we have any general observations to make we should make them on the resolution. This I would like to do at this stage, but I certainly cannot do it in five minutes. However, I do want to indicate in the time that is available some of the reasons why we will not be able to support this particular resolution.

The minister has said that it is a very modest, very small increase. If it is a small increase, it is not going to do very much to help the Canadian woollen industry. The minister might also have said that this increase applies only to British imports and has no effect on the most-favoured-nation clause and therefore on other imports. As it happens, and as the minister knows, the British have not even been holding their share of this market; whereas imports from other countries, more particularly from Italy, have been increasing.

We know that the minister and the government are negotiating to maintain the margin between the British preferential rate and the M.F.N. rate and, as he has already indicated to us this afternoon in connection with another item, in that process of negotiations the proposal which they make may not come out inviolate and therefore for that reason and for a good many other reasons we are not happy about this resolution.

It may not be enough of an increase to do very much for the woollen industry but it has been enough to cause a great deal of disturbance in the United Kingdom, as my hon. friend has pointed out, at the very eve of a commonwealth economic conference which will be dealing with trade matters. It seems to me to be a pretty unfortunate essay in international economic policy vis-a-vis the United Kingdom at this time when we are proposing to interfere with the exports from the United Kingdom, on the eve of this conference, of a commodity which represents her largest export to this country, I think something like $35 million worth of goods.

There has been abundant evidence, as my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River pointed out, that while this may be a modest increase it has not been considered in its implications as such on the other side. Even the high commissioner of the United Kingdom, who is a discreet individual and a diplomat and normally would not have very much, if anything whatever, to say on a matter of this kind, is quoted in the Vancouver Sun of July 21, 1958, as follows:

> Britain's offer of free trade with Canada is still open, United Kingdom High Commissioner Sir Saville Garner said in Vancouver today.
> "It's on the table. Any time the Canadian government wishes to discuss it they'll find a ready response in the United Kingdom".

When he was asked about the British reaction to Canada's increase in wool tariff, which was announced in the minister's budget, he replied:

> "No comment".

This is the kind of comment you would expect from a discreet and experienced diplomat. Apparently his feelings were too much for him because he added:

> We were inevitably disappointed—especially at a time when the United Kingdom is trying to work up enthusiasm to come into this market.

And, Mr. Chairman, they have been encouraged by this government to work up excitement and enthusiasm. The Chairman of the National Wool Textile Export Corporation of Bradford, Yorkshire, states in regard to this increased duty:

> The Canadian tariff board's recommendation is incomprehensible,—

That is the recommendation which is embodied in this resolution. I continue:

> —especially at a time when the British share of the Canadian woollens market has been stable while the foreign share has been rapidly increasing.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The president of the Huddersfield chamber of commerce, which is in the very heart of the British woollen industry, said at the same time:

> The recommendation of the tariff board—

Which is now the policy of the government. I continue:

> —is not only disappointing, but inexplicable. Both the British and Canadian governments are expressing a desire to encourage trade between the two countries. It is not an encouragement when an increased duty is recommended on one of our largest exports.

Therefore, this matter is not considered as one of no importance in the United Kingdom especially, as I say, on the eve of the commonwealth economic conference. For this reason, and because it is not going to give any substantial help to the Canadian industry, and it is not meant to save the Canadian industry, as the tariff board report states very frankly, because, in negotiating with other countries under the M.F.N. clause, especially Italy, we can get ourselves into trouble in regard to exports from this country; for these and for a good many other reasons which I may have an opportunity to refer to on another occasion, I cannot support this resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Can this item be carried, on division?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is for tomorrow? I wonder whether he can also indicate what estimates we will be discussing on Thursday, Friday and Saturday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with these Customs Tariff resolutions and then take item No. 4 on today's order paper, the house in committee on Bill No. C-44, to amend the Excise Tax Act. Then we shall take items 8 and 9 on today's order paper, one having to do with amendments to the Loan Companies Act and the other with amendments to the Trust Companies Act.

It is the intention to refer these to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Then we shall go into estimates, commencing with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and then labour and fisheries.

Mr. Chevrier: What about the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: We are planning to take the estimates of mines and technical surveys but not until Saturday. We may also take the estimates of the Department of Transport. I am not sure yet.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.

STARRED QUESTIONS

GEORGE P. LEBLANC—ALEX P. BOUDREAU

Question No. 33—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Were George P. LeBlanc and Alex P. Boudreau dismissed from the Cape Breton Highlands national park effective June 10, 1958?
2. How long had each of these employees been employed by the national park?
3. What was the reason for dismissal in each case?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Stand.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, these questions have been on the order paper for a very long time. They require only factual information, and factual information which is desired before the minister's estimates come up. Surely the minister is now in a position to answer.

Question stands.

STAFF DISMISSALS, CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS NATIONAL PARK

3. What was the reason for dismissal in each case?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to the first question is no. The men listed above are still working at the park.

The answer to the second question is as follows: John A. MacLellan, continuously employed from April 26, 1955; Lester Fraser, continuously employed from October, 1955; Dave Fraser, continuously employed from January 3, 1956; George MacLean, continuously employed from May 1, 1952.

4. What are the estimated total present and proposed expenditures by the United States government on the St. Lawrence seaway, listing the expenditures by project?

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REPORTED OFFER TO PURCHASE VESSELS BY AURA SHIPPING COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The morning press contains a statement that a Toronto firm, Aura Shipping Company, last night claimed that it made a last minute offer of $3 million for the ships of Canadian National Steamships. "Transport Minister Hees said in Ottawa that he had never heard from, or of, this firm. He did not know of any letter which Mark Rashkis, president of Aura Leasing Company, said the firm had received from him." The questions I should like to ask are whether or not this firm did make an offer, what the offer was, and why it was rejected.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I expected that the hon. member would be asking this identical question, so I have a statement I am prepared to make about it.

In November of 1957 an individual signing on behalf of Aura Shipping Company, but using the letterhead of Aurora Leasing Corporation with a Toronto address, wrote to Canadian National Steamships expressing interest in the acquisition of these vessels. They were informed at that time that the ships were not then for sale. The same individual addressed a further letter to the Canadian National in May, again expressing interest. A copy of this letter was also sent to me and an acknowledgment was sent from my office. Subsequently a decision was reached to put these vessels up for sale, and when the Canadian National issued its public advertisement inviting tenders, a copy of this notice was specifically sent to Aurora Leasing Corporation, along with a number of other companies which had indicated interest in possible purchase.

Officials of the Canadian National informed me that in response to this invitation to tender no reply was ever received by Canadian National Steamships from either Aura Shipping Company or Aurora Leasing Corporation, nor did any official of the company come to discuss the matter with officials of Canadian National Steamships concerned with this matter.

However, on July 7 the same individual wrote me again, indicating interest in this matter if the government would be prepared to pay a subsidy for operation of the service. In my reply, dated July 23, I stated that it was not the policy of the government to subsidize vessels in this trade, but that if the company were interested in purchase they should contact Mr. Bromley, of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, in Montreal, as the disposal of the ships was being left in the hands of the company. There is no record of any attempt to get in touch with Canadian National Steamships subsequent to this.

As regards the reported offer of $3 million from this company, as of this morning a letter was received by my department from the Aurora company asking if the government would be prepared to consider such a sum, but containing no other details. My announcement of the sale of these vessels was made in this house yesterday morning, August 12. This further letter from the Aurora corporation was dated August 12, and the envelope containing it, which I have here with me, was stamped at 9.30 p.m. in Toronto. Hon. members may, I think, draw their own conclusions from this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question after all that applause, and it is this. Did the minister receive an offer of $5 million from this firm in Toronto?

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: I would repeat that no specific offer was ever made to the Canadian National by this company in response to the Canadian National invitation to tender which was sent to them. However, I understand that what this company contemplated in any case was not a genuine purchase, but rather an arrangement under which the company would purchase these vessels, the government would then lease them from the company, and would be required to underwrite the whole project financially, not only by agreeing to lease the vessels but also by agreeing to pay a substantial subsidy for their operation.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the minister has certainly come into the house well prepared.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You could take some lessons from him.

Mr. Chevrier: No. I do not think I need to take any lessons, particularly from the Minister of Agriculture, in view of the fact that he fires people without giving them a hearing.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harkness: I did not say a word, but I think the hon. member could still take some lessons.

Mr. Chevrier: The remark came from that direction, and the minister makes so much noise that I had reason to suppose he was the one who made it.

Mr. Harkness: Wrong as usual.

Mr. Chevrier: If the minister is so anxious to give information, would he be good enough to table the correspondence that took place between Canadian National Steamships and those tendering with reference to the sale of these ships?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I do not know about the ethical procedure in this regard, whether all correspondence between a company such as the Canadian National and all those tendering should be made public. I will discuss the matter with Mr. Donald Gordon, and if they are willing and it is possible I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a further supplementary question. Would the minister tell the house whether the purchaser, whose name I understand was Flota Maritima Browning, includes any Canadian citizens, and whether directly or indirectly there is Canadian ownership in the purchaser's corporation.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether they are or are not.

ATOMIC ENERGY

UN REPORT ON EFFECTS OF RADIATION—SUSPENSION OF TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether the interdepartmental committee has completed its study of the recent report of the United Nations dealing with the effects of atomic radiation? In view of the statement in the report that even a small increase in radiation is dangerous to the human race, can the Prime Minister say whether Canada is now pressing for the suspension of further nuclear tests?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his intention to ask these two questions. My information is that the interdepartmental committee has completed its study, and I hope that tomorrow the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be able to deal with this phase of the question.

As to the second part of the question may I say that following the report of the United Nations scientific committee which was set up by the general assembly in December of 1955, full consideration will be given to the suggestions therein. That committee was composed of scientific experts from 15 nations, including Canada, to consider the general question of the relationship of this hazard to an agreement on the cessation of nuclear tests. The viewpoint of the government has been frequently expressed, and that viewpoint is that a political agreement on the suspension of atomic tests would be desirable. In that connection I would like to point out that I dealt with this matter on April 16 last in the following words:

> My hope is that the nations of the free world will announce in the immediate future their desire and willingness to discontinue nuclear tests, except for the application of known explosive techniques to peaceful purposes, provided that there is suitable international supervision.

I made that statement in the course of an address delivered to the Canadian Press in the city of Toronto, and it still represents the viewpoint of this government. We do not underestimate the difficulties of reaching an agreement on the cessation of tests. We must at all times bear in mind the very important considerations of western security; and if the U.S.S.R. desires and is willing to accept what has frequently been suggested as a sound basis and as a preliminary to the cessation of such tests, a necessary element as I see it, in order to secure agreement in this direction would be the recognition by the U.S.S.R. of the principle of international supervision.

Inspection will assure security and when security is assured action should certainly be taken in this connection. While the U.S.S.R. today says it is very much in favour of the cessation of tests, it must not be forgotten that the expression of this viewpoint by the U.S.S.R. was preceded by a succession of tests, and only after numerous such tests did the U.S.S.R. say that it was suspending tests.

I believe that the achievement of agreement on cessation of tests is necessary, and to that end we shall bend our every effort. At the same time we must be sure that through supervision and inspection on both sides the promise of cessation will be assuredly maintained.

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Macdonald (Kings): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the government considering the establishment of a national historic park in Prince Edward Island and, if so, what progress has been made to this end?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I would like to thank the hon. member for having sent me this question yesterday. The question of establishing Fort Amherst or Fort LaJoie as a national historic park has been considered by the historic sites and monuments board of Canada at different times since 1920. At its last meeting in May, 1958, the board, which advises me on all historic matters of national moment, considered favourably the establishment of a national historic park on the island.

As the matter of establishing such a park depends upon the province providing the land free of encumbrance to the federal government, I wrote on June 25, 1958, to Premier Matheson saying that if the province acquired a suitable tract of land and was prepared to turn it over to the federal government free of encumbrance, I would be prepared to recommend that this land be accepted in trust by the nation and developed as a national historic park.

As yet I have not had a reply from Premier Matheson to this letter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOW-FLYING AIRCRAFT—COMPLAINTS OF PUBLIC INCONVENIENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to a minister who, I know, subscribes to the doctrine that every Canadian's home is his castle. Has the Minister of National Defence received any complaints with respect to inconvenience and annoyance occasioned Canadian citizens by the low flying of jet aircraft over towns or other populated areas?

Second, if information as to the place, date and time of such low flying is supplied the department, can the Royal Canadian Air Force identify the plane causing the annoyance and, if so, what action is taken to protect the quiet enjoyment of life which is the right of every Canadian citizen?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. From time to time complaints have been received, and provided there is sufficient information given an investigation is carried out to determine whether there has been any breach of the regulations. If there has been any breach of the regulations, disciplinary action is taken against the parties concerned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DOMINION RIFLE SHOOT—REFERENCE TO HON. MEMBER FOR COLCHESTER-HANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the creditable showing yesterday by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants at the Dominion Rifle Association shoot at Connaught ranges, when he posted 74 points out of a possible 75, would the minister consent to assign him as a bodyguard to accompany the hon. member for Essex East on his tour of the Middle East?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member on his skill at rifle shooting; but if he accompanies the hon. member for Essex East to the Middle East he will have to go unarmed and without expense to the public. In those circumstances I think the two hon. members concerned had better arrange details.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

AVAILABILITY OF NEW "PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State but before I do so I should like, with your permission, to apologize to the house for misinforming hon. members about the Parliamentary Guide. It came to my notice after I made an observation on August 2 that in fact the Parliamentary Guide for the last parliament did come out. It came out at a time when I at least was otherwise occupied, and never came to my attention. What I wanted to ask the Secretary of State—and again I recognize that this is an unofficial publication but I understand it is subsidized—was whether he had any information with respect as to when the new Parliamentary Guide is going to be available.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): I shall inquire and let the hon. member know.

BRIDGES

NIAGARA RIVER—STATEMENT ON GRANTING OF DOMINION CHARTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer a question which was directed to me by the hon. member for Niagara Falls on August 6.

No application for incorporation under part 1 of the Companies Act has been made to the Department of the Secretary of State. I would expect that if incorporation were to be obtained it would be by special act of the parliament of Canada, or perhaps of Ontario.

GRAIN

APPLICATION FOR INCREASED HANDLING CHARGES—ESTABLISHMENT OF BUYING PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say whether he has yet received a report from the board of grain commissioners as a result of the application made by the elevator companies for increased handling charges? Is he able to assure the country that there will be no such increase this year?

I wonder if I might ask the minister a second question; whether the wheat board has yet been able to establish buying prices for grain this year and, if not, whether those prices will be established within the next few days.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In answer to the first part of the question, I have not yet received such a report from the board of grain commissioners. In answer to the second part, I have been advised that the wheat board has established buying prices for the various grades of wheat it sells, and an announcement to this effect will be made very shortly.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. I wonder if the minister is able to say now whether those buying prices will be the same as last year or whether there would be some differences.

Mr. Churchill: When the announcement is made and the prices are published a comparison can be made with the prices for last year, but I have not got the figures in my head now.

FINANCE

CONVERSION LOAN—INQUIRY AS TO PERCENTAGE HELD BY INDIVIDUALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Now that the announcement has been made that over half the victory bonds have been turned in for conversion, is the minister able to supply us with any information with regard to the percentage of these turned-in bonds which were held by individuals?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no such figures are available as yet. It will probably be after the campaign is over before there will be time to complete such figures, but there are some indications already in the light of the returns that have been made. I indicated when this campaign was launched that according to the best estimates available—which cannot be absolutely precise having regard to the fact that many of the bonds are in bearer form, but having regard to the individual bonds, the number of pieces of paper outstanding—the best estimate of those qualified, I believe, to form a judgment in these matters was that there are two million individual holders of these outstanding Canada victory bonds. I am told that in the light of the recent returns that estimate has been confirmed.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Did the minister say two million individual bondholders or two million bonds held by individuals?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I said two million holders of the bonds. We are dealing with amounts here in the aggregate sum of $6,400 million. I said at the beginning, and I repeat for the information of the hon. member, that the original estimate which I gave publicly was that there are two million individuals, that is, not including corporations, provinces or municipalities, but two million individuals, holding Canada victory bonds, and I repeat also for the hon. gentleman's information that according to the information now being received that estimate is confirmed.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated that he has information to the effect that approximately two million individuals hold bonds that would be open for conversion. What is the estimated value of those bonds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I said that an estimate had been made by those who in my opinion are competent to do so; but as to the exact amount, I am not prepared to give a figure at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister said he was not able to give the house any information with respect to the proportion of applications for conversion in the various categories. Are we to take it that so far only applications are being received and no new bonds are being issued?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I thought my hon. friend was aware that delivery of the new bonds begins in September. The actual new bonds are not handed to persons applying for conversion at the present time. The procedure is to take the old bonds in and delivery of the new bonds will be made later as the campaign proceeds. There has not been an attempt under the pressures of this campaign to take off exact figures as to the amounts in the four categories that those who are converting their bonds are taking. The emphasis at the present time is on pressing the conversion to a successful conclusion and the results thus far, I am happy to say, are extremely gratifying.

There will be an opportunity after the pressures of the campaign are over to reckon up precisely the amounts of the four categories that the converting bondholders are taking. There are 5,000 agencies that are reporting each day on the conversions that are being made. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that it would be a waste of manpower to attempt to catalogue those precisely every day, but I can tell him that the reports I have received are to the effect that a gratifyingly substantial proportion of the bondholders are selecting the 25-year maturity.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. I am sure that the minister would like to reflect on his previous answer. Does he not realize that two million individuals would represent half the households in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I think it unnecessary to answer that question, which is obviously an argument rather than a request for information.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

7. Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff item 554b, the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty set opposite that item, and by inserting therein the following item, enumeration of goods and rates of duty:

Tariff Item—554b (1) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff 40 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 cents; most-favoured-nation tariff, 30 cents; general tariff 35 cents.

Provided, that the total duty leviable shall not be in excess of, per pound: British preferential tariff, 60 cents.

(2) Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair and weighing not less than twelve ounces per squared yard: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff 40 per cent; and, per pound: British preferential tariff, 15 cents; most-favoured-nation tariff, 30 cents; general tariff, 35 cents.

Provided, that the total duty leviable shall not be in excess of, per pound: British preferential tariff, 55 cents.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, when the house rose last evening I was making some observations on this resolution, and during them I indicated that we in this party would not be able to support it. The resolution, which is based on a report of the tariff board, brings up not only the whole question of the position of the woollen industry in Canada but has a bearing on our trade relations with the United Kingdom. We in this party are very conscious of the fact that on every conceivable occasion the government professes its devotion to anything that will increase trade between our country and the United Kingdom. This particular resolution will certainly not have that effect. Perhaps it does not go very far in increasing the protection against British woollens. Perhaps it is no wolf in sheep's clothing, but its implications both in respect of trade with the United Kingdom and in respect of protection generally are important. It is primarily because of these implications that we are opposed to the resolution.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The report of the tariff board on reference No. 125 on which the resolution is based, gives a great deal of information, statistical and otherwise, about the Canadian woollen industry before it makes the recommendation it does. Anyone reading that report must, I think, be struck by the fact that the members of the board seemed pretty uncertain and not too confident in respect of the recommendations they were making.

In their report they indicate, and present a good deal of evidence to support the indication, that for a good many years now the woollen industry in this country has been declining. There are many figures which bear out that statement. In 1946 there were 100 woollen mills in Canada. By 1950 that number had been reduced to 85 and in 1957 it was down to 54. In 1946 there were 9,900 Canadians employed in this industry and by 1957 that number had been reduced to 5,729. As a whole the operations of the industry are unprofitable in spite, I think one should add, of the efforts of the industry to operate efficiently. There is indeed a declining market. That is shown by the fact that in 1948 47 million yards of woollen fabrics were sold in Canada and in 1956 that figure had gone down to 37.9 million, and the per capita consumption of wool cloth had gone down from 3.78 yards in 1948 to 2.36 yards in 1956.

All this, of course, is primarily due to a lessening demand for wool fabrics in favour of other materials, a demand which has nothing to do with imports at all. It is quite true that over recent years there have been increased imports of woollen fabrics into Canada, but that increase in imports—and I mentioned this last night—has not come from the United Kingdom, which is the only country affected by this change of duty, but from other countries which are not affected by it at the present time; particularly Italy and to some extent Japan.

Despite the increase in imports of woollen goods and woollen fabrics since 1954, the United Kingdom has supplied a decreasing proportion of our needs. In 1954 some 92 per cent of our imports came from the United Kingdom. In the first half of 1957 only 75 per cent came from the United Kingdom. As I have already indicated, Italy has been the big gainer with regard to the increase in imports, and Italy is not affected by this change. Italy has gone from 232,000 pounds in 1954 to 1.4 million pounds in 1956.

We have been informed by the minister that, because that is a bound item under GATT, steps are being taken to preserve the existing margin of preference by renegotiating the most-favoured-nation duties with Italy and, I suppose, other countries.

As the minister pointed out last night, when you go into that kind of negotiation you have to give concessions as well as get them. We do not know what concessions will be required from Canada.

Italian competition, which is increasing in importance in this country, I suppose arises to a large extent from the skilful use of Italian material and the lower cost of operation as compared with Canada, as well as from the styling of Italian fabrics in the low-price field. All these things have had an important influence in extending the market in Canada for Italian goods. If that extension is to be interfered with by negotiation under GATT, and presumably that will have to be done if the margin is to be preserved, the Italians have it within their power to ask for concessions or to retaliate against us.

There at once comes to mind, and I have no doubt there will be other members on our side who will emphasize this, the fact that Italy is an important market for Canadian products, especially fish products. We would certainly not want to support any action which would prejudice that market.

The trend, then, in the Canadian woollen industry, as I have indicated, has been downward in recent years. In 1956, although there had been a good year in the previous year, 1955, there was a drop of 2 million yards in the woollen fabrics shipped from Canadian mills, even though the total demand in that year had increased. I repeat that it is not the inefficiency of the Canadian woollen industry which is responsible. Indeed, the Canadian industry has already improved its efficiency since 1954, and there is a higher amount of cloth now shipped from the mills per worker. Certainly the reason is not excessively high wages in the Canadian industry. Of course the wages here are higher than the wages in Italy and higher than the wages in some other countries, but the woollen industry has one of the lowest paid groups of workers in Canadian manufacturing. If you compare the average weekly earnings for workers in the woollen industry in 1956 with the average for all manufacturing industries in Canada, you find the wool figure is $46.4 and the average for all manufacturing is $62.3.

It was in the face of this situation that the tariff board went into this question and made its findings. The industry, before the tariff board, claimed that because of its higher labour costs—they do not seem to have been excessively high—it required assistance to compete on equitable terms with its competitors. The tariff board, in examining the question, admitted the higher costs in Canada, but the tariff board went on to say:

> It is the opinion of the board that disparity in costs cannot be the sole or necessarily even an important factor in determining levels of tariff protection.

Then the tariff board examined the question—and this is of very great importance to us—upon which I have already touched, as to whether further assistance to the woollen industry in the way of increased protection would damage Canada's overseas markets. In this connection we must recall, and I think I mentioned this figure last night, that when we do something which will make it more difficult to export to this country these British woollens, we interfere with the export of the largest single commodity coming from the United Kingdom to Canada. About $35 million worth of wool was exported to this country from the United Kingdom in 1957. The tariff board had this to say on this point, and I quote from its findings:

> The board appreciates the concern of these parties that the granting of additional protection to Canadian industries would impair the United Kingdom ability to earn dollars which would in turn reduce Canada's markets for her export products.

I must say in fairness, however, that the board went on to say:

> Such cloths—

Those represented by United Kingdom sales to Canada.

> —are only a small proportion of total exports of wool cloth from the United Kingdom.

This may be true, but they represent $35 million worth of exports from the United Kingdom. Then the board went on to say this:

> The board considers that on balance it should be possible without undue harm to Canada's export trade to offer to the remaining core of Canada's wool cloth industry a better chance of survival.

That is all it was proposing to do in the recommendations which it made and which were accepted by the government, merely to offer the industry a better chance of survival. The board did not suggest in its report that the changes which were recommended would save the Canadian woollen industry. It went on to point out, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River mentioned last night, that the maintenance of this industry in a healthy state, indeed its very survival, remains essentially a matter of high policy for the government, and it would not certainly be determined by any recommendations made by the tariff board which are embodied in this resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. gentleman if he would indicate what he would propose in order to meet the needs of the situation?

Mr. Pearson: Well, I do not happen to be part of the government at the moment. Last night we asked the minister if he would indicate why the government was producing this resolution. What had it in mind? What was the basis of its policy? What determined it in accepting this resolution? If he had taken us into his confidence at that time perhaps we would have been in a better position to deal with government policy at this moment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you have a policy you have not declared it yet.

Mr. Pearson: This is certainly no policy, and we are against it. I am proceeding to indicate why, and before I finish perhaps I might even—though it is going to be very difficult, I know—convince the Minister of Finance that in putting forward this particular recommendation as government policy, all he is doing is getting the worst of both worlds.

The tariff board obviously debated with itself as to the wisdom of granting the kind of assistance which would preserve this industry. On page 42 of the report it had this to say:

> Whether or not the Canadian taxpayer should further assist, by increased tariff protection, the domestic wool cloth industry is debatable—

Then the board went on to raise three considerations upon which the assistance might be justified. I thought perhaps the minister, if he had bothered to speak on this matter last night, might have indicated whether these considerations weighed with the government in accepting and putting forward the policy it is putting forward. The first consideration was national security. The board said that such a decision is a matter for consideration on strategic grounds and not one upon which this board is expected to offer an opinion, much less give advice. Nor does it presume to do so. Mr. Chairman, it would be very difficult indeed to justify the action which is being proposed on any grounds of national security.

Then the second consideration put forward by the board, also on page 42 of its report, was economic grounds. The board had this to say:

> It is difficult to see, on the basis of economic criteria alone, that Canada should keep in being, or permit or encourage to grow, an industry which appears to have little hope of competing profitably with its own competitors abroad or of maintaining its place relative to other domestic industries offering greater opportunities for growth and success.

This is a very important statement by the board on this industry. Then the third consideration put forward by the board that perhaps justified increased protection was the social factor. Having refused to pass on the national security factor and having found no justification for increased protection on economic grounds, the board did go on to say, however, that the industry has, and I quote from page 43 of this report—> —a social significance which, while it may lack substantial economic grounding, is not something that may be dismissed, even in these spacious times, as of no consequence to the nation.

Then further at the same page:

> It is an aspect of an economic problem in respect of which only "high policy", in the most literal sense of the phrase, can be expected to come to judgment.

In the light of these factors, or in the light of these considerations, what will the action recommended by the government do to meet them? Certainly this action will not, quoting again from the report of the board, "put the industry on easy street". It will not, according to the board, "keep the industry in being, as a going concern, for an indefinite period in the future". It will not grant, according to the board again, "the protection it (the industry) sought and argued for at public hearings". The protection recommended will give the industry a—> —measure of assistance that will permit it to continue to fight for its existence, at least until such time as there may be enunciated, by the proper authority, a carefully considered decision in high policy regarding the future of the Canadian wool cloth industry.

In other words this is a kind of stop-gap recommendation on the part of the government, something tentative until something else can be worked out. The policy that is recommended in this resolution will not save the Canadian industry. If it will not save the Canadian industry, what will it do? As I said last night, it prejudices our trade relations with the United Kingdom on the very eve of a commonwealth economic conference about which my hon. friends talked so much as being such a hopeful development in commonwealth economic relations. Surely it is a depressing prelude to the conference to take action of this kind, which will do little or nothing to save the Canadian industry but which will offend and anger the United Kingdom on the eve of this commonwealth conference.

I gave some examples last night, some observations by the high commissioner of the United Kingdom in Canada and by two leaders of the British woollen industry, which show that this particular action has distressed, disappointed and irritated them on the other side. Coming as it does after all the fervent declarations we have heard from the other side of the house about the desire of this government to increase trade with the United Kingdom and to divert our imports from the United States to the United Kingdom, psychologically this action must have, and indeed it has, come as a shock to our friends overseas. The reaction in the United Kingdom shows the nature of that shock to be one of surprise and anger.

That is what I mean, Mr. Chairman, when I say that whatever policy we might have adopted if we had been in power, we certainly would not have adopted a policy which is designed to get the worst of both worlds. Because of that consideration, Mr. Chairman, we shall have to vote against this particular resolution.

Mr. Argue: We in the C.C.F., Mr. Chairman, feel that it is a mistake at this time for the Canadian government to move in the direction of higher tariffs, either generally or in relation to British woollens. We believe that at this time in the world's history the expansion of trade is becoming more and more important to the free world, and that everything we do in Canada and in other nations within the free world should be directed not against an increase in trade but rather toward a large expansion of it.

At various times the Prime Minister himself and other prominent men in the western world have referred to the growing Soviet trade offensive. They have said that in their judgment the economic offensive now being launched by the Soviet union and also by China is a greater threat to the western world at this time than the threat of aggression or the use of atomic weapons. If the future of western civilization is going to be tied so closely to our success or failure in bringing about an expansion in trade, surely it is not sensible, logical or in the interests of democratic society that we in Canada at this time should be moving in the direction of trade barriers.

Another reason that this increase is ill timed is the imminence of the commonwealth trade conference. If the government had sincerely felt that this move should be made; if they had felt that there should be a general increase in tariffs against goods from commonwealth countries, surely in the interests of good relations with other commonwealth countries these moves should not have been taken until after the commonwealth conference. From reading the press we know that the reaction in the United Kingdom to this very proposal has been most adverse. We know that prominent industrialists and leaders in the United Kingdom are alarmed at this apparent new trend in Canadian policy. If the government had deliberately set out to impede and block—yes, even to wreck—the coming commonwealth trade conference and the chance of its being successful, it could have done nothing to bring about this result more certainly than what it is doing now.

In the light of the wishy-washy, weak-kneed report of the tariff board, I do not know why the government acted at all. The tariff board weighed both sides very carefully in considering what should be done. Then apparently one small grain of sand tilted their judgment on the side of recommending these tariff increases. With such a pale and innocuous recommendation, the government acted. All that fact suggests to me is that the government will give extremely rapid and sympathetic consideration whenever there is a suggestion that trade barriers be increased. However, I see little or no indication that the government is prepared to act in the opposite direction and reduce trade barriers.

In the history of this nation the Conservative party has been known as a high tariff party. As soon as the Conservative party obtain the reins of office they use their power to increase tariffs and provide impediments to trade. In the light of the government's many promises with regard to its intention to do everything possible to expand world trade and to expand commonwealth trade, Canadians generally all hoped that the government would be moving in the direction of reducing trade barriers, even in the light of its history; but apparently the forces within the Conservative party who believe that protectionist measures should be increased are in the saddle, and they have moved in this direction. Many Canadians also felt that since the Prime Minister himself as a private member of this house, both inside and outside of this house has for many, many years expressed his support of a reduction in tariffs and the freeing of commonwealth trade, this government would not be acting as it is now acting.

I have said that the report of the tariff board on the woollen industry was on both sides of the matter. It did not seem to take a very strong stand either way, though it did seem to recognize some of the very great difficulties now faced by the industry. On page 43 of the report I find the following statement under the heading, "Social Significance of the Industry":

> But—the wool cloth industry is here. It has a social significance which, while it may lack substantial economic grounding, is not something that may be dismissed, even in these spacious times, as of no consequence to the nation. This aspect of the situation is one which, upon humanitarian grounds alone, cannot be written off as plants or equipment can be written off; it is an aspect of an economic problem in respect of which only "high policy", in the most literal sense of the phrase, can be expected to come to judgment. The industry is, by and large, a small town industry. Very often, even today, it is the industrial backbone of semi-rural communities. It is currently giving employment to several thousand Canadians and affording the means of sustenance to their families. Partly because of its long association with scores of localities, it is part of the warp and woof of Canadian life. Often, in its own area, it provides the only openings for skilled or semi-skilled labour.

That is an enunciation of the importance to the Canadian economy, in particular to certain sections of the economy, of the wool cloth industry as it now exists. But did the tariff board do anything? Did they recommend anything to maintain the position of the industry and keep it healthy? It admits that it has not, because on page 44 one finds the further statement that the board is not prepared even to recommend tariff treatment that might within reason be expected to keep the industry in being and as a going concern for an indefinite period in the future. So with all the bad things which flow from what the government is now doing, those who work in the woollen industry cannot from the words of the tariff board take very much encouragement from what is being done, because the tariff board says in effect that little or nothing should be done to save this industry.

As our nation progresses and as we improve our technology through the years certain industries are bound to be adversely affected; certain industries are bound, if nothing else is done, to become depressed industries. The textile industry is certainly not the only industry in Canada which is being affected in this way; we know that this applies to the coal industry and to the gold mining industry. With fixed prices their costs go up, and the gold mining industry is having greater and greater difficulties.

We in the C.C.F. have great sympathy, not for the companies, not with respect to their profit and loss statements and not with respect to the return on investment, but we have sympathy for the people who work in those industries. We feel, as was said in a previous debate, that when the government undertakes to institute policies ostensibly to help an industry, as it has done for example in the gold mining subsidy, consideration should be given to whether or not such help will result in an improvement in the position of the workers in that industry, and will not be pocketed by the company so that the workers from that point have to negotiate with the company to try to get, if they can, a fraction of the aid given.

I would like to see a full national inquiry into the textile industry, into the coal industry, into the gold industry and into the other depressed industries in this nation. I would certainly include agriculture, particularly on the prairies, as a depressed industry.

An hon. Member: The pulp and paper industry?

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but we are not at present dealing with matters concerning general conditions in the gold industry, the pulp and paper industry or any other industry. We are at present discussing a resolution with respect to the textile industry, and I would ask the hon. member to please confine his remarks to that resolution.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I had been saying that I felt a full scale inquiry should be made into our depressed industries, and I had in mind in the first instance the textile industry, which is the industry we are discussing by way of this item. I have mentioned certain other industries, but I agree that any extensive statement or reference to other industries would be out of order under this item.

What I was endeavouring to say was that I would not wish to see one policy adopted for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for adopted for other industries which are also depressed. The objective I would have in recommending such an inquiry would be to enunciate a policy based on whether, after full investigation, it was felt that the industry should be maintained at its present level or that it should be expanded or contracted; but that in any movement of Canadian resources into or out of such industry there should be full consideration of the effects in order to make certain that there should be the minimum of hardship suffered as a result of any changes made.

I believe that if adequate plans were made it would be possible for workers, when their transfer became necessary to some other industry, to effect that transfer without any loss of their property or standard of living. What happens now is that they are sacrificed by the industry which is in difficulty, and there is resultant human hardship. Even if the tariff is increased by the government it is not likely, as stated in the report, to result in any real alleviation of such hardship. In the past the C.C.F. has moved motions in this house asking for inquiries to be made in somewhat the same way I am now proposing in order to see whether or not some type of insurance could be set up to be used by people engaged in industries obviously depressed, and where the maintaining of such industries at their present levels was questionable.

The C.C.F. has given a good deal of thought to the whole question of the textile industry on many occasions in the past, and while I do not want to bore the committee unduly by referring in any great detail to our policy, I would nevertheless like to quote from a statement on C.C.F. policy on the textile industry adopted in this city on March 20, 1957, as follows:

The C.C.F. urges that vigorous government action be taken to rehabilitate the textile industry and to relieve distress, not only among textile workers but in communities hard hit by the textile slump of recent years. In particular the C.C.F. asks the government to:

1. Endeavour to fill defence and other government orders for textiles from Canadian plants before placing any such orders abroad;

2. Eliminate the 10 per cent sales tax on clothing so that total sales of textiles in Canada may be increased;

3. Provide for the orderly importing of textiles through export-import boards and the setting of appropriate quotas which will:

(a) enable the Canadian industry to plan for the future;

(b) guarantee Canadian consumers an economical supply of good quality textiles at fair prices;

(c) provide security for the workers in the industry;

4. Ensure fair trade practices and prohibit the unfair dumping of textiles into Canada at distress prices;

5. Supervise the prices of textiles with power to fix or limit prices if necessary, so as to ensure that neither the consumers nor the workers are exploited by the textile companies;

6. Take action to promote the modernization and increase the efficiency of the textile industry and thus to maintain wage rates and working conditions comparable with other industries;

7. Actively assist in the establishment of alternative industries in communities where plants have closed down and there is no likelihood of their reopening soon;

8. Provide vocational training for textile workers where necessary to re-establish them in other industries;

9. Provide federal aid to help workers relocate in other areas if necessary to ensure full employment.

Those were the nine points that were enunciated as proposals to meet the great difficulties which the textile industry now faces, and more particularly the difficulties now facing the workers in the industry, while at the same time keeping in mind the interests of the Canadian economy as a whole.

Before I resume my seat, I repeat that this type of proposal by the government will do little to assist the textile industry, but it may do a great deal of harm by being adopted just before the commonwealth trade conference convenes. We hope the government will even now be prepared to allow this proposal to stand and not push it through parliament during this session, because we feel that this is the worst possible way by which the administration could deal with what we all admit is a very difficult problem. We think the efforts of the government should be directed toward increasing international trade and increasing the standard of living of all the people in this country, and in that we include the workers in the textile industry.

(Translation):

Mr. Lafreniere: Mr. Chairman, it is with pleasure—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I have recognized the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Anderson). If the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency will kindly wait a few moments he will be next in line.

(Text):

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly not criticizing the Minister of Finance, because he has been of great help to me with his knowledge of the constituency which I serve and the large number of woollen textile firms in my constituency, but again I draw to the attention of the committee the serious plight of the various textile mills concerned, both woollen and cotton, in my area. Three large mills have closed completely, one with a subsidiary in Barrie and another in Peterborough. I may say that these large firms employed 2,500 employees, and according to the last information I had there were only four in the plant. And I received word yesterday that the largest remaining mill in my riding will be forced to close at the end of this month unless something can be worked out during the next few days.

While the management of the various mills are grateful for the meagre increase in the British preferential tariff, no change has been made in the most-favoured-nation tariff or the general tariff, and the reason for the major portion of our lost trade lies in increased imports from Italy, and some from Japan. The effect of these large mills closing is serious, and when I think of the wonderful contribution these firms made to the Canadian economy during war years I wonder where the government would turn in the event of a national emergency for the type of materials which were supplied by two of these very large firms in my constituency. One of these firms, the plant that may close this month, manufactures more than one third of all the woollen blankets made in Canada. The other, which is already closed, turned out a very large percentage of all the uniform material required and used in all the three services.

One of the mill owners, speaking to me a few weeks ago, put it very aptly, I think, when he told me that he realized the government had to plan in advance for defence and in so doing had to spend many millions of dollars. A striking example was the development of the CF-105. And yet, he said, they did not yet even have the pants for the pilots who were to fly these planes. It is my sincere hope that the government will make strong representations to the tariff board that more protection should be provided for the industry in Canada against imports from Italy, Japan and other countries.

The closing of these mills has caused a serious increase in unemployment. My own area has long been well known for its fine textile plants at Galt, Preston and Hespeler, and for the fine products these mills have produced. It is a pity to watch the slow strangulation of an industry which has been carried on almost since confederation, and to see large numbers of people being turned over to the ranks of the unemployed. I sincerely hope we are not to lose the know-how of third and fourth generations of the world's best textile workers, and that is what has been happening in my area, where so many have had to turn to other forms of employment. Their skill and know-how are being lost, and I urge the government to study this situation carefully and make the necessary representations to the tariff board in order to correct this serious situation.

(Translation):

Mr. Lafreniere: Mr. Chairman, it is easy to see that several members of this house are very much interested in the problems of the textile industry.

Well they might, Mr. Chairman, for there are no less than 745 textile establishments in Canada. The industry can therefore be said to be decentralized, a most important feature for the economic life of the country as a whole.

As far as I am concerned, I represent a riding where there is a textile plant, which in 1946-47, was employing about 2,000 workers and has now only 1,200 to 1,300 employees, merely on part time basis, that is, who work only three or four days a week. The same is true, Mr. Chairman, of several larger centres in Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec. A number of towns are in the same position as Montmorency, in the riding of Quebec-Montmorency, in that their economic survival depends on a single industry. And since, in most cases, they are textile centres, if the mills should close down, those communities would become ghost towns. That is why it is essential that the government do something to help the textile industry.

Since we are supposed to speak only about woollens, it might also be useful to mention that in Canada some 54 establishments manufacture wool textile, while 36 of them manufacture only or mainly those products. Last May that industry had 11,000 people on its pay roll, roughly 6,000 less than in 1950. It is sad to note that, in the last four or five years, some 25 factories have shut down and that others are in a shaky position.

Mr. Chairman, this general economic slowdown and this relative lack of jobs in certain areas and industries are what the tariff board had in mind when, last November it launched its inquiry which resulted in recommendations designed to make slight increases and adjustments in the customs duties on British woollens imported into Canada.

The improvement which will result from the adjustments recommended by the tariff board, since implemented by the government, will benefit the public of Canada. Of course, everybody understands that this is a temporary measure, but the government deserves to be commended for taking the only action possible in the circumstances. As everybody knows, we are going through a period where, in spite of the relatively high standard of income per capita and of national income, in spite of the growth in population and increased demand for goods, Canadian industry is losing ground instead of making any headway. Part of the explanation for this seemingly contradictory situation is the fact that world textile production has substantially increased in the last ten years. After the war, Canadian textile manufacturers could profitably market their entire output, not only in Canada but on the international market. Today, foreign producers can supply the demand on the international market at prices lower than production costs of Canadian manufacturers. Accordingly their sole outlets now are on the domestic market. But there also foreign competition is felt to the detriment of Canadian industry. For instance, in 1946, 72.5 per cent of woollens sold in Canada were of Canadian manufacture. For the first six months of 1957, that proportion was reduced to 47 per cent.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, production costs of Canadian textiles are relatively higher than they are in the textile mills of, say, England and Japan. On the other hand, production costs in the Canadian textile industry are not out of line with those of other Canadian manufacturing industries.

It is therefore pretty obvious that this important Canadian industry needs some degree of protection. Its prosperity would benefit all Canada and Canadians. Let us therefore congratulate the government for this proposed amendment to the Customs Act and more particularly for the increase of tariff item 554b.

Moreover, as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech of June 17 last, I quote:

> The government intends to defend Canadian producers against the practice of dumping, whatever form it may take. This will require the strengthening of the present valuation provisions of the Customs Act and their effective enforcement.

As to the increase in custom duties, it is worthy of note that, about 30 years ago, a duty of 50 cents a pound was levied on British woollens imported into Canada. That measure was designed to promote imports of some of the expensive fabrics which were then considered a British specialty, and which were not manufactured in Canada. It was felt then, and rightly so, that the regular rate would raise the price of such fabrics to more than the Canadian consumer would be prepared to pay. Since that type of cloth was unavailable in Canada, it was felt it might be unfair to Canadian consumers and also to British manufacturers.

But, since that time, the situation has undergone a radical change. Prices have gone up to such an extent, on the whole, that practically every British fabric is just as high priced today as were the most expensive ones only a few years ago. As a result, practically all the woollens entering Canada from Great Britain were taking advantage of the maximum custom duty of 50 cents a pound. This had never been contemplated by the makers of the customs tariff and it obviously discriminates against Canadian manufacturers of similar fabrics. After many representations from the leaders of the Canadian woollen industry, the tariff board recommended that the maximum duty be increased to 55 cents in some cases, and to 60 cents in some others. Those duties now apply. They will temporarily alleviate the situation of the Canadian industry.

But, as everyone knows, those changes, as well as other minor changes in the rate of customs duty are considered to be merely temporary measures, pending a complete study of the industry's problems, a study which must be made at the highest level, as recommended by the tariff board.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, it is the government's duty to insure the Canadian industry against any kind of dumping, and, at the same time, to grant it the required level of tariff protection. That is how measures enacted by this government should be understood.

It is gratifying to see that the government has the political courage to implement the advice of the tariff board, notwithstanding the trouble which, as they very well knew, would ensue.

Under the circumstances, I believe that the government has taken a step which can help the textile industry for a time. On behalf of all Canadian workers of the textile industry, which has become necessary to our economic well-being, I express the hope that the government will continue to study that important problem with a view to finding a permanent solution capable of ensuring a long life of prosperity to our Canadian textile industry.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, which was certainly a protectionist speech in the old Tory manner. If the government were to follow the advice of the hon. gentleman we would soon have about the same amount of trade as we had in the last year of the last Tory government. The hon. gentleman congratulated the government on their political courage in bringing forward this measure. I think, sir, that if the government had shown real political courage its members would have gone all across the country and told the people before March 31 that they intended at the first opportunity after they came into power to embark upon a protectionist policy, and the results of the election in certain parts of the country would undoubtedly have been very different.

As I said when I was speaking about this matter on the budget, at least in the old days the Tories were not ashamed of what they did. You can describe Mr. Bennett's approach to tariffs as a boastful one. The approach of the present government, the Fleming approach, seems to be a furtive one, and it is its very furtiveness, bringing in something that is supposed to be so small that it cannot possibly do consumers any harm and will make those of us who oppose it look as though we were somewhat niggling, that in my opinion constitutes the gravest danger of all of this proposal.

This view is not mine alone. I know I cannot quote views that I am not willing to endorse, and I endorse with great enthusiasm the view of Professor Walter B. Harvey, published in that great Liberal paper the London Free Press on July 3. I assume the Free Press published this because they wanted their readers to see that there was this side to the question. The article is headed, "No Excuse for Raising Tariffs", and it says:

> The tariff changes in Mr. Fleming's budget will come as a shock to the high hopes that many Canadians had placed on the new government. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians voted Progressive Conservative last March in the hope that Mr. Diefenbaker as a westerner would not revert to the tariff raising policies that were associated with the Conservative party in the past. Hundreds of thousands voted P.C. in the hope that a party which announced its intention to increase the United Kingdom's share in our trade would do something to make such an increase easier. All those hopes have been disappointed by Mr. Fleming's budget. You do not increase Britain's share of our trade by raising tariffs on one of her most important exports.

The Halifax Chronicle-Herald headed its main editorial on the budget "Back to Protectionism?" This was on June 20. They had this to say:

> After some further probing into the reasons for tariff revisions contained in the federal budget this week, parliamentary news correspondents now are reporting that the Diefenbaker administration has embarked upon a definite policy of protectionism for domestic industry.

I have no doubt that the minister will get up and tell us that this is another press report that is without foundation, but unfortunately the facts are here on the other side of the case. I must say, speaking as one who spent 30 years of his life in the province of Manitoba, that I am not surprised that the minister from Manitoba is not in his seat when we are discussing this item; because I am perfectly certain that if he had gone to his electors in Winnipeg and said, "I am going down to Ottawa to raise the tariff on woollens", the results would have been very different from what they were.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps my friend would allow me to say that at this moment the Minister of Trade and Commerce is attending a cabinet meeting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes, I know; the business of parliament is arranged in such a fashion that it is no longer possible for ministers to be in their seats attending to their parliamentary duties. That was not what happened in former days. That is one of the reforms of parliament. They now have loudspeakers to listen to what goes on here.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. member to come back to resolution No. 7.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact I was diverted by the Minister of Finance, the minister of diversions. But whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in his seat, it is very interesting to observe that not one of all the Conservative members from the three prairie provinces has got up and said one word in commendation of the proposed increase in the tariff on woollens.

Mr. Pallett: Have you checked the trade balance recently?

Mr. Pickersgill: When the vote is taken on this item it will be very interesting to see how many Conservative members from the prairie provinces find it convenient to be somewhere else, as one of the most distinguished Conservative members in other parliaments often used to find it convenient to be somewhere else.

Mr. Pallett: Three hundred million bushels of wheat is a lot of wheat sales in one year.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Peel, with his incomparable knowledge of our commerce, talks about the increase in our wheat sales. He has anticipated a point I had intended to make a little later but I will make it right now. My point is, and the furtive approach is all the more dangerous on this account, that the minister told us—perhaps he should not have told us; perhaps he should not have been so frank—that this was just to be the prelude to changing the most-favoured-nation tariff if he can negotiate a change because it is a bound item.

Now, sir, what country is it that exports most of the woollens to us under the most-favoured-nation section of the tariff? It is Italy. The tariff board pointed out that Italy is a large and expanding market for two of our greatest and most important primary products, wheat and fish, and it is perfectly obvious that if this tariff is increased the Italians are not going to take it lying down. The government has already succeeded in losing the market for our fish in Jamaica, and if they go on by this kind of tariff action to lose the market for our fish in Italy and we have that much more fish to be concentrated on the few markets left after these disastrous policies have been carried on for some length of time, we can see that the social position of an industry which employs far more people than the woollen industry is going to be adversely affected. The plain fact is that in my constituency and nearly all constituencies represented by members from the Atlantic provinces there are fishermen whose main income is derived from the sale of salt codfish.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is all right for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to make a passing reference to that matter, but it is not all right for him to go on and make a budget speech on the fisheries.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not making a budget speech. I am explaining, as surely is my right, why I am opposed to the passing of this item and why I intend to vote against it. I consider that to increase the tariff on wool against the British is a very bad thing in itself. I will say something more about that, though I cannot add much to what was said so admirably by the Leader of the Opposition on that point. But I say this is just part of the policy, this is just the prelude to an increase in the most favoured nation rate against a country which is an essential market for our primary producers. The only excuse the tariff board could find was that this industry had social significance. I sympathize with the hon. member for Waterloo South, and so does every decent Canadian sympathize with any hon. member who represents a constituency which is being adversely affected by the general economic policies of the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: What did you do to prevent it? You did nothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: And this government is doing nothing at all. In earlier days, as was quite correctly pointed out, many more people were employed than there are now. I sympathize with the hon. member—

Mr. Ricard: It started to go down under a Liberal government.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I say, anyone who has any humanitarianism at all sympathizes with anybody in any part of this country who wants to work and is unemployed through no fault of his own. It is important that something be done to meet this unemployment problem. But the tariff board itself indicates that this increase will not meet the problem. The government says it is very insignificant; it cannot really have any effect on anything in Canada, but the external effects are going to be very serious indeed.

Mr. Anderson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: Does the hon. member not recall that the cutback in the big mill from 2,500 happened during the regime of the former government?

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Anderson: My question was, does he not remember that this happened during the time of his government?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course everyone is well aware of what the hon. member for Waterloo South has pointed out. Everybody is well aware of the fact that the textile industry in North America, not merely in Canada, has been going through very difficult times. It was for this reason my friend Mr. Harris, when he was minister of finance, made the original reference to the tariff board. I might poitn out to the hon. member for Waterloo South that the tariff board itself admits that this recommendation will do nothing effective to help this industry, but it will have the indirect effect, if it has any effect at all, of increasing costs to consumers and of jeopardizing markets for many of our most important raw materials such as fish and wheat.

Mr. Pallett: Have you looked at the recent trade figures?

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened patiently to the hon. gentleman speak for his constituents, as is his right, and I speak now for mine who will be affected not in one way, if the government carries out this policy, but in two ways. In the first place, like other Canadian consumers they will have to pay more for their woollens, and fishermen are consumers of woollens. They will have to pay more for what they buy, but they will have to go on selling in a market where we can give them no tariff protection, a market which is threatened by this very policy.

That is the point I am trying to make, that by embarking upon this policy, this protectionist policy, this restrictionist policy, this policy calculated to stop imports into Canada, the government is inevitably going to provoke retaliation which is going to affect primary producers who cannot, in the nature of things, be given any kind of special help through the tariff.

It does seem to me that this would be bad enough if it were going to be effective. When the tariff board admits that it is not going to be effective, that it is not really going to accomplish anything, it does seem to me that we are being asked here to do something which will—well, I cannot for the life of me understand why the government is asking us to do it. It may be that they feel that by making this gesture at this time they will fob off the pressure on them from certain of their backbenchers; that may be one explanation. The other explanation is that they really believe this is an intelligent, constructive policy calculated to give Canadian self-sufficiency or something approaching self-sufficiency in the woollen industry.

The Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, speaking in the budget debate described this industry—I thought he was rather shamefaced in doing so—as an indigenous industry. It is rather difficult to think of any industry that is much less indigenous. The raw material comes from abroad; the machinery in the plants come from abroad, and the skills originally came from abroad. It is certainly not by any stretch of the imagination an indigenous industry.

What is being proposed, if it is seriously intended and if the government gets away with it this time, is to provide really high protection and really to make us self-sufficient in woollens at the expense of other Canadians. If that is so I would say we are embarking upon a most dangerous course. We should know now whether we are embarking on that course. It does not matter whether you look at this from the point of view of the generality of Canadian consumers or from the point of view of those particular industries that depend upon markets abroad—the United Kingdom, Italy and Japan are the three principal exporters to us at the present time of woollen goods—it seems to me that this policy is folly. It is contrary to our interests.

I do want to say something too, though very briefly because the Leader of the Opposition has already mentioned this, about the opportuneness of this gesture. If I recall correctly, we listened from about 1950 or 1951 to hon. gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches talking about a commonwealth economic conference. In season and out of season, every time they could find any excuse under the rules for doing so, they talked about a commonwealth economic conference.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I shall have to ask the hon. member not to continue discussing the economic conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to discuss the commonwealth economic conference, because I have always preferred to discuss things that have happened rather than things that have not happened. As I was saying, in season and out of season in this house, hon. gentlemen opposite when they were on this side talked about the way in which the Liberal administration was discouraging commonwealth trade. They did this at a time when we were doing what?

Mr. Pallett: Nothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: We were lending hundreds of millions of dollars to maintain British trade with Canada after the war; removing restrictions one after another every year, and attempting to encourage trade with the United Kingdom in every way. Yet what do we find as the first positive—no, it is not positive; if anything it is more negative—action of this government? The first thing this government does, and they do it on the eve of a commonwealth conference, is to kick the British in the teeth and say we do not want your exports; we only want you to buy from us. We will let you export things to us if we are getting them from some other country.

Now, if it means anything at all that is what this step is calculated to do. It is calculated to reduce what the Leader of the Opposition pointed out was the biggest single British export to Canada, and what is their symbolic export to Canada. It seems to me we are being asked to embark upon a fundamental change in policy. The last time we did this—and this is another reason why I am opposed to it—was in the month of September, 1930. I sat in the gallery up there and watched Mr. Bennett introduce the first big increases in tariffs. We saw what happened. The trade of this country declined until it became a trickle; that is what happened.

In 1935 we embarked upon a different policy, a policy of expanding trade by every possible means. We saw that year after year our trade expanded. It would appear that in this furtive fashion we are going back to that Tory course again that will lead us into the position in which we were in 1933, 1934 and 1935. It seems to me that we in Canada should not take this dangerous turn.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from one of the main textile centres in the province of Quebec, St. Hyacinthe, where that industry counts 18 factories, and being myself a textile employee, as I worked in one of the most important plants of St. Hyacinthe, the Goodyear Cotton Co., I cannot refrain from saying a few words on a subject dear to my heart.

I would have liked to speak in English, after seeing the crocodile tears just shed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), but, as my notes are written in French and I have only a few minutes at my disposal, I shall express myself in French.

Mr. Dupuis: He speaks and understands French very well.

Mr. Ricard: In fact, he probably speaks better French than the hon. member who just made that interjection.

The textile industry, Mr. Chairman, is one of the most stable in Canada. Employment in the textile industry, which in 1951 gave work to 98,000 people has been reduced to only 81,000 workers in 1956.

You will have noted, Mr. Chairman, that this situation occurred under a Liberal regime and those people are the very ones who today reproach the government with helping out textile workers. Yet, they did nothing at the time to prevent this situation from developing at the expense of the worker.

While in 1930, that industry was supplying 71 per cent of the national consumption, in 1957 it got only 57 per cent of the domestic market, always under a Liberal regime. From 1950 to 1955, still under a Liberal regime, foreign producers were allowed to grab 43 per cent of our national consumption. In 1948, Japan exported 0.4 million dollars' worth of textile products to Canada while in 1954, under a Liberal regime, I repeat, $4 million worth of Japanese textiles were imported into this country. In 1956, Japan exported to Canada 13½ million yards of cotton, that is, the equivalent of 5 per cent of the Canadian production. While the Canadian production of textile products slowed down by 19 per cent, the Liberal government allowed foreign producers to export 24 per cent more textile products into Canada. From Italy alone, during the year 1956, again under a Liberal administration, shipments of woollens amounted to 1,720,000 yards, that is an increase of 140 per cent over the preceding years.

Mr. Chairman, the speeches made in this house by some hon. members of the opposition show clearly that the textile industry's business had begun to decline long before the Conservative party came into power. Some time ago, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) said, among other things, that the Canadian production of running shoes, the manufacture of which is based upon textile products, had dropped from 3,127,222 pairs in 1949 to 1,931,178 pairs in 1955, and this was again under a Liberal administration. Again, according to the hon. member for Shefford, during the same period the importation of shoes went up from 2,000 to 2,200,000 pairs. Mr. Chairman, it is interesting, to see people who did nothing at the time, shed hot tears now over the present fate of textile workers.

I am therefore happy, on behalf of the textile workers of St. Hyacinthe, to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for his stand in connection with our textile industry. About the consequences of the steps he has taken, I would like to quote an article published in La Presse on July 9, 1958:

> About 200 employees of the Penman's mills, at St. Hyacinthe, have been called back to work after many months of forced idleness. Mill manager E. G. James stated at the beginning of the week that production was "almost" back to normal.
> In a letter to the member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot in the House of Commons, Mr. James expressed his satisfaction that the tariff board and the federal government seem concerned with the serious problems of the textile industry. He points out however that the company of which he is the manager at St. Hyacinthe is only indirectly connected with the woollen industry which at the moment is foremost in the minds of our legislators. Mr. James adds that his company is very much interested in the tariffs that will apply to the knitting industry. In conclusion, he conveys his thanks to the federal member for St. Hyacinthe, Mr. Theo Ricard, for his concern over the textile regression and the interest he has shown in ways to protect that basic industry.

Mr. Chairman, the textile industry certainly has not yet solved every problem it has to face, but I trust that the legislation introduced by this government will be such as to give more work to employees of Canadian textile mills.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. White: I did not intend to take part in this debate until the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate quoted from the London Free Press. He mentioned an article by Mr. Walter Harvey of the University of Western Ontario, and he tried to leave the impression with this house that the ideas expressed by Mr. Harvey were those of the London Free Press. I should therefore at once point out to him and to the house that Mr. Harvey is a free lance writer and that practically all the articles carried in the London Free Press are preceded by these words:

> The opinions expressed in this article are those of the writer and not necessarily those of the London Free Press.

The Liberal party, in the speeches of its members today on tariff item 554b dealing with the woollen cloth industry, has demonstrated to Canadians—both industry and labour—that this industry is expendable. This is an industry which ever since confederation has employed a large number of workers in this country. Just to give the house an idea of some of the expressions of opinion voiced by Mr. Walter Harvey, I would like to mention two such expressions of opinion which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not quote. The first of these is as follows:

> If the Canadian producers really need a 50 per cent duty, they must be inefficient.

And secondly he has this to say in the London Free Press of July 3 last:

> The lower wages paid to workers in Britain, or in Hong Kong for that matter, have nothing to do with the case. The Canadian woollen industry is not in competition for labour with any industry outside Canada. Wages are high in Canada because we have some efficient industries that can pay high wages and meet all comers in the markets of the world.

I should not say that I am amazed because the Liberal party is following the policy it has verbally espoused for many long years. However, when it was in power it did not practise that policy, and in fact gave a great deal of high protection to some industries which did not need it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. White: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is perfectly satisfactory. I always do.

Mr. Benidickson: And he did this morning.

Mr. White: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is at his best when he is interrupting people.

Mr. Benidickson: I think he is at his best when he is interrupted.

Mr. White: However, I was just saying, Mr. Chairman, that the Liberal party has indicated to this house that the Canadian woollen cloth industry is expendable. I think it has also failed to realize that in June of 1957 and in March of this year the Canadian people very plainly told the Liberals that they had had enough of this nonsense which had been going on for 22 years and as soon as the Liberals wake up to the voice of the people they will cease saying the things they said this morning about Canadian industry.

I was also interested to hear the views of the C.C.F. party. That party stayed on the fence; it shed crocodile tears for the workers but indicated it had no interest in the industry. Where does that get us? I think the Canadian people pretty well caught up to the C.C.F. in the last two elections, and I am just waiting to see the results of the next one.

I would also like to say that I am amazed at the opinions expressed by Mr. Walter Harvey, who professes to know so much and yet in some of his writings has revealed how little he knows about the political and economic facts of life in Canada. In this article he has demonstrated a very biased political opinion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member now permit a question? Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Liberal party had given more protection than was necessary to a number of industries?

Mr. White: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member tell us which were those industries?

Mr. White: No, I am not going to.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not think he would.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the debate on the proposed amendment to tariff item 554b has been very interesting and useful contributions have been made by a number of hon. members who have come to this house from constituencies in which the textile industry is a very important factor in the economy of the local area and who have spoken with great authority as to the conditions in that industry.

Speeches were also made by the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I suppose if we were thinking in terms of sport we could say that the Leader of the Opposition had undertaken to demonstrate his dexterity at skating because if ever a member skated around a question, the Leader of the Opposition this morning skated around this one. He talked about various sides of the problem but he did not linger on any one of them; he talked about the industry and said it was not inefficient but he did say, or he seemed to say, that it was in need of some assistance. He did not, however, stop there. He kept on going until he went right around in a circle and to this moment I do not suppose any member of this house knows what are the views of the Leader of the Opposition on this subject.

Mr. Pearson: Our view is that it is a bad resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He accused this government of making the worst of both worlds but certainly the Leader of the Opposition did his best to make for himself and his party the best of both worlds, because he did not come down on any side of the real issue.

Mr. Pearson: We are going to vote against the resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He still has not touched the ground on this subject, but it was left to the right arm of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, to remove all doubts as to the position of the Liberal party on this subject. And that eminent authority on questions economic and fiscal and almost everything else has been very definite today in his remarks. I suppose all members of the committee will be very grateful to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for having eked out the very evasive speech of his leader and clarified for the understanding of us all the position of the Liberal party.

Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition did not attempt to deny that there is a very serious problem confronting the textile industry in Canada today. The question would naturally arise in the mind of any intelligent and responsible person: what is to be done about that problem? But that question, though posed by the Leader of the Opposition, was then carefully dropped, and not an inkling did he give as to what ought to be done about it.

Let one thing be clearly understood in this committee: this problem grew up under the former government. I was so rash as to ask the Leader of the Opposition at one point in his remarks what he would do about it. But he turned his back on that question, and we know just as much now as we knew before he started this morning with regard to what he would do about it. Nevertheless, we can find readily at hand an answer to an associated question which may help us to know what answer the Leader of the Opposition would give had he the temerity to reply to the question I put to him this morning. This is the other question: what did you do about it when you were in power? And the answer is that they did nothing at all about this problem, though it was growing up right under their eyes.

This problem did not burst suddenly upon the Canadian economy; these difficulties did not suddenly overtake the textile industry in Canada. The difficulties which the textile industry faces today have been developing for years in this postwar period and they have been growing acute for some years past. And, Mr. Chairman, there is not one thing that hon. members opposite—the four of them who were members of the previous government—can point to as having been done by them to help to solve this problem or even to turn a helping hand to assist the textile industry. They simply ignored the problem.

I make one qualification. My predecessor, the former minister of finance, did something about this. I will not do him an injustice. He did something. But it was to take the pressure off himself and off the government. He directed a reference to the tariff board. And what a reference! He asked the board to inquire into the conditions of the woollen industry in Canada and, by no accident, he did not instruct it to make any recommendations. The tariff board, in accordance with his instructions, conducted this review and reported to the minister in February 1955 and, again, true to their instructions, did not attach to that report one single recommendation.

Why was not the tariff board instructed to make recommendations? That is a question which hon. members opposite have never answered yet, and one which they will not be able to answer. The fact is that that reference was initiated by the former government simply to take pressure off their own shoulders, and the textile industry was misled into thinking that the government was really serious in inquiring into the problems of the woollen industry. Let us clearly understand then the contrast between the irresponsible, do-nothing attitude of the former government and the steps which this government took soon after coming into office.

What member of this House of Commons who has any claim to knowing anything about conditions in Canada could fail to realize that the textile industry was in serious difficulties? The Canadian producers' share of the Canadian market had been falling, and indeed if you will look at the report of the tariff board on woollen fabrics, this recent report, No. 125, you will see it is pointed out that in 1954 domestic manufacturers supplied 62 per cent of the woollen goods sold on the Canadian market. But by 1956 and the first half of 1957 a very different situation existed. By that time Canadian producers were supplying only 48 per cent of the requirements of the Canadian market and, in contrast, imported supplies rose, as is shown on page 18 of the report, by more than four million yards in 1956 and by nearly two million yards in the first half of 1957.

Thus it is not hard to understand why the textile industry felt that their difficulties were associated with the very serious decline in the share of the Canadian market enjoyed by Canadian textile producers. What did we do? We immediately directed the tariff board to conduct an inquiry into the whole textile industry—woollens, cottons, silks, synthetics, everything in the tariff pertaining to textiles. We asked the tariff board to make its report phase by phase as the studies were completed. And we did that which the former government chose not to do: we asked the tariff board to make recommendations. How can a report of the tariff board following an inquiry be really serious, or really effective, if it is not accompanied by recommendations based upon the board's review?

The tariff board began its work with the woollen items in the customs tariffs which was the section they had studied three years earlier. They brought their study of conditions up to date, and made their recommendations and, in the resolution now under debate, the committee has before it the amendments proposed to item 554b which have been recommended by the tariff board.

I have stressed that this problem was not of our creation. This was one more of the problems to which we fell heir when our predecessors—our do-nothing predecessors—went out of office. Surely the textile industry and the tens of thousands of Canadian workers in that industry are entitled to receive some intelligent understanding of their problems and some sympathy in the light of their difficulties. But, Mr. Chairman, if the Leader of the Opposition did not commit himself on anything today, the effective spokesman for the opposition, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, made the position of the official opposition abundantly clear. One does not need to search the speech of the Leader of the Opposition with a fine tooth comb to find out what he might have meant. All we need do now is turn to the very clear statement by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and it is abundantly clear from his remarks that the textile industry so far as the Liberal party is concerned will be permitted to die.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rubbish.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The speech of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a pronouncement of a sentence of doom upon the textile industry of Canada.

I have something to say about this textile industry. The hon. member for Waterloo South was good enough to recall today that I have had some occasion as a native of South Waterloo, a native of the city of Galt, to know something about the textile industry and what it has meant in the Canadian economy.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Chairman, the textile industry has been a very important employer of Canadian workmen. The textile industry has shown in these recent years in the midst of its difficulties that it is prepared to meet the test of efficiency, for no finger has yet been successfully pointed in the course of any inquiry at the textile industry on the grounds of inefficiency. The textile industry has striven to keep ahead in a technological way of the developing needs of that industry.

I should like to tell the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the textile industry has rendered notable service to Canada in times past in days of national stress.

Mr. Pickersgill: So have the farmers and fishermen.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not ask the hon. member to take my word for it. I have here the recent report of the tariff board, and let me remind hon. members that every one of the members of the tariff board that prepared this report was a member appointed by the former government. Not one of the members of the board that wrote the report was appointed by the present government. Here is what we find at page 42 of that report:

> In this connection, it should be stated that the record of this industry during world war II was outstanding; its contribution to the equipping, not only of the Canadian services but also those of various allies, was in every respect a splendid achievement.

Mr. Chairman, I need say no more about the notable contribution of this industry to the service of this country and its cause in days of stress.

But another important feature of the textile industry in the Canadian economy is that it has been largely a decentralized industry. It is true there are some very large textile mills in Canada, but it has been a feature of this industry that it has been largely decentralized. It has grown up as a localized industry and in that way it has contributed strength and stability to the economy of many a local area throughout this country. Let me quote again from page 43 of the report:

> The industry is, by and large, a small town industry. Very often, even today, it is the industrial back-bone of semi-rural communities. It is currently giving employment to several thousand Canadians and affording the means of sustenance to their families. Partly because of its long association with scores of localities, it is part of the warp and woof of Canadian life. Often, in its own area, it provides the only openings for skilled or semi-skilled labour.

That is the industry which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, speaking for the Liberal party, would condemn to doom and extinction. I say to the Leader of the Opposition that it is a poor way to serve the admitted needs of this industry to offer words.

This industry deserves something more than words and it will require more than words to meet its needs of that industry. It will take more than the type of attitude the Leader of the Opposition exhibited here this morning. The hon. member made no contribution whatsoever to the solution of the problem.

Let me now deal with the recommendation of the tariff board and the action the government is inviting the house to take to carry into effect the recommendation of this board. No one pretends for one minute that this modest recommendation is the solution of all the problems of the textile industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course, it is not the whole solution to the problem. We are accompanying the proposal with a very important ingredient in the program of the government, namely the revision of section 35 of the Customs Act to meet the problem of dumping which has been at the heart of the problem.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, surely the minister is anticipating a debate which he expects next week.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am not launching into that subject at all.

Mr. Chevrier: You are.

Some hon. Members: You are out of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am not going into a discussion of that amendment to section 35 of the Customs Act. There will be an opportunity on another occasion. An amendment to section 35 will be introduced soon and when we are asked today to accept a cheap jibe from hon. members opposite and to believe that this amendment to section 554b of the Customs Act is inadequate in itself to meet all the problems of the woollen goods industry then we shall say at once, of course, that this modest proposal is not enough of itself but that is not the whole government program. Take the government program complete and ask yourself if it does not do a whole lot more to meet the needs of this industry than the do-nothing policy of the previous administration.

Hon. members opposite speak about the budget. Mr. Chairman, they were very selective again as they have been on many occasions of late. It will be remembered that the budget proposed measures that were carefully omitted in the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite today when they are complaining not about the plight of the Canadian textile industry but about the plight of others in other lands. This seemed to concern them much more than the plight of the Canadian textile industry. Let me make it clear that with the utmost good will to all other countries interested in this problem our first responsibility is to Canada and Canadians.

Mr. Pickersgill: Canadian farmers and fishermen.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, looking at this problem frankly as we did in the budget, what we did was this. We knew that this slight increase was not going to hurt any British exporter materially.

Mr. Pearson: They loved it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nevertheless in the minds of some of them it may be regarded as a matter of regret. But we did something else in the budget that helped them very much. We increased the tourist exemption—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and that is going to be of considerable assistance to the British textile industry.

When questions are raised today by hon. members opposite about the commonwealth conference, does it not gladden your bosom and warm the cockles of your heart, Mr. Chairman, to find hon. members opposite, these Liberals, showing some interest at last in the commonwealth trade and economic conference?

Mr. Benidickson: Pretty heavy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What big hearts these gentlemen have today! They are filled with solicitude for the outcome of the commonwealth trade and economic conference. More moisture was on the floor of this house today than at almost any other time as their huge crocodile tears flowed left, right and centre. These are the same hon. members who not so long ago were deriding the efforts of this government to promote the commonwealth trade and economic conference.

Mr. Habel: There is no flag draped on our desks, though.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but I believe we are straying away from the terms of the resolution which is before us.

Mr. Pearson: He has never been on it.

The Chairman: It would be appreciated if we tried to keep as close as possible to the terms of the resolution before us.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, on the point you raised, I think we ought to be as liberal as possible to my hon. friend and let him go as far as he will in this direction. We are interested in what he is saying. I think he should be given every possible latitude in this highly protectionist speech.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Do you want the job of Speaker?

The Chairman: Order. As chairman of this committee I regret to say I must ask hon. members of all parties to adhere to the terms of the resolution being discussed at the present time and although some latitude may be permitted in debate we must respect the principle of article 59, subparagraph 2 of the standing order which says that relevancy must be observed in debate.

Mr. Benidickson: There seems to be unanimous consent.

The Chairman: Again I ask the hon. member to keep his remarks as close to the resolution as possible.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I assure you I had no intention of saying anything more about that subject than to reply concisely to remarks that have been made about it by hon. members opposite in the course of their speeches today.

Hon. members opposite had something to say about the reaction in the United Kingdom. It is true that in several of the journals there and in the case of one or two trade associations, where naturally a proposal of this kind could hardly be expected to be received with cheers, there was expression of regret at the action taken, but to picture that as a general reaction throughout the United Kingdom is not only to exaggerate but to distort the facts. I will say that if there was anything lacking in an unfavourable response in the United Kingdom whatever was lacking has been supplied by hon. members opposite, for they have spent every effort in publicizing to the utmost every unfavourable aspect of that reaction.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are now trying to stifle freedom of speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Indeed, they have done their best to trumpet this aspect of the reaction in the United Kingdom and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was at his distorting best this morning or worst, depending on your point of view, when he said that this was kicking the British in the teeth.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister would prefer it I would be willing to substitute the word "stomach".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as any statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is concerned, if you wish to come close to the facts the very best thing you can do is to turn his sentence completely around, make it read exactly the opposite and you will probably come fairly close to the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My time is nearly up. I will permit a question then. I have not time to be interrupted now.

The Chairman: It is the privilege of the minister to continue his speech and if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has remarks to make he can make them after the minister has finished.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is worth recalling that there have been some very different statements made in responsible quarters in the United Kingdom from those that my hon. friends read to the house in the course of their selective treatment of the subject. Here is a statement that has appeared within the last several weeks in the annual report of Patons and Baldwins Limited, one of the largest woollen operators in the United Kingdom. In referring to conditions in Canada they say:

> In Canada the textile trade has continued in the doldrums and it is difficult at present to see how and when recovery will come. The Canadian government have recently announced their intention to increase the duties on imports of wool cloth from the United Kingdom but to maintain, in the face of imports from other countries such as Italy, the margin of British tariff preference. Though this in itself has no immediate effect on your company, Canadian spinners have made an application to the tariff board for an increase in yarn import duties. Undoubtedly the Canadian textile industry is in urgent need of a measure of protection if it is to revive or indeed to survive.

That is the statement in the annual report of one of the largest woollen manufacturers in the United Kingdom.

There is nothing symbolic in this proposal, Mr. Chairman, as hon. members opposite sought to pretend. The concern that has been expressed in some quarters in the United Kingdom stemmed in considerable part from the fact that the tariff board recommended an increase only in the British preferential rate and did not recommend an increase in the most-favoured-nation rate which would have preserved the extent of the British preference. In the budget speech, if I may remind hon. members, we indicated that we were going to initiate negotiations with the countries concerned with a view to maintaining the preference that has existed.

There is urgency in this situation. That is the reason this amendment has been included in the recommendations submitted to the house as part of the budget.

We were told this morning that the government has adopted a high protection approach.

That is a palpable untruth. That is another of those opposition charges that have no substantiation. To make that pretence is to indulge in misrepresentation of the facts. We have shown in the course of the discussions yesterday that with reference to the report of the tariff board in connection with iron and steel items we recommended some increases and some decreases compared with the recommendations of the tariff board and the decreases were in the majority. Similarly, on pipes and tubes, in the departures we recommended from the report of the tariff board there were some increases and some decreases and the decreases were in the majority.

No one can pretend, Mr. Chairman, that the tariff on wool items is a heavy or high tariff. Let me give you these figures by way of illustration. I am not going into other aspects of the textile industry. If you take woollen fabrics summed up in percentage figures the tariff hitherto applicable to woollens has been 15 to 16 per cent. With these modest changes it will be 17 to 18 per cent. Compare that with cotton goods under the Canadian tariff. The average tariff there is 21 per cent and on synthetics 30 per cent. Have we heard complaints from hon. members opposite about these other rates? These rates of 21 per cent on cotton and 30 per cent on synthetics were inherited from them but they left the woollen rates at 15 to 16 per cent and talk about an increase to 17 to 18 per cent, a 2 per cent increase, as though it would move this item into a high tariff rate. One has only to illustrate by the reference I have made to realize that kind of talk is simply poppycock.

Let me ask the rank and file of hon. members opposite this question. Are they prepared to disregard this modest recommendation of the tariff board, ignore the needs of this industry, go blithely forward and permit the industry, if necessary, to die, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said? He says it is not an indigenous industry and therefore it does not deserve to live.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said it did not deserve to live if it could not get along with low tariff rates. That was the whole burden of his speech. What indigenous industries are there in this country by his standard? I suppose fishing, hunting and some primitive agriculture are the only indigenous industries that he recognizes.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the Minister of Finance but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister a question and then he will have another half hour. The minister said that so far as any remark of mine was concerned the opposite meaning should be taken and it would be pretty accurate. The minister objected to my saying that this resolution was kicking the British in the teeth. I offered to substitute the word "stomach". I ask the minister seriously, taking the opposite meaning does he regard this gesture as an embrace of Britain?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, let us come down to facts and put aside my friend's metaphors and figures. This is not a gesture at all and there is nothing symbolic about it as he has sought to represent on this and other occasions. This is a measure that has to be judged by the house, in my respectful submission, precisely on its merits. It was not intended to have any symbolic significance other than its intrinsic merit and the effect it will have in creating a very modest increase here. In measuring the modesty of the increase, let me point out that it has been estimated, contrary to what was said by hon. members opposite about the burden this is going to throw upon Canadian consumers, that all it means is an increase of about 15 cents in the cost of the woollen material in a suit of clothes and an increase of about 25 cents in the cost of the material entering into an overcoat. In the face of that they try to pretend that this is something that is going to hurt Canadian consumers. I ask the hon. members opposite to judge this on its merits.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister just confirm that by the well known trade rules on yardage that apply to a suit or an overcoat?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend wishes, I shall be glad to give him the details of that. If he wishes to know the weight of the goods that go into the suit or into the overcoat, I shall be glad to tell him. Those are the figures that have been submitted by very competent authorities.

I am not going to take advantage of the opportunity which was given to me to extend my remarks. I simply wish to close my remarks by asking—

The Chairman: I must ask hon. members to please permit the Minister of Finance to carry on his remarks. There is far too much noise in the chamber at the moment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not intend to proceed, I simply wish to ask a question. I will close with a question. Will certain members opposite be prepared to follow the lead and endorse the statements made today by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate? Will the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska endorse what was said by this member? Will the member for Beauce do so? Will the member for Cartier do so? Will the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont do so?

Mr. Deschatelets: Yes, of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We shall watch with interest to see whether they are prepared to endorse the proposals to watch the textile industry go to the doom pronounced by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the minister please answer a question? If what the minister is proposing is of modest assistance to the woollen industry, why is he suddenly so modest? Why does he not go farther and give the ultimate cure by imposing an embargo on British woollens?

Mr. Ricard: So smart.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should have thought my hon. friend would have been serious in the questions he asks. I think I need say no more than that I would prefer the hon. member should be treated as a member who asks serious questions, and as this obviously could not be regarded as a serious one I will not embarrass the hon. member by commenting on it.

Mr. Pearson: I do not intend to delay the committee very long, but what the minister has said deserves some notice from this side. We who have been in this house for some time are familiar with the minister's roaring and blustering tactics in debate. We know that the roaring of the minister is generally in inverse proportion to the strength of his case. Today, while he has not reached the maximum of roaring, his case was weak enough to require a certain amount of it, and we got it.

Let us try to get behind his roars and his blusters and see what are some of the realities of this situation. As a matter of fact, we have already dealt with them, but there are one or two questions the minister raised to which I should refer. He talked about our party, and what were we doing? What is our policy? It is very noticeable, and is becoming more noticeable as the session goes on, that whenever the government gets into a difficult position they fall back on the argument, if you can call it an argument, that you had 22 years and what did you do about it. Then, whenever that does not work, and they have no policy themselves, they say, what would you do? Will you give us some ideas? But it is they who are in the position of responsibility and we should look to them for ideas. Certainly if this is the best they can do for the Canadian woollen textile industry, it is not very effective; in fact, it is not effective at all, except to get us into trouble with the United Kingdom which is the country about which they talk so much as being the one with whom we should develop and increase our trade.

As I have said already, and my colleagues have said, all the government has done in this resolution is to get the worst of both worlds. The minister's statement was interesting, and perhaps significant, because a great deal of the time he was completely out of order. He was talking about the textile industry as a whole. Nevertheless, we were very glad to have him do that, because it was quite clear from what he said—and this is one of the implications of this matter which causes us so much anxiety—that the remedy which they have seized upon to help the woollen textile industry is the remedy that they are going to apply to the textile industry as a whole, that is higher tariff protection. They are falling back, when they do that, on the traditional Tory policy. When they ask what did we do over the years let me warn the minister that the last time they were in power, from 1930 to 1935, more textile plants closed than at any other five-year period in our history. If they are merely going to apply the remedy now that they tried to apply in 1930 to 1935 the textile industry has not very much to look forward to under this government.

As we have already pointed out, the minister has made a lot of claims that this was only a small, modest proposal. It certainly is a modest proposal in so far as helping the woollen industry is concerned, but it is not a modest proposal in its implications on our trade relationships with the United Kingdom. It also might lead to other proposals which are not as modest. The modesty of this proposal, the futility and ineffectiveness of it, is shown by the fact that it deals only with the British trade. It does not touch those countries whose imports into this country of textiles are increasing while British imports are decreasing. The minister has said, and I want to be fair to him, that that matter is going to be negotiated under GATT, as is indeed required under GATT. If that is the case, surely they might have suspended action on this matter until they saw what the results of the negotiations under GATT would be in respect of imports from other countries. This is not the right way, I suggest, to deal with any measure of help to the woollen textile industry. But it is a wrong way to deal with those United Kingdom trade relationships about which they talk so much.

That is what we mean when we say that they are getting the worst of both worlds.

They are not going to save the industry about which they are talking. But they are going to hurt our trade relationships with the United Kingdom on the eve of a commonwealth economic conference, which is the one thing they have been boasting about ever since they came into office; what they were going to do to increase commonwealth trade. We know what they are going to do in so far as this particular industry is concerned, which is the one of greatest importance to the British in their exports to Canada. Furthermore anyone who considers this whole approach to the problem cannot escape anxiety over its implications in terms of higher protection for the whole textile industry in Canada.

The minister took great pleasure in referring to certain members of our party and demanding to know what they are going to do in respect of this particular matter. Let me ask representatives of farming and fishing constituencies on the other side what they are going to do about a proposal which means more protection for one industry. Moreover, the proposal does not deal with all countries affected by that industry, but merely with the United Kingdom. What are they going to do about a resolution of this kind that takes action against the United Kingdom but leaves the other countries untouched? I suggest they will be more embarrassed than any member of our party is going to be.

The minister asks, what are we going to do? I will tell him what we are going to do, we are going to vote against this resolution as a futile, feeble, ineffective gesture, a gesture which has very dangerous implications in terms of higher tariff policy and higher protection. We should have learned something about that remedy during the years from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I am not very good at predicting but I have some figures which I should like to give to this house and which show what the Liberal government were doing while they were in power. In 1947, being an employee of Goodyear Cotton Company of Canada Limited, St. Hyacinthe, I may say that our production which was 18½ million pounds dropped in 1953 to 11½ million pounds.

Mr. Benidickson: Does this involve woollen goods?

Mr. Ricard: We lost our markets in Australia, New Zealand and Peru.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot—

Mr. Ricard: They do not like to learn the truth.

Mr. Chevrier: You are out of order; that is all.

The Chairman: At the present time we are discussing one definite resolution and the hon. member's remarks at the present time are out of order.

Mr. Pallett: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I point out to you that the hon. member was speaking about woollen goods.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: They just do not want to hear about it.

The Chairman: All members of this house must confine their remarks to the resolution being discussed. It is out of order to discuss matters which are not pertinent to the resolution which is before us and which do not touch upon or concern the resolution being discussed at the present time. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Item agreed to: Yeas, 118; nays, 32.

8. Resolved, That Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 90f, 99e, 125, 128, 198c, 206c, 208, 208x, 237a, 327a, 376a, 376b, 409t, 409u, 410s, 427c, 431d, 431g, 437b, 438b, 438c, 438d, 438e, 439b, 439e, 440m, 440n, 462d, 482, 504a, 505, 505a, 505b, 597a(4), 597b, 597d, 691(1), 695d, 696a, 696c, 696d, 703, 791, 901, 902, 907 and 914, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Customs tariff—79g. Rose stock, not including buds not scions, for grafting or budding: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I previously complimented the minister for designing these items in the tariff resolution in such a way that we could deal with them as groups. We have already dealt with groups that refer to particular items of a main trade variety. We are now looking at something that comes before this committee every year in the matter of tariff changes that relate to miscellaneous items. However, I should like the minister to indicate as we proceed with these items which of them relate to negotiation or trading which has resulted from our association with GATT. I am not given very much information any more about matters of this kind but I read in the Financial Post, I think just after the introduction of the minister's budget, an article by Mr. Leslie Wilson in which he said this:

> Canadian negotiators went to the GATT meetings last fall not with the idea of negotiating general decreases, but with that of getting specific increases and offering predetermined decreases as bait.

It happens that this correspondent in the press gallery for this reputable business journal indicated that in this section we were likely to find some of the concessions that had been given by Canada in consequence of some of the increases in tariff that we have previously dealt with in this committee. I should like the minister to comment upon that matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a large number of miscellaneous amendments to the tariff embraced within the scope of resolution No. 8. All but two of them contemplate decreases in the tariff. There are no increases provided with respect to any of these items in resolution No. 8. Some of them were bound under GATT. One could hardly expect that there would be any objection on the part of the countries in whose favour there are to be any decreases in tariff, the kind of decreases that are proposed in this resolution.

As to the course of negotiation with any country under the GATT procedure, Mr. Chairman, it has never been the policy—and for very good reason—to trace the course of the bargaining or negotiations or to indicate what items have been traded on one hand for advantages on the other hand.

If I may, I should like to make a qualification to my statement. There are two items where there are to be increases. They are the very last ones in resolution No. 8, namely item 907 and item 914. Under 907 there is an increase from free to 15 per cent B.P. and 20 per cent M.F.N. on foamed and expanded synthetic resins, in logs, blocks, or boards, or in flakes, granules or powder. In item No. 914 there is the same type of increase proposed with respect to foamed and expanded cellulose plastics in blocks or boards, granules or powder.

Mr. Benidickson: I just thought that as we go along in these miscellaneous items the minister might indicate which of them are items that we have negotiated with other countries through our association in GATT. Perhaps he would do that. In the article to which I made reference in the Financial Post it was suggested that if we just go down to the fourth of some 30 items that we are now to discuss, we will find an item that it is suggested was subject to a lower rate of duty by reason of something that we gave because we wanted something in this trading relationship that is known as GATT.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I fully appreciate the problems which my hon. friend's question has raised, but while some of these items are bound, that does not mean they entered into the scope of negotiations at all.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told with respect to a number of these items which were bound that they did not enter into the scope of negotiations with the United States at all.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not particularly refer to the United States. I simply say that we in the opposition naturally have little official knowledge these days of the details relating to items described in such particular form as we have before us.

I said to the minister last night that in previous days, as I recall it, I was always provided with a memo from the officials in the department who were giving full time to this kind of work, and I think invariably in those notes provided to me when I was on the other side there was an indication respecting the tariff items which were or were not bound items as a result of GATT negotiations. I thought therefore that the minister, in order to be fair, as I know he wants to be, might as we proceed indicate which items are and are not involved in our GATT tariff relationships.

Mr. McIlraith: Did I understand the minister's remarks to indicate that where he was able to, say, negotiate an increase in a tariff item, he was not willing to disclose to this committee what he had to give up in return for that increase? Did I understand him to say that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It does not work out just that way. We do not necessarily trade a specific item for something else. We have brought to this house the net result of all these negotiations up to the present time regarding these various classes of items in the Customs Tariff which are the subject of the recommendations of the tariff board. The results are now before the house and it would be a mistake to infer that the negotiations reach the point where something specific on the one hand is exchanged for something absolutely specific on the other.

We are here presenting these items in their totality, and we do not attempt to trace the course of the negotiations down to the minute details or to specific items of negotiation. As I have indicated, it has not been the practice to do so and it would be unwise to say anything about the course of the negotiations or the details of the bargaining between two countries in such a way as has been suggested. It would be harmful to our future bargaining negotiations.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I am not asking about negotiations which are pending; I am asking about negotiations which have been concluded with respect to any such items, and my understanding of the practice is a little different from the minister's understanding. That is why I want some clarification on this matter. As I understand the practice of this house under the former government, it was to bring before the house at the conclusion of any negotiation a statement involving the giving of a list of items for which we were successful in getting an increase and, at the same time, a corresponding list of the concessions we had to make. In other words, if there were advantages—if one can call an increase an advantage—to be gained by way of increase, at the same time a statement was given to this house indicating the list of concessions we had to make.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think there has been some misapprehension on the part of my hon. friend who is, I believe, referring to the original negotiations, the net result of which was a series of tariff reductions on the part of both parties. That is very different from the matter of negotiation at a later stage involving concessions during the period when the agreements are running. It has never been the policy, as I am reminded, to segregate the items in negotiations or bargaining in either case, that is to say, as to the benefits received or the concessions given.

Mr. Benidickson: Did my hon. friend refer to future or past negotiations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am referring to past practice.

Mr. Benidickson: I know, but to past negotiations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I think my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River was under a misapprehension when he referred to his own experience in that regard. I think he referred to the same thing referred to by the hon. member for Ottawa West, namely the original negotiations, the outcome of which is a series of reductions on the part of both parties. I am told it has never been the practice to make detailed reports on the negotiations carried out during the time when agreements are in effect, in cases where negotiations have been carried out in order that a change might be made on the one hand which involves the giving of a concession by the other party. I might also say that the resolution now before the house embodies the results of concluded negotiations. There are no negotiations which have been concluded which are not embodied within the resolution now before the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, but has the minister yet indicated to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada the negotiations which, say, took place in 1957?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I reported on the negotiations in the budget speech I made to this house. Those negotiations had been carried out on this series of reports of the tariff board, and the negotiation results are embodied in the resolution now under debate. There are no other negotiations which are completed. I referred in my budget speech to one matter concerning another tariff board report which is not included in the budget resolutions. In that case negotiations are pending but there are no others which have been concluded.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, that is fruits and vegetables. That is perfectly true, but my hon. friend in that reference was looking to the future, and we cannot perhaps at the moment, under our laws, probe the minister's negotiations in that sphere although we are naturally very interested. I am concerned, however, about the negotiations which have taken place, shall we say, within the last year and upon which we would expect to receive a report.

Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the report given by the previous minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Howe, when on June 14 of 1955, as recorded at page 4750 of Hansard for that date, he gave a very complete report as to the give and take which was involved in negotiations with respect to GATT for the period concerning which parliament and the public were entitled to information.

Mr. Howe on that occasion had this to say:

> Mr. Speaker, . . . I wish to make an announcement about some tariff negotiations which have recently been concluded in Geneva. These negotiations have been carried out under three headings,—

Of course, one was with respect to a new entrant into the GATT arrangement, Japan, but something which is of more interest is the following:

> —to give effect to the desire of some other countries to renegotiate certain increases in tariff rates bound under the general agreement;
> 3. I am reporting on renegotiations in certain Canadian tariff rates which are bound to other countries under the agreement.

And at that time he tabled before the House of Commons the results of this give and take over the years as a result of our partnership in this large association of nations in a trading sphere under GATT. The detail is to be found in an appendix to the Hansard of June 14, 1955 entitled "The results of tariff negotiations at Geneva". I am not going to repeat this information for the benefit of the committee, but I am certainly going to say that under separate headings and in very valuable detail we find here in item (c), after a reference to the concessions given to the new entering partner, Japan, a reference to concessions by the United States to Canada. Then under (d) a reference is made to concessions by Canada to the United States.

This practice was followed in 1956 by the then minister of trade and commerce, and I refer to the June 7, 1956 copy of Hansard, page 4972. The then minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Howe, did just what was done in 1955 and this information is available to all members who care to read it. I want to quote just a few words of the minister spoken at the time he was tabling this document for the information of the public and the House of Commons. He said:

> The agreement concluded between Canada and the United States is one of the major agreements resulting from this conference. The concessions that could be made by the United States were limited by United States legislation to maximum tariff reductions of 15 per cent spread over the next two years.

In an aside I questioned whether it was two years or three. I understood that the executive had never been given more than a 5 per cent discretion, and I think 5 per cent is a discretion which has been under consideration within the last few days in the United States congress with regard to tariff reduction and it has now, probably, been passed.

But to continue with my reference to what the minister of trade and commerce at that time said in the House of Commons. He went on:

> Also there were a number of items, particularly in the agricultural and fisheries fields, on which the United States was not prepared to negotiate at this time. Within these limitations, however, we have concluded an agreement which should be most satisfactory to both countries. The fact that the United States concessions would be implemented in three stages was, of course, taken into consideration fully by our negotiators in determining the nature of the concessions Canada could justifiably grant. Canada has obtained maximum concessions on a large number of products including various chemicals, certain metals, some agricultural items and a number of manufactured products and machinery.

Mr. Broome: Is that the detailed report you were talking about?

Mr. Benidickson: No, I will refer the hon. member to that. It takes up many pages and shows the full information which was available to parliament and the public. If he will refer to page 4834 of Hansard, going on from there he will find, I think, eight pages setting out the detail, to page 4841. And now, if the hon. member will allow me, I will continue, simply to show the type of information which was given to the members of the House of Commons under the previous administration by the minister of trade and commerce. Further, he said:

> I am sure the house will welcome this agreement as a further step in our joint effort to reduce trade barriers between Canada and the United States.

Then, further, on page 4793, the former minister said:

> In multilateral negotiations which involve reductions in most-favoured-nation tariffs, it is customary for both Canada and the United Kingdom to alter certain of the tariff preferences accorded to the other. Most of the reductions in margins of preference of interest to Canadian exporters in the United Kingdom are relatively minor. There were, of course, opportunities for informal exchanges of views on matters of common interest between Canada and the United Kingdom as the negotiations progressed.

The hon. member who just rose gave me the opportunity to point out that the details were again found as an appendix to Hansard of that date. We again find, in 1956, the details outlined according to product and according to the rate of tariffs showing the concessions obtained by Canada and the concessions granted by Canada as a result of the negotiations which occurred that year by reason of Canada's participation in the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

I am concerned about why we have no information with respect to the year 1957. I realize, of course, that these reports were produced in parliament by the previous administration in June of 1955 and in June of 1956. We all know what the circumstances were in June 1957. I anticipate some applause which has not developed. However, we did have a session after June, 1957, and to my knowledge we have not had any information given us similar to the outline which I have given respecting 1956 and 1957. Indeed when in our discussion yesterday I raised this question in all my innocence—because, I frankly admit, I did not recall this experience —I asked the Minister of Finance, as recorded on page 3435 of Hansard, whether he would indicate what he did trade, finally, in respect to the items that we had under discussion and with respect to such items as are before the committee at this moment. The minister replied:

> It is not customary to indicate the various stages in the bargaining. We might have to bargain again with the United States at some time, and I think the hon. gentleman will realize that the practice in this respect is a sound one—not to attempt to retract the various stages in the bargaining.

We are not particularly asking the minister about the course of his bargaining at the moment, although he has announced in his budget speech that he is negotiating with certain countries on items which are bound by GATT agreement. We had a short while ago a discussion on the possibility of negotiations with respect to woollen items in the most-favoured-nation category, particularly with respect to Italy. The minister referred to this in his budget speech, and I am not going to go into that question. I do not think our laws particularly require the minister to tell us what he is doing in this respect. But I do assert that the broad statement which was given to us yesterday is not a proper one, and I ask the minister to reconsider his position. I ask him particularly to reconsider his position in view of the resolution which we have here before us, resolution No. 8. I have indicated that sources outside the House of Commons seem to have information which is not available to us. They suggest that among the miscellaneous items that would come before this committee at this time for review, some involve tariff decreases which presumably affect some producers in Canada, and they suggest that they are the quid pro quo and the "give" for the "take" we have heard about in some other categories.

I think the minister should give us some further information on these points. The article to which I referred, as I have said, referred to fresh smelt and said that some of the concessions given may be in compensation for concessions received in one or other of the big packages such as lobster meat, boiled lobster and brushes for farm equipment. The article continues in these words:

> Several types of parts for new-model cars, i.e., synchronizing cones for transmissions, were moved to free from various rates between 15 per cent and 25 per cent.
> Several types of truck parts, i.e., internal combustion engines about 349 cubic inches, were moved to free from 7½ per cent.

I think this is of interest to the committee. I recall attending a convention on unemployment from the Windsor area about a month ago and the chief spokesman of the government at that time was the Minister of National Revenue. My recollection is that the minister assured the delegation which was large, not only in its complement of visitors but with respect to members of parliament from all parties, that actually since the government had changed any policies which were likely to be operative and were in favour of manufacturing in Canada some of these components of an automobile rather than making it easier for those components to be imported and then simply put in the automobile that ostensibly was manufactured in Canada.

The suggestion is that all of this is the result of negotiations the government had been obliged to conduct by reason of its membership in GATT. I believe I am familiar with the nature of those negotiations and my understanding is that the person who wants a change in the agreement applies to the opposite number which is the chief supplier of that commodity and they negotiate bilaterally and then after they reach an agreement they submit it to the general conference in GATT, and whatever is the result is available to all members of that trading partnership and agreement.

I do not think we could very intelligently pursue a discussion of some of the items in this miscellaneous package if the minister was not more frank in indicating which items are involved in our GATT trading and where reductions in tariff have been provided which reductions are due to negotiations and I should like to ask if he could tell us when we reduce a tariff here what was the other item that was the quid pro quo where there was an increase in the other items we discussed previously in this committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I still think there is some misapprehension here and perhaps I should do my best to clear that up now. It is one thing where there has been a fresh series of negotiations either at the outset of GATT in the fall of 1947 or at the time of the various renewals for the government charged with negotiations to bring back a report to the house and the public as to the result, pointing out what changes are to be made in the Canadian tariff in exchange for benefits to be had in other countries in relation to their tariffs, but it is an entirely different matter from negotiations, as I tried to say earlier, that may occur while an agreement is in effect where one country desires to make a change in its own tariff items that are bound by GATT and is precluded by the terms of GATT from doing so without the concurrence of the countries in whose favour the items are bound.

Mr. Benidickson: Largely the principal supplier?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, whatever countries they may be in whose favour the items have been bound. In those cases, of course, it is customary for the country in whose favour the items are bound to demand concessions. The government, of course, must report on the results of those negotiations. We have done so. The results of the negotiations here are embodied in the resolutions now before us. My hon. friend complains that we did not issue a press statement or make a separate report to the house earlier than June 17 in the budget speech.

Mr. Benidickson: It is 1957 I am concerned with, of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure my hon. friend that the negotiations I referred to were concluded so short a time before the budget speech that the budget was the first convenient opportunity to make them known to the house. In these particular negotiations we were not seeking a change in the United States tariff; we were seeking freedom to make changes in the Canadian tariff items in accordance with the recommendations with respect to those items on which the tariff board had made recommendations. We negotiated with the United States over a period of time with the result that the United States did not make any changes in its tariff. So on that side, as a result of the negotiations, we simply have a maintenance of the status quo. But with respect to the items of the Canadian tariff we have obtained a concession on the part of the United States that gave us liberty to make the changes in our tariff that are embodied in the resolutions now before the committee, so far as those items had previously been bound, and have undertaken to make certain changes in our tariff as the quid pro quo to the United States; so what we bring before the committee now is a complete package, and the results of those negotiations are fully embodied in the terms of the resolutions.

My hon. friend goes on from that point and quotes what I gather was a newspaper article containing, I may say, a great deal of wild speculation about what were the items on which the negotiations proceeded.

Mr. Benidickson: That is usually my hon. friend's comment in debate, of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a very accurate one.

Mr. Benidickson: Let us continue item by item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me talk about the hon. gentleman's reference to the fourth item of smelt. I can tell him that the changes proposed in the tariff on smelt—and was it oysters or lobsters?

Mr. Benidickson: I think smelt is a better item to take.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, item 115b. The newspaper article was quite erroneous in its speculation on that point.

Mr. Benidickson: It was not a bound item?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not a bound item and the reduction that is proposed here in the resolution was made at the request of the Canadian fisheries council.

Mr. Benidickson: What reasons did they advance when they requested the decrease?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to deal with this when we come to that item if my hon. friend wishes. I am just dealing now with the point he raised at the outset. The further matter he mentioned was the change contemplated in item 438d.

I may say to him that the changes proposed in item 438d were made at the request of the Canadian automotive chamber of commerce and at the request also of the automotive parts association representing the manufacturers of automotive parts.

Mr. Benidickson: Were there any representations from the united automobile workers of America?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We did not hear from them on that point. Perhaps we should wait until we reach the particular item before going into the details.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to his answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Do I understand the minister to say that even after these negotiations have been completed it is considered contrary to public policy to make a specific statement during the currency of the agreement? I understood the minister to say that when the agreement was renewed parliament was told what the concessions were and what the concessions made by other countries were, as Mr. Howe did on a couple of occasions to which the hon. gentleman referred, but that during the currency of a negotiation, even though this particular negotiation was itself concluded, parliament was not told that the reason for these changes was negotiations under GATT?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My friend has used the expression "during the currency of the agreement". What I was directing my remarks to, to which he has alluded, was the course of the negotiations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, quite.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been no attempt ever made, and I think the reason is obvious, to trace the course of negotiations, the various steps that enter into the bargaining.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would agree with that at once.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told in particular that in the case of bilateral negotiations no report has ever been made except as to the result, the exchanges of advantages on the one hand for concessions on the other. I think perhaps part of the earlier discussion proceeded on the basis of a misapprehension. I think the position is clear now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could state my understanding. I am not seeking to be contentious at all, but I was rather surprised, if I understood correctly, that once these negotiations had been completed, during the currency of an agreement, there would be any obstacle to telling parliament "we have made this tariff change because of negotiations concluded under GATT" and in another case because of representations from the automobile chamber of commerce and so on, as the minister has just said. I take it the minister has no objection to telling us in each case whether it is as a result of GATT negotiations that the change is being made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have no objection at all on that score. As a matter of fact, there is a large number of miscellaneous items here and, of course, the great bulk of them did not enter into the negotiations at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what I would imagine. I think that clears up the difficulty.

Mr. Benidickson: Except for this, that I indicated to the house by quoting from Hansard of 1955 and 1956 that the then minister of trade and commerce had in both of those years—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Could my friend give me the reference in 1955 again, please?

Mr. Benidickson: The minister's statement is on page 4750 and the appendix he provided appears on page 4808.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Was that a press statement?

Mr. Benidickson: No, it is an official document provided to the House of Commons by the then minister of trade and commerce indicating the effect in considerable detail. As a matter of fact it is headed "Results of Tariff Negotiations at Geneva", and it has several subheadings. The first subheading is "Concessions by Japan to Canada" and the second is "Concessions by Canada to Japan". The third is "Concessions by the United States to Canada" and the fourth is "Concessions by Canada to the United States and Japan."

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will my hon. friend permit me to point out—we have the volume now—that what was reported on there was the result of original negotiations and not renegotiations, except as to the third item. This was a matter of a new negotiation with Japan over the establishment in the tariffs of both countries of certain rates which were bound in favour of the other.

Mr. Benidickson: I made that very clear but let us go to the next year, 1956. I refer my hon. friend again to page 4792 where the then minister of trade and commerce did the same thing. It seemed to me to be a comprehensive review and a very proper report to parliament upon the results achieved by Canada's officials in negotiations of this importance over a past period. My difficulty is that I do not know the period for which the report is given. Certainly it was presented to the house in June, 1956. I make the point that in June, 1957, we were engaged in an election campaign but we met on October 14, I believe, and sat for some time. I would have thought that in 1957 we would have received a similar report from the new Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to GATT negotiations for a comparable period.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid we are going back into the misapprehension that existed earlier. The 1956 report to which my hon. friend refers was a report on original negotiations. There were no renegotiations in 1956. What the then minister of trade and commerce gave to the house was the result of those original negotiations. That is the situation with respect to 1956. As to 1957, again there is a misapprehension. No negotiations under GATT were concluded in 1957. Some negotiations were started at Geneva in the fall but no negotiations were concluded in 1957.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps we can sum it up that the minister agrees that when there are original negotiations under GATT all particulars with regard thereto should be made available to parliament as they have been in the past but as far as renegotiations are concerned he thinks that the procedure he has adopted is quite adequate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. We have laid everything before the house in this resolution. It is true that it is a bulkier resolution than the house usually has before it. It may be that we have been pounding on an open door here because I do not see that there is any difference between us with regard to the matter of the reporting. Where there are original negotiations involving changing the agreement on the part of Canada to make certain changes in return for changes on the part of another country or countries in their tariffs then of course a report should be made to the house giving the particulars of the changes; in other words, the quid as well as the quo. In this case we had a situation which followed the desire of the government to make certain changes in rates that had already been bound and the whole story is there in the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about this problem. I have admitted my ignorance about some of these procedures because they largely involve trade and commerce. The minister may correct me if I am wrong in my understanding, but what is the situation when Canada decides that it would like to approach its principal supplier of fruits and vegetables, shall we say, which would be the United States? Some items at least are under GATT. Am I right in thinking that before the United States comes to grips in negotiations with Canada, under its tariff board procedures public notice is given of the fact that it has been approached by Canada which desires to increase its tariffs with respect to these products. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, that is correct. The law of the United States requires public notice to be given.

Mr. Benidickson: We have not that provision here, I realize.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: The difficult thing, of course, is that the government is very secretive about its intentions to request adjustments with respect to these agreements. They approach a foreign government such as the United States and the United States, under its law, publicizes the fact of the approach. People who might be affected are given an opportunity to come before a certain governmental body down there to express their views. Here the minister says we are not entitled even to know he has gone forward to ask for some of these changes. This makes it very awkward, indeed, I think, in public discussions in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item carries, would the minister tell us whether this was one of the items affected by the GATT discussions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. I have indicated them already. There are only three items out of I think about 75 items in resolution 8 which entered into the negotiations under GATT. They were 438d; 504a and 505.

Mr. Benidickson: They are the only ones in this group involved in GATT negotiations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That were involved in negotiations that have been concluded.

Mr. Benidickson: That is past negotiations?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: It is quite understandable that if the minister is negotiating in the future with respect to some other quid pro quo, we would not have this before us at the time.

Item agreed to.

Items 90f; 99e agreed to.

Customs Tariff—115b. Smelt, fresh, for processing in Canadian plants per pound: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 1 ct.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister just what is the origin of this change, and who requested it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The change in item 115b was requested by the fisheries council of Canada. This is a new item to assist Canadian smelt processors who must occasionally import smelt when smelt is not available in Canadian waters. Most of the smelt which is processed in Canada is exported. It is my understanding that no Canadian fishermen will be adversely affected by this reduction. The annual imports are estimated at $50,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs Tariff—125. Oysters, shelled; cans containing shelled oysters: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if we could have an explanation of this one?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The change here applies to the words, "cans containing shelled oysters".

Mr. Pickersgill: What was the rate before?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was always free before. My hon. friend will see on the right-hand side the reference to the prior rate. The words "cans containing shelled oysters", have been added to this item.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is my point, what was the rate on cans containing shelled oysters?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is on the right-hand side; they were always free.

Item agreed to.

Customs Tariff—128. Lobsters or lobster meat, fresh or boiled: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if we could have an explanation of this item, as I am interested in it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The change in item 128 was requested by the fisheries council. The tariff on boiled lobster was removed and brought into line with the United States tariff. Canada imports negligible quantities of lobster, but our exports to the United States are quite sizeable.

Item agreed to.

Items 206c, 208, 208x, 210h, 237a, 296g, 327a, 347, 347a, 409t, 409u, 410s, 427c, 431d, 431g, 434e agreed to.

1. When of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 30 per cent.

2. When of a class or kind made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I should like to raise a question on 438b. Hon. members will note, down at the bottom of the page, the words, "when of a class or kind not made in Canada". The rate previously was free, but in some instances was 17½ per cent. Am I right in thinking that the 17½ per cent probably was applicable only to the items in the section that are in italicized printing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The explanation is in the note at the bottom of page 21. So far as those items that are of a class or kind not made in Canada are concerned, those always were free. There is no change proposed. To the extent that they were of a class or kind made in Canada, there were various rates and the effect of the change applies to the italicized items.

Parts of all the foregoing, including brackets, fittings and connections therefor;

All of the foregoing when for use in the manufacture or repair of the goods enumerated in tariff items 410a(iii), 424 and 438a, or for use in the manufacture of parts therefor: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(1) If the above articles, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, are for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of passenger automobiles (having a seating capacity for not more than ten persons each) enumerated in tariff item 438a, whose total factory output, during the year in which importation is sought, does not exceed ten thousand such complete passenger automobiles, and if not less than forty per cent of the factory cost of production of such automobiles, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(2) If the above articles, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, are for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of passenger automobiles (having a seating capacity for not more than ten persons each) enumerated in tariff item 438a, whose total factory output, during the year in which importation is sought, exceeds ten thousand, but does not exceed twenty thousand such complete passenger automobiles, and if not less than fifty per cent of the factory cost of production of such automobiles, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(3) If the above articles, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, are for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of passenger automobiles (having a seating capacity for not more than ten persons each) enumerated in tariff item 438a, whose total factory output, during the year in which importation is sought, exceeds twenty thousand such complete passenger automobiles, and if not less than sixty per cent of the factory cost of production of such automobiles, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(4) If the above articles, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, are for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of motor trucks, motor buses, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, motor ambulances, and hearses, or chassis for same, as enumerated in tariff items 410a (iii), 438a and 424, whose total factory output of such vehicles during the year in which importation is sought, does not exceed ten thousand such vehicles, and if not less than forty per cent of the factory cost of production of such vehicles, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(5) If the above articles, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, are for use as original equipment by a manufacturer of motor trucks, motor buses, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, motor ambulances and hearses, or chassis for same, as enumerated in tariff items 410a (iii), 438a and 424, whose total factory output of such vehicles during the year in which importation is sought, exceeds ten thousand units, and if not less than fifty per cent of the factory cost of production of such vehicles, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(6) If the above articles are of a class or kind not made in Canada and are for use in the repair of the goods enumerated in tariff items 410a (iii), 424 and 438a, or are for use in the manufacture of repair parts therefor, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(7) The Governor in Council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment which I should like to read to this section which affects this item. I move:

That resolution No. 8 be amended in so far as the provision for stampings under tariff item 438c is concerned by inserting the words "coated or not" after "of metal" and deleting them after "in the rough".

I would ask my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to move this amendment.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I so move.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this an amendment beyond those given to us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, there are no amendments except those of which I gave the house notice and which are recorded in Votes and Proceedings of July 28.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Broome: I should like to say a few words with regard to item 438c, and particularly those sections which have to do with the percentage of Canadian content which is linked to annual production. It states in one part, where the production does not exceed 10,000 units a year and has a 40 per cent commonwealth content, that the items under 438c are imported free of duty.

It goes on to say that when annual production is 20,000 units, then the comparable figure is 50 per cent Canadian content, and over 20,000 the figure is 60 per cent Canadian content. This item was brought into the tariff schedule, I believe, in 1937. Canadian production of motor vehicles today is almost 2½ times what the figure was in 1937. I would suggest to the minister that perhaps the tariff board might make a review to ascertain whether these percentage figures now are realistic in view of increased production, and particularly in regard to the top bracket, that is over 20,000 units having a 60 per cent Canadian content.

With the greater complexity of motor cars, the result would be, I believe, that a great deal of manufacturing which could have been done in Canada has not been done. Furthermore, this will not affect the price to the consumer because the prices of motor cars are set on the United States price plus duty and then a certain adjustment from that figure. I have had a rather long experience with the motor car industry. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that manufacturing costs in Canada are quite comparative as far as labour costs are concerned with similar figures in the United States. Such items as automatic transmissions, elements with regard to power steering and so on might well be considered by the manufacturers for manufacture in Canada but they do not have to do so because they already are above the 60 per cent. So an annual volume of some 50,000 units in 1937 from General Motors has increased so that today that company will have an annual figure of around 150,000 units. They have room for greater manufacturing in Canada than they are doing now. I suggest this is one item that should be well checked into by the tariff board with respect to promoting a greater Canadian content.

Mr. Benidickson: Am I right in thinking that the tariff board would not, on its own initiative, look into this matter? Certainly it has a heavy body of work ahead of it. Would it not only be done as a result of a request from the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct. This item is one that is bound under GATT. There was a time when the 60 per cent that was referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South was 65 per cent. These matters are constantly under review and due note will be taken of my hon. friend's observations.

Item agreed to.

All of the foregoing when of a class or kind not made in Canada, and when imported only for the manufacture of motor trucks, motor buses, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances, hearses, and the chassis for same: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(1) If the above articles are imported for use as original equipment for motor trucks, motor buses, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances, hearses, or for chassis for same, by a manufacturer of the goods enumerated in tariff items 410a (iii), 424 and 438a, and during the year in which importation is sought, not less than forty per cent of the factory cost of production of such vehicles and chassis therefor, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(2) If the above articles are for use in the repair of motor trucks, motor buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances, hearses and electric trackless trolley buses, or for chassis for same or for use in the manufacture of repair parts therefor, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(3) The Governor in Council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment to item 438d. It has been printed and perhaps I do not have to read it again for that reason. It appears in Votes and Proceedings. I will ask my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to move it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: As the committee is familiar with the amendment, may I dispense with the reading of it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: On the main item as amended may I say this. The minister indicated that this was indeed an item that did involve, in the recent past, negotiations with the United States because Canada had approached the United States for certain amendments to its agreements with respect to tariffs on other items. I wonder whether the minister would just indicate to us the essential items in this tariff category that were involved in the trading and perhaps the value of the trade per annum.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The changes in the items or the descriptions, of course, are set forth in italics. The essential change, as far as rate is concerned, is that the rate has been reduced from 7½ per cent to free on goods of a class not made in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Are these invariably motor trucks rather than passenger automobiles?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; all motor trucks.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate what has been the past annual import value of items that are now subject to change?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps we can give my friend that information at the end.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not want to follow up until we came to an unusual item the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Vancouver South. But the minister will no doubt remember that I made reference to this delegation that we all received here from Windsor, Oakville and probably Oshawa, from the automotive trades industry because of unemployment that was bothering them severely. At that time the Minister of National Revenue indicated that rather than reducing the tariffs, as is indicated here, he and his new administration had provided something that was of benefit to the people that were working in Canada at this trade. Would the Minister of Finance give the committee some information on that matter? The industry as a whole was complaining that many of the things were imported from the United States that could very well be manufactured in Windsor, Oshawa or Oakville but that they were not manufactured there because of the protective element. I understood from the Minister of National Revenue that something had been done by the new administration in their favour. This would rather indicate something that makes it easier to import such things as transmissions and so on about which the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not know precisely what was the context of the remarks attributed to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue. However, I think it is obvious that he was talking about something quite different from what is involved in this resolution respecting item 438d. The changes contemplated here were requested by the Canadian automotive chamber of commerce—

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, surely; but they are dominated by United States industry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and the automotive parts association who represent all the manufacturers of automotive parts in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I was lenient with respect to 438c. I knew that we had before us a reference to something that might be done by the governor in council. I wonder whether the committee would grant me the indulgence of allowing me to refer to item 438c, although I admit that we are on item 438d.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to revert to item 438c?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: I deliberately avoided discussion on item 438c because of the minister's reference that item 438d was the only automobile item that had reference to GATT. But in item 438c there is a paragraph, namely paragraph 7. As the minister and all hon. members of the committee will find, it reads as follows:

(7) The Governor in Council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Have there been any orders in council with respect to this item since the new administration took office?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): None has been made since this new government came into office. But item 438c is not proposed to be amended in this respect at all.

Mr. Benidickson: Not here. I meant since June, 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was in operation during the time my hon. friend was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and no additional use has been made of that power since the new government came into office.

Customs tariff—438e. Internal combustion engines of 348 cubic inches and under in displacement; Parts of the foregoing;

All of the foregoing when of a class or kind not made in Canada, and when imported only for the manufacture of motor trucks, motor buses, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances, hearses, and the chassis for same: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(1) If the above articles are imported for use as original equipment for motor trucks, motor buses, electric trackless trolley buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances, hearses, or for chassis for same, by a manufacturer of the goods enumerated in tariff items 410a(iii), 424 and 438a, and during the year in which importation is sought, not less than forty per cent of the factory cost of production of such vehicles and chassis therefor, not including duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Commonwealth, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(2) If the above articles are for use in the repair of motor trucks, motor buses, fire fighting vehicles, ambulances, hearses and electric trackless trolley buses, or for chassis for same or for use in the manufacture of repair parts therefor, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(3) The Governor in Council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment to item 438e. I would ask my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to move it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Would you read the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is in Votes and Proceedings. This amendment is to item 438e.

Mr. Benidickson: I am satisfied.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Item 438f agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: I would like to ask the minister if it is only the numbering which is new with respect to 438f?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Items 439b, and 439e agreed to.

Customs tariff—440m. Aircraft, not including engines, under such regulations as the Minister may prescribe:

1. When of types or sizes not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 27½ per cent; on and after July 1, 1960: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

2. When of types and sizes made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. Peters: I do not profess to know anything at all about this matter, but I would like to know if this general tariff affects the government with respect to its purchases for national defence. If, say, it has occasion to buy items under 440m or 440n, is the government exempt from this part of the tariff with respect to its purchases?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the federal government pays the tariff duty on its imports in accordance with the provision of the statute.

Mr. Benidickson: I must confess that I do not recall the effect of this particular item. I see that the proposed change is with respect to the "on and after July 1, 1960". Is this something which is an annual extension, perhaps, subject to discretion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At the present time the tariff simply reads "1958", whereas the resolution proposes in italics "1960". It is, in other words, to extend for a period of two years the effect of the present item.

Mr. Benidickson: And the rate of course would be 15 per cent after 1958 if this resolution had not been brought forward?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, if we had not made the change, that would have been the effect.

Item agreed to.

Item 440n agreed to.

Customs tariff—462d. Cinematograph and motion picture cameras for use by professional motion picture producers having studios in Canada equipped for motion picture production; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 15 per cent;

On and after July 1, 1959: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 9 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Is there anything significant about the "on and after July 1, 1959", or is this similar to the other item which the minister has kindly explained?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a new provision for effect until July 1, 1959, and it will give the government an opportunity in the next 10½ months to decide whether this duty-free entry should be extended.

Mr. Benidickson: That is possibly one of those items upon which the Financial Post speculated was involved in GATT trading, but of course I take the minister's word on that subject.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, and they were wrong.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Items 462i, 463b, 482 and 482a agreed to.

Customs tariff—504a. Ponderosa pine lumber (pinus ponderosa), California sugarpine lumber (pinus Lambertiana) and California redwood lumber (sequoia semper virens), not further manufactured than planed, dressed or jointed: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister care to explain the thinking of the tariff board on this item and the other items connected with the lumber industry, particularly the pine industry, and if any consideration has been given to protection, particularly of white pine. The industry is facing very serious problems because of the imports of competing white pine from the United States. Markets are being lost as a result by the Canadian industry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item was not the subject of an inquiry by the tariff board. It resulted from an appeal to the tariff board as I outlined in my budget speech. The result was that the tariff board ruled that lumber which had been dressed, such as shiplap, did not qualify for entry at the lower rate. This gave a good deal of concern to the lumber producers of British Columbia because the United States tariff item read to the same effect. They were concerned that if the ruling of the Canadian tariff board on this item stood, the United States might choose to apply it against imports from Canada, and at the urgent request of the British Columbia lumber industry we have here undertaken what is in effect a clarification to restore the law to the effect it was always understood to have.

This actually reverses the ruling of the tariff board and in effect reduces the Canadian tariff, but it has been done for the purpose of maintaining uniformity with the United States tariff in order that Canadians may still have the benefit of access to the United States market for Canadian lumber at the lower rate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will be delighted to hear that this is one thing which he has done with which I completely agree.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quite overwhelmed, and I thank my hon. friend most humbly.

Mr. Broome: In this regard I would like to say that the British Columbia lumber manufacturers' association were very greatly concerned about the matter and the action of the minister has the most wholehearted approval of the British Columbia lumber industry.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Item agreed to.

Items 505, 505a, 505b, 505c, 505d and 595a agreed to.

Customs tariff—597d. Musical instruments, namely: autoharps, clavichords, harpsichords, harps; bass violas, violas, violins, violin cellos; strings for the foregoing; recorders, xylophones; bassoons, clarinets, English horns; fifes, flutes, oboes, piccolos, saxophones: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment to 597d, consisting simply of the addition of the words, "parts of the foregoing", and I would like to ask my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to move it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Items 691, 695d, 696a, 696c, 703a, 703b, 703c, 791, 901 and 902 agreed to.

Customs tariff—907. Foamed and expanded synthetic resins, in logs, blocks or boards, or in flakes, granules or powder: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Customs tariff—914. Foamed and expanded cellulose plastics in blocks or boards, granules or powder: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment with respect to items 907 and 914, which I would like to ask my colleague to move.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) moved:

That resolution No. 8 of the budget resolutions relating to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom items 907 and 914 and by substituting therefor the following:

"Customs tariff—907. Foamed and expanded synthetic resins, in logs, sheets, blocks or boards, or in flakes, granules or powder: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Customs tariff—914. Foamed and expanded cellulose plastics in sheets, blocks or boards, granules or powder: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent."

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, these are very substantial increases, as hon. members will see. I am not too well informed as to where these particular products, namely resins, eventually arrive in industry or in respect to consumer utilization, but I believe they do become very important items in consumer spending on insulation and such things. I am well aware that a few years ago there was a reference to the tariff board with respect to the general situation respecting resins and cellulose plastics, and as a result we brought in some recommendations to the House of Commons. I would just like some assurance from the minister that these items are comparable to certain items which were recommended for rates similar to these and perhaps the minister could indicate in a comparable form the items he believes to be comparable. Normally I would not think an item involving spending on a consumer or industrial level of the size I suspect is involved in these items to be dealt with without reference to the tariff board. I should like the minister to make some comment on the increases that he proposes here, having regard to the fact that this, again, has not been referred to the tariff board.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This takes us back to the tariff board's report of 1952 on plastics. Following that report, items were written into the Canadian tariff with the rates which are proposed in the present resolution, namely British preferential, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation, 20 per cent; general tariff 25 per cent. At that time, foamed and expanded synthetic resins were not made in Canada. They are made in Canada today, and this amendment is simply designed to apply to them the same rates as were recommended by the board in 1952 with respect to similar products which the board found to be made in Canada at that time and to be entitled to protection.

I may say there are several companies now making this product in Canada, and we are recommending the same rates should apply to foamed and expanded resins as apply to comparable products. Under comparable products I might refer to item 908 of the tariff which applies to manufactures of synthetic resins including floor and wall tiles containing synthetic resins. This is the general item. The rates are: British preferential, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation, 20 per cent and the general tariff, 20 per cent. Another item that is comparable is item 918b which applies to cellulose sponges and which carries the same rates, 15 per cent, 20 per cent and 30 per cent.

As far as the amendment is concerned I may say that this product in sheet form has always been classified under these various items. However, for the sake of clarity and ease of administration, the word "sheets" is being added to both items in the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: These items, as the minister has said, are, of course, being subjected to the same duty as certain other products of a generally similar character. But it will be recalled that these are duties which were put on only after an inquiry by the tariff board, and since there was no inquiry made by the tariff board in this case I wonder if the minister could tell us what it was that induced the government to apply these rates. After all, they represent an impost on the general public, as do all such tariffs, and presumably the government had stronger reasons for taking the action it did than mere reasoning by analogy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We received strong representations from Canadian producers who pointed out that there had been a change in the forms of production since the tariff board wrote its report in 1952, and there was no reason to doubt that had these producers been producing foamed and expanded synthetic resins in 1952 the tariff board would have proposed to extend to them the rates which were recommended by the board in its report on these comparable products such as I have mentioned in items 908 and 918b.

Mr. Benidickson: Since the minister announced on June 17 his intention to increase tariff protection for these particular products, may I ask whether he has received any protests? He has mentioned the people who have applied for the increase.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The matter has been discussed with us since that time by several interested parties, and in the course of that discussion I think a clear understanding was brought about as to the effect, and we are not aware that there are any objections outstanding now with respect to this proposed change.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say just another word about this matter. The minister pointed out earlier today that I have a consumer bias, and I do not object to that. The effect of these tariff changes would almost certainly be to increase the price of these products to someone. I assume that this will be the effect, otherwise there seems to be very little point in making them. Under the tariff board hearing procedure which has been in effect for a long time, consumers and potential consumers do have an opportunity to attend and make their representations. It does occur to me to wonder why it was not possible to have the usual procedure—the procedure of tariff board hearings—followed in this case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We do not send everything to the tariff board. As I pointed out in the budget speech, there are a great many individual items with which it would be quite hopeless to clutter the tariff board. The tariff board's docket is a very heavy one and we cannot expect the board to deal with a multitude of small individual items. Besides, the case here was very clear, and a strong case was made out for the need for the application of these rates to the manufacture of foamed and expanded synthetic resins, otherwise the Canadian market would be taken up by imports from abroad. This is going to enable the Canadian manufacturers in this field to carry on with the same protection, no more and no less than manufacturers of similar products now have. A number of these products happened to be in existence and in production in 1952 when the tariff board made its report, and this is how they obtained the benefit of the rate recommended by the board at that time. There are manufacturers who have come along since, and who are making a comparable product.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assume that the manufacturers began making these products before they had any protection, and that they did not undertake to make them at a loss merely in the lively expectation of getting a tariff later on. I must say that the minister's argument is just the usual, indeed the classic argument in favour of protection, and it does seem to me that before embarking upon protection on an important new product which will, presumably, grow and increase in importance, the time necessary to have referred this question to the tariff board might have been taken.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the committee that the cost of manufacture has been rising in this field and that one Canadian manufacturer who was turning out this product was compelled by high cost and foreign competition to go out of business.

Item 907 as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 914 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say that I repeat all my observations on this item.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions 9 and 10 agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, July 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-44, to amend the Excise Tax Act—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On schedule III.

The Deputy Chairman: When this committee rose on July 30 we were discussing the heading "Municipalities" at page 11 in the schedule attached to the bill. Shall this heading carry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, discussion had opened under the heading "Municipalities" on a subject which applied really to the concluding words on page 12 under the heading "Processing Materials" where hon. gentlemen will find the words:

> Materials (not including grease, lubricating oils or fuel for use in internal combustion engines) consumed or expended directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods.

And then provision had been made for an amendment so that the tax with respect to diesel fuel oil should not apply to the consumption of that product in logging and lumbering operations. For that reason at the resolution stage the words had been added which appear at the bottom of page 12 of the bill:

> Diesel fuel oil when used in internal combustion engines used in logging operations and in the manufacture of rough lumber.

We discussed these two matters, Mr. Chairman, that on page 11 and that on page 12 together, because that was the way hon. members opposite wished it and because in particular under the heading "Municipalities" provision had been made for the exemption of diesel fuel oil used by municipalities in the generation of electricity.

When the committee last sat, which was on July 30 two weeks ago today, several hon. members had raised the question as to whether the exemption might not be applied as well to the consumption of fuel oil in the generation of electricity in mining operations. I gave some indication that we would consider that matter, and I am now in a position to submit to the committee an amendment on that point. The amendment reads as follows:

> That Bill No. C-44, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, be amended by adding thereto at the end of schedule III on page 12 the following:
> Diesel fuel oil when used in internal combustion engines at mines to generate electricity for use in mining operations and other purposes connected therewith.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister for reaching this decision. When we last discussed this item I do not think he did, as he now says, suggest he would give this consideration, but I am very glad he has done so and I believe he has significantly shortened the debate that might follow upon this bill. I believe the decision was inevitable and a very desirable one. Inadvertently and with the best intentions the minister informed the committee on July 29 that to his knowledge the mines had not enjoyed the benefit that had come from a decision of the Department of Justice given to the Department of National Revenue that persons utilizing this product for the purposes of production would be exempt from tax. The following day he very properly announced to the committee that he was misinformed and that since last October the mines like the lumbering industry and the municipalities had indeed enjoyed the benefit of this decision of the Department of Justice.

I do not want to prolong the discussion. I compliment the minister for reaching this decision. I merely say it was not anticipated as a result of anything he said the last time we were together on this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps my hon. friend is correct in saying I did not say anything in the committee on that point. We had a number of representations from hon. members and mines and mining associations in this respect, and I had given an indication to them that we would give consideration to their proposals.

Mr. Benidickson: It was not given to your colleagues in the committee; but, however—

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I also want to say we in this group are very pleased that the minister has given consideration since the resolution stage to the representations of the mining associations and those of hon. members of the house when the debate took place at that stage. While this will not mean a large saving it will be a valuable thing to many small mining operations that are in a touch and go position at the present time. This type of thing helps them carry on. I know a number of mines that are operating with a very small profit and some with a loss and they are hoping to carry on in the expectation that there will be an improvement in the price of metal in the future under this beneficent government.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express the appreciation of the northern mining companies and those engaged in mining operations in the north of this amendment. A good number of hon. members on the government side of the house discussed the matter with the minister inasmuch as we did not have the opportunity to do so when it came up in the committee on the last occasion when the resolution was under discussion. It will effect substantial savings to those engaged in mineral operations in the far north where in some areas diesel fuel and gasoline reaches a cost as high as $8 or $9 a gallon. I wish to add my words of appreciation to the minister for this progressive forward step in assisting those engaged in northern mining operations.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, like those hon. members who have spoken I am grateful to the minister for having brought in this amendment thus allowing the mining companies to profit by the exemption. As was mentioned by previous speakers, and more particularly by the hon. member for the Yukon, the mining operations in the remote areas will certainly benefit by this exemption. The hon. member mentioned that the price of diesel fuel oil in the northern districts is very high. I am aware that the Taurcanis Mines Limited is paying 85 cents a gallon in the Northwest Territories and the price is also high in parts of northern Quebec and Ontario. If the amendment had not been proposed it would have represented a double imposition. The first imposition would be the high price and the second having to pay a tax on top of that. We are grateful to the minister for having brought in the amendment permitting the mining companies to benefit as a result of this exemption.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment. Shall it carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any more discussion on "municipalities"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I should tell the committee for the sake of the record that these two exemptions which have been approved, the exemption for logging and lumbering operations and the exemption in respect of mining operations, will, it is estimated, reduce our revenues by about $2 million. Consequently I have to tell the house that I must revise my estimated budget deficit upward by that amount. It accordingly rises from $648 million to $650 million.

Mr. Benidickson: You will have to change it a lot more than that.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any discussion on "printing and educational"? Is there any discussion on "processing materials"?

Trust Companies Act

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INCORPORATION, ANNUAL STATEMENT, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-11, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. S-11, an act to amend the Trust Companies Act, and Bill No. S-10, an act to amend the Loan Companies Act, are almost identical and while we cannot embrace two bills in the one motion nevertheless the explanatory statement I now propose to make really applies to both bills. The bills have in fact only four points in each of them that might be regarded as substantial or significant. All other clauses are consequential or incidental and arise in the main through cross-references to these four points in other sections of the two acts.

The Loan Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act were first enacted in 1914 and apply only to companies incorporated by or under the authority of parliament. These acts, and the amendments to them that are now being proposed, have therefore no application to loan and trust companies that have been incorporated under provincial authority. The number of companies to which these acts do apply is in each case relatively small, there being at the present time only five dominion loan companies and eleven dominion trust companies. Moreover, one of the trust companies, Western Trust Company of Winnipeg, is now in the process of being merged with another trust company, Guaranty Trust Company, after which there will only be ten trust companies under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister proposing to name the companies for the benefit of members?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it might be simpler if that were left to the committee stage. I am going to suggest after second reading that these two bills might be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce where there can be a detailed review of the clauses and where Mr. MacGregor, the superintendent of insurance, will be available as a witness. Most of these dominion loan and trust companies have been transacting business for many years. Several were incorporated prior to the turn of the century and some had their origin before confederation.

The Loan Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act did not originally provide for regular supervision by the government but the companies were required to file statements annually with the minister of finance. However, by amendments made in 1920 the companies were thereafter required to be inspected at least once each year by the superintendent of insurance, and further amendments in 1927 provided for annual licences from the minister. At the present time the powers of these companies, including their investment and lending powers, are strictly limited by statute and all such companies are regularly inspected by the staff of the department of insurance.

The first main amendment relates to the minimum capital that a new loan or trust company must have before the first meeting of the shareholders is called and before the company may commence business. Under the Loan Companies Act it has heretofore been required that in respect of a new company there must be $100,000 and under the Trust Companies Act $150,000 of the capital stock subscribed, and in either case at least $50,000 paid thereon before the provisional directors may call a general meeting of the shareholders; also, that a certificate permitting the company to commence business shall not be issued by the minister until at least $250,000 of the capital stock has been subscribed and at least $100,000 paid thereon.

These amounts have not been changed since the acts were originally passed in 1914 and they are now, in general, quite inadequate. The capital required for a new loan or trust company should be substantial but may vary in amount depending upon the nature of the business to be done by a particular company and the field of its operations. Only a very few loan and trust companies have been incorporated by parliament during the last 25 years, one loan company and four trust companies, and it seems preferable to leave it to each company's act of incorporation to determine the amount of authorized capital, the amount to be subscribed and the amount to be paid before commencing business, as is the practice in the case of insurance companies. Parliament can then give consideration to any special circumstances in settling upon suitable amounts of capital. With respect to the incorporation of loan and trust companies by the dominion, it might be pointed out that since 1914 no such company may be incorporated by letters patent under the Companies Act of Canada. Incorporation by special act of parliament is the only permissible course.

The second main amendment relates to the form of the annual statement and the procedure for filing it with the government. Each act prescribes in a schedule the form of annual statement to be submitted to the minister but gives power to the minister to make changes to elicit additional information.

From time to time it has been found necessary to change the forms and the point has now been reached where they bear little resemblance to the forms set forth in the schedules to the acts.

It is therefore proposed that schedule B to each act be repealed and that the form of the statement be left to the minister to determine. In addition, for administrative convenience it is further proposed that the statements and the auditors' reports be required to be filed in the department of insurance rather than with the minister. This is the procedure authorized by the insurance acts in reference to insurance companies, both with respect to the determination of the forms and the filing of them with the government.

I now come to the third of the four main amendments. Loan companies are empowered to accept money on deposit and to issue debentures. Trust companies are also empowered to accept deposits and may issue guaranteed investment certificates covering money left in trust for investment, the repayment of which is guaranteed by the company.

All such moneys are regarded under the acts as borrowed moneys. Under each act, the amount that may be borrowed by a company including debentures issued by loan companies, guaranteed investment certificates issued by trust companies, and deposits accepted by either loan or trust companies, is limited to ten times the amount of the company's unimpaired paid-up capital and reserve. Such a limitation ensures that a company will have, in the form of capital and reserves, an adequate safety margin in relation to its borrowed money, presently 10 per cent, to give adequate security for the repayment of its liabilities.

Over the years the limit has been raised from time to time. Under the Loan Companies Act, the maximum amount that might be borrowed was set at four times the unimpaired paid-up capital and reserve in 1914. It was raised to six times in 1927 and to the present level in 1948. Under the Trust Companies Act, the original maximum of five times the unimpaired paid-up capital and reserve in 1914 was raised to seven times in 1931 and to the present level in 1947. In the light of the increased experience of these companies and of their financial stability, it is now proposed to increase their borrowing capacity by raising the maximum amount prescribed by each act from ten times to 12½ times the unimpaired paid-up capital and reserve.

The fourth and last main amendment relates to the values at which dominion and provincial government bonds may be carried into the balance sheet in the annual statement. At present, all bonds and stocks are required to be carried at values which, in the aggregate, do not exceed the aggregate of their market values. It is now proposed that a company subject to either of these acts be permitted to take its bonds and stocks into account at values that, in total, do not exceed the amortized values of redeemable securities not in default issued or guaranteed by the government of Canada or by the government of any province of Canada and the market values of all other bonds and stocks. I am sure hon. members are aware of the fact that the amortized value of a bond is sometimes referred to as the investment value and may be defined generally as the cost price adjusted from year to year after purchase to reach the par value at maturity.

The foregoing change would authorize the same procedure as that now followed by the Bank of Canada, and authorized for the chartered banks, the Quebec Savings Banks, and life insurance companies. The acts would, however, continue to require the market values of all bonds and stocks to be shown in the detailed schedules to annual statements, and it is intended that the relationship between aggregate market values and the values carried on the balance sheet would continue to be shown in the detailed schedules to the annual statement. As I mentioned earlier all other amendments in these bills are consequential to the four main amendments to which reference is made here, and are purely incidental, and are being proposed merely in the interests of greater clarity and completeness.

If it meets with the approval of the house this bill, after being given second reading may, as I suggested earlier, be referred to the banking and commerce committee for further study and at this meeting Mr. MacGregor, the superintendent of insurance, will be glad to attend.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I am very glad to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) say that we will have an opportunity to discuss very carefully the provisions of these bills in the banking and commerce committee. We did read, as these bills were originally introduced in the Senate, that there arose a fair amount of controversy respecting them. I have read the debates of the other place with reference to these bills. They are contained in the Senate Hansard for July 10, July 15, July 17 and July 23. I am all the more gratified that the minister is prepared to let us have a detailed discussion of these bills because I find there is no Hansard report covering the discussion of these bills in the Senate banking and commerce committee. Apparently they did not have a reporter available when they were examining the superintendent of insurance and others.

The minister has indicated that the proposed amendments, with respect to both loan and trust companies, are very similar, although we have to deal with them in separate bills. I thought the minister would indicate to the house at this stage, particularly with respect to trust companies, that our consideration of these bills does not involve some of the more prominent trust companies of the country with which we are familiar. Many of the trust companies are incorporated under provincial jurisdiction. The minister indicated that there were 11 trust companies.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to put that on the record if my hon. friend thinks it is of any advantage.

Mr. Benidickson: No, but the hon. senator who introduced this bill in the other place referred to 10 companies. I felt this should be on the record because many of the members of the house are not members of the banking and commerce committee. We all know that sometimes, after careful consideration in the committee, our colleagues are quite prepared to accede to the recommendations that come from such a committee.

So far as I am informed the trust companies that would be involved in this legislation are the Canada Permanent Trust Company, the Canada Trust Company, Chartered Trust Company, Commercial Trust Company Limited, the Eastern Trust Company, Guaranty Trust Company of Canada, the Premier Trust Company, Prudential Trust Company, Limited, the Sterling Trusts Corporation, and the Investors Trust Company. Hon. members of the house will recognize the absence of the names of many of the very prominent trust companies of the country with which we are familiar because of the fact that they are not subject to federal law with respect to their incorporation.

The minister indicated that there were four significant points in the bills that are before us. I, of course, cannot at this stage refer to the various clauses, but he did indicate that perhaps of the four, two have aroused particular public concern. One is the suggested change in the relationship between paid-up capital and borrowings of the institutions. The other which I think has major significance is the question of whether or not those institutions or corporations will be empowered under the law to make their annual statement to the superintendent of insurance with respect to federal and provincial bonds based on the market value of those bonds or whether or not instead it might be on the amortized values. I am impressed by the fact that many other institutions today follow the practice in their reports of utilizing the amortized values. The minister indicated that this is permitted to the chartered banks and to the insurance companies. I understand that the Bank of Canada adopts this form in its annual report. I understand that this is the practice of companies of this kind in the United Kingdom, so I say that I am not going to make any criticism of the proposal at this stage.

I happen to be a member of the banking and commerce committee and will have an opportunity of meeting there with the superintendent of insurance and other witnesses, and examining very carefully the public interest with respect to the proposals that are before us.

In conclusion, may I just say that I know of no public servant in whom the House of Commons in past experience has reason to have more confidence than the superintendent of insurance. I have sat on many committees over the past 13 years or so and on most of those committees I have found that my friend the Minister of Finance was also a member of the same committees. I think he will agree with me that perhaps no public official comes before a House of Commons committee with a greater respect for the members of the House of Commons committee or a Senate committee. I think he is, perhaps beyond all others, anxious to explain in the utmost detail for those of us who are not too experienced in some of these matters the elements that are involved in the legislation that is under discussion. I said that I regret that whatever the superintendent of insurance had to say directly to the senators was not available in a Hansard. He was quoted, of course, in the Senate debates, sometimes for a persons viewpoint and sometimes against it. I shall look forward to the opportunity of having these bills discussed in the banking and commerce committee. I am pleased that the Minister of Finance has announced that the superintendent of insurance will be available so that hon. members may have his guidance and his advice in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the outline of the purpose of this bill which I understood the minister to say is almost identical with the next bill which will be introduced in this respect. Like the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), I perused with some interest the debates in the other place with respect to this measure and I noticed that there was not a unanimity, shall I say, of opinion with respect to the value of this legislation. Then later I thought I would go and find the committee minutes; but so far as I could find there are no published minutes of the committee's hearing of evidence in connection with this bill and the bill which I presume is coming next. However, I get the impression that the major amendments have been sought for some years by the trust companies and the loan companies and for that reason I presume that they are to the advantage or to the benefit of the trust companies and the loan companies.

I think the main thing that we must prove with respect to these two bills is this: Are they in the public interest? It is for that reason that I was pleased to hear that the minister is recommending that the bills go before the banking and commerce committee. I think that procedure is necessary because there has been a good deal of eyebrow raising, suspicion and criticism of, shall I say, the action that was taken with respect to the insurance companies along similar lines during the depression. It is for that reason that we in this group are glad the bills are going before the banking and commerce committee where there will be an opportunity to hear the superintendent of bankruptcy, Mr. MacGregor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The superintendent of insurance.

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me; I am always thinking in terms of bankruptcy; that is my tendency. In that committee there will be an opportunity to hear the superintendent of insurance, Mr. MacGregor and representatives of the companies concerned—I like everything brought out in the open; we in this group like that procedure—and any other persons who might properly give evidence or information to the committee.

We in this group think there should be a most thorough examination of these amendments in order to make certain that these proposals are in the public interest. From our point of view in this group the major amendment is section 12 with which, under the rules, I am not allowed to deal at this time. However, I can say that I have often thought —as I think have other members of this group—that it would be very nice if the superintendent of bankruptcy would give the same consideration to individuals when the officials are assessing their assets with respect to bankruptcy and things of that sort. We do not see why individuals should not have the same privileges as will be given under section 12 of this bill with respect to valuating assets at what might be a very critical or deciding period.

That is about all I have to say at this time. I am sure we shall look forward to the report of the banking and commerce committee and the opportunity to deal in detail with the sections of the bill when it comes back to the house and is discussed in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INCORPORATION, ANNUAL STATEMENT, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-10, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

266. Departmental administration, $731,410.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to draw the minister's attention to a project which is very dear to my district. I should like to draw the minister's attention to the historic site of Ile-aux-Noix, better known as Fort Lennox.

In a French publication issued by the Canadian tourist bureau under the authority of Hon. Jean Lesage in 1954 this important monument is described as follows:

> Among the historic memorials of Canada there is none richer in interest or more charmingly situated than massive old Fort Lennox. The fort stands in quiet dignity on the southern end of Ile-aux-Noix, in the Richelieu river, 12 miles below the outlet of lake Champlain and 10 miles from the United States border.

This is a very picturesque area where the old Fort Lennox has been preserved intact and where its majestic appearance recalls in a striking manner the moving story of the early defenders of the nation. This monument encourages and maintains forever the respect and the memory of these brave people who paid the greatest possible sacrifice for the glory of their country.

However, Mr. Chairman, this island and this magnificent monument are not well known to our fellow citizens or to our United States neighbours who live only ten miles from this site.

I think it is very important that this site should be better known and more justly appreciated.

I do not intend to outline here in the House of Commons the complete history of Fort Lennox but it is fitting that I should recall, briefly, a few facts which illustrate the importance and value of this picturesque island of which the citizens of St. Jean-Iberville are so proud.

Samuel de Champlain, founder of the city of Quebec, visited Ile-aux-Noix in 1609. The island was first occupied in 1759 by the French under the command of General de Bourlamaque. On the night of August 28, 1760, the 2,000 men stationed there were surprised by a massive attack by English soldiers under the command of General Haviland. The surrender of the island to the English was the prelude to the fall of Montreal and was the last defence of the old French regime. The English established themselves on the island in order to try to stop the advance of the American rebels when the war of independence broke out in 1775. In November of the same year the Americans took the island, but the English General Arnold recaptured it a year later in July, 1776.

The fort was erected in 1782 under the capable direction of the engineer William Twiss, who later became governor and colonel in command of the royal engineers. The fort was completed in 1812 and the island and fort were of great value to the English during the 1812-14 war against the Americans. It was only in 1870 that the English troops left the island for the last time. For several months it served as a penitentiary and was subsequently abandoned.

On May 18, 1921 the historic sites and monuments commission brought pressure to bear on the Canadian government to place the island under the national parks service in order to preserve the fortress and the surrounding area. Since that time considerable money has been spent by the Canadian government in beautifying Ile-aux-Noix, which has become a rendezvous for tourists and picnickers. Unfortunately, not enough has been done as yet to develop the full potential of this beautiful island and that is why I rise today to ask the assistance of the minister. I feel that the department should undertake a publicity campaign in co-operation with the chambers of commerce and municipal authorities of the area to make this area better known and appreciated. I suggest construction work should be immediately undertaken with a view to attracting tourists, which would of course result in additional revenue to the St. Paul-Ile-aux-Noix area and surrounding municipalities.

There is a great need in the island for restaurants, modern cabins, swimming facilities and an amusement park along lines similar to those of Coney island. Such a development would result in increased revenue for the government and would help to solve the difficult unemployment problem at present existing all across our country.

I am confident the minister and his officials will wish to investigate this matter and I feel sure it will receive serious consideration. In addition to the advantages I have mentioned such an approach would give to Fort Lennox its full historic importance in this country and the amusements which would be available to the tourists would be an added advantage. Visitors should become acquainted with the beautiful museum containing many relics from Indian days and the historic military events of our great country.

There are already two very fine docks on either side of the island. Yachts and boats requiring greater depth of water have easy access to the dock on the right bank.

Situated halfway between Montreal and Plattsburg in the United States, only 10 miles from the United States border, this beautiful island could become a tourist paradise, an historic chef-d'œuvre and an important source of revenue if the department agrees with the suggestion which I have made.

I sincerely hope the minister will give his very best consideration to my arguments in favour of Ile-aux-Noix, and I feel sure that if this is done, in a short time Canadians and Americans will find it pleasurable and interesting to spend their weekends or holidays in Canada for the greater good of the Canadian economy.

I notice that the minister intends to spend an increased amount on construction work with reference to national parks and historic sites, and I would like to draw to his attention another important matter.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I now would like to add a few words in French to say that the whole area of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville would benefit from any action which could be taken in this regard by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton). We have in Ile-aux-Noix a magnificent site, an ideal tourist attraction, and I believe the matter should be considered as soon as possible so that the whole area might benefit from the potentialities of this island.

As to my questions, Mr. Chairman, I shall let them stand until we come to the estimates of the department.

(Text):

Mr. Godin: I rise to discuss two matters which might be considered to be of importance in the area which I represent. The riding of Nickel Belt is, of course, situated in northern Ontario, and in discussing the estimates of the department I realize the minister is very much interested in the historical sites of our country, so I would like to point out that this riding is favoured by the fact that the French river, formerly known as la riviere des Français, flows through its centre. This necessarily brings to the minds of my constituents and to the minds of many other citizens of Canada the fact that Champlain in the early days of our country had occasion to travel through this area. Many thousands today know that the French river is one of the nicest spots in northern Ontario and the area accommodates many United States tourists every year.

Possibly, therefore, some assistance could be given to local organizations which have in the past made efforts to preserve some of the souvenirs related to those days. I know the chamber of commerce in my area, in fact there are two such bodies, have done preliminary work to try to revive interest in certain historical facts, and no doubt if assistance could be given by the department, before too long certain monuments could be erected which would be of interest to the numerous visitors to our country and those Canadians who come from many other parts of Canada to admire the site of these historical events in the French river area.

Documents have been prepared by the chamber of commerce of the city of Sudbury and I read a few days ago in the Sudbury Star that arrowheads have been found in the French river bed. These arrowheads have been sent away for identification as it is felt that they probably date back to the days of Champlain's travels in this area. I am hoping that some of the funds mentioned in the estimates might be used to assist the various groups in my area to promote the development of these historic sites.

The second matter I should like to discuss is the tourist trade. At some of the committee meetings we were repeatedly told by the minister that the tourist trade was a matter of importance in which his department was most interested. I have tried to find out just what the policy of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is with regard to this matter, and I may say that the expression I should apply to it is "the policy of the rocking chair". It gives the Conservatives much to do, and it gets the country nowhere. I do not suppose I should say this without justifying what I have said.

We talk about dreams and visions of the great north and yet, as a new member of the house, I recall that we were informed only the other day that our Eskimo Canadians were dying of starvation. We have heard much about the great northland, and I have tried to follow the minister's policy as it was explained to us in the committee with the help and assistance of maps. We were shown roads which were described as access roads, and we were told that this was not where the roads should be or would be. But we need access roads. The minister was asked whether a policy with regard to access roads could be used as a means of developing the tourist trade in this country, and he replied that it could.

I stand here to speak on this problem because in the Nickel Belt area we face grave difficulties. Our nickel industry is down to four days a week, and our chamber of commerce and many other institutions are trying to bring in other industries. But it is very difficult to bring in new industries to a mining area because wages are so high. But I do feel that one way in which this great area could be helped, now that the mining industry and the lumber industry have gone down, would be by developing the area more extensively as a tourist attraction with the help of well designed access roads. In my riding I have wonderful communities such as Gogama and Foleget which cannot be reached by automobile unless one travels through five other ridings from my own. They are wonderful communities. They used to be rich on account of the lumber that is in there but the lumber industry being in its present state in northern Ontario, these towns may now become ghost towns. I feel that if through co-operation between the federal government and the provincial government, through the intermediary of the department of northern affairs, roads could be constructed west of Capreol, such access roads would definitely bring new wealth to this riding.

I realize that a program of this kind would undoubtedly require a certain amount of study, but it would, perhaps, be appropriate for the minister at this time to let us know just what discussions are going on now between the government of Ontario and the federal government as to the position with regard to access roads and the development of the tourist trade in our region. We have heard for many months, about the great improvements which are intended for the northland. We Liberals feel that without doubt certain surveys and inspections should continue; as the minister realizes, these were begun during the Liberal administration. But I feel, also, that this government should pay attention to some of the areas in Ontario which are only partly developed and which are still definitely lacking in facilities for accommodating and expanding the tourist trade, a trade which undoubtedly, in my district, might certainly become an industry second to nickel.

Mr. Fairfield: A great deal has been said both in the house and in the committee concerning the problem of the conservation of our great national resources. I am sorry I was not a member of the committee, but I have read the reports and the minutes and I can say that I think the committee has examined our conservation program very thoroughly. I think all hon. members as well as the people of Canada are fairly conversant with the action which the government has taken under its conservation programs.

I think the minister and the department have this problem well in hand and are going to do a good job. The minister himself, when he was addressing the committee, according to the minutes, made an eloquent and, I think, fairly thorough analysis of our present position in so far as the conservation of our resources is concerned. I know the experience of the United States natural resources exploitation has been well demonstrated by the report called the Paley report. I happened to look at this report in the library the other day. Unfortunately, one of the principal reports was missing, the one on water resources in the United States. However, these reports certainly show that there has been a great lack of planning in the United States, and it is gratifying that some of the warnings which have been issued have already been heeded and that we, in Canada, may be saved from making the same mistakes.

One other matter which the minister brought up was his announcement that there is going to be a dominion-provincial conference on conservation this fall. I think it goes without saying that we in Canada have some of the greatest natural resources in the world today, but in thinking of natural resources we also have to think of soil, forest, and water, because they are all interdependent and they together make up the elements of our renewable resources. And unless all three are conserved and skilfully managed under a plan in perpetuity we face not only the loss of our renewable resources but economic ruin and, consequently, the loss of those things which sustain our very existence.

There are grave responsibilities facing us all today to study and formulate a conservation program on the broadest possible basis. Under the British North America Act the responsibility for most aspects of national resources has been delegated to the provinces. There are a few exceptions such as migratory birds which know no international or provincial boundaries. They therefore come under federal and even international control. Another example is the sockeye salmon fishing industry in the Fraser river which because it enters international water comes under a joint Canadian-United States commission.

We find in the ten provinces there is a great deal of concern about the conservation of our renewable resources. A great deal of good work is being done on this very important subject. It is the split in the federal and provincial jurisdiction which makes it all the more difficult no matter how well intentioned the plans of each province are and there is no definite over-all national program.

The minister himself stated in the standing committee that we have no right to interfere with the policies of any provincial government. He said that as Canadians we can only put forward suggestions which we think are in the interest of the whole country and then it is up to the provinces to try to carry out those suggestions. Perhaps the dominion-provincial conference this fall will help solve some of these problems but we fear that some of these jurisdictional difficulties will preclude complete success in achieving the goal toward which we are now striving.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and for Friday and Saturday as well?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we intend to commence with the estimates of northern affairs and then take labour, fisheries and transport. I am not sure on what day, except that the estimates of mines and technical surveys will be on Saturday, but before the end of the week we plan to take also post office, national health and welfare and citizenship and immigration.

Mr. Chevrier: What does the government intend to do on Monday? I hope the leader will find it possible to tell us.

Mr. Green: It will be legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister indicate what legislation?

Mr. Green: No, I cannot give the order at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: When is it intended to discuss the dumping legislation?

Mr. Green: I hope that the resolution preceding the bill will be in Votes and Proceedings for tomorrow which will come out on Friday.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the leader give any indication as to when the legislation having to do with radio and television will be introduced?

Mr. Green: That too is almost ready to come before the house. I am not sure on what date it will actually appear but I believe within the next day or so.

It being ten minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on August 4.
